Recent court decisions in Canada have recognized aboriginal rights to the land. In the Delgamuukw Court of Appeal decision last June the court clearly distinguished between land ownership and land use. The traditional use rights are to be determined on a case by case basis. The aboriginal rights referred to are for the use and enjoyment of the land according to tradition and culture while recognizing there are other third party interests which also require use of the land base.

The courts do not currently hold that the aboriginal right to the land is a right of ownership but of use. This agreement goes far beyond that. Not only have fewer than 1,800 Sahtu Dene and Metis retained the right to hunt, trap and fish throughout the settlement area, but they have a share of resource royalties in perpetuity, a generous cash compensation and a significant land and resource base.

For all the rights the Sahtu have received, what are their accompanying responsibilities and obligations? Despite the generosity of this agreement, the crown retains responsibility for program delivery and for special economic development programs to encourage self–sufficiency. These programs are in addition to the many government programs the Sahtu and other Canadians are eligible for.

Where is the incentive or the responsibility to become economically self–sufficient if the government is committed to providing programs indefinitely?

The crown has gone far beyond its lawful obligations and is not getting any diminishment of its responsibilities in return. Although the agreement states that government is not liable for damages or losses due to the failure of a Sahtu organization to comply with its administrative obligations, what does this really mean?

If the government does not get any concessions from the signatories regarding their assumption of program funding and delivery in this settlement then it is certainly not going to get it from south of 60 where governments cannot afford to be quite so generous.

The continuation of government's involvement will incur increasing fiduciary obligations despite the fact the Sahtu now have the land and money to begin to take responsibility for these functions themselves.

This agreement is setting a precedent for self–government negotiations down the road. Where First Nations in the future may have a tax base and the economic means to provide for their own programs, will they choose to rely on government funding? Instead of downsizing with the devolution of programs and authority away from Indian affairs, we seem to be encouraging greater bureaucracy with little fiscal responsibility at the local level.

What precedent is the crown setting for negotiators in other treaty territories and in comprehensive claim areas throughout Canada? There is a clause which extinguishes all future Sahtu claims to additional land and water, but treaty 11 also had an extinguishment clause. The government chose to renegotiate the land entitlement provisions and resource royalties even though it takes the position that the Sahtu did surrender title to the land in 1921. The extinguishment clause in this agreement apparently provides greater certainty to the government, but extinguishment is extinguishment.

Modern day treaties are far more complex and it is hoped more equitable, but will they be any more binding on the parties?

The Indian Act was created in an era when paternalistic government believed that the Indian and Inuit peoples of Canada needed protection from unscrupulous land speculators and others, but it evolved into the misguided monster we see today.

The Indian Act created dependencies where none existed before. Government assumed responsibility for all decisions regarding monetary or land transactions and removed all responsibility and decision making authority from the people it sought to protect.

It is time that government got out of the business of making decisions for people. Government must restore the dignity of the Indian, Inuit and Metis people by letting them make their own decisions and allow them to be responsible for the consequences of those decisions.

Government has given the Sahtu a settlement with extensive rights. Now it must ensure that the Sahtu assume the responsibilities that go with those rights.

The government of the day has the right to negotiate fair and just settlements with aboriginal peoples who have outstanding claims, but the government also has the responsibility to ensure that those settlements are fair for all Canadians.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut]

Mr. Speaker, the attitude of the Reform Party reminds me of the story of Rip Van Winkle who slept for so many years that when he woke up things had changed drastically. I think Reformers are still sleeping with the attitude they have.

• (1625)

Their attitude is surprising when they say how generous the government is. I think the Sahtu Dene and Metis have been pretty generous by giving up 240,000 square kilometres of land to the Government of Canada and only retaining 41,000 square kilometres and 1,800 of subsurface and surface rights. I think that is pretty generous.

I would like to think that the Reform Party can see reason. However, that might be impossible to ask of such outdated thinking.

To the three speakers from the Reform Party, how would they feel if they woke up one morning and somebody said they can live on their land but laws are going to be proposed which they have to obey on how to live, where to live, outlawing their beliefs, taking away their dignity, taking away their hunting rights, not allowing them to vote, putting in a new justice system that is totally foreign to them, and in the process infecting them with smallpox, tuberculosis and other communicable diseases?

How can they be so dense that they cannot understand that the Government of Canada and the people of Canada are now trying to correct a situation, an injustice that has been around for a few hundred years?

I will repeat my remarks from earlier. The Reform Party members talk as if the aboriginal people are invading their land. It is as if we are taking land away from them. They can record their history in hundreds of years. We can record ours in thousands and tens of thousands of years. The sheer audacity of this group—I am at a loss for words.

How would they feel if they woke up one morning and suddenly found themselves subject to a totally different kind of life than they had been used to for years and years?

Some of them make statements that they are all for aboriginal self–government, self–determination. Strip away that veneer and I think all we see is paternalistic statements from the Reform Party. It is like saying some of my best friends are Indians. It is good to say it but it does not really mean much, because the respect and the support have to be there from within rather than just saying it on the surface.

Mr. Hill (Prince George—Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his comments. I do not think that anyone would deny that there have been injustices done. I detailed some examples of that, how that has taken place down through the history of our country.

I think also that what I was trying to get at in my presentation is that when rights are granted to individuals or to groups there are corresponding responsibilities that go with those rights. I do not see in this agreement where that is taking place within the confines of the agreement. I see all sorts of things being granted to this group of Canadians, and I think we have to distinguish here that we are all Canadians and we have all benefited from this great land of ours in different ways. Even the native people, the aboriginal people, have clearly benefited from Canada. My comment is that they also have to take responsibility. If they are going to go down the road toward self–government—there clearly does not seem to be any definition of that forthcoming from the opposite side of the House—then obviously there should be this devolution of power, to the Sahtu people in this particular case, to the aboriginal people in Canada, but also they should be seeking to give up any further rights to aboriginal programs.

My hope always was that once we came to a reasonable and fair settlement and self–government for the aboriginal people that at some point we would all be treated equally. There would not be any programs specifically based on race any more.

I see that this agreement does not accomplish that, even though the monetary compensation is paid, even though the land use is guaranteed, even though the fee simple land is given over, even though subsurface mineral rights are given to these people from the Government of Canada. The bottom line still appears to be that they do not give up any future access to aboriginal programs, either existing ones or ones in the future. That was the thrust of my speech. That is my concern.

Mr. Julian Reed (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member and I have a hard time coming to grips with the root of his reasoning.

He suggests somehow that Canada is giving them something. In his speech he even goes on to suggest that other agreements would have given them less. I cannot really comprehend it. Then the hon. member goes on to say we are going to give them these things but what are their obligations. In other words he wants to pay homage or lip service to self–government but then turns around and says we should be making the rules for them and tell them what their obligations are. That is what I hear in the speech.

We are not giving the natives anything. It is already theirs. We are simply arriving at a suitable accommodation so that the country can forge ahead.

I saw a cartoon once where two Indians are standing on Mount Royal watching Jacques Cartier land. The soldiers are about to get off the boat and come ashore and one Indian is saying to the other: "Let them land. What harm can they do?"

Does the hon. member really believe that we are giving them something by these agreements? I have really failed to understand what direction he is coming from. We have already taken. It is already theirs.

Mr. Hill (Prince George—Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question and comments regarding my presentation.

What I was referring to was that the ancestors of the Sahtu Dene did sign treaty No. 11. As signatories to that treaty certain things were decided on, one of which was that there should be 128 acres granted per person under the treaty. What we see under this new agreement goes far beyond that.

I believe that as a people and a country we are giving up something. If we are not then I would ask the member in return where is the $75 million coming from? It is coming from somewhere. Someone is giving that money and it is we as a nation, which includes all the aboriginal people, all of us are giving that. I am not saying we as a race or we as a party or we as a government. I am saying we as a nation are giving up some of the things that are in this agreement. I dispute his point.

• (1635)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Given the nature of the debate today, if any one of you should be watching the clock very carefully you will notice that I am going to extend the period of questions and comments because I want to hear from the Secretary of State for Training and Youth.

I think all of us in the House would recognize her interest in this issue and that of others. But in this instance I would like to give the floor to hon. Secretary of State for Training and Youth.

Hon. Ethel Blondin–Andrew (Secretary of State (Training and Youth)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member. I know that he has had intense briefing this very day and put forward quite a few ideas concerning this claim.

I just want to say that some of the things I am hearing in this debate are very disturbing. It is a very ethnocentric view that is being perpetrated, but then I suppose that is the reason why we have different political ideologies. We totally support the land claims process. In fact as a government we want to make that process fairer and more equitable for the aboriginal people.

It is unfortunate that this particular claim is receiving all of the concerns that the Reform Party has. It is not specifically the Sahtu claim that is being dealt with here. It is the Reform Party's political agenda regarding aboriginal issues: self–government, compensation. However there are a number of things I want to hit on.

Talking about treating all Canadians the same I think is very misguided and misdirected through this claims debate because talking about treating aboriginal people the same is not treating them fairly necessarily.

If you know the language of constitutional debates and of aboriginal justice you will know that treating people who are poor, who are probably one of the poorest groups in the country, who have the highest unemployment, who have the highest rate of suicide—in Big Cove one a month—if you think about the social statistics, the under representation of aboriginal people in the financial institutions, the political institutions and when you think about the over representation of those people in terms of incarceration, poor health, poverty, suicide and a number of other social malaise, you will know that treating the people the same is not treating them fairly. Maybe we can eradicate that view.

Second, I would like to say that you are talking about the finality of the claim. It was my grandfather, Chief George Zault Blondin who signed treaty 11. It was with the good intent of holding in trust those things that we hold dear to us. I know from the history of my people that it was not to forfeit anything. It was signed to secure and hold close the things that mean something to aboriginal people.

This is a peculiar arrangement, a very difficult process, which for the last 20 or 24 years these people have undergone. They voted for it. They want it. We recognize that as a government. By taking the debate one step further, the hon. member alleges that if we have a deal there has to be finality, there has to be an element of certainty, that if we reach an agreement the people have to be responsible and must not ask for anything else.

My question to the hon. member is this. Is he alleging that once provinces become provinces they should not ask for any more transfer payments? Is he alleging that once municipal governments are formed they should not look for any subsidies in terms of tax benefits or anything like that? Is he alleging that any form of government that is established outside of the federal government should have that same finality as well? If we are going to treat people the same, so should governments be treated the same.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I will certainly give the hon. member for Prince George—Peace River the same generosity of time to respond.

• (1640)

Mr. Hill (Prince George—Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I will address my comments to the last question first. That is not what I am advocating. When the municipalities of the Sahtu Dene are formed I would think and hope they would be eligible for the same programs and the same benefits as any municipality in Canada.

What I was referring to were programs specific to one group based on race, in other words, specific aboriginal programs. That is what I was referring to. Certainly, once they form their municipalities and have self–government, they should be eligible for the same programs as any other municipality in any province.

I have a couple of other quick points because I know time is of the essence. I agree with the hon. member. The system has failed and part of the reason it has failed in the past is that they have not been treated equally. People were segregated and shoved on to reserves and they had to live there.

That is where the system failed in the past. They were not treated equally. Therefore I still hold on to the long–term goal that gradually we can reach a point where all Canadian citizens will be treated equally. I noticed that the hon. member used the term that she was interested in a fair and equitable settlement for the aboriginal people. Certainly that is my concern and I think the concern of my colleagues in the Reform Party as well.

We go a bit beyond that. I would say to the hon. member that we are concerned about a fair and equitable settlement not just for the aboriginal people but for all the people of Canada. We feel we do not just represent one group. We represent all Canadians and we are speaking on behalf of all Canadians when we raise these issues.

She also mentioned that she had concerns about the Reform Party's position, that we were using this debate and it was not specific to this agreement. I agree with her. Obviously we are trying to bring other issues concerning the aboriginal people to light using the format of the debate here today.

We are very concerned about the precedent that one agreement will set. It might be used in future agreements throughout the country and we are using the debate to bring forward some of these other issues. I thank the hon. member for her comments and her questions.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, MIL Davie shipbuilding; the hon. member for Portneuf, bilingualism; the hon. member for Frontenac, job creation.

[English]

Mr. Elijah Harper (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have spoken here a few times. I have made some statements but this is my first speech in the House. I am very honoured to be sent to the Parliament of Canada to represent my constituents, not only the aboriginal people in my area but also many non–aboriginal people.

As an aboriginal person and First Nations member, I have been involved in this discussion for many years both as a chief in my reserve, Red Sucker Lake Band, and also as a member of the Legislative Assembly in Manitoba for well over 11 years. I have committed myself to this process for a very long time. What I find is that I have to repeat myself over and over again many times to get my point across.

When we talk about the aboriginal people we have been here for thousands and thousands of years. We have had governments for thousands of years. We had societies. We had political structures, social structures. We had our own languages. We traded with other nations. In that way we have existed as a nation, as a government in this country. When the first European people or the settlers arrived they were met by the First Nations in this country. They welcomed these people on to the shores of what we call Canada today. Whether it was on the west coast or on the St. Lawrence River we were here; even through Hudson Bay, which I am very familiar with, down to the Nelson River to Winnipeg we welcomed these people.

If it had not been for the kindness and the generosity of our people many of those people would have perished. If the Lord Selkirk settlers had not been helped by Chief Peguis, many of these people would have perished.

What surprises me in this country is the lack of understanding or the ignorance of the history of this country. We see the Canadian Constitution being proposed as supreme law in this country, entrenching in the law of this land the recognition of two founding nations, the French and the English. We know very well that the first people here were the First Nations. Yet your Constitution is based upon the supremacy of God and the rule of law.

There is a myth concerning the Canadian Constitution and the truth. Any constitution should be able to tell the truth, built upon strong foundations that will not crumble but will stand the test of time. The Canadian Constitution never did that. That is why it crumbled, it did not acknowledge the truth and reality in this country.

It was the First Nations that contributed so much to this country by signing treaties. What does it mean when you sign treaties? It means that you enter into an agreement with another nation, in this case the settler people represented by the Queen with our representatives of the First Nations.

There were many pre–Confederation treaties and a number of treaties made in Manitoba and today what are called modern day treaties. Treaties are about establishing relationships. That is what it is all about. As a matter of fact, when we say inherent right to self–government, we are exercising the very authority to sign the treaties. We did not need Parliament to tell us we have treaties. As a matter of fact, there should be a formal recognition by Parliament that we always had the inherent right to self–government. It is not something that can be granted by Parliament or by Canada, because we came to the table as equals. That is what the treaty making process is all about, establishing that.

In that process we shared the land and resources of this country from which many people have benefited all over the world. How generous and how kind we have been to the rest of this country. What kind of benefits have we received so far? Look at the situation in Davis Inlet or in my home at Red Sucker Lake. We have poor housing conditions. We do not have running water. We do have unemployment rates higher than in the cities. I am sure that if unemployment reaches 20 per cent it is a national disaster across the country, but it is 90 per cent in many of these communities. Nobody cries about those kinds of conditions.

All we want is governments to honour and respect the treaties they have signed with us. We do not expect anything more or anything less because we have contributed so much to this great country and we have not benefited at all.

• (1650)

We talk about the special relationships. I know we have a special relationship, but I do not mean special in the way that we are better off than anyone. We have a unique relationship which no other group has in this country. We want governments to honour that.

This government has proceeded to do what has not been done, and that is to settle and implement inherent right to self–government. We are not asking it to give us self–government. It has never been anyone else's concern to give us anything. It is a matter of acknowledging that we have always had that.

We talk about the Fathers of Confederation in Charlottetown. What about our forefathers who signed the treaties? Can they not be mentioned in history as contributing to the well–being of everybody else in this country? There is no formal recognition of our people. All we are asking for is to settle the outstanding issues, the treaty obligations. The spirit and intent of the treaties should be honoured.

Many people have risen and spoken here but all we asked for, compared with what money has been spent, has been very little. Consider how much land and resources have been generated in this country and shared by the aboriginal people. I am sure billions and billions of dollars have been made off this great country. Yet when we ask for money we are not asking in the sense that we are begging for it, we have been asking governments to honour their treaty obligations, if only a small portion allocated under the control of First Nations.

If we look at the treaty making process, government officials went back and developed the wording. They never really understood what the native people were saying. First, our way of life and our philosophy is to share what we have so we shared the land and the resources so that we would have respect for each other, that we would live side by side with each and that we would co–exist with each other and help each other. That was the spirit and intent.

It was never our intention to be governed by a government. We have never extinguished or surrendered the right to govern ourselves. It has never been that. When we signed the treaties they were signed nation to nation. As a matter of fact, it was a recognition when we signed treaties that we were nations. As a nation we expect governments not to act unilaterally in the way history has shown us and in which they created the Indian Act which has total control over our lives. It even defines who we are today. This has to be done away with and we have to have a renewed partnership. That is the challenge that faces us today. How can we honour that? I know we have honoured our bargain. We expect the government with the support of the opposition to honour the promises of its forefathers, those they made to us. We do not expect anything more or anything less. That is all we ask for, we do not ask for very much. We have been very patient for a very long time and it is time the government honour those treaties.

That is why I am very honoured to speak on Bill C–16. It is a very small part. We want to be part of this country and we have contributed so much to this country as well, but no one seems to talk about it or at least acknowledge it. If they acknowledge it somehow they seem to be obligated that they have to provide more things or more benefits.

If the governments alone were to provide for their treaty obligations there would really be no need to ask for more funding. We talk about finality. In the treaties it says as long as the sun shines and the rivers flow and the grass grows. That is the terminology used. It is forever, the relationship that we have.

We are very committed to this country. We want Canada to be wealthy. We want Canada to be united. We love this country. We love this land. We love everybody. I often say jokingly that our immigration policy was wide open, and it has been to show what kind of people we have been. We have been very kind but it has been the governments here that have always dictated and put restrictions on. It seems like within our own homeland we are treated like foreigners, we are treated like outside citizens, second class citizens.

The first order of business should be the First Nations business in this country. We should settle the treaties and settle land claims. I speak in favour of this bill. I hope members will support this bill.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Churchill on his first participation in debate. I think we were very appreciative of the words he spoke, his commitment to Canada, and the warmth and conviction with which he speaks.

I have spoken to many Canadians and I am sure I speak for millions of Canadians who would like to express appreciation to the hon. member for Churchill for the part he played in the debate over the Meech Lake accord. I have had many people express to me their appreciation for the fact that the hon. member for Churchill played a major and a significant role in defeating the Meech Lake accord and preventing it from being imposed upon Canadians.

I also want to congratulate the hon. member on his concern over Canada as being a country built on two founding races. I know that my Reform colleagues and I for many years now have shared the view that as a false conception of Canada it is not relevant in very many parts of the country and certainly does not recognize the role played by the true founding race of Canada, the aboriginal people.

I do have a question. On our side of the House and in our caucus we have asked the minister of Indian affairs, we have asked the Prime Minister and we have asked many influential members on the government side to provide us with a definition of aboriginal self–government. I heard the hon. member for Churchill speak about aboriginal self–government today. It is very difficult for us to fulfil our role as an opposition until we have the terms of aboriginal self–government defined for us so we can determine whether they are good and just and will make us a better country and will enhance the role of aboriginal people within the nation, whether it may be divisive and negative on the country. I plead with the hon. member for Churchill. Would he at least be so considerate as to give us his definition of what aboriginal self–government is.

Mr. Harper (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, self–government simply put is to administer our own affairs, to be able to make our own decisions and to determine our own future. It is a very simple statement but very complicated to implement. Self–government entails many things. It means to start developing our own institutions, language, culture, education and our own First Nations government structures.

In negotiations self–government is based upon what kind of agreement is reached. My position has always been that the fundamental basis and foundation from which we negotiate are the treaties. When the first governments met we sat down together and came up with a treaty. That formed a basis for our relationship with the government. In return we were to have certain benefits.

However we have never extinguished the right to self–government. It has never been surrendered. To me the treaty making process has never come to an end. What needs to happen is the government needs to sit down with the First Nations in this country.

One of the reasons the constitutional process failed is that the very question the hon. member asked was raised at the constitutional table. All the first ministers and the Prime Minister asked the same question. They were the ones really to say what kind of structure we have. It was not based on equality. We were not being invited as equals; we were just invitees at the first ministers conferences. It failed because we were not equal in the negotiations.

Sometimes we get invited equally on a level playing field. However often when we are on that level playing field or let us say we are in a skating arena we find we have no ice skates or equipment, yet we play according to their rules. That is the kind of process we have been involved in. We are not being treated equally.

It should be based on the treaties, nation to nation. Once that is recognized instead of trying to determine what is best for us, we should sit down as equals, equal to First Nations. I think that would resolve a lot of the questions.

Self–government is not something which is defined in a paper. It has to be negotiated with the First Nations. It may vary from the Micmacs to the Haida people because they have different cultures and a different way of doing things.

There is the potlatch system. Potlatch is a system of government. We have the clan system which is another traditional form of government. There is Iroquois confederacy. These different systems of government have been here for a long time, whether they will be modified or not. Those are things we go through.

When the hon. member asks for a definition of self–government, it is a matter defining it in the negotiation process or through a treaty process. It is not black and white but it is a process that hopefully the governments are going to be undertaking so we can resolve it.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are competing with each other to be recognized by you.

First of all I would like to congratulate the member for his speech today and the straightforwardness with which he expresses his point of view.

I for one am in this House to help resolve this problem. I definitely would like to see as much consultation and work as possible with the aboriginal peoples, the Indians, the Metis and the Inuit so we can resolve these long term outstanding settlements and agreements.

I know the settler people are here. I know the white man took over, those immigrants when they first landed. Perhaps the hon. member for Churchill would appreciate the current 1 per cent rule the Liberal government has and he would have maintained control.

Repetition is important; it is a fact of life. If he has to give a similar speech again and if he has to repeat it five or six times, I would encourage him to do that.

There have been a lot of wrongs committed. A lot of injustices to the native peoples have been perpetrated over the years. We in this House are not the ones who have perpetrated this crime nor made these mistakes. We are here to learn from these mistakes and we are here to try to make it better.

It is in this light and in this vein I wish to address the hon. member and let him know that what we are concerned about is the consultative process. Will he agree with us or put forward the next time he speaks the type of self–government the native people or the aboriginal people want will comply with the current law? He has his problems with the other tribes and other nations. There is a problem with that interfacing with the laws of the land as they are today. It is a fact of life that the Government of Canada is here and it has to be negotiated with.

Will the hon. member try to put an answer in the context that what they are seeking for in terms of self–government will in fact comply with the laws we have today? How can we get over that hurdle? What would his response be on that basis?

Mr. Harper (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, certainly the problem we are wrestling with is not as a result of our laws. It is as a result of the laws that were passed here a long, long time ago, well over 100 years ago.

Many of our people have been put outside of their communities as a result of laws that were passed here. If we had exercised our own laws many of our people would still be enjoying the benefits of our societies. When we are concerned about leaving out people or people not being represented or losing their rights, the principles of that will be maintained by our people.

Certainly, when we are talking about self–government structures we cannot operate with the kind of laws that have been put in place. If we did that all we would be doing would be implementing the colonial oppressive policies on ourselves. Therefore, a new kind of system would have to be recognized and a level of government would have to be established in which we would be able to exercise jurisdiction within our own territory.

When talking about justice, whose justice are we talking about? Usually the dominant society has the upper hand in dispelling justice which is quite different from ours in terms of value systems. We could get into a big debate about that, but I certainly think the aboriginal people in their own traditions have maintained the kind of structures that would provide all kinds of rights and benefits to our communities.

I do not see any kind of loss of rights if we were to administer our own jurisdiction in our own territory. I have no hesitation in saying that.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to rise and respond to the hon. member for Churchill.

This really is what Parliament is all about. I am personally very honoured to have been here for the hon. member's first intervention and to have heard him speak so passionately and honestly about his life, his experiences, dreams and aspirations. Obviously it came from the heart. It is not something I could live; I cannot be in the hon. member's skin. We can learn a tremendous amount from each other.

I want to assure the hon. member, other members in this House and others in our land that our role here is to oppose the government, to challenge its program and to try to ensure that by a spirited and healthy debate we end up with a better solution than we would have had without that debate.

• (1710)

I thank the hon. member for his intervention. I look forward to more in the future.

What would the member do faced with this situation? The situation is that all across the land on reservations there are all of the social ills and the unemployment the hon. member described. How do we go about changing that, not just on reservations but for urban Indians as well?

Mr. Harper (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, first of all we would like to be in a position to make our own decisions. We would like to exercise our own jurisdiction in respect of our territories. At the same time we would expect the government to honour its treaties so that we would have the resources and the financial wherewithal to address and alleviate some of those problems that are so apparent in our communities such as unemployment, the high suicide rates and the economic conditions.

We are not asking for any special funding or to consider anything special. All we are asking is that the government honour its treaty obligations. Housing, medicare and education are under the treaties, just to give an example of what we are talking about.

What is important is that the government tends to make decisions for us and that has to stop. By not supporting this bill I think what is being said is that the hon. member is agreeing to the policy which exists today. What is being said to me is that he is not agreeing with the government's policy and legislation to allow us to make those decisions.

With respect, the amount of dollars we are talking about is very small compared to the spending government has had. As I said, we have been very generous. We are not asking for billions of dollars in this package. We are asking for a very small amount of money compared to the kind of money spent overall.

My first answer is, allow us to control it and honour your commitment by supporting this bill. Actions speaker louder than words.

Mr. Anawak: Mr. Speaker, just a point of order to correct what I believe is a small error. In Canada we have reserves, not reservations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I am not sure that was a point of order. However, the point has been made and I thank the parliamentary secretary for his intervention.

Let me add also my own remarks that I feel honoured to have been in the Chair on the occasion of the member for Churchill's first intervention and debate on the floor of the House of Commons.

Let me also compliment all members in the House, particularly those who have participated in the debate and even those who did not participate through this intervention but who listened very attentively. The tone was most encouraging and the sensitivity in respect of the debate is much appreciated by the Chair. I compliment all members present.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I would like first to thank the hon. member for Churchill who gave us a lesson in history. He spoke from his heart and also with great wisdom, and I can only hope that his speech will help improve our relations with aboriginal nations, as well as our understanding of those people.

This having been said, we have before us a bill to approve, give effect and declare valid the comprehensive land claim agreement of the Sahtu Dene and Metis, which was signed on September 6, 1993. The region covered is a territory of 280,000 square kilometres, in which live some 2,000 people representing five communities. The Bloc Quebecois supports this legislation.

At this point, I would like, for the benefit of those who are listening here and across the country, to give a chronology of the events which have led to the tabling of this bill today.

In 1976, the federal government started negotiating under a land claim process with the Dene and the Metis of the Mackenzie Valley. In 1981, these negotiations led to a final agreement which was concluded in April of 1990. On September 6, 1993, the agreement was signed by the Queen and the Sahtu Tribal Council, in Fort Norman, Northwest Territories.

A plebiscite was held from July 5 to July 8, 1993, to ratify the agreement. The agreement was approved by 85 per cent of the Dene and by 99 per cent of the Metis. On January 13 and February 11, 1994, the tribal council approved certain amendments to the agreement. Just what is this agreement all about?

First, its purpose is to achieve certainty and clarity of rights with respect to ownership and use of some lands and their natural resources. The agreement is divided in two parts. The first one deals with issues such as self–government, royalties on resources, taxation, financial and economic measures, rights over water, as well as wildlife harvesting and management.

Financial compensations totalling $75 million, in dollars of 1990, are to be provided over a period of about 15 years. An annual proportion of royalties collected on resources from the Mackenzie Valley is also covered by the agreement. As well, an annual proportion of royalties collected on resources from the Norman Wells oil and gas development is also covered. Indeed, 7.5 per cent of the first two million dollars collected by the government during a given year and 1.5 per cent of any additional amount will be used as royalties.

The agreement also includes participation in land use planning, renewable resources management, water and land control, as well as preservation of the Sahtu heritage in the region covered. Federal, territorial and municipal laws will continue to apply to Sahtu Dene and Metis, and also to the land.

A Renewable Resources Board is created. This board is a legal entity, which means that it can take legal action and can itself be sued. It can also set policies and propose regulations on the commercial harvesting of wild animals and on commercial activities related to wildlife. It will be the main wildlife management organization in the region. It is composed of seven members appointed jointly by the federal government and the territorial government, with at least three members chosen from a list submitted by the Sahtu Tribal Council.

I said that this agreement was in two parts. The second part concerns land and distinguishes between areas with rights to underground resources and areas with only surface rights. Property rights cover 41,437 square kilometres in the Mackenzie Valley region, with mining rights for 1,813 square kilometres.

At this time, I think it is appropriate to talk about the aboriginal question in a broader way, going beyond the specific subject before us now and putting it in the larger context in which it belongs anyway and on which the rest must necessarily be based. Perhaps we could begin with the native issue in Quebec.

I remember a song heard fairly often on radio and television in the 1970s, which told the story of what our colleague from Nunatsiaq was talking about earlier, I believe.

In the beginning, in his tent, a very easygoing native man received a white man, who asked permission to plant a stake, just a single little stake. The reaction was, "Well, my God, it is just a single stake, so why object, it is so simple and easy; it is not much, go ahead, plant your stake". Some days passed and he was asked permission for a second stake; a few more days went by and a request came for a third stake. Several months later, after a series of stakes had been installed across the forest, he was asked to let a wire go through. Every time, the native had always agreed in good faith and complied with great pleasure.

Once the wire was installed, he found himself with concrete, highways, houses, buildings and he finally had to move his teepee. The song goes on for about three minutes, but I have to shorten it. However, I believe that it expressed a certain inescapable reality.

Many people have asked me, and I am sure that many of my colleagues in the Bloc have been asked the same question, Mr. Speaker, "What will Quebec do about the native people?" That is the wrong question. Not only is it the wrong question, but it is one which should not be asked in the first place.

First, we are not doing anything about the native people. If something is to be done, it will be done together, as equals. It is not up to us or anyone else to decide what must be done about native issues. This is a matter that must be negotiated and covered by agreements between equal nations. The question arises how this translates in Quebec and how our perspectives on the matter have developed since the sixties.

I may recall that on April 8, 1963, the Government of Quebec resumed contact, administratively speaking, with the aboriginal peoples within Quebec territory. Until then, the federal government's responsibility was paramount and it still is today. The Government of Quebec at the time established the Ministère des richesses naturelles et de la Direction générale du Nouveau Québec. Within New Quebec, the department was responsible, with the exception of those areas that were already administered by Quebec, for the administration of justice, provincial police services and the services of the department of lands and forests. At the time, the purpose was to develop natural resources.

Not until federal responsibility for community and municipal services was transferred to the province 17 years later, in February 1981, was the direction générale du Nouveau Québec able to start concentrating on education, although it had, as in 1963, stated its desire to respect the Inuit language and culture.

By the way, I would like to commend the hon. member for Nunatsiaq on using his mother tongue. I don't understand when he speaks in his own language, but we must realize that language communicates culture. When I speak French, I am able to express ideas in a certain way, and I would be unable to do so in English because language is a reflection of culture. When the hon. member speaks in his native tongue, we don't understand, and I think that is his message to us. We don't understand. And when we realize that we don't understand, perhaps then we will start showing respect, and he has my respect.

To continue this short history, in the early seventies, the federal government published a White Paper on native policy. Quebec established the Commission de négociation des affaires indiennes, whose purpose was to work together with the department of intergovernmental affairs and other departments involved in negotiations with the Confederation of Indians of Quebec, and with the federal department of Indian affairs and Northern Development regarding Quebec's responsibilities vis–à–vis the Indians of Quebec or Indian affairs.

The Commission de négociation des affaires indiennes was also supposed to make recommendations on an integrated policy on Indian affairs and to propose measures to be taken in order to implement the policies concerning Indian affairs.

On November 11, 1975, the Quebec government signed the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement with the Crees and the Inuit. On January 31, 1978, it signed the Northeastern Quebec Agreement with the Naskapis of Quebec.

We were then facing a new reality in Quebec government departments: the aboriginal reality. And the whole of the Quebec policy on aboriginal people was summed up in two agreements only. Therefore, we had to give ourselves a more comprehensive policy; that is why on January 18, 1978, the Secrétariat des activités gouvernementales en milieu amérindien et inuit was created and the Direction générale du Nouveau–Québec and the Bureau de coordination de l'entente were abolished.

Then came the eighties. In January 1987, the secrétariat was given a new name, Secrétariat aux affaires autochtones, and its new mandate was to negotiate global agreements in co–operation with the various departments involved. Let me remind you that the preamble of the Charter of the French Language says that "the National Assembly of Québec recognizes the right of the Amerinds and the Inuit of Québec, the first inhabitants of this land, to preserve and develop their original language and culture".

And self–government is certainly the focus of discussions between aboriginal people and governments. It was the subject of four constitutional conferences held in Ottawa between 1983 and 1987. There again, they talked about the principle of the inherent right to self–government, but unfortunately that right was not entrenched in the Canadian Constitution. Natives have to get some political leverage if they want to really exercise that self–government because this is the way to their economic self–sufficiency.

Self–government means giving aboriginal people complete jurisdiction over health, education and social services they receive. It means giving them full jurisdiction also over the administration of justice, environment, public safety and land and forest management.

I would now like to present this House with some statistics that should give it some food for thought. It should interest as well those who are watching this debate at home.

In 1991, there were, in Quebec, 39,590 Indians living either on reserves, in establishments or on treaty lands, whereas 15,794 Indians lived off their reserves. On top of that, there were 6,400 Inuit living in northern settlements in the Hudson and Ungava Bay area.

We are therefore dealing with a native population of 61,754 according to the 1991 Census, which represents one per cent of the total population in Quebec. The lands set aside for them amount to 14,770 square kilometres. The main native peoples or nations are the Mohawks, with close to 16,000 members; the Montagnais, with more than 11,000; the Crees, with a little more than 10,000; and the Algonquins, with more than 6,000.

Nations vary in size from 242 for the Malecites to more than 15,000, very close to 16,000 for the Mohawks. Fifty per cent of these communities have less than 500 members. Their annual birth rate is 2.4 compared to 1.4 for other Quebecers. Seventy per cent of Indians living on reserves do not have a high school diploma. Their suicide rate is three times that of Quebecers. The native infant mortality rate is three and a half times higher than in the general population. Life expectancy for Indians on reserves is 8.6 years shorter than for the rest of the population. Indians account for 2.74 per cent of inmates.

Here are now a few statistics for Canada as a whole, again as food for thought. Twenty–five per cent of natives are unemployed, whereas Montreal, with 19 per cent, has the highest unemployment rate in the country.

The average income is 33 per cent lower. The unemployment rate for native people on reserves is 33 per cent, and 16 per cent of natives say that their race is a barrier to employment, which proves that racism and discrimination are probably fairly prevalent.

In 1990, 13 per cent of native adults did not have any income, compared to 9 per cent for the general Canadian population. Only 5 per cent of natives had an income in excess of $40,000 in 1990, compared to 15 per cent among Canadians in general. Seventeen per cent had an income of less that $2,000 and 29 per cent were on welfare. Forty–two per cent of native welfare recipients lived on reserves.

The main problems encountered by natives are, in descending order of importance: chronic unemployment, alcoholism, family violence, suicide, sexual abuse, rape. Six per cent of natives have diabetes compared to two per cent in the general population, even though this disease was unknown among native people in the 1940s.

Forty–five per cent of Indians on reserves claim that their absence of mobility is a problem. Twenty per cent of native housing is in need of major repairs against eight per cent for all dwellings in Quebec. Ten per cent of native dwellings did not have toilets, less than half were heated with electricity. Nevertheless, the average rent was $410 in 1991.

Crib death among native infants is 4.7 times higher that the national rate, and deaths in the 15 to 44 age group resulting from drowning, fire, shooting and vehicle accidents, can often be linked to alcohol abuse. The suicide rate among young adults is 22 per 100,000, twice the national average.

The only way to give back their dignity to the First Nations is to treat them as equals. Nobody has a secret formula for reaching the results which must be obtained before the next century, but everyone should keep an open mind and a fair attitude. We could thus negotiate on an equal basis and come to suitable agreements like the one signed with the Dene, which is before us tonight.

[English]

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to congratulate the Sahtu Dene for the very professional manner in which they have pursued this agreement and the help they have been to me and to others in trying to get a handle on this debate and exactly what is in the bill.

It is my view that in Bill C–16 the majority of what is written is innovative, imaginative and very worth while.

At the outset I want to point out that I will be raising some points while speaking about the bill. The intent is to make it better and to understand what we are talking about. This is probably one of the very first times that there has ever been a debate in the House of Commons over such an important issue. These issues come before the House and because they are politically sensitive or motherhood issues they never end up being debated honestly. It is this lack of honest, vigorous debate which may have allowed us to arrive in the position we are at today.

It is our job, our function, our responsibility not to automatically assume that everything the government presents is right and holy and good. Our job is to assume that everything the government presents is exactly the opposite.

An hon. member: And can be improved.

• (1735)

Mr. McClelland: And can be improved. It is in that spirit I make my comments today and I know my hon. colleagues do as well.

We are all aware that Bill C–16 will pass eventually. It will pass intact or with moderate or very little change. The question then is this: Why am I and my colleagues so impassioned about this debate? That is the question. Why would we even bother?

The other question is: This is a debate of incredible importance, at least in our view, to the nation, and yet how much ink does it get? Where are the priorities in the nation? We are talking about the First Nations, the first people in our country. They have traditionally, we know and acknowledge, been the recipients of something less than the kind of treatment of which we should be proud. Yet for the very first time it is being debated. Unfortunately it will probably get very little interest outside the House.

Why then do I think this is the most important speech I have given in the House thus far, and why do I care so deeply that what we do is right? It is because the relationship between the first people and the immigrants, that is all of us that they welcomed to this continent, has largely been one of paternalism, of manipulation, of neglect and of isolation.

We acknowledge that there are two sides to every story. While we—I am speaking essentially as a white person in this country—have not much to be proud about, neither do our native brothers have very much to be proud about either. We have to recognize that there are two sides to this story and responsibilities on both sides. We must accept responsibility, but so must the aboriginal people accept responsibility for their lot in life.

That is not to say there have not been examples of inspiration and achievement. But in general, especially on the prairies where I am from, we have nothing to be proud of. By using that as a starting point and as a base, what can we do, where do we go from here?

As in everything we have to recognize the situation as it is, not as we would wish it to be. We have to recognize both sides of the issue; those who will receive the benefits of this agreement, and also those who are going to be paying the bills. Because we are all, as it was mentioned earlier by an hon. colleague, and we have to make it work. If it is not good for both sides it will not be good for either.

Aboriginal Canadians comprise about 5 per cent of the population, and yet aboriginal Canadians are over–represented in every statistic that speaks to failure in our society and they are under represented in most statistics that represent success. This was so eloquently put across to all of us by the hon. member for Churchill when he talked about his experiences. We know this, it is not something we are debating at all.

How did this unholy circumstance happen? Did it happen by accident? I submit it did not. It happened because our forefathers chose not to accept the aboriginals as brother human beings, equal in every respect, in human rights and in dignity. Instead, aboriginal Canadians were treated as innocents, they were in need of the benevolent protection of the state. Aboriginal Canadians were herded on to reserves, isolated from the world, out of sight and out of mind. That has largely been the situation for many years, one of benevolent ignorance, "let's not pay attention to it and it won't be a problem".

It does not matter whether the intention was good or evil. The result today is the circumstance that aboriginal people largely endure, a circumstance in many respects no better than South Africa's discredited system of apartheid, so deservedly denounced in all the civilized world. Aas we debate today, free elections are under way in South Africa. Another nail is being driven into the coffin of the marginalization of indigenous peoples around the world. South Africans should and must be congratulated for this giant leap forward and that indeed is a giant leap forward for mankind.

However, I must get back to Bill C–16, the comprehensive land claims settlement of the Sahtu Dene and Metis. How would the bill lead to a better way of life for those involved and will this settlement lead to self–sufficiency, pride, self–respect and self–confidence of the Sahtu Dene as a people? That is the question. If what we are talking about would lead to self–respect, pride, self–confidence and self–sufficiency, then it would be a very small price to pay. It is what we all want to achieve. It is where we want to be at the end of the day.

Unfortunately I think the answer is a qualified no. I do not know if it is going to achieve the noble objectives which are envisioned for it. While there are aspects of the bill my colleagues have already questioned, I need to point out that 16,000 square miles is an awful lot of land for just 2,200 people, not to mention $130 million over 15 years.

Why do the Sahtu Dene need so much land and why does the government pay them so much money, while at the same time they are still entitled to all the benefits all other status Indians have today or may receive in the future?

Sixteen thousand square miles is a lot of land. However keep in mind that over much of the year it is covered with ice and snow. Also keep in mind there really are not a whole lot of people up there and the traditional way of life for the Sahtu Dene is trapping, hunting and fishing. Not a whole lot of people are trying to get into that land either, except to explore and get at the resources and we still have that opportunity.

As I understand it the Sahtu Dene will be the custodians of the land. We should not make any mistake. The land will be theirs in fee simple. However, except for about 700 square miles all Canadians will have access, with permission where possible, provided they do not harm the land or destroy the environment.

We can look at the immense amount of land and look at the Sahtu Dene and Metis because there will not be any reserves. This is all settlement land. We can look at it as a big national park but the park rangers are the traditional inhabitants, the Sahtu Dene and Metis. While they will be getting the land in fee simple, they do not own the resources of the vast majority of the land. They own the resources of about 700 square miles. That is an important consideration.

However, if resources are found in any of that land, they will via royalties be able to participate in the profit. The money, $75 million to be paid out over 15 years, is intended to help develop a commercial infrastructure and is paid to the band council. With the money they can set up hunting lodges—if handguns or rifles are not banned—and with fishing and guiding try to get some tourist trade going.

The idea of the Sahtu Dene is to participate, to be doing something, rather than sitting back and for this they are to be recognized and congratulated.

The reality is that we, the Government of Canada, are going to pay out $75 million over 15 years. The money is not going to disappear. It will be recycled through the band to the community. I think that financial commitment may turn out to be a mistake and this is the primary reason why I have a problem with the bill. Remember it is in addition to any existing entitlements.

In my opinion the Sahtu Dene would be well served if their commercial activities had to undergo the same checks and balances as any other commercial venture anywhere else in Canada. The band council could consider a system of guarantees but the focus should be to develop entrepreneurs who would repay their stake and be accountable for use of the money. However the most important consideration is: Will the agreement lead to self–sufficiency? Will this get people off social assistance and into the mainstream of Canadian life?

Unless the entrepreneurs in the Sahtu Dene nation have obligations, they are not going to be able to develop skills as entrepreneurs that will allow them to become part of mainstream life. All of us exist in a competitive society and we cannot take ourselves out of it. If we are going to get into business, we are into business. We cannot be half in and half out. Otherwise it will be a black hole in which we will be throwing more and more money.

I think, though, it could be but only if the land settlement and cash payment are one–time deals. That is why the agreement is so very important. In my opinion the agreement will set the stage for future agreements to be negotiated across the country in the months and years ahead.

Most Canadians want to do the right thing by our aboriginal brothers. Most Canadians feel a collective sense of embarrassment over the condition and situation of many aboriginal Canadians. We will not improve their situation by creating still more dependence and throwing still more money at the problem. Therefore this would be a much better agreement if the Sahtu Dene and Metis were to receive the benefit of the agreement or their traditional entitlements as agreed, but not both.

That is a fairly major change. They would receive the benefits of the agreement or their traditional entitlements, but not both. The way it is set up today, they would receive all their traditional benefits plus all the benefits that accrue to them under the agreement.

There are only 982 people to participate in this. How will that do anything to promote self–sufficiency? We must remember that when the settlement is done the Sahtu Dene will get the benefit of the royalties of resources on the land. Those royalties would today give them $200,000. How does anyone know what might be found there in the future?

By accepting this land settlement and the royalties that come with it as well as the cash settlements, the Sahtu Dene should also accept the same rights, freedoms and obligations of any other Canadian in any other part of the country. That is the only road that leads to self–sufficiency, self–respect and dignity.

Continued dependence generation after generation leads to exactly what we do not want whether the recipients are aboriginal or not. This settlement offers at the very minimum hope of a better future for the Sahtu Dene and Metis. I am concerned that the agreement sets a bad precedence because it does not regulate the use of the cash payment. The land settlement is absolutely enormous. It is not clear if there is a provision to make changes in the agreement if it is subsequently seen to be in need of correction. The agreement is entrenched in the Constitution under section 35 because the Sahtu Dene are already covered under treaty 11.

Another consideration has to be the implementation of aboriginal self–government. It is my opinion the Sahtu Dene will be responsible in implementing a combination of band council and municipal government. We have to face it that in this circumstance there are only about 2,800 people in the entire 16,000 square kilometres and they are mostly concentrated in a few communities.

Finally the agreement will be entrenched in the Constitution. Therefore I am of the opinion that the charter rights would prevail as the law of the land despite any future self–government negotiations.

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the member who just spoke was a businessman in his previous life. Has he looked at the agreement from the standpoint of the new bureaucracy, how it would affect doing future business and how it would affect existing businesses within the settlement area?

• (1750)

Mr. McClelland: Mr. Speaker, no, I have not looked at it carefully from that perspective. I contacted Mr. George Cleary, president of the Sahtu Tribal Council, and talked to him about this settlement. He seemed in conversation to be very concerned that whatever was done on both sides of the table be done right and be done in a responsible manner.

There are provisions in the agreement to set up an enormous level of bureaucracy. I believe there are seven, eight or as many as nine other bureaucracies. He was very clear in saying they understand the potential for problem there and would be very cautious to ensure that did not happen by perhaps having people wearing two or three different hats at one time.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my caucus colleague from Edmonton. I appreciate and understand his concern about the size of the grant of funds.

What about inherent self–government and how that will interface? Perhaps he has an idea of how inherent self–government could be negotiated on the reserves within this large land area and how that would interface with the laws of the rest of Canada. Does he see any potential conflicts there? Should this be negotiated now before we do the land settlements?

He talked about precedent. That is something they did not mention. I would like to know as a businessman how he would be negotiating this deal from that point of view.

Mr. McClelland: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for that entirely unexpected question.

The implementation of self–government in this particular circumstance will be very different from the implementation of self–government in other circumstances. This is an enormous area with relatively few people who are by and large involved in a traditional lifestyle, with the exception that they particularly want to get more involved in oil and gas exploration. Self–government in this particular model would be one that would be more municipal; it is envisioned as being more municipal than it would be federal.

Something we would want to keep in mind in this whole self–government consideration is that if 5 per cent of Canadians are of aboriginal ancestry, and yet something like 40 or 50 per cent of Canadians in jail are of aboriginal ancestry, then somewhere along the line we have gone horribly wrong. If we need to make a leap of faith to try to right that wrong then it is incumbent on us to do exactly that.

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member make a distinction between land use control, oil and gas development and self–government as such? Does he see an intrinsic difference between them?

Obviously oil and gas development would not be compatible with the structure and powers of a municipal set of governments.

Mr. McClelland: Mr. Speaker, on the whole question of mineral exploration or exploration for anything the self–government model would have to go to a provincial model. In this particular case the people involved have indicated they would be flexible to do whatever is necessary and to do whatever is right. It is a learning process for everyone involved.

The important thing in the whole aspect of self–government as I envision it is not to replace one with another but is to say: "Give us the opportunity to earn and to have our dignity by making our own laws. This is our land. We know our land. We know how to look after our land a lot better than you do. Give us the power to do so".

I think particularly in this agreement the Sahtu Dene have not tried to say this was their land exclusively. It is very clearly laid out in the agreement that with the exception of about 700 kilometres it is open to anyone on permission. The caveat is not to destroy the environment or harm the land. In answer to the direct question it would not work as a municipal but it might be a combination of municipal and provincial. Who knows?

• (1755)

Mr. John Finlay (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to my hon. colleague's speech. He raised some questions that I might like to refer to and ask him one in return.

He asked: "Is this agreement fair?" If this agreement were arrived at by an equal number of participants who wanted to make an agreement that would stand and serve their interests, those of Canada and those of the aboriginal people, it is probably fair.

He said that 16,000 square kilometres was a whole lot of land I agree but we do have a lot of land in the country. Then he said they were custodians. I suggest aboriginal people made less impression on this land in 36,000 years than we immigrants made in the past 200. In fact in the past 50 years we have done a pretty good job of changing the face of this land.

It might be a good thing to return some custodianship to those who believe that the land suckles us all and that it is here for our children and grandchildren and not for our exploitation.

He said that the Dene wanted to participate but that the money may turn out to be mistake. He asked: "Will this agreement lead to self–sufficiency?" All members of the House would like to say they hope very much that it will. Certainly what we have been doing up to now has not led to self–sufficiency. Maybe we had better try another approach to see whether it will work.

Mr. McClelland: Mr. Speaker, I did not really hear much of a question in the comments, but I would pretty much echo virtually everything he said. We are basically on the same wavelength.

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I will admit that I am not an expert on native affairs, land claim settlements or treaties that were signed years ago. However because I am the only Reform member from Manitoba, and Manitoba being probably a model of self–government for the rest of Canada, I would like to point out a few things that could have some effect on self–government for Manitoba which are kind of laid down in the guidelines in the Sahtu Dene and Metis bill.

Through the agreement the government, as far as I am concerned, has shirked the wider public interest in dealing with aboriginal land claims. North of 60, which is the Northwest Territories and Yukon, comprises 40 per cent of the land mass of Canada. Ownership up to now has been with the federal government, which should control it in the best interest of all Canadians. It would appear however that the government like the one before it is more concerned with being perceived as politically correct than it is in administering the land in the best interest of all.

The people in this part of the country have seen four major territorial agreements. There have been four massive land claim agreements since 1984. The Inuvialuit agreement covered the western Arctic. The Gwich'in agreement dealt with the Mackenzie River Delta and the Nunavut agreement covered the eastern Arctic. Now we have before us the Sahtu Dene and Metis agreement which covers the Great Bear Lake region. These agreements typically give vast amounts of land to a relatively small number of people. The land settlement agreement to Sahtu Dene and the Metis includes land equal to 28,000 square kilometres or about five times the area of Nova Scotia.

There are, however, only about 1,755 beneficiaries. This works out to approximately 160 square kilometres per person, an area 10 kilometres by 16 kilometres per individual. If you take that into miles it is 6 by 10 miles which is 60 sections per individual, 36 sections in a township. Each individual will receive approximately two townships of property.

These agreements give generous concessions to the recipients, including the constitutionally entrenched rights for aboriginal fishing, trapping and hunting forever. If any outside group wants to use this area in the future for something like forestry or the development of oil and gas it would have to go through several complex layers of regulations including native negotiations. This could seriously deter any potential investors from setting up shop in these areas.

This bill will also provide cash payments of $130 million over 15 years. This works out to approximately $74,000 per person. Also included in this agreement is a percentage of resource royalties from any gas, oil and mineral development. No indication is given as to how much money this would include.

When combined with the agreements that preceded it we have an area of over half a million square kilometres. That is half the size of Ontario and it is granted to a population of 23,800 individuals. These actions have taken this land with its untold resources out of the hands of all Canadians and put it into the hands of a few.

This bill has special significance to me because I am the only Reform member of Parliament from Manitoba. The hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has indicated that Manitoba will be a test case for aboriginal self–government. I am very concerned that this Sahtu Dene and Metis agreement sets a precedent for future Manitoba agreements. Manitoba has a native population of about 84,000, four times the amount that these four agreements include.

I am not sure that this government can define everything that would be included in self–government but to put it in perspective, if the agreement that C–16 deals with is used as a model and the same concessions are eventually given to Manitoba's 84,000 natives, the government would have to agree to land claims of about 13.4 million square kilometres.

Since Manitoba covers about 650,000 square kilometres this is obviously impossible. This would mean that the federal government would have to purchase another 20 Manitobas somewhere to settle the land claims. Maybe this would be a way of selling my farm land which I am told is very valuable, although it is hard to get the money out of it.

Based on the funds that are given under the Sahtu Dene and Metis deal, about $6.2 billion is going to be handed over to the 84,000 Metis. Where will the federal government get that type of money to settle all the land claims? What is the figure eventually going to be for the rest of the native people in Canada?

One week after the Charlottetown accord referendum was defeated a leaked government document indicated that the government had few answers as to what self–government would entail. It had no idea of how much it would cost, where it would get the money or how many aboriginal groups would want to be a part of this.

I am simply not confident that this present government has a better grasp on these matters. Yet, through the Sahtu Dene and Metis agreement the government will enter into a future agreement for self–government.

As I stated, the model for self–government is not clear. Thee is a reference in appendix B of the land claims settlement agreement for local law making on a range of powers that are normally exercised federally or provincially. I would hope that the government could assure Canadians that this does not mean a new legislative law making body would be set up with a new judicial system all for the benefit of fewer than 2,000 people.

As I mentioned, huge questions surround how Manitoba will become a testing ground for aboriginal self–government. The number of acres of land that will be set aside for Manitoba natives and the amount of money involved are two more of the obvious questions, but there are no answers because they do not make sense in this agreement.

What will the related costs add up to, for example the cost of policing a judicial system? In appendix B of the Sahtu Dene and Metis agreement there is a framework that considers transferring not only administrative responsibilities but also legislative powers. The extent to which this applies in any self–government initiative remains to be determined in future negotiations.

This leads to a number of questions. Would this include a special and separate native police force? Who will be responsible for the hiring and training of such a police force? Who would be responsible for the incredible costs involved?

There is also the question of whether the Charter of Rights and Freedoms would apply to any self–government arrangement negotiated in accordance with this agreement. That is a question that is not answered in this agreement.

A very questionable aspect to this agreement is the additional layer of bureaucracy it creates to administer the land, the water, the resource and the wildlife provisions. Renewable resource councils will be established by each community. A renewable resource board will be created by the government. Sahtu Dene and Metis will make up half the membership on this board. An arbitration panel will be formed to settle disputes relating to this agreement without going to court. A land use planning board and a land and water board will each be set up, with 50 per cent membership for the Sahtu Dene and Metis.

There will also be an environmental impact review board and a surface rights board. Together with an expected act on the Mackenzie Valley resource management, this agreement will give rise to a whole new layer of bureaucracy.

Who will pay the salaries and expenses of the members on this new layer of government? Are we just training the Sahtu Dene and the Metis to become bureaucrats? Currently all of these functions are performed by either the department of Indian and northern affairs or the government of the Northwest Territories. I see no commitment to phase out these current boards. I wonder if they will continue to exist even though their jobs have been taken over by someone else.

The department of Indian affairs has a budget of about $5 billion and has a staff of 3,400 people. In this year's estimates salaries and contributions to employee plans amount to $134.4 million. This works out to an average salary of approximately $40,000. Will this department with a huge budget and a large staff continue to exist as we set up another bureaucracy?

This land of course will have roads, bridges and similar infrastructure that will have to be built and maintained. Presumably this will be the responsibility of the new native administration. Will it still be federal funds that will be applied for?

I think it is worth mentioning that health care under this agreement will remain unchanged. It will still be administered by the federal government. As I can expect that self–government will be introduced into Manitoba, this is of concern to my constituents. In the report to the Manitoba standing committee on medical manpower concerning the year 1991–92, I learned that the total health care service expenditure per capita for natives was much higher than for the rest of the province. In my own area of the province, which includes Morden and Steinbach, the average cost was about $140 per person. In Winnipeg it was about $200 per person. The Manitoba average was $185 but on the southern native reserve it was $260 per person. One doctor told me that half the people on the native reserve are afflicted with diabetes—how sad. It is of real concern to the other people in that area that these problems get corrected and how that will be accomplished.

It is similar when we look at the average expenditure for each hospital visit. For towns like Winkler and Steinbach the cost was about $23 per visit which was about the same as the Winnipeg and Manitoba average, but for the reserve natives, the average cost was $50, more than twice as much.

Clearly this indicates that there are special health care requirements for Manitoba's native population. It is a social issue because we should be looking at ways to improve their overall health but it is also a financial issue and I think it is important to realize that these costs will remain after these land claims are settled.

Will there be any provision under self–government for natives to assume their own health care or will they depend on the federal system forever?

The government has also announced its commitment to continue the northern food mail program which I think is a very important program. This program will cost about $14.1 million in 1994–95. I think it is important for Canadians to realize that these programs continue even after these agreements have been achieved. The Canadian taxpayer's responsibility to fund these programs does not disappear just because natives are being given new land rights and more control over their affairs.

I wonder when the time comes for self–government in Manitoba what the government will do in the way of initiatives to improve the health of this segment of the population. I hope it will not ignore the problem and just agree to another wholesale giveaway of land and resources as it has done in the Sahtu Dene and Metis agreement.

I think it is very important that we realize that not just the Metis and the native people but the white are responsible to correct some of these problems and they have to be dealt with and there have to be funds for it. Huge land claims will not deal with these health problems.

In closing, I hope I have served to air some concerns and raise some very important questions regarding Bill C–16. The implications are very far reaching and it is very troubling that some of the more important questions seem to be without answers.

As a Manitoba member of Parliament I hope that when the time comes for any self–government or land claim agreement in my own province it is more well thought out than this one is. The current concept of self–government is so ill–defined and open minded there are serious implications to everyone involved, not the least of whom is the Canadian taxpayer.

A large percentage of native bands in Manitoba are millions of dollars in debt because of mismanagement and corruption. By moving toward self–government are we going to clear ourselves out of this indescribable mess created by Indian and Northern Affairs, or will it simply make the situation worse?

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it always amazes me when members talk, as the previous speaker just did, about giving away land. It seems to me incredibly naive to say that the government gives away land. After all, I cannot describe well enough what has happened to the land that we now call crown land or Her Majesty's land or whatever the case may be.

The member talks about the large size of the land that has been given. He compares it to how Manitoba would fare if it had a similar type of land claim in that regard.

We have to remember that the boundaries were not set down by the aboriginal people. As far as the aboriginal people are concerned those are artificial boundaries when they talk about their land.

The aboriginal people, the Dene and the Inuit of the Northwest Territories, the Denesuline from Manitoba and the people from Prince Albert did not sit down and say: "Okay, here is Manitoba, here is Saskatchewan and here is the Northwest Territories". It was imposed on them. As far as they were concerned they had some boundaries but not necessarily defined when they hunted and survived around that area.

When the member talks about how large the land is in ratio to if they tried to do that with Manitoba, that is not an applicable question.

The hon member talks about how self–government is undefined. I go back to a response I made some weeks ago about self–government.

When the British parliamentary system was being set up here who asked the aboriginal people of Canada? "We are going to set up a government. We are going to set up the Parliament of Canada, but you do not have a choice. You are just going to have to go along with it". That is basically what happened. We did not have a role in defining how the system of government was going to be set up in our land.

There has to be some understanding and I am sure the understanding is there. It is just being chosen to be ignored.

We talk about the bureaucracy which is going to be set up. In the Nunavut area I hope that the bureaucracy is going to be comprised of a large number of Inuit in our area. Hopefully the same will be true in the western Arctic, and there will be a large number of Dene within the bureaucracy.

In order to save time and money in dealing with issues we want a bureaucracy and a government sensitive to the people being served. After all the bureaucracy is there to serve the people. Even though sometimes the bureaucrats seem to think it is the other way around, that is the way it is supposed to be.

Does the hon. member not understand that this is setting up a system or settling claims which are long overdue? The hon. member asks whether the aboriginal people will be paying for their own medical care and so on. He talks about the food–mail program which he says is a good one and I agree. However that subsidy cannot be taken away from the people it presently serves when in large part those people have the least earning power.

In some cases they are paying $4 for a loaf of bread, $4 for a dozen eggs, $5 for a litre of milk. They regard apples and oranges and other fruit as treats rather than a nutritional part of their diet.

Does the hon. member not think this is the settling of some claims which has been long overdue?

Mr. Hoeppner: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate those comments from the hon. member.

As I said, I am not that familiar with the history of the native people but when I read the history books, it seems to me the native people were immigrants at one time too. They did come to Canada from the Soviet Union across the Bering Strait. North America was settled to some extent by them. I do not know who was replaced.

I can also tell the hon. member that I stood on the ruins of Chichén Itza. That was a Mayan civilization which totally disappeared from North America before there was any white man around. It was because agriculture failed in that area.

I can also tell the hon. member that my forefathers came to this country and bought a quarter of land for $10. After 100 years and having cut down every tree to provide food for this nation, they have lost everything. I buried three of my neighbours who committed suicide just like the hon. member explains because the system we have today took away from them what they had worked for, just like their people have done.

This land has been given to us by our creator. We should use it for the benefit of all people. We cannot totally disengage ourselves from the kind of situation where we want to try to grab more for this person or more for that person.

We have to realize that problems were here before the white man came. I am just wondering what the natives would be like today if it had not been white men who defended these borders against the communist regime in the Soviet Union.

I had the opportunity to talk to some of the native people at Flin Flon or Pine Falls recently. I listened to their problems. We have made a lot of problems but we have also done some good for this country. I wish that was acknowledged once in a while.

Mr. Anawak: Mr. Speaker, I do not think we are here to debate hypothetical questions. That is a totally hypothetical question.

I suspect if Christopher Columbus had not come over, North America would be a lot more cleaner place to live. I would hate to think if not the aboriginal people but the people whose forefathers came first, what state of affairs the aboriginal people would be in. I cannot imagine the despair we would be in.

However I acknowledge what the hon. member has stated, that he is ignorant about the aboriginal issue. I accept part of his comments. Ignorance is bliss.

Mr. Hoeppner: Mr. Speaker, I am just wondering. Do we then say that our history books are full of lies and there is no truth in that when I read about the 1400s and 1500s of how native people in this area were fighting among themselves? Whole nations were wiped out. People starved to death because of famines. Is that all a myth? Did the white man create that in Europe before he was even here? Is our history that false? Should we rewrite our history books?

What would the hon. member suggest? Does the hon. member want to take the facts or do we want to work on as he said, hypothetical questions, solutions or answers? We have to be honest about this issue. We have to try to resolve that, not just for the native issues or their grievances but there are also grievances on the other side.

I think if we want this country to survive we have to come to a realization that this is a joint problem and we have to work together to solve it or else we will destroy ourselves.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleague what he thinks of the land tenure system that has been put in place from the beginning with the earlier settlers, those who settled this land and stayed put versus what those settlers may have found here as a group of people not necessarily staying on the land, and did that actually help develop this country?

Mr. Hoeppner: Mr. Speaker, after hearing the hon. member speak, I do not know how to respond to that. I always thought that we as a people who developed a country should have some respect or some benefits from it.

My forefathers were driven from Prussia to the Soviet Union. They lost all their land and came over to Canada and started over again. Maybe it is just natural for us to be on the losing side all the time. Maybe it is the other side that should always win. I also have feelings and needs.

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I would like to preface my comments by saying that there is a legitimacy about the comments that the Reform Party members are making in this debate.

I am honoured to be here. I am honoured to participate in this debate and express concerns and questions of my constituents.

Far too many aboriginal people struggle daily with the economic and social conditions that are overwhelming and tragic. Few Canadians would argue that their standard of living is acceptable. For far too long aboriginal people and the state of their affairs were out of sight of most Canadians. However, as Canadian people become increasingly aware of what life on reserves has meant in terms of humiliation and loss, there is a justifiable reaction. Let us remedy the situation. Let us make it right. There is a will for this to happen.

Some people are saying there is no way that we can move too quickly or do too much to remedy the unacceptable state of aboriginal affairs. I have heard non–aboriginal people in their enthusiasm and guilt say things like it is the white man's turn to live on the reserves with no vote and do what the department of Indian affairs tells him.

In my mind, however, what we must accomplish is somewhat less reactionary. I believe that what we should be doing is bringing down the barriers and co–operatively opening up the way for aboriginal people to come as far into the mainstream of Canadian life as they individually choose to come.

I have heard aboriginal people respond to this guilt of the white man. In very natural human terms aboriginal people are prepared to take whatever the government will give up; money, land, special rights. Aboriginal leaders are justifiably proud that they have learned how to get money out of the government, as one western chief described it. They have learned that in the present climate of political correctness the government has little if any will to deny aboriginal demands.

As an example of this the media reported recently that the minister of aboriginal affairs was handed a memorandum of understanding by Chief Phil Fontaine and after quickly reading the memorandum, without a word of clarification or consultation and to the surprise of everyone in the room, the minister took out his pen and signed it. All involved were so surprised at the minister's action, to quote the reporter, you could have heard a pin drop.

I see the Sahtu Dene and Metis comprehensive land claim agreement that we are debating today in much the same light; a willingness to give to the Sahtu Dene and Metis whatever is demanded. Once again there is a willingness to relinquish large tracts of land, water, surface and subsurface rights with little public consultation south of 60. There is also the unanswered question of the federal government's legal ability to enter into such an agreement without at least consulting the provincial governments.

I am not suggesting that past wrongs and present day inequities should not be addressed. They must be addressed. But inasmuch as there are now no secrets about what happened on the reserves and in the residential schools, by the same token neither should there be any secrets about what the government of the day does behind closed doors.

So far the Sahtu Dene and Metis agreement has been made behind closed doors with little public consultation. When the facts become known, as surely they will, what will be the reaction of mainstream Canadians? They will feel they have been deceived by the government. Will their reaction stall and delay and even prevent the kind of programs that fair–minded aboriginals and non–aboriginals alike have been struggling to achieve? Will the reaction move against and stifle the agreement?

Bridges can and should be built between aboriginal and non–aboriginal people. These bridges need to be built for two–way traffic. Cultural enrichment can cross these bridges in both directions for the benefit of all Canadians.

In the mosaic of cultures that is being created in Canada, every culture can receive as well as contribute to the Canadian mosaic. I am not confusing this concept with that of the melting pot of cultures. What I am insisting on is that we have as an ultimate objective a unity within Canada that dynamically includes all cultures with no benefit or loss of benefit based on cultures—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Hindsight is 20–20, as we all know. I suppose that at 6.25 when the member for Cariboo—Chilcotin began his intervention I could have asked the House if it wished me to see the clock as being 6.30. However, I did not.

I wonder if there would be unanimous consent to allow the member to complete his intervention. We would not have questions or comments. Maybe the member could give us some indication of how much longer he would require because I hate to cut people off half way through.

I am in the hands of the House. The hon. member could help us possibly.

Mr. Mayfield: I would need about another 15 minutes to complete my intervention, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Would there be unanimous consent or should we go to the late show and the member will have to complete his intervention when we resume debate on the bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I must proceed then to the orders of the House.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

MIL DAVIE SHIPBUILDING

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, on April 12, I informed the Speaker of the House that the Minister of Industry had still not recommended to the government to make decisions on two issues affecting the MIL Davie shipyard in Lauzon, namely the Magdalen Islands ferry and the multifunctional smart ship project.

I added that, if the government still believed in employment, it had no reason not to make an immediate decision on the future of this shipyard. I also informed the House that, with every passing day, government inaction threatened the survival of the biggest private business in the Quebec City region.

The employers, employees and people concerned are not at all satisfied with the answers then given by the Minister of Industry to these two questions. We cannot be satisfied with a stock answer such as the one we received. We agree that, as the custodian of public funds, the government must make decisions that are in the best interest of taxpayers, but it must still make them.

In the last election campaign, all local stakeholders told the parties now forming the government and the Opposition how important it was to react rapidly in the MIL Davie case because failure to do so could lead to economic disaster, namely the closure of the MIL Davie shipyard. The shipyard is now in a state of panic as no contract has been or is waiting to be signed.

At this time last year, 3,000 employees were working. There are now 2,000 workers but this number will go down to 300 in December if the government does not assume its responsibilities right away.

As you can appreciate, people are ready to use any means to ensure their survival. They do not intend to wait for the provincial election to be called without the federal government taking a firm stand. All too often, campaigning politicians promised the shipyard it would be awarded contracts that never materialized after the election.

Today I am asking the Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry to give me a definite answer on the government position in this case, not on a whim but because the situation is serious and urgent. That is also the reason why, Mr. Speaker, you allowed me to address this House tonight pursuant to Standing Order 37(3).

People on both shores of the Quebec City region who work in the private sector are dependent on two major industries: pulp and paper and shipbuilding.

The pulp and paper industry is already facing serious difficulties in trying to apply certain federal environmental standards but, Mr. Speaker, if you allow me, I will bring this thorny problem to the attention of the House a little later.

The other industry supporting 3,000 employees has no contracts left and is about to close its doors. I would like the government to be aware of the major problems that would be created by its failure to take immediate action. Three thousand families represent about 10,000 people who will live on unemployment insurance for a while. The following year, these 10,000 people will be forced to live on welfare with all the psychological problems brought on by this situation. These psychological problems will lead to a significant increase in health–care costs paid in part by the federal government.

The government, I am sure, analyzed all these repercussions and I fervently hope that my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, is now in a position to give us the good news right now, namely that MIL Davie of Lauzon has been awarded the contract for building the Magdalen Islands ferry as well as the smart ship prototype so that it can survive for the next few years.

[English]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry has asked me to comment on the issue raised by the hon. member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orleans on April 12 and I am sure he will get a clear answer as he requested.

The future of MIL Davie and its ability to generate meaningful long–term employment is of great importance to this government and I know how important it is for the population of the Quebec region.

With the completion later this year of the Canadian patrol frigate and trump contracts at MIL Davie the government will discuss the future of the shipyard with its owner, the province of Quebec. As a basis for the discussion, the province of Quebec is assessing a corporate business plan identifying the direction the company will take to ensure its future success.

I understand that the provincial government has not approved the draft plan and the MIL Davie business plan has not been presented to the federal government at this time.

Unsolicited proposals have been made by MIL Davie for two federal construction contracts. The first is a contract for the replacement of the Lucy Maud Montgomery ferry operating between the Magdalen Islands and P.E.I. The second is for a multifunctional vessel or smart ship for the Department of National Defence.

In the case of the ferry my colleague, the Minister of Transport, is evaluating the options available to him in the context of limited budget resources, other Canadian shipyards and the provision of timely and effective ferry service.

Regarding construction of the smart ship, the Minister of National Defence will be able to assess future naval requirements following the completion of the defence policy review that the member knows is going on at present.

In conclusion the long term future of MIL Davie and the well–being of its workers and the community is important to this government. As my colleague the Minister of Industry has said many times, we are committed to working with the yard's owner, the province of Quebec in a co–operative fashion.

BILINGUALISM

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf): On April 13 last, I had the opportunity to put two questions to the Prime Minister concerning bilingualism.

• (1840)

Part of his response to one of the questions was as follows, and I quote:

> It seeks to protect its rights.

The Prime Minister was referring to Canada's francophone and Acadian community.

> However, it also deplores the fact that some francophones like the Parti Quebecois and Bloc Quebecois members are the ones who create the most serious problems for it.

Mr. Speaker, statements like this call for an apology or, at the very least, some serious explanations. Here is how I see these statements and why I find them exceedingly disagreeable. To begin with, the rights of Canada's francophone and Acadian communities are not dependent on Quebec. These communities enjoy them outright. They enjoy these rights because of what they are. Moreover, these rights are entrenched in the Constitution and in the Charter.

Whether Quebec is or is not part of the Canadian confederation does not take anything away from the fact that these rights are legitimately theirs. The Prime Minister seemed to be saying that, if Quebec were no longer around, either the Liberal government could not be counted on to ensure compliance with the Constitution or the Charter, or Canadians would not normally be inclined to uphold their Constitution and Charter.

Are we to understand then that the government wants to hold Quebec accountable for the future to which Canada's francophone and Acadian communities are entitled? Are we to understand that the government wants to hold Quebec accountable for the way in which other Canadians from coast to coast will treat their francophone and Acadian communities?

I hope that this was not what the Prime Minister was hinting at. Therefore, I think some explanations are in order. In short, either the Prime Minister, as Leader of the Liberal government, has no intention, in Quebec's absence, of ensuring compliance with the Constitution or, the Prime Minister believes that, in Quebec's absence, Canadians from coast to coast will not have the will, determination or sense of fair–play to ensure compliance with the Constitution and the Charter.

Which is it? Or should these words never have been spoken in the first place?

Not only am I waiting for an answer, Mr. Speaker, so too, I have no doubt, are tens of thousands of other people. There are 900,000 anglophones in Quebec and that province has never once said that it would treat them any other way but very fairly. There are 960,000 francophones in the rest of the country, 60,000 more than there are anglophones in Quebec, and they are waiting for an answer now.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Canadian Heritage): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that nearly a million francophones in Canada live outside Quebec and their number has increased by 50,000 since 1971. While the proportion of francophones outside Quebec has diminished during the same period, this is mainly due to the growing proportion of Canadians of diverse origins who came to our country during that period.

Nevertheless, the government recognizes the particular challenges facing francophones outside Quebec.

• (1845)

The hon. member opposite uses statistics on the situation of francophone communities outside Quebec to make this House believe that these people will soon disappear and that their disappearance would end our policy on official languages throughout Canada.

[English]

French speaking Canadians living outside Quebec represent about 20 per cent of the total francophone population of Canada. Through government action there has been notable progress in recent years, particularly in terms of greater access in all provinces to French language schooling.

For example, there are now over 185,000 young Canadians in 700 French language elementary and secondary schools outside Quebec and in 45 colleges and universities which give instruction fully or partially in French.

[Translation]

The hon. member should keep in mind that a community's vitality is measured by its entrepreneurship spirit and its sense of identity and not only by statistics.

JOB CREATION

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, on March 25 last, I rose in this House to put a question to the Minister of Finance on the Sainte–Marguerite project.

At that time, all was set for construction to start, except that one permit was missing. It so happens that it was to be issued by the federal government. Already struggling with unemployment, the Sept–Îles region, in Quebec, was faced with job creation efforts being paralysed by the federal government's dilatoriness.

To a question as to when the federal government was going to allow Hydro–Québec to go ahead with this project, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport replied that the environment had to be protected. I agree. However, that is putting a bit too much on the back of the environment, seeing that the BAPE report was accepted on February 24. If the idea is to harmonize federal and provincial standards, why is the Quebec report not enough?

As for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, he took that opportunity to emphasize what a great achievement this agreement between his government and the Quebec government was. He explained that the permit in question was a complex and was detailed document and that a few more pieces of information were needed before it could be issued, indicating in passing that the missing information was to be supplied by Quebec. In other words, it was Quebec's fault if the federal government could not issue the permit. So much for the great example of co–operation!

In the end, all that time was wasted for nothing because the government allowed construction to start without the famous permit. I am happy that it got under way so that the people from the Sept–Îles region can work. Let me elaborate on that. It is clear as day that the federal government allowed construction to start without permit just to score points with the electorate.

It is clear and it reeks of electioneering when the Prime Minister of Canada tells the Premier of Quebec that he does not need his authorization. This whole thing is clearly ridiculous. It is clear, in particular, that no one is falling for the little game the Premier and the Prime Minister are playing.

And they call this an excellent example of federal–provincial co–operation. The fact that the federal and provincial environmental standards are different has put a wrench in the works for Hydro–Quebec.

We get along fine on paper, but when the time comes to take positive action, we hit a wall. When well–intentioned people try to find out where the blockage is, the process gets so cumbersome that they can hardly find an answer. My point, Mr. Speaker, is that the Sainte–Marguerite project incident is proof, once again, that the federal system is dead. For the people of Quebec, there is one level of government too many and the sooner we get rid of that one the better. Then Quebec will be able to develop to its full potential because all the tools it needs will be in its hands alone and Quebec will be the master of its destiny.

[English]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport has asked me to address the concerns expressed in the House over perceived delays in the granting of the necessary federal approval for Ste. Marguerite 3 hydro electric project.

The construction of the project requires a permit under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, which is administered by the Department of Transport.

The scope of the work required an environmental assessment. To that end the federal and provincial governments agreed to conduct a joint public panel.

On March 28, 1994 the Department of Transport, on behalf of the federal government, made public the federal response to the Bureau d'audiences publique sur l'environnement, BAPE, panel report.

The Department of Transport is moving expeditiously to complete its statutory responsibilities. Following the minister's February 24 announcement, departmental officials contacted the province and Hydro Quebec to explain the requirements for Navigable Waters Protection Act approval.

In order to finalize the approval documents the Department of Transport will have to receive and approve the final detailed plans and drawings of the project. In accordance with the Navigable Waters Protection Act, Hydro Quebec must deposit these plans in a land registry office and advertise their project intentions in two local newspapers and the Canada Gazette and await 30 days prior to commencing any work which may interfere with navigation.

To close, Hydro Quebec can and has, I believe, begun the road work for the project. There is certainly work that is not associated with the Navigable Waters Protection Act process with which they can proceed. Contrary to the comments of the hon. member for Frontenac, I believe the government commitment to both the protection of the environment and to job creation have been met.

I might also remind the hon. member that not long ago the United Nations declared Canada the number one place on the planet where to live, measured against certain criteria and thanks to the co–operation of all provinces, territories and the federal government. He should take that to bed and sleep on it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted.

The House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Hon. Fernand Robichaud (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to certain petitions.

MILITARY TRAINING

Hon. David Michael Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise in this House today to provide information to my hon. colleagues on a subject we all care about, and that is the opportunities the Department of National Defence will provide young Canadians to receive officer training in the Canadian forces, in a fully bilingual Canadian military college.

[English]

I promised the hon. member for Roberval some weeks ago, when there was topical questioning as a result of the budget and the closing of the Collège militaire in St. Jean, Quebec, that within a number of weeks I would make a progress report to the House to let members know what the Department of National Defence is doing to ensure the bilingual nature of the military college system once there is consolidation at Kingston.

Tomorrow I shall be appearing before the Senate finance committee. I understand the prime focus for the questioning on that date has to do with the collège militaire and its closing. I felt it was only courteous to members of the House that I make a statement in my own Chamber to let the House know how our thinking has evolved before I went to the Senate committee.

The amalgamation of our three military colleges into a single institution has been dictated by both budgetary constraints and the operational requirements of the Canadian forces. Since 1989 the strength of the officer corps of the regular force has been declining. As a result of the 1994 budget the number of officers will continue to decrease until 1998. Thus the number of cadets in military colleges will obviously be reduced from the current level of about 1,600 to about 900. A single college will therefore be sufficient to meet our needs.

Once we have one military college it will have to be fully bilingual for two reasons. First, our college must accommodate young Canadians from all regions of Canada, whatever their first official language. Not only must these young Canadians know they are welcome in their military college; they must feel at home there. Second, the principle of equality of the status of the official languages as well as the spirit of the Official Languages Act require us to ensure that the training of officers is carried out in both official languages.

Bilingual training is also important because our officer corps must be able to command personnel from both linguistic groups. It was therefore recently decided that beginning in academic year 1996–97 all graduates of the Canadian military college must be functionally bilingual. I shall return to this point in a few moments.

The establishment of a fully bilingual military college is typical of the challenges we face in Canada. Among our goals is to promote relationships based on respect for differences as well as harmony and co–operation in the name of a common cause: to serve and protect Canada. The Department of National Defence has taken on this challenge willingly. My department has developed both a transition plan for the period from 1994 to 1997 and a plan to make the Royal Military College in Kingston fully bilingual.

As part of the transition plan measures will be put in place to ensure the replacement of the programs currently offered by the three military colleges by the end of the 1996–97 academic year. We are also considering several options to replace, starting in 1995–96, the qualifying year offered by the Collège militaire royal de Saint–Jean, in Quebec.

At the same time, the Department of National Defence is developing a plan to make the Royal Military College fully bilingual. Here is an outline of this plan. The Royal Military College is already partially bilingual, the science and engineering curriculum having been taught in both official languages for many years. Both French and English have also been used for a long time in daily activities, alternating from week to week.

The plan national defence officials are presently working on is geared toward making the Royal Military College fully bilingual and creating an environment where young francophones and anglophones will be motivated to study to become bilingual officers of the Canadian Armed Forces.

This plan will have an impact on the four pillars of the Canadian military college system, namely academic training, the military training plan, sports and physical fitness, as well as second language skills. It will apply to the directing staff and the officer cadets and affect administrative support and all aspects of the daily operations of the college.

[English]

As part of the rationalization of our military college system all academic programs that are retained will be offered to new entrants in both official languages. To meet this objective college commandants and principals are currently assessing francophone and anglophone staffing requirements, both military and civilian.

Because the level of bilingualism demanded of the Royal Military College graduates has been raised, increased emphasis will be placed on the day to day use of both French and English at the college. Cadets who need to upgrade their second language skills will take summer language training in an appropriate linguistic setting.

The bilingual nature of the college will be enhanced by the simple fact that the cadet population at RMC will soon be 30 per cent francophone and 70 per cent anglophone, as compared to the current breakdown of 17 per cent and 83 per cent respectively.

As for the military staff, the commandant is already working with personnel staff in Ottawa to ensure that the staff composition of the college reflects its requirements.

[Translation]

It must be pointed out that in July Brigadier General Charles Émond, who is the current commanding officer of the Collège militaire royal de Saint–Jean, will be taking on his new duties as commanding officer of our new centralized military college.

[English]

In other words the commandant at the Collège militaire de Saint–Jean, Québec, Brigadier General Charles Émond, will move to the Royal Military College in Kingston to ensure the smooth transition to one college system and that the bilingual presence will be maintained.

I draw this to the attention of members on the other side of the House, especially my friends in the Bloc Quebecois because they were most concerned about the consolidation into one college at Kingston. I have great confidence that General Émond, the commandant now at CMR, will be able to realize our goals in making the Royal Military College in Kingston a truly proud bilingual institution all of us will admire.

Brigadier General Émond graduated from the Collège militaire royal and received a diploma from the RMC. We are counting on him to make our new college continue to reflect the National Defence vision of bilingualism among Canadian Forces officers.

I will now outline in greater detail the bilingual officer corps concept within the Canadian forces. This concept was adopted by the Armed Forces Council on June 28, 1988. It met the senior officers' need to lead their subordinates in both official languages.

This concept is now being studied by a special joint task force made up of representatives of National Defence and of the Commissioner of Official Languages. We intend to refine this concept and resolve the issues raised by the Commissioner during our consultations.

Our goal is to establish the following policy: effective January 1, 1998, all officers promoted to the rank of Lieutenant–Colonel will normally have to be bilingual. I already mentioned this fact during oral question period in this House.

The steps taken to offer second–language training to francophone and anglophone officers are part of the Official Languages Program of the Department of National Defence. This program is based in part on the 1988 Official Languages Act and contains the following elements: language of work, equitable participation, communications with the public, service delivery and language training.

[English]

First, with regard to language of work, we have adopted a special model that takes into account our unique environment and the organizational arrangements needed to achieve bilingualism within the Department of National Defence and Canadian forces. The second element is equitable participation.

In 1992 a detailed review of the linguistic designation of every unit and every position revealed that much still has to be done to increase the number of bilingual anglophones in the military.

To examine the participation rate of francophones within the Canadian Forces, we undertook a comprehensive analysis of recruitment, enrolment, promotion and attrition rates of officers and non–commissioned members in the last 15 to 20 years.

This review of all ranks and military occupations ended in December 1992. It found that, by and large, the goal of equitable participation was reached except in three out of 135 military occupations.

The third element of the Official Languages Program deals with communications with and service to the public. Our personnel co–operate on a continuing basis with Treasury Board Secretariat officials to ensure that the Department of National Defence honours the spirit of official languages regulations.

[English]

At present, second language training is provided in house. In an effort to rationalize the program, senior staff of my department together with representatives of the Public Service Commission and Treasury Board are looking at the feasibility of transferring our second language training to the Public Service Commission.

As for the more general criticisms directed at us by the Commissioner of Official Languages, rest assured that my department will continue to improve its performance. Let me underscore three areas I have just covered, namely our blueprint for a fully bilingual military college, the concept of an effective bilingual officer corps and the study aimed at improving the efficiency of our second language training.

These three initiatives are striking examples of just how seriously the Department of National Defence considers the question of official languages. We will continue to work within the framework of the Official Languages Act and its associated policies. We will continue to work closely with the Commissioner of Official Languages.

[Translation]

I hope I have convinced my colleagues that we are striving to make the Canadian armed forces as a whole better reflect the Canadian reality. I also hope to have assured them that the doors of the new Canadian military college, one of the main paths to a career as an officer in the Canadian Forces, are wide open to all qualified candidates, be they anglophones or francophones.

[English]

As Minister of National Defence I am proud to be part of the creation of this bilingual military college. Indeed we can all take pride in this initiative, for our military college will be a unique institution, one that mirrors the linguistic duality of our country. It will welcome young Canadians, our leaders of tomorrow, regardless of their province or their territory of origin.

Before I sit down I would like to apologize to the critics opposite. I am not sure they received sufficient notice of my statement. I think they got an hour or two, but they were most gracious in letting me go forward with the statement today.

I would like to mention for the member for Charlesbourg who arrived just as I was beginning that one of the reasons for making the statement today is that I felt it was only courteous to give these comments to the House of Commons. Tomorrow I will be appearing before the Senate committee on finance where I understand I will be questioned most rigorously on the closing of the military college and the future of our military colleges.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg): First of all, Madam Speaker, I was planning to point out to the minister the delay in informing us of the time he was to deliver his speech, but I accept his apologies.

• (1020)

I am pleased to speak once again on this issue of burning importance to Quebec, that is the closure of the Collège militaire de Saint–Jean and the decision to use only one college, Kingston's Royal Military College, for the future training of officers. The closure of the Collège militaire de Saint–Jean has never been justified, either for cost cutting reasons, or because of the need to reduce the size of the military. Nor has the government demonstrated that the military college in Kingston is capable of taking up the slack.

I have no doubt that the minister is being sincere and is making efforts in this area, but despite the speech that he just delivered this morning, I think that we have to be realistic. The Official Languages Act was around long before this Liberal government took office. RMC, the Collège militaire de Saint–Jean and Royal Roads Military College should have been bilingual and operating in both languages for a number of years by now. Based on the information we have and according to the criticisms of official languages pointed out by the minister, we know for a fact that the results of the legislation leave much to be desired.

This morning, the minister of defence gave us an overview of a proposal to convert the Royal Military College in Kingston into a fully bilingual institution. As I have just indicated, we have some doubts as to whether this is at all possible, despite good intentions and the efforts that will be made. We are given the broad outline of the proposal, while at the same time, we are told that DND officials are in the process of drafting a plan. Are we to understand that the minister was merely throwing up a smokescreen this morning? There is absolutely nothing tangible in this plan.

The minister talks about the consequences of a plan which we have not seen and of which we know nothing. We know nothing about its aims, its concepts or its mechanisms. Francophones expect more than vague concepts. The only details which the minister released to us concerning his concept of a bilingual officer corps is the date on which this concept was agreed to. He informs us that this concept is presently being reviewed by a special joint task force. Another task force.

Plans call for refining this concept and resolving the issues raised by the Commissioner of Official Languages. The minister defers to the department's Official Languages Program. We all know the kind of results this program had at the military college in Kingston. Worse yet, all officers promoted to the rank of lieutenant colonel are not expected to be bilingual until 1998. The minister has already made this fact clear to the House in response to questions put to him. I wonder what a normally bilingual lieutenant colonel is. What does "normally bilingual" mean? How can we accept it? It is too little too late.

Furthermore, the minister tell us nothing about what he intends to do to promote French culture within the military college in Kingston. The environment counts for a great deal in training an officer cadet trying to master a second language. Learning a new language takes more than an academic program. It also takes the right environment and immersion. I am well placed to speak on it since I have trouble learning a new language. Even though we are in a situation of partial immersion here, I intend to take total immersion.

From the recommendations produced by the official languages committee in the department of defence and in the Canadian Armed Forces, it appears that the committee recommended immersion as an important factor in training officer cadets. It recommended that all officer cadets at the Royal Military College and the Royal Roads Military College spend at least a year at the Saint–Jean campus, while those at the military college in Saint–Jean should spend at least a year at one of the other two colleges; this would help everyone develop their language ability and provide exposure to the other culture.

This brief excerpt shows how training bilingual officer cadets is not something that can be achieved with a hastily conceived academic program such as the one the hon. minister has presented.

It would certainly be more promising to emphasize immersion and exposure to another culture.

Some positions explain why my colleagues in the Bloc Quebecois and I are opposed to closing the military college in Saint–Jean and have been opposed to it from the beginning.

We all know that more francophones than anglophones in the Canadian Armed Forces are bilingual and most bilingual anglophones in the forces went to the military college in Saint–Jean.

There is a big shortage of bilingual military people whose mother tongue is English, but a surplus of bilingual military people whose mother tongue is French.

An internal report of the Canadian Armed Forces on bilingualism in the military reported a serious deficiency in this regard. This report said that 2,861 more francophones than required were bilingual, while there was a shortage of 1,424 bilingual anglophones.

Of course, this sample includes more than the officer corps, but it shows how much it has been left to francophones to promote bilingualism in the Canadian forces.

Remember the climate surrounding the announcement that the military college in Saint–Jean would be closed. The defence minister said that the military college in Saint–Jean would be closed to save money. It is also for economic reasons that he has decided to put francophones in an English speaking environment for their military training.

In his statement, the minister talks about an environment that encourages francophones to study in Kingston. Unfortunately, I think that is hypocritical, because many past and present officer cadets question the statement which the minister made this morning.

The minister made optimistic predictions about the level of bilingualism in the officer corps. I will give him some more realistic projections: yes, there will still be bilingual officer cadets, but more and more of them will be from a French background. That is reality.

There is nothing specific in this plan, nothing about how to get there, nothing about extra costs, nothing to satisfy us. There is nothing that could justify closing the military college in Saint–Jean or offset the loss and the major setback for francophones in the Canadian Forces as a result of this politically motivated closure.

[English]

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, first I would like to accept the minister's apology for the late delivery of his statement. We have managed somehow even though it is late.

In answer to the minister, it must first be understood that Royal Military College in Kingston is already a rather bilingual institution and has been for years.

It must also be recognized that, following the closing of CMR in Saint–Jean, there must be a place where francophone officer cadets can complete their studies.

Consequently, it is desirable and rather easy to have a fully bilingual institution such as CMR.

I also want to add that, after talking this morning with a former commanding officer of the college, I really think that bilingualism there is something which promotes national unity.

[English]

While agreeing that bilingualism at RMC is desirable and achievable at little extra expense, the point could be made that with the closing of CMR and Royal Roads there will be considerable savings.

Nevertheless it is necessary to signal a cautionary. The watchword from DND, the Department of National Defence, cannot be RMC today, tomorrow the whole country. There is a real and present danger underlined by the words of the Minister of National Defence in the House in February when he announced that by 1997 officers in the Canadian forces must be bilingual if they wish to be promoted beyond the rank of lieutenant colonel.

English speaking Canadians should be able to have a full and unfettered career in the English language, however desirable it is to be bilingual.

The recent booklet of the Minister of Canadian Heritage, "Official Languages: Myths and Realities", states: "English speaking Canadians and French speaking Canadians regardless of ethnic origin or first language learned have equal opportunities for employment and advancement". It also states: "The federal government is bilingual but the individual citizen does not have to be. You have every right to remain unilingual. Universal bilingualism has never been the goal of the policy". Finally it is stated on page 16: "Individual bilingualism is a matter of personal choice".

In conclusion we can endorse the completion of the bilingual process at RMC for the reasons noted, including cost savings. However we caution the government against carrying the enforced bilingualism policy too far as it is doing in the rest of the Canadian forces.

Voluntary bilingualism, yes; enforced, no.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my honour to present a petition duly certified by the clerk of petitions. It is signed by 60 residents of the Hodgeville–Glen Bain district in my constituency.

Briefly the petition states in part that the petitioners humbly pray that Parliament not repeal or amend section 241 of the Criminal Code in any way and uphold the Supreme Court of Canada decision of September 30, 1993 to disallow assisted suicide, euthanasia. I support the petition.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Hon. Fernand Robichaud (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs)): Madam Speaker, the following question will be answered today: No. 22.

[Text]

Question No. 22—Mr. Taylor:

Following the 1989 report of the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas, will the government proceed with the termination of the tax benefits for certain northern and isolated areas?

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Because of the inequities associated with previous approaches of providing tax assistance to northern residents, in 1988 a task force was established to study this issue and to make recommendations. The task force held public meetings in many communities across the country and received a number of written submissions. On the basis of these consultations, the task force concluded that an approach based on broad zones of eligibility was preferable. The northern and intermediate zones were defined using ranking systems developed by the task force which were comprised of objective criteria relating to environmental factors, community characteristics, and location.

Full implementation of this system will result in gradually making certain communities ineligible for some or all of the benefits. For example, those communities becoming ineligible for all benefits were entitled to full benefits until the end of 1992, received two–thirds benefits in 1993, will receive one–third benefits in 1994, and zero thereafter.

A review of the events that led to the implementation of the current system establishes that the zonal approach is the right one. The system must be given a chance to reach a mature stage.

When the full impact of the current system is known after the transitional measures have run their course it will be possible to determine whether the current policy is fairer, simpler, and more effective than its predecessors at providing tax assistance to residents of northern and isolated areas.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The question enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Hon. Fernand Robichaud (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs)): Madam Speaker, I would ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT AGREEMENTS ACT

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C–22, an Act respecting certain agreements concerning the redevelopment and operation of terminals 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson International Airport, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, today I have the pleasure of proposing the second reading of this very important piece of legislation and I want to take this opportunity to thank my colleague, the Minister of Industry, who was kind enough to table this bill on my behalf.

Bill C–22 is a measure to cancel agreements between Her Majesty and T1 T2 Limited Partnership.

[English]

The arrangements I refer to were entered into by the previous government. They would have turned over the development and operation of terminals 1 and 2 at Canada's largest and most important transportation facility, Lester B. Pearson International Airport, for 60 years to a group of private developers.

Our government after careful examination of the agreements has determined they are not in the public interest. Our examination included a report by Mr. Robert Nixon who described a flawed process clouded by the possibility of political manipulation.

This government rejects the previous government's way of doing business on behalf of Canadians. A reliance on lobbyists, the backroom dealings, the manipulation of bona fide private sector interests and the lack of respect for the impartiality of public servants are absolutely unacceptable.

It should be noted the request for proposals for the project was released in March 1992 after a ministerial announcement in October 1990. The claim for compensation from the partnership however shows that as early as August 1989 one of the partners was working on a proposal to develop and operate terminals at Pearson International. This would lead one to believe that someone other than the government was in charge of the privatization project at Pearson.

The government intends to be in charge of the public agenda. We will make the decisions that affect the national interest. We believe matters that could significantly affect our economy and our competitive position as a nation should be decided in an open and accessible process, not by lobbyists and certainly not by five–year old governments in the dying days of their mandate. Decisions made by our government will reflect Canadians' traditional sense of fairness and fair play.

In deciding to legislate an end to this quagmire, the government took account of several factors: the need to come to an early decision on the future needs of Pearson unencumbered by these agreements; the government's intention to put the national interest ahead of private sector profit; and the fact that the private sector would have taken control of one of the country's most important transportation assets, an asset that if not managed in the public interest could jeopardize the country's economy and its international competitiveness.

These concerns and the government's response to them are reflected in the legislation before us today. The legislation contains several provisions. It declares that the agreements have not come into force and have no legal effect.

Further, no court action of any kind may be taken against Her Majesty, her servants or agents owing to these agreements, the process that was followed to enter into the agreements or to terminate them.

No one will be entitled to compensation from Her Majesty as a result of this legislation. However, the Minister of Transport may with governor in council approval provide for appropriate payments to the partnership for its out of pocket expenses, but nothing will be paid for lost profits or lobbyist fees.

The bill will allow the Government of Canada to retain control over the future of terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson. It will provide a framework to allow for a fair and equitable disposition of the matter.

The legislation reflects public statements made by members of the government that predate the signing of the agreement. Those statements included a clear warning to the developer not to sign an agreement and to risk cancellation of the agreement if it was found not to be in the public interest.

As well, there have been the subsequent statements by government that it would consider paying out of pocket expenses but that nothing would be paid for lost profits or lobbyist fees. The government decided on no lost profits because we believe to pay such compensation is simply not appropriate in these circumstances.

The warnings not to sign these agreements and the subsequent action taken to cancel them are absolutely consistent. Uncontrolled lobbying conducted behind closed doors that leads to a contract detrimental to the public good cannot and will not be condoned. The government's decision not to pay lobbyist fees recognizes that individuals and companies involved in the process did not take the public interest into account.

The government wants to make it as clear as we can that we wish to deal with the private sector in an open, fair and responsible manner, but we will always take the taxpayers' interests into account. This decision should signal to all parties that abuses in the political process and practices we consider to be unacceptable will not be tolerated.

The government has decided it may pay out of pocket expenses in recognition that this particular privatization process no matter how flawed was an accepted practice by the previous government. The parties were playing in a game that in this particular case was heavily influenced by the actions of lobbyists.

It is recognized that the cancellation of the arrangement will have an impact on the developers. Several of the companies spent large amounts of money to plan, design and negotiate this deal. I am well aware some will say that expenses such as these should not be paid because of the manipulation that occurred. However we believe as a government that we must make every attempt to be reasonable and equitable.

I want to emphasize another point. This legislation does not lessen the government's desire to reach a negotiated settlement with the developer on these out of pocket expenses. These negotiations are under way.

The legislation clearly sets out certain parameters for these negotiations, including a time limit. A time limit is necessary to ensure that negotiations are not unduly protracted, thus allowing the government to proceed with planning the future of Canada's largest and most important transportation facility.

The matter must be finalized so that we can plan the future of Pearson International Airport. It is our objective to provide clear direction on the future of Pearson before the end of this year. I have stated that on many occasions. This will include decisions on a future management regime for Pearson and its development needs.

These arrangements cannot be finalized while these contracts are not cancelled because they could very well hamper the ability of a new management system to respond to the essential needs of Pearson. Lengthy delays could have significant economic consequences not only in the metropolitan Toronto area but across the country because Pearson is the hub on which Canada's aviation system turns.

In summary the legislation is designed to formally put an end to those agreements relating to the redevelopment and operation of terminals 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson that were arrived at as the result of a flawed process.

I reiterate that in cancelling the deals the government will attempt to negotiate fair and reasonable out of pocket expenses compensation, but it will not pay for lost profits and it will not reimburse anything for lobbyist fees.

The government will not be held hostage to any lengthy negotiating process that could impact on the future of Pearson, our economy, the international competitiveness of that facility and in the final analysis the public good.

If an acceptable settlement cannot be arrived at and arrived at soon, the legislation provides that no compensation shall be paid.

It is time to get on with the business of providing Canada with an efficient, safe and affordable national airport system. It is time to get on with the future of Lester B. Pearson International Airport.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, this government has introduced Bill C–22 as an example of renewed political transparency. Or so it claims. In fact, in some respects, the proposed legislation casts a cozy mantle of discretion over the actions it was intended to censure.

First of all, the bill itself raises a number of questions, and I hope this debate will help clarify the grey areas about which we have a quite a few queries. In fact, Bill C–22 is unsatisfactory, not because of what it says but because of what it does not say.

Of course, the government wants to get rid of a hot potato that has been passed back and forth for months, from the anterooms of politicians to law offices, from lobbyists' offices to the halls of government. However, if the powers that be expect this bill will put an end to this disgraceful manoeuvring, they are wrong. On the contrary, there is some fancy legal wording that says a great deal about the hidden agenda of the government, one instance being section 9 of the bill which provides very clearly, as the minister just said with some satisfaction, that no compensation will be paid. Section 9 provides very clearly, and I quote:

> 9. No one is entitled to any compensation from Her Majesty in connection with the coming into force of this Act.

Now that sounds squeaky clean, does it not? The problem is, that the bill immediately goes on to say in section 10(1) that:

> 10. (1) If the Minister considers it appropriate to do so, the Minister may, with the approval of the Governor in Council—

In other words, the cabinet. It continues:

> —if the Minister considers it appropriate to do so.

With his ministerial discretion and considering what he thinks is sensible and the interests of his government and those of his friends, he may:

> enter into agreements on behalf of Her Majesty to provide for the payment of such amounts as the Minister considers appropriate in connection with the coming into force of this Act, subject to the terms and conditions that the Minister considers appropriate.

Of course the government is not at all trying to protect the interests of the parties involved with these agreements that will be made at the minister's discretion, in the privacy of cabinet, with the Liberal Party's lobbyists in attendance. That is the situation. That is what bill C–22 is all about. Although section 10(2) provides:

> (2) No amount is payable under an agreement entered into under this section in relation to (a) any loss of profits, or (b) any fee paid for the purpose of lobbying a public office holder—

We still have no indication of the nature of the amounts the minister may pay at his discretion or of the identity of the individuals who may benefit from such ministerial discretion.

This is disturbing. It is disturbing because this particular case is overrun by lobbyists. It is full of people wheeling and dealing in the corridors of power with the two big parties, the Liberal Party and the Conservative Party.

• (1050)

And it makes the hon. minister laugh. It amuses him. He is laughing at the thought that, by this evening, his concerns will be put to rest by a vote, while those who were mixed up in this sordid affair are loosing sleep over it.

Furthermore, even if lobbying fees are not compensated under the legislation, the fact remains that the taxpayers will be paying part of the companies' lobbying expenses indirectly, in the form of corporate tax deductions.

How can you justify making the taxpayers in Quebec and Canada contribute to the funding of such crass patronage? Even the current Minister of Transport has suggested that lobbying fees not be made tax deductible. Even he, the minister who is laughing here in this House today!

His government did not listen to him. Did he protest? No, he smiled. He was voted down by Cabinet on this issue. He finds it amusing and defers to Cabinet solidarity and the party line.

This is to say that we are not alone to rebel against this policy. What is the government asking for here?

It is asking us to back this shameless political sham. They would want us to give the minister a blank cheque to compensate their friends and others spoilsmen that they would not go about it any differently.

Never will the Bloc Quebecois accept to support in any way a government plan to take with the right hand what it is apparently forbidding itself to take with the left hand.

They would have us be taken in by Bill C–22, colloquially speaking. Just to set things in perspective, allow me, to look back briefly on the recent past.

I would like to reemphasize some basic facts of this complex issue. I see that the minister has little interest for the issue, since he is leaving! He has more important things to do than to listen to the truth on this issue.

Mr. Young: And you, where were you when I spoke, you hypocrite?

Mr. Bouchard: Madam Speaker, unparliamentary language has just been used by a member whom you had not recognized. I would ask that you to call him to order.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In the interest of courteous debate, I wonder if the minister would be willing to withdraw his comments.

[Translation]

Mr. Young (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I apologize. It is just that the hon. leader of the Bloc Quebecois was referring to the fact that I was having a private conversation with a colleague while he was speaking.

I simply pointed out that he himself was not in this chamber when I gave my speech and that it is somewhat hypocritical to mention my presence or absence when he himself was not present when I made my remarks.

Mr. Plamondon: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

I would like to remind you that, about a month ago, I used the same word or words to the effect that the hon. member who was tabling a particular petition was acting hypocritically, that it was hypocrisy and, at the time, the Chair had stood up and asked me to withdraw my remark.

I wanted to explain myself, but was turned down and told to withdraw immediately what I had said. Out of respect for the Chair, I complied immediately, withdrew my remark, and apologized to the hon. member I had called a hypocrite. That is how much respect I have for the Chair and for this institution. I think that a Cabinet minister should do as I did and, at the request of the Chair, withdraw his remarks and apologize.

Mr. Bouchard: Like you, I noticed that, when the Chair asked the hon. minister to withdraw his remark, he rose only to reiterate it, using the word hypocrite again in what should have been an apology.

I think that the least that could be expected from a minister, in particular a veteran of this House, when we are debating a point of paramount importance on a subject that directly concerns him as the minister responsible for the subject, the gentlemanly thing to do would be to withdraw his remarks.

Mr. Young: Madam Speaker, if, with the Opposition Leader's vast experience as a member of the government that created the problem we are trying to solve today, he does not consider himself a hypocrite, I will withdraw my accusation.

Mr. Bouchard: We will resume this very important debate on one of the biggest Canadian political scandals in recent years involving the two major parties. This affair is somewhat reminiscent of a political and financial soap opera. What is the plot? Who are the actors? Who is the director? It leaves a lot of unanswered questions. One thing is clear: there is no answer to be found in the bill we are being asked to approve.

Although we are not entirely sure of the actors and the plot, one thing has been clear since the beginning: that the stage is lit with red and blue lights—a very bright, Liberal red and a tasteful dark Tory blue. Transparency is reduced to a bare minimum. In fact, the only thing that is transparent in this sensitive case, in my opinion, is the will of the parties involved to make things as unclear as possible.

The most distressing aspect of this sorry business is that we are here today to debate a bill concerning the cancellation of an airport privatization which was accepted by the government whose official policy on airport management was, and still is as far as I know, to return the management of airports to the local people and not to private interests. As you can see, the plot thickens even before the curtain rises.

[English]

In April 1987, as members will recall, the previous government announced with great to do an overall policy for airport management in Canada. That policy advocated in particular that the running of airports be entrusted to local administrations, not to consortiums or friends or the party in power but to truly local administrations.

Transport Canada in pursuance of that policy and recognizing the economic importance of airports for the regions they serve favoured local groups to run them, groups made up of local elected officials and businessmen, in other words, those people who have the best understanding of all the economic factors involved and of the need for a forceful and realistic management approach.

Furthermore, in the case of Pearson International Airport such a group had been formed in April 1993 and was ready to take in hand the operation of the airport.

The Ontario government was strongly in favour of turning over the operation of the airport to a local non–profit organization of that type. The federal government, using as a protest certain disagreements within the group, preferred to satisfy the appetites of the moneylenders and the lobbyists and, disregarding its own policy, proceeded to privatize the airport.

What was the pressure to privatize? There was pressure of two kinds. First it was in 1993.

An hon. member: You were in cabinet.

Mr. Bouchard: The Liberals seem to have forgotten that I resigned from government in May 1990. I am a free man. I am very happy to be that and have been very proud of it for the last three years.

There was pressure of two kinds. First, there was the lure of gain for a friendly regime. Second, there was the desire on the part of the government to please those friends. That explains the unseemly rush during the last days of the Conservative regime to conclude a deal where everyone stood to gain except the public at large. The privatization was suddenly not motivated by any need on the part of the federal government of the day to get rid of burdensome installations since according to the airport financial statements transmitted to Mr. Robert Nixon, the Prime Minister's special investigator, the airport would have made profits in the region of $23 million in 1993 and that is without taking into consideration rental revenues from terminal 3.

Let us not forget that Pearson International Airport is the most important airport in Canada. It employs 15,000 people. According to a Transport Canada study dating from 1987 it has direct economic side effects for the Ontario economy amounting to $4 billion. Approximately 57,000 passengers pass through the airport every day, that is to say 20 million passengers each year. About 800 aircraft land and take off daily for 300 destinations in 60 countries.

It is in fact the only Canadian airport which could be termed a hub for air traffic in Canada, a status that Vancouver is about to attain and that Montreal could reach if only the government would give it the necessary boost.

Yet it is the lure of profit that is the primary source of all the political and media tumult now obliging the Canadian House of Commons to come to a decision on the bill. If the Parliament of Canada has to be called in, the backroom ministerial manoeuvrings have to be particularly scandalous.

The intrigues surrounding this case since the beginning started as soon as the government announced its Canadian airport management policy. As I said earlier, this policy was made public in April 1987, and the following June, the government asked the Airport Development Corporation to build and operate Terminal 3 at Pearson Airport.

In September 1989, Paxport Inc. submitted to the government a proposal to privatize Terminals 1 and 2. This proposal was rejected because the government policy was not to privatize. I was then a member of the government.

One year later—I had since resigned—the federal government took the lead in inviting, without further explanations, the private sector to participate in the upgrading of Terminals 1 and 2.

In March 1992, the government officially requested proposals to privatize Terminals 1 and 2. But unlike what was done in awarding the contract to build and operate Terminal 3—a two–phase process consisting of the request for proposals and the selection of candidates—, the bids to privatize Terminals 1 and 2 were only subject to one 90–day selection phase.

Why the rush? Did the upcoming election spur them into action? In early June of the same year, perhaps because of the extremely tight deadlines set by the government, only two proposals were received, one from Paxport Inc. and the other from Claridge, already at work on Terminal 3.

On December 7, 1992, the government approved the bid submitted by Paxport, which had until February 15 to demonstrate the financial viability of its proposal. But that was not to be since, less than two months later, a financially–troubled Paxport had to merge with its only competitor, Claridge Properties, to create the T1 T2 Limited Partnership consortium.

Is it not rather surprising that the government awarded a 57–year contract worth millions of dollars to a financially–troubled management company that was also close to the political party in office?

We know that one of the arguments put forward by the government to justify its decision to award the contract to Paxport had to do with encouraging healthy competition between the manager of Terminals 1 and 2, Paxport, and the manager of Terminal 3, Claridge. How virtuous can you get?

Here is a government which, although it wants to privatize, wants to do it according to the rules of the private sector, by encouraging competition. How can we explain this about–face by the government which accepts without objecting the merging of the two competitors? Under this submission, those two competitors who were adversaries one day became united friends the next. The government could have rejected that submission, but it did not even bat an eyelash, thereby accepting to deal with only one entity, after having sung the praises of competition and insisted on its necessity.

Is it not strange that when the only two bidders for such an important contract form a monopoly, the government accepts that? Is it not strange that the period for making submissions was only 90 days, as in the case for an ordinary call for tenders, while the duration and the complexity of the contract are way out of the ordinary? Why limit that period? Is it to allow interested parties already familiar with the issue to review their submission? After all, Paxport had already submitted a privatization plan in 1989, while Claridge was already managing terminal 3 at Pearson Airport.

Obviously somebody somewhere deemed appropriate to bypass the bureaucratic system and infiltrate the government political machine to gain some privileges, this in contempt of the official principles of equity. Is this not a clear and particularly cynical example of private interests being more concerned about their revenue than the common good? And what about the elected officials who caved in to them?

The Nixon report judges them severely: "It is clear that the lobbyists played a prominent part in attempting to affect the decisions that were reached, going far beyond the acceptable concept of "consulting". When senior bureaucrats involved in the negociations for the Government of Canada feel that their actions and decisions are being heavily affected by lobbyists as occurred here, the role of the latter has, in my view, exceeded permissible norms."

This strong statement should have convinced this government to take every measure to find out about the role played by lobbyists in the dealings related to the privatization of Terminals 1 and 2. Instead, the government decides to turn the page, and tries do so in an incredible way, after a five–minute speech by the minister responsible, who is not even here for the debate that follows. The minister is in fact asking the House of Commons to cover his acts. He wants to use a vote in the House to cover acts which should be made public. Instead of trying harder to discover the facts and to look in detail at the actions and motives of those involved, he tries to close the case by tabling a piece of legislation.

Who can doubt that, if it is passed by the House, Bill C–22 will close the book for good on this shocking issue? Lobbyists and others involved in this operation will be able to relax. Some who are not lobbyists but who were bidders might even be compensated by the minister. Madam Speaker, you might wonder to which stakeholders I am referring? The act is silent on this and merely excludes refunding lobbyists fees and anticipated profits. Everything else is at the discretion of the minister and depends on his generosity.

Everyone knows that lobbyists abound on Parliament Hill and are involved in every important issue. I agree that some lobbying is acceptable. In this regard, I support the comments made by the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations which, in its report on lobbies released last year, said that lobbying is a necessary component of a modern decision–making process, and that the right to lobby is a fundamental one in a democracy.

However, the committee also added that, when lobbying takes place without the public's knowledge, there is a greater risk of decisions being made against its interest.

If there is an example in our political history which confirms the validity of the committee's comments, it is the Pearson Airport dealings, which were conducted clandestinely, behind the close doors of ministers offices, with political operators, people who influence governments, political contributors and lobbyists.

• (1110)

If we need an example of the need for public disclosure, which was one of the priorities of the Commons committee on lobbying, we have it right here. And if there is any lesson to be learned from the Pearson airport affair, it is that something must be done to change the rules of the game.

[English]

In the case concerning us today it is clear that lobbying played a preponderant role. The final result will cost the taxpayers millions of dollars. That is what I call overstepping the mark and it is why I am inviting the Prime Minister to submit concrete proposals to make that very significant activity as open as possible.

His government could suggest putting more teeth into the act respecting the registration of lobbyists, an act which lacks consistency to say the least.

In its report on lobbying the standing committee draws attention to several flaws and suggests some useful solutions. In particular the committee considers inadequate the requirements regarding the registration of tier II lobbyists, a group which is very poorly defined in the present act and which has only to disclose their names and the names of their employers.

The committee report says: "Such disclosure gives no indication as to the type of questions which could be of interest to the organization", to say nothing of the fact that the actual function of lobbyists could easily be disguised through the use of various legal tactics.

Concerning the matter of the disclosure of the objectives sought by the lobbyists, the requirements of the act are not sufficiently forceful and the provision concerning the registration of lobbying activities is so vague as to be useless.

To close the loopholes in the current legislation on lobbyists, we should at least consider a system of disclosure, under which the public office holder being lobbied would have an obligation to disclose his professional contacts with lobbyists. Transparency would no longer apply only to the wish list of the lobbyists but also to the public office holders being lobbied.

Similarly, the quality of our political and democratic system would be enhanced by imposing a code of ethics on elected representatives and senior officials. We could take our inspiration from the bill now before the U.S. Congress, where they have understood the need to provide a framework of measures designed to preserve the integrity of the political process.

In fact, even the Liberal Party, during its period of abstinence when it was seeking power, had taken a position on this issue, and as far as I know, it still stands. The red book, which is constantly being quoted in this House and which was launched with lot of hoopla during the election campaign, clearly says on page 95, and this is from the Liberals before they came to power, and I quote:

> —we will develop a Code of Conduct for public officials to guide cabinet ministers, members of Parliament, senators, political staff and public servants in their dealings with lobbyists.

The red book, still the red book, also promises:

> In particular, a Liberal government will appoint an independent ethics counsellor to advise both public officials and lobbyists in the day–to–day application of the Code of Conduct for public officials. The ethics counsellor will be appointed after consultation with the leaders of all parties in the House of Commons and will report directly to Parliament—

Where is this independent ethics counsellor? When does the government intend to consult us? Why has it been dragging its feet for six months? Where is its political will? Where is the transparency? Nowhere, because today, the Liberals form the government and, by the same token, are in no rush to keep their promises.

These are only a few examples, not only of the shortcomings, omissions and vagueness of the Lobbyists Registration Act and the questions it raises, but also of the ways which this transparency can be guaranteed. We must go further and apply the same principles to political party financing. In fact, if the government in its concerns for transparency intends to give all citizens equal access to public decision–makers, why does it refuse to make political party financing more democratic? Good question.

How can the Liberal government expect to make the system more transparent when it too depends on donations from large corporations. For example, in 1992, the last year for which data are available, the six largest Canadian banks—I will not bother to name them since we all know which banks are involved—donated nearly $500,000 to Liberal and Conservative party coffers. These two parties received $244,301.54 and $241,493.92 respectively. Canadian banks have a sense of election parity since the total amounts donated to each party were virtually identical. As we all know, the party in power today could be replaced by another tomorrow, and the banks are big on insurance policies. They like to keep things even, especially when their interests are at stake and especially when it is a matter of influencing government by the decisions they make.

In Quebec, under the guidance of René Lévesque—yes, René Lévesque, a name not spoken in this House—this process was brought out into the open. The act of cleaning up our political standards and practices which ensued today stands as proof of the pride and democratic vitality of Quebecers.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bouchard: It is vitally important that the process of donating funds to political parties be democratized. The need to do so transcends partisan political divisions, given that the democratic well–being of the people is at stake. It was in this spirit that my colleague, the hon. member for Richelieu, tabled a resolution respecting donations to political parties. I wish to take this opportunity to invite all members of this House to reflect on this issue and to bring pressure to bear on the government to launch this process of democratizing political party funding as soon as possible. Our political system must be hooked into today's reality and made more open and accessible to the ordinary citizen. This process will breathe new life into the system.

Everyone is well aware of the deals made between large financial backers and certain political parties, mostly the major parties and who can disagree that the Liberal Party is a major party? The Liberals are the first ones to say that theirs is a major party. The well–known deals and arrangements between these large political parties and the big financial backers have led the public to have an unhealthy distrust of our political institutions. There is not one member in this House who has not seen on numerous occasions how deeply suspicious his constituents are of the hidden, close, clandestine, almost incestuous relations between the big financial backers and the major parties that form the government.

All members of this House are aware of this fact. Which ones will put pressure on the government to force it to adopt once and for all a fundamentally democratic measure which is desperately needed and to follow Quebec's example? I am referring to limiting to individuals, the right to donate to political parties a practice which we advocate and follow. It allows us to keep in constant touch with our fellow citizens and gives those who make donations a real voice in the political process. At the same time, it leaves the legislator perfectly free, because his first duty is to the public, not to groups operating behind the scenes.

By raising donations in this manner, we will ensure that the party remains in the hands of the members, irrespective of the ongoing pressure exerted on the party's elected representatives to adopt sectarian positions. This process has a name: transparency. Transparency serves a purpose, that is the promotion of democracy. It is this same democracy that enables all of us here today to represent our fellow citizens. Transparency should be the cornerstone of the governing process. It is imperative that all government business be conducted in a transparent manner, including decisions to award contracts such as the one involving Pearson Airport.

The same holds true with respect to financial backers associated with the government. Here again with the Pearson Airport deal, it is clear that the first and sole beneficiaries of the government's largesse in the contract adjudication process have ties to the previous Conservative government as well as to the present Liberal government. If I may echo the enlightened words spoken earlier by the member for Richelieu, the Lortie Commission which was set up several years ago to consider reforms to the Elections Act and which had a mandate to examine this particular issue, could have given serious consideration to party fundraising practices and could have made more substantial recommendations as to how the process could be made more democratic. However, it did not have the guts to do so.

Although these days, as my colleague said, major companies account for only half of the electoral contributions to political parties, it is still too much because the amounts are still large and this obsolete system leaves plenty of room for all kinds of political schemes.

Lobbyists do not only give money or cold hard cash to election campaigns; they give of themselves.

They are high powered campaign workers. They rarely work for small fry like an ordinary backbencher. They prefer to work for ministers and even the Prime Minister, if possible, and their political zeal is apparent not only during elections, because leadership races appeal to their tireless devotion as well.

And lobbyists are not at all partisan. Every time the government changes, we see them shuffling their deck and generously hiring lobbyists from the winning side. Lobbyists are wonderfully open–minded.

So there are natural ties between contributors, lobbyists and elected candidates. This buddy–buddy relationship is particularly noticeable when a juicy government contract is at stake.

The Pearson contract was a juicy one. In 1993, Pearson Airport made a profit of $23 million, not counting terminal 3.

The rent to be paid by the Pearson Development Corporation was about $27 million the first year, $27 million the second year, $28 million the third year, $29 million the fourth year and $30 million a year from the fifth to the tenth year.

At first glance, renting the facilities for $27 million the first year might seem to be a good deal for the government, compared to the $23 million it makes from it now.

But if you take a closer look, you see that is not at all the case. Indeed, after renovating the air terminal buildings, the Pearson Development Corporation intended to raise the rates charged to airlines from $2 to $7 a passenger, which would have meant millions and millions more income every year. For the whole airport, it is $100 million a year, but since the rate in terminal 3 had already been raised to $7 per passenger, the additional charges for terminals 1 and 2 are quite a lot.

Now who would have paid this additional charge per passenger? The travelling public, of course. In this regard, we were not surprised to learn that, to win Air Canada's support for this privatization, the government had agreed in July 1993 to pay 15 per cent of the rent for that airline and foreign airlines operating in terminal 2.

Since Air Canada's present lease expires in 1997 and the new lease would run for 37 years, this measure alone would have cost the federal government some $70 million.

I think that all these shady dealings are suspicious enough to raise serious questions about the management of public funds, but there is more.

You will see that this huge waste of taxpayers' money has many ramifications. For example, I said a moment ago that these higher rates would have brought in tens of millions of dollars a year, which the federal government could very well cash in if it keeps control of the airport and makes the necessary adjustments and raises the rates itself. These rates would be the same as the present rate at terminal 3 and at most major North American airports.

Of course, this higher rate provided for in the agreement would not have taken effect immediately, but only after the Pearson Development Corporation invested the $700 million it had promised.

But this investment itself is a problem. Pearson had initially promised to invest $100 million of this amount to modernize terminal 1.

However, to encourage the initial investment, the government had agreed to collect only $16 million of the $17–million annual rent, which amounts to a 40 per cent rebate for 1994, 1995, 1996 and part of 1997. Although these amounts were to be paid back subsequently, with interest, by deferring these payments the federal government was actually helping to finance the upgrading of Terminal 1, when it had specifically said it would not do so.

Let us not mince words to describe the scheming and artful dodging that went on around an agreement that was unworthy of the trust that should exist between citizens and their government. The players in this political–financial saga ignored the most elementary code of ethics that should guide the relationship between the electorate and their elected representatives. By their greed they undermined the very foundation of our political system. They made a travesty of the very essence of the social contract that binds society together, to satisfy a craving for profit at any price, and the disclosure of their dealings discredited what was left of the government in power at the time.

It is rather difficult to understand why, after all this, the minister should seek authority to pay them compensation. I think we must ask this question: Is it necessary, appropriate and legitimate to pay these bidders compensation, considering the circumstances in which they operated? Only a thorough public inquiry would reveal exactly who did what and who is entitled to receive compensation and how much.

A number of players seem to have tried to take advantage of their political connections. This was hardly the average business operation you could brag about on the campaign trail, so the friends of the outgoing government and those of the incoming government acted like sensible people and reached a very sensible compromise. They said: "Let us stop fighting. Let us merge our Liberal and Conservative interests". Together, they were to conclude very quickly, before the election, a deal which until then had eluded them.

Not only Conservative lobbyists and personalities were involved. The government has presented this bill as through it were St. George slaying the dragon, in this case the Pearson contract. Away with this shameful Conservative contract and let the House help me raise a wall to protect the citizens of Canada from this contract!

Not only Conservative lobbyists and personalities were involved. Both traditional parties, as they like to call themselves, are represented in this mixed bag of moneylenders, fundraisers and lobbyists.

One of the directors of Claridge is the Liberal senator who received the future Liberal Prime Minister at his residence in Westmount at a $1,000–a–plate reception in the middle of the election campaign.

An hon. member: That's indecent!

Mr. Bouchard: Another lobbyist for Claridge was the present Prime Minister's former organizer, so we should not be misled by the present government's insistence on its role in cancelling the contract. The government knows perfectly well that this tainted contract was produced by the entourages of both camps, and not only by the Conservatives. The government knows perfectly well—my speaking time is not limited, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): No, I apologize for interrupting the minister.

Mr. Bouchard: He is getting upset over there because he doesn't like what I am saying. He would prefer to see this legislation go through the House like so many bills, after a quick vote. That will not happen, however. There is a debate here in this House.

An hon. member: Right on!

Mr. Bouchard: Canadians and Quebecers are entitled to hear the truth about this bill.

Some hon. members: Let's hear it for political patronage!

Mr. Bouchard: The government knows perfectly well that an enquiry would bring many of its fundraising friends scurrying out of their hiding places. We know that both camps worked together on this deal.

There is a lesson here, and it is that like great causes and great ideas, money sometimes makes strange bedfellows.

The author of the Nixon report is a former treasurer of the Ontario government. He is not a member of the Bloc Quebecois.

He is a respectable man, probably a federalist—and I respect him none the less for that—who was closely involved in the running of democratic institutions in Ontario, a well–known man, a man of integrity. In a word, the man I am about to quote—and you will notice that his criticism is even harsher than mine—knows what he is talking about. He has submitted the contract to a thorough examination, and was commissioned to do so. What did he find? He said: "To leave in place an inadequate contract, arrived at through such a flawed process and under the shadow of possible political manipulation, is unacceptable".

In other words, Mr. Nixon, who had neither the time, the means nor the power to conduct a comprehensive investigation was only able to get a glimpse, through the curtain, through the smoke in the ante–rooms of power, of possible political manipulation. Now that we know about this possibility, we must act. We must gather information. We must find out who the players were and who engineered this, if only to make sure they do not receive compensation they do not deserve.

Should an in–depth investigation show that some of the people involved acted in an unlawful, unacceptable or unethical manner in this matter, would we still be expected to pass clause 9, and especially clause 10, that allows the minister to pay them generous compensation? Certainly not! But, unbeknown to us, this doubt, this terrible, gnawing doubt, was put in our minds by the findings of the investigators.

"Possible political manipulation", that is heavy stuff. I could not bring myself to utter those words in my speech, but that is how the formal investigation report was worded. Do we stop here, in case the commission of inquiry decides some compensation is in order? That is a possibility. We do not know. We do not have all the facts. There may be people in there who acted in good faith. Maybe, maybe not. We would need to know which were honest and which were not. Otherwise, the good guy is going to pay for the actions of the others. We would have to sort all that out in a public inquiry that would show to everyone that justice has been served.

In addition, if this commission found that some compensation was called for in certain cases, it could determine the amounts openly and publicly and much more objectively than any Liberal minister, including the minister responsible for this case. We could also protect ourselves in the future by identifying clearly the people who pulled the strings on the Liberal side. We know they are there and we could identify them, thus preventing them from acting the same way with the current government in other cases.

I therefore ask the Prime Minister to set up such a royal commission of inquiry, which is the only authority capable of sorting out the real responsibilities of the parties involved in this case. It is also the only way to promote, in the general population as well as in this House, a healthy debate on the links that should or should not exist between a democratically elected government and partisan political entities interested in promoting private interests.

Such a commission could also, in the course of its work, study the issues underlying all these manipulations such as the management of federal airports. In the current economic context, who is in the best position to guarantee the viability and profitability of airport development? Is it the federal government? Is it non–profit agencies created for this purpose or other formulas? Would it not be better to turn their management over to local administrations, like in Montreal, as advocated in Transport Canada's policy during the events examined by Nixon?

Who in this country is best equipped to manage airports? It is an important question. It appears that even the current Prime Minister is not sure as he objected to Pearson Airport's privatization only on the last day of the election campaign, when it became obvious that the public was outraged by the deal's secrecy.

We all have a duty to be transparent. It is this transparency that made Nixon say on page 11 of his report: "Failure to make public the full identity of the participants in this agreement and other salient terms of the contract inevitably raises public suspicion. Where the Government of Canada proposes to privatize a public asset, in my opinion, transparency should be the order of the day. The public should have the right to know the full details of the agreement".

• (1135)

On this point, the Bloc can only support the opinion expressed by the fact finder, Mr. Nixon, and demand that the government truly take note of his comments and puts an end to this era of confusion which has everyone wondering.

[English]

Openness is a political virtue which has been absent in the country for many years now. Openness is a constant guide. It represents security and inspires confidence. We all know that confidence is a flower that has faded in recent years in Canada.

The disengagement of citizens, smuggling, the black market, general cynicism, all these social phenomena are the products of apparently very disparate factors. They can all be traced back to the same origin: the lack of openness on the part of the state which operates behind closed doors concerned, I would say obsessed, with management matters, too often oblivious to the real needs of all those men and women upon whom it must depend for its very legitimacy.

The time has come to go back to the basics and restore political transparency so as to once again give meaning to Canadian democracy. The Bloc will oppose Bill C–22. First, because this legislation is premature. First and foremost because a royal commission of inquiry must be appointed to clarify this dark episode in which the ethical behaviour of the government and some related players was not up to par.

Moreover, and I will end on that, it is imperative that, before anything else, and especially before trying to hide the reprehensible actions which were taken, strict measures be taken to control the activities of lobbyists. This is the very basis of my amendment.

Therefore, seconded by my colleague the member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, I move:

That all the words following "That" be eliminated and replaced by the following:

That this House refuse to proceed with the second reading of Bill C–22, an Act respecting certain agreements concerning the redevelopment and operation of Terminals 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson International Airport

Because the bill is flawed since it does not provide measures to ensure the transparency of lobbyists' activities.

[English]

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity today to speak on Bill C–22.

This whole Pearson revitalization and the studies that have been done raise many questions. I am hoping that the debate we are about to embark on will provide some answers to the questions. Actually Mr. Nixon's review demands a response. I would like to quote from the press release that came out with Mr. Nixon's review: "My review has left me with but one conclusion, to leave in place an inadequate contract, arrived at with such a flawed process and under the shadow of possible political manipulation, is unacceptable. I recommend to you that the contract be cancelled".

Those are very strong words and I think in those words there is a message that we must be fair. I was interested in the minister's comments when he spoke earlier this morning about being fair. The minister said that there may be those who would question any moneys being paid because of manipulation. He acknowledged that there may have been some manipulation. However he wanted his government to be fair and reasonable.

To whom are we going to be fair and reasonable? Will it be the taxpayers of Canada, the people who are paying the bills, or the lobbyists who are to profit from any moneys that are exchanged here? I think we have to be fair and reasonable. My priorities are that we have to be fair and reasonable with the taxpayers of Canada. We have an obligation to be fair and reasonable to those whose names and reputations have been called into question in all of this. They should be given an opportunity to clear themselves if that is possible. There should be no tax dollars spent until the air is clear.

Bill C–22 is virtually unprecedented. However I would suggest that the circumstances here are virtually unprecedented. We have accusations of patronage, accusations of political interference, accusations of excessive lobbying and apparently the elimination of competition.

The government has said much about honesty and fairness. I would like to quote from the red book on page 91. Chapter 6 begins:

If government is to play a positive role in society, as it must, honesty and integrity in our political institutions must be restored.

The most important asset of government is the confidence it enjoys of the citizens to whom it is accountable.

Bill C–22 does nothing toward this goal. Full disclosure of all that has taken place would go a long way toward achieving this. Let us review the background and the history to bring us up to date on the Pearson revitalization. There are many conflicting and contradictory positions.

Through a series of complicated deals two companies merge as partners: Paxport, which is controlled by Matthews Group Limited with very strong Tory connections, and Claridge investments, a company with very strong Liberal connections. These two companies are joined together as the Pearson Development Corporation.

Bill C–22 is the beginning of the end of a process which started in 1987 to move airports across Canada into local hands. Generally airports across Canada have gone into the hands of local airport authorities. The ones they have tried so far have met with some excellent results.

Pearson airport was a different case. The former Tory government was determined to privatize Pearson for the benefit of a number of its friends, among them David Matthews, a former Tory president and fund raiser and former Tory cabinet minister. Otto Jelinek joined Paxport, which is Matthews owned, shortly before the election. He is on its board of directors and president of its Asian wing. Excessive amounts of lobbying went into the privatization of Pearson airport. At least 10 firms were involved.

One of the clearest parts of this whole deal is the fact that the Liberals are heavily involved. Since the Liberal government has been in power it has appointed a former provincial Liberal cabinet minister to lead the review and the Prime Minister's former law partner to lead the negotiations for compensation.

These may be very capable and honest people. However the circumstances dictated that direct political connections should have been avoided. A suspicious and secret deal by the Tories now looks very much like a suspicious and secret Liberal cancellation.

Mr. Keyes: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am curious to what extent the Chair will go to allow the remarks of the member to potentially put into disrepute those individuals of whom the member speaks, especially in light of the result of the report of Mr. Nixon.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry but that is a point of debate rather than a point of order.

Mr. Harper (Simcoe Centre): Madam Speaker, actually the history going back to 1987 was when the Parliament of Canada passed the National Transportation Act which set the stage for a newly deregulated Canadian airline industry.

On April 8, 1987 the Government of Canada issued its policy on the future framework for the management of airports in Canada. It envisioned local airport authorities as the preferred method of airport management. Privatization was only given passing mention.

Three months later we had a reversal. On June 22, 1987 the Airport Development Corporation was the preferred developer to construct and operate terminal 3 at Pearson. The Matthews Group of companies sponsored an unsuccessful bid in this competition. However it will reappear.

In September 1989 the Matthews Group submitted an unsolicited proposal to the Government of Canada to privatize terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson. This proposal was not accepted. However no costs were expected at that time.

In October 1990 the government announced that private sector participation in the modernization of these two terminals would be sought through a future request for proposals process. No details were provided. As a matter of fact attempts by local airport authorities were rebuffed or rejected. They were not even encouraged to bid in spite of the success of airport authorities in Vancouver, Edmonton and Calgary.

On March 11, 1992 the government issued a request for proposals with 90 days provided for responses, placing heavy demands on those submitting a proposal. This gave the Matthews Group an advantage since it had previously submitted a bid in 1989. Two groups bid on the project: Paxport controlled by the Matthews Group and Claridge.

It must be noted that 90 days is a very short time to allow for proposals on a project of this magnitude. Another thing worth noting is that this was a one stage process. When T3 was considered it was a two–stage process, the first stage being to solicit and short list bidders and the second stage being to encourage detailed bids. This was not the case when we were looking at T1 and T2.

Another interesting aspect was that passenger volumes were open to projections by the bidders. A significant amount of information and coming up with a price was left open to those who were going to be bidding.

At that time there were many firms looking for work and yet so few were given the opportunity to bid on this project.

• (1150)

In December 1992 Paxport Incorporated was announced as the best overall proposal. It had to demonstrate its viability by February 1993. By that time Paxport found it did not have the financial backing it needed so it turned to Claridge for support.

The question here is how could a project of this magnitude proceed without financial ability as a prime consideration. Having discovered that it did not have the financial ability, the questions arise: Why Claridge? Was no other option available to Paxport?

In February 1993 Paxport and Claridge announced a joint venture partnership which became T1 T2 Limited Partnership and eventually the Pearson Development Corporation with terminal 3 to pursue the redevelopment according to Paxport's proposal.

The request for the proposal implicitly said that there must be competition between T1 T2 and terminal 3. As a matter of fact Paxport in its bid highlighted the importance of competition in its bid. However in joining forces the competition that was to be there was eliminated.

In May 1993 Claridge had assumed effective control of the joint venture. Competition is lost and yet Paxport is still there.

In June 1993 the Pearson Development Corporation and the government signed a letter of understanding as to the substance of the previous agreement. Just prior to that a member, Huguette Labelle, a former transport deputy minister, was moved out of her position because of her opposition to the government's movement.

On August 30 the Minister of Transport announced that a general agreement was reached with Pearson Development Corporation to redevelop T1 and T2 and indicated the agreement would be finalized in the fall with a legal agreement for the long term management operation and redevelopment of the terminals. This is with the election only days away. On September 8, 1993 the election was called.

Prior to the conclusion of the legal agreement the Leader of the Opposition, the present Prime Minister, had indicated clearly that parties proceeding to conclude this transaction did so at their own risk and that a new government would not hesitate to pass legislation to block the privatization of terminals 1 and 2 if the transaction was not in the public interest.

At this time the chief negotiator of the Government of Canada sought written instructions about whether to complete the transaction.

On October 7, 1993 the Prime Minister at the time gave written instructions to complete the deal. We were in the middle of an election and those instructions were given. One has to ask the question: Why?

On October 7 the legal agreement was made to complete the Pearson privatization. At this point we were only 18 days away from an election. Knowing it was going to be an election issue, knowing it would be cancelled if it did not prove to be in the public interest, the government proceeded with the undertaking.

On October 28, 1993 the Prime Minister appointed Robert Nixon, a former Liberal cabinet minister, to do a quick review of the Pearson deal.

There is much that has gone on in the background and, as I said at the beginning, there are many questions that have been raised here. In fact there are questions that are crying out to be answered.

We should take a minute to review some of Mr. Nixon's comments and his opinions in the process. On page 8 of his report he states:

> The request for proposals having as it did only a single stage and requiring proponents to engage in project definition as well as proposal submissions and all within a 90 day timeframe created, in my view, an enormous advantage to a proponent that had previously submitted a proposal for privatizing and developing terminals T1 and T2.
> [...] With little consideration and development occurring others should have been sought and given reasonable time to participate.

● (1155)

The role of lobbyists and political staff, as stated on page 9 of the report, reads:

> It is clear that the lobbyists played a prominent role in attempting to effect the decisions that were reached, going far beyond the acceptable concept of consulting. When senior bureaucrats involved in the negotiations for the Government of Canada feel that their actions and decisions are being heavily affected by lobbyists, as occurred here, the role of the latter has, in my view, exceeded permissible norms.
> As well, there was the perception that political staff were interested in this transaction to a highly unusual extent; indeed, this climate of pressure resulted in civil servants being reassigned or requesting transfers from the project.

In closing, this was a flawed process that would appear to be killing this project. Mr. Nixon in his review said that the project should indeed proceed. There are five chairpersons and 32 municipalities which support that position.

There is also a safety angle here. Pilots have been stressing this safety factor. I quote from an article in the Toronto Star that was reported in response to some airline pilots who attended a committee hearing.

As pilot Rick Anderson noted, "planes are designed to land in the wind. Crosswinds can cause problems, especially on slippery runways. When heavy crosswinds are blowing, a second north–south runway would be safer to use than the existing east–west runways, and cut delays as well. While the value of the latter cannot be underestimated as we pull out of this recession, since planes burn about 1,360 kilograms of fuel an hour while waiting to land, travellers, airlines and environment all would benefit from reduced travel time, fuel costs and air pollution".

There are thousands of construction jobs at stake. The delay in this project is hurting job creating projects around the province, and indeed in Canada. Mike Sifton, president of Toronto Airways, stated that "airports create jobs and business. The real jobs an airport creates are one and a half miles down the road from the runway".

This review need not and should not hold up construction. Currently some Toronto MPs are delaying this for purely local concerns. Canadian jobs and growth are at stake. Pearson is a national issue, not a local issue, and jobs are at stake in Kitchener, Windsor, North Bay, Kingston, Oshawa and Barrie.

There is much at stake here: honesty and integrity in the system, confidence and trust in politicians, potentially millions of taxpayers' dollars, the names and reputations of many people, Pearson's revitalization, thousands of jobs and future growth in the economy.

Bill C–22 in my view does nothing to address these issues. We will be supporting the Bloc amendment. I would move an amendment to the Bloc amendment. I move:

That the amendment be amended by adding immediately after the words "more open" the words "in Canada".

• (1200)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I would like to advise the hon. member for Simcoe Centre that we will take his proposed subamendment under consideration.

For the moment I will resume debate with the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, before I get into the text of my speech I wonder if I could make a couple of observations that are rather striking and troublesome.

We have heard from both the Bloc Quebecois and the Reform Party. They have questioned the way the Pearson deal came about and the substance of the deal. We all agree that the process and the substance were seriously flawed in many ways because the Canadian public interest was not protected. Yet both opposition parties are voting against the bill.

That is rather curious. I must admit I was rather surprised that the leader of the Bloc Quebecois would take the time to address this issue. He talked about a number of things, from lobbyists to other circumstances. He went on ad nauseam about the fact he had left the government before he had anything to do with it. I believe that perhaps he has a guilty conscience.

He is right. He left the government in May 1990, but he was part of that gang, part of his colleagues, part of the cabinet, part of the so–called friends he now wants to deny he ever had anything to do with who put this darned bad deal together. It is rather curious that the Bloc leader would go on at length trying to divorce himself from a bad gang, as Canadians would know it, as he knew it. Yet he participated maybe not in the Pearson deal, but right from the beginning he knew exactly what was going on.

He went on and on. He must have a guilty conscience about the fact that he had anything to do with the gang that operated in Ottawa for nine years.

He then starts talking about the bill being a smoke screen and in fact talks about Pearson being a very important economic instrument and transportation mechanism. What does he ask for? A public inquiry that would probably cost millions and millions of taxpayers' dollars and waste a lot more time. We need to get on with the planning of Pearson. The bill needs to be put in place to effect the cancellation because the former government did not put a cancellation clause in the agreement.

I find it rather curious that the Bloc talks about integrity. It is really talking about wasting a heck of a lot more time so that we cannot get on with the business of deciding what we need to do in the public interest with regard to Pearson.

The comments of the Reform Party were equally absurd. They talked about the flawed process, about the flawed contract. Yet what is it talking about? It is talking about delaying.

The member for Simcoe Centre said that Pearson was an important employment generator. We can put people back to work. Yet he said Reformers could not support the bill until certain other things happen. That is not being fiscally responsible, like the Reform Party likes to pretend it is, at least in the minds of Canadians. I do not really understand where the Reform Party is coming from in terms of delay and timing. We want to do exactly what I thought the member said, and that is get on with planning the future of Pearson and national transportation.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in the debate on this important legislation, Bill C–22. I want to add my support to the Minister of Transport who has brought this legislation forward to cancel the agreements entered into by a previous government for the operations of terminal 1 and terminal 2 at Pearson International. This is a necessary step not only to ensure the future of Pearson but also to restore the faith of Canadians in their democratic institutions.

We are not cancelling this deal because it was fashioned by a previous government. To do so simply for partisan reasons would be unjustifiably frivolous. Rather the government has said that we will build on some of the previous government's initiatives when, and I emphasize when, such works serve the interests of the people of Canada. Pearson airport did not serve those interests.

The people of Canada voted in the last election for open and transparent government. The process that led to this deal was neither open nor transparent, nor did it stand up to scrutiny by an impartial observer, Mr. Robert Nixon. As we all remember,

Mr. Nixon, the former Ontario treasurer, advised the government to reject the deal saying: "To leave in place an inadequate contract, arrived at with such flawed process and under the shadow of possible political manipulation, is unacceptable".

I want to digress perhaps a little for a moment, although it is related. One of our important commitments as a government is to renewing Canada's infrastructure and that includes our transportation system.

As my hon. colleague, the Minister of Transport, said in his speech in February, we intend to help Canadians build a stronger economy. One way to do this is through policies that bring immediate gains in transportation efficiencies. This kind of forward thinking will contribute to long term economic growth by enabling Canadians to do business and move goods quickly and efficiently at competitive costs. Yes, we need to improve our transportation infrastructure but not at the expense of the long term interests of the people of Canada.

To get back to this particular deal, perhaps it would be useful to look at some history, to get some perspective on where things started to come apart. I know that other speakers have already indicated that. On April 8, 1987 the then Government of Canada issued its policy framework for the management of airports in Canada. On June 22, 1987 the government selected the Airport Development Corporation to construct and operate Pearson's terminal 3. I should point out at the same time that the Leader of the Opposition was in the Conservative cabinet.

The Falcon Star Group which included the Matthews Group of companies was an unsuccessful bidder in this competition back on June 22, 1987. In September 1989 the Matthews Group submitted an unsolicited proposal to privatize terminals 1 and 2 but this proposal was not accepted by the then government in September of 1989.

In October 1990 the then Minister of Transport announced the government would privatize terminal 1 and terminal 2 at Pearson. A year and a half later on March 11, 1992 the government issued an RFP for the privatization and redevelopment of terminals 1 and 2. The original RFP provided only 90 days for response, although that was extended, if we can call it that, by an additional 30 days.

It is not as though the construction industry was booming in southern Ontario in those days. Yet no other firms were given reasonable time to participate, so the process was flawed right from the beginning.

On December 7, 1992 the government announced Paxport's proposal was the best overall, but Paxport still had to demonstrate that its proposal was financially viable. When it could not do this it turned to Claridge, its rival for financial support. By February 1, 1993 Paxport had joined forces with the other original bidder in a joint venture partnership which became T1 T2 Limited Partnership.

By May 1993 when most outstanding issues had been dealt with sufficiently for formal negotiations to start, we now find that Claridge, the second place finisher, in effective control of the joint venture.

On August 30, 1993 the then Minister of Transport announced that a general agreement had been reached to redevelop and operate the two terminals. Then just nine short or long days later, depending on your perspective, on September 8, 1993 the government called the long awaited election. We all remember that campaign well and we all remember the concerns raised by the public and media about the Pearson deal.

The soon to be Prime Minister warned the parties to the deal not to sign it, that a new government would not hesitate to cancel it if it was not found to be in the public interest.

It should perhaps be noted that the circumstances were such that the government's chief negotiator asked for written instructions about whether to complete the transaction. That chief negotiator got those instructions on October 7, 1993 despite the concerns expressed by many Canadians, the soon to be former Prime Minister issued explicit instructions to conclude the deal. We now know where the push came from. It seems that the Canadian people had some doubts as well and we know how they expressed themselves at the ballot boxes.

What would the Government of Canada have gained by the agreement? Remember the terms of the lease was 37 years with an option for an additional 20 years. This means the government could well have been signing away control of a major national asset for almost three generations.

The agreement also included a constraint on alternative airport development within a 75–kilometre radius of Pearson. How did the previous government suppose this government would serve the people of London and the rest of southern Ontario by this kind of provision in the agreement?

Extensive reviews have shown that the airport facilities in the area of south central Ontario must be co–ordinated. Southern Ontario airports must, for planning purposes, be considered part of a single integrated system. This clause alone would have severely constrained future governments, eliminating many sound planning options. Under the agreement the government could have done nothing to alleviate the pressures of growth at other airports until Pearson topped 33 million passengers a year.

As Mr. Nixon said in what I take to be restrained understatement, the agreement did not serve the public interests.

I know my allotted time is running out, but I cannot leave the matter without some mention of the appearance of cronyism conveyed by this deal. It is this appearance that is so corrosive to public confidence in the government and its institutions. While we are not suggesting that anything illegal was done by any of the parties, some of their actions conveyed the impression that they had something to hide.

Everyone knows how much concern was expressed about lobbyists and political staff seeming to have an inordinate influence on decisions that should have been made on the basis of public interest, influencing them so much that senior public servants felt pressured.

We have a long tradition that requires openness and transparency in any undertaking that involves the public purse. Canadians are entitled to disclosure when it comes to a deal affecting their assets.

I am afraid there is much more, but time does not permit me to examine the rest of it. What is also important now is that it is time to move forward. The government understands that the people of Ontario, in fact all Canadians affected by Pearson's operations, would like a prompt decision on how we are going to manage Pearson. That is one good reason for proceeding with the bill, to cancel the agreement as we must formally through this legislation as quickly as possible. Pearson is too important a national asset to languish while we debate. The Minister of Industry said when he introduced the bill: "We need to get the cancellation over with so we can get on with the job of planning for its future operations".

However, as has been clearly stated by the Minister of Transport, we will not be put in the untenable position of cobbling together a solution. Pearson is too important and we are too much aware of our responsibility to Canadians to rush simply for the sake of doing something, anything, as some members opposite seem to want us to do without proper care for the long term effects of our decision.

The fact of the matter is that the decisions we take at Pearson do not just affect that single airport. That is why we are consulting with a great many people. Yes, we are consulting with our Toronto members of Parliament. They were elected and are the rightful voice of their constituents in Parliament, in our caucus and in our government. We will consult with provincial, municipal and regional governments and local community leaders. We are doing that and the minister is doing that. We intend to do it right, not like the previous government has done.

In fact, as some of our other counterparts have indicated in the debate this morning, Pearson is not a local airport. It is a national airport and we are seeking national consultation.

The fact that our party is a national party with representatives from all parts of this country is a positive for us, not a negative. I cannot say that about the Bloc which only has members in one province nor the Reform Party which has members in only two or three provinces. We are a national party with national representation. We will consult with our national caucuses as to what to do about our national airport.

The government intends to make a final decision on Pearson's administrative structure before the end of this year. It is now time to close the book on this sorry chapter and move forward with planning for the future of Canada's transportation hub. Passing the legislation will allow us to plan the future of Pearson unencumbered by these flawed agreements.

No one should be surprised by anything in the legislation. It is nothing more than what we said we would do before the election, after the election, and when we introduced the legislation.

We will negotiate only for out of pocket expenses. We will not negotiate for lost profits and we will not negotiate for lobbyist fees. We are doing what the Bloc has indicated we should not; we are doing what the Reform has indicated we should not, which is to negotiate lobbyist fees. We will not pay for lobbyist fees. We will not pay for lost profit. We will pay for out of pocket expenses.

The legislation does not limit the amount of any potential payment nor does it preclude any continued negotiations because negotiations must continue. It does make clear to all the parties what the government is and is not prepared to consider. It makes it clear that these negotiations cannot go on indefinitely.

We are not saying that lobbyists should not be paid. We are saying these parties should take up the matter with the people who employed them, the developers, and not the taxpayers of the country.

I would like to close with this reminder. The most important asset a government can have is the confidence of its citizens. During the nine years of the previous government—and I was happy to hear the history lesson from the leader of the Bloc Quebecois because he participated in part of those nine years in that government—we saw a steady erosion of confidence in the public sector.

This erosion had many causes, from the behaviour of certain elected politicians to an arrogant style of political leadership. One of the key causes of this erosion was the practice of conducting public business behind closed doors giving the idea of favouritism.

Canadians deserve better. The government intends to do better by delivering to Canadians the leadership and the innovation demanded by today's changes backed by integrity and supported by principles that will never be sacrificed to expediency.

We look forward to working with both parties at committee to improve the legislation, if we can. We need to get on with the business of planning Pearson's future. We cannot unless we pass the legislation. I look forward to the comments of members from both sides.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Prior to going to the questions and comments section, the subamendment as proposed by the hon. member for Simcoe Centre is procedurally acceptable, as long as he is asking that we insert the words "in Canada" after the word "lobbyist". Is that correct?

Mr. Harper (Simcoe Centre): That is correct, Madam Speaker.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, I would like to place a couple of comments on the record before putting a question to the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Bill C–22 is reasonable, prudent and protects the Canadian taxpayers. After all, the developers behind the Pearson deal were warned. The Liberal Party stated long before the 1993 election that it smelled something rotten in this deal. We put it on record that we would take this action if we found there was something rotten about the deal. The Nixon report confirmed that and now we have Bill C–22. It is the only course of action to take.

Leading up to my question I am glad the government is taking this action. It indicates to me that the government is committed to transparency and accountability.

The House probably already knows that airport authorities are being proposed for other centres in Canada, including my home city of Winnipeg. The hold–over model proposed by the former government for the proposed airport authority in Winnipeg is flawed.

In my opinion the accountability under the plan proposed by the Conservative government is weak. Transparency is not there. For example there is no provision for the public tendering process. The conflict of interest guidelines are a joke and representation can certainly be improved.

If we are going to go ahead with establishing airport authorities, be it one to replace the Pearson deal in Toronto or to replace other Transport Canada management at other centres in the country, let us get it right. Let us get it down so we do have public accountability, transparency and so on.

Perhaps the hon. parliamentary secretary could answer my questions. Are we going to establish further airport authorities of the kind proposed in Winnipeg, not for profit but still an airport authority, a kind of privatization? When these airport authorities are established will public accountability be the top priority?

I do not want private clubs operating airports. I want bodies that operate airports in the public interest and have public accountability at the top of the list.

Mr. Fontana: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the comments made by my colleague from Winnipeg St. James. He has touched on a number of important issues with regard to local airport authorities. He is absolutely right that we want to get it right, that we want to do it right.

The government has learned from mistakes made by others. The Minister of Transport and Transport Canada are looking at ways of fixing those flaws the member talked about with regard to local airport authorities. There are tremendous opportunities.

The minister sees it that way. Transport Canada sees it that way. Local communities can play a positive, constructive and proactive role in running airports to be the economic instruments they can be, but not to the detriment of public interest. We are defining what that public interest is in terms of safety and other matters.

The member is right on. We intend to make sure the local airport authority provisions are enhanced to make them much more accountable, much more transparent. We intend to ensure there is broad representation on those boards, to ensure the bottom line is that the interests of the community are always at the top of the heap so to speak.

I thank the hon. member for his constructive suggestions. We hope to have those revisions in place as soon as possible. As the member has indicated a number of communities are looking at opportunities.

As the Reform Party keeps reminding us, the government wants to be as effective and as efficient as it possibly can to save taxpayers money. If the local airport authorities can do the job well and protect the public interests as well as further their own local objectives, why not? The government is prepared to look at that.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans): I detect some contradiction in the words of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport, and I will explain why.

It seems to me that the parliamentary secretary is speaking from both sides of the mouth, not at the same time, of course, but I will explain myself.

On March 10, the Minister of Transport, in response to the Budget Speech of the Minister of Finance, said in several places—I do not have the Hansard with me, but I studied his speech very well—that several activities currently conducted by Transport Canada would have to be sold and privatized.

I would like the parliamentary secretary to indicate to me whether there is not a contradiction in what he was saying earlier about the fact that the Pearson airport should continue to be part of the public heritage.

[English]

Mr. Fontana: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the comment and question by my colleague the transport critic for the Bloc.

The minister and the government have indicated that Transport Canada and our government want to look at commercialization opportunities. Commercialization does not necessarily mean the same as turning over or privatizing so that the private interest is protected and the public interest is not.

The member will know we have already announced some measures such as the air navigation system. We will be consulting all the stakeholders to find out if there is a better way of controlling our air navigation system to make sure that safety is paramount, that all the stakeholders have input into the system, and at the same time save the taxpayers some money.

I do not have to tell the member why we need to look at opportunities for saving money. We have a deficit and a debt to deal with. The taxpayers also demand that this government look at every opportunity to make sure we are as efficient and as effective as possible, but not to give up the public interest.

We are not in any position to make an announcement as to how we will deal with Pearson. That announcement will come as the minister indicated and as I indicated in my speech. By the end of the year we will put forward our plan of action for Pearson, not only the administrative structure but also the plans we have for its future. We are consulting.

It is not inconsistent nor is it talking out of both sides of the mouth to say that the deal structured by the former government was a bad deal. It was badly structured. It was a bad process, repugnant to taxpayers. The detail and substance of the deal were bad and not in good public interest.

We do not intend to make the same mistakes. We have learned from other people's mistakes, hopefully. We will put together a plan for Pearson, other airports, other modes of transportation, be it the seaway, be it rail, be it marine, be it highways, to work in co–operation with all the stakeholders, the provinces, municipalities, communities, anyone we have to, to make sure that Canada has the most effective, efficient, integrated transportation system to serve Canadians.

At the end of the day Canadians have to compete with the Americans, with the Mexicans, with the global community. Unless we can move goods and people as efficiently as we possibly can and at the best costs we cannot compete. If we cannot compete we do not have jobs and if we do not have jobs we have economic and social problems.

I would hope that commercialization is not a bad word. It is an opportunity that the government wants to look at to see how much more efficient and effective we can be in all modes of transportation.

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans): Madam Speaker, you will understand that, as transport critic for the Official Opposition, I am extremely interested in Bill C–22 which was presented at first reading on April 13, 1993. I also carefully reviewed the report Mr. Robert Nixon submitted to the hon. Prime Minister on November 29, 1993.

I did not waste any time in studying the contract signed on October 7, 1993 by the Government of Canada and T1 T2 Limited Partnership. I also asked certain employee associations for their opinion and consulted with some airport managers. I will not violate any official secrets by saying that, after these consultations and all that reading, I agree with the amendment proposed by the Leader of the Opposition and ask this House to authorize a Royal Commission to hold an inquiry on the circumstances surrounding the deal entered into by the government and T1 T2 Limited Partnership.

In its present form, Bill C–22 contains a dozen clauses. We agree with some of them but cannot support the wording of subsection 10(1), and I quote:

> If the Minister considers it appropriate to do so, the Minister may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, enter into agreement on behalf of Her Majesty to provide for the payment of such amounts as the Minister considers appropriate in connection with the coming into force of this Act, subject to the terms and conditions the Minister considers appropriate.

During the election campaign, the leader of the Liberal Party of Canada, the present Prime Minister, made it very clear to the parties involved that he would have no qualms about cancelling the deal after he was elected. Following this statement, the chief negotiator for the former government requested written instructions on whether to complete the transaction. The then Conservative Prime Minister specifically requested that the agreement be signed that very day. However, concluding a transaction of this magnitude in the midst of an election campaign, effectively tying the newly elected government to the previous government's policies, flies in the face of normal democratic practices.

We must admit that the new Liberal Prime Minister, who was elected last October 27, wasted no time in dealing with the situation, announcing on December 3, 1993 the cancellation of the Pearson Airport privatization deal. Unfortunately, he probably soon realized that some of the people involved in that deal belonged to his party. It is probably why, on April 13, 1994, his government presented a bill to finalize the cancellation while reserving the right, under subsection 10(1), to enter into agreements on behalf of Her Majesty to provide for the payment of such amounts he himself considers appropriate.

You will understand that to exclude Parliament from such an important decision and to give a blank cheque to Cabinet, especially the minister of Transport, is unacceptable.

• (1235)

During the last campaign, our party mentioned that the Liberals and the Tories were so similar that they were like two peas in a pod or "blanc bonnet, bonnet blanc", as we say in Beauport and on Île d'Orléans. This bill confirms it.

It is unacceptable for payment of compensation to be authorized without even being sure such compensation is warranted. When examining all the documents, and particularly the lengthy Nixon report, I wonder if there was any wrongdoing in that operation and I am very concerned about the answer.

After the royal commission of inquiry has made its review, after its decision and recommendations, maybe we will come to the conclusion that it is rather T1 T2 Limited Partnership that should pay compensation to the Canadian government. If however the royal commission concludes that there is compensation to be paid, Parliament will still be in a position to make a fair and enlightened decision.

I mentioned that we were not in agreement with section 10(1), but I would like to add that there should be another section in the bill saying who should manage Pearson International Airport. We all know that Transport Canada still operates the airport, but we would have liked to see this bill determine clearly that the Toronto airport should be under the management of a non–profit organisation just like the Montreal, Calgary, Vancouver and Edmonton airports.

In these cases, management is a group of people from the local community so they are quite capable of defending the interests of those they represent. Let me just give as an example Aéroports de Montréal, the corporation that operates the two Montreal airports; the members of its board come from the business community and are also board members of the SOPRAM, the corporation responsible for the promotion of Montreal airports.

The eighth member is the president and chief executive officer of Aéroports de Montréal, ADM if you will. It is also interesting to note that SOPRAM is a non–profit organization comprising 21 members appointed by the following organisations: the City of Montreal, the City of Laval, the Conférence des maires de banlieue, the Chambre de commerce du Montréal métropolitain, the Board of Trade of Metropolitan Montreal, the Corporation de promotion de l'aéroport de Mirabel (COPAM), the Société montérégienne de développement (SMD) and the city of Longueuil.

This kind of representation means that the corporation is sensitive to local interests and has a perspective rooted into the business community. This is a prerequisite that we would have liked to see in Bill C–22. I would like to come back to the royal commission we are requesting. Why should we have a commission of inquiry? There are several reasons.

The first would be to determine why, on March 11, 1992, the government asked formally for proposals regarding the privatization of Terminals 1 and 2 of Pearson Airport. There would be only one phase and no prequalification, contrary to the process for Terminal 3, which was to be in two phases.

The second reason is that, looking at the Nixon report, we note that the call for tenders left only a very short time, 90 days, which meant that only groups closely connected with the operation of the airport, like Claridge and Paxport, could possibly submit a valid tender. This explains why only two tenders were received. Paxport had already submitted a privatization plan in 1989, but had had to withdraw, and Claridge was operating Terminal 3.

The third reason is to determine why the contract was signed on October 7, 1993, during the election campaign, and despite the fact that the very hesitant chief negotiator had asked for written instructions before signing the deal.

The fourth reason is to determine what role did the lobbyists played and whom they lobbied. The fifth one, to determine the cost to the public of this hasty decision, and who really benefitted from it. The sixth one, to establish why the Conservative government sought to privatize Pearson Airport, the most profitable in Canada. The seventh reason, to find out why the government allowed T1 T2 Limited Partnership a rate of return of 24 per cent before taxes and 14 per cent after taxes.

The eighth reason is to see why the Nixon Report recommends that no compensation be paid for lost business opportunities and lobbying costs. Have the commissioners uncovered even more irregularities than we know of?

The ninth reason is to determine the role of certain stakeholders closely linked either to the Conservative Party or to the Liberal Party of Canada.

The tenth reason is the answer to the following question: Why did the government not include in Bill C–22 a clause allowing it to transfer the Pearson Airport administration to a non–profit organization?

These are some of the reasons why a royal commission of inquiry is needed to arrive at a well advised decision. It is also important that the commission clearly indicate the impact of lobbyists in this case. It must examine the costs to the taxpayers, the impact on jobs in the Metro Toronto area, and especially, the impact on transportation in Canada.

I will be focusing in particular on the repercussions of this transaction on Canadian transportation. My colleagues will discuss not only the impact on public finances and on jobs in the Metro Toronto area, but also the role of lobbyists in this affair.

Airports, along with aircraft and human resources, are the mainstay of the air transport industry. Airport facilities allow you to increase the number of destinations, accommodate various types of aircraft and provide different kinds of services.

Air transportation has a great influence on the overall economy of a region. An airport is the point of arrival for foreign investors and the point of departure for local human and non–human resources. For the region where it is located as well as for the destinations it is linked with, an airport is considered a significant economic lever.

According to a study conducted by the École des hautes études commerciales of Montreal in the late 1980s, the contribution of Montreal airports to the Gross Domestic Product in terms of value added in 1992 was expected to be $1.3 billion in direct effects only and $2.2 billion in both direct and indirect effects.

To show just how airport facilities can influence regional development, let me quote from an IATA report issued in December 1991. In Toronto, the addition of a runway would mean $3.5 billion more in revenues for the region over the next 15 years and $9 billion more for the province. The impact on the employment situation would be significant: locally, the addition of the runway would create 3,300 new jobs every year and 3,700 jobs throughout Ontario, which comes to over 7,000 new jobs for Ontario.

Also, in its October 1992 issue, the magazine L'Actualité reported that the number and frequency of air transport communications between major cities is the fifth criterion used by potential investors.

The air transport industry depends directly on airport facilities. Carriers are the primary clients of airports and it is thanks to the serviceability of airport facilities that airlines can develop and generate by their activities considerable revenues for the community.

The main cause of these decreases is quite clear. In the mid 1960s, projections for future passenger and cargo traffic led authorities to plan the building of a second airport in Montreal, that is Mirabel. According to the projections made in 1967 for the 1980s, we were to expect 14 million passengers and 2,020,000 tons of cargo by 1985.

Also in the mid 1960s, we anticipated a 15 per cent growth rate for passenger traffic in the Montreal area, that is approximately 10,600,000 passengers for 1975, the year Mirabel was going to be inaugurated.

Lastly, Mirabel was to be the sole gateway in Canada for all transatlantic flights and, eventually, for all international flights other than transborder flights.

• (1245)

Things did not turn out that way. In 1985, the combined passenger traffic for Dorval and Mirabel was 7 million passengers, that is half of what was initially projected. In 1985, the combined cargo traffic for Dorval and Mirabel was approximately 105,000 tons, which is less than what Dorval handled alone in 1975. This cargo is 5 per cent of what was projected in 1967.

In the years following the inauguration of Mirabel Airport, Montreal lost the preferential status that it had been promised. Mirabel is no longer the only gateway in Canada and more and more airlines are authorized to offer direct flights from other Canadian airports to foreign destinations.

Between 1966 and 1975, passenger traffic in Montreal grew by about 9.9 per cent, which is 5 per cent less than expected. However, the growth rate did not remain steady after 1975. Between 1975 and 1984, passenger traffic grew by only 2.24 per cent, which represents an annual growth rate of less than one quarter of one per cent. So, the growth rate at both Montreal airports was about 10 per cent of the Canadian growth rate during the same period.

Between 1975 and 1984, increases in passenger traffic occurred mainly in Toronto, Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Ottawa and Halifax. Montreal accounted for only 1.86 per cent of the overall growth in traffic in Canada during this nine–year period. Also, during the last ten years, that is from 1981 to 1991, the growth rate of passenger traffic in Montreal was minimal compared to the 44.55 per cent rate recorded in Toronto.

In 1981, Dorval and Mirabel handled 7.5 million passengers a year, whereas Toronto handled 14.7 million. The slow growth of airport activity in Montreal since the early 70s is especially notable compared to what happened in Toronto over the same period. Statistical data are a proven measure of airport activity.

Therefore, one can imagine that the negative impact of this shift in economic activity from Montreal to Toronto has played a major role in the erosion of Air Canada's pilot base in Montreal in favour of Ontario's capital. For example, in 1979, Air Canada had 461 pilots based in Montreal and 451 in Toronto, a difference of 10 in favour of Montreal. Some 13 years later, in 1992, Air Canada had 301 pilots based in Montreal and 781 in Toronto, a difference of 480 in favour of Toronto. Over a 13–year period, Montreal lost 160 pilots whereas Toronto gained 480 pilots. This about–turn is due mainly to the fact that Montreal has lost its privileged status with regard to direct flights to Europe, which allowed a shift in economic activity from Montreal to Toronto.

In closing, I would like to quote the words of Mr. Tory Hine, financial analyst for Scotia McLeod, as reported by the magazine Wings, vol. 5, in the fall of 1992.

[English]

"We have an airline industry concentrated on a single hub, Pearson International in Toronto, with secondary hubs in Vancouver, the Pacific gateway and Montreal. The position and dominance of the Toronto hub is the single asset of Canada's industry. The potential for Toronto to be the North American scale hub is important for the jobs and revenue which would be created in the Toronto area, but it also provides an important link which enables Canada to participate fully in both the Canada—U.S. and North American free trade agreements. The split of Montreal's two airports between international services at Mirabel and domestic and transborder services at Dorval means that the two airports are relegated to serving primarily the local market. Montreal as a result has not emerged as a full hub".

[Translation]

Again, if Montreal could have maintained the status it enjoyed in the seventies, it would not have to limit itself to serving local routes.

• (1250)

In conclusion, the Montreal airports authority manages Montreal's two airports very well. Business people and airport people are talking to each other and the best solution will soon be found. Hopefully, the Montreal airports authority will try to convince airlines to have their inspection and maintenance work done in a place where air traffic is already heavy. This would have a major impact on employment at the Air Canada technical maintenance centre in Montreal, where close to 3,500 people work and which is known around the world for its excellence and expertise.

My party does not intend to take the place of local people when it comes to deciding whether there should be one or two airports in Montreal. We are convinced that they are able to make the right decisions.

The government will soon have important decisions to make concerning Pearson Airport, and I am not talking about compensation, but about its future and administration. Before making decisions that could result in one area of the country being more prosperous than another, would it not be a good idea to review the whole Canadian airport system, to discuss with business people and specialized agencies, and to involve the provincial governments so that all regions, and not only one, can prosper?

[English]

Mr. Barry Campbell (St. Paul's): Madam Speaker, I rise in support of Bill C–22, an act respecting certain agreements concerning the redevelopment and operation of terminals 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson International Airport.

This is the bill to cancel the agreements made by the previous government for the operation of terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson airport. As my colleague, the member for London East, made clear a few moments ago, it is time we close the book on this ill–conceived project so that we can get on with the important work of planning Pearson's future.

I support the bill for a number of reasons because it puts an end to agreements contrary to the public interest reached through what have been described charitably as a flawed process. The legislation enables the government to get on with planning the future of Pearson airport and air transportation and that future is too important to be tied up in procedural knots.

Most of all, the bill should be supported because it clears the decks for the serious work of rebuilding Canada's transportation system, including our air transportation network which has Pearson as its hub.

One of the government's first priorities is to secure Canada's economic future, a task in which transportation plays a key role. There is no question that the cost of moving goods and people is a major factor in our nation's economic health. For Canada it is a daily challenge.

The growth and prosperity of the country have always depended on transportation. This was true before Confederation and it is true today. It is even truer today; a fast, reliable, low cost transportation system is vital to Canada's prosperity. It is the life support system of the country's exports and a critical factor in our competitiveness. It is transportation which keeps us together as a nation.

Air travel plays a particularly important role in binding the country together. It is how we travel when we go home for the holidays, when we take a vacation, when we seek out new business. Pearson is the hub of air transportation in Canada, our largest airport, one of North America's busiest gateways. One–third of all air travellers in Canada pass through Lester B. Pearson International Airport. Twenty–one million people passing through on their way to visit friends and family make business connections or even take their first steps on Canadian soil.

As Mr. Nixon said in his report to the Prime Minister, Pearson is a critical national gateway and a hub service to travellers, families and shippers. It cannot be duplicated by any other facility in the area, indeed in the province or in the country.

However Pearson is more than a transportation hub. It is also an economic generator for southern Ontario. The airport generates employment for 57,000 people directly and indirectly, including 14,000 people who work on site, and these jobs generate almost $2 billion a year in personal income. Add to that the almost $4 billion a year in direct revenue for local businesses and tourism and the $633 million in taxes from airport activity that go to various governmental jurisdictions. That gives us some idea of the airport's economic contribution to southern Ontario, the greater Toronto area, and all of Canada.

When we consider its economic and social importance to the region, the provinces and the country we see that Pearson is far more than a transportation facility. It is one of the most important public assets in our economy, an airport which serves the entire region, Ontario and all of Canada.

It is incredible to me that the previous government would have planned to sign away this vital asset in the heat of an election campaign without financial prequalification and constraining airport development in the entire region.

As Mr. Nixon concluded, this was an inadequate contract, arrived at in a flawed process and under the shadow of possible political manipulation. This deal was contrary to public good.

Being against the Pearson deal is not the same as being against renewal of our transportation system; far from it. As the Minister of Transport said in his response to the budget, the government is fully committed to helping Canadians build a stronger economy. An essential part of this effort is renewing Canada's infrastructure and that includes our transportation system. This renewal will contribute to long term economic growth by enabling Canadians to transact their business and move their goods quickly, efficiently and at competitive cost.

The government is committed to improving transportation effectiveness, but we must avoid simplified solutions that stem from a political agenda rather than clear eyed planning. We must avoid sacrificing the interests of the nation as a whole to serve a narrow, ideologically based vision.

That is why the government is developing a national transportation policy, a framework to allow us to retool our facilities and services to meet current and future needs.

To meet these needs we need to develop an integrated transportation system. To get maximum benefits from transportation we have to focus on the entire system, not on its parts, its many parts. The transition may be difficult, especially for aspects or facets of our struggling transportation industry but it must be done.

We must also encourage and stimulate competition. Government can do this by providing the regulatory framework, incentives, and infrastructure the private sector needs to deliver transportation services competitively and safely.

The government intends to pursue a pragmatic mix of modal integration, innovation and realism. Transport Canada is reviewing all its policies and programs. This review is intended to address the challenges and pressures facing Canada's transportation sector through a comprehensive, coherent strategy of reform.

Being against the flawed Pearson deal does not mean being against private sector participation in what were once viewed as traditional government activities.

The government does not believe that it has to own and operate a system in order to achieve its public policy goals, but government does have as role to play as a facilitator, as a catalyst, setting goals, providing direction, monitoring performance, making sure the job gets done fairly and effectively.

Yes, the federal government has a responsibility to ensure that Canada has the national transportation system it needs and we intend to live up to that responsibility. We see no reason why the private sector should not be invited to do what it does best. The government believes that commercialisation is an attractive option, one that brings business discipline to the provision of services that have traditionally been delivered by government.

However commercialisation does not necessarily mean outright privatization. It can take many forms, ranging from the contracting out of services, public–private partnerships, non–profit entities, special operating agencies, crown corporations.

Regardless of what form it takes, what is essential is a business like approach to the provision of services, an approach that is more efficient, more responsive and less dependent on the Canadian taxpayer.

This will result in better capital planning, access to private financing, faster approval, easier introduction of new technologies and more user and client input. For exampie, the government sees great potential for commercializing the air navigation system. The International Civil Aviation Organization cites a clear trend toward the establishment of autonomous authorities to own and operate AMS facilities around the world.

Commercialization in these and many other areas of government activity can bring major savings to taxpayers and better service to clients. Any move to commercialization must always maintain Canada's high transportation standards. Cancelling this deal is not an attack on the private sector. It is an attack on what is a flawed, suspect deal contrary to the public interest.

Our action in regard to this transaction does not rule out future involvement by the private sector in some of the activities now undertaken by government. We will look at every opportunity to collaborate with the private sector to provide transportation services to Canadians.

The private sector has a role to play in airport operations. Non–profit private sector management groups now have responsibility for five of Canada's major airports. We must take the necessary action to terminate the ill–conceived terminals 1 and 2 deal and allow the government to move forward with its plans for Pearson.

Under the proposed legislation the government may make a payment to developers, but this will not include lost profits or any fees paid for lobbying. The Minister of Industry said when he introduced the bill: "We publicly asked the previous government and the company not to conclude this highly controversial deal during the election campaign. They chose to proceed anyway".

The legislation does not stop or hinder any negotiations or compensation. It simply sets the necessary limit on how long this process should go on, how long negotiations might block resolution of this matter.

The government prefers a negotiated settlement. However once this legislation is passed and proclaimed the government and the developers will have 30 days to come to an agreement. After that there will be no further discussion and no additional compensation. After all, the government has been negotiating with Pearson Development Corporation on behalf of T1 T2 Limited Partnership since last December when the Prime Minister announced that the government would cancel the agreements.

I remind the House that the legislation is required to finalize the cancellation of this contract because the original agreement negotiated by the previous government did not include a cancellation clause.

The transport minister has said decisions affecting airport expansion projects are linked directly to decisions on the airport's management structure. These decisions cannot be made as long as the previous agreements are in place. That means nothing can move forward until we have cancelled this agreement which should not have been made in the first place. Our decisions with respect to Pearson can no longer be held hostage to those agreements.

One result would be that there would be no new construction this year on terminal 1 and terminal 2 development or runway expansion projects at Pearson. I am sure we would all agree that it is in the best interest of the people of southern Ontario and the country in general to move as quickly as possible to develop a new administrative structure for the airport so that we can move ahead in making the critical decisions to maintain Pearson as a vital economic asset for the entire country.

The time to act is now. We can no longer allow this to proceed. The passage of the legislation will allow the development of Canada's air transportation hub to proceed in the public interest unhindered by yesterday's mistakes. We must proceed now.

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, what a strange situation we find ourselves in today, debating whether or not to pass a bill which might control the amount of compensation which can be paid as a result of the cancellation of the Pearson airport privatization deal.

Under normal commercial circumstances in the private sector cancellation of a contract usually means a negotiated or litigated settlement which takes into account the lost opportunities and the lost profits.

Admittedly these private sector negotiations can sometimes take years to complete. It is often only the lawyers who make money out of the whole exercise. However an entity in the private sector does not have the luxury of legislating itself to be exempt from the obligation to compensate another party when it breaks an agreement.

• (1305)

Generally speaking there is something unattractive in the idea that a government can do what the private enterprise cannot do by exempting itself from the need to compensate a group and to also exempt itself from the ability of someone to start litigation against it.

I must admit I feel somewhat uncomfortable about the reality of the bill, the fact that the government could introduce such a bill to protect itself. I know this Liberal government has a large proportion of lawyers in its ranks whereas within the Reform caucus we only have one lawyer.

Perhaps it is this abundance of lawyers in the Liberal Party that has driven the introduction of the bill. Perhaps they are celebrating what must be every lawyer's dream, the ability to control the outcome of a case. Why would one need a judge and jury when one can simply legislate the outcome of the event with no recourse?

I admit feeling somewhat uncomfortable about this situation although I also admit that the circumstances in this situation are rather unique. It was August 1993 when the then Minister of Transport announced that a general agreement had been reached with the Pearson Development Corporation to redevelop terminals 1 and 2.

The minister indicated that the agreement would be finalized in the fall with a legal document for the long term management operation and redevelopment of the terminals. What an impressive list of players there were involved. Included were Donald Matthew, a former Tory president and fundraiser; Otto Jelinek, a former Tory cabinet minister; Bill Neville, formerly a Tory chief of staff and part of the transition team for the previous Prime Minister. There was a Quebec multimillionaire, Charles Bronfman. There were also some well known Liberals, a certain senator, Herb Metcalfe, and Bob Wright, a Liberal fundraiser.

It is the involvement of these high profile Liberals that caused me to use the word might in my opening sentence when I said the bill might control the amount of compensation. Could it be that clause 10 of the bill will allow the Minister of Transport to look after Liberal friends while shutting others out?

The portion of the bill in question reads: "If the minister considers it appropriate to do so, the minister may with the approval of the Governor in Council enter into agreements on behalf of Her Majesty to provide for the payment of such amounts as the minister considers appropriate".

The question I have is whether appropriate compensation for a Liberal supporter will be different from appropriate compensation for someone else. One wonders aloud. Despite all this, there is one aspect to the circumstances surrounding the signing and subsequent cancellation of the Pearson deal that provides a powerful argument for supporting Bill C–22.

It comes from the natural sense of justice that a person feels when having warned someone that there will be consequences of an action, that person defies the warning, goes ahead with the action and subsequently does indeed suffer the consequences.

Just nine days after the Pearson agreement announcement of August 30, 1993, the previous Prime Minister called the election. Prior to the conclusion of the legal agreement on Pearson, the then Leader of the Opposition, now Prime Minister, clearly stated that parties taking part in the agreement did so at their own risk because a Liberal government would not hesitate to pass legislation to block the privatization of terminals 1 and 2 if the transaction was not in the private interest.

The chief negotiator for the government at the time took the statement so seriously that he asked for written instructions about whether to complete the transaction. On October 7, 1993 in the final days of her government, the previous Prime Minister gave her written instructions to complete the deal and the same day the agreement was made.

Subsequent events, starting October 28, 1993 with the appointment of Robert Nixon to review the deal, have resulted in its cancellation. Although the idea that a government can exempt itself from responsibility for compensation bothers me, on balance I would tend to support the bill because all parties to the agreement were clearly warned of the consequences. Perhaps some of them even believed that the deal would be cancelled but took a gamble that compensation would be paid in the normal manner after cancellation. Quite a gamble.

I doubt that any party to the agreement could claim that there was not an awareness of the stand of the present Prime Minister on the issue when he was in opposition back in October 1993. There was plenty of publicity and plenty of reason to believe that the deal would indeed be cancelled if the Liberals took power. At the time the polls certainly showed that to be a possibility.

Incidentally I have often wondered why those same pollsters who so confidently predicted a win for the Liberals never realized that Reform would get 52 seats. I wonder whether they really knew and suppressed the information or whether they did not conduct a reasonable poll.

I will continue to listen to the debate on Bill C–22 and will continue to take input from my constituents who have been writing me letters and making occasional phone calls on the issue. I would urge all other members to do the same: listen to the debate and receive input from their constituents before they make the final decision on whether to support Bill C–22.

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to rise to speak in favour of Bill C–22. I will start by identifying what we are talking about, specifically looking at Toronto area airport issues.

Pearson International Airport is Canada's premier airport. Thirty per cent of all air passengers in Canada go through Pearson; 20 million passengers in 1992. It is among the top 30 airports internationally, the third largest gateway to North America after JFK airport and the Miami airport. It is a critical hub for many smaller cities in Ontario and indeed Canada.

It has 15,000 employees on site. It creates 56,000 jobs in Ontario and accounts for over $4 billion of annual economic activity. That is the reason why the Pearson airport issue is so important.

We have before us Bill C–22 to deal specifically with matters pertaining to Pearson. I would like to give some background events leading up to the legal agreements which Bill C–22 deals with.

In 1989 the Matthews Group of companies submitted an unsolicited proposal to the federal government to privatize terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson. The government did not accept that proposal, but the following year it did announce that it would proceed with a request for proposals to obtain private sector participation in the modernization of the two terminals at Pearson.

The request for proposals for the privatization and the redevelopment of terminals 1 and 2 was issued by the federal government in March 1992 and the bidders were given 90 days to respond. Two bids were submitted: one by Paxport Inc., controlled by the Matthews Group, and the other by Claridge Holdings Inc.

In December 1992 the Paxport proposal was declared to be more acceptable and the company was given until mid–February 1993 to satisfy the government that it was a financially viable proposal. When Paxport could not demonstrate this or raise the necessary capital, it sought assistance from Claridge. The private sector participants then formed the Pearson Development Corporation, referred to as PDC, and T1 T2 Limited Partnership for the purposes of carrying out the project.

In August 1993 the federal government and PDC announced that they had reached an agreement to redevelop and operate terminals 1 and 2. Legal agreements were to be finalized in the autumn of 1993.

A federal election was called on September 8, 1993. During the election campaign the Leader of the Opposition, now the Prime Minister, declared that the new government under his leadership would cancel any deal to privatize terminals 1 and 2 if the transaction was deemed not to be in the public interest. The chief negotiator for the government sought written instructions on whether to complete the transactions and on October 7, 1993 received written direction that it was Prime Minister Campbell's wish to complete the deal on that date. The legal agreements were therefore finalized on October 7.

Subsequent to the election one of the first actions of the government was to review the Pearson deal. As many members have alluded to, the government engaged Mr. Robert Nixon to do an independent review. I would like to read the conclusion from his report: "My review has left me with but one conclusion, to leave in place an inadequate contract, arrived at with such a flawed process and under the shadow of possible political manipulation, is unacceptable. I recommend to you that the contract be cancelled".

I then went on to look further because obviously a bald statement like that does require some substantive support to be able to indicate the so–called flawed process. In looking at Mr. Nixon's report, page 8, subparagraph 3, I would like to read into the record some extracts to give Canadians an idea of some of the things that were of concern to Mr. Nixon in preparing his report:

"The request for proposals having as it did only a single stage and requiring proponents to engage in project definition as well as proposal submission and all within a 90 day timeframe created in my view an enormous advantage to a proponent that had previously submitted a proposal for privatizing and developing T1 and T2. Other management and construction firms not having been involved in the manoeuvring preceding the RFP had no chance to come up to speed and submit a bid in a short time period".

At this point Mr. Nixon noted that there are some timing irregularities and probably some improprieties, at least in appearance:

"With little construction and developing occurring others should have been sought out and given reasonable time to participate. Further, it is significant that no financial prequalification was required in this competition. For a project of this magnitude the selection of the best overall acceptable proposal without complete assurance of financial viability seems to me to have been highly unusual and unwise".

Finally Mr. Nixon states: "The concluding of this transaction at Prime Ministerial direction in the midst of an election campaign where this issue was controversial in my view flies in the face of normal and honourable democratic practice. It is a well known and carefully observed tradition that when governments dissolve Parliament they must accept a restricted power of decision during the election period. Certainly the closing of a transaction of significant financial importance sealing for 57 years the privatization of a major public asset should not have been entered into during an election campaign".

I have to reiterate that the government said very clearly during the election campaign that the Pearson agreement should not proceed and that if it did the government's intention was to review the deal and to cancel the deal if indeed it was not deemed to be in the public interest. It chose to proceed and in fact the government did honour its promise to the Canadian people.

We have heard a lot of speakers today discussing the process and how it is seriously flawed, that the substance was similarly flawed and that we really need a transportation vision for Canada, a comprehensive strategy for our transportation system.

During the election campaign it was very clear to me that Canadians were saying political credibility is zero. I think one of the things that all members know and have learned very well is that political credibility demands fiscal responsibility. That fiscal responsibility will result in hopefully the restored confidence of Canadians in our legislative process and indeed in the integrity and credibility of people in political life. The Pearson deal, as many have suggested, did not do justice to the Canadian people. It was the right thing to do.

I would like to turn now specifically to Bill C–22, an act respecting certain agreements concerning the redevelopment and operations of terminals 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson International Airport, which received first reading on April 13, 1994. I would like to read for the House the explanatory note:

The enactment concerns agreements arising out of the Request for Proposals for the Terminal Development Project at Lester B. Pearson International Airport or the negotiations following that Request. It declares the agreements not to have come into force and to have no legal effect, and bars certain actions or other proceedings against Her Majesty in the right of Canada in relation to the agreements.

The enactment also authorizes the Minister of Transport, with the approval of the Governor in Council, to enter into agreements for the payment of amounts in connection with the coming into force of the enactment.

The bill was presented to the House by the Minister of Industry on behalf of the Minister of Transport. In summary of the legislation it indicates that the proposed legislation—this is for the benefit of those who have not followed the debate so far—will cancel those agreements that were entered into. It will make clear that government is not obligated to compensate the developer and allow the minister to make some payments but not for specifically lobbyist fees or lost profits.

The government's policy has been and remains that it would consider reimbursing out of pocket expenses with the exception of the lobby fees but would not make payments for lost profits.

As I went through many of the documents that were available to us, I found with some interest rhetorical questions which I think probably many Canadians and maybe members have been considering. The first question one might ask is: Are not private sector companies now going to be afraid to do business with the government? I think that is a very fair question and I think the answer is not at all. The government takes its contractual obligations seriously, but this is a different and special case unlikely to arise again.

The Liberal Party made it very clear that we were concerned that the agreement might be contrary to the public interest but the parties risked signed that anyway. It is extremely important that the government gave notice and put the participants on notice. In spite of the clear message that was sent they took the public risk to proceed in any event.

The new government subsequently reviewed the agreement in detail and determined that it was indeed contrary to the public interest and that is precisely what we expect elected officials of governments to do.

The second question of note was why is the government being so hard on Pearson Development Corporation. It sounds like Pearson Development Corporation is going to lose a lot of money for the sin of negotiating a contract with the government of the day. Again that is a very relevant and good question, but we also have to understand that the people who entered into these agreements are responsible and professional business people and that the government wishes to negotiate with them in a fair and reasonable manner.

During the campaign our party made it very clear that we were concerned that the agreement was contrary to the public interest but the parties proceeded anyway. This is extremely important to the essence of the bill.

The government subsequently reviewed the agreement in detail and determined it was indeed contrary to the public interest. However the government stands by its commitments and there will be no payments for the lost profits or lobbying costs.

The final question that was stated was what are the government's future plans for Pearson International Airport. This is probably as important a question as any. I stated earlier in my speech some of the dimensions of the Pearson contribution to Canada, to jobs and to the economy. The Minister of Transport said that he intends to make a decision on airport administrative structure and potential expansion before the end of the year. He is seeking input from a large variety of sources, including his own caucus which will be giving him input with regard to the decisions.

I have a special interest in the Pearson airport issue because it is just north of my riding, a mere 10–minute drive from the east end of my riding. We have had a number of public meetings over the years on many controversial issues, many relating to privatization, some relating to the expansion of the airport, and recently a very emotional debate with regard to expansion of runways, the new north–south runways which were already subject to a major environmental assessment review.

Having had two public meetings, I think the last one was just two weeks ago, the people who have participated in this debate over these many long months have said one thing, that they agree Pearson is an extremely important economic unit to Canada and that the future of Pearson has to be handled in a comprehensive but careful manner to ensure that they will be able to maintain Pearson as the focal airport of Canada.

At this point I do not intend to debate the merits of expansion of the airport, of privatization. All I can say is that the people I represent and who have attended these public meetings are calling out and asking the government to provide the leadership with regard to this important economic unit.

I believe the bill is the next step in the process. Any time is a good time to cancel a bad agreement and to get on with the future of Pearson, which is the undertaking of the government today.

I would like to conclude my comments simply by making a reference to the amendment proposed by the leader of the Bloc Quebecois. It basically calls for a public inquiry. It has a lot to do with the fact that the bill does not deal sufficiently with the transparency of activities of Canadian lobbyists, which was the amendment from the Reform.

I have some difficulty understanding why that issue is relevant to this particular bill. There is no question the government has put everyone on notice that the activities of lobbyists are an important issue to this government and that it will be addressing specifically matters related to the lobbyist activity in our country.

Lobbyist activity does not directly relate to the bill. The bill deals with legal agreements and how we have a point of departure to get on with the business of the day to ensure that the future of Pearson is dealt with in a timely fashion.

The amendment appears to be quite inappropriate. I do not understand it. Pearson will continue to be the major airport for Canada. It is my pleasure to have spoken today in favour of Bill C–22.

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly): I have been listening very carefully to the remarks made by the hon. member who just sat down.

Throughout his remarks, he spoke of cancellation: cancellation of contracts, cancellation of agreements. I have some difficulty understanding that Bill C–22 is in fact a piece of legislation which cancels something since, in law, in Quebec as everywhere else in Canada I suppose, nothing leads to nothing. It is clear that if something is null it was nothing to begin with, and cannot lead to something.

Bill C–22 declares that the agreements are null, and that they are nothing, but on the other hand, the government wants to breathe life into that nothingness, so to speak.

With Section 10, indeed, they want to compensate friends of the government that might have benefitted from this whole scheme. That is my first question.

The hon. member who just sat down said that he does not understand much of what the Bloc Quebecois is saying, that it is using the piece of legislation we are currently considering, to address the issue of lobbying. Since this morning, I have the feeling that the Liberals understand what they want to understand and prefer to ignore what is not convenient for them. There has been some strange goings–on with regard to this whole scheme. We do not say so; it is the Nixon Report that says so. There have been some very unusual dealings in this matter by friends of this government as well as friends of the previous government.

I doubt that any future legislation on lobbying will prevent the sort of thing that happened last fall. Any such new legislation, should the Prime Minister ever introduce it, will hopefully regulate the activities of lobbyists. As for the past, I am surprised by the attitude of the Liberals, who are saying: "We are cancelling all that, we want to do it in a hurry, but we do not want to harm anybody, we do not want to tarnish anybody's reputation". I find such remarks outrageous in the face of a project such as this one on Toronto airport, where just about the whole investment by Canada would have been handed over to some people, if they had been allowed to do as they pleased. That is all I had to say about the matter. I would like the hon. member to tell me, if he can, whether we are dealing with a cancellation or with the legal recognition of a valid contract, the main players of which are about to be compensated?

[English]

Mr. Szabo: Madam Speaker, I understand the member's concern and his questions.

He dealt with two issues, one being the issue of lobbyists. He also commented with regard to the propriety of the amendment proposed by his leader.

First, the issue of lobbyists is important and it must be dealt with. The government has indicated it will be dealing with the total question of lobbyists. I believe it probably would be appropriate to call a public inquiry, to investigate what happened and why with regard to lobbyist activities, whether it be Pearson or otherwise, just to ensure that we know what happened.

The amendment proposed by the leader of the Bloc Quebecois is basically to frustrate the passing of the legislation. The member has not really addressed the real question of whether the legislation which has been proposed should go forward. It is not to say that if this goes forward we cannot look into the aspects of lobby registrations.

The member is asking questions about the bill, whether there is agreement or not, and what we are trying to do. Clearly the government assessed whether it was necessary to bring in the legislation. It made the determination based on the best legal advice it had and counsel it obtained that it was necessary to come forward with legislation to put a stop to the agreements, to declare that they have not come into force. It deems they did not come into force and they have no legal effect. It bars certain actions against the government.

This requires legislation and the government has brought forward the legislation to ensure that the matter can be dealt with finally by the Government of Canada.

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly): Madam Speaker, the bill before the House is needed because of the context in which certain agreements were signed concerning the redevelopment and operation of terminals 1 and 2 at the Toronto international airport. The findings of the Nixon report commissioned by the Prime Minister speak for themselves.

"My review has left me with but one conclusion. To leave in place an inadequate contract, arrived at with such flawed process and under the shadow of possible political manipulation, is unacceptable. I recommend to you that the contract be cancelled".

• (1335)

If this bill is needed to cancel all agreements with T1 T2 Limited Partnership, any responsible government must look into the reasons why we are in this dilemma.

Our gracious Majesty had dealings with unknown persons whose identity is still shrouded in mystery. As recommended by the Nixon report, the Crown must unilaterally cancel those agreements because it was misled by her main counsellors and agents at the end of the 34th Parliament. We will try to explain to the House the role played by certain parties. It will then become clear why they want to remain unknown.

The Nixon report is particularly harsh with those responsible for the signing of those agreements. It is not impossible that very influential people wielded that influence improperly and in a way which is detrimental to the Canadian heritage. According to the Nixon report, there was very high level influence peddling.

If this House has reached the point where it is going to ignore the consensual principle and have our dear monarch lose face by unilaterally cancelling an agreement, I think it is because the Crown was very poorly advised.

What was the rush for a clearly moribund government to pass such contracts privatizing the only profitable air terminals in the country, thus binding for a long time, the next 57 years in fact, future Canadian governments, when the then–Leader of the Opposition and present Prime Minister of Canada cautioned the government not to conclude these deals before the election of October 25, 1993, and even warned that he would cancel the whole thing?

Before the deal was finalized, the future Prime Minister said publicly and warned the parties that he would not hesitate to cancel all that. Following this declaration, the government's chief negotiator in this case asked for written instructions before signing the contracts. On October 7, 1993, the then–Prime Minister, through an internal memo, insisted on the signing being done the same day. During the final phase of negotiations, certain top–ranking civil servants involved asked for a transfer because they were not sure that they were acting correctly.

Can we associate this move with the 500 partisan appointments made about the same time of close friends of the regime which was then collapsing? It is not improbable.

Not only a lot of money was lost because of all what had to be spent in this voluminous case, which some of my colleagues will address later, but it dealt a severe blow to the principles of transparency and honesty. I did not invent any of this; it is all in the Nixon report.

By taking lightly the whole development of an industry of the future which cost Canadians a lot of money, the government seemed to the people to be out to grab what it could, and this is serious, coming from what must be the most honest and upright of our democratic institutions.

The government of the 34th Parliament acted like a real scrounger, thus tarnishing the image Canadians had of it. The verdict rendered a few days later leaves no doubt in this regard.

We also learn in the Nixon report that our government even willingly colluded to deprive the Government of Ontario of its right to $10 million under the land transfer law of this province.

A responsible governement cannot afford to have two different sets of laws: one for itself and another for the citizens. In the past, several forceful rulings by the highest court of the land have reminded us of it in no uncertain terms. But we can see now the unbearable consequences of the former government's doings: unilaterally cancelling a contract is almost indecent.

• (1340)

Ordinary citizens cannot resort to what is called in French "dol", that is fraud by deceit, to seek the cancellation of a contract, except in Quebec, of course, where that procedure is allowed under the new Civil Code. Once more our beautiful province has shown her clearsightedness and sense of innovation, as opposed to some provinces that are incapable of changing their traditional vision of this country.

But I digress, Mr. Speaker. I want to come back to Bill C–22 which reflects poorly on the crown from a legal as well as factual point of view.

Common law principles do not allow ordinary citizens to resort to "dol" and case law has not changed in that regard.

To lose face, Mr. Speaker, is not too strong a way of putting it. How could Her gracious Majesty resort to "dol" to cancel that contract, when she is so well advised by the largest firm of legal advisors, the Public Service of Canada?

Her Majesty must surely not be very happy with what is happening right now. If it had not been for her unlimited authority, Her Majesty would have been had. Fortunately, as we were taught during the first term of our BA in law, the only thing the crown cannot do is to change a man into a woman, and I would add "and even that remains to be seen".

The Queen can do no wrong. It is because of this principle of common law, so dear to our fellow citizens across the floor, that this fool's deal can still be cancelled and its effects avoided, thank God.

Earlier, I was wondering how come we had gotten there. I agree that we should cancel for all intents and purposes the agreements concerning terminals 1 and 2 of Pearson airport, but I do not want this to be done at the expense of our public servants. It is understandable that we would want to hold the previous government responsible, as this government always does, but I would advise the Liberals against casting the first stone because the Conservatives just pushed a bit farther the puck that had been put into play by their predecessors.

What does the government intend to do, to avoid further insults of this kind to our beloved sovereign? In its famous red book, the party now in power, rightly criticizing the agreements reached a few days before election day on October 25, had definitely promised Canadian taxpayers to introduce a bill which would have the effect of restricting lobbying activities on Parliament Hill. Did it keep its promise? Not at all.

The present Prime Minister and member from Saint–Maurice had promised us legislation governing lobbyists' activities on Parliament Hill. This legislation has yet to come.

In the daily Le Droit of March 21, David Zussman, in charge of the lobbying issue for the Prime Minister, said regarding the introduction of such legislation that, although the principles were clear, it sometimes takes more time to write the rules than to agree on the principles. He also said that there are so many elements and so many players in all of this that it will require much more time than one could have imagined.

There is reason to be confused, especially when one remembers that the Prime Minister, when given a rough ride in his own riding, said recently that it was all in the red book, that one had only to read between the lines.

Good legislation must be clear, concise, and precise. Its principles must be clear and not be subject to interpretation. Its scope must not be mitigated in any way neither by the number of people concerned nor their political or social status. If such legislation is written on the basis of the corporative interests of all the friends of the government, it can only be legislation difficult to write, evasive, permissive and easy to circumvent. It becomes questionable legislation. Must we understand that this is the kind of difficulty that the government is having with the development of this bill at this time?

The Pearson airport contracts were awarded in its last days by the former government, when it felt the carpet slipping under its feet. What does the government intend to do to protect itself against such a temptation at the end of its present mandate? I trust that such a vision of the future will not dictate that it uses the same self–control as it is using in the development of its code of ethics.

Could the present government, which is as alike as two peas in a pod as its predecessor, not reassure our dear sovereign, Canadians and Quebecers that such absurd actions as those that were perpetrated by the previous government with regard to the Toronto airport will not likely occur again?

Those divine banquets at $3,000 per person, which were attended by the most powerful members of the present government and the Senate, and those brunches at $1,000 per person, that is where the main activities of the most powerful lobbyists are likely to occur, because the Prime Minister's eloquence alone cannot justify such an investment.

Far be it from me to cast aspersions on our Prime Minister. After all, his political longevity is proof positive of his integrity. However, I think we can say the Prime Minister was being a little careless about his image when he appointed Robert Wright, a Liberal fundraiser from away back, to negotiate the cancellation of the agreement on privatization of the air terminals in Toronto, especially when we realize that Mr. Wright, who has many qualifications, was the Prime Minister's fundraiser during his campaign for the leadership of the Liberal Party in 1984.

Section 10 of the bill before the House today says that, if the Minister considers it appropriate, he may enter into agreements on behalf of Her Majesty to provide for the payment of such amounts as the Minister considers appropriate in connection with the coming into force of this act. That is what it says.

This provision adds insult to injury. Not only did Her august Majesty get the short end of the stick in these agreements, she will also have to deal with the fall–out that will come as a result of this legislation. Is the government again using Her long suffering Majesty to get several million dollars for its friends?

Far be it from me to cast any doubts on the integrity of the Minister of Transport who, I am sure, is capable of exercising his discretionary powers with the requisite honesty and restraint, but I think this is a truly herculean task which we cannot reasonably ask him to perform.

Those who dealt with the government in this particular matter had been warned by the present Prime Minister that the deal was a dead end and that, if the Liberal Party came to power, the contracts would be cancelled. That is why the government negotiator asked for instructions before proceeding with the signing of the agreements. Those who dealt with the government were aware of all the implications. They gambled, and they lost. Moral turpitude is not a defence.

In any case, the parties to these contracts never lost money in their dealings with the government in power, and for reasons I mentioned earlier, I wonder on what ethical grounds we would owe them anything at all.

Throughout my speech, I consciously and purposely used the terms "Majesty", "Sovereign", "Queen", and the "Crown". The people in this House know that when we refer to Her Majesty, we are talking about the people of this country, which means all Canadians. But do Canadians realize this? Do they realize that they also got the short end of the stick?

Do the citizens of this country realize that the Toronto airport deal is only the tip of the iceberg? For 127 years, for as long as the Canadian federation has existed, the citizens of this country thought they owned this country and were the masters of its destiny. A cold, northern country, very austere, but a country of the strong, the brave and the adventurous. Those who chose it did so out of love, because they had a dream to build a life and were prepared to suffer, to forego sun and heat and make do with very little, but always with a great love for the land.

They were exploited by foreign fur traders, misled by power–hungry or simply money–grubbing politicians, leading a life of few dreams and limited prospects. What are we going to leave our children? Six, seven, eight, nine hundred billion dollars worth of debt!

I am ashamed, Mr. Speaker, ashamed. Why? Because I am part of the generation who made off with the cashbox. I inherited a beautiful, clean country, and in less than 50 years, see what I have done, see what will be left for the next generations: a country burdened with debt, polluted, dirty, torn apart by sorry politicians who cared only for their personal comfort.

This country has been ruined by greed, vandalized by those who feel no loyalty to any country, by mudsucking tadpoles, by well–educated politicians who lack vision and are blinded by their personal ambitions.

A great philosopher once said: it is not the last drop that makes the cup overflow, but the first one. It is true.

The Toronto airport could very well be the last drop. There is too much doubt, too much confusion here, as well as too many mistakes, for us not to start asking questions.

In this whole mess, some senior officials resigned, others asked to be transferred, and others said nothing for fear of retaliation. The operation was so gross that only those few who had absolute authority thought they were untouchable.

The steamroller was in motion. They were marching on against all common sense and advice; greed had no limits, the project was the only purpose and cupidity ruled.

Proud people were made into servants, honest ones were made deceitful and truthful ones turned into liars. Things have to change, this country must regain its dignity, regain respect and redefine its aspirations; most of all, it must re–establish the rule of law. That is why we must immediately, even at the risk of collectively hurting ourselves, revive justice and pride to give hope once again to those who follow; we must take our destiny into our own hands.

Consequently, we must immediately set up a royal commission to inquire into the Pearson Airport deal and we must implement its recommendations. We must put a stop to false bidding and allow Canadians, including Quebecers, to regain their sense of pride and dignity. The nobility of the principles of equality, fraternity and justice must be restored. This way, perhaps we could considerably reduce disputes between Quebec and Ottawa. Perhaps people could understand that Quebecers who choose emancipation have decided to free themselves from this kind of socioeconomic and financial colonialism that holds too many Canadians hostages.

Que bene annat, bene castigat, or "spare the rod and spoil the child". This age–old latin maxim is still valid today. If our Prime Minister is tabling Bill C–22 for honest reasons, if he wants to restore the principles of justice in this country, he must proclaim now the appointment of a royal commission of inquiry on Terminals 1 and 2 in Toronto. The conclusions of the commissioners will allow us to prosecute all those who are at fault, as rich as they may be, under one justice, honourable and righteous, the justice of Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry): Madam Speaker, toward the end of the hon. member's remarks he sounded as if he had taken the government position.

We as Liberals led by the Prime Minister have fought against the dismantling of the Pearson International Airport. We did that not only when we sat on that side of the House of Commons. During the election campaign when we heard that the then Conservative government was going ahead we said it was not our policy direction. We did not want to privatize Pearson International Airport. We campaigned against it and we acted immediately once the Prime Minister took office.

In no way, shape or form are Canadians confused when it comes to the decision the Prime Minister took. It was decisive and the right thing to do in the long term interests of all Canadians.

This is a strange approach we we have here today. We are trying to act on the decision and put the Pearson file behind us and properly pay those people who unfortunately got into a bad deal with the previous government.

• (1355)

We are trying to put that file behind us so we can rebuild a market in Toronto with a fresh policy start. There are a lot of unemployed people in Toronto. We do not intend to leave Pearson in the state it is forever.

However we would like to do this as a Government of Canada project. As the member so appropriately recognized, this is a Government of Canada asset. It generates profits for the people of Canada. That is part of the reason we did not want to proceed on this deal. It was not a good deal for taxpayers.

To mix the issue of lobbying with the action of the bill today is not the right way to go. Could the member not see this whole issue of reviewing lobbyist activity, and even reviewing the lobbyist activity as it pertains to Pearson International Airport, could be more appropriately handled when we bring forward the lobbyists registration bill which we will not only discuss in the House but in committee as well? In that way we would not be slowing down the whole process and we could put the bill behind us.

[Translation]

Mr. Lebel: Madam Speaker, I said it before, and I will say it again, the Liberals understand what is grist to their mill and acts in their favour. When they present their bill, their code of ethics, it will not be appropriate to bring up past cases. The member who asked the question is well aware of that. He is trying to ensnare me. He knows that we will not be able to mention the Pearson airport deal when his government finally decides to present its bill.

We will debate the essence of the bill, its strengths and weaknesses, which I expect will be many. But we will not be allowed to talk about the maneuvering that preceded the Toronto airport deal. Being a lot more experienced, he knows that better than me. I cannot understand why the Liberals who, during the election campaign, opposed this deal which was in the process of being completed, are now very sheepish, having realized since October 7, when the contract was signed, that some of their friends were involved in that deal. Does this explain the compensation under clause 10?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Plamondon: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. I have been standing for one minute and it is customary, once a member has asked a question to a Bloc Quebecois member, that a member from another party then addresses the previous speaker. I therefore wonder why you are not giving me the floor instead of recognizing the member who just rose.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The speaker was a Bloc member. Mr. Mills rose for questions and comments. It is customary to then recognize the party opposite. In this case the speaker was a member of the Bloc Quebecois.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, I would like you to consult the clerks and the Standing Orders. It is the member who rises first who has the floor, and should several people rise at the same time, according to tradition, you must alternate between parties. Since I have been standing for one minute, it is obvious that I should have the floor. No other members having risen, I have priority to address the previous speaker. I ask you to consult and give a new ruling.

[English]

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, perhaps I could assist in straightening out this confusion. I was about to speak on debate and that is why I rose. When the member from the Bloc suddenly stood, I sat down. There are still a couple of minutes left.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I will come back to the hon. member for Richelieu. It is true that the parliamentary secretary was asking to be recognized, but there was another member behind him. I apologize to the member. I had not forgotten him and I was not ignoring him either. Quite the opposite, in fact.

[English]

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I want to respond to a comment made by the member who basically imputed motives. I know the Speaker has often said to members to take due care in terms of imputing motives.

The member indicated the reason the Liberals cancelled the deal was so that they could deal with their own pockets. I find that statement very unsavoury. I would invite the member to read the report of Mr. Nixon to determine whether there was a flawed process, and to make his own decision if it was appropriate to cancel the deal. Do not impute motives to the Liberal Party but rather make a decision on your own. It is a bad deal. It has been cancelled, and the government is acting responsibly.

The Speaker: Order. It seems that I came in on a pretty warm debate here.

It being two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

JUSTICE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the draft amendments to the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff Act introduced by the Minister of Justice last week in response to the proliferation of serial killer cards and board games is a clear indication to all Canadians that the justice minister is listening and that he will be acting promptly to bring needed changes to the justice system.

As the justice minister stated, as a society we must protect children and youth from exposure to material which exploits violence, cruelty and horror, while balancing this goal against the important guarantees of freedom of expression contained in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The government is committed to making our streets, our homes and our communities safer. The threat of violence that pervades our society is intimidating and alarming to most Canadians. By seeking to prohibit the sale or distribution of materials that exploit violence, we do a great service not only to the majority of law abiding citizens, but to the young people who deserve to develop interests and talents free of such negative influences.

SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert): Mr. Speaker, today is a day that will long be remembered by men and women the world over. Democratic parliamentary institutions are becoming a reality in the political life of South Africa because, as of This morning, for the first time ever, blacks from every town and city in South Africa have begun the process of democratically electing their representatives.

As parliamentarians, we cannot remain indifferent to the words of one elderly South African who said: "I can die now because I have voted for the first time in my life".

Despite the bombings and the violence, despite the numerous obstacles on the road to democracy in South Africa, we are confident that the people of South Africa will triumph.

KURT BROWNING

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, on this past Sunday I attended an event in Caroline, Alberta, in the heart of my constituency of Red Deer. This event truly made me proud to be a Canadian.

The village of Caroline held a barbecue to pay tribute to a truly Canadian role model, Mr. Kurt Browning. People came from all parts of my constituency and from far beyond to honour this world renowned Canadian. Kurt has brought honour not only to the town of Caroline but to Alberta and to all of Canada. His four world championships are an inspiration to all Canadians. Kurt's accomplishments and his real Canadian spirit gives Canadians the sense of pride and national identification that is needed to unite the country.

The pride which glowed from everyone's face is what Canada is all about. Kurt's personality and true love of people and his country is demonstrated again and again. Today I ask the House to salute a true Canadian champion, Mr. Kurt Browning.

CULTURAL LEARNING CENTRE

Mr. Pat O'Brien (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, the London Cross Cultural Learner Centre is a multifaceted facility that has provided services to newcomers to Canada for over 25 years. The centre has evolved into a unique combination of programs and services that are based on cross cultural learning within the community.

To promote global education in the community the centre provides a resource centre and regularly hosts guest speakers, screens films and holds special exhibits. As well the centre collaborates with the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and the community to initiate language instruction to new Canadians or LINC.

There is a growing cultural diversity in the community of London—Middlesex. I commend the dedication and commitment of the individuals who have worked to create such a unique cultural learning centre.

TOURISM

Mr. John Maloney (Erie): Mr. Speaker, tourism is a significant part of the economy of Erie riding and indeed of the whole Niagara region.

It is an industry with the potential to employ many more people than it does currently and this in an area of very high unemployment. The tourism industry encompasses small to large companies as well as business people of all backgrounds, including youth and seniors. The needs of these people and the tourism industry must be looked at to help them not just to survive but to prosper and expand.

Tourism is a $28 billion industry in Canada. The vast majority of the 60,000 tourist enterprises are small or medium sized businesses. Tourism tax revenues for all levels of government are estimated to be in the neighbourhood of $11 billion annually. This is an important sector of economy.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, I would point out that there was a trade deficit of $8 billion in 1993 with the rest of the world. Approximately $5.5 billion of that deficit was with the United States. We can do better; we must do better.

TRADE

Mr. Paul Steckle (Huron—Bruce): Mr. Speaker, Thursday CNN reported that because of our low Canadian dollar, Americans were flocking to Canadian border communities to buy new cars. Americans realized they could save thousands of dollars by shopping in Canada.

There is one problem. No, it is not either national government. In fact freer trade laws have enabled these types of sales. Rather it is the big three auto makers forbidding their dealerships to sell cars for export.

The big three have told their dealers that if they sell cars for export they could lose their franchise agreement. This does not sit well with dealers who say that if allowed they could sell hundreds of cars to our American neighbours. It is especially difficult for the dealers since other dealers not associated with the big three have not been curtailed from selling for export.

Businesses have long complained that government is hindering their sales potential with obtrusive trade laws. The government has acted but now apparently big business has stepped in to install greater non–tariff barriers. The Canadian economy has suffered for years from cross–border shopping. Now it is time to reverse that and take advantage of the situation while it is still in our favour.

CANADA'S CREDIT RATING

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the president of Moody's, a New York bond rating agency, stated the following: "The Quebec election is not a factor to be analyzed in reviewing Canada's credit rating". The president of Moody's acknowledged that Canada's credit rating was being closely monitored because of the country's financial situation and high debt levels. The outcome of the current review could prove costly in terms of high interest rates.

In fact, since the Liberal government brought down its first budget, the gap between Canadian and American interest rates has widened considerably. The markets are reacting this way because foreign investors are worried about the lack of concrete deficit reduction measures in the first Liberal budget.

These comments from the president of Moody's confirm that the recent volatility of the market is due to the sorry state of public finances, not to the political situation in Canada.

CURLING

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride and pleasure that I rise to again honour Canada's curlers.

For the first time all major Canadian curling teams have swept their way to world championships. In both women's and men's senior and women's and men's junior playdowns, Canada's curlers walked off with the gold.

I want to extend special acknowledgement to Saanich—Gulf Islander Elaine Dagg–Jackson who was team leader for the Canadian junior world curling team. Elaine and members of all our teams have proven Canada to be a powerhouse in world curing. Caught between a rock and a hard place they consistently drew to the button.

I know all members of the House join me in applauding these outstanding athletes.

TERRITORIAL BILINGUALISM

Mr. Robert Bertrand (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle): Mr. Speaker, last week, a Reform Party member tabled a motion to amend the Official Languages Act so as to reflect the principle of territorial bilingualism, which consists in providing federal services essentially in French in Quebec, and essentially in English in the rest of Canada.

• (1410)

This concept of territorial bilingualism is an aberration which reflects a profound ignorance of the history of our country. Such an idea does not take into account our Canadian national identity, and it more or less promotes intolerance.

There can be no doubt that, after being in effect for over a quarter of a century, the federal official languages policy is an integral part of the Canadian identity.

According to an Angus Reid poll conducted in May 1993, close to 70 per cent of Canadians approve the federal government's promotion of official language minority rights.

It is inconceivable that anyone would suggest taking a step backward!

EFAMOL RESEARCH INSTITUTE

Mr. John Murphy (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to raise awareness of some exciting research and development that is currently under way at the EFAMOL Research Institute in my riding of Annapolis Valley—Hants.

The institute is a world leader in the research of medical benefits derived from the oil of evening primrose plants. Research is focused on new treatments for cancer, AIDS, diabetes, cardiovascular disease and arthritis.

EFAMOL is the evening primrose oil used in over 95 per cent of all published medical trials. It is widely considered the best researched primrose oil on the market.

On Wednesday, May 4, EFAMOL Research Incorporated is hosting the grand opening of its new research and development laboratory. I would ask all members of the House to join me in extending my congratulations to the members of the EFAMOL Research Institute for their world class work in this field.

BINNEY AND SMITH (CANADA)

Mr. John O'Reilly (Victoria—Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, Binney and Smith (Canada) may not be a household name to most Canadians. However, on closer inspection I am certain we will see otherwise.

The company got its Canadian start in 1926 and moved to Lindsay, Ontario, in 1933 and was renamed Canada Crayon Company. It was early in 1934 that it produced Canada's first Crayola crayons and in 1958 it became a wholly–owned subsidiary of Binney and Smith Inc. and is the only current manufacturer of crayons in Canada.

And manufacture it does. Last year 185 employees produced over 150 million crayons and 30 million markers. It is a model of success which every company in Canada should follow. In 1992 the entire product line was named Toy of the Year by the Canadian Toy Testing Council. In September last year it was one of five companies to receive the outstanding business achievement award from the Ontario Chamber of Commerce in recognition of outstanding achievement and business excellence.

We salute a great Canadian company, Binney and Smith (Canada) in Lindsay, Ontario.

IRVING WHALE

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, the Irving family is once again trying to duck its obligations toward Canadian taxpayers. In a clever diversion attempt, the company proposed that the costs of refloating the barge that ran aground be paid by the compensation fund financed by the oil industry.

This fund should not be used in that case, since it was set up after the accident. Ottawa has still not indicated who will foot the bill for the operation. Knowing the reputation of the Irving family as a stateless entity which avoids Canadian taxes by operating out of Bermuda, taxpayers are understandably concerned about the government's decision.

The government must ensure that it is those responsible for the situation who will pay for the operation. The Gagnon–Easter committee remained silent on this aspect.

SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, the first multiracial elections in South Africa are beginning today.

These elections mark for the first time in that country the end of institutionalized racism. They are the culmination of years of hard work by many of its citizens.

It is both my hope and my prayer that these elections will be conducted in a fair and just manner and that the members of the new multiracial government will be able to work together for a peaceful and prosperous future for all.

Only by practising tolerance, understanding and moderation will the people of that beautiful country be able to bury its destructive past. South Africa has learned that equality of all people is fundamental to a peaceful society. Giving special status to some groups at the expense of others only engenders conflict and is highly divisive.

• (1415)

I hope we in Canada in dealing with our own constitutional problems will learn from abroad. I personally challenge Canadians of all regions and races to practise tolerance and understanding toward each other.

GEORGE ANDERSON

Hon. Roger Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I want to salute the courage of a young man, a constituent of mine, Private George Anderson of Cape Ray, Newfoundland.

Members will realize that he was one of two Canadian peacekeepers seriously injured on Sunday in Croatia. In that incident he lost an eye and the lower parts of both his legs while doing his bit to help restore peace and stability in that part of the world.

Last evening I went to see his family: Ralph and Mary, his father and mother, and Angela and LeRoy, his sister and brother. His father told me he knew it was a dangerous place to be.

I want him and his family to know on our behalf that as he goes through this very difficult time in his life our thoughts and our prayers are with him.

YARMOUTH HIGH SCHOOL

Mr. Harry Verran (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to welcome a class of grade 12 students from the high school in the town of Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, the largest town in the riding of South West Nova.

Mr. Ken Langille and his group are on a law society tour of the capital. These young people have raised funds for this trip by writing, publishing and selling a magazine outlining various criminal activities and cases.

Mr. Ken Langille is a well known teacher throughout the educational system in Nova Scotia for being an innovative teacher with regard to our legal system.

It is a pleasure on behalf of the government and the House to welcome them to Ottawa. I hope they find their trip to be educational and productive. I know all members of the House will join with me in wishing them success and a safe journey home.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

ATLANTIC FISHERIES ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

In its Atlantic fisheries adjustment program, the government will oblige fishermen to sign a contract requiring them to take training courses, go back to school or do community work. Otherwise they cannot receive benefits from the program. The Minister of Human Resources Development even confirmed that his reform could extend such a contract to all social programs from coast to coast.

I ask the Prime Minister to tell us if, under his reform, he intends to require the unemployed and welfare recipients to take courses and to work in order to collect the benefits to which they are entitled and I ask him to tell us whether he admits that it would now be illegal to apply such a contract to everyone.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Since it is most unusual to have people who completely lost their livelihood, in co–operation with the provincial Government of Newfoundland, we have tried to set up a program that could help these people find something else to do with their lives.

Since we know that half the fishermen will not be able to go back to fishing, they need to adjust to the labour market; that is why we prepared such a comprehensive plan and we want those who cannot return to work in the fisheries to be able to work elsewhere and they will be trained in educational institutions in the provinces concerned.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition): There seems to be a contradiction again between the Prime Minister and the minister responsible, since the Prime Minister is telling us that the fisheries program was designed to meet a very specific need and would therefore be limited to fishermen. However, the minister suggested that all social programs could be subject to this kind of requirement.

I therefore ask the Prime Minister if he can tell us whether the fierce opposition of several provinces to his program of social reform is due to their refusal to endorse the coercive approach favoured by his minister.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, what my minister is trying to do now is to reach an agreement with the provinces. They asked for time to study in more detail the best ways to help people go back to work and that is our priority. We want people to return to work and have the dignity of doing a job and the satisfaction of supporting their family. That is why the Department of Human Resources Development is negotiating and discussing with the provinces now, because like them, we have programs and we prefer to find a solution that will suit the provinces and the federal government.

We want people to be able to retrain and to prepare themselves so that they can earn their living honourably.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, despite what the Prime Minister says, everyone knows that they are not negotiating very hard, since the provinces, or at least several of them, refused to attend the latest federal–provincial conference that the minister wanted to hold on this subject.

Second, the provinces are well aware that all the Prime Minister's answers indicate that, if they do not accept his point of view, he will impose it on them.

So I ask him if we are to understand that he is trying to break the poorest provinces by brandishing the threat of a substantial reduction in transfer payments.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition has it all wrong. It is unfortunate that he spends all his time in the House trying to foment difficulties where there are not difficulties.

The fact of the matter is we just met and talked last week with provincial ministers who are all still committed to working in collaboration to bring about serious reform in the country on programs that will help people get back to work.

There is only one person with one group in this entire country who wants to see the programs fail and it is the Leader of the Opposition.

HIBERNIA PROJECT

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies): Mr. Speaker, the Hibernia project is already far from proving that it can be profitable. Because of the announced cost overruns, the production cost of a barrel of Hibernia oil would be considerably higher than international market prices. The extra money invested in this project by the government is totally unjustifiable. Defending Hibernia's profitability seems to be an act of faith we can no longer afford.

My question is for the Minister of Natural Resources, of course. How can the minister invoke the profitability of the Hibernia money pit, when it seems certain that the cost of extracting oil from the Hibernia deposit will be higher than oil prices on the international markets?

[English]

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources): Mr. Speaker, let me say first, in response to my hon. colleague's question, that we have contractual obligations. We are one of five owners of the Hibernia project. We are an 8.5 per cent equity owner. We must maintain and live up to our contractual obligations. Therefore we are going to be responsible for 8.5 per cent of any cost overruns.

In addition, let me say that the government and I continue to believe that Hibernia will be a profitable project in the coming 18 to 20 weeks.

[Translation]

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies): Mr. Speaker, are we to understand that, after investing $4 billion in the development of Hibernia, the government is now telling us that its hands are tied, that it cannot go back and that it must go ahead at any cost, by continuing to sink millions of dollars of taxpayers' money?

[English]

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources): Mr. Speaker, let me clarify for my hon. friend that the federal government has not spent $4 billion on the Hibernia project. The total projected cost of the project, involving all equity owners, is $5.2 billion.

• (1425)

Therefore to suggest that the federal government has expended $4 billion is completely inaccurate and unfortunately a misrepresentation of the situation as it presently exists.

In addition, let me reiterate the point that we as a government believe and my projections and figures indicate that Hibernia has every prospect of being ultimately profitable and an important component in our long term energy security as a nation.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Both the International Monetary Fund and Moody's Investors Service have again expressed concern about overspending by the Canadian government. It is not just the size of the deficit and the debt that worries the money markets. It is also their concern that the federal government seems to lack the ability or the tools to control overspending.

What plans, if any, does the government have to strengthen the capacities of the Treasury Board, of departmental managers, of Parliament itself to control federal overspending?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, to answer the question, it is something that we are working on all the time.

When we look at the budget, we indicated that we are working to reduce substantially the deficit and we are confident that the deficit in relation to GDP will be 3 per cent at the end of three years. We are doing it on a constant basis.

For example, the minister of immigration cancelled all citizenship judges, thus saving millions of dollars.

Still today I am waiting for the member's list on where to cut. Whenever we propose a cut he says it is not the right one, that it should be somewhere else. I received complaints from people in his province because we had to cut national defence, for example. It is not that easy to do. We are doing our best. We have a plan that we were elected on and we will deliver the goods.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Prime Minister for his answer. He may be a bit behind in his reading. We tabled in the House a list of $20 billion in spending cuts that could be made over the next three years. Those were our contributions to the solution to that problem.

My supplementary line of inquiry is that one positive signal that the Prime Minister could send to the money markets would be to openly encourage parliamentary committees to reduce rather than simply rubber stamp the spending estimates presented to them.

Could the Prime Minister assure members of the House that if they were to reduce the spending estimates presented to them in committee, the government would accept those reductions and not regard them as an expression of non–confidence in the government's budget?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are looking at all the expenditures. If the committees want to make more recommendations we will be delighted to see them but there are some principles, some things we will not agree to cut.

We will not scrap medicare in Canada even if members ask us to do that.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): Good, some members opposite are applauding. Do members want us to scrap old age pensions?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): Okay. Do members want us to stop transferring money to—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: More, more.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, we are getting question period reversed here. We will be happy to answer the questions.

In seriousness, the Prime Minister did not answer my simple and direct question. I will repeat it. All we are looking for is a straight answer. Could the Prime Minister assure members of the House that if they were to reduce the spending estimates presented to them in committee the government would accept those reductions and not regard them as an expression of non–confidence in the government's budget?

• (1430)

I ask this not just on behalf of committee members on this side of the House but on behalf of members on all sides of the House.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is all come and go in the committee and make the recommendations and get the recommendations. We would be happy with that. That is why we have committees. It is very easy to make a big statement here.

Whenever I suggest areas where we could cut, members of the Reform Party say we should not cut. They should make up their minds. They are obsessed with only one or two programs, such as bilingualism. They would not reduce the deficit with that one. Later on when we are faced with those who want to separate from this country they will blame me because I did not want to have a policy to keep the country together.

The Speaker: I am starting to get that old feeling again.

ELECTION ACT

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Quebec director general of elections, Mr. Pierre–F. Côté, has recognized yesterday that the Prime Minister and his ministers are not bound by the provisions of the Quebec Election Act, and those governing election expenses in particular. This means that the Prime Minister and his ministers can spend as much as they want during the election campaign without having to account for it, while other federal members of Parliament, including the Bloc Quebecois members, have to comply with the legislation.

My question is as follows: Does the Prime Minister undertake, on behalf of all the members of his government, to abide by the spirit of the Quebec Election Act during the next election campaign, as requested by the Quebec director general of elections, for the sake of democratic fairness?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not read the report in question. Are you afraid that I will go and campaign in Quebec?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): Good. I will certainly find opportunities to let the people of Quebec know that it would be disastrous if the separatists were to be elected.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): And that would not cost a fortune. I can assure this House that I have no intention of abusing my privileges as Prime Minister of Canada during the election campaign. I will respect the wishes of the people of Quebec. Of course, opportunities will arise for me and my ministers to express our views. But do not worry, we will not go overboard. However, we will continue to represent the government, and as such, we have the right to speak in any province during an election. We will avail ourselves of that right. I think that, unlike Mr. Parizeau, Mr. Johnson does not need the support of the federal party to win the election.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, we hope the Prime Minister will come and discuss the real issues in Quebec. But we do not want have to pay out of the tax dollars we send to Ottawa for the Brinks' trick he pulled off with Trudeau and his friends in the old days.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Duceppe: I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he can promise not to launch large scale government advertising campaigns that could serve the interests of his federalist ally in Quebec. Can he promise not to waste public money for purely partisan purposes?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member can promise me that not one single member of the Bloc Quebecois or their constituency office staff will take any part in the election, that they will carry out their duty as members of Parliament and remain in Ottawa during the election, then I too will stay in Ottawa. That is a promise.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): So, if they do not agree at this time—

• (1435)

No, no; that is it. Because the 54 members from the Bloc Quebecois have staff working for them who are paid by the federal government to deal with problems concerning the federal government, and they should not be promoting the separation of Quebec using federal funds.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

THEME PARK

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

In addition to the $20 billion in spending cuts that we tabled, we have a very practical example. Yesterday the Prime Minister referred to vast private sector support for the patronage theme park in his riding.

I would point out to the Prime Minister that Hydro Quebec, which is supplying almost all of the so-called private funding, is a provincial crown corporation. In fact the taxpayers of Canada and Quebec are contributing almost all of the funding for this boondoggle.

In light of the fact that this theme park is almost entirely funded by public funds and not the private sector, will the federal government withdraw its support for this doomed project?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the report that the member is using was published two years ago. After that it was reviewed and downsized and the provincial government and the federal government agreed to develop this park. It is a project that the community has been working on for a long time.

If it had done it through the infrastructure program, the federal government would have paid one third. Through this system it is paying less than 20 per cent. Just from the construction we will most likely get more than our share in income tax and other taxes that the project will generate.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, it is really disappointing to see the government with its blinders on. The report by the Federal Bureau of Regional Development on this project claims that the revenue generated by visitors to the park will be less than half of what is projected. The cost of maintaining the facility will be almost $900,000 per year higher than projected and to run the park properly it might have to triple its payroll.

The evidence indicates that this patronage park will run deficits every year.

I ask the Prime Minister whether his government is prepared to bail out this money pit year after year, or is the Prime Minister prepared to show some leadership and pull the plug on the boondoggle—no more federal funding?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the member is making the case. I just said that the document he is looking at was prepared in 1992. The project has been cut down to a more manageable level. The group has been told very clearly by the Quebec government and by the federal government that if it cannot make a go of it, it will not be able to come to us later on.

The local community is dedicated and committed to making it work and I am convinced it will work. We are making a small contribution compared to what Hydro Quebec is making. Hydro Quebec is very independent from the government; it is run completely separate. Ask any MLA and they will tell you.

TRANSPORT CANADA

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, we learned from a working paper drafted by Transport Canada that the minister of Transport is considering eliminating 14,000 jobs by privatizing several activities and going as far as privatizing all activities conducted by the Canadian Coast Guard.

Can the minister confirm that he is about to downsize its department by eliminating 14,000 jobs?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the budget includes a marketing process for Transport Canada operations.

We will examine all the activities the department is responsible for and carry out consultations which will enable us to still provide Canadians with safe, but also efficient services. The hon. member will be informed as soon as the decision is made.

• (1440)

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister confirm that his government will privatize the Coast Guard, hence decreasing the competitiveness of ports along the St. Lawrence Seaway and forcing shipowners to look for someone to foot the bill, which will come to about $200 million a year?

[English]

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have heard from the Official Opposition and from other parties in the House that we need to put our financial affairs in order, that we have to address all of the areas of government where there is a possibility of reducing costs and being more efficient.

We are going to look at the entire ambit of activities for which Transport Canada is responsible, including the coast guard. We are going to be very careful at maintaining what we think is our fiduciary responsibility of providing security for Canadians in all modes of transport. But we are going to look at all possibilities in consultation with provinces and with the clients that we have to serve.

We have not made any decisions on this except to do the very best we can in making sure that we provide an effective, integrated Transport Canada policy in all areas that we are responsible for.

MEMBER FOR SAINT–LÉONARD

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

There was a rather disturbing report in La Presse this morning about the government member for Saint–Léonard. Has the Prime Minister personally reviewed the RCMP file and security check on the member in question and, if so, could the Prime Minister assure the House that he is satisfied that there has been no questionable conduct?

The Speaker: Order. There are times when we get into very delicate issues in the House. I would remind all hon. members that in putting questions that there be in no way any hint of attacking the character or integrity of another member of Parliament.

However these questions, as long as they are put within the concept or the precept of the administrative responsibility of the government, of course would be in order. This question I would judge to be in order and I would permit the right hon. Prime Minister to answer.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have thoroughly reviewed the situation.

When I became the head of the government, before I formed the cabinet I asked the police to review all members of Parliament on my side. They had a question mark about clients of the member, but they made no allegation against the member at all.

I asked the member if he had done something wrong and he said "no". He asked me: "How can I get this question mark out of my file?" I said: "Let's ask the police to go to the bottom of it". In January the Clerk of the Privy Council informed me that there was absolutely no allegation whatever against the integrity of the member who is the whip.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member. He was the whip of my party when I was in opposition and he was a very good whip. In fact, I asked him to serve again as whip and we can see the result of his work. We have cut $5 million from the perks.

Another good example of how good he is in terms of administration was in 1988. When 55 new members were coming into the House of Commons, the previous administration spent $1.3 million to move members around. This time, with 205 new members in the House, this whip managed to do all that and spent only $185,000. He saved more—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): Parliament would be much better off if we had many more Gagliano here.

Some hon. members: More, more.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1445)

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Prime Minister for that unequivocal statement of support for the member.

I believe there is nothing to these reports. Is there some value in the Prime Minister tabling both the preliminary report and the January report in the House so that speculation will be put to rest once and for all?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is the rule that we accept the words of a member. It is very unfortunate because I do not know where that leak is coming from.

A leak like that casts a shadow of a doubt over somebody. This gentleman was cleared by everybody. I am surprised the question was even asked. There was a leak. There might be some people making allegations about something that is not true against any one of us here. Just because it is in the press there is a shadow of doubt which is terribly unfair.

In my opinion this gentleman has our support. He has been an excellent member of Parliament and has given me a very satisfactory explanation. I am very proud he is member of my caucus.

BIOVAC

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health. On June 8, 1992, the BioVac company of Quebec submitted an application for the licensing of its BCG–cancer vaccine. After 22 months, this application is still pending. Connaught submitted an application for a similar vaccine on March 2, 1989, and a license was issued after 14 months. This delay in the licensing process is causing serious prejudice to BioVac which stands to lose important contracts.

Could the minister tell us what is delaying unduly the licensing of the Biovac BCG–cancer vaccine?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, I cannot comment on what happened in the department before my appointment. However, I can tell you that there are many reasons why delays sometimes occur. In this particular case, I could try to get information and answer some time later. You can be assured that we are trying to serve the Canadian people in the best possible way.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that I already put this question to the minister in the lobby, but that I am still waiting for an answer. I wish she would explain why the double standards, one for BioVac which, after 22 months, is still waiting for an answer from the department, and one for Connaught which got a license for its vaccine after 14 months.

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, I always try to answer the question of the hon. member. When I have the answer, I will give it to her.

PACIFIC SALMON TREATY

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

The most recent session of the 1993–94 Pacific salmon treaty negotiating round has failed to make any progress. The negotiation with the United States once again is at an impasse. This impasse will have important conservation consequences in 1994 and in future years. It will also have bilateral fisheries and international relations consequences for Canada and the United States.

Would the minister please advise the House what further action the government will take to reach an agreement and to protect Canadian fishermen and Canadian resources under international law?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question on this important and troubling negotiation.

We have done everything we can to move the negotiation forward and to avoid confrontation with the Americans on the Pacific salmon management plan this year. As recently as last week the Prime Minister raised this question directly with the President of the United States as an important unresolved matter between our two countries.

I will be in British Columbia this week meeting with stakeholders in the industry and seeking their advice before Canada proceeds further on this matter.

I can say that the United States is indicating thus far it wants more access to Canadian salmon, to the tune of $60 or $70 million a year more access. It wants Canadian fishermen to have less access to our own salmon and U.S. salmon. In fact it wants the imbalance that has been in place over the last nine years to continue. I can tell the House that is not going to happen.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, today as South Africans are voting in their first genuinely democratic election Canadian democracy has been taking a backward step.

Bill C–18 which is designed to block electoral redistribution until the next century has been roundly condemned in Canada, especially in British Columbia where it has been condemned by all parties, including B.C. Liberals.

My question is for the government House leader. Will the government withdraw its support for Bill C–18 now that public hearings are under way and thereby avoid possible constitutional challenges and an unnecessary confrontation with the Senate?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, we are satisfied the bill is constitutional. It has received the support of the House. I look forward to discussing the bill with members of the other place.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I am obviously disappointed with this answer.

There has been considerable speculation about the motivation for this bill. The Globe and Mail reported on March 25 that the government House leader promised in a closed meeting of Liberal MPs in early March that he would block electoral redistribution in response to the partisan and political needs of Ontario Liberal MPs.

Will the minister confirm for the House that the meeting reported in the Globe and Mail took place?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I think it is considered to be improper to question motives in this House. The hon. member should know this by now.

Questions have been raised about the suitability of the redistribution process in terms of its recognition of such things as community of interest, geography and so on, in many corners of the House and in many provinces.

Again I want to say I look forward to discussing the bill with members of the other place. When it comes to Ontario Liberal members, they showed in the last election they can do pretty well on their own.

CANADIAN HEMOPHILIA SOCIETY

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Health, and I hope I will have better luck than the hon. member for Drummond.

A group of international experts was recently assigned to the Krever Commission on tainted blood to do a comparative study of the best blood supply systems in the world and make recommendations to improve the blood products supply systems in Canada.

Why does the minister provide very substantial amounts of money for these international experts, while the Canadian Hemophilia Society is still waiting to receive the money it needs to adequately represent its own members before the Commission?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Justice Krever who is in charge of the inquiry spends his money as he sees fit, and in fact, he hired these experts. We remain in touch with the commission, and I must say there have been no problems so far. The people who wish to take part in this inquiry have the right, as well as the funding they need, to appear before the commission.

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I beg to differ. The Canadian Hemophilia Society has to lay off staff because the minister has not granted the requisite funding, effectively putting a gag on the society.

Does the minister agree that appointing this committee of experts will do absolutely nothing to shed light on the tainted blood scandal?

[English]

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, when there is a judicial inquiry the head of that inquiry has much latitude. As far as I know, he is the one who engaged the committee of experts.

• (1455)

The hon. member speaks of the Canadian Hemophilia Society which has asked for further funding. It is under consideration. However, to date none of the people who wished to appear before the Krever commission has been denied the funding necessary to help them.

HIV TESTING PROGRAM

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health.

The government recognizes that inmates in federal prisons exist in medium to high risk exposure to AIDS because of the significant numbers of inmates who have a history of IV drug use, the continued drug use with unsterilized needles in prisons, inmates who receive tattoos with unsterilized needles, or engage in unprotected sexual relationships.

Considering the high cost in social and monetary terms AIDS imposes on society, why has this minister not instituted a concerted HIV testing program in prisons?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member will not mind if I answer his question. This is a matter pertaining to Correctional Service Canada.

Recently a blue ribbon committee outside of government studied the matter and made recommendations. The government through Correctional Service Canada announced it was accepting most of the recommendations, including measures to step up dealing with the problem of AIDS.

I invite the hon. member to look at that report and the response of Correctional Service. I hope he will get some satisfaction from it.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, I have looked at the report the hon. minister mentioned.

In section 2 of that report, which I believe was prepared on February 4, it was stated loud and clear that the HIV testing program currently in place is sadly lacking in a number of ways.

Could the minister tell me what steps are being taken to improve the situation?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, it is my recollection that in response to the report Correctional Service is augmenting its testing program so that more is being done in that regard.

CHILD ABUSE REGISTRY

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

I know the minister is aware of the injustices that have been committed against children in Canada and the many cases of child abuse. I know he would agree that for too long these offences have been hidden.

Will the minister commit to taking some immediate action to establish a national child abuse registry? Prior to hiring a person to work in a position of trust with children, it would require that an employer conduct a search to determine whether the applicant had previously been convicted of a sexual offence against children.

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I can give the commitment readily.

In fact as a result of work that the Solicitor General, the Minister of Health and I have done over the last several weeks, we are about to release an options paper during the month of May into the hands of interested parties across the country. It will set out specific steps we can take to put in place a registry of child abusers in the country.

Just this morning I met with Monica Rainey who has been the very active and very effective president of Citizens Against Child Exploitation. Her work and the message she brought me this morning serve to show the urgency of this undertaking. We have to protect children from repeat abuses by people who have been convicted of these offences.

The efforts we are making focus on both the short term and the long term. The first is to establish the registry perhaps through an adaptation of the CPIC system the police use for convictions. The second is to have an effective screening system so that employers who are about to hire people in positions of trust can find out whether they have been convicted.

I share the hon. member's sense of urgency on this issue. I assure him we are taking steps and our paper will be in his hands within the next four weeks.

ADVERTISING

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides): Yesterday, the Minister of Public Works and Government Services volunteered the information that Genesis Media Inc. had been given a one–year extension on its lucrative contract to buy federal advertising space. The contract, worth $1.8 million, was extended by the minister at his discretion, without tenders.

• (1500)

Considering the government's new code of ethics so often referred to by the Prime Minister, how does the Minister of Public Works and Government Services justify his decision to give a one–year extension for a contract worth nearly $2 million without tenders and without consulting Cabinet?

[English]

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for an excellent question. The precondition that the government has set in the awarding of various contracts is the ability and the competency to carry out the work.

The hon. member should know that each and every day this company does approximately 1,500 transactions. It was virtually impossible for us to change that. We have extended the contract under the existing rules for a 12–month period while we conduct our review. Thereafter we will go to a tender and other companies that wish to opt for that type of business will then have an opportunity to make the necessary bids.

YOUTH EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of human resources.

On April 16 a group of North Vancouver voters who had been selected at random from the voters' list reviewed applications for grants under the SEED program for the creation of summer jobs for students. The group rejected 16 of the 52 applications as being unsuitable use of taxpayers money.

Employment Canada is sending the rejected applications to the minister for review. Will the minister please assure the voters of North Vancouver that he will not overrule their democratic decision?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that the 16 individuals who were selected by the member represent the entire 75,000 people who live in North Vancouver, especially the high number of unemployed young people in North Vancouver who desperately want to find some way to get back to work so they can pay their expenses to go back to school.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and has to do with the revelation of a proposal made by Railex, an American transport company, for the purchase of VIA Rail infrastructure west of Winnipeg on the condition that all current VIA Rail employees be laid off.

Would the minister like to take this opportunity to completely rule out at this time, on the floor of the House of Commons, in a very public way, any possibility of privatizing VIA Rail in western Canada and for that matter anywhere, but particularly given this proposal, in western Canada?

Could he also tell us when he will make public the recommendations of the task force that went around Manitoba in particular, that was conducted by the member for St. Boniface and the member for Churchill? What is the attitude of the government toward Railex's proposal?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question.

First, with respect to the proposal by Railex, it is not under consideration by the government. That kind of approach would not be one that we would have any sympathy for whatever.

With respect to the work of members of Parliament, members would know that they are free to conduct inquiries and to participate in making sure that their constituents' views can be heard on any matter. I look forward to hearing from the members who conducted the hearings the hon. member referred to in Manitoba and will certainly take them into account.

I want to make it clear that the exercise was not mandated by the Minister of Transport. However as we would for any MPs in the House who consult with their constituents, we will pay a great deal of attention to what they have to say.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT AGREEMENTS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–22, an act respecting certain agreements concerning the redevelopment and operation of terminals 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson International Airport, be read the second time and referred to a committee; and of the amendment; and of the amendment to the amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I understand that, before Question Period, a question was asked of the member for Chambly. I will ask him to kindly complete his answer.

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some confusion. I answered the question. The member for Mississauga spoke after me on that.

[English]

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate having the opportunity to speak on Bill C–22 because as members know, this was an issue I was quite active on when in opposition and also during the campaign. Pearson International Airport is not directly in my riding but it is located in the city that I represent with many other Liberals.

I want to go back to the days when we opposed the privatization of Pearson International Airport and make it perfectly clear that when we told the then government we were against this particular project, the privatization of Pearson, we were very specific about our reasons.

One of the reasons we put forward was that Pearson International Airport is probably the largest profit centre the Government of Canada controls. I was just looking at some figures that my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport, handed me during question period. These numbers are taken from years 1991–92 and 1992–93 where the positive cash flow after operating expenses and capital expenditures was over $50 million. That was during a period of time when revenues and travelling were down. In 1992–93 it was $67 million and in 1993–94 the revenues were close to $68 million again.

If we go back to the mid and late 1980s there were a couple of years when the Pearson International Airport was generating close to $100 million a year. We heard from the Conservative government at that time that if we let the private sector take over Pearson it could do a better job than the bureaucrats and the officials.

The position we took was that if there were management people out there who could do a better job than the bureaucrats who were at that time generating $100 million a year, and even during the depression over $50 million a year, that was interesting. Why not introduce us to these management experts and let us give them a contract as management consultants?

In other words, if they said that they could improve the cash flow at these airports from 51 to 60 or put some specific targets in place, let us give them a base salary and a percentage of what they would pick up as they increased the efficiency or the cash flow from what the officials or the bureaucrats were doing.

We thought that we could probably achieve everything that the government wanted to achieve: a better cash flow, renovate or renew the airport and clean up the parking lots without giving it away. That was the position we took.

I know that during the election campaign several people were involved in the airport transaction. They had actually come to me in my campaign office and said: "Dennis, listen, I hope you aren't as rigid on your view of Pearson". I would tell them: "I am as rigid today as I was then". I am not against giving people a contract to renew or construct new construction at the airport. I am not against using the private sector to do the food services, the parking lots, the cleaning services, all these things that the private sector can do better. However the thought of handing over a crown asset, a jewel in the crown, that essentially had the potential to pay for all of the renovation and renewal required in about a 10–year period out of the existing cash flow.

Again I felt that our position was constructive in opposition when we said: "Look, if there is room for efficiency we will accept that. There is always a possibility, but let's hire these so–called experts who can operate it better. Let's give them a contract but let's not give away the whole franchise. Let's not give away the whole store". If a business was doing well and somebody came along and said "I can improve your profits or your cash flow by 10 per cent or 20 per cent", it would say: "Sure, let's do it". However, if the person said: "No, no, no. I want to own the business. I want to take your business", there is not a member of Parliament who would go along with that deal.

Therefore the Prime Minister made the right decision during and after the campaign when he shut down this contract because it was not good in the long term interests of the Canadian public.

The thing that makes me feel bad about this contract is that we could have had that airport under construction right now if the people who had all of this expertise and all these plans on renewal and renovation had come in with a proposal that did not say we need to own it. It is a fact of life that we have to clean up the parking lot and we have to do the renewal and renovation there and we could have had people working. It is too bad they did not take the compromised approach that many of us suggested. Hopefully we can get through the bill today and maybe get back to this with a fresh approach.

There is another part of this contract that I did not like. I want to credit my colleague from York South—Weston for bringing this up. My colleague from York South—Weston as everybody in Canada knows really led the way on the debate on the merits of why we should not proceed with the privatization on this deal.

I will never forget one particular evening when we were in a meeting. It is like any family, some people in the room are for or against and take different positions on an issue. I remember the member for York South—Weston turning to someone in the room who had an awareness of certain contents related to the contract and he asked: "Is there a flip clause in this particular Pearson privatization contract?" The person said yes, at year 10 the owners have the opportunity to flip this. That is exactly what was said.

I remember all of a sudden the lights went on with all of us. We said: "Imagine if this contract had gone through, 10 years from now with the private owners of the Lester B. Pearson International Airport. Can you imagine what the people of Canada would have said if we had basically sold this airport to the Libyans or sold it to some other offshore group?" I remember we said jokingly that night that 10 years from now it will be called Gaddafi International.

Just the thought of selling the Pearson International Airport to an offshore group—if there were ever a piece of good, positive contribution to our community and our country as Pearson airport, to think that we would be so stupid as to construct a deal that would allow it to be given away ten years from now, there is just no contest on that point alone.

I am happy to stand in the House today in support of the bill. I want to say to the members of the Bloc Quebecois who put forward an amendment today proposing that this go to a royal commission of inquiry that I know exactly where the Bloc members are coming from. They want to do a detailed analysis of the players, the participants, and who constructed this deal. If that is put into a royal commission mode that would go on for months and months and perhaps years, and it would cost literally millions of dollars.

The basic objective the Bloc members are trying to achieve could be done when we do the lobby registration bill. We need speedy passage of the bill so that we can start from scratch in renewing and renovating Pearson International Airport. Not only do we need it for creating immediate jobs but because Toronto is a major access point for tourism, trade shows and all kinds of other activities. It is not just in the greater Toronto area but in every other region of Canada. It is really important that we get on with that.

I hope when we come to the table the next time with the private sector it will understand that we respect its skill in terms of giving us advice on how we can manage the place. We would certainly want it to do the construction and everything else because that is not government's business. It also has to understand that in the long term interests of Canadians it is best that the Lester B. Pearson International Airport stay in the hands of the Government of Canada.

• (1520)

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood. He stated in his speech that, after realizing that Pearson Airport was profitable and that the private sector should no longer be party to this transaction, the government decided to cancel the contract. The member told us that the government would like the Pearson Airport to stay in the hands of the Government of Canada, but in the same breath, he added that, when it comes back to the table the next time with the private sector, it will seek better terms to make sure that the interests of Canadians are well served.

Are we to conclude from this analysis of the issue by the member that the government intends to turn Pearson Airport over to the private sector in the near future, while, for the time being, cancelling a deal signed with the private sector? The government would temporarily take over the airport to eventually put it back into the hands of the private sector, maybe in a few months or in a couple of years.

If that is the case, one must wonder what the government really intends to do. Is the government cancelling the deal only to hand out the airport to other individuals it likes better than the ones chosen by the previous government? I would like the member to clarify this point.

[English]

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question from the member. I want to make it perfectly clear that we have taken a policy position. Not only was this particular airport contract flawed but the privatization approach that was used was not in keeping with our thrust.

We are not just cancelling this contract to walk around the curtains and give it to some other private sector group. We are looking at all types of options to make sure we get the best contract for Canadians, not just in the short term but in the long term.

That means that it may not be run out of the Department of Transport but maybe it could be quasi–crown organization. In no way, shape or form have I ever heard from anyone on our side that we are looking to shut this contract down so we just turn around and give it to some other private sector contractor.

I personally believe that the officials in Transport Canada have been doing a very good job in managing the Pearson International Airport. Is the member asking me can they do a better job? We can all do a better job. It does not matter what we are doing. Does it mean that maybe we should go outside and get some private sector advice on how we can increase the profits or do a better job to raise funds? I have no problem with that. What I am saying is: give the contract to the consultants. Let us not give away the farm.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the previous speaker that certainly Pearson airport is the hub of the Canadian airline industry. Certainly the building of an airline and a successful transportation network within Canada is dependent on the hub and spoke concept. It is perhaps the single most important airport. As I have mentioned, it is certainly an important part of the infrastructure of Ontario and of Canada as a whole. Therefore the outcome of any bill or action surrounding the Pearson airport is of utmost importance to Canadians.

With this in mind Pearson airport must be a cornerstone in this whole planning process. Pearson International Airport operations generate some $2 billion in personal income, $4 billion in business revenues and $700 million in tax revenue.

Pearson accounts for one–third of Canada's domestic flights and 50 per cent of all international and transborder traffic.

We all agree that the deal that was struck between the Conservative government and Pearson Development Corporation last year was unacceptable. This is an obvious example of the old style of doing business. We agree with the Minister of Transport's statement earlier today that the deal should quashed because of backroom dealings and other unscrupulous behaviour. If the minister is correct and someone other than the government of the day was responsible for the Pearson deal, the current government must not honour the contract. If the contract was influenced unduly by lobbyists, again the current government must not honour that contract.

I believe these facts to be true. For this reason I feel that it is a wise move for the current government to cancel this deal. To legislate an end to the fiasco and hopefully open the process of revamping Pearson airport is acceptable to me and my party. What is not acceptable is the clause of Bill C–22 which allows the minister to negotiate the payment of out of pocket expenses to the contractors. The Prime Minister promised before the election that he would cancel the entire deal. He has cancelled part of the deal, but now the hon. Minister of Transport is going to compensate those individuals who were involved in this sordid affair. The minister has done nothing to remove the secrecy surrounding this deal that began with the previous government.

Greg Weston of the Ottawa Citizen said in his March 9 column: "The Grits have managed the remarkable feat of turning a highly suspicious and secretive Tory deal into a highly suspicious and secretive Liberal cancellation process. A secret inquiry followed by current secret compensation negotiations". The government must not stop halfway on this issue by paying off those who were involved in this questionable affair. Quite simply, there should be no compensation whatsoever for anyone involved in this deal, period.

Many suspect excessive amounts of lobbying went on in the privatization of the Pearson airport, with both Liberal and Conservatives heavily involved. Key people include Charles Bronfman, Senator Leo Kolber, Herb Metcalfe, and many more. The list is some 50 people.

Liberals have appointed former provincial Liberal cabinet minister Robert Nixon and the Prime Minister's former law partner, Bob Wright, to lead the negotiations for compensation. The Liberal government with Liberal negotiators compensating Liberal backers is questionable at the very best.

What are the alternatives? This payoff of what has been reported could reach $40 million, could be funnelled back into Pearson directly. With the money that we will pay back for this deal we could do a lot of things in that airport. Many of those things have been mentioned earlier today.

We could help the airline industry, currently struggling to become more efficient and competitive in the international market. As just one other example, permit me to talk a little about the runway construction at Pearson and the many things that have to happen there.

The runway expansion is the most sensible, cost effective way to secure the future viability of Pearson International Airport. For example, the first runway that is required by the airport is a new crosswind runway and this is needed as soon as possible because it will help to eliminate around 50 per cent of all the delays at Pearson. These delays cost the Canadian traveller a great deal of money as planes circle and use large amounts of fuel.

There has already been some $30 million in preconstruction work invested in the north–south crosswind runway. A crosswind runway would greatly increase safety at Pearson airport. Recently pilots who fly into Pearson have cited the potential dangers of extreme crosswinds on the current runways.

Pearson could also use the $40 million the government is going to spend to buy off contractors to fund two east–west runways. That would raise Pearson to its optimum capacity and ensure the airport's place as an international hub.

Furthermore if this expansion does not occur traffic will soon have to divert away from Pearson airport. Currently there are no reasonable alternatives to expansion of Pearson. Moreover, attempts to divert traffic away from the Pearson hub will hurt the regional spoke communities. For many of these communities two–thirds of their traffic going to Pearson is connecting to another airport.

Finally these new runways can be built now without impeding any discussions on the future organizational structure of Pearson. Directing the money now slated to pay off contract expenses from the Pearson deal could be routed to runway expansion. It would create an estimated 2,500 construction jobs and up to 6,000 over the long term.

Therefore the bottom line is, like so many other decisions made by this government, the money that is to buy off a contractor could be put to good use in funding the expansion of one of Canada's most important pieces of public infrastructure, Pearson airport.

There are also international concerns which should be touched on. It has been reported in the Financial Post that one of those corporations seeking compensation is a Dutch government company called Schiphol.

Schiphol has filed a claim in Ontario court for $7.5 million in damages for loss of contract. The Dutch airport authority has expressed shock at Ottawa's willingness to use its power to pass laws to nullify a valid contract.

I am not suggesting that this government retract its stand on rejecting such a claim. However I do wonder out loud how this government will deal with a firm such as Schiphol which is non–political and has a good argument that it had nothing to do with Canadian political nepotism. Will it be compensated for out of pocket expenses? Will it be compensated for its original contract? What are the political and diplomatic ramifications of these international concerns?

What we want most is a transparent government, one which does not make behind the scenes and closed deals as is the example in the Pearson deal.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises concerns about other companies that may have been involved in good faith in this particular process.

I remind the hon. member that the contract on the redevelopment of Pearson International Airport was not signed until October 7, 1993. That was several weeks before the general election campaign and after the leader of the Liberal Party made it clear and unequivocal that if elected he would rescind or cancel the contract.

With that knowledge in mind, the consortium signed the contract. All the other people who might have a claim today would have had that knowledge. In the circumstances, does the hon. member not feel that those who participated in this particular unconscionable contract were the authors of their own misfortune as they knew the contract would be cancelled well in advance of the time it was signed? Does the member not think their claim for compensation is not founded on solid principle, moral and otherwise?

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree with that. I would agree wholeheartedly with the member's comments that they knew better and they obviously should not be expecting any compensation.

However, because some of these are international, and that is why I used Schiphol as an example, the diplomatic problem is possibly more important than the actual possibility of their getting any money out of the deal.

When other foreign governments start suing our government because they feel the government has interfered in business that is where, rightfully or wrongfully, the diplomatic problem comes in. That is why I used that example. Others could come up, certainly a number of the other airlines which had plans and had done some of their negotiating with that group. That is where the problem comes in.

In actual dollars it should not cost us anything. As I said I would not recommend paying a single penny in compensation to anyone.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, the contract was signed on October 7 and the member raises his concern about this diplomatic problem we might have.

If anything, the message was sent out loud and clear by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport when this contract was cancelled. The message was if you want to do business with the Government of Canada then you have to do it above board in a responsible and reasonable way and it ought to contemplate the public interest.

In this particular case Mr. Nixon made it abundantly clear that there were a lot of shady aspects to this particular deal. There were a lot of backroom negotiations and much manipulation. There were a lot of payoffs. Lobbyists were selling access. They were arranging meetings for very significant fees.

The hon. member talks about this particular company that might feel particularly aggrieved. One wonders whether it hired one of the lobbying firms involved. Surely as responsible business people they knew what was going on.

In any event would the member not agree their claim is not for out of pocket expenses but for lost profits? Any out of pocket expenses they may have incurred could only have taken place after the signing of the actual contract on October 7. After that of course they knew on October 25 the government would change.

Again would the hon. member not agree that any company that in any way shape or form was involved with this contract, or hoped to gain as a result of this contract knew very well that the contract would be cancelled even before it was signed? Therefore why would it expend one red cent when the writing was already on the wall?

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I agree with those comments. They are legitimate comments.

In a discussion with the Dutch embassy just now it feels Bill C–22 unjustly punishes third party firms associated with Pearson. It says that the Schiphol airport authority being non–political should not be caught up in the whole Canadian political corruption the hon. member mentioned. According to the embassy it is saying the company from Holland feels it has a claim.

Again I get to the diplomacy. I am not saying that position is right. Obviously the courts will determine that. However it has filed a claim in the Canadian courts about this deal. Therefore it is obvious it feels this is not a dead issue and that it is not something it should not raise.

[Translation]

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I am more inclined to endorse the recommendations of the hon. member who spoke before the Reform member. I wonder which principles come into play. I can understand that there may have been companies which unfortunately entered in good faith into negotiations or made some kind of deal with T1 T2 Partnership Limited. But, getting back to what the Liberal member was saying, what reason would we have for compensating individuals who were truly involved in some kind of scheme against the government?

• (1540)

If a group of criminals spends a substantial amount of money plotting to rob a bank and then screws up, the bank is not about to compensate those people for the costs incurred in the planning of the robbery. That is the principle I am having trouble understanding. I hope that the Reform member is not trying to tell me that we would be better off paying compensation to avoid lawsuits from foreign companies. Is that what he is suggesting?

[English]

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, let me make it extremely clear. I am recommending we compensate no one involved in any part of this, including foreign companies that are now making claims in court. We should not compensate them. All I am saying is those claims are out there and it does not help our image. That is all I am concerned about. Do not compensate them at all.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, the third party contracts the hon. member refers to would fall within the definition of agreement under the bill. In effect the bill cancels or precludes any legal recourse whatsoever for all contracts whether they are with the consortium or other third parties who might have participated. I just wanted to make that point.

One further point is that the request for proposals dated March 1992 made it abundantly clear to all those who wanted to bid on this contract that the government was under no obligation to accept any of the bids. In fact the government reserved the right to reject any or all of the proposals and to elect not to proceed with the project.

All the companies involved in the bidding process, and perhaps this foreign company was one of them, knew in advance that any moneys they spent in preparing the proposal could very well have been money lost because the government made it clear in its bid for proposals it could elect not to proceed with the project.

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I agree totally with that comment.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to discuss Bill C–22 today. The essence of the bill is to put a fence around the problems surrounding the development of Canada's largest airport for the last number of years. It not only puts a fence around the problem in delineating a timeframe but it also goes on to speak about the type of compensation, if any, which is to be allowed to the successful bidders.

In the minister's statements today, lobbying fees, other costs and loss of profit are not going to be considered in the eventual solution to this problem.

It is interesting and I say with pride that there has been some continuity in the Liberal Party. From its inception we have opposed the concept of privatizing Pearson airport, even when we were sitting on that side of the House.

On June 12, 1989 in the recommendations of the federal caucus task force on the future of Pearson International Airport, my colleague who spoke a few moments ago stated in part: "It should never be allowed that Pearson be privatized. It should always remain as a viable and important part of the infrastructure of Canada. It should always be used for the public policy and in the public interest of all Canadians". That was in a report made by my colleague as far back as 1989.

This problem had its genesis when the government of the day decided it should privatize a new terminal that was being built at Pearson. As a result of that process a private consortium was allowed to build what we now know as Trillium or terminal 3.

To this day, as hard as we worked when we were in opposition to find out the terms of that contractual arrangement between the owners of Trillium and the government of the day, we were not made privy to that very important document that allowed the first privatized terminal at Pearson airport.

We were told at the time that the reason for the privatization of terminal 3 was that Canadians did not have the means by which to expand airport facilities in that area. That had some semblance of accuracy. However we failed to realize at that time that terminal 1 could have been made into a more efficient airport with the expenditure of a few million dollars for modernization.

As they got on with the building and prior to the opening of terminal 3 we were advised that there was a move afoot to privatize terminals 1 and 2. The reason was that the government wanted, and this is a very important concept, to provide a competitive factor at Pearson International Airport in order to keep in balance the privatized interests that were operating at terminal 3 and terminals 1 and 2 under another entirely different corporate structure. This was to bring some balance for the best interest of the consumer who was travelling in and out of that airport. That was the reason it came forward with the privatization concept of terminals 1 and 2.

We had some concerns about the privatization concept. As a result of that the Liberals while on that side of the House entered into another task force proposal. That was done on September 12, 1990, one year after the first proposal. We found that the contract for terminal 3 had been entered into but there had not at that time been any designation of any airline that would use that airport.

I will quote from some of our findings of that task force. Please recall that in 1990 the airlines, as they are today, were experiencing severe financial difficulties. Part of the findings were that the airlines in the country, particularly Canadian, faced the dilemma that operationally it could not use terminal 3. At the same time Canadian could not afford to move into that airport. It would have been a financial disaster. That came from one of the leaders of the Canadian airline industry at that time.

We found as a result of that study in 1990, and these feelings were expressed in the House just prior to the opening of Trillium, that the cost of flying into terminal 3 would be prohibitive to the average Canadian consumer. Those of us who sometimes travel at government expense perhaps do not not realize the cost of travelling as much as we should. However the cost of going into terminal 3 would have been prohibitive to the average Canadian wage earner in the country flying with his family or wanting to see the rest of Canada.

We knew that exorbitant rental fees were being charged. After terminal 3 opened there was almost a rebellion by everyone renting space in terminal 3. The costs of leases to the airlines and the the retailers were passed on to the travelling customer.

If terminals 1 and 2 are privatized, price increases can be expected for every consumer. Terminal 3 will set the pattern for terminals 1 and 2 should privatization be allowed. Either way, whether it is privatization with one consortium of terminal 3 and privatization by another corporate citizen of terminals 1 and 2, there will be one inevitable conclusion: The cost of travelling into Toronto, the largest airport in the country, will increase substantially. Those were our findings. Those were our recommendations. The government carried on, although we were sincere in trying to get it to change its mind.

Let us see what happened after that. All of a sudden people showed up at some of our offices, including I am sure the office of my colleague who just spoke, saying: "We want to show you our proposal". This was long before the government asked for proposals for the privatization of terminals 1 and 2.

In 1991 people came to my office and said: "We would like to show you our proposals for terminals 1 and 2". I told them the government had not asked for proposals. The answer was: "Yes, but we are anticipating that this government is going to ask for proposals for privatization".

Finally, I believe in March 1992, the government asked for formal presentations for proposals for the privatization of terminals 1 and 2. As a result three proposals were made. The first proposal was by the then owners of terminal 3. That was not met with much favour because of the competitive factor that we wanted to maintain between terminals 1 and 3.

A very good proposal was submitted by the British Airport Authority which operates the airports in England and other places on the continent. It had some very good ideas that I think we should incorporate into what we are trying to do at Pearson today. However its proposal was shortlived. It did not meet with favour.

The third proposal was from a company called Paxport. Paxport always seemed to have the inside track for whatever reason. Eventually, as these proposal were being discussed, Air Canada made it known that Paxport made a proposal that interested it most and since it was operating exclusively out of terminal 2, Paxport was the proposal it would entertain.

Going back to the original statement, competitiveness was always a factor in the privatization of terminals 1 and 2. The Paxport proposal was looked on with favour by Air Canada. Eventually something else happened.

Terminal 3 was taken over by a corporation called Pearson Development Corporation. The previous owner sold out interest to Pearson Development Corporation.

An hon. member: Who owns Pearson Development Corporation?

Mr. Comuzzi: Then Paxport disappeared, the one that was operating with favour. Where did it resurrect itself? Pearson Development Corporation. All of a sudden, having been given assurances by the government of the day that there would be competition at the airport in Toronto, as the government was getting close to awarding the tender we found that there was going to be no competition at Pearson International Airport. In fact the three terminals, terminal 3 which was called Trillium, terminal 2 and terminal 1, would all be under the direct control of Pearson Development Corporation.

An hon. member: A real monopoly.

Mr. Comuzzi: A real monopoly in Canada's main hub, the largest airport and our pride and joy in Canada. That move was just unconscionable.

We in the government kept expressing our displeasure at what we saw happening at the Pearson airport complex. We stated throughout the election, including when we were approaching October, that the Pearson privatization was not a rational, logical proposal for the public interests of Canada.

What was proposed for all other airports in the country was to put every one of them under what we called local airport authorities. That vested the local airport in each of our communities under a local control made up of non–profit oriented business people, men and women who would operate the airports in the best interests of their communities. That was not a bad idea and we supported that legislation.

We asked the government of the day why, if local airport authorities were all right for Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg, Mirabel, Dorval and other airports in the country, they would not be good for Pearson International Airport.

The reason was simply that we were having a difficult time getting along with all of the jurisdictions that surround Pearson airport at the municipal level. That did not wash.

The second reason was that Pearson was such a strong international airport that it could not be left to the control of a local authority, although that did not apply to Dorval, Winnipeg, Edmonton, Calgary or Vancouver. The whole concept never ever made any sense.

Those who knew about it most were those who eventually evolved from Paxport into Pearson Development Corporation. In June, July, August and September 1993 the issue became hotter and hotter on the political stage. Time does not allow me, Mr. Speaker, to give you some insight into the lengthy meetings with the lobbyists.

Former ministers of the government were getting into the bargaining process with the Pearson Development Corporation and the Department of Transport. When the lobbyists found out that it was slipping away they entered into a contract knowing full well that if there was going to be a change in government, the Pearson deal was going to be cancelled. That was the first move this government made and I am thankful that it was.

That brings us to where we are today. My colleagues in the House and I suspect that within the next four to eight weeks the Pearson deal will be cut, finished once and for all, and we can get on to doing the things that are necessary at Pearson airport not only for the benefit of metro Toronto and southwestern Ontario but for the benefit of the travelling public in Canada as a whole.

When we get rid of this problem and through to the eventual climax, we must look at the contractual arrangement that was entered into. A contract was signed on October 7 or October 8, 20 days before the election. That in itself was unconscionable. We talked today in the House about awarding compensation. Our minister, who is much more generous than a lot of us on this side of the House, said the government is not going to pay for lost profits and lobbying fees but it will look at out of pocket expenses in so far as the proposals were concerned.

Are we looking at the cost of making the proposals by the British Airport Authority which made an excellent proposal but was not given the opportunity to bid with any degree of certainty?

If we look at Pearson Development Corporation it is only just, equitable and right that we look at what the British Airport Authority did in trying to present its best proposal to the House and to the government of the day. We must also look at the other proposals that were made and see what costs were borne by them. That is just, that is equitable and that is right.

To be exclusive in looking at compensation for out of pocket expenses for Pearson Development Corporation alone is not the right thing to do. We should take in the whole gamut of all those who spent considerable time and expense in developing proposals.

In conclusion, I trust that in the next four to eight weeks my colleagues on all sides of the House will be happy to get this problem over with as quickly as possible in order to get on with the decision as to whether we need a north–south runway at Pearson and deal with the problems associated with two extra east–west runways. Let us get on with the problem of what is going to happen to terminal 1. Should it be refurbished? It is a very good airport and accommodates eight or nine million people a year very comfortably.

In so far as transportation requirements are concerned in the country, we have to start to get on track. We are being superseded by communities that are not even half the size of Toronto. We are falling backward because we are failing to act and failing to do what is necessary in not only airport transportation but in passenger rail service and finding an economical way of getting our goods to market so that we can be globally competitive.

I implore all of my colleagues on all sides of the House, let us get down to business, let us get Pearson over with as fast as we can, let us get on with making Pearson a world class airport that we can all be proud of. I know the government with the support of our people on the other side will work toward this very fundamental, vital role for this airport that will be to the benefit of all of us.

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I have trouble understanding the comments made by the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon. He seems in complete agreement with what has been said on this side of the House since this morning. The Canadian people, and the Quebec people among others, can testify to the barely concealed and unconcealable embarrassment of the speakers from the party in office with regard to Bill C–22.

We are told: "There has been scheming; acts that would otherwise be unquestionably criminal have been committed by politicians and business people. But let us forget about that, so that Toronto airport can be developed. Let us forget about all that and stop talking about it, as it does not make things move forward". Is this case as urgent today as it was on October 7? What is preventing us from getting to the bottom of this and looking at the facts? Is it the urgency of it, as the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon is telling me?

I understand the urgent need, at some point, to resolve this issue, but the members opposite seem to be trying to hide behind convoluted language and they almost get away with it. Some things need to be clarified. We must clear things up.

Why do they not want to clear things up? If no serious impropriety has been committed in this case, unlike what Mr. Nixon says in his report, the Canadian people will at least feel that the government then in office and the current government acted in their interest. Why refuse at all costs to get to the bottom of this?

I ask the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon to try to justify this behaviour, if he thinks he is still strong enough to do it.

[English]

Mr. Comuzzi: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I did not make myself clear at the outset of my intervention today. I am not defending anything that went on in the past. I feel as my colleague does that there were a lot of things that went on with respect to the privatization concept that may one day be exposed.

I do not think that is our job today. I think our responsibility here today is to get on with the problem of deciding if there is compensation to a party, Pearson Development Corporation. Leave the problems of the workings of government and how they evolved for another day so it does not hamper what we want to do immediately. I have nothing to hide nor does this government have anything to hide with what we have done.

If there is anyone who wants to hide anything I would suggest to my colleagues that the previous government should be answering to how it got us into this position at Pearson Development Corporation up to this point.

All we are trying to do, and I impress this upon my friend, is clean up a mess. A royal commission, I suspect that is what my friend is alluding to.—What is a royal commission? A royal commission is four, five or half a dozen independent people who have not perhaps been exposed to the problem before. They are funded. What is the price of a royal commission today? The last one I saw on transportation policy came out to be $22 million. Do we need that type of venture today? Do we need that type of inquisition in order to tell us something that we already know? Are we prepared to spend that kind of money? We will have a report in 18 months or 24 months—that is what it takes to have a royal commission now—on something we already know.

I understand. I sympathize. I appreciate the comments the member just made but I am saying let us get on with the job. Get this thing over with and not only work here for Pearson International Airport, but work on behalf of every airport in this country.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I share the view of my Bloc colleague. I want to thank him for putting on the record the kind of sordid history of this whole mess.

I remember the need for disclosure that involved the Petrofina sale and I remember the cry of the opposition to the Liberal government of the day to provide the Auditor General with all details necessary to report fully on that purchase. I remember it refused to provide that. Then the government changed and as Canadians we heard the Liberal opposition demanding of the Conservative government to do the very same thing, to reveal all the financial details to the Auditor General so that he could make an accurate report to the public on the sale of Petrofina. That never happened.

The hon. member mentioned a contract that was let with regard to the development of the third terminal and that they had asked for the details of that.

Is the government prepared to provide information, to make a full disclosure on this? We do not need a royal commission of inquiry, but bring all the pertinent documents and table them in this House so that the public has access to them and the representatives of the Canadian people have access to those documents so that if we want to examine them we can or any interested body can make representation for that kind of information.

Would the member comment on that.

Mr. Comuzzi: Mr. Speaker, I would very much like to comment on that and I am pleased to hear the member say that we do not need a royal commission.

His question is so timely. We had a meeting this morning of the steering committee on transport. The Reform Party had I think two representatives there and we agreed unanimously that what we want the transport committee of the House of Commons to do is go into as much detail as we possibly can, to get as much information as we possibly can, to put it out on the table as fast as we can so that through this medium people in this House and people in this country will know exactly what kind of process was ongoing to strike that kind of deal that interfered with the rights of Canadians.

I hope that we can all learn a lesson on this side and on the member's side that we should never, if we represent the people in this country properly, allow ourselves to get into that kind of negotiating process again. I would be very upset if I saw anyone in this House get into that type of process of negotiation with such lobbying and such influence that it would be embarrassing to be a member of this government.

I welcome that question. The information that the member is requesting will be forthcoming through the Standing Committee on Transport and his membership in his party.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the hon. member for his submissions today. As a result of his submissions I am sure it is clear to everyone that he is one of the resident experts on Pearson International Airport, indeed on transportation issues.

I have always admired the depth of knowledge of my colleague. I am not only saying this because I happen to agree with him, but since his election to Parliament in 1988 he has distinguished himself as one of the foremost experts on transportation matters, in particular with regard to the Pearson airport deal. I know he provided me with a lot of advice on this particular matter.

He and I share the opinion that it takes a lot of audacity on the part of Mr. Bronfman and other principals in the Pearson Development Corporation to put forward a claim of close to $200 million for compensation—that is right, after all of the shenanigans that took place.

The hon. member has pointed out some of the aspects of the deal that caused Mr. Nixon to make the following conclusions: "My review has left me with one conclusion, to leave in place an inadequate contract, arrived at through such a flawed process and under the shadow of possible political manipulation, is unacceptable". Mr. Bronfman has the audacity to put forward a claim.

My question for my friend and colleague is: Does he believe that they ought to be entitled to anything at all? In my respectful submission, Mr. Bronfman and the Pearson Development Corporation, as a result of everything that transpired, deserve to be told to take a hike. They are not deserving of a single red cent as a result of the unconscionable nature of this contract.

If he agrees on that being the case, would he not agree that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I am sorry, we do not want to extend the time too much longer. I would like to ask the member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon to respond, please.

Mr Comuzzi: Mr. Speaker, I should respond by thanking first the member for those very kind remarks. I will try to be succinct. I think the starting point for these negotiations is just that, zero.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister had promised to make public all the details regarding the negotiation of a privatization agreement concerning Pearson Airport as well as the agreement itself.

Instead, we have a study done by a former Ontario Liberal minister, behind closed doors, that explains that political personnel and lobbyists had a role to play, a role out of the ordinary, in the negotiation of this agreement. We have few details and nobody is being blamed. We must shed more light on this, and only a public inquiry can do it.

Till we know the role of the various players, that is to say governments, officials, political personnel, lobbyists and investors in these negotiations, and till we know who exercised pressure to have this deal signed come what may, even during the election campaign, we will not be able to determine whether investors are really victims that should be compensated, or players who managed to get a hasty signature, and therefore should not get anything from the public purse.

Since the government wants to appear open and show us that it functions in a transparent way, it should allow the royal commission of inquiry we have been asking for since the very beginning of this affair. We must shed light on a case which just might be one of the biggest patronage affairs in the history of Canada.

I should point out that in the first few days of this government— I was hearing this morning comments sometimes odious, often uncalled for —the Minister of Transport was not against such an inquiry on the Pearson deal. Several Liberal members of the Toronto caucus were definitely in favour. However, they soon realized that friends of their party were also involved, not just friends of the Conservative Party, so the government and the minister backed down and went for a report prepared behind closed doors: the Nixon report.

There is no doubt, when you look at the people involved, that there were many lobbyists very close to the previous Conservative government. Let me name just a few. There was Pat MacAdam, a Conservative lobbyist and college friend of Brian Mulroney. There was Bill Fox, a Conservative lobbyist who is a former press secretary and personal friend of Brian Mulroney. There was Harry Near, a Conservative lobbyist and a long time party activist. There was Don Matthews, former chairman of Brian Mulroney's nomination campaign in 1983, and also former chairman of the Conservative Party and of the party's fund-raising campaign. There was Hugh Riopel, a lobbyist who was an important member of Mr. Mulroney's staff. There was John Llegate, a close friend of Michael Wilson. There was also Fred Doucet, who has always been related to the Conservative Party in one way or another.

However, there were also Liberals, which probably explains certain things. This is probably why, in spite of all the promises made regarding an eventual royal commission of inquiry to find out the details regarding the privatization of Pearson Airport, such an exercise was not conducted with all the necessary transparency.

For example, the people involved included senator Leo Kolber, who made the headlines during the election campaign, when he organized for the current Prime Minister a very private dinner meeting, a simple affair where the cover charge was a mere $1,000. Senator Kolber invited well-known personalities such as Charles Bronfman, who also happened to be involved in the Pearson dealings.

Also present was Herb Metcalfe, a lobbyist with the Capital Hill group, as well as an official for Claridge Properties and a former organizer for the current Prime Minister. There were others and there will be others such as Ramsay Whitters, a Liberal lobbyist closely related to the Prime Minister. There were all kinds of people.

So, when I look at all this, I can understand that the Liberal Party of Canada did not want to embarrass its friends who probably indirectly contribute, through their interests in Canadian ventures, to the party financing, and this is probably why the government did not want to shed light on this episode.

The members opposite are upset because we name their friends and point out the major reason why such an indecent bill was tabled today by a government willing to let its friends off the hook, in spite of their involvement in the privatization of Pearson Airport.

The public has the right to know all the details surrounding this decision, and this is why the Bloc Quebecois demands a public and independent inquiry which will shed light on these dealings. The situation is so serious in fact that the Minister of Transport himself stated that the federal government was considering setting up a royal commission of inquiry. The minister made that statement on November 29, 1993. It is true that new appointees are always full of good intentions when they take over a department. I suspect the minister was quickly called to order by his party's establishment.

We must not only mention the involvement of friends of the Liberal Party of Canada. There is also a whole series of strange, bizarre and even indecent things which have occurred from a financial point of view regarding the transaction as such, and these things must be pointed out. I will just name a few. We have examined the contract in its entirety and that is why it would be interesting to have a royal commission go over these incongruities together.

First, the term of the contract. The term would be divided in two: a 37–year term, with the possibility to renew for another 20 years. What for? Why did the federal government accept to do this for the Pearson Airport investors at the time? To avoid paying an Ontario transfer tax whereby you have to pay some $10 million in taxes on leases with terms over 50 years.

So, with the help of the federal government, the investors were able through that clause to circumvent the Ontario tax. Have you ever heard of a federal government conniving in defrauding provincial tax?

Second incongruity: the way the rent is to be calculated. It says in the contract that it can be calculated one of two ways. I will mention just one about which there are no less than ten oddities, ten seldom if ever used clauses in this kind of contract, especially for multimillion dollar transactions like the privatization of the Pearson Airport. The contract provides that PDC, Pearson Development Corporation, must pay 30.5 per cent of its previous year gross income to the government, up to a maximum of $125 million of gross income. On any amount exceeding $125 million in gross income, PDC would have to pay to the government 45.5 per cent of its gross income in rent.

Normally, gross income includes all income generated by the operation of air terminals but, in the case of the Pearson Airport, it excludes no less than 10 deductions considered as unusual in this kind of contract. The first one relates to taxes paid by consumers, passengers and occupants which are collected by Pearson Development Corporation on behalf of the government. Second, certain unusual items do not go into the calculation of the gross income, which is unusual. If you deduct these unusual items when calculating gross income, of course this will reduce the rent to be paid.

So unusual earnings were intentionally removed from the contract so that the Pearson lease could be reduced over the 57 years. The third incongruity in this financial deal is that other types of income provided for, while not extraordinary, are not usual and do not originate from regular terminal operations, including the sale of assets. In other words, again, gross leasing costs are reduced by exempting these unusual types of income.

There were other inconguities in the provisions on investment income. I will not go into detail on this as there are actuarial tables available, but I will say that this type of investment income provision is unusual in this kind of transaction. I could mention the discounts and refunds granted by PDC to airport tenants. I could talk about the money recovered and spent by the government to occupy parts of the airport, where inconsistencies and things that are unusual in this kind of deal were noted everywhere.

We could also talk about the amounts collected by PDC on behalf of the government or any other party, which is a rather unusual clause in this type of contract. I would also like to point out another clause whereby the federal government covered Pearson's debts although it was not involved in operations in any way. In other words, it covered bad debts although it was no longer involved in airport management. It is a disgrace, Mr. Speaker.

I could also talk about the $70 million paid to Air Canada to convince it to support privatization. Imagine, convincing Air Canada to support a privatization project as inappropriate and unusual as the Pearson airport deal.

We could also mention the severance allowance for employees of Transport Canada. The Government of Canada had offered severance allowances to 160 of its employees, although their jobs with Pearson Development Corporation were guaranteed for two years, under conditions similar to those in their current jobs. This severance allowance was supposed to cost Canadian taxpayers the trifling sum of $5.5 million.

It is also appalling to see, especially in a transaction of this nature, the total lack of any financial analysis, of any sound and independent projections of the main parties' revenues, and I am referring to the two investment corporations which later merged, and also the lack of any analysis of these investors' status. When we look at Paxport and the other party to this transaction, it is clear that all was not rosy. The financial situation of Paxport was appalling.

So we could talk about all kinds of anomalies, and we could go on for ever, because when you look at the fine print, there are always questions that arise regarding this deal.

So by going ahead with the bill before the House this morning and by refusing to conduct a public inquiry into this matter, the government has lost its credibility, a government that during the election campaign claimed that it was going to restore the confidence of citizens in government by opting for transparency and integrity. I think they are off to a very bad start.

I think it is time Liberal members opposite, who look rather depressed by the course of events, decided to wake up. It is time they did, because my colleagues and I have the impression they are being manipulated by the establishment of their party and by their minister who comes to caucus meetings with instructions to vote for this and support that and do the other. They are mainly being manipulated by the leaders of the Liberal Party establishment.

I beg them to wake up, because the public is starting to wake up. It is fed up with patronage and money going to the friends of the party, fed up with the lack of policies for public funding, fed up with the lack of transparency and integrity—in other words, fed up with people who for years criticized the previous government's lack of integrity in condemning a deal which they practically endorsed, because friends of the Liberal Party of Canada are involved, and they are directly involved.

For all these reasons, I will vote against Bill C–22, and on behalf of my colleagues, and the Leader of the Opposition made the same request this morning, I ask that a royal commission of inquiry be appointed to investigate this matter.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I hope my colleagues opposite wake up some day, because their behaviour today is irresponsible.

[English]

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the statements made by the hon. member are, to say the least, absolutely unfounded. To accuse this party, that did what it said it was going to do and cancelled the deal, and call us puppets, is absolutely ridiculous.

We are not the party that is trying to abrogate its responsibilities to the Canadian public. We are, by this legislation, doing what we promised before the election and what we promised since we have been elected: cancel the deal because we knew it was not in the public interest. Even the Bloc admits that the process is bad and that the substance of the agreement is not good.

I wish the member would be a little more generous with his terms. It was his leader who was party to that gang of hoodlums, as we knew the previous government, for a good many years. I am getting sick and tired of listening to your hypocrisy, pointing fingers here—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I would like to remind members to direct their interventions through the Chair, please.

• (1630)

Mr. Fontana: Mr. Speaker, through the Chair, he is a hypocrite and so is his leader and—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. That is not acceptable. The Chair will ask the parliamentary secretary to withdraw that unparliamentary remark.

Mr. Fontana: Mr. Speaker, it is only unparliamentary when it is not true. I will not withdraw the comment because we are taking all kinds of accusations—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I know that members feel very strongly about issues that they bring to the floor of the House. By and large each and every one of us conducts ourselves in a respectful manner to uphold the traditions of this House and I think also to fulfil the expectations of our constituents across this great land of ours. In the Chamber at times there is a great deal of passion in our discussions and deliberations, but I would ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport to reconsider and to withdraw that remark.

Mr. Fontana: Mr. Speaker, I do withdraw the remark, my apologies to the House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fontana: I would hope that the member on the other side would find it possible not to also send out derogatory remarks such as calling members on this side of the house puppets because that is impugning the character of members on this side of the House.

The Bloc has put forward an amendment and a proposal asking for a public hearing. I want to know how the member can justify the great delay that would take, the great expense that would also entail and would it not be prudent to put this behind us? The bill is pretty clear as to what we will pay and what we will not pay. We will not pay lobbyist fees, we will not pay loss of profits, loss of opportunities but we will pay out of pocket expenses. The bill is pretty explicit. In fact it says that we negotiate on those terms. If we cannot negotiate on those terms, 30 days after proclamation there in fact will be no further negotiations and the people will get nothing.

The Bloc talks to us about fiscal responsibility, talks to us about transparency, talks about getting on with building this country, building Pearson and so on. How can it put forward a proposal that will cost the Canadian taxpayers more money, not less money, and in fact delay the process even further?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before I recognize the hon. member for Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, I want to express on behalf of all chair occupants my respect and appreciation to the member for London East for his reconsideration and withdrawal.

Mr. Loubier: Mr. Speaker, I accept my colleague's apologies.

Why should we convene a royal commission of inquiry? I will give you several reasons why. First, to respond to the recommendations of Mr. Robert Nixon who brought to light a number of irregularities. At one point, he said that lobbyists had played a very crucial role in this whole affair, along with friends of the Conservatives and the Liberals.

Therefore, a royal commission would shed some light on this deal and would perhaps prompt the lobbyists running around on Parliament Hill trying to influence ministers, members, caucuses and the Prime Minister to behave as good citizens, not as schemers acting in cahoots with former senior officials with close ties to the Liberal Party.

If the collective conscious of the members opposite is clear, why are they so reluctant to convene this royal commission of inquiry, in keeping with a recommendation made not so very long ago by the Minister of Transport? Why do they refuse to set up a royal commission? Second, I find my colleague to be somewhat of a complete cynic when he states that, with this bill, the palms of those who likely benefited from other projects, albeit perhaps not on the same scale as the Pearson deal, will no longer be greased. Once a professional lobbyist, always a professional lobbyist, in so far as federal areas are concerned.

How can he say that no more palms will be greased as far as this project is concerned, when it is stated that the Minister of Transport can choose whether or not to compensate the parties involved and when the final decision as to the amount of compensation to be paid, and to whom, rests with him? Imagine, he enjoys a virtual dictatorship.

Therefore I would ask my colleagues not to be so cynical and to stop boasting.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to my colleague that I agree with him that a royal inquiry is needed.

[English]

I want to say to the member that I agree with him and his party in their request for an inquiry into this matter, especially in light of what Mr. Nixon had to say.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nunziata: I want to quote again from Mr. Nixon's report: "To leave in place an inadequate contract arrived at through such a flawed process and under the shadow of possible political manipulation is unacceptable".

He goes on to say: "The role of the lobbyist was extensive, going far beyond what I consider to be appropriate activities of consultants that are available to businesses to approach government".

One could almost conclude that the activity bordered on the criminal. Mr. Nixon conducted his report—I have considerable respect for Mr. Nixon—in private, his investigation in private. While we were in opposition and while in government we complained about the process that lead up to the signing of the contract with the Pearson Development Corporation.

Mr. Nixon conducted his hearings in private. Mr. Wright now is conducting the negotiations in private and in my respectful submission I want to say that in order for Canadians to understand exactly what happened, Mr. Nixon did not name any names and perhaps names should have been named publicly so that Canadians can come to a conclusion on whether compensation ought to be paid.

We are being told here by this bill that there should be some compensation for out of pocket expenses. In my submission there ought to be no compensation at all.

With an inquiry or if Canadians are apprised of the total facts in this particular situation they too, I believe, will agree that no compensation is necessary.

I would like to put a question to my friend from the Bloc Quebecois. Would he not agree with me in light of the information that he has available today that there ought to be no compensation at all?

If that is the case would the Bloc Quebecois support an amendment that would delete paragraph 10 from this bill which is the paragraph that allows the minister in effect to have a blank cheque in order to pay out of pocket expenses?

[Translation]

Mr. Loubier: Mr. Speaker, my party will examine the hon. member's suggestion on its merits. One thing is for sure, we welcome the hon. member's remarks and we are relieved to see that not all the members opposite are puppets or marionettes.

Mr. Maurice Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to congratulate my colleague from Saint–Hyacinthe on his brilliant speech, in which he set out troubling facts arguing for a royal commission of inquiry.

I would also like to make a comment about my colleague and friend, the hon. member for London, who spoke against a royal inquiry. He also accused our leader of using unparliamentary language and linked him to decisions made by the previous government which went along the lines of the decisions concerning Pearson Airport. I think he should reconsider and agree with us on the need for a royal commission of inquiry. Then, he would see who the real players were, on both the Conservative and Liberal sides. He would understand better why it is so important that all the information be made available to the public.

So, I would invite my colleague, as well as his colleague, to support this request for an inquiry. I think that, following tomorrow's caucus meeting, the government members will sing another tune. I am convinced that, by tomorrow afternoon, they will readily support the Bloc Quebecois amendment proposal.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Leeds—Grenville, Ethanol; the hon. member for Lévis, Youth Action Plan; the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, VIA Rail.

[English]

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to make some submissions with regard to this bill before Parliament, Bill C-22.

As a member from metropolitan Toronto I took a particular interest in this matter not only during the election campaign in the fall but indeed a number of years before when I chaired a federal Liberal Party task force studying the future of Pearson International Airport.

The committee submitted its report on June 12, 1989 and in this particular report we concluded that it would be a mistake to proceed with privatization of any of the terminals at Pearson. We as a party have maintained that position throughout the last number of years.

Much to our chagrin the previous Tory administration decided in its wisdom, if you will, that it would privatize terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson, having already allowed private interest to build and operate terminal 3.

It became abundantly clear over the last year and the months preceding the general election campaign that what was happening with regard to the privatization of the airport terminals was that Tory ministers and, I would submit, the Prime Minister, Mr. Mulroney, and Prime Minister Campbell knew exactly what was going on with regard to the privatization and in fact gave their blessing to a process that Mr. Nixon would subsequently call flawed and have a lot of very strong comments on.

The negotiations took place behind closed doors. The deal was consummated in the shadows. Lobbyists were involved. Lobbyist earned hundreds of thousands if not millions of dollars as a result of what was occurring.

I keep repeating Mr. Nixon's quotation: "My review has left me but one conclusion, to leave in place an inadequate contract, arrived at through such a flawed process and under the shadow of possible political manipulation, is unacceptable". He went on to say: "The role of the lobbyist was extensive, going far beyond what I consider to be appropriate activities of consultants that are available to businesses to approach government". He also pointed out in his report that senior transport officials were replaced when they objected to the contract.

Imagine, the previous government when faced with bureaucrats who had as their preoccupation the public interest objected to this particular contract. They in effect were constructively dismissed from their positions and put elsewhere. They were replaced with people who would agree with a contract that in effect rewarded Tory loyalists and supporters.

During the election campaign the government, indeed the consortium, recognizing that the Conservative government was on its last legs, tried to and in fact did sign the contract on October 7, 1993, two and a half weeks before the general election.

It thought that having signed the deal the new Liberal administration would not cancel the contract. It had another think coming because during the election campaign the Prime Minister, as the leader of the Liberal Party, made it clear in advance of the signing of the contract that if elected he would cancel the contract.

He said on October 6: "I challenge the Prime Minister to stop the deal right now". He went on to say: "You do not make a deal like that three weeks before an election when hundreds of millions of dollars are at stake. We will not accept it. I am dead serious. To anybody involved in that, I say: 'Don't get too excited tomorrow. We will review the deal when we form a government. If it is not a good deal, we will not proceed'".

He also said: "It is the Mulroney mentality at its worst. They are really trying to put one over on us at the last minute and I say it is totally unacceptable". This is the Prime Minister speaking in the election campaign: "I am warning everyone involved that if we become the government we will review this transaction. If necessary, legislation will be passed to overturn the deal".

What could be more clear from the Leader of the Opposition in advance of the signing of the deal? What could be more clear that his government would cancel the deal? To have Mr. Charles Bronfman and the consortium come to the taxpayers of Canada, cap in hand, after doing what they did to get this deal signed and after signing the deal when warned by the man who was destined to become the next Prime Minister, for them to come seeking $200 million from the taxpayers of Canada, that takes a lot of balls. It takes a lot of audacity to do that.

I say shame on Mr. Bronfman and shame on his corporation for having the audacity to do that after what Mr. Nixon had to say and what the Prime Minister had to say when he was the Leader of the Opposition.

This bill allows for limited compensation. I have to take exception to any compensation being paid at all. No one has established why any compensation should be paid. All kinds of reasons can be given. We have heard from various members as to why there ought not to be any compensation at all. I have not heard anybody say that because they were acting in good faith or because they expended money unbeknownst, they were innocent, they deserve some compensation. I have not heard that reason.

There is not a reason. That is why members have not heard any justification or rationalization or rationale for paying the Pearson Development Corporation any money at all. For that reason I believe that paragraph (10) which allows the minister to pay compensation should be deleted from this bill.

I would urge members of the committee who study this bill to delete paragraph (10) because that is the paragraph that empowers the minister, in effect gives the minister a blank cheque, subject to no compensation for lobbyist fees or lost profits but short of that, to compensate not only the Pearson Development Corporation but everyone involved with them for out of pocket expenses.

I would submit that it would be unconscionable if they were paid any money whatsoever not only because of what was said during the election campaign, and what happened behind the scenes, but also because of the very clear statement and the request for proposals that was put out in March 1992. At paragraph (8.6.3), it says this. Again Mr. Bronfman and all those who were participating in this contract were well aware of what was in the request for proposals.

It said: "All costs and expenses incurred by proponents relating to proposals will be borne by the proponents. The government is not liable to pay for such costs and expenses or to reimburse or to compensate proponents in any manner whatsoever for such costs and expenses under any circumstances, including the rejection of any or all proposals and the cancellation of the project".

What could be more clear than the statement in the request for proposals that said to all those who wanted to contract with the Government of Canada, that wanted to enter into this contract, that you are doing so at your own risk, that not only might your proposal be rejected, but even if it does happen to be the best proposal the government reserves the right not to proceed with the project.

Why then would there be any compensation at all? The request for proposals goes on to state at paragraph 8.7.1: "The government has the right, number one, to reject any or all of the proposals; number two, to accept any proposal, and three, to elect not to proceed with the project, all as it so determines in its sole and absolute discretion".

What could be more clear? If that is the case and they were all aware of what they were doing, why would the poor taxpayers be requested to pay anything at all to the Pearson Development Corporation, which is majority owned by billionaire Charles Bronfman from Montreal?

That is the question the committee and Parliament has to grapple with. I would submit that the overwhelming majority of members of Parliament would agree that in the circumstances there should be no compensation.

There is a Latin phrase which says: "Ex turpi causa non oritur actio". It is something they taught us in law school way back in first year. When you go to court you have to go with clean hands. You cannot be the author of your own misfortune or you cannot be party to a fraudulent transaction, or you cannot be culpable in any way, shape or form and then expect to go to the court to seek out justice, equity or compensation.

It could hardly be said that Mr. Bronfman and the Pearson Development Corporation and its predecessors, Paxport and all those involved in putting together this unhappy and unfortunate transaction were not aware of what they were doing and what was going on behind closed doors.

The Canadian people were hoodwinked by the previous Tory administration. We were told for example that there would be competition at the airport and yet the contract was awarded to a friend of the Prime Minister, Mr. Mulroney. Then, for financial reasons, he goes to Mr. Bronfman and says: "I can't carry this out". Mr. Bronfman, who owns terminal 3, all of a sudden becomes the monopoly owner of all the terminals at Pearson International Airport.

Where was the public interest? Was there anybody considering the public interest throughout this whole sorry matter? I would submit not. There were a lot of people who were more concerned and people who are presently before this Parliament seeking compensation, were more concerned about somehow gathering and squeezing out of the taxpayers as much money as possible. They were prepared to border on activity that could be conceived as criminal or fraudulent in order to strike a deal which, as I have said, is totally unconscionable.

All the responsibility lies with the previous administration. The present Prime Minister made it clear during the election campaign that he would cancel the deal and that is what he did. No one could ever call into question the integrity of the Prime Minister as far as the cancellation of the Pearson contract deal is concerned. He conducted a review. The review took place and the deal was cancelled. In effect, the deal was cancelled on December 3, 1993. The bill before Parliament today gives legal effect to the decision of the Prime Minister on December 3. It goes further. While I agree in principle that the deal ought to be cancelled, I disagree fundamentally with compensation being paid pursuant to paragraph 10. More important, I disagree with the proposition that Parliament be called on to discuss, in effect, a proposal that we do not know about.

The consortium led by Mr. Bronfman has put forward a claim. I would submit that the people of Canada are entitled to know exactly what that claim is. Where is the claim? What exactly does he want to get paid for? We know he is not going to get paid for lost profits, but he is still seeking, reports indicate, some $30 to $35 million in compensation for out of pocket expenses.

Before Parliament can effectively deal with this matter, the committee should request and Parliament must have a detailed listing of exactly what the compensation is for if Parliament is to give the consortium anything at all. In my submission it ought not to be given anything.

I hope the minister is not prepared to sign a cheque to the consortium and keep the taxpayers in the dark as to what the cheque is for. I have considerable confidence in the integrity of the Minister of Transport and I know he will not allow that to happen, and that the claim will come before Parliament. At committee I hope a request will be made that whatever claim is being made the details will be put forward.

Those are my submissions on the issue of compensation. I agree that the deal has to be cancelled by law. It is obvious that the consortium, the Pearson Development Corporation, will not simply walk away. It should, in effect, be told to take a hike but it appears it is not. It is pushing the issue.

The other issue that has to be dealt with is the future of Pearson International Airport. In the few minutes remaining I want to make a few comments about that.

Having decided to cancel the transaction, the government now is faced with making a decision as to what ought to happen at Pearson International Airport. The debate will decide ultimately whether a private group, a local airport authority, should control Pearson or whether Transport Canada should continue to have direct control over a federal government asset that generates close to 100,000 direct and indirect jobs and is responsible for billions of dollars in economic activity.

A more thorough debate will have to take place but in my respectful submission, given the importance of Pearson airport to the national economy, to the national transportation system, the Government of Canada should continue to have direct control over Pearson through the Department of Transport. We ought not to transfer responsibility to a local airport authority. A local airport authority would be concerned primarily with the local area of metropolitan Toronto, in this case, as opposed to the impact that Pearson will have on the nation as a whole.

I hope the minister at some point will allow Parliament to deal with the greater question of the future of Pearson International Airport and who should control it. I think most members will agree that it ought not to be privatized, that that is a mistake. Our main international airport should not be handed over to the private sector for private profit and gain.

We all want to see Pearson refurbished but some say that the government simply does not have the money to refurbish Pearson. That is not quite true. Looking at the profit and loss statements of Pearson International Airport over the last 10 or 20 years and in particular over the last few years when we were in the midst of a recession, the airport in effect has been making significant profits. Those profits could be used to refurbish.

Some 20 million passengers travel through Pearson annually. If push came to shove, given the numbers of passengers, if a $5 fee were levied to refurbish Pearson which is not unreasonable then the necessary funding could be received without having to privatize the airport.

Given the importance of Pearson, the task force I was part of recommended that a royal commission of inquiry look into the future of Pearson International Airport, its purpose and use, the problems with air traffic control, the need for additional runways and their environmental impact. I do not believe we can look at any one aspect of Pearson in isolation from the overall picture.

I urge the minister to engage this Parliament in a debate as to the future of Pearson and what the best mechanism will be to determine what route should be taken.

In closing let me reiterate this bill must be amended to make it absolutely clear that no compensation should be paid whatsoever to the Pearson Development Corporation. In any event, before this Parliament can effectively deal with this bill the claim that is being put forward by Mr. Bronfman should be made public so the taxpayers of Canada know exactly what the nature of the claim is.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the hon. member for his clear presentation. I think that he knows the issue quite well—that is pretty obvious.

I would like him to tell us what effect it will have on the people of Quebec and Canada not to hold a public inquiry in a situation like that, if, as it seems very clear, there were many underhanded dealings in this case, many people who took advantage of the over-representation by lobbyists and the questionable lobbying practices.

So I would like to know from him what he thinks the impact on the public and on the future of the present Liberal government would be if we were led to believe that it is a free-for-all and that we will continue to operate with the same kind of system, and at the same time, what message does it send to those who are not part of this wonderful system where special contacts and having friends in the right places are what counts.

For ordinary people who are caught in the current economic bind, with all the attendant difficulties, and who are being hit with an increase in the number of weeks needed to qualify for unemployment insurance, for example, what message does it send when a whole government tolerates such situations and would let them be by not holding a public inquiry that could clarify matters?

[English]

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that the Prime Minister promised integrity in government. Last year on December 3 he sent out a very clear message to all those who would like to do business with the Government of Canada. That message was if you wanted to do business with the Government of Canada the public interest must be paramount, public concern must be discharged and he would not hesitate to denounce and cancel any transaction that was consummated in a fashion contrary to that public interest.

To his credit the Prime Minister has always maintained there ought to be fairness and equity in deliberations with the Government of Canada. I think that message has been well received by the people of Canada.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, it seems clear that clause 10, including all of its subclauses, is a means by which compensation is going to be paid. That seems to be clear. Therefore one can conclude this clause is a direct result of representation being made to the government by someone.

• (1705)

Consequently what appears to be happening is that compensation is going to be paid. Someone has made application to the government for compensation and probably the sums have been clearly articulated. Through clause 10 this document is going to allow for that payment to be made.

The hon. member has laid this out so well and he seems to be clearly in opposition to what his own government is doing. Would the hon. member respond to what appears to be surfacing, that the application for compensation has been made, the legislation is in place under clause 10 to provide for that compensation and there is nothing we can do about it.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I disagree. I think there is a lot we can do.

This bill is before Parliament. We are all parliamentarians. We have a responsibility to make sure this bill discharges the public interest. I expect all hon. members who feel as I do to speak out for the repeal of clause 10 in this bill.

If you read clause 9 of the bill it says that no one is entitled to any compensation from Her Majesty in connection with the coming into force of this act. This makes it clear that the deal is cancelled, but I have very serious reservations about clause 10.

The hon. member is correct. It is the vehicle by which a cheque could be written to Pearson Development Corporation and that is wrong. In my view it ought not to be paid anything.

I am not part of the transport committee, but I expect and hope that members of the transport committee will move an amendment rather than being sidetracked on issues such as a royal commission. That is a separate issue. With regard to the bill before Parliament, I hope that hon. members will move an amendment to delete clause 10. The deletion of clause 10 in effect will not allow for any compensation at all.

[Translation]

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the hon. member for York South—Weston for his frankness and courage. Unfortunately, we have not observed the same qualities in all members of the party opposite.

I would like to ask the hon. member if he thinks, based on his experience, which I have tremendous respect for, because he has been in this House for a long time now and his reputation and honesty are well established, and based on the legislative program presented to us or which we can expect, if we will have a chance, as the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon said earlier, to review this whole Pearson Airport saga, especially when the famous legislation on conflicts of interest or lobbies on Parliament Hill is presented. In any case, it is rather hard to get an idea of what kind of legislation is coming, but I think that he knows to what legislation I am referring. Does he think that we will then be able to deal with all that, as the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon said?

[English]

Mr. Nunziata: As I indicated earlier, Mr. Speaker, it is important that all the details of the Pearson deal be made public. I am not sure what vehicle should be used, but all the documents should be made public.

Mr. Nixon made some very strong comments but he did not go into the details. The details are necessary so we know for example exactly which lobbying firms in Ottawa were part of the deal and which individuals who are presently dealing with the Government of Canada partook in an activity Mr. Nixon found to be totally unacceptable. Public interest requires all those details to be made public. For that reason I support an inquiry.

• (1710)

The transport committee could conduct an inquiry. A three–month royal commission with a limited mandate and a limited budget could serve the same purpose. Or, Mr. Nixon who has already been involved in this matter could conduct the inquiry in an open fashion so that all the evidence could be heard and Canadians would know the exact details.

I do not think the decision or the desire to pay them compensation can be adequately discussed or debated unless we rely on the details presently available. As I said earlier based on the information I have and the statements made by Mr. Nixon, my conclusion is that there should be no compensation at all.

For future reference, given that we will be discussing an ethics package before Parliament, this deal could serve as a very strong example of how governments and lobbyists can harm the public interest in its deliberations and the type of activity that ought to be avoided.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this issue. I certainly appreciate the member's comments in opening up the matter quite clearly for all of us. I also hope this will peak the interest and raise the ire of Canadians across the country.

The privatization of Pearson airport and this government's hasty reversal of the privatization decision smacks of a political soap opera with very real consequences for the people involved, for Torontonians and for all Canadians. At this rate the soap opera will not have a happy ending.

The privatization of Pearson was a complex animal right from its conception. One of the reasons is that it was all done behind closed doors. It was a decision which grew more complex with, the passing of time and the ever increasing involvement of political players.

Now Bill C–22 comes along. It is not really a complex piece of legislation on the face of it. However the simplicity of its prose I am afraid masks what many believe is a complexity of intent on the part of the government.

Needless to say the Reform Party supports the cancellation of the privatization deal for Pearson, despite the fact that privatization of most if not all government industries would represent a great leap down the road to a new Canada. It is truly a shame the previous government and previous governing party was so mired in scandal and pork that it could put such a bad light in the minds of Canadians on this whole concept of privatization.

Of course Bill C–22 is no solution or remedy to the mess created by the former government. It just creates a new mess of its own. That is why it is imperative we scrap Bill C–22 by passing the motion of my colleagues in Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition and start from scratch to untangle this web of political intrigue, patronage and bad politics.

As we untangle this web we may find a new list of names along the way which played a prominent part in this whole episode. That I fear is the motivation in proposing carte blanche out of pocket compensation in Bill C–22, a bill that will not fix the Pearson problem but only make it go ever so quietly away.

I refer to the Pearson saga as a soap opera, but this soap opera has real players who have been genuinely hurt by this mess. As usual, the people who have the least to do with creating the problem are most likely to be hurt by it and least likely to be helped by the solution proposed by this government.

I refer to the residents of Toronto. They so very badly require Pearson to become a world class air terminal to serve a world class city. I refer to the men and women who would have done the work to modify Pearson. Those people were counting on jobs. I refer to all Canadians who whether they know it or not depend on Pearson, the most important hub airport in Canada, to keep business flying, to take Canadians efficiently to overseas trade destinations and to bring foreign traders in.

It is always the case that there is a ripple effect whenever a government makes a decision of any kind. This is precisely why government must learn to restrict itself, for it is inevitable that government when it acts will often disrupt the lives of people who have no stake in whatever particular project is undertaken.

Again, privatization is to be encouraged but when that privatization breaks down due to mismanagement and corruption, as it did in this case, then the reversal of that privatization must be undertaken with the greatest of care, even if it takes a bit of time.

That is not what happened here. This government wants to ram Bill C–22 down the collective throats of this House. It wants to ram Bill C–22 down the throats of Canadians. Whenever traditional government takes the decision to study something and issue a report, it is customary to expect that with the amount of time involved before bureaucrats get around to actually concluding something, so much dust will have settled and the pages turned so yellow with age that the problem will have evolved into something entirely different.

That was certainly the case for the last government and was also most certainly the case when this party was last in power. It is not in this case. I have become so sceptical about the workings of traditional politics that I cannot help but be suspicious that the sheer speed with which this government published its Nixon study and decided to allow for compensation reveals that this government has something to fear when it comes to leaving this issue on the table for too long.

The Pearson deal as it was struck needs to be revoked. Let us do that. Then, rather than granting the minister the power to dole out vast sums of money, somewhere in the neighbourhood of $30 million to $40 million for out of pocket expenses, a politically suspicious phrase if I have ever heard one, let us dig deeper into the issue to discover a couple of things. Number one, let us find out the degree to which the previous government bungled this deal.

A public inquiry, that is one dead horse that deserves to be beaten a bit more for fear that it may rise from the dead and trample once again on the political process in Canada. Let us take time to find out just how wide the web of political blunder has been woven. In particular, let us find out precisely the role of the lobbyists in this deal. Let us discover how many people have been needlessly and through no fault of their own adversely affected by the Pearson debacle in order that this government can provide restitution where restitution is due.

It is interesting to note the players who have come into being and whose party or whose companies and names have been published in other manuscripts. They should be examined closely. Let us use this as a case study in politics gone wrong so that it hopefully will never happen again.

We need to see just how much of a liability Pearson has been for the government. We know that a major liability has been incurred already and will grow if Bill C–22 is passed, especially with section 10.

Last, let us re–examine the privatization of Pearson to see just how to make it work. This time around I hope the government in power will exercise the political will and common sense wisdom necessary to bear in mind that political decisions like this affect more than just the political players involved. They affect everyone, the people who work at Pearson, the people who would rebuilt Pearson, and all Canadians who depend on Pearson in so many ways.

There is a valuable lesson to be learned from Pearson. By proposing Bill C–22 this government has proven to the Canadian people that they have learned nothing, especially with the compensation package. I hope that it will redeem itself by supporting the amendment to kill this bill, to stop the blind power of the minister to make huge repayments without accountability and by starting over.

If not, this government will have proved that narrow political interests are still at work controlling Ottawa and that the interests of hard working people have yet to be adequately represented by traditional political parties.

[Translation]

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the member who just spoke because his comments are very much to the point.

Since the hon. member is also in favour of setting up a royal inquiry commission, I want to ask him if he agrees with the Liberal member who said earlier that the costs related to such a commission would be somewhere around $27 million.

[English]

Mr. Hanger: Mr. Speaker, it is a good question as to the evaluation of costs. What do out of pocket costs or expenses mean if one is talking about repayment? I do not think I can evaluate that compensation package at this point. It would have to be exposed to the public and a clear examination done.

The hon. member mentioned something about a royal commission. I question whether a royal commission is necessarily the way to go. I certainly agree to an inquiry to have the package exposed to public scrutiny but not necessarily to a royal commission.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup): Mr. Speaker, I want to go back to the comments made by the previous speaker, who said that we must distinguish between privatization under circumstances which justify such a measure, and privatization under rather dubious circumstances such as in the case of the Pearson Airport.

I want to ask the hon. member if, in some future legislation on lobbies, it would be appropriate to include specific provisions on the concerns related to lobbies under particular circumstances where privatization is anticipated. Should we have specific rules concerning lobbies which could apply to this case, but which could also apply to any case, so as to be sure that those who have a vested interest are kept at arm's length?

[English]

Mr. Hanger: Mr. Speaker, lobbying has been around for as long as politics has been around. To really stamp it out through legislation may be a very difficult thing.

One matter that must be brought forward on any deal, compensation package or transaction the government involves itself in with private industry is if it is all laid out on the table for it to be examined by the public and everyone knows exactly where they stand in any operational deal, one is going to avoid a lot of questionable activities. If it is protected and hidden behind closed doors, the lobbyists will be the most effective. Exposing it to light, of course, they are the least effective.

From that point of view I would like to see things certainly brought to the forefront when it comes to any kind of privatization deal in the future.

[Translation]

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, there is an aspect of the issue which concerns me somewhat. Several members expressed concern regarding the cost of such an inquiry, and whether a royal commission is the way to go. Perhaps we could have another type of inquiry. The important thing is to have an instrument, a commission which will have the power to find out the truth. When it comes to deciding between a material interest related to the quick construction of an airport terminal and the common interest, we should not even hesitate if we want the public to trust institutions such as ours: we must favour the common interest and ensure that the public is protected.

• (1725)

If we have to wait a further six months before a third terminal can be built at Pearson, then so be it. During this time, the taxpaying citizens will know that their tax dollars are being used wisely. Moreover, if the government party's conscience is clear with regard to the former government's transactions and if the current government believes that it is not acting in a similar fashion, then it should have nothing to fear from a commission of inquiry. It would have no reason to fear that a commission would uncover some deals in which it may have been involved itself.

A transparent government like the one the Liberal Party likes to boast about should not have any concerns about inquiries conducted by a royal commission. It should not be afraid of answering questions put to it. Yet, the government continues to object to this request. Taxpayers may very well begin to question this government's sincerity. They may start asking themselves why the Liberals are trying so hard to avoid appearing before a commissioner of inquiry. When someone's hands are clean, there is no need to fear the truth, or investigators. There is no reason to fear disclosing someone else's past activities because they may be associated with ours.

I think that the comments made were sincere, but this should not be the end of it. We must ensure that the truth comes to light, that the public is informed of it, and above all, that with respect to other projects—it could be Hibernia or maybe the helicopter contract, another cancelled deal—the same questions will not come up again. When questions do arise and when the public interest is at issue, there should be no reason to fear asking the questions openly.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I do not know if the member for Calgary Northeast wishes to comment to the last intervention.

Mr. Hanger: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there was a question there. There was certainly a considerable amount of information passed through his five minute presentation.

Again, going back to the royal commission and looking at taxpayers' dollars, what is to be gained by striking a royal commission? In looking at previous royal commissions they have been very expensive in nature. Can this matter be handled in a much more efficient way than a royal commission and the expenditure of millions more?

I know that Mr. Nixon did a study on the matter and there were certain recommendations and I believe that we should be looking closely at those recommendations. If they indicate that there should no compensation then there should be no compensation. I am certainly much in favour of that.

Apart from that, I really do not have anything more to say in reference to the member's comments.

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I consider it a privilege to speak in this debate on Bill C–22. In the last election campaign, the leader of the Liberal Party of Canada travelled from coast to coast to promise a transparent government, among other things, to the Canadian people. Where is this government after six months in office?

I will quickly go over a few facts that, in my opinion, are revealing in this regard. As promised, the government cancelled the helicopter contract but we and the Canadian people still do not know how much this decision really cost.

Last December, when hardly anyone was paying any attention to what was happening in Ottawa, and while we were busy setting up our offices in Ottawa and in our respective ridings, the government announced an increase in unemployment insurance premiums. In its February 22 budget, the government tried to portray itself to Canadians as a generous and understanding government and a very good manager by announcing a premium reduction that will, however, only come into effect in 1995. This government does not want to let Canadians know that it has brought premiums back to where they were before it increased them.

In the Ginn Publishing affair, the government did not fool anyone who followed the case, and Canadians did not fall for the very strange and contradictory explanations given by the various ministers questioned on this subject.

The Official Opposition tried by every means available to shed light on the sale of a Canadian publishing house to an American giant. It was all in vain. All Liberal members and ministers continued to act in collusion, preferring silence to clear and unequivocal answers. They prefer to swim in neutral waters where only spoken words leave traces and where the Liberals feel tied by a verbal agreement apparently made by a minister from the previous government. According to a legal opinion given by the Department of Justice at the request of its client, the Department of Finance, this information is subject to solicitor–client privilege pursuant to section 23 of the Access to Information Act.

Given the lack of transparency of this government, it was impossible for the population to know for sure who was protected in this deal and who really benefited from it. This was followed by another troubling situation: serious allegations to the effect that the Museum of Nature was mismanaged. There was a general outcry from Canadian and international scientists, who asked the government to intervene before it was too late.

The Official Opposition pointed out, once again, before the Committee on Canadian Heritage that the population had the right to know whether or not the allegations were founded since the $18 or $20 million budget of this museum comes from taxpayers. Both Opposition parties demanded the right to let the committee hear witnesses so we could listen to both versions of the story. No such luck! The Liberals who are so proud of their transparency refused, once again, to let us shed light on this issue.

I will not pretend that I undertook an exhaustive review of this government's first six months in office. My purpose is rather to draw the public's attention to one constant in the few examples I have just given. The constant is this: every time the government could follow up on its promise of integrity and openness, it chooses subterfuges, even though, in the red book and in his speeches throughout the campaign, the Prime Minister said in various ways that openness was necessary if people were to regain confidence in government and in politicians.

Now let us take a closer look at Bill C–22, an act respecting certain agreements concerning the redevelopment and operation of terminals 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson International Airport. I will go right to the point and highlight briefly, in my own way, some of the events which began in April 1987.

First, the Conservative government agreed to entrust the building and operation of terminal 3 at Pearson Airport to a real estate company owned by Charles Bronfman. This first group of friends included Herb Metcalfe, a lobbyist for Claridge Properties Inc. and former organizer for Jean Chrétien; Leo Kolber, a Liberal senator who, as has been mentioned on many occasions, held a party at $1,000 per guest during the election campaign; Peter Coughlin, president of Claridge Properties Inc. and general manager of Pearson Development Corporation; Ray Hession, who was deputy minister of everything important in previous Liberal governments and has ties to Paxport Inc., as the Ottawa Citizen pointed out.

Later, Brian Mulroney's government went back on one of its decisions and in December 1992 decided to turn the redevelopment and operation of terminals 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson International Airport over to private enterprise. The deadlines were very short and only two firms could answer the government's call for tenders and bid: Claridge, for Charles Bronfman, and Paxport, for the Matthews group. Paxport Inc. was selected.

This time we find the Conservative government's real friends, including Don Matthews, president of Paxport Inc., who was president of Brian Mulroney's leadership campaign in 1983; he is a former president of the Conservative Party and chaired many fund–raising campaigns. His son–in–law, David Peterson, was Premier of Ontario. Mr. Chrétien asked Bob Nixon, a former Peterson Cabinet minister, to investigate, behind closed doors, the transaction that he promised to cancel on the very last day of his campaign.

Otto Jelinek, a former minister in the Conservative government, is a member of the board of directors of Paxport and president of an Asian subsidiary of the Matthews Group. Fred Doucet, a professional lobbyist and long–standing friend of Brian Mulroney, will be hired by Paxport; his name will also come up in the Ginn Publishing affair. As you can see, Mr. Speaker, it all holds together.

Bill Neville, another Paxport lobbyist, and a former chief of staff—a very interesting character, as you will see—of Joe Clark when he was Prime Minister, member of Brian Mulroney's inner circle and head of Ms. Campbell's transition team. He will have served all three of them; in his case, it was wall to wall.

Paxport Inc. was to demonstrate the financial viability of its proposal by February 15, 1993, but the government did not hold firm on this condition. Since its financial backing was not solid enough for this transaction to go through, Paxport will have to turn to their pal Charles Bronfman and ask him: "Come to our rescue, competitor dear. Let us merge and acquire a controlling interest in this highly profitable airport. This will allow us to add millions to our respective family trusts". As a result, T1 T2 Limited Partnership was established; it was the only way to go on with negotiations with the government. Furthermore, Claridge, the rival company, became a majority holder, with 66 per cent of the shares, while the company initially selected to implement this project found itself holding a mere 17 per cent of the shares of the new company, based on what it could afford.

To make this enterprise very profitable for its friends, the government undertook to divert passenger traffic to that airport and curb, if not stop, any airport development activity within 75 kilometres of the Lester B. Pearson Airport.

Since the government apparently had unlimited funds available given the possibility of making deficits, it dug out several other millions to complete this privatization which would allow the government's friends to get rich on the backs of the taxpayers. To sell privatization to key groups, the following compensations were offered: severance pay for Transport Canada employees, for a grand total of $5.5 million and this, in spite of the fact that all jobs had been protected for at least two years with Pearson Development Corporation.

Add to that a 15 per cent contribution toward the rent paid by Air Canada and foreign airlines using the facilities at Terminal 2.

Moreover, while the government had expressly committed itself to not finance the construction, repair or renovation of terminals 1 and 2, it secretly decided otherwise by agreeing to a 40 per cent carry over on rent, through a good clause in a contract which is about that thick. I saw it this morning and I was rather surprised. The money will be paid back later, with interest based on the Bank of Canada rate, plus 2.5 per cent.

The Lester B. Pearson Airport generates profits, and this could make it attractive for third parties. Yet, in a contract that thick, the Canadian government did not even include a clause to enable it to oppose such a transfer, so that the airport operations could fall in the hands of foreign interests and the government would not even be able to do anything about it.

There seems to be sufficient reasons to justify a public inquiry. Indeed, in the report which recommended cancelling the privatization of Pearson Airport, Mr. Nixon mentions that the role of lobbyists in this case went largely beyond what is normally acceptable, especially as regards the reassignment of several senior civil servants. The report also points out that to conclude a transaction of this scope during an election campaign flies in the face of democratic practice.

The first eight sections of the legislation cancel the transaction and prohibit any suit against the Government of Canada and its officials. Fine. The Liberal government had made a promise and, for the second time, it gets out of a written commitment involving several million dollars. First, it got out of the helicopter contract and now, through a piece of legislation, it is getting out of a hastily drafted contract regarding the Lester B. Pearson Airport.

How can this same government claim, as it has been doing for months now, that it was not able to get out of an oral commitment made by a minister of the previous government, while it gets out of the written agreement? This government is not fooling anybody, and the inquiry could reveal other things.

What is really behind the cancellation of this whole deal? Is it that too many Conservatives and not enough Liberals were benefitting from the transaction? Or, was there some fear that the scheme would eventually be discovered?

There is reason to be worried, and Canadians will come to know the contents of this bill. Just when they are being asked to tighten their belts and prepare for a review of their social security net, the government wants to enact legislation favouring those who let certain political parties come to power.

Pursuant to clause 9, there will be no compensation in connection with the coming into force of the Act. But, according to clause 10, compensation may be awarded if the Minister deems it appropriate. This is doctoring, Mr. Speaker! I was very happy to hear other members say that to leave all that power in the hands of the minister was dangerous, as some bleeding is occurring and God knows when it will stop.

Here is my conclusion: This government is hog–tied thanks to friends of the system who, year after year, continue to fill the campaign coffers of both the Liberal and the Conservative parties.

• (1745)

And I will remind hon. members that the Leader of the Opposition very clearly demonstrated this morning that the five largest Canadian banks split their donations fifty–fifty between both traditional parties, handing out almost half a million dollars, that is $250,000 to the Liberal Party and $250,000 to the Conservative Party.

These old political parties take into account the best interests of those who make it possible for them to take turns running the country, while ignoring the best interests of the public.

The time has more than come to put public finances on a healthy footing by introducing a bill concerning the financing of political parties, something similar to the legislation passed by the Quebec government.

In this case, we do not have any other choice but to set up a royal commission to clarify this very dismal and shameful instance of patronage.

This commission could, if necessary, recommend the amounts of money to be paid following the cancellation of the current contract. However, it is understood that this money could not be used to cover any potential profit T1 T2 Limited Partnership could have made from Terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson Airport or to cover the fee paid for the purpose of lobbying a public office holder.

To put it plainly, that covers any fee paid to the lobbyists who made the government do their bidding by reminding them who in fact is responsible for their election.

Canadians are sick of this government's lack of openness. They are sick of these secret promises that cost a bundle to Canadian taxpayers.

Canadians have had enough of this government protecting its friends and paying back those who financially supported its election campaign. They have had enough of the promises made in the red book—which, when I was young, referred to the used cars listing—and which makes the government look good and projects an inaccurate picture of its true identity.

In short, Canadians are sick of promises that keep the wheel turning, that allow the rich to get richer, the poor to get poorer, and the traditional political parties to take turns at running the country and taking a slice of the pie.

Canadians have reached the threshold of tolerance and have lost confidence in a government which, in a very short period of time, has missed all the opportunities it was given to restore confidence and refused to show any openness.

On their behalf, I too call for a royal commission to get to the bottom of this shocking deal.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member sitting next to me for her clear demonstration. It was very instructive and we can see that her experience as a teacher is now useful when time comes to give very clear examples.

I really liked the comparison she made with Ginn Publishing. Whereas the Pearson Airport situation is the doing of the previous administration, the Ginn Publishing matter is the responsibility of this government but, in both cases, we see the same pattern of unclear behaviour which maintains the behind-the-scene influence of the lobbyists. I would like my colleague for Rimouski—Témiscouata to give us more details about the changes to the financing of political parties that would be needed to correct this situation.

In a sense, this reminds us a little of what may have happened in Quebec before 1976, particularly during the first two terms under Robert Bourassa, that is from 1970 to 1976, when questionable practices were common.

We had people somehow similar to those mentioned in the speech. In Quebec, Desrochers, for example, was maybe the type of person to do that kind of work.

• (1750)

Quebec managed to break free from such practices thanks in particular to the way Mr. René Lévesque revised the financing of political parties. I would like my colleague to clarify for us the ways to eliminate the questionable relationship between governments and lobbyists.

Mrs. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question and for giving me an opportunity to talk a little bit about political party financing.

It is, obviously, extremely important that the federal government address this question and make a fundamental change to prohibit all companies from making donations to political parties. The money to fund political parties must come from individuals and there must be a limit on contributions.

We have seen what has happened in the past. If we look at Mr. Desmarais' contribution in the Charlottetown referendum campaign, each of the eight members of his family, including a three-year-old girl, gave $3,000. His contribution could not exceed $24,000. That is a far cry from the $250,000 campaign contribution he could have made.

It is the same thing with Bombardier. These companies have to paint themselves red or blue. It would take too long to give a detailed answer to my colleague's question, but if we took away the right of companies to donate money to political parties, we would not have such a mess on our hands. If the legislation on lobbyists was reformed, we would know exactly how things work and we could get to the bottom of the matter.

The same applies to people who appear as witnesses before committees. We should adopt the American system where sworn testimony is the rule, otherwise the work of committees is pointless.

[English]

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear that when a government stops a deal like this the question is how can it do so without alienating very powerful people within Canada who are involved in the deal. It is obvious how the government has arranged to do that and that is through section 10. Section 10 is clear evidence that an agreement has been made. Not only that, in order to satisfy everyone that agreement has to be consummated in very short order.

Subsection (3) of section 10 states:

> No agreement may be entered into under this section after one month after the coming into force of this Act.

All the payouts are going to occur one month after this act is passed.

The agreement that has been made, and it is obvious to me and everyone who has looked at this situation, is that the compensation package has been put forward by those people to the government. It has been agreed upon and we are simply going through the motions. Because we are in a majority government situation, this is going to be passed. This is a fait accompli.

I would like to ask a question of the hon. member who spoke so eloquently about this situation. The Bloc is recommending a royal commission of inquiry. Does the member not feel it is time that the standing committees of the House were empowered to deal with these kinds of issues? Should they not have the power of subpoena and the power to bring witnesses before the standing committees to examine them? Should not the elected representatives be playing the role that the royal commissions of inquiry have in the past at enormous costs? Ought we not to be doing that job? I am asking the hon. member if she would agree with that. If she does, would she make that recommendation to her caucus?

[Translation]

Mrs. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his very pertinent question and his very judicious comment. It is quite clear that one does not need a crystal ball or clairvoyant powers to see what is in clause 10 of the bill.

Thanks to clause 10, people will recover what they lost when their contract was cancelled. I agree totally with my colleague on that point.

Unfortunately, I do not believe in the work of committees. Based on my personal experience, I find these committees a sham. Unless we can have people subpoenaed and testify under oath, these committees are merely entertainment for most Liberal backbenchers, but are becoming quite a waste of time for us on this side.

Mr. Maurice Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, let me first of all congratulate my colleague for her speech. What I retain from her remarks is the kind of relationship, the kind of scheming brought to light on this issue, between various successive governments.

Basically, my colleague for Rimouski has very eloquently demonstrated the relationships that the Liberal–Conservative contributors and the Conservative–Liberal contributors have had sometimes with the Conservative government and sometimes with the Liberal government. As we can see, it all boils down to the same thing. That is something to really think about. Our colleague for Crowfoot suggested that clause 10 in this bill hints that there is a deal somewhere, but that it obviously cannot be outlined in the legislation. What is stated in the bill is that the Minister may approve any agreement submitted to him within 35 days after the passing of this legislation.

I would like to hear my colleague further on that kind of deal and also on that kind of Liberal–Conservative or Conservative–Liberal buddy–buddy system, because of which we always find ourselves in that kind of situation. The people invited to a $1,000 or $3,000–a–plate dinner are not the kind of people the Prime Minister referred to as beer drinkers last week, but rather people arriving with their six–pack of champagne and generous contributions for the Liberal Party.

The only way we can resolve that problem is to pass a legislation on the funding of political parties and electoral campaigns. I like to remind people that since such a piece of legislation was passed in Quebec, no matter what government is in power in Quebec, there has been no instance of wrongdoing brought to light. How come? Because of the transparency of the funds contributed to the parties. I would like to hear my colleague speak on that.

Mrs. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. Obviously a deal has been concluded, this is very clear in this legislation. This is the only thing transparent in this bill, there is a deal. Now it has been repeated during the whole campaign, Conservatives and Liberals are six of one and half a dozen of the other, they amount to the same thing. If we are able to rise today in this House and condemn this legislation, and denounce the scheming and the patronage, it is because our hands are clean.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 5.56 p.m., the House will now proceed to consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed from March 22 consideration of the motion.

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, it is a pity we have to move on to other things, because we were having a very interesting and lively debate. We will now proceed to something more technical dealing with child support payments, a subject which is rather important in itself.

This issue arises in a context of developments to which society must adjust. Broken families are more and more prevalent and, even though it may not be desirable, the government must adjust itself to these new circumstances.

The motion presented by the hon. member for Nepean reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should amend the Income Tax Act so that child support payments are no longer considered taxable income for their recipients.

• (1800)

This is a very interesting motion, but we should nonetheless consider both sides of its potential impact. Some of my colleagues have already mentioned that the Bloc would support this motion. That is what we will do.

But I would like to make a point. Under the current system, the parent who must make support payments—that is the father most of the time—can deduct those payments for income tax purposes. The mother who receives support payments must include them in her own taxable income.

The first goal, naturally, is to avoid double taxation and to tax the income in the hands of the recipient. Another consideration would be to allow the taxpayer with the lowest income to include the payments in his or her income in order to lower the tax amount. Those are commendable goals but they create in fact a deep feeling of injustice.

The one question that should be asked is: Who is the recipient of the support payments? They are paid to the mother and she must include them in her income. In fact, it is income that is used and should be used for the children, and, in most cases, it is used for the children. It is often insufficient, however, since it must take into account the ability to pay of the spouse or of the person who is making the alimony payments. And the person who receives the payments must pay income tax on it.

This creates a feeling of injustice because, in reality, the income should go to the child. Does the child have to pay or support income tax, finally? The child has no income, and this could be the problem. Should we really make this income taxable?

This may be where we should improve on the proposal. Insofar as the person receiving the alimony payments is not required to pay income tax or to declare these payments, we should make sure that, in establishing the amount of alimony, a judge is not influenced by a change in the tax system.

Take for example the case of a person receiving alimony of $6,000 a year or $500 a month; the person would receive a gross income of $500, and a net income of let us say $400, which would allow for $100 in income tax. We could be in a situation where a judge would take the new tax rules into account and say: "I will ask the spouse to pay only $400. He will pay tax only on $400 and the beneficiairy will receive the same amount as before".

We would then be in a neutral situation for the person collecting alimony. I do not think this is the purpose of the motion presented by the member for Nepean. I think that its objective is to ensure that the gross amount that is paid becomes a net amount, and that the spouse who is giving child support bears the tax burden, as if in fact that spouse was still part of the couple and should pay for children's expenses.

We could say: "Yes, but in fact, the simple thing to do would be not to tax either side". That is dangerous, because that would easily encourage a transfer of income from one spouse to the other, so that a good part of the income would become non–taxable. That is not really desirable. A part of the income must continue to be taxable.

The question we must ask ourselves is: Must the children support a part of that tax? For the government, taxing the spouse who is giving child support payments would have a stimulating effect on the income since that income is often higher that the one that gets the spouse who is receiving those payments. On the other side, that might encourage single–parent families. That should be examined.

There is also an aspect in this issue that should not be overlooked. A good part of the problems does not stem necessarily from the tax treatment, but often from the incapability for a spouse who is entitled to child support payments to actually get them.

We all know or are often told that an ex–husband or ex–wife may often have one or several unreported incomes. We all know that the underground economy is thriving and that a spouse can avoid paying alimony. In such cases, it is very difficult to do something about it and proceedings are long and expensive. We are looking at a group of people who do not take their responsibilities seriously. I am not saying everybody is like that. Despite the fact that their family is apart, many people remain very much concerned about the development of their children and take their responsibilities seriously.

In some cases, however, things are much more difficult. We should insist on the protection of ex–spouses, and in particular ex–wives because there are much more ex–wives who experience problems with alimony payments from their ex–husbands. I think these are issues that should not be dealt with separately. They should be integrated as a whole. In that sense, I think it is a good proposal but, as I said, we should take that into consideration.

After checking this afternoon, according to information we received, it would appear that judges tend to take the tax treatment into consideration before allowing an amount to an ex–spouse. That being said, if they do that now, chances are that they will continue to do that in the future and that they are going to take into account the amendments brought to the Income Tax Act.

We should clarify things so as to avoid an adverse impact from this measure. I understand that it is only a motion and that we want to set out a principle. I think that we all have to agree on that principle. Even the members from the Reform Party who said they were against the motion recognized that principle. They are not opposed to it. However, they said that they had problems with the technicalities. That is possible, but that does not mean that there is no way to improve them.

The member from Nepean thoroughly researched her motion. She talked about the origin of the alimony, which began in the 1940s, and the way it operates for income tax purposes. She was perfectly right when she said that the context or the legislation never made any progress over the years. She talked about the principle of deduction/inclusion since it is possible to make a deduction on one hand, and on the other hand, to include the amount that has been deducted in the other income which is not correct and which, according to several people, seems quite unfair.

In that sense, I think that knowing that she has the support of this side of the House, she should now go one step further than what is proposed in her motion and talk to the minister of Revenue and the minister of Finance.

I am sure that the Department of Revenue reviewed the matter. When this was debated earlier in the House, someone mentioned that, in the United States, no distinction is made between the portion of the alimony used for the expenses that a woman must incur by the very fact that she has children, and the portion of the alimony used for the expenses directly linked to the children. There are two categories subject to different tax treatments. Perhaps this is an alternative worth considering, an interesting approach. One should also look at what is done elsewhere. There are certain things which are easy to do and which would allow a fairer system. This is the meaning of her proposal.

Finally, in introducing this motion, the member has been guided by deeply humane motives. We are going to support her proposal, but we must go one step further in the technical details so as to ensure that what we want to put forward will not have adverse effects.

[English]

Ms. Bonnie Brown (Oakville—Milton): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to speak in support of the private member's motion put forward by my colleague from Nepean. Her initiative provides an opportunity for this new Parliament to address not just one issue but three recent phenomena which Canadians are not happy about.

The motion specifically addresses the taxation of child support payments, but more broadly asks us to examine the distribution of wealth in the country, the growth of child poverty and the cohesion between the values of Canadians and the policies of government.

First let us look at the distribution of wealth. If you put all the families in Canada together and then divide them into five equally sized groups, you see some interesting numbers. The 20 per cent at the top level of income receives 40 per cent of the income paid out. The lowest 20 per cent receives only a meagre 6 per cent of the income.

If we go further and combine the two lowest groups of 20 per cent and form a new group that represents 40 per cent of all Canadian families, we will find that this substantially sized group receives and lives on only 18 per cent of the total income. Compare this idea of the bottom 40 per cent living on 20 per cent of the income with the top 20 per cent living and spending 40 per cent of the income.

The remaining two groups in the middle receive 18 per cent and 24 per cent respectively, hovering close to the 20 per cent figure that the group represents.

I ask the House whether as representatives of Canadians we are satisfied with this situation? I know it is a large question but I think it is appropriate to ask it in the early stages of a new Parliament because today's debate is the first opportunity to begin to consider it and keep it in mind as we discuss tax reform and the 1995 and subsequent budgets.

Personally I am not satisfied with the fact that 20 per cent of our families struggle to exist on 6 per cent of income because I know that in those families live children who are not getting their fair share of the wealth of their country.

Second, let us look at this phenomenon of poverty of children in Canada. Statistics Canada reports that 1.2 million children under the age of 18 live in poverty. The effect of poverty on their health is particularly significant, given that poverty at the earliest stages of life has a lasting impact on health status that extends into adulthood.

This is further illustrated by the fact that the infant mortality rate of children in poor neighbourhoods is almost twice as high as that in rich neighbourhoods. In 1992, 900,000 children needed to use a food bank and about one in eight families were living in substandard housing.

I am not satisfied with these statistics either. They remind me of a situation in an emerging nation where a few live like kings and the many struggle to exist. They even bring to mind the word oligarchy where a powerful few are in control and are accepting of and tolerant of the sight of hungry children.

Canadians reject the idea that such a system is acceptable. Canadians question the appropriateness of obscene salaries for certain chief executive officers. In Maclean's magazine this week Allan Fotheringham in his column writes about a Canadian CEO who was paid $6.9 million last year and asks the question: "Is anyone worth $6.9 million for one year's chores"?

Many Canadians are suffering, food banks are blooming but somehow there is enough spare change in the system to pay one person $6.9 million. This is offensive to Canadians who value fairness and dignity for all. It is offensive to a people committed to peace, order and good government.

This is the context in which we address the question of the taxation of child support payments. Today on breakup of a marriage one parent usually gets custody of the children and the other parent is ordered to make regular payments. The money received by the custodial parent is considered to be income and is taxed as such. The non–custodial parent is allowed to deduct the amount transferred over the course of a year from taxable income on the annual tax form.

I believe that from the outset this is unfair compared to the situation of intact or two–parent families who file income tax returns. In a two–parent family both parents spend money on their children's welfare all year but neither of them is able to add it all up and then subtract it from taxable income.

Today we are actually rewarding the non–custodial parent by providing a tax break not enjoyed either by single custodial parents nor by the two parents who stay together.

Why did we ever do this in the first place? It was thought that if income tax was paid by the custodial parent, usually the mother who was in a lower tax bracket, that less money would go to the government and there would be more for the children. This idea was obviously developed by people who had never been divorced and who thought that the concept of the original family including mutual support and nurturence continued beyond the date of the divorce.

• (1815)

It ignored several realities, the reality that divorce is adversarial and usually leaves in its wake revenge and bitterness, the reality that divorce requires the maintenance of two households with accompanying costs, and ignored the reality that the non–custodial parent embarks on a new lifestyle with new demands and unanticipated costs. It ignored the reality that the family which remains loses one adult worker to share housework, home maintenance and child care. It ignored the reality that the custodial parent inherits the work, the worry, the emotional and intellectual strain of maintaining a home and being on duty 24 hours a day for the children.

Our tax system rewards the parent who leaves and penalizes the parent who stays.

Some would say that amounts to be paid are the business of the courts and that judges and lawyers today are calculating all these facts when they gross up support payments. But some of these decisions are 10 to 15 years old and not only are the amounts paid totally inadequate but no gross up ever occurred in the original calculations.

Some would say then it is time to go back to court for a change of circumstance review. I would say those who give such advice have never been divorced either, or at least have never lived the life of a single parent. Single parents are usually poorer than their peers who are still married. They are often exhausted because of the burden they carry.

Picture a single mother of three teenagers who has been divorced for 10 years. Chances are she has already been back to court several times attempting to secure arrears owed to her, or perhaps she has registered with the provincial system designed to chase the non–custodial parent for arrears owing. Neither system has served her or her children well.

The result of these systems that do not work on the members of a single parent family is a feeling that they are less valuable to society, that they are marginalized in their struggle to survive. The temptation is to give up.

When poor single parents read in the paper that 61 per cent of single parent families live in poverty at an average of $9,000 per year below the poverty line it confirms to them the reality that they are living every day. It is not encouraging to them.

I and the other members of this new Parliament have inherited a country where over the last nine years the free market and government inaction were supposed to enhance the economic wellbeing of all but Canadians have come together to agree that that system did not deliver the results they were looking for.

They are expecting us to shake off the political paralysis and to shed the philosophy of inaction. They are asking us to unleash the political will for changes that will restore a sense of fairness to all Canadians.

Amending the Income Tax Act so that child support payments are no longer considered taxable income for the recipients is admittedly just one piece of a much larger puzzle but this motion before us tonight is the first chance we have had to demonstrate that we too are appalled by the statistics on the poverty endured by children in single parent families and that we are committed to restoring hope to those children.

Our support of this motion sends a message that we are not timid. We are not afraid to challenge the status quo. Rather it says that we who formed this government reflect the deep held values of Canadians and that we do have the political will to make the changes necessary to reinstate fairness as the hallmark of Canadian society.

[Translation]

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to support the motion presented by the hon. member for Nepean. The issue of support payments is a very important one for many people, especially for women and children.

The current legislation discriminates against children born in poor families or families headed by single parents. This motion is needed to improve the circumstances of women and children. The legislation was passed 52 years ago and has changed very little since then, but society and the status of women have changed a great deal.

In the forties, the government introduced what was considered progressive legislation. In 1994, that is no longer true.

• (1820)

[English]

In 1942 when this policy was first developed the support payers, at that time mostly men, invariably earned more than their wives so that the tax brackets of the two parents were different. The husband would save more by his deduction than the wife would pay in tax and that net savings would conceivably be passed on to the child. In some cases of course this has happened, though to so few that it makes little difference. Three facts make support of this motion essential.

To begin with the reality of separation and divorce is rarely so easy, and I am sure we all know of cases where children have become pawns in parental disputes. Children who generally never have a say in such matters are left without a voice in their own future.

Change of the income tax code will not eliminate this problem but it will be a significant measure to combat it.

It is also true, that after a divorce, the husband's standard of living goes up while that of the wife and children goes down. Justice in this case is impossible under the prevailing legislation.

[English]

Second, since the reform of the tax code several years ago the number of tax brackets has been reduced to three. The likelihood of tax differential has dropped merely as a result of that factor alone.

[Translation]

Today, the likelihood that both parents are in the same tax bracket is far greater. It means giving a break to the non-custodial spouse and obliging the spouse who does to pay income tax. The system does not make sense, and when all is said and done, the money saved rarely goes to those who need it most, in other words, to the children.

[English]

Third, when one also considers that more and more women are part of the labour force than when this law was introduced, it becomes even clearer that the system has become a system of subtle discrimination against women. In other words, as women have entered the labour force their relative responsibilities regarding the family have stayed the same as witnessed by the fact that still very few men gain custody of children.

With the duel responsibilities of family and work single parent women suffer all the more because their child support is taxed back once again. This was never an intention of the original law.

Let us look at a typical situation of child support payments. Across Canada we have the problem of many so-called deadbeat dads who do not pay child support in full. If for example supporting a child would cost $10,000 per year, that income would naturally be taxed back. Often settlements will include that extra amount. Therefore the net amount would stay the same.

Unfortunately if the support is in partial default the parent with custody, and again I repeat almost always the mother, must pay tax on an amount already insufficient to support her child, whereas the defaulter would still get a tax credit on what he did pay.

If the defaulter paid half the amount, which is $5,000 in this case, the mother and the child would suffer from not having enough money and the obligation by law to pay for it while the man would receive a tax credit on the part he did pay with no penalty.

A law that allows this sort of shocking absurdity must be changed.

We often hear stories about how hard it is for single parent families to get support payments. They are often poor, and the government penalizes them even more.

I hope members of all parties will realize that this motion is not just a matter of amending the income tax, but of letting justice prevail, so that these people will have a better life than they do now.

I also want to say that the changes proposed by the hon. member for Nepean are entirely sensible and economically viable. Our social programs support many women who then have to spend money they do not have to pay taxes. Often poor women cannot work because it would be too expensive. Being on welfare undermines a person's hope and dignity.

• (1825)

The purpose of social programs is not to help divorced spouses. The current system is unnecessarily costly.

[English]

We have to remember some important facts about the broader issue of single parent families. Large portions of poor children come from mother supported single parent families. Single parent families most often live either just on the edge of or below the poverty line.

I think we should all recognize that to fail to change this law would result in some people—I remind all members that these are living, breathing children not just numbers out in space somewhere—not succeeding where a relatively minor measure, from our point of view, might help them to succeed in their endeavours.

However, if you look at the law it seems that we actually try to hurt our youth. Youth issues have always been important to me and I am sure to all my colleagues and I must oppose any measure which we know makes life even more difficult for the youth of Canada.

As my colleague pointed out when she introduced this motion, Canada seems to be unique among first world nations in that it taxes child support. The United Kingdom, the United States and Australia were all among the nations she cited then as being more progressive than Canada.

It is at this point that I wish to criticize the member for Calgary Centre who asserted in the House on March 22 that because child support would then become income exempted the government would receive less money and therefore damage the economic wellbeing of the country.

Once again the Reform Party is failing to take into account the long term. Not helping our children now might lead to greater family insecurity, welfare dependency and even crime, subjects I know all members are currently concerned about.

I must disagree with his analysis of the validity of this motion.

Can we truly say that the system is fair? No. Many experts agree that the legislation should be changed as soon as possible. This is not just a debate between men and women. Children are the ones who are affected most by separation or divorce, and in all cases, it is the children who suffer.

Can we tolerate the status quo, when measures taken by the government today discriminate against youth? We cannot, Mr. Speaker. Young people are our resource for the future. Our government has many programs that are very important, and I am glad to support them. However, what we give with one hand, we take back with the other. We will never achieve prosperity if we maintain measures that discriminate against young people who have not had all the opportunities to which they are entitled in a country as rich and strong as Canada.

Once again, I want to commend the hon. member for Nepean for presenting this votable motion. I hope that all members of this House will take note of this motion and support it without hesitation.

[English]

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I am particularly pleased to rise and to speak to this motion this evening. It addresses an issue of importance to our nation and it is of importance to families, whether together or apart, and that is taking responsible action to ensure that our children are well provided for.

Having said that, I believe that the Income Tax Act should be revenue neutral when considering taxable income for families that remain intact and for those that separate. Presently it is not revenue neutral.

I want to make it crystal clear from the outset that I support this motion in principle. However, it does not go far enough. It is because of the manner by which it does not fulfil the principle that ultimately I cannot support it.

I will explain how the motion goes right and how it goes awry. In keeping with the practice established by my Reform colleagues in this House, I will propose constructive suggestions for making this motion more acceptable.

I commend my hon. colleague, the member for Nepean, for having identified a piece of legislation that is in absolute and desperate need of reform. She pointed out that the legislation was enacted during a time when women seldom worked outside of the home. The year was 1942 and for those post war times the legislation was developed in good faith.

However, the relevant section of the Income Tax Act has become severely outdated. It no longer properly reflects the contemporary reality of divorce. In particular, it fails to address the reality of the millions of Canadian women who work outside the home. Let me share a little of today's reality for those women whose spouses have left and who are raising children on their own.

Statistics Canada has indicated that a large and growing number of single parents, particularly women, suffer a decline in their standard of living in income relative to the parent who no longer lives with his or her children. We have heard that argument numerous times in this debate.

The Income Tax act provides for deductibility of child support payments by the payer and their inclusion into income by the recipient. If the payer had remained in the family unit, his or her ability to deduct child raising expenses would in most cases be reduced.

For example in 1993, the main income earner in a typical husband, wife and one child family would have received a child tax credit of $1,002 for a dependent child. That is if they lived in Alberta and the child was between seven and eleven years of age. If the family income was above a threshold level, then no child tax credit would be paid and the cost of raising the child would provide few, if any, tax deductions. If the parents separated in 1993 and the highest income earner supported the child only through fully tax deductible payments, $500 a month for example, he or she would obtain this significant tax deduction.

It is estimated that by allowing the deduction for the non–custodial parent and taxing the payment received by the custodial parent, generally the one with the lower income, it cost the government $235 million in tax revenue in 1992. With tougher laws enforcing more parents to pay child support it is expected this amount will grow. One can call that a moral hazard, if you will.

I agree with my colleague across the House that the Income Tax Act seems to treat the parent who leaves a relationship and who has fewer responsibilities for raising the children better than the parent, usually a woman, who remains with the children. Let me give an example of how this is the case. This example does not just come out of thin air. It reflects a number of real Canadian situations and actually comes out of my riding of Calgary Southeast.

This is the case of a married man and woman. He made $85,000 a year and she was a homemaker who received no income. This couple divorced and the woman received custody of the children. He continues to earn $85,000 a year and she now has a job that pays $17,000 a year. As part of the settlement he agreed to pay his former spouse $6,000 a year in support payments for his children.

What we need to look at is the $6,000 given as maintenance support. Under the present tax system, the recipient of the $6,000 pays income tax on this amount and the payer, the former husband in my example, receives a $6,000 tax credit. This system provides tax incentives for spouses who leave marriages and who do not raise the children.

A person who divorces, thanks to the existing legislation, receives a windfall for leaving the marriage. Certainly it is not the intent of the legislation to financially benefit a person for leaving family responsibilities behind.

The Income Tax Act as it now exists for reasons I have just mentioned contributes to a perception that there is little legislative support for families torn apart by divorce. This situation is intolerable. Ultimately it hurts the children.

The present system as I see it is flawed for two reasons. The first is allowing the ex–husband to claim a tax credit for his maintenance payments and the second is taxing the ex–wife for the amount she receives. Both of these problems show a failure of the government to encourage or recognize the importance of stabilizing the family unit and responding to the ongoing responsibilities of caring for the children involved.

The motion my colleague has proposed recognizes this inequity to be sure and attempts to redress it. However, I am concerned that her motion fails to be equitable. The pendulum may have been too far on the side of inequity, but the answer is not to swing it all the way in the other direction.

What is needed is some real compromise that will ensure ultimately an effective standard of financial support for the children who are affected and that will treat all affected parties fairly.

The motion allows the recipient, regardless of his or her income, to not have to claim the maintenance he or she receives. It is the lack of recognition of the income component received that is inequitable.

There should be a means test applied to the recipient in order to determine when and if he or she should pay any tax on the maintenance payment. This could be done quite simply. I suggest a recipient should pay no tax on maintenance payments up to $1,000 a month. Any maintenance payments over $1,000 a month should be included as taxable income by the recipient parent.

The changes I would like to see to this motion would in effect see no tax being paid on the amount that is paid in child support up to an acceptable limit by either the custodial parent or by the spouse providing the support. My suggestion is that the child support payment not be taxed as part of the income of the custodial parent unless that amount exceeds $1,000 a month. For example, if it was $1,200 a month, the $200 per month would be added to the income of the recipient and that portion would be taxed.

This may not result in loss of government revenue over all, but it is really too early to tell what the net effect may be. It is unclear at this point if there would indeed be a net tax loss through such an approach. In fact, in the long term it may ensure greater financial support for the children.

I spent quite a bit of time over the break developing this particular thesis. Perhaps it is not quite the same approach my colleagues on this side of the House have taken to this point. However I felt it was also very important to express my views on behalf of those constituents who have approached me for a very long time on this matter.

In conclusion given that the motion refers to changes in the Income Tax Act, I must mention the following. My colleague wishes to make the Income Tax Act more fair for all parties. A good place to begin is with a flat tax system. It could be the case that if such a flat tax were implemented then we would not have to be looking at yet more complicated changes to an already complicated tax system.

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak in support of Motion No. 14, introduced by my colleague, the hon. member for Nepean.

The motion urges the government to amend the Income Tax Act so that child support payments are no longer considered taxable income for the recipients. This debate presents an opportunity for Parliament to correct a contentious longstanding problem with the Income Tax Act.

The provisions in the tax legislation which provide for tax deductible child support payments were brought into force in 1942. Canadian society has progressed a great deal since the 1940s, but unfortunately where the issue of child support is concerned the tax laws have lagged behind the new realities of today's society.

In Canada today there are nearly one million single parent families, or 20 per cent of all families with children. Eighty per cent of these one parent families are headed by women. Over half of these households live in poverty. Although they represent a small number of Canadian households, only 3 per cent, these single parent families headed by women bear 17 per cent of this country's total poverty burden.

The issue we are debating today involves more than changing legislation. The fundamental issue in this debate is justice for single parents, especially single mothers.

During this debate we must examine the intent of the current legislation and the effect it has on today's families. Because 98 per cent of child support recipients are women, it is fair to say that the present child support provisions in the Income Tax Act have a detrimental effect upon women and children of single parent families.

The tax treatment of child support payments actually decreases the ability of single parent women to support their children after separation and divorce. It creates even greater disparities between custodial and non–custodial households. The income of support payers is roughly double that of recipients and their dependants.

It is a fact that after divorce women and their children tend to suffer a decline in their standard of living while the man's tends to rise. With 57 per cent of single parent families headed by women living below the poverty line, the Income Tax Act must be changed to reflect the realities faced by single parent families in the 1990s. By changing the legislation the government would be helping to foster a healthy environment for children of single parent families.

The finance department views the tax deduction provided to child support payers as an incentive to make support payments. However, the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women has stated that studies show child support payment default rates as high as 85 per cent.

Furthermore the finance department feels that the current deduction also encourages higher support payments. Since taxable income is shifted from the payer who is presumed to be in a relatively high tax bracket, to the recipient who is presumed to be in a lower tax bracket, there results an overall tax saving which will lead to greater resources and therefore increased support payments. In reality this is rarely the case.

When the original legislation was written 52 years ago the assumption was that the custodial parent, the mother, had less income than the payer, the father. Today this assumption is no longer always valid. Even though women comprise a large part of today's workforce wage disparity still exists, yet this is not reflected in the current taxation structure.

The only way a single parent mother can benefit from the current legislation is if she happens to be in a low income tax bracket. Fortunately, Canadians have been working toward more equal treatment of women in the workforce and equal pay for equal work. The current tax situation impedes this progress for single parent working mothers by chipping away at their income and thus increasing their burden.

Studies by the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women have shown that in 49 per cent of situations the child support payer's tax saving did not exceed the recipient's tax obligation which resulted in no overall tax benefit. In 20 per cent of these cases the child support provisions in the Income Tax Act actually decreased the resources available for child support.

The Income Tax Act needs to be amended so that it reflects current realities and provides support where the support is needed most, with the custodial parent. In one parent families, the non–custodial parent is given a tax incentive even though the parental responsibilities remain.

When a divorce occurs neither parent's responsibility toward their children changes. Child support payments should therefore not be considered taxable income of the custodial parent, but merely a continuation of the responsibility of the non–custodial parent for the care and maintenance of the children involved.

I have touched upon some of the points surrounding this issue but I would like to come back to my central theme which is justice. Most one parent families are headed by women. The majority of these households live below the poverty line and bear a disproportionate amount of this country's total poverty burden. The current Income Tax Act only contributes to this unfortunate problem.

• (1845)

Clearly this is not justice. We have an opportunity to take a step toward fairness for women and for single parent families. It is my sincere wish that this motion be adopted by the House and embraced by the government in the form of amendments to the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, what we are discussing today is a 1942 tax law which defines the regulations for child support payments following a divorce settlement. I am pleased to join the debate because I believe that a wise society should strive to give its children the best possible start in life.

Canadians were appalled when in 1993 the United Nations committee on social, economic and cultural rights blasted Canada for the fact that half of all single mothers and their children live below the poverty line. In conclusion the report stated that Canada has not outlined any new or planned measures to remedy the situation.

The question we are debating today is whether the tax laws should be altered in the interest of fairness where child support payments are concerned. As our system stands presently, payers of child support are given a tax break, whereas recipients of child support, the mothers who have the custody of the children, are required to treat those payments as taxable income.

I ask the public, my colleagues and the bureaucrats who defend this 1942 regulation to clarify in their own minds whether it is the principles of the income tax system or whether it is the rights of children that must be defended?

Fifty–two years ago when the policy was developed there were 10 tax brackets for Canadian citizens. The parent paying support was usually in a higher tax bracket than the recipient parent. As a result it was determined that providing the donor with a tax break while taxing the recipient in a lower tax bracket would reduce the total amount of taxes paid on this sum.

At the same time these bureaucrats reasoned that allowing the non–custodial parent to deduct payments from their taxable income would provide an incentive to maintain regular payments. While this is convincing in theory, it fails miserably in practice.

The speakers today have waxed eloquent on the outdated basis of the child support taxation policy. In 1942 it was likely that by giving the non–custodial parent at tax break and taxing the custodial parent more money would end up benefiting the children. Today it is much more likely that both parents fall into the same tax bracket.

We must decide, given the 1990s setting, which parent will benefit from this subsidy. I believe that the mother who is in 98 per cent of instances the recipient of child support should not have to pay taxes on her child support payments.

Although it is true that women still on average earn less than men, they are much more likely than before to be in the same tax bracket as their former spouse. As pay equity legislation takes root we hope women will reach parity with men's wages in this country. Therefore a child support system which assumes that women make less than men is anachronistic and must be revised.

The revisions we seek are those that will divert moneys from the tax system to the children. In Nova Scotia one in five children lives below the poverty line. These proposed changes would be one small step to help those children.

One alternative that has been proposed and that is currently before the courts offers that income be considered the child's income and be taxed accordingly. Another option is for the parents of the children to negotiate among themselves the tax break they generally receive to ensure this is channelled toward the children's expenses.

Discussion of the intricacies of the tax system or tax reform should not sway us from the larger issues at play here. A report by Ellen Zweibel and Richard Shillington for the Policy Research Centre on Children, Youth and Families stated that the basic pre–tax child support amount being awarded is stunningly low.

Our government will prove its commitment to youth by following through with the promises in the red book.

• (1850)

Apprenticeship programs will ease the transition from school to work. We are establishing a youth services corps and we are restoring full funding to the national literacy program. But we must start earlier. We must invest all available resources in our children during their formative years.

A House of Commons resolution in 1989 to abolish child poverty by the year 2000 was adopted by the entire Parliament. We must recommit ourselves to this challenge and redouble our efforts.

In 1991 more than 1.2 million Canadian children were living in poverty. I was involved for five year in the metro food bank society in the Halifax—Dartmouth area and I know that sustainable and systematic changes are needed.

In 1992 an estimated 900,000 children were fed by one of the 436 food banks across this country and these numbers are growing. As a matter of fact in 1980 there were no food banks in Canada and now we have more than 400 food banks. That is astounding and appalling.

To reverse this frightening trend we must make the required changes to the Income Tax Act so that children are not financially devastated by their parent's divorce or separation. We must ensure that fathers, and in 98 per cent of cases it is the father who is the payer, keep up with their child support payments.

Some insight into the breakdown of the whole system can be derived from statistics from the legal world. In Nova Scotia the family court system administered maintenance payments for about 13,000 families. In 1990–91 that court issued 7,000 summonses to individuals who had failed to pay court ordered support. These are not meaningless numbers. For each summons there is a story of hardship.

I mentioned earlier that the tax break for non–custodial parents was meant as an incentive—some incentive. Fifty–two years later child support dodgers are rampant in our society. We have made some inroads in this area. There is legislation in every province to garnishee wages from defaulters. That is not enough. A lot of work is needed to standardize child support levels and enforcement mechanisms across this country.

Loopholes abound in our system of taxation with no clear rationale for who benefits and who does not. Commons sense tells us and groups that have coalesced around this issue insist that women despite gross–up payments should not be paying tax on child support payments. Adopting this resolution as the shared opinion of this House is a positive step, one that makes sense.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. Member for Nepean for introducing a bill to amend the Income Tax Act.

Her amendment deals mainly with regulations dating back to 1942, that are 52 years ago, at a time when child support payments were paid to the mother, who generally had custody of the children. It allowed the father to deduct support payments from his taxable income.

As you know, the Divorce Act is administered by the provinces and the amount of child support is determined by provincial court judges.

We also know that, compared to 1942, the number of divorces is very high. This is regrettable, but this is a fact of life in our society.

[English]

I have a report from the federal–provincial–territorial family law committee that suggests that if tax implications are to be taken into account there are number of issues to be considered. There is no guidance in the Divorce Act nor provincial or territorial legislation as to how the calculations should be made or how the benefit of the deduction should be shared between the parties.

• (1855)

Reference is made to a Divorce Act evaluation from May 1990 from the Department of Justice that stated: "It is important to consider this issue in the context in which it actually occurs, namely that two–thirds of Canadian women and children live in poverty following divorce".

I am going to take the liberty to read parts of a letter I received from a constituent of mine after getting permission from this person to read extracts. Mrs. Jackie Cloutier wrote to me regarding the taxation of child support. She is proud to give me permission to read these extracts from her letter: "Taxing child support in the hand of the already impoverished parent is wrong. Many women like myself lose up to two–thirds of their child support to income tax. We do not live in fancy homes or drive fancy cars. We do not take lavish vacations. We cannot afford to plan for retirement. We struggle every day to make ends meet, most often living from pay cheque to pay cheque and regularly running out of money at the end of the month. Every year in April we are faced with this unnecessary debt to Revenue Canada".

She concludes, and I jumped some parts of her letter: "The report released by the United Nations on the status of women and children in Canada clearly stated that we are living in poverty. Please take the necessary steps to change this law now. Don't let another year go by where women and children suffer needlessly at the hands of the tax system".

Therefore, I am pleased to support the initiative of my colleague from Nepean and to ask the federal government that it change the Income Tax Act to exempt child support payments from taxation.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

ETHANOL

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to participate in the adjournment proceedings tonight in accordance with Standing Order 37(3) on the subject of ethanol.

The ethanol gasoline mixture to replace regular gasoline has been highly successful in western Canada and for many years highly successful in the United States. The proposed ratio of mix here in Canada is 90 per cent gasoline and 10 per cent ethanol, that is a 90 per cent non–renewable source of energy and a 10 per cent renewable source of energy.

This fuel mix has been available in western Ontario and is now becoming available in eastern Ontario. There is talk of a plant, and hopefully it will materialize, in my own riding of Leeds—Grenville. The manufacture of ethanol started with a group of farmers, about 135 farmers, who got together and each threw in $2,500. I think it shows commitment.

We can talk about the advantages of using ethanol mixed with gas and we can do it from various viewpoints, but a former colleague of mine, the hon. Ralph Ferguson, was a pioneer of blended fuel in this House in the last Parliament. I became interested in blended fuel from listening to the hon. Ralph Ferguson, the former Minister of Agriculture, because he spoke on it many times. I think maybe we could name it Fergie's fuel because whenever you got talking to Fergie he would want to promote the idea of ethanol. He really believed in it as a source of energy for Canadians.

Because of the time restraints I have to summarize a bit. The biggest winner in the blended fuel business is the environment. There is no question about that. The exhaust from a car using blended mix will contain 30 per cent less carbon monoxide and 6 to 10 per cent less carbon dioxide. The manufacture of ethanol from grains, primarily corn but it can be other grains, makes a great market for corn farmers and for farmers in general.

One gets about 10 litres of ethanol from a bushel of corn. The byproduct, once the starch is removed from the corn to make the ethanol, is an excellent source of feed for beef and dairy cattle. The ethanol is manufactured from a renewable resource, so there is a real plus for everybody. That is not the case with fossil fuels.

What prompted my original question to the Minister of Finance is the cost of production. That is the problem. If we applied the federal excise tax to ethanol and put the provincial excise tax on ethanol, the product would be just out of the question. It would be too costly. People would not buy because of the price. Nobody would choose it as an alternative fuel.

We would miss the manufacturing of it, the sale of it and everything that is associated with it but most important, we would miss the environmental advantages of this friendly product. The assurance I got from the Minister of Finance was okay as far as it went, that the government would not impose an excise tax on ethanol.

Governments come and governments go and these people are looking for a little more assurance than that. What the ethanol industry wanted was assurance similar to the one that Ontario gave the industry not too long ago. The Government of Ontario announced that if a future provincial government wanted to reimpose the provincial excise tax on ethanol, the manufacturers would be compensated. The ethanol industry is asking for that kind of assurance from the federal government.

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to participate in this discussion of an issue important to many members of the House.

Hon. members are no doubt aware that the 8.5–cent per litre excise tax exemption for the ethanol portion of gasoline fuels was introduced in the 1992 budget to provide "a level playing field in the taxation of alternative fuels". Prior to 1992, federal excise taxes on motor vehicle fuels did not apply to propane, natural gas or pure methanol or ethanol used as motor vehicle fuels. However the excise tax was imposed on all gasoline fuels, including ethanol and methanol blends.

The exemption from the excise tax for the ethanol and methanol portion of blended fuels was introduced to ensure that all alternative fuels were subject to the same federal excise tax treatment during a period of technological and marketing development of these fuels.

I should note that the excise tax exemption is limited to gasoline blended fuels that use ethanol and methanol made from renewable feed stocks such as corn, grain and wood. Ethanol fuels derived from biomass offer a number of environmental benefits that generate, for instance, lower levels of carbon monoxide than in the case of gasoline.

The excise tax exemption for gasoline–ethanol blends continues to be entirely consistent with the government's current policies on the tax treatment of alternative fuels. Therefore, I would like to assure members that the ethanol and methanol that are produced from biomass and used in gasoline–type fuels will remain exempt from the 8.5 cent per litre excise tax during the course of this government's current mandate.

By encouraging the blending and marketing of ethanol–gasoline blends, this commitment should be of significant assistance to Canadian ethanol producers. It should also benefit the agricultural sector by providing additional domestic markets for grain and corn, as well as the potential for new markets for wood and agricultural waste products.

YOUTH ACTION PLAN

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, on April 14 last, I put a question to the Minister of Human Resources Development concerning his youth action plan.

Instead of answering my question about the jurisdictional conflicts arising from his action plan, the Minister of Human Resources Development merely criticized the fact that I was denouncing his action plan. This is rather odd, since I thought it was the duty of an opposition member to criticize the government's actions and that this was not the least bit unusual. This is what I was told. Yet, there was the minister criticizing me.

I felt an even greater duty to criticize the plan since it represented another intrusion into an area of provincial jurisdiction, namely education. Let me show you what I mean.

First, let me read the title of the action plan. I have no problem with the first part of the title, "Youth Employment". This is, admittedly, an area of shared jurisdiction.

The second part of the title reads as follows: "And Learning Strategy". Can this title make it any clearer that education is involved? May I remind hon. members that education is an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. Yet, there was the Minister of Human Resources Development announcing on April 15 last a strategy which is one more example of federal intrusion in the field of education.

Let us begin by examining the first measure, Youth Service Canada. The first stream identified as a priority area for projects is community development and learning, to quote the action plan, "in the area of education". No effort whatsoever is made to hide the fact.

A second Youth Service Canada component which pertains to education is the education voucher. Following a period of service lasting nine months, participants receive a bonus of $2,000 in the form of an education voucher.

The second measure is the Youth Internship Program. This is a new title designed to avoid any reference to apprenticeship programs. We now speak of youth interns. What does the action plan have to say about youth interns? In the second paragraph, it says that "the federal government is acting to implement new entry level training models". Further on, on page 6, third paragraph: "The standardization of existing training plans will ensure that programs are based on common standards and thus have applicability across Canada."

I will skim over the Summer Employment Program which poses no problems as far as jurisdiction goes, as well as the increases in student loans, although I would like to mention here that among students, notably those in Quebec, 16 per cent are unable to repay their student loans and are forced to seek protection under the bankruptcy legislation. And what is the minister doing? Well, he is increasing the level of indebtedness of students.

On page 11 under Learning Initiatives, mention is made of setting national training goals, of updating existing training measurement tools, of putting multimedia resources and computers in place in schools, of facilitating the dissemination of information on key learning issues and, finally, of maintaining the stay in school program. All of these are education–related initiatives.

Following the unveiling of this program, three provinces decided not to attend the federal–provincial meeting scheduled for the following Monday. That very same day, the Liberal Party and the Parti Quebecois joined forces in the Quebec National Assembly to unanimously pass a motion calling upon the federal government not only to refrain from any further intrusion in, but also to withdraw from the field of manpower training.

Finally, last Friday, the Conseil permanent de la jeunesse, a paragovernmental agency in Quebec, held a press conference to denounce as well federal intrusion in the area of manpower training. I would have liked to put my question to the minister, but I see that his parliamentary secretary is not present. I hope that someone is on hand to speak on his behalf. Normally, we should get an answer to our question.

When will the federal government withdraw from this field—

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the federal government, like the Government of Quebec, is committed to investing in Canada's youth, especially by providing our young people with the knowledge and skills needed for the jobs of tomorrow.

In so doing, the federal government does not intend to question provincial jurisdiction over education. It is the government's intention to help young people in this country through programs that complement, and I do mean complement, those that the provinces offer.

[English]

In fact there have been ongoing discussions with all the provinces on all four components of the youth employment and learning strategy.

[Translation]

The federal government's role is more that of a presenter. The provinces will take part in implementing pilot training projects for young people. These projects will be based on current provincial programs and will respect provincial priorities.

We will also encourage the provinces to establish, adjust or propose mechanisms in addition to the three which already exist in the youth training program, namely sectoral initiatives, work–study co–op program and project–oriented training.

[English]

With regard to internship in Quebec, we have received very positive feedback from the province and the provincial education ministers on youth internship programs.

[Translation]

Our government wishes to harmonize its training initiatives for young people with those of Quebec and other provinces. We will pursue productive and effective discussions with the provinces to find the best ways to help all young people wherever they live in Canada.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup): Mr. Speaker, on March 24, 1994, I questioned the Minister of Transport on the rationalization of VIA Rail operations. The minister gave me the following answer:

> If there is no dramatic improvement in VIA Rail's ability to provide service within the budgets allocated by the federal government, then some major changes will certainly be made.

I urge the minister to consider the November 1989 report of the federal Liberal task force on VIA Rail, whose members included over 15 Liberal members now sitting in this House and which made recommendations on what VIA Rail should do and on what could be done to make it profitable and efficient. One of the conclusions was this: "We must however show foresight by immediately introducing a program of expenditures—they were not talking about cutbacks or rationalization—of investments aimed at upgrading the whole VIA Rail network".

This report signed by more than 20 federal Liberal members shows how they felt about all this. The Minister of Transport would be well advised to consider it and perhaps to make it his policy to ensure that VIA Rail becomes profitable and efficient in the future, so that we in Eastern Quebec can stop working desperately to keep our rail service, as we have been doing for at least 10 years.

I urge the federal government to assume its responsibilities in this area before dealing with education and other issues. It is always advisable to look at the consequences of our actions to see if we did the right thing. I am thinking in particular of the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine who has a major responsibility in this area because rail service in his region is cast in doubt year after year. The whole line that goes as far as the Maritimes is also called into question year after year.

One would think that, when federal parties go from being in opposition to forming the government, their vocabulary suddenly changes and they start defending regional underdevelopment, when we could turn rail line development into an important tool to provide our regions with the basic transport infrastructure needed for the development of small and medium-sized businesses in our communities, thus contributing to local growth, instead of always being on the defensive and only seeing the little cuts that can be made here and there.

What I found rather surprising is that when the Liberal Party of Canada was in opposition, their recommendations were, for example, to improve the equipment and infrastructure; to upgrade and introduce high-speed trains—they settled for low speed instead; to revive track-guided buses; to make fares and schedules more flexible; to involve the public.

In this sense, we think it is important to impose a moratorium on the elimination of rail service in Eastern Canada, as was done in Western Canada. Especially since we know that, in a 1989 report written in the last Parliament when it was in opposition, the government advocated involving the public in the future of VIA Rail. I would ask the current government why it does not honour the commitments it made when it was in opposition. We are not talking about independent members but about an official report of the national Liberal caucus, several members of which are now ministers who should make appropriate representations to the Cabinet.

I hope the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine will convince his government to stand firm and honour the commitments it made in the report of the national Liberal caucus.

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to reply to the comments made by the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup. It is always important to put one's comments in perspective. The Minister of Transport did not hide the fact that the government has no other money to give to VIA Rail.

[English]

The future of VIA Rail will depend on the availability of financial resources both from the government and from passenger revenues and will be affected in large part by the outcome of the current labour negotiations that are under consideration now. After these negotiations VIA will present its plans to the government at the appropriate time and we will deal with them then.

The government supports VIA's current efforts to maximize efficiencies of its operations before a decision is taken on the long term future of the corporation. For my friend's information, VIA has made fantastic gains in the past three years in terms of efficiencies in its operations, in terms of manpower, in terms of locomotives, in terms of equipment. They have made great gains but more can be done.

Clearly there can be no immediate service changes. VIA must present a proposal to the government. I repeat there can be no cuts without the government's approval.

It is very important that the Canadian people and goods be moved efficiently throughout the country. Canadians want to see a workable, affordable transportation system. It would be premature to speculate on service changes, aside from the fact that VIA will operate a network which Canadians can afford.

In addition, the member spoke about the Liberal task force. I was one of the co–authors of that task force, as many of my colleagues know. We will take some of those task force recommendations into account as the minister and the government take a look at the options available. We will also look at ways of modernizing the VIA network. We will look at those recommendations, as I said.

More important, the member should understand that. He talked about whether the government should intrude in areas of provincial jurisdiction. This is one place where in fact the federal government would work with the provinces, as it has in Ontario. We would welcome co–operation with the Quebec government, municipalities, the private sector, community groups, all to come and play and be part of the solution so that we can maintain a viable national VIA network across the country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 7.18 p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

BOVINE SOMATOTROPIN

Mr. Bernard Patry (Pierrefonds—Dollard): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity today to express my concerns about recombinant BST or bovine somatotropin.

Although this hormone is found in cattle in its natural state, artificially increasing the rate of BST will not improve the quality of the milk, which is the most important consideration here.

Furthermore, the consumer backlash may be substantial. There is no particular rush to approve the use of this hormone, especially not before appropriate consultations with consumer associations.

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, last week I attended a justice meeting in which a review of the National Parole Board was the topic of discussion.

The result of this meeting left me questioning the accountability of the parole board. During the course of the discussion it was proven again that the current system is flawed. One of the results of the meeting was the Solicitor General's proposing a disciplinary scheme for members of the parole board. The time and thought given to these cosmetic disciplinary changes has been wasted time. We should not be spending time on how to get rid of people, we should be ensuring that the board is competent from the beginning.

The public wants concrete changes, not cleanup measures. For accountability to be restored it has to begin at the top. This means the Solicitor General should consider placing a moratorium on the release of dangerous offenders coming up for parole until this whole system is revamped and meets the standard.

IMMIGRATION

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Quebec): Mr. Speaker, in the years to come, Quebec will receive a major influx of immigrants. The need to make these people welcome and to integrate them into Quebec society would seem paramount, non only to guarantee the continued existence of the French language but also to strengthen economic links between new immigrants and Quebec's institutions.

The Mouvement des caisses populaires Desjardins, one of the motors of Quebec's economic development, has shown leadership in this field.

SOUTH AFRICAN ELECTIONS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Foreign Affairs it is my honour to pay tribute to the democratic process which is unfolding in South Africa today.

The Government of Canada is committed to the advancement of human rights and our support continues with some 150 Canadians currently in South Africa to observe the elections and to provide electoral expertise in the first democratic and non–racial elections.

At present the Secretary of State for Latin America and Africa is leading the official bilateral team of electoral observers, while many other Canadians are serving with the United Nations, the Commonwealth and non–governmental organizations during this historic transition.

I salute all the people of the new South Africa. Today marks an end to the past and is hope for the future.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, I celebrated Earth Day with students from the Collège de Bois–de–Boulogne, some of whom are here today. We released the results of environmental programs put in place at the college and officially launched the composting system set up by the students.

I would like to draw your attention more particularly to the work of Environnement Jeunesse, ENJEU, which makes students more aware of and educates them about the environment in Quebec. I was delighted and inspired by their commitment and the projects they have started. They have convinced me of the need to provide strong support for all youth initiatives.

[English]

In a time when we are desperate for more opportunities and initiatives for youth, Collège de Bois de Boulogne has succeeded in creating new and innovative ways to involve its students and enhance their awareness of the issues.

This demonstrates that with perseverance and commitment success is possible. Projects such as these are great achievements and should serve as an example for all our youth to follow.

I applaud the college administrators, the private sector and the community for making this idea a reality and I urge my fellow colleagues to encourage such initiatives.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Mr. John Finlay (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to inform this House of meetings I hosted with regard to the social security review.

Residents in my riding had three opportunities to make their views known on the changes they feel would help to modernize our social security network.

Today I was able to present a report on behalf of my constituents to the Minister of Human Resources Development. The minister has assured all members that our constituents' opinions are important to this process, and I ask the hon. members opposite to stop characterizing such meetings as smoke screens to hide something which they suggest has already been decided. The people of Canada may conclude that the opposition is out to torpedo the work that is being done through these public consultations.

• (1405)

In closing, I want to thank the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Human Resources Development for speaking at my public meeting and for listening to the concerns of my constituents.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Gaston Péloquin (Brome—Missisquoi): The Supreme Court decision handed down yesterday with regard to telecommunications did not surprise anyone in Quebec. For the third time since 1993, Quebec is having powers in the area of communications torn away by the federal government. After broadcasting and cable television, Quebec is now losing control over telephone companies, control which is essential to the province's social and economic development as we embark on the electronic highway.

Once again, the Supreme Court takes a "Canadian" and centralizing view of the Constitution to continue chipping away, little by little, year after year, at the powers of the Quebec National Assembly. That is the true face of federalism in Canada, Mr. Speaker.

This Supreme Court decision confirms the necessity and urgent need for the people of Quebec to have a sovereign state of their own.

OVERSEAS TAX CREDIT

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, thousands of Canadians who work abroad in natural resource industries benefit from the federal overseas tax credit. In return for spending six months of the year away from their families and working often under very difficult conditions, these Canadian workers have had their annual tax liabilities reduced by the credit.

Now as reported by Alberta Report magazine, Revenue Canada has decided to retroactively disallow the overseas tax credit to those Canadian workers employed by U.S. parented companies. In some cases this disallowance may extend back three years. This move will be an annoyance to the companies in question but it will do great harm to hundreds of ordinary Canadian workers, most of them Albertans.

I am told that the unforeseen tax bill of up to $50,000 will cause some of them to lose their homes. This is a shameful way for the Minister of National Revenue to accomplish his goal of closing a so–called tax loophole.

ROUGE RIVER VALLEY

Mr. John Cannis (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, this past weekend I had the opportunity along with my family to participate in a reforestation project in the Rouge River Valley system.

The 10,000 Trees for the Rouge River Valley program has been operating for five years and has steadily increased its profile within the community. This year over 1,200 Scarborough residents planted 8,000 trees. Over the past five years this program has planted close to 60,000 trees on about 80 acres of land.

The Rouge Valley is a unique and valuable environmental resource and I urge the Minister of the Environment and The Minister of Canadian Heritage to continue their support and negotiations with the provincial government and to move quickly to protect this region.

KIDS SENSE WEEK

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, April 27 through May 1, 1994 is Kids Sense Week across Canada sponsored by the International Council of Shopping Centres, a non–profit trade organization. Shopping centres across Canada as we know are significant contributors to the economy as well as entertainment centres and effective forums for public service programs.

This morning I was pleased to be at the Merivale Mall in Nepean along with kids and parents and police and others. We could see that the Merivale Mall and all other shopping centres are providing important community services. They are raising awareness of safety issues in conjunction with the national observance of Kids Sense Week.

I am delighted that this week is Kids Sense Week in Ottawa–Carleton and I encourage our young people and their parents or guardians to involve themselves in this vital community service activity.

SARAJEVO

Mr. David Iftody (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to the attention of all members of Parliament a letter and a painting I received from a constituent of mine, a 7–year old girl whose name is Milaine Curé.

• (1410)

The letter reads: "Dear Mr. Iftody, how can I help the children of Sarajevo? The children are very sick and they do not have any medication".

We often forget how news can have a profound effect on our children. I felt the fear of this child by the madness and suffering that have resulted from this war. Yet, I also felt the promise of hope from our own children.

Canadians care and we will not abandon our duty as citizens of the world.

PROVINCIAL ELECTION

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Prime Minister could barely hide how anxious he is to take an active part in the coming election campaign in Quebec. What is disappointing is that he refused to promise publicly to abide by the spirit of the Quebec legislation on election expenses. The Bloc Quebecois strongly deplores that the taxpayers are made to pay against their will, through their taxes, such breaches to democracy.

Also, in light of the Prime Minister's refusal, are we to understand that he intends to authorize massive, illegitimate expenses to be made in Quebec during the election campaign, as was done at the time of the 1980 referendum? We believe that the Prime Minister should take the advice of the Quebec Premier and mind his own business.

BATTLE OF THE ATLANTIC

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, Sunday, May 1 will commemorate the Battle of the Atlantic across Canada. We will honour the Canadian veterans who fought so courageously and with such great sacrifice to keep the enemy from our shores and to gain control of sea lanes so that allied forces could bring World War II to an end.

We honour those who served in the RCAF coastal command, the Royal Canadian Navy and our merchant navy. During the bloody and bitter conflict in the Atlantic, each one made a vital contribution to destroying the German U–boat menace which extended from Britain right into the St. Lawrence.

They made possible the transport of vital troops and supplies to beleaguered Britain. Without their heroic efforts there would have been no Normandy landings on D–Day.

This year we commemorate the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II through the Canada Remembers program. This Sunday let every Canadian who cherishes freedom remember those who fought so well and who made the supreme sacrifice in the Battle of the Atlantic.

Oral Questions

COMMUNITY VIOLENCE

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of the House an issue which has brought tremendous sorrow and shock to members of my constituency.

Last Saturday a deplorable tragedy occurred in Vancouver south. Mr. Glen Olsen, an innocent bystander, was shot and killed while walking his dog down a street in my riding.

It is with profound sympathy that I pass my condolences on to Mr. Olsen's family and friends. I want them to know that the horror of this event has not gone unnoticed.

I have spoken to the Vancouver police department and I have full confidence that it is doing everything possible to bring those responsible to justice.

As the federal representative for my community I would like it to know that I will do everything in my power to ensure that these types of incidents do not occur in our communities. I will continue to fight for stricter gun control and stronger crime prevention measures so that tragedies like this do not occur in the future.

For the sake of the victims I implore all members of this House to support initiatives which will make our streets and our communities safer places.

TOBACCO TAX

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, during the debate on the lowering of the cigarette tax this party presented several very good reasons why it should not be done.

It would increase smoking among youth according to Statistics Canada and would also increase smoking among the general population and add to our health costs.

Today we see that total Canadian production of cigarettes reached 5.8 billion in March, the highest in eight years. Clearly the policy of this government to reduce cigarette taxes is going to add to our health care costs, add to the illness of Canadians.

I call on the Minister of Health to finally stand up for the health of Canadians, to fight on behalf of Canadians and to fight this policy which has only led to more smoking among Canadians and greater health risks.

INFRASTRUCTURE

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, the federal government has decided to build its own $11.9 million office complex in Sault Ste. Marie. This steel, brick and glass building will include 120,000 square feet on two storeys to house the Canada Employment Centre, the Income Securities Office, Revenue Canada, Health Canada, Public Works and Government Services, and the RCMP.

Local property managers are outraged by this needless political project. A recent survey indicates there is over a 20 per cent vacancy rate in major downtown buildings. There is existing vacant office space, and a new federal building will create more vacancies.

Does the government not have better ways to put people back to work than pumping money into unneeded facilities in competition with the private sector?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

HIGH-SPEED TRAIN

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Speaking yesterday to the greater Montreal Chamber of Commerce, the Chairman of VIA Rail unveiled his agency's proposal for a high-speed train in the Quebec City-Windsor corridor. VIA Rail is proposing that the federal government support the project financially using part of the grant it awards each year to the agency. This would allow the government to build the HST without it affecting Ottawa's budget.

Can the Prime Minister tell us if the government is interested in VIA Rail's proposal which has the advantage of requiring no additional outlay on the part of the federal government?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have indeed indicated that we are interested in this venture. We have said that if this project can be carried out without the government having to incur significant costs, then we would be happy to proceed with it. However, if one proposal seems more acceptable at this time, I am certain the government will review it carefully. There could be a problem though in that it will be hard for a high-speed train linking Montreal and Toronto to be forced to stop for inspection at the border, once Quebec becomes independent, as the Leader of the Opposition hopes will happen.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I asked a serious question to someone who, I thought, took things seriously. Instead, he responded in a joking fashion.

The HST project has been under consideration for many years. Governments have been studying it for at least three years. Why is the Prime Minister so reluctant to announce his support for the HST, given that this project will generate activity, create thousands of long-term jobs and, at the same time, strengthen our competitive position in a high-tech sector?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. leader of the Opposition surely knows that the governments of Quebec, Ontario and Canada have already invested just under $6 million in a high-speed train study. The three governments expect the report to be ready by this summer and we will, of course, be reviewing it with a great deal of interest. The study is being carried out jointly by the aforementioned three governments and I hope the Leader of the Opposition is interested in seeing the results, just as these three governments are.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, what reasons can the Prime Minister give, I wonder, for his reluctance to state clearly what he thinks, and where he stands on the HST project, when all the while, the federal government has invested and will continue to invest—I would even say waste, at least in the case of Hibernia—billions in Hibernia, not to mention the exorbitant sums spent on upgrading the rail system in the West?

Why is the Prime Minister holding off on disclosing his views on an HST that will link Quebec and Canada with the United States?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if we want to talk about decisions made by this government, I would point out to the Leader of the Opposition that the most successful company in Montreal is Canadair. It was during my tenure as Minister of Industry and Trade that the government bought Canadair back from private interests, got it back on track and invested money to develop the Challenger jets and other aircraft responsible for Canadair's current success. This was all due to the intervention of this government.

The Leader of the Opposition is always asking us to work with the provinces, but the Minister of Transport has just said that he is working very closely with provincial governments on this matter. Now the Leader of the Opposition is suggesting that we not listen to the provinces.

We do listen to them and, when the proposal is ready, we will respond. If it represents no cost to us, then of course the project will get the green light. However, if the costs are exorbitant, we will have to take into consideration this government's financial situation.

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, according to the Minister of Industry, the federal government apparently wants to review the drug-patent law. This legislation extended to 20 years, need we remind you, the protection offered to patented drugs and led to the announcement that nearly $1 billion would be invested in research and development in Quebec by 1996. By the year 2000, the total value of investment projects could reach $5 billion in Canada.

Does the minister admit that it is because of pressure from lobbyists representing the interests of generic-drug companies, mainly concentrated in Toronto, that he is about to review the drug-patent legislation?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that I have no interest in lobbyists' efforts. What I care about the most is Canadians' interests.

We promised during the election campaign that we would review Bill C-91, and that is what we explained again yesterday. We are interested in drug prices and in the investment and R and D track record here in Canada.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, Quebec's Minister of Industry and Commerce stated this morning before a parliamentary committee in Quebec City that the mere mention of a review of Bill C-91 caused the immediate postponement of a $50-million investment in Quebec's pharmaceutical industry.

Does the Minister of Finance, who is also responsible for regional development in Quebec, admit that a review of the drug-patent legislation would be disastrous for the brand-name drug industry, which is mainly concentrated in Montreal?

[English]

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, this is the same kind of exaggerated hyperbole that we have heard on both sides of this debate for too long.

We are trying to deal with the facts and we are going to determine what the facts are. The facts will indicate what policy direction the government should take in the future.

I want the hon. member to understand, because he was not here when Bill C-91 was passed, that law contains within it a statutory review that would occur within four years of its enactment in 1993. That is already in the bill. There is nothing new about saying that we will review legislation passed by the previous government.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Recently the Minister of Human Resources Development was forced to cancel a federal-provincial meeting on job training because several of the provinces objected to the federal government's approach.

Now it appears the Minister of Health may scuttle the planned forum on national health care with her ill-advised tax on provincial health care initiatives in Alberta and British Columbia. National health care reform requires more co–operation, not less, between federal and provincial governments.

Will the Prime Minister instruct his Minister of Health to stop antagonizing and start listening to the provinces on health care reform?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have a very clear law of Parliament that medicare in Canada is free for everybody.

• (1425)

We have a law in Canada that says there will not be a two tier system of medicare, one for the rich and one for the poor. We also have a law in Canada which says that if one province is engaged in that direction we shall cut off funds to it.

The minister is doing what is right. She is making sure that the laws of Parliament are respected.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, the root of the financial difficulties of health care lies in the fact that federal transfers to the provinces in support of health care have consistently declined over the last 15 years. Just last week the finance minister promised further cuts to federal transfers.

If the Prime Minister is really committed to health care, will he commit today to maintaining federal transfers to health care at present levels and to making deeper spending cuts elsewhere required to support that commitment?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is another good day. Now the leader of the Reform Party is pleading with us not to cut. I hope the Minister of Finance will note that.

In our platform we said that we were to maintain the level of transfers to the provinces, that they were not to be reduced, and they were not reduced in the last budget.

We say to the provinces that we want to sit down with them. The Minister of Health is organizing the conference that I will be presiding over in June wherein we will make sure that free medicare is portable for all our citizens whatever their financial means, respected and operated efficiently. We will have that meeting to do that and I hope the Reform Party will support this process. In fact, yesterday when I said that we should keep that system in Canada I saw many of his members applauding.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is avoiding the issue. When national medicare was introduced the federal government made a solemn commitment to carry 50 per cent of the cost to the provinces.

Today federal transfers in support of health care in provinces like British Columbia cover only 36 per cent of the cost. Yet the federal government continues to use the Canada Health Act to tell the province how to finance and operate the system. In other words, health care is being choked between reduced federal transfers and an outdated national health care act.

My question to the Prime Minister is very simple. Will he stop the choking? Will he promise that federal transfers in support of health care will be maintained and instruct the health minister to give the provinces more latitude, not less, in developing solutions to their health care needs?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course there are some problems in the administration of medicare. We have said that and we have said that is why we need a conference.

It has been a good system. It is a system the Canadian people want to maintain. We have to sit down with the provinces to make sure that it is revisited at this time and that it is operating properly. It has been a great service to Canada since it was established. I think all Canadians want to keep it.

We want to work to maintain it. I am happy to see the Reform Party supporting the notion that we should have free medicare and not two types of medicare for people in Canada.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health. After 22 months of waiting, BioVac has still not received approval for its BCG cancer vaccine, while Connaught of Toronto obtained such approval after only a 14–month wait. I reminded the minister yesterday that her department was applying a double standard.

My question is this: Now that she has had the time to do the necessary checks, can the minister tell us when BioVac will receive its authorization?

• (1430)

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, an application for the BCG therapeutic product used in treating cancer of the bladder was filed by Connaught Laboratories on March 2, 1989. The notice of compliance was issued on April 25, 1990. The approval process thus took 13 1/2 months.

The Biochem file on BCG cancer, a product intended to treat bladder cancer, was received on June 10, 1992. The hon. member must realize that we receive a growing number of submissions of new research drugs and new drugs that qualify for priority evaluation; this increase is mainly due to progress in the biotechnology industry.

These priority applications take precedence over regular ones that are already being processed in order of receipt. Many physicians wishing to obtain the product from Biochem in order to treat patients in their care can do so through the Emergency Drug Distribution Program.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I personally met with the minister. I wrote to her. I asked her a question in the House yesterday. I ask her the same question again today: When will BioVac have its approval? When? Is that clear?

[English]

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, let me remind the hon. member that my function is to ensure that any medication which receives a notice of compliance is safe and efficacious.

I will only issue a notice of compliance when my department and scientists are absolutely sure it is safe for the people of Canada.

That is the process we follow. It is the process we will continue to follow.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of immigration.

It has been revealed that one of the individuals arrested in Toronto in connection with the Just Desserts killing had an ongoing involvement with Canadian immigration officials and the minister's department.

This individual had been ordered deported in 1992 but had been given a stay of proceedings on that deportation order again by the minister's department in 1993. Had this individual been deported on time he would not have been charged in connection with the murder of Georgina Leimonis.

Why was this individual given a stay on his deportation order in 1993 by the minister's department?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this is a difficult situation. We should be careful and try not to be in contempt of court so as not to prejudice this very important case many Canadians are looking at. Let me say this tragedy moved more than the city of metropolitan Toronto. It moved the whole country to think about that senseless killing.

Let me also put into focus this department moved on the basis of inadmissibility grounds to deport that individual. I can tell the hon. member and this House I believe when we moved to deport that individual the case was made before an immigration appeal member. This is not controlled by my department but is a quasi–judicial independent tribunal.

I will say the system failed us on this case. That strengthens my convictions that the amendments I have been discussing with my officials to strengthen the criminality provisions and to close the loopholes are the right course.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, the individual in question was issued a stay on his deportation order in 1993 despite the fact he had a criminal record as long as his arm, and that was with the knowledge of the department.

• (1435)

When will the minister finally acknowledge that his department's system of background checks and enforcement is not working? How many more lives are going to be lost before the minister takes action to ensure the safety of Canadians?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this member of Parliament does a disservice to the facts of the issue and to the concerns both of us and both sides of this House share. You do not have a monopoly on concern—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Speaker: I would remind hon. colleagues to please address the Chair.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, my department wanted and pushed for deportation. An independent quasi–judicial body stayed the deportation. The adjudicator who made that decision was not reappointed to that board. She was not reappointed by this minister. Therefore we need no lessons from the hon. member.

DEFENCE INDUSTRY PRODUCTIVITY PROGRAM

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, in the past, the Liberal government has recognized on numerous occasions the need to set up a reconversion assistance program for the defence industry Indeed, the situation of these companies is very precarious and no specific assistance is currently provided to those interested in restructuring their operations.

Does the Minister of Industry recognize that the defence industry productivity program, or DIPP, does not provide any specific assistance for conversion purposes, and that the defence industry wants a fund to be set up, using money from the current DIPP budget to support conversion initiatives? Indeed, the budget of this program should be used for that purpose.

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to hear the hon. member refer to that project, because the rules regulating DIPP will be expanded so as to include conversion projects for the defence industry.

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the minister is referring to the future, because right now this program cannot be used to support conversion initiatives by these companies.

Consequently, why does the minister not give us a concrete and specific schedule regarding his conversion support strategy?

[English]

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I do want to assure the member that as was announced in the budget, the broadening of the terms of the DIPP is being worked on at the present time.

The member is aware of the financial limitations the government has. That is why we are also looking not only at making the DIPP contributions repayable in their entirety, but creating a revolving fund. Therefore not only do we aid projects that are directed at defence conversion presently, but we build a fund based on commercial viability that will sustain such projects and those companies that are involved in those sectors of our industry into the future.

CHALLENGER JET

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

It is with a heavy heart that I once again must ask the Prime Minister why he continues to waste tax dollars, this time on a sun and fun holiday among the palms of a Caribbean island.

It is reported the Prime Minister not only used a Challenger jet for a personal vacation, at a cost of slightly more than $250,000 using the Auditor General's formula, he allowed his hangers on and his flight crew to enjoy 10 days in the sun as well.

When will this Prime Minister realize Canadian taxpayers will not accept his free spending ways?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already explained they have asked me to travel on these planes for security reasons. I was already in Mexico and I stayed south for a few days. The member would have complained if the plane had travelled back and forth like it did when it was a trip for the Governor General.

I think they are doing a big disservice to an industry. I was talking with Canadair the other day. That type of question talks down on Canadian airplanes because you pretend it costs tons of money and that is not true. The figure you use is not the real one.

The Speaker: Colleagues, I recognize that in the heat of debate we sometimes forget the Speaker. I would ask all of you to please address your remarks to the Chair.

If the right hon. Prime Minister has not finished, I invite him to finish. If he has, I will go to the next question.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. What did not happen was we did not address the extravagance. It sounds like a two tier system to me. Security for the Prime Minister is extremely important. We realize that.

Did the Prime Minister check the private charter prices? I did and he could have saved $125,000. Why not save money for a change? Quit being so reckless. Will he stop being reckless?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am doing that. It is a plane that is owned by the Canadian government to be used by the Prime Minister of Canada.

I have checked too. I asked Canadair if these planes were transferred to them how much they would charge the government for travelling. They said it would be less than $3,500 an hour. That is the real cost of using these planes.

Not only that, when you calculate the cost of the pilots, you have to understand these are national defence pilots. They have to be in the air so many hours in a month anyway to keep their licences. However you charge the cost to the government when a minister is on board and you do not complain when they use the plane for training.

Be a bit respectful. The Prime Minister of the country should be able to travel like the RCMP requests.

SOCIAL PROGRAM REFORM

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Human Resources Development.

Profound differences remain between Ottawa and the provinces regarding the reform of our social programs. As you know, a federal-provincial conference on the subject was cancelled at the last minute because of objections raised by several provinces.

Furthermore, the minister promised to release a policy paper early next month, setting forth the government's choices and options. Does the minister intend to proceed according to schedule and release his action plan next week, as he promised?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification): Mr. Speaker, contrary to what the hon. member alleges, all the provinces are still very much committed to participating in the process of reform.

I spoke to provincial ministers over the last several days both face to face and by telephone. All of them indicated a continued willingness to work together to find important measures to deliver programs more effectively and more efficiently to Canadians.

When the hon. member asserts there is great conflict and problems, he is not describing what in fact takes place. We postponed the meeting for a period of a couple of weeks to allow the provinces to have more time. I have indicated that we will have a meeting of deputy ministers within a couple of weeks to go over this documentation and based upon that we will then set a new timetable for ministerial meetings.

• (1445)

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup): Mr. Speaker, will the minister confirm that the federal-provincial conference, already cancelled once, has been postponed once again, this time indefinitely, because of the continuing deadlock with British Columbia, Alberta, Ontario and Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member lives in a world of fiction and fantasy. He simply makes up things and then tries to launch them as facts.

That is simply not true. I told him before he read the second question he had prepared that I have talked to all provincial ministers in each province who have indicated their continued willingness to co-operate to get social reform in this country, to put people back to work, to provide a better sense of security and to give some hope back to Canadians.

INFRASTRUCTURE

Mr. Tony Ianno (Trinity—Spadina): My question is for the Minister responsible for Infrastructure.

As the government moves forward with the renewal of Canada's environmental, communications and transportation infrastructure, many of my constituents in Trinity—Spadina are looking forward to the new jobs that will be created by the program for today's and tomorrow's economy.

Can the minister tell us how many jobs Canadians can expect to have generated by this program and its spinoffs and when will these badly needed projects commence?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question which gives me the opportunity to give more good news to this House on how this Liberal government is getting Canadians back to work.

Since I reported last Friday, we have an increase of $8 million of projects that have been approved, another 400 people, and we are now up to 5,500 jobs. We have approved over 350 applications and we have another thousand in the pipeline. What is more, there are people in rural Saskatchewan at this very moment constructing and reconstructing roads for the benefit of the citizens in those communities.

Finally, the original estimate of 60,000 jobs has now been revised as a result of accurate data from Statistics Canada.

TOBACCO

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

When the federal government lowered the cost of cigarettes in an attempt to cut off smuggling, it spawned new problems including increased smuggling of alcohol and interprovincial smuggling of cheap cigarettes.

I ask the Prime Minister if the government has any realistic plans to put out the fires that his cigarette policies have lit.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the program that we put in place to stop the smuggling of cigarettes has been a great success. There were reports that there was an increase in smoking but the articles did not report the fact that cigarette export sales declined while domestic shipments increased.

In terms of consumption, when you look at the total number of cigarette shipments a year ago compared to the total number of cigarettes shipments this year, there was a decrease of 3 per cent.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker, for the Prime Minister.

Earlier this month the premier of Alberta in his role as chairman of the most recent western premiers' conference wrote to the Prime Minister asking for his co-operation to combat the potential flood of smuggled tobacco from central Canada into western Canada. One of the recommendations was to implement a uniform federal tobacco tax rate across all of Canada to lessen the incentive for interprovincial smuggling.

Can the Prime Minister tell the House if he has made any effort to adopt this proposal from the western premiers?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we made exactly the same offer to all the provinces. Some decided to take it, others decided not to take it. We have offered exactly the same to all the provinces. We did not treat any province differently.

COLLÈGE MILITAIRE ROYAL DE SAINT–JEAN

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Defence has repeated many times that the government would soon make public its decision on the future of the military college in Saint–Jean, on the basis of consultations and recommendations, especially from the Government of Quebec.

Can the minister tell us his intentions on a new military role for Saint–Jean and report on the outcome of the negotiations with the Government of Quebec?

[English]

Hon. David Michael Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my colleague the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, who is ill today, is looking into the alternate uses of the Collège militaire royal de Saint–Jean but I wish to reaffirm that the government in its budget of February 22 did announce that we will be moving to one college which will be located in Kingston, Ontario.

I made a statement yesterday in the House and the member's colleague from Charlesbourg replied on behalf of his party in terms of how we will make Kingston much more bilingual than it is already. I also announced that the commandant of the Collège militaire royal de Saint–Jean, General Emond, will start in July of this year as the new commandant of the Collège militaire royal located at Kingston to ensure that there is an equitable transition and to make sure that we do indeed continue the very excellent tradition of having a bilingual officer formation in the Canadian Armed Forces.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean): With reference to the minister's statement yesterday, Mr. Speaker, he announced two plans: one to make the military college in Kingston bilingual and the other concerning curricula.

Can the minister tell us how much these measures will cost and can he confirm that these additional costs will cancel for all practical purposes the meagre amounts he intended to save, starting next year, by closing the military college in Saint–Jean?

[English]

Hon. David Michael Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have covered this a number of times in the House.

We expect the closure of Royal Roads Military College and the Collège militaire royal de Saint–Jean to accrue about $35 million annually to the federal treasury. There are one–time costs associated with the reformation in Kingston but that was all in the budget statement. The hon. member should read that.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

Last week the minister's parliamentary secretary confirmed that Canada Pension Plan premiums will have to be increased from the current 5.2 per cent of earnings in order to cover payments to our aging population. In fact at the current rate in less than 25 years these premiums will eat up 10 per cent of every worker's paycheque.

Has the minister looked at this problem? What is he doing to keep premiums in check?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification): Mr. Speaker, I want to report to the hon. member that I have read the press reports.

It would be very important to refer him to a study or assessment that was undertaken by the Canadian Institute of Actuaries which noted that the financing of the Canada Pension Plan is on an actuarially sound basis. The formulas are there.

We all understand that as the population changes and as we go into the future where there will be a larger number of Canadians who are in retirement age, there will be some pressures on the Canada Pension Plan. That is the reason why my colleague, the Minister of Finance, announced in the budget that we will put forward a paper that will make some assessment and analysis of what those kinds of issues will be. We will have an opportunity for a public debate, assessment or dialogue on what some of the resolutions or responses should be.

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, we look forward to that public debate.

The surplus fund or contingency fund that the minister mentioned is presently invested in low interest provincial government bonds that subsidize the debt of provincial governments.

What is the government doing to ensure a better return on investment so that Canadians can count on having the pension they spend their whole lives contributing to?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification): Mr. Speaker, just to put this matter in its proper context, the managers of the fund have maintained throughout that this was not an unexpected development of the contingency fund, that it would have some pressures.

Certainly for the next three years it has full funding to cover any possible change or alteration in the situation of the fund. It is certainly actuarially sound and has sufficient contingency funds within it.

As the hon. member knows, according to legislation there must be changes in premium rates along the way. That is one reason why we have emphasized in the budget the importance of bringing down the cost of payroll tax, things like UI premiums and CPP premiums, so that we can maintain an active incentive for the private sector. That is one reason why the paper that the Minister of Finance announced will be a very important document for us to study.

GROUNDFISH LICENCES

Mr. Derek Wells (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

In December 1992 the government announced a freeze on all inactive groundfish licences. As a result of this, in order to demonstrate their attachment to the fishery and to avoid losing their licences, fishermen felt compelled to increase their fishing effort. Last week, in announcing the Atlantic groundfish strategy, the minister promised that he would review this policy.

Will the minister advise the House as to what action has been taken on this issue?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the member for the question. Indeed, he and virtually every other member of the Atlantic caucus raised the issue of frozen or inactive groundfish licences with me.

Following consultation with members of the Atlantic caucus and consultation with the Canadian Council of Fish Harvesters, I have come to a decision to put in place a new professional standard affecting the fishermen that will have the effect of thawing or releasing the freeze on the vast majority of those so–called frozen groundfish licences.

This decision will have the effect of contributing nothing to capacity as it affects only professional or bona fide fishermen. It will increase not one cent the cost of the Atlantic groundfish strategy, but it will do a great deal in the sense of fairness and, may I say, simple justice to restore the trust between fishermen, professional fishermen, bona fide fishermen and their government.

I thank the member and indeed all members of the Atlantic caucus for their active input in assisting me in making this decision. I think we sure tried.

REPRODUCTIVE TECHNOLOGIES

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

Last February 9, the minister stated that the recommendations in the Baird report on new reproductive technologies were being thoroughly reviewed, but the government has still not indicated what it intends to do with these recommendations. I want to point out that Canada is one of only a handful of industrialized countries with no legislation on reproductive technologies.

Does the minister agree on the need to act and regulate practices related to reproductive technologies, as is recommended in the Baird report, and will he undertake to table a bill before the House recesses for the summer in June?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I decline to give the undertaking. I think it is premature. The royal commission which reported in February delivered some 300 recommendations to government, most of which were for my colleague, the Minister of Health, but many of which affected the Ministry of Justice in so far as they suggested changes to the Criminal Code.

As I mentioned to the hon. member on the last occasion when she raised this important matter, there are complex questions arising from the recommendations such as, for example, the intersection of criminal law where it tries to prevent horrendous interference with genetic matters and, on the other hand, legitimate research in the university setting which can go to push back the frontiers of medical knowledge.

I say to the hon. member that I share her sense that these issues are important, that they should come before Parliament, but I will not bring them here until we have assessed them thoroughly so that we can form the issues properly and members of this House can make a decision based on all the facts.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert): Mr. Speaker, does the minister intend to amend the Criminal Code and prohibit the marketing of human embryos, which is a measure recommended in the Baird report and largely supported by the public?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the hon. member, I decline to give a piecemeal position of the government on these issues. I would rather have the matter come forward in its entirety with the complex underlying issues fully assessed. Therefore, I will respond to her question at the appropriate time.

FIRST NATIONS

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The wife of the chair of the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development has been hired by a federally funded Assembly of First Nations as a media relations officer.

My colleague from the Official Opposition has asked for the chairman's resignation. A spokesperson from the Prime Minister's office is quoted as saying of this arrangement: "This is not a conflict". Does the Prime Minister agree with this statement attributed to his office?

• (1500)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am answering the question in my capacity as House leader. I point out to the hon. member that a committee chairman is not a member of the government. Therefore the concerns which underlie the hon. member's question do not apply.

Furthermore, I think we have reached the time in our society when spouses can be considered independent of members of Parliament and have their own careers.

The Speaker: Order. As I mentioned last week in a brief statement which I made, committees really stand on their own. Questions with regard to the specifics of committees should probably be addressed in the committees themselves. If, however, there are questions of a general nature which I feel impact upon the administration of government then by and large I would permit these questions to be in order.

I would urge hon. members, if they have questions with the administration of government in mind as opposed to committees, to put them as such.

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, this is another example of the need for this long awaited ethics counsellor.

Will the Prime Minister agree that the long awaited ethics counsellor would find this arrangement to be a blatant conflict of interest?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer given by the House leader is the appropriate one.

In our society a member of Parliament is a member of Parliament and the career of his or her spouse should not be affected by the status of a member of Parliament.

There are some restrictions for cabinet ministers that must be respected, but spouses of members of Parliament have the right to earn a living. They have the capacity to earn a living. This is the fundamental right of equality in our society.

HANDGUNS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

On Monday the Minister of Justice met with representatives of Concordia University, the Canadian Safety Council, the Canadian Bar Association, the Ottawa Chief of Police and others who asked for a ban on handguns.

Since handguns are not used for hunting but are very often used for criminal purpose, will the minister propose legislative amendments to implement these proposals? What was his answer to these groups on Monday?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed the meeting on Monday. The delegation that came to see me in my office was as described by the hon. member and served to remind me that the vast majority of Canadians want effective gun control in the country.

It is recognized that this is only part of the solution. It is recognized that we have to deal with the smuggling of illegal arms and deal properly with those who use firearms in the commission of offences. At the same time it is important to recognize that guns are used in suicides, over 1,000 each year, and that 3,000 firearms are lost or stolen from the homes of lawful owners each year and then turn up in the hands of criminals who subsequently injure or kill with them.

While respecting the legitimate rights of lawful gun owners in the country, the government is committed toward more effective gun control. We will be responding to concerns such as those expressed on Monday last in my office by those who visited on the occasion described by the hon. member.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–241, an act to amend the Income Tax Act (child support payments).

She said: Mr. Speaker, the current tax treatment of child support payments requires custodial parents to pay taxes on the support they receive while non–custodial parents are allowed to fully deduct the amount.

Canada's tax policy taxes child support payments unlike what we see in the United States, Australia, Britain, Sweden, and many other countries of the world.

While the average child support order covers less than half the minimum cost of raising a child, up to one–third or more of the support payments that are meant to help feed and clothe children are taken away in taxes.

This private member's bill will alleviate this injustice and will work to bring fairness into our tax system, particularly as it relates to the future of our children.

I might add that I am paralleling this private member's bill with my private member's motion. The issue is relevant and this injustice to our nation's children must be corrected.

PETITIONS

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Jean–Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions signed by about 40 constituents of mine.

The first petition deals with the sanctity of human life. The petitioners pray that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no change in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

The second petition deals with the sanctity of life but for a different reason. The petitioners pray that Parliament act immediately to protect the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

PORT OF CHURCHILL

Mr. Elijah Harper (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present certified petitions from over 100 of my constituents and others in support of the increased use of the port of Churchill.

The port of Churchill is an untapped national resource. The petitioners call on Parliament to direct the hon. minister responsible for the wheat board to maximize the port's use and to ship at least 5 per cent of Canada's annual grain shipments through the port.

The Canadians who built the port and the railway to Churchill had a vision of Canada and of the north. I join the petitioners in hoping that this vision can live on.

ETHANOL

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition on ethanol. The ethanol industry will certainly create a boon for the agricultural industry. Ethanol is one of the most environmentally friendly fuels available.

Residents in the Chatham, Essex and Kent county areas are very concerned that the government show a consideration on taxation with regard to ethanol.

They humbly ask the Parliament of Canada to allow a decade of tax allowance in order that the industry may get under way. The economic values to the industry are far greater than the tax costs.

Mr. Pat O'Brien (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I too rise in the House today to present a petition in support of ethanol as a fuel. Its time has come in Ontario.

Some 200 petitioners call on the government to extend the exemption on the excise portion of ethanol for a decade to allow the strong and self–sufficient ethanol industry in Canada to go forward.

I present this petition on their behalf.

Mrs. Rose–Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present on behalf of the constituents of Lambton—Middlesex and area a petition which has been duly certified by the clerk of petitions.

It requests Parliament to maintain the present exemption on the excise portion of ethanol for a decade, allowing for a strong and self–sufficient ethanol industry in Canada to go forward.

POINT OF ORDER

PETITIONS PRESENTED IN THE HOUSE—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Deputy Speaker: Dear colleagues, the Chair is now ready to deal with the point of order raised by the hon. member for Chicoutimi, on Monday, April 18, 1994, concerning the manner in which certain petitions have recently been presented in the House.

The right of the public to petition Parliament is very important because it constitutes the only means by which individual Canadians can directly place grievances before this body and make their concerns known. As is noted in Bourinot's Fourth Edition at page 231, the signing and presentation of public petitions is highly appreciated by Parliament and in many cases assists it in forming its opinions and in taking appropriate action.

[English]

Since individual Canadians are not permitted to address the House directly, as members know, petitions are presented by members. Groups and individuals with petitions for the House must therefore enlist the aid of MPs to have their petitions certified and presented. Citation 1038 of Beauchesne's sixth edition states that members are not bound to present petitions and cannot be compelled to do so. Nevertheless, it is not unusual for members to present a petition to the House whether or not they agree with its contents.

Under the provisions of the standing orders a petition may be presented in one of two ways. Standing Order 36(5) states:

> A petition to the House may be presented by a Member at any time during the sitting of the House by filing the same with the Clerk of the House.

This is also known as tabling by the back door. The second method of presenting a public petition is prescribed by Standing Order 36(6) which states:

> Any Member desiring to present a petition, in his or her place in the House may do so on "Presenting Petitions", a period not to exceed 15 minutes, during the ordinary daily routine of business.

As noted at page 111 of the Annotated Standing Orders, several conditions apply to the presentation of petitions in the House during Routine Proceedings, the most notable of which is the prohibition contained in Standing Order 36(7) on "debate on or in relation to" petitions presented.

On February 26, 1986, Speaker Bosley issued guidelines which not only reiterated provisions of Standing Order 36(7) but also invoked the practices which had evolved here on the manner of presenting petitions, and I quote:

> In presenting a petition during Routine Proceedings, the member may make a brief—

I underline the word brief.

> —summary of the prayer of the petition, state the parties from whom it comes and the number of signatures it contains, but may not make a speech or enter into debate on or in relation to the petition. The member should also indicate that the petition has been certified in order, pursuant to the standing orders.

Therefore, commenting in any way on the merits of a petition could be considered a form of debate on the petition. In this Parliament, on several occasions some Members have commented favourably or adversely on the petitions they are presenting, prompting other members to voice various objections to those comments.

Since there is only a limited period during each sitting when members may present petitions, saying anything other than what is normally permitted takes time away from other members who wish to present petitions. Members should bear in mind that the Member presenting a petition in the House or filing it with the Clerk is acting as a messenger or intermediary between Parliament and the petitioners.

If the rules permitted debate on petitions or if the subject of the petition were to come before the House for debate in some other manner, the member's view on the subject matter would be relevant and vital to the process. As things stand, however, the role of the member, while essential, is limited.

Therefore the Chair would ask members to refrain from commenting on petitions they present other than to simply note the prayer of the petition, the number of signataries, and their place of residence.

[English]

Finally, should members choose to present petitions with which they disagree they may do so during Routing Proceedings without comment or simply file them with the Clerk of the House at any time.

Both methods of presentation fulfil the requirements of the standing orders and both are equally valid.

I hope this brief statement will help explain the procedure on presenting petitions to the House.

I thank the hon. member for Chicoutimi for raising this matter and thus allowing the Chair to provide the House with an explanation of the process.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT AGREEMENTS ACT

The House resumed consideration from April 26 of the motion that Bill C–22, an act respecting certain agreements concerning the redevelopment and operation of terminals 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson International Airport, be read the second time and referred to a committee; and of the amendment; and of the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–22 will be an opportunity for me to demonstrate the unfair treatment given Jean Lesage Airport in my riding, compared with other Canadian airports.

Since the opening of the 35th Parliament on January 17, we have on many occasions heard Liberal and Reform Party members boast of the advantages of Canadian federalism for Quebecers. In my speech on Bill C–22, I will try to show how different the real situation is by looking at the problems we have with air transportation.

First of all, we condemn the centralizing approach of Transport Canada in decisions that affect Quebec. For instance, there is the story around the selection of Mirabel as a second airport for Montreal. The result: 20 years of economic disaster. Mirabel is still finding its feet, Dorval has stagnated, and Toronto has emerged as the big winner from Transport Canada's planning disaster. From 1970 to 1991, Air Canada moved 12 per cent of its employees from Montreal to Toronto, and from 1977 to 1991, Montreal lost 22 per cent of its pilots, while the number of pilots in Toronto increased by 34 per cent. In 1988, Air Canada transferred its pilot training services to Toronto, and in 1991, 12 management positions were transferred as well.

The centralizing approach of Transport Canada has affected air traffic control as well.

• (1520)

Terminal control units have been transferred to regional control centres. Halifax, Thunder Bay, North Bay, Regina, Saskatoon and Sault Ste. Marie each lost their radar control facilities.

The terminal at the airport in Quebec City will be closed in July 1994, which means that after that date, aside from the seven regional control centres, only Ottawa and Calgary will be allowed to maintain their air traffic control units.

Nearly $1 billion has been spent as part of a plan that has created a number of security problems by making vast areas extremely vulnerable, in case of a malfunction in regional radars or if regional control centres have to be evacuated in an emergency, and I will get back to this later on.

I would now like to make some comparisons to illustrate how ignorant Liberal and Reform Party members are when they claim Quebec is complaining on a full stomach.

The airport in Quebec City was built on 633 hectares of land, the airport in Halifax on 930 hectares, Winnipeg on 1504 hectares, Toronto on 1714 hectares and Edmonton on 2669 hectares.

Liberal and Reform Party members will have to admit that Quebecers paid approximately 25 per cent of the cost of these locations, which are much bigger than the site at Jean Lesage Airport in Quebec City.

These properties have cost Quebecers a lot of money. Only the airports in Newfoundland, Charlottetown, Regina, Yellowknife and Whitehorse are on sites smaller than the location in Quebec City.

If we compare air terminal areas, Quebec has 12,126 square metres, Ottawa has 18,044, Winnipeg has 24,834, Halifax has 24,870 and Edmonton 34,374. Liberal and Reform Party members will have to admit that Quebecers paid 25 per cent of the cost of the air terminals in these Canadian cities, while they have to make do with an area two to three times as small. Once again, the other provinces have cost Quebec a lot of money.

My Liberal and Reform Party colleagues might want to justify Transport Canada's neglect of Quebec, by assuming that the volume of air traffic at the airport in Quebec City is smaller than at other Canadian airports.

Here are some more figures to demonstrate the greed of Transport Canada. What we have here is the increase in transborder and international flights from 1988 to 1992: Halifax went up 12.5 per cent; Winnipeg, 13 per cent; Calgary, 15 per cent; Quebec City, 179 p. 100.

I did not make this up. These figures are from Transport Canada.

This was about increases in volume. If we compare the flight volume in Quebec City with the volume at the other airports I mentioned, we see that these volumes are comparable. It is therefore not surprising that, with a comparable flight volume and an operating area two to three times as small, the quality of service provided by Transport Canada at Jean Lesage Airport is very poor. In fact, according to Transport Canada's own criteria, the level of service at the airport in Quebec City, rates an F, which means: system saturated, congestion and unacceptable delays. So much for the profitable federalism you are trying to sell Quebecers!

Everyone refers to Jean Lesage Airport as a bush airport. Considering the millions of dollars invested in other Canadian airports and especially in Toronto, the situation in Quebec city is a disgrace. The only explanation is the irresponsible attitude, if not bad faith, of Transport Canada and the Liberal and Conservative members who sat and sit on the benches opposite.

This is one more indication that, under Canadian federalism, Liberal and Conservative members from Quebec have always done the bidding of the English Canadian majority and never had any real power. The presence of Prime Ministers from Quebec was, and still is, merely an illusion of power.

Let us now go back to air traffic control. While the regional centres in other provinces serve, on average, some 2.6 million people, in Quebec, according to Transport Canada plans, the Montreal regional air traffic control centre will be serving a population of 7 million. This is what we mean by profitable federalism for all Canadians, except Quebecers, who are paying to provide other provinces with services they can only dream of.

We are not fooled by all this! Why is Transport Canada trying to close the Quebec City airport terminal air traffic control unit? The reason invoked is savings. However, we do not believe it, because we can prove that a series of decisions proposed by Transport Canada will require much larger investments than what is requested by the people involved in the Quebec City area. We believe that the real reason, although nobody would admit to it, is the elimination of a French-speaking air traffic control centre. Then Canada would be left with only two officially bilingual centres, one in Montreal and one in Ottawa.

Speaking of bilingualism at the Ottawa airport, how do you expect francophones of this country to feel that they get some respect, when they know that Transport Canada has been trying unsuccessfully for five years to render air traffic control bilingual at the airport of the national capital of a country which claims to have an official languages policy. This is the Prime Minister's Canada.

By the way, why was the Ottawa airport terminal air traffic control unit not transferred to Toronto, like all other units within a given region? Air traffic control in Ottawa was supposed to become bilingual, so if it were to be transferred to Toronto, could that centre be expected to become bilingual one day? The answer is obvious.

This is one more example of the so-called profitability of federalism as it applies, this time, to air transportation. Over the years, Quebecers have come to realize that Canadian federalism cannot be reformed and cannot be profitable. I should add, by the way, that if the other provinces had not come to the same conclusion, that is to say that Quebec is profitable for them, why would they be so strenuously opposed to Quebec sovereignty?

As for the possibility of the Canadian government compensating people who were about to extort millions of dollars from Canadians, it is outrageous. If we should compensate friends of Liberal and Conservative regimes for profit losses, how should we compensate Quebecers for 125 years of federalism that kept them unemployed and dependent? This unfair treatment of the people of Quebec began in 1840, when England imposed the Act of Union between Upper and Lower Canada. In doing so, England wanted to make Canadians living in Lower Canada, French Canadians, pay part of Upper Canada's debt. Quebec has already paid its share of compensation and then some.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, clearly, I will vote against this bill.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, listening to the analysis presented by our colleague opposite, it appears to be a black and white issue. His view of history betrays prejudices which have no room in our world.

Sure, if you look at our history, you will find that not everything was perfect, but an analysis such as yours is bordering on slander. I wonder where you found all those data to reach such a negative conclusion. It is unfair. There are two sides to every story and you must take it into consideration when analyzing situations like this one, especially going all the way back to 1840.

Would you be willing to consider the benefits of our confederation, one of the best in the world? It will be difficult to convince you that, were it not for the Canadian federation, you would not have been able to maintain a second official language. It would have been impossible anywhere else but in Canada. We are the only living proof of that in the world.

The Deputy Speaker: Before recognizing the member, I would like once again to ask you to address your remarks to the Chair. It lowers the chances of friction.

Mr. Paré: Mr. Speaker, most of the data I quoted in my speech come from reports published by Transport Canada. To compare the situation at the Quebec City Airport with that of airports in other capitals, be it in the provinces or the Northwest Territories, I relied mainly on statistics from Transport Canada. To compare the increased frequency of flights between those airports, I used Transport Canada data. To compare air traffic, again I used Transport Canada data.

Mr. Speaker, Quebecers have studied history. We may not have had the same history books as our colleagues opposite, however, I can assure you that, in the next few months, we will be prepared for the upcoming debate on nationhood for Quebec. Rest assured that the system has given us all the arguments we need to prove what I just started demonstrating. It is only a matter of time. We only have to read the official reports published by the federal government and Statistics Canada, to find the necessary data. We will make them public and circulate them among Quebecers, who will, no doubt, come to the proper conclusion.

The Deputy Speaker: I inform the House that, after five hours of debate, we will now proceed to the ten-minute allotted time period for speeches without questions or comments. The member for Chicoutimi.

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on the amendment to Bill C-22.

First of all, I would like to briefly review the sequence of events. In 1989, Paxport Inc. spontaneously submitted a proposal for the privatization of Terminals 1 and 2. The government of the day nixed the idea. That was in 1989. However, in October of 1990, the government invited the private sector to submit proposals for the redevelopment of Terminals 1 and 2. In 1991, Terminal 3 opened for business under the management of Claridge Holdings Inc. On March 11, 1992, the government formally issued requests for proposals for the privatization of Terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson. This preceded the decision on the proposed expansion of the runway system at the airport. Only a one-phase process was called for, involving no prequalification, whereas the bidding for the privatization of Terminal 3 involved a two-stage process, initially soliciting interested parties and selecting a short list of bidders, and then encouraging detailed submissions.

As for the competition process itself, the Nixon report states the following on page 2, and I quote: "The Request for Proposals did not set out many of the fundamental aspects of the proposed development, but left these to bidders to define for themselves". Therefore, it was left to bidders to make projections on passenger traffic at the airport. Yet, data on passenger traffic is critical to determining the pace and scope of the redevelopment. With a project of this magnitude, how could it have been left to the bidders to define such crucial parameters?

Moreover, only 90 days were provided for responses. This is an unusually short deadline, considering that we are dealing with a highly complex, long-term contract covering a period of 57 years. What reason could there be for setting such a tight deadline if not to give an advantage to certain companies, such as Paxport which had submitted an earlier privatization plan in 1989, and Claridge which was already managing Terminal 3 at Pearson? In the end, the government received only two bids, one from Claridge and one from Paxport.

On December 7, 1992, the Paxport proposal was selected as the best of the two bids. The company was required to demonstrate by February 15, 1993 that its proposal was financially viable.

As it could not do so nor, according to its president, obtain the necessary capital from other sources, Paxport and Claridge established T1 T2 Limited Partnership less than two months later. In fact, Paxport created a joint venture with its only competitor.

Why did the government then in office award a 57-year contract worth hundreds of millions of dollars to a financially-troubled company that was also close to the party? All interested parties in the Toronto region knew at the time that Paxport was in financial difficulty. The government cannot claim it acted in good faith.

As you may recall, one of the reasons Paxport was chosen was to encourage healthy competition between the manager of Terminals 1 and 2 and the manager of Terminal 3.

On August 30, 1993, the Minister of Transport announced a general agreement between the two parties. He promised that a final agreement would be signed in the fall.

On September 8, 1993, the Government of Canada called an election. The Nixon report summarizes the events as follows: "Prior to the conclusion of the legal agreement the Leader of the Opposition (now the Prime Minister) indicated clearly that parties proceeding to conclude this transaction did so at their own risk and that a new government"—that is, the people opposite—"would not hesitate to pass legislation to block the privatization of terminals 1 and 2 if the transaction was not in the public interest". The legal agreement was signed nevertheless.

Under the pressure of public opinion, the government ordered a review of this highly controversial deal and the Nixon report was published on November 29, 1993. On December 3, 1993, the Prime Minister announced the cancellation of the agreement.

The Nixon report outlines the process and argues that it strongly favoured one of the proposals since Paxport had already submitted a privatization proposal.

The report itself describes in plain language the abuses that were committed in this deal: "Other management and construction firms not having been involved in the maneuvering preceding the RFP had no chance to come up to speed and submit a bid in the short time permitted".

Other companies should have been invited to bid and should have been given a reasonable deadline. No prequalification financial analysis was required in this request for proposals.

Finally, the Conservative government signed the contract in the final stretch of an election campaign. Allow me to quote from the report. "It is a well-known and carefully observed tradition that when governments dissolve Parliament they must accept a restricted power of decision during the election period". The report concludes that the privatization process was far from promoting the interest of the public to the fullest.

We demand a royal commission of inquiry. The Nixon investigation was conducted in private. In the red book, the Liberals say that people are irritated because key parts of public business are conducted behind closed door.

The government keeps harping on about transparency. Here is a chance to show us they believe in their principles and can apply them responsibly.

A government that preaches transparency has to shed some light on this whole issue. Taxpayers have the right to know and to be provided with inside information on these transactions. The government cancelled the privatization plan, yet this bill provides for compensation, although the parties were aware of a possible contract cancellation.

• (1540)

The Crown does not have to compensate investors for miscalculations. Clause 10, paragraph 2, reads as follows:

> No amount is payable under an agreement entered into under this section in relation to (a) any loss of profit, or (b) any fee paid for the purpose of lobbying a public office holder, within the meaning of subsection 2(1) of the Lobbyists Registration Act, in connection with any agreement.

It has to be stronger than that. Public funds are at stake.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to denounce the doings of some politicians in this country. More particularly, I intend to denounce the almost incestuous practices which are part of the culture of some people who try every day to influence government decisions, using all the means at their disposal, from childhood friendships to services rendered, including election organizing and political party financing.

These people try to change the normal course of events, to trade the public interest for private gain and, sadly, to relegate to the background parliamentarians' role as their constituents' elected representatives. I therefore speak on this bitter taste left by Bill C-22, the uncertainties surrounding the privatization of Pearson Airport in which lobbyists, politicians, former senior civil servants and friends of the government seem to be involved.

The Pearson Airport issue is worth considering, beyond Bill C-22. The government is wrong in refusing to clear up the whole matter. By simply clamping a lid on it while clause 10 would pay generous compensation set in secret and at its discretion, without consulting parliamentarians, the government is showing the people of Quebec and Canada its true colours, while its red book talked about a code of ethics for lobbying.

Has the powerful lobby around it made the government change its mind? If not, as I hope, the government has the ideal issue before it to show its good will, to set a new path in the conduct of affairs of state and to give back to our fellow citizens a minimum of trust in their political leaders.

At a time when polls and all opinion surveys agree that the people mistrust and doubt their political leaders and hold them in low esteem, is it not worth confronting the old demons which haunt the halls and corridors of government and giving the people what they want: honesty, openness and the plain simple truth? The Pearson Airport issue is perfect for this exercise and I am convinced that, in a free vote, parliamentarians would listen to their conscience and go for transparency, legitimacy and restraint.

The government has the duty to hold a public inquiry on the privatization of that airport. By refusing to do so and not following the suggestion made by the Bloc Quebecois, the government would not fulfil its responsibilities; it would renege on its election promises, and it would in fact endorse methods used by Conservatives. The government would merely replace a few beneficiaries.

As Mr. Nixon mentioned in his report, the privatization of Pearson Airport is an obvious example of political interference, irregularities and maneuvering. This is why, if the government has nothing to hide or to protect, the issue must be thoroughly examined and must stand as an example to ensure that such a situation does not occur again.

In 1987, when the federal government implemented a new management policy regarding Canadian airports, it did so mainly to involve local authorities in the development of airport sites. This was the case for Vancouver and Montreal, among others, where non-profit corporations manage airport facilities. In Toronto, the situation was very different, perhaps because Pearson Airport was the most profitable in Canada. In a context of freer trade, which is a sacred cow, the thinking goes like this: Why should the government keep a profitable venture when it can look after so many non-profitable ones?

Far from promoting public interest, the transaction took place in the midst of an election campaign, for the benefit of the only two bidders, former competitors now united to reap the profits. Paxport Inc., whose bid had been approved by the government without any prior financial analysis, was not able to come up with the funds necessary to conclude the transaction involving terminals 1 and 2. Paxport joins forces with Claridge Inc., which already controls terminal 3 via Pearson Development Corporation.

This merger produces T1 T2 Partnership. And there you have it! Pearson, which is a very profitable airport, is completely privatized for the benefit of a single group. The financial details of the deal are kept secret, but when reviewed by Robert Nixon and other Ontario investigators, they do not seem to be compatible with public policy. How many millions of dollars are we talking about? We have to know in order to determine how much we are ready to pay to show our appreciation to government supporters. It is in the best interest of Canadians to know these things, because it is their money the government is squandering and wasting away on such schemes.

It is also in the interest of the public to find out who took part in those deals and how they managed to come up with such irregular and intricate deals. This information will only come out of an in–depth inquiry, which the government must set up.

Right now, we only know who the lead actors in the Pearson deal were and notice that they all are closely linked either to the Conservative Party or the Liberal Party. For instance, Claridge Properties Inc., belongs to Charles Bronfman, who is well–known for his ties to the Liberal Party of Canada. Senator Léo Kolber sat on the board of directors of Claridge when the deal was signed and, during the election campaign, he held a party at $1,000 a plate, which Mr. Bronfman and the current Prime Minister, among others, attended.

Herb Metcalf, a lobbyist for Claridge, is a former political organizer for Mr. Chrétien, while Ramsey Withers, deputy minister of Transport at the time of the request for proposals process concerning Terminal 3, is another lobbyist well–known for his close ties to the current prime minister.

At Claridge, to strike a balance between red and blue, there were also Conservative lobbyists involved in this deal: Pat MacAdam, a college friend of Brian Mulroney, Bill Fox, former press secretary to and personal friend of Brian Mulroney, and finally Harry Near, a long–time party activist.

Paxport Inc. also has some Conservative friends even though it reportedly also maintains close ties with the Liberal Party of Canada. There is Don Matthew, former chairman of Brian Mulroney's leadership campaign, former chairman of the Conservative Party and of the party's fund–raising campaign. Another former chief of staff of Brian Mulroney, Fred Doucet, acted as a Conservative lobbyist for Paxport while the consortium with Claridge was being planned. Other lobbyists, like Bill Neville, Hugh Riopelle and John Legate, are all known to have easy access to Brian Mulroney Cabinet members.

Given this information and all the disturbing matters raised in the Nixon report, the government simply cannot brush aside this issue, as it is trying to do with Bill C–22.

In his report, Mr. Nixon talks about political manipulation, which is a serious allegation. Will we encourage this by handing to the minister, under the cover of section 10, a blank cheque for the payment of compensations as he sees fit? The Nixon Report indicates that financiers and lobbyists tried to put one over on us, the taxpayers of Canada and of Quebec, with this project. Will we help them to con us even more?

The answer is no, and I will conclude with this. Taxpayers have already paid too much, and they need to know why. Thus, we must reject Bill C–22 and soon proceed with a royal commission of inquiry.

Mr. Maurice Dumas (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, lobbying has evolved considerably over the last few years. The real transformation came about in the early 70s. Before then, Canadians thought that lobbying was virtually non–existent and this subject was seldom discussed. However, in the early 80s, lobbying became part of the federal decision–making process.

In its famous red book, the Liberal Party talks about making government more transparent in order to restore public confidence. However, it is mentioned in the Nixon report that some politicians showed an enormous interest in the Pearson Airport transaction. In his report, Robert Nixon states, and I quote: "My review has left me with one conclusion, to leave in place an inadequate contract arrived at with such a flawed process and under the shadow of possible political manipulation is unacceptable".

I will now summarize the evolution of lobbying before telling you about the real players in the Pearson Airport deal.

In view of the recent death of Richard Nixon, I do not need to remind members of the Watergate scandal in the 1970s, a scandal which shook the confidence of our neighbours to the south in their political system. Need I remind members also of the Canadian Pacific scandal in the 1870s, one of the first political scandals to take place in Canada. That scandal was about making donations to the election fund. In fact, Sir Alexander Mackenzie had made honesty the theme of his Liberal election campaign, and in the process brought down the government of Sir John A. Macdonald.

Later on, under the Conservative government, draftsmen began to work on a bill stating the basic principles of a lobbyists registration system. Its foundation was Bill C–82, now entitled "Lobbyists Registration Act", afterward referred to as R.S., 1985, c. 44, assented to September 13, 1988 and in force September 30, 1989. That act was subsequently amended by Bill C–76, passed February 22, 1993.

Let us ask ourselves: What is really a lobbyist? A lobbyist can be defined as an individual or a corporation which, for payment or other compensation, makes representations for a client to ministers or officials. The basic principles can be summed up this way: public access to government; transparency of dealings with governments; simplicity of the system's administration.

The Ninth Report to the House of Commons by the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations, tabled in 1993, stated and I quote: "When lobbying is conducted away from public view, there is a greater opportunity for decisions that undermine the public interest".

• (1555)

Thus, lobbyists are required to file returns with registrars. There are now different categories of lobbyists.

First, there are professional lobbyists who, for payment and on behalf of a client, undertake to arrange a meeting with a public office holder in an attempt to influence him or her on legislative proposals, on the passage or defeat of a bill or on the awarding of monetary grants or government contracts. These lobbyists are subject to very strict regulations.

And then, there are the other lobbyists. They are employees who, as a significant part of their duties, communicate with public office holders. Let us note that the registry of lobbyists may be consulted by the public. This second category of lobbyists is a problem because they are not subject to the same disclosure procedures.

In 1993, the standing committee recommended the elimination of distinctions between different categories concerning mandatory disclosure. It is crucial that we support those recommendations by the standing committee, since many lobbyists do not abide by the law. An anti–avoidance rule is needed. Obviously, staunch opposition is to be expected from many lobbyists.

The concept of openness should also apply to the financing of political parties. Incidentally, on March 13, my colleague, the hon. member for Richelieu, introduced a motion to restrict donations by individuals to $5,000 a year and to eliminate all corporate contributions.

That motion reminded us that the real bosses are the voters and not the big backers.

The hon. member for Richelieu went on to say: "Although the proportion has changed, the amount provided is still significant and a potential source of conflict. Since the reform of 1974 and the ensuing evolution of fundraising, small contributions from private individuals account for a larger share of the financing of political parties. Such democratization is very much due to the institution of a federal tax credit on political contributions, which was adopted in 1974".

Mr. Speaker, some people may think the current legislation is an adequate means to limit influence peddling and that there is no need to impose a ceiling on donations. However, the accusations of influence peddling made in the last ten years against members of the Senate or the House of Commons tend to prove otherwise.

More and more, Canadians and Quebecers are demanding openness. This disproportionate influence must stop and the people must regain control over our electoral system. Quebec's legislation is a model for all aspects of the electoral system. Popular financing and the requirement to disclose the source and amount of contributions are an integral part of Quebecers' customs.

The last point I want to mention is the recommendation of a code of ethics for elected representative and senior managers, which would allow for more transparency in the registration of lobbyists. This recommendation leads me to the Pearson Airport affair.

Many players are involved and the two principal political parties were largely implicated in this scheming. We find the following companies: Claridge Properties Inc., Paxport Inc., Pearson Development Corporation, and names like Peter Coughlin, Senator Leo Kolber, Herb Metcalfe, Ray Hession, Don Matthews, Otto Jelinek and Fred Doucet, to name only a few.

• (1600)

So it is not without reason that Robert Nixon, Jean Chrétien's investigator, recommended cancelling the contract last November. Having named all these players, we have to conclude that a code of ethics for elected representatives and senior managers is essential.

Given all the disturbing facts of the Pearson Airport affair, it is of the utmost importance to ask the Prime Minister to appoint a royal commission of inquiry to get to the bottom of the dealings of those involved. Transparency must prevail if Canadian democracy is to regain its true meaning.

Mr. Maurice Godin (Châteauguay): Mr. Speaker, today's debate challenges all our political morals, our habits, our customs out of this Chamber, our relations behind the political scene and the influence peddling that usually remain hidden from the public. The study of Bill C–22 provides a unique opportunity to ask ourselves about the interaction that may exist between the political authority of a government and the economic power of large corporations.

We have before us a holding which resorted to the most extreme schemes to acquire terminals 1 and 2 of Pearson Airport in Toronto. The report by Robert Nixon, who was responsible for examining the deal, is very critical in that regard. Corporate transactions, transfers of senior departmental officers, exceptional tendering procedures, no requirement for a prior financial analysis, clauses benefitting the airport at the expense of others, everything led the investigator to believe that such an inadequate contract signed in such an irregular way was unacceptable.

One can understand Airport Development Corporation, Claridge Holdings Inc., Paxport Inc. and their consortium T1 T2 Limited Partnership. Pearson Airport was a jewel for developers in the air transport industry. With 20 million passengers each year, an area covering 1 792 hectares, three terminals, 15 000 employees, and 800 airplanes landing or taking off every day for 300 destinations in 60 countries, Pearson airport is the hub of air transport in Canada.

According to a Transport Canada study dating from 1987, Pearson airport has direct economic spin–offs amounting to $4 billion for the Ontario economy and it employs 56 000 people. Yet, not long ago, it was Montreal that was the hub of air traffic.

The federal government is responsible for major changes that have affected the location of the poles of economic activity. Quebec has long been suffering from federal interventionism within its economy. Pearson airport is benefitting from the side effects of one of these federal interventions, namely the building of Mirabel International Airport.

The Mirabel decision had horrible consequences for Quebec in several regards. Initially, the idea was to meet a demand that Dorval airport could no longer satisfy. Why not stick to consolidating Dorval infrastructures into one modern efficient airport that would have confirmed Montreal as the hub for the next 50 years? No. Politicians at the time agreed to build a second airport in Mirabel, 40 kilometres from Montreal and about a hundred kilometres from Ottawa, at a spot Highway 13 has not even reached yet.

Meanwhile, Quebec representatives were thinking about locating that airport in the Montreal–Sherbrooke–Quebec triangle in order to serve adequately the metropolitan area, as well as the old capital, while opening up, through Sherbrooke, to the big market of the East coast, with several million people. The federal government refused to listen and, while Quebec was pursuing its actions and its consultations, the federal government made a unilateral decision on March 27, 1969. Its airport would be located in Mirabel to serve, it was claimed, both the federal capital, Ottawa, and the Montreal metropolis.

The federal government, with our money, was making a poisoned gift to Quebec. What a gift. It was depriving us of 95,856 acres of one of the best farming land. But most of all, Mirabel airport would gradually cause the Montreal area to lose its status as the hub of international air traffic in favour of Pearson airport in Toronto. While Mirabel was being built, the federal government was giving permission to all international airline companies to use the airport in Toronto, which could then provide all these services and keep expanding in one single airport.

A plot to move this economic activity 500 kilometres to the West could not have been more successful. This federal intervention resulted in a significant loss of jobs for Quebec. And who paid the bill? Quebecers themselves, with the taxes they are sending to Ottawa.

This kind of deplorable intervention by the federal against Quebec's interests is not the first and will not be the last, as long as Quebec remains in this federation. Interventionism has also affected all our oil and petro–chemical industry. In 1957, the Diefenbaker government established a Royal Commission on Energy chaired by Henry Borden. Of the six commissioners, Jean–Louis Lévesque, from Montreal, was the only one representing Quebec. The mandate of the Borden Commission was to examine all issues relating to energy, such as size of the domestic market, security of oil supply, the export volume and price.

The commission was anxious to develop this sector of the economy to become less dependent on other countries and at the same time reach the U.S. market. There was more to it, however. A jealous eye was cast on the oil refineries in Montreal, which some people wanted to see transferred to Ontario. The commission heard representations from independent producers who were in favour of building a pipeline from Edmonton to Montreal, so that Alberta crude would displace imported Venezuelan crude being refined in Montreal. However, Ontario was not really interested in this pipeline or western natural gas but in Montreal's major refineries.

Once again, as in so many other cases, the influence of the lobbyists was decisive. The project was opposed by the major oil multinationals. Finally, the commission recommended drawing a demarcation line along the Ottawa Valley. It recommended securing all markets to the west of this line for producers in Alberta. The federal government implemented this recommendation in 1961. Since the pipeline went to Toronto, Sarnia was born. The next step was to extend the pipeline to Montreal, and after taking away our refineries, English Canada was to take over the Montreal market.

We owe the disappearance of an entire petrochemical industry in East Montreal to Canada's national policy initiatives. Richard Séguin, one of our great singers from Quebec—the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry referred to him on February 9 as a great artist—tells us in one of his songs about the incredible human cost of the disappearance of East Montreal's refineries. At the end of his song he says to his father: "J'vais prier pour toi".

Another example, equally important, is the St. Lawrence Seaway. We all know that this access way to the Great Lakes, built with our taxes, sounded the death knell of the Port of Montreal. It contributed substantially towards shifting certain activities towards the West, while destroying Montreal's position as a transit zone for goods, services and people. We could have made Montreal the biggest interior port in the world, a real international hub.

Today, a special committee is considering the future of the Seaway, but we are stuck with it, and it will probably cost too much to undo.

As an economic activity, transportation is central to many other activities. This is why maritime, rail, pipeline and air transportation play a role in the development capabilities of other economic activities. You can sense the appeal of that. This is clearly the reason why big investors, lobbyists and friends of the government are doing their utmost to lay their hands on this sector. Wolves follow their prey, and if we are not vigilant, private interest will prevail over public interest.

I will conclude by saying that for too long our taxes have been used against us in this federation. We no longer want our taxes to be used to enrich the friends of the government, we want them to be used to reduce the debt. The financing of our party, the Bloc Quebecois, is a model to follow. Money comes from individuals, not from large companies or interest groups seeking favours by giving money to the main parties, irrespective of their leanings. We do not owe anyone anything, our hands are not tied.

We are here to defend Quebec's interests, and they include a sound management of public funds. This is why the Bloc Quebecois is asking for a royal commission of inquiry. While waiting for Quebec sovereignty, we will try to improve Canada. Be assured that we are going to try to clean up its act.

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, several questions have been raised since yesterday regarding the famous Bill C-22, an Act respecting certain agreements concerning the redevelopment and operation of Terminals 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson International Airport.

Several questions, to the total amazement of our friends opposite, had escaped them, not all of them though. Some Liberal members are more lucid than others, such as the member for York South—Weston, as demonstrated on page 3539 of yesterday's official report. I quote what he said:

> I would submit that it would be unconscionable if they were paid any money whatsoever not only because of what was said during the election campaign, and what happened behind the scenes, but also because of the very clear statement and the request for proposals that was put out in March 1992. At paragraph (8.6.3.), it says this. Again Mr. Bronfman and all those who were participating in this contract were well aware of what was in the request for proposals.
> It said: "All costs and expenses incurred by proponents relating to proposals will be borne by the proponents. The government is not liable to pay such costs and expenses or to reimburse or to compensate proponents in any manner whatsoever for such costs and expenses under any circumstances, including the rejection of any or all proposals and the cancellation of the project".

This paragraph shows very clearly that clause 10 of Bill C-22 makes no sense whatsoever, unless the minister, the Minister of Transport in this case, has to, heaven forbid, reward friends of his party.

Liberal members are surprised by our relentless attacks on this bill but what has happened to their commitment to transparency, now that they are six months into their mandate?

Among the promises which filled a whole chapter of the red book, what has happened to the ethics counsellor in charge of advising ministers, MPs and other public officials? The government could really use somebody like that, these days. What progress has been made in the drafting of a code of conduct for Parliament? It seems to me that it has fallen by the wayside.

What has happened to the new rules regarding lobbying? The Liberals will undoubtedly answer that it is a priority for them, but if we were to make a list of the priorities they have been talking about since January 17, I would feel sorry for issues that did not make it in their eyes because, for this government, everything is a priority, or rather, nothing is.

With respect to the new lobbying rules, we learned only yesterday from a report in La Presse that the federal government had decided to extend by one year very lucrative advertising contracts prior to establishing its new lobbying rules.

Clearly, there must be some mistake, Mr. Speaker. And yet, the government is now giving us the impression of taking care of its friends, before passing legislation to protect them, as I just mentioned. Perhaps we are mistaken, but the perception is rather different. And perception is the key to whether or not the public trusts the government. In this particular case, positions are relatively clear.

With your permission, I would like to quote the hon. member for Red Deer who stated the following yesterday, which appears on page 3529 of Hansard. I quote:

> —I certainly agree with that. I would agree wholeheartedly with the member's comments that they know better and they obviously should not be expecting any compensation.

As you can see, I have introduced quotes from Liberal and Reform members who agree with our amendments, but none from Bloc members.

It is clear that Bloc members stand solidly behind this amendment, as do Reform members and even a few Liberals. Therefore, they have no business saying that we are being paranoid and that we are nitpicking.

Not so very long ago, in addition to the member for York South—Weston, the Minister of Immigration himself, the President of the Treasury Board and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry spoke out on this agreement. Even the Minister of Transport said that the federal government was considering setting up a royal commission of inquiry into the privatization of Pearson Airport. This fact was reported in La Presse on November 29 last. The Minister of Transport himself suggested that such a commission be established.

Why then are our colleagues opposite so surprised when barely a few months ago, they shared our position on this issue? Could it be because the members on this side have not changed their minds and are not in the habit of doing so every few months?

Why did we not change our minds? Why are we asking for a royal commission of inquiry to save millions of dollars, perhaps hundreds of millions in the long run, to the taxpayers, but above all to clarify whether the government's hands are clean? That is the whole question.

Why is it that, while the Nixon report, which surprisingly enough took only 30 days to produce, states that there has been wrongdoing in connection with lobbying, it gives no specific example of such practice?

Also, why compensate people for costs incurred in such instances? My mother used to tell me, as a child, that honesty pays. Was she right or not?

Why does the government continue to refuse to release the privatization contract concerning Pearson Airport? There are many unanswered questions, are there not? Many questions that will do nothing to improve the Liberal Party's credibility rating, if it has any credibility left.

The reason we are opposing Bill C-22 and asking the government, for its own good and in the interest of the Canadian population as a whole, to shed light onto these obscure dealings is to get all these questions answered. Of course, that is if the government has nothing to hide; otherwise, its reluctance is understandable.

In closing, let me repeat the amendment moved by the Bloc Quebecois:

> "This House declines to give second reading to Bill C-22, An Act respecting certain agreements concerning the redevelopment and operation of Terminals 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson International Airport, because the principle of the Bill is flawed due to the fact that it contains no provisions aimed at making the work done by lobbyists more transparent."

We also support the amendment to amendment moved by the Reform Party to add "in Canada" after the word "lobbyists".

• (1620)

Mr. Jean-Guy Chrétien (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, as my colleagues have been doing for two days, I want to speak on the shady privatization of Pearson Airport. It is obviously a question of money but it is also a matter of principle concerning the very foundation of the federal system, namely the financing of political parties.

When stories such as this still make headlines in 1994, we wonder if democracy has made progress or if we are still facing the dubious tactics of the good old 1940s. Now, my dear friends, Mr. Speaker, I would like to relate to you a story my mother and father told me more than once. My father, an important lumber dealer and a highly-regarded Liberal organizer—back in the 1940s, of course—who raised enormous amounts of money for the Liberal Party, had the opportunity to acquire machinery no longer needed after World War II, such as tracked vehicles and tanks. He leased flat cars from Canadian Pacific in Toronto and he was always telling me what a good deal it was. He told me: "I sold one and all the others were free and clear". He was of course a friend of the government. All his friends in the community tried to buy some but they were all gone, as friends of the government had bought everything they could lay their hands on at ridiculous prices.

Before the last election, I was living quietly in my little community and looking from afar at what politicians with various levels of credibility were trying to do. Sometimes they did well, other times not so well. Political criticisms and analyses always apply to what the media choose to report. We are not so gullible as to believe that newspapers are always unbiased and always report all the facts. Not everything should be taken for granted.

So, the media report horror stories suggesting that the government is not doing its job. We object and say it makes no sense, but, deep down, we wonder what is true. Barring some exceptions, nothing is black or white. For example, there was the Malaroï case, where virtue was pitted against bureaucracy, and where my colleague from Québec-Est spared no effort. Normally, sensationalism is profitable, not subtleties. As to the case before us today, even if we were not in the House when the story first broke, we realize that the more we learn from the media, the less we understand.

Even if all members in the House know the story, I will summarize it briefly as I, the member for Frontenac, see it.

The contract to privatize Pearson Airport was signed on October 7, 1993. As we all remember, that was only 18 days before the defeat of the Conservative government. And in Quebec, like elsewhere, polls were conducted almost every day. And the closer we got to October 25, the lower the Conservatives were in those polls. Time was of the essence; this could not wait until after the election; the Conservatives were no longer in the picture. You remember as well as I do what happened. Two bidders fought hard to get a contract worth several million dollars. To succeed, the two finally merged and got the contract on October 7.

During the last election campaign, the Liberals, and particularly those from the Toronto area, promised to cancel that contract. These same Liberals are now attempting to cancel the contract, but they are also trying to compensate the promoters. It must be pointed out that, under Bill C-22, the government does not have to compensate these people but the legislation authorizes—and this is what I strongly object to—the minister to make certain payments to promoters, at his discretion. Let me remind you that, according to recent polls, politicians are far from being popular.

When I meet people from my region, they say: "You are O.K., but we do not trust the others. Try not to stay in Ottawa too long, otherwise you will turn out like them". My colleague for Terrebonne says that politicians are less popular than used car dealers. We do not give rebates. When such sordid stories are found out, how can you possibly hope to improve the image of politicians in Quebec? When the reputation of one of us is tarnished, we all pay a price.

The first thing that comes to mind is the fact that there is no smoke without fire. If everything is honest and transparent in a contract, why be so secretive? Why not appoint a royal commission of inquiry? If the Liberal government opposite does not have anything to hide, such a measure would settle the issue and the Conservatives might be the only ones in hot water. But the Liberal Party is afraid to set up a royal commission of inquiry with the power to question all the players in the Pearson Airport saga.

What seems contradictory at first glance is that a contract signed under suspicious circumstances by the Conservatives is not being denounced by the Liberals, who now form the government and have the necessary tools to shed some light on this transaction. Yet, during the election campaign the Liberals kept referring to the importance of transparency.

When I taught my ecology students the transparency of water, I told them: "It is like when you look down into a lake and you see the bottom". We say that water is transparent when we see through it. Can we say that we see through the Liberal government today? I am asking them.

Yet, in the red book, it is all there in black and white: the government is committed to more transparency. It has been six months and we are still waiting for this same transparency. This would have been the opportunity, I think, to prove that it was the transparency of a notion that was dear to them and not a media show.

Unfortunately, I was able to deliver only one part of my speech. If one of my colleagues would want to take it, I could have it passed on to him or her. I thank you for your patience, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take my turn in this debate on Bill C-22 respecting certain agreements concerning the redevelopment and operation of Terminals 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson International Airport in Toronto.

I assume that, after listening to all the speeches we have had so far, you have realized that the very serious reservations of the Official Opposition about this bill concern section 10, which reads as follows:

> 10. (1) If the Minister considers it appropriate to do so, the Minister may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, enter into agreements on behalf of Her Majesty to provide for the payment of such amounts as the Minister considers appropriate in connection with the coming into force of this Act, subject to the terms and conditions that the Minister considers appropriate.

Mr. Speaker, I imagine you have also understood that the opposition approves of cancelling this highly improper contract because there are many reasons for doing so. I became convinced after reading the Nixon report several times from start to finish. I found out why, although Mr. Nixon is as Liberal as they come—a very well connected Liberal who is very close to the circles we are talking about, including the friends of the Prime Minister—why his intellectual honesty and his sense of responsibility forced him to use the word "maneuverings".

After carefully reading his report, one realizes why he had to use this word, which could be translated in French as "magouillage". The Petit Robert defines the word "magouille" as follows: "Manoeuvres, tractations douteuses ou malhonnêtes". The English definition is: "Maneuverings, questionable practices or shady dealings". So this is pretty strong language.

I thought I would simply bring to the attention of this House a few passages from the Nixon report which are self-explanatory and which illustrate the murky and shocking aspects of this affair, and as some people are saying, we may need a royal commission of inquiry to determine whether bad faith was involved.

For instance, on page 5, there is a short paragraph that gives us an indication of the maneuvring, and a theme that runs through the entire Nixon report, and I quote:

> In the calculation of gross revenue (on which rent will be based), there are 10 deductions which I am advised are unusual in commercial transactions.

Mr. Nixon also said that T1 T2 Limited Partnership, which would manage the airport, is a multi-purpose rather than a sole-purpose corporation.

> The lease does not restrict the freedom of T1 T2 Limited Partnership to carry out an undertaking other than the management, operation and maintenance of Terminals 1 and 2. Therefore, the financial health of T1 T2 Limited Partnership could be adversely affected by the financial failure of a venture which has nothing to do with the management, operation and maintenance of Terminals 1 and 2.

The report also says, with respect to air traffic:

The Government of Canada undertakes not to permit development of any airport facility within 75 km of the T1 T2 complex that would reduce passenger traffic at Pearson by more than 1.5 million persons per year, until the volume of passenger traffic at Pearson reaches 33 million people per year. Present projections predict this number to be reached by approximately the year 2005. If the Government of Canada chooses to engage in such proscribed development—

• (1635)

—we can see the manoeuvring, the understanding which exists among people who are close to the government, have undue influence and who may even, and we will see this later on, condition and intimidate senior officials—

—it must either pay economic loss to the Tenant

—we know who that is—

—or provide the Tenant with access to Area 4 at Pearson, an area explicitly excluded from the RFP.

Another interesting and revealing point.

About the end of September 1993, T1 T2 Limited Partnership represented to the Government that it had entered into 10 contracts with non-arm's length parties—

—in other words, parties connected with and involved in the project—

—prior to October 7, 1993. One of these was said to be a construction management agreement with Matthews Construction. This information was not publicly disclosed.

The point is that Matthews is directly concerned and involved in the whole transaction and was closely connected with the activities of Paxport.

The report also says the following:

After permitting the privatization of Terminal 3 at Pearson, the process to privatize Terminals 1 and 2, the remainder of the largest airport in Canada, is inconsistent—

—this is fundamental—

—with the major thrust of the policy of the Government of Canada announced in 1987.

It was on the basis of this policy that the offer made in 1989-90 by the same parties was turned down by the government. With the passage of time and as a result of intense lobbying, the government became very interested in 1993, and we know what happened.

Another consideration in the Nixon report, a very important one this time, concerns the time frame the parties were allowed to submit their proposals.

The RFP having as it did only a single stage and requiring proponents to engage in project definition as well as proposal submission and, all within a 90 day time frame—

—we are talking about an investment of $700 million, and people are being given 90 days to position themselves.

—created, in my view, an enormous advantage to a proponent—

—Paxport—

—an enormous advantage—

—this is the maneuvering—

—that had previously submitted a proposal for privatizing and developing T1 and T2.

This was referred to earlier. It was the proposal turned down in 1989.

Other management and construction firms not having been involved in the maneuvering—

—this is Nixon speaking—

—preceding the RFP had no chance to come up to speed and submit a bid in the short time permitted. With little construction and development occurring—

—by honest people—considering the state of the economy in Toronto as well—

—others should have been sought out and given reasonable time to participate.

Further, it is significant that no financial pre-qualification was required in this competition. For a project of this magnitude the selection of a "best overall acceptable proposal"— —that was the basic criterion—

—without complete assurance of financial viability seems to me to have been highly unusual and unwise.

Finally, the concluding of this transaction at Prime Ministerial direction in the midst of an election campaign where this issue was controversial, in my view flies in the face of normal and honourable democratic practice. It is a well known and carefully observed tradition that when governments dissolve Parliament they must accept a restricted power of decision during the election period.

There is no question that a financial deal of this magnitude—$700 million—which would have privatized a public asset for 57 years should not have been signed at that time.

I will end with one of the conclusions of Mr. Nixon, who believed that the process: "to privatize and redevelop Terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson fell far short of maximizing the public interest". Therefore, considering all that surrounded the "negotiation", it is imperative—and one is astonished that the report does not make any recommendation to that effect, and that the Prime minister who preaches openness in the red book has not taken any action in that direction—that we have an inquiry that can get to the bottom of that shocking event that is so damaging to the reputation of Canada, a country known for the quality of its institutions.

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, with clause 10 of Bill C-22, the government is in fact inviting the friends of the system—Conservatives and Liberals united as brothers this time and drooling in anticipation—to grab a piece of Pearson, a particularly juicy pie. Not only is the bill conveniently unclear about the way this pie is to be shared, but it does not explain how Pearson Airport is to be managed and what its place will be in the Canadian network. It is this latter and no doubt less scandalous, but nevertheless important aspect of the bill that I would like to address today.

It may be a good idea to show this airport's importance with regard to air transport, and in particular in relation to Montreal's two airports.

Pearson and Mirabel–Dorval play a major function in air transportation in Canada. Competition between them can be beneficial, provided they compete on equal terms, which is not the case. The Mirabel–Dorval airport complex has a major handicap. If I wanted to make a case against the government based on assumptions and not facts, I would suspect it of, if not keeping an old wound open, at least painstakingly not helping it heal. Its persistent failure to act on this issue is really incomprehensible. I am referring to the lack of a high–speed link between Mirabel and Dorval as well as the totally inappropriate linkage of the airport complex with the road and railway system. First, a few facts.

Dorval is the point of origin of all regular flights within Canada and to the United States, while Mirabel is the boarding point for all other destinations. A passenger travelling from Quebec City to Paris will have to transfer. That is normal, but what is not quite as normal is the fact that this person has to ride, from Dorval to Mirabel, in a shuttle travelling on Highways 15, 640, and 13 and then on Mirabel Blvd. Commuting time: 40 minutes, plus waiting time. It is absolutely absurd.

To remedy the problem, it was suggested that Mirabel be closed down and all flights shifted to Dorval. What a brilliant idea! You eliminate one of the airports, thereby eliminating the need to connect them. Rather than curing the disease, it would be simpler to get rid of the patient!

A simple solution would be to extend Highway 13 another 25 kilometres to the north. It was agreed a long time ago that the costs—that is to say $78 million in 1988 dollars—were to be shared equally by Ottawa and Quebec, but nothing has been done since. Of course, for a long time, the two governments accused one another of refusing to co–operate, stating that a cheque could be made the following morning if only the other side would stop dragging its feet. I guess that is what you call profitable federalism!

Mr. Speaker, the sad thing is that, since then, cost estimates have risen by $50 million because of the procrastination. This will certainly not help break the impasse. The fact remains that there is a serious need to extend Highway 13 from Boisbriand to Mirabel Airport.

However, what Mirabel needs to become a world class airport is a rail link.

This unacceptable oversight could be corrected while at the same time another problem which is somewhat less frustrating could be solved. As everyone knows, most developed countries already have a high–speed train, an ultramodern means of transportation. In this as in so many other areas, Canada is lagging behind for lack of vision. The Minister of Transport is waiting for another in an endless series of reports on the Quebec City–Windsor HST project before giving consideration to eventually setting up this network. Studies already completed have concluded that an east–west rail link through Quebec and Ontario is feasible, necessary and cost–effective. A total of 120,000 jobs would be created during the construction phase of the project.

All that would need to be done is to add a loop to the main line to connect Montreal's two airports.

Connections between the two airports could thus be made in 18 minutes, instead of the current forty. Furthermore, the two provinces would be linked to Mirabel–Dorval by a high–speed, comfortable rail system, one which would leave foreign passengers with the impression this time of a country in the forefront of new technologies.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, to ensure that the Toronto and Mirabel–Dorval airports can continue to complement one another and to provide services commensurate with the capital invested, steps must be taken to provide Mirabel with the tools mentioned. Failing this, neither Mirabel nor Dorval, for that matter, will be able to ensure appropriate levels of user services. I am talking about extending Highway 13 from Boisbriand to Mirabel and developing a high–speed train in the Quebec City–Windsor corridor, along with a loop to provide service to Mirabel and Dorval.

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to state my position on Bill C–22, the Pearson International Airport Agreements Act.

The bill declares in particular that the agreements did not come into force, bars any action for damages against the federal government, and authorizes the Minister of Transport to enter into agreements for the payment of amounts in connection with the coming into force of the legislation.

I wish to draw the attention of the House to the last point. I strongly object to Bill C–22, which authorizes the government to pay the compensation it sees fit to private–sector contractors without shedding light on the circumstances that led to the decision to privatize the airport and to the hasty signature of the contract.

When the government privatizes public property, transparency must be paramount, as the government advocates in the Throne Speech delivered at the beginning of this Parliament. Part of this speech reads as follows: "Integrity and public trust in the institutions of government are essential. My ministers"— it was the Governor General speaking—"will insist upon integrity, honesty and openness on the part of those who exercise power on behalf of Canadians".

• (1650)

The Prime Minister promised to shed light on the circumstances surrounding the negotiations and the agreement to privatize Pearson Airport. Instead, he gives us an internal review behind closed doors. Nevertheless, the study by Robert Nixon, a good Liberal, a former provincial finance minister and a former leader of the Liberal Party of Ontario, underlines the undue influence of lobbyists sympathetic to the current government.

The Nixon report contains a number of comments on the privatization process, its political dimension and the terms of the redevelopment agreements. This same Mr. Nixon says that privatizing terminals 1 and 2 is not in accordance with the government policy that such terminals should be owned and operated by local authorities. He condemns this transaction and talks about the role of patronage and pressure groups.

I would like to make myself clear. We want to shed light on this process of privatization, deals and agreements that are not in the public interest. The review of the Pearson Airport case concludes on page 9 that the role of lobbyists went far beyond the acceptable concept of consulting. "It is clear that the lobbyists played a prominent role in attempting to affect the decisions that were reached".

This is a series of troubling facts that call into question this government's openness and the legitimacy of any decision to compensate the companies involved in the case. Why compensate individuals for charges incurred by people who abused their connections? This decision is contrary to government policies on this subject. Bill C–22 deals with a very controversial development agreement which should be elucidated.

I understand that the government thinks that the bill is a way to undo an agreement that it condemns because the agreement was politically motivated and pushed by lobbyists. I understand the government wanting to avoid long and costly lawsuits if an agreement could not be negotiated.

However, despite the controversy and although the government has announced the end of the contract, why does the government still want to keep this contract secret? Would there be something to hide? Not disclosing the full identity of all parties to this agreement and other major provisions of the contract inevitably arouses public mistrust. When the government makes a decision in a case involving the public interest, I think that it has to be open. The public has a right to know all the details of this agreement and the facts surrounding the government's decision.

[English]

In the events leading up to the signing of the contract permitting the privatization of Pearson International Airport the various lobbyists appear to have played a disproportionate role.

I call on the government to enlighten this affair of public interest as mentioned by the Leader of the Official Opposition in this House calling for the establishment of a royal commission of inquiry before the tabling of Bill C–22.

As long as we do not know the roles played by the various players in this matter, how can we determine for sure whether investors are victims or actors in this affair?

• (1655)

Bill C–22 declares that no amount will be payable under this agreement in relation to any loss of profit or any fee paid for the purpose of lobbying a public office holder. Why then will the Minister of Transport with the approval of the Governor in Council make agreements on behalf of the government to provide for the payment of such amounts?

If the government wants to be off the hook, it must authorize an inquiry which will shed light on what might be one of the biggest patronage scandals in the history of Canada.

Initially, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport himself did not oppose the idea of a public inquiry to find out the details of the circumstances surrounding the Pearson Airport transaction. And the minister even had the support of several of his colleagues regarding such an initiative.

Only after realizing that some of its close friends were involved did the government make an about–face, opting for a simple report prepared behind close doors. The government does not have the right to demand sacrifices from the public to help reduce the deficit, to make cuts in social programs, and to use taxpayers' money to compensate the key players in these dealings, when its own report states that in this case lobbies have largely exceeded the acceptable limits.

Even if lobbying is legal, the public has a negative perception of this activity, especially in a case like this, where the lobbying took place without the public knowing about it, and where the decisions made went against public interest. Greater transparency will enable Canadians to know who is trying to influence who, how, and on what issue.

For the sake of transparency and honesty, an inquiry must be held on the Pearson Airport transaction.

Mr. Speaker, I fully support the government when it is willing to improve Parliament's credibility. I am quite prepared to support the government when it proposes legislation aimed at ensuring greater transparency regarding its dealings with lobbyists.

In this case, the government has no choice but to shed light on this issue. This is why I support the motion of the Leader of the Official Opposition to set up a royal commission of inquiry and find out the details of that unfortunate saga.

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have this opportunity today to speak on Bill C–22.

I would like to point out to my colleagues and all members of Parliament that I had the privilege to sit, for four years, on the Société de promotion des aéroports de Montréal, which is considered, as you know, a local airport authority, according to a 1987 government plan. I want to show you that local airport authorities, or LAA as they are called in the air transport industry, are much less prone to scheming than private companies which take charge of an airport, as was the case at Pearson.

So, I think that we absolutely have to talk about the great openness shown by local airport authorities, and to do so, I want to use Montreal as an example, that is the airport of Montreal and its Société de promotion des aéroports, made up of 21 individuals from the Communauté urbaine de Montréal.

• (1700)

What does a SOPRAM or a promotion company do? First of all, it must get a very good representation within the greater metropolitan area as such. In the case of SOPRAM, there are three electoral colleges which form the 21 members of this promotion company. Of course, what the company will promote are these airports and with only one objective in mind, that is to re–invest the money in the community by doing repair work in these airports. That is far better than favouring a bunch of friends who are mostly interested in capitalizing their funds and ensuring that shareholders get more and more dividends in the end.

In the case of a local airport authority, it is the opposite; the money is directed towards the community and re–invested, and people are put to work in the same community.

If I go back to SOPRAM, I was saying earlier that there are three major electoral colleges; there are seven business people who form the executive of the Montreal Airport Administration. They all are business people and their distribution, as you will see, is very well thought out in terms of territorial distribution in the greater Montreal area. We also have seven elected people at the municipal level who are representatives of municipal politicians, and also, people who are responsible for the technology and the administration as such. I was myself part of the technicians and administrators category and I was delegated by the Société montérégienne de développement and the City of Longueuil.

Also on territorial distribution, it was made sure that the whole of the territory would be very well represented. Among others, we have three representatives from the South area, six representatives from the North area and 12 representatives from the island of Montreal. These people are serving their respective interests within a regional solidarity, and it is worth repeating that all the money is re–invested in the greater Montreal area.

My colleagues raised earlier the relevancy of airport duality in Montreal. That is a debate that was just completed—airport of Montreal—and what was agreed to is that both Montreal airports are extremely important. Even a major international panel confirmed it. The international panel told us that having two airports was an extraordinary advantage for us. Unfortunately, at the time of devolution, the government withdrew from its project to link Dorval and Mirabel by a special shuttle so that, today, the cost of it will have to be borne by ADM.

Let us look at the economic impact. As I said, the goal and objective of the development corporation, as far as Montreal airports are concerned is to make sure that money is reinvested in the area. At the present time these two airports bring in about $100 million. After expenses, we manage to keep $30 million which, over the next five years, will be reinvested into the communities through improvements and repairs to the airports. This will create about 1,700 jobs over the next five years. The difference is obvious. Profits are reinvested in the community, they go directly to the workers hired to improve the infrastructures and not to shareholders, as dividends, or to a bunch of friends of the government.

We can also talk of the direct impact. In 1987, it amounted to $109 million for the community of Montreal and, in 1992, it reached $273 million. I repeat, the revenues are around $100 million annually.

According to an HEC study, 42,185 jobs result directly and indirectly from the operation of the two Montreal airports and the reinvestment of profits into the community contributes greatly to job creation. We can see the importance of a local airport authority. This is not the situation at Pearson Airport. Why not?

• (1705)

Clearly, the private sector noticed that there was a ripe plum to be picked, something juicy enough to whet the appetite of shareholders. With the help of lobbyists they pressed the government by saying: "Do not give it to a local airport authority, this is a source of trouble". Squabbles occur in all local airport authorities, and Montreal had its share, but in the end, we agreed in order to protect the interest of the community.

In Toronto, the government said that a local airport authority would not work and that the private sector should have the opportunity to dip into the trough. And that is what happened. The present government, which promised during the election campaign that it would cancel the deal, in now finding that the people feeding at the trough were not all friends of the Conservatives, there were also friends of the Liberals. This is why the minister has included in the bill provisions that would give him discretionary powers to compensate friends of his party.

We can see all the differences and contradictions that exist between the two systems; on the one hand, Montreal proceeds with a people-minded, democratic approach whereas, on the other hand, people in Toronto manage to get a piece of the action, and put the interests of the shareholders, lobbyists, and friends of the government before those of the community.

To conclude, I am indeed in complete agreement with the amendment proposed by the Bloc Quebecois because we need a royal commission to review the whole deal. I would even say that, besides a royal commission, the government should allow, without delay, Metropolitan Toronto to take matters into its own hands. I think that there are some very worthwhile people in that city who would be more concerned with the interests of the community than with strictly financial interests. There are people who were there at the time, such as the mayor of Mississauga who was very active and who would probably be willing to carry the torch to make sure that this local airport authority comes into being and that priority is given to the public interest instead of the interests of the government's friends.

To this end, I think that a royal commission is an absolute must. And I repeat that we should take this opportunity to allow Metropolitan Toronto to take matters into its own hands and say to the government's friends: "Sorry, the contract is cancelled and there will be no discretionary compensation". I think that, in this whole matter, we have to look at the government's transparency and set an example so that, from now on, in Canada, there is a clear message that you cannot operate behind the scene and favour your friends at the expense of the public purse. I believe that a royal commission is in order. Let us proceed with a royal commission and discover what is behind all this manoeuvering.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, now that the future of Quebec and of Canada is being debated, we still find ourselves talking about lobbyists. Need we remind members that lobbying is not a new activity? This country, Canada, is the end result of lobbying efforts. Consider the Grand Trunk railroad! The many lobbyists who were involved in the building of the railroad were in fact responsible for building Canada. There more things change, the more they remain the same.

The question is even raised in our history books. I pointed this out to one member, a friend who sits across from me in this House. Lobbyists were the great Canadian promoters and we are still contending with them today, albeit not the same people. However, the spirit of lobbying continues to burn brightly.

Yet, in its red book, the government promised transparency. On looking at the whole Pearson Airport deal, it becomes clear that the one thing lacking is transparency, at the very least. Let me recall a few facts for you.

• (1710)

On December 7, 1992, the federal government decided to go with the bid submitted by Paxport Inc.

Two months later, this company was forced to join forces with its only competitor to form a consortium, T1 T2 Limited Partnership. It is somewhat troubling to realize that the government was planning to award a 57-year contract worth several hundred million dollars to a company in financial difficulty, a company which besides had close ties with the governing party, which at the time, was the Conservative party.

While we could say that T1 T2 was once a Tory entreprise, over time it has become a Grit entreprise. Basically, that is what the red book is all about, Mr. Speaker. It is saying: Count on us, we will put you in the red. And we currently seem to be heading in that direction.

The policy put forward by the Conservative government as early as 1987 regarding airport administration was based first and foremost on local airport authorities of the public type—I am thinking of the Montreal ADM—or else the administration was contracted to certain firms, as was the case in Vancouver, Calgary and Edmonton. Privatizing Pearson Airport ran directly counter Transport Canada's policies.

Take also the bidding period, which was only 90 days long. This time limit seems somewhat unusual, in that we cannot talk about standard tendering. This is a 57-year contract, a long-term and very complex contract.

So, why limit the bidding period that much, if not to favour companies that had already expressed an interest in that area? Companies like Paxport, which had already submitted a privatization plan in 1989 or one which was already managing another airport, like Claridge, responsible of Terminal 3 at Pearson Airport.

Wrongdoing on the part of lobbyists was mentioned in the Nixon Report, but without quoting any specific case. Why then compensate people for their expenses if they misused their connections?

As Robert Nixon points out: "It is clear that the lobbyists played a prominent part in attempting to affect the decisions that were reached, going far beyond the acceptable concept of "consulting". That is on page 9 of the report, Mr. Speaker.

Disturbing conduct is also reported on the part of political staff members who have shown too much interest in the transaction, an interest disproportionate to reality as we know it today. That is also on page 9, Mr. Speaker.

In spite of the controversy, in spite of the fact that it has already announced the cancellation of the contract, the government persists in refusing to release the contract in question.

One can wonder why. Does the government have something to hide? Is this a case of the Ginn Publishing syndrome? Because in that case too, they refuse to show us the contract. Are we dealing, for example, with advertising contracts awarded by the minister responsible for government operations with no real tendering process, no clear criteria, basically at the discretion of the minister?

Contracts which, as we find out, are more often than not granted to friends of the system, the kind of people who carry a membership card in the Laurier Club. It is strange that things are not more open, and that there are even no parameters.

In the Quebec legislature, if contracts were awarded in this way, there would be a general outcry. We are a long way from "Vautrin's pants" in the days of Duplessis. We are not talking about a pair of pants but about an airport, Mr. Speaker.

Why was this 57-year contract, worth hundreds of millions of dollars, awarded without financial pre-qualification? On page 8 of his report, Robert Nixon concludes that such a process is highly unusual. At least we hope so. If it were usual to award 57-year contracts worth hundreds of millions without financial pre-qualification, we would be worried and with good reason.

We can however ask, not necessarily for the first time either, why Hibernia project we are now considering was not subjected to a thorough financial review either. We are set to invest another $1 billion in the biggest contract, private or public, in Canada's history, and no serious study was done. We are now being asked to invest another $1 billion with our eyes closed. So no prior financial study was made for Pearson Airport.

As you may recall, the Conservative government signed the contract in the last days of an election campaign. This undemocratic gesture was denounced by our friends opposite. Mr. Chrétien jumped on this opportunity to denounce these undemocratic measures flying in the face of Parliament's supremacy because the government, of course, must honour its predecessors' commitments. But there is a way to get out of it to accommodate current realities, as was the case with the helicopters. They acted, but more openly that time. That was in Quebec, and the government may have fewer friends in Quebec, but it is different in Toronto.

Private developers could not help but know that the Liberals were likely to form the next government. That is why the T1 T2 Partnership is friends with the Liberals and with the Conservatives. As everyone knows, the ranks of lobbyists do not only include Conservatives. They also need Liberals in case a new government is elected. They know how to prepare for change. These people are used to power. The party in power may change, but the ideas remain the same.

The lobbyists knew then that the Liberals would take power; they knew that there was a risk in signing such a contract. They decided to take it. That is the law of the market. They are business people, serious people who are always telling us that we have to take the risk of free competition, we must not be afraid, we must know how to take risks, and they are asking the government to compensate them for the risks they took. They made a mistake, poor things! They must be compensated. These are the same people who usually denounce the unemployed and welfare recipients. Pearson is luxury-class welfare, Mr. Speaker.

When the Conservatives awarded the contract, they knew one thing. Ms. Campbell and Mr. Charest did not seriously think that they would keep power. They knew that, but they did not know that they would be left with only two members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I just want to make sure that we know that we are supposed to refer to one another by the name of our riding when we sit in the House. I just wanted to bring this to the hon. member's attention.

Mr. Duceppe: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. So the member for Sherbrooke and Ms. Campbell—I must name her because she no longer has a riding—did not suspect that their party would be reduced to two seats.

So these people said to themselves, "Before we leave Parliament and our access to government funds, we will ensure that our friends have not invested for nothing," because the names involved in the Pearson affair did not invest only in Pearson. These people invest at least every four years, even every year, with the Grits and with the Tories, with the Tories and with the Grits. Depending on who will be in power, they invest more in one side than the other. I suppose they invested more in the Liberals, who have 177 seats, than in the Conservatives, although each of the two remaining Tories must have got more than the 177 Liberals, on a per capita basis.

So Mr. Nixon says a little farther in his report, and I will close with that—my ten minutes are almost up—that his examination had led him to only one conclusion: to leave in place an inadequate contract, arrived at through such a flawed process and under the shadow of possible political manipulation, is unacceptable.

That is what we say: it is unacceptable. We must get to the bottom of it and have the resources to do so, have the power to compel people to testify, to present documents and to get a good idea of what people opposite would like to keep in semi-obscurity.

• (1720)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I would just add that, as Acting Speaker, I have the duty and the honour and the pleasure to protect the interests and privileges of members of this House.

I do understand that when members are outside the House, they are more vulnerable. However, I know that, whether you are here or not, I must maintain respect for these traditions in the House.

Now to continue the debate, the hon. member for Gaspé.

Mr. Yvan Bernier (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, please excuse my astonishment. I did not expect to rise so soon in the House on this matter.

Never mind, there is so much to say on the subject, that I would be tempted to say: "Let us get on with this, the party is over". That attitude must have prompted the motion from members opposite.

If I understood my colleagues well, and what members opposite did not understand, our main objection to this bill is the fact that in principle it does not allow us to see what the lobbyists involved are doing.

On my opinion, to avoid making the same errors in the future, it is important that we review such measures. Because this is no small matter. We are talking big money here. Moreover, we are dealing with the future of transportation in Canada, which was really the issue here and which they are trying to make us forget. They want us to casually disregard what has happened.

The biggest surprise, and all my colleague agree on that, is that it was only when the election drew near, or during the last week of the campaign, that the new Prime Minister rushed in to announce that an end would be put to that "bargain".

Now, in Parliament, we are told that we must keep silent and that we will not be told what really happened. We call that writing a blank check. I must admit that I find it hard to live with such an arrangement.

What are we to think of all those things which they are trying to hide from us? The things they hide from us tell a lot about the way political parties are financed. We are talking about lobbyists. The Bloc Quebecois has very strict rules regarding party financing, and we must thank Mr. René Lévesque for that.

We must specify who gives us money, and the maximum allowable amount is $5,000. This, Mr. Speaker, is a good example of transparency. You can see who gives us money and whose interests I represent. People may contribute $5, $10 or $100. There are very few in my riding who can make a contribution of $1,000, and this brings me to another issue: the underdevelopment of regions.

Remote regions like mine do not have the monies or incentives which would allow us to be represented by very articulate lobbyists. They are capable of great things, but we are not on a level playing field in that regard. There is one thing though which the public has understood, and I will get back to this when I discuss the underdevelopment of our regions.

The public has the right to know. During the last election campaign, the Bloc Quebecois had limited funds with those $5 and $10 contributions to which I referred earlier. Nevertheless, with these small amounts, it succeeded in getting almost two thirds of the seats in Quebec: 54 out of 75 to be precise.

• (1725)

Personally, I only spent 60 per cent of the amount allowed to me by the returning officer, and that was enough to defeat two powerful organizations, two old parties. Why is that? It is because I talked to people; I did not try to buy their vote with money. In fact, I could not even afford a single page of advertising in newspapers. But I talked to people and journalists, and the public got my message.

The Liberals now have the opportunity to do exactly what the public expects from them, and that is to tell the people what this is all about. The people have to know what went on with this deal. They have to know why such a thing cannot happen ever again. It is very important.

I also want to talk about the economic underdevelopment of some areas. If the current Liberal government cannot show us how to ensure that, from now on, lobbyists will not be able to continue to influence Canadian development and economic policies in any negative way, how can we benefit from the expertise of these lobbyists? This is a good question, since all the Liberals talked about in the red book and during the election campaign was jobs, jobs, jobs. But when will we be able to work with people who know how to get money from the government to put remote areas residents back to work?

I know that I am digressing, and I will come back to the Pearson issue, but I just want to ask how am I supposed to explain to people in my riding, where unemployment is at 27 per cent and the labour force participation rate stands at 42 per cent, that I gave the government a blank cheque to pass over in silence the millions of dollars that were wasted and the nasty trick we were about to play on the Canadian air transport industry. I will never be able to explain the situation to my voters. However, if the minister or the Cabinet wants to play this little game, maybe they can try to explain the whole situation or send lobbyists to develop the remote areas that are currently underdeveloped. We have the resources, but maybe we are not developing them the right way. But we were never given a chance in the past, since each time we came up with a good idea, as many people from the Gaspe Peninsula have noticed, a funny thing happened and the project was always taken away to the city.

This leads us to believe that lobbyists have a lot of clout and that is not acceptable to us. Also it is difficult to understand that only two groups were involved in that deal as there were only two parties—and some criticized us for this. But there is now a third party, which I would call the voice of the Quebec people, that is the Bloc Quebecois. And we do not want to put up with that kind of things.

I agree with everything the hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean and Leader of the Opposition said the other day in his speech and I would invite every Canadian to reflect on it. We make so many speeches to try to promote awareness among members on the other side. Although they do not belong to our party, our colleagues in the Opposition must also have something to say against this lobby system, which may be responsible for the increase in poverty and a wider development gap between central Canada and the rural or isolated areas like mine.

How can I make the government think? As an hon. member, the only means I have is the opportunity to express my views in this House. I do not have millions of dollars but I represent a riding as equal and as influential as the others.

During my election campaign, I used to say: "Local problems call for local solutions". If ever the federal government must give up its direct control over Pearson Airport, I would understand, as the hon. member who spoke before me said, that it could be transferred to a municipal airport authority. Torontonians would know how to use such a development tool, such an important link in the transportation system. However, I repeat that, before any decision is made, the government will have to clarify the role of the lobbyists in this issue. Pearson must become a reference case so that never again is such a situation imposed on the Canadian taxpayers, especially not during an election.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 5.30 p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

NATIONAL SPORT ACT

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops) moved that Bill C–212, an act to recognize hockey as the national sport, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood along with my colleague from Regina—Lumsden and many others who formally seconded this bill. I want to acknowledge my assistant, Bill Syrros, for all of the preparatory work he has done to make this a success today.

I will begin my short speech by quoting Bruce Kidd who said in the book Welcome Home by Stuart McLean: "Hockey is the Canadian metaphor. The rink is a symbol of this country's vast stretches of water and wilderness, its extremes of climate, the player a symbol of our struggle to civilize such a land. Unsure as we are about who we are, we know at least this about ourselves: We are hockey players and we are hockey fans".

Those words certainly ring very true these days considering what the national pastime is of Canadians from coast to coast to coast nightly.

I do not suppose there are many of us who do not recall that moment of excitement on a Saturday night when the Montreal Canadiens would take to the ice and that soft maritime chant would fill the room: "Good evening ladies and gentlemen and hockey fans from coast to coast. This is Danny Gallivan at the Forum in Montreal". Then Saturday night would be complete and life would be good.

Probably most of us in this House played hockey and skated even before we could tie our own skates. Many of us will remember those great moments when we first learned how to raise a puck, seeing that puck sailing through the air for the first time. Or maybe it was the first time we were able to complete a good slapshot and heard the sound of that puck bashing into the boards.

It is safe to say that hockey matters to all of us, in Quebec and the rest of Canada. It is part of our culture. It is key to the understanding of Canada. It is the perfect game on the perfect Canadian medium in the perfect Canadian season. We are a northern people and hockey is a northern sport. It is certainly fair to say it is much more than a game in our country.

There are few sportsmen in Canada today who on a wintery Saturday night are not seated waiting for those familiar words: "It's hockey night in Canada". The voice of the late Foster Hewitt was embedded in the minds of many Canadians from the inception of CBC radio and television. That voice united Canada from the Atlantic shores of Newfoundland to Vancouver Island and even northward to the Arctic missions.

It has been estimated that over 650,000 Canadians actually take part in some form of organized hockey.

● (1735)

To quote the late Foster Hewitt: "In our country while hockey is usually played for sheer enjoyment, its outdoor rinks and enclosed arenas are meeting places for youths of all origins where race, culture and creed are forgotten. Stewarts, Kellys, Smiths, Beliveaus, Delvecchios, Mahovlichs, the Ullmans and Howes combine for the glory of the team and in the process, Canada gains in unity and strength".

In this day, sport has become a means by which a nation attains international status and recognition. I believe that hockey is Canada's national game and is the main sports preoccupation of our young people.

It is ultimately woven in our Canadian self–image and our mythology. Paul Henderson set the tone for this image in 1972 with his dramatic goal over Russia. Indeed, hockey is more than a national game for its popularity has spread to at least 20 different countries.

It is time to recognize hockey for its impact on Canada. It is time to thank the volunteers and all the hockey teams in Canada for their contribution in a number of areas such as charity, education, competition and international co–operation.

It gives me a great deal of pleasure to congratulate Canada's championship women's hockey team for capturing its third consecutive world hockey championship in Lake Placid two weeks ago. It is no wonder that women's hockey is the fastest growing sport in Canada.

When we look at whether or not we should identify a certain sport as our national sport, it is important to look at the origin of the sport, its popularity in the country today, the reputation it has abroad and the value of a number of intangibles.

Many historians have tried to figure out where and when hockey was created in Canada. The cities of Halifax, Kingston and Montreal have all boasted that they are the true birthplace of hockey in Canada. I am sure more theories of hockey's birthplace will arise in the future.

I was interested to hear a comment last month by my hon. Liberal colleague representing the riding of Annapolis Valley—Hants who mentioned that his riding represents the birthplace of hockey.

One theory in support of Kingston mentions that an early historian by the name of Mr. Horsey wrote in his diary of 1847: "Most of the soldier boys were quite at home on skates. Shinny was their first delight where 50 or more players on each side would be in the game".

A committee appointed by the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association to determine the Canadian origin of hockey concluded: "The first hockey was played by the Royal Canadian Rifles, an imperial unit stationed in Halifax and Kingston in 1855. It is quite possible that English troops stationed in Kingston from 1783 to 1855 played hockey, as there was evidence in old papers, letters and legends".

In Montreal authorities emphatically declared their city is the original home of ice hockey. They felt that the first pure hockey game was played in Montreal at Victoria Skating Rink on March 3, 1875.

Perhaps the true cradle of hockey could have been Acropolis Hill in Greece, as there are remnants of a goal, men with hockey sticks in hand, a ball on the ground between curved blades, and an official about to give the starting signal.

Hockey remains the sport of first choice for the majority of Canadian households. It is already looked upon by Canadians as Canada's national sport. This has been proven in the past but most recently by the great outpouring of support and encouragement for Canada's gold medal national junior hockey team, five medals over the last seven years, and the silver medal efforts of our Olympic team in each of the last two Winter Olympic Games. In a recent newspaper article by the Ottawa Citizen it was mentioned that Canadian fans vastly outnumbered Americans as a sea of red aided the Canadian women's hockey team to a third consecutive world championship in Lake Placid, New York.

A national sport would promote national interest in times of national competition. Hockey is governed by a national organization and millions of fans follow it. National radio and television spend a great deal of money to broadcast hockey games. There is an organized hockey event in virtually every Canadian community, be it a large city or a humble village.

I received a letter of support for this motion from the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association. Its membership includes an active volunteer force in excess of 100,000 Canadians and upward of 500,000 on–ice participants.

Canada is recognized worldwide as the nation where the great sport originated. It is unquestionably looked upon as the foremost leader playing a vital role in the evolution of hockey worldwide. By the most recent estimates it extends now to not 20 but actually 51 countries that make up the membership of the International Ice Hockey Federation.

● (1740)

There is nothing more identifiably Canadian to the rest of the world than our game of hockey. Canadian Amateur Hockey Association teams at all levels of play compete regularly and successfully in international tournaments and championships around the world.

In each season the Canadian Hockey Association transfers almost 600 accomplished Canadian players to hockey–playing countries where they assist in the growth of this sport overseas in various emerging federations. All of these players are outstanding ambassadors for our country and our game. They help to sell Canada, its wholesome values and its healthy lifestyles.

In discussing hockey we can never forget the economic impact it has on Canada. A cursory glance indicates that tens of thousands of Canadians are employed directly or indirectly as a result of the game of hockey.

In 1992 Statistics Canada completed a family expenditure survey which concluded that Canadians spent approximately $400 million annually on hockey. This does not include club dues, ice time, travelling expenses or other numerous expenses relating to participation in hockey competition.

Again I cannot mention enough the appreciation for the millions of hours that volunteers contribute to ensure the success of tournaments and the education of youth in this sport.

Women's hockey is the fastest growing women's sport played in Canada today. In the past few years the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association has estimated the number of women participating in minor hockey at approximately 13,000 and that is being very modest. This has grown from the 6,000 recorded in the 1991–92 season. This upsurge has a lot to do with the success of officially sanctioned world championship events.

Women are actively challenging for positions on professional teams throughout Canada and the United States. The success of Canadian Manon Rhéaume, the first woman to play hockey in the National Hockey League, also has a lot to do with the surge of female participation in hockey.

Brampton, Ontario hosts a women's hockey tournament every year that attracts over 250 teams, including international teams from countries such as Russia and Finland.

I could go on about how hockey supports charity organizations of all sorts throughout our country. I could talk about the impact of the international Hockey Hall of Fame located in the great city of Toronto. I could talk about the impact hockey has on my hometown of Kamloops where we enthusiastically support the Kamloops Blazers. I wish them well in their competition with our friends from Saskatoon. I could go on but I want to step down to allow ample time for a number of members who have indicated an interest in participating in this debate.

I simply want to say the time has come and the timing is perfect. We are right in the middle of hockey enthusiasm and excitement in this country. It would be a great gesture of this Parliament to agree to declare hockey our national sport. I think Canadians would welcome and applaud that from coast to coast to coast.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Canadian Heritage): Mr. Speaker, during the last election campaign there was much rhetoric about how there should be more co–operation in Parliament and how MPs should actually work together to achieve objectives common to all.

We have the opportunity today to prove that co–operation works.

[English]

In an effort to include a Canadian sporting tradition that predates Confederation, I have asked the member for Kamloops to support the amendment of his private member's bill to recognize both ice hockey and lacrosse as national sports of Canada.

While many Canadians would certainly view the national sports status of ice hockey as a natural expression of the Canadian reality, the concept has been on ice for decades. Canadians have long recognized the significance of another sport which also originated in Canada and which is played all over the world today.

Our proposed amendment would allow for the inclusion of Canada's long tradition in the sport of lacrosse and would resolve an issue that has been left on the bench since Confederation.

In January 1967 Prime Minister Lester Pearson, a devotee of sports and honorary chair of the Canadian Lacrosse Association, said in this House: "I think we should have a national summer game and a national winter game".

• (1745)

Twenty–seven years later members of this Parliament had the chance to convert a pass from Pearson and remind ourselves of some unique aspects of Canadian culture.

As Americans remember where they were when Neil Armstrong took a great leap for mankind, Canadians remember what they were doing when Paul Henderson sent Canadians to the moon when he scored the winning goal for Canada in 1972.

Canadians can be proud when hockey is played at the Olympic Games in Norway or when the lacrosse championship is held in the United Kingdom.

[English]

Not only are Canadians a dominant force in both sports but we have been on top for more than a century. Both these sports are just as symbolic of Canada as the maple leaf or the Bluenose.

[Translation]

Ice hockey as it is played today originated in Canada in 1855, on Christmas Day, when the Royal Canadian Rifles based in Kingston, Ontario decided to remove the snow covering the ice in the harbour. They then attached blades to their boots and started playing with field hockey sticks and a lacrosse ball which they had borrowed.

[English]

In the early 1800s the Algonquin Indian tribe of the St. Lawrence Valley in Canada played a sport that is known as lacrosse, the sport that was an important element in the life and culture of First Nations. Today it is just as important in the lives of Canadians of all backgrounds.

[Translation]

Throughout Canadian history, we have had every reason to be proud of our athletes who participate in all kinds of sports.

[English]

Our nation's athletes have inspired great pride in Canadians by their world class performance in so many different sports: curling, synchronized swimming, canoeing, rugby, diving, track and field, skiing, skating and biathlon, to name a few. Today we salute Canadian achievement in all sports.

Recognizing that sports are an important element of our culture, I think it is essential that we take responsibility for the future of sports in Canada.

[English]

As one of the partners involved in the development of sport, the Government of Canada has a very legitimate and essential role to play in that future. We must focus on building a stronger recognition of sport as an important contributor to the Canadian cultural identity.

Douglas Fisher once said: "Most of our shared experiences and values from Bonavista to Vancouver Island are through politics and sport. We would be a much duller lot without our sporting heritage and sporting present". In short, we must make sure that our athletes are always playing at full strength.

This is one occasion when Parliament should not take one game at a time. Mr. Speaker, I think you will find that there is unanimous consent for this motion. I move:

That Bill C-212 be modified in clause 2 by deleting all the words following "national" and replacing them with the following:

winter sport of Canada and the game commonly known as lacrosse is hereby recognized and declared to be the national summer sport of Canada;

That the title and short title also be amended to include the word "lacrosse"; and

That, at the conclusion of the time provided for Private Members' Business later this day, all questions necessary to dispose of Bill C-212 at all stages be deemed to have been proposed, put and carried, and the bill passed.

• (1750)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is there a point of order? The hon. member for Bellechasse.

Mr. Langlois: Yes, Mr. Speaker, about the relevancy of the amendment. I respectfully suggest that this amendment should be submitted during consideration by the committee of the whole House, if there is to be a committee of the whole House on this bill, and not at the second reading stage.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I thank the hon. member for Bellechasse for his remarks. I will consult with the table officers and I will get back to the House at once, on this matter.

The parliamentary secretary is asking for unanimous consent. If the House gives its unanimous consent, it would be acceptable to proceed in this manner at this stage.

[English]

Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The motion is adopted.

(Motion agreed to.)

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, since I was prepared to speak to the motion dealing with hockey, I will speak only about hockey, which does not mean that I oppose the amendment.

I would first like to congratulate the hon. member for Kamloops for his determination in wanting to have hockey recognized as the national sport since, according to our research, this is at least his third attempt to do so. Moreover, I learned from my own research that this is at least the tenth time that someone in this House tried to have hockey recognized as the national sport.

Let me say straightaway that we are in favour of recognizing hockey as the national sport, but for another reason than the one raised by the hon. member for Kamloops. The hon. member for Kamloops said that one of the reasons why he presented this bill is that it may contribute to national unity.

I do not intend to embark on a partisan debate today, because the reason for a national sport is to foster harmony, but I would like to indicate to the hon. member for Kamloops that our perspective may be different from his. Nothing prevents two countries from sharing the same national sport. Quebecers also love hockey. We will have to wait for a referendum, but Quebec will likely be a sovereign state in a couple of years, and it will want to keep excellent relations with English-speaking Canada. Sports foster good relations. For reasons that have nothing to do with those of the hon. member for Kamloops, we agree that hockey should become a national sport.

If there is a sport that can arouse interest here, that sport is hockey. Playoffs under way in the National Hockey League are on the mind of many people. The first item on the Téléjournal on April 20 was the health problems of the Canadiens' goalie Patrick Roy, and not the war in Bosnia or bloodshed in Rwanda.

Many people may condemn that editorial choice, but it shows how important hockey is for Canadians and Quebecers.

The method most frequently used by countries to choose a national sport is to find one which was created in that country. This is the case for hockey which is a combination of four other sports, three coming from abroad and one taken from the Indians. People probably do not know it, but hockey is a combination of bandy, originally from England, shinty, originally from Scotland, hurley, originally from Ireland, and, of course, lacrosse, a native Indian sport.

The books written on hockey do not say when and where the first real game was played. As the member for Kamloops and the parliamentary secretary said, many have their own ideas about its history. Many regions still claim, without documented proof, to be the site of the first game. However, we know that the first publicized hockey game was played in 1875 at McGill University in Montreal and that the first rules were published in The Gazette on February 27, 1877. All this proves one thing: hockey was truly invented in Canada.

It is also very important to look at the number of people who practice a sport to determine its popularity. Nowadays in Canada more than 650,000 men and women participate in this sport. Even if hockey is played mostly by men, more and more women play as well. Our women's national team has just won its third world championship in a row. This team's goalie is Manon Rhéaume, the first woman ever to play professional hockey.

Who has not played hockey in the street or on a frozen lake? So, when you say 650,000 players, these are players registered with the Canadian Hockey Association. In reality, there are countless players. Just about everybody has played hockey, at one time or another, more often in the street than on an rink with boards around it. The fans who closely monitor the performance of their favourite teams number in the millions. Names such as Wayne Gretzky, Mario Lemieux, Gordie Howe, Maurice Richard, Bobby Hull, Jean Béliveau, and Bobby Orr are now legendary. They are or will be inducted into the Hockey Hall of Fame, in Toronto, where most of the inductees were born in Canada or in Quebec.

When we think about hockey, we think about the National Hockey League and the Stanley Cup, one of the most prestigious trophies in professional sport. It was created in 1893 by Lord Stanley, a great sports fan who was also the sixth Governor General in Canadian history. The original trophy was only a salad bowl for which Lord Stanley had paid less than $50. But over the years, several layers have been added to it; the names of the winning team members are engraved on it. In spite of its relative lack of value, the trophy is highly coveted.

Hockey has become the national pride of Canada and Quebec; it reached its pinnacle in 1972 during the series of the century which pitted Canada against the Soviet Union.

In Quebec, there is a hockey team which greatly contributed to enhance French Canadian pride—that is what we were called in those days—the Montreal Canadiens, created in 1909. With 24 Stanley Cups, they are the most important dynasty in professional sport in North America. In the twenties and thirties, this team was one of the first to recruit French-speaking players. Lightning-fast and aggressive, they were nicknamed the Flying Frenchmen. There was Aurèle Joliat, Armand Mondou, and Sylvio Mantha, to name but a few. They played in the Montreal Forum, the legendary building at the corner of Sainte-Catherine and Atwater.

It was during the forties and the fifties that they became truly legendary, especially because of Maurice Richard.

• (1800)

He was the first player to score 50 goals in one season in the NHL; he led the Montreal Canadiens to many Stanley Cups, including five in a row between 1956 and 1960. That man was a powerful symbol for Quebecers. The suspension which he got in 1955, depriving the Canadiens from the Stanley Cup, provoked a real riot in the Montreal Forum.

The Canadiens benefitted from an almost monopoly of recruitment in Quebec for many years. That allowed them to acquire players such as Phil Goyette, Bernard Geoffrion and Jacques Plante.

The Canadiens have always had many French-speaking stars on their team over the years. I will name some others: Jean Béliveau, Jacques Laperrière, Henri Richard, Guy Lafleur, Jacques Lemaire, Guy Lapointe, Patrick Roy, Guy Charbonneau and many more. Of course, there were also English players who contributed: Howie Morenz, Ken Dryden, Toe Blake, Doug Harvey, Larry Robinson and many others. Naturally, some French-speaking players also won fame with other teams: Jean Ratelle with the New York Rangers, Mario Lemieux with Pittsburgh, Marcel Dionne and many others.

This was to demonstrate that Quebecers have been well represented in the sport that is called hockey. It was one of their first successes. Coming from the province of Quebec, I would not forgive myself if I did not mention the Quebec Nordiques who, due to the dramatic increase in salaries, may have to leave Quebec City, as other players from other teams may have to leave cities such as Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg and various small towns.

It is fine to adopt today an act recognizing hockey as the national sport. But I believe that one should also consider to take rather quickly some measures which would keep teams such as the ones I just mentioned in Canada and in Quebec. It is very important.

The last point I want to make is that, to preserve this sport, I feel it is important to take measures to fight against violence in hockey, a factor which may very well discredit that sport. In closing, Mr. Speaker, I wish together with my colleagues to congratulate once again the member from Kamloops for introducing this bill.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. In the spirit of co-operation and good will that exists and in an effort to acknowledge the days of work that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Canadian Heritage has put in to facilitate today, I wonder if I could seek unanimous consent of the House to acknowledge the parliamentary secretary as being one of the formal seconders of Bill C-212.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Members have heard the member for Kamloops. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I guess today would be one of those days that you wish you were involved in this debate having been a player not only of the Memorial Cup team you played on but a coach and referee in the NHL. We are certainly all aware of your participation in this national sport.

I begin by quoting from The Game which Ken Dryden and Roy McGregor put together. I think it summarizes most of the spirit and the theme that the member for Kamloops is putting forward in his bill today:

> Hockey is part sport and recreation, part entertainment, part business, part community builder, social connector, and fantasy maker. It is played in every province and territory and in every part of every province and territory in this country.
> Once a game for little boys, now little girls play hockey as well and so do older men and women, so do the blind and the mentally and physically handicapped, and although its symmetry is far from perfect hockey does far better than most in cutting across social divisions, young and old, rich and poor, urban and rural, French and English, east and west, able and disabled.
> It is this breadth, its reach into the past, that makes hockey such a vivid instrument through which to view Canadian life.

I believe that Roy McGregor and Ken Dryden have captured what the member for Kamloops is trying to put forward today in this bill and I stand here in full support. I would like to talk about a couple of experiences that I have had in dealing with hockey as our national sport since I have been a member of Parliament and how I feel that it really pulls us together, not only as a House of Commons but as a country.

• (1805)

About the time when we were celebrating the 125th anniversary of our country a group of us from all parties got together. At that time most of us who were working on this idea were in the opposition. We went to the then minister responsible for national unity, the Right Hon. Joe Clark, and asked him to support us in bringing to Toronto 58 hockey teams from villages, towns and cities from all across Canada. From coast to coast, every region of our country, they all came to Toronto in April of that year to play in Maple Leaf Gardens in a 10-day tournament.

There were a few things that inspired me to believe that hockey truly is the sport that pulls us together as a country.

First I have to talk about the evening that the Dartmouth Whalers played in Maple Leaf Gardens against a team that most people thought would dominate the Dartmouth Whalers, a team in a AAA league in Toronto at the peewee level. At the end of the game the Dartmouth Whalers were victorious. They had beaten this Toronto championship team.

The following morning in the hotel I ran into the captain of the Dartmouth Whalers and I said to him: "Boy you had a pretty good game last night. We were all surprised that you did so well". He said: "Well, Mr. Mills, it was a funny experience. We walked into Maple Leaf Gardens. First of all when we looked up and saw those stands we felt the magic in the place. We felt good. But then when we got on the ice our energy quadrupled, our spirit was so great no one could beat us".

Those young peewees from Dartmouth said it all. Hockey provides an energy, a feeling and a spirit of pulling us together that I do not think any other sport in this country has. I am not putting down any other sport, but I do believe it truly is our national sport.

I know you can relate to this, Mr. Speaker, because we both have sons who play in the Ontario Hockey League. Your son is a terrific player with the Kingston Frontenacs and I have had the pleasure of watching my son play this year with the Belleville Bulls. It is an experience going to these local rinks. I am amazed at the way it pulls the community together. It becomes the local event. The radio stations and the local TV stations and the whole community experience happens around hockey. There is a whole family experience that happens around hockey. This same experience is in every rink throughout our nation.

I am happy to stand here today in support of hockey as our national sport. I believe that hockey will be one of the things that ultimately keeps us together as a nation. I just cannot imagine the Montreal Canadiens being changed to the Montreal Blocs. It just does not work.

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I was going to rise in the House today to speak against this, but I guess I have to change that because I have already agreed to the amendment and everything.

Why are we using valuable debate time in this House to debate and vote on a bill which dismisses our national support of lacrosse as though it never was? Perhaps this member does not know his Canadian history. Perhaps this bill is presented to this House out of ignorance.

It occurred to me that if one member of this House is ignorant of our history perhaps other members are not aware of our rich cultural heritage, a cultural heritage given to us by our first peoples. I am therefore going to present some of our history of lacrosse to this House. In 10 minutes I cannot really do the game justice but I will do what I am able.

There are some who try to date lacrosse back to Confederation, perhaps because many of the encyclopaedias refer to it as being our national sport at that time.

Lacrosse cannot be dated in this House. Who in this House is going to decide when lacrosse started in what today we call Canada? We have records going back to the Seven Year War, the 1700s, and the story of the English trader Alexander Henry's experience at Fort Mackinac when on the pretence of celebrating King George III's birthday on June 2, 1763 the Ojibway Indians played lacrosse outside the open gate of the fort. When the ball went through the gate the players and the onlookers went after it.

Upon entering the grounds they attacked the garrison and seized the fort. It is told that the native women concealed the weapons beneath their skirts.

Father Brebeuf, the Jesuit priest, speaks of lacrosse in his writings. Many in this House I am sure are aware of the Jesuit priests or the Black Robes who date well back in Canada's 1600s.

I am told that the Creator gave lacrosse to our native people.

I have with me today a list of 27 citations referring to lacrosse as Canada's national sport. They are recognized authorities or researchers, such as sports writers, historians and five encyclopaedias. Some of these resources date from 1877, 1902, 1911 and right up to the present.

Shribners is the earliest source which in volume 14, May to October 1877, states: "The game of lacrosse was adopted as the national game of Canada on July 1, 1859".

In 1911, Encyclopaedia Britannica, 11th edition, states: "Lacrosse, the national game of Canada". I do not have time to quote them all here.

When our children ask us and their teachers for facts on a subject where do we send them? We send them to the encyclopaedia for factual information.

I am not here today to build up lacrosse and tear down hockey. Both are great sports. In fact if we were to ask our national lacrosse and hockey players their opinions I wonder if we would not find many had played both sports during their careers and value the special attributes of both.

Hockey legend Bobby Orr I believe played lacrosse for Oshawa. Other lacrosse celebrities including such names as Wayne Gretzky, Joe Nievendyke, Gary Roberts, Cliff Renning, Newsy Lalonde, Jack Bionda, Adam Oates, Brian Bellows and many more that I cannot name. Each played lacrosse in the summer and hockey in winter. Gretzky used lacrosse to sharpen his hockey skills.

There are some facts about lacrosse I am sure many members here are not aware of. The Guinness Book of Records states that the first night game of baseball was played in the 1883. Baseball fans pride themselves on the fact that this was an amazing accomplishment. Would it surprise the House to know that the game of lacrosse was played under the electric light in Montreal in 1880?

Are we all aware that some of hockey's proudest moments began in lacrosse? Each year there is a celebration and a congratulation among hockey people as they hold their all-star game. The concept of holding all-star games began in the 1870s when the lacrosse clubs in Ontario banded together to challenge their rivals from across the border in Quebec.

In the 1870s and 1880s when hockey was becoming popular, in order to increase its appeal to the public, the game borrowed from the most popular sport of the time, lacrosse, the concept of goal posts, centre face off, referees and the position names for its players.

In 1904 Canada sent its first delegation to the Olympic games. Among the team sports which represented Canada at its premier was the lacrosse team. Lacrosse is the only Olympic team sport where Canada has won more medals than the rest of the world combined.

Talk about numbers and attendance at sports games. In 1910, when the Canadian Minto Cup Senior Lacrosse Championships of Canada were played between New Westminster and the Montreal Shamrocks, there were 15,000 spectators. That is not very many you say. It is incredible when we look at the facts. The number of people living in New Westminster at that time was under 8,000. The game literally shut down the majority of B.C. as people travelled to New Westminister to see the game. That is the spirit of nationalism.

How many here are aware of the fact that the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson during his office of Prime Minister became the head of only one sport in Canada? Lester Pearson accepted the role and served as honorary chairman of the Canadian Lacrosse Association.

I have always been a sports participant and not much of a spectator, but I did have an opportunity to learn about our national sport lacrosse. Often heard it is the fastest sport on two feet, from a family connection in my early twenties. Lacrosse great Jack Bionda is my brother-in-law, and he played both hockey and lacrosse professionally.

Through Jack I can best describe how these two great sports are a part of one's life. He played hockey for the Boston Bruins and in two Stanley Cup finals; for the Toronto Maple Leafs, among others, and was a defenceman for the Portland Buckaroos for six years.

However, lacrosse was his sport, beginning in Huntsville and carrying Jack to the west where he played in seven Man Cup finals, five of them winners. He played for the Victoria Shamrocks, Nanaimo and the famous New Westminster Salmonbellies. Jack's superb stick handling developed when he was a lad of 10 or 11. He was inseparable from his lacrosse stick and he walked to school practising, hitting the telephone poles with the ball as he walked along. This ability to control the ball until the last minute and score won him the lacrosse all time high scorer in his time.

He has been honoured in the New Westminster Lacrosse Hall of Fame and the Canadian Hall of Fame. Even today in his sixties Jack gives tirelessly to young lacrosse players at clinics and tournaments. His love of the sport extends to the continued use of the wooden native lacrosse stick.

That brings me to Wes Patterson, a Tuscorora native which is part of the Six Nations. Wes Patterson is a North American Indian who knows as much about the cultural heritage of our national sport of lacrosse as any person in Canada. For many years he has been engaged in successfully producing the wooden lacrosse stick through Can Am Lacrosse Ltd. I wish I had one in the House today to show the skill of this very talented aboriginal.

I have not yet had the honour of meeting Wes Patterson but I have it from good authority that this native can make a complete lacrosse stick in 20 minutes as you watch. He talks of the days as a young boy playing lacrosse and how you were not able to play on the team if you did not select, cut your hickory limb, steam it, bend it, shape it, cut the leather strips and make the net.

What am I trying to say? Is it not long past time for Canadians to realize the cultural contribution of our first people, our truly first people not just in sport but in many things? This is not mythology but true, actual facts.

I do not think Canadians can cheer any harder or enthusiastically for hockey than they have already demonstrated during the Canada-Russia hockey series of the past or than they did during our hockey team's performance at Lillehammer. Both sports are very popular at this time. If members are not aware, ask the countless volunteers who sign up the youth of our nation each season for both these sports.

Today I pay tribute to all volunteers in both associations who over the years have given countless hours promoting these sports. Above all I can never dismiss what the past has given us. We do have a rich cultural heritage.

Come to the Commonwealth Games in Victoria this August 18 to 28 and see lacrosse as the introductory sport. Who will be representing our aboriginal people? Wes Patterson.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to support this bill as amended. It was originally a bill to declare hockey our national sport and now it is a bill to have hockey accepted as our national winter sport and lacrosse as our national summer sport.

I fully support the amendment but I principally want to talk about hockey. I love this game. I love playing it. I love watching it. I love talking about it. Some of my greatest friendships have been formed through hockey.

As many know I come from Montreal, the hockey capital of the world. Montrealers, like no other citizens of any other city, breathe, live and die for hockey.

Last year was the 100th anniversary of the Stanley Cup.

• (1820)

In those 100 years, six Montreal teams won the Stanley Cup 41 times, including the first time in 1893. The Canadiens won it 24 times. I am saying that because I want to correct the record. Many newspapers in Canada, in listing last year those that won the Stanley Cup in those 100 years, mentioned that the Canadiens won it 24 times and that the Leafs won it so many times. They forgot that there were five other Montreal teams that won it to make it a total of 41 times for Montreal, way beyond any other city or community in Canada. This not to belittle the other cities but simply to remind Canadians that Montreal is the capital of hockey in Canada.

I have been playing hockey since I was six years old and despite my ancient appearance I am still playing. At this time I want to pay tribute to the many Canadians who are still playing and organizing oldtimer hockey. There are now thousands of leagues in Canada, many tournaments and every weekend a lot of us old guys go here and there to play weekend tournaments.

I think all this goes to show what many people are saying here in this House. It shows that Canadians of all ages and both sexes love this game. We are supporting this bill to make hockey our national winter sport. I hope it would mean more than simply lip service to the game.

What I hope it would mean is that we as Canadians will really support this game at all levels from peewee to international hockey. There have been times in recent years when we have not at the government level and at the private sector level supported it as we should.

By making it part of our legislation, I would hope that our commitment to hockey as our national winter sport will make us more aware of its place in our history and in our tradition and culture.

I have only one concern and I will end with it. My concern is that the cost to young people playing hockey today is escalating to the point at which many young people can no longer play. I am sad to say that in many cases hockey is now becoming a rich man's sport.

That was not the case when I was young in Montreal. We played on outdoor rinks at the peewee level, the bantam level. If you played in a school then you might get on an artificial rink. Our equipment was not that expensive and we did not have many long trips or a long schedule.

I am not arguing with it but simply pointing out my fears. Today players at 11, 12, 13 are playing all their games on indoor artificial rinks which is very expensive. It is very expensive for the parents. They are fully equipped with the best of equipment. They have long schedules and often very expensive travel schedules.

I give credit to the parents who are doing outstanding jobs following their young boys and girls around with these teams. They are paying sometimes up to $1,000 a year simply to keep their children in minor hockey. If that had been the case we may not have had the Maurice Richards, the Boom Boom Geffrions and the Gordie Howes and many other of these players who came from moderate backgrounds and who went up the ranks and became outstanding hockey players.

I fully support this bill. Canadians fully support this bill but I hope once we pass it, it will not simply be a memory for us but will be what it means; namely a commitment by the Parliament of Canada to really support these two games, hockey and lacrosse, from the very minor level to the international level and the professional level.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I would like to seek unanimous consent to prolong the debate for a maximum of one-half hour or at the collapse of the debate, whichever comes first, in order to permit more members to participate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

• (1825)

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to spend five minutes of my time on this bill that I support, naturally. I would like to congratulate the hon. member who finally managed to bring his project to fruition. At least it is debated, and I hope it will pass before the end of the sitting. I congratulate also the parliamentary secretary for her amendment that we will gladly support. Since I do not know very much about lacrosse, I am sure this will be an opportunity to learn about it. We will have to find the equipment to learn how to play though. However we are already masters at other sports.

The previous speakers dealt mostly with hockey and I will follow their example. We tried to rewrite history, but the truth is the origin of hockey is largely uncertain. It is very difficult to know for sure where and how it started. Some people go back 2,000 or 3,000 years. Nobody knows. Even in Canada, the time and place of the first game ever played are difficult to find. I choose to remember one place, Montreal, and one date, 1837, 100 years before my birth.

Mr. Robichaud: It was much earlier than that.

Mrs. Tremblay: Perhaps. Let us not argue about it. Anyone can make his own choice.

Making hockey our national sport gives Canada another symbol. We had the beaver, the national anthem, the flag, now we have two national sports: lacrosse in the summer, and hockey in the winter. So these are important elements of our national identity. For now, they are declared national sports of Canada. As mentioned by my colleague, we will see in due time what Quebec will do about it, but I already favour the parliamentary secretary's proposition. The Montreal Blocs could very well play against the Toronto Maple Leafs. That would be a good representation of the two Canadian nations, once sovereign.

When the national news on TV begin with the announcement of the Canadian's defeat, I wonder less about the fanaticism of Montreal or Canadian fans than about the choice of the news desk officer. Recognizing hockey as our national sport implies that we must not value it excessively. Recognizing hockey as our national sport is of course recognizing its rights, but also its duties accordingly. I think we must act and clearly define standards so that Canada's national sport is played according to rules that apply even in the national league. Parliament could be called upon to adopt rules that would allow civil or criminal lawsuits against NHL players whose conduct does not improve because a national sport must set an example for a country's young people. Consequently, Canadian hockey officials will have to take on the responsibilities that come with it.

Canada should also make sure that, when it sends a team abroad to compete in our national sport, it can win medals as we are able to do with players of the calibre of our national champions such as Rocket Richard, who made this sport famous, the great Jean Béliveau, Bernard "Boom Boom" Geoffrion, who became the highest scorer, passing Maurice the day Mr. Campbell suspended him—

An hon. member: She really knows her hockey.

Mrs. Tremblay: I was at the Forum the day of the riot. That dates me, I guess.

Several members have mentioned the great ones: Lemieux, Gretzky, Roy, Orr, and Hull. I congratulate the members who took part in this debate and carried it through. I am very happy to have two national sports from now on.

[English]

Mr. Pat O'Brien (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I am pleased to congratulate the hon. member for Kamloops and am very pleased to support this amended bill. The bill recognizes two sports officially as our national sports, hockey and lacrosse, neither of which has ever been officially recognized in the House before as a national sport. I think that is a very positive initiative.

• (1830)

Can there be anyone in the Chamber or anyone in the country who does not know that one sport fascinates and obsesses Canadians from coast to coast to coast? Frankly we know that sport is hockey.

It is our national obsession. It is played by young and old, by male and female, by the able bodied and by the disabled. How well I remember seeing people playing a variation of hockey in a gymnasium, people who had lost the use of their legs. It is our national obsession unlike any other sport, and that is not to denigrate the many other sports Canadians participate in very aggressively, including lacrosse.

Whether it is my young son, Carl, or yours, Mr. Speaker, playing hockey in the backyard or Patrick Roy in the Forum, most Canadians have played hockey at one time or another in their lives, be they citizens in a large city or in one of our hamlets from coast to coast to coast.

Being from southwestern Ontario I can tell the House that the summertime sport of choice there is baseball. It always has been. London, Ontario has the site of the oldest continuous baseball played at Labatt Park. Not to denigrate the sport of lacrosse which I have played a bit, it is not played in some parts of the country. That cannot be said about the sport of ice hockey as we all know. It truly is the national sport of Canadians and I would say the national obsession of Canadians.

We all know that the true world hockey championship is not the Olympics or the yearly world tournament. It is the Canada Cup. That is the true world championship of hockey. Canadian men and women excel at this sport.

It has been said by several members that our women's national team has just won the world championships for the third time in a row. I expect they will add many more times to that championship run.

Hockey is part of our national identity. It helps us to define ourselves. Canadian poet Al Purdy called hockey a combination of ballet and murder. We might not like the second word but it is an aggressive sport. He wrote: "For years a Canadian specific to salve the anguish of inferiority by being good at something the Americans aren't".

The Americans are improving but they have a long way to go to come up to our level. As we all know with the American franchises by far most of their players are Canadians and with the influx of Europeans we are seeing the Americans still have a long way to go to catch us in our national sport.

The impact of the professional sports franchise, the Montreal Canadiens has been mentioned already. It is the most successful of all sports franchises. As several of my colleagues have said—and, my hockey loyalty can be found in this comment—the Canadiens 24 Stanley Cups is a professional sports record. No team in any other sport equals that success level.

I am proud to tell the House that although many early players were French Canadians and the sport was founded in Montreal, it was founded by an Irish Canadian by the name of Ambrose O'Brien. I am proud to note that fact in the debate.

Canadian cities compete to claim these hockey heroes. Being from southwestern Ontario I can say that Stratford likes to claim Howie Morenz as the Stratford Streak, but the people of Mitchell, Ontario, will say that Howie Morenz was born in Mitchell, Ontario.

We have national lessons to learn from the great game of ice hockey. I would like to refer to the most famous goal ever scored. That of course has to be the goal scored by Paul Henderson to give us victory in the 1972 World Championship against the Russians, the first such series.

As a Montreal Canadiens fan my whole life, I am proud to remind the House that the Henderson goal was made possible by a great play by Yvan Cournoyer to keep the puck in the Russian end, an extraordinary effort when they tried to clear the puck, and then by Phil Esposito who refused to be denied his shot on goal, the rebound of which Henderson then pounced on and put into the net. It has hit me many times for years the symbolism of that goal. Let me give you those three names again: Paul Henderson, Yvan Cournoyer and Phil Esposito. That is the kind of co-operation we need in this country: An English Canadian, a French Canadian and an Italian Canadian working together to help us win a hockey series.

• (1835)

We are most confident, we are most determined and we are most united on a hockey rink. That is a lesson we ought to bear in mind as we support this bill. I applaud this. This is not frivolous in any way. This is an extremely important bill. It is well worth the time for us to take a few minutes in this House and learn the lessons we should be learning from hockey. The fact that we are at our best as a nation when we set aside background, English, French, ethnic, and we work together as a nation. May it always be so.

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to support Bill C-212 and the amendment introduced by the parliamentary secretary.

This discussion encompasses much more than the pros and cons of two Canadian sports. Rather it is an opportunity for us as members of Parliament to raise a rallying point to help us further define ourselves as Canadians. I assert that by naming Canada's national sports, with which we identify parts of our history, our present reality and a future that can bring all Canadians a step closer together.

There are certain questions we can ask ourselves. My colleague has actually presented a case for lacrosse. I wish to briefly propose some questions that will address whether hockey should be made Canada's national sport.

First, is hockey rooted firmly in Canada's history? As we have heard the answer is an unequivocal yes. Hockey in Canada has been in existence for as long as Canada itself. Hockey is a uniquely Canadian sport dating as far back as the early 19th century.

The hockey that is most familiar to Canadians today was first introduced in Montreal by a McGill University student named J.G.A. Creighton. The first world hockey championship was held in Canada in 1883. The first Stanley Cup game was held in 1894 and won by the Montreal triple A team.

In addition to Lord Stanley's contribution, Canada also recognizes excellence in hockey through other historical awards. The Lester Pearson award is given to the most outstanding player in the NHL. The Lady Byng Memorial Trophy is awarded to the player who has exhibited the best type of sportsmanship combined with a high standard of playing ability.

Second, is hockey seen by Canadians as their national sport? Most Canadians would answer yes. Over the last several decades hockey has consistently attracted a number of fans and participants greater than all other sports together. Household words are hockey names like Rocket Richard, Gordie Howe and Wayne Gretzky.

There are over half a million players registered at the amateur level and for each of those at least five other Canadians are behind the scenes. There are 31,000 teams and 2,400 hockey organizations registered with our national registry. These numbers do not include the many tens of thousands of other players. From pre-schoolers to old timers there is an explosion of participation. Like so many other centres in my own riding of Port Moody—Coquitlam the facilities in our area just cannot keep up with the demand.

Third, is hockey an inclusive sport open to all Canadians? For instance, women's hockey is the fastest growing sport played by women in Canada today. Two weeks ago our women's national team gained international recognition as the best team in the world. This was their third straight world title. They have yet to lose to any country at the international level.

Fourth, is hockey accessible to Canadians? Canada boasts the most impressive organizational network for hockey in the entire world. Known as the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association this body links the membership of local associations to all other nationally and internationally organized bodies. First formed in 1914 the CAHA has nurtured amateur hockey in Canada so that millions of Canadians from coast to coast can come together. In addition, police and government organizations, colleges, universities, et cetera, et cetera bring Canadians together through hockey across Canada.

Fifth, does hockey serve the interests of Canadians both individually and as a community? Hockey indeed enriches the lives of many Canadians. It encourages leadership among our youth. It teaches sportsmanship, drive and determination. It builds a healthy sense of competitiveness and fosters an atmosphere where lasting friendships as we have already heard can be developed.

Millions of volunteers offer their time to this sport each and every year. Parents, teachers, friends, neighbours, people from all walks of life invest their time in their communities and therefore in Canada as a whole. In addition, an estimated $400 million is pumped into the national economy annually as a direct result of hockey.

Sixth, when other countries look at Canada, what do they see? They see hockey. Teams from across Canada travel all over the world to challenge the best players from other countries. Whether we win or lose on the ice as a nation, Canada wins each and every time one of our teams competes abroad.

Remember well the 1972 Canada–Russia series when Paul Henderson scored. It was one of the great moments in our history, a moment in time that caught and has held the hearts of all Canadians.

Seventh, when Canadians look at Canada what do we see? Canada is hockey. Hockey is played in every region of the country, from west to east, south to north, from Vancouver to St. John's, from Calgary to Montreal, from Edmonton to Toronto, and in every town and village in between.

We look at the present and to the future and see the need to bring Canadians closer together. We need symbols that represent Canada as a whole. We need to build on what we have. Hockey and lacrosse can play a part in furthering pride in our land and our unity.

In the words of one of our hockey greats: "The 1972 Canada–Russia series was not politics, it was not sport. At that time we were not considered easterners or westerners, we were Canadians. We represented Canada and had the best players in the world".

In conclusion, from what I have heard today, may I suggest that we take part in Winterlude on the ice next year and show Canada that we as parliamentarians can enjoy our national winter sport.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, here we are at the beginning of the parliamentary season and tonight we are already going into overtime.

The speeches from members across the way could be characterized as very careful stick handling. The House of Commons today will score with all Canadians, I am sure, when we pass this bill. A referee of the NHL is in the Chair as we are having this debate, and I am speaking of you, Mr. Speaker. I think the parliamentary secretary has scored a hat trick with all three readings in one day. This is a shoot out for the member for Kamloops because in the end, he is going to have the winning goal.

We achieved all of this without penalty. Mr. Speaker, I hope you do not think I am offside for making these remarks as we are approaching the termination of the debate.

The net gain in all of this is that Canadians will win and no one will lose. This has to be the only game in town where you have winners and no losers. Indeed, this is a victory for the Canadian hockey team with a very large C.

[Translation]

The Canadian team has just won. And tonight, all of us will be winners when we adopt this bill.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I must tell you in my 10 years with the National Hockey League I would commonly tell the players: "I call 'em as I see 'em" and they would say: "But Bob you don't see enough". Well, today I wear glasses so I can see all of you.

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to support this bill which recognizes hockey as the national sport.

Like my predecessors did earlier, all Canadians and Quebecers agree that hockey should be recognized as the most popular, and therefore national, sport. This goes without saying. All we have to do is look at the popularity of the playoff games now under way, or scheduled to start in a few minutes, to recognize the importance of hockey.

However, to introduce a somewhat discordant note into the proceedings, the government is trying to use hockey as a component of national unity.

I would remind them that this evening, the Canadiens are playing against Boston, that is a sovereign Canadian country is squaring off against a sovereign American nation. If I am not mistaken, I believe that Toronto is also playing against Chicago. I do not think that Mr. Clinton and Mr. Chrétien call one another up very often or that this creates problems between the two sovereign countries. National unity, perhaps.

Still on the subject of the importance of hockey as a national sport, I want to say, as indicated earlier, that by now there is probably not one soul in Quebec or even in Canada who has not heard about Patrick Roy's appendicitis, and we hope he gets well soon.

However, let me express some reservation about debating hockey in this place, all the while respecting the principles of the parliamentary system.

Yesterday, I was the guest speaker at a luncheon organized by the Chamber of Commerce of Repentigny. By the way, I thank them for their invitation. A hundred or so business people from my riding were gathered and there were discussions about the difficult economic situation, the interest rates, and the insufficient risk capital made available to small business. Other subjects of discussion included the GST and the Quebec sales tax as well as unemployment and, of course, sovereignty.

A quick look at yesterday's Hansard leads us to ask questions on several problems facing people; yet we are talking about hockey tonight.

The issues debated yesterday in this House include the military college in Saint-Jean; Pearson Airport; the Young Offenders Act; South Africa. We congratulate them on their first democratic election and we hope that everyone will recognize the election results. Also, Bosnia; Canada's credit rating; bilingualism; the fisheries; Hibernia; the economy; AIDS; income tax; and job training.

I said earlier that many young people watch our proceedings. Talking about job training, I would like to quote the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine who said yesterday in this House in answer to my colleague from Lévis: "The federal government does not intend to question provincial jurisdiction over education".

Does this mean that he will not discuss it, that he will take on total jurisdiction in this area? His answer raises questions.

Still on the subject of young people, the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine said on CBC two weeks ago that 30 to 60 per cent of young Quebecers are dropouts because of the plan for sovereignty. Look at this figure: between 30 and 60 per cent. With such precise numbers, he could be finance minister.

Last fall, Maclean's showed that although serious, the actual dropout rate of young people in Quebec was about 20 per cent. We agree that we must encourage our young people and our youth, but not at their expense and not with crass petty politicking like he engages in too often.

Mr. Speaker, as I said at the beginning of my presentation, I support the bill to recognize hockey as Canada's national sport, but let us all agree that people in Quebec and Canada and throughout the world face much more urgent problems.

[English]

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to join with my colleagues in the House of Commons this evening to support Bill C-212.

I stand in this House as a certified CAHA hockey coach. I am from Saskatchewan and we do have world curling champions, both men and women. Hockey is played in every community on every dugout in the winter and on every piece of ice that one can find in every community in our province.

That is a tribute to the type of thing we are doing today in the House of Commons, making hockey along with lacrosse our official national sports.

Every Canadian either played hockey or wants to play hockey. It is a dream of almost every young hockey player to play in the NHL.

• (1850)

Although Saskatchewan does not have any NHL teams we have exported a number of NHL hockey players to make up a number of teams. For example, we have Mike Modano playing for the Dallas Stars. He played for the Prince Albert Raiders at one point. Ron Grechner who is now with the Sabres is from North Battleford. Theoren Fleury from the Calgary Flames was playing for Moose Jaw at one point. Jeff Shantz is from the Regina Pats. He is playing with the Chicago Black Hawks.

Of course Wendel Clark who is from Kelvington, Saskatchewan is playing with the Toronto Maple Leafs. Doug Wickenheiser, the first draft choice of the Montreal Canadiens, is from the Regina Pats. We have as well Barry Melrose who played hockey in the NHL and coaches the Los Angeles Kings. I believe he is from Kelvington as well, the same place as Wendel Clark. Bill Hicke played many years ago for the champion Montreal Canadiens.

We have from Floral, Saskatchewan Mr. Hockey, Gordie Howe. Hockey is such a popular sport in our province that there is even a statue to Gordie Howe among the many statues in Saskatoon that my colleague from across the floor would acknowledge and certainly support.

As a matter of fact, Gordie Howe is such a major figure in Saskatchewan that he has even got some colleagues of mine in university passing grades. For example, we had a psychology exam one day and one of my friends from Saskatchewan did not know the answers so he wrote a story about Gordie Howe which had nothing to do with psychology. The professor gave him an A for this exam because he was a Gordie Howe fan too. I think that it has interesting implications as we go through the hockey process.

I want to not only support this bill but acknowledge in this House that the Regina Pat Canadians are the 1994 Canadian midget champions. They have played very well throughout the season and ended up winning the entire championship recently.

Not only have I been a coach, I have worked with many individuals in the community. I want to acknowledge this evening the volunteers who have spent hundreds of hours and many years in particular in my district, Regina—Lumsden, working for both the parks and recreation leagues which have in my constituency probably about 2,000 hockey players overall, as well as those in the more competitive city league of Regina which has about 1,600 players for the entire city at a higher level.

I think what they are doing is very important. Individuals like Greg Mario, president of the Regina Northwest Sports Association, and Harald Gohlke, vice-president in charge of hockey, have made significant contributions to the community by being involved in the sport, in the community by teaching young players not only skills but how to get along in life as they age and become very reliable and admirable citizens of our country.

There are about eight hockey rinks in my constituency. They are always filled from five o'clock in the morning until late at night. We have not only the recreation leagues and the competitive leagues but the senior leagues, the oldtimers, those over 30 as well. Everybody in my community, if they do not play hockey, has played hockey. I think that is an indication of the broad based support for this very important national sport that we are approving this evening.

In summary, I want to say that "he shoots, he scores" is a very well known slogan in hockey. As far as I am concerned everybody in this House this evening has taken a shot today and everybody has scored.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I want to rise and speak for just a couple of minutes on this bill. I certainly want to indicate my support for the bill in principle and its amendment. I am more than happy to give my support to it.

I think it is entirely appropriate for a Winnipeger to stand up and enter into this debate because Winnipeg and the province of Manitoba have contributed greatly to this great game of ours called hockey, especially the NHL.

I would like to remind the acting Speaker, who naturally served in the NHL as a referee, that perhaps one of the greatest of referees ever to serve in the NHL and currently serves in the NHL is none other than Andy Van Hellemond and he comes from that great suburb of Winnipeg called St. Boniface.

Andy's name is just one of dozens and dozens from Winnipeg who have contributed to this great game of hockey. For example, does anyone know, and this is just a little piece of trivia, that the NHL player holding the record for the three fastest goals comes from Winnipeg. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you would recognize the name Billy Mosienko. He is probably about six months older than you, or something like that. Sorry about that. Billy Mosienko of course played for many years. He had a sterling, outstanding career with the Chicago Black Hawks and his record of three goals I believe in 21 seconds still stands. I would doubt whether that record will ever be broken.

Who can ever forget Bill Juzda, the great defenceman who probably could deliver some of the greatest bone cracking body checks ever delivered on ice in the NHL.

I am sure you cannot forget Don 'Bones' Raleigh who was a great player with the New York Rangers. How about Tom Johnson who played with not only the Boston Bruins but the Montreal Canadiens. I would like to say politicians are given to this kind of thing. The Tom, who shares my ancestry which is Canadian Icelandic, grew up a mere 14 miles from my community. He grew up in a little town called Baldur and I grew up in a little town called Glenboro.

There was another great hockey player from Manitoba. Again, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that given your age and your interest in hockey and participation that you would remember a great player by the name of Black Jack Stewart who grew up in Pilot Mound, Manitoba.

I just wanted to share a little bit of this history because Manitoba has played a great part in hockey and contributed greatly to the game. We are all proud of it. I am happy to support the bill. I think that by adding this amendment that it is in itself a great symbolism of the way we do politics in this country because this is the quintessential Canadian compromise. You start off with a proposition that hockey should be named the national sport then people come in and say: "Now hold it. We have a history, we have a record. Lacrosse also has a lot of merit in this so why do we not reach the Canadian compromise and name lacrosse the summer national sport and hockey the winter hockey sport".

I think that is a great compromise and I am more than happy to support the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The member for Winnipeg—St. James brought the name of a former colleague in another life with the National Hockey League, Andy Van Hellemond, but let me tell you about one other because I am aging rather rapidly here by all accounts, none other than Red Storey. A few years ago a number of parliamentarians, including the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce who spoke earlier, came together to form a hockey team to play for a good charitable cause at the civic auditorium here in Ottawa against some National Hockey League oldtimers.

Lo and behold, in the middle of the game, for no apparent reason, Red Storey blew his whistle and stopped the play. Keep in mind that we had about 30 players on our bench. Red came over and said: "Look fellows, whatever you do don't quit your day jobs".

Mr. François Langlois (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, first I want to congratulate the hon. member for Kamloops whose perseverance will be rewarded in a few moments.

I also want to thank the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam, who made a brilliant presentation on lacrosse, a sport which those who will read Hansard tomorrow will be able to learn more about. If the hon. member has more detailed personal notes on this topic, I would be pleased to read them. In the meantime, I wanted to highlight her contribution to the debate.

Later on this evening, most members will watch the hockey game between Montreal and Boston. As for me, I will probably go to Hull to watch the sixth game between the Hull Olympiques and the Chicoutimi Saguenéens of the Quebec junior major league. My interest in hockey stems more from my career as a journalist rather than from the limited skills I displayed on the ice. Indeed, I was better at writing about the game than at playing it. Early in my relatively short career as a journalist, I covered what was then junior A hockey in Canada, since major junior hockey did not yet exist.

I remember all the trips I made for the newspaper I was working for at the time and the playoffs I covered between teams which became famous. I could tell you stories that may have been forgotten in some areas, but are still much talked about in other places.

I covered games between the Quebec Remparts and another great hockey team, the Cornwall Royals, which also played in the Quebec major junior hockey league, and also the east-west finals between the Estevan Bruins and the Niagara Falls Flyers. What was funny about these finals was that both teams had the very same jersey, and I think it was the Niagara Falls Flyers organization which had to lend their visiting-team jerseys to the western team for the Memorial Cup Finals.

I want to point out that the Centennial Cup Series will start on Friday and will be held in Olds, Alberta. I want to wish the best of luck to the team that will be representing Quebec, the Châteauguay Élites, and may the best team win.

If it were not for all these men and women who drive their kids to the arena, or even an ice rink or somewhere else, and stay to entice their children to play their favourite sport, I do not think we would have a national sport. We talked about people playing in the heat and wearing extremely expensive equipment but there are still people playing outside in siberian cold like the ones we had last winter. We must pay tribute to those people of my generation who started playing hockey with elementary equipment, because that sport was for us the soccer of the North. We would build our nets with ice, use hockey sticks worth 59 cents and quite often make a puck out of frozen horse droppings. Imagine how interesting it would have been in the spring to have a slap shot at the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, if you will allow me a joke, Mr. Speaker.

I am pleased, in the name of the Bloc Quebecois and of all my colleagues since we share a common interest, whether we are from Quebec or Canada, regarding the two sports we are about to recognize, to support the bill introduced by the member from Kamloops, which we are going to pass unanimously.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I must confess that I have been very pleased and honoured to have been in the chair throughout debate on this private member's bill. I congratulate the member for Kamloops. I also thank the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Canadian Heritage for her diligence and work so that we might bring the bill to conclusion today.

The sports of hockey and lacrosse have played important roles in the development of my home town of Cornwall and the entire area of Stormont—Dundas. In naming names sometimes we forget someone, but let me go to the early 1900s. Two names that come to mind are Joe Lally and Newsie Lalonde, both of whom we will find in the Lacrosse Hall of Fame located in New Westminster, British Columbia. Of course Newsie Lalonde has also been inducted into the National Hockey League Hockey Hall of Fame.

Prior to the early 1960s the Roundpoint Chisholm lacrosse stick factory located on the Akwesasne Reserve manufactured 85 per cent to 90 per cent of the world's hickory lacrosse sticks. I really enjoyed being in the chair throughout the debate.

Pursuant to order made earlier this day, Bill C-212, as amended, is deemed read the second time and referred to committee of the whole, deemed considered in committee of the whole, deemed reported without amendment, deemed concurred in at report stage, deemed read a third time and passed.

(Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, concurred in, read the third time and passed.)

It being 7.04 p.m. the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

NATIONAL DAY OF MOURNING

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification): Mr. Speaker, on this national day of mourning, I offer my deepest sympathy to Canadian workers.

We all remember friends, relatives or colleagues who died, were injured or handicapped for life as a result of work accidents.

[English]

Nothing would give me greater pleasure than to be able to say that from year to year workplace safety and health have been improving and that prevention measures have been implemented with a high level of success. Unfortunately this is not so.

In 1992 for example, more than 700 workers lost their lives as a result of work accidents. Although the fatality rate generally has declined over the past decade all the parties involved, the workers, employers, unions and regulatory bodies, clearly have to improve and take more seriously the question of workplace safety so they begin to make a difference to all those who have lost friends, relatives and family members to workplace accidents.

Investing in safety and health is investing in people and in prosperity and also avoidance of unnecessary tragedies. I am very hopeful that step by step we can continue to enhance regulations at the federal and provincial levels to increase compliance and to improve our performance in protecting Canadian workers.

To that effect, the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety located in Hamilton provides a very important service of information, support and resources in protecting employees and giving important knowledge to employers about workplace safety.

I recently visited the centre, and took that opportunity to announce that my government was giving the centre $100,000 to help it maintain its toll free emergency phone service.

[English]

This very important service ensures that there is one central place where individuals, employees and employers can phone in to get up to date information. It would be my hope in the future to continue to enhance and augment the role of the centre. I believe it is one of the most important institutions in workplace safety in the country.

I would also like to point out to members that occupational health and safety is a broad international concern. When signing the NAFTA labour agreement the three countries, Mexico, United States and our own agreed that this would be the priority issue. We have established as a result of that meeting a series of major conferences on workplace safety, the first beginning in Canada this summer.

We can now use the labour agreement under NAFTA as a venue and a means by which we can both improve knowledge and even aid those other countries by sharing information, by sharing knowledge and looking at measures in key industries like the oil and gas industry, engineering and others so that we can begin to provide in a co-operative fashion mutual activities.

I am sure that all members join me in remembering those who have paid the ultimate price in the workplace. I trust that they will encourage their constituents to be more vigilant about occupational health and safety. We can drastically reduce the pain and suffering caused by accidents to the victims, their families and friends if we all are more caring, more vigilant and more concerned.

• (1010)

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, according to the Canadian Labour Congress bulletin on health and safety in the work place, one thousand workers die annually as a result of accidents in the work place, and another million are injured, while thousands more die of diseases caused by toxic substances used in the work place or as a result of various other problems in their job environment.

The Bloc Quebecois, the Official Opposition, wishes to join in this national and international day of mourning in honour of those men and women who died on the job or as a result of an accident or a disease contracted in the work place.

Speaking on behalf the Official Opposition, I must point out that although the actual number of accidents has declined, the situation is far from ideal. In fact, many job related diseases have not yet been recognized as such and are therefore not included in these figures.

It is also true that the work place is changing, and as we have seen in the past, each new generation of technologies brings with it new diseases and accidents. The same is true today. Unfortunately, unlike other periods before the second world war, the labour movement is not on the rise and is experiencing difficulties in certain areas and even receding in certain cases. That is why governments have an even greater obligation not only to improve legislation but also its implementation.

Because of the pressures of globalization, there is an increasing tendency to fragment the work place and have jobs done by companies whose labour practices are irresponsible. This means that we as parliamentarians must remain alert. Only political will and social commitment will be able to stop these terrible and unacceptable effects of the job environment. We are concerned about the problems of the unemployed, but we cannot ignore those who, because of current pressures in the work place, must work under conditions that may lead to loss of life or loss of physical or mental well–being.

[English]

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, politicians are well known for sitting behind mounds of paper and bureaucracy dispensing advice to others. Seldom do they step outside their hallowed halls to feel the pain and also the joy of aching muscles and blisters from a physical day of hard work.

In my view it would be far more appropriate today if we had a framer, a mason, a steeplejack, a buggy operator, a labourer or a roustabout to offer a tribute in these halls.

I personally recall a powerful young mechanic severely injured by a propane blast that took his sight in one searing instant, leaving him disfigured and blind, his years of training made useless, his life's experiences suddenly only memories, his world a shambles.

Cliff and his wife never complain. In fact they are happy to have one another's love and support. Occupational health and safety are important. To Cliff and all his injured colleagues I dedicate this national day of mourning. To those less fortunate I offer a simple prayer.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the first report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. According to the committee, discussions on the debt and the deficits should not happen only during prebudget consultations but should be an ongoing process. The committee suggests that all members of Parliament use, among other things, the indicators proposed in this report to explain more readily to their constituents Canada's financial and economic situation.

The report tabled today reflects the basic consensus of the committee and the dissenting opinion of the members for Joliette and Chicoutimi concerning the addition to the report of a series of prospective economic indicators.

Pursuant to Standing Order 109 of the House of Commons, the committee is asking the government to table a comprehensive response to the report.

CORRECTIONS AND CONDITIONAL RELEASE ACT

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River) moved for leave to introduce bill C–242, an act to amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act, the Criminal Code and the Young Offenders Act (improvement to public safety).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to reintroduce into this House this bill which amends the Criminal Code, the Young Offenders Act and the Corrections and Conditional Release Act.

The bill will close a significant loophole in sentencing laws. It will lower the age of application of the Young Offenders Act. It will outlaw so–called crack houses and other locations involved in the trafficking of drugs. It will provide for stiffer bail procedures. It will deny statutory release to repeat serious offenders and will allow for the benefit of victims judicially ordered blood tests for those accused of sexual assaults and rape.

I want to acknowledge the support and collaboration of other colleagues in this and the previous Parliament and the assistance of various victims groups throughout the country which participated and collaborated in the construction of this bill.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR ACT

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–243, an Act to amend the Department of Labour Act (eligibility for assistance for long–service employees).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from Mercier for seconding the motion for introduction of this bill which seeks to amend the Program for Older Workers Adjustment.

The private member's bill I have the pleasure to introduce today in this House seeks to correct a terrible inequity toward Montreal workers and all workers from a community having more that 500,000 inhabitants. A laid off Montreal worker is eligible to the Program for Older Workers Adjustment only if the company laid off more than 100 workers in a single group.

But it so happens that, in Montreal, the industrial make–up is such that the vast majority of companies employ 20 to 30 workers. As a consequence, 83 per cent of all applications under the OWA program in Montreal have been rejected. This bill seeks to change that situation. I hope it will be favourably received by government members.

STARRED QUESTIONS

Hon. Fernand Robichaud (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call starred question No. 24.

[Text]

Question No. 24—Mr. Robinson:

Does the government intend to submit a brief to the International Court of Justice in response to their request for briefs concerning the legality of the use by a state of nuclear weapons in armed conflict? If so, what position will the government take on this issue, if not, why not?

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the answer be printed in Hansard as if it had been read.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs): The government is considering this issue and will announce its decision in due course.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, I respectfully suggest that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY—AGRICULTURE

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est) moved:

That this House denounce the government's lack of action in the agricultural sector, which is currently facing the most significant changes in thirty years.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I thank my distinguished colleague from Hochelaga—Maisonneuve for seconding this motion. I am pleased to rise in this House for this motion:

That this House denounce the government's lack of action in the agricultural sector, which is currently facing the most significant changes in thirty years.

I also ask all members of all parties present here to do the same in condemning the government's inaction on agriculture. A self–respecting society is one that recognizes the importance of its agriculture. A country must first of all ensure that its citizens have good food, hence the importance of stimulating this crucial sector of our economy. Subject to the whims of nature and buffeted by political decisions made here and elsewhere, agriculture requires heavy investment, diversified technical expertise and constant support from the government.

We cannot overemphasize that. Agriculture is a very important industry in Canada. Agri–food accounts for nearly 8 per cent of the gross domestic product and almost 2 million jobs, 15 per cent of all employment in Canada. It produces some $64 billion of goods a year. Food processing industries alone generate $38 billion, which is more than the automobile industry in Canada, which generates about $30 billion.

In fact, every dollar of agricultural production generates nearly $3 in economic benefits.

• (1025)

Agriculture is, therefore, extremely important to Canada and to Quebec. It plays a major role in our economy, serves as the basis of our society and is an important component of our national identity.

The 38,000 farms and 1,200 processing plants which make up the agri–food industry inject roughly $3 billion into the economy in the form of inputs, services and salaries. The industry generates approximately 400,000 jobs, or 11 per cent of the overall total, and accounts for $11 billion in shipments in the manufacturing sector in Quebec.

This is nearly three times the shipments of the pulp and paper sector. In fact, the agricultural and agri–food sector in Quebec is much larger than the province's pulp and paper industry or even the automobile industry.

Is it not time for our politicians and governments to pay more serious attention to agriculture and to stop neglecting this sector which provides a source of jobs and economic wealth?

What could account for this laxness and lack of action on the part of the government? Because there is no question that farmers are currently facing serious problems. With the upheavals resulting from the GATT and the NAFTA, the agricultural sector has undergone over the past few years some of the biggest changes in 30 years.

No one denies that the GATT and the NAFTA have changed the rules of the game in agriculture and it is hard to argue that in the case of these agreements, the federal government was truly successful in defending the interests of Canadian farmers.

The Canadian government lost out on GATT. First, because it failed to maintain support for article XI and was unable to cobble together a coalition of countries to defend its position and ensure that article XI would be maintained. Not only did the federal government fail to defend article XI of the GATT, which provides for a highly equitable system for farmers and consumers, it failed as well to gain a reasonable period of time for farmers affected by article XI to adapt to changes in these sectors.

The agri–food industry needs a reasonable period of time to make the transition to a competitive world. However, the government failed to win the industry enough time to make a smooth transition to the new system.

By signing the GATT Agreement, the federal government is subjecting the farmers of Quebec and Canada to time frames and terms of change imposed from the outside, by their very competitors.

In fact, the government's lack of action in the agricultural sector has been obvious since the GATT Agreement was signed, and in its trade negotiations with the United States in particular.

Not only did the federal government lose the battle for article XI at GATT and give the farmers very little time to adjust, but when it signed the GATT agreements on December 15 last, it did not make sure our many trade disputes with our main trading partner, the US, were settled.

Canada has since had to negotiate under pressure the settlement of a large number of trade disputes in the agricultural sector. Naturally, the United States has managed to drag Canada into global negotiations of all issues pertaining to agriculture instead of negotiating issues on the merits of each case.

In so doing, Canada had once again put itself in a position of incredible weakness. The federal government's strategy is one of damage control, a mainly defensive strategy. Our negotiators keep complaining that the US is acting in bad faith.

Canada's position of inaction and passivity is also exemplified by the fact it has accepted to negotiate a cap on Canadian durum wheat exports to the United States.

• (1030)

Given that Canada is doing nothing wrong under NAFTA, why allow to be penalized with respect to durum wheat exports when we know that the problems are on the American side?

There is a very long list of cases resulting from agreements signed at GATT and from NAFTA in various agricultural areas across the country which show how weak and soft this government's administration of agriculture is. But we will have the opportunity to discuss this in greater detail later on.

Canadian agriculture is faced with a serious problem, and the government has not done anything to deal with it: that is the considerable decline in the number of Canadian farms.

In Canada in the last 20 years the number of farms has fallen by nearly 25 per cent or almost one–fourth. We lost close to 100,000 farms. This means that 170,000 men and women who used to farm no longer earn a living as farmers. Even among those who still farm, almost 40 per cent, and in some sectors over 50 per cent, need a regular job elsewhere to survive as farmers.

In other words, in Canada not only is the farming population diminishing but it cannot even earn a decent living from farming alone. Rural people need our support; rural communities are in decline but everything we say on this subject seems to fall on deaf ears. So far the government has not come up with any proposal to improve rural communities and the fate of family farms.

Our farmers are among the most sophisticated in the world in several areas. Despite farmers' meagre income and reduced numbers, average productivity has grown by 2.4 per cent a year since 1981, which puts them in first place in Canada, far ahead of the manufacturing sector with a growth rate of only 1 per cent. The excellent performance of farmers must be pointed out.

Canada comes first in the world for its capacity to feed its citizens at the lowest cost. How would you like to live in London, England, and spend 24 per cent of your salary on food in Tokyo and spend 33 per cent or a third of your income to feed your family, when Canadian consumers only spend 13 per cent of their income on premium quality and surprisingly varied food products? In spite of its problems and the lack of government support, the agricultural sector does its job well.

We are losing our farmers at an alarming rate. Our countryside is emptying and unemployment is going up. In addition, farmers are getting older: 42 per cent of them are over 55 and they are hard to replace because farming requires an enormous investment. Return on investment is low and working conditions are hard and totally different from those experienced by other workers in this country.

Who among us would be willing to start a business, invest half a million and, in return, have to work 80 hours a week, as is sometimes the case, without any vacation and for a salary which only represents 80 per cent of the average income of the rest of Canadians? The problem is not that there are no young people willing to take over, it is that the current policy is conducive to the dismantling of family farms.

Right now a person who wants to transfer his farm to his child must make great sacrifices. That person must be prepared to accept a substantial reduction of the value of his farm, often on the order of 50 per cent. In other words, it is the person who worked hard for over 40 years, reinvesting all his earnings in the farm to improve it and make it more efficient and profitable, and who always deprived himself of all those little treats which ordinary citizens take for granted—vacations, free evenings, sleeping in, etc.—who must, when the time to retire comes, sacrifice his pension fund to allow his offspring to take over the family operation. Farmers should not have to subsidize the new generation taking over. If we want an abundant and steady supply of food items, the government must take its responsibilities and initiate a farm transfer program. When will the government do that?

The loss of a farm is a tragic event which accelerates the deterioration of rural zones. We must put a stop to this terrible pattern. We must do something to keep rural populations from constantly decreasing. A healthy rural community is essential to the well-being of our society. Losing a farm often means losing a concession, a road, a post office, or a store. It can also lead to the deterioration of our rural communities and massive loss in investments, knowledge, money, training, expertise, research and subsidies. Our rural communities are full of dynamic and intelligent people who deserve better than what the government is proposing. The time has come for our distinguished colleagues opposite to introduce a rural policy that includes farm transfers.

Besides worrying about who will take over from them, farmers are concerned about their farm income which, as was mentioned earlier, does not get them very far. How many of us would be ready to spend our evenings, our weekends and our holidays holding down a second job, because our boss does not pay us a decent salary? In 1992-93, government subsidies accounted for 42 per cent of the total net income of farmers. This represents a significant decrease, since direct federal subsidies dropped by $113 million in 1993. Things are getting better, slowly but surely. However, these figures clearly indicate that the government contribution is crucial to the survival of our agricultural industry. Farmers need some support from the government.

The Department of Agriculture and Agri-Food has a budget of some $3 billion, which represents less than 2 per cent of the federal government budget. This is not a huge amount of money when you consider the importance of this sector. Unfortunately, the money is not always well spent. Take for instance, agricultural research. In 1992-93, $300 million of taxpayers money were spent in this area, which provides 3,000 jobs. At first glance, this seems like a good investment. However, the money may not have been spent efficiently.

The Auditor General said: "The Department does not have in place a system to monitor the use of the technologies it has developed and transferred, with the exception of tracking the usage of new seed varieties. Without an effective monitoring system, it is not possible to determine how successful the Department has been in improving the adoption of technology by Canadian producers and processors". Since 1986, the department has known that until a responsibility framework has been defined and implemented by means of fiscal systems and performance evaluation mechanisms, it will be unable to highlight effectively the connection between resources and anticipated results on the one hand, and expenditures and actual results on the other hand.

Wasted money, ineffective research, much could be said on the gathering of market information and the gathering and compilation of statistical reports. It is incredible how Agriculture Canada fails to meet farmers' needs. Information does not always include conclusions, forecasts and data on market opportunities, and I quote from the Auditor General: "Dissemination of market information/intelligence is too slow and fails to meet the industry's needs for timeliness".

Although rather small, Agriculture Canada's budget is not managed effectively. The system has several deficiencies and it is about time we do something about it. In 1994, there will be a thorough review of the department's programs as a result of the signing of the GATT and NAFTA agreements.

In the past, these programs were not well controlled. Again I quote the Auditor General: "Some key aspects of the agreements, such as objectives, responsibilities, cost sharing and accountability, are not clearly defined".

So much money and effort has been spent to provide a service that does not meet the producers' needs. There is waste also in the duplication of programs, be it farm credit, food inspection, income support, market development or marketing. These duplications entail costs for the taxpayers, for such things as staff, services or office space. The respective tasks of the federal government and the provinces in trade exploration are poorly defined. As for the information gathered by various departments, when it is passed on to farmers, it is often too late for them to take advantage of it.

There has been progress, of course, but there is still much duplication between the federal and provincial levels, not only in programs but also in data, as we can see in this blatant example. According to Agriculture Canada data on hog exports, the figure for 1992 was 72,000 for Eastern Canada; but according to Statistics Canada, the figure for the same year and the same region was 125,000, that is twice as much. This is at the very least very bad data compiling, and it is very embarrassing to see such nonsense.

The Chair is indicating that I have one minute left, but a minute is not enough. It is unacceptable, all the more so since I was getting to the core of the subject.

Beyond these many difficulties for farmers, the waste and the many administrative duplications, there is something even worse in the agricultural sector. There is a very serious inequity problem in Canada between the west and Quebec, an inequity that shows up in many ways and that has been going on for a long time. There are numerous instances: milk, research, rural diversification, transportation and GATT. For example—and to sum up quickly since I do not have time to extrapolate—since 1980, the federal assistance share of the prairie provinces, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, has grown from 42 per cent to 64 per cent of the federal budget, whereas financial assistance for Quebec has decreased from 30 per cent to 10 per cent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Since the hon. member for Québec–Est is the first member to participate today in this debate on a matter of great importance to the whole country, I wonder if there would be unanimous consent to allow the member to conclude his remarks so we can start off debate on the right foot.

[English]

Would there be unanimous consent, seeing that the member for Québec–Est is the lead speaker on this opposition day in this very important debate on the subject of agriculture?

• (1045)

I hope the member does not need more than two or three minutes to conclude his remarks.

Mr. Marchand: I need five minutes, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Five minutes.

[English]

The member is asking for unanimous consent to extend his intervention by five minutes. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Marchand: I thank all hon. members for their kindness.

I wanted to deal with the inequity of the situation in agriculture because it lies at the heart of the problem, at least from the Quebec viewpoint. There are numerous examples of inequities between Quebec and western Canada.

Grain transportation is a case in point. Grain traffic on the St. Lawrence seaway is constantly being eroded and diverted to west coast ports. Since 1984, the volume of grain moved through the seaway has been halved, dropping from million 12 to 6 million tonnes.

In 1993 the volume of goods shipped through the seaway was 32 million tonnes, a 50 per cent reduction compared with 15 years ago. Glen Stewart, the chairman of the St. Lawrence seaway authority, says the Western Grain Transportation Act encourages producers to ship their grain through Pacific coast ports. That stands to reason since we have more buyers in the far east, but why is it that millions of tonnes of grain shipped to Africa and Europe also move through West coast ports and Panama?

The dice are loaded because westbound grain shipments are subsidized all the way to the Pacific coast whereas subsidies for eastbound grain stop at the lakehead, which is still thousands of kilometres from the Atlantic ocean. Would it not be normal that such subsidies apply a mari usque ad mare, from coast to coast?

Why should western Canada get better treatment than eastern Canada? Right from the beginning, Canadian agricultural policies were developed mainly to meet the needs of western grain producers and worked against the interests of farmers in Quebec. To make up for the deficiencies of their policies and the unfairness of federal transfers to Quebec, we Quebecers have had to develop our own programs adapted to Quebec's realities.

It goes without saying that this situation is very costly for Quebec's taxpayers. The taxes paid by Quebecers for agriculture have mostly benefited western farmers. As I already said, the prairies' share of federal funds rose to 64 percent from 42 per cent, while Quebec's share diminished from 30 per cent to 10 per cent.

Of course the federal government spent money to help the west diversify. In the last five years, hundreds of thousands of dollars were spent to diversify western agriculture, while the federal government never contributed anything to the diversification of Quebec's agriculture.

There are a vast number of cases in which we can very clearly see that the federal governement is less and less interested in Quebec's agriculture. Maybe this is good for Quebec's producers because they are very well organized. In fact, I believe they will benefit in a big way from sovereignty.

This may be good but let us take the example of UHT milk made in Quebec, a high quality product which held 40 per cent of the market for this kind of product in Puerto Rico, where the Americans tried to block Quebec exports of UHT milk and succeeded. We are not selling any more UHT milk in Puerto Rico. In this case, the federal governement did nothing to protect this $40 million production. However, at the same time in the beer dispute between Ontario and the USA the federal government intervened very rapidly.

I mentioned diversification of agriculture, but there is another example, the railways. In the west we maintain close to 25,000 kilometres of railway lines for the sake of national unity, while we are abandoning thousands of kilometres of lines in the east, particularly in Quebec.

• (1050)

Here is another example. New Brunswick potato growers know that their production is subsidized. Transportation for their potatoes is subsidized at 50 per cent.

No other producers are subsidized at 50 p. 100 for the transportation of their potatoes, so New Brunswick producers can sell their potatoes in Quebec cheaper than Quebec producers.

The same goes for Prince Edward Island, and there are more examples like that one. It is as if the government wants to crush Quebec. Once again poor negotiation strategies at the GATT talks have contributed to scaring Canadian producers. We have the feeling that the federal government does not want to protect farmers, but rather create a very serious instability in quota production. And here we have that crisis in the Ontario chicken market where production is being considerably increased, jeopardizing all quota production in Quebec.

I will conclude with these very brief words. I am convinced that Quebec's farmers will be the first to benefit from Quebec's sovereignty, because when Quebec recovers the money that it is paying to the west to subsidize agriculture, that money will go directly to the regions and toward social and economic infrastructures, schools, education and services. That money will reinforce Quebec's regions, promote agriculture and even enlist Quebec into a democratization process, which is what we wish for everybody.

[English]

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I did appreciate the hon. member's comments because I come from a rural–urban riding mix as well and have a great support for the agriculture sector, in particular dairy agriculture.

I remind the hon. member of two points that this government has done. In the SEED program, which is summer employment for students, a program that has just recently been introduced, approximately one–quarter of my student applicants have applied for jobs in the farm sector. I would challenge the hon. member that the farm sector is still a vibrant sector in this country, that our young people are returning to the farms and that a nation that cannot feed itself is not a strong nation. I believe Canada is going in the right direction.

The second point I would remind the hon. member of is that with our budget in February of this year we retained the $500,000 capital gains exemption for small business and farms. Therefore farms could be passed on to the second generation or provide a strength of security for the farm family in the older days of their lives.

We have not done everything that we may, but we are going in the direction to preserve the family farm and to maintain a source of strong, excellent and healthy food supply for this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the extra time you gave me. I would now like to answer my colleague's question.

[English]

Obviously Agriculture Canada has not done everything wrong, I would not go as far as that. There are some things it has done right. Certainly the $500,000 capital gains due to the Minister of Finance is good, there is no doubt about it, and also the encouragement for young people to return during the summer months to work on the farm.

All sorts of things that Agriculture Canada does are worth underlining, there is no doubt about it, but overall no, this government is not going in the right direction for agriculture and it shows. There are a great number of issues that could be brought up.

The loss of the number of family farms is an example. The government is not doing anything to counteract this development. I suspect that Agriculture Canada encourages inefficient producing farms or family farms and is in agreement with the American attitude in respect to agriculture. That is to say it encourages well integrated systems, large farms which will make it such that farmers will no longer be farmers. They will become employees in large farms. Maybe they will make a better salary, who knows, but personally I do not think that is the right direction in respect of the family farm.

I think the government could use more structural moneys to help redress this. One could go on and on about just this one issue. We could encourage large agricultural businesses situated in Saskatoon or Quebec City, but what about the rural areas? How do you encourage a population to occupy its rural area if you do not encourage the family farm?

Agriculture is fundamental for that. The agricultural population is not different from us. It needs all sorts of services such as schools, education, hospitals and so forth.

In losing the farmers in the rural areas and losing all the other services, these rural areas are abandoned and that is a big price to pay for a country like Canada.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri–food): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a couple of comments to the member opposite who has been chatting with us this morning for a little while.

The last part of the motion refers to the agri–industry which is currently facing the most significant changes in the last 30 years. I would agree with that but I would like to have him recognize, which I think if he were very straight with the House he would, that these changes are also opportunities.

Yes, there are challenges there. At no time in the history of Canadian agriculture has the agri–food industry starting with the primary producer, the farmer, going right up through the whole chain, had the opportunities before it as the industry has at the present time.

The opportunity is there to meet the challenges that are there. It is like everything in life. Those challenges are not always simple and easy, taking a snap of the finger to get them, but those opportunities are there.

I would suggest to the member that he recognize that this government has only been in power for the last six months. He should look at what this government has done with regard to trade initiatives, protecting the family farm, our success in getting the tariff levels in place at the GATT talks, and I could go on. Work is being done on the pesticide review and with regard to the whole farm safety net program.

I remind the member that we have done a lot in the first six months. He had better sit back and wait because we are not done yet.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, there has been an awful lot of talk and a lot of studies. Even the parliamentary secretary for agriculture is involved in one of these studies. However, there has been very little action.

The little action the government has taken has been backward in some respects, forced upon it by the earlier government, for example in the case of GATT. We are dealing with the consequences from GATT. I am not sure or convinced that this agreement was advantageous for farmers in Canada.

I think we broke in, we broke down, we did not negotiate fully or effectively. Now we are caught in a situation in which we are having to give away an agricultural system, the supply management system, which was an excellent system, the world's best system. We are forced to give it away.

• (1100)

The agricultural community which was directly under the supply management program now is forced to readapt very quickly, in six years, for example. This is not an advantage to those farmers. Farming is not like producing dingy bells or post cards. You do not change agriculture from one day to the next. You need long term planning and structural investment. You have to know where you are going and this government does not seem to know where it is going.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, coming from B.C. the subject of grain is not a big issue in our area. However, I want to make a couple of comments to the member about some of his statements regarding his concern about the lack of grain or the decrease in grain passing through the St. Lawrence seaway.

Clearly the member realizes that there has been a huge market change in the demand for grain in the world. Europe, for example, has gone from a net importer to a net exporter of grain. This is a predominant factor in grain shipments throughout the east coast ports.

I sit in the House every day and listen to the members from the Bloc crying about how hard done by the province of Quebec is and how things are so tough and they are being penalized so much. The member should realize that for so many years the pendulum swung the other way toward the province of Quebec.

We talk about the supply management system. Today in the domestic market the province of Quebec enjoys a huge protectionist advantage for shipping things like cheese and milk products and some of the other items in the domestic market.

In our province, for example, because of the supply management system we are restricted to pretty much a local area for selling our product. The member is once more bringing up the hard done by Quebec issue and I think that his facts are not exactly correct.

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, Quebec certainly is not winning by any means in this. For example, with milk definitely we have a certain advantage in Quebec over the west, that is for sure. Now obviously with the change in the GATT, Quebec is going to have to realign itself and develop new markets.

In terms of grain transportation it is obvious that there are millions of tonnes of grain going via Vancouver. It is not because I do not want it to go via Vancouver but it is rather illogical to transport grain to Vancouver ports in order to get to Europe when the line is more directly toward the St. Lawrence seaway. There is a very clear tendency there that seems to want to favour it. I do not know why.

This is in line with the whole subsidy program. Why, for example, are there many tonnes of grain that are subsidized going to Thunder Bay and then back down the line to get to the United States? Grain transportation is subsidized in such a way—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I know this issue, as I mentioned earlier, is of great importance and I am sure that members throughout the day will want to raise these issues.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues, the minister, the hon. Ralph Goodale, and the parliamentary secretary, Mr. Lyle Vanclief, it is with pleasure that I open the debate on the opposition motion relating to a vital sector of the Canadian economy, that is to say agriculture and the agri–food industry.

I would like to start by commenting briefly the wording of this motion that I find absolutely ridiculous. I must tell you that I was stunned—I could not believe my eyes—when I read this motion. Just think, our colleagues opposite are asking that this House denounce the government's lack of action in the agricultural sector. The government's lack of action, nothing less.

Ironically enough, while we are fed such cliches, while we are criticized for our alleged inaction, my colleague, the minister of agriculture, happens to be abroad on a mission to promote agricultural trade.

In fact, that is why I am replacing the hon. minister here today. As we speak the minister of agriculture is leading a trade mission in the Asia–Pacific region. This region is an economic zone undergoing phenomenal growth, one that looks like a promising export market for our agri–food products and know how.

The minister is accompanied by a delegation of 15 leaders of the Canadian agri–food industry representing most areas in that industry. After stopping off in Japan and Korea, they are now in China and from there are headed for Hong Kong.

As recently as last Monday, the minister of agriculture left Korea with a signed contract to sell wheat to Korea as well as interesting prospects for the sale of pork meat and animal feed. If that is called lack of action, there is something wrong with the definition of the word. As a matter of fact, I am convinced that not only the Bloc Quebecois critic for agriculture but also my hon. colleague the critic for finance, a prominent agricultural economist, will approve of the objectivity and capacity to promote agriculture in the Canadian economy.

How can one dare talk about government lack of action when this government has been praised by the industry for reacting both quickly and firmly to the American decision to renegotiate customs duties on wheat under article XXVIII of GATT? Our government made it clear that we do not want a trade war with the United States. We would rather negotiate. But we will go to war if we have to. As the hon. minister indicated, no deal will be made with the Americans unless this deal benefits the Canadian agri–food industry as a whole as far as grain products, processing and supply managed commodities are concerned. Canada will not give in on one point to get more on another. We refuse to play one group or region off against another.

[English]

Inertia my eye. This government takes great pride in the exceptional work that our Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food has been doing since taking office in November. I would congratulate my colleague, the parliamentary secretary to the minister, for his intervention five minutes ago when he talked about the positive things that we as a government and as a country are bringing to this, one of the most important sectors of our economy.

In the last five months the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food has travelled widely in an effort to meet all of the pertinent players around the world, in Canada and in Quebec. He has met with industry associations and stakeholders. He has met with provincial and municipal governments as well as American, Mexican and now Asia–Pacific agriculture and trade officials.

These meetings were held in a spirit of co–operation and consultation which has been the hallmark of this government's approach to making Canada's agri–food industry one of the strongest in the world.

The Canadian agri–food industry is a major employer. It is a major exporter. It accounts for 8 per cent of Canada's GDP and 15 per cent of our jobs, three–quarters of which are found beyond the farm gate. In fact, it represents work for more than 1.5 million Canadians on the farm, in processing plants and in the food distribution chain. It also provides Canadians with safe, nutritious food at reasonable prices. Agri–food exports are a significant source of income for Canada. In 1992 exports were worth $13.7 billion.

Our platform, the famous red book, says that our sector has unique opportunities for growth and places great emphasis on security for Canadian farm families. It recognizes that Canadian farmers want that security to be built on the development of solid domestic and international markets, on staying at the forefront of innovation, on stewardship of our natural resources and in the confidence consumers have in the safety and the quality of our food.

I would like to take some time to review the work that we have done to live up to our commitments, to follow up perhaps on the intervention of the parliamentary secretary some minutes ago.

I would like to begin by reaffirming as a government our commitment to research and to innovation. This is an area where our government feels that the Department of Agriculture and Agri–Food can work closely with other government departments to build a framework that will make it easy for firms in the agriculture sector to bring products successfully to the marketplace.

Successful agriculture is a knowledge industry. Studies have shown that the return on investment in some key areas of agri–food research can exceed 50 per cent. This is one area where Ralph Goodale is very keen to see government continue to emphasize—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I hesitate to interrupt the Minister of Finance. I just want to remind us all to refer to each other by our titles or positions, such as the minister of agriculture or minister of this, unless of course that member is no longer in this Chamber, which is always regrettable. For all those of us here in this 35th Parliament I know it is a tradition that we will want to maintain.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I am suitably admonished. It is just that I am so enthusiastic about the work the minister of agriculture does that I sometimes get carried away.

In any event, this is one area, that is to say agri–food research, in which the government is very keen to see us place even more emphasis. Therefore, Agriculture and Agri–Food Canada will give a very high priority to innovative research and to collaboration with private research partners.

In our agenda for creating opportunity we have endorsed the idea of providing matching funds for research proposed jointly by the public and the private sectors. My colleague is looking at a variety of options, collaboration with the private sector and the public sector, including a plan to work with industry for additional co–operative investment funding.

As for trade, which the critic discussed, from the day we took office it has been our top priority. The focus of our government's platform has been economic renewal, growth and jobs. A number of the initiatives so far have been aimed at encouraging small business, stimulating innovation in research and development, providing stability for the future and in particular, restoring confidence and stability in the agri–food sector.

In pursuing these goals we have set out two priorities: concluding the trade deals and getting absolutely the most out of new trade opportunities. That again is what the parliamentary secretary referred to. Let us not only look at the problems but let us look at change as something that will provide a very dynamic agricultural sector with the opportunity to develop new products and create new opportunities.

We hit the ground running by negotiating a successful GATT agreement that will bring fairness and predictability to international trade which Canada is so dependent on.

On January 1 we saw the introduction of the North American free trade agreement which will provide an even greater opportunity for our industry in North America. A more secure trading environment will over time provide better stability for our farm families and for our agri–food entrepreneurs. Our challenge now is to take the utmost advantage of the opportunities presented by these agreements.

We already have a commitment from industry to work toward the goal of exporting $20 billion in agri–food products by the year 2000. That is a considerable leap from the $13.7 billion we are now realizing. I am confident, as are the Department of Agriculture and Agri–Food and the government, that we can do it if we all work together. I would ask the opposition to join us in that great effort.

The Department of Agriculture and Agri–Food is reordering its priorities to increase support for export initiatives. We have placed agri–food specialists in selected embassies abroad to provide better service for our exporters. The first ones are in place in Mexico, Japan, South Korea and Taiwan. The response we have had to their work has been very good.

To further consolidate our trade efforts in Mexico, we will soon open a Canada business centre in Mexico City to promote our exports and to offer trade related services to our new NAFTA partners.

Canadian farmers are very supportive of this focus on trade. They want to earn their incomes from the marketplace, not from the high subsidy levels that have prevailed over the past few. years. They repeatedly tell us that they do not want subsidies, that they just want a decent price from the market.

The producers continue to need some protection from the vagaries of the market and from external disasters. Our platform promised to review all existing support programs to develop farm income stabilization programs based on the concept of the whole farm, a user friendly safety net based on income from the whole farm.

We see farm income security as a consequence of the marketplace more than as a result of government support programs.

Development of the new whole farm income support program has been a key part of our plan to create security for farm families. We launched in Winnipeg at the beginning of February a consultative process on refurbishing Canadian farm safety net programs which will draw on the expertise of farm leaders from across the country, as well as federal and provincial government officials.

What emerged from that Winnipeg meeting was a strong consensus to make a whole farm program available to all commodities. There was also agreement that some sort of additional support or companion programs would be needed to deal with specific regional or commodity problems as they arise. This will be part of our overall approach to safety nets.

We have already taken a few big steps toward safety net reform. The first was establishing a national safety nets committee made up of government and industry representatives.

The membership of the committee was established to ensure that the agri–food industry had input in the policy and program activities that will lead to the establishment of a renewed safety net regime. The membership is charged with ensuring that the input of all interested producers is brought to the table for consideration. They are to ensure that the deliberations and the conclusions of the committee are disseminated around the country.

We need to develop a program that is GATT consistent, market neutral, financially sound, affordable and effective. We need to ensure that taxpayers' money is spent in the most efficient way: to improve the industry's ability to adapt and to compete while not distorting trade. We would like to be ready to begin its implementation in 1995.

While not strictly a safety net issue, the question of interest free cash advances must be considered when we are thinking about safety nets, because there is only one source of funds for agricultural programs. As the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food recently told several farm groups, our government is quite prepared to move on our campaign promise to improve these programs but first he wants to get the opinions of all major farm groups.

It is important to note that the budget of the Department of Agriculture and Agri–Food for all income support and safety net programs is currently about $850 million. Historically interest free cash advances have cost us $50 million to $75 million. If $75 million is used for cash advances it means that much less is available for other things. If we hear a consensus from producers that it is the best way to spend that money, our government will proceed.

The finance critic for the Bloc Quebecois may tell his colleague, the agriculture critic, that he does not think money should be spent on agriculture. However we are going to do it because we believe in Canadian agriculture.

We are asking farm groups to look at the basket of programs we have in place, the new initiatives that may come out of the safety net discussions, and the amount of money available to support these programs, to tell us what is the best way to spend our limited resources, our scarce resources. I know the financial critic for the Bloc will support me in this effort.

Is the commitment to fully interest free cash advances the best use of these funds? Are there ways to make cash advance programs more effective at lower costs? That is the debate we must have in the House.

Another element of security for farm families consists of the programs in place to help farmers manage. There are a number of them. Some are being questioned; others are aimed at helping farmers adapt to changes in farm financial situations which the critic raised in his remarks.

In some cases the provinces have programs similar to our own. We need to assess these programs. We need to ask ourselves what types of programs might be considered companion programs and how they are best going to meet the needs of the future. How can we eliminate duplication among different levels of government? How can we provide straightforward service to farmers? We will be looking at all federal programs in this context.

Tied into the issue of security for farm families and agricultural communities as a whole is the question of rural development. A healthy rural sector is an important part of ensuring a prosperous agriculture industry and vice versa.

The Prime Minister has asked the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food to promote and facilitate rural renewal using the resources of Agriculture and Agri–Food Canada. As a result the minister announced that a rural renewal secretariat was being established within his department to provide leadership and co–ordination.

This secretariat is working with other departments, with provincial governments, industry, communities, organizations and grassroots stakeholders to address the challenges facing rural Canada.

The key to this effort is partnership, the co–ordination of the business of government, the vigilance and the political will to ensure that rural people and rural issues get the careful attention they need around the cabinet table and in the conduct of government.

[Translation]

As for supply management, the new GATT agreement will certainly require adjustments on our part, but we must nonetheless recognize that substantial gains were made. We have ensured that tariffs will be reasonably high, applied for a reasonable length of time and combined to clear access rules so as to allow product sectors to get by.

In co–operation with the provinces and the industry, we are developing a supply management system which will be both sustainable and responsive to the new market conditions. A federal–provincial–industrial working group will be holding consultations and developing a strategy to get the most out of the new trading context.

[English]

Many agri–food enterprises are small or medium sized businesses. A key part of our platform is directed at helping to unleash the job creation potential in small and medium sized businesses. We will provide one stop shopping for business. We will provide the market development support necessary to succeed in today's global markets. We will continue to cut red tape and unnecessary regulation.

[Translation]

Change is now the order of the day. This Parliament must also work in co–operation toward ensuring the prosperity of our agri–food industry.

• (1125)

Our government has not been twiddling its thumbs, whatever the opposition says. I call upon its common sense and spirit of co–operation to bring about positive change within the industry. All Canadians will benefit from this.

[English]

I believe the farmers and business people of Canada recognize the contribution the agri–food sector brings to the Canadian economy. We all look forward to making the most of what I know will be a better future for all Canadians.

In conclusion, that is why we on this side of the House welcome this debate. This House is a dramatically changed House from the previous one. On our side, as was evident in the intervention of my colleague, there is tremendous interest and expertise in agricultural matters. There is a very strong rural influence running through the Liberal caucus.

As I look across the House, the Reform Party brings with it a great deal of knowledge and understanding of western agriculture. The agriculture critic for the Bloc Quebecois is an acknowledged expert in the area, as indeed is its finance critic an eminent and renowned economist in that sector.

There is an opportunity in the House to marry the tremendous knowledge, desire and enthusiasm for Canadian agriculture existing in the government with the sincerity of the opposition parties. It is for that reason we are delighted to participate in the debate today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I take note of the interest of members who want to participate in questions and comments with the Minister of Finance. I will attempt to recognize as many as possible in the 10–minute period available to us.

I encourage members to keep their questions brief and the minister to respond in the same fashion so that I may accommodate as many members as possible.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot): Mr. Speaker, thank you very much for this opportunity to address the Minister of Finance. I had no idea that he could speak so eloquently about farming.

Speaking for the minister of agriculture, the Minister of Finance stated earlier that I supported a reduction in farm subsidies. Given the enormous upheavals that the agricultural sector in Quebec and in Canada is currently experiencing, I would never have said such a thing quite the contrary.

The government should continue to support the agricultural sector and perhaps even increase that level of support, not only to the primary sector but to the processing sector as well so as to improve the industry's current performance and prepare it to face the challenge of global competition.

When we speak of the government's lack of action, here is what we are talking about. Since 1986 and as far back as 1982, when I was working for the federal Department of Agriculture, there has been a great deal of discussion, at the federal level at least, with the provinces and farmers.

Since 1986 discussions have involved the Conservatives primarily. The current Minister of Finance says that he deplores the fact that no decision is ever taken. Why is that? Because the very same thing is happening today. Senior officials want to implement agricultural policies across the board and coast to coast. I have often questioned the minister of agriculture about income security programs and the negotiations currently taking place between his officials and market growers. His answer has been to leave everything in the capable hands of his officials whose job it is to deal with these matters.

My question, therefore, is to the minister of agriculture. When will real policies be drafted to give Canadian farmers the ability to meet the challenge of global markets and when will the government show some backbone in the face of constant trade dispute threats from the Americans, as is presently the case with respect to tariffs on Canadian durum wheat?

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly the first to admit that I am not personally known as an expert on agriculture, except that I should tell my hon. colleague that I am a farmer.

I have a farm where I raise beef in the riding of Brome—Missisquoi; it is one of the most beautiful parts of Quebec and I invite him to come and visit my farm and really see what it is to work the land.

• (1130)

I also invite the agriculture critic of the Bloc Quebecois. I can talk to him as to a Quebec farmer and I can certainly tell him that, for me, as a Quebec farmer, not only the provincial government is important, the federal government is important too.

They ask when we will confront the Americans. It has been done. I was in Washington two days ago. I met the Treasury Secretary there, I raised the issue of the debate that we are having here and I can assure the House that we will hold our ground in these discussions with the Americans and we will win because we are right.

[English]

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the Minister of Finance speak to the issue of agriculture. I appreciate his presence here because a lot of the decisions affecting agriculture have a dollar attached to them.

His speech was rather a motherhood one. I am sure that if you glance through Hansard you would see similar speeches made by agriculture ministers and finance ministers since time immemorial both at the federal and provincial levels.

There was really nothing of substance that I can take back to my rural riding and tell my constituents that I heard this from the government and it would give them hope or at least help them to prepare for the decisions they have to make to manage their farming enterprises.

A crucial question we would like to have clarification on from the Minister of Finance is—I am not talking in broad motherhood terms—when federal financial support for agriculture is justifiable.

Reform has very clearly stated the basis on which we feel support is justifiable. I can mention eight areas. What about countering international trade wars? What about transportation issues? What about natural hazards? What about regional disparities in agricultural sectors? What about variations or instability in the marketplace returns from agriculture produce? What about sustainability of rural Canada? What about research and development? What about environmental and conservation measures?

Specifically, does the government support funding for agriculture in these definite areas because I am not sure there are enough dollars to cover all of them. We need to know the priorities of the government. Because the minister went to great lengths to say that the federal agriculture minister was so wonderful I am sure they have had considerable consultation and have an action plan in place.

I would like to know what the priorities of the federal government are with regard to consolidating federal programs. The minister said it is an issue they may pursue. We want to know what programs are going to be consolidated in the agriculture sector. What can we expect from the government?

We also wonder if it would pledge to cut down administration but retain funding in real dollars for actual agricultural programs, except perhaps if savings could be accrued through reduction or de-escalation in the trade war.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that I dealt quite extensively in my remarks with exactly the points that were raised by the opposition critic.

Our position on the trade war is very clear in terms of our absolute preparedness to go to the wall to protect the Canadian farmer. Indeed the agriculture minister has made that very clear. We are right and we are going to win and let there be no doubt about that.

I dealt with research and development extensively in my remarks. We believe that if you look at the development, the evolution of Canadian agriculture over the years, it is in fact because we have invested heavily in research and development, have developed new hybrid forms of grain, as an example, in the area from which the member comes that we have been so successful in world markets.

We have stated very clearly that the agri-food industry is an essential part of the growing Canadian economy. It is one that is worthy of support in world markets.

The minister is now on a tour of the Asian markets which are crucial to the future of Canadian agriculture.

We have also said that the department of agriculture, as indeed other government departments, will be cutting back on the heavy cost of administration that we have inherited in order to have more money to put into programs to support Canadian farmers.

That is part and parcel of the philosophy of the government in terms of agriculture, in terms of defence, in terms of industry. We believe that the huge government apparatus ought to be scaled back so that scarce resources can be put on the front line where the battles are being waged.

• (1135)

Yes, I did talk very enthusiastically about the minister of agriculture, about the work he is in the process of doing. It is an essential pillar of the economic philosophy of the government, that Canadian agriculture not simply survive but that it grow. That is because as the parliamentary secretary said, we see in Canadian agriculture not only problems as do the opposition, but tremendous, tremendous opportunity.

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, I agree perfectly with what was said previously. We enjoy having the Minister of Finance talk about agriculture. He is a very good speaker but primarily it is a lot of talk. That is very much in line with the minister of agriculture, a lot of talk.

Take GATT for example. Canada lost out on GATT. In fact, we are in this position because the federal government was not strong enough in those negotiations. Take the export of wheat now. Why accept a limit to the export of wheat to the United States? This is what is being negotiated. If Canada really respected itself it would not accept any limit. We would be dealing according to free trade with the United States.

As far as the minister of agriculture's trips to China and so on, of course that is a good trip for him. Hopefully it will be good for Canada. All of these measures are really like motherhood; that is to say it falls within the norms of what we expect from Agriculture Canada and the federal government. However, we expect a little more, not just the bare minimum. We expect more and better ideas in terms of agriculture.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I said in my remarks, as did the parliamentary secretary, that in the program set out by the minister of agriculture, we have been very specific as to the actions we intend to take.

Yes, there are areas where we have said we are going to consult because we think it is an essential part of the democratic process that we go out and that we talk. Surely the members of the Reform Party would agree that you go out and talk to Canadians, talk to those who are involved.

I cannot believe the Bloc Quebecois members do not share the same view that what government must do is consult with the stakeholder before coming down with the final program. We have nailed our colours to the mast. We have said what we are going to do.

The final remark I would make in response to the critic's remarks is with regard to what he said about GATT. I watched the evolution of that negotiation. When this government came into power we were dealt a very late hand. A previous government had not faced up to the tremendous demands that were out there; a previous government had not owned up to the Canadian people about what it had said, and a previous government had misplayed its hand very badly in Geneva. Nonetheless, having been dealt that hand, we were able to snatch tremendous victory from the jaws of defeat because of the negotiating skills of the government.

The net result of GATT which could have turned out so badly for Canadian agriculture is that in fact it has turned out to be a tremendous victory. It has turned out to be a tremendous victory because as a government we knew exactly what we wanted. Our negotiators went over to Europe, sat down at the the table and did not leave the table until they got it. I am sure that in the private moments of his home the opposition critic knows that.

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the whip of the Reform Party I would like to advise the House that pursuant to Standing Order 43(2) our speakers on this motion will be dividing their time with your concurrence.

I am really enthused about the hon. minister's speech this morning. I would like to direct a few remarks to him before I go into the details I want to present to the Liberal government.

I started farming because of farm programs like FCC and MACC. I was guaranteed a low interest rate for 25 years which I really appreciated. It was the only way I could acquire land and continue to farm and later retire as a farmer.

Why did the Liberal government in the 1970s change the farm credit regulations to do away with those programs and allow the banks to take over the financing for young farmers? Also during that period, why did the Liberal government allow interest rates to go to 24 per cent and force thousands and thousands of farmers off their land?

I am so glad to hear the hon. minister is prepared to do some fence mending on those issues. I hope he gets the fences built a lot stronger in the west because they are getting very thin. If something is not done for the farmers there could be a charge by the big western farmers right down here into Ottawa to demand some changes. However, I appreciate his comments and I hope he will take them into account.

I am not going to be quite as critical of the government on the issues of farm problems as my friend in the Bloc was. However I would like to address some of the problems we farmers are facing. I hope the hon. members in the government will take them to heart, look at them and give us some help with them.

My speech is mostly going to be directed toward transportation. I would like to point out some of the problems we are having today. We feel the car shortage on the railway system is not due to something that has happened overnight.

I would like to point out to the government that in a letter dated November 15, 1993 the Thunder Bay Harbour Commission Port Authority warned the Minister of Transport at that time that the rail car shortage problem had been some time in the making and was due in part to the policy of dispersing the rail car fleet into trades and routings outside its original purpose.

In an October submission to the National Transportation Agency, one of Canada's railroads confirmed there was in existence as early as May 1993 an extreme car shortage affecting its ability to supply cars. To be sure the terrible situation we find ourselves in today was not without warning.

What did the railroads do? They chose to chase business in the United States without first making sure they had enough cars to handle the Canadian grain requirements. That makes money for the railways but it certainly left the western agriculture community high and dry.

Under the Western Grain Transportation Act brought in by the previous Liberal government the railways are supposed to be subject to sanctions if they do not meet targets for unloading grain at Canadian ports.

However, this recourse proved useless when the senior grain transportation committee decided not to pursue those sanctions. I wonder why. Who sits on that senior grain transportation committee and whose best interests do they have at stake? Apparently it is not farmers.

I look at the people on that agency: They represent elevator companies, terminal operators, the railways, everybody but farmers. An article in the Western Producer states that elevators shipped the wrong grain to the port of Vancouver just recently. Why? They have all the stats and all the figures on trade at their fingertips. They know what they need. Is the system so inefficient that they cannot even load the proper grain?

Mr. Minister, I hope you look into that because it seems ludicrous. It almost seems as if there is a conspiracy to shut the system down.

William Stinson, chairman and chief executive of Canadian Pacific Ltd. received a $448,000 bonus for losing less money than the previous year. CP is trying to negotiate with two unions right now and is asking for cuts and labour deterrents so they will not go on strike, but this gentleman is given an extra half a million dollars for losing $2 billion. How does he expect to get a settlement with his unions?

It is imperative that the government start to look at these issues and address them. One of these days we are going to have a civil war if this is the system we are going to allow to go on. A million and a half dollars for management and 50 cents an hour for the workers. Is that fair, Mr. Minister?

• (1145)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I was just wondering. For one moment I thought maybe I had been forgotten.

Mr. Hoeppner: Well, you know—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): One moment, please. We can only speak one at a time. While I am standing I would suggest that the member take a moment to sit down. I know people feel very strongly about all issues and this one is no different from any other we debate on the floor of this House. But I must encourage the member and I must ask the member to direct his comments through the Chair.

Mr. Hoeppner: I apologize for that, Mr. Speaker. Seeing the minister was so impressed with the farm issues, it got to my heart. I hope to simmer down a bit.

The railways are required by law to move these grains according to the Western Grain Transportation Act. Why do we not see them doing it? It amazes me when I see stats that the turnaround on a hopper car today is actually a little longer than was required in 1923. Is this today's modern system that is supposed to help farmers survive?

With the negotiations having gone on for over a year, this government failed to pass legislation to order the west coast strikers back to work. We lost 12 days. Not only that, I was told that during the Easter holidays there was again a four day shutdown. There are 40 ships sitting in Vancouver drawing demurrage charges on grain that cannot be shipped. When is this government going to take action on this?

That has dealt a tremendous blow to the farm sector in western Canada. Shipping $100 a tonne feed wheat to the U.S. which takes twice as long as putting a car to Vancouver with $500 a tonne canola just does not seem to make sense. When are we going to get the right type of direction from some of our farm organizations or our government to solve these problems? Farmers need that cash to put in another crop. Farm programs cannot look after all these requirements. We have to ship that grain. We have to get our money out of that grain. I appreciate that the hon. minister is listening and I hope that something can be done about it.

The other serious issue coming out of this whole system of not delivering grain is the lost sales. Japan today is encouraging Australian farmers to plant more canola because the Canadian system cannot deliver the product after it is grown. How long can our economy continue to exist in western Canada if we do not start supporting the farmer who produces more efficiently every year and then is not allowed to sell to get the funds out of it?

It amazes me sometimes what modernization, with all the computer technology and the efficiencies we have built into our systems, has done to us. I will give one little example of an experience I had. This is not with grain transportation.

Being a farmer I like to save as much money as I can because I know I will need it. Just before I came back to Ottawa two months ago, I got a telephone bill for $27.65. I wrote the cheque for the due date on the bill. I said to my wife: "Would you please drop it off at the telephone office so it is there directly and I can save myself the 45 cents".

Lo and behold, a month later I got a returned cheque with a notice on it saying "insufficient funds", charging me a $15 service charge for a $27 telephone bill. It is a provincial utility. I went to see the banker, furious as can be. I have never had less than $2,000 in that bank account.

Somebody had punched the wrong figure and it showed there were insufficient funds. To hide their mistake, they wrote out a little slip which said: "Due to insufficient funds". It took me a month and probably $30 worth of telephone calls to find out where the problem was. Is this progress?

I said to my wife: "I know what I am going to do with the next telephone bill. I am going to put a stamp on it, mail it in Morden because it will take the postal service at least six months to figure out it is supposed to be delivered to Morden. It will travel all across Canada. They will cut off my telephone before I get back. Then at least I will have peace and quiet this summer with Stats Canada phoning me every month wanting to know how much grain I have left in my bins". There is a way of getting around this system, but how long can we continue to do it?

I apologize for the problems I caused you, Mr. Speaker. Forgive me. I hope the hon. minister does listen to this.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Paul Marchand (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I fully agree with what the hon. member for Lisgar—Marquette said.

[English]

I agree with the criticisms he made regarding agriculture and those he addressed to the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance underlined the fact that Agriculture Canada is in the process of consulting with farmers. Again, it is a delay tactic. The farmers know what they want but this government does not deliver.

In the GATT negotiation for example, the farmers wanted to maintain article XI but the government did not deliver. When it comes to grain transportation, again it is a crying problem in the west. There are incredible delays but the government does not deliver.

There may be ways to improve delivery of grain via the St. Lawrence seaway, but that is not being taken advantage of. The minister of agriculture has gone to Korea and China to sell more grain but my goodness, if we cannot get the grain out of Canada now when we have surpluses and markets across the globe that we are losing because of our inefficient system, why go to China to sell more grain?

We have a great deal of programs to improve in Canada. The member for Lisgar—Marquette certainly does have reason to criticize this government in its lack of initiative in setting up better programs to serve farmers in this country.

Mr. Hoeppner: Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out a report that was given to the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri-Food the other day to back up some of my figures, just kind of arguing the point with the hon. member about going through Thunder Bay.

When we had the PSAC witnesses on grain transportation, they pointed out to us that in a two week period of officially weighing grain which is done for Agriculture Canada, it was detected that 341 rail cars would have gone through the system with the wrong car numbers, putting the wrong grain to the wrong customer. One hundred and sixty-nine had the wrong initials on them, bringing the total to 510 cars in two weeks that they had to correct.

In the same period, there were 26 mixes between different railways, 45 mixes that were prevented by weighers and assistants. Grain was left in receiving hoppers 10 times, 12 spills, overweight as much as 25 tonnes on a boxcar or on a hopper car or underweight in some cases.

The total was 1,173 cars that were under the wrong procedure in two weeks out of a total shipment of 13,000 cars. Almost 10 per cent of the cars that were directed to Thunder Bay had been marked incorrectly by elevator companies. How can you have a system deliver our grain under those circumstances?

This is why I say we have a disaster. We have a calamity in the transportation system. If this government does not correct some of those problems we will never be able to survive on the farms by becoming more efficient and producing more. It is senseless.

Mr. Allan Kerpan (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I open with the question that I hear most in my riding of Moose Jaw—Lake Centre. Farmers ask me why they have not heard anything about agriculture from Ottawa through the newspapers or on television. I have to be honest and tell them we are not talking about agriculture in Ottawa. Sometimes it is very difficult for me, being a farmer, to admit that we are not talking or spending very much time on agriculture. That is the question I hear most often in my riding.

I want to talk about two subjects today, safety nets and the farm debt problem.

First, in many cases over the past years we have seen safety nets that have been ill conceived, open to abuse, and poorly planned. I do not believe there is a farmer in this country who wants federal or provincial government agriculture subsidies. All farmers want is a reasonable chance to make some sort of decent living in this country. I do not care which part of Canada they come from.

We have been in the situation over the past number of years where we have been looking at world trade problems, weather related problems and various other problems. That has shifted the focus in many areas so governments have been trying to give financial aid to farmers in poorly planned ways.

We have had safety net programs for many years. We have had GRIP, crop insurance, FSAM, the grain stabilization program, and any number of ad hoc programs, as many as we all care to remember.

We have spent billions of taxpayers' dollars on agriculture subsidies, and yet I still see farmers in Saskatchewan, and I know this is true right across this country, who are losing their farms. I ask myself how we justify spending billions upon billions of dollars and whether there is any effect or any good reason to pour dollars into farm subsidies when there is no reasonable chance of hope for success.

In most cases the programs we have seen are open to abuse. They encourage very poor farming practices. They lack continuity. As I mentioned before, we have jumped in and out of all sorts of different farm programs on almost a yearly basis.

That is generally the problem I see with those kinds of programs. In all cases they are bureaucratic programs, developed by bureaucrats for bureaucrats. They have done very little talking to farmers, listening and hearing what farmers are saying across this country. That is something we need to change. That is the area we need to move to.

As I have said many, many times, farmers are the people who know what programs will work and what programs will not work. They know what is the best way to market their grain. In many cases they know the best way to transport their grain.

I am not being particularly critical of this government. It has been governments of all stripes in the past. We have seen it from all governments.

I generally like the idea of the whole farm concept of some sort of farm insurance. The concept is realistic. The question I have is, what process will be used to develop this program? Will it be bureaucrats again, as we have seen so many times in the past, or will it be consultation with farmers? If it is consultation with farmers in the grassroots area, I am all for that.

• (1200)

I just returned from a meeting of the standing committee on agriculture this morning and we had a group of people in from the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities. They did a provincial summary in Saskatchewan last year listing some of the problems they see with the GRIP and the NISA program.

I will quote the report: "Declining support levels, premiums are too high, not bankable, lack of producer consultation, payment processes too long".

When they talk about NISA they say it is too complicated, the forms are too lengthy, it is poorly administered. They do not trust government with their money; it does not cover all agriculture income and is not suitable for young farmers.

Those are some of the comments the farmers in Saskatchewan are making to groups in Saskatchewan, the problems they have with farm safety net programs.

The second area I want to spend a couple of minutes on is the farm debt problem. In Saskatchewan we have over $5 billion in farm debt. That is Saskatchewan only. In the rural municipality of Craik which is very close to mine, over 50 per cent of the farmers have gone through the farm debt review process. In other words, they have been in serious financial difficulty.

The largest municipal taxpayer in Saskatchewan is the Farm Credit Corporation and the second highest taxpayers are the chartered banks. That gives an indication, a bit of background to the kinds of problems and how serious the debt problem is in this country.

A few years ago we were all witness and subject to many different farm rallies, most of which were held in western Canada, because of the farm debt crisis. We have not seen many of those in the past year or 18 months.

People will say that perhaps the farm debt crisis is over, perhaps it is no longer a problem. We see that cattle prices have gone up. We see that prices for special grains have gone up. Perhaps the crisis is over. I do not believe that.

I believe that the debt crisis is still there and it is still as big as it was before. I think the difference now is that farmers in this country have come to realize if they are going to solve the problems of debt, the problems of marketing and so on and so forth, they will have to do it themselves.

Farmers have to take the initiative to help solve their problems. They are no longer looking for government support the way they did five or perhaps ten years ago. They realize the way to solutions is to open up the process and let them handle their own problems.

I believe farmers have decided they will take matters into their own hands. That is why we see things such as the huge influx of new crops in our country, specialty crops, crops that we would not have believed we would grow five or ten years ago. We are now growing them. We see a great increase in the cattle industry. We see value added industry. In my own riding we have a good number of various value added industries that are going to be successful because they are farmer owned, they are farmer controlled and they do not depend on government subsidy.

We see a huge increase in off farm jobs, off farm income. A recent survey in Saskatchewan said that as high as 50 per cent of the farmers in Saskatchewan have off farm income. I often humorously say as a farmer that my wife teaches school to support my farming habit. It is a fact of life out there. It is just the way it is. I think that is good. People are starting to realize they have to take matters into their own hands.

I want to spend just a minute talking about the Farm Credit Corporation. It has a new lend–lease program, initiated this year. The comments I have received from my riding, the initial comments, are that it is a good program. Some of the negative comments might be that the term of six years is probably too short and should be increased to 10 years.

The other comment I get about the Farm Credit Corporation which I want to finish with is that it has been very difficult, very bureaucratic to deal with in its history. Many farmers in my area have turned back their land or voluntarily transferred it back to the Farm Credit Corporation over the past few years and it has been very difficult negotiating, coming to terms.

In conclusion, I would like to say that farmers are now preparing for their spring seeding. Right across this country they are busy. They are on their tractors. They are listening to the radio. I think more than anything else they would like to hear on their radios as they are working this spring that there are some specifics, that somebody will stand up and say this is the program, these are the details. That is what they want to hear.

I believe that agri–policy must be developed by farmers for farmers. There is no other way in this country that we can solve some of the problems we face in our industry other than by full consultations with farmers.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri–food): Mr. Speaker, I take note of the comments the hon. member and his colleague made in the last few minutes.

I would like to assure the previous speaker that as far as the whole farm and the safety net program are concerned we do have a 17 person national committee. By far the majority of people on that are farmers from across Canada. I do not think anyone can say that in the development of the whole farm program in Canada the farmers do not have a voice. We are consulting. I do not know how we could consult any more on those types of things.

In response to the speaker just before him, I would like to announce to the House we know in government that we do have a lot of problems at the present time with grain handling in western Canada.

A number of us have spoken to the minister in China this morning. The minister has asked me to announce that tomorrow he will be inviting a number of key people from the grain industry to meet with him immediately, as quickly as the date can be arranged upon his return from China, to talk about all those issues, all those problems and all of those challenges in the grain handling situation in western Canada.

I hope the opposition will be pleased with that and will have input for us as members on that matter.

Mr. Kerpan: Mr. Speaker, I am obviously well aware of the national committee on the safety net programs. I do applaud the government. I do believe there are some very fine people on that committee.

However, by the same token and having said that, I also believe we have to take it one step further. We have to have full consultation with every farmer in this country. That has been the problem in the past. We have had a select group. They have been good people but they cannot always get the feeling of what each individual grassroots farmer wants. We have to have the process and take it right to the end. That is the way we will find success in the program.

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, in response to the MP for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, he made a lot of good comments which I applaud.

For example, the problem with newspapers, information in the media in terms of agriculture, is big. It is probably one of the elements we so quickly ignore or forget. There are not enough specialized newspaper people dealing with the issue of agriculture. Maybe it is because agriculture is not as sexy an issue. In spite of the fact there is a lot of sex in agriculture, it is not sexy enough to really draw a lot of attention.

The people from the west should at least be reassured by the fact that there are a lot of newspapers and newspaper reporters covering agriculture in the west, in Quebec and in the east. The fact is they have decreased considerably over the past few years.

In the case of farm debt in Quebec, it is quite high and quite serious. In terms of revenues as well, the percentage of farmers who have to have revenue outside of the farm is quite high.

As a last comment about the bureaucrats in Agriculture Canada, my goodness there are too many who are not farmers. The Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food is not a farmer. The deputy minister and a lot of the other deputy ministers are not farmers. One suggestion I would make to at least resolve the problem of bureaucrats in Agriculture Canada would be to make sure that over 50 per cent if not 75 per cent of the people who work in Agriculture Canada are farmers.

Mr. Kerpan: Mr. Speaker, I want to very briefly state that I think the hon. member has a valid point in the fact that in many cases farmers in Quebec certainly do not understand the western Canadian agriculture and vice versa. I do not think there is any question about that.

• (1210)

The media does play a very important role in our industry. We certainly have enough media in our part of the world but, as I mentioned before, sometimes it is misunderstood between regions.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief.

My colleague and neighbouring member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre referred to safety net programs and the ongoing problem. I am hearing in my riding of Kindersley—Lloydminster that in spite of all this consultation there is not the foggiest idea of what program will be replacing GRIP which is currently being discontinued.

I wonder if the member has had the same problem in his riding.

Mr. Kerpan: Mr. Speaker, absolutely. There is no question. Given the fact that Saskatchewan will be opting out of GRIP after this year, we are in a very short time span. By next spring, one year from now, it is imperative to people in my province that we develop something that will work. Certainly that is a major concern.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to speak today on the agricultural sector and to debate the motion of my colleague, the Official Opposition critic on agriculture.

I had the opportunity and the honour to work for a long time for the farmers of Quebec and I can tell you that, since 1986 in particular, the significant changes occurring throughout the world, the GATT negotiations, North American free trade, et cetera, have occupied a lot of their thoughts and forced them to act in co-operation to deal with these changes.

They know where they want to go and what they, their partners and governments should aim for. All that is left to do is make the federal government move toward the clearly expressed goals they set for themselves.

In February 1991, when the Farmers Union started a reflection process called the rural summit conference—incidently, I want to pay tribute to Jacques Proulx, who until very recently was president of the Farmers Union. He acted as a great leader in involving not only agri-food partners but also rural partners in this wonderful rural summit conference. Today I pay tribute to this great leader, Jacques Proulx, former president of the Farmers Union.

What resulted from this? A strong desire on the part of farmers and all rural stakeholders to take control of their own destiny.

They talked about co-operation between local and regional partners, about protecting and renewing rural resources, and especially about redistributing political powers from the top down.

What does this mean? It means a modern day approach to managing agricultural and rural development policies. It means decentralization, a word the people opposite do not know and have never recognized, for better efficiency.

This exercise continued at the Trois-Rivières summit in 1991 where stakeholders in the Quebec agri-food sector met to decide on a number of policies and commitments.

The decisions included, among other initiatives, more research, as well as the transfer of new technologies, as part of a strategy to conquer markets, because we have really developed a liking for conquering new markets and making gains in the context of globalization.

The various players in the agri-food industry also made very firm commitments. Again, under the leadership of Mr. Jacques Proulx, the former UPA president, commitments were made to establish a more efficient link between research, technology transfers and production, as well as better co-ordination of research activities conducted by governments and private sector universities.

Some very serious commitments were made. I am not talking about meaningless speeches such as the one made earlier by the Minister of Finance on behalf of the minister of agriculture. I mean real commitments.

For example, it was decided to approve, upgrade and support human resources training.

• (1215)

A commitment was made to ensure the continuity, development and growth of agri-food industries through the identification of particularly promising sectors, not only at the domestic level, but also internationally.

Several commitments were made and, in particular, it was decided to work hard at readjusting income security programs in the agricultural sector so that they comply not only with NAFTA, but also with GATT.

A commitment was made by all those involved in Quebec's agri-food industry, including farmers, processors, distributors and even exporters, to promote financing and self-reliance of agricultural operations by ensuring the most efficient and inexpensive transfer of farms to the new generation. Indeed, we must not forget that to be productive a farming operation must have a very high capital available as well as very modern equipment. In short, farmers often have to borrow huge amounts of money to be productive and more and more competitive on the national and international markets. To promote and improve programs aimed at encouraging young people to take up farming is another commitment made at the Trois-Rivières summit, which was an historical Summit according to all the key players involved in the Quebec agri-food industry at that time.

From all the considerations, commitments and principles the partners in the Quebec agri-food industry came up with, I developed four avenues that the stakeholders should use and the governments should support.

First, we should promote the autonomy of farming enterprises and processing plants by supporting their efforts and not by taking their places. We should make sure the government, for example, support their efforts to help them adapt to the new market requirements. When we talk about markets, we are talking about the taste of the consumers who are becoming more and more sophisticated and are asking for overprocessed products, what we call high quality, flawless products.

The idea is also to promote the autonomy and performance of enterprises trying to access new international markets. That is the new creed. We cannot simply talk about globalization and let the stakeholders down by saying the free market will take care of things. We must organize and co-ordinate our efforts. The expansion of our farming industry must be based on better co-operation between all those involved in the agri-food sector.

Second, we should consider farmers to be entrepreneurs and support regional entrepreneurship. In order to face the new realities of the 1980s and 1990s like globalization farmers had to get into management in a big way. I say this because I have met quite a few farmers in my time, starting in 1982 when I was with Agriculture Canada and especially between 1986 and 1991 when I was employed by the Union des producteurs agricoles. Agriculture is a high risk sector. It is a sector in which it is very difficult to perform well. Any farmer who wants to make a decent living faces a number of factors that are beyond his control, including often unpredictable weather conditions.

Operating in a high risk sector while also coping with globalization and increased competition from outside Quebec or Canada requires exceptional management skills. I want to pay tribute to our 47,000 farm producers in Quebec for what they do every day, because it is not easy to work for about 14, 15 or 16 hours a day to support a family, and I think we should respect these great artisans of modern farming.

These great artisans also need ongoing professional training because, when we talk about globalization, internationalization and increased competition, these skilled managers must be capable of keeping up with the increased competition, especially since after the signing of the GATT agreements there will be less and less protection at the border in the years to come. In other words, there will be more and more competition from food imports from the United States, Mexico and Latin America generally, from Europe and even from new countries like Ukraine, which at one time was, and may well again become, the world's bread basket. Not Canada but Ukraine is, or at least was, the world's bread basket until 1990, when the bureaucracy did its work, as bureaucracies will do—and we are seeing today in the federal government—and took over and made Ukraine lose its position as the world's bread basket.

There is a third option we should explore if we want consistent programs to deal with today's challenges, and that is decentralization.

As I said earlier, there is unanimous support for decentralization in Quebec. When we talk about bringing government closer to the grassroots, this also applies to agriculture. There is a consensus in Quebec that has grown since in 1989 at the annual convention of the Union des producteurs agricoles a resolution was passed by 99.3 per cent of delegates from all over Quebec and from every sector of the agricultural industry that the federal government should cease its involvement in the agricultural sector in Quebec. They said also that we should repatriate all of the levers and budgets, but only after these budgets are redressed and made more equitable.

As my colleague said earlier, the fairness of federal interventions in the area of agriculture is certainly not going to choke the federal government, for it certainly has not during the last 15 years. Federal interventions have always been unfair to Quebec.

Therefore, decentralization and repatriation of powers and public funds in support of the farmers' efforts is a third possibility we must look upon favourably since these elements are not sufficient, given the new realities to which we have to adjust.

The fourth avenue is support for the transition toward sustainable agriculture. Sustainable agriculture will protect and help regenerate the resources used in the production of agricultural goods while at the same time satisfying the advocates of economic performance. Not only is sustainability vital, it is also serves to promote agriculture, as does food quality or safety.

Agriculture in Quebec, as in the rest of Canada for that matter, will be competitive only if we can offer products that are not only as good as those of our trading partners but even better. We must increase support for the trend toward sustainable development that Quebec farmers adopted a couple of years ago; it is not easy for them to go from conventional farming or breeding techniques to increasingly environment friendly methods, but it pays. When it comes to adapting to a new world order, I would say that it is a promotion tool without equal which could rapidly be recognized as such by our trading partners.

I will give, as a recent example of this, the growth hormone called bovine somatotropin, which produces a 15 to 30 per cent increase in milk production, depending on the study. My colleague will correct me if I am wrong but according to the public hearings held by the committee on agriculture, we will get a moratorium, and already American processors have been telling us that if we do not use the bovine somatotropin in the coming year we could benefit from it since it is being used by American producers. Take lactose products for newborns, for example; the use of a growth hormone such as somatotropin can be detrimental to the image of companies such as Global and other firms involved in the manufacture of that kind of product.

Therefore, the payback could be great for Quebec and Canadian dairy farmers, for instance, if their products were more "natural" and retained a healthier image.

• (1225)

All the commitments from the agri–food stakeholders in Quebec and across Canada and their boundless dynamism and energy are confronted with the government's lack of action and its laissez faire attitude, as mentioned in the opposition motion.

I listened to the Minister of Finance say a few minutes ago that the government had received everything it wanted from the GATT negotiations. Really, there is no better example of the government's lack of action to help support the growth and development of the agriculture sector in Quebec and Canada than this one. We did not get anything in these negotiations. As soon as the GATT agreement was signed, we were told that Canada had won on all fronts, but it was all a show. The truth is Canada lost section XI(2)(c)(i) of the GATT.

I repeat, we do not blame the government for losing article XI(2)(c)(i). What we are blaming it for is trying to dupe the farmers of Quebec and Canada by telling them that we have won on all fronts. Over the last six years farmers have become experts in trade negotiations, they are experts on GATT.

Do not insult their intelligence by telling them that we won everything. Please let us show some respect for the farmers of Quebec and Canada. They are willing to adapt; they do it constantly and they have demonstrated their resilience. They will adapt to this new situation, but enough of these triumphant speeches on GATT and agriculture. Canadian negotiators under the direction of the new Liberal government won absolutely nothing.

The same is true for export subsidies for our colleagues, the grain farmers of western Canada. The main objective of the Uruguay round, which started in 1986, was precisely to eliminate export subsidies, the source of many problems in the grain sector since 1978. Instead, we are talking of a 36 per cent reduction in subsidies over the next few years. These subsidies should have been eliminated altogether.

There is another example of this government's lack of action, again in the grain sector. Look at the way the government behaves when faced with threats of American action against durum wheat. Western grain producers, the first producers of the best quality durum wheat in the world, are threatened daily and unfairly with trade retaliation by the Americans. They are not more subsidized than their American counterparts. Policies like the Crow's Nest Pass Agreement relating to western grain transportation are being criticized, while the Americans have the same subsidies for grain transportation on the Mississippi.

Why does this government not defend itself by saying no way, there is a limit? You are telling us that our durum wheat is subsidized, you want to threaten us with export quotas on the U.S. market while you are subsidizing your grain producers perhaps even more than Canadian grain producers. I say perhaps because only a study would demonstrate it.

That too is another example of the inertia of this government toward agriculture in Quebec and Canada.

We can also talk now about bilateral negotiations between Canada and the United States. Admittedly, I am concerned with the new tariffication coming out of the GATT negotiations, one that is supposed to apply to milk and farming industries. The Americans are claiming since the beginning, since December 15 of last year, this new tariffication which will replace import controls under article XI must be subject to the provisions of the North American Free Trade Agreement, which provides for the elimination of tariffs over the next 10 years. Even with a tariff protection of 343 per cent for butter, contrary to what the Minister of Finance was saying, we have gained nothing yet. We are still negotiating and the Americans are very tough in these negotiations. Canadian negotiators, led by the present government, have been behaving like pee-wees since the beginning of the trade negotiations.

I see that my time is running out, but I think that I can give a few more examples of inertia.

I look at what is happening in the chicken industry, in the poultry industry in general. The bickering between Quebec and Ontario is destabilizing the industry as a whole and is jeopardizing the normal development of that industry, as well as the implementation of measures allowing it to face world competition. I see the lack of leadership in that issue.

• (1230)

The minister of agriculture should show a little more leadership, deal with the matter and act as a conciliator instead of not giving a darn about it and letting people fight.

Mr. Speaker, this is unacceptable and you can understand much better what is meant by government inaction in the agricultural sector.

It is the same thing with all the discussions going on about the new income security programs in the agricultural sector.

I asked the minister of agriculture a number of times, as I pointed out to the Minister of Finance this morning, to show responsibility and to instruct his officials who are negotiating the new income security programs, especially in the horticultural sector, to proceed with the negotiations so that a new income security program can be put in place for market farmers in Quebec and Ontario who agree with that and to stop buying everything senior officials say.

Unfortunately, those people will not show any leadership. They go along with anything senior officials say during negotiations and discussions.

I find that in the present circumstances it is very dangerous to have leaders like that, political leaders who do not take their responsibilities and who show no accountability whatsoever, given the enormous challenges facing the agricultural sector in Quebec and in Canada.

In closing, I wish that in the forthcoming months farmers in Quebec and in Canada will be better served by their federal government because they deserve to be supported for the tremendous efforts they have been making for the past years to meet the challenges of globalization, in particular.

As for Quebec producers, we are proposing to them, through sovereignty, to take up the great challenge they talked about during the discussions held over the past years, that is to give Quebec an agricultural sector that would be strong, environmentally friendly but above all that would provide a living for farmers, men and women, in Quebec and in Canada as well.

We are giving all those farmers, especially those living in Quebec, a chance to take part in the agri-food program of their own country.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member for Québec-Est will straighten his colleague out when he gets a chance to talk to him a bit and explain a few facts.

The hon. member for Québec-Est surely knows that the United States of America did not challenge a single tariff established by Canada.

It had until April 15 to do so. I have the list in front of me, page after page of tariffs.

Therefore, this is the final list for agricultural tariffs and not one was challenged by the United States. Did the hon. member opposite know that? According to the comments he made previously, I would say he did not.

Second, the hon. member talked about durum wheat. Does he know that Canada won four times over that issue? If you will allow an expression used in hockey, and we talked about hockey last evening in this House, it is four to nothing. We have won four to nothing.

The United States took us to the GATT and we have won four times to date. If we were successful four times in a row, one need not be a lawyer from Baie-Comeau to understand that we will win a fifth time. The Canadian government is protecting Canadian farmers, it is doing all it can for them. Therefore, to describe the situation in such a way and to refer to sovereignty as a means to end the debate is something else. Members opposite may mix sovereignty with ice cream or with wheat, or even the three together when it suits them, but the truth is a bit different.

We are talking about the loss of article XI of the GATT. I have before me an article published in a francophone paper of my riding and I call upon the hon. member to give an answer to all this.

If what he is saying is true, how does he explain, for instance, that according to some agricultural journals, and I will quote only the title since time is running out: "Despite the loss of article XI of the Gatt, Canadian supply management programs are safe"? I could read one quote after another from agricultural journals stating that our quotas are safe. How does he explain that quotas are protected in the opinion of the agricultural community but not in the opinion of the Bloc Quebecois? Could it be that the Bloc members do not support quotas?

• (1235)

Mr. Loubier: Mr. Speaker, I will start with the last question because as usual the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell has gone too far. He said that in spite of the loss of article XI, supply management sectors would survive, and so forth. I never said they would not. I said: stop deceiving Quebec producers by saying that you won on all fronts. Producers are now adjusting, and I can assure you that these are very talented and ingenious people. They will adjust. They will get through this rough spot, but I don't think you will in the next election.

We say stop deceiving the producers who know everything there is to know about GATT articles. They know perfectly well that article XI has been replaced by a tariff that will be reduced gradually. It will not be easy to adjust, but they will. Nobody said supply management was dead in the dairy sector and the agricultural industry. You only hear what you want to hear.

I also think we should stop underestimating the intelligence of farm producers regarding another issue raised by the hon. member opposite. In referring to tariffs, we said that today, negotiations were taking place between the United States and Canada, and if the hon. member denies the existence of these negotiations, he is contradicting what was said by his minister of agriculture, his Minister for International Trade, his Minister of Finance and his own Prime Minister.

On December 15, a Canadian task force was appointed by the Prime Minister when the GATT agreement was signed. On the American side, an American task force was appointed by President Clinton to examine the implications of the GATT agreement and the corresponding section of the North American free trade agreement. How do we manage both?

The first thing the Americans said was that NAFTA took precedence over the GATT agreement as far as tariffs were concerned. In other words, the new tariff designed to protect the agriculture and dairy sectors should come under NAFTA, which provides that in ten years' time, tariffs will be phased out. If he does not have the facts, I think he should stop talking nonsense.

Incidentally, last week I was reading a report from the Prairie Pool and the Western Producer which said the Canadian government should stand firm on the durum wheat issue. These are not my words but those of western producers and editorial writers. If the hon. member thinks we only read about what happens in Quebec, he is wrong. We take our responsibilities as the Official Opposition very seriously, and to us it is clear Canada is not doing its job to protect western grain producers in the case of durum wheat exports to the United States. That is the subject of today's debate. I realize the truth may not be palatable, but above all, I wish the hon. member would stop talking nonsense. When one does not know the facts, one refrains from commenting.

Mr. Jean-Paul Marchand (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell does not really know the agricultural sector, because when he says that no tariff was disputed, he forgets that negotiations are under way right now with the Americans, mostly concerning ice cream and yogurt. That is mainly what these negotiations are about. That is where we will really suffer. They want to reduce tariffs by 200 per cent in these two sectors. It is criminal.

They really do not know what they are talking about. Huge amounts are involved. It amounts to about 14 per cent of the whole industry. If they think they won in the GATT negotiations, why is the Ontario chicken market in a crisis? Why are farmers subject to quotas in a state of panic? They raised their production by 30 per cent. They are at war. They do not respect the Canadian council's recommendations regarding chicken production. Why? Because the federal government did not do its job in the GATT negotiations. Because it did not win. It was able to reach an agreement which seemed very generous for farmers, but when they examine the facts in various fields and sectors such as ice cream, yogurt or poultry, farmers soon realize that there is no real guarantee of good revenues, on the contrary.

For the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell to maintain that we won at the GATT table and that there is no change considered concerning tariffs in some sectors subject to quotas, I must tell him that I do not agree.

Mr. Loubier: Mr. Speaker, I forgot to mention that negotiations were ongoing on yogurt and ice cream, as my colleague mentioned a few minutes ago. It is a very important sector for Quebec since it absorbs around 48 or 49 per cent of industrial milk, that is to say milk used to make yogurt and ice cream.

On a national level, it is more like 15 per cent. Forty per cent of the total Canadian yogurt production comes from Quebec, that is why this sector is vital for the future of the dairy industry in Quebec. I forgot to mention these negotiations, but I am quite sure that the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell did not even know about them.

[English]

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri-food): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to take part in the debate today. The pleasure will be to try to educate, either in my comments or in answer to the questions afterward, members across the way who obviously do not know the facts about what is going on in agriculture today.

I have read the motion and have commented earlier today. I say to members opposite that in one way I agree with what they are saying in their motion. The agri-food industry is going through some of the most significant changes in 30 years. However, as I said before, those changes are positive. They are challenges. They are offering things to the industry that were never offered to that extent before.

It is not inertia; it is just the contrary. A tremendous amount of activity is going on. As we go through life there are challenges. We have to prepare ourselves to meet challenges head on, to manage those challenges that come before us. This is a time of opportunity; this is a time of vision.

The government should be commended. I respect and agree with some members opposite who have spoken today about some of the good things the government has been doing in their view. We have only been here for six months. We had to take the hand that was dealt us, as the finance minister said earlier this morning, in the agri–food industry as well as in many other sectors and try to make the best of it.

We are well into the process of taking stock of what is going on. We are consulting constantly with the players, all the stakeholders. I remind members of the House and anyone who might be watching today about the size of the agri–food sector in Canada. There are 225,000 farms in Canada, plus or minus, depending on the definition of a farm. There are about 425,000 or 430,000 people working on farms.

I remind the House of the title of the department. It is the Ministry of Agriculture and Agri–Food. The agri–food system in Canada employs over 1.5 million Canadians or about 15 per cent of the Canadian working population.

When we look at its value, the $10.5 billion in input costs of primary producers or farmers each year to start the system evolve into about $13.5 billion in exports of either bulk or processed agri–food products. In addition Canadians spend at the purchasing or retail level. This does not include the cost of a restaurant meal but the cost of the food that the restaurant operator will buy. That $10.5 billion of input that primary producers make each year multiplies to over a $70 billion agri–food industry in Canada. In terms sometimes used in agriculture, that is no small potatoes. That is a big industry.

I have been involved in the agri–food industry all of my life. At no time have I seen a coming together of the players in the agri–food industry like we in this government have been able to make happen in the short time we have been here.

We are bringing this with a tremendous amount of co–operation, and a tremendous amount of reflection around the situations that are there today. They are coming around the table. They are sitting down together to talk about how we in the industry, everybody, all the stakeholders, can collectively do what needs to be done so that we are all successful as we go down the road.

I wanted to make those comments. As well, I want to congratulate those in the agri–food sector for the way they are meeting these challenges. As has been outlined by some other speakers today, it is not easy. It is not easy in any sector in today's economy.

It is not easy in the agri–food sector as well, whether one is out there today seeding, whether one is out there with one's livestock or whether one is further along as a further processor or wholesaler or retailer or whatever.

It is not easy but they are meeting those challenges. That is because that industry is made up of people who are very capable, highly educated, very well trained in the use and management of technology and use and management in general, in marketing, et cetera.

I praise them and congratulate them. We look forward in the ministry and in this government to continuing to work with those people to meet those challenges. I want to also remind everyone today we in government realize that we are an exporting nation. Agriculture for every dollar, that is farm gate dollar we talk about, about 46 to 50 cents of that in the end is derived from export.

It is important that as a government we have taken the initiatives we have concerning the trade opportunities out there for us. We know this government was involved in the GATT deal in the last seven weeks of what turned out to be a seven year round of negotiations which was supposed to be completed in four.

We also found that maybe the previous government had not been forthright with the industry in telling it about 24 months before we got there as a straightforward and straight shooting government that many of the supporters for supply management had long left the table. The previous government had not explained that as forthrightly as it could have to Canadians and to the industry.

We had a choice. We made the responsible choice. We could have walked away from the table and let the rest of the world shape the destiny of the Canadian dairy, egg and poultry industry, but that was not the responsible way to go. We took the choice of sitting down and making the best deal we possibly could.

We made a deal. Yes, it is tariffication. There is no deal, whether it is a GATT deal or whether it is a contract to do something else, with which everybody walks away from the table happier. Yes, we would like to have had an article XI that was there and firm, but I issue this challenge to everyone: If we had got that strengthened and clarified article XI, whatever that might have been, I would also think we would have to be honest enough to say that it too probably would have been challenged down the road.

As we go about in the world today, we know the advantages of freer trade in the world. We have been successful in putting in tremendous amounts of protection for the dairy, egg and poultry industry that still and by the year 2001 will have tariff levels at 85 per cent of where they are at the present time.

That is only a reduction of 2.5 per cent per year for the six years after the GATT deal is implemented, be that January 1, 1995 or July 1, 1995. That decision has not yet been made.

Nowhere did we work as diligently than on that trade issue. Without question we got the best deal we possibly could for Canadian producers because as I said before fundamentally we are a trading nation. On those negotiations and even now on the negotiations on some bilateral issues with the United States we have put forward our position very vigorously.

In the bilaterals with the United States that include wheat and a few other products there will be—and we promise this to the Canadian producers and to Canada totally—no deal unless it is a good deal for Canada. That means a good deal for the grain sector, a good deal for the processing sectors and for the supply managed sectors.

We will not trade off one sector against another as some people think we should. We say we will not because we should not. There is no reason. We are negotiating and talking about different issues at the table, but we are not talking about them interconnecting with each other.

We have been steadfast and strong on our position. This is emphasized by the fact that these bilaterals have been going on now for many months. There have been three face to face meetings and many meetings with officials in conversations over the telephone by the ministers, the minister with the secretary of state for agriculture in the United States, and we have stood firm and we will continue to stand firm on those.

With the trade agreements that we have, especially with the GATT agreement, we now have a set of trade rules that all countries will have to abide by. We have the World Trade Organization that we can go back to, any country can go back to if it thinks it is being mistreated or mishandled or accused of something by another country. One must never be so naive as to think that challenges will not continue to arise.

When we think someone is not treating Canada properly we will use the measures available to us to challenge that and to question that. We also have to recognize that the reverse may very well be true.

As the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell just outlined, in the durum wheat issue with the United States the score is four to zero. As we speak today the International Trade Commission in the United States is having another hearing on that and we are confident it will be five to zero when this is over.

What we are doing here in Canada is playing fair. We are following the rules. We have been playing fair. We continue to play fair and we will continue to win as we play with those fair trade rules.

We recognize as well that we just cannot focus. It is very important because if the primary producer is not economically viable its chain is not going to pull. If the processor is not economically viable, if the further processor, the wholesaler and the retailer are not economically viable, we recognize that the chain will not pull. We know full well that in all those different stakeholder areas in the sector the efficient producer, the efficient operator, must be economically viable for the sector to be successful.

In light of that, if I could refer to the supply managed sector, the opposition today is saying there is inertia, inaction. That is far from the case. The minister of agriculture has given me the opportunity to lead a task force in that industry. Some of the opposition members are saying today that the stakeholders are not involved which is far from the case.

In the supply managed sectors we have put in place five commodity committees made up of primary producers, processors, grocery products manufacturers, further processors, all of the stakeholders. We first put together the list of the issues and the process is in place to deal with them. Now those people who work in that industry every day, not bureaucrats, are sitting down together and deciding how we can best take advantage of the opportunities that are now before us under the new rules of GATT and under the new trade rules we have.

I do not know what more could be asked than to have that type of participation.

• (1255)

We have made great strides as well in meeting the challenge the ministers have put forward, provincial and federal. As far as knocking down interprovincial trade barriers, we know that is a tremendous challenge. It is just like everything else. Too often people agree with it in principle and then when it comes time to do something the walls start going up. We have to knock those walls down.

We have to meet the challenge and we are forging ahead in many different areas to meet the challenges as far as $20 billion of export trade by the year 2000. The industry collectively with federal and provincial governments says we can do that and is welcoming the challenge.

As far as the inertia some people talk about, obviously they do not know and should become more aware of what is going on in this government. They need to do a little more reading. They need to follow a little closer.

I have talked about supply management. I have talked about the bilateral discussions with the United States. I announced a few minutes ago in the House, and I will comment on it again, that some of us have been talking with the minister in China this morning. We fully realize, could I say, the confusion and the problems and the challenges in the western grain movement at the present time.

The minister will be officially announcing tomorrow that he will be bringing together as soon as he possible can on his return from Asia a small group of key players in the western grain sector. They will put their heads together around the table and see what they can do to fix those problems out there and will then go on from there to look at all of the issues out there in the western grain industry, the Canadian grain industry. It is not just a western problem. It has come to a head in the western area right now, but it is a problem right across the country which we recognize.

We have made some changes already according to our platform. We have announced some changes in the Farm Credit Corporation. We have probably made more strides with pesticide regulation and the registration process in the last 60 days than the previous government did between the time it tabled that study in December 1990 until fortunately it was replaced here in Ottawa with the present government.

As well, we have placed some extra people in trade office positions around the world, namely in Mexico, Japan and Taiwan, and they are giving us good results. We have established a new branch in the department called the market and industry branch to work with producers, producers groups, processors and the industry as we go about the world with the new opportunities and challenges to market further processed products.

We have been fairly successful, but not as successful as we might like to have been in Canada in the past by selling bulk products. The way we have to go now to create the jobs and to take advantage of value added is to value add and further process those here.

The minister, as we know, is spending a number of days in Korea, Hong Kong and China not only talking about grain but about beef, dairy and pork, reaffirming the connections and the strategic alliances we have there. We know, and this is straight from the World Bank, that it is saying between now and the year 2000, 50 per cent of the increase in world trade, including agricultural trade, will take place in that part of the world.

That is not very long, between 1995 and the year 2000, 50 per cent of the increase. That is because 50 per cent of the increase in the wealth in the world is going to take place in that area and we need to be there. We are working with everybody in the industry in order to collectively take advantage of that.

One of the goals and the platforms this government ran on last fall which we will fulfil is the agri–food industry. We want to ensure financial security. We want to ensure food safety for Canadians. We want to reassure Canadians that we will maintain and improve the sustainability of the resources that mean so much to all of us. We will do that by having adaptation and development programs and consultation processes with everybody in the industry. We will promote that growth through market responsiveness and value added initiatives. I am proud to say that we will do that while at the same time maintaining fiscal responsibility.

I am going to close with one comment that I always like to close with and remind people of. Yes, we have a lot of important sectors in the Canadian economy. Maybe it is because I was born and brought up on a farm and maybe it is because after my family my first love is the agri–food industry, but I want to remind everybody in Canada and remind this House—and we, the minister and the department are fully aware of that—as goes agriculture so goes the economy of any country.

We are going to make sure, with the co–operation of everybody, that agriculture goes well and therefore the economy of this country will go well as a result of that.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief to the hon. parliamentary secretary. You mentioned the breaking down of interprovincial trade—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I just want to remind members to direct their questions through the Chair.

Mr. Harris: I apologize, Mr. Speaker.

Could the hon. member specifically and briefly give me a couple of examples of interprovincial trade barriers that the government is working on that would begin to allow western producers to have access to the Ontario and Quebec markets? Are there one or two specific trade barriers he is working on at the present time that would allow that?

Mr. Vanclief: Mr. Speaker, because a number of these are in the negotiation area and because, as I said, it seems to be a delicate area that everybody agrees with in principle, when the ministers get together they talk about different things.

The last time the federal and provincial ministers met together they gave the officials very firm instructions. I had the opportunity to be at that meeting. There were very firm instructions to get together again and to continue their meetings with each other to find some of those initial ones where we can start to show that type of activity can work.

There has been some work done and some successes as far as honey and some different things in the last few years. However there are more major ones that I know we need to look at, unfortunately not only in agriculture. We have too many trade barriers between provinces. It seems that the will is there now and the recognition is there more than ever. I guess like anything else, the first thing you have to do to conquer something is to recognize that you have a problem. I think there is more recognition now than there ever has been and that is a big first step.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the government member that, in final analysis, the energy that exists in the agricultural sector must come from its leadership.

However, it is well known that the problems do not come from farmers, they come from the inability of the government to defend them. It could not protect article XI and similarly, protectionism is disappearing. The only argument I was given at the Bélanger–Campeau Commission by the person who is now Minister of Foreign Affairs was the Canadian system will protect milk production in Quebec, but if you leave Canada you will lose this protection.

This argument is no longer appropriate, because we now are in a much larger market. Does the hon. member not agree that in the North American economy, in the Canadian economy, eastern and western agricultures have interests so different that trying to defend them simultaneously brings about important problems and situations almost impossible to reconcile? I will give an example. In lamb production there were rules to control disease. In my riding a sheep farmer had a problem because of a disease in his flock.

Previously, stricken animals were slaughtered and that was the end of the problem. Now, under pressure from the Americans, we have changed our procedure. We do not slaughter the animals anymore, because they have such large herds out West that the Americans insisted we change our procedure. In Quebec where the herds are small, we must abide by nation–wide guidelines which are not realistic for small flocks of pure bred sheep.

We thus place in opposition eastern and western farmers even though in this case it was not just to please western farmers, it was under pressure from the Americans, and this is a problem for Quebec.

I took this example to show that in the future the interests of Quebec farmers and those of Canadian farmers will be difficult to reconcile. Our interests are different and in the past we have often been on the losing end. I think that in the near future Quebec farmers are going to make a choice that will allow them to work out more concrete solutions in the larger economic market we now have.

[English]

Mr. Vanclief: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the specific example of lamb producers the hon. member is referring to, I am not familiar with that. I would be interested if he would explain and chat with me about that. My guess is there is more to what is being said. I am not accusing the member of not giving the whole story.

I can give the example of what we in Agriculture Canada did for our industries when we found the—and I cannot get my tongue around the big full name—the mad cow disease. When one cow died in Alberta last year because of that we sought out and destroyed all of the animals from coast to coast in this country that we thought ever had a chance of coming in contact with it. We did that in order to protect the beef industry, and I am sure we will take similar actions as far as the lamb industry is concerned. I would be interested to follow that up.

As far as the protectionism in article XI, I just do not buy that. There are concerns. I ask the member to consider this: If the dairy industry and dairy producers are so concerned about their future, I would ask him why they are paying more as far as purchasing quota to have the opportunity for the right to produce. I simply cannot understand if somebody is convinced in their mind, as they are, that the industry is going some place in a hand cart why so many people want to be in the cart.

It is very interesting. When we talk to producers, the dairy farmers of Canada, we find it did not go exactly the way everybody wanted it to go. We look at the level of protection, the very slow rate.

What we have in the supply managed sector for the next six or seven years is the opportunity to prepare to meet the challenges of the market, the challenges of that very, very slow rate of reduction. I remind members opposite that even in the year 2001 the tariff rate protection for all of those will still be very close to, if not over, 200 per cent.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Paul Marchand (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, this government is indeed lacking in leadership. That is very obvious because there has been lots of talk since this morning, and even some mistakes made by certain members, including the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

The parliamentary secretary to the minister of agriculture has just told us that the government is doing the best it can, in spite of the split among farmers. However, even when farmers agree completely with consumers, as is the case with bovine somatotropin, what does the government do? What action has the government taken in response to a unanimous recommendation from the Agriculture Committee with which some members of this House are quite familiar?

I would like to ask this question of the parliamentary secretary to the minister of agriculture. What is the government doing? Does it plan to comply with the agriculture committee's recommendation that a one–year moratorium be imposed on the sale of this hormone, a move which is endorsed by all farm agencies in Canada and by all consumer organizations?

Mr. Boudria: Yes.

Mr. Marchand: As usual, the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is uninformed. Therefore, I will put the question to the parliamentary secretary to the minister of agriculture.

[English]

Mr. Vanclief: Mr. Speaker, I challenge the member opposite to have a one to one debate on agriculture sometime with the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. I would suggest that he be very well prepared before he enters into that debate.

As far as the government's response to the recommendations of the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri-Food regarding the bovine growth hormone or BST or whatever term you want to use—we know the product he is talking about—the member knows full well because he is a member of that committee and was there I understand when the recommendations were put forward.

The government has 150 days to respond to those recommendations. I know that the government, the officials, the minister and I are already discussing those recommendations. The member can be assured this government will respond well within the 150 days in a very responsible way to the recommendations made to the government by the standing committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Resuming debate. The hon. member for Beauharnois—Salaberry has the floor. I would ask him to help out the Chair by indicating whether he will share his time or take the full 20 minutes.

Mr. Laurent Lavigne (Beauharnois—Salaberry): Mr. Speaker, I was just about to tell you. We will share our time pursuant to Standing Order 43(2).

I would like to move on to the motion before us today, a motion on agriculture.

The term "lack of action" was mentioned with regard to the government opposite; I totally agree with the notion of "lack of action" and I would like to add another term: inequity.

I think that in the last several years Quebec farmers have been treated inequitably by the Canadian government; that is unacceptable, in my opinion.

I dug out a few figures to support my arguments and to have the word "inequity" included in today's non-confidence motion because, when we look at government spending on agriculture, it is clear that for the federal government agriculture is limited to western Canada.

I will start by giving you an example. In 1980, Quebec was the beneficiary of $300 million in federal agricultural expenditures, compared with $1 billion in western Canada.

In 1987 Quebec received $410 million, compared with over $4 billion in Western Canada. I think adding the word "inequity" to today's motion would be neither superfluous nor inappropriate.

Another thing I discovered is that Quebec's share of federal spending went from 16.4 per cent in 1980 to only 7.7 per cent in 1987, which amounts to half of Quebec's share of farming revenues in Canada or 15.6 per cent.

On the other hand, western Canada's share of federal agricultural expenditures went from 55 per cent in 1980 to 76 per cent in 1987.

Between 1980 and 1987, Quebec's share fell while Western Canada's increased. It went from 55 per cent in 1980 to 76 per cent in 1987.

Once again, I emphasize the terms "unfairness" and "inequities", all these expenditures to which Quebecers contributed a big share through their taxes of various kinds; they know very well that the federal government gets a lot from them.

We calculate that about 25 per cent of the taxes collected by the federal government comes from Quebec, which means that this money which Quebecers send to the federal government is redistributed unfairly to our detriment, especially in agriculture.

From 1980 to 1987, federal spending on agriculture increased one sixth as fast in Quebec as in the rest of Canada.

During that period federal spending rose by 192 per cent. I am glad that federal spending on agriculture rose by 192 per cent between 1980 and 1987. The federal government thought it was important to increase its spending to help agriculture. I come back to my word "unfairness", and we will see how this 192 per cent increase in federal spending on agriculture was distributed.

Spending increased 37 per cent in Quebec, compared with 340 per cent in Alberta, 292 per cent in Manitoba and 285 per cent in Saskatchewan. Again I come back to the word "unfairness". Such glaring differences are outrageous. An increase of 37 per cent in Quebec when Alberta got 340 per cent, Manitoba 292 per cent and Saskatchewan 285 per cent is unacceptable. I repeat that a lot of this money, at least 25 per cent, comes from Quebecers.

In 1990, the federal government spent almost half, 50 per cent, of its whole agriculture budget on research. I do not know if it is by chance, but most of the agriculture research budget was invested in grain production. We know that more grain has been produced in Quebec in recent years, but nevertheless it only accounts for 6 per cent of all our agricultural production in Quebec. We were shortchanged in the distribution of the research budget of the department of agriculture, considering that the department invested half its budget in research on grain and grain is only 6 per cent of Quebec's agricultural production.

When the time came to do research in three other sectors where Quebec is much more active, namely the dairy, poultry and pork industries, it only contributed 24 per cent. Yet, these industries account for 59 per cent of Quebec's production. Again, you can see the inequity. Ten per cent of the research budget is allocated to the dairy industry, while the production of this sector represents one third of the total. Quebec was also penalized regarding research and development in agriculture, since more than 50 per cent of that budget was spent in western Canada.

Federal government policies unfairly benefit western producers and adversely affect Quebec producers' competitiveness, particularly regarding grain and livestock production, as I just mentioned.

These unfair federal policies force Quebec to make greater financial efforts to support the agricultural industry. Let me explain how, because the province does not get its fair share from the federal government, the Quebec department of agriculture must rely on provincial taxes. In 1987, the Quebec department of agriculture, fisheries and food had to allocate $569 million to the agricultural sector, whereas the federal government was only contributing $410 million. In other words, the Quebec government spends more on its agricultural sector than the federal government.

The injustice lies in the fact that Quebecers have contributed a lot more to support agriculture in other provinces than in their own province. In 1987, Quebecers contributed $1.3 billion to agriculture in the other provinces. We paid for 25 per cent of all federal expenditures in agriculture, which totalled at that time $5.3 billion, twice the Quebec budget for agriculture. In other words, we use Quebec taxpayers' money to spend $569 million on our own agricultural industry and to send $1.3 billion to Ottawa to support other Canadian provinces. That also is unfair. I really want to stress that point. I want to show how utterly unfair Canadian policies were to Quebec policies.

There is a double standard in the federal agricultural policy, and I want to give you some examples. Between 1983 and 1987, federal subsidies reached an average of $32 a tonne for Western grain, compared to $12.34 a tonne for Quebec grain. Why $34 in the west and only $12 in Quebec? What was that all about? We pay taxes like evernyone else. Why do we not get our fair share?

Pursuant to the act, the Canadian Wheat Board must, at the time of delivery, pay to western grain producers an initial payment set and guaranteed by the federal government. If sales revenues do not cover the payments made, the federal government makes up for the deficit. This system resulted in the following: between 1985 and 1988, the federal government spent $344 million to cover the difference between the sales price asked by the Canadian Wheat Board and the payments made to the producers. We ended up with a $344 million deficit which the federal government covered with our taxes. The worst of it all is that Quebec grain producers are not eligible for that program. We pay for the rest of the producers, but we are not entitled to these benefits.

In 1991 and 1992, under the western grain stabilization program, western grain producers were guaranteed a net income equivalent to their average income over the five previous years. The federal government paid for three quarters of the contributions for this program, and the producers paid the rest. Western provincial governments did not take part in this program. When came the time to implement the program in Quebec, the federal government asked the province to pay for a third of it. Why did the western provinces not participate in it? Was it strictly between the producers and the federal government? When the time came for Quebec to take advantage of this program, Ottawa told the province that it had to pay for a third of it.

Western grain transportation support is a real scandal. Since 1983, the federal government has been paying an indexed $658 million every year. In 1991–1992, it paid railroad companies 1.1 billion to transport western grain, whereas Quebec producers were once again not eligible for that program. We pay taxes and with our taxes, the government promotes farm production in the west at the expense of eastern producers. It is in that sense that I would like to add the words "lack of fairness" to the words "lack of action" in our motion. If I had more time, I could give you more examples, but my allotted time is running out.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I am sorry, but the member's allotted time has expired.

[English]

Mr. Wayne Easter (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at some of the comments from the member on the other side. He is certainly playing with numbers.

One of the principles in the country is that in times of need we share in helping each other out of our difficulties. In terms of the payments to the west, I remind the member that there was an international grain price war. We had an obligation as a country to support western Canada and that is what we did. By the same token, when there were low prices in the hog industry and in the beef industry, which is more located in Quebec, the country supported those industries.

The member opposite should understand that one of the programs Quebec benefits from probably more than any other province is the supply management system. Quebec has benefited greatly. Its dairy production is somewhere around 46 per cent to 48 per cent of the total dairy production in the country as a result of our great Canadian supply management program.

I have a question for the member. If his party were successful in moving toward separation, which I do not believe it will be, what would that do to dairy producers in the province of Quebec in terms of the loss of the great Canadian supply management system we operate under?

• (1325)

Mr. Lavigne: Mr. Speaker, I could have given you other examples, but I think that the presentation I made just a moment ago clearly showed that the level of Quebec's participation in agricultural tax revenue, taxation money sent to the federal government and reinvested in Canadian agriculture is I repeat, unfair; we realized that numerous programs were unfair.

In reply to my colleague's question, I would say that if Quebec were to separate and become sovereign, we could keep all that money, that is approximately $28 billion in various taxes sent to Ottawa each year, and redistribute it through our different agricultural programs without being subjected to federal inequity and discrimination. We would then offer our own farmers many very profitable programs. I think, in that case, we could be much more aggressive on the international markets and carve our own niche for milk, poultry, eggs, grains or anything else we would chose to produce in Quebec.

I think there would be no problem whatsoever. On the contrary, sovereignty would solve a problem.

Mr. Réjean Lefebvre (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak the motion denouncing the government's lack of action and its inequity, as the hon. member said.

The government does not seem to have a specific policy for agriculture, especially considering the post-GATT situation. However, in line with the Quebec development model, several years ago the agricultural industry in Quebec started to organize and conduct round table discussions involving all players in the industry.

The États généraux du monde rural held in February 1991 in Montreal was attended by all Quebecers involved in regional development and the agri-food industry. This exercise produced a series of guidelines for future action. Here are some examples: letting the agricultural community take charge of its own future; respecting and promoting regional and local values; focussing on local and regional concertation and co-operation; diversifying the regional economic base; protecting and regenerating resources; and achieving a better balance in political decision-making from the bottom up.

As part of this process of consultation and co-operation, Quebecers in the agricultural industry organized and looked for ways to pool their resources. Round table discussions were organized on a sectorial basis, including the dairy industry, the pork industry, and so forth. At the summit in Trois-Rivières in June 1992, these discussions produced a consensus on what should be done to promote the development of the agri-food industry in Quebec.

The Trois-Rivières summit, an unprecedent exercise for Quebec, produced a series of commitments which included the following: to increase research and technology transfers as part of a strategy for acquiring new markets; to recognize, promote and support the need for human resources training; to guarantee the continued existence, development and growth of agri-food businesses; to revamp existing income security programs based on production costs by emphasizing risk sharing, productivity of farm operations, sustainable development and an awareness of market signals; to develop income security programs compatible with the rules of international trade; to promote the financing and transfer of farm operations in such a way as to prevent massive debt; to consider assistance for non-viable operations that could be reoriented within the industry and help farmers who retire from the industry.

After this consultation process, what the industry needs now is the right vehicle to make the new strategy for agri-food development in Quebec operational.

• (1330)

People in the Quebec farm community know what they want. They do not need the federal government to come in and impose policies which do not coincide with the priorities and the paths they have set for themselves. These people want to be able to make the decisions in the areas which concern them.

What we are talking about here is a massive decentralization from top to bottom. Is this something the federal government can offer? Is the government willing to give Quebecers the means to make their projects come true?

The agri-food sector needs a reasonable period of time to reach international competitiveness. Unfortunately, the federal government did not do a very good job of defending Canada's interests and Quebec farmers during the Uruguay round of negotiations under the GATT. It was totally unable to preserve article XI which afforded some protection to egg, poultry and milk producers, concentrated mostly in Quebec. Despite repeated promises by the Liberal government, last December, federal negotiators were not able to rally enough countries to defend and preserve article XI.

Although the present import quotas will be replaced by high tariffs which will gradually diminish over time, the disappearance of article XI will seriously shake the Quebec farming community.

By accepting to sign the GATT agreement, the federal government submits farmers, in Canada and Quebec, to a rate and mode of change imposed from outside by our competitors. The agri–food industry must change very rapidly in order to be able to face the new international competition.

The GATT agreement reduces by 36 per cent the amount used to subsidize exports of farm products. This is a step in the right direction, although it is rather modest. Each year, Canadian and Quebec taxpayers will have to spend hundreds of millions of dollars merely to compete on international markets with heavily subsidized grain exports from the United States and the European Union.

While grain exports remain heavily subsidized, the GATT accords have forced the government to review its overall domestic farm support policies.

Clearly, the agreement negotiated in Geneva on December 15 last was not the best possible deal that the federal government could have obtained for Canadian and Quebec farmers. The biggest threat to the interests of Canadian and Quebec farmers is the outcome of Canada–U.S. trade negotiations in the agricultural sector.

The federal government is being taken for a rough ride by U.S. negotiators over the question of tariffs on products subject to quotas—eggs, poultry and milk—products concentrated primarily in Quebec and Ontario, and over the question of durum wheat, yogurt and ice cream exports to the United States.

Government spending in agriculture does not promote structuring. The government should be evaluating the cost–effectiveness of its actions. Agriculture Canada is now involved in the analysis, organization and dissemination of information on agri–food markets. However, the Auditor General notes that the information collected does not necessarily correspond to user needs. The Department of Agriculture and Agri–Food should strive to develop a closer relationship with its clientele in order to avoid wasting public funds.

The government must further define its action areas to ensure that there is no overlap onto provincial initiatives. In Quebec, industry and government have been working together for several years on implementing various market strategies. Since developing new markets seems to have become a federal government priority, it is essential that Ottawa bear in mind the priorities set by Quebec.

The federal government should contribute financially to the efforts of stakeholders in the Quebec agri–food industry, particularly research and development efforts, to ensure that new market challenges are met.

• (1335)

The idea is not just to spend the taxpayers' money, but to invest it so as to promote industrial restructuring while maintaining the family farm system which is pivotal to Quebec's farm economy.

Producers and processors are working together to develop new markets and adapt their products to consumers' tastes. In the agri–food business, competition is fierce and the industry must react quickly to diversify production, all the while making sure it has access to the best suited technology. This means keeping in step with the rapidly changing technologies used by foreign competition.

The government must do more than make funds available for research and development. It must ensure close co–operation between its departments, the private sector and the research community. We hope the government will take positive steps to make sure the money spent meets the priorities imposed by market developments. Also, when it intervenes, it should be fair and give the same importance, relatively speaking, to each areas of the agricultural industry.

One of the best solutions for Quebec farm producers, it seems, would be the decentralization of the decisions making process and related budgets. In a word, it is another good reason for a sovereign Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Wayne Easter (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to note in the member's speech that he recognizes the benefits of the supply management system that has been designed in the Canadian context.

I again come back to a question I asked his colleague previously. The principle that the program of supply management operates under is basically managing supply to meet effective domestic demand. Given the fact that Quebec has 46 per cent to 48 per cent of the Canadian production, how is the member going to explain to his producers under his proposed separation that they will be able to have in place this system that he so admires?

The member mentioned the trade discussions we are having with the United States. I think we have to recognize that the ministers are taking a tough stance in the interests of all Canadians. I certainly say to the hon. member opposite we on this side would welcome a statement of support from his party in terms of that tough stance our Canadian ministers are taking in those negotiations in all of Canada's interests.

[Translation]

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Speaker, I endorse the reply my colleague, Mr. Lavigne, gave our friend opposite. I would like to emphasize that the crux of the problem for the people of Quebec is really inequity because from where we stand we get the impression that the government's attention with regard to the Canadian agricultural industry is centred on the western part of the country.

I would also like to mention a few things my colleague did not have the time to mention earlier. Regarding lamb production, Quebec has been unable to keep up with Western Canada, with its livestock increasing by 8 per cent from 1981 to 1991, as compared with 33 per cent in western provinces. Based on all that has been said so far in this debate in this place, I think we have one more reason to become sovereign in Quebec, to get the legislative tools we really need for things to run smoothly in our future country.

Mr. Jean-Paul Marchand (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, as for milk production in Quebec, the question was raised——at least two times. Of course under the supply management system Quebec has been advantaged in terms of milk production. It is the only advantage in agriculture Quebec has had under the present system.

• (1340)

Because of the fact that the federal government has been inept in maintaining article XI, supply management is the thing of the past as the hon. member knows. The farmers in Quebec, organized as they are, better than any other agricultural organization in Canada, are positioned to make such that the milk production will be sold in other countries. We cannot work any more in the supply management sector, only because the federal government has not.

One other thing about inequity in terms of the expenses of the federal government is it is not as though people in Quebec are not generous people. We recognize the principle that when one province is poorer than the other we try to be generous. That is not the issue. The issue is disloyal competition.

This form of inequity which has been going on for decades in Canada has disadvantaged Quebec in a disloyal way. That is to say, in those areas where Quebec has had a marked advantage like in pork production, moneys were being used by the federal government to develop industries competitive to Quebec in other provinces.

That is not a question of simple inequity. It is disloyal competition. That has been one of the problems with the farmers in Quebec.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Does the colleague of the hon. member for Québec-Est, the hon. member for Champlain, want to add anything to his colleague's comments before we move on to comments? The hon. member for Champlain has the floor.

Mr. Réjean Lefebvre (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, some members of this House often think that we cannot see beyond Quebec but I think we are able to include western Canada in our discussions. We must, however, point out this great inequity toward Quebec in all areas.

We do not want to sound like whiners but we have discovered so many inequities at Agriculture Canada that it must be pointed out today.

[English]

Mr. David Iftody (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I take this opportunity to speak to the House about the accomplishments of our government with respect to farm income and safety nets.

As a western Canadian representing a large farming community with both supply management and wheat farmers, the debate today is of particular importance. I welcome debate from members of both the Reform Party and the Bloc on these matters.

While the previous government's plan for safety nets was simply a piecemeal approach, our government looks at farm income and safety nets in a much more comprehensive perspective. In our campaign commitments, this government called for the development of a strong whole farm support.

Our approach is based on simple but effective principles. Farmers and their families need a comprehensive set of programs that will provide income security as they move to adjust and take advantage of the new international trading regime and to generate economic growth in rural communities that is badly needed in this country.

Our government wants to provide farming communities with the tools they need to succeed in the years and the century ahead. I am pleased to report to the Chair that our minister is doing an effective job in that regard.

As we all know, the system of safety nets in Canadian agriculture is a tripartite approach involving producers, provinces and the federal government. There is tremendous diversity and need out there.

We recognize there are different needs in Quebec, different needs in Atlantic Canada, different needs even within Manitoba in the northern and southern parts of the province. My hon. friend from the Reform Party for Lisgar—Marquette will attest to that, being a farmer from that area.

The approach taken by the minister is very open and transparent. Soon after the election the minister established a safety net conference for all players to air their views and concerns. This is the approach we want to take with respect to the whole farm support program. We do not want to have one separate program in Quebec, one separate program in British Columbia and one separate program in Prince Edward Island. We are looking at a comprehensive national approach. We are meeting with Quebec leaders.

I want to refer, for example, to the GATT discussions that were raised. Our minister spoke to dairy farmers in Quebec and, if I am not mistaken, received a standing ovation. I also want to say that the Liberal government brought in supply management which benefited Quebec farmers greatly for the past 20 years. On the question of loyalty I think we have been very loyal, very representative and fair in our approach to all farmers.

We want the kind of safety nets that will benefit all the needs of our partners. Taxpayers want programs that are financially sound and transparent. Our objective, therefore, is to develop a whole farm support program which will provide equitable support for all commodities, all producers and all provinces; which will not distort based on market signals; which will not influence production decisions; and which is less vulnerable to trade actions. Certainly people in the wheat industry in western Canada know all about trade actions, particularly those invoked most recently by the U.S.

Farmers have seen tremendous safety net changes in the last five years. Some have been good, and we acknowledge the good work, but others have failed due to hasty implementation and because there was no producer acceptance or understanding. The government is committed to full consultation and agreement on an approach that works.

The accomplishments since the safety net conference clearly show that our comprehensive and consultative approach is working. This is not an easy process. People need to talk through their differences. We acknowledge again that there are differences. The parliamentary secretary acknowledged we have to sit down at the negotiating table to work out these differences in the best interests of all Canadian farmers.

The work of the committee over the next six months will be critical in shaping the industry's economic position. To seize opportunities presented by trade accords and growing international markets we need stability and confidence at home. The importance of this point has been impressed upon us particularly again in western communities because of the possible trade war with the U.S.

Stability does not interfere with our capability to be innovative and market responsive, stability that allows us to preserve our resources, stability that works with fiscal realities.

During the electoral campaign our government promised to reinstate interest free cash advances to strengthen the farm debt review process. The minister is consulting with farm groups and has asked the sector to come up with proposals. This is an important issue.

In the committee on banking, for example, we have heard from the farming industry of Quebec, Atlantic Canada and western Canada. These farmers tell us that they cannot get access to capital. Young men and women in Canada cannot buy farms, their parents' farms, because the banks are not willing to do business with them. That is why we as a federal government have stepped into the process through agencies such as the Farm Credit Corporation to open up avenues of resources to young Canadian farmers.

The agriculture and agri–food department is currently reviewing the farm debt review board program, along with other programs, to ensure they meet today's needs in the sector. Again I want to emphasize that we are consulting with the people.

Our government is comfortable with the idea that safety nets help industries stabilize income and ensure against risks the banks are not willing to take on the Canadian farming industry. However more money is not necessarily the answer. At home and abroad value added and niche markets represent big bucks for those who seize the opportunities. This is precisely what our industry is trying to do.

The GATT has created new possibilities for the Canadian farming community. I want to respond to my hon. friend's comments about the GATT. Our Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food stood in the GATT negotiations to fight for the dairy industry. I have dairy farmers in my riding who I know were pleased with the outcome. I also know that tariffication levels almost as high as 300 per cent will protect dairy farmers in Quebec and those in my riding of Provencher.

It is obvious the government has accomplished a lot since it took office last fall. When we consider all the players involved in the safety net design, the complexity and the diversity of our agricultural industry, we realize the government is living up to its commitments.

We brought everyone to the table. Our process of developing a new safety net package is on a tight schedule. We want to implement it by 1995. It will be a key item on the agenda for the next federal–provincial meeting of agriculture ministers. Our minister is planning to present it to the House soon after that.

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Provencher for his speech. I point out to him that the cash shortages, the financing problems, are severe.

If he had read the Winnipeg Free Press last night he would realize that one window manufacturing company in Winnipeg got a $370,000 interest free grant. This is the kind of money the FCC needs to help farmers solve some of their problems. I would appreciate his attention to that.

Mr. Iftody: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for those comments. Although I have not read the Free Press to respond accurately to that suggestion, I just want to advise the hon. member that in both his riding of Lisgar—Marquette and my adjacent riding of Provencher the federal government has made a number of investments in terms of the farm community.

He will recall that only two or three weeks ago I had occasion to visit his riding under the PAMWI agreements. I am pleased to report that we made an investment of $3 million under a tripartite agreement, with the federal government contributing $1 million out of its agricultural program to the good people of Winkler.

In keeping with the theme of my friends in the Reform Party, the policies of the federal Government of Canada are equitable. If we give something to a window manufacturer in Winnipeg for a tax break, we certainly have given the same opportunities to the people of Winkler, the town in which my hon. friend resides.

[Translation]

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said that efforts have been made since they came to office. Having travelled to the west and being from the east, I can say that they are two different worlds. Lands in the west are much bigger and look very different to easterners, especially to someone from the Gaspé Peninsula. Sons cannot afford to buy their fathers' lands.

In my region of Matapédia, we do not even have our own slaughterhouse; producers have to send their animals 100 or 150 kilometres away. I would like to ask the hon. member what concrete measures, not only plans to review the situation, they have taken since they came to office to help farmers' sons who want to follow in their parents' footsteps. What are you doing to help us slaughter our animals in our own communities instead of 200 or 300 kilometres away?

[English]

Mr. Iftody: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his observations and questions. He referred to dairy farmers in his riding and I want to tell him that I have dairy farmers in my riding.

• (1355)

I also point out what I think is important for the purposes of his question. The dairy farmers in my riding are concentrated largely in French communities, primarily French speaking communities. The dairy farmers in Provencher, the southern part of my French communities, are very similar to those in his riding. The operations in 1993 are much the same. I would never suggest that the operations in my hon. friend's riding are somewhat further ahead or further behind those in mine.

I point out again that dairy farmers in Canada, including those in the hon. member's riding, have done quite well in the past 20 years under a Liberal program of supply management. Just to provide the hon. member with ongoing assurance, the government will continue to express that loyalty to the people of Quebec, to provide help for them and to stand up for the dairy farmers in Quebec.

On the second point about slaughterhouses, I am working on a similar kind of proposal with my provincial colleagues in the southeast corner of Provencher. We are anticipating that our exports in the hog and cattle industry are going to double over the next 10 years. We are looking at capitalizing on that in terms of value added.

I would ask the hon. member to have his membership convey their interest in terms of entering into secondary processing with value added to bring benefits to the community. I welcome that kind of interactive process. I can assure the hon. member we are doing everything in government to ensure that young farmers in his area and in my area have the same opportunities as their fathers and grandfathers did under a Liberal government.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, I appreciated hearing the hon. member for Provencher speak to this issue.

As he is no doubt aware, a very divisive issue in western Canada has been that of the recipient of payments under the Western Grain Transportation Act. Should those funds be paid to producers or paid to the railways as they are currently being administered? Does the hon. member favour the status quo of paying the WGTA to the railroads? Would he favour paying that transportation subsidy to producers? Or, does he have a new initiative that he would prefer to see undertaken?

Mr. Iftody: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his question. As he probably knows a payment panel has been studying the issue for some time. The Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food is awaiting the response from the panel to have a look at the proposal.

I assure him that my position is in the best interests of grain farmers in my area. If they tell me they would prefer to use the current system then I will believe them. If they tell me they want to change the system and have a direct cash payment then I will support that.

Just to provide some context, farmers even within my own riding have different views on the issue. Different farmers in close proximity to one another will have different views on what is in their best interests with respect to the payments they receive.

I assure the hon. member and the whole House that our minister, as I said in my opening comments, will study the issue in detail. We want to hear everyone's view on it. We want to do what is in the best interests of western Canadian farmers.

The Speaker: It being two o'clock the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT

Mrs. Karen Kraft Sloan (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to speak out against corporal punishment.

I believe corporal punishment is an inhuman form of torture that should not be accepted by civilized government. I was appalled to learn that a provincial court judge has recently spoken in favour of caning as an appropriate punishment for young offenders.

In Singapore caning involves victims being lashed on their bare buttocks with a thick bamboo rod by a martial arts expert. These victims bleed after the first lash and are scarred for life. Recent events in Singapore have drawn the world's attention to this colonial form of justice. We could not advance as a civilized nation if we were to practise archaic methods of punishment such as caning.

I strongly believe we cannot deter violence by the threat of inflicting violence against individuals.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Bernard Deshaies (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Health, who cares so much about the health of Canadians and Quebecers, as she keeps saying, in my opinion deserves the gold medal for cynicism.

How can the minister denounce provincial governments forced to reduce health services or allow extra billing when her own government has extended the freeze on transfer payments until 1995?

How can the provinces maintain the quality of health care when her government is constantly reducing its share of health–care expenditures?

When she was in opposition, the Deputy Prime Minister said that federal financing was on a slippery slope and was creating a crisis in the Canadian health care sector.

The crisis is here and the responsibility for prolonging it falls squarely on her own government.

ALBERTA

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, during the Easter recess I had the opportunity to meet with government officials from 10 different municipalities within my riding of Crowfoot.

Each of these Alberta municipal governments told me that it is operating in the black and has varying degrees of reserves to draw upon if necessary.

What a novel idea. Money in the bank, no interest payments, no out of control debt, no threat of bankruptcy and a credit rating which is indicative of good fiscal management and responsibility. Only in Alberta they say.

I commend the mayors and councillors of these Alberta municipalities. When asked how they managed to run a debt free operation, they shared with me their closely guarded secret. They said they never spend more than they bring in.

Why can the local governments express such responsibility in fiscal matters while the federal government has been such a disaster?

SERIAL KILLER BOARD GAME

Mr. Dan McTeague (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, the sale of killer games and cards in Canada suffered a serious setback last week when the Minister of Justice presented a bill banning them in this country for children under 18. Board games and collectable cards on mass murderers have no place in Canadian society.

These products glorify criminals and their brutal acts. Many constituents in my riding of Ontario have conveyed to me their concern and repugnance over the sale of such items to children.

I wish to commend the Minister of Justice for taking this initiative and I will be glad when the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs begins public consideration of the bill.

I also take the opportunity to congratulate the Catholic Women's League of Canada and the churches in my riding on their efforts.

CLUB ROMA

Mr. Walt Lastewka (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate Club Roma on its recent 33rd anniversary celebrations. Club Roma is an important Italian organization in the city of St. Catharines. As Club Roma begins its 34th year, it is launching the greatest expansion and fund raising project in its history.

The ambitious project has been aptly kicked off with the Club Roma dream house raffle. The new expansion project is evidence of the important role that Club Roma plays in the community. Many organizations in St. Catharines have benefited from the club's generosity, including every hospital in St. Catharines.

Club Roma is also an integral part of the rich multicultural heritage of St. Catharines. The club's success in the preservation and promotion of the diverse heritage of our community has contributed immensely to the city of St. Catharines and the greater Niagara region.

I extend congratulations and good wishes to the president, Angelo Mirabella, and to Club Roma for a successful campaign and a successful 1994.

SAFETY IN THE WORKPLACE

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Labour Congress has declared today a national day of mourning for workers who have been killed or injured on the job.

The figures for workplace death and injury are frightening. Each work day four Canadians die as a result of accidents, unsafe conditions or exposure to harmful substances at work. Disabling injuries have increased 17 per cent over the past 20 years. One in four women each year is injured on the job compared with one in eighteen men. The cost of workplace death and injury amounts to $10.6 billion a year.

No one can place a value on life or the suffering of family and friends who have lost a loved one in a work related incident.

• (1405)

We should recognize today, April 28, as a day to pay our respect to Canadian workers who have been killed or injured on the job.

ELECTRONIC HIGHWAY

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, the electronic highway is the major technological challenge of the future. This highway will combine telephone, cable and computer technology so that consumers can have a wide range of interactive services.

Although the advisory committee was able to bring together a strong team with expertise in electronic infrastructure, we must admit that the creative artistic community was tactlessly left out. This is an unacceptable omission.

The government cannot keep outside the decision–making process the very people who produce much of the material that will be carried on the electronic highway, especially since the creative artistic community could have played an essential role with its knowledge of such issues as privacy, copyright and intellectual property.

If the minister and his government are really concerned about protecting culture, they must correct this error and leave a big place for the creative people of this country.

DNA TESTING

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of this House a terrible injustice in my home province of British Columbia.

A 78–year old woman was raped and brutally beaten by a ruthless criminal. Although the judge conceded the DNA match was conclusive, he ruled the evidence inadmissible because it infringed on the rights of the criminal under the charter. The criminal left this poor woman naked and battered yet he is the one being shielded.

Police use breathalyser tests in drinking and driving cases and yet we deny them the right to use this important tool to put violent criminals behind bars.

DNA testing must be permitted when necessary. We have run out of patience with ineffective political parties. The rights of the victim must take priority over the rights of the criminal.

NATIONAL BASKETBALL ASSOCIATION

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the city of Vancouver and Arthur Griffiths in particular for their successful bid for a National Basketball Association franchise.

Vancouver joins an expanding and exciting league. Canadians have been eagerly anticipating this favourable decision for a long time and clearly it is much deserved. Much thanks must go to Arthur Griffiths for his dedication and outstanding commitment to realizing this goal.

The awarding of an NBA team demonstrates the significance of Vancouver, how it has grown and developed into a socially vibrant metropolis. There is a realization that Canadians have much to contribute to the sporting world. Canadians are recognized as being among the most enthusiastic, passionate and committed of supporters.

The new basketball team will be sharing the yet to be completed GM Place with the Vancouver Canucks who, incidentally, will be playing the Calgary Flames tonight at the Pacific Coliseum.

I am confident the Canucks will handily even their series and I wish them and Vancouver's new basketball team the very best of luck.

FISHERIES

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, in the House yesterday during Question Period the hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans stated that the groundfish licences of bona fide professional fishermen that had been frozen in 1991 would be returned at once. He made it clear that not all licences would be returned, only those of bona fide professional fishermen.

This is a move that will be supported by the various fishermen's associations. It is, I assure the House, most gratifying to have a Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who listens to the fishing industry and to the fishermen.

These licences are most important to the diversified, multi–licence traditional fishery and to the professional fishermen in my Carleton—Charlotte constituency.

The minister has proven that he understands and cares deeply for the traditional fishery. I would like to personally thank and congratulate the hon. minister for this most sensible and important move.

HOME LOAN INSURANCE PROGRAM

Mrs. Georgette Sheridan (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise in the House today to speak about the federal government's first home loan insurance program.

In a surge of activity, over 33,000 homes were purchased by first time buyers in the first quarter of 1994. The high level of activity is a result of consumers taking advantage of almost ideal home buying conditions.

The home loan insurance program is good news. It will help Canadians realize their dream of purchasing a first home. As important, it will stimulate the economy. Almost 60,000 person years of direct employment have been created.

PROVINCIAL ELECTIONS

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, at a fund raising cocktail where guests had to pay $250 each, the Minister of Foreign Affairs accused the Quebec director general of elections of not being impartial in asking the federal government to comply with the spending limits provided in Quebec's Elections Act.

By attacking the professional integrity of Mr. Pierre–F. Côté, and by showing his contempt for Quebec's election rules, the Minister of Foreign Affairs shows an arrogance typical of the Trudeau years.

It is ironic that the minister would make such comments at a fund raising cocktail. He would be better advised to implement the commitments made by the Liberal Party regarding ethics and to table legislation on the financing of political parties, based on the principles of transparency and fairness contained in the Quebec act.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, 30 years ago the Liberal government of Lester Pearson brought medicare to Canada. Although there were concerns expressed at that time about what the program would cost, the majority of Canadians applauded the initiative.

In the years since, Canadians, including Reformers, have come to put a high value on our health care system. It is tragic that today health care is under threat from the very same party that introduced it.

Health care is deteriorating rapidly and soon it may no longer be the envy of the world. Our huge debt and deficits and this government's refusal to update the 30–year old outdated Canada Health Act are combining to undermine and gradually destroy the system.

Canadians cherish their health care system. They demand solutions from their government instead of rhetoric that is hauled out of the archives from the 1960s.

Let us hope that in addition to the aluminum smelter museum in Shawinigan, the Prime Minister will not have to consider building a health care museum.

Oral Questions

NATIONAL SPORTS ACT

Mr. Roger Gallaway (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, yesterday this Parliament approved Bill C–212, a bill officially designating ice hockey as our national winter sport and lacrosse as our national summer sport.

Both of these sports have a significant place in Canadian history and are an important element of our culture. Hockey and lacrosse are just as symbolic of Canada as the maple leaf or the Bluenose.

The passage of this bill is a good example of co–operation in Parliament and of how MPs on both sides should work together without the cross–checking, holding and interference that usually occur in the House as they do on the ice, on the floor, or on the field.

This bill brings all Canadians together, contributing to our national unity. I am sure that all Canadians will be pleased with the action taken by this Parliament.

SAFETY IN THE WORKPLACE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, today, April 28, is a national day of mourning for workers who have been injured or died on the job.

[Translation]

Each working day, four Canadians are killed on the job.

[English]

Every seven seconds of every working day a serious injury occurs. Every year workers die from workplace diseases that too often go unrecorded and uncompensated. Health and safety standards and their enforcement continue to be weakened by governments nationally and internationally.

I call on this government to honour this national day of mourning as passed in this House of Commons by fighting for good labour standards for our workers and, in order to honour our workers, that the Prime Minister agree to fly flags at half–mast on this day of mourning for the workers of this country who have lost their lives at work.

CITIZENSHIP COURT

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, on April 14 the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration stated: "As vacancies arise, new citizenship court judges will not be appointed". On April 26 the Prime Minister stated: "We are working at substantially reducing the deficit". He referred to the millions of dollars being saved by the citizenship court judge decision.

• (1415)

As a result of the attrition in these appointments the estimated potential savings for this year alone should be in the range of $300,000. However, all attempts to have the estimates in this one department reduced at all to reflect these savings to the Canadian taxpayer have been stonewalled by the Prime Minister's own caucus.

Similar to this government's first budget brought down in February, we continue to hear promises from this Prime Minister but see no action.

PATENT DRUGS

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, I will direct my question to the Minister of Finance.

Reacting to the federal government's intention to reopen the drug patent law, the Quebec minister of industry accuses Ottawa of creating a climate of instability by threatening investments in Quebec. He says that a drug company established in Quebec has already postponed a $50–million investment in research and development because of the federal government's intention to review Bill C–91.

I ask the minister if he admits that the government's announced intention to review this law is already hurting high–tech investments. Does he confirm that, for lack of assurance from Ottawa about the law, a drug company established in Quebec has postponed a $50–million investment?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the government has already announced its intention to keep our international commitments, as we signed the new GATT agreement and NAFTA.

Moreover, I want to remind the Leader of the Opposition of the provisions of C–91 which he supported. These provisions include a clause to review this legislation. It is already in C–91. The Bloquistes supported this bill. It is more than a little hypocritical for the Leader of the Opposition to say now that the bill is being reviewed.

The Speaker: The word "hypocritical" is somewhat inflammatory. I would ask the hon. minister to withdraw this word "hypocritical".

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be rather difficult to understand if I did not use that word. I would never want to give the impression that the Hon. Leader of the Opposition is a hypocrite.

The Speaker: I would just like the hon. minister to take back that word.

Mr. Manley: Certainly, Mr. Speaker. I withdraw that word.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the main thing is to determine whether or not this government will reopen the law before it is due for review.

I have here in front of me a Canadian Press article published in La Presse, according to which the minister said on April 26 that he would review the drug patent law. We know very well that this law is not to be reviewed until 1997. We in the Bloc are very proud to have voted for a law that will give Montreal an extremely important pharmaceutical research centre—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1420)

Mr. Bouchard: —prouder no doubt than the Liberal Party, which waged a fierce battle to prevent a real pharmaceutical research centre from being created in Montreal.

I ask the minister to tell us today in this House if he does not think he should reassure the pharmaceutical industry and if he is considering announcing once and for all that he will not call into question the 20–year patent protection, whereby a drug developed and patented by a company cannot be copied by others. I ask him to make that commitment here in this House today.

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, as I just said, we are very aware of our commitments under GATT and NAFTA. That is the basis of our position.

[English]

I want to make perfectly clear to the House and to Canadians that this government is not going to be blackmailed by threats. We made one simple commitment during the election campaign on Bill C–91 and that was that we would review it.

As I explained yesterday both here and to the media, that review consists of looking at the impact on prices of prescription medications and on looking, second, at the fulfilment of obligations made to the previous government with respect to investment and research and development.

If the Leader of the Opposition considers it to be inappropriate for governments to monitor performance resulting from the passage of important pieces of legislation like that, why does he not get up and say that companies no matter what kind of companies they are can do whatever they want? We believe that the best interests of Canadians need to count first. That is what the government is endeavouring to do.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing worse in politics, as in other fields, than ambiguity, and I would like to give the minister the opportunity to clarify specifically any ambiguity there might be.

Bill C–91 contains a statutory requirement for a review of the provisions and application of the law in 1997; a statutory review is planned for 1997.

I understood the minister to say that he will reopen the law before the 1997 deadline. If so, let him tell us clearly: Will he wait until 1997 or will he review it before then by a decision of the Liberal majority in this House?

[English]

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition seems to be very nervous about this. At least he is now acknowledging that he supported a review of the legislation. It is indeed as he says scheduled to take effect no later than the fourth anniversary of the passage of the bill which would be the spring of 1997 as he indicates.

I think it would be fair to say that it is appropriate for the government to monitor the results in the areas I have mentioned in the course of performing this review. Perhaps we will have a look at the results of that monitoring and will be able to give a precise answer to his question later on.

Let me say this as well. If anyone wants to talk about what is causing instability in the investment climate in this country, one does not need to look beyond the Leader of the Opposition.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, we gather from the Minister of Industry's response that he intends to review the legislation immediately and that is why he has made that announcement. That is what his response leads to believe.

My question is directed to the Minister of Foreign Affairs. You will get a chance to respond. Just hear the question, then you will get to answer it.

Reacting yesterday to remarks made by the Quebec minister of industry and commerce, Mr. Gérald Tremblay, who was outraged to see the federal government create a climate of instability detrimental to Quebec, the Minister of Foreign Affairs said that, instead of getting all excited, Mr. Tremblay should have contacted him and he would have put his concerns to rest.

• (1425)

In light of the statements made by the minister of industry and commerce, should the Minister of Foreign Affairs not take this opportunity to make a reassuring statement in this place for all of Quebec and Quebec's pharmaceutical industry to hear?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, every time I hear a question from the hon. member for Roberval it calls to mind the words from Macbeth: "a tale told by an idiot full of sound and fury signifying nothing".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Speaker: I would appeal to all hon. members to sort of lower our tone in the questions and also the words we use.

I would appeal to all hon. members both in the questions and the answers to please tone down our voices and possibly not crank up the rhetoric. I would appeal to all hon. members so that we can get the questions and answers in today.

I take it that the hon. Minister of Industry is finished with his answer.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, the public can see for themselves. These proceedings are televised and widely broadcasted. They know what we are getting at. We know why the Minister of Industry is nervous. He has nothing better to do than to respond by insulting Quebec's legitimate demands.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put his question through the Chair.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, we are concerned to see the Minister of Foreign Affairs answer out of order and then fail to respond when questioned. Can the government, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Minister of Industry or the Minister of Finance, one of the them, respond and tell us why the people of Quebec should trust ministers of the government that guided Bill S–31 through the House, a bill which tied the hands of the Quebec Deposit and Investment Fund and curbed Quebec's growth? Why should we trust these people? We want an answer from the minister.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I must point out that it is impossible for the Minister of Foreign Affairs to answer questions on matters that do not fall under his administrative responsibility. He could easily provide an appropriate answer, but the Standing Orders of this House do not allow him to respond.

I could add that the three ministers referred to by the opposition leader have demonstrated that they have obviously been working and will continue to work in the best interests of Quebecers and Canadians in general. And this work will continue to be positive and to promote the interests of Quebecers and Canadians. That has been clearly demonstrated, and the opposition's questions are not disproving anything.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, since you permitted a quotation from Shakespeare I am sure you would permit one from Edmund Burke that says: "Just because a few grasshoppers under a fern make the field ring with their importunate chirping, whilst thousands of great cattle repose beneath the trees chew their cud and are silent, please do not believe that those who make the noise are the only inhabitants of the field".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: If I may quote one of the great Speakers of the House of Commons, would the hon. member please put his question?

Mr. Manning: Mr. Speaker, my question today is for the Minister of Health. Yesterday the Prime Minister acknowledged that there are serious problems in Canada's health care system, but in the same breath he refused to consider the most obvious measures to help our health care system to survive.

My question for the health minister is this. If the federal government cannot maintain its financial support of health care, and if it will not amend the Canada Health Act to allow the provinces more flexibility in paying for health care, how then does the minister propose to solve the problem of financing health care in Canada?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. It gives me the opportunity to set the record straight.

Actually the best news of the past budget was the fact that transfer payments in health care were not cut. It was the one area that was not. We guaranteed stability over the next few years. As matter of fact transfer payments will be allowed to grow somewhat over the next few years.

In light of the fiscal problems we are facing, that should send a very positive message to all Canadians, that our health care system is one we value above all else.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

I thank the minister for her reply. However it does not take a brain surgeon to figure out what is at the root of the financing problems of health care. The total health care bill in Canada is now over $70 billion with the provinces paying 46 per cent of that bill, individuals and private insurance companies paying about 28 per cent and the federal government now paying about 23 per cent. The federal government is no longer the senior partner in health care financing. It has become a junior partner.

Will the minister today admit that health care transfers are now insufficient to permit the provinces to meet the demands of the Canada Health Act? Will she commit to amend the act to give the provinces the flexibility they need to finance the major portion of the bill?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, hard working Canadians who live by the rules, who pay their taxes, gave us a very strong message during the last election. They believe in the health care system as it is governed by the Canada Health Act. That is our mandate and we will maintain it. There is a role for the national government.

I would like to take this opportunity to tell all Canadians that there is someone here, there is a government, that will make sure they get health care not based on the size of their pocketbooks but based on the fact that they are sick.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I have one further supplementary question.

The minister's answer leaves Canadians wondering what it would take to convince the government that health care financing and the Canada Health Act need to be reformed. How many more hospitals have to be closed down? How much longer do the waiting lines have to become? How many more Canadians have to go to the United States for health care?

• (1435)

How much further does the health care system have to deteriorate before the government will agree to reform the Canada Health Act and the financing of health care in Canada?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt in my mind and in the minds of most Canadians that the health care system is one of the best. It is far better than what you find south of the border.

Not only is it one of the best but it has given us a great economic advantage. We will not reopen the Canada Health Act in the short term. We are here to make sure that what we value as a party, as a country, is maintained.

There will have to be some changes, and change is always difficult. But it does not mean we have to let go of the principles we really believe in.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance who is also responsible for regional development in Quebec.

The red book emphasizes the importance of developing companies in high-tech sectors. The Liberal Party has promised to increase incentives for leading-edge industries. We were therefore amazed to hear that the government plans to revise and, in effect, weaken Bill C-91, the drug patent bill.

My question is this: How can the minister co-operate with the Minister of Industry on a strategy that will have a disastrous and devastating impact on brand-name manufacturers in the pharmaceutical industry who invest massively in research and development and are mainly located in the Montreal area, where the Minister of Finance has his riding?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, Bloc members are having a hard time understanding the answers to the questions. As I just said, first of all, we are very much aware of our commitments under GATT and NAFTA. Second, it is very important for us to review the performance of companies on the basis of their commitment to invest in research and development, and we also have to—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, they are not interested, and they are not even listening to the answers. Maybe that is why they do not understand.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary for the Minister of Finance and minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, and I hope he will give me an answer. I would like to point out that the minister, unlike his Liberal colleagues at the time, did not vote against Bill C-91 because he knows how important it is for Montreal, and I commend him for that.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Duceppe: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the minister whether he will finally speak for Quebec in Cabinet and defend this important industry in the Montreal area by rejecting out of hand any changes that would weaken the patent legislation. Will the minister take a stand to defend the interests of Quebec and Montreal against his colleagues or will he remain silent and let the ministers from Ontario go ahead and undermine Quebec's interests?

[English]

The Speaker: The question should be addressed to the minister having the administrative responsibility for a particular dossier and I go to the Minister of Industry.

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, this is a continuing campaign of confusion and obfuscation by the Official Opposition. The member's question implies that this issue simply divides along the Ottawa River. This is simply not correct.

The brand name pharmaceutical industry is as important in the province of Ontario as it is in the province of Quebec. In addition the generic industry exists in the province of Quebec as it does in the province of Ontario.

• (1440)

Furthermore, Canadians in all parts of the country are profoundly concerned that governments look to the companies involved in this industry, first of all to live up to the obligations that they entered into. Second, Canadians in all parts of the country are concerned about the impact of drug prices on our health care system.

If members of the Bloc Quebecois are not interested in these things, that is for them to say. However, as to the commitment of the government to an innovative economy, that is clear and will be pursued by this government with vigour and determination across Canada.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that our health care system is sick and the way to find out is to go to a hospital.

Recently in my province of British Columbia the Prince George Regional Hospital had to close one-third of its beds. Vancouver General Hospital has closed 108 beds. Calgary General Hospital is being closed down and the lights are being turned out on Calgary's children's hospital, all because of a lack of funds.

Because of the Canada Health Act rules and regulations, the only solution to the health care problem the minister has offered to the provinces is to withhold health care funding to rationing and bed closures.

Does the minister offer any other alternatives to health care funding in this country?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, no doubt there have been problems in transfer payments. We have had a different government. Now we are back to protect the people of Canada.

There are many new techniques nowadays which often mean we do not need to use all the hospital beds. To go out and spread fear among the population is wrong. We still have a very good system. We are going to work together to make it better and to renew it. That is why we are going to have a national forum on health.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, as a physician and surgeon who works in hospitals, if you are sick and need a hospital bed and cannot get it, that is a tragedy that does not belong in this great country.

Yesterday the minister told the provinces she is going to withhold $750,000 per month in transfer payments for health care. That is $750,000 less to treat the people of British Columbia which means longer bed closures, less care for the sick and the elderly and people are going to die.

We must get our heads out of the sand. What is the minister going to do and what alternative does she have to get health care and Canada on firm financial ground? It needs immediate care now. What is she going to do about it?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, we have the law of the land which is very specific. If a previous government chose not to follow the law, then that was wrong.

This Minister of Health and this government take our responsibilities very seriously. We will follow the letter of the law. We will also send a message out that extra billing is wrong. It is wrong because it hurts those who need help. Believe me, I will fight to make sure that people who are sick get treatment based on their illnesses, not based on the size of their wallets. Any extra billing is a tax on illness and that is wrong.

MIL DAVIE SHIPYARDS

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, Ottawa has yet to announce its decision regarding the construction of a new ferry to service the Magdalen Islands. This project would certainly put MIL Davie shipyards in Lauzon back on track.

Yesterday the Quebec minister of industry criticized the federal government's attitude and stated the following: "We are entitled to have our ferry and to have it built here in Quebec. All of a sudden, the federal government has taken an interest in this ferry and wants to award the contract to a shipyard outside the province".

• (1445)

My question is directed to the Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec. Can the minister give us his assurance that he will do whatever it takes in order to get the Prime Minister to rein in his Minister of Transport so that he does not play politics at Quebec's expense and divert the contract to build the ferry from MIL Davie in Lauzon to Saint John Shipbuilding Ltd., which happens to be located in the Minister of Transport's own province?

[English]

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this question has been asked many times in the House of the Minister of Transport and of the Minister of Industry. The Minister of Transport is looking at all options available for the replacement of this ferry.

No decisions have been made. We will take all considerations into account and when a decision has been made we will advise the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, we wonder if there really is a Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec.

Are we to understand from the minister's silence that he agrees with the statements of the Minister of Transport? Is that why the Prime Minister refused to make any specific promises to the shipyard workers in Lévis during the last election campaign?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, we are extremely aware of how important MIL Davie shipyards are to the Quebec region.

As the hon. member knows full well, both the federal government and the Quebec government have received a business plan and we are prepared to consider it as part of a long–term plan for the commercial viability of MIL Davie.

However, I have no doubt that the hon. member agrees with the following statement: "I hope that this policy, which calls for the rationalization of shipyards, will adhere to the fundamental principle which the government has always defended, that is the principle of free enterprise. Any other approach would only lead to lame duck solutions, and this would be to the detriment of a shipyard that already enjoys a competitive position".

These words were spoken by his colleague, the hon. member for Richelieu.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health.

In my home province of Alberta there are some creative alternatives to the problems of the health care system. For example, the world renowned private Gimbel Eye Clinic provided cataract surgery to 3,500 people last year. That is one–quarter of the cataract surgery done in Alberta.

In her zeal to enforce the three–decade old Canada Health Act does the minister propose that 25 per cent of cataract patients line up in a longer line?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, let me set the record straight here. When people go to the Gimbel Eye Clinic they pay a facility fee. It costs approximately $1,000 for a person to go there.

What this means is that a person who has money can get the cataract surgery ahead of others, but the person who really needs it and probably does not have the money has to wait a lot longer.

What does that $1,000 do? Does it add to hospitals? Does it help the system do a better job? Does it foster better utilization of what we have in place? No. It allows someone to get richer.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, let me debunk the myth that these are wealthy people going to the Gimbel Eye Clinic. These are senior citizens, citizens who cannot see, cannot watch television and cannot read. They are not rich. They are poor.

The message the Minister of Health is giving us is that she cares more about the law of the land than the health of the land, and that is wrong.

QUEBEC'S CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, last night at a $250–a–head Liberal fund raising cocktail party in Quebec City, the Minister of Foreign Affairs publicly attacked the credibility of Quebec's Chief Electoral Officer. He described Mr. Côté's warning with respect to federal parties' involvement in the next campaign as a biased and partisan attack.

The Speaker: These questions do not deal with the administrative functions of the government. Perhaps the hon. member could rephrase his question so that it refers to these functions; his question would then be in order. The hon. member for Portneuf.

Mr. de Savoye: Mr. Speaker, do you not think that the minister should realize that he is going against the commitment made by the Prime Minister on Tuesday that his government would respect Quebec's election law and that his attack is petty and contradicts what the Prime Minister promised, a petty attack against the Chief Electoral Officer who, as you will agree, oversees a fundamentally important institution in the democratic life of Quebec?

The Speaker: I am sorry but in my opinion this question does not deal with the purely administrative functions of the minister who is here. I think the question is out of order. If the hon. member has another question, would he please ask it?

Mr. de Savoye: I have already asked two questions. Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister had been here, I would have been happy to ask him a question, but he is not here.

RWANDA

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs and it concerns Rwanda.

Canada's reputation in Africa is very good. Therefore, why not use our good offices with international institutions, particularly the Organization of African Unity, to establish a humanitarian corridor and allow the 20,000 people currently stranded in Kigali to leave and seek refuge in Tanzania, until the situation stabilizes and the slaughter ends?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs): Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to answer a question which concerns my department and which is asked pursuant to the rules of this House.

I want to confirm to the hon. member that our official in Addis–Abeba made representations to the Organization of African Unity, asking it to get more involved in finding ways to help a population decimated by this totally unacceptable civil war.

I can assure the hon. member that Canada is prepared to participate in a humanitarian mission in that part of the world, which needs it badly.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

Four years ago a young offender by the name of Danny Perrault was convicted of manslaughter in youth court and received a three–year sentence. Last year he was transferred to minimum security in an adult provincial institute to serve a sentence for being unlawfully at large from the youth detention centre.

Mr. Perrault walked away from the minimum security facility and before being arrested he committed a brutal sexual assault. Earlier this year he received a 14–year sentence for that crime, which he is appealing on the grounds the judge gave undue consideration to the protection of society.

Will the minister send an unequivocal message to the Canadian legal profession, as well as to the Canadian public, that the protection of society is a primary concern of the criminal justice system?

● (1455)

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, there are three points in response.

First, as the hon. member knows, because I have said as much in the House, we propose to bring forward specific changes to the Young Offenders Act within the coming weeks as we undertook to do during the election campaign in order to deal more effectively with crimes of serious violence. The steps we will propose will be intended in great part to meet the concerns addressed by the hon. member in her question.

Second, as to the facts of the specific case, I ask the hon. member to bear in mind that while that issue is raised in the appeal, the statute as it exists at present provides expressly that protection of society is one of the governing principles of the Young Offenders Act and is to be taken into account.

Third, we do not think for a moment that violent crime is going to be resolved in this society by tinkering with statutes or changing acts. The fact of the matter is that the criminal justice system itself is not going to end violent crime. It only deals with the consequence of underlying social problems. It is crime prevention that must have at least the equal focus of the House of Commons.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Solicitor General.

It was recently reported that despite the fact Danny Perrault has twice terrorized the greater Vancouver area by being unlawfully at large, current parole legislation would permit him to go on unescorted day parole as early as December this year.

Is the minister prepared to change the parole legislation to ensure the Canadian public that protection of society is a primary concern of the criminal justice system?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated to the House and to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs that I intend to bring forward legislation very soon to update the parole system and the correction system in light of a number of public concerns.

In that connection I want to confirm what I have already said: The priority will continue to be the protection of the public.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, I will address my question to the Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec on the off-chance that he will have something to say today.

The government, which told us yesterday that it has already spent $6 million on studies regarding the high-speed train, is hiding behind some future study to avoid taking position on the HST project, or even approving it in principle. The government showed its lack of interest in VIA Rail's proposal.

How can the government, which claims to make job creation a priority, show so little interest in a major project that could create some 120,000 jobs in a high technology sector?

[English]

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the member's question with regard to VIA, yesterday the Prime Minister as well as the Minister of Transport indicated to the House that the $6 million report that is awaited and being done by three levels of government, the Quebec, Ontario and federal governments, is due some time this summer.

At that point the government will study the opportunities and the alternatives available to it to look at the very intriguing project of high speed rail.

We are not discarding anything, but it would be premature to say anything at this point until such time as the study was complete. Then we would be willing to work with all members of the House to see whether or not it is viable and feasible for the country.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, that is what you get for trying too hard.

Will the Prime Minister recognize that the HST project, considering the type of equipment required and the type of jobs created, fits perfectly in a strategy for the reconversion of the military industry, which is a commitment made by the Liberal Party in its red book and that is yet to be fulfilled?

• (1500)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the Bloc Quebecois constantly talks about the need to co-operate with the provinces. The high speed train is a project we are looking at closely with the governments of Quebec and Ontario, and this is why these studies are necessary. Consequently, if we are to follow the advice of the Bloc, we should wait for the results of the studies and review these very carefully. As the member for Windsor, I can assure you that I have a real interest in this issue.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Human Resources Development.

It was reported in the Globe and Mail that the government paid out $440 million in unemployment insurance benefits due to fraud, abuse and mistakes in 1993. An internal investigation and control audit identified a study which pointed to a better focus on who abuses UI, but the use of this focus was prohibited because it contravened the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Will the parliamentary secretary confirm that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which was set up to protect law abiding Canadians from abuse by government, is once again being used to protect criminals at the expense of ordinary and law abiding Canadian citizens?

Hon. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Secretary of State (Training and Youth)): Mr. Speaker, as you well know the people on this side of the House are the architects of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and we have a great deal of respect for the charter. Everything that the government undertakes does reflect that.

In reply to the question, that is a very specific question on which the minister has taken action. Of course everything we do upholds the charter. The full weight of the charter stands.

The Speaker: My colleagues, I have notice of two questions of privilege which I am going to hear.

I would appeal to all members in putting forth their points of privilege to be reminded that privilege is very narrow in scope. I would ask hon. members to identify the point of privilege which has in some way been impeded so that I might get a better idea of just what is the point.

I go first to the hon. Minister of Foreign Affairs on a point of privilege

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I fully understand your desire to ensure that all members of this House enjoy the same privileges. I raise this question because I believe my privileges as a member of this House were breached during Question Period.

As House Leader for the Official Opposition, the member for Roberval should be familiar with the Standing Orders and should know that these prevail during Question Period. The fact that he would put questions to a minister concerning a field for which he is not responsible is not, in itself, an abuse of his right to ask questions since another minister, the responsible minister, may answer the question.

Where I feel my privileges were breached during Question Period, and I would think the same was true for the Minister of Finance, was not when opposition members rose and put questions to us, knowing full well that we could not answer them because they were not related to our ministerial responsibilities. Other ministers simply took it upon themselves to answer the questions.

I feel my privileges were breached when, in the preamble to their questions, both the member for Roberval and the member for Laurier—Sainte–Marie made some gratuitous statements to the effect that as a member and a minister from the province of Quebec, I was avoiding answering the question and leaving this task up to another minister from the province of Ontario.

It is totally unacceptable to allege dereliction of duty on the part of a member of this House. By making such an allegation, the members for Roberval and Laurier—Sainte–Marie were hoping to cast in a negative light my work as a minister and as a member of this House who defends the interests of his constituents.

In conclusion, I ask that you reflect upon this situation and review the questions put earlier by the opposition. I think it is important that you check the blues. As the saying goes, when you lie long enough, the lie becomes the truth.

The Speaker: I will certainly reread the blues and Hansard.

Some hon. members: And the newspapers.

The Speaker: Order.

I will take this matter under advisement and get back to the House with—

Some hon. members: Good.

The Speaker: Order.

I will check Hansard and get back to the House with my ruling tomorrow.

The hon. member for Roberval on a question of privilege.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of privilege and a point of order.

If I may, I will start with the point of order since it is directly related to what has just been said.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to have your opinion, which is part of your mandate, because my colleague raised the question of privilege in reference to comments made by a government minister. I admit that he may not have been speaking about something which falls within his area of responsibility but that is not my problem. I can question as I see fit, and my colleagues can also question any comment made by a member of the government because they are supposed to act responsibly. If they do not, that is a different problem.

I would like you, Mr. Speaker, to rule on this, and take the time to do the necessary research, so we can know whether the Opposition is allowed to question in accordance with Standing Orders any member of the government who has made a public statement, even if this statement is not directly related to his or her department.

I would like to have your opinion on this at your convenience and, if I may, I will now move on to my question of privilege.

The Speaker: I will make enquiries. I will get back to the House and give you my opinion.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, the breach of privilege committed in this House has to do with the industry minister's comments, which I find totally unparliamentary, unworthy of this House and unacceptable. In his comments, the minister tried or seemed to criticize my attitude or the way I phrased the question or the way in which he perceived me.

• (1510)

I find it totally unacceptable that, within the framework of the parliamentary game, a government minister's only way of defending himself against the verbal jousting and the questions asked in this House is to try to humiliate, discredit and or be rude to a member of this Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell you that, as the Opposition House leader, I think that the Minister of Industry has violated these privileges and I demand that he withdraw his comments without further ado. That is what I demand.

The Speaker: As you know, I do not remember everything that has been said today but, for my colleagues, I will certainly go over what was said in context. I will take the request of the hon. member for Roberval into consideration and get back to the House with my decision.

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I would like to give a short response.

[English]

There are many traditions in this House. You, Mr. Speaker, are the master of the rules of this House and you rule. I do not think this is a point of privilege but perhaps a point of order that is being made.

Surely we deprive this House of a great deal if it becomes inappropriate for a member of Parliament to recall a famous quotation from the Bard himself in response to a situation that arises.

The Speaker: I will take under advisement the interventions of members of both sides. I am not sure we have a point of privilege but I will treat it as either a point of privilege or point of information.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, unlike the minister, we do not want to make it into a cultural issue. This is about the privileges of the hon. member for Roberval. On the subject of culture, I could quote Confucius who said something along the line of culture is like jam; the less you have, the more you spread it.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: Order, please. At this rate we are going to start singing songs.

MEMBERS STATEMENTS

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, yesterday under Standing Order 31, Statements by Members, I talked about a new federal building of 120,000 square feet. I would like to correct the record. The correct number is 40,000 square feet. In my metric conversion I cubed rather than squared.

The Speaker: Your point of order will be corrected in Hansard.

The question on business of the House. The hon. House leader. First we need to have a question and then we are going to have an answer.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, before you recognized me to I could put that question, I indicated to you that I would have a previous question. It is a simple inquiry about the question of privilege I have raised.

I just wanted to ask you—and it is perfectly in order—if, after ascertaining what words were spoken by the Minister of Industry, you found that the minister had indeed exceeded his rights as a parliamentarian and made unspeakable remarks, I just wanted to know if you will then ask that he withdraw his remarks, as I have requested?

• (1515)

The Speaker: As I said earlier, I will review the matter because I do not remember the exact words.

If unparliamentary language was used, I will then make a decision based on this review.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my hon. colleague, the government house leader, what the business of the House will be for the days to come.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, in giving the weekly business statement I want to assure all colleagues and you that I will not say a word about the subject of culture.

Tomorrow the House will resume consideration of second reading of Bill C–22 regarding Pearson airport. If that is completed we will continue with second reading of Bill C–16 respecting the Sahtu agreement.

If on Friday we have completed second reading of Bill C–22 and C–16, only then on Monday will we consider second reading stages of Bill C–23 regarding the Migratory Birds Act, Bill C–24 respecting the Wildlife Act and Bill C–12 regarding the Canada Business Corporations Act.

Tuesday, May 3 and Thursday, May 5 shall be opposition days. On Wednesday the House will resume debates that have already been commenced. I want to consult with my colleagues opposite about this business at our regular weekly meeting of House leaders next week.

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise in the House this afternoon to speak against the motion by the hon. member for Québec–Est.

Part of that motion talks about the government's lack of action in the agricultural sector. I find this an insult to our agricultural sector. I do not believe that farmers have the intention of coming here with their hands out looking for favours from our government.

I would like to talk about my riding, the riding of Durham, which is a large agricultural sector. It includes Uxbridge, Scugog township, Bowmanville and Orono. These places are well known for their agricultural background and indeed not only in the riding but throughout Canada. They show their cattle at the local royal agricultural fair and compete with some farmers from Quebec.

In my riding agriculture is the second largest industry, second only to General Motors.

My years of living with these people and acting as an adviser to them and farming myself has taught me of their great independence and integrity. They do not depend on government to run their local every day operations. Today I am sure that many are out on the land cultivating and preparing for their spring crops.

What is the role of government and how does it interact with our farming community? What has the government actually done to foster this development?

I would like to talk about three basic areas. One is trade. As some will know, we have just recently culminated our trade negotiations in GATT in which we have had a change in our system from the supply management system to a tariffication system. We spent a great many days and hours in this House debating these negotiations. Indeed, our agriculture department has been involved on an hourly basis dealing with this.

● (1520)

This even continues after the culmination of GATT as we try to get side agreements with the Americans dealing with some of our problems with durum wheat and so forth. In fact, the government has been committed to representing the interests of farmers. I can assure members that the farmers in my riding that I have talked to are indeed happy and proud that our government has stood up for their interests. They realize they did not get everything they wanted from the GATT negotiations.

Having said that, I go back to my original premise. They are proud and independent people. They look at the GATT negotiations and the new trade opportunities as great challenges for Canadian farmers. They look at things like NAFTA and new markets created both in the United States and now in Mexico.

Only last week a number of farmers attended at my office. Their promotion was not that they were upset with the actions of the government, indeed not. They wanted to attend a trade negotiation in South America. They wanted to find out more about bean farmers in South America. I am happy to say that I transferred those comments to the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food who is considering this.

Another of these farmers had realized the great opportunities presented by the North American market and developed a food processing plant. Many of the farmers in the area got together to support this. This production facility which basically fast freezes vegetables ships 100 per cent of its output into the American market. These are great opportunities that our farmers are realizing.

I would like to speak of another area to do with research and development and our government's commitment to Canadian farmers in the areas of research and development. Our ability to innovate depends on a commitment to research. Agri–food research has produced some exceptional economic gains for Canada.

Perhaps the best example is the development of canola. From humble origins as rapeseed grown during the Second World War to produce a marine lubricant, canola has become one of our most important export crops worth almost a billion dollars.

The Cinderella story of canola is well known but it is still worth noting that researchers at Agri–Food Canada used selective breeding to reduce or eliminate undesirable aspects of the oil and produced a high quality oil substitute for human consumption.

There are many other good examples of innovative thinking in agri–research. For instance the research centre in Lennoxville, Quebec has adapted a technology that helps detect a generic mutation in pork that reduces quality. This technology will help pork producers sell their products into lucrative markets but also very selective markets in Asia.

I should interject at this point to note that as we stand here the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food is in southeast Asia promoting new markets for Canadian agricultural producers. I am proud to say that I have taken some of those initiatives to heart in my own riding and suggested to some of our dairy producers who export cattle around the world that they should also be focusing on southeast Asia.

Furthermore, I would like to mention that CIDA has an agricultural dairy operation testing in southern China at this very moment. We hope that some of the benefits that will flow out of that are increased cattle production and shipment to China.

Carrying on with research and development, the Saskatoon Research Centre has developed a new type of sunflower called sunola that is heat and drought resistant. This crop can be grown further north than regular sunflowers and produces a healthier oil. Contract production began in Saskatchewan in 1993 on about 100,000 acres.

The department is also a major player in the development and application of biotechnologies like natural pest controls for the improvement of agriculture and agri–food products.

In these times of fiscal restraint expanding our budget for agri–food R and D is just not possible. But the minister has made a firm commitment to maintain current research funding levels by absorbing administrative costs in other parts of his department.

• (1525)

At the same time the department is ensuring that research priorities are driven by market opportunities. Better focused R and D is critical to global competitiveness and economic growth. It is now increasingly important for us to develop low cost processes and the new products we need to capture new markets. The future holds great opportunities and potential gains for biotechnology and from value added non–food products such as ethanol.

Canada is not alone in this field. Our agri–food sector has a lot of competitors. While Canada has a strong record on public investment and R and D our competitors invest more overall, that is public and private sector research and development, than we do.

The main challenges the government faces are to keep R and D funding at least at current levels to ensure that research priorities are driven by market opportunities, to stimulate industry investment, to look into ways of increasing the accessibility of venture capital for new products and development, to ensure that the right technologies get to the right people as quickly as possible.

R and D unlike other expenditures cannot be turned off like a tap. It requires careful planning. Because of inadequate support for research in the past, Canada has already missed the advantages of leadership in some areas. They will change policies that act as disincentives to the private sector in investment in agri–food technologies.

I would like to go on to a further section and that is to deal with our taxation policies. In Canada we have a very favourable tax policy toward farmers. It is called cash basis accounting. It means that you can buy cattle and so forth and write them off for tax purposes. This has existed in Canada and indeed Quebec for many years. It allows our farmers to build up big inventories of cattle and livestock without paying any income tax. This program of course is being continued by our government.

I look also toward the last budget. There was much talk about losing the $500,000 exemption for farmers. I am proud to say that our finance minister has listened very well to the needs and concerns of farmers and kept this in place.

I note also that we are debating through the finance committee, of which I am a member, the GST. One of our major concerns is to reduce and to avoid taxing farmers and try to make that tax simpler for farmers so that they do not have to get involved with the accounting and so forth for it.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, almost everything the government has done has been for the best interest in advancing the best interests of farmers.

I would like to go back to where I started and that is that this motion is inconsistent and makes farmers feel they have to be dependent on government for everything. This is just not the case and it is unworthy of Canadian farmers.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's remarks. Today's motion does not really deal with research and development in Canada, but with the department of agriculture's lack of spine, its lack of leadership, and the lack of direction in agriculture.

It is quite true that in the R and D sector, scientists across Canada are making all kinds of discoveries, and that is good. Developments regarding new varieties of wheat and seeds are desirable. As a matter of fact, we would like the government to find more funds to support R and D. As the hon. member mentioned, the opening of new markets depends first and foremost on R and D.

The government is lacking initiative even when it comes to R and D, the member admitted it himself; investments in that area have been frozen. If it really had the interests of farmers at heart, the government could at leat increase its funding of R and D for agriculture. I repeat, the motion does not deal with Canadian R and D, but with the government's lack of leadership and initiative. We could give you many examples of this lack of initiative such as the negotiations with the United States for which some Liberal members tell us that the government has taken a tough stand, when we know that in fact they are completely caving in.

• (1530)

[English]

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his comments. I am as sure as we breathe here today that Agriculture Canada is undertaking research and development. The hon. member is probably correct in the sense that we cannot increase funding and many aspects of our government have been curtailed. That is just the way it is.

I can assure the member that research and development continues as we breathe today. Indeed I find it very hard to accept this concept of lack of initiative. As we stand here the minister of agriculture is in southeast Asia promoting new markets for agriculture in Canada. It seems unbelievable that the member would think this way.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my distinguished colleague across the way who just gave us this very excellent discourse is an accountant by profession. Obviously he knows how to count things well and proper.

I wonder how he can reconcile for me the Bloc Quebecois policy whereby on the one hand it is saying today that we must reduce the number of specialists in agriculture and hire—as the member for Quebec–Est said this morning—more farmers to be in the agriculture department. A couple of hours later it was saying hire more scientists in agriculture, which is the opposite of the previous argument.

I wonder if he can also tell us what he thinks as an accountant of a party that asks us to decrease overall budgetary expenditures and at the same time today is telling us that we are not spending enough.

Can he reconcile that kind of accounting for us, because I am having some difficulty. Perhaps the professional judgment of my colleague across can help us understand this Bloc Quebecois modern math.

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. Of course I do not know if the math in Quebec is different from that in the rest of Canada. It appears that perhaps it is.

I do not know how it balances things from one hand to the other. It seems that it lives in a different world than we do. It must be a great place to be, it must be a tremendous fairy land in some ways where you can have your cake and eat it too constantly. I find that very hard to believe. I think we have to have a more honest approach to these problems. I am sure farmers in all of Canada want a more honest approach.

Mr. Charlie Penson (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I certainly welcome this opportunity to speak on this very important issue of agriculture.

My family and I are actively involved in operating a 1,100 acre grain farm in northern Alberta and so agriculture is very near and dear to my heart. Agriculture is important to my riding of Peace River as well because it is a very large industry. No one has any doubt that agriculture is crucial to Canada.

Although Canadian farmers have been hard hit with a trade war that has lasted many years, in 1992 alone we still managed to export over $12 billion of agriculture commodities. Wheat and other cereals are our leading exports, with principal destinations being China, Korea and Japan. Live animals, meat and meat products are also important, with exports bound for the United States and Japan. Oilseeds, mostly canola, go mostly to Japan in raw form and to the United States in the form of processed oil.

In 1991 a total of 867,000 people resided on farms in Canada and total receipts from those farming operations came to $23 billion. We also know that agriculture has one of the highest spinoffs in terms of job creation.

Today we are being asked to condemn this government for its inaction with respect to the agriculture sector which is presently being confronted with the largest restructuring it has faced in the last 30 years.

• (1535)

Restructuring is something that agriculture and farmers are familiar with and has happened since Canada has been inhabited. My response to this question is yes, the government can do more. However, in the area of trade we have made a very good start even though it is only a start.

Canada is a trading nation. One out of every four jobs in this country can be linked to trade. Therefore we must push for trade liberalization both at home and abroad. This means moving beyond what has been negotiated at the first phase of GATT. We must work within the World Trade Organization to lower remaining trade barriers at a faster pace so that those sectors that have natural advantages can compete and win markets without the support of the treasuries of those countries.

We welcome the agricultural trade rules that GATT has brought us. Let us examine some of those rules.

Number one, overall tariffs on agriculture goods will be reduced by 36 per cent with a minimum reduction of 15 per cent for each specific product. Implementation will take place between 1995 and the year 2000 in six equal annual steps.

Number two, countries will be compelled to reduce internal support of their agricultural industries by up to 20 per cent over six years where such support has the effect of distorting trade. Countries will be committed to reducing export subsidy expenditures by 36 per cent and reducing the volume of subsidized exports by 21 per cent over the next six years.

Supply managed products will now be subject to tariff barriers instead of quota restrictions. It is true that the supply managed sectors need protection for a time to adjust to the free market conditions. I would think that 10 years should be quite enough time for that adjustment process to take place.

It was evident at the GATT negotiations that Canada had no support for article XI. The world has moved beyond that. We are looking for liberalized trade throughout the world and Canada simply could not sustain any argument for article XI support.

My concern is that having set our tariffs for certain products at excessively high levels, we are inviting challenges from our trading partners. Let me give members a run through on a quick list. We have set our tariffs on eggs at 192 per cent; yogurt, 279 per cent; chicken, 280 per cent; milk, 283 per cent; ice cream, 326 per cent; and butter, 351 per cent.

I would like to elaborate a little on that last tariff. The domestic price of butter in the United States is $1.54 per kilogram. Once transportation and the 351 per cent tariff are added and the American dollar is converted to Canadian, that same kilogram of butter will cost $10.15 in Canada. That compares with the Canadian support price of $5.32.

The tariff makes American butter almost twice the price of Canadian butter. Is this not overkill? Is this not a reeling example of overtariffication? Obviously the tariff is way out of line. It is obvious we will not see any trade in butter for many years to come. Yes, let us help the supply managed sector move toward becoming a self–sustaining industry but let us be fair and not jeopardize the trading opportunities of those agriculture sectors that are competitive by suggesting blatantly high tariff rates for dairy and poultry products.

I suspect the true test of these high tariffs may come from our own Canadian consumers. Why should they stand for excessively high prices? Furthermore, high tariffs seem to be a contradiction to the spirit of the North American free trade agreement whose benefits Canadian consumers are eagerly awaiting.

I would like to talk a bit about the grain industry which I believe will see slow but steady improvement. Here we must push for a faster action to reduce overproduction, subsidies and import quotas worldwide. As an example, western durum wheat farmers are now facing restrictive import quotas from the Americans who accuse us of subsidizing our wheat exports.

• (1540)

The truth is that on four separate occasions a binational panel has dismissed these allegations by the United States. It is the American's own export enhancement program which encourages exports of Canadian wheat to other countries which is at fault. This program has left the Americans with shortages which Canadian wheat fills. Now American farmers are crying that Canadian grain has filled their terminals.

This is the exact type of program that has so devastated the agriculture industries in countries like Australia, Argentina and Canada that had the small treasuries and cannot back their farmers up to the degree that they do in Europe and the United States.

I believe governments must move quickly to free trade. Otherwise the initial optimism of the GATT signing will be lost. The big challenge for the new World Trade Organization which replaces the GATT in January will be to define what happens at the end of the first six years. I say that our goals should be to strive for a no subsidies, no trade barrier situation in a total time frame of 10 years.

Unfortunately there is no time to address other important issues in detail. I know that my colleagues here are going to be speaking about some of those issues, although I do want to touch on them briefly.

However, we have to have a responsive, deregulated transportation system in Canada. I also believe the Canadian Wheat Board should have a democratically elected board of governors and a system that is market driven.

Canadian farmers are hard working, proud people who would rather receive their income from the marketplace than from government subsidies. Our farmers offer the Canadian public a quality product and the security of a reasonably priced food. Canadian farmers have a worldwide reputation for supplying quality products.

What do farmers want from our government? They expect protection from unfair trade practices of our competitors. They want the protection of fair trade rules throughout the world. They want our government to push to reduce subsidies worldwide so that they can benefit from free trade. They want governments to live within their means which will lead to lower taxes and lower input costs. Finally, they want governments to reduce regulations and unnecessary programs.

I believe Canadian farmers can compete anywhere in the world, given a fair opportunity. I believe our Canadian farmers will adapt and prosper under the new trade environment. I believe they do not need more than 10 years to make these necessary adjustments.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed the hon. member's remarks but I have questions on two issues that he raised.

One is the deregulation of transportation which he has been advocating. I wonder what the arguments are in favour of doing that given our experience this past crop year in shipping into a deregulated market, namely the United States which is relatively deregulated in transport. Our hopper cars hauling wheat and durum into the United States have a turnaround time of something in the order of 40 days or more before they are dumped and returned in a deregulated system. In Canada under regulation the turnaround time is 13 to 15 days.

I wonder if he would comment on the advantages of deregulation given that experience. Would he also explain a little further why he was so critical of the proposed high tariffs on butter and dairy products between ourselves and the United States and other countries. In reality most of the likely trade in dairy products will be between Canada and the United States.

Given the fact that it is impossible for us to export anything into the United States by way of dairy products, the reality is that its tariffs will be as high or higher than ours given that it has had a GATT waiver all these years on dairy products.

• (1545)

This is one of the reasons that Canada was very loathe to implement the GATT ruling that the U.S. got prior to these last negotiations forcing us to open our markets to its yogurt and ice cream. The facts of the situation are that if we had opened the border we could have bought ice cream and yogurt, put it in the freezer or fridge of our motorhome in order to go down to Arizona and hit the border only to find that we could not take those American products into the United States because it was absolutely illegal to take dairy products the other way.

I wonder if the member would tell us about deregulation and if he does not recognize that there may be some fairness to the high tariffs on dairy products.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The member for Mackenzie has put his 14 years of experience to good use today and I would ask the member for Peace River to reply.

Mr. Penson: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the member for Mackenzie for those questions.

First of all I believe that deregulation in the transportation industry is necessary. We have to have a very practical solution to movement of products. They should move by whatever method is the cheapest form and they should move in whatever route is the most direct and cheapest.

I think when he talked about the hopper cars going into the United States and the turnaround time, part of the reason for that is the very regulated system we have with the crow rate where we have seen grain going as far out as Thunder Bay and then back into Saskatchewan and crossing the border. That does not make any sense at all.

I believe we have to look at practical solutions to problems so that Canadians can face the reality of the nineties and adapt to the new trade environment.

In terms of high tariffs and why I am critical of the high tariffs, I believe these tariffs are put in place as an adjustment process to let our industries adapt over a reasonable period of time from a system of supply management with a lot of regulation to free trade. I think that can be done fairly quickly. These tariffs are set probably high on both sides of the border, but that does not excuse either side.

It is in our interests when we have just signed a trade deal with the United States and Mexico that says we want to move to free trade among all three countries in a short period of time to phase these out very quickly.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege and a very great interest of mine to be involved in a discussion in this House on agricultural issues.

Coming from the riding of Kindersley—Lloydminster where most of us make our livelihood either directly or indirectly from agriculture, myself included, I feel it is a very important issue and I appreciate the chance to speak to it. I have chosen to address the problems that many farmers face in the marketing of their produce and the federal agency responsible for prairie grain marketing, the Canadian Wheat Board.

The Canadian Wheat Board should more appropriately be called the prairie wheat board, as its mandate limits the board's activity to the three prairie provinces and a small part of British Columbia in the Peace River area. There is a similar organization in Ontario called the Ontario Wheat Board. I find it is one of the best kept secrets across the prairies that in fact the Canadian Wheat Board is not a national board but a regional board. Many producers I am finding in my part of the world did not even realize there was an Ontario Wheat Board.

This Ontario Wheat Board is rather interesting. It was established in 1958 by a vote of Ontario wheat producers. It operates under the authority of the Ontario Farm Products Marketing Act. There are 18,000 wheat producers in Ontario and the Ontario board is run by 10 directors who are elected by the producers. The board operates on a one producer, one vote system. Each of the 10 directors represents a geographic district within the province. Each district elects one delegate to the annual meeting for each 250 producers within that district. The directors are then elected from among those delegates.

The Canadian Wheat Board on the other hand has 137,000 producers or permit book holders, compared with the 18,000 farmers who control the Ontario board. Many opponents of a producer control system claim that the government will not guarantee initial prices for a depoliticized organization like the Ontario Wheat Board.

However, the realities are that the initial payments are guaranteed for both the Canadian Wheat Board and the Ontario Wheat Board.

• (1550)

The wheat board act limits the Canadian Wheat Board's activities to wheat and barley grown for human consumption. The Ontario Wheat Board is mandated by statute to limit its activities to wheat production and marketing within the province of Ontario. This demonstrates that there are some differences and some similarities in the scope and the influence of a producer directed organization compared with one which is government run.

The single biggest difference between the two is that the Ontario Wheat Board is democratic and the Canadian Wheat Board is run by a panel of three to five commissioners who are appointed by the governor in council. This means that the minister is usually the one who recommends the names.

The Canadian Wheat Board is a crown corporation and its commissioners are political appointees. Nevertheless, producers pay for all of the operations of the board through the amount subtracted from the final payments for the producer's grain. In fact, most agriculture marketing agencies, including those in the supply managed sector, include producers in the decision making and managerial process. The Canadian Wheat Board is the odd man out, being a top down, government run corporation.

Many farmers in western Canada are not happy with the actions of the Canadian Wheat Board and the way it is run. Far too much time and energy is spent in all places, from the courts to the coffee shops, trying to determine what the powers of the board should be, what commodities should be added or left out of the wheat board's mandate, should farmers be selling their grain on a contract basis or under the quota system or both, and in that case what proportion for each.

There is much discussion about the board's monopoly power versus the principle of marketing options. Perhaps one of the biggest irritants today is the wheat board's involvement in grain car allocation. My hon. colleague from Lisgar—Marquette discussed that situation from the aspect of the western grain transportation authority as well. There are many fingers in the pot here. It seems like the end result is that the service is not very good.

What sticks in the craw of so many producers is that these complex issues to which there are no easy solutions require solutions, but the producers have no substantial say as to how these problems are to be solved.

Another great disadvantage to the Canadian Wheat Board being an arm of the government is the way that new wheat prices or final payments or price changes are announced. It was common in years past for ministers of agriculture to play politics with the announcement of either price increases or decreases. Farmers were used as pawns, waiting for the right kind of announcement so that the minister could get as much political mileage or minimize the political fallout from grain price announcements.

We as Reformers have been quite clear on the direction of marketing reforms. It is paramount that the Canadian Wheat Board be democratised. It must be accountable to the producers it serves and producers must have the ability to change or update the mandate of the board when they feel their interests could be better served.

Producers must have control over how their grain is marketed. We must remember that it is after all their grain. If producers decide through a democratic process that the mandate of the board should be expanded to cover other grains and oilseeds then the act should be changed to respect the wishes of producers. If this is done they may choose to provide opting out provisions for niche markets. The purchase of grains on a cash or pool basis might be considered to improve current marketing arrangements. We would like to see the expansion of producer contracts if farmers so desire.

Once the board is democratised the decision will be up to producers to make, but we feel that the Canadian Wheat Board should maintain its responsibility for initial payment shortfalls. Government loan guarantees for export sales should also be continued for as long as other nations do the same.

We have a responsibility to recognize that change is required because present realities in the agriculture industry are different from when the Canadian Wheat Board was brought into existence.

My father was a pioneer. When he first delivered his wheat he had to hitch up a wagon and a team of horses and haul that wheat 26 miles to a small community called Waldeck, Saskatchewan. When he got there he did not know what the price was going to be He did not know what the grade of that grain was going to be. There was a requirement for change in the way our products were marketed and we saw improvements to the system which enabled him to have some protection in the marketing of his product.

Today's situation is different with modern transportation and modern communications. In fact, we cannot maintain a system that was intended for 30, 40, 50 years ago. We must be prepared to look to new and innovative means of marketing our products.

• (1555)

We know from the Ontario example that a producer controlled system is possible. That particular organizational model may or may not fit on the prairies, but I feel that the principle of a producer directed process does. If we give farmers the chance to design, control and continually update their marketing system a much more effective, fair and cost efficient Canadian Wheat Board would result. As legislators we would give it the freedom to act.

In conclusion, I would like to express my appreciation for this time being allotted for a discussion of agriculture. The government seems to have put a very low priority on agricultural issues. On behalf of all the farmers of Kindersley—Lloydminster and all of Saskatchewan, I am grateful for the opportunity to try and solve some of the very important issues facing rural Canada.

Mr. Wayne Easter (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am having difficulty sorting out where the hon. member is coming from relative to the Canadian Wheat Board. There is no question that this government showed leadership during the campaign and since the campaign.

I would quote out of the red book what we said on the Canadian Wheat Board and that is what we were elected on: "Canada's agri–food industry needs policies and programs such as supply management, the Canadian Wheat Board and stabilization programs to minimize the impact of market price fluctuations".

We ran on a campaign of strong support for the wheat board and we are continuing to show that. I recognize there is a debate taking place in the west. I have been inundated lately with petitions asking to strengthen the Canadian Wheat Board and expand its powers.

The member wants some components of the wheat board it seems, but not its all. I am wondering if he has anything to comment on in terms of the Canadian Wheat Board advisory committee. The Canadian Wheat Board advisory committee is the legitimate, elected producers who act in an advisory capacity to the wheat board. Clearly, during the last election eight of the eleven were very strong, orderly marketers.

I am wondering what the member's thoughts are relative to the Canadian Wheat Board advisory which is calling for us to maintain the powers of the wheat board, that it is the sole seller of export wheat and barley.

Mr. Hermanson: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to respond to the hon. member for Malpeque. I feel some affinity knowing that he also has provided for his livelihood. He also chews gum like I do and he forgets to do up his jacket like I do. I do feel some affinity for the hon. member.

I am also very happy to respond to his question because I think living in western Canada I am closer to some of the issues that he is talking about. I would like to just remind the hon. member that you cannot have it both ways. I know that his government was committed to a referendum or a producer vote of whether there should be a continental barley market. I favoured that when he favoured it. That was before the decision was made that there not be a continental barley market.

The hon. member and his government have changed their minds since the court ruling has been reversed. In fact, the continental barley market was ruled illegal. I have not changed my mind. Neither has my party. We still believe that producers should be in the driver's seat and make these decisions.

The hon. member on the other side is saying that as long as things are going the way my personal philosophy dictates, I am happy to put producers in the driver's seat. But as soon as my own views and the views of producers begin to differ, then I want to have control. I want to politicize this thing. I do not want to let go of the administrative control of the Canadian Wheat Board.

I am saying to the hon. member that he cannot have it both ways. You are either going to trust producers or you are not going to trust them.

I would also tell the hon. member that I spoke recently to an organization with which I know he is quite well acquainted, the local chapter of the National Farmers Union. We discussed the advisory council and it was of the same opinion as I am. In fact, this advisory board is a rather useless organization because it has no impact whatsoever as long as the wheat board is controlled by the Government of Canada and the political process rather than the producer, grassroots, bottom up process.

• (1600)

I thank the hon. member for his questions. I hope I have shed a little light on where we are coming from on this side of the House in trying to solve the problems of producers by trusting them rather than taking over the decision making process from them.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate. I want to draw the attention of this House to the policy and initiatives of the government regarding an important sector of the Canadian economy. I am referring to the agricultural and agri–food industry. More specifically, I want to talk about the dairy, poultry and pork industries, for which quotas are in place.

Mr. Speaker, as the member representing the riding next to mine, I am sure you will agree on the importance of quotas in the agricultural sector.

The main objective of the Liberal government's agricultural policy is food security for Canadians and decent revenues for all our farmers. Supply management, which is a system put in place by a Liberal government almost a quarter of a century ago, confirms the merits and the success of this policy.

You all remember former Liberal minister Eugene Whelan. I know that the hon. member for Québec–Est knew him well, because I think that at one time he worked in his office. Mr. Whelan's daughter is now a member of this House and she also does a very good job of representing the interests of farmers, as do the hon. members for Haldimand—Norfolk and Prince Edward—Hastings, and also the minister of agriculture.

As I said, in the early seventies, the Liberal government of the time put in place regulated marketing programs for the dairy, poultry and pork industries. This system is based on two basic principles: domestic production quotas and, of course, efficient control over imports to protect the quotas.

Supply management stabilized farmers' revenues, and ensured the supply of top quality and healthy food products to Canadians, while also providing an important regional economic development tool.

For the benefit of opposition members I would like to mention again the considerable accomplishments of this government regarding supply management. Less than six weeks after being elected, the government had already negotiated an agreement under GATT which is acceptable to the agricultural sector, and which ensures that supply management will enable us to meet the challenges ahead and take advantage of the opportunities provided by GATT. This is what we call effective and concerted action.

I would like to quote from an article written by Mr. Pierre Glaude and published in the December 20, 1993 issue of Agricom, a newspaper in my riding: "The goal is the same", said the new chairman of the Union des producteurs agricoles du Québec, Mr. Laurent Pellerin, "only the means to reach it have changed. The organization is trying to reassure its members. Under the new GATT agreement, supply management programs will be maintained through tariffs".

In other words, contrary to what some members opposite have said, the spokespersons for the Quebec agricultural community consider that the measures taken by our government were successful in protecting our quotas.

Not only in Quebec do farmers and their representatives make such statements. In my riding, people agree. Representatives of the farm industry maintain that the new tariffs will protect our quota systems.

This may be the best argument I could use to show how much Canadian farmers still have confidence in our quota system and why members opposite should not try to undermine that. The confidence of our farmers is what enables us to maintain the value of our quotas. Quotas have increased in value since the GATT accord was signed. What does this tell us? It tells us that the agricultural community is confident and takes position that supply management will be around for a long time. After all, people do not buy quotas, and certainly not on credit, when they expect these quotas be phased out very shortly. The agricultural community believes, as we do, that quotas will be around for a long time and will be protected by the new tariffs negotiated with other countries.

• (1605)

Speaking of tariffs, I have here, as I mentioned it this morning, a list of the tariffs tabled by our government at GATT, and I want to point out that the United States raised no objections to these tariffs. We must have tabled hundreds of pages of agricultural tariffs in Marrakesh, but no objections were raised by the United States. In the dairy sector, tariffs of around 300 per cent were mentioned, and I disagree with the way the Reform Party Member calculated the price of those tariffs. In any case, these tariffs will be reduced by 15 per cent over a period of six years, not 15 per cent annually but 15 per cent over six years.

In the Liberal red book, and especially in the policy paper on agriculture, the government was committed to staunchly defending our supply management programs at the GATT negotiations. That is what the Liberal government did, and it succeeded. It managed to obtain a tariff system under which we will be able to maintain our marketing boards and supply management and everything that entails. As a result, the impact of fluctuating prices will be kept to a minimum and farmers as well as food processors will be guaranteed a decent income.

During the Uruguay round, the Liberal government did everything it could to defend Canada's supply management system. We should remember that the position of the Canadian government during the weeks leading up to the GATT agreement was established in consultation with the agricultural sector. Furthermore, the minister of agriculture worked very hard with colleagues and senior officials to ensure that all sectors in Canada's agriculture industry would not only survive GATT but also be able to take advantage of the opportunities provided in the GATT agreement.

Earlier, the Official Opposition's finance critic said that everyone in the agriculture industry had lost at GATT, but nothing could be further from the truth. The agricultural industry made major gains at GATT, and all members opposite know that perfectly well. They know about the US farm bill which dates back to 1985 and which the United States used to subsidize its agricultural industry and thus harm our exports.

Some US $70 billion were paid out during the first five years of this American farm program, and we know that the purpose of this program was to take away part of the market share held by other countries, especially countries in the southern hemisphere, but of course Canada was also affected by the U.S. Farm Bill, though it was not the main target. The United States wanted to react against overproduction and the fact that other countries, after the crisis in Afghanistan, had tried to sell wheat and other products to the Soviet Union and thus take over part of the so–called traditional market share of the Americans.

The members opposite know this, just as they know that our farmers could no longer continue receiving large farm subsidies, given the major losses experienced in the sector. Some members opposite even admitted as much a while ago. That is why the government had to work with other countries for the good of the entire agricultural community.

First, it had to work to strengthen the laws governing supply management. As we know, there were problems with some of these laws. You may recall the incident with ice cream and yogurt, following the adoption in 1988 of the free trade agreement, which moreover was endorsed by the current Leader of the Opposition. Hon. members will also recall that the FTA led us to lose our case with respect to quotas on ice cream and yogurt. These were restored with the GATT agreement.

With respect to the grains sector, some of the subsidies from other countries have been reduced, thereby allowing us to market our products. New markets have been found for Canadian products. Our ministers have worked hard and so has the parliamentary secretary. The agricultural sector has been well treated by our government and we have just begun our work. We have only been in office for six months and we have already accomplished a great deal. And we will accomplish even more in the future.

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, I sometimes wonder if the hon. member who just spoke is really from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and not an extra–terrestrial being from the moon, because it is abundantly clear from his remarks that he does not understand what effect the GATT Agreement had. And he does not seem to believe the farmers, as if they had not figured out what happened with GATT.

For example, to say that quota values had increased following the signing of the agreement, or that the quota system will be in place for a very long time, that is ridiculous. Especially since farmers are aware that the quota system is under attack due to tariffs and they may not be confident in what has happened, as witnessed by the Ontario chicken producers. Why did they increase their production by 30 per cent if not as a clear indication of their lack of confidence in the system? They know how the market works.

You have to do more than tell farmers that all is well, that everything is perfect in Canada, to make things work. Farmers understand very well what is going on. It is the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell who, sadly, does not understand.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member opposite tells us that quotas will not survive. For 1995, the tariff for fluid milk is 283.8 per cent minimum and, by the year 2000, it will be 241 per cent minimum. Does the hon. member mean to say that these tariffs are too low? If so, how can he be so out of touch with the agricultural community?

Let me tell you what André Chabot, the president of the Franco–Ontarian Farmers' Union, had to say. I referred earlier to what the leaders of the Quebec agricultural community had said. I will now address the situation in Ontario. The hon. member for Québec–Est is a Franco–Ontario, just like me. Mr. Chabot's letter reads: "Canadian farmers agree that Canadian supply management systems are in no way threatened by the new GATT rules. Some even see this as an improvement over the situation under article XI". Certainly a Franco–Ontarian like my chum across the way can understand that.

[English]

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, politics is a funny business. If the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell were sitting in the opposition, I am sure his comments would be very similar to those of the hon. member from the Bloc who has been speaking on agricultural issues. It seems like the government has quite a different view now of what has happened with regard to the GATT negotiations it was involved in.

• (1615)

I tell the hon. member and the House that Reform reviewed the GATT situation two years ago. The same sources should have been available to the hon. member. It became very clear that article XI would become indefensible. We were quite frank and honest in admitting that.

At the same time hon. members on the other side had not done a reality check. They were trying to tell supply managed industries that article XI was safe and could be preserved, and that they would be the agent that would preserve article XI. Reform on the other hand said it was obvious that article XI would be gone and that tariffs would have to be put in its place.

Because of that attitude supply managed industries undertook a very expensive advertising campaign involving millions of dollars to try to speak to political parties and politicians and to encourage them to take a strong position in defence of article XI which was a hopeless cause. I would hope some members on the other side would apologize for that action because these dollars were hard earned and should not have been spent on useless advertising campaigns.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I will not apologize for standing up for dairy farmers in my riding. It is not that article XI was indefensible. The member has it wrong. That is not what happened. If he thinks that is what happened he is mistaken.

I say to the hon. member and all hon. members that article XI was clearly defensible. It was a very good system. We gradually lost the supporters we had among other nations. That does not mean the system was bad, but we ended up on the very last day with 115 to 1. We were the only country that still wanted it. That does not mean it was bad. It was still good. We were trading with other nations and 115 of them were saying that it was no longer there.

It is like the National Hockey League deciding that every team except one is to disband. We could wish the league to exist but if it only had one team it would no longer be there. That is easy for anyone in the House to understand, particularly after last night's debate.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I say to the hon. member that I too will not apologize for standing up for supply managed commodities and for standing up for farmers in my constituency. I do not need to apologize.

I was one who stood more than any member in the House and fought for supply management. I know what I told my constituents during election time. I made no promises that I could save supply management. I told them, though, that I would fight damned hard for it. That is what we did in this party.

I am proud of the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food. The Minister for International Trade with whom I have had differences on this matter in the past stood up in Geneva and told the world. Unfortunately, as my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott— Russell said, in the end we could not do it.

It is easy for the Reformers. They spend half their time in the agriculture committee—and Mr. Hoeppner over there will know he is not one of them—crapping on supply management.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I know members on both sides of the House feel very strongly, but I think a moment ago the member was probably wanting to identify the member for Lisgar—Marquette.

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, I was looking for his name. He is the same guy within that party who has been unfortunately knocking supply management. It is easy to say now, after the fact: "We knew, we knew", but it would have been better to have that party support us on this when the Americans were fighting us. They were saying: "Your party over there doesn't want the wheat board, doesn't want any of these subsidies. Members from Alberta don't want subsidies". We kept arguing that supply management was not a subsidy.

On the issue of subsidies I want to look at what Agriculture and Agri–Food Canada spends province by province. These members from Alberta keep saying: "We can do it ourselves". It is funny how much agricultural spending actually goes into the province of Alberta. In 1993 figures the amount was $536,315,000. That was well over the percentage of farmers that they have. If I were as provincial as some members in the House pretend to be and if I were just fighting for the province of Ontario instead of for the country, I would argue that Ontario with about 25 per cent of the farmers in the country is not getting its fair share. However I understand some of the problems we have in western Canada so I will not do that.

In my speech today I want to talk about a few issues, one of which is trade. Many of the problems we are having in agriculture today and many of the problems the Reform Party has in its own ridings are because of actions brought by other countries. In a lot of cases it is the United States against Canada. I feel they are very unfair actions.

If we are talking about the wheat issue, Mickey Kantor, the international trade person in the United States, said before the Senate committee last week that Canada was taking advantage of a window of opportunity that had been created. The reason the window of opportunity was created was frankly because of something called export enhancement that the United States uses. It is a two–price system which, by the way, we would like to have in this country. However the Reformers fought us against it and we do not have it now. It is a two–price system that has been responsible for wheat going out of the country.

As a result Canadian producers have been shipping wheat and have shown U.S. millers that we have high quality wheat that is graded and will do exactly what it says it will do. As a result U.S. millers have said: "I like that better. I know and I am guaranteed, because of the Canadian system of distributing wheat, that I will get that wheat and it will do what it says it will do".

The U.S. has been complaining that some actions we take with regard to wheat in western Canada and its shipment were unfair subsidies. That is not the case. The U.S. International Trade Commission found in 1990 that transportation subsidies were not a factor in the competitiveness of Canadian wheat. The U.S. General Accounting Office found in 1992 that there was no evidence of unfair wheat board practices. Again in 1992 in a unanimous decision of a binational panel, including a former U.S. Attorney General and former Chief Justice Dickson, found fault with the U.S. contentions.

However the panel recommended that an audit be done, which results were released last month some time. That report found that 102 of the 105 durum wheat contracts between 1989 and 1992 were fully in compliance with the provisions of the free trade agreement. Clearly the U.S. has no strong position on this matter.

I congratulate the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food for the tough stands he has taken. Over the years I stood in the House and watched the previous government negotiate with the Americans. I always felt that somehow we were doing something wrong in this country. I always felt as a farmer that somehow Canadian farmers were not being fairly represented by their government. I was very pleased at the GATT, with the stand the minister took in Geneva, and with some of the tough stands he has taken in terms of putting Canada's agriculture position forward very strongly.

I want to go back to the Bloc Quebecois now and the member for Québec–Est, a very good member of the standing committee who represents the views of his party well on the issue. I take exception to the fact that he is denouncing the government for lack of action in the agriculture sector. He sat around that table with us in the agriculture committee, as well as Bloc members, I might add, who add to the sense of the committee; it worked very well. In recent weeks we have looked at some of the stuff Agriculture Canada is doing. As one on the other side of the House who criticized some of the actions of Agriculture Canada, I recognized over the past little while that in fact a lot of those actions have changed substantially. They have changed substantially because the government has changed. We have given a new direction to Agriculture Canada. That direction can be found in the red book. It outlines clearly the direction we want to take agriculture into the next century.

Looking at the money Agriculture Canada is spending in Quebec—and the hon. member asked for this information—$371,723,000 have gone into the province of Quebec. According to the chart, Quebec ranks behind only Saskatchewan, Alberta, and a bit behind Ontario in this regard. Obviously with the problems they are having in western Canada with respect to wheat prices we can understand why a lot of this money has gone there.

I really do take exception to the hon. member's contention that we have not done anything. Frankly it has been six months. I do not want to use that as an excuse, but we have made some significant changes in those areas that particularly affect agriculture. I have mentioned some of those in trade and the good work the minister of agriculture is doing in standing up for trade. I also want to talk about some of the stuff we have been doing in rural development.

I come from small town Ontario, as you do, Mr. Speaker. What we have found to be happening over the past few years, especially in an area like mine that has been hit hard because of certain commodities grown there, namely tobacco. In small town Ontario unemployment rates have been rising. There has been a loss of business in stores and other areas that help farming communities. We are finding a bit of a drifting because there are no jobs, with a lot of small town people moving to the cities.

I was very pleased when the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food came forward with a plan to deal with rural development. He indicated very clearly that rural development was a top priority. This means rural development not only in Ontario and Quebec but in the west also where small towns are literally closing up in some places.

There is no huge pot of dollars; there is not a lot of money in this promise. Frankly there is not the money there. Instead of money the minister plans—and we had the department before the committee today—to organize those parts of government that are specifically directing their efforts toward helping small towns and infrastructures. We are co–ordinating the machinery of government.

It really is a grassroots participation. That is the final point I want to make. The government and the minister have taken a lot of time talking to ordinary Canadians, talking to ordinary farmers. The development of the small town initiative, the rural initiative, will be through the communities themselves.

That is one of the things I am proud of. We have done very well to make sure that before we make any decisions Canadians are consulted and that the views of farmers are heard. We will continue to do that.

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, the member for Haldimand—Norfolk is an excellent chairman of the agriculture committee. He does an excellent job.

However today there are three points I would like briefly to correct or bring to his attention. Basically the discussion today is about the lack of leadership in government regarding agriculture. What he said would indicate even more the lack of leadership with respect to agriculture in government. For example, he mentioned rural development, which is of course extremely important, saying how the government minister indicated that it was his top priority but he did not put any money in it. What sort of top priority is that when you say it is really very important and you do not put any money in it?

• (1630)

Another example is trade. He mentioned that there are many initiatives with regard to trade. Of course, the minister has gone to China to sell wheat. However, in the negotiations that are going on with the United States right now there is a problem that was created by the Americans by their export enhancement program and other issues. Of course Canada profited from this situation. Of course Canada profited from free trade with the United States, but why suddenly is Canada giving in to American pressure and putting a cap on durum wheat to the United States? It is lack of leadership.

Another example, again in dealing with trade with the United States, which really is a big item, is instead of dealing sector by sector so that we get the maximum for our bucks for Canada we put it all in one lump package. This is what the minister of agriculture is trying to deal with the United States, instead of dealing sector by sector so that he would get the maximum for his bucks. Lack of leadership. The examples were given by the MP for Haldimand—Norfolk who is a very good president of the agriculture committee.

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, maybe that is one of the differences between this party and the party of the hon. member for Québec–Est. We feel that within government if we are going to make changes that really directly affect Canadians, in this case farmers, changes that will work in their best interest, that throwing a pot of money at them is not going to solve the problem.

We think that by taking the money we have there and spending it more wisely and making sure that money is not directed for overhead or administration but is directed into the hands of Canadians is probably the better approach.

In terms of his question on the cap on wheat, I am sorry I missed the announcement. I have not heard that there was an announcement on a cap on wheat. In fact if the hon. member might be more honest with it he will know that in fact there is not a cap on wheat yet. However, there is a question of whether or not we should negotiate a settlement.

If anyone in this House thinks that world trade is fair they do not have a clue on how the world trade system works. In fact it is not a fair system. Canada represents a very small percentage of trade done in the world. In relative terms it is important to us in terms of our gross domestic product and its importance to Canada but we are a small country. To suggest that we could stand at a table one on one with the Americans, they do not have to play fair, frankly.

The former Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Whelan, who used to sit in this House used to constantly say: "The Americans never agreed to a GATT decision because they didn't have to". It is not a fair decision. One of the points that the minister was making to them was this. He said very clearly and he said it in this House a number times that we are not prepared to trade one part of the country off against another part of the country. We are not prepared to trade one sector of this country off against another sector of the country.

In fact, if you remember both the comments by the Prime Minister and the Minister for International Trade, they were not prepared to deal with this in one lump sum. They were going to go sector by sector by sector. We feel we have a strong position. We feel that the Americans will in the end give in on this because they have to and because they are wrong. We are prepared to stand forth and fight on behalf of Canadian farmers to make sure that point of view is put forward.

[Translation]

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, Bloc members are very concerned with rural issues, especially agriculture. I could not say the same about the members opposite. My Bloc colleagues have succeeded in demonstrating the inequality among the provinces and the federal government's lack of action on Quebec's behalf.

• (1635)

In particular, I will try to describe the situation that exists in some rural ridings of the Gaspé Peninsula, where I am from, and the lower St. Lawrence region. In the lower St. Lawrence region, as in most rural areas of the country, agriculture should play a very important role in regional development. There are 400,000 hectares under cultivation, over 260 agricultural enterprises, and sales in the order of $190 million a year.

Our dairy products alone bring in 75 per cent of farm income and account for more than 50 per cent of agricultural enterprises. We also have 16,000 head of meat cattle, 20,000 sheep, and 30,000 pigs.

This translates into more than 7,500 permanent jobs and thousands of seasonal jobs. Forty–eight per cent of the workforce are under 40 years old.

Despite this profile, figures available for the Matépédia Valley alone show that between 1981 and 1991, farmlands declined by 22 per cent. In the same period, the number of farms fell from 420 to 285, a decrease of 32 per cent. The main cause of this reduction is the same as in other sectors.

Our regions produce raw materials for major centres, which process them before selling them back to us. When are we going to understand that, in order to grow, resource rich regions must equip themselves with the infrastructure they need to process and market their raw materials? It is much more important to us than a few sidewalks and a little road paving.

Processing and marketing also mean jobs, which we do not have unfortunately. Processing creates economic activities that give confidence to people and encourage them to start their own businesses.

We, for example, have the potential to develop beef production. But Quebec, unfortunately, is still behind in this area. Our cattle farmers must export their production outside the region without processing it. They even export calves at lesser cost without being able to finish them on site.

Over 100 valley producers have decided to spend more than $160,000 of their own money to build a slaughterhouse so they can process in their own region the animals they breed. Can you believe it, Mr. Speaker?

That is a laudable initiative from the farmers themselves. Such an enterprising attitude must be encouraged.

• (1640)

In my region people got together and are now ready to act.

After a wide ranging consultation with those concerned, the regional co–operation and development council targeted five bio–food development priorities: processing and upgrading bio–food products; diversifying crops; consolidating production; developing human resources; developing and marketing regional products.

The people of Matane, Mont–Joli, the Matapedia Valley and our regions know what they need to develop and know how to succeed.

Centralized decisions and programs that apply unchanged throughout the country are surely not the way for the government to boost agriculture in our region. On the contrary, decisions must be decentralized. Programs must be decentralized and adapted to regional realities. Trust the men and women who actually produce what people in the cities need to live. Economic development takes place in the field, not in the offices of senior bureaucrats.

I will give you a demonstration of this unhealthy incoherence, which is demoralizing for the farmers in my region. In March 1995, the federal–provincial agreement which included a testing and experimentation component will end. This program is the most visible of those from the federal government. With the funds it provided, this program helped farmers launch productive activities with significant benefits for our region. Ending this program will really hurt us and I say to the Minister of Regional Development that he must take a stand as soon as possible on extending it.

The regions must be given the wherewithal to do what they decided to do to deal with technological change and changing markets. To overlook the resource regions is to overlook what we are: human beings who need to feed ourselves and live in a healthy environment so that we can develop properly.

Another point that I want to raise immediately is transportation subsidies. Most of them cause unhealthy competition between the regions. They pay transportation companies to send unfinished products to urban centres, instead of encouraging local processing and helping people develop.

This shows the government's neglect. By wanting to centralize everything, it hinders development. By wanting to centralize everything, it makes people dependent. By wanting to centralize everything, it kills any initiative from local people.

• (1645)

When you know that, for almost a decade now, Western Canada has been receiving ten times more than Quebec from the federal government, you can ask yourself some questions. I want agricultural producers from my region and all of Quebec to get what they are entitled to, nothing more but nothing less.

Quebec farmers are striving to reach food self–sufficiency. To that end, they have decided to: first, consolidate and develop their potential; second, make full use again of agricultural land; third, process their products themselves, to the extent possible.

These people, who generate over $4 million in annual revenues, have the right to be considered job creators and major contractors, like any multinational company which finances the old political parties.

It is not because we live in rural areas that we cannot benefit from collective prosperity or that we should be overlooked by a system which favours big business.

Producers from the lower St. Lawrence are entitled to the same support as others. They need that help to consolidate their business, transform their products and make a profit with the added value. They have the right to hope to expand as they deem appropriate. They need help to be able to do so.

I will end with this. When game became scarce, man turned to agriculture for survival, and nothing has since replaced the food obtained from that activity. This is why rural regions such as ours need help.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate what the hon. member said, when he explained some of the problems of the farmers in his riding which is in such a beautiful part of the country.

I have a question for the hon. member opposite. If we forget the partisan comments which are of course part of the parliamentary routine, and part of our job, I think he must admit that for the past 20 or 30 years, Canadian agriculture has enjoyed unprecedented growth.

I am sure he also realizes that for instance in Quebec and Ontario, in my own riding, which is right on the border with Quebec, we see outstanding farm operations which exist thanks to the system introduced by Mr. Whelan, the former boss of his colleague from Québec–Est, other Liberal agriculture ministers and, of course, by ministers of other political formations as well.

Does the hon. member acknowledge the tremendous progress which has been made in the agricultural industry, in terms of the use of technology on the farm, the standard of living of our farmers, and especially in supply managed sectors and other sectors? And will he at least, with his usual eloquence, acknowledge the excellent job done by the former boss of the hon. member for Québec–Est?

Mr. Canuel: Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree that a number of things have been done, but it is also true that many, many farms have disappeared.

• (1650)

To expand, some farmers bought big farms adjoining their own land. They modernized their operations and they used technology, of course, but I say this is not necessarily a good thing for rural communities. In a parish of 3,000 souls, if there are now only four farmers when they used to be 40, this is not necessarily a good thing. It may be the modern way of doing things and perhaps this is inevitable. That means rural communities will gradually disappear.

If they do, small towns will disappear as well. Anyone who is familiar with our part of the country will notice that, starting at Mont-Joli, it is very hard to keep rural communities alive, because most farmers have left the area, and although dairy production has increased or remained stable, people are not there any more. I think agriculture should be compatible with rural communities, and I have no answers right now, although there must be a solution and we must find it. I am sure that, when we become a sovereign nation, we will find it more readily.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 38, it is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Lévis—Manpower Training; the hon. member for Brome—Missisquoi—Hyundai Plant in Bromont; the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden—Trade; the hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve—Military Industries; the hon. member for Matapédia—Matane—Unemployment Insurance Reform.

Resuming debate, the honourable member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak today during the first day of debate in this House on agriculture. We will have to remember that the official opposition is responsible for this first day of the 35th Parliament devoted to the subject of agriculture.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

An hon. member: We have the hon. member for Québec-Est to thank for this.

Mr. Crête: Indeed, the originator of the motion is the member for Québec-Est. In the past, he worked for a former Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Whelan, but he came to realize during this time, and probably because of his experiences, that Quebec had no future in Canada, particularly where agriculture was concerned. Moreover, you will recall that this Minister of Agriculture had the good fortune of being sprayed with milk by Quebec farmers because he could not grasp what they were trying to tell him. The only way they could get their message across to him was by spraying him in the face with milk.

On a more serious note, let them say what they will about sales and milk production figures of all other sectors. The fact of the matter is that rural communities are dying. The population of our villages has been declining for a number of years. When it has come to the point at which villages such as Saint-Paul-de-la-Croix in my riding have taken to advertising in the newspapers to attract families that may be willing to settle in a rural community, we know that we need to make some fundamental changes to the way we approach rural development and agriculture.

Right now in Eastern Quebec we can see dairy trucks go by, heading for Montreal, and that milk comes back in the form of processed cheese. That is the sort of thing we would like to be able to change so there could be a future in primary and secondary processing in our region. The fact that our communities are small does not mean that we do not have expertise in the various agricultural productions.

My riding has been the home of Canada's biggest milk producers for a long time.

• (1655)

Fresh lamb is another area. It should be noted that interestingly, 30 per cent of the fresh lamb consumed in Quebec is processed in our region.

Also, farmers in Eastern Quebec, and my riding in particular, have adapted successfully to changes in the agricultural industry. The UPA may be confident in the future, but this does not mean that all government's actions automatically have its blessing. Their confidence comes from knowing that with their skills and the ideas they have come up with, they will be able to ride out this time of fundamental change brought about by GATT.

A great deal of work was done in Quebec to prepare for the future and make sure agriculture had the place it deserved in Quebec in the 21st century. Take for example the "États généraux du monde rural" and the Trois-Rivières summit where a consensus was reached on the efforts required to ensure the prosperity of the Quebec agricultural industry for the future.

I hope that the government will take that into account in planning its next move and that it will make sure the interests of the Quebec agricultural community do not get lost in the sea of Canadian and Western interests. Care should be taken not to let the durum exports issue adversely affect advocacy for farmers in Eastern Canada, and Quebec in particular.

When the Bélanger-Campeau Commission held hearings in the Lower St. Lawrence region, the Minister of Foreign Affairs who was the Liberal Party representative on the commission at the time, had argued that, should Quebec become a sovereign state, we would lose any control we may have had on our milk quotas. Since then, current world events have caught up with the hon. member—who is now Minister of Foreign Affairs—and quotas will be less prominent. Belonging to the Canadian Federation may not be that beneficial for Quebec farm producers after all. A more profitable approach is to make sure we are able to sell our products abroad, and for that, we need programs to promote processing.

We must also learn from the past. In agriculture, we went from a period when many regions could be self-sufficient by processing and selling their products locally to a new era when, in the name of productivity, natural resources are sent outside the producing regions, creating unemployment. Something can be done to bring processing back to the regions, thus enabling more people to live with dignity.

I would like to point out one of the abnormalities inherent in the Canadian system. In lamb production, Canada, under pressure from the United States, reviewed the way it treats sick animals. Before, especially in the case of pure–bred lambs, we used to slaughter all sick animals. We have now decided that moderately sick lambs would not be killed but quarantined. This can be appropriate for owners of very large herds like those in the West, for whom quarantining a small part of their herd is not a major problem.

However, in Quebec, where herds are much smaller, this type of action is inappropriate. In my riding, for example, it pushed a producer to the brink of bankruptcy. We had to intervene many times to make the bureaucracy understand the situation. Unfortunately, we have not yet managed to change the regulations, the new practice adopted under U.S. pressure.

That is one example where implementing a practice across Canada can harm the economy of one of Canada's regions.

• (1700)

The other point that I would like to bring to the attention of the House is support for exports. Much is being done to help people who are long established, but there is not much room for new exporters. For example, young people who would like to export top–quality maple syrup do not easily find the government program that could help them.

In agriculture, it is very complicated to find which program applies to which crop since agriculture has always been a shared federal–provincial jurisdiction; this does not make it easy for those who want to be involved in agriculture.

In another area, the federal government is acting contrary to the fine principles it has put forward, namely by cutting the funding for regional agricultural fairs. While they say they want to give regional agriculture a chance, this year they are cutting the budgets for the 55 regional agricultural fairs in Quebec by 15 per cent and next year they want to cut them out completely, which will eliminate these regional agricultural fairs that promote high–quality livestock.

I think that such an example proves the government's lack of leadership in agriculture. They just say the right words; what they do is in fact contrary to the decisions that should be made. Instead of encouraging agriculture, they are making drastic cuts that will hurt agriculture instead of helping it to develop.

[English]

Mr. Althouse: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would like the permission of the House to speak for eight or ten minutes, please, if that is possible.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Members have heard the request from the member for Mackenzie. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: No.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I just want to make sure, at the request of the hon. member for Mackenzie, that he can share his comments with us for eight to ten minutes at most. Would there be unanimous consent?

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup): Will giving me the floor prevent a member who was supposed to speak from speaking on this point?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The period should end at 5.30 p.m.; we would have to add nine or ten minutes, and the minister's statement is scheduled for 5.40 p.m. So if a member speaks, someone else will certainly be unable to speak. The day must end at some point.

Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

[English]

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, it is a great privilege to speak in the House today on this debate on agricultural issues. I am conscious of the fact that I represent an urban riding but I remind the members of the House that not only are the members of urban ridings consumers of agricultural products but we are all interested in a healthy farm community.

It is in the interest of all of us and there are many of us in Rosedale riding, those for example who work at the University of Toronto in the research area and others, who make in their own way a contribution to the health of the important agricultural community in this country.

• (1705)

Since the last election probably the single most important and dominant issue for our government for Canada's agri–food industry has been international trade. That is a matter of great concern to the foreign affairs and international trade committee of which I happen to be the vice–chairman. As was pointed out by the members for Haldimand—Norfolk, Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and Peace River this has been a very intense and challenging period in that area.

I think it is important for us to bear in mind that 1.5 million Canadians, that is one in five, depend directly on exports for their livelihood. Trade in goods and services is equal almost to half our GDP and in the agri-food sector for every dollar that is earned at the farm gate exports generate about 45 cents.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, international trade in this sector has become increasingly important for the province of Quebec. In 1991, exports from this province amounted to 9 per cent of the Canadian total. Today they are 13 per cent, an increase of 49 per cent, for a total value of 1.8 billion Canadian dollars.

[English]

Exports to the United States are extremely important and new markets and new jobs will arise from our entry into new international markets. Although we are presently engaged in difficult negotiations with the United States over trade in some agri-food products which we hope to resolve over the coming months, the bulk of our trade remains free of dispute and continues to expand. Once a settlement with the United States is reached we will have a more secure environment in which all sectors can plan for the future.

I would like to take the opportunity today to look at some of the impacts of the new trading arrangements and how our government is working to assist Canada's agri-food sector with its market development activities.

The Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development has forecast that the new GATT agreement will give the Canadian economy an additional $8 billion boost by the year 2002. This government is determined to ensure that Canada's agri-food sector is a major participant in that economic growth.

The new development brings agriculture under effective trade rules for the first time in history and will ensure that these rules apply equally to all countries. Under the GATT as a result of the Uruguay round members have agreed to cut agri-food export subsidies by 21 per cent by volume and 36 per cent by value over six years. Export subsidy programs like the European Communities' CAP and the U.S. export enhancement program which the member for Haldimand—Norfolk referred to this afternoon are curtailed and international grains and oilseed prices will gradually rise.

It is hard to describe the importance of these changes. The anomalies that were created by agricultural subsidies in world trade were absolutely extraordinary. We had this crazy situation in the United States for example in which its export subsidies encouraged its farmers to export wheat to Turkey. The Turks, not being crazy, turned this wheat into pasta and sent it back to the United States which then competed with the pasta manufacturers in the United States which had to import Canadian wheat. Meanwhile Canadians were selling subsidized wheat to Italy which the Italians were turning into pasta and shipping back to Canada.

These anomalies created by subsides riddled agricultural trade. They have to some extent been brought under discipline under the new GATT rules. The importance of this cannot be under emphasized.

In that context we have to recognize that our supply management system which will be preserved as a result of our high tariffs came under attack under article XI, but this government was able to negotiate those high protective tariffs which will preserve the benefits of our farm management system.

As the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell pointed out we do not live in an isolated world. We are one member of the GATT and 115 other members insisted that we change from the type of quotas which we had used up to this time to a new and different type of system.

• (1710)

This government recognizes that changes will be needed. Changes will be needed to help the sector. To this end, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food is heading a six member federal-provincial industry task force on orderly marketing. Its mandate is to consult with all supply management stakeholders to identify the issues that need to be addressed and suggest co-operative decision making processes to deal with those in anticipation of the GATT implementation in 1995.

Amendment to the GATT rules will allow for more competition. But of themselves the rules will not ensure that we take advantage of those markets. We have to work for those markets and this government recognizes that. To help the agri-food sector capitalize on these advantages, Agriculture and Agri-Food Canada has a new branch, market and industry services, with offices in all of the provinces. This branch is specifically designated to work with the industry on enhancing its global competitiveness and increasing its share of domestic and international markets.

As well, the federal government has 55 trade commissioners and commercial officers working on agri-food trade and developing more than 150 foreign markets. This includes 18 agri-food specialists, five of whom were recently named to our diplomatic posts in Taipei, Seoul, Singapore, Osaka and Mexico City.

Here at home, an agri-food industry council will be established to advise on all matters related to improving Canada's market position, promoting economic growth and creating jobs.

In addition, Agriculture and Agri-Food Canada will be working with other federal departments and the provinces to establish a single window marketing service for Canadian industry. This will help facilitate access to programs such as the new getting ready to go global program, which gives cost shared assistance to food and beverage processors in developing competitiveness strategies and initiatives, and the agri–food industry marketing strategy program which helps agri–food associations develop and implement marketing plans.

The government's plan is to concentrate marketing on those areas of the globe which have the greatest potential for economic growth and market expansion in the future. In that context, the government is putting particular emphasis on the Asia Pacific and Mexican markets.

The minister of agriculture and the Governor General are presently on a trip to China and to Asia with industry representatives to sell our agricultural products. I hope, having heard the member for Peace River today speak of the importance of international trade in agricultural products, he may bring some discipline to bear on the member for Wild Rose when he questions the costs of these trips and the Governor General attending when important marketing initiatives can be made by such initiatives.

The Asia Pacific region is the fastest growing economic region in the world and it offers tremendous opportunities for Canadian agri–food exporters. This government intends to exploit that market and is doing so at this time. This represents a potential for jobs. They are good jobs, high paying jobs based on real markets in a growing part of the world.

Jobs, Mr. Speaker and other members of the House, I remind you, in the export area involve not only the farm marketers themselves but support services, banking and other areas, which those who live in urban communities benefit from as well. That is why the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food is in Asia today and 15 leaders in the agri–food sector thought it was important enough to be there with him.

With growing access to new markets around the world, it is clear that the future of Canada's agri–food industry is full of opportunities, the opportunity for growth and opportunity to contribute to economic activity and jobs in all parts of the country.

By working in close co–operation with the provinces, industry and other stakeholders, and by continuing to support the trade and marketing initiatives of Agriculture and Agri–Food Canada and other federal departments I am confident that we can help the industry make Canada agriculture and agri–food number one in the world.

In so doing, we will be ensuring not only the wellbeing of our farm community but the overall economic health of our country which includes important interests in our urban community as well.

• (1715)

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to address this unfortunate motion. However I would like to commend the opposition for raising this issue because the agri–food sector is such a strong contributor to our economy.

A few moments ago the hon. member for Mackenzie was not allowed to speak by the opposition. The member for Mackenzie, who is very interested in agriculture, often sits in on the standing committee. While I may not always agree with his comments or theories, I do feel sad that the opposition would not allow him to speak.

The rules of the road for business are government regulations. Regulations protect Canadians, ensuring them safe, nutritious food. Regulations also play a very important role. They are a way of setting standards. High standards mean quality and that can mean Canadian agri–food products are attractive to world markets because of their quality.

However times change and regulations that were helpful in the past become an obstacle to growth today. In some cases, new technology makes regulations obsolete as scientific tests replace manual inspections. In other cases, various levels of government have added layer after layer of regulation without co–ordinating their efforts and without counting the cost to industry.

We view regulations as a tool that can help the agri–food sector produce internationally competitive products. But to be an effective tool it must be honed and constantly sharpened to keep pace with changing world markets and technology. Regulations should be a tool which encourages innovation and entrepreneurship, not one that blunts industry's integrity.

That is why the government is dedicated to reforming regulations. Regulations are dry, technical and complicated. Done wrong, they cost too much to the industry and to the taxpayers but done right, they can create jobs.

As members know, the focus of the government's election campaign last fall was economic renewal and job creation. Building on this commitment in the February budget, the finance minister announced numerous initiatives to help improve the competitiveness of the Canadian industry.

One of the steps he announced was: "We will intensify and accelerate the effort to reform and remove regulations that create confusion and costs by putting in place a task force to provide on a fast track basis a better regulatory regime, one that will not compromise compliance but rather improve the competitiveness of business".

The government has already done a considerable amount of work in recent years to ensure that government regulations fulfil a specific departmental mandate and that they enhance, not hinder, industry's ability to compete. An interdepartmental committee of assistant deputy ministers on regulatory reform is currently working to, first, provide departments with the means to use alternatives to reduce the regulatory burden; second, provide a greater variety of enforcement tools and options; and third, improve the process of the regulatory development.

At Agriculture and Agri–Food Canada, the first phase of regulatory housekeeping led to the elimination and amendment of regulations through an omnibus regulatory package passed in April 1993. This work is continuing. A second package of regulatory amendments has now been prepared involving the processed poultry regulations, livestock carcass grading regulations, fertilizer regulations and egg regulations. A copy of this package has been provided to the provinces for review and for their comment. It is anticipated that it will appear in part I of the Canada Gazette this summer.

As part of this federal regulatory reform process, the government, in co–operation with consumer groups and industry stakeholders, also reviewed the current regulatory requirements concerning best before dating and packed on dating and looked at the subject of food date marking in general.

Under the food and drug regulations the labels of most perishable and semi–perishable prepackaged foods with a shelf life of 90 days or less are required to show a durable life or "best before" date in a clear, non–encoded manner. Storage instructions are required if conditions other than room temperature storage are necessary. When packaged on retail premises, perishables and semi–perishable foods are required to show packed on date instead of best before date.

The intent of these requirements introduced back in 1974 is to provide consumers with useful information regarding relative freshness and potential shelf life of food. Foods which have exceeded the best before date are still acceptable for consumption but they may not be at their peak state of freshness.

During the reform process the government found strong, general support for retaining present date marking requirements for perishables and semi–perishables having a durable life date of 90 days or less.

Consumers and industry believe these requirements to be very effective and a useful way of informing consumers as to relevant produce freshness.

We also found support for the voluntary use by manufacturers of best before dating on foods with durable life of more than 90 days.

As a result of the review the following recommendations were developed. Support the use of best before dating on products with a durable life of more 90 days on a voluntary basis. Amend the food and drug regulations to revoke durable life date exemptions for donuts and commissary items. Review date marking in respect to products with modified atmosphere packaging. Review the need for date marking on low acid foods packaged in hermetically sealed containers and on refrigerated products and consider extending the requirements relating to the statement "previously frozen" to all products which have been frozen and thawed prior to sale.

In the last phase of the implementation process Agriculture and Agri–Food Canada's food production and inspection branch, in co–operation with the Department of Health, will be consulting on these recommendations with food industry stakeholders, including industry associations, consumer groups and other federal and provincial government departments.

Central to these discussions is Agriculture and Agri–Food Canada's inspection and regulation mandate. The department's responsibility is to set and enforce standards to safeguard human, animal and plant health and facilitate international trade and to support the protection of the environment through sustainable agricultural practices.

In line with these departmental responsibilities, the FBI branch has been working in recent months to develop a business plan which will ensure that its resources are directed to the highest priorities, to ensure that only safe, wholesome food enters the Canadian marketplace and that our inspections program works to enhance the competitiveness of Canada's agri–food sector.

The challenge is to maintain and improve the branch's current food inspection programs while at the same time making the best use of the taxpayers' dollars.

I believe our efforts to reduce the unnecessary regulations of industry and to focus on our resources on a top priority of ensuring food safety will pay off handsomely in every province. Reforming regulations create new opportunities. It creates jobs. It is a way to ensure that the agri–food sector is profitable. It will remain a very important tool for making sure the agri–food sector remains competitive.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup): Mr. Speaker, just a short comment on what the hon. member said in his introduction, in which he reproached us for not letting another member take the floor.

I simply wanted to say that, for the opposition day we requested on agriculture, we need all the time we are allowed to voice the concerns of Quebec and those of farmers across Canada, and we are prepared to consider the possibility of having the hon. member speak when we have finished. All members who expressed an interest in speaking in this debate, members from the rural ridings who want agriculture to have its rightful place in Canada and Quebec, should be able to speak, and that is why we felt this was important, because the treatment of agriculture in Quebec has left much to be desired in the past.

Agriculture in Canada is to a large extent western agriculture, and we want to say there is an agricultural industry in Quebec as well, and that is why we want all our members who have something to say about their ridings and certain expectations they want to express on behalf of their constituents, to be able to do so. We want to ensure that the concerns of the agricultural industry, in Quebec and in Canada, get the attention they deserve, and that is why we want to ensure that the entire debate is used to discuss those concerns.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): As you know, I have been in the Chair all day for this very important debate and I understand, as the hon. member just mentioned, that there are still a large number of members would like to speak to the issue.

As some members have pointed out when the hon. member made his presentation, there is a tradition in this House to the effect that we do not reflect on a decision which has been made.

I imagine that we all learned something. I am convinced that the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte will take note, as I will, and I thank the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup for his intervention.

[English]

Maybe the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte would like to respond.

Mr. Culbert: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated the member for Mackenzie certainly has tremendous experience in the field. I also indicated that while I may not always agree with his comments or his theories, I do feel he deserved an opportunity to make those comments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. Of course the House is always the master of its own destiny. It is a tradition of the House that once a decision is taken, we carry on the business of the day. It is not the tradition to reflect on a decision taken.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could assist the Chair and the House by indicating that I have had informal conversations with my colleagues of all represented parties in the House at the present time and they have unanimously agreed to extend the hours to allow the member to speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): We are getting ahead of ourselves here. I know that there are other members who want to speak to the issue of the day.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the debate should normally end around 5.40 p.m.

Consequently, since I will in all likelihood be the last speaker on this motion, I would like to first congratulate again the hon. member for Québec-Est, who is the Official Opposition critic on agriculture, for tabling a motion which, as pointed out a few moments ago by the hon. member for Kamouraska—Témiscouata, is the first one on agriculture since the opening of the 35th Parliament.

• (1730)

We, members of the Official Opposition, are justifiably proud to be the first ones to table such a motion and to show to all Quebecers, and farmers in particular, that we are here to protect their interests in every field and especially in the agricultural sector.

Today, members from the Bloc have spoken brilliantly and eloquently on the issue, and they have clearly demonstrated the nonchalance of the Liberal government regarding the agricultural sector since it took office. This lack of vision, policy and decision is hurting agriculture in Canada, and particularly in Quebec.

I want to take those few minutes to emphasize the importance of agriculture. I will use my own constituency of Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead as an example, since it is essentially a rural riding where agriculture is the number one industry. I have here some figures which I am pleased to communicate to members and to Canadians, so that we can see the impact, on this industry, of the measures taken by governments, particularly the federal government.

There are close to 2,000 farms in the riding of Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead. According to Statistics Canada, in 1991, expenditures and revenues related to the agricultural industry in my riding were somewhere around $123 million and $156 million, respectively. These two figures alone show how important that industry is for our riding and for all of Quebec also.

Moving on, 2,500 jobs in my riding are directly dependent on agriculture. Imagine, 2,500 jobs. One would have to travel to several municipalities and to several ridings to find industries which employ such a large number of workers. And for every direct job, we can count on six indirect ones, which means that farming in the riding of Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead accounts for an additional 15,000 jobs in the eastern townships.

The agricultural sector in Quebec has evolved rapidly over the years. I listened to the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell who tried to get my colleague from the Bloc who serves as agriculture critic to admit that agriculture has flourished in Quebec because of federal government policies. May I remind this House and point out for the benefit of my colleague that agriculture underwent a remarkable period of growth between 1976 and 1985, thanks to the vision and energy of a government, but more especially, thanks to one man, the MNA for Lévis, Mr. Jean Garon, who in many ways sparked the development of the agricultural sector in Quebec. Many people considered the MNA for Lévis to be a dreamer. Some even thought he was a little crazy when he said his goal was to increase agricultural self–sufficiency in Quebec from 50 per cent, the level it stood at when the Parti Quebecois came to power in 1976, to over 70 per cent. Within four years or one term of office, Quebec had already achieved a level of self–sufficiency greater than 70 per cent, all because of the government's policies. Since then, the Liberal government which came to power in 1985 has managed to bring the level back down to about 60 per cent.

On the subject of agriculture, we should also mention certain initiatives that were taken and the benefits that accrued to show, as I said at the beginning of my speech, the impact of agriculture on a region. I would like to point out three initiatives that I am particularly proud of in my riding. First, the Centre d'initiative agricole de Coaticook, which is basically a group of farmers who not only put a lot of effort in their own farming enterprises, but also provide training to other farmers. They have just set a precedent by approving an agreement concluded with the local school board to invest in farm training for our young people. This deserved to be pointed out. They have been praised by all socio–economic stakeholders in l'Estrie for this initiative.

There is also the agri–food table, la Table agro–alimentaire, in the Haut–Saint–François RCM, which brings together—somewhat like the group in Coaticook—a number of farmers who have set out to develop the agricultural industry by encouraging new farms to locate or get established in their region and, to that end, by meeting students in our agricultural colleges, in Saint–Hyacinthe and in the Quebec area, as well as by inviting them to invest in the most beautiful riding in the province, the riding of Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead.

In conjunction with all economic stakeholders, they are also setting up agricultural products processing industries to ensure that our farm products can be processed locally, thus creating employment.

One last example, before closing: farm tourism. It was barely mentioned today, but its is nonetheless an important industry. Let me give you one figure. In 1993, in my riding and the Coaticook region, thanks to the concerted efforts of the municipalities, the agricultural community and the tourist industry, 4,000 European tourists, mostly from France, came to visit us and were able to appreciate the state of development of our agricultural industry as well as enjoying, of course, the warm welcome Quebecers are renowned for.

• (1740)

In conclusion, in the weeks and months to come, the federal government must concentrate on an issue of major importance not only to my riding but also to Quebec as a whole and even a major part of Ontario. I am referring of course to the negotiations scheduled to take place as a result of the GATT agreement, particularly to set tariffs for milk.

Someone on the government side said earlier—and I will close on this—that deals had already been made. We want, we insist that the efforts made by our farmers over all those the years not be compromised by negotiations, the outcome of which are not known. We in the opposition will be extremely vigilant in that regard.

MOTION TO EXTEND HOURS OF SITTING

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I wish to seek unanimous consent of the House to extend the sitting hours by 10 minutes in order to permit the hon. member for Mackenzie to address the House, and subsequently of course to add 10 minutes to private members' hour to ensure that it is not shortened and that the full hour be allotted to private members' hour as is customarily the case.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): My thanks to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House for extending the session for 10 minutes. I am sorry that we had a misunderstanding a few minutes ago when we tried to do the same thing and failed.

Being from the riding of Mackenzie, which is located in northeastern Saskatchewan, we are very concerned about agricultural policy and the terms that the government imposes on agricultural policy in this country. We were faced with local conditions that are quite unusual this past year such as flooding and extra rain which has meant harvesting not completed from last year and it means that many producers will not be able to seed a crop this year because last year's crop is still in the fields.

There was a great deal of hope that a third line of defence would be worked out given this circumstance in northeastern Saskatchewan and northwestern Manitoba. However, no such thing happened. The minister and his counterparts across the country simply said that the crop insurance and the GRIP programs that are in effect are going to have to be used.

We urge all farmers in the circumstance of perhaps losing two crops to make certain they take advantage of that part of the crop insurance program that covers inability to seed in the coming year.

There have been other problems that these people have been facing. They face the same problems that all Canadian farmers have faced: low incomes due to low grain prices because of the grain wars that have erupted between the United States and Europe; the United States' insistence upon using export enhancement funds to depreciate the value of export prices to the point that the only place Canadians can get a decent price for durum wheat is in the United States, which is the only country that has not been targeted for export enhancement funds.

In effect the market is $40 or $50 U.S. per tonne higher in the United States than it is in any of the markets that we normally sell to because the United States has been paying our old customers $50 to $60 a tonne to take their durum wheat instead and their other grains as well.

As well, for a short period of time a small window of opportunity opened up in the U.S. market for barley and that became the high value market. Canada sold barley into the United States which has triggered a short skirmish in the continuing skirmishes along that border in agricultural trade to the point at which one of the senators from North Dakota—although he says it was in jest—actually suggested to one of the committees of Congress that the 300 Minuteman missiles located in silos in North Dakota be reprogrammed to hit Canadian wheat farmers.

Those problems will pass and they will be resurfacing again from my experience in free trade with the Americans. We have had free trade, I might add, in meats for over 50 years and there have always been times when border access was very difficult even though we have a program of free trade in pork and beef between our two countries.

The challenge I want to speak about today in the short period that I have is the global challenge that arises now that we have had Canada–U.S. trade agreements, the North American free trade agreement, followed by the General Agreement on Tariff and Trade.

All of these agreements have substantially limited the power of national governments to impose or to have their own programs for agriculture or for production of any kind of product whether it is manufactured products or a raw product like most of the agriculture products that we export.

This has been assessed by various world trade experts and economists who have concluded that in Canada's case Canadian agriculture is going to have to get used to a lower level of export, lower incomes and this means that we have a great challenge ahead in rural Canada and at the federal level as well to find new ways of reducing production costs.

Where I live our ability to export is highly dependent upon the continuation of the crow rate which was there to entice us to settle that region in the first place. We are a long way from tidewater and cheap shipping. We are relatively close to Churchill but none of our purchasers of raw products seems interested in picking up products at Churchill so we have to ship to Vancouver, Thunder Bay or Prince Rupert, very long distances.

We are located about as far from those ports as it is possible to get on the prairies. Yet the government has continued to pursue the policy of the previous government of reducing the benefits to the crow rate.

The panel has looked at who should receive that payment. Though it has not made any recommendations the study shows that there is very little to be gained by paying the payment to the producers. It shows that if you paid the producers rather than the railways barley exports would disappear. There would be very little change in the production of meats, beef and hogs, which has been the contention by those who wanted the payment made to producers rather than to the railways. The government has what will probably be a difficult decision because there is so much politics behind the feeling among some farm groups that they could do a better job of spending the money by paying the railways themselves than the government paying the railways in order to keep the rates down.

We are left with very few options in government policy for the federal government. Under the new GATT arrangements it will have to reduce its subsidies. We have a challenge of trying to identify the subsidies of other countries so that we can make certain that we are operating on a fair basis. The previous government did not do a good job of that. It did not identify the subsidies the United States has even though it spent a lot of time negotiating the agreement with the United States.

We have some positive things we can look at. I am trying to hurry because of the time. We can still use marketing boards. There are great advantages to producers in gaining regulated control of the products they wish to market. That has been proven through the wheat board, the hog marketing boards, the Ontario Wheat Board, as was mentioned, various milk marketing boards, and the chicken and egg marketing boards across the land.

• (1750)

These agencies do an excellent job of making certain that a product finds a market, that it gets to market with the least possible cost without running trucks and trains back and forth across the country. It is the most efficient way to work.

Therefore I would urge the government to pursue those options, particularly putting more grains under the Canadian Wheat Board and expanding the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board to go into eastern Ontario and the rest of the country as it chooses as well.

I note that there is a need for revitalization. I was at a committee meeting this morning at which the department officials talked about rural revitalization. I note that there are a lot of things that need to be done in this area and that can be done even in spite of the GATT rules.

We have taxation policies that favour the relatively wealthy, medium and high income people, relatively old people, but we do not have any RRSP treatment for the young which would permit them to invest in their farms and businesses at a young age to get some tax benefits. Instead, we wait until they get into their middle years and older and then the tax system encourages the investment in RRSP. We actually lose taxes as a result of that.

Why do we not invest the tax treatment in the younger people so that they can revitalize local communities and maybe back off a little bit the tax advantages that we are giving to the medium and high income people? We should be pursuing these and a whole host of other things that I had on my list. Perhaps some other time the House will grant me the privilege of presenting the rest of those ideas.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 5.49 p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(19), proceedings on the motion have expired.

The House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRESCRIPTION DRUGS

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider repealing the Patent Act Amendment Act, Chapter 2, Statutes of Canada, 1993, to make prescription drugs more affordable to Canadians and to encourage the creation of jobs in Canada by generic drug companies.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure this afternoon to move this motion in the House of Commons. Bill C–91 in essence ended Canada's compulsory drug licensing system in place since 1969 which helped make medicines more affordable.

Bill C–91 increased patent protection for the large multinational pharmaceutical corporations. What that means is that those drug companies were able to extend the monopoly pricing for periods of up to 20 years for their prescription drugs. Canadians are deeply concerned about the consequences of this bill. What Bill C–91 has done is increase the cost of some prescription drugs by about 120 per cent in the past three years.

As a result of this bill, for example, the Saskatchewan drug plan, a government funded plan, has had to diminish its coverage for Saskatchewan citizens quite significantly but still pays about $10 million more a year for the plan because of increased prescription drug prices.

The boost in the cost of provincial drug programs ultimately means you pay more for drugs and increases Canada's dependence on the most powerful pharmaceutical companies. Bill C–91 also weakens Canadians generic drug companies at the expense of foreign multinational pharmaceuticals. It also sharply deteriorates our own pharmaceutical trade balance, making Canada a warehouse for drug imports. The biggest impact is on the consumer, in particular those people who require prescription drugs, the sick, the elderly, people from all walks of life.

The Eastman committee which studied drug patents and costs in 1983 claimed that across Canada at that time the public saved $211 million per year in drug costs from generics. In 1986 the Canadian Drug Manufacturers Association, which is the organization of companies that manufacture generic drugs in Canada, estimated that compulsory licensing saved us about $500 million a year.

We do not have an updated figure but for health care plans in this country which total about $70 billion in costs to the government the components of the pharmaceuticals in that $70 billion cost is about 17 per cent, which means it costs Canadians abut $13 billion or $14 billion a year. Estimates today indicate that we would be saving between $1 billion and $2 billion a year if Bill C–91 did not exist.

Not only do we save on the generic price but whenever a generic equivalent is introduced to the market the brand name product falls about 20 per cent to compete with it.

The Eastman committee at that time recommended a maximum monopoly of four years. The government legislated seven years for some drugs and ten years for others. Someone from the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said we did not give them a nickel more than they asked for. Now it is not just seven years or ten years or even seventeen, but Bill C–91 gives these pharmaceuticals 20 years of protection.

There is a well know drug, an antibiotic, that is marketed as Septra by a company called Burroughs Wellcome and there is Bactrim by another company called Hoffmann–La Roche. This medicine is composed of two constituents that work together to produce their effects in the urinary tract and in the respiratory system.

One of these components is owned by the British drug company Burroughs Wellcome and the other component is owned by Hofmann–La Roche of Switzerland.

Not only do the components work symbiotically, so do the companies. Wellcome makes enough of its product to supply its own needs and that of the Roche company while the Roche company makes sufficient of its own product to supply itself and Burroughs Wellcome.

Then each company advertises its own product as superior to that of the opposite company and will produce research material to even prove it. Yet the only difference is that the one company markets this tablet in green and the other is coloured white. There is a slight difference in shape but they both contain the identical amounts of the same two drugs that came from the same two companies. They come from the same machinery in the same factories. Not only that, but they each thereafter supply these components to generic drug companies who could produce them under compulsory licensing at a cheaper rate and then these pharmaceuticals have the cheek to call themselves ethical pharmaceutical manufacturers.

An article in the Globe and Mail of January 20, 1993 cites the chairman of a company that administers many private drug benefit plans in Ontario. He told the Senate committee investigating this matter that the average cost of a prescription drug in Ontario in 1987 was $12.52. Five years later it was $21.12, an increase of 75 per cent over five years for the average prescription drug. He projected that by the year 2000, six short years away, the average would be about $34.

Of course the federal government's rationale for C–91 was that great big bogeyman GATT, the General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs. Bill C–91 was retroactive to three years prior to the GATT's being implemented before it took effect. My concern is why should Canada have internal matters decided by foreign governments?

As a matter of fact, Canadian drug manufacturers have indicated in their research that under the present Patent Act Canadian generic pharmaceutical manufacturers are prohibited from producing for export products that are under patent in Canada, even if the product is not under patent in the country we wish to export to.

For example, given that many patents are granted in the United States before they are granted in Canada, patents will expire in the U.S. before they expire in Canada. The Canadian generic pharmaceutical industry must now locate manufacturing facilities in the U.S. when a patent expires there before it expires in Canada.

This means we cannot continue to create jobs and produce our export products here in Canada. In effect we are being forced to export Canadian investment and jobs which we prefer to locate right here. Unless this problem is quickly rectified we will be forced to curtail more jobs in Canada and invest and create jobs in the U.S., Mexico and other export markets.

The repeal of Bill C–91 would demonstrate to Canadians that the Canadian government still has control over its domestic affairs rather than the multinational foreign drug manufacturers. If this bill is not repealed it will prove once again to Canadians that the Liberals are no different than the Conservatives.

We have often heard in many jurisdictions in this country the phrase "Liberal, Tory, same old story".

My sense of it is that unless the Liberals who voted in opposition against Bill C–91 repeal this legislation they will be no better than their sisters, the Conservative Party. I think actions speak louder than words. It is incumbent upon the Liberal government to take action on this bill and repeal it so that we can save a whole lot of jobs and a whole lot of money for our drug plans and for Canadian consumers in the end.

When the Tories passed the drug patent legislation, Bill C–91, New Democrats predicted it was a prescription for problems. The legislation gave brand name drug companies a 20 year monopoly to charge basically whatever they wanted for prescription drugs. New Democrats said that the granting of generic drug licences would be eliminated and that consumers would bear the brunt of decreased competition and increased prices. Without competition big name pharmaceutical companies would be able to set the price of being healthy.

According to a 1986 Ontario report on drug competition when five versions of the same drug were on the market the cheapest generic drug was almost half the price of the original. Since Bill C–91 was passed this type of saving to the consumer is a thing of the past.

I have here some brand name–generic price comparisons for the top 25 genericized products. For example, for the drug Cimetidine which is an ulcer drug—that is the drug name, the brand name is Tagamet—the generic price is about 80 per cent less expensive than the original brand name. We are actually paying 80 per cent more for the brand name of a drug which produces the same ultimate result.

For Naproxen which is an arthritis drug, the brand name of which is Naprosyn, the per cent savings if we use a generic is about 76 per cent. There is a whole list of examples. Every one of these examples is at least 15 per cent cheaper, and in many cases up to 80 per cent cheaper by using generics.

What we can conclude from this is that the consumers in Canada are being gouged by Bill C–91 which allows the pharmaceutical corporations to gouge consumers. New Democrats in this country, New Democrats in this House of Commons, oppose this kind of gouging of consumers.

Even provincial drug plans will not be able to shield Canadians from the high cost of being healthy. Cash strapped provinces will be forced to delete more and more drugs from the list of the products they pay for, creating a situation like that in the U.S. where people are dying because they cannot afford brand name drugs and they do not have an option to purchase generic drugs.

Saskatchewan was convinced that Bill C–91 was a severe blow to health care in Saskatchewan. At that time it estimated it would cost its drug plan between $6 million and $10 million more each year. Not only has it proven to cost $10 million a year more, but it has had to reduce the coverage because of the massive increases in drugs.

The Tories argument in favour of Bill C–91 is that without patent protection Canada is in danger of losing research and development investments. In support of this claim Judy Erola, former Liberal Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and president of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada, resorted to using blackmail as a rallying cry. She claimed that the brand name industry would pass us by if patent protection was not extended. While Bill C–91 is in effect the promised drug jobs have not materialized and in fact layoffs have occurred.

As recently as April 26, 1994 in the Globe and Mail it was stated: "Earlier this month Eli Lilly Canada Inc. of Toronto scrapped a plan to add 150 manufacturing jobs and a major expansion first announced at the time of C–91's passage. The company says it still plans to pump more money into R and D but shelved the $170 million expansion because of cuts dictated by its U.S. parent, the Eli Lilly Company of Minneapolis, Minnesota".

Here is one of many examples of this wonderful Bill C–91 falling short from every single promise that was ever made by the former government.

The problem with the arguments put forward by Ms. Erola is that the drug companies are not legally obligated to use their increased profits to conduct research and create jobs in Canada and past experience points to the contrary. When Bill C–22 was passed by the Tories in 1987 the same promises were made. However, Stats Canada figures show that only 500 new research jobs were created and these were offset by more than 1,000 jobs lost in drug manufacturing. In addition, Canada has no large drug companies with basic research facilities headquartered here.

We have some very serious problems in our health care program in Canada. We have increased prices in drugs which have skyrocketed since the implementation of Bill C–91. I have chosen this motion because it is important not just to me but to millions of Canadians.

I have presented in this House petitions from thousands of people who are opposed to Bill C–91 and want generic drug companies to produce lower cost drugs for their use in terms of addressing their health problems. I have letters from a number of organizations. I want to read one into the record. This was sent to me by Mr. F.J. Lancaster, the immediate past national president of the Federal Superannuates National Association, which represent about 70,000 retired federal civil servants in its 74 branches across the country. He says regarding Bill C–91: "It is insidious legislation and more so because one 10–year extension of patent rights on new drugs had already been granted, I believe in the 1970s, and Bill C–91 was a further sellout to the international drug companies. The costs of prescription drugs have risen dramatically. That is hurting the poor and aged on small incomes and causing some provincial government medical plans to virtually remove from their health care plans benefits related to prescription drugs because the plans cannot afford the coverage".

He continues: "As a result, the users of prescription drugs have had to assume an additional and very heavy financial burden. While our organization is strictly non–partisan, we will fight the government of the day on any legislation inimical to our interests and we will support the efforts of any of our parliamentary representatives who oppose such type of legislation". He represents 70,000 superannuates.

I received a number of letters, one addressed to the Prime Minister from one of my constituents, urging the government to immediately review Bill C–91. This was dated January 5, 1994. I have not yet heard whether the Prime Minister responded. I am sure he responded to this constituent. These are examples of people across the country who are concerned.

Another example is on April 5, 1994 a motion was passed in the Saskatchewan legislature, the province that I represent in this House of Commons, which was unanimously supported that read as follows: "That this assembly urge the federal government to repeal Bill C–91 because it provides excessive profits to foreign drug companies, causes severe financial hardships to prescription drug users, particularly the elderly, and makes provincial drug plans economically impossible".

The entire legislature, which is composed of 54 New Democrats, 3 Liberals and 10 Conservatives, supported this motion unanimously.

Not only is this evidence I provided important, but a poll taken recently conducted with about 1,100 Canadians was done by Insight Canada Research for the Canadian Drug Manufacturers Association. In this poll they found that 63 per cent of Canadian respondents are concerned about the high price of prescription drugs. Seventy–nine per cent of those people reside in Quebec. They say that 79 per cent of the Quebec population are concerned about it, 71 per cent of the population in the prairies are concerned about it and 77 per cent in Atlantic Canada. It also found that 75 per cent of Canadians believe the federal government should control the price of prescription drugs. Eighty–seven per cent of Quebecers believe the federal government should control the price of prescription drugs. They believe they are too high.

I was curious to note in the House of Commons during Question Period today the Bloc Quebecois member who stood up and said: "We oppose repealing Bill C–91. We want to see this bill protected and actually enhanced and strengthened". They believe it is a good bill. That is not surprising because when they were in the previous Parliament they supported this legislation.

What I cannot find a rationale for is that they really are supporting the international pharmaceutical corporations at the expense of gouging their own Quebec French Canadian consumer. They have in essence betrayed their own people. They got elected on a policy of so–called social democracy and the first opportunity they have to protect their people, they knife them in the gut. I think it is disgusting. All I can say is shame on them for that kind of performance and that kind of stand on this very, very important issue.

• (1810)

Bill C–91 is a threat to medicare, it is a threat to our Canadian generic drug manufacturers, it is a threat to consumers of prescription drugs. Bill C–91 is a threat to our provincial drug plans and it is a threat to the sick and the elderly.

It helps no one except the large multinational corporations. It does not help anybody else in this country. That is why I believe the government of the day has to support this.

I might say that in the previous Parliament many members opposite who are now in government, including the Prime Minister of Canada and the Minister of Health, opposed Bill C–91. I am asking them in their positions in cabinet and controlling the government to follow their instincts and their position in the previous Parliament and to repeal Bill C–91.

I end by saying that I was very pleased to hear from many members of Parliament who support this motion, including the member for the riding of Ontario and, of course, the member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce.

I know my time has ended. I reiterate by saying that I am urging the federal government to repeal Bill C–91 for the sake of our social programs, for the sake of medicare, for the sake of the sick and the elderly in our country.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in my place today to respond to the motion put forward by the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden.

We share his concern over the impact of the amendments to the Patent Act that were introduced in the last Parliament. The laws that govern pharmaceuticals must balance many different interests. They must serve the industry, consumers and provincial governments whose health care plans account for about half of prescription sales in this country. As a result, I think it altogether appropriate that the government take a careful look at the results of the changes to the patent laws that were introduced by the last government.

We would like to remind this House that the compulsory licensing regime for drugs was first adopted in 1923 following the example of an act in the United Kingdom. Until 1969, however, few compulsory licences were issued because the act required that active ingredients used in the manufacture of the generic drug would be produced in Canada.

That changed in 1969. In that year the Patent Act was amended to allow generic companies to import active ingredients. This allowed a generic drug sector to develop in Canada.

Under the system that was established compulsory licence applications were filed with the Commissioner of Patents who determined the royalty rate to be paid by generic companies to the patentees. The royalty rate was generally set at 4 per cent of the sales of the generic product. This system continued for the next 18 years.

Some have argued that the system served Canada well. They would point out how the Canadian health care system benefited from cheaper pharmaceuticals. Because the results of their investment, hard work and innovation was not protected by our patent laws, the makers of brand name pharmaceuticals were reluctant to establish research facilities in Canada.

Back in 1969 this was not considered to be as important a cost in light of the benefits of cheaper pharmaceuticals. For one thing, it seemed unlikely that brand name pharmaceutical companies would establish research facilities in this country in any event. After all, most of the innovative pharmaceutical companies were foreign multinationals and they tended to set up their research facilities in their home countries.

Indeed, when a commission of inquiry on the pharmaceutical industry, chaired by Harry Eastman, tabled its report in 1985 it maintained that the innovative pharmaceutical companies were not hurt financially by the compulsory licensing regime. The profits of the industry from 1968 to 1982 were substantially higher than for total manufacturing in most other industries.

In fact, the Eastman commission recommended that compulsory licensing brought a competitive element to the industry. It estimated that it saved Canadian taxpayers and consumers $200 million in 1983 alone. The commission recommended that compulsory licensing be continued but that the royalties paid to patentees be increased to reflect the costs of research and development to the innovator. The report also recommended that patentees be allowed four years of market exclusivity before generic companies would be permitted to enter the market.

• (1815)

The Eastman commission tabled its report at a time of profound change in the worldwide pharmaceutical industry. Mr. Eastman could not have anticipated some changes in the global environment for research and development that were taking place.

The major multinational drug manufacturers were beginning to invest their research and development dollars in countries other than their home country. One of the assurances that they sought in return for this investment was adequate intellectual property protection for their products.

Around the world other leading industrialized countries abandoned their compulsory licensing regimes for drugs. Canada became increasingly isolated in trade discussions and subject to pressure to repeal the compulsory licensing regime.

Many members of the House will recall the bitter debates that took place over the amendments to the Patent Act that were passed in 1987. Pharmaceutical patent owners were guaranteed a period of market exclusivity of seven to ten years instead of the four years that had been the case previously. In exchange, the brand name pharmaceutical companies made a public commitment to increase its research and development to sales ratio from 4.9 per cent, which is where it was in 1987, to 10 per cent by the year 1996.

In fairness to these companies the House should acknowledge that they have been increasing their R and D. The House will recall that the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board was created under Bill C–22 to control the prices of patented medicines as well as to report on R and D investments.

As the House knows, the previous government was not content to leave the patent legislation as it was amended through Bill C–22. In 1993 after another very bitter debate further changes were introduced through Bill C–91.

These amendments abolished the compulsory licensing regime entirely. They did so retroactively. The amendments rendered inoperative any compulsory licence not granted by the Commissioner of Patents as of December 20, 1991. That was the date the so–called Dunkel text of the GATT was made public. The NAFTA also requires implementation on that date. These two trade agreements, the GATT and the NAFTA, limit the possibility for change in patent laws in Canada. Compulsory licensing specifically for drugs is not allowed.

However some changes introduced in Bill C–91 went beyond what was required by these agreements. The government is taking a very close look at ways where it can harmonize the interests within the pharmaceutical industry and among consumers, provincial governments and drug companies.

I also remind the House that Bill C–91 strengthened the powers of the Patent Medicine Prices Review Board. For example, failure to comply with the board's orders now carries a fine of up to $100,000 a day for a company and $25,000 a day for an individual. Although the price tests applied by the board were not changed, new price control factors can now be added by regulation after consultation with stakeholders.

Another aspect of the act to amend the Patent Act should be mentioned here. Regulations were adopted that prevent the health protection branch of Health Canada from approving a generic product before the expiry of the Canadian patents on the brand name equivalent. These regulations have led to many lawsuits within the pharmaceutical industry and the volume of litigation arising from this provision is being reviewed.

These are matters the House must take into consideration when dealing with the motion before us. It would not be appropriate to look at just one side of this very complex issue as the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden has done.

I understand the Minister of Industry has met with representatives of the pharmaceutical industry. He is reviewing carefully the current drug policy and its effect on investments in Canada, job creation and drug prices. He will ensure that consumers are treated fairly.

The challenge is to ensure that drug patent legislation supports the development of Canada's pharmaceutical industry while making patented drugs available to Canadian consumers at affordable prices.

The government will not take the side of the pharmaceutical industry over the side of health care objectives. It will take all interests into consideration. That is what the government is committed to doing. It is what Canadians expect of us. The government is weighing very carefully the various issues at stake and acting upon its commitment to review the drug patent policy.

• (1820)

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, in the next few minutes, I intend to share my comments and concerns about the motion tabled by the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden, who is asking the House to repeal the Patent Act Amendment Act passed by the House in 1993 and better known as C–91.

I must tell you right away that I strongly oppose this motion and I will now explain to my hon. colleagues the reasons behind my position.

To understand all the elements of this debate, we must go back to the past to see what the situation was like in Canada before Bill C–91 and its predecessor, C–22, were passed in 1993 and 1987 respectively.

In 1960, a royal inquiry commission found that drug prices in Canada were too high and recommended establishing a procedure to issue compulsory licences to import and sell patented pharmaceutical products. That is what Canada did in 1969.

This reform led to the creation of a number of pharmaceutical businesses which, after obtaining the compulsory licences, produced and sold generic drugs at lower prices than brand–name drugs. Although the purpose of the reform, namely to control and reduce drug prices, was achieved, it also had a very negative impact. Research in the Canadian pharmaceutical sector dropped dramatically.

To promote research and the growth of the pharmaceutical industry, the federal government created the Eastman Commission in 1984. In its report made public the following year, the commission proposed a major reform which was approved by the government and led to C–22, an Act to amend the Patent Act.

This reform had an ambitious goal: to stop the exodus of Canadian researchers to the U.S., convince pharmaceutical companies to invest more money in research, and put Canada back on the list of industrialized countries where high–tech medical research is done.

Now that we know the background, we understand better the various elements and the reasons that led to this trench war still being fought between generic–drug manufacturers and innovative companies. After supporting the former for over 25 years, the government lived up to the challenge of helping innovative and research companies while ensuring that drug prices remain under control.

We can identify three real consequences of this reform. First, innovative companies made a public promise to increase significantly their investments in pharmaceutical research. These companies kept their word. So these two pieces of legislation resulted in the biggest research and development expansion program ever undertaken in the medical research sector in recent history.

Before 1987, brand–name drug makers spent only 3.5 to 4.5 per cent of their sales revenues on research and development activities. After C–22 was passed, the ratio of research and development spending increased to 6.1 per cent in 1988 and to 9.7 per cent in 1991. The latest figures available, for 1993, show a ratio of 9.9 per cent.

We see that investment on research and development has practically doubled since the two bills were passed, from less than $100 million to more than $400 million invested in medical research, within less than seven years.

Just on this point, we can see that these two laws were a success, but we must hope that drug makers will continue and raise R and D spending to over 10 per cent of sales, to come closer to American innovative companies that invest 14.2 per cent in R and D and their British counterparts, who invest up to 20 per cent.

A second major consequence of this reform was to maintain the price of patented drugs. That was the biggest concern of opponents of C–22 and C–91. Even today, we see in this House that it is still this aspect that seems to give the greatest concern to opponents of this reform.

We must admit that drug prices account for much of the health spending of various governments. An aging population, greater consumption of health care and increasingly sophisticated research affect the kind and amount of drugs consumed and the funds allocated for drugs.

To avoid sudden increases in patented drug prices, the prices review board was created with the mandate, which it still has, of ensuring that innovative companies do not jack up above their actual value the price of patented drugs leaving the factory. The board must therefore take into account the price of drugs sold in other countries, the price of other medication in the same therapeutic category and other factors to determine whether the drug price is excessive. The Minster of Industry and the provincial ministers have the right to intervene at the board's hearings.

From 1987 to 1992, the price of patent drugs increased at an annual average rate of 2.9 per cent, compared to 4.2 per cent for the consumer price index. Since 1988, the price increase has remained lower for patent drugs than for drugs as a whole. We must therefore conclude that the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board, with the added power delegated to it by Bill C–91, was able to fulfil its role and prevent undue price increases for patent drugs.

The third consequence of the reform is mainly the result of Bill C–91, which is the legislation we are now being asked to revoke. Yet, this consequence, which I would call global realignment, is absolutely normal and was unavoidable. In these days of trade liberalization and free trade zones, Canada must provide its industries and its economy with a legislative framework that will allow them to be competitive at the international level. The two acts were passed with that objective in mind.

It is interesting to make a comparison with other industrialized countries. While, as a rule, patents for drugs are granted for 20 years, some countries have gone even farther by extending that 20–year period so as to absorb the marketing period, which can sometimes be up to ten or twelve years. This is the case with the EEC which, since June of 1992, may grant a five–year extension, depending on the length of the marketing period, so as to guarantee exclusivity to patent holders for 15 years.

Japan and Australia have also granted extensions of five and four years. It is in Canada's interest, given its limited market, to ensure that intellectual property laws are governed by GATT proposals. Indeed, the primary objective of Bill C–91 was to align the Canadian legislation on intellectual property of patent drugs with the laws and regulations in effect elsewhere in the world.

The fact is that before Bill C-91 became law, Canada was the only industrialized country which did not treat drugs like any other invention. There is no doubt that in 1993, when it decided to abolish the compulsory licence program for pharmaceutical products and harmonize its policy on intellectual property with the rules governing its major competitors on the international scene, Canada gave itself one of the best tools to get the investments it needs.

The motion asks us to repeal the 1993 act, better known as Bill C-91, to make patent drugs more affordable. Clearly, the provisions contained in the federal act can ensure the protection of consumers against price increases for prescription drugs, while at the same time promoting research and development, as well as the creation of highly skilled jobs.

The protection provided by Canada to pharmaceutical patents before Bill C-91 became law kept product manufacturers from being competitive. While Canadian companies had a seven-year protection, their American and European competitors were being granted exclusivity for 14 years.

• (1830)

Canada and Quebec cannot overlook the favourable conditions offered by our foreign competitors.

I think I have shown that Bill C-91 also provides an adjustment mechanism in this era of freer trade. This legislation enables Canada to adjust and to harmonize its laws and regulations with the international agreements to which it is a party. Bill C-91 was the outcome of a reform which has had positive and desirable consequences on the economy of Quebec and Canada, and this is why I firmly oppose this motion.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important today to put this whole debate into context. First of all, the hon. member moved:

This is all very well but what will we replace it with? You know as well as I do how difficult if not utterly impossible it is to undo an omelet. This debate reminds me a little of the one we had on free trade a few years back. Even though I was one of those who voted against the free trade agreement then, I think it is impossible to go back, considering the investment decisions that have been made since. Going on with the free trade analogy, I think we should undoubtedly take into consideration, for example, the fact that plants that have closed in my riding because of free trade would not reopen if the agreement were cancelled. And those that opened since would surely close their doors. As you can see, when the eggs are broken, that's it! This is what I am trying to explain to this House.

Today we are faced with almost the same situation. An hon. member tells us we should cancel a measure which was approved a year ago. And with what would we replace it? What is the point now that investment decisions have already been made? Will that lower the price of drugs? We do not know. There is no proof of that. Will that encourage other industries? Probably not. Will this make us lose investments which could or should have been announced? This is quite possible. The problem with that kind of motion is that it does not take into account the constant evolution of things. Situations change. Moreover, as parliamentarians, we must realize that the situation changes not only in our country but all over the world.

I must say that, when we were debating Bill C-22 in this House seven years ago, I did not give much thought to the possibility that a GATT agreement would be signed in Marrakesh on April 15, 1994, and even less to the provisions of such an agreement. The same thing is true of Bill C-91.

I come back to Bill C-91 because there is something important about it. A little earlier today, during Question Period, the hon. members opposite said, and that is the other extreme: How dare you say that there will be a review of Bill C-91? You do not have to be a lawyer from Baie-Comeau—to use one of my favourite expressions—to understand that under, section 14 of Bill C-91, the present Act, there must be such a review. It is not optional, it is compulsory, it is written into the law. And guess who voted in favour of that bill? The hon. members of the Bloc who where here during the previous Parliament. They never proposed any amendment to remove that provision from the bill. So I say to them: Do not get carried away.

• (1835)

Do not tell me that this legislation will never be reviewed. You voted for a bill that provided for such a review without proposing an amendment to delete this provision. I have here a copy of Hansard for December 10, 1992. I have looked at it carefully. No such amendment was moved by members of the Bloc in 1992.

Members opposite, do not come and tell me that you are against a review of the act in 1997. If you do, you are a little late, like the rainbow. The rain has already fallen.

So, the act provides for a review to be conducted no later than in 1997. That is reality. Since the members opposite voted for the bill without moving an amendment to delete this provision, we can assume that they were not against it.

Of course, members of my party, including myself, proposed a series of amendments at the time. My amendments were rejected, but that is unimportant. It is water under the Perley Bridge, as they would say in Hawkesbury.

Nevertheless, Bill C-91 became law and that law still exists today. It is unreasonable to suggest that we should repeal it completely, as the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden does in his motion, without offering any alternative to replace it.

I wonder what the hon. member would do if, God forbid, we had to vote on this. It is almost like watching a dog running after a tire, and wondering what would happen if it caught it.

Would he vote for it, knowing what the result would be the day after the vote? It is all very well to propose something, but one should always consider any proposal in the light of the following question: What will happen if it is agreed to? Because, should what he is proposing today get agreed to, the members opposite might face a deplorable situation.

It is easier to propose something, knowing very well that it has no chance of getting agreed to, than to propose something that just might be agreed to by other members of the House. Fortunately, the chances of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden being agreed to are almost nil. I think I have clearly shown why a little earlier.

In 1992 we had a full debate here in this House of Commons on that piece of legislation. At that time, members of various political parties publicly stated their point of view on the bill, and then Parliament, in its wisdom, no matter whether I agree or not with what it did, passed the legislation, but with a provision for a review which must take place in or before 1997. This was provided for in subsections 14(1) and 14(2) of the bill. I am sure you remember this clause very well, Mr. Speaker. You must have read it very carefully yourself.

Repealing this act today is not a solution to be considered, because it does not give us any assurance that prices would drop, that jobs would be created, or that research needed to find new drugs for various illnesses would be conducted.

• (1840)

Mr. Speaker, you know my 16–year–old daughter Julie, who is asthmatic. She must use a pump made by one of the large pharmaceutical companies based in Kirkland. Other similar products, albeit generic products, were recommended to her at one point. In her case, and I do not consider this trivial, the supposedly equivalent generic product did not prove to be effective. Her condition deteriorated. She leads a normal adolescent life, very active, but when she has a bronchitis attack, the situation is quite alarming at home. We must then immediately fetch one of these pumps. As expected, there is one pump in her school bag, and others scattered around the house. When we come across a pump that does not have a well known brand name, we avoid it, because we know the results, or rather, the lack of results that we can expect to have.

Research is crucial. I say this personally, based on my own experience. The member's initiative does not guarantee any improvement, any research, and any reduction in prices. Again, when the eggs are broken, that's it.

[English]

Mr. Hugh Hanrahan (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to discuss the motion introduced by my hon. colleague. Motion 167 allows us to discuss the possibility of repealing Bill C–91 which was passed during the 34th parliament.

I believe that in all fairness to both the generic and to the brand name manufacturers we should hold off on this debate until such time is allowed to determine whether Bill C–91 has had a positive or a negative impact on research and development spending in Canada, employment and health care costs.

In fact, it is already explicitly stated in sections 14(1) and 14(2) of Bill C–91 that a review of this bill will be done in 1997. We should allow the Patent Medicine Price Review Board and the drug manufacturers time to adjust to this new legislation. However, I would like to make a few comments on the motion.

First, I think that it would be useful to examine why we need patent protection in the pharmaceutical industry. Patent protection is crucial to this innovative sector. These companies require a certain amount of market exclusiveness guaranteed to them in the form of patents in order to recoup their research and development expenditures and finance the development of new products.

I believe like other inventions pharmaceutical products are entitled to patent protection. Unlike other products, however, the pharmaceutical industry must undergo a strict regimen of tests and evaluations to determine a product's safety and efficiency before it can be sold commercially. This testing process is rigorous and time consuming, involving animal and clinical trials.

Essentially Bill C–91 allows patent extensions to approximately three or four years. This extension still does not bring us in line with the rest of the world. In fact, the European Community averages 15 years, the U.S. 14, while Canada is at 10. It is little wonder that Canada has also one of the lowest research and development spending levels compared with the rest of the developed world.

Since 1987 when Bill C–22, the previous amendment to the Patent Act, was introduced R and D in Canada also increased. It was through Bill C–22 that multinational pharmaceutical manufacturers agreed to spend 10 per cent of Canadian sales in R and D in Canada. As a result R and D in Canada has increased approximately 250 per cent between 1988 and 1992. However, as mentioned earlier, it is too soon to determine just what impact Bill C–91 will have on the R and D spending in Canada in the long run.

Yet I do know that since the passage of Bill C–91 the pharmaceutical industry has spent over $600 million in research and development in Canada. This is a large capital output which has been a benefit to all regions of Canada.

Other key issues that must be considered are the mandate and powers of the Patented Medicine Price Review Board. This body was created under amendment to the Patent Act enacted in Bill C–22. The board was also amended in Bill C–91 during the last Parliament. The board is a quasi–judicial body which has the power to issue corrective orders when at the outcome of a hearing it is determined that the price of a patented drug sold in Canada was excessive. The board's jurisdiction extends to all patented medicines sold in Canada, whether they be prescription or non–prescription.

The mandate of the board is threefold: first, to ensure that the factory gate prices of patent medicines charged by the drug companies are not excessive; second, to report annually on the activities and pricing trends in the pharmaceutical industry; and, third, to report annually on research and development expenditures by the patented medicine industry.

The board's pricing guidelines ensure that no medicines exceed the international range regardless of the category in which the drug falls. These guidelines also ensure that price increases do not surge above the estimated consumer price index.

Since the creation of the board the prices of patent medicines in Canada have increased on average less than the consumer price index per year. Prior to the establishment of the board prices of the patent medicines rose on the average twice that of the consumer price index.

The principal amendments to the Patent Act brought about by Bill C–91 include new remedies for firms that charge excessive prices. These remedies include ordering price reductions, ordering a monetary payment in the amount of the excess revenues, and the extension of the patent life of patent medicines by approximately three years.

With the adoption of Bill C–22 the pharmaceutical industries in Canada increase both their patent protection life and the amount of employees hired. In fact employment increased by almost 15 per cent from 1987 to 1991. Again I believe we should have had a longer time period in order to assess the impact Bill C–91 will have on the employment rate in the pharmaceutical industry.

Another key area that must be examined is whether or not the extension of the patent life to 20 years has increased health care costs in Canada. Again the jury is still out. There has not been sufficient time to do a realistic study of the prices of medicines in Canada that relate directly to the patent life. Bill C–91 allows the board to be an effective control and watchdog that has some real teeth to it, which ensures that drug prices do not become an albatross to the health care system.

According to the executive director of the Newfoundland Hospital and Nursing Home Association, the boards have brought the pricing back down and companies have made large settlements. The Drug Prices Review Board seems to have done some very positive things which have brought companies into line.

As mentioned earlier the board has a new mandate which is ensuring that those manufacturers that wish to break the pricing standards will be financially accountable.

If we look at the total costs of health care the pharmaceutical industry's portion of these costs is approximately 2 per cent of health care expenditure in Canada. Therefore I am not overly convinced that allowing these companies an extension in patent longevity is the driving force behind our increasing health care costs.

A comparison between the generic industry in Canada and the United States illustrates a few interesting points. There are two Canadian companies that control 80 per cent to 90 per cent of the generic market in Canada and their prices average 60 per cent to 80 per cent of the brand name product. In the U.S. there are 200 to 300 companies that compete in the marketplace and the prices of the generic manufacturing there average 25 per cent to 35 per cent of the brand name product.

I must state we are premature in discussing the pros and cons of Bill C–91 because it has not been enacted long enough to make a well informed, unbiased decision. I would think we would be better suited to discuss this issue in the future, allowing both generic and brand name manufacturers to have sufficient time to make changes and work within the new bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1) the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

MANPOWER TRAINING

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, on April 13, I asked a question to the Minister of Human Resources Development concerning the new apprenticeship program for young people which, as you know, is now called "Young Apprentices". Unfortunately, my question was not answered satisfactorily.

What I was asking the minister was to commit himself to give Quebec its fair share of the program funds so that it could invest them according to its own needs and priorities.

Instead of answering my question, the Minister of Human Resources Development criticized some figures that I had not even mentioned in terms of vocational training. Vocational training is a provincial responsibility. The next day representatives from both the Parti Quebecois and the Liberal Party of Quebec in the National Assembly unanimously passed a motion asking the federal government to withdraw from vocational training.

Quebec was not the only one to make this request to the minister. At least three other provinces also expressed their reservations to the minister, which seemingly caused the cancellation of the federal–provincial conference that was expected for the next Monday.

Since then, the minister has continued to go forward unilaterally with this "Young Apprentices" Program, despite the fact that vocational training is, and I repeat it, the exclusive responsibility of the provinces.

Using federal spending power, with about 24 per cent of tax revenues coming from Quebec, the Minister of Human Resources Development admitted yesterday before a parliamentary committee that he used funds formerly allocated to community agencies to partly finance his new programs. For the benefit of Quebecers, I may point out that these programs are commonly referred to as direct employment programs.

I think it is highly improper to divert funds allocated to agencies that focus on local community development, in order to finance a new intrusion into a field of provincial jurisdiction. Hundreds of community agencies are now waiting for a reply from the Minister of Human Resources Development.

They talk about new models and new programs but never about new budget envelopes. They just recycle and fiddle with the existing envelopes for community agencies.

Does the minister really think he can fool us? When will the federal government finally understand that it is now time to reduce duplication, get rid of bureaucratic fat, encourage consultation on program financing and respect provincial jurisdictions such as education and job training?

• (1855)

Will the minister finally understand that we can save more than $300 million if he stops the duplication in the field of job training and if he gives the Government of Quebec the money he intends to spend in this area?

Finally, will the minister show some common sense and abide by the unanimous resolution of the Quebec National Assembly on job training and the various programs for young people recently announced by the minister?

[English]

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I begin by saying that in the government's recent announcement of the youth employment and learning strategy we stated that we would work in close collaboration with all the provinces in the implementation of the approaches and specific programs for young Canadians. In saying this the government is committed to assisting Canada's youth through programs that complement those offered by the provinces.

Quebec has a very different apprenticeship program from those in all other provinces. In Quebec those who wish to learn a trade attend a CEGEP for two or three years and then seek out an employer. In other provinces a person who wants to learn an apprenticeship trade must find an employer who is willing to employ and to train him or her. As a result Quebec does not require nearly as many funds for apprenticeship as do other provinces. Therefore funds are allocated where they are most needed, such as for the forms of vocational training offered at CEGEPs.

In addition Quebec still receives more than its fair share for the province's youth through regular employment programs and services, as well as through special current initiatives such as the joint management of co–operative education and project based training courses which are jointly delivered with the SQDM.

We will continue to work with the province of Quebec to set priorities for our youth programs and, where possible, we will harmonize our programs with those of the province of Quebec.

HYUNDAI PLANT IN BROMONT

Mr. Gaston Péloquin (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development–Quebec and it concerns the status of the Hyundai automobile plant in Bromont.

As the minister already knows, more than 850 workers lost their jobs when the plant closed. On March 23 last, I put a question to the minister asking him if he could provide any information to the residents of Brome—Missisquoi as to how the government planned to handle this matter. At the time, the Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development–Quebec informed us that he wanted to work closely with the Quebec government in an effort to find a way of reopening this plant located in my riding.

Today, nearly one month after putting this question to the minister, I am again asking him for a status report on the efforts made thus far to bring this matter to a happy resolution.

For over a month now, all kinds of rumours have been making the rounds about the possible reopening of the Hyundai plant. It has been rumoured that work will resume either in 1998, in the year 2000 or in the year 2002, that the plant will close permanently, that other companies have agreed to buy the building. And I could go on. Furthermore, the employees received very little severance pay from the company.

You will agree with me that the situation is already quite difficult and that it is essential for the Hyundai workers, their families and those around them, as well as for all the taxpayers of Brome—Missisquoi, that we avoid creating still more confusion on this issue.

It is time for the Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec to tell this House what he has done and what he intends to do so that the Bromont plant can reopen to make cars or any other product that would put back to work the 850 workers who are waiting to use their talents and dedication.

• (1900)

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri-food): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by expressing once again the great disappointment felt by the government following the decision of Hyundai Canada to delay the reopening of the Bromont plant indefinitely.

We are well aware that a definite closing of this facility would be an immense loss not only for the eastern townships but indeed for all of Quebec. I would like to state today, however, that we do not regard this as a dead issue and we are not going to sit back and resign ourselves to our fate.

We have therefore undertaken consultations with the Quebec government in the hope of finding a solution to this problem. I would like to add that during a recent visit to South Korea in early April the Minister for International Trade had an opportunity to speak to the chief executive officer of the Hyundai group, Mr. Chung, as well as the chairman of the board of Hyundai Motor, the parent company of Hyundai Canada, a gentleman by the name of Mr. Chong.

Both of these gentlemen, I stress, clearly indicated their firm intention of reopening the Bromont plant for the assembly of a competitive vehicle which could carve out a place for itself in the automotive market.

Hyundai's directors have mentioned that they intend to submit a business plan in the fall of 1994. We will examine this document carefully. We will go over it a second time with the Quebec government. The results of this examination will determine the type of support we will give to Hyundai to carry out its plans and reopen the Bromont plant.

Our government is committed to setting the economy of this country back on the road to prosperity. Our actions are an integral part of our desire to provide all Canadians with productive and well paid jobs like those in the automotive industry.

TRADE

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, on April 22 I raised with the Minister for International Trade a question concerning the recent decision by the U.S. government which affected Canadian exports of durum wheat.

What happened at that time is that the American farm lobby pressured the U.S. government, the U.S. trade representative and the President to initiate some anti-dumping regulations and penalties according to the GATT agreement.

What this has done is really create an air of uncertainty for Canadian farmers, in particular farmers I represent in the province of Saskatchewan. The problem we have with this is that the Americans in every election year seemed to initiate a number of anti-dumping and countervailing actions on our Canadian exports.

This is a very serious concern because it seems that we signed the free trade agreements in 1988 and NAFTA in 1993. We signed last week the GATT agreements to facilitate freer trade, competitive trade between nations, particularly between Canada and the U.S.

Since these agreements have been signed we tend to have all of these actions, which are extremely difficult for many of our producers, particularly the grain producers in western Canada and in other parts of the country when they have a very good market. They have a very good product and they are very competitive in terms of their product. It is not subsidized to any great extent. It is an action of fair trade.

I was not totally pleased with the response I received during question period. It was very short. What I wanted to do is give an overview of my experience in Washington last week. I met with a number of U.S. congressmen to discuss trade issues as well as with the U.S. trade representative and other people.

What I concluded from all this is that in private the U.S. congressmen understand the issue of durum wheat imports into the U.S. They understand the complexities of trade and the commonalties between the U.S. and Canada. In many ways they are aware of the very important fact that Canada is the U.S.' major trading partner and vice versa.

Privately they are very consoling and they are saying do not worry about these things, they are pretty important to the farmers they represent but it is election year.

This is the point. We have all of the Congress of 435 representatives, congressmen, running for re–election this fall. We have 34 of the hundred senators running for re–election in the U.S. this fall. It seems that every two years, which is a very gruelling schedule for elections, the U.S. has a large number of these anti–dumping and countervailing actions taken upon Canada. It is not only Canada, it always means to target other countries like Brazil and Europe and South America and some of the Pacific rim countries, but it always includes Canada because it is really politically astute for it.

My question at this time is the same except I would like a little more information from the government. Can we have this government's assurance that it is going to protect Canadian farmers' interests and not cave in to this American pre–election posturing?

What I am looking for in specific terms is what is our week by week, month by month response to this action, which I classify as an unfriendly action on our country, to the Americans and to some of the businesses that are based in America that do business with Canada?

Can the hon. member give us a precise overview on what that might be?

Mr. Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri–food): In the brief time available to me, Mr. Speaker, I think I can help the member.

This is certainly an issue that has top priority with the government. It is an issue that has been raised at the highest level and that is between our Prime Minister and the President of the United States. The minister of agriculture, the Minister for International Trade and the government have the intention and the will to stand firm and hard in order to conclude an agreement which will respect the interests of the Canadian agricultural industry.

Specifically our object in these negotiations is to reach a deal that will protect Canada's access to the United States and which provides certainty and predictability for our agricultural and agri–food producers.

As the minister of agriculture has stated many times, there can be no deal unless it is a good deal for Canada. This means a good deal for the grains, food processing and supply managed sectors.

With respect to grains, we know that on April 22, last Friday, the United States notified the GATT of its intention to renegotiate tariffs on Canadian wheat and barley under GATT article XXVIII. By notifying us this did not shut the border. Negotiations can continue for 90 days, and if at the end of that 90–day period the United States is determined and takes a unilateral action we will retaliate in kind. We will protect and we will defend the interests of Canada and the Canadian producers.

We trade fairly with the United States. Our success there has been because of our high quality and because of a shortage there; a shortage there that has been mainly created by its export enhancement program which has taken products out of the United States in order to take advantage of its huge export subsidies.

Throughout these negotiations which began in December we have consulted closely with the industry and the provincial governments on a very high level. We will continue to do that because we know that the bilateral trade between Canada and the United States of $11.5 billion is important. We are committed to ensuring that this trade continues to grow for the advantage and for the future positive effects and mutual benefits to both countries.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, I put my question to the Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec.

It pertains to Opération Dignité II. Representatives from this organization came to Ottawa to raise awareness among government members, because they felt their message was not getting through. They are from rural areas. I do not understand. Governments change, we had the Conservatives, and now the Liberals who were here also before the Conservatives, but the rural areas are more and more dependant on UI and welfare.

• (1910)

Now, unemployment insurance is being cut. Years ago, the Eastern Quebec Development Bureau spent millions of dollars to close small parishes. Instead of creating employment they went out of their way to close villages. Fortunately some people in those places took things into their own hands. There was the first Operation Dignity, the Ralliement populaire—a citizens' coalition, and the creation of corporations to pool woodlots, the pooling of resources by land owners.

There were many demonstrations in the streets under the banner of the Ralliement populaire and we were able to get a plant, Panval de Sébec. People managed to keep open the parish of Sainte–Paule which was scheduled to close. I invite you, Mr. Speaker, as well as the minister of regional development, to come and visit this parish which took hold of its own destiny.

Other municipalities did the same thing. But governments do not seem to have any political will, they seem to be trying to turn the Gaspé Peninsula into a huge park. It is harder for us to get a bit of money for a slaughterhouse than it is for Hibernia to get billions. And all this money might not be bring a good return on investment, while a few dollars for a slaughterhouse in our area would make sure that our beef would stay in our region, instead of going to Montreal or Toronto on the hoof and coming back as meat.

What was done over the last twenty years? Millions are spent on unemployment while we are just asking for a few thousand, a few million maybe, to produce finished products, but we are being refused. That is the reason why I was not at all satisfied with the minister's answer. I have this second chance, and I am sure that the parliamentary secretary will give me his vision of rural life. The minister promised he would come to my riding next summer. He said so on the 17th, when I invited him to come and talk to the residents of the Gaspé Peninsula.

[English]

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by saying to the member that I cannot speak on the minister's coming to his riding but one day I would love to visit his riding and I hope that one day he will come and visit my riding in downtown Toronto.

To the member I want to say that even though he looks after his people in a rural setting and I am in a downtown setting we both share and care in the same way. What the government is trying to do is take a number of steps that hopefully will put people back to work.

We are not just reforming the unemployment insurance system. We are also trying to urge the financial institutions and the banks of Canada to be more generous in their attitude toward small and medium size businesses, the businesses that the member described in his riding. With the support of his colleagues in committee we are beginning to have some success in that area. We are trying with our infrastructure program to get some activity stimulated in the member's community and throughout all of Quebec and Canada.

We are also trying to the best of our ability to reform the tax system in the finance committee. There are a number of things we are trying to do. We know that there is a great sense of urgency and we are doing our best to move these projects forward.

Make no mistake about it, the member's riding will get the same attention and the same care as any other riding of any other member in this House.

On behalf of the minister I want to say that we do care about the pain that the member's constituents are experiencing and we are going to do our best to make sure that some of that pain can be relieved in the not too distant future.

DEFENCE INDUSTRY

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, two weeks ago, I asked a question of the Minister of Industry who, very casually, did not bother answering it. And yet, I was asking him a very important question regarding the conversion of defence industries to civilian production.

As you know, for the last three years, due to the international situation and defense budget cuts, the industries involved with defense production, 60 per cent of which are located in Quebec, have been going through horrendous times.

So much so that 10,000—Mr. Speaker, you heard right, I see worry on your face—jobs were lost in the military sector and it is the reason why I had asked the minister to highlight the concrete measures his government intends to take to remedy this disastrous situation.

I was flabbergasted when I realized that all he did was skate around the issue. The minister, whom I thought was an earnest man, could not tell us anything in spite of the promises made by his government during the election campaign. They are in the red book which has know become a black book for Canadians.

This government must give us its agenda and assist these industries. There are 600 in Quebec, 30 of them in jeopardy for lack of orders. And yet they have plans, and they know how to go about this long–awaited diversification.

Allow me to quote the great Quebec specialist in the area of conversion strategies, Professor Yves Bélanger who made a statement confirming my own conviction in the Le Soleil on April 16. He said the defence industry is not lacking in diversification ideas, especially given the fact that it gathered the greatest concentration of specialists attracted there by good salaries and research conditions.

And Professor Bélanger concluded that we must act quickly and adequately since recent experiences show that it takes from five to seven years to convert half a company's capacity from military to civilian production. We will necessarily lose some very important players along the way if the government does not act swiftly.

One wonders why the government does nothing; it certainly has the proper tool for it, namely the Defence Industry Productivity Program under the management of minister Manley and his department. It is the perfect instrument, the ideal vehicle for the implementation of a conversion program.

How come the minister has not found the vim to propose a schedule, and a concrete plan for addressing that problem which weighs heavily upon that important industrial sector?

Mr. Speaker, you have here a man who is demoralized by this negligence on the part of the government, but I want you to know that the fight will not end for us until the government presents a concrete program or schedule. It can be sure that we will continue to fight relentlessly as long as the government will not have produced a real program including a schedule.

The stakes are too high for Quebec for us to allow the government to fail to produce a work schedule by the end of the session. We challenge it to act on this, Mr. Speaker, and you can be sure that we will be watching it closely and urging it to exercise great caution.

[English]

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I begin by saying how disappointed I am that the member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve does not appreciate the British humour of the Minister of Industry. This is something we on this side of the House are all quite proud of.

I want to tell the member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve that we are committed to carrying out our promise to assist defence industries in transition from high technology military production to high technology civilian production.

The member knows, because this member is educated and he is very close to these issues, that this is not like buying a can of soup, putting it in a microwave and 20 seconds later it is ready to eat. This is a very complex issue. The exercise of converting these defence industries into industries that are going to be viable in peacetime is very complex.

The member should know that we are committed and we are working with several organizations, especially in Quebec. As he knows, in the February budget the DIPP program was explicitly targeted for redesign and we are working with many companies such as Oerlikon and Paramax, so I would ask the member to please bear with us.

I think by the time we return from China along with the member and 100 small and medium–sized businessmen from all over Canada who are going there with us, there will be even more action on the DIPP conversion program.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT AGREEMENTS ACT

The House resumed from April 26 consideration of the motion that Bill C–22, an act respecting certain agreements concerning the redevelopment and operation of terminals 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson International airport, be read the second time and referred to a committee; and of the amendment; and of the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C–22 which is the Liberal government response to the Pearson airport fiasco it inherited from the previous government.

We all know that over the last number of years the previous government tried to address itself to the cost and administration of regional airports in this country. One of the things it tried to do was follow through on a different policy regarding its budget management by setting up local airport authorities and quasi–independent authorities.

The administration and financing of airports were moved off the government's balance sheet and therefore away from the government's deficit. This allowed these independent authorities to borrow on their own although the loans were guaranteed by the federal government. Because the federal government guarantees a loan it allows them to avoid bringing forth documents to show that the budget would have been that much larger, yet the amount of money borrowed by the government and its institutions would nonetheless remain the same.

This was part of the smoke and mirrors used by the previous government to deceive the Canadian public as to the true situation of this country's finances. The previous government should be ashamed of that approach. Of course the election showed that Canadians had lost complete faith in its approach to the situation.

Because of the magnitude of Pearson airport and because it was the only profitable airport in the country, the Conservatives decided they would take a different approach. They entered into negotiations which were behind the scenes and not public tender to lease, sell and give away property belonging to the taxpayers.

It seems ironic they would choose their friends and those of other political parties to come forth and negotiate with the government behind the scenes. The agreement would allow them to take charge of one of the prime federal assets in this country, hundreds of acres of property close to downtown Toronto. They would have a sweetheart lease on it for many years which guaranteed them income, all at the taxpayers' expense.

When the situation blew up in their faces during the last election this government decided it was time to do something about it and said to stop the deal from going forward. Of course the government did not heed the cries and concerns of the electorate and the last government in its dying days signed a deal.

Now we have the present government's response to that in Bill C–22. It is going to kill the deal signed by the former federal government. It was a sad day for Canada, for government and for administration in this country when the previous government entered into the contract. However, it is an equally sad day when the government presents Bill C–22 in which it is going to use its force and power to override a signed agreement.

The phrase force majeure means if someone of a higher authority exerts their power to kill a legitimate transaction that is already in agreement, it is perfectly acceptable in law. But when the federal government enters into a transaction with the private sector and then changes its mind, no one in the private sector can do that without recourse. Nonetheless the federal government has used its power, the ultimate power in this country, to cancel the agreement which has already been signed.

• (1010)

Our position in the Reform Party is that we do not like the bill. It gives compensation to some people who knew that the Canadian taxpayer disagreed and knew the Canadian taxpayer was being taken to the cleaners in this situation. We do not like the bill because the minister, in the sum of millions of dollars to be determined, is going to compensate them for the costs they incurred in the negotiations on this contract. They knew it was contrary to public policy and contrary to the desires and benefits of the Canadian taxpayer. Now they feel they are entitled to compensation because they entered into that type of a negotiation.

The taxpayer is being taken to the cleaners. The Canadian taxpayer is being insulted by this bill. In our opinion the people on the other side should not be entitled to any compensation whatsoever. They knew when they signed the contract there was a very good chance if the Liberals won the election that the contract would be gone. For them to wait another week or two for the outcome of the election would have prevented them from being in a position to claim any money from the government whatsoever.

Therefore, being responsible to the taxpayers and being concerned about taxpayers' money, our position is that this bill should be defeated and voted down. No compensation whatsoever should be paid to the group that signed the lease.

I mentioned on a wider topic that the whole local airport authority concept as it was envisaged by the previous government was an attempt to move some borrowing off the balance sheet and off the budget. We disagree with that as well. The Auditor General has looked at these situations over the past number of years. He has been quite critical of the way the government has approached the method of financing and administration of the airports.

It is time this government that is so new in its mandate decided to review the whole area of administration and financing of this country's airports. It should develop a clear, concise policy to ensure this type of boondoggle does not happen again, to ensure that the taxpayers are respected and that their money is spent wisely and fairly for the benefit of all Canadians in the transfer of people moving around in this country.

That is the position of the Reform Party. I hope that the government will take that into serious consideration and if this bill does go forward, when it comes time to negotiate with the other parties that the amount is kept if not to nil, to an absolute minimum.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup): Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House today has a very evocative title: the Pearson International airport Agreements Act.

Pearson airport has become a symbol of all the old partisan practices and the more or less above-board lobbying that goes on in a parliamentary system when elected representatives do not have sufficient control.

It is also a test of the present Liberal governement's approach to such practices. I agree that they inherited a deal that had been "negotiated" by the Conservatives, but it seems that, although Prime Ministers have changed, their friends remain the same. On the list of lobbyists who were involved in this deal, we find as many friends or contributors on both the Liberal and what used to be the Conservative side.

The point I would like to make this morning is that we often try to rationalize the lack of development in the regions by pointing to a lack of initiative in these regions or similar arguments.

• (1015)

I would like to say that perhaps the real reason is that these regions are not part of the more or less legal, sometimes "shady" networks of lobbyists. As a joke, I said to one of my colleagues: I wish there was a bill on certain agreements concerning the development of eastern Quebec. This might give us some insight into why our projects, which are prepared by development agencies, local contractors and regional authorities acting in good faith, or even by citizens groups, are seldom successful in attacking the dollars they need.

In other words, spending $250,000 in my region has always seemed more complicated than spending $250,000 on the Pearson airport deal, where $250,000 is a drop in the bucket compared to what will be paid just to the lobbyists, for instance.

So what we have here is a double standard. In the case of Pearson airport, the big bucks network makes sure everyone around those who set up this deal gets their share.

We would have liked to see this bill specify exactly what form of compensation, if any, will be provided for a given part of the contract and how it will be awarded, so that there is an open process.

One might also ask how we got into this mess. What is it in our system that lets people who are not elected have more clout than those who are? When we look at the list of people involved in the Pearson deal, those who lobby the government for a decision, why do we see so few elected representatives and so many what I would call powers behind the throne?

I think we have a system that has lost control over the way it operates, and I heard the same comment from voters during the election campaign. It does't take a genius to see that, in our current federal political system, there is a lot of waste, a lot of money going down the drain. So why is this happening? Of course we should always allow for some margin of error in the way we do things, but there is no excuse for this kind of behaviour, and I think that the Liberal government which was elected on a promise of transparency will be judged on how it settles the Pearson question. As I see it, what is in this bill falls very wide of the mark and there is certainly a lack of transparency.

What the government proposes is a bill with a kind of fragmented authority, a bill so full of holes that all parties can get what they want out of it. Another reason why this kind of arrangement was tabled is the fact that the political parties which have formed of government in Canada since this country's inception were always financed, more or less openly, by people who do not vote. By this I mean companies, unions and other organizations which, in the final analysis, do not vote and thus do not give a mandate to our elected representatives. In this connection, I would like to mention the public financing bill in Quebec, which has caused a significant shift in the behaviour and authority of elected representatives and lobbyists.

In Quebec, and the same applies to the Bloc as far as party financing is concerned, the only lobbyists who can influence us are people who contributed to our fundraising campaign as citizens and individuals.

• (1020)

In the case of federal parties, and this applies to the current government in particular, funding is provided by these very same people who, merely by changing hats, become lobbyists. They sign on to lobby for a given company, thereby placing the government in a very difficult situation. It can hardly say no to someone who, more as a corporate citizen than as an individual, has made a major financial contribution.

Next week, we will likely proceed to debate a motion on the funding of political parties. I find it totally logical that this motion was introduced by the member for Richelieu and that it ties in with the debate on Pearson airport. I think the government should take a lesson from the opposition in the case of Pearson, take a good hard look at its motives and determine how, in future, it can avoid a recurrence of situations such as this.

Regarding the sub–amendment moved by the Reform Party, my initial impression was that it was a technical amendment. However, on further consideration, since it adds the words "in Canada", it reflects more accurately the Canadian reality.

Why has Ontario always benefitted more from economic development in Canada? Is it because there are more entrepreneurs or more leadership in this province? I do not believe this is the reason. I think it is a question of networks and of contacts people have with political parties. In this respect, the Reform Party's sub–amendment is interesting because it proves to us that, in Canada, some people are more equal than others.

We want the government to take this principle of equality to heart either by amending or withdrawing the bill respecting certain agreements concerning Pearson International airport. In its place, we would like the government to introduce a bill entitled an Act respecting the Pearson airport agreement. This bill would shed light once and for all on whether friends of the government benefitted from this agreement. It would also give us an indication of whether in future the Liberals intend to take a different course of action.

Considering that, during the election campaign, a $1,000, $2,000 or $3,000 a plate dinner was held—I am not sure exactly which it was—this could be viewed as a warning sign of the direction which the government intends to take. In my view, it is important that a clear signal now be sent out that, in Canada and in Quebec, it is possible to have development issues addressed without having to resort to parallel circuits. What matters should be the relevance of the project, not whether a company is an influential friend of the government.

In this respect, it is important that all Canadians be made fully aware of the situation and that this debate uncover the whole truth about this transaction. All aspects of the deal must be fully explored.

[English]

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley): Mr. Speaker, having read through the Nixon report and previewed statements made by the Minister of Transport and other government members, it is very clear to me that the government and the leader of the Liberal Party were wise in raising concerns during the election about this agreement that was struck between the previous government and the Pearson airport authority.

It brings to mind how this deal came about. It was signed October 7 in the middle of a general election. When the deal was signed it was made very clear by the Leader of the Opposition, who it was evident was going to be the next Prime Minister, that when he became Prime Minister the deal would be reviewed and perhaps rescinded. The people who came together and invested in the Toronto Pearson deal knew in advance that it was a risky venture. They knew at that time there was a very real possibility that the deal would be struck down. We applaud the government's decision to revoke this agreement by bringing forward Bill C–22. I quote the minister on the reasons why he felt the need to revoke this deal: "The deal was surrounded by a reliance on lobbyists, by backroom dealings, by the manipulation of bona fide private sector investors and the lack of respect for the impartiality of public servants".

We can appreciate the reasons why the minister made this move, why the government made this decision. It causes me concern and it causes the Reform Party concern that anyone would expect to get reimbursed for having put together a proposal for government to consider, and for any out of pocket costs that it might have incurred after submitting the tender.

It causes me concern that the government is asking the House to give it a blank cheque to compensate for out of pocket expenses those investors when the investors knew it was very risky in the first place. My experience with government contracts and tenders is that a cost is involved in preparing documentation for a proposed contract, and that for all those many people who put proposals forward before government, they never get reimbursed for the expenses incurred in putting the proposal together.

I am concerned in this instance that we have a clause in the bill that allows for compensation to be paid. We have to continually remember the date that this contract was signed, which was October 7, in the middle of a general election. Is consideration being given for out of pocket expenses prior to that date or are we talking about after October 7, after the contract was actually signed? It is very important that the government remember that companies making a proposal for government do so at their own risk and at their own expense. They should not be compensated.

I would suggest that anybody who was made well aware by the media and by the statements of the soon to be Prime Minister that the investment was very risky, going ahead and spending more money after October 7 did so at his or her own peril.

This government, if it is truly committed to rejecting the previous government's way of doing business, the Tory way of doing business, will send a loud and clear message today that if you involve yourself in a questionable arrangement with a government in the dying hours of its mandate, you do so at your own peril. If the government wants to show this group and others in the lobbying business that it was wrong and that government has to take a firm stand, half measures will not do. I would like to suggest to the government that it take out any concept of reimbursing the private sector for doing business with the government.

The minister went on to say that the Minister of Transport may, with the governor in council, approve appropriate payments to the partnership for its out of pocket expenses. I mentioned before that it sounds like a blank cheque. We have no idea what these out of pocket expenses might be. It is definitely going to be in the millions of dollars. I do not think that Canadian taxpayers owe anything to a group of investors that got involved in a risky venture at best.

Canadians want their government to reject the type of patronage that was shown in this instance. If it pays this group, it is completely undermining the message that it is trying to send to Canadians. I do not think this bill should provide a consolation prize.

When one gets into the discussion of the appropriate place for government to be, there are other options of how government can remove itself from direct control of airport operations. It has done so successfully in the Vancouver International airport, the Edmonton International airport, the Calgary International airport and Montreal by establishing local airport authorities, non–profit organizations, with the ability to provide the service that Canadians expect with no consideration for making money for themselves.

Although I am not an expert in civil aviation, I am a frequent customer of the Vancouver airport. It is not because I want to be, it is because I have to be. From a consumer's point of view I am really quite impressed with what the private sector is doing at that airport.

The Vancouver airport is the second largest airport in Canada. It is undergoing major expansion. A second main runway is being built. The terminal is being greatly enlarged. The local authority there is planning ahead to capitalize on the ever increasing Pacific rim market. While this expansion is actually taking place, the Vancouver International airport appears to be running smoother than ever before.

The services in the existing terminal are better and more accessible than they were in the past. Despite some early objections to the airport improvement fee, which is payable by everybody using the airport, it is being used for expansion of the airport.

Canadians are quite prepared to see a user pay system come into play so that the people who are actually using the services are the ones who are paying for it, not the general taxpayer who if ever or very seldom uses the airports under consideration.

The airports have to provide a service but it is best left in the hands of the private sector. The government has to consider this as an option when it is finished with the contract for the Pearson airport. The government has to remember what the role of government should be in the operation of an airport. I feel the government's role is to ensure that the flying public has a safe, affordable and convenient means of travel. It is not to make profits or have politics as a priority.

The non–profit airport authorities appear to be a good way to ensure that public interest comes first and that the service is there for the public.

If the previous government had taken this approach we would not be in this mess with Bill C–22. If the current government wants to avoid problems in the future it should do two things. First, it should scrap any payments to the Pearson Development Corporation and second, it should carefully examine the effectiveness of a non–profit authority running Pearson International airport.

[Translation]

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to rise today on Bill C–22 tabled by the Minister of Transport, a bill that cancels the agreements to privatize Pearson airport. This whole affair can certainly not be held up as an example to follow. It is to me—and to the majority of Canadians, I am sure—a total mess in all respects. A mess founded on blatant patronage on an unprecedented scale.

It is an enormous cloud behind which the players, who are certainly no angels, worked to reach their goal: get their hands on the No. 1 airport in Canada, a profitable and promotable facility, under certain terms of the agreement.

I think this case could be described as anything but transparent and open. Every step is surrounded by very troubling facts. The way this case was handled is no way to promote the role and image of governments and elected representatives.

The Pearson agreement, signed in the midst of the election campaign and whose cancellation was announced by the Prime Minister on December 3, requires a thorough examination. This whole affair must be cleared up quickly and in broad daylight.

• (1035)

This was not done by the Nixon report, which was conducted in private—again, demonstrating a lack of transparency and openness, and which the Prime Minister commissioned and used as a basis to cancel the agreements. Instead of Nixon's quick and superficial look, people want an in-depth public enquiry to really determine the facts surrounding the negotiations on the agreement, in particular whether the firms involved should be compensated. I remind the government that several members from the Toronto region have demanded such a public enquiry. I hope that the little they got, namely the Nixon report, will lead them to continue to press their case. Let us hope that their party's gag order will not turn them into sheep.

Commissioning the Nixon report shows a real lack of will and courage. They wanted to look at this case and keep it under covers. The Liberals, led by the Prime Minister, preferred not to make waves to avoid splashing anyone. However, many questions remain unanswered. People have a right to know every detail of this case.

In this affair, decision makers were surrounded by many people called lobbyists. As we all know, especially the ministers opposite, various groups call on lobbyists to defend their specific and well defined interests. These lobbyists, that the law divides into two classes: professionals and employees, haunt lobbies, pay visits to decision makers, and communicate with public officials and ministers to influence their decisions.

In the airport case, it is clear that lobbyists played a crucial if not predominant role. At every step of the way, including the Nixon report, the close links between the players produced results. If we look at the parties involved, it is easy to establish close connections between them and the decision maker; we can even picture a big spider web where everyone got caught in the end. Conservatives and Liberals found themselves mixed up in this case. Former ministers, organizers and chiefs of staff, and old friends of the old parties, they all worked together. They used their knowledge of the system, the people and the situation to influence decision makers to their advantage or that of their clients.

One wonders whether these people are not more influential now than when they used to work right in political circles. They have the financial resources they need to achieve well defined objectives.

Faced with all this systematic and well-organized influence, we must question our governments' decision-making process and wonder if our political system and its supporters are preyed on by lobbyists. Are our decision makers independent? Do they make allowances? Are they vulnerable to all this pressure? Do they keep a good measure of realism?

There is no getting around it: the causes worked on and promoted by lobbyists are mainly economic and financial. Lobbyists are paid by big business and, in the end, they exist to make a profit. According to the annual report on the Lobbyists Registration Act, the most popular issues are: international trade, industry, regional economic development, government contracts and, in fifth place, science and technology. All these issues are strictly economic in nature.

The first social issue listed in this report comes in 40th place. Youth issues, 40th place; housing, an issue I deeply care about, 41st place; women's issues, 42nd place; seniors, 43rd place; and in 52nd and last place, human rights.

There is no doubt that lobbyists try to influence decision makers on profit-related economic issues. Social and humanitarian causes lag far behind and stay on the back burner.

• (1040)

The results are obvious and denounced more and more. Everyday reality is the best proof. Poverty which is becoming more entrenched and the unmet basic needs of a growing number of individuals and households clearly show that the decision makers have given up social causes.

Nevertheless, many organizations work in the community and demand thorough changes. Are they heeded? Their power is very small compared to that of big corporations and industries. Nor do they have the same means to exert influence. The big shots have dollars and the little people have cents. The big shots know many friends in high places, and the little people know little people.

For some, it is cocktails, business dinners and fancy meetings. Others have to march in the street, occupy offices and hold hasty meetings with decision makers so that these officials can have a good conscience and get rid of the few reporters who are interested.

The effects are there. The evidence is quite clear. Governments are disconnected from the grass roots and have been for a long time. Considering all the clout wielded by lobbyists and large political contributors, there is very little room left for ordinary people.

Seniors' groups, associations of the unemployed, community groups, housing committees, women's shelters, day care centres—none of these gives thousands of dollars to the old parties.

The Liberals are caught in this system of lobbying and large donors. The Martin budget is a perfect illustration of this. The lower and middle classes are affected and the rich are allowed to breathe easy.

The Pearson issue also shows very clearly all the influence and pressure exerted by the wealthy. We sense that the government is ill at ease and that it is reluctant to get to the bottom of the issue.

The political system and politicians owe it to the people to be open and aboveboard. Secrecy and intrigue are no longer in order. The government absolutely must deal with the present system of influence and also the financing of political parties.

Lobbying must be examined very thoroughly. Who is doing what? Who is working for what? Who is meeting whom? Why? With what results? Voters and taxpayers are entitled to know everything because they are the ones who pay the government. As for the financing of political parties, I call on the old parties to show moderation. I call on them to follow our party and adopt the Quebec formula. Governments must at last be free and independent.

Let us hope that the system will soon be completely open and let us give everyone equal access to decision makers. Democracy can only gain by it.

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères): Mr. Speaker, I usually rise with enthusiasm in this House to speak to various bills introduced by the government. In fact, I often open my remarks by saying it is with pleasure that I will rise in this House to speak to such and such a bill.

Today however, it is without enthusiasm and even with disappointment that I do. I am taking part in this debate with no pleasure, but with the conviction of carrying out my duties and obligations as a parliamentarian.

It is indeed my duty to stand up in this House and publicly denounce the bill now being debated. The debate on Bill C–22 opened last Tuesday has brought to light an absolutely outrageous business. The contract to privatize Pearson airport entered into by the previous Conservative government has turned out to be an exercise in distributing presents to the friends of the system, the whole thing being engineered in an atmosphere of scheming and secrecy.

Allow me to recall a number of flaws that led eminently serious observers to come to that conclusion.

In 1993, Pearson airport generated over $23 million in profit. Under the contract passed with the Conservative government in the middle of an election campaign, Pearson Development Corporation was to operate Terminals 1 and 2 for an annual fee of $27 million.

At first glance, it looked like this transaction could be profitable to the taxpayers.

• (1045)

The picture changes completely once you know that the corporation with the winning bid was planning a 350 per cent hike in passenger fees, which would have resulted in a net increase in earnings totalling over $100 million annually, airport users footing the bill, naturally.

Air Canada publicly challenged this decision. To sugar the pill, Air Canada was also given a little bonus in the form of rent reduction, another cost to be absorbed by the taxpayers, naturally.

The reason given by the government to explain why it was not increasing fees itself and pocketing these substantial profits was the necessity to finance major redevelopment work in Terminal 1, to the tune of $100 million. Yet, in a huge fit of generosity, the government granted Pearson Development Corporation a 40 per cent rent deferral for 1994, 1995, 1996 and part of 1997.

While these amounts were to be eventually reimbursed with interest, the fact remains nonetheless that the government was reneging on its promise not to finance the modernization of Terminal 1 by accepting that rent be deferred over four years. Also, it is stunning to see the obvious lack of financial analysis in the development of these privatization agreements. No financial viability study was done, and Paxport, to which the contract was originally awarded, was faced with serious financial difficulties and decided to team up with its only competitor, Claridge Inc., thus creating a monopoly situation.

Yet, for some obscure reasons, the contract was not cancelled, even though it should have been. It must also be pointed out that, because the contract was split in two periods of 37 years and 20 years, the owners do not have to pay provincial tax, which would have amounted to ten million dollars if the contract had been awarded for a period of 50 years. Even if you include the cost of work paid by investors, the taxpayer is still the big loser in this transaction.

I also want to mention briefly that several newspapers have reported that the rate of return of about 14.2 per cent after tax given to Pearson Development Corporation was too high for this type of transaction. The media, the Ontario government, public opinion, and even the Liberal Party at the very end of the election campaign, have all voiced their opposition to that outrageous deal. Common sense dictates that the government should have gone to the bottom of this issue.

Unfortunately, this is not the case at all. Bill C–22 is not the beginning of a new era. It is a smokescreen to cover the dealings that took place. The government wants to avoid at any cost having to go to the root of the problem, which is first an acute lack of transparency in the privatization process, collusion between the old federal parties and certain private businesses, and also a lack of appropriate legislation to regulate the activities of lobbyists.

Last October, the government appointed a former Ontario Liberal minister, Mr. Robert Nixon, to conduct an in camera inquiry to find out about the dealings which led, as Mr. Nixon said in his report, to "an inadequate contract arrived at through such a flawed process and under the shadow of possible political manipulation".

Mr. Speaker, I remind the government that you rarely shed light on an issue when you look at it behind closed doors. Also, a former Liberal minister, regardless of his personal credibility, is certainly not the best choice to inquire about a transaction in which some key players are directly linked to the Liberal Party of Canada.

Following that inquiry, and in a moment of clear–mindedness and common sense on its part, the government decided to fulfil its election promise and cancel the formal agreement with Pearson Development Corporation. Unfortunately, the government did so in such a way that everything leads us to believe that it has every intention of paying off its political debts to its friends. When I say its friends, I mean those of both the Conservatives and the Liberals, since the people and companies involved in this mysterious transaction are very closely related to one or the other of these old political parties.

While it is true that section 9 of Bill C–22 provides that no compensation will be given in lieu of unrealized profits, or for monies contributed to lobbying activities in connection with public office holders, the fact remains that, in section 10, the government gives the Minister of Transport the arbitrary right to pay to people of his choice such amounts as he deems appropriate.

Does not that open the door wide for some more abuse? Under section 10 of Bill C–22, the government can compensate and even reward individuals and corporations involved in a rather sordid deal which not only went against public interests, but also bordered on something criminal.

Last Tuesday, the Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport said that the Liberal government had learned from the mistakes made by the previous government. I am not so sure about that. There is something fishy about the government's refusal to get right to the bottom of this nebulous deal, but the government adds insult to injury by giving itself carte blanche to hand out very generous compensation to the loyal contributors to the war chests of the old political parties. The government, which not so long ago solemnly promised to abide by such principles as openness, integrity and sound management of public funds, was quick to turn its back on its pious wish and to revert to its old habits. As the old saying goes: what is bred in the bone will not out of the flesh.

By allowing big corporations to generously contribute to the parties' election coffers, the Canada Elections Act certainly does not help to restore the credibility of federal politicians and political parties. By refusing to change the legislative framework under which such a deal was made, the current Liberal government is asking the public to make another profession of faith and to believe that it is totally impervious to the financial and corporative interests supporting it and to the pressure coming from its good friends.

All of this disgraceful incident just goes to prove how crucial it is to act as soon as possible and pass an act concerning the financing of political parties, something similar to Quebec's current legislation. This would release federal political parties from any obligation to the big financial interests and make politicians accountable to those they are supposed to represent, that is the people of Canada.

The other major problem stems from the fact that the legislation concerning lobbyists is full of holes and does not define specifically enough the nature of lobbyists and the nature of their activities. The identification of the individuals who are subjected to pressures raises also serious ethical problems.

The Nixon Report speaks of dealings by members of the political staff who got too much involved in the transaction. It seems that lobbyists are directly responsible in the case of several officials who were reassigned and others who asked to be replaced. The promoters behind the privatization proposal knew very well that a future Liberal government would revoke the privatization contract, so they decided to take a risk. The government should not have to compensate for investors' miscalculations. The reform of the Lobbyists Registration Act would greatly contribute to prevent such muddle which, I must say, borders on something illegal.

I urge the present government to do its utmost to avoid making the same mistakes as the Conservatives. It was a mistake, for example, to entrust the airport management to private interests while everywhere else in Canada and in Quebec it was agreed that the best solution was to establish a non–profit group composed of local interests. It was also a mistake to deal with this issue without taking into account the will and the choices of the province concerned.

To conclude, I will join the opposition leader in asking for the establishment as soon as possible of an independant royal inquiry commission to get right to the bottom of this nebulous privatization deal so that never again organized and well–funded interests may influence the decision–making process in such a big way. This public inquiry could pave the way for the reform of the Lobbyists Registration Act. At the same time, it is imperative that the government amends the Election Act so that Canadians begin again to trust their political institutions as well as politicians.

Mr. Gaston Péloquin (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, with its Bill C–22, the Liberal government is reviving the debate on what is now commonly known as the Pearson affair. However, the provisions contained in this bill take the debate one step further than a mere discussion on the sale of Pearson International airport. They bring to light one of the biggest flaws in the Canadian political system.

• (1055)

The Pearson airport issue, which may only be the tip of the iceberg, is a perfect example of the influence of lobbyists and various pressure groups on government decisions, which have the unfortunate tendency of always favouring special interests rather than the public interest.

It is important that Canadians finally realize what goes on behind the closed doors of their federal Parliament. In fact, it is the whole decision–making process that must be called into question. Right now, the most effective way to make your grievances known to the federal government is to hire a lobbying firm which, for a few thousands dollars a day, will put you in touch with the highest government authorities. Needless to say, only large corporations and very rich people can afford to hire a professional lobbying firm.

There is another effective means of establishing contact with the government in office, and it is, of course, by making a substantial contribution to the election fund of the party that will form the government. As for ordinary Canadians, after having had their say in the federal elections, they must now sit and wait to see how the government will manage its resources. People do not always realize that their vote does not carry much weight compared to the powerful corporations and the rich friends that the government will support during its term. The Liberals and the Conservatives have certainly helped to reinforce the image of lobbying as an obscure phenomenon.

But what is a lobbyist? The image that most people have is that of a mysterious individual who, in a dark corner, hands over a big envelope to a minister or a senior official to obtain some favour from the government. Unfortunately, reality is much more subtle than that since very often, the lobbyists who are active today behind the scenes are former ministers, deputy ministers or lawyers of political parties who, thanks to their contacts inside the government, are able to make the case of those who hired them.

Their work is made easier by the fact that, most of the time, their bosses contributed richly to the campaign fund of the party in power. The lobbyists' task is to remind the government of its political debts towards those interest groups. In fact, the real elected representatives, that is the hon. members of the government side as well as those from the opposition side, collectively get less of a hearing from ministers than any of those obscure professional lobbyists. That tells us a lot about their clout in the decision–making process of government.

About fifteen years ago, political analyst Stanley B. Ryerson argued that the Canadian federation had been formed in 1867 in response to the demands of some interest groups. If you allow me, I would like to quote what he said: "Macdonald and Galt were representing the general interests of English Canadian business circles".

The Speaker: It being eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

I will add, dear colleague, that you still have five minutes left to finish your speech when we resume after question period.

SERIAL KILLER CARDS AND GAMES

Mr. Derek Wells (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to commend the Minister of Justice for introducing draft legislation to deal with the availability of serial killer cards and board games in Canada.

Our government is committed to dealing with the growing incidence of violent crime in this country. Therefore, the exploitation of violent, cruel and horrible crimes must not be allowed to undermine our crime prevention measures.

The glorification of people whose acts have taken lives, hurt families and shattered the security of communities is inappropriate and unwarranted. The government must seek to curtail access to these products.

Mobilized by those who have been dramatically affected by violent crime, people are signing petitions and indicating to Parliament that these cards and games must not be made available in Canada.

By introducing this draft legislation the minister has shown that this government is listening and taking action. We must not lead the children of this country to conclude that violent acts of a Clifford Olsen or a Son of Sam are in anyway comparable with those of—

The Speaker: Order, please.

MARALOÏ FAMILY

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, the Maraloï family, who had to put up with a lot of hostility from the federal Department of Citizenship and Immigration, and a good deal of procrastination from the department of immigration and cultural communities, will finally be allowed to stay in Quebec.

As the Official Opposition, we want to pay tribute to the courage and determination of these people who found themselves, quite unwillingly, at the centre of bureaucratic wrangling over immigration. After being wrongly told by the federal government that Quebec had the power to accept them as permanent residents, and then, turned back at the U.S. border while facing threats of deportation to Rumania, they finally saw an end to their troubles with the bureaucracy.

We are welcoming the Maraloï family in the Quebec society and we wish them all the success and happiness they deserve, at the eve of their new life in Quebec.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, yesterday near Saint John, New Brunswick two airmen died and two were seriously injured in service to our country. We do not know yet how this accident happened and will not for some time know why.

What we do know is that every day, whether it be here in Canada, in Croatia, Bosnia or in other parts of the world our Canadian forces service men and women willingly serve and take risks for their country.

Nothing can change what has happened in this instance and nothing can alter the impact it has on the families of those involved.

On behalf of all members of this House we extend our best wishes to Owen Hanam of Baddeck, Nova Scotia and Michael Langdon of Canadian Forces Base Shearwater, Nova Scotia for a full and speedy recovery.

To the families of Major Walter Sweetman of Peterborough, Ontario, and Major Robert Henderson of Victoria, British Columbia, who died in the crash we offer our heartfelt sympathy and the hope that will help you to know that you are not alone in your sorrow.

SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, when Nelson Mandela cast his ballot Wednesday morning at the Ohlange High School north of Durban, people around the world watched and cheered. Nobel Peace Prize winner and democratic pioneer, Mandela stands as a pioneer of integrity and dedication in our chaotic world.

Canada played an active role during the 1980s mobilizing world opinion against apartheid and supporting sanctions. Our effort in South Africa includes the participation of some 57 Canadians in the observation groups of the UN mission. We have sent electoral experts, NGO sponsored observer missions as well as the Canadian bilateral observation mission led by the Secretary of State for Latin America and Africa.

These observers come from all walks of life and all regions of our country. Nova Scotia is represented by her provincial Chief Electoral Officer, Ms. Janet Willwerth, and a few others.

Neither bigotry nor bombs can deter the democratic spirit in South Africa. The secretary of state told the Cobourg Star that the international community must continue its support for South Africa after the election. The problems that lie ahead are formidable, but when the results come out on Saturday, Canadians and people all over the world can share in this victory for equality.

FISHING LICENCES

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans last Wednesday announced the results of a review of inactive groundfish licences following a meeting in Halifax with fishing industry representatives.

The minister agreed on new measures that would return frozen licences to groundfish fishermen who meet the following criteria.

They are head of an inactive multi–species fishing enterprise. They have fished full time for seven years and have made 75 per cent of earned income or recent annual enterprise revenues of $20,000 from fishing.

• (1105)

Earlier in the week the minister agreed to amend the seal licensing policy for eastern Canada to allow retired fishermen who are eligible for a sealing licence in 1993 to take up to six seals a year for personal use. This approach to the frozen inactive groundfish licence and to the seal licensing policy is a step in the direction of economic viability in the groundfish industry without jeopardizing conservation objectives. It moves toward the fishery of the future by promoting multi–species licensing.

GOLD RESERVES

Mr. Peter Thalheimer (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, recently the Minister of Finance announced that Canada would stop selling off its gold reserves which was initiated by the previous government and which has resulted in the depletion of Canada's gold reserves and has no doubt put pressure on the downward trend of the price of gold on the international market.

This is good news for Canada and to my riding Timmins—Chapleau, in particular to the city of Timmins which is known as the city with the heart of gold.

I want to acknowledge in this House the hard work of His Worship Mayor Vic Power, the mayor of the city of Timmins, for having brought pressure to bear on the government to stop the sale of Canada's gold reserves.

I am confident that this move by our government will have positive results and that gold will once again regain its glitter on the international market.

12TH REGIMENT OF VALCARTIER

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, a group of soldiers, most of them from the 12e Régiment blindé de Valcartier, arrived in Quebec City yesterday, on their way back from several months of peacekeeping duty in the former Yugoslavia. The remaining troops from the 12th Regiment are due to arrive in a few days.

On behalf of all the Bloc Quebecois members, I would like to pay tribute to these Quebec and Canadian soldiers for the dedication and sense of duty they have shown in the accomplishment of their task, during their long and difficult stay in the former Yugoslavia. I believe that several of these soldiers deserve that their acts of bravery be officially recognized.

The UN peacekeeping mission in that country is not over, and the 12th Regiment is being replaced by troops from Calgary. We wish them all the best.

FEDERAL ELECTION

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, Reformers have been telling the government for months that it is possible to do more with less.

This morning several Canadian newspapers reported how much each party paid for its seats in this House. It should come as no surprise to anyone that the party that sank the nation so deeply into a sea of red ink was the Conservatives, spending well over $10 million for two seats. That is over $5 million per seat. The NDP was also extremely wasteful, spending more than $825,000 per seat. The governing Liberals fared a little better, spending $56,000 per seat.

If the government wants to see how real fiscal responsibility is practised it should take note of the party that spent less than $1.5 million for 52 seats. That party is Reform which kept the cost per seat down to only $28,000, half of what the government spent and miles ahead of the others.

Canadian taxpayers are very concerned that much of their tax money is wasted. Federal party spending in the last election illustrates that the Reform Party would be the best stewards of taxpayers' money because the party also completed the election campaign in the black.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I rise in my place today to thank the members of our Standing Committee on Finance for the sterling work they did on behalf of this House on the issue of replacement measures for the GST.

I commend them for the many long hours and the many thousands of miles they travelled on our behalf, listening to the suggestions of Canadians as to how we can replace this detested and very damaging tax.

This week I was privileged to testify before this committee here in Ottawa to discuss my proposal for a tax on gross business output at a rate of 2 per cent to replace the GST at 7 per cent.

Our government pledged in the famous red book to look at options through public consultation to replace the GST. I believe this committee deserves our sincere thanks for its diligent efforts to consult seriously with Canadians to provide a real alternative to the GST.

CRIME

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker, crime in our society is a very serious matter and is becoming more of a problem every day.

• (1110)

In 1992, the Canadian Centre for Justice Statistics reported 3,270,000 criminal incidents, 87 per cent of which were Criminal Code incidents.

Violent crime has been steadily on the rise every year since 1977 at an average yearly rate of 5 per cent. Youth crime has become a major concern for many Canadians. In 1992, 135,348 youths aged between 12 and 17 were charged under the Criminal Code. Fifteen per cent of these incidents were violent crimes.

Canadians want decisive action to curb the increase in crime—

The Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member.

TRADE

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, the haranguing continues with Canada and the United States over trade disputes on everything from beer to softwood lumber. Sometimes it reaches the level of near harassment.

The minister of trade in the last government was correct when he said in the House one day: "It is too bad that we could not have agreed on a definition of what a subsidy is". This government should take a much needed initiative and call a meeting of trade reps of Canada, United States and Mexico and arrive at a definition of subsidy before things further disintegrate.

INTERNATIONAL WORKERS DAY

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup): Mr. Speaker, the Bloc Quebecois wishes to draw attention to the International Workers Day, also known as May Day, which will be celebrated on May 1.

To mark this event, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois met this morning, as he does every year, with the leaders of the three main Quebec unions to talk about the problems that workers presently face.

This year, Quebec bishops will be part of the rallies which will be held Sunday to denounce the growing poverty problems that our society is experiencing.

The Bloc Quebecois urges workers to come to these rallies to show their pride and remind society of their vital contribution. We also invite the unemployed to participate and thus denounce the lack of action of governments in the area of job creation.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, many Canadians believe that the key to parliamentary reform lies in the principles of direct democracy. This would include freer votes in the Commons, referenda, citizens' initiatives and of course recall.

Much of the dynamic and constructive changes that have occurred throughout our history have been due to citizens who have insisted on renewal and reform of government.

Canadians have become cynical about politics. Parents, when asked if they would be pleased to see their children become politicians, replied no 98 per cent of the time. These responses and the perceptions behind them reflect a serious sickness in our parliamentary system and bode ill for the future of democracy in Canada unless we reform now.

Accountability is the key word here. If an MP fails to do the job that he or she was elected to do or abuses a position of trust, their constituents should have the power to remove them. The three *r*s are still alive. Let us be radical. Let us reform the system. Let us be subject to recall, like every other worker in the country.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding statements of some members across, the support for the Official Languages Act in Canada remains strong. A recent Angus Reid Southam News report reveals that 64 per cent of Canadians support the policy of having two official languages.

[Translation]

Some members take pleasure in adding the costs of bilingualism. How many of them took time to evaluate its benefits. For example, the former president of Air Canada, Claude Taylor, said that the company flourished because of the language ability of its employees. How many similar cases can we find?

A good knowledge of French and English allows us to deal with these two great cultures. In fact, 33 countries have French as a working language, while 56 use English. As Canadians we are privileged.

[English]

Let us remember how lucky we are. Let us cherish the wealth of using two great languages, the languages of Shakespeare and Molière.

DRUG PATENTS

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, contrary to the claims of several opposition members, the pharmaceutical industry is neither surprised nor alarmed by the federal government's position regarding Patent Drug Act.

• (1115)

Not only is the industry in good shape, to use the words of Mr. Charles Pitts of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association, but it has a time trying to understand the concerns of the Bloc Quebecois. There is no need to reassure an industry which is not worried. I find it unacceptable that the Official Opposition is using the pharmaceutical industry as a pawn to further its own political ends!

The people would be better served by political leaders working at building a stable and thriving environment that would encourage industry to create jobs, instead of playing politics.

REVENUE CANADA

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, as Canadians heard the news this morning they were shocked, astonished, and by the end of the day they will be enraged. The Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada revealed that Revenue Canada is not serious about enforcing the Income Tax Act and other legislation.

They conducted a survey among the 4,000 employees who audit corporate income taxes for Revenue Canada and 75 per cent of the auditors surveyed believe that operations had been hindered by the level of politicization by the Liberal government. The auditors say that they get the word from the Liberal government to drop this file and move to another.

While Canadians are filing their individual tax returns, while small businesses are filing their tax returns and paying through the nose, we now find out from Revenue Canada that corporate Canada is once again getting off the hook from paying its fair share of taxes.

BILL C–18

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend the Liberal member for Vancouver East who stated in an interview in the Hill Times on April 28 that she realizes the provision in Bill C–18 for imposing a two–year suspension on the redistribution of ridings does not do her province any favours. In fact it would make it almost impossible for the process to conclude before the next election. The hon. member goes on: "One year would probably be the right approach".

If this is the case I wonder why so many Liberals, including the hon. member for Vancouver East, chose to defeat the one–year amendment when it was brought forward by the Reform Party in the House.

This is a perfect example of why Canadians are so cynical of the representation they receive in the Chamber and why democratic reform such as free votes are essential to restore the confidence of Canadians in their elected officials.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

PATENT DRUGS

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry. Despite the unsettling effect that his hasty, irresponsible statement about reviewing the drug patent legislation has had, the Minister of Industry reiterated yesterday his intention of going ahead with a review of the legislation. Already, the review is jeopardizing important investments in Quebec.

Does the minister intend to follow up on the request of his Quebec colleague and put to rest his concerns, as well as those of the multinational which this week decided, further to Ottawa's hasty announcement to reopen Bill C–91, the drug patent legislation, that it was holding off on a $50 million investment in Quebec?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word about this because the opposition is truly exaggerating.

It is really very simple. A bill was passed by Parliament and the pharmaceutical industry made a commitment to the Canadian public. It undertook to invest money and to refrain from increasing the price of drugs. The government therefore has a duty to ensure that the promised investments have been made.

If the industry believes that it has fulfilled the obligations set out by Parliament, then it has nothing to fear. However, if it has not fulfilled its obligations and made the investments, the opposition should be telling us to take steps to ensure that these investments are indeed made. But if we do not carry out a review, we will never know.

We have an obligation to carry out this review, pursuant to the legislation passed by Parliament. As the whip stated earlier, a industry spokesperson said he was not in the least bit worried and that this was nothing more than a tempest in a teapot whipped up by the Bloc Quebecois. On the one hand, Bloc members rise in the House and ask us to protect this industry, while on the other hand, they want us to go along with their plans for Quebec independence, which will create even more instability for potential investors in this country in the years to come.

• (1120)

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot): Mr. Speaker, as usual, in response to serious questions, questions dealing with Quebec's economic interests, the Prime Minister and his ministers talk nonsense.

The Speaker: Some days are more trying than others and we had hoped not to hear words like the ones just used by the hon.

member and those I have already asked another hon. member to withdraw. I hope the hon. member can understand why I ask him to withdraw the word "nonsense".

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the word "nonsense", but I simply used it to indicate that, when we talk about vocational training for example, we are told that it is nothing but one of Quebec's whims, and when we talk about drug patents, we are told that we are getting excited over nothing. Just last evening, Minister Tremblay called for government intervention and I reiterate minister Tremblay's request in that respect.

Could the Minister of Industry deal directly with the company that reconsidered a $50 million investment it was about to make in Quebec? Do you not think this would be a good way to reassure the pharmaceutical industry as a whole? These companies are seriously concerned at present, Mr. Speaker, about the irresponsible remarks the minister has made. So, I put the question to him.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Did you hear that? He just described the remarks as irresponsible. As for the hon. member's own remarks, insult being the weapon of the weak, as the saying goes, it is only natural that he would want to insult everybody.

We have said, and the people in the industry themselves said yesterday that they were not concerned about what is going on right now. The industry itself said so. However, if the industry wants to invest, it should go ahead and invest! The legislation is in place, it was passed and investments have been made under it in past years.

Why is it all of a sudden that one of them has become more nervous than the rest? Those who made investments last year did so under the same legislation. I imagine that these people who have invested so far were familiar with the provisions of the legislation. This company should read the law and follow the same reasoning as the ones that invested last year and the year before. That is the way to do it. It is nothing to make a fuss about, and our position is that we will abide by the law in the interest of investment and in the interest of the patients who have to buy drugs.

That is one of the objectives of this legislation and we will enforce it because either the patients pay or the governments have to pay for them, when the pharmaceutical industry goes too far.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I hear the Prime Minister talking about a review of the prices charged and investments made by the pharmaceutical industry. It is also provided for in Bill C–91. We do not need to re–open that bill, a review is already planned. A body has been set up to monitor these things, so I put the question to the minister again.

Does the minister not agree that his intention to review the law has already hurt investment in research and development in Quebec and that his intended review has a much broader purpose than checking the prices of patented drugs or investments, which are already controlled by a body reporting to the Department of Health?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I already indicated in the House yesterday that we intend to conduct a review, as the Prime Minister promised during the election campaign, but as the Prime Minister just said, the proposed review is not what is causing uncertainty. I can tell the hon. member that I have two press releases here, the first from Merck Frosst, issued yesterday, announcing that they have completed their engineering study and have begun the design work for the plant in question, and I quote: "We will honour our commitment because we are sure that the Canadian government will honour its commitment".

• (1125)

Also, I have a letter from Astra Canada.

[English]

Excuse me, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is having—

The Speaker: Perhaps the hon. Minister of Industry could bring his answer to a close.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, if the Bloc is genuinely concerned about assurances on these things perhaps it could listen to the assurances I can offer.

This is Astra Canada: "I understand there has been some indication that an unnamed pharmaceutical firm has indicated that their $50 million investment has now been cancelled. I have had some calls inquiring as to whether or not that company is Astra. Please be assured that we remain fully committed to the establishment of our basic drug discovery facility in the city of St. Laurent. This is a very significant investment involving about $33 million in building and equipment and an annual investment of over $10 million in research".

MANPOWER TRAINING

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. The Prime Minister says that the Bloc Quebecois is stirring up a tempest in a teapot. Yet, he seems to refuse to listen to several comments and interventions made by Quebec ministers.

The Quebec minister of employment has been trying unsuccessfully for several months to convince the federal government to reach an agreement on the manpower training issue. Yesterday, he sent out a real alarm over the state of relations between Quebec and Ottawa. Speaking of malaise, the minister said that several of his Cabinet colleagues have been coming up against Ottawa's centralizing designs.

Are we to understand from that statement, and contrary to what the minister said in this House, that the negotiations between Quebec and Ottawa over manpower training are more than ever in a deadlock because of Ottawa's refusal to give anything to Quebec?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal): Mr. Speaker, since I have been involved in interprovincial relations for several dozens of years, I evidently do not have the same blood pressure as the hon. member when it comes to a problem such as manpower training, which has been going on for many years.

Our position in the negotiations is clearly not the same as the one of Quebec. We are pursuing our discussions with Quebec; it is possible that we will come to an agreement, but it is also possible that we will not come to an agreement on this issue at the present time. That is part of the way federal–provincial relations have been working for many years in this country, and there are not more problems today than there were at any other time in our history.

M. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, so the minister is confirming that the negotiations are deteriorating and that we are in a deadlock.

Is the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs confirming, and will he have the courage to admit, that relations between Quebec and Ottawa have been deteriorating in several areas, particularly in education, youth programs, readjustment programs for fishermen, the review of Bill C–91, health financing and the high–speed train, to name just a few, and that, finally, Ottawa's intentions are aimed at centralization?

The Speaker: I find that questions and answers are perhaps a bit long. I would ask everyone to please make it shorter.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday the Minister of Health said that the government would not reopen the Canada Health Act "in the short term". She said: "There is no question that there will have to be some changes and change is always difficult".

• (1130)

In light of these comments, could the Prime Minister tell the House exactly when the government plans on reviewing the Canada Health Act?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government is planning a conference with all the people involved in health services and I will be presiding over it.

We said we were having this review. We are holding discussions with the provinces at the moment and the first meeting of this continuing conference on health problems in Canada will be held in the middle of June.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, the health minister was quite clear yesterday in her comments. She said there would be changes to the Canada Health Act and that those changes were necessary.

Yesterday the health minister also said that health funding was holding steady under this government but the fact is that federal funding as a portion of total health spending has dropped from 50 per cent to 23 per cent and continues to drop. As a result the provinces, handcuffed by the Canada Health Act, are being forced to cut health services.

I repeat, when and how will the government amend the Canada Health Act?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the financing of these programs is done by through a formula. Sometimes the figures that are used are confusing because the money transferred has been reduced, but there has been a transfer of tax points to be used for the financing of these programs.

Over a period of years people have stopped thinking that. In fact we have made more room for the provinces to collect more money. The transfer of cash has diminished but the participation of the federal government has not been reduced, as some people say.

What I was very pleased with yesterday was seeing the Reform Party asking the federal government to spend more, more, more.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod): This is a good day, Mr. Speaker, a good day.

The actions and inactions of the government amount to a total abdication of responsibility toward the health care system. The Liberal government keeps telling us about the sanctity of medicare but cannot answer as to how it will be preserved.

Why is the government now trying to snuff out creative attempts by provinces, doctors and patients to preserve the health care system when the government appears to have no answers at all?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I question that statement. We have one concern that is very important to this party. We do not want to fall into the trap of finding so–called new solutions, new approaches that very soon in Canada it would be like in the United States: good service for the rich and poor service for the poor. We will never let that happen in Canada.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, this morning we heard that a number of auditors with the Department of National Revenue complained about political interference when auditing Canadian companies.

The president of the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada said, at a press conference this morning, and I quote: "Auditors received instructions to back off from certain files".

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Does the Prime Minister intend to investigate these very serious allegations and could he give us the assurance that all provisions of the Canadian Income Tax Act apply to all companies in Canada, without exception?

[English]

Ms. Susan Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the survey that was released today is very general in nature. There are no specific allegations revealed whatsoever.

The department is very committed, as is the government, to fair taxation for everyone. If concrete evidence of political interference is provided, the department will definitely investigate.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I may add that 250 public servants complained about this kind of political interference, which to me is pretty factual.

Would the Prime Minister agree that these serious allegations may cause the public to doubt the impartiality of our tax system and will he undertake to clarify this question by calling for an independent investigation by the Auditor General, whose findings would be released as soon as the report is tabled?

• (1135)

[English]

Ms. Susan Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the department is aware of the survey and has a meeting scheduled with the union on May 11. It was scheduled before the announcement today. We will proceed with that meeting. The survey is an item on the agenda at that meeting.

Again I state there were no specific allegations released today.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

According to a recent study by the Association of General Surgeons, 23,000 people in Quebec are on waiting lists for surgery. Half of them have been there for over 18 months. This waiting list has doubled since 1985 and 626 of those individuals are cancer patients waiting for urgent surgery.

In light of this will the Prime Minister acknowledge that health care in this county is collapsing. The act is obsolete and reform of the act is crucial. We are not asking for more money.

I would like the Prime Minister to please guarantee that federal transfer payments for funding for health care will stay at 1992–93 levels at least and not decrease any more.

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, on the one hand the member says he does not want us to spend any more money. On the other hand he is pointing out the difficulties being faced by the provinces.

The Minister of Health met with provincial ministers in February. She has another meeting scheduled in the next few weeks specifically to discuss making sure that every Canadian has access to health care services at no cost to themselves.

Frankly, if we followed the suggestion of the Reform Party to cancel the Canada Health Act, every fibre of the work that we have done over the last 30 years in building one of the best health care systems in the world would be flushed down the toilet and we do not intend to do that.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, we do not have the best health care system in the world right now, but we should.

The government on the one hand is denying the provinces the right to get health care under control by forcing them to adhere to an obsolete Canada Health Act. On the other hand it is not living up to its commitment by continually decreasing funding for health care over the last 15 years.

Will you give us and this country, and on behalf of my patients—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member please direct his question through the Chair and put his question, please.

Mr. Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, will the government guarantee that it will live up to its commitments and provide federal funding for health care for Canadians based on 1992–93 levels and not continually decrease it?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly not agree with the member's statement about the state of Canada's health care.

Yesterday I had the privilege of discussing with the wife of the President of the United States their health reforms. She was asking me how they could put in place a system which would mirror or be similar to the system we have in Canada. The Americans are coming to this country to see a system that works.

Obviously the system has to respond to new realities.

[Translation]

We were very happy to see that midwives were finally accepted by physicians in some provinces, including Quebec and Ontario. It is very important that changes be brought to the system.

It is not enough to say that we will only amend the Canada Health Act. The answer lies in innovation and that is what we are seeking to do in cooperation with provinces.

TAINTED BLOOD

Mr. Maurice Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

The Minister of Health stated in this House on February 3, on March 23 and again this week on April 26 that the request for extra funds for the Krever Commission and the Canadian Hemophilia Society was still being examined by Treasury Board.

Can the minister promise this House that he will give immediately a clear, definite and positive answer regarding the request for additional funds for the Krever Commission and the Canadian Hemophilia Society?

• (1140)

[English]

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure): Mr. Speaker, consideration of the matter is nearing completion. I can assure the hon. member that every opportunity is being taken to try to expedite the matter, understanding the importance of it.

I must also add that nobody is being denied an opportunity to appear before the commission and have his or her views appropriately heard.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, we can understand that the President of the Treasury Board is more eager to put on a show with the infrastructure program than to address the real problems.

My question to the President of the Treasury Board is this: Is he going to wait until the work of the commission is over to give an answer to the Canadian Hemophilia Society? What is the rationale behind such delay, given that granting additional funds requested by Justice Krever would allow the commission to carry on fully its mandate and to get right to the bottom of that scandal?

[English]

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure): Mr. Speaker, the government has provided very substantial funds to the Krever commission. In fact it has asked for additional funds. That has taken some review but it is being done in an expeditious manner.

As I said a few moments ago, nobody is being denied an opportunity to have his or her views heard by the commission. We will continue to make sure that we advance this matter so that the commission can get on with its work and provide its report.

JUSTICE

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice.

Jason Gamache of Courtney, B.C. was recently convicted of the first degree murder of six year–old Dawn Shaw. Evidence shows that Gamache was a repeat sexual offender who was not allowed to be with children. However, this fact was not known to the local authorities or to Jason Gamache's neighbours because of the protection of privacy sections of the Young Offenders Act.

Will the parliamentary secretary and the ministry advise the House if it is the government's intention to eliminate this section of the act?

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, it certainly is the intention and the present activity of the Minister of Justice and the department to look into this important question.

The Minister of Justice has stated to the House that he and the department are presently analysing the question of a registry of sexual abusers and that there will be something brought before the House in the not too distant future.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the government if it is prepared to commit to a philosophy that the rights of victims must come before the rights of criminals, or does it believe that the rights of the Jason Gamaches of this world should take precedent over the rights of the Dawn Shaws?

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the children in our country are the future of our country. This government places the utmost reliance on our children. Nothing will come before the benefit and the welfare of the children of Canada.

PUBLISHING INDUSTRY

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage.

In order to justify the controversial sale of Ginn Publishing to Paramount, the governement has pointed out the specific commitments made by Paramount to ensure that Canada obtains a net advantage from that deal. But Paramount does not abide by its commitments. The 140 members of the Canadian Publishers Association ask the government to investigate the behaviour of Paramount.

Does the minister aknowledge that, by depriving the Canadian distributor Distican from a market of approximately $2 million and by entrusting it to a firm controlled by American rather than Canadian interests, Paramount blatlantly violates the deal which was agreed regarding the sale of Ginn?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage): Mr. Speaker, I am of course aware of the allegation just made. So is my colleague, the Minister of Industry.

Surely, a company must abide by its commitments, especially when these are made to the Government of Canada. This is the reason why an investigation has been launched in consultation with the Minister of Industry.

FOOD LABELLING

Mr. Pat O'Brien (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, recently at a meeting of the Middlesex County Federation of Agriculture the concern was raised that Canada may have abandoned the idea of expanding and improving country of origin labelling for agri-food products. My question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food.

Has Canada made any commitments with the United States and Mexico as part of NAFTA to implement country of origin labelling for food products purchased in Canada? Could the parliamentary secretary indicate what timeframe he might foresee for the implementation of such labelling?

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri-food): Mr. Speaker, country of origin labelling is required on products coming into Canada at the retail level. Most provinces also have requirements for any bulk vegetables or fruit to be labelled whether they are a product of Canada or another country. Also produce that is repackaged in Canada must have its Canada grade designation on it.

There have not been any changes in the rules with NAFTA on that. We will continue to ensure safety with the labelling so that the consumer knows where the product comes from.

GRAIN TRANSPORT

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

In a letter dated November 15, 1993 the Thunder Bay Harbour Commission Port Authority warned the minister that the rail car shortage problem had been some time in the making and was due in part to the policy of dispersing the rail car fleet into trades and routings outside its original purpose. This is just one of the several warnings the minister received.

Could the minister please explain what measures were taken in light of these warnings?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Transport I will take the member's question under advisement and undertake to get a reply to him as soon as possible.

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette): Mr. Speaker, further to that I would ask the government whether it is doing something with demurrage charges that are piling up on the west coast. Grain and oilseed sales have been lost. Japan is in search of a reliable supplier to grow more canola next year.

Would the government indicate what measures it intends to take to keep Canada a reliable grain and oilseed supplier to the world?

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri-food): Mr. Speaker, all government departments are aware of the situation in grain handling in western Canada today. The minister of agriculture will be announcing later today that as soon as he returns to the country he is bringing together the key players in the grain handling industry in western Canada to resolve that issue.

The rail car companies have informed us they will be putting several more thousand rail cars on the rails. They have already started. It is our intention to solve this so we can better serve our customers as we have in the past and will continue to in the future.

HOUSING

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

On April 10, the City of Montreal and the key players in social and cooperative housing made a plea to the Quebec and federal governments, asking for a non–recurring $40–million program to renovate 1,000 dwellings every year in that city.

Considering that the Quebec Minister of Municipal Affairs reacted positively to this project called "Resolution Montreal", is the federal government prepared to make a commitment to the Quebec government and to Montrealers, and help meet the urgent needs of the population?

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question. The minister has already met with his counterparts and will meet them again soon. The minister is holding consultations and will make a decision later as to what new initiative the government can undertake in co–operation with the provinces and territories. Obviously, the above mentioned project is one which will get very serious consideration.

• (1150)

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, since the beginning of this Parliament, no concrete action has been taken regarding social housing. Does the Deputy Prime Minister agree that, by unduly postponing necessary funding to implement this innovative program, her government is avoiding its responsibility to the poor in Montreal?

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services): Mr. Speaker, we have to consult with the provinces; we are asked to do so. We have met with ministers and we will continue to do so. I said that the project would be carefully considered; we will see what other ministers propose.

To say that the government did nothing for social housing is not true at all. Across the country, there are over 559,000 units costing annually $2.1 million to the federal government. Also, we will spend $100 million, over a period of two years, to renovate dwellings. There are several other projects which I do not have the time to mention. There are several projects, including in Quebec, and I would appreciate it if the opposition recognized that great efforts have been made. Moreover, the minister said that the savings of about $100 million would be used to support other initiatives.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of agriculture.

Recently the United States enacted article XXVIII of the GATT in response to what it perceived as unfair imports of Canadian durum wheat. The fact is that American prices for durum wheat have increased approximately 90 per cent in the past year. This totally refutes the claim that the American industry is being harmed by Canadian durum wheat imports.

Could the minister please explain what actions his government is taking to dispute the U.S. claim that Canadian durum wheat imports are hurting its farmers?

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri–food): Mr. Speaker, we certainly regret the Americans took the action they did a week ago today by putting in place article XXVIII. I want to assure the member and the industry that this does not close the border; what it does is move the negotiations to another stage.

We will continue to negotiate as strongly and as firmly as we have with the Americans on this issue. We have won a number of challenges and panels since 1990. The score for Canada on the trade disputes on wheat with the United States is 4 to 0. And at this time of the year when a hockey score is 4 to 0 it is a pretty decisive win.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member indicated, four previous investigations have exonerated the Canadian Wheat Board of unfair pricing. Despite this we now have a scenario for counterproductive retaliatory tariffs between the U.S. and Canada.

Is this government prepared to insist that the root cause of this trade disruption is not Canadian durum wheat imports but the distorting influence of the U.S. export enhancement program?

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri–food): Mr. Speaker, we have made it very clear to the United States if it decides to go ahead and take unilateral action at the end of the 90 days that we will respond in kind. We have indicated some of the areas where we might do that.

I also assure the member that we had representation yesterday in Washington at the International Trade Commission hearings. This should be of some comfort to us.

We must remember all of those commissioners who are attending that hearing are American and as one of the commissioners said: "We have only received two documents from the department. Both are essentially statements devoid of analysis and one I could barely understand". I think that bodes well.

We look forward to the response and conclusion of that ITC panel in July of this year.

NUCLEAR DISARMAMENT

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Remembering Canada's record of leadership in the United Nations General Assembly over the whole post–war period under St. Laurent, Pearson, Paul Martin Sr. and Trudeau, in the movement for nuclear and general disarmament under international law, will the Minister of Foreign Affairs consider intervening in the World Health Organization process now pending before the World Court in The Hague on the illegality of nuclear weapons?

• (1155)

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage): I thank the member for Vancouver Quadra for his question.

Indeed Canada was always a leader in the field of non–proliferation. We can take pride in the fact that we invented strangulation of nuclear weapons.

The question the hon. member raises this morning is a very legitimate one. I am informed that it is up for consideration by the foreign minister who will make a decision in due course. However, there is no evidence in sight that Canada is going to change its traditional support for non–proliferation and to stop its fight against nuclear weapons.

COPYRIGHT

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval–Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage, who happens to represent the riding next to mine.

The Société des auteurs et compositeurs du Québec appeared before the Copyright Board this week to ask for a 2 to 5 per cent increase on royalties paid to songwriters every time their songs are performed.

Would the minister give us a progress report on the review of copyright legislation currently underway in his department, as well as in the Department of Industry, and tell us when he intends to introduce a bill to modernize the outdated provisions of the current act?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage): Mr. Speaker, I agree that the current legislation is outdated. I think it is important we make all necessary changes.

The proposed amendments are being reviewed, not only in my department, but also in all other departments concerned. When all the preliminary work is done, we will be happy to report to the House.

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval–Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that my neighbour and I both agree that some of our laws are outdated.

Recently, the Minister of Industry announced the membership of the National Advisory Committee on the Information Highway. We noticed that creative artists and songwriters are not represented on this committee.

Would the Minister of Canadian Heritage tell us if he intends to suggest to his colleague, the Minister of Industry, to appoint such a representative to this committee?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister responsible for this issue should answer the question.

On the committee I set up to advise my department are representatives of the cultural industries. What the hon. member just said is not true. We have on this committee some very important Quebecers, who contributed a lot to the overall cultural industry, such as Mr. Chagnon, of Vidéotron, who implemented in the Chicoutimi area a very important pilot project for the building of the information highway, as well as Mr. Bureau, former chairman of the CRTC, and many more.

I do not know why the Bloc member would think that these people do not understand cultural issues.

MINISTERIAL STAFF

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

In November the Prime Minister announced that cabinet ministers would be limited to 19 staff members, thereby saving

$10 million. Yesterday it was reported in the press that the Prime Minister in response to pressure from his caucus will soon allow cabinet ministers to hire more staff.

• (1200)

Can the Prime Minister please tell the House if there is any truth to this report?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure): No, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry. It is good news and bad news. A provision has been made for summer students to be hired.

In the red book we said we were going to cut the budgets of ministers by some $10 million. We have not only done that but we have actually exceeded that amount.

I am pleased to be able to say that as part of the savings we are able to provide ministers with an opportunity to hire summer students and, most important, to create job opportunities for those students to help to prepare them for the job market when they are finished their education.

I would hope that all members would applaud that move.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, we applaud any savings that the government can get in place. Our concern was that there may be an announcement later on in the summer. We applaud the government's move and congratulate it on holding the line on staff requirements.

The Speaker: Maybe I should stop while I am ahead here.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions.

According to a report in the Montreal Gazette, Canada's economy is outperforming that of the United States. Specifically the report indicates a 4 per cent growth during the last quarter in Canada and it projects continuing growth this spring compared with 2.6 per cent growth in the United States.

How does this compare with the economic performance projections contained in the government's budget?

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions)): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the question and the opportunity to confirm that those numbers are good news for Canada.

We have had a series of good news reports. Our economy has performed better than it had before and a number of forecasters have pointed this out. These are much better numbers than we had used for the projections in the budget. That should be good news to all members in the House.

POINTS OF ORDER

QUESTION PERIOD—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Speaker: Yesterday I was asked to consider and rule on two points of privilege and a point of order. I am now prepared to rule on the point of order and I will be ruling on the points of privilege later on.

I have had a chance to look over the "blues" and Hansard from yesterday with regard to statements which were made in the heat of debate. At the time the hon. Minister of Industry in a comment quoted Shakespeare.

Now I, as a former teacher, am far from ever criticizing anyone for using quotes, especially from Shakespeare. However, in the context in which the words were used, I have of course done research and I find the words in the context in which they were used are in my view unparliamentary.

I would invite the hon. Minister of Industry to reconsider the words he used. In fact I would ask him to withdraw the statement which he made yesterday on page 3648 when he referred to the hon. member for Roberval.

The hon. Minister of Industry is in the Chamber and I would invite him to withdraw.

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, certainly out of deference to your wisdom and your office I will withdraw the comments and I shall in future endeavour not to associate the member for Roberval with Mr. Shakespeare.

The Speaker: I accept the withdrawal. I think the point has been made.

We do have days such as yesterday where exchanges are quite strong. I would simply invite all hon. members to please be very careful in the words they use because words are our weapons and our tools here in the House of Commons. I thank the hon. Minister of Industry for withdrawing and the matter is closed.

• (1205)

I will return to the House with the decision on the two points of privilege which are before me.

NATIONAL SOLIDARITY DAY FOR THE ABORIGINAL PEOPLES OF CANADA

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–244, an act respecting a national solidarity day for the aboriginal peoples of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, considering that most Canadians consider it desirable that we have a day in recognition of Canada's original inhabitants and considering that Canadians earnestly seek an example of their commitment to honouring native cultures, this bill would set aside June 21 of each year to be called national solidarity day for the aboriginal peoples of Canada.

Just for certainty, Mr. Speaker, this day would not be a legal holiday nor would it be required to be kept or observed as such.

PETITIONS

KILLER CARDS

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to present yet another petition requesting that Parliament ban the importation and sale of killer cards.

By now it must obvious that the wide public outrage over these despicable cards must be addressed swiftly by government.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present two petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36. The first is signed by 31 residents mainly from the city of Calgary that ask the government to amend the laws of Canada to prohibit the importation, distribution, sale and manufacture of killer cards.

I note with some satisfaction that the government has tabled draft legislation relevant to this subject.

TWO OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, my second petition concerns a national referendum on the issue of the two official languages in Canada. It is signed by 36 citizens, mostly from the city of Calgary. I think such a referendum could succeed better with a policy based on the territorial principle proposed by the Reform Party of Canada.

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, question No. 17 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 17—Mr. Forseth:

For the years 1992 and 1993, have any departments, agencies or crown corporations contributed funding to the legal education and action fund and, if so, (a) which ones (b) in what amounts?

Hon. Fernand Robichaud (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs)): I am informed by the Departments of Justice and Human Resources Development as follows:

	Justice Canada	Human Resources Development
1992–93	$9,395	$232,248
1993–94	None	259,324

The House resumed consideration of the motion of the Minister of Transport; of the amendment; and of the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Gaston Péloquin (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, before I was interrupted by Question Period, I was mentioning that Stanley Ryerson, a political scientist, was arguing some fifteen years ago that the Canadian federation was created, in 1867, because of pressure by certain interest groups. I would like to quote him.

"Macdonald and Galt were representing the general interests of English Canadian business circles. And Brown was the spokesman for Toronto's commercial and industrial circles. Finally, Cartier represented the conservative wing of the French–Canadian bourgeoisie and of the clergy. The new political structures were tailored to the economic and politic interests of the dominant social groups".

Our proud Fathers of Confederation were therefore Canadian bankers, financiers and businessmen pressuring the British Parliament to unite the Canadian colonies in order to widen their markets and protect themselves against the economic threat posed by the U.S. According to that view, Canada was created by lobbyists, and successive governments have perpetuated that long tradition of favouritism. Since then, the two main national parties have always relied on large corporations to finance their political activities.

The Pearson airport privatization proves that things have not really changed since Confederation, except that interest groups have gained more and more influence on the decision–making process in the Canadian government.

• (1215)

Today, our society is organised around a corruption system perfectly institutionalized. The voice of the people is getting weaker in the hallways of the Parliament of Canada, and Bill C–22 does nothing to prove it is not so. On the contrary, it makes the system even more susceptible to manipulation by interest groups.

The names that keep cropping up concerning the sale of Pearson airport show how the system works in Ottawa. Here is a list of friends of Mulroney and Conservative organizers: Otto Jelinek, former Conservative minister; Don Matthews, former president of the Conservative Party; Bill Neville, Joe Clark's former chief of staff ; Hugh Riopelle, lobbyist and friend of Mr. Mazankowski; Fred Doucet, former chief of staff of Brian Mulroney; John Llegate, lobbyist and friend of Michael Wilson; Pat MacAdam, lobbyist and friend of Mr. Mulroney; Bill Fox, lobbyist and friend of Mr. Mulroney; Harry Near, lobbyist and Conservative faithful; Scott Proudfoot, Conservative lobbyist.

On the Liberal side we have: Herb Metcalfe, former organizer for Mr. Chrétien; Leo Kolber, a Liberal senator.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order! I ask the member to refer to those who presently hold a seat in the House by their title. For example, when referring to Mr. Chrétien, he must call him the Right Hon. Prime Minister, since he happens to be speaking about the head of the Liberal government. I am committed to maintaining tradition whether members are present in the House or not. I know the member for Brome—Missisquoi has gained a lot of experience in a very short time in the House but I ask his further co–operation in this matter.

Mr. Péloquin: All those people were more or less implicated in the secret dealings surrounding the sale of Toronto Pearson International airport up to this point. Because of their political contacts those lobbyists succeeded in having the government sign a bad contract. In order to thank them, our government is now considering compensating them because they could not carry their shady deal to fruition.

That is exactly the kind of situation that confirms the population's cynicism towards politicians. According to a popular saying, a politicians's promise is a broken promise. This brings the credibility of the whole Canadian parliamentary system into question. Bill C–22 will certainly be adding to the contempt and scorn with which Canadians regard politicians. In fact, Canadians should not be surprised to see the Liberals act exactly the way they do each time they form the government in Ottawa.

Mr. Maurice Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this extremely important debate. This bill concerns the cancellation of the deal signed by the Conservative government. But it also puts to the test the government's credibility and the integrity of the parliamentary process.

The point I would like to raise in the next few minutes concerns the compensation provided for by bill C–22. When I read this piece of legislation, I had serious doubts. You, and all the members in this House, will surely agree with me that when parliamentarians make legislation, they must respect certain principles to ensure that our legislation is clear, the wording as precise as possible, and the clauses consistent.

• (1220)

Clause 7, regarding compensation, reads as follows:

> No action or other proceeding, including any action or proceeding in restitution, or for damages of any kind in tort or contract— may be instituted by anyone against Her Majesty, or against any minister or any servant or agent of Her Majesty—

In other words, clause 7 means that no compensation may be paid in connection with the Pearson deal.

But when reading clause 10, we find that:

> 10.(1) If the Minister considers it appropriate to do so, the Minister may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, enter into agreements on behalf of Her Majesty to provide for the payment of such amounts as the Minister considers appropriate in connection with the coming into force of this Act, subject to the terms and conditions that the Minister considers appropriate.

And further, still under clause 10:

> (3) No agreement may be entered into under this section after one month after the coming into force of this Act.

When comparing those two sections, in my area, we would say that "there is something missing" because on the one hand, we have the impression that no action may be taken by anyone against the government in relation to any possible agreement or compensation while on the other hand, the minister may, with the blessing of Her Majesty, enter into an agreement, but only within one month after the coming into force of the bill.

After rereading those sections, I finally managed to find some cohesion. Basically, what the bill is suggesting to us in terms of compensation is that there is already a done deal. We now have to find a way to go ahead with the deal. We have to be careful not to fall into two or three traps. First, according to section 7, we must not give the impression of giving away compensation. Better still, we say to people: "Don't worry, you will not have to take us to court because we are going to forbid that. So, there's no problem, you see the minister—under section 10—and you make a deal with him which does not seem to be related to the transaction itself but which will basically allow you to achieve the same result".

The reason I say that in all likelihood the deal has already been made is because of the obligation to come to an agreement within one month after the coming into force of the bill. Therefore, there seems to be some urgency because the legislator, who does not usually speak for nothing, comes to the conclusion that all agreements must be entered into within one month. That is what I wanted to point out.

I will go on about this deal, which has obviously already been struck, although we know nothing about it. As was mentioned by some of my colleagues, including the hon. member for Brome—Missisquoi who just spoke and others who repeatedly said so this week, lobbyists belong to every party and feed at every trough, whether it be with this Liberal government or with the former Conservative government. They just turn coat, then go meet the minister and get the same results.

• (1225)

Everybody remembers the famous $1,000–a–plate dinner held during last election campaign. Charles Bronfman, unquestionably a francophile emeritus who, in 1976, the day after the election of the Parti Quebecois, had nothing better to say than he would move the Expos out of Quebec, attended this dinner party and was told by the Prime Minister that the agreement concluded for the privatization of Pearson airport would be cancelled.

During the election campaign, the Prime Minister took great pride in saying that Mr. Bronfman paid $1,000 to hear that his agreement was no good. The dinner must have lasted a little longer that this conversation, and Mr. Bronfman surely got guarantees for what was to follow.

Several people reached that conclusion, especially the chairman of the board of inquiry, Mr. Robert Nixon, who said in his report: "My review has left me with but one conclusion: To leave in place an inadequate contract, arrived at with such a flawed process and under the shadow of possible political manipulation, is unacceptable. I therefore recommend that it be cancelled".

Also, still with reference to the famous $1,000–a–plate dinner, I would like to quote the comment made by André Pratte, a journalist for La Presse, during the election campaign: "If a $1,000 gift can help you drop a few words in the leader's or the potential prime minister's ear, what privileges do people who give $5,000 enjoy?"

And what does a business like Canadian Pacific, which gave $64,000 to each party last year, get? These questions have to be asked; and they have to be answered! There is an old saying, "A man is known by the company he keeps". We have to know the facts, we have to find out about these relations.

Therefore, it goes without saying that I support the Bloc Quebecois's amendment and the Reform Party's sub–amendment requesting a commission of inquiry. Mr. Speaker, it is one thing to come and legislate in this House, even if we support the purpose of the bill, which is to cancel this ridiculous contract, but we must also ensure that the government and politicians never again find themselves in such a situation.

And to ensure this, we have to know the facts. To find them out, since we have the report prepared by Mr. Nixon, who conducted an in camera inquiry but still came up with some serious conclusions, it is absolutely justified to appoint a commission of inquiry. I repeat that we must not permit this bill to end a process which, in my opinion, reveals some troubling facts.

We have to know the truth because those who elected us throughout Quebec and Canada want to know what this is all about. The credibility of the government and of all parliamentarians is at stake, and that is why we need a commission of inquiry.

• (1230)

Mr. Bernard Deshaies (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate today on Bill C–22 to explain how my constituents may be indirectly affected, by the more or less successful privatization of this major airport.

Pearson airport in Toronto is Canada's largest airport, with nearly 20 million passengers coming through annually, which is nearly 57,000 per day. Pearson airport has a direct economic impact worth nearly $4 billion annually on Ontario's economy.

Considering these figures, Pearson airport is considered to be, and indeed is, a very profitable airport. That is good news, because in a big country like ours, where equalization is the rule so that all citizens get a fair share, profitable airports in the south make it possible to finance the operations of airports further north.

We need a commission of inquiry to investigate the transactions that took place and those that might have been concluded to realize the real financial potential of this airport—whether or not it is sold to private interests—in order to measure the financial impact and ensure profits can be used to finance the maintenance and development of northern airports.

Air transportation in the north is a vital part of local communications between communities and provides a vital link between communities in the north and the south. Considering the fragile economy of these communities, free competition could adversely affect the security and autonomy of the people in these regions. In fact, I would like to take this opportunity to discuss the privatization policy the government wants to implement in Canada and Quebec. I think that in both cases, Pearson airport and the government's plan to privatize air traffic control, the result will be a loss of services for people in the regions.

Some time ago, the Minister of Transport announced that studies would be conducted on the privatization of air traffic control in Canada and Quebec, to be followed by consultations with users, unions and groups with an interest in Canada's air navigation system.

The Bloc Quebecois is concerned about the implications and especially about the lack of transparency around this project. The information we are getting is extremely vague. The Bloc Quebecois is therefore anxious to find out the real reasons behind the government's plan to transfer nearly 6,000 jobs, including 2,000 air traffic controllers, to an as yet unknown entity.

Will this be a Crown corporation, like Canada Post, or a completely private enterprise?

Does the minister intend to give us the names of the companies, commercial groups or interest groups that have shown an interest or even tendered bids for an air navigation system in Canada or parts of that system?

We think it is important that the public should know who wants what and what the conditions will be for the sale of the system, if there is one. We do not want the scandal of the Pearson airport privatization happening again.

Air traffic safety. If there is a transportation area where decisions concerning the safety of the travelling public should not be delegated to the private sector, it is certainly air traffic safety. Can the government explain to us how it will force this new company to offer air traffic control services where they are needed?

Will the government force this new company, or these companies, to offer air traffic control services even in regions where air traffic is not lucrative? Let us take, for example, an airport with thousands of small plane flights every year which does not bring in much money in terms of landing fees and which is not economically viable, but where the volume of flights is such that the danger of air collisions is high. Will the government force this or these new companies to offer air traffic control services even if they were to lose some money on that part of their activities? We are not too sure about that.

How will remote areas such as Abitibi or the North Shore, or any other Northern or remote area, be treated? How will the government force this new commercial entity to monitor the level and quality of services provided?

• (1235)

You will recall the Dryden crash, where it was demonstrated that Transport Canada had had trouble enforcing laws and regulations. It has been proven that self–regulation does not work and is unacceptable, especially in air travel. How will the government enforce air traffic safety?

If there is a service which is of national interest, such as the Armed Forces, how can the government think about transferring this responsibility—I am talking about air traffic control—to commercial interests?

By the same token, can the minister tell us what will become of the travellers protection, given the fact that he is now considering putting an end to the presence of permanent and professional fire fighters in regional airports in Canada?

We have not forgotten the cuts in services that followed when Canada Post became a Crown corporation. In remote and isolated areas mail service was drastically reduced in order to save money and in the name of profitability. Does the government intend to do the same thing in the case of control towers, flight service stations and fire fighters in regional airports? Will we end up with airplanes being controlled from Quebec and Montreal? In a nutshell, is the government getting ready to shut down regions by reducing services to a minimum?

Furthermore, can the minister explain why his government is still going ahead with its project of "modernizing" the air traffic control system by closing thirteen control towers in Canada? Why does the department want to close four towers in Quebec, or 44 per cent of all towers in Quebec? Must I remind the minister that three out of those four towers are located in peripheral areas, namely Val–d'Or, Sept–Îles and Baie–Comeau? What a coincidence!

In addition to air security, how air traffic controllers and other workers who are currently public servants will be treated is of great concern to our party. Can the minister tell us what will become of those men and women who have given 5, 10, 15 and, for some, 20 years of faithful service to the Canadian public? Will the minister dismiss those who refuse to join the new private corporation or company? Does the minister intend to offer them maybe a "grandfather" clause which would allow them to remain public servants although working within the new air traffic control system?

Is the minister aware of the fact that many believe the air controllers working for the new entity could have the right to strike, which they do not have now? Can the minister confirm or deny that rumour? Can he tell us what he intends to do to clear things up concerning that essential service? Will the government require that seniority and other benefits accumulated by theses employees as public servants for the Canadian government be respected or will these people be at the mercy of every whim of the new managers?

If the government maintains that project of privatizing the Canadian air control system, will it force the new company to abide by the Official Languages Act with regard to services offered to users and employees? Will the pilots, private or professional, still have access to air control services in the language of their choice? Will the employees enjoy the same work rules as they have now, for example the right to receive training and communications in French wherever the legislation permits?

I mention these points, Mr. Speaker, to stress the possible impacts of loss of income in the south which would allow grants and support for the northern regions.

Any privatization project which is of national interest, be it the Pearson airport or the air traffic control system, should be reviewed with everyone's interests in mind and in such a way that citizens in the northern regions or remote areas would be treated fairly.

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take advantage of the debate on Bill C–22 to show how the Quebec City airport has been unfairly treated by the federal government up until now, to the point that it is slowing down the development of Metropolitan Quebec City.

• (1240)

What is striking in this bill is the double standard applied by the Liberal government when dealing with the airports in Toronto and Quebec City. In the case of Quebec City, the Liberal government is dragging its feet. But in Toronto, it uses a steam–roller approach, overlooking a lot of things, probably under the pressure of lobbyists.

As a matter of fact, I am starting to understand what some Liberal candidates in the Quebec City area meant, during the last election campaign, when they mentioned the corridors of power. They probably meant the corridors used by lobbyists. But do people really want to leave the task of influencing the government's actions to the lobbyists? Or would they rather have their elected members make representations to the government? I believe the latter.

Otherwise, Quebec should probably consider speeding up the HST project or upgrading the Quebec City airport, to shorten delays, since lobbyists for Quebec City appear to be less powerful than those for the Toronto airport.

For some time now, the federal government has known that the Quebec City airport infrastructure is totally inadequate to meet the needs of an area where the capital city of all Quebecers is located. On June 23, 1993, on the eve of Quebec's national holiday, representatives of the federal Conservative government held a big ceremony during which they unveiled a new sign and announced that Jean Lesage airport in Quebec City would henceforth enjoy the status of an international airport. Without wanting to minimize the promotional impact of this new status, plans to expand Jean Lesage airport are still collecting dust on the responsible minister's desk.

A simple sign identifying the airport in Quebec City as an international facility will not resolve the bottlenecks that occur. The international flight passenger waiting area is so small that overcrowding occurs on a regular basis, particularly when several international chartered flights carrying hundreds of passengers arrive at the same time. To avoid total chaos, passengers on the last incoming flight must all too often wait to disembark.

A circus atmosphere prevails when hundreds of passengers converge on the sole luggage conveyors in the area reserved for international flights and on the customs area. How can we hope to attract major international carriers when a short stopover in Quebec City on a Paris–Los Angeles flight can mean a delay of several hours for passengers who must patiently wait until those wishing to disembark can do so and the flight can resume?

Under the circumstances, it is not surprising that the many past attempts by airline companies to establish international links to Quebec City have been quickly abandoned.

Another good reason for expanding the airport is Quebec City's bid for the Winter Olympic Games in the year 2002. According to the Association des gens de l'air du Québec, Jean Lesage airport is too small to handle the traffic that would be generated by the Olympic Games in eight years' time.

The association is of the opinion that, because of its bush–league airport, foreign travellers will be left with the impression that Quebec City is, and I quote, "a banana republic". In fact, in our region, people can hardly believe how little was done to fix the airport in recent years.

• (1245)

Again, the president of the air transportation workers union was quoted in a Quebec City daily newspaper as saying: "The main runway was widened so 747s could land. It is all very well but runway lights were not even moved, so if that heavy aircraft veers slightly off course, it will hit the lights and the necessary repairs will slow everything down".

A brief that the air transportation workers union sent to the people responsible for the Quebec City airport development plan and to Corporation Québec 2002 lists four major deficiencies that need to be addressed quickly. First, a runway less than 4,000–feet long running parallel to the main runway would separate heavy aircraft from lighter aircraft for better safety and efficiency.

Second, a taxiway network should be developed to allow aircraft to quickly leave or enter the main runway, thus reducing waiting periods. Third, access ramps must be widened as they are getting more and more congested. Passengers must walk long distances outside, an embarrassing and sometimes dangerous situation, especially in winter.

Fourth, customs personnel must be increased. The lack of customs officers sometimes creates long and tiring line–ups at peak times for international passengers.

It is worth pointing out that these recommendations were tabled on December 8, 1992. We are still waiting for a concrete response from federal officials, something other than simply designating as international an airport with such a status but without the necessary facilities. Whatever we do, we must not make the mistake of minimizing the importance of an adequate airport for the 2002 Olympic Games.

Salt Lake City will certainly be Quebec City's fiercest rival. It even has a truly international airport with all the amenities likely to sway the people who will pick the winning city among the applicants.

The applicant's guide to hosting the 19th Winter Olympic Games in 2002, issued by the International Olympic Committee, says under "transportation" that, as previous experience shows, one of the keys to successful Games is an efficient transportation system. This guide recommends that applicant cities focus on three key areas, namely the transportation of people, equipment and luggage, as well as customs clearance. This is a very good reason to increase the number of customs officers and put in new baggage conveyors at the Quebec City airport.

Of course, the decision to expand the airport should not be based only on the possibility of hosting the 2002 Winter Olympic Games. We must consider above all the needs of the Quebec City region, before and after the Games. The figures quoted in this House on Wednesday by my colleague from Louis–Hébert demonstrate the need for expansion due to the dramatic increase in transborder and international flights at the Quebec City airport between 1988 and 1992.

According to Transport Canada's own figures, as quoted by the hon. member for Louis–Hébert, transborder flights have increased by 179 per cent in Quebec City. In comparison, they went up 12.5 per cent in Halifax, 13 per cent in Winnipeg and 15 per cent in Calgary.

I can hear from here the government side argue that investments were made to upgrade the runway to accommodate jumbo jets like the Boeing 747. It was a very minor reconstruction project, a $7.5 million project, while the $33.5 million five–year capital plan announced in September of 1990 called for the construction of a new control tower, among other things.

Now what has come of that plan? I fear that, as usual, this government will say it is under consideration, the classic excuse to avoid admitting that, again, nothing was done.

The fact of the matter is that millions of dollars were spent to reconstruct the runway, just to prevent grass clippings blown away by the 747s' jet engines from blowing back on the runway. That is the kind of upgrade the Quebec airport has undergone!

But the business community in the Quebec City region have been calling attention to the deficiencies of our airport for a great many years.

Our region's development depends for a large part on technological enterprises open on the world and on tourism. Quebec has acquired international stature after it was declared—the only city in Canada, by the way—World Heritage City by UNESCO. Its cultural life and festivals make it a choice destination for tourists from around the world. However, our development is being compromised because, once again, a central government out of touch with local needs is dragging its feet.

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, like my colleagues, I am pleased to speak in the debate on Bill C–22 and, following them, to shed some light on this bill. This bill absolutely must be clarified because, as you heard in everything they said, there are grey areas, some very dark grey areas, in this bill.

A major topic of the government's red book, the real political manifesto of the Liberal Party of Canada during the election campaign, is to question the disproportionate and decisive influence of behind–the–scenes lobbies on government policies.

The purpose is to restore the image of this same government so that the people again trust their political elite and democracy will experience an unprecedented renewal. The Liberal bible says: "We will develop a Code of Conduct for Public Officials to guide cabinet ministers, members of Parliament, senators, political staff, and public servants in their dealings with lobbyists".

Indeed, a key word in the Liberals' election campaign was openness. However, the reality is quite different. Instead, it shows this party's shameless opportunism and its thirst for power with a view to consolidating the political and financial establishment in Canada.

In the attempted privatization of Pearson airport in Toronto, there is a series of troubling facts that make one seriously question the openness of the Liberal government and of the previous government.

Bill C–22 is a unique opportunity for the Bloc Quebecois to shed light on all the lobbyists who are the real leaders in the old parties, a shadowy area in Canadian politics, Mr. Speaker.

When the federal government published its policy on airport management in Canada in the spring of 1987, it showed that it intended to turn airport management over to local authorities, such as provincial governments, municipalities or boards authorized by federal or provincial legislation. Transport Canada is to provide a safe and efficient airport system. This can be done through appropriate legislation and financial support, without Transport Canada owning an airport.

In the summer of that year, the Conservative government designated Claridge Properties Inc. to build and operate terminal 3 at Pearson. Since then, this consortium owned by Charles Bronfman has had a monopoly. In the first half of the 1990s, he, with the help of the Conservative Party, was in a position to become the sole manager of the airport's three terminals. Not more than a month after his triumph in English Canada last November, the Prime Minister, acting completely contrary to a spirit of openness, asked a former Ontario Liberal minister, Mr. Nixon, to conduct an inquiry behind closed doors, yes, in secret, on this incipient monopoly. As you know, doing something behind closed doors is just the opposite of ensuring transparency. Yet, this is the way these old parties work. Mr. Nixon writes in his report:

> Terminal 3 will be privately based and operated for a further 57 years. To contemplate the privatization of the remaining two terminals of this public asset is, in my view, contrary to the public good.

• (1255)

In March 1992, the government blatantly contradicted its political statement by officially requesting proposals for the privatization of terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson airport. The deadline for proposals was 90 days. A 90–day period in this case was not normal, because this was no ordinary call for tenders, since it involved a very complex contract over 57 years. So, why have such a short bidding period, if not to favour those firms which had already expressed an interest, including Claridge Properties Inc. and Paxport, which had already submitted a privatization plan in 1989?

Let me give you some details on Paxport. The Don Matthews Group, which has a 40 per cent interest in this consortium, has links to the Progressive Conservative Party and the Liberal Party. Mr. Matthews was chairman of Brian Mulroney's leadership campaign and is a former chairman of the Conservative Party. When Paxport made its bid following the government offer to privatize terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson, its president was Ray Hession, a former deputy minister of Industry and senior civil servant with Supply and Services where contracts are awarded. In other words, all the key players were related to the previous Liberal governments. The president of Paxport Inc. himself hired the group of lobbyists which was to work on the privatization project for the benefit of the company. He then resigned from his position as president in 1992, once approval of Paxport's bid was confirmed by the government. And there you have it.

In February 1993, Paxport and Claridge Properties Inc. merged and became T1 T2 Limited Partnership. One of the reasons Paxport's bid had been accepted was that it would create healthy competition between the manager of terminals 1 and 2, Paxport, and the manager of terminal 3, Claridge. Consequently, the merging of the two companies had the effect of totally eliminating any such competition. Not to mention that Claridge managed to acquire a 66 per cent interest in the consortium. So, this is a monopoly.

Claridge Properties Inc. has very close ties to the Liberal Party of Canada. Senator Léo Kolber, who sat on the board of directors of Claridge when the agreements were signed, is the same guy who held a benefit dinner at his home, in Westmount, for the Liberal Party, at $1,000 per guest, where the guest of honour was the current Prime Minister. Now you see why they tried to keep this benefit dinner secret.

Herb Metcalfe, former party organizer for the current Prime Minister, is a lobbyist at Capital Hill Group and represents Claridge Properties. Ramsay Withers, former deputy minister of Transport at the time the request for proposals concerning Terminal 3 at Pearson airport went out, is a Liberal lobbyist who has very close ties to the current Prime Minister.

Given these facts, we have to wonder about the nature of this government and about its ties to the Toronto financial establishment. What about the openness they promised us? What about the ethics? Be serious. What we have here is cover–up and patronage benefiting some private interests at the expense of Canadian taxpayers, and particularly middle–class citizens, which the government always picks on, and the underprivileged. Let us be blunt. The Liberal Party of Canada has always been in cahoots with the financial establishment.

On October 7, 1993, the legal agreement on the privatization of Terminals 1 and 2 was signed. However, Claridge Properties had taken control of T1 T2 Partnership Inc. a few months before, in May of 1993. So, the October agreement was between the government and Pearson Development Corporation.

What is Pearson Development? It is a joint venture partnership which manages operations at all three Pearson airport terminals. Claridge Properties, which is the contractor for terminal 3, holds a 66 per cent interest in Pearson Development and is also the majority shareholder in Paxport, which was awarded the contract in December 1992 for the privatization of Terminals 1 and 2. Once again, so much for transparency and ethics! The least we could say is that the Pearson deal is nothing more than the takeover of all three terminals by a financial power that has a friendly relationship with a so–called democratic government.

Clearly, whether the government is Liberal or Conservative, it is all the same. Today more than ever before, it is increasingly obvious that powerful financial interests, to achieve their ends, will put at the head of the Canadian government a friend who will stop at nothing to stay in power, a person who will have absolutely no regard for the most fundamental rule of transparency and ethics.

Due to the troubling circumstances under which the 1993 agreement was negotiated and executed—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I am sorry but your ten–minute period has expired. We have to move on.

Mr. Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe): May I conclude my remarks?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I will leave it to the hon. members. If they give unanimous consent, I have no objection.

Is there unanimous consent to allow the member for Richmond—Wolfe to conclude his remarks?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Leroux: Mr. Speaker, because its credibility is at stake here, the government has no other choice but to confirm the need for a commission of inquiry to examine this matter as soon as possible. We need an inquiry.

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies): Mr. Speaker, most of my Bloc Quebecois colleagues who have taken part in the debate on Bill C–22 so far looked at it in terms of government openness, and all of them came to the obvious conclusion that a royal commission of enquiry should be set up to look into the whole issue of the privatization of Pearson airport.

In the speech he just made, my colleague for Brome—Missisquoi brought out quite well the large number of friends of the government, both Conservative and Liberal, who were involved or had a hand into this matter, which represents millions of dollars.

My colleague for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead told us how this piece of legislation before the House today was put together: under clause 7, no action may be instituted against the government by any company that could have grievances against it, but clause 10 allows the minister to make a direct but secret settlement with people who might want to claim some small compensation.

Besides, the Nixon Report, commissioned by the Prime Minister, concludes along the same lines. I would like to quote its conclusion:

> My review has left me with but one conclusion. To leave in place an inadequate contract arrived at through such a flawed process and under the shadow of possible political manipulation is unacceptable. I therefore recommend that it be cancelled.

Leading to that conclusion, Mr. Nixon said: "Failure to make public the full identity of the participants in the agreement and other salient terms of the contract inevitably raises public suspicion".

In my opinion, when the government proposes to privatize a Crown asset, openness should be mandatory and the public should be entitled to know all the details in the agreement. That is why, on the whole, we are asking for an enquiry in that matter.

I would also like to quote some remarks made by the hon. member opposite for York South—Weston and reported in the media. They were reported in the November 26, 1993 issue of the Ottawa Citizen, and I quote:

[English]

"I didn't spend the last nine years in Ottawa bashing Tory sleaze to have it occur in our party or for our party to condone it".

[Translation]

Some other remarks were also reported by the Globe and Mail where he was quoted as saying:

[English]

"This will be a true test of Mr. Chrétien's commitment to integrity in government and I have considerable confidence in him that he will kill the deal".

• (1305)

Of course, this is the bill that kills the deal. The only problem is that giving the Minister of Transport discretionary powers to compensate people party to this behind–the–scenes deal is tantamount to having the fox in charge of the chicken coop, and the Bloc is obviously against that.

Why was the privatization of Pearson airport ever considered to begin with? It is quite simple. Pearson airport makes money. Incidentally, it is one of the very few money–making airports in Canada. Why does it make money? Because everything was done to put it in that position.

The Mirabel airport was built many years ago because the Montreal airport was crowded with international flights. A few months after Mirabel was built, the ban on international flights landing directly in Toronto without a stop–over at Mirabel was lifted. After that, all international flights could land directly in Toronto without stopping first in Mirabel.

What did that mean? It meant killing Mirabel and increasing the number of international flights landing directly in Toronto. Today, Mirabel airport is a white elephant and we are on the verge of expanding Pearson airport at the cost of millions of dollars, several million of which will come from Quebec.

The same pattern can be seen in the case of the port of Montreal, with the opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway. Over the years, that system diverted traffic from Montreal to Toronto. The port of Montreal is failing and the one in Toronto is thriving.

The same thing happened with the Borden line. It was recommended by the Borden commission, on which not a single Quebecer sat. It resulted in the petrochemical industry of the east end of Montreal being transferred to Sarnia.

The Auto Pact is another example. It was signed with the United Stated, which goes to prove beyond the shade of a doubt that a small country like Canada can strike deals with a giant such as the United States. But that deal was made for Ontario. Quebec did not get anything out of it.

What is the logic behind all this? They want Ontario to be the economic heart of Canada. This is a Canadian way of thinking. Concentrate all the economic activity in Ontario. Unfortunately, this concentration is to the detriment of Quebec. In the four points I just mentioned, thousands of jobs were lost in Quebec.

Once Toronto's and Ontario's international attraction is established, many companies deciding to come to Canada will follow the same logic which says: "If you want to do business, go where the business is". So they all go to Toronto or elsewhere in Ontario because that is where the business is.

Once this attraction has become extremely strong, it even drains Quebec's own companies. And I am referring to companies like Cadbury, Black and Decker, Electrolux, Habitant Soups, which all left Quebec because there were better opportunities in Toronto. Of course, this endless corporate exodus is responsible for the loss of hundreds of thousands of jobs in Quebec. As we speak, the media report that there are 790,000 welfare recipients and 400,000 unemployed workers in Quebec. And the media—and I heard it again this morning—tell us about an economic recovery.

There is no economic recovery, Mr. Speaker, let us not kid ourselves. The Prime Minister of Canada, under the circumstances, must find a culprit because he does not want to admit the phenomenon I just described. Of course someone to blame is always found, as we saw recently in the House: the unemployed and the welfare recipients, they are to blame.

So they are officially accused of being beer drinkers slouched in front of their TV, this after their jobs have been taken away. Unfortunately all these people are in fact looking for a job. Since he got a very strong reaction, the Prime Minister is attempting to find other reasons why the situation is bad, even if the corporate exodus from Quebec to Ontario is very clear. And now the Prime Minister has called all of Quebec's legitimate and historical demands whims.

I would like to say a few words on this. All the Premiers of Quebec, whatever their political party, as far back as I can remember—and I am not very old, but I still remember it—always said the same thing.

In the mid–1950s, Maurice Duplessis wanted Ottawa to give Quebec back its due. This was not a whim on his part; he said it because he believed that we were being had by Ottawa.

• (1310)

In the early 1960s, Jean Lesage liked to use the expression "masters in our own house"; that was no whim. He was simply convinced that we were not in charge of our own affairs and that Ottawa always controlled everything.

A few years later, Daniel Johnson used the expression "equality or independence". That was not a whim either. He simply felt that, with the way things were in Canada, Quebec was not getting equal treatment. The situation was such that ultimately Ottawa always decided what was best for Quebec.

Of course, several years after that, René Lévesque began to champion the cause of Quebec sovereignty. And that was no whim either. He believed that sovereignty was the only way for Quebecers to become masters in their own home.

The Bélanger–Campeau Commission came to the same conclusion. Either Canadian federalism undergoes a radical change to ensure that Quebec is given its fair share, or Quebec becomes sovereign. That conclusion was certainly no whim. It reflected the clear consensus of all Quebecers who appeared before the Commission.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are indicating that I have one minute remaining. There is so much more that I could say. When we say that we do not want the federal government to intrude into our field of jurisdiction with respect to vocational training, it is no whim. This is the unanimous position of the National Assembly.

The Prime Minister claims that disaster will ensue if the separatists—this is the word he used—are elected. Need I remind him that Moody's, which is certainly not a den of nasty separatists, has pointed out to him that the debt, not the political situation, is responsible for what ails Canada. When the Liberals came to power in 1980, the debt stood at $80 million. They managed to increase it to roughly $200 million. Under the Conservatives, the debt rose from $200 million to $500 million. Now the Liberals, in office once more, are saying that the debt will come in at about $600 million.

It does not take a genius to figure out why our bankers are nervous. The fault does not lie with the nasty separatists. They are nervous because they are owed money. May I conclude, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): If I recall correctly, I was asked yesterday if, by allowing one hon. member to speak longer, I was in fact impinging on another member's speaking time. We are supposed to adjourn at 1.30 p.m. this afternoon. I will let your colleagues decide whether they will let you conclude your remarks, briefly.

Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to conclude his remarks?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Pomerleau: To make it short, Mr. Speaker, I will skip a few things. Let us just say that we request a royal commission into the Pearson airport transaction. It is obvious from all the facts stated in this place that there has been some degree of scheming. We do not want any dealings to take place outside of this House. If certain facts need to be disclosed to the public, we want them to be made public here, before this House, so that the people can have a good idea of what this is about.

The Speaker: I wish to thank the hon. member for his co–operation. On debate, the hon. member for Jonquière.

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, in the last days of its second mandate and in the middle of an election campaign, the previous government privatized Terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson airport in Toronto by signing an agreement with a company called T1 T2 Limited Partnership. After defeating the Conservatives on October 25, the Liberal Party came to power planning to cancel this deal, as promised during the election campaign.

On October 28, the Prime Minister commissioned Mr. Robert Nixon, former treasurer of a Liberal Ontario government, to investigate this controversial agreement. The bill before us today gives effect to Mr. Nixon's recommendation to cancel the privatization agreement made between the government of Canada and the T1 T2 Limited Partnership consortium.

Let me remind you that the principal shareholders of this company are the fabulously wealthy Charles Bronfman and Mr. Don Mathews, Brian Mulroney's leadership campaign manager and former fund–raising campaign president for the Conservative Party.

In light of the exceptional circumstances under which this agreement was made and the many disquieting facts surrounding it, and also in light of the findings of the Nixon Report, simply cancelling the contract will do very little to clarify matters for the public, which is expecting more from the government.

The public wants light to be shed on the role played by lobby groups in this whole business. According to the Nixon Report, lobbyists had put a great deal of pressure on the Conservative political staff as well as on senior government officials.

• (1315)

Mr. Nixon says that lobbyists, by their actions, led the government to make dubious decisions. He said, and I quote: It is clear that the lobbyists played a prominent part in attempting to affect the decisions that were reached, going far beyond the concept of "consulting". With regards to lobbyists' influence on government officials, he added: "When senior bureaucrats involved in the negotiation for the government of Canada feel that their actions and decisions are being heavily affected by lobbyists, as occurred here, the role of the latter has in my view, exceeded permissible norms". Permissible norms were exceeded in the Pearson airport affair. Such statements cannot remain unanswered.

Obviously, excessive lobbying was used with Conservative politicians and federal officials in order to influence their decisions. It seems evident that the public service integrity and impartiality are being questioned by the findings of Mr. Nixon's inquiry. In view of these circumstances, the government cannot turn a blind eye on this affair and just cancel the Pearson airport privatization deal, by secretly compensating people who may have lost money, as it intends to do with this bill before us.

A royal commission of inquiry must be established to shed light on this dubious transaction which looks increasingly like a political and financial scandal as the facts come out. Quebecers and Canadiens must be told the truth about the role attributed by the media to Bill Box, Pat MacAdam, Fred Doucet, Harry Near, Hugh Riopelle, and Garry Ouellette, all lobbyists linked to the Conservative Party, former senior officials or members of Mr. Mulroney's party political staff. One could add to that list Ramsey Withers, a Liberal lobbyist and former deputy minister of Transport, and Ray Hession, former deputy minister of Industry and senior official of the Department of Supply and Services under Trudeau.

A royal commission of inquiry will be able to throw some light on this whole affair and on the role played by these persons. If nothing reprehensible is found, great, we will be pleased to know it. This is not all. The government has to learn a lesson from all this and to take this opportunity to conduct a comprehensive review of the legislation governing lobbying in Canada.

In a free and democratic society as ours, where citizens have the right to express their views, lobbying is part of the decision–making process. Citizens as well as organized groups may influence the government decisions if they feel it is in the public interest. In the United States, lobbying is institutionalized, part of the political scene and well regulated. In order to prevent undue influence of lobbyists on the government, it is essential that their activities be governed by stricter legislation than what we presently have in Canada, which has been totally inefficient as far as the Pearson airport issue is concerned.

The present Lobbyists Registration Act identifies two categories of lobbyist groups. These are: professional lobbyists who have contracts with third parties and approach politicians and civil servants in order to influence them; and the other lobbyists who, because of their functions, may have to approach federal civil servants or politicians to defend their interests; those are, for instance, unions or professional associations seeking the support of the government on a specific piece of legislation.

As for disclosure of their activities, professional lobbyists must give the name of their employer, the name and address of their clients and the purpose of their approach. Those of the second group are required to give only their name and the name of the organisation for which they are working.

Like the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations in its report, I think that interest groups of all categories should be required to follow the same rules of disclosure. Since the purpose of interest groups is essentially to influence the decision–making process of the government, it seems normal that they all be subjected to the same rules.

• (1320)

In brief, time has come for lobbyists to be required to disclose the nature and object of their activities with governmental authorities, as well as the financial benefits they receive for their services.

Moreover, we must protect senior public servants against the schemes of interest groups.

As a matter of fact, the Nixon report reveals that many senior public servants were exposed to considerable pressure by lobbyists who were trying to influence their decisions regarding the privatization of the airport. It even points out that, and I quote: "Indeed this element of pressure resulted in several civil servants being re–assigned or requesting transfer from the project".

The investigator found that some government officials involved in the privatization of Pearson airport had to quit working on that matter because the pressures from lobbyists were too strong and their integrity was in jeopardy.

Given those disclosures, which are very disturbing—to say the least—and in order to avoid any recurrence of such things, Mr. Speaker, all public office holders must be required by law to disclose all contacts they have with lobbyists. Canadians and Quebecers have a right to know who is trying to influence government officials, and why.

In conclusion, at a time when our fellow citizens are asking governments to be more open, we have no other choice than to demand that a royal commission of inquiry be established to clarify the strange events that surrounded the privatization of Pearson airport.

The government must also clean up lobbying in Canada. It has to, because of the scandal that surrounded the privatization of Pearson airport. We have to put an end to the maneuvering by friends of the government and to influence peddling, which tarnish the reputation of our democratic institutions and that of the people working in those institutions.

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval Centre): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–22 has been the focus of debates in this House since April 26. It is now at the second reading stage before being referred to a committee.

However, it seems the decision of the House will have to wait because the Official Opposition clearly intends to show that supporting Bill C–22 is tantamount to supporting non–transparency. Otherwise, the Prime Minister, who professes to be the best advocate of transparency, would never forgive us.

Since October 25, 1993, things have been happening in Canada; among others, the House received a new group of members for whom political transparency is just a ploy if there are no strict statutory rules governing the democratic financing of political parties. The impact of our arrival was traumatic for Canada. But just like some hard–to–swallow pill, I believe this impact can only be beneficial.

This debate on Bill C–22, driven firmly and efficiently by the Official Opposition, is also educational since it proves clearly that the present laxity of the federal rules on political parties' financing is contrary to the best interests of society.

Traditionally, oppositions, like those of the 34 previous Parliaments, hesitated, with good reason, to point a finger at friends of the party in place because any accusation on their part had a 90 per cent chance of turning into a boomerang as fierce as the attacks themselves. But the opposition in this 35th Parliament intends to prove that the absence of legislation on the financing of political parties can only create a vicious circle with a very simple and clear–cut rationale.

Mr. Speaker, no one has the right to bite the hand that feeds him, much less this government. It's an open secret: this government considers that corporate contributions to the election funds of traditional federal parties are as essential as bread and butter. There is enough butter left to clog the most performing liver. Otherwise, how can we explain the presence of clause 10 in this bill, which, for all intents and purposes, authorizes the Cabinet to compensate Limited Partnership, if it considers appropriate to do so? I looked into my crystal ball and I could see, without any doubt, that the government will pay a reasonable compensation to the groups connected with the Pearson Development Corporation.

• (1325)

But can a reasonable government take upon itself to pay a reasonable financial compensation when the whole contract, according to Mr. Robert Nixon, was anything but reasonable? You can judge for yourself, since Mr. Nixon wrote the following in his report:

> My review has left me with but one conclusion. To leave in place an inadequate contract arrived at with such a flawed process and under the shadow of possible political manipulation is unacceptable. I recommend to you that the contract be cancelled.

In his wisdom, the Prime Minister followed the recommendation of his investigator. Indeed, Mr. Robert Nixon, the former Treasurer of Ontario under the Liberal government of David Peterson, and a prominent member of the Liberal Party of Ontario, knew what he was talking about.

I will repeat my question: Is it reasonable to pay compensation as a result of the reasonable cancellation of an unreasonable deal? Any citizen with any degree of common sense will answer a resounding no. Why would the government be tempted to answer in the affirmative? We can safely assume that the reasons are many, but I will suggest two.

Answer no. 1: You do not bite the hand that feeds you, especially when that hand is called Charles Bronfman, whose links with the Liberal Party are well known; or Leo Kolber, a Liberal senator and host of benefit diner at $1000 a plate during the election campaign; or Herb Metcalfe, well–known lobbyist and, surprisingly, former organizer of the present Prime Minister, one job preparing the way for the other I suppose; or Ramsey Withers, another Liberal lobbyist; or Ray Hession, former Deputy Minister of Industry during the Trudeau era.

Answer no. 2: You do not bite the hand that feeds others. You never know. Even if the others seem to be dying, there might be a miracle, they might come back to life. Don Matthews was chairman of the leadership campaign of Brian Mulroney in 1983.

I have other names, but time is getting short and since I want to give you my conclusion, I will skip them. Besides, they are well known.

So, we have come full circle. The government, which has been bragging for a long time about openness, has no choice but to act according to its commitments.

Since October 25, the government has made a number of decisions. In Quebec, it cancelled the helicopter contract, but where are the compensations for lost jobs? Do we have any expectation of industrial reconversion? No. True, Quebec workers are not the ones who contribute the most to the finances of the Liberal Party of Canada.

In Toronto, the Pearson airport deal is cancelled. In that case we know where compensations are going to go. Canadians and Quebecers know it too. The jobs will be saved, and friends of Pearson Development Corporation will be rewarded—I mean compensated, Mr. Speaker.

On the one hand, contracts are cancelled and on the other hand, verbal agreements are carried out, which is hardly conceivable. Members will understand that I am referring to the Ginn Publishing deal.

I can appreciate that our colleagues opposite think it is time to stop quibbling about the issue. In my career as a teacher, I have learned that even a clear message will not necessarily be understood by everyone. We believe that, if we repeat it enough, the population of Canada will finally come to understand and will ask the government to implement a law on democratic funding of political parties, for the sake of transparency.

• (1330)

The government should take the Quebec legislation as a model in that matter. Besides, there is no reason to be ashamed of trailing behind Quebec on that issue. In that field as in many others, Quebec does not see things the same way, perhaps on account of its difference.

I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that when Quebec decides to cut the Canadian trailer loose, my country will be glad to collaborate with its neighbour in order to help bring more justice and equity to our world.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 1.30 p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

RECALL ACT

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River) moved that Bill C–210, an act to provide for the recall of members of the House of Commons, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

She said: Mr. Speaker, for a moment I thought we had unanimous consent to put it straight through the House; that would have been absolutely marvellous.

It is a real pleasure for me to stand in the House today to bring forward an issue that many Canadians, at least outside the House, are talking about probably far more regularly than some of our colleagues would like to acknowledge.

Canadians are seeking dynamic and constructive change in their political institutions; not just tinkering with this or that but real change. They are demanding that political institutions and politicians listen to them, consult with them, and ultimately be accountable to them.

Over the past 25 years governments have expanded their scope of activities enormously and touched people's daily lives in many ways. Canadians want an increasing share in decisions that affect their lives and their pocketbooks. During the same 25 years governments have become very large, very complex, and are often out of touch with ordinary citizens.

One need only reflect on the findings a couple of years ago of the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future, of course referred to as the Spicer report, to sense the frustration and anger felt by Canadians toward government in the recent past. The defeat of the Charlottetown accord in October 1992 was seen by many as a massive rejection of the typical or traditional style of leadership in Canada.

Members will know from media reports, from a wide variety of polls and from their own door to door experience in the last election, that many Canadians do not even think it worthwhile to participate in the political process. Too many have become disillusioned, alienated and cynical about political parties, politicians themselves and government in general, perhaps in some cases with good reason, sad to say, through failure of politicians to listen, failure to consult, and failure to be accountable at all times to the people who elected them.

We in the 35th Parliament have an opportunity to change this, to rectify these shortcomings, and to improve the quality of representative democracy in the country. Through a series of modest, pragmatic, parliamentary reforms we can improve this in future parliaments and work to restore confidence and pride among Canadians in our political institutions. Nothing would be more refreshing than that. We would have people coming from sea to sea to the Chamber and saying: "Yes, this place is real; it is practical and it works".

Recall legislation is one of those sensible, pragmatic, progressive parliamentary reforms that the House should legislate. Recall is a parliamentary reform whose time has come.

There is much misinformation about recall. I would like to quash some of the misinformation about recall legislation. I certainly hope this may change the speeches on the other side of the House that are already prepared. I would like to talk also about the virtues of recall legislation because I believe they far outweigh any misinformation or myth. Otherwise I would not be introducing the bill.

• (1335)

I think is important that we remember the key words again, to listen, to consult and ultimately to be accountable to their employers, the voters in their particular districts who hired them and brought them into office.

Recall legislation would make sure that there was benefit both to our constituents who voted us in and to ourselves. There has to be benefit on both sides. It is not going to be just all good for them or all good for us who sit within the sanctity of these halls.

The opponents of recall suggest at least three bogeymen in expressing their opposition. First, they say that recall is a procedure that has failed when tried in other jurisdictions. In other words it has not worked so it will not work. That certainly is inappropriate.

Second is that recall would be used mischievously for partisan purposes. For example, high profile government members such as cabinet ministers or my friend from Broadview—Greenwood who certainly is high profile would be subjected to harassment. We would hate such a thing to happen.

Third, people will say that recall would encourage short term or parochial thinking by members to the detriment of the long term common interest of all Canadians.

If we fall for any one of those three myths we are saying that the Canadian public does not have common sense. I am not sure there is anyone in this House who would dare say such a thing, especially after the fall of Meech Lake, after the fall of the Charlottetown accord and after last fall's general election where we saw incredible changes in this House of Commons.

Hon. members will know that recall has been a facet of the Swiss system of direct democracy for a long period of time and it is well regarded in that country. Fifteen states in the United States of America employ recall for elected state officials and two additional states, Hawaii and Utah, are now actively considering recall legislation.

This is not ground breaking, this is nothing totally radical. It is not the Canadian way of course to do anything radical. We would be following other countries that have brought in legislation on recall and which have proved substantially that it works well. Thirty–six states provide for recall of locally elected officials. No American state has ever repealed recall legislation once it was established. I think that tells us volumes.

The United States has 36 states that have recall in place. They have never once repealed recall legislation. Something about it must work.

Of course we as members of Parliament know that it is not maybe so much the exact act of recall but it is the threat of recall where members must be looking over their shoulders all the time, not so much with a fine bunch as this, but people are saying: "We do not think he or she is doing their job well". We would be continually looking over our shoulder realizing that somebody stands there with a chain to bring us back into line if we stand out of line.

That whole thing is so important. There would be members in this House as they have done any number of times even in the life of this Parliament, who would say: "Oh, yes Deborah, but Alberta brought it in and then repealed it".

As we know recall legislation was brought in by Premier William Aberhart in 1936. It was repealed. But it was repealed because of some very serious weaknesses in it. They were basically that people could buy off names for a petition. My recall bill has made sure that cannot happen. When that bill was repealed, and we want to make sure that it is on the record in Hansard one more time, Premier William Aberhart and Ernest Manning who was a senior cabinet minister then, the father of Preston Manning the leader of the Reform Party, the hon. member for Calgary Southwest, in fact voted against the repeal. We can honestly say it was not their fault. They brought in the legislation but it was repealed by a bunch of backbenchers who thought there were real serious weaknesses in it.

Let us turn and look at the positive side because that is where we gain the most. Let us look at Switzerland and the 36 American states in assessing the success of recall. The charge that recall would be used in a frivolous manner by defeated parties or special interest groups to harass high profile government members such as cabinet ministers does not stand up under examination. Who would benefit by such actions?

Political parties do not wish to appear frivolous. Dear knows they may wish to appear to be any number of other things. But I am not sure that political parties go out to seek the goal of being frivolous. Not one.

• (1340)

Second, not all the losing parties in a constituency have an interest in a byelection at a particular moment. They would not say: "Let us defeat that person immediately and have a byelection". As all of us well know, we are exhausted after a general election and much work has to be done for the new Parliament. By making the threshold high enough people will not be tempted to be foolish and say: "Let us unseat that person".

Most important, political parties do not have the degree of authority over their members between elections for such nonsense to occur. There is no way anyone from any political party in this House of Commons would have their leadership say: "We demand that you trigger a byelection to force that MP who won the election out of office". I do not believe that would happen. It takes an incredible amount of time, energy and money to get the process going. I do not think political parties would do that just to appear frivolous.

The second myth, the view that voters can be shamelessly manipulated between elections, shows little trust in the electors. If anything has been learned from the last five or ten years of Canadian history it is that we should trust the electors. Some of us might think they made some wrong choices at a particular time. There are some Reform Party candidates I would have loved to have seen in office because they would have made excellent MPs.

At the same time, I know we must trust the common wisdom of the electors. Therefore, when we say the people have spoken on election day we must mean it. We must be able to say that the electors spoke and this is the way it is. Sure, maybe those of us on this side of the House wish the numbers had been different. Who knows, maybe some on that side wish the numbers had been different as well. However, they were voted in by people who care about their country and we must not dispute that.

These are the same electors who showed wisdom and judgment during the general election. Surely they can be trusted to show the same wisdom and judgment when faced with a petition for recall.

It cannot be said on the other side of the House: "We were voted in with a huge majority so we think all the electors are very wise" and then this afternoon stand up in this House of Commons and say: "MP recall is ridiculous for any number of reasons", by intimating that the electors could not fall for such foolishness. It does not work.

The third charge against recall and another myth I would like to dispel is that members might become very parochial to the detriment of implementing the government's mandate. Similar to my previous comment, this view shows little trust in the intelligence or the judgment of the electors. In addition, it shows no confidence in the ability or judgment of the ordinary member of Parliament.

I think it is always seen by MPs who are safe and cosy in this place after being elected that they are on the payroll as it were for four or five years, to say: "Well MP recall is negative. It can never do me, as a member of Parliament, any good".

Let me talk about the positive side of recall for an MP. If I am doing my job to the best of my ability or if my neighbour is doing his best job, then why would they be able to get an enormous number of constituents to sign a recall petition against him? There would be a great deal of difficulty in getting the number of people necessary to sign under my Bill C–210. It would then show a vote of confidence in the member for Kindersley—Lloydminster. If they were not able to rustle up enough names to vote against him that would not be a negative thing, it would be positive. It would show he has the confidence of his electors.

It would be a marvellous exercise to see recall in action. For constituents not to be able to get enough signatures together on a petition, what a vote of confidence that would be for my friend here to say: "Wow, they could not get enough people together. That means they generally believe in me and what I am doing". That would be healthy, refreshing and long overdue at this point.

The charges against recall contain little substance and much misinformation.

There have been quotations in the House in the last several days. Let me add a quote by Thomas E. Cronin in his discussion of the pros and cons of recall in his book entitled Direct Democracy: The Politics of Initiative, Referendum and Recall put out by Harvard University Press in 1989. Thomas Cronin states:

> Today's critics of the recall device—

I suspect there may be some of them in the Chamber today.

> —continue to view it as an invitation to unruly, impatient action and as a potential hazard to representative government. They also say it is another media age factor that could weaken the party system.

• (1345)

Then he says, to close his comments:

> No evidence exists to support either contention.

Beware anyone who might stand up in the Chamber this afternoon, and say that such a thing would not work because Thomas Cronin has said there is no evidence at all to support the contention that member of Parliament recall is weak.

When I last spoke on this bill, as I have done several times because I believe in it, I emphasized that members have nothing to fear from its introduction. The bill contains a number of sensible provisions to prevent its mischievous use and ensures strict regulation in its application.

Perhaps the bill in Alberta in 1936 was not tight enough and that is probably why it was repealed. However, we have come up with sensible legislation.

These are some examples of why I think it would be taken seriously by the electors and would not pose any personal threat to probably most members in the House.

First, the petition must be signed by a sufficiently high number of electors in a constituency to prevent mischief. If I needed 100 names or 5,000 names or whatever I could find them very easily. However if we looked at the number of voters who voted in the last election and then took 50 per cent plus one, that is a powerful number of names that we would need. It is a high threshold because we have a multi–party system.

In the United States it is just one way or the other. You vote Republican or Democrat and the person needs 50 per cent plus one. It is about as simple as that. But we have four or five parties running here. A seat can be easily won without 50 per cent of the vote, so I have put the threshold high, that 50 per cent plus one of the number of people who voted in the riding in the previous election is needed. That number of names is very difficult to come up with and the Chief Electoral Officer would need to make sure that all those names were legitimate.

Also I have incorporated a period of grace into the bill, an 18–month waiting period after the general election before a recall petition can be initiated. That also would destroy the myth of people turning around and saying, "let's go get her" after she has been elected for two weeks. We would need a period of a year and a half in the bill for people to prove themselves. This would make sure that MPs are given a chance.

Naturally unusual circumstances such as criminal charges, fraud, et cetera could shorten this period in the case of blatant misrepresentation. Also, recall could be used only once in a constituency during the life of a Parliament. If people got this tool and went wild with it, they would be able to say: "Oh, let's get him" and "let's get her". Let us put some sensible guidelines in place. Another one is that it could only be used once in the life of the Parliament.

Anyone who is still dubious about this should remember that people are sensible. If we are talking about power to the people we need to give it to them whether we like it or not. As we have witnessed around the world people are taking power into their own hands. Canadians are no different. They have proved it time and time again: Charlottetown, 1992. That side of the House was in opposition then, they all said "yes" at least publicly. I know of some, I will not mention any names, who had a great deal of difficulty with it and they voted "no". But publicly they all came out and said "yes".

It depends how loudly we talk publicly, but nonetheless we would make sure that if this only happened once in the life of a Parliament that would be healthy. The recall process also would be subject to strict regulations, verified by the Chief Electoral Officer. For example, there should be procedures for verifying that all signatures are genuine and obtained through legitimate means.

Of course the first thing somebody would say is: "That's going to cost an incredible amount of money and you Reformers are always, always saying cut, cut, cut". There would be some dollars involved in this but I ask the question to all of those cynics: How much will it cost if we do not do that? What will the ultimate cost be if we do not initiate recall and see some incredible situations as we are witnessing even today where members of Parliament are going to sit as independents or whatever else? What is the cost ultimately to the constituents, to the particular member, and to the Canadian political system in general? We are all going to be harmed. I think this would be cheap and would make sure that we have some healthy balance in here.

Let me talk about some more merits of recall. I have a feeling I have not convinced everyone on the other side of the House.

An hon. member: They are coming.

Miss Grey: They are coming, though. Let us remember that recall will strengthen the link between individual representatives and their electors. That is a good thing to to have happen in the country.

It will provide the disillusioned or dissatisfied voter with an instrument and public process for practical action. We saw it in the Charlottetown accord where people said: "I have a vote", and vote they did in incredible numbers with an incredibly resounding n–o from sea to sea. It was not just us rebels in the west; one of the maritime provinces voted no as well and Ontario as good as voted no.

That is exciting to me because people realize that they can hold the reins of power; it is not just in the Chamber. People will be able to do more than just sit and complain as they wait for the next election. One can deduce from this that recall will ensure political parties and politicians listen more.

I can think of nothing more to say to wrap this up. If politicians would listen more, if they would consult more, ultimately they would be accountable far more to the people who actually voted them in, who actually are paying their paycheques, and who are actually saying: "We want some mechanism in place whereby you are accountable to us".

We have heard time and again from across the floor the Prime Minister and others saying that we do have accountability, that we do have recall; it is called general elections. No, it is called MP recall. I would be thrilled to see the bill pass through the House of Commons as quickly as possible.

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to follow the hon. member for Beaver River. She speaks with thoughtfulness. She is always interesting and she is good humoured. I hope to enter the debate with those same qualities.

It is an interesting question. I think we are all interested in participatory democracy. It was, after all, Pierre Trudeau who coined the term. This Parliament is marked by a feeling that transcends all parties to change the system to get more direct involvement by people, more participation by members.

It should be understood, though, that we operate within the context of two different antinomies or sometimes conflicting principles of liberal constitutionalism today in western societies and western influenced societies. One is the concept of government by assembly, which is returning power to Parliament after more than half a century in most western societies of executive dominated regimes.

The other is direct democracy, getting people involved in decision making in its logical conclusion or what my friend, Professor Mirkine–Guetzévitch, called plebiscitarian democracy. Sometimes those two trends run counter to each other. Without anticipating the work of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs, the committee of the House of Commons now studying these issues including the institution of recall, I would refer to some changes that are already apparent.

The office of prime ministership is in the process of change. It is always true that the office depends on the man or woman in it. The prime ministership was different under Mr. Churchill from that under his successor, Mr. Attlee, or under Margaret Thatcher and her successor whose name is often forgotten. The same is happening in Canada.

The Chrétien model of the prime ministership is a very kinder and gentler Prime Minister who rests on collegiality, consensus and a heightened respect for Parliament. Some would say after the last eight years that was very much needed. It is the Pearson model and it is changing Parliament interestingly and constructively.

There is also a heightened sensitiveness among individual members of their responsibilities to their constituents and getting their opinions and, by the way, no particular fear of referenda as such.

• (1355)

I happen to think referenda are fully part of democratic constitutionalism. The Quebec referendum of 1980 was healthy. It cleared the air. The Charlottetown referendum was healthy. I never accepted the view of the prophets of gloom and doom that the country might come to an end as a result of that referendum. The decision has been accepted loyally and with goodwill by all concerned and we are now on to the economic business of the country.

Referenda should not of course be used as an instrument to harass governments or to preoccupy the public agenda. I would warn that there are constitutional limits. If referenda proposals are deliberately ambiguous and confusing or they are repetitive, repeated every year, there are ample constitutional means for controlling them through the Supreme Court. Maybe at some future stage some people, including myself, may have to return to that issue.

Let us get on to recall, the institution as such which the hon. member raised with such ardour and such persuasiveness. It is in many respects antithetical to the main liberalizing constitutional element I have already referred to: government by assembly giving more powers to members of Parliament, not merely opposition but government members, getting away from this presidentialized prime ministership we see in so many British influenced societies.

I would have to raise some questions to the hon. member. I have lived in Switzerland as part of my professional life. I have a great admiration for the Swiss system. However I am always reminded of the particularity of constitutional institutions in their own society and the difficulties in translating an institution from one society to another, unless the basic societal and cultural conditions in the one are sufficiently replicated in the other. It is one thing to have recall in a Swiss canton where everybody knows everybody. I knew all my neighbours; I knew everybody in my canton, I think.

Try translating recall to a constituency. Not even speaking of the hon. member for Ontario's seat which has 220,000 voters, but a seat like my own of 100,000, how do you prove 50,000 or 40,000 signatures on a recall petition? It does not even take a good lawyer to tie an issue like that up in the courts for 17 years requiring everybody to prove their signatures.

I can foresee very great difficulties, endless litigation and expense in carrying this proposal out if it were to be adopted. I wonder if the liberalizing thoughts of the hon. member might not be better directed to other institutions of participatory democracy which I think are already receiving some early favour with the standing committee.

There are more effective ways for Parliament itself to control its own procedures and to ensure dignity and mutual respect among its members. It must never be forgotten that Parliament is a high court of Parliament. It is a vestigial judicial institution too. It has enormous disciplinary powers which are sometimes forgotten. It has the power to scrutinize its own MPs.

There are constitutional limits to this and political dangers. As an academic commentator I warned during the U.S. impeachment debate about confusing legal grounds for impeachment with political grounds for impeachment. That is to take us back to the bad days of the 18th century instead of the golden days of the 17th century in which constitutionalism in England was more vibrant. One is also reminded of the last days of the Weimar republic when majorities used their power to exclude minority members.

Nevertheless, this having been said the standing committee would do well to re–examine Parliament's power itself to discipline its members. It could look at these issues for taking care of some of the pathological examples the hon. member cited where recall in the absence of other more effective mechanisms might be the constitutional instrument to look to.

• (1400)

I would ask the hon. member if she could put her proposals in the context of a larger constitutional vision which includes a revived Parliament where members do have something to do, where the executive exercises modesty and self–restraint in relation to opposition members and government members.

There are changes here that we are on the verge of making. We have a sympathetic Prime Minister. I cite again the example of Mr. Pearson. He and his great colleague, Paul Martin, Sr., were great parliamentarians. This can be a House that will literally reform itself.

Contributions such as the hon. member opposite has made are constructive and helpful. They start the debate. They are the raw material for the overburdened standing committee with a strange double barrelled name. Nobody dares use the word constitution but let us face it, it is a constitutional committee that we have in Parliament, the Standing Committee on House Management and Procedures, and it can act.

Her contributions will add to the debate and I do believe she will see results, perhaps not the particular institution she is advocating. It does need more thought on the modalities, how to get it through, how to overcome those battalions of lawyers who will descend and those 17 years delays but it can be done.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak in the debate on Bill C–210 and consider certain aspects of this bill.

Speaking on behalf of the Bloc Quebecois, I would like to start by saying that the essence of the act to provide for the recall of members of the House of Commons may be expressed as follows: "any elector ordinarily resident in an electoral district who wishes to seek the recall of the members for that district may file with the Clerk an application for the recall of the member in a prescribed form". The recall procedure which exists in 15 American States, allows for the dismissal of a member of Parliament or public servant.

I would like to provide some historical background. A similar system exists in four swiss cantons. Significantly, the procedure exists only with a very restricted socio–political framework, and even at that level, its use is extremely limited. In the United States, for instance, the system only operates at the municipal level. At a higher level, we have only the case of a Governor of the State of Oregon who was recalled in 1921.

To define more clearly the position of the Bloc Quebecois on this question and to explain the political background of the recall concept, I think it is important to go back in history, and I intend to go back a little further than the hon. member from Vancouver Quadra, in fact, to the end of the 18th century. It was the Age of Reason in Europe, a philosophical movement that dominated the world of ideas and gave birth to the broad democratic principles that would guide western societies and still do. In continental Europe, the principle of sovereignty was transferred from the absolute monarch to the people. Although this movement started two centuries ago in England, France and Germany, it has gained in depth and acquired a more universal dimension.

For Jean–Jacques Rousseau, for instance, sovereignty is the "general will" which is always fair and equitable and thus a very effective concept. We see the idea of democracy emerging, where the people decide. But is democracy, in the sense of power to the people, the best form of government? And by the same token, is the right to recall based on the concept of power to the people a good way to control the actions of politicians? If this right to recall existed, would politicians be more likely to answer to constituents for their actions?

As for the foundation of government legitimacy, after royal authority was abolished at the end of the 18th century, in Rousseau's opinion, the people became the ultimate holders of the decision–making power. That is why he rejects the idea of representative democracy whereby the people can only wield their influence at regular intervals. About the English people, he said this: "The people think they are free, they are sorely mistaken; they are only free during elections. As soon as the members of Parliament are elected, the people revert to being slaves, to being nothing". That is why Rousseau wanted to give people the right to recall their representatives on a daily basis.

So, as we can see, recalling elected representatives is not a new idea. I think the main flaws of representative democracy, in particular the principle that citizens can only exercise their right to vote once every four or five years, deeply troubles all democrats since the beginning of universal suffrage.

The question raised at the dawn of representative democracy can still be raised today: "How can the sovereign power exercised by a few parliamentary dignitaries result from people's sovereignty?" The notion of democracy expressed through people's sovereignty, through the idea that every citizen of a sovereign state can influence the decision–making process, that everyone wields political power, will quickly take the form of state sovereignty with the application of democracy.

Throughout the 19th century, especially with the advent of universal suffrage, we see that the people's will expressed through the election process does not coincide with the general will. This is important: it does not coincide with the general will. As we move away from the great revolutionary movements that swept Europe in the 18th and 19th centuries, the notion of people's sovereignty gradually gives way to the more absolutist concept of parliamentary sovereignty.

Given what I just said, the Bloc Quebecois considers this bill to be fully justified and symptomatic of people's misgivings about their representatives and of the massive failure of the Canadian political system. Actually, this bill would be impossible to enforce, but it shows a democratic conscience deeply disillusioned by over 100 years of a system that simply does not work. Parliamentary sovereignty has lost all credibility, and making members of Parliament subject to recall will not restore its credibility.

Clause 4(d) of Bill C–210 says that a statement of 200 words or less would be sufficient to trigger the recall process. This provision would necessarily lead to anarchy in many ridings. Further on, clause 6(b) mentions the requirement to have a petition signed by a majority of the constituents of a riding in order to recall a member. Such a procedure would make the democratic process too costly and completely uncontrollable. I note what the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra said about this.

This bill is not practical throughout a country whose population numbers in the millions. It results from a nostalgic feeling about the democratic idealism which arose in 18th-century Europe. That is why the Bloc Quebecois is opposed to this bill and prefers, along with some of our fellow members, like the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, to take the option of developing within the institution of Parliament itself all the mechanisms for recalling members who are unable to do their job and represent their constituents democratically.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Beaver River for raising this issue, which is a very important one. This is not a new idea; in fact, it has been around since at least the 19th century. As you know, we have always wondered about the possible benefits and the effectiveness of such a measure.

• (1410)

This idea seems to be very attractive, even popular, but we still do not have any proof that it would work. Personally, I do not believe that a simple act would change a great deal the behaviour of hon. members. I would like to believe otherwise, but I think that the behaviour of hon. members cannot be managed by legislation.

In the United States, for example, since 1908, if my memory serves me correctly, there has been only 11 recalled elected officials. You are certainly aware that hundreds, even thousands, could have been recalled, but since 1908, only 11 were.

[English]

There are a number of questions that I think need to be answered before we could possibly support this piece of legislation. I will go back to something that the leader of the Reform Party said and I would like to be corrected if I am wrong. The leader indicated that whenever a new initiative is undertaken one has to ask at least three questions: What will it cost? How many people will be involved? Where will the money come from?

I have read the legislation. I have had some people take a look at it. I have had independent parties do an analysis for me. These questions have not yet been answered and they are important questions.

I want to raise another couple of points. Perhaps there are answers to these points. If you look at the last elections in Canada you will find that some members of Parliament were elected with majorities in excess of 80 per cent. Others had majorities of 30 per cent plus a little bit. Is it appropriate to treat both of those individuals, if they were to be made subject to recall, in the same way even though there is a 50 per cent difference in their win? That is a point that I raise that concerns me.

The other point of course, and I indicated that initially in my remarks in French, is it is appealing. There is no question about that. I think the notion by itself is an appropriate one. However it is much more complicated than it appears. How litigious would it be? I suspect that anyone who would be the object of recall would have many opportunities along the way to question whether or not the process had been followed and whether or not it had been followed properly. I think it could probably be stalled for weeks, perhaps even months.

I will give a simple example. Once you were the object of such a process and someone brought in the required number of names, you as an individual would probably want to make absolutely certain that every single one of those names qualified. First, putting that list together would be a mammoth task and, second, ensuring its absolute accuracy would be extremely important otherwise we could be open to litigation. Of course all of that would be extremely important to do and extremely expensive. Some of you will know that the Lortie commission, after having taken a look at it, indicated that this was not the best way to proceed.

Some of you will know as well that Dr. McCormick, who is a supporter of recall, left a lot of questions unanswered. In fact he could not persuade people that this was the way to proceed.

I want to remind the House that on February 7—I believe that is the accurate date—the government asked the Standing Committee on House Affairs and Procedures to examine a number of measures. Among them were, and I quote: "Measures to achieve more direct participation by citizens, including citizens' initiative, the right of constituents to recall their MP". Therefore, there is a process in place in order, I hope, to address that very question in a very serious kind of way.

Until that report is in, until the questions that I have raised are answered—how much will it cost, how many people will be involved in such a process and where will the money come from—it seems to me that it would be wise to withhold support.

I come back to a point that I made initially. While it seems terribly appealing to think that such a process, such a law, such a bill would reform Parliament or the behaviour of parliamentarians, I am very, very cautious about that. I say it in no way to denigrates the idea, an idea I think which is motivated by a member who believes that if it were to work, as she believes that it might, it could bring about some additional refinement to Parliament. We all know that on particular days it could stand additional refinement.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, as I said a moment ago, even if the idea seems attractive and even if there is some good in it, there are a number of questions about its effectiveness, its advantages and its cost, that must be studied before going ahead.

But the main reason is that the government already launched an initiative which will deal with a number of questions. I personally think that the matter must be considered as a whole. If it is not considered that way, I am not convinced that it will change very much the behaviour of hon. members.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I should have said initially, and I hope that you and the members will permit me, to share my time with my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): There are five minutes remaining in this block of time and if that is agreeable to the House, the member for Broadview—Greenwood would have the floor until 2.20 p.m.

Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I begin by congratulating the member for Beaver River for advancing debate on this very important issue.

Part of the reason why I will not support your motion is because I believe you have been an example—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I know the member for Broadview—Greenwood brings a great deal of enthusiasm and other qualities to his interventions, but the Speaker would want to maintain the usual traditions and be somewhat—

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, through you to the member, I did not want the member to think that I was all of a sudden becoming impersonal.

I believe that one of the unique qualities of the member for Beaver River is the fact that the member has always had the courage to go against the wind. I want to pick up from the member's speech where she talked about the Charlottetown accord and tried to bring the relevance of the Charlottetown accord experience to this recall debate.

I was elected in 1988 for a very specific reason in downtown Toronto. I ran opposing the Meech Lake accord. I believe in a strong national government. I was ideologically supportive of the Pierre Trudeau vision of this country and I still am. I was given the trust in 1988 by the people of Broadview—Greenwood, which had been an NDP riding for 25 years, because I took a very specific stand on that important constitutional issue. I also thank John Turner for his terrific debating skills. That was the other great reason I believe that I won.

Two years ago, when we had the Charlottetown accord, I was sitting in this House of Commons with a position on the Constitution, a strong national government. If I were to maintain the trust of my electorate, and the member for Beaver River always says listen to your electors, I had to sit in this House in opposition and I did not support the Charlottetown accord. I sat here and I did not support my party's position. It was a very painful experience.

I then went into my riding and I campaigned on the beliefs that I had. My beliefs were personally that I did not believe in dismantling or decentralizing this national government any more than it had already been dismantled. I campaigned, not vigorously, but I campaigned. I was not trying to get into a confrontation with my leader or my party colleagues. It was just something that I had been given a trust on in 1988 and I had to m maintain it.

• (1420)

During discussion of the Charlottetown accord I put my position forward. A majority of my constituents at that time did not share my view of the Constitution. Every night I gave my reasons. Our office was open seven days a week, 24 hours a day, for that period of time. It cannot be said that I hid behind the curtain or anything like that. People knew.

Because of the incredible thrust of advertising and because of the media, we were gobbled up by the big hustle on the Charlottetown accord. During that campaign period many people in the community went along with the pack. Those of us in my own community at the time of the election who did not share the view lost by 2 per cent.

I could have been at that moment in time, because of the Charlottetown accord, a victim of a recall action. My constituents could have initiated a recall action. They would have had the basis for getting a recall motion going.

It is important that we debate the issue, but the real test of our accountability does not come in the short term. It comes with our four–year actions in the House. That is when we get our recall test.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, it is truly an honour for me today to support my colleague from Beaver River and Bill C–210. I will start with a quote, if I may: "People, it has been said, want a government that listens, not lectures".

When I was younger one of my goals in life was to represent my country in a responsible fashion through entering the political arena. I was lucky enough to do that through my constituents in Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca.

Prior to the Reform Party coming into existence, I did not feel there was any political party around that truly stood for democratic principles, where the politicians truly represented the wishes of their constituents.

One of the things that attracted me to the Reform Party as opposed to any other political party was its commitment to democratic reforms, reforms that would give the power back to the people. I feel putting the power back where it belongs is fundamental to a truly democratic society.

A primary example of this is the ability of the public to recall elected representatives when they are misusing their position or are not representing their electorate in the manner they were led to believe they would be represented. This is not pie in the sky reform but is a very real part of democratic reforms in a number of countries. We need to look at our neighbours south of the border to see that reform, democratic principles and recall are integral parts of both state and local politics. As mentioned before it also occurs in Switzerland, a model of democracy.

What is the mechanism of recall in Canada? First, as has been proposed by my esteemed colleague, there would have to be a relatively high petition threshold of 50 per cent plus one. This would be an attempt to avoid any spurious attempts at recalling MPs by the opposition. I hope this allays some of the fears of my colleagues across the way in government.

Second, members of Parliament must be given adequate time to get a track record, that is recall cannot be instituted before 18 months in the tenure of a member of Parliament.

Third, recall can only be applied once during the tenure of an MP in any four or five year period of time.

Recall is a remedy of the partisan block voting that has plagued Canadian politics for decades. Members vote now in many cases according to what their party wishes them to vote. This is the antithesis of democracy. Hand in hand though with recall there is another excellent opportunity for the government to democratize the system. That is, we must see that every vote in this House on a bill is not a vote of confidence in the government. Rather, if a bill were defeated, we would have a vote of confidence. This is a liberating thing and would enable the members of this House to truly represent the wishes of their constituents and they would not be hamstrung by party lines.

• (1425)

It would only take the Prime Minister a couple of minutes to make a statement in the House to liberate the members in this House and enable us to do that. I implore him to do that.

A concern about recall that has been mentioned by my colleagues in the government that I will put to rest right now is that it would enable special interest groups to manipulate the electorate and exert undue influence in the political process through continually exercising a petition to have a member recalled.

The reality is very different and will not occur because the electorate is not gullible, It is not mindless or ill–informed but then it does not bend to the whims of special interest groups. We should have more confidence in the ability of the electorate to not fall for spurious attempts at defeating a member of Parliament. That is why this bill will be excellent for democracy in this country.

This has been borne out many times in studies and is one of the reasons why it has been so successful with our colleagues to the south of our border.

My esteemed colleague from Beaver River has brought about and is raising this matter partly because the people desperately want recall. A few examples are evident right now and appropriate.

In my home province of British Columbia in the 1991 provincial election the people were asked do they or do they not want recall. Eighty–one per cent of the people in British Columbia said that they want recall now.

We in the Reform Party asked 1,500 Canadians across this country if they wanted recall or did not want recall. Seventy–five per cent of them wanted recall. This is something the public desperately wants. I think we should exert our influence, our duty and our role to adopt this great bill.

There are a number of other initiatives that I think we ought to address in tying in with our ability and our wishes in the Reform Party to democratize the system. One of those is binding national referenda and the other is citizens' initiatives, both democratic forums that I think would strongly improve the way in which business is done in the House.

Some would argue that these reforms somehow enable elected officials to shirk their responsibilities and get them off the hook in making difficult decisions. I submit that there is no higher power in this land, in a democratic society, than the will of the Canadian people.

We elected officials are merely agents of that will. It is true that we are elected to make decisions on their behalf but I still hold very dear to my heart the idea that the power of the people is of primary importance.

I quote Thomas Jefferson who said in 1820: "I know of no safer depository of the ultimate powers of society but the people themselves and if we think them not enlightened enough to exercise control with a wholesome discretion, the remedy is not to take it from them but to inform their discretion".

It is our Reform Party belief of direct democracy which distinguishes it from the other three mainline political parties. These democratic reforms are what I believe in and are what we as a party believe in. It is what we will fight for.

I hope other like–minded democratic parliamentarians will think likewise, know that this Bill C–210 is integral and important for democratic reforms and is equally important to making our Parliament more effective.

I implore them to adopt this worthy bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): With the bit of time we have left, the hon. member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury.

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I will try to be as brief as possible.

I commend the member for bringing this debate forward. I believe in her sincerity and I believe also in the underlying principles around which the recall concept is being promoted. Unfortunately I cannot support it. I see the exercise of recall as an adversarial exercise.

The public is tired of that kind of adversarial system. I genuinely believe we can come up with positive measures to involve people. In my constituency we have held a number of very successful public meetings that were well attended, well received and non–partisan. It involves the constituents in Fredericton—York—Sunbury in public policy discussions. There are those kinds of positive approaches to involvement.

I agree with the member that the public feels powerless and alienated from the system. I spent nine months going door to door in the constituency and I have to say with honesty that the concept did not come up as a mechanism, although the concerns the member expressed certainly came up very often.

As a member of Parliament I felt an obligation to respond to that and I have. On February 27 we had a large forum in the constituency on health matters. In March we had a forum on national defence matters. These were well attended, well reported, televised public policy discussions. Just last Sunday the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Human Resources Development visited the constituency and we had a non–partisan public meeting on HRD issues.

The need to change the system is real. I believe the public expects us to do that. I also suggest that there has been evidence so far in this Parliament, as brought to the attention of the House by the members on the side of the member proposing this bill, that changes have been made, for instance the debate in terms of Bosnia as one positive change.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I thank you for your indulgence.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(3), the order is dropped to the bottom of the list of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

It being 2.30 p.m., this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston) moved that Bill C–217, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act, the Contraventions Act and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with profound regret that I lead off the debate on changes to the Young Offenders Act today. Press reports indicate that a 16–year old man, Marwan Harb, was murdered yesterday in Hull, just blocks away from the Parliament Buildings.

The person allegedly responsible for that death apparently is a young offender and according to press reports the victim, Marwan Harb, is the second cousin of one of our colleagues, the member for Ottawa Centre.

We do not need this latest incident to remind us of the necessity for changes to the Young Offenders Act, which is in desperate need for reform. Just a few weeks ago there was another senseless killing, again committed by a young offender. Nicholas Battersby met his death as a result of a drive–by shooting in Ottawa. These murders, these incidents, are happening right across the country.

• (1105)

My colleague from Kent who has been instrumental in calling for changes to the Young Offenders Act will be speaking about a particularly vicious murder in his community.

In the province of Alberta a woman trying to protect her children was stabbed to death, again by a young offender.

A six–year–old in British Columbia was raped and murdered by a young offender who had a number of convictions for molesting young children. The public did not know because the Young Offenders Act has a total ban on the publication of details.

The beat goes on and on. While these incidents are taking place, while these murders, rapes, robberies and assaults are taking place, we in Parliament are sitting on our hands. We did not need these incidents to tell us that the Young Offenders Act is in desperate need of reform.

We have been back for six months and there still is not any concrete action. This is the first bill before Parliament to address the Young Offenders Act, which is just one small component of the criminal justice system, one small component of a system that simply does not work, a system that is unbalanced, a system that cares more about suspects and criminals, a system that is more concerned about those who perpetrate crimes than those who are victims of crime in the country.

One thing was made perfectly clear by my constituents in the riding of York South—Weston, and I am sure by all Canadians, and that is that the criminal justice system is in desperate need of reform.

Canadians want leadership. They want changes not only to the Young Offenders Act but to other pieces of federal legislation, including the Criminal Code, the parole laws, the bail laws, the prostitution laws. We cannot simply sit back and say what a wonderful country we live in, look at how safe our country is. Let us look to the United States as an example of what it is really like to be bad as far as criminal activity is concerned.

This debate is timely. At the conclusion of the debate this morning I will be seeking the unanimous consent of the House to have this matter referred to the justice committee so that the justice committee can begin work. I will be listening very carefully to the person or persons in the House who will deny unanimous consent to send this matter to committee, and that person or those MPs who deny unanimous consent will have to explain their reasons why they want to continue to sit on their hands.

I have to say as well that I am not at all happy with the government's agenda with regard to changes to the Young Offenders Act. The government's agenda is on a slow boat to China when we ought to have changes here in the House immediately.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I have great respect and confidence in the Minister of Justice with regard to his genuine commitment to changes to the criminal justice system in Canada, but unfortunately his agenda calls for simply the introduction of a bill in June and he is not expecting passage of the bill until later this year or sometime next year. That is just not good enough.

I would submit that it would be totally and completely and absolutely irresponsible for members of all sides of this House to rise for the summer holidays, to go back to our homes, families and cottages without passing changes to the Young Offenders Act. That would be an abdication of our responsibility as legislators. It would be an abdication of the mandate and the trust given to us by the people of Canada six short months ago.

I would urge the minister, I would urge the government, I would urge all members in the House to expedite changes. We do not need another year or two of study. I was a member of the justice committee for eight years. When I was first elected to the House in September 1984 the Young Offenders Act was only a few months old and it was clear then that the Young Offenders Act would not work. I have been calling for changes for the last 10 years.

• (1110)

Here we are 10 years later and just a few weeks ago the 10th anniversary of the Young Offenders Act was celebrated. The Young Offenders Act replaced the old juvenile delinquents act. Back then the bleeding hearts claimed that the juvenile delinquents act was not working and they needed a more balanced system.

We have now a piece of federal legislation that is totally unbalanced. It is a piece of legislation that shoves aside the public interest and shoves aside security for the public. Instead it protects and invites young people to break the law, to embark upon a lifetime of criminality.

The bill which I have before Parliament today addresses three of the fundamental changes necessary to the Young Offenders Act. I will speak about those changes in a few moments.

First, I want to talk about the existing law, the Young Offenders Act, section 3, which contains eight statements of policy indicating the philosophy behind the Young Offenders Act. I want to summarize the philosophy and explain why in my view that while the intention was there, the 10 years of practice that we have had have clearly established that the principles have gone haywire.

The first principle is that young persons are said not to be as accountable for their acts as are adults but even so they must bear responsibility for their contraventions—motherhood and apple pie.

Second, society must be afforded protection from illegal behaviour although it does have a responsibility to take measures to prevent criminal conduct by youth. That was the second principle, but experience has shown that the protection of society does not even appear to register in the consideration of those involved in the system, particularly judges who have to bear some of the responsibility for some of the outrageous sentences that are handed down today.

The third statement recognizes the need for supervision, discipline and control of young offenders, but also that they have special needs and require guidance and assistance. We will not find any dispute about the need for special guidance and assistance for young people. We all recognize that there is a need for a system that will deal with young offenders. We do not want to treat 12 and 13 year olds, genuine children, like adults. We do not want to throw them in the slammer, send them down to Kingston to serve a life sentence or to serve lengthy prison terms. There has to be a balanced system. We all recognize that.

However, when we look at the experience today we recognize that the system is doing a disservice to the public and to young people because it is telling young people today that they have to carry knives. One cannot help but wonder that if there were a different psychology out there with our young people today the young person who was murdered in Hull yesterday would be alive today. Why was it necessary for the person who committed the murder to be carrying a knife? It is not uncommon for young people today to carry knives and loaded guns to school every morning. That is the atmosphere that our young people are faced with today. They carry guns and knives and other deadly weapons not simply to do harm to other people but for protection.

Mr. Speaker, when you and I were in high school, public school and university if there was a score to settle you used your fists. You would go out back and have a fist fight, a little wrestle and you would settle your scores. Today scores are settled with deadly force. Scores are settled with knives and bullets and guns. People are killed and maimed right across the country as a result of this unfortunate and tragic situation that our young people are faced with today.

The philosophy also says, the fourth consideration, that the taking of measures other than judicial proceedings should be considered where not inconsistent with the protection of society.

• (1115)

The fifth statement recognizes the legal and constitutional rights of youth. Therein lies one of the major problems with the Young Offenders Act. On the one hand it says we should treat young offenders as children. On the other hand it says we should afford them all the rights and privileges afforded other criminals under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

That is fine and dandy, but then young people recognize that they have the right to a lawyer; let's go get legal aid. They have the right to all the protection that adults have, such as the right to remain silent and all the other rights. Young people recognize that those rights exist and they are using them as protection from criminal responsibility.

The sixth principle is that a young person has the right—and this is a real kicker—to the least possible interference with freedom as is consistent with public safety. It is built right into the Young Offenders Act. It says we cannot interfere with their freedom.

Seventh, young offenders have the right to be informed of their rights and freedoms in any situation where those rights and freedoms may be infringed.

Finally, parents are said to have a responsibility for the care and supervision of their children, and children are to be removed from parents only in compelling circumstances.

That is the philosophy behind the Young Offenders Act. Some of it is apple pie and motherhood, but the rest of it unfortunately has led to a system that is a contributing factor to the decay of the moral fibre and the integrity of our youth.

I want to make one thing perfectly clear. I am not calling for sending young children to jail and throwing away the keys, or whipping them and hanging them. What I am calling for is a more balanced approach. The significant majority of young people are law–abiding citizens. They do not need a law to tell them the difference between right and wrong. We are dealing with the exceptions, the small percentage of young hoods, young incorrigibles in our society, who are using the law in order to further their criminality.

We need a balanced system. Somehow the principles outlined in the Young Offenders Act have not been translated into action and the pendulum has swung in favour of the rights and protection of the youth. Public security has become a secondary consideration at best and all too often has been neglected entirely.

My bill addresses three specific areas. First, I would change the age limits provided in the Young Offenders Act. Today a young offender, a child, these people who are in need of protection and caring guidance, is defined as a young person between the ages of 12 and 17. We have the situation of a 17–year–old, one day shy of his or her 18th birthday, old enough to drive, old enough to enter into contracts in some jurisdictions, yet treated as a child and defined as a child.

Statistics show that half of the youth court case load involves 16 and 17 year olds. My bill would treat 16 and 17 year olds as adults. They would be charged and prosecuted in adult court, and in my submission that would act as a very serious deterrent to other 16 and 17 year olds from breaking the law.

As well my bill would lower the age limit to the age of 10. Some people are suggesting that there should not be any lower end to the definition of a young offender. We all know of the case in Great Britain, for example, where two 10–year–olds were convicted of murder. In Canada children under the age of 12 are used by adults to commit criminal offences. Second, some of them are committing in their own right serious offences. By lowering the age limit it allows the police to bring these children into the system so they can be dealt with and treated properly.

My bill would define children as those young people between the ages of 12 and 15. Sixteen and seventeen year olds know the difference between right and wrong, understand the nature and consequences of their acts and therefore, in my view, ought to be prosecuted in adult court. As members know, age is always a mitigating circumstance at sentencing in adult court.

The second aspect of my bill—it is something that the minister has already indicated he supports—is the increase in the maximum penalty for first degree murder from five to ten years. I applaud the minister for confirming his position in that regard not too long ago. Just a few years ago the maximum penalty was three years for first degree murder.

We had the situation in Scarborough, for example, where a young offender committed a triple murder, first degree murder, and served three years. He then was released. Now the sentence has been bumped up to five years but in my respectful submission it ought to be ten years for first degree murder.

The third aspect of my bill would allow for the publication of the details and the identity of a young offender after the second serious conviction. Right now there is a blanket prohibition on the publication of details.

The case in British Columbia—there are dozens of other similar cases—underlined the need for the public, the neighbours, the school system to know of some of the serious offences. The young person had been convicted of molesting young children. If the public knew, if the police knew, if neighbours knew, they could have taken the necessary precautions. He murdered and raped a six–year old child.

My bill would allow the young offender two chances. Once they have committed two serious offences, then the public would be entitled to know the details and the identity of the young offender. I submit that would serve as a deterrent for young offenders.

Let me end where I began. The system is in desperate need of repair. We have to move with dispatch. For those people who suggest this concern is a knee–jerk reaction to the murder in Hull or the murder here in Ottawa or the dozens of other murders and rapes and violent assaults, let me tell members that they are sadly mistaken. Their heads are in the sand and it is time that they woke up and smelled the coffee.

This is not something that happened overnight. It is a concern. The problem has been here for the last 10 years. I would urge my colleagues to expedite changing passages in the Young Offenders Act.

I would ask that at the conclusion of this debate at 12 noon today we have the unanimous consent of the House to refer the bill and its subject matter to the justice committee so that we can begin immediate deliberations with regard to this component of the criminal justice system.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to the bill introduced by the hon. member for York South—Weston, a trial balloon being launched by the Liberal government on the issue of young offenders.

Since the opening of the 35th Parliament, the Department of Justice has been discussing amendments to the Young Offenders Act. For reasons known to the department, it seems this was one of its priorities.

Furthermore, in the famous red book people have been talking about since October 25, the Liberal party proposed to reform the Young Offenders Act, to offer real rehabilitation while cracking down on young criminals.

Since I assume no one is against real rehabilitation, today the Liberal government is testing the temper and sensibilities of voters on the issue of cracking down on young criminals. Considering the bill the hon. member has introduced, I understand why he sits on the extreme right of the Prime Minister.

• (1125)

Unfortunately, this shift to the right on the young offenders issue is based on a skewed equation of violence and young people. To the average citizen, youth is equated with violence and adolescence is synonymous with delinquency. However, nothing could be further from the truth.

In Quebec, since 1979, all crimes committed by young people have decreased substantially, by nearly 8 per cent across Quebec and by 34 per cent in the Montreal area. Was the government, or should I say, was the hon. member aware of these figures before he introduced the kind of bill we have before us today?

We cannot go on being alarmist to this degree, because it gives a false picture of reality and we end up with bills like this one which I consider to be very alarming indeed.

It is all well and good to ask for zero tolerance, but should this necessarily mean lowering the age limit of offenders covered by the youth courts, should this mean more severe sentencing and releasing the names of repeat young offenders? This interpretation of zero tolerance is tantamount to telling all young offenders: get in there and stay there. That is the easy way out.

That is a fifties petit bourgeois attitude. The emphasis should not be on the sentencing aspect as much as on assistance, guidance and reintegration of the young offender.

Obviously, I am against the simplistic bill before the House today. If this proposal would help the government save money, a government that is flat broke, perhaps we could discuss it and consider the benefits from that angle. However, by increasing sentences and lowering the age at which one is considered to be young offender, we are merely filling up our prisons faster and adding to the number of unproductive young people who will be a burden on society for the rest of their lives.

Current public pressure for a stricter Young Offenders Act is understandable, especially in western Canada. Sensational cases reported in the media add to the skewed perception of the problem. However, reaching directly with amendments like these reflects some confusion about, and represents a major departure from, the objectives pursued by the Young Offenders Act passed in 1984, in other words, deterrence, rehabilitation and the protection of society.

In Quebec, we understand the main principles behind the protection of youth and society. When dealing with young offenders, we rely on rehabilitation and reintegration. As much as possible, we avoid criminalizing cases involving young offenders.

The Quebec Department of Health and Social Services and the Youth Protection Branch take care of young offenders and assist them. The results have been astonishing. In Quebec, we invest in rehabilitation because we believe in it. Statistics are extremely revealing in that respect. According to a very sound study conducted in Quebec between 1968 and 1983, it takes society less than five years to recoup the money it invests to rehabilitate young murderers and turn them into productive young adults who work, pay taxes and spend money, all of which keep the economy going.

In western Canada, they are understandably intolerant because they do not invest in their youth as we do. It is not one of their concerns. They do not seem to have the resources; they do not take care of young offenders who are left to fend for themselves. They just lock them up in a different part of the prison than the adults.

Our assessment of this bill illustrates how distinct a society Quebec is. You know, it is not only our language and culture which make us different from the rest of Canada, but also our beliefs, concerns and philosophy. We just do not see things the same way and the bill before us this morning is a case in point.

I would be remiss if I did not mention that the goal aimed at by the amendments proposed in this bill could be achieved through a stricter enforcement of the present Young Offenders Act. It appears that, in his bill, the Liberal member is seeking to make young offenders accountable and responsible for their illegal actions so that they can be tried in a regular court.

In our justice system, teenagers charged with indictable offences are seldom tried in adult court, even though the April 1992 amendments make it easier.

Being doubly concerned with the rehabilitation of the young offender and the protection of society, lawyers and judges are not surprisingly very reluctant, one to ask for a trial in adult court, and the other to order it.

• (1130)

In Quebec, according to the information I have, transfer to an adult court is requested in no more than 5 per cent of all cases.

This reluctance is easily explained: If a young offender is found guilty in adult court he will receive a very stiff sentence, offering very little opportunity for rehabilitation. Moreover, he will be eligible for parole only after five or ten years, depending on whether the crime was first or second degree murder.

Why force the hand of the courts if, for legal and social reasons, they do not do it? Even though they can try some young offenders as adults, accountable and responsible for their actions, they rarely choose to do it. If the hon. member wishes to help society, he should instead introduce a bill to make the public more aware that a program offering help in a responsible manner affords better protection than a punitive measure, which is effective only as long as it is in force.

More than that, he should support a complete transfer of jurisdiction to the provinces, with the necessary budget. This way each province could deal with its young offenders as it chooses.

The deterrent effect sought by imposing longer sentences is not supported by the information available. In fact, the reverse in true according to Crime and Delinquency which, in its January issue, published the results of a study carried out in several American States proving that.

Like his government, the hon. member misses the target completely with this bill. If the Criminal Code needed amendments, it would be to force rehabilitation and reentry into the community for young offenders, but this is outside the jurisdiction of this House.

Society should be more tolerant and its objective should not be to make all young persons conform with what their environment, their family, their school and society itself expect of them, but to make them able to become independent, with the minimum of limitations, and to make their reentry a success.

[English]

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise today to speak in complete, full and total support of Bill C–217, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act, the Contraventions Act and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof. It was placed before the House by my colleague, the hon. member for York South—Weston. I congratulate him for the bill and for his distinguished efforts at drawing much needed attention to the issue of young offenders.

When I was first elected to the House of Commons one of my goals was to strengthen the Young Offenders Act. Recent events in my riding only give me greater resolve and strength to push for tougher sentences.

As many in the House may be aware the city of Chatham, Ontario, population 43,000, is still reeling from the brutal murder last week of seven–year old Daniel Miller. He was in the wrong place at the wrong time. A local teenage gang member has been charged with first degree murder in the beating death.

My heart goes out to the Miller family. They lost a son before the prime of his life, before he had a future. The slaying has sparked angry demonstrations and a series of petitions calling for action to prevent more violence.

A railroad bridge near where the boy's body was found was covered with graffiti by a group called Criminally Minded Corporations or CMC. A young concerned citizen painted the bridge on the weekend to erase the gutter language. The CMC is the best organized of six youth gangs in Chatham and boasts over 100 members. Many gang members wear army boots with symbolically coloured shoelaces.

In addition, this totally random act of murder is seemingly just one more example of the crumbling decline of our society, morals and family values. The day after, a 17–year–old was charged with assault causing bodily harm to a security guard who was watching over the abandoned yard where the murder took place.

Where does it end? Local parents and other citizens are calling for vigilante justice. They do not trust our current system of justice, that it lets off criminals with a slap on the wrist while the victims are left in limbo for the rest of their lives.

• (1135)

One resident, Jason Gale, who moved to Chatham recently with his two young daughters, mother and grandmother said this: "They are terrorizing people. I think if the people of Chatham started fighting back, if a few of these gang members got beaten up pretty bad or had something happen to them, I think a lot of it would stop". Is that where our society is today?

I appeal for calm and level heads to prevail in my riding. We must improve the justice system so that criminals are punished for their crimes. Bill C–217 is an important step in the right direction.

Several years ago the former Conservative government introduced some tougher sentences. For instance the maximum sentence for murder was increased to five years from three. I said at that time when the bill was introduced, and I will repeat it today, that the current Young Offenders Act is too soft. It is a joke.

I have presented over 25,000 names on petitions collected by Roy Asselstine Jr. and his parents calling for a reinforcement of the act. I am told by lawyers and police that if some young people are involved with the Young Offenders Act it is a badge of honour. It is a measure of distinction. That is what they are saying on the streets. No ivory tower mentality of Parliament Hill is going to change that reality. It is a reality not just in Toronto, Montreal or Vancouver but also in many smaller cities such as Chatham.

Bill C–217 will augment the debate. As my friend from York South—Weston pointed out, his bill is endorsed by the Canadian Police Association and Victims of Violence and is co–sponsored by 17 members of Parliament.

The purpose of the bill is threefold. First, the young offender would now be between the ages of 10 and 15. As a result 16 and 17 year olds would be held responsible for their criminal acts and prosecuted in adult court. Second, the maximum penalty for first and second degree murder would be increased to 10 years from the current 5 years. Third, after a second conviction the young offender's name could be published.

These are reasonable improvements to the current Young Offenders Act which is not an effective deterrent and does not allow correctional officials a sufficient opportunity to rehabilitate young people. Bill C–217 goes a long way toward balancing the needs of the public as well as our youth.

Yes, we must work to prevent crime, to give hope to young people that their futures can be meaningful, that their lives can make a difference in this world of ours. Rehabilitation must be a vital component of any new law.

I am pleased to offer my backing to the bill. I urge hon. members to send it to the justice committee where it can receive more in–depth study.

In closing I have an article from the Chatham paper. The headline reads: "Family of teen beaten up by gang moves out of Maple City". These are the Asselstines whose son was beaten up by the gang CMC and hospitalized. On his release from hospital he and his parents went around the Chatham area getting signatures on a petition. They have been harassed ever since and have moved with no forwarding address. This is not what we want in our society today.

It is on their behalf and that of young Daniel Miller that I stand in the House in support of Bill C–217.

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to basically support the bill as amendments to the Young Offenders Act are so very long overdue.

The issue certainly was up front during the election. There was always someone who was sure to bring it up at a local town hall meeting during the campaign.

• (1140)

Consequently, in view of such wide concern about problems with the act from right across Canada, it was with dismay we found listening from this side of the House that the government did not even give a mention of the Young Offenders Act in the throne speech. After subsequently pressing the government on that sorely misplaced priority, we have now had a number of promises from the justice minister that the government is moving on a series of amendments.

However, the timing of the long awaited government bill at last count is that it is to be introduced sometime in June. Based on the shifting sands of time of this government, one wonders if there will ever be a government bill amending the Young Offenders Act tabled before the House adjourns for the summer.

I am sure therefore it is with a backdrop of frustration that the member has introduced his own private member's bill. I have heard that the substantive part of it does not have the support of the government. From our observation, this is most disconcerting.

The Young Offenders Act has a title. This bill seeks to make the act live up to its name. The YOA should deal with young offenders, not youthful adults. I would certainly like to see more comprehensive adjustments to the act, however as far as this bill goes, we on this side are prepared to support it.

Specifically the bill is threefold. It lowers the age limits that define who is a young person for the operation of the act. It also allows the publication of the name of a young offender who has been convicted of an indictable offence on two previous occasions. This is a weak effort of improvement but certainly is a move in the right direction.

The bill also increases the maximum penalty for first and second degree murder to 10 years. This last point has been hinted at by the justice minister. However the bill at least leaves the other measures alone whereas the justice minister plans to give on one hand yet take away with the other by limiting the transfer provisions of the act.

My sympathies go out to the member that he is part of a group which is so out of touch with Canadians that he has to bring forward his own bill. Although the bill has timid half measures it still does not get the support of the cabinet.

I have been around at the operational level with young offenders since the days of working with the juvenile delinquents act. I recall all too well the federal–provincial conferences and negotiations for 10 years leading up to the passage of the YOA in the dying days of a previous Liberal government.

Canadians were assured in bold terms how the YOA struck the right balance. I also recall strong voices at the time, even in the House, of how the YOA sent the wrong message to the community and especially to young offenders.

We have now lived with the Young Offenders Act for about 10 years. It has been amended three times in response to community concern. It is the single piece of criminal legislation that is most vilified by the public. We have had 10 years of implementation. One would think over that period some semblance of accommodation would have resulted. However the opposite is true.

The verdict is in from the empirical evidence of operation in the field. The Young Offenders Act is fundamentally flawed because it arises from false assumptions of human nature and as we know best, top down attitude that the community really does not know what is good for it.

Reformers on this side have been calling for some time for a fundamental review because the community demands it. The murder rate has doubled since the death penalty was last used in 1962. Violent crime in general has increased even more. The basic point is that crime rates in general are too high.

We know who the offenders are. We need to protect the community and give more recognition to victims. We have considerable resources available for offenders. We should do more to provide opportunities for making self–reformation available for offenders. However the Young Offenders Act is way off track in respect of victims of youth crime.

In my riding the biggest outcry for the Young Offenders Act reform comes from high school students. They are all too well aware of what the street sentiment is about what happens to one of their own when they seriously offend against another student. Many students, especially females in high schools, are afraid. There is an atmosphere out there that nothing happens to young offenders. There are no real consequences. Law–abiding students have no confidence in the justice system.

Youth are in a period of learning where they resist limits. They kick against authority and watch how the community responds. The Young Offenders Act does the young no favours by sending the wrong message about violating the rights of others. The Young Offenders Act sends the wrong message to the community.

We check the newspaper today. Again we see that 16–year old Marwan Harb of Dompierre Street was pronounced dead at the hospital after being stabbed in the back. A 15–year old boy who was arrested two hours after the stabbing will be charged with murder.

• (1145)

A group of teens was walking through a park. Following an argument one of the boys punched Harb's girlfriend in the face. When Harb tried to defend her a fight broke out and he was stabbed in the back. It was a fight between a bunch of kids. It was not like a gang war. It was not racial. The victim and the accused knew each other through school. Upon being noticed the kids ran away, leaving Harb lying on the ground. Incidents like this that are repeated across Canada demonstrate that we need to address youth violence.

We have an atmosphere where youths carry weapons. There is little community consensus that we are accountable to an atmosphere of law and order and, if violated, offenders will be held to account. In some aspects we see youths behaving as if all law and order has broken down and they are living with the attitude of anarchy, every person for themselves; protect yourself because for no one else will.

The inter–relationship between law, its application and social order is complex. Yet in its simplest form,Canadians from across the country have indicated that the Young Offenders Act does not strike the right balance of deterrence to the individual, deterrence to others, victims' rights and opportunities to reform.

I recently drafted my own private member's bill that was rejected by the system as Bill C–217 was already in the hopper, working its way through. My bill was seen as being too similar. Unfortunately the bill is not votable but I commend the member for sending a message to his colleagues. I hope they wake up and get going with fundamental changes.

Reform Party members will have a lot to say in the future about a constructive alternative to the Young Offenders Act. We have been listening to the community. Our platform comes from the bottom up. The Reform Party national task force on law and order specified substantive changes to the Young Offenders Act and we will be bringing those forward.

Now is the time to support the voice of reason and practical reality. The Young Offenders Act needs changing. The bill although too modest in substance certainly goes in the right direction. Voices of this tone must be supported. The bill must not only be supported by like–minded individuals but must be supported in the name of young people right across the country. The misguided premise of the Young Offenders Act will eventually be fixed. Perhaps it will take a Reform Party government to do it.

In the meantime Her Majesty's loyal constructive alternative from this side of the House will support any voice of reason and balance to deal with the measures the community wants. Let us change the Young Offenders Act now and send a more realistic message to offenders and potential offenders that someone's rights end where someone else's nose begins. Offending needs to be denounced.

We need a young offender law that is realistic in our culture, that balances the needs and the rights of the offender and the offended. The community must have confidence again in the justice system. That is why I support the inherent message of the bill.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on the bill this morning. I congratulate the hon. member for York South—Weston on bringing the issue forward. It is one that has been very much on the minds of all members of Parliament and certainly on the minds of the general public. There are some very succinct parts of the young offenders legislation that should be given a very serious look and review.

This issue is like any other major issue that arises and becomes a public concern. There are serious events that occur that bring the issue forward in the media. People feel that nothing is working. Something is working. Something is not. The something that is not working should be reviewed and repaired.

All legislation has to be changed from time to time to meet the trends and the changes that take place in society. However there is one thing I disagree with. As a former educator I hear some people saying that young offenders do not understand the implications of what they are doing. I can say, having taught many teenagers in my earlier days before coming to this institution, they understand what they are doing. No one needs to throw that argument out. It will not work.

The other sad part of this argument is the fact that some people automatically think that these people come from poor homes, no training and so on in the home. There are areas where this occurs. There are other cases where people are looked after in the home and they still go astray because peer pressure is very strong on them to join gangs and go in the wrong direction.

I spoke many times in the last Parliament on young offenders because we had a serious case in my constituency in the village of Barry's Bay. I think one of the major problems is that the plea bargaining that goes on in the courts is simply not justifiable and cannot be supported. I am glad to know that the justice committee at the direction of the government is making a serious review of this legislation and will probably be into it before June or, if not, during the month of June. I congratulate it on that.

The plea bargaining that goes on in our courts today has to be changed if we are going to change the Young Offenders Act and other legislation dealing with the criminal element. There is no way that we can allow lawyers to go on bargaining away the laws of the country. The laws of the country are put in the records of Parliament, put in legislation to be carried out. That is the intent of the legislators who pass them.

I am absolutely opposed to handing it over to a group of lawyers and the court and the crown and saying: "You drop this, I will take that". In the end you have a situation similar to one that was brought to my attention recently by the hon. member for Victoria—Haliburton. A person goes into a store with a sawed–off shotgun, holds up the store, gets away, is finally caught and brought into court. When he is sentenced he gets four months and he will probably be out in two and a half months. They used to get 10, 12 and 15 years for armed robbery.

That is not justice in the eyes of the public and the punishment certainly does not fit the crime. These are things that have to be changed.

We cannot have people committing crimes in this country and walking away laughing at the law. That is indeed what is going on. We cannot have people going down the streets and shooting a top–notch graduate student on a sidewalk in Ottawa, Toronto or anywhere else, destroying good lives.

The system has to be seriously reviewed, not just reviewed and looked at and talked about and so on. I wish the justice committee well as it does this later. I thank the hon. member for York South—Weston for bringing the issue before the House and giving us a chance to discuss it. I know he is very serious about having the bill adopted for further study and brought before the justice committee.

The bottom line here, and I do not like using that term because it is usually used in an unsophisticated manner, or the real essence of law is that legislators pass laws hopefully to be obeyed, hopefully to be administered, hopefully not to allow a loophole where the law can be bargained away for those who want to get the case over with and win cases for people who should not be on the streets. When someone does get out on the street early and commits another crime, up goes another big sympathy wave saying: "Oh, this person shouldn't be out on the street".

He should not have been out on the street. The law has to be administered. Some of it is already on the books so that when a person is in prison he or she should not be out of incarceration until they have had medical treatment and are deemed by medical authorities to be capable of running their own lives, leading a decent life out on the streets and byways.

• (1155)

If there is anything that we are going to have to improve along with this legislation, it is to make sure that the treatment, medical care and the advising are in place to bring these young people back into a productive way of life.

There are some who have come under the Young Offenders Act who are now very productive in society. We have to recognize that side, too. It is not a one-sided picture. We can only try to perfect it if we try to correct the things that are not working in it today.

I want to review briefly the things that I have touched on. There is the medical treatment of these people, ensuring that the plea bargaining system is changed so that it is going to back up the law that we put on the books, the publishing of names of young offenders as indicated in the hon. member's private members' bill this morning and the fact that these young people do know what they are doing.

Let us go at this in a very constructive way and correct what is working to complement that which is working today.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I stand today to support Bill C-217. I support it in principle as has been explained by another member of my party. There are some aspects on which we would like to see some fine tuning.

Any move in this direction is a move that will work in favour of our most valuable asset in Canada, our young people. Our young people are the ones who are the most disadvantaged by the current Young Offenders Act.

I agree with the member for York South—Weston totally that the bill should have been votable. It really shows something wrong with the system when we can have a votable bill on whether hockey should be Canada's national sport but for something like this that works directly against the young people, the greatest asset of Canada, we are not going to vote on it. I find that really outstanding.

Young people come to me quite frequently. They say: "As a high school student my biggest problem is that I recognize that I am under a cloud". I suspect that for many members and their constituents, when they see young people on a bus or gathered somewhere they assume the worst because there are some bad apples.

We must make changes to the Young Offenders Act not only for property values or violence but primarily to support Canada's greatest asset, our young people. Many of those young people are involved in things like science fairs. They are very exciting events to attend. I commend them to all members and to the public.

Many of them belong to school clubs and organizations. They belong to sports teams. Many are involved in cadets, scouts or guides. Many belong to churches, young people's groups or counsel at summer camp as counsellors. They are involved in marching bands, 4-H clubs, forestry camps, computer clubs, sports clubs and camps. Those who are actively involved are the people who are the most disadvantaged by this law.

We as adults have to get our priorities straight. Let us protect our greatest asset. Many of our young people are involved in summer work. Often we think of summer work as kind of a make work kind of a thing. As members know, without the inclusion in the work force of our young people, many of the things that get cleaned up in the summertime would not get cleaned up. They help with tourist and recreation facilities. They act as information for business.

I say that parents have to be involved in education of the young people. They have to be involved in guidance of the young people. They have to be involved—

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I apologize to the hon. member for interrupting his speech but the rules require that the debate end in about a minute's time.

I understand that a good number of members would like to take part in this debate. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice has stood. He would like to speak. I am sure the hon. member would like to conclude his remarks so I would seek the unanimous consent of the House to extend the debate on this most important subject matter for an additional hour until one o'clock.

• (1200)

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: There does not appear to be unanimous consent. I believe the hon. member had a second point of order.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, can you indicate who denied unanimous consent? I did not hear anything from this end.

The Deputy Speaker: The member, if he had been sitting here, certainly would have heard something.

Mr. Nunziata: It is unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, considering the comparative importance of the next bill we are supposed to debate to the people of Canada. However those who denied unanimous consent will have to account to their constituents and to the people of Canada why they think that an hour's debate on the Young Offenders Act is too much.

In view of the importance of the legislation, I would seek the unanimous consent of the House to adopt the bill at second reading, in principle, and to refer the bill to the justice committee for further consideration.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: Once again I must advise members that there is no unanimous consent on this side.

[English]

Mr. Nunziata: I rise on a further point of order, Mr. Speaker. The separatists will have to explain to the rest of Canada why they do not want to debate or even discuss the bill.

I will try once again. Rather than adopting the bill at second reading I would ask that the subject matter of the Young Offenders Act, not the bill before Parliament, be referred to the committee so that all members will have an opportunity to discuss the subject matter at committee.

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to refer the subject matter of the bill to committee?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: Again there is no unanimous consent.

The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), this item is dropped from the Order Paper.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT AGREEMENTS ACT

The House resumed from April 29 consideration of the motion that Bill C–22, an act respecting certain agreements concerning the redevelopment and operation of terminals 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson International Airport, be read the second time and referred to a committee; of the amendment; and of the amendment to the amendment.

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Quebec): Mr. Speaker, this government is blatantly guilty of applying a double standard. This very same government, which not so long ago attacked the least fortunate in our society, is now getting ready to protect and compensate persons with no redeeming value whatsoever, other than the fact that they helped fill the coffers of the two major federal political parties.

This is the same government that, less than one month ago, announced restrictions to unemployment insurance entitlement, thereby propelling more workers into the ranks of social assistance recipients.

Unlike the unemployed, lobbyists and heads of corporations with close ties to political parties need not be concerned about incurring losses. There is certainly no question of them losing their benefits, remuneration or compensation. Their interests are well protected since they are directly tied to party finances.

The dealings surrounding the privatization of terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson airport are a striking example of how Canadian governments unfortunately resort all too often to playing politics. Many of those who have already spoken in this debate have recounted in detail the saga of this deal. Therefore I will not go over the same ground again.

My purpose in speaking today is to emphasize the odious nature of this affair and the offensive attitude of the two governments who have been successively involved in it.

• (1205)

Take for instance the way the privatization bids were solicited. A 90–day bidding period is highly unusual for such a major contract. Did anyone in the federal administration protest? Certainly not! It was better kept in the family.

With the result that we know: Paxport and Claridge Corporation were the only bidders. The Nixon report had a great deal to say on the subject. While the quote may be a tad long, it is well worth reading and rereading:

> The RFP [request for proposals] having as it did only a single stage and requiring proponents to engage in project definition as well as proposal submission and, all within a 90 day time frame, created, in my view, an enormous advantage to a proponent that had previously submitted a proposal for privatizing and developing T1 and T2. Other management and construction firms not having been involved in the manoeuvering preceding the RFP had no chance to come up to speed and submit a bid in the short time permitted.

The winner, as we know, was Paxport, in spite of the fact it was grappling with financial difficulties. Which leads to the next question that has to be raised again: How could the government let a contract of that magnitude to a company without checking its financial statements? Can anyone imagine even for a moment that an unemployed citizen would be granted a subsidy, a loan or a contract, to start up a small business without having to prove profitability?

The answer is obvious. Never, ever, could such a thing happen. Principles like the need to manage public funds soundly would be argued. Always the same double standard! If you are rich and close to those in power, the usual conditions just do not apply to you, or barely.

Another unknown in this matter is the role played by lobbyists in obtaining these contracts. We know that the Lobbyists Registration Act was passed by the Conservative government in 1988 and came into effect in September 1989. It is interesting to stop and look briefly at the basic principles underlying this legislation. There were three principles.

First, accessibility, meaning that the public has the right to express its opinion and have unrestricted access to government; second, transparency, that is to say that activities involving governments should be clear and open; and third, simplicity, which means the administration of the registration system must be simple. To that end, lobbyists must register with the registrar in one of the categories established by law. In theory, nothing could be simpler.

Assuming I am a lobbyist, I register with the registrar and thereafter, anybody refering to the register will know that I am working as a lobbyist. Depending on the category I am registered under, information concerning my activities will be more or less elaborate. Many problems with the application of the law have been identified, but the gist of it remains valid.

Let us move on to the role of lobbyists involved in the Pearson Airport case and the treatment provided for in the act. We will focus on three major players, namely Donald Matthews, Hugh Riopelle and Patrick MacAdam. Mr. Matthews is president of the Matthews group, which has a 40 per cent controlling interest in Paxport. As you know, Mr. Matthews presided over Brian Mulroney's leadership campaign in 1983. In addition, as a former president of the Conservative Party, he ran fund–raising campaigns for that party.

Mr. Riopelle was chief of staff to former Tory Prime Minister Joe Clark and was later to be appointed to lead the transition team of ex–Prime Minister Kim Campbell. Mr. Riopelle was hired as lobbyist by Paxport's president at the time, Ray Hession.

The third lobbyist is Mr. MacAdam, a friend of Mr. Mulroney and of the Conservative Party. These three men have one thing in common: they never registered as lobbyists.

Should the law not apply equally to everybody? It does not seem to apply to Tory lobbyists. What about Liberal lobbyists? It is an open question. We think it would be appropriate to look more closely at the lobbying firms involved in the Pearson Airport deal. Here are some of them. Working on behalf of Paxport is the Government Business Consulting Group Inc., whose CEO is J.A. Fred Doucet. Surprise, surprise! Mr. Doucet was Mr. Mulroney's chief of staff and senior adviser on Kim Campbell's campaign. It is a small world.

• (1210)

John Legate is president of J.S.L. Consulting Services Limited. Coincidentally, he was hired as lobbyist by Paxport's president when he had access to the Tory Cabinet through the minister then responsible for Toronto, Michael Wilson. As you recall, the airport is located in that city.

Last but not least, Atlantic Research Canada Inc. whose president at the beginning of the privatization affair was Ray Hession, who was also president of Paxport. Mr. Hession was Deputy Minister at Supply and Services under the Liberal government of Pierre Elliott Trudeau. Once the contract was awarded to Paxport, he resigned as president to be replaced by Don Matthews' son.

At Claridge Properties, Earnscliffe Strategy Group Inc., one of the lobbyists, is represented by William J. Fox, a former political attaché and personal friend of Brian Mulroney.

At Near Consultants and Associates Limited, we find Harry Near, who is also involved in the Earnscliffe Group. Mr. Near has long been active in the Conservative Party.

There is no need to continue this litany of names and companies, the conclusion is clear and obvious: they were all related to one another and to the two federal parties which have succeeded each other in office.

Other questions arise. Who exactly do these people and these companies represent? Who are the directors of the various companies involved? We must clear that up. These people have had great influence with political decision–makers, so much so that the former government violated an important parliamentary principle according to which a government at the end of its term makes no decision that could endanger the decision–making power of a future government.

They were so influential that on April 13, 1994, the Liberal government tabled Bill C–22 which is being debated today. This legislation would allow the government to pay corporations, especially the T1 T2 Limited Partnership, large amounts for cancelling the contract. Their influence is such that this government is asking us to ratify another transaction from which corporations tied to the two traditional parties will benefit. Their influence is such that this government is asking us to forget all the transactions between the corporations and the Department of Transport were in flagrant violation of the government policies in effect. Their influence is such that the government is asking us to forget these policies intended to encourage marketing the airports and their contribution to economic development and to make them aware of local concerns and interests.

We want to know whose economy was to be developed. We want to know what local concerns and interests were served by these agreements. We want to know who benefited: the taxpayers, local communities or corporations.

These questions indicate how openly the government conducts its affairs and how easily the public can access information on this. Remember that these principles are affected by the law and that lobbyists must respect them.

The picture we have just painted shows us a group of influential people, well connected with ties to the political parties, who can bend government decisions to their financial advantage.

We have many questions and very few answers. We all know that you must first have your questions answered before you can make a decision.

The taxpayers of Canada and Quebec need light to be shed on this issue, an intense, bright light. That is why the Bloc Quebecois demands setting up a royal commission of inquiry on this matter.

Mr. Michel Daviault (Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on Bill C–22.

I wanted to go over the sequence of key events surrounding the drafting of the privatization contract, but since there are so many details, manoeuvres and shady dealings in this transaction, and since some colleagues have already looked at these events, I will instead put the emphasis on a few aspects of this project which involve the alleged transparency of this government in this whole issue.

• (1215)

This government paints a glowing picture of the consulting process to get Canadians' opinion, but in fact all these so–called consultation exercises are nothing but a mirage, because when this pretence of transparency puts the government on the defensive, it quickly states that it was elected to make decisions and that it is doing just that. However, by acting like a bunch of know–it–alls, as Liberal Premier Daniel Johnson said, this government will lead us directly to social chaos. Canadians will not be fooled.

What distinguishes this government from the previous Conservative government? Nothing, except maybe the colour of its program. It is a centralizing government, a government which does not hesitate to maintain duplication and overlappings; a government which continues to violate areas of provincial jurisdictions by unilaterally occupying the whole field. Where is the transparency? Can you not see a pattern between the recent squabbles between Ottawa and Quebec City regarding manpower training, the youth corps program, federal subsidies for education, social programs reform, drug patents, the telephone industry and cable TV? All these issues demonstrate the centralizing actions of Ottawa. Where is the transparency?

As regards Bill C–22, again I will refer to what Greg Weston, a journalist with the Ottawa Citizen, wrote in his column on March 9. Mr. Weston wrote:

> The Grits have managed the remarkable feat of turning a highly suspicious and secretive Tory deal into a highly suspicious and secretive Liberal cancellation process—a secret inquiry, followed by the current secret compensation negotiations, which may ultimately lead to a huge government cheque with a secret invoice.

This sums it up quite well. It seems obvious to me that section 10(1) opens the door to arbitrary measures and that the power given to the minister to decide on the payment of a compensation is a discretionary power which this government should not use if it really wants to govern with a degree of transparency and credibility. Indeed, this Liberal government is not immune to patronage, as you can see when you take a quick look at those closely or remotely involved in this scandal. This is why we ask that a commission of public inquiry be set up.

The circumstances around the hasty signing of the contract for the redevelopment of Pearson Airport are very disturbing, but what is even more disturbing is the attitude of this government, which was also in a hurry to designate a former Liberal minister, Mr. Bob Nixon, to conduct a private investigation.

In the awarding of this contract, what was the role of Senator Leo Kolber, former member of the board of directors of Claridge Properties Inc., a group that has close links with the Liberal Party of Canada, and of Herb Metcalfe, a Liberal lobbyist with the Capital Hill group, who represented Claridge Properties and was a former organizer for the present Prime Minister? What was the role of Ramsey Withers, a Liberal lobbyist whose ties with the present Prime Minister are known and who was Deputy Minister of Transport during the bidding process on Terminal 3 at Pearson Airport?

What was the role of Ray Hession, former Deputy Minister of Industry and senior official with Supply and Services, the department awarding the contracts? Mr. Hession was president of Paxport Inc. and hired a battery of lobbyists, including Bill Neville, closely linked to Mr. Mulroney, Mr. Clark and Mrs. Campbell; Mr. Hugh Riopelle, former PR man and representative for Air Canada, who had access to Mr. Don Mazankowski, a leading figure in the Mulroney cabinet; Mr. John Legate, a friend of Michael Wilson, and so forth. What a mess.

Was an agreement reached by the present Prime Minister and Mr. Charles Bronfman, owner of Claridge Properties and principal partner in the Pearson Development Corporation, at that notorious $1,000 a plate dinner among friends during the election campaign? Only investigators without links to current and past governments would be able to force the people involved come clean, not a timid in–house inquiry, held privately, without any judicial powers.

Mr. Nixon himself observed that the role of lobbyists in this deal went beyond permissible norms. A time frame of 90 days for bidding proposals is unusually short. I may recall that this was a very long term contract—57 years—and a very complex one, which was to prevent several groups from submitting a valid proposal. Of course, Claridge and Paxport, already involved in the management of the airport, were able to submit tenders which, by the way, were the only ones accepted. A single corporation was to control all three terminals, despite the fact that the government of the time claimed that one of the criteria in the privatization of terminals 1 and 2 was competition. We can see now that a monopoly was in the cards.

• (1220)

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, the list of irregularities is very long, and this is why we are requesting a public inquiry, an inquiry that the Liberals stubbornly refuse. The present Liberal government, claiming openness, wants to cancel the deal. But it keeps a discretionary power, in section 10, to compensate, «if the Minister considers it appropriate», certain friends of the party or contributors who may have been implicated in this scandal. As the leader of the opposition was saying, "this particular case is overrun by lobbyists. It is full of people wheeling and dealing in the corridors of power with the two big parties—"

At the present time, Mr. Bob Wright, a good friend of our Prime Minister, is negotiating strenuously and in private too, in order to determine the amount of compensation to be given to strangers.

In fact, we are shown only the tip of the iceberg and we are asked, a bit too lightly, to forget the rest in order to save money.

The Liberal member for York South—Weston was saying in this House, on Tuesday, that compensations to the Pearson Development Corporation could reach almost $200 million.

Mr. Bronfman and the conglomerate he heads, friends of the Liberal Party, have already submitted claims for $30 to $35 million for non–refundable expenses. That's on top of tax deductions they will be able to claim from Revenue Canada, thus hitting the taxpayer once again.

The hon. member for Thunder Bay was saying in this House:

> To be exclusive in looking at compensation for out–of–pocket expenses for Pearson Development Corporation alone is not the right thing to do. We should take in the whole gamut of all those who spent considerable time and expense in developing proposals.

And this, in spite of the fact that these people knew exactly what they were doing since the present Prime Minister had announced that he would cancel the contract.

The facts revealed by a royal commission would allow the government to pass laws to prevent such blatant patronage to happen again. I am asking you: What would be cheaper, holding a public inquiry, not a review and private negotiations, or paying financial compensation to individuals who finance Canadian political parties?

We could talk about political party financing now, but we will do that later. The member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon claims that a royal commission would be too expensive and a waste of time to learn something we already know. Our colleagues opposite may know more about this contract than we do.

As Mr. Nixon himself said in his report:

> Failure to make public the full identity of the participants in this agreement and other salient terms of the contract inevitably raises public suspicion. Where the Government of Canada proposes to privatize a public asset, in my opinion, transparency should be the order of the day.

And Mr. Nixon added:

> My review has left me with but one conclusion. To leave in place an inadequate contract, arrived at with such a flawed process and under the shadow of possible political manipulation, is unacceptable.

After such a statement, it cannot be justified to compensate people or companies who tried to take advantage of such flaws.

Can we put a price on government's transparency and credibility? Is it a waste of time to try to maintain such democratic values?

With this in mind, we call for a public inquiry and for the government to get right to the bottom of these sad events.

We vigorously denounce this attempt and this bill.

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would be sorry indeed if I did not take this opportunity to speak on this bill which shows the true face of the members opposite. As you may recall, during the election campaign, the Prime Minister promised to cancel this deal and to make the political process more transparent. Most likely he was swept up in the media frenzy in the dying days of the campaign and got a little carried away.

• (1225)

His friends, those same friends who shell out $1,000 a plate for the opportunity to gain his ear, were quick to remind him: "Careful, we incurred expenses in connection with this deal". Today, we have a more complete picture and these individuals will receive compensation. This bill is to be passed here in Parliament, and rather quickly. Fortunately, some of us are keeping our eyes open and are criticizing the government's actions loud and clear.

The aim of the bill is twofold. First, it would cancel the deal which is full of irregularities. This is a positive development. Second, however, it would provide compensation, again by way of a closed process, to certain parties. This is far less positive.

From the very moment it came to power, this government made transparency one of its major objectives. It has also made a number of decisions, such as cancelling the helicopter contract and the Pearson airport deal and launching the infrastructure program. Three decisions, and then almost nothing, with the exception of a budget, and a bad budget at that. Since then, it has simply gone about its day to day business. The government seemed to have scored well on these three issues, but now, there is some question about its performance on the airport deal. It is highly doubtful that the government should be given a passing grade in this case.

It bothers me to hear so much talk about transparency. It has become such a major issue that I would not be surprised to see Liberal members walking around with bottles of Mr. Clean. Yet, when time comes to practice what they preach, all is forgotten. All of a sudden, members stop talking. There is no real desire to shed light on this issue, to examine the root of the problem and to avoid a recurrence in the future. No, now that they are in power, they must not let the public in on their plans for the future.

This is terrible. If we look at the whole privatization process and at the companies involved, that is Paxport and Claridge, and if we look at who is behind these companies—and I will not bother to give you a complete rundown since my colleagues have already done that—the whole spectacle is rather sordid indeed. All these people with very close ties to the federal government used their influence, going as far as having people shifted around, to make sure they achieved their ends.

Many of these people are still alive and not too far removed from the system, still today. How can this government be trusted when many of the people involved are their friends and are still around, and when they refuse to institute an inquiry which would publicly condemn these people who can be linked to their political party?

That is not a possible course of action; it would be far too dangerous. Mr. Nixon, in the very short time he was given to investigate the matter, attempted to shed some light on this, enough anyway to tell us that this contract should indeed be cancelled. This was obvious just from reading a few good articles published in the dying days of the election campaign and around the main events. We knew then that something was wrong with the announcement of a contract to privatize the airport.

During the election campaign, it had been held out that only friends of the Convervative government were involved and the previous government was to be condemned, on this score. Now, we find out —but it had been discovered earlier— that plenty of Liberals are also involved. As the financial stakes rise, the political convictions of these people shrink. They will team up with anybody, whatever the cost.

The bill before us today contains a most interesting provision. It will allow those who are to be compensated to be targeted very specifically, ensuring that only friends get compensated. That is even better. What a great political tool.

This is the sort of attitude that deeply disheartens the public. It generated tremendous cynicism for politicians, for the administration of public funds. Here we have the perfect occasion to shed light on a major matter where certain people have used their influence, where lobbying has been too intensive and too influential in particular. Yet, we have to wait. What for? I wonder.

There are a number of quotes from the famous red book that I would like to bring up, because this government had told us it was going to control the activities of lobbyists when it would come to power. Apparently some things take much longer than others, but I will quote this:

> We will develop a Code of Conduct for Public Officials to guide Cabinet ministers, members of Parliament, senators, political staff, and public servants in their dealings with lobbyists.

It goes on to say:

> We will appoint an independent Ethics Counsellor to advise both public officials and lobbyists in the application of the Code of Conduct. The Ethics Counsellor will be appointed after consultation with the leaders of all parties in the House of Commons.

● (1230)

At that time, they were probably far from thinking that the Leader of the Official Opposition would be a member of the Bloc Quebecois. They may find this a bit unsettling. But they had good intentions. Now that they are in office, it is a different matter. They were in opposition for a long time. They had enough time to get ready. A party in opposition since 1984 would have had the time to put a lot of things on the table. People would appreciate it. Instead, they are trying to scare lobbyists into being very nice to the current government. The coffers must be filling up quickly. We should avoid this legislation at all costs or take the time to ensure it will have as little effect as possible.

What is most appalling in the bill before us is clause 9 and especially clause 10. Clause 9 states that there will be no compensation for the parties involved. In short, the main purpose of Clauses 1 through 8 is to ensure that the government will not be sued. Clause 9 bars any compensation—perhaps the government hopes that people will get discouraged after reading it. Clause 10 provides for "the approval of the governor in council" so the minister may allow some compensation but not for lobbyists' fees. It is the least that can be done as these fees are already tax deductible. If they had to be compensated in some other way besides, it need have cost the government nothing. These people see paying lobbyists as an investment, so they have to pay the price somewhere.

We are not at all reassured by knowing that the Cabinet will have the power to do that in secrecy. To pay how much compensation? Who knows? Who will know? Will we know one day? That remains to be seen. For the sake of openness, this should be elucidated. In addition, if compensation is to be paid, people should have access to this information much more easily.

At least some parliamentarians should be able to deal with it. But no, openness will come later.

Before concluding—my colleague wants me to go quickly—I would not want to overlook one of the real sources of the present problem, namely the financing of political parties. I exclude our party because we are subject to much stricter constraints. But when you are financed by people who have very big corporate interests, when you agree to be financed by these corporations and it is even one of your biggest sources of funding, you are subject to that pressure. People who back political parties have some control.

Personally, I much prefer to have a base of party members making small donations and exercising that power instead of business people who make large donations and try to get very close to the government with those gifts. I think that is a constraint from which the government should free itself. If it is serious when it talks about openness, it has a model right at hand. Quebec already has legislation which, although it may not be totally perfect, is much better than what we have here and it could be used as a basis. But no, they refuse to look at it. Why? Because now that they are in power, they want to benefit from it. They have nine lean years to make up for now. They want to make a little hay. Perhaps later they will think of doing something to please the public, but nothing substantial. In conclusion, if there is one thing I would want to give Canadians before leaving the federal system, it is a law on political party financing that would make elected representatives much closer to the people in a much more open system—a real reform, this time.

• (1235)

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–22, the subject of today's debate, is a rather particular piece of legislation. This bill deals with agreements arising out of the request for proposals for the terminal redevelopment project at Lester B. Pearson Airport, and the negotiations concerning that project.

The bill states that these agreements have not come into force and have no legal effect. Moreover, it provides that no action or other proceeding may be instituted against Her Majesty in relation to these agreements.

This is an extremely serious piece of legislation. The previous government concluded a contract with some corporations, and this government is trying to renege on that deal by pretending that it never took place.

Why is that? Later on I will show how the process was flawed in a number of ways and that indeed the government should not go ahead with this contract.

The bill also authorizes the minister, with the approval of the governor in council, to enter into agreements to provide for the payment of amounts in connection with the coming into force of that act. This second part seems to be a convenient provision to ensure that parties which may have been prejudiced can be adequately compensated following the cancellation of the contract.

However, while it may seem appropriate to do so, the wording of the provision makes you wonder, and so do some connections which can be made between various events. I will attempt to show that, because of these events which may leave public opinion with a bitter taste, it is important to look more thoroughly at what went on before the agreements were negotiated and concluded, as well as to what is going on now.

To put the legislation in its proper context, clause 3 provides that the agreements which have been concluded:

> — are hereby declared not to have come into force and to have no legal effect.

Moreover, clause 4 says:

> 4.Forgreatercertainty,allundertakings,obligations,liabilities,estates,rights,titles and interests arising out of the agreements are hereby declared not to have come into existence.

As for clause 9, it provides that:

> 9. No one is entitled to any compensation from Her Majesty in connection with the coming into force of this Act.

So far so good. However, everything is spoiled by clause 10 which reads:

> 10.(1) If the Minister considers it appropriate to do so, —if he considers it appropriate--Minister may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, enter into agreements on behalf of Her Majesty to provide for the payment of such amounts as the Minister considers appropriate in connection with the coming into force of this Act, subject to the terms and conditions that the Minister considers appropriate.

I certainly do not question the good judgment of the minister or the governor in council. However, I would like to refer to a few excerpts from Mr. Robert Nixon's report, who was appointed last October 28 by the current Prime Minister to look into this transaction. Mr. Nixon's report was submitted a month later, on November 29. What does this report tell us? To quote Mr. Nixon:

> Prior to the conclusion of the legal agreement the Leader of the Opposition (now the Prime Minister) indicated clearly that parties proceeding to conclude this transaction did so at their own risk and that a new government would not hesitate to pass legislation to block the privatization of Terminals 1 and 2 if the transaction was not in the public interest.

• (1240)

Mr. Nixon's report goes on to say: "On October, 7, 1993, the chief negotiator for the Government of Canada received his written direction indicating that it was the explicit instruction of the Prime Minister that the transaction be concluded on that very same day. On October 7, 1993, therefore, the legal agreement to privatize and redevelop terminals 1 and 2 was made".

It was a very substantial agreement. In fact, when we talk about terminals 1 and 2, we are talking about a major air transportation hub in this country. To quote the Nixon report:

> According to a 1987 Transport Canada study, Pearson has a $4 billion direct economic impact on the economy of the province of Ontario and was directly and indirectly responsible for over 56,000 Ontario jobs. It is by any estimation more than the sum of its parts or the total of its assets and liabilities.

This is a contract which has an enormous impact on a region's economy, by letting private interests manage an air terminal of that size, while for many years, airports near nonheal have been under–used. In Central Canada we have created a powerful magnet for air traffic that can draw traffic away from the country's other major airports, especially those near Montreal.

And how many years would this contract be in effect? I am still quoting Mr. Nixon: "Terminal 3 will be privately leased and operated for"—I was going to say at least 25 years, but no, Mr. Speaker—" a further 57 years". Not only our own generation and the next, but our children's children would have suffered as a result of this agreement. There would be fewer objections if the usual procedures had been followed. Again, I quote from Mr. Nixon's report: "The RFP having as it did only a single stage"— specifications with a single stage are not only unusual, Mr. Speaker, but also extremely disturbing—"and requiring proponents to engage in project definition as well as proposal submission and, all within a 90 day time frame".

I used to be in business, and I received government calls for tenders, and believe me, it is quite a job to read all the specifications. There are pages and pages of the stuff, and you have to read them carefully. And then, preparing a bid is also a complex undertaking. The primary concern is, of course, to make a bid that will not bankrupt the company. The price should be right, but you still have to make a profit, because if you do not make a profit, you cannot deliver. So the first thing is to make a bid at the right price and be able to make a profit.

Second, you have to make sure that your bid will be competitive with those of the other parties who are bidding, so the price has to be fine tuned to give you a good chance to get your bid accepted and win the contract.

• (1245)

You see, Mr. Speaker, when you know that there are only 90 days for something that complex, you can assume that there will not be much competition and, consequently, the price is probably not the best the public could have had. I quote Mr. Nixon again: "In summary, it is my opinion that the process to privatize and redevelop Terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson fell far short of maximizing the public interest".

All that happened under the Conservative government. Having the Liberal government cancel the deal is a good thing. However, the clause I was mentioning a moment ago, which will allow the minister to consider compensation when appropriate, is more troublesome, particularly knowing that major actors in this Pearson deal have connections with the Liberal Party.

We could mention Claridge Properties, a company belonging to Mr. Bronfman; we could mention Mr. Colbert, from Claridge, who gave a dinner for Mr. Bronfman and the Prime Minister at a $1000 a plate. I am not questioning the honesty of members and ministers of the Liberal Party, what I am saying is that there is an appearance of conflict and the only way to shed light on this affair and dispel any doubt in the eyes of the people of Canada and Quebec, is to have the public inquiry that the Bloc Quebecois and I are requesting.

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, this whole deal smacks of political manoeuvring and, as the Leader of the Official Opposition said, only a royal commission will get to the bottom of it once and for all.

People in Canada, and especially in Metropolitan Toronto, have the right to know the truth and to be assured that there will be no undue compensation for these contracts which seemed to favour the friends—friends in the broader sense of the word—of the parties which succeeded each other at the helm of the country.

Mr. Speaker, if the Official Opposition, the Bloc Quebecois, is asking for a royal commission, it is not to delay the work which is to take place at both airports because—let me tell you— Metropolitan Montreal knows only too well the devastating effects of uncertainty about airport development.

Allow me to highlight the devastating effects of the development of what became the two Montreal airports. I will stress how important it will be for Transport Canada and then for the Toronto Airport Authority to take over and redevelop Toronto airport because, otherwise, any future expansion at other airports, including Montreal, will be seriously limited.

But, let me remind the House that when it comes to airports, long term forecasting is very dicey. In the mid–sixties, the federal government decided to build a second airport in Montreal, Mirabel airport.

In 1967, it was projected that, by 1985, passenger traffic would be 14 million. In reality, things turned out quite differently.

In 1985, passenger traffic in both Dorval and Mirabel was only 7 million, half of what was originally expected.

• (1250)

We know how important an adequate airport infrastructure is for the development of a region. Why? Because it is the entrance point for investors and the departure point of human and material resources going abroad. It is a considerable economic lever.

My colleague mentioned the 1987 Transport Canada study on Pearson airport which states that the direct economic impact of the airport on the province is in the order of $4 billion—that was in 1987—and that Pearson accounts directly or indirectly for 56,000 jobs. On the other hand, when adding both direct and indirect jobs and induced ones, the total number in Montreal is 48,500. Economic development involving airports stems from the carriage not only of cargo but also of passengers.

I would like to point out that Toronto had a narrow escape when the federal government decided Toronto also should have two airports at a respectable distance from one another. The second one was to be located in Pickering, but the people of Pickering protested and managed to convince the authorities not to develop this second location, but to develop a second terminal at Pearson instead—a third one was added later on, as we know—on a site easier to integrate.

Toronto had a narrow escape, but Montreal was not so lucky. In spite of all our protestations—and as we know, farming was precluded for many years on some of the best arable land in the region—two separate airports were built in Montreal, airports that together, did not achieve together the results that had been projected for just one previously. The federal government paid no attention to the wishes of the people or the airlines. It must be noted however that had rapid, direct service been provided between the two airports, things might have turned out differently. In 1975, a high–speed link had been announced; it was to cost $400 million, but the project never got off the ground.

For any number of reasons, the airport in Toronto flourished and today, it is on the way to becoming a hub airport, "hub" being, as I understand, shoptalk for a traffic exchange point, a place that both companies and passengers are interested in.

Because Montreal's two airports are poorly connected, from 1969 to 1983, the gap between Montreal and Toronto increased from 27 per cent to 116 per cent in terms of passenger carriage. That is very substantial. The adverse effects of inefficiency in Montreal impacted not only the development of the airport, but also economic development. Worse yet, the federal government delayed handing over to the municipalities, the community, in Montreal the management of their airport. It is imperative that in Toronto, the municipalities, the community, rapidly assume the management of the airports.

Just think that provided sufficient investments were made by the federal government both in Toronto and in Montreal, we could have two hubs: one in Toronto, with its own potential, and one in Montreal, as a point of entry for the Eastern part of the country.

I therefore conclude that we are calling for a royal commission of inquiry not because we want to slow things down—because we are all aware of the effects of uncertainty on economic development—but because we believe it is absolutely imperative that the manoeuvring surrounding the development of both terminals, as well as that of the third one, be dissolved, reversed and the only way this can be done, in our view, is not by striking a deal behind closed doors, but through a royal commission of inquiry.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Deputy Speaker: The question is on the amendment to the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), I have been requested by the chief opposition whip to defer the division until a later time.

[Translation]

Accordingly, pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until 3 p.m. tomorrow, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I think you will find unanimous consent, since tomorrow is an opposition day, that for however long the bells sound at 3 p.m. tomorrow, this time be added to the debate on the opposition motion, so that opposition parties are not penalized.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the House give unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SAHTU DENE AND METIS LAND CLAIM SETTLEMENT ACT

The House resumed from April 25 consideration of the motion that Bill C–16, an act to approve, give effect to and declare valid an agreement between Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada and the Dene of Colville Lake, Déline, Fort Good Hope and Fort Norman and the Metis of Fort Good Hope, Fort Norman and Norman Wells, as represented by the Sahtu Tribal Council, and to make related amendments to another act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

The Deputy Speaker: When the debate last ended, the hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin had six minutes remaining for debate. I do not think the hon. member is here. Accordingly the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Skeena on debate.

• (1300)

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak in opposition to Bill C–16, otherwise known as the Sahtu Dene and Metis comprehensive land claim agreement. Before I begin debating the terms of the agreement, I want to make an observation about the big media establishment in the country that I think badly needs to be said.

The debate on Bill C–16 began on Monday last week, April 25, with members on this side of the House speaking openly and honestly about their concerns with the agreement. This marks a precedent, the first time the old style tradition of the old line political parties not debating such issues publicly being broken.

This is because Reformers believe that we must not be afraid to talk honestly about native self–government and land claims. We cannot expect to achieve workable solutions to the challenges we face as a nation unless we engage in such debate.

Following the debate on Monday, I eagerly scanned the newspapers and watched television news broadcasts to see how the media treated this issue. Do you know what I discovered, Mr. Speaker? The press totally ignored the issue. I could not find any coverage on Bill C–16 anywhere.

Admittedly many bills pass through the House that are not very interesting or newsworthy, but this is surely not the case with Bill C–16 which will convey benefits of an enormous piece of land 50 times the size of Prince Edward Island, almost one–third the size of British Columbia, to less than 1,800 aboriginals for all time.

One would think that with all the remaining land claims yet outstanding the press would be somewhat interested in what is going on here. I know the people in my riding are and I am sure the people in British Columbia and all of Canada are. How is that an MP's expense account or the theatrics of question period can remain front page news for days and yet when we see an issue of such profound importance to all Canadians, aboriginal and non–aboriginal alike, being debated the media is asleep at the switch?

I have concluded that it is either indifference born out of laziness or a tacit agreement not to provide serious coverage on issues which challenge the Liberal left agenda that has been wholeheartedly adopted and supported by a bunch of the big media in the country.

Having said that, I would like to discuss the elements of the bill which I cannot support. As has already been pointed by many of my Reform colleagues, the Sahtu Dene and Metis agreement constitutes a massive conveyance of land and benefits to a group of less than 1,800 people, half of them children.

There is not likely to be much protest coming from non–aboriginals in the land claim area because there are so few of them. Yet the land in question is important to all Canadians. It has the potential to generate an enormous amount of wealth, jobs and tax revenue in the future. That potential will be seriously affected by this agreement.

One cannot help but be struck with the magnitude of the land transfer. Over 42 square kilometres for every adult will be conveyed fee simple. The vast majority of Canadians meanwhile own only their own property, the property that their house is on, and spend most of their working lives paying off mortgages so that hopefully they can own their land fee simple in their retirement years.

According to Statistics Canada's 1991 census, 21.5 million adults live in Canada today. If each one of these adult Canadians were to be granted 42 square kilometres of land by the government one would require a land mass of approximately one billion square kilometres to meet that conveyance.

Given that the actual total land mass of Canada is just over nine million square kilometres one would need therefore an area more than 100 times the size of Canada's total land mass to meet that obligation.

In a world which continues to experience significant population growth and where population density in many countries is measured in hundreds of human beings per each square kilometre it is impossible to reconcile this massive land grant.

I ask aboriginal people to consider this very carefully. Canada's population continues to grow. We continue to accept immigrants and refugees from all over the world to come and make their home here. While we may disagree with the current immigration levels, all Canadians and all members of the House embrace this. Immigration provides benefits not only for the newcomers to Canada but to the people already living here, much like the European migration to North America brought benefits to this land and to its original aboriginal inhabitants many years ago.

Admittedly colonization created much hardship and injustice for native Indians of the day as well and we recognize that as an inescapable part of our history. When I consider the land aspect of this agreement, I must conclude that at best it is 18th century thinking at a time when we are approaching the end of the 20th century.

In addition to the outright transfer of over 40,000 square kilometres of land fee simple, the federal government will pay out approximately $130 million over the next 15 years to the Sahtu Tribal Council. This equates to more than $130,000 for each adult covered under the agreement.

Again, to put this into perspective, if every adult Canadian was given the same amount of money, the government would need more than $3 trillion in the bank to write out the cheques. Three trillion dollars is more than four times Canada's total debt of $700 billion which includes federal, provincial and municipal government debt.

Furthermore, even after such a massive transfer of land and cash nothing in the agreement affects the ability of the Sahtu Dene and Metis to receive existing and future benefits under aboriginal programs. In discussions with my constituents on the land claims question, I hear a diverse range of opinions on how to resolve the issue.

The one consistent theme running through all of this is finality. People want assurance that the resolution of the land claims will entail a systematic reduction and phasing out of taxpayer funded aboriginal programs delivered by the government. This agreement does not achieve this.

I would now like to talk about the beneficiaries of the $130 million to be paid out to the Sahtu Tribal Council. Only some $3,500 will be given to individuals as one–time grants. Virtually all the benefits conferred on the Sahtu Dene and Metis under this agreement will be controlled by Indian leaders rather than distributed to individuals.

All governments, including this one, are notoriously bad managers of wealth and resources. I do not believe a majority of Canadians have any doubts about that whatsoever. If I were a rank and file Sahtu Dene or Metis, I would far prefer that I received a direct personal benefit rather than having money and land given over to the control of a tribal council.

I receive entreaties on an ongoing basis from native people living on reserves within my riding telling me of the injustices they receive at the hands of their leaders. They tell me of nepotism where band jobs and other perks go to relatives and friends of native leaders while others are shut out.

This is typically the way government functions. Look at the federal government's behaviour, if members need any convincing. It is for these reasons that I believe in the value and dignity of the individual over the collective regardless of what collective we are talking about. I am a strong advocate for settlements government to individual rather than government to government.

Incidentally I believe the reason a majority of natives voted against the Charlottetown accord is that the rank and file individuals living in aboriginal communities recognize that self–government was not necessarily in their interest but rather the narrow interests of the Indian leaders. They know that power consolidated into the hands of a few people is rarely a good thing. It has not been good for Canada in the case of our federal governments or the provincial governments. At a time when our national institutions are struggling to become more populous, to break down the barriers of arrogant, political elitism, natives in Canada are not interested in going in the other direction.

Therefore before I can support any legislation for self–government or land claim resolutions, I want to see the affected aboriginal people have an opportunity to decide by referendum whether they want self–government, and in the resolution of land claims, whether they want money and land turned over to themselves as individuals or to the band leaders.

My deepest concern over the bill is the precedent being set for future land claim negotiations. The Sahtu Dene and Metis agreement along with the Nunavut and other agreements entered into recently up north are no doubt being carefully studied by aboriginals in the rest of Canada, particularly in British Columbia.

There are now 38 land claims registered in B.C. with more to follow. The first B.C. land claim to be accepted by the federal government for negotiation is the Nisga'a claim which is within my riding of Skeena. Negotiations have been under way for some time behind closed doors and therefore in a forum where my constituents have no information as to what is on the table in terms of land and resources. When my constituents express their deep concern about being shut out of the process, they are patted condescendingly on the head and told by government officials not to worry, that their best interests are being looked out for. These are largely the same government officials who patted us on the head and told us that the Charlottetown accord was good for us and we should vote for it.

We can therefore understand why people in my riding are very doubtful that their interests are being protected. The Sahtu Dene and Metis agreement will only serve to heighten their concerns.

If the people of Canada had not been given an opportunity to vote on the Charlottetown accord in a referendum we would have had it imposed on us even though a majority of Canadians and almost 70 per cent of British Columbians found it unacceptable.

It is imperative that the people in Skeena receive an opportunity to vote on a proposed land claims settlement within the riding to ensure that the settlement agreement is not imposed from the top down. In saying that, let me reassure Indian people who may be listening that Canadians are very fair minded and I am sure that any just and equitable settlement proposed will be supported.

I would like to read from a letter I have recently sent to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development which encapsulates the concerns of my constituents with respect to land claims:

Dear Minister:

As we are both aware, negotiations between the Nisga'a people of North West British Columbia, the Federal Government and the Province of B.C. are ongoing and have been for some time in an attempt to resolve the outstanding Nisga'a land claim.

The land claimed by the Nisga'a falls within my constituency of Skeena and consequently is of great concern to all people living in the riding. I have received numerous phone calls, letters, and personal entreaties from constituents who are fearful of what a land claim resolution might mean for them.

Given that the foundation of our economy in Skeena rests squarely on resource industries, fishing, forestry, and mining, and understanding that these resources are inextricably linked to the land base, this same land which is being claimed by natives, it is easy to see why people are concerned.

These ongoing land claim negotiations are taking place behind closed doors, out of the public eye, and this heightens concern, worry, and uncertainty.

I wrote to you earlier this spring on behalf of Andy Burton, Mayor of Stewart, asking that you allow a representative of this community to be appointed to the negotiating team. This request was denied.

My purpose in writing today is to request detailed, specific information which may help to re–assure my constituents.

1. What is the timetable for settlement of the Nisga'a land claim?

2. When do you expect to have an agreement in principle signed?

3. Will every Nisga'a have the right, as an individual to vote to accept or reject the agreement?

4. Will members of the Nisga'a band have the option of receiving benefits conferred under the agreement on a personal basis, that is, directly from the Government rather than to the Band Council on his/her behalf?

5. Will non–Natives in the Land Claim area have the right, as individuals, to vote to accept or reject the agreement?

6. Has your department assessed potential socio–economic impacts of a land claim settlement on surrounding non–Native communities? If so, could you provide these to me and if not will you commit to do so before signing any agreement?

7. Have you considered the potential cumulative effect that over 40 land claims could have on the B.C. economy?

8. Considering that the Nisga'a land claim is the First claim in B.C. to be negotiated and will set the floor and not the ceiling for benefits and land conveyance, will you commit to a detailed study of the above mentioned potential cumulative effect?

9. Have you considered the tax base generated by the resource industries in the claim area which provides direct benefits to all Canadians, and how this base may be affected by land claim settlements?

10. Do you intend to provide fair compensation to non–Nisga'a people who are economically injured or displaced as the result of land claim settlements? If so, can you provide details of your policy on compensation? I am not just referring to fishermen, forestry workers or miners, but also the thousands of retail, commercial, and service jobs that exist because of these industries.

11. Will regulations in place to protect and enhance renewable resources apply to resources conveyed to the Nisga'a people?

Will the Nisga'a people be entitled to ship unprocessed round logs for export? If so, what percentage of their timber is subject to this practice?

Mr. Minister, these are serious questions which my constituents need and deserve answers to and I trust that you will respond in a forthright and detailed manner to each one.

• (1315)

What I am getting at with this letter is the fact that the land claim issue is not just about aboriginal people. It is about all of us and how we will continue to function as a society both economically and politically. At the end of the day we all want and need essentially the same things regardless of our linguistic, cultural or ethnic backgrounds. We want an opportunity to live and work in a free country and within an economy that provides decent food, shelter, clothing and education for our children and allows us to enjoy the benefits of modern technology to enhance our lifestyles.

The Sahtu Dene and Metis land claim agreement is not an agreement which considers the long term interests of all Canadians, including the aboriginal peoples involved. It serves to heighten the deep concern my constituents have with the process of land claim resolutions.

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in a debate that is historic and I believe precedent setting.

First, it is my belief the Liberals will pass Bill C–16 using their majority regardless of what it might mean to future generations of Canadians.

Second, my colleagues and I want to register our opposition. We believe that Bill C–16 will not create a better Canada for the Sahtu Dene and Metis or for other Canadians. It does not provide for future harmonious relationships among Canadians. My purpose this afternoon is to show why I believe this agreement will not achieve what it was designed to achieve.

The agreement will have difficulty meeting its first objective. The first objective states "to provide for the certainty of rights to ownership and use of land and resources". It is clear that the intent of this objective is to provide certainty regarding the right of ownership to Sahtu Dene and Metis, called participants in the text of the agreement. Let us examine these rights.

It is for a very small group comprising 153 Metis, 829 Dene and 773 children for a total of 1,755 persons, slightly less than 2,000. More persons can be added to the Sahtu community in the future if the individuals are residents of the settlement area, have aboriginal ancestry and are accepted by a Sahtu community at any time in the future.

Acceptance is not defined in the agreement except that it requires a sponsor who is a participant and following that is approved by a process to be determined by the participants in the Sahtu community concerned.

What are some of the implications here? The agreement, based on the above, relates to a known group of people today. There is no clear definition of who will be affected in the future, except we know it could be any person who is sponsored by a process as yet unknown, determined by the community and solely by the community involved, so that those kinds of people will participate in the future from the benefits of this agreement. Thus it is possible that the beneficiaries of this agreement may be quite different from those with whom the agreement was reached in the first place.

The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development suggests that new participants will be few and therefore do not be concerned. Perhaps, but consider growing wealth and growing power as a result of the exploration and development of natural resources, gems, the need for water and the access to it. In such a case is it not reasonable to expect that more and more people would want to become participants? The pressure would be on to become participants in a Sahtu community.

Let us examine some of the details of the land ownership that is being talked about. There are three kinds of ownership.

There is the ownership of the settlement area which covers 280,000 square kilometres which is the equivalent of 108,200 square miles or 108,200 sections of land. That is 54 sections per participant if you use 2,000 as the number for easy figuring. That represents slightly less than one-third of the province of B.C. as my hon. colleague has just mentioned. It contains Great Bear Lake, Horton Lake, Colville Lake and a major section of the Mackenzie River valley.

The second kind of land ownership is the outright fee simple title to 41,437 square kilometres which is equivalent to 16,000 square miles or about eight sections of land per participant. To put that into acres, it is 5,120 acres.

Then there is the third kind of land ownership and that is municipal land. There are two kinds of municipal land: land which is within municipal boundaries and that which is outside municipal boundaries.

What is significant about all of this? The land outside municipal boundaries must be held by one or more Sahtu organizations. I really want to underline the phrase "shall not be conveyed to a person", but the other part is that land inside a municipal boundary may be conveyed to a person. What are the implications of this?

Sahtu land may not be mortgaged or given as security. Sahtu lands when conveyed to a person are no longer Sahtu lands. What is the observation then? Since municipal Sahtu lands may be conveyed to individuals and upon so doing cease to be Sahtu lands, they can now be mortgaged and given as security.

It does not require a great leap of logic to recognize that over time what are described as Sahtu lands within municipal boundaries may indeed be owned by persons who are not Sahtu. Preposterous, you say. All we need to do is look at what is happening and what has happened in other parts of Canada.

At this moment certain financial institutions in Canada have agreed with a certain Indian band to issue mortgages on residential development on reservation lands. If it has happened once, chances are it can happen again. Indeed chances are that it will happen again. That is particularly true if huge profits appear likely.

A further example consists of the problems surrounding certificates of ownership. These are certificates of ownership of Indian reservation land by natives on those reserves having such provisions.

In years past it is my understanding that has not been the Indian way. No individual shall own reservation land, yet it happened. They said: "But it is not selfish in the way the land is transferred". It is my observation that it is clearly known these transfers are fraught with delays, inaccuracies and transfers from one person to another. In some cases they have even been proven to be fraudulent. Will it happen here? I do not know and neither does this government. However the provision to allow it to happen is there. Therefore the stated objective to provide certainty and clarity of rights to ownership and use of land resources is anything but providing certainty of ownership by Sahtu Dene and Metis.

Let us look a little closer at the municipal boundaries. Section 23.2.1 delineates the boundaries of municipal lands. The agreement provides that these boundaries may be changed. The provisions are particularly relevant. They state in part:

> Where there is any change to the extent or location of Sahtu municipal lands pursuant to this agreement, schedules XV and XVI shall be amended to reflect this change and such changes—

I quote and directly underline:

—shall not be considered to be an amendment to the agreement.

Schedules XV and XVI describe the Sahtu municipal lands, schedule XV the surveyed lands and schedule XVI the unsurveyed municipal lands.

This list of municipal lands includes Déline, Fort Norman, Norman Wells, Colville Lake and Fort Good Hope. These names are significant to anyone associated with oil and gas and natural resources exploration.

• (1325)

It is my contention that not nearly adequate attention has been given to the possible future development in this region of Canada, particularly in reference to the implications of the provisions found in this agreement on such future developments in the region.

I believe that while the agreement clarifies some matters, it confuses others.

This agreement also is entrenched in the Constitution. The agreement states very clearly: "This treaty, which when given effect by Parliament in settlement legislation"—and that would be Bill C–16—"will be recognized as a land claims agreement under the Constitution Act, 1982".

That means once this agreement has been given effect it can only be amended by resorting to the appropriate part of the amending formula set out in the Constitution Act, 1982. There are six different ways of amending the Constitution. It brings into question which amending formula would apply. According to one constitutional expert:

> When the amending formula was designed, no thought was given to devising a formula for amending a constitutionalized land claim agreement between an Indian band and the federal Government of Canada. Section 43 of the amending formula comes closest in that it deals with a constitutional change that affects only one province. In those circumstances an amendment is brought about by resolutions of the Parliament of Canada and the legislature of the particular province involved. But this provision does not really fit either because the Sahtu Dene and Metis collectively is simply not a province. Nor do the territories qualify as provinces for the purposes of the amending formula.
> The result of all this may well be that resort might have to be made to section 41 which is described as the general amending formula. If a given amendment does not come within the more specific parts of the amending formula—

I suggest that is probably the case here.

> —then section 41 is the only amending formula that would be available in this case. The congruity of that would be that section 41 not only requires a resolution of Parliament but also a resolution of at least seven provincial legislatures. This is inappropriate in the circumstances because the provinces are of course not involved or directly affected by this land claim agreement. Nonetheless, proper constitutional amendment permits no shortcuts or extemporaneous solutions.

Some may observe that the agreement is not the Constitution. It only provides for constitutional protection. If constitutional protection is to mean anything at all then it requires that amendments to this agreement be governed by the appropriate provisions of the Constitution.

Even if we could find ways around the kinds of things we have talked about until now, there remains the question of whether there is judicial support for such claims in the first place.

Chief Justice Allan McEachern in the Gitksan case rejected such claims and went on to say that a summary of Canadian case law was conclusively against the plaintiff's claims for sovereignty of ownership. Is it right for the government to proceed, indeed to accelerate land claim settlements of this kind when the latest word from the courts is that there is no legal basis for such claims?

With an area as large as 50 times the size of Prince Edward Island, which is a province, surely it is almost as if a new province was being created. The Constitution provides that the establishment of new provinces requires the approval of all existing provinces as well as Parliament. This requirement is being bypassed by Bill C–16.

To establish a region that is to be governed under a new set of laws and to convey to a defined group of Canadians known as Sahtu Dene and Metis outright fee simple ownership of 41,000 square kilometres of land is to de facto establish a geographic and political region of Canada that in many respects is like establishing a new province. In my opinion any and all provisions of the Constitution Act, 1982, that apply to the creation of new provinces should apply in this case also.

Some may argue that I am opposed to any settlement or agreement with the Sahtu Dene and Metis regarding land. That would be folly in the extreme and a deliberate misinterpretation of my remarks. It is necessary for all Canadians to be fair minded. That includes recognizing grievances put forward by people such as the Sahtu Dene and Metis and to provide for their redress.

I support that. My contention is that Bill C–16 does not meet its own objectives to clarify and provide for the certainty of land ownership, needlessly complicates administration, costs too much and makes any future amendments a matter of constitutional amendment.

There is a final question. Will this agreement provide for greater Canadian unity and help clarify how Canadians want to government themselves? To answer that question requires answers to three prior questions. First, will giving land and money provide for the harmonious relationships between members of the Sahtu Dene and Metis communities? The answer is no.

Second, will the settlement of land claims bring about recognition, understanding and acceptance of the respective values, social morals, religious beliefs and decision making processes either among participants or between participants and other Canadians? Again the answer is no.

Third, will creating another bureaucracy of boards, either above or below or within the bureaucracy that currently exists for the administration of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development make governing this land more effective? Again the answer is no.

Since in my opinion the answers to these questions are all negative, how can we justify completing the agreement by passing Bill C–16? I submit what this Parliament should be doing is building a stronger, more united and more globally competitive Canada. I submit to the House and to all Canadians that passage of Bill C–16 will drive wedges between Canadians by creating political power fiefdoms that are economically inefficient, perhaps even unsound and administrative nightmares.

Passage of the bill creates an environment of competing powers that will feed selfish interests to the exclusion of the interests of others. It will create competition where co–operation should exist. Just think of our interprovincial trade barriers that exist in Canada today. Finally, it will make Canada increasingly non–competitive in the global marketplace.

In conclusion, we need to settle and redress grievances of native Canadians. We must agree that the agreement that is the subject of Bill C–16 will not do those things.

I ask all members of the House to defeat Bill C–16 and find an agreement that will redress and solve the grievances that exist between us and the Sahtu Dene and Metis people.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to address the House in relation to Bill C–16. This agreement was signed on September 6, 1993 and tabled in the House on March 10, 1994.

I know the Sahtu Dene and Metis overwhelmingly supported the bill in a ratification vote. It appears that they are more than satisfied with this settlement. However I believe we would be negligent, as parties in the past have been, if we did not address some of the problems contained within Bill C–16.

Certainly my colleagues and I in the Reform Party are willing to obtain concepts of aboriginal self–determination, but only in situations in which aboriginals will clearly come to a position of self–sufficiency within the Canadian society. Unfortunately Bill C–16 does not address this situation.

Bill C–16 in fact calls for more bureaucracy, huge settlement moneys, continued DIAND programs and extensive future negotiations on self–government. The bureaucracy which will be spawned by Bill C–16 is in a word overwhelming.

There will be seven new boards, panels and councils established to manage the resources of 2,200 people. These new entities will have representatives from the Sahtu Dene, the Metis and the government itself.

One wonders why aboriginal representatives could not be incorporated into existing DIAND boards which manage the resources in the settlement area. The agreement, Bill C–16, appears to propagate bureaucracy in so far as it overlaps existing regulatory boards and threatens to turn a very small population into a community of regulatory bureaucrats.

The potential for bureaucratic havoc in this new regime appears to be very serious, and this is something we want to address. We must take the resource management arrangements in this settlement as something that will set a benchmark for future and existing management agreements in other areas.

As all members can appreciate the resources governed by these boards will traverse a wide area. Accordingly matters concerning wildlife or water would affect a number of distinct settlement areas all sharing in these resources and all having their own regulatory regime, a formula for bureaucratic havoc.

Moreover, the various regions may have different attitudes as to how to deal with a particular problem. Certainly that they have exclusive rights over the resources in their area, claims of mismanagement arising from governments or neighbouring bands may be difficult to establish and address.

In short, there is a huge potential for an interbureaucratic tangle among the various boards in the various settlement areas. The government's position with respect to the decisions of these boards is very unclear and may contribute to the bureaucratic bog already created under the agreement.

The new boards, the territorial government and the federal government will all have input into the process of resource management. The new bureaucracy in Bill C–16 will be responsible to, and I quote the minister, "as the context requires". This could be a minister of the Government of Canada or a minister of the Government of the Northwest Territories.

Aboriginal boards, ministries of the Northwest Territories and ministries of the Government of Canada will all grapple with and decide on such issues as transport, the environment and natural resources. Moreover, bureaucracies within settlement areas and bureaucracies within various levels of government will all vie for the ability to regulate in their respective fields.

The net effect of this bureaucratic web is increased cost, increased confusion and increased time to enact any necessary measures. Further, we must consider the potential harmful effects of all this regulation and consultation, the effect it may have on future economic development in the country.

Under Bill C–16 companies that may wish to develop subservice resources would have to consult with this bureaucracy, would have to consult with the Sahtu tribal council on such matters as environmental impact and Sahtu employment opportunities. I would suggest that this new extensive bureaucratic structure that is bound to be set up, is destined to be set up under Bill C–16, and the processes established in this agreement may discourage many firms from investing in that region.

In all we create an enormous bureaucracy with a small economic base to support it. This bureaucracy and the control that goes with it are far from this government's notion of self–government. Despite the large settlement area, despite compensation to the tune of $130 million, despite regulatory authority, and despite royalties derived from gas and oil production the Liberals are committed still to the establishment of self–government for the Sahtu as stated in appendix B of this agreement.

An inability to define the term inherent self–government seems to in no way deter the government from undertaking negotiations to implement it.

This voluminous, complicated, expensive agreement is simply the introduction to a more voluminous, more complex, more expensive round of negotiations on self–government. I believe it is our duty to question what type of structure this new level of government will take, what will be its duties and powers.

Is self–government even appropriate for a population of 2,200, of whom some 982 are adults? Does the federal government recognize the time and cost involved in separate self–government negotiations with every native band in Canada as it is committed to? Will the government continue to deny the reality of the situation as it has in not believing that a definition of self–government is necessary before negotiations start to take place?

The government has no definition of aboriginal self–government and yet is prepared to embark on this journey without a map. The government will not be able to sweep this one under the rug. Provisions in this agreement and future self–government negotiations will hit Canadians where they will feel it the most: in their pocketbooks.

Since 1990 the budget of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has increased approximately $400 million a year, the largest increase of any of the ministerial budgets. In 1994–95 DIAND will spend some $5 billion, of which 68 per cent or $3.38 billion are grants and contributions to band and tribal councils, a process which the Auditor General himself criticized in 1991 as faulty since the department could not ascertain whether the funds were used for the purposes intended or managed with due regard to the economy, to efficiency and to effectiveness.

Despite this agreement, despite Bill C–16, it is clear that the Sahtu Dene and the Metis will continue to have access to every DIAND program that is currently offered. This is in addition to the settlement terms of this agreement.

This agreement and the parameters for negotiations on self–government do not address the spiralling inefficient expenditures of DIAND. The government does not address the issue of financial self–sufficiency for the Sahtu. As it now appears future self–government negotiations will do very little to assist aboriginals out from under their continuing dependency on DIAND.

By not addressing the issue of self–sufficiency it seems to me that self–government will simply represent a different instrument for the dispersal of government funds to aboriginals. I would suggest the taxpayer can no longer afford DIAND's huge and inefficient expenditures and I would suggest that aboriginals as well no longer wish to live in the dependency of a federal department.

Bill C–16 does not deal clearly with this issue. The bottom line is that this agreement creates more bureaucracy and thereby more expenditures for DIAND. Furthermore, since this settlement does not concern itself with aboriginal self–sufficiency and since the beneficiaries of this agreement are entitled to all benefits continuing derived from DIAND's programs, agreements such as this will simply push this country further into debt.

I believe it is time to settle all land claims as quickly and as fairly as possible. However, with consideration as to the current financial state of Canada I believe that these claims, every claim, must be settled with an eye to removing aboriginal dependency on government funding. I would apply the same criteria to any negotiations surrounding self–government. Otherwise DIAND simply will become a larger sinkhole for government funds.

We do not need agreements such as this one guaranteeing government funding well into the future. We need a strategy that will break the cycle of dependency. That is what the Canadian people want. That is what the aboriginal people want. I look forward to the day when aboriginals stand as economic equals with all other Canadians. Unfortunately agreements which create more bureaucracy and more expenditures will only exacerbate the dependency that these aboriginals have on the federal government.

• (1345)

This settlement is just one such agreement and I therefore must opposite it.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

[English]

It is obvious listening to the hon. member that he really does not support any aboriginal self–determination and does not really understand the nature of what the Sahtu Dene and Metis are trying to do through this agreement.

For the last couple of hundred years the aboriginal people in those land claims have been at the receiving end of the generosity of a different group of people who did not have the understanding that they were dealing with a totally different culture when they were dealing with aboriginal people in the country.

It is obvious from his remarks that this hon. member does not understand nor does he want to understand what the aboriginal people want.

It is all very fine to say: "Well, it would be very nice for the aboriginal people in that area to have economic self–sufficiency". It is years of being under a system like the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development that has created that so–called dependency which we would not necessarily have to be dealing with today if so–called well meaning bureaucrats had decided that these people were much better off making their own decisions and the bureaucrats implementing those decisions for those aboriginal people.

I would like to ask the hon. member this question. Has he ever met with the Sahtu Dene and Metis and has he discussed at length the concerns of the Sahtu Dene and Metis? Has he discussed at length the concept of self–government with the Sahtu Dene and Metis? What is his understanding of the inherent right of self–government as we understand it? If he is that much in support of economic self–sufficiency, does he agree that the aboriginal people's inherent right of self government should be recognized? If so, how would he see that recognition through the House of Commons?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member opposite, unfortunately what I have just heard is the standard answer when someone dares to criticize aboriginal programs. That standard answer is: "You simply don't understand the aboriginal people".

I live in an area of British Columbia where there are many aboriginal people. I have talked extensively with many of them and I have listened to their concerns. The one concern they have is they want to break this dependency on the federal government. They want to be able to provide for their own self–sufficiency.

• (1350)

This is a good direction to go but Bill C–16, as I stated earlier, does not break the dependency. It only provides an obligation for continued dependency on the federal government.

I believe that any agreement the federal government enters into with aboriginal people respecting settlements or land claims must lead to an ending of continued federal government funding. The aboriginal people must be permitted to enter into an economic base for themselves that will create self–sufficiency.

The member opposite asked about my definition of inherent right to self–government. My understanding is inherent right to self–government means that it always existed and is answerable to no other authority. I consider every inhabitant of the country a Canadian. We have a federal government, provincial governments and municipal governments. My vision of self–government for the aboriginal people is that they get to a position where they are Canadians within the existing federal, provincial and municipal laws.

I do not support new governments being established within my country that would operate outside the established laws to which every other Canadian is obligated.

The Deputy Speaker: There are still about two or three minutes left in questions or comments.

Mr. Anawak: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member does not understand. I did not ask a standard question. That may be what he thinks if he gets a question from somebody who is not of that culture. I asked those questions from the intimate knowledge of what I am talking about. That is why I asked the questions, not because I read it in some magazine or some newspaper. I asked them from the point of view that I know what I am talking about. That is precisely why I asked those questions.

As far as self–government is concerned I do not think the hon. member has an understanding of the aboriginal people who want to have the opportunity to exercise that inherent right of self–government.

I would also ask the member how many aboriginal people and from what particular area in British Columbia area are saying to him that they have great concerns and, if so, would he be prepared to say that this particular group opposes those things that we are attempting to do as a government? I find it very hard to believe that a large group of aboriginal people would be saying that whatever we are trying to do is contrary to the wishes of the aboriginal people in Canada.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I said in my earlier statement that the response that we do not understand the aboriginal people or their concerns is a standard response when someone dares to criticize any form of agreement or any form of structure that is proposed within the aboriginal and federal government negotiations.

Perhaps the hon. member is right. Perhaps I do not understand or possess the intimate knowledge of the aboriginal people that he may have. That is probably quite natural, seeing that I am not an aboriginal person. What I do understand is this. The government and even the aboriginal people themselves have no clear definition of what the outcome of aboriginal self–government would be.

• (1355)

We have asked that question in British Columbia. It has been asked in almost every province. It has been asked in the House. I asked it of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and he had no answer to that question. That is the gist of what this is all about today. This agreement will provide for an immediate settlement of sorts but still opens the door for further extensive, complex negotiations of aboriginal self–government. There is no clear map. There is no clear direction. There is no clear agenda for where these negotiations will go or what they will end up with.

That is like starting a journey in a totally unknown territory and hoping you get to where you are going.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I see that two o'clock will arrive before I will have finished so I will continue until you shut me down.

I want to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to participate in the debate on Bill C–16. As do many of my colleagues, I have a particular interest in the proposed legislation. During my career I have had opportunity to work directly with native people as a labour foreman on a hydroelectric project in the territories, as an ombudsman for the Alberta region of the department of Indian affairs under Harold Cardinal and as a business consultant.

I have seen the problems of these people firsthand and therefore I speak from experience if not empathy for the plight of these people.

The Dogrib Indians of the territories I found to be some of the hardest working and capable individuals I have ever worked with. They were more than willing to work under adverse conditions of weather and isolation when the jobs were available. However the opportunity to work is not always there and when this occurs these willing and capable people are unemployed.

I was appointed ombudsman by Harold Cardinal who was regional director general for the department of Indian affairs in Alberta. Mr. Cardinal was a prominent aboriginal leader in Canada and president of the Alberta Indian Association for a number of years.

In this position I dealt with many of the concerns and complaints of the Indian people. As a consultant I have received many complaints from band members across western Canada accusing their band council leaders of corruption and expending funds improperly. Seldom if ever did the department of Indian affairs look into these complaints.

Therefore, like many Canadians I want to see Canada's aboriginal peoples given the opportunity to become economically and politically independent. I want to see their dependency on the taxpayer ended. If an agreement provides these ingredients it should be supported. If not it should not be supported.

This agreement fails to meet these requirements and therefore I cannot give Bill C–16 my support. The Sahtu land settlement area covers 280,000 square kilometres with a population of approximately 1,700 people. I am prepared to support this part of the agreement, although extremely generous, because it is clear that these people must have a land base from which they can draw resources in order to become economically independent and self–reliant.

When we compare this to the land base of P.E.I. and Nova Scotia which have much larger populations, it is evident that the land base requirement for self–reliance is adequately provided for in the Sahtu nation in this agreement. In addition, this agreement provides not only for subsurface resource rights but for royalties on resources presently developed within the Mackenzie River valley.

These aspects of the agreement are essential for future economic self–reliance of the Sahtu nation. I submit that a strong, economically self–reliant Sahtu nation will be a benefit to all Canadians. This agreement also provides for a transfer of funds from the Canadian taxpayer amounting to—

The Speaker: I note that the hon. member still has approximately 15 minutes to speak. The hon. member will be given the floor as soon as we resume debate.

It being 2 p.m. pursuant to Standing Order 35 the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

OZONE LAYER

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the latest figures from Environment Canada on the ozone layer are disturbing. Measurements of the atmosphere above Toronto shows the ozone layer was 7 per cent to 9 per cent thinner in April than it should be. Approximately the same situation was reported for Montreal and Vancouver. The ozone layer filters ultraviolet rays from the sun, as we know. These rays can cause skin cancer, cataracts and possibly immune system damage.

The layer has been eroded by chlorine from chlorofluorocarbons used in air conditioners, refrigerators and some electronic and plastic industries. With 3 per cent less ozone that normal forecasted for this coming summer, it is important that Canadians, particularly children and young ones, protect their skin and eyes from harmful ultraviolet sun rays.

The message therefore is clear: Protect your health by protecting yourself from the sun.

INTERNATIONAL WORKERS DAY

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est): Despite the inclement weather, over 30,000 men and women gathered in Montreal and in Quebec City on International Workers Day, also known as May Day, to express their disappointment over the federal government's lack of genuine job creation policies and to denounce the erosion in social protection and equity.

The distress call was sounded clearly yesterday. The federal government should focus its efforts on restoring hope by implementing a real job creation policy, instead of imposing social program reforms which could very likely mortgage the future of many Quebecers and Canadians.

The members of the Bloc Quebecois join with workers in Quebec and in Canada in expressing the hope that the federal government will finally hear this distress call.

SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to congratulate the people of South Africa in holding the first free elections in the history of their country, thereby eliminating 350 years of oppression.

Best wishes must also go to Nelson Mandela and the ANC as they are poised to take over the reins of power and guide their country through a minefield of troubles.

I implore our country to help to achieve a prosperous society for all. For South Africa can be the economic giant that drives the whole southern half of the content. To let it fall would commit this region to decades of civil strife and destitution.

I hope the leaders of the new South Africa and perhaps we in our country can learn from the gross mistakes of other countries on that continent.

Special status for one group over another and affirmative action are discriminatory and only create divisions in the society. But equal status for all and preferential status for none is a bond—

INTERNATIONAL CHILDREN'S GAMES

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, on June 16–19, 1994 Hamilton will play host to the International Children's Games, the first time in its 25 year history that these games have been held outside Europe.

The participation age 11 to 15 is ideal for the children to learn the values of competition and fair play and to appreciate the cultures of other countries. The theme of the games "Tomorrow's Dreams" symbolizes the aspirations of all young athletes to develop into tomorrow's future leaders.

Hamilton is understandably proud and excited to be hosting this special event, and we look forward to making these the best International Children's Games ever. To date we have 38 confirmed cities from around the world with a total of 750 children participating, 150 from Canada alone.

All those who have been working to prepare these games are to be congratulated. Hamilton looks forward to giving the youth of the world an opportunity to participate in a multi–sport event in a spirit of friendship and competition.

CULTURAL MINORITIES

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint–Léonard): Mr. Speaker, finally the truth is out: a Quebec government led by the Parti Quebecois will not protect cultural minorities in an independent Quebec. The party's vice–president, Bernard Landry, confirmed on the weekend that his party rejects the idea of multiculturalism and wants minorities to integrate into Quebec's melting pot.

In a speech before the council of citizens of Haitian descent, the PQ's vice–president also stressed that Quebec's public and common culture is that of Quebecers. It is obvious that the Parti Quebecois has no desire to honour its commitment to the various minorities in Quebec society.

Now we just have to find out whether or not the Bloc Quebecois agrees with Mr. Landry's comments. If the BQ agrees with him, it should say so; if not, it should denounce him!

SOUTH AFRICAN ELECTIONS

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Quebec): Mr. Speaker, the first free elections in South Africa were held last week, allowing millions of blacks to vote for the first time in their lives. After so many years of apartheid and repression, this striking victory of democracy shows the courage and determination of those who fought for equality for all South Africans.

By clearly rejecting the political parties calling for violence and vengeance, South African voters turned the page on a dark chapter in their history to embrace a democratic and peaceful future. This rejection of violence brings hope to all Africans.

On behalf of all members of this House, I congratulate the newly elected representatives of South Africa on their victory and their determination.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, I often receive letters from constituents who are frustrated by certain aspects of the UI system because they do not understand the limits of their coverage.

Most complaints are about restrictions on training or the taking of temporary jobs that beneficiaries felt would have improved their chances of finding more permanent work.

Anyone who insures a home or a car receives a written policy which lists entitlements, deductions and restrictions. A lot of misunderstandings and frustration could be avoided for workers if a similar document was available which listed entitlements and deductions for the UI system.

I urge the minister to produce a printed insurance policy for UI which could be posted in places of work or supplied to workers when they begin paying UI premiums. This could lead in time to a range of UI policies being available at different premium levels which would better meet workers' needs and would introduce some flexibility into the UI system.

MRS. MARGARET MCCAIN

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I rise in the House today to extend congratulations to a distinguished and worthy citizen from Carleton—Charlotte constituency, Mrs. Margaret McCain, who was recently appointed Lieutenant–Governor of my home province, New Brunswick.

After many years of dedicated service to several provincial and Canadian organizations, Mrs. McCain of Florenceville, New Brunswick, the mother of four grown children, will become the first woman Lieutenant–Governor of the beautiful picture province.

I know you will want to join with me on behalf of all members of the House to extend our heartfelt congratulations and best wishes for a successful tenure to Margaret McCain, New Brunswick's new Lieutenant Governor, and to offer our thanks to His Excellency Gilbert Finn for a job well done.

FISHERIES

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, last week the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans announced measures that will return over 500 frozen licences to groundfish fishermen who have demonstrated a long–term attachment to the industry. Over 200 of these restored licences belonged to fishermen in the province of Prince Edward Island.

This whole sorry mess was the result of an arbitrary decision by the previous "no–Tory–us" government. Sad to say it is only one of such messes in the fishery that we have inherited.

I want to commend the minister, not only for correcting this injustice but also for the establishment of a consultative process which in this case involved 11 different fishing organizations.

Even though it is a very difficult period in the Atlantic fishery, this type of co–operation between the minister and the stakeholders in the industry will go a long way toward alleviating pain and anguish while the industry is being restructured.

This new spirit of co–operation and negotiation bodes well both for redefining the concept of professional fishermen and for establishing the framework of the fishery of the future.

In conjunction with the sentiments expressed by the P.E.I. Fisherman's Association, I once again commend the minister for his work in resolving this situation.

NATIONAL FOREST WEEK

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out to the House that we are celebrating National Forest Week this week.

Forests are our greatest natural resource and contribute more than anything else to our balance of trade. From coast to coast, the forest industry provides some 800,000 jobs, directly and indirectly.

[English]

Our forest industries provide the economic foundation of some 350 Canadian cities and towns. The people who live in these forest dependent communities know the value of forests, the vital role they play in their lives and the critical need to ensure that our forests remain healthy and flourish into the future so that future generations will enjoy the same benefits in terms of employment, recreation, and a healthy environment.

HIGH SPEED TRAIN

Mr. François Langlois (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday, the Prime Minister mocked the Bloc Quebecois's proposal to go ahead with building a high speed train between Quebec City and Windsor. According to the Prime Minister, it would be hard for a high speed train to have to stop at the border of a sovereign Quebec.

Perhaps the Prime Minister has never taken the Amtrak train between New York and Montreal. If he had, he would have realized that the train does not stop at the Canada–U.S. border. For the Prime Minister's information, planes do not stop at the borders of sovereign countries either. In fact, the Bloc Quebecois does not see why it would not be the same for a high–speed train between Quebec and Ontario.

If some people wanted to build walls around a sovereign Quebec, it would certainly not be Quebecers themselves. Quebecers seem to be more aware than the Prime Minister that the future development of nations depends on openness to the world. Let us stop this demagogy and discuss rationally the real issues for Quebec and Canada.

AIDS

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, picture a virus that attacks a baby's brain, destroying any ability to crawl, to walk, to speak. Imagine a virus that can kill a child before its second birthday, the body completely overrun by infection. There is no vaccine, no cure for this virus and babies can get it in the most tragic way: from their mothers.

White heterosexual females are the fastest growing demographic group to fall victim to AIDS. Many do not know that they have the disease. In fact they even believe this could not possibly happen to them.

Reported pediatric cases of AIDS have been rising steadily since the early 1980s. The latest statistics show that 93 children have been diagnosed with AIDS in Canada. Sixty–three of them have already died.

In Quebec one out of 80 pregnant women has AIDS. Experts agree that the only way to curtail the rise in pediatric AIDS is to prevent transmission of the disease to women.

I urge the government to support aggressive public education campaigns, including women focused efforts. AIDS in children is a problem that will not easily disappear.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, yesterday 16–year old Marwan Harb was brutally murdered in Hull, just across the river. Mr. Harb was the second cousin of our colleague from Ottawa Centre.

Speaker's Ruling

The Harb murder is the latest in a series of violent crimes committed by young offenders. The Young Offenders Act is crying out for change. It is in desperate need of reform.

Earlier today we had the opportunity to discuss the Young Offenders Act in Parliament. Regrettably the Bloc Quebecois denied unanimous consent to have the subject matter of the bill referred to committee.

● (1415)

I would encourage and urge the Bloc Quebecois and all members and the government to immediately address that very serious issue. I would urge the government to immediately introduce a bill amending the Young Offenders Act and to assure Canadians that a bill is passed—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Speaker: I am ready to deliver my decision on two questions of privilege which were brought up on Thursday. The reason I am giving my decision now before the start of Question Period is that it could impact on Question Period itself.

I will add whatever time it takes for me to read my decision to the end of Question Period today.

As I said, I am now ready to render my decision concerning the question of privilege raised by the hon. Minister of Foreign Affairs on Thursday, April 28 following Question Period. I will also respond to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Roberval at the same time.

[Translation]

The minister has indicated that his privileges were breached when, in the preamble to certain questions, statements were made that he was unwilling to answer some questions that had been addressed to him. Such comments could give a poor impression of his work as a minister and a member.

We must always bear in mind the basic principles that govern Question Period. These principles have been eloquently summarized in the past by Speakers Jerome and Bosley, and the highlights of their statements can be found in citations 409 and 410 of the 6th edition of Beauchesne.

One of these principles is that the Opposition is free to ask questions of any minister but only if these questions fall within the administrative responsibility of the government. However, according to citation 410, paragraph 16, in the 6th edition of Beauchesne:

> Ministers may be questioned only in relation to current portfolios.

I would like to remind this House of the remarks of Speaker Lamoureux on this subject on October 16, 1968, which were reported at page 133 of the House of Commons Journals:

> —a minister may be asked questions relating to a department for which he has ministerial responsibility or acting ministerial responsibility, but a minister cannot be asked, nor can he answer questions in another capacity, such as being responsible for a province, or part of a province or, again, as spokesman for a racial or religious group.

[English]

These remarks, which were referred to by Speaker Bosley in his statement of February 24, 1986, today apply more than ever and should be followed as strictly as possible by the members when addressing questions to a minister. As the members will recall, during Question Period on Thursday I had to redirect certain questions to the ministers who were responsible for them.

[Translation]

This is also why I found the question of the hon. member for Portneuf unacceptable. Furthermore, on rereading the Debates, I must acknowledge that the questions and comments by the hon. member for Roberval to the Minister of Foreign Affairs and those by the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte–Marie to the Minister of Finance were not only incorrect, but totally unacceptable acording to our rules.

The Speaker accordingly recognizes the merits of the arguments raised by the Minister of Foreign Affairs. I must, however, state that what is involved here is not prima facie a question of privilege, but rather a point of order.

Finally, to answer the question raised by the hon. member for Roberval, as to whether ministers may be questioned on a public statement unrelated to their departmental responsibilities, I reiterate the principle that a minister may be questioned during Oral Question Period on matters directly related to areas affecting his department. The member is incorrect in claiming that a minister of the government may be questioned on any comment he may have made. The precedents and the parliamentary practice are very clear on this point: a member may not question a minister concerning a public statement that is not directly related to his department.

[English]

In closing, I would like to add that since the beginning of this Parliament the exchanges during question period have been interesting and lively and in the overwhelming majority of cases marked by the respect that we owe to ourselves and to this House. I am certain that we can continue along this path.

I thank the hon. Minister of Foreign Affairs and the hon. member for Roberval for the clarity and conciseness of their interventions and I hope that these comments will be of use to them and may also serve as a guide to all members as well.

It is now 20 minutes past the hour. This Question Period will last until 3.05 p.m.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister appointed the Minister of Finance as the minister responsible for Quebec's regional economic development. However, because of his personal economic interests, which we do not criticize him for but which exist, the finance minister's room to manoeuvre is significantly reduced on several issues of importance to Quebec's economic future.

Does the Prime Minister admit that his finance minister's room to manoeuvre is extremely reduced on several economic issues of major importance to Quebec since he cannot, as he himself acknowledged, deal with the high speed train, the Magdalen Islands ferry, the multifunctional smart ship or, in large part, the conversion of defence industry to civilian uses? Does the Prime Minister admit that Quebec is thus poorly served?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Absolutely not, Mr. Speaker. We have ministers responsible for every portfolio and if there are cases where the Minister of Finance cannot get involved for the reasons we all know, well, the Prime Minister comes from Quebec and he can intervene. However, the Minister of Transport or other ministers consider the issues and report back when it is time to do so. Everyone knows how competent the Minister of Finance is and, considering the responsibilities we have given him, he could not do any better.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister has seen fit to appoint ministers responsible for Western Economic Diversification, the Atlantic provinces' development and Quebec's development, I imagine he had good reasons to do so.

Are we to understand from what the Prime Minister just said that every time the minister he entrusted with Quebec's economic issues cannot get involved, the Prime Minister will take over his portfolio and intervene as the minister responsible for Quebec should?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this may occur in one or two areas, especially in transportation matters, for the reasons we all know, but these issues are well known by all the ministers and by the Prime Minister.

In this as in most cases, the Minister of Transport is kept abreast of developments so Quebec's interests are never minimized at any time because the Minister of Finance, who must also deal with the rest of the regional development portfolio, happens to be the minister responsible. On the contrary, I think the hon. member should rise and say, "We are very lucky that the Minister of Finance comes from Quebec".

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister admit that the Minister of Finance is in a very bad position, under these circumstances, to intervene on behalf of the MIL Davie shipyard in Lauzon for the Magdalen Islands ferry, while his colleague in Transport, who is directly involved in the decision, and the minister responsible for development in the Atlantic provinces have all the freedom required to intervene on behalf of a shipyard in their region, in their province?

• (1425)

Is Quebec not at a disadvantage since, unfortunately in this issue, the official spokesman has his hands tied, unlike his colleagues?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec): Mr. Speaker, it is necessary to really understand the objectives and purpose of the Federal Office of Regional Development for Quebec.

As I announced three weeks ago and as the Minister of Human Resources Development announced regarding the Western Diversification Fund in the west, we in the Federal Office really intend to emphasize small and medium–sized business.

In Quebec, we who are really the heirs of the Quiet Revolution and the entrepreneurial revolution know very well that Quebec's economic future is in our hands, in our small and medium–sized businesses, and as the federal government, we intend to encourage this dynamism; Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that there is no conflict of interest between the Minister of Finance, the minister responsible for the Federal Office and Quebec entrepreneurs.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance who is also responsible for regional development.

The future of the largest private employer in the Quebec City region is in serious jeopardy. It is riding, basically, on two decisions to be made by the federal government: one concerning the project to build a ferry for the Magdalen Islands and the other concerning the project to develop a multipurpose ship called a smart ship.

Does the minister responsible for regional development in Quebec recognize that the future of the MIL Davie shipyards basically depends on the decision the federal government will make in these two matters and does he recognize at the same time that he cannot intervene directly to protect the interests of MIL Davie in these two very important matters?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows very well I believe, we have just received a draft of a comprehensive business plan for MIL Davie. Our officials are presently reviewing this plan and, when a decision is made with the stockholder who has the greatest share of responsibility for MIL Davie, we may have an opportunity to give it some advice on the company. We are perfectly aware of the major role of this company in the Quebec City region.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie): My question is for the Prime Minister. Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister not agree that the very fact the Minister of Finance is incapable of answering this question in the House clearly shows the difficulty he has carrying out his functions as minister responsible for regional development in Quebec, given he is incapable of intervening in favour of MIL Davie in cabinet, while his colleagues from Transport and Public works will be able to defend without any restrictions the interests of shipyards in the Maritimes?

[English]

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is very clear to me that in the case of the prairies the file is the responsibility of the Minister of Transport. We are following and I am following personally this file.

I believe the interests of everyone concerned are very well protected. The mandate that has been given to the Minister of Finance does not mean he is responsible for the Minister of Transport. We have a very good Minister of Transport who is looking into this need and what is required for transportation. He has to look at all the alternatives and the costs and the decision will be made in due course.

In the case of the chantiers maritimes, we have ministers responsible. The office that is under the responsibility of the Minister of Finance has nothing to do with MIL–Davie or transportation or defence. It has to do with small and medium sized businesses. The minister is doing an excellent job helping them.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Last night many Canadians stayed awake to do their income tax returns.

An hon. member: The hockey game.

Mr. Silye: No, it was not to watch the hockey game. Canadians were sorting through their T1s, T1CTBs, their T778s, their T4s and T5s. Frankly, today there are lot of teed–off Canadians out there.

• (1430)

Every year Canadians spend countless millions of dollars on accountants and lawyers to have their income tax returns prepared. The 2,091 page Income Tax Act is an unmitigated mess of rules and regulations and is screaming for reform, as are many Canadians.

When will the Prime Minister instruct his ministers and mandarins to simplify the income tax system to reflect equity, efficiency and effectiveness and thereby reduce the tax burden on Canadians?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is very evident that the hon. member of Parliament read the red book.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow's supply motion will be on this very subject. I hope the Prime Minister takes the time to listen to some of the comments by members of this House.

Currently tax freedom day is July 7. That is how long Canadians have to work to pay their share of the costs of this government's red book plan.

I ask the Prime Minister, when can Canadians expect to pay less in taxes in a current year than they did the year before?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Canadians will be in that position the minute all Canadians who want to work find jobs. That is the best way to reduce the tax burden. However when 11.6 per cent of the people are unemployed such as the situation we faced when we were elected, we asked how we could rectify that.

The easy answer is to have programs that will create jobs. However, I note every time we want to have a program to create jobs the Reform Party is opposed to it.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, the income tax system is so complicated that the revenue department is the largest employer in the public service with over 35,000 employees at a cost of $1.8 billion. That is a workforce larger than the town of Shawinigan.

I ask the Prime Minister, has the government calculated how many billions of dollars it could save in government administration costs and how much individual taxpayers could save in tax preparation charges by introducing a fair and integrated system of taxation?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is why we have committees of the House of Commons looking into that. The Minister of Finance is looking into it all the time also.

I noted in the debate on the budget and when there was a rumour something might be changed that very often the Reform members were opposed to it. Sometimes people are afraid of too many changes.

We are trying to change the GST and replace it with a fair system of taxation. I am very confident the committee will come out with a report next month so that the Minister of Finance will be in a position to study the recommendations of the House of Commons. This is a very complex system that people want to get rid of. I know the Reform Party wants to keep the very complex system of GST. One of the statements made by the leader of that party was that they love the GST. We hate it and we will kill it.

RWANDA

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for Foreign Affairs. The civil war continues in Rwanda, where an estimated 200,000 people have been killed. Negotiations for a ceasefire have reached a deadlock.

Friday, the UN Secretary–General urged the security council to consider the use of force to put an end to the massacre of thousands of innocent people, even if this would mean bringing in more–UN peacekeepers.

According to a news bulletin this morning, the Minister of National Defence is hesitant to support this proposal by the UN Secretary–General. Could the Minister for Foreign Affairs indicate whether Canada intends to support this proposal?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the slaughter which continues in Rwanda cannot be tolerated by countries that have had development aid programs in Rwanda.

Canada is among those countries who are trying, within the United Nations or the Organization for African Unity, to find ways to make these factions who are killing each other today see reason.

• (1435)

I can inform the hon. member that preliminary talks which took place at the United Nations have not been successful, and that is why we feel that perhaps another forum, the OAU for instance, might be in a better position to start a conciliation process and persuade the parties to stop killing each other. Any proposals to that effect will certainly be supported by Canada.

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert): Mr. Speaker, considering the increasing number of Rwandan refugees who are fleeing the civil war and 30 years of close ties between Quebec and Rwanda, does the minister intend to increase the humanitarian aid he announced previously?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is aware, the Canadian International Development Agency has donated $1 million for emergency aid, and we have also donated $2 million to the International Red Cross to help save lives and help the wounded in that country. It is not much, considering the extent of the slaughter. Canada, in co–operation with other countries, is trying to determine what kind of humanitarian aid should be sent immediately.

Obviously, as long as the fighting and the carnage continues, it is extremely difficult to bring in humanitarian aid and ensure it reaches those who need it. Nevertheless, Canada and other countries will continue to look for ways to go and help these people who have been left to fend for themselves.

JUSTICE

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

The minister is on record as stating that he fundamentally disagrees with the proposition that there is a crisis in confidence in the Canadian system of justice. He has also stated he thinks the justice system works well and that it is fundamentally sound. Today it is reported that the minister has been selective in the use of his statistics to back up these claims.

Does the minister truly believe that a 61 per cent increase in violent crimes over the past 10 years does not constitute a crisis in Canada's criminal justice system?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, let me say first that I do not think any useful purpose is served by a protracted debate about the numbers. The fact is any amount of crime in Canada is too much. The justice system could always be improved and we are working hard to achieve that.

On the subject of the numbers and the statistics, let me point out to the hon. member that the statistics reported today in one of the newspapers on this very subject involve numbers going back to 1962. While that is interesting what is perhaps of more relevance to today's purpose are the more recent statistics.

Since 1977, in the last 16 years during which numbers have been kept, homicides are up only 4 per cent. Those are the statistical facts from the same source referred to in the newspaper this morning.

Reference is made to violent crime. However in many of those statistics if you look behind the initial number, violence often includes such things as schoolyard shoving and slapping by young offenders, behaviours which were not charged in the days before the statute but now are and form part of the statistics.

I say to the hon. member that any amount of crime is too much. I insist that we keep this issue in perspective and I repeat that the justice system on the whole is in very good shape.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley): Mr. Speaker, it is also reported that since the death penalty was last used in 1962, and granted it is a figure used in 1962, the murder rate in Canada has more than doubled.

Is the minister going to attempt to convince Canadians there is no crisis in the justice system by using selective statistics? Or is the government prepared to introduce the necessary legislation to ensure the protection of society?

• (1440)

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I have dealt with the point about the statistics. The more recent numbers over the last 16 years are far more reliable and meaningful. Let us put aside the question of numbers and get to the root of this issue.

I know the hon. member and I are of the same mind on one issue. That is that we have to improve the justice system in order to diminish crimes of serious violence. We have to do that by making the laws more effective and by attacking the underlying causes of crime.

I know as we introduce measures in the weeks ahead on those subjects in this House that we can count upon the hon. member and her party to support us in that cause.

ATLANTIC FISHERIES

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development. Opposition is mounting to the adjustment strategy for Atlantic fishermen. According to a report in today's newspaper, a spokesperson for Newfoundland fishery workers has rejected the minister's proposal which would have each fishery worker sign an individual contract committing him or her to undergoing training or doing community work in exchange for benefits.

Will the minister concede that his proposal for individual contracts is being roundly criticized and has raised some legitimate concerns and consequently, is he prepared to negotiate collective agreements with the unions, as is being recommended to him by the spokesperson for the fishery workers?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification): Mr. Speaker, first let me point out that the comments or quotes used by the hon. member are not exactly what the head of the fishermen's union has said. He said they had some questions about the nature of it.

I would like to point out to the hon. member there are already a number of programs that we offer in which there is an agreement about participation by the person who takes a benefit from human resources. For example on the question of training, one is expected to have certain obligations on their side.

We are trying to apply a principle of mutual responsibility in this area. This subject was extensively discussed with members of the fishermen's union beginning last February. They had plenty of opportunity to conduct and to exchange points of view on this matter. In fact, during the course of those discussions there was no objection raised.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, this morning's newspaper quotes the spokesperson as saying:

[English]

"We don't sign individual agreements; we sign collective agreements".

Surely the minister has read these comments.

Will the minister not agree that, after going over the heads of the provinces, it would, at the very least, be in his best interests to secure the co–operation of the unions representing fishery workers and will he undertake, therefore, to meet with the unions before proceeding to sign any individual contracts?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification): Mr. Speaker, let me first point out to the hon. member that this agreement we arrived at in the Atlantic fisheries did not go over the heads of the provinces. It was extensively discussed with each province involved and they were in agreement with the program. That is a fact.

Second, we discussed all these matters with the unions. Every union was involved in extensive consultations. When the minister of fisheries and I announced the program we said if there were any problems or concerns with the evolution of the agreement we would be glad to sit down with them and work those problems out.

Once again, the hon. member is trying to misstate exactly what went on. The fact is that this program is based on very extensive and broad consultations with all the parties involved and the parties are very satisfied with the agreement.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Charlie Penson (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The latest media report suggests that President Clinton has now publicly taken the side of the American farmers in the durum wheat dispute. Given that the United States' own international trade commission has scoffed at the unsupported allegations of unfair Canadian trade practices, will the Prime Minister personally contact President Clinton? Will he ask him to rise above domestic politics and take a leadership role in the interest of free trade?

• (1445)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): I did that a week ago with President Clinton, so the question is a bit late.

Mr. Charlie Penson (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplemental.

Can the Prime Minister outline for the House what steps he is going to personally take to assure that this trade war does not spread and threaten to become a full fledged trade war world–wide?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have done what is possible to be done.

The Minister of Agriculture has strongly made the point since January to his U.S. counterpart. The Minister for International Trade did that with his counterpart as well. I mentioned the matter two or three times to President Clinton. We hope that reason will prevail. We are selling wheat there because wheat produced by Canadian farmers in many instances is better.

Senator Bradley for example argued last week that it was not a good move for them to try to stop our durum wheat. He recognized that durum wheat produced in Canada is much better for making pasta. I was pleased to see an American senator use the argument I made a month ago.

FUTUROPOLIS

Mr. Michel Daviault (Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry.

The city of Montreal is planning a project named Futuropolis, which would be located in the technopark. The first phase of this project could require investments of up to $225 million within the next three years and attract some 200 companies involved with information highway technologies. The SODIM, the agency responsible for industrial development in Montreal, is committed to investing $200,000 in a feasibility study, provided the federal and Quebec do the same.

Does the Minister of Industry, responsible for the information highway, intend to give a favourable answer to the city of Montreal regarding the financing of a feasibility study on the Futuropolis project?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to receive and study a proposal from the city of Montreal. Up to now, our commitment to finance the information highway has been limited to supporting the CANARIE project establishing networks across Canada to form the basis of the electronic highway.

Moreover, as the member knows, we are in the process of drafting regulations regarding the electronic highway.

Mr. Michel Daviault (Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, the minister seems somewhat caught off guard by this project; he should make inquiries on Futuropolis, a project which could certainly allow Montreal and Quebec companies to take advantage of potential spin–offs and could even become a major element of the information highway development.

SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. Sarkis Assadourian (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, Martin Luther King, one of the most prominent figures of the century, once said: "I have a dream". Today that dream is directed to South Africa and they are free again.

My question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs. Can the minister indicate to this House what, if any, programs he is prepared to implement to help South Africa on its path to democratic and economic reform in the years to come?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think that all members of this House will rejoice at the outcome of the very peaceful, well run election in South Africa.

Clearly we are very happy at having been associated with those who organized this election. Canada contributed to the preparations for the campaign. Number two at Elections Canada, Mr. Gould, was sent there and was part of the team which organized the elections. Certainly he has done a magnificent job along with the others who were responsible for this election.

I would like to say that any new Canadian initiatives will first have to be discussed with the new government. Certainly the Secretary of State for Africa upon returning Canada will convene a meeting of representatives of NGOs, associations, groups and individuals who would like to discuss what kind of aid Canada should be giving in the future to South Africa.

• (1450)

Following these consultations, certainly we will be in a position to make statements in this House in this regard.

MICHAEL LAWRENCE DRAKE

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice and concerns the extradition of Michael Lawrence Drake.

In March 1992, Drake was charged with molesting a two and a half–year old girl in Washington. While awaiting trial, Drake jumped bail and fled to Canada. In June 1992, an American court found Drake guilty of sexual assault in absentia. Last week, Drake was released on bail by Canadian officials pending an extradition hearing before the B.C. Supreme Court.

Why did Canadian officials release Drake into the community when he has already been convicted of sexual abuse of a child and when he has already proven his willingness to jump bail in the United States?

The Speaker: These questions that are posed many times are so specific that I do not know that all ministers or any ministers can have a complete grasp of specific cases. Perhaps there would be another venue where the member could get that information. However, I will permit the Minister of Justice to address himself to this case generally, if he has the information.

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the issue is now one of extradition as the hon. member has said.

As such, it will first go to the court with respect to the issue of a warrant of committal and then eventually it will come to me, if that is the process followed. It is open to the person in question to apply to the Minister of Justice eventually no matter what the outcome of the court proceeding. If the person is committed then the minister can intervene under the statute.

I do not propose to comment on the substance or the merits of the extradition procedure. The member's question goes to the issue of detention and the person being in the community during the pending of the proceeding. I will be happy to make inquiries about what happened with respect to that matter and respond factually to the member when I get that information.

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre): Mr. Speaker, I really appreciate the forthrightness of the answer of the minister. It is indeed the matter of detaining an individual who was convicted this way and puts into jeopardy the young children in our communities.

I really urge the minister to answer this question. When will we stop hiding behind the law and put the protection of children first?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, that is indeed a much more general question.

Let me say that in all cases where people are accused of serious crime, including sexual interference with children, it is a question for the court in accordance with the bail provisions in the code whether such persons are released pending trial, and indeed following trial, pending sentence or an appeal from sentence.

All I can say to the hon. member is that I am confident that crown attorneys across the country exercise their judgment responsibly and that courts in each case consider the safety of the community in determining whether bail should be granted either in the event of trial or afterward.

LOBBYING

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, in its red book, the Liberal Party stated nice principles regarding the need to monitor the activities of lobbyists, in the best interest of the federal administration. Yet, six months after the election, the Liberals have become silent on this issue. Somehow, they seem to have distanced themselves from the policies which they were advocating before the election.

How can the Prime Minister explain his hesitation to table a bill on lobbyists, considering that his stated intentions during the election campaign seemed very clear on that issue?

• (1455)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have made a commitment and we intend to fulfill it. Right now, I am trying to find the right person for the job. I would like to know that person very well, so that he can participate in the drafting of the bill.

As I said, once we find that person, I will consult with the leader of the Opposition and the leader of the Reform Party before making the appointment, because it is only appropriate to inform them of that choice. I hope that we can proceed before the summer recess, which means very soon.

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, almost four months after the throne speech, the government has still not appointed an ethics counsellor, as promised by the Prime Minister during the election campaign.

When will the Prime Minister appoint the counsellor who of be responsible for this ethical issue and for the enforcing of the law?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know, our mandate is for five years. We have fulfilled many commitments made in the red book. I hope the hon. member will take a look at page 111; he will be surprised. Indeed, we have fulfilled our promises regarding the helicopter contract, the infrastructure program, job creation for young people, as well as other initiatives. We are not done yet with that particular commitment. Obviously, we cannot do everything within a four month session. However, things are going very well. That problem will be solved to everyone's satisfaction—I hope—before Parliament recesses for the summer, in exactly seven weeks.

APPLE GROWERS

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

The minister has been asked several times by Canadian apple growers to immediately stop the dumping of U.S. apples into Canada. As usual the government talks a good game but also as usual nothing concrete comes of it. The best the government has come up with is for the growers to start anti–dumping action through the Canadian International Trade Tribunal which will take at least five months before damage is halted. These growers are being hurt by this dumping today.

Will the minister take action now to stop this destruction of the apple industry in Canada?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

I have met with representatives of the apple growers on two occasions, not just the apple growers in British Columbia but elsewhere in the country. The member failed to point out that the reason we face this problem is because the Canadian apple growers lost a case earlier. The result of this is that they must now show actual damage before we can again take up the case and come to what we hope will be a successful conclusion.

It is important for the member and the House to recognize that to rush in before we have adequate facts to prove our case, having lost the first case, would be extremely unwise. Therefore we are working with the apple growers to develop the best possible case so that the next time we go forward we will not in fact lose as we have before.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Revenue will recall that at a recent Chamber of Commerce meeting in Penticton he expressed concerns for the apple producers of Canada. He will also recall that he stated that once proof of damage was supplied to his department, immediate action would take place. I remind the minister that that information was supplied early in April by the fruit growers.

Can the minister please tell this House today when Canadians will see his government take action?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, once again the hon. member is certainly correct in his premise. I and all members of this government are very concerned about the plight of Canadian fruit growers, particularly apple growers, faced with the American competition that is flooding across the border. He is also correct in stating that we will proceed as soon as we believe we have a case that can be won.

I ask the hon. member as I asked him on a previous occasion, in Kelowna, whether he wishes us to take the risk of a second loss or whether he would like to make sure that we have our case in hand and a case that can be won before we go to an international trade tribunal.

OVERSEAS EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT

Mr. Bernie Collins (Souris—Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, certain members opposite have stated that the Minister of National Revenue is retroactively disallowing the overseas employment tax credit to certain Canadians.

On page 3564 of Hansard the member for Calgary West stated: "This is a shameful way for the Minister of National Revenue to accomplish his goal of closing so–called tax loopholes".

What assurances can the minister offer us that he is not making retroactive tax grabs?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Souris—Moose Mountain for his question which allows me to state unequivocally that there have been absolutely no legislative changes, retroactive or otherwise, to the overseas employment tax credit.

The statement he quoted by another member is in fact incorrect. This credit was introduced to make Canadian companies more competitive when bidding on foreign contacts. The object is to ensure that Canadian companies bidding on foreign contracts have every incentive to hire Canadians and provide jobs to this country. It was never intended to give anyone a tax holiday because they happen to work for a foreign parented corporation with a branch in this country.

What is happening is that there is a disallowance of ineligible tax credit claims and a normal reassessment in accordance with the law.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg): Mr. Speaker, lands used by the armed forces, that is the bases, the training sites and the ranges, are likely to be contaminated by specific substances relating to military uses, which is affecting the quality of our environment.

My question is for the Minister of Defence. Can the minister tell us whether his department has a specific policy dealing with military land decontamination?

[English]

Hon. David Michael Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that the hon. member has raised this question because he states the problem accurately.

As the Department of National Defence extricates itself from certain facilities across the country where there have been target practices there is considerable environmental damage. In the case of Ipperwash we are discussing the cleanup procedure with the natives who have claim in the area and we will be spending a lot of money trying to bring that particular site back to its original form.

We also have a problem in Calgary. We moved the Lord Strathconas to Edmonton. One of the reasons was to get off the native lands there but there will be some cleanup that will have to be done.

We did make an announcement a couple of weeks ago in the expansion of the supply depot in Montreal for a $26 million state of the art cleanup of the soil contaminated in Montreal because this government is totally committed to proper care of our environment.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the minister for his answer. I would like the minister to inform us about the number and the type of interventions that are being made necessary by the cleanup of military lands on Canadian territory. And I would also like the minister to table, if possible, the policy on environmental protection for military lands.

[English]

Hon. David Michael Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly make available to the hon. member all kinds of information on how the department follows this cleanup to ensure that we leave the land environmentally safe.

In effect I think we have demonstrated by the previous answer that we have an ongoing program of trying to ensure that any lands the department has used over the years that have been contaminated are returned to their original state.

JUSTICE

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The figures released last week by Elections Canada proved once again big spenders cannot buy Canadian voters.

Now that the Charlottetown accord outcome has been reinforced by these results will the government save tax dollars and drop its appeal of the gag law?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am replying as government House leader.

This issue is an important one and because it is important I think it deserves to be tested in the courts.

I understand the hon. member's concerns. I will review this matter with the Minister of Justice but I continue to believe there is an important issue to be dealt with.

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, this has already been tested in one court but the important question is has the government estimated the cost to taxpayers involved in this appeal and if so will it table these figures?

• (1505)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Minister of Justice to look into that.

I ask the hon. member and other members of this House to consider the cost to the Canadian economy and to the Canadian population generally if it is possible for wealthy groups to influence the election unduly and not be under the same kinds of constraints as political parties. This is an issue that deserves to be considered.

I do not know why the hon. member does not want to have that done if he is concerned about democracy in this country.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Karen Kraft Sloan (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, during the budget speech the Minister of Finance said the government is committed to sustainable development. The minister went on to say that the government is establishing a task force to identify barriers and disincentives to sound environmental practice.

I would like to ask the Minister of the Environment what the status of this task force is.

Mr. Clifford Lincoln (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, our government is committed to sustainable development. Both the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of Finance have committed themselves to set up this task force on sustainable development as soon as possible.

As a first step they have directed both their ministries to make it a priority. As a second step a meeting will be convened of all the interested stakeholders to discuss terms of reference, following which this task force will be set up.

POINT OF ORDER

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, earlier, you handed down a ruling which I accept and respect and which we will abide by in the future, but I would appreciate some additional explanations.

The Speaker: Order, please. I reread all the exchanges which took place, and my decision was reached after spending an entire weekend considering the issue.

If the hon. member would like further information, first of all, I would ask him to read my ruling, and if he has any questions he would like to ask me in my chambers or perhaps would like to ask the Clerk, he is welcome to do so, but the point has been made and the Chair's decision stands.

Is this the only point the hon. member wishes to make?

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to question your ruling. Not at all. I simply said first of all that we respected this ruling, but it will lead to your making another decision, and that is what I wanted to say, if you are prepared to entertain the following question.

You said in your ruling, which we accept, that a minister could answer only on a subject related to his jurisdiction. You added that the minister should not answer questions which do not relate to his jurisdiction.

I would appreciate it if you would analyse the implications of the following. If your ruling is respected from now on by everyone in this House, does that mean that when we question a minister within his field of competence while referring to a statement made by one of his colleagues, does that mean that the colleague who is quoted will not have the right to answer the question?

In other words, for practical purposes, if I cannot ask a minister about a statement he made concerning the Department of Finance and he does not have the right to reply, does this mean that if I put my question to the Minister of Finance on a statement made by his colleague, the minister who is quoted would not have the right to rise in the House and the Minister of Finance would have to answer my question? That is what I would like to know, because there are implications for the ruling you just made, because usually, if we quote a minister's colleague, often the colleague will rise to justify what he said. Now you said in your ruling that he does not have the right to do that.

• (1510)

The Speaker: Order! Hon. members can put questions to the Speaker at any time, but these are hypothetical questions. If there is anything arising from what we discuss here in Parliament, and if a member, any member, has any questions about what happened in the House, I would be glad to provide some answers. However, if they are hypothetical questions, I think the Chair should consider whether an answer is necessary. I would like to leave this for the time being. Any other questions?

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Maurice Godin (Châteauguay): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table a petition which has been certified correct according to our Standing Orders. It is signed by over 1,130 people in support of the request of the Garda family, of Châteauguay, for political refugee status.

These two people belong to the Hungarian minority in Rumania where, as such, they would be threatened and persecuted.

People in the Châteauguay riding do not want another Maraloï case. They want the minister to really meet the needs, within a reasonable timeframe, of all refugees, especially political refugees, who seek to be integrated into our North American society.

SAHTU DENE AND METIS LAND CLAIM SETTLEMENT ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–16, an act to approve, give effect to and declare valid an agreement between Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada and the Dene of Coville Lake, Déline, Fort Good Hope and Fort Norman and the Metis of Fort Good Hope, Fort Norman and Norman Wells, as represented by the Sahtu Tribal Council, and to make related ammendments to another Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Crowfoot had the floor before Question Period. I believe he has 15 minutes left in his speech.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, continuing with my speech on Bill C–16, I submit that a strong, economically self–reliant Sahtu nation will be a benefit to all Canadians.

This agreement also provides for a transfer of funds from the Canadian taxpayer amounting to $130 million over the next 15 years. This amounts to over $8 million a year. These funds are apparently designated for areas such as education, training and heritage preservation.

I am sure that Canadians would support this transfer of tax dollars for these purposes as well as the allocation of the land involved. However, I do not believe that the Canadian people will support these articles of the agreement unless there is a clear indication that the financial dependency on the taxpayer will end some time in the future.

This agreement provides no such assurance. In fact, it is clear from the agreement that the Sahtu's right to receive benefits from existing or future aboriginal programs will continue, therefore continuing the dependency which this government contends will be extinguished by this agreement. This defeats the purpose of the agreement itself.

• (1515)

In this connection I would like to comment on an article in the Globe and Mail. According to a March 29, 1994 report the federal government has spent more than $50 million on self–government negotiations with native groups over the past seven years, yet it has produced only one agreement. About 400 native communities have entered self–government talks but most have abandoned the process because it is long, bureaucratic, limited and legalistic.

According to the Globe and Mail, this was the finding of a federal audit. The audit apparently described a host of weaknesses in the federal policy for negotiating self–government deals at the community level and concluded that the process is long, cumbersome and expensive.

Federal payments to native groups for the negotiations jumped by 500 per cent since the process began in the 1986–87 fiscal year. The department of Indian affairs has given $30 million to aboriginal groups for the talks and has spent a further $20 million on internal operating costs.

The department has spent $50 million creating a cottage industry around these negotiations, where lawyers and political leaders are the only ones who benefit while the deplorable living conditions of the individual aboriginal person has not changed as a result of the expenditure of these funds.

I suggest the weaknesses evident in the Sahtu agreement are a reflection of the flawed negotiation process identified by the federal audit. The interests of the Canadian taxpayer are not protected in the agreement.

Within the agreement the means exist by which the Sahtu nation can continue to demand that the federal government tax the wealth of Canadians for their use, in spite of the enormous land mass assigned to these people, the significant resource royalties agreed to and the multimillion dollar cash settlement provided.

This is neither fair to the Sahtu nation nor the Canadian taxpayer. It is unfair to the taxpayer because there is no end to the financial support demanded and unfair to the Sahtu people because it does not end their dependency on the Canadian taxpayer and therefore is not a formula for self–reliance.

A final area of concern to many Canadians is that this agreement creates entitlements and rights based on race and ethnic origin and will be as racist a document as is the Indian Act. The agreement will create special status for the Sahtu nation based on race and destroys the principle of equality of citizenship in that all Canadians ought to stand equal before the law.

This does not bode well for the future unity of our country. I believe the intolerable conditions faced by aboriginal people is due to the fact that for many years they did not have equal rights in Canada. They were discriminated against at all levels of society. Their language, religion and culture were suppressed. Job opportunities were non–existent for the majority of aboriginal people.

In order to correct the situation we must ensure they stand equal before the law. If we grant them special status, harmony and unity will not be the result.

While the rest of the world, including South Africa, is bringing the barriers down between races and ethnic groups, we are in the process of erecting them through agreements such as this. We saw it in the Meech Lake accord, the Charlottetown accord and we are seeing it again in this agreement. People are being granted special rights and privileges based on race and ethnic origin.

These rights and privileges are being paid for by the Canadian taxpayer. The formula cannot succeed in a multicultural society such as Canada. We must ensure that all Canadians stand equal before the law regardless of race, language, culture or religion.

This may be the greatest failing of the Sahtu agreement. It grants special rights based on race and ethnic origin and in doing so destroys the principle of equality of citizenship in Canada.

The Deputy Speaker: Members should know that we have now passed the five hour point in the debate, so we now go to 10 minutes speeches and no questions or comments, starting with the member who is about to be recognized. The hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Charlie Penson (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I live in one of those large northern ridings where there are many reserves and Metis settlements.

I am very concerned about the precedent the government is setting with this overly generous settlement. I support the concept of self–sufficiency and self–reliance inherent in the successful land claim settlement process. In no way do I argue with the principle.

• (1520)

However I encourage the government to dismantle the department of Indian affairs and let the people involved conduct their own affairs. This approach develops responsibility and places decision–making in the hands of those most directly involved.

Let us deal with the magnitude of the settlement. Seventeen hundred and fifty–five people will be receiving a financial package of $130 million, including interest. The land being handed over is equivalent to eight square miles per person.

I will put this into perspective. When my forefathers came to Canada in 1869, over 100 years ago, they received 210 acres of farmland in the Muskoka Lakes area for a family of nine people. By comparison each person, not each family, receives a settlement of 5,120 acres. With this kind of generosity I do not think there is any doubt how these 1,755 people will be voting in the future.

My own farm operation in northwestern Alberta, one that my wife and I have built up over 30 years, involves 1,280 acres, two sections of farmland. Compare this to eight sections per person in the settlement. I know a lot of farmers who would not mind finding out that their land was being claimed as a settlement and getting a payout under this generous rate.

Let us not forget that the original treaty agreement called for each person to receive just 120 acres, about 5,000 acres less than is now being proposed.

In addition to the more than generous settlement of land and money, the people involved will still enjoy their aboriginal status and still have access to all present and future aboriginal programs, as well as access to resource development.

My colleagues have spoken about the very great potential for resource development in the area. The agreement allows the Sahtu to have shared resource revenue resulting from development, something which most Canadians do not enjoy.

In conclusion, it is clear that the government is setting a very bad precedent, one it will be pressured into meeting in future claims. We all know a lot of land claim settlements need to be resolved in the future. I think this one is a very bad precedent indeed. It comes at a time when our country is staggering under a burdensome debt. We cannot afford this kind of settlement.

I suggest we send the bill back to the drawing board. The government can do better. It must do better.

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to oppose the rubber stamping of this massive, open–ended and precedent setting agreement with the people of the Great Bear Lake in the Northwest Territories called the Sahtu Dene and Metis comprehensive land claim agreement.

First let me state that I am strongly in favour of prompt settlement of native land claims, as well as encouragement toward self–government on a tribe by tribe basis.

Why then would I oppose Bill C–16? It is for the following reasons. First, because the agreement is a blank cheque, a giveaway, of non–renewable natural resources plus resource royalties which belong to all the people of Canada.

Second, instead of simply protecting aboriginal rights and providing a municipal type ownership of major settlement areas, this is a massive transfer of land in fee simple ownership to a very tiny percentage of our national population.

Third, it is a complex, open–ended agreement with a number of provisions no sensible person should sign regarding his own personal affairs, let alone the affairs of the nation.

Regarding resources, the sparsely settled basin of the Mackenzie River today largely remains a unexplored and underdeveloped treasure trove. Although an oil glutted Canada turned down the Mackenzie Valley pipeline in 1977 and passed a 10–year moratorium, future developments and future needs of a resource starved nation may yet see us looking toward this region as a major transportation corridor, with the addition to tugs, freight barges and native fishing boats plying a river whose volume of fresh water is surpassed in Canada only by the St. Lawrence.

• (1525)

The Mackenzie basin's largely unknown mineral resources nevertheless have inspired the mining rushes of Yellowknife, the Great Bear Lake and the Canol project for oil and gas.

Government policies today are seriously injuring a once mighty mining industry, but a wiser future government might once again see thousands of jobs in resource development in the Mackenzie basin whose already known riches include Yellowknife's gold and possibly diamonds, Uranium City and Echo Bay's uranium, the tungsten of Flat River and Faro's lead and zinc, in addition to the petroleum of Norman Wells and the Athabasca tar sands.

As a miner and prospector, I challenge the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Minister of Natural Resources to tell the people of Canada how many millions of dollars in non–renewable resource wealth this agreement gives away forever by ceding mineral rights to 1,800 square kilometres of a mineral rich Mackenzie basin to the 982 adults and 773 children of the Sahtu Dene and Metis.

In addition to 15 annual cash payments of between $3.8 million and $9.6 million in 1990 dollars; in addition to a percentage of oil and gas royalties received by the government within the settlement area and including the Norman Wells oil field operated by Esso; these two ministers are prepared to hand the 982 adults and 733 children a blank cheque for mineral resources.

I would be intrigued to learn when in aboriginal history oil and gas and other mineral exploration development became an aboriginal right.

My second objection to Bill C–16 is that the agreement takes away from common ownership by all the people of Canada, an area larger than the combined land mass of Vancouver Island plus the Fraser Valley plus the Okanagan Valley where I live and hand this entire area over in fee simple ownership once again to 982 adults and 733 children.

As I stated, I am strongly in favour of settling native land claims promptly and encouraging our aboriginal people to move toward self–government on a tribe by tribe basis. I would have no objection to an agreement recognizing special rights of the Sahtu Dene and Metis to such renewable resources as hunting and fishing as carried on in native communities prior to colonial contact.

I might even see myself agreeing as part of self–government for these people a municipal type ownership being vested in the appropriate bands regarding their major settlement areas of Fort Good Hope, Colville Lake, Deline, Fort Norman and Norman Wells.

However according to a brief prepared by Melvin Smith, Q.C.: "No court in Canada of which I am aware, has decided that an aboriginal interest in land goes so far as to entitle aboriginal people to fee simple or full ownership".

My colleagues and I in the Reform Party on behalf of all the people of Canada are opposed to settling native land claims by handing over the fee simple ownership of massive chunks of land. We believe it would be far more appropriate for this House, as guardians of the rights of all Canadians, including generations yet unborn, to give native people special rights to hunting and fishing and to guarantee native people special representation on all governmental bodies having jurisdiction over water use and land use in land claim areas. It is more than excessive. We believe it is foolhardy and contravenes the right to equality of treatment for all citizens of this enormous country to hand over so much land in fee simple ownership.

Moving on to my third point, I see this agreement as having many serious flaws. For example there is a map accompanying this agreement which gives the impression that a certain specific piece of land has been decided upon. This is simply not true.

Appendix C to the agreement goes into some detail to describe the process for land selection which allows the Sahtu Tribal Council and the government to pursue the process of land identification and selection. In other words, this bill is asking Parliament to endorse giving away a huge tract of land which has not yet been specifically defined.

Pages 119 and 120 of the agreement are similarly open–ended. Section 26.4 merely appoints a working group to consider and make recommendations regarding a list of heritage places and sites. Also page 120 is blank, except for this note: "Sahtu Dene and Metis sacred sites. To be completed by parties".

Can signing this open–ended agreement be considered proper guardianship? Can signing this agreement be considered careful stewardship of a land which belongs today to our grandchildren? I say no.

Another aspect of this agreement which I find troubling is the multiplication of quasi–governmental boards. For example it will create renewable resource councils for each community. It will also create boards for renewable resources, for land use planning, for surface rights, for reviewing environmental impact as well as land and water boards. Of course, there is an arbitration board.

I an told this government plans to introduce later in 1994 the Mackenzie River resource management act. This will spawn even more boards and panels to co–ordinate all those other boards and councils and panels and to regulate land and water uses that cross the settlement areas.

In view of the fact there are only 982 adults in the Sahtu Dene and Metis, one might be forgiven for wondering who will be left to carry on the traditional native pursuits of hunting, fishing and trapping when they are going to have so many councils and boards and panels to sit on?

The Deputy Speaker: The member's time with the 10–minute limit has expired. I wonder if he wishes to seek unanimous consent to go on a bit longer.

Is there unanimous consent to let the member complete his remarks?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Stinson Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the answer is that probably a significant part of the cash payment going to these natives supposedly for their good will be used to hire white lawyers and social workers and negotiators and other greedy hangers–on of the so–called Indian industry to deal with this agreement's miles of red tape.

Finally, in regard to future self–government for these people, this agreement provides a framework of sorts in appendix B. But it also says that in case of disputes this agreement takes precedence over future self–government agreements.

Also, according to the Indian affairs minister, it takes precedence over other federal, territorial and municipal laws as stated in Hansard on April 25. I believe it is wrong to set a precedent whereby any native land claim agreement should be allowed to trample all existing federal, territorial or provincial laws and municipal laws in the land claim area.

In conclusion, I wish to extend my personal best wishes to the Sahtu Dene and Metis people in their efforts to obtain a prompt, just settlement of their land claims. I can see that many people have spent many hours and much effort on this agreement, but I strongly object to some of its basic principles.

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in participating in this debate today as this House examines the wisdom of supporting Bill C–16, the Sahtu land claim agreement, I have been fortunate in having the benefit of hearing the many thoughtful, sincere and well–informed arguments made by members from all parties. I would like to acknowledge their contribution to this debate and thank them for it. Their perspectives have been a great help to Canadians in weighing this initiative, the Sahtu land claim agreement.

It is always difficult to express any reservations about such an initiative. As we have seen already in this debate to do so brings down swift charges of lack of compassion, fairness and generosity.

I doubt if any representative of the people of Canada cares to be depicted in such harsh terms. However, someone surely has the duty and obligation to weigh agreements such as this in a thoughtful and reasoned way, especially since the well–being of the people directly affected, the people represented by the Sahtu Tribal Council, is an issue. In addition the interests of all Canadians, the 27 million people whose welfare is entrusted to the 295 representatives chosen to sit in this Chamber must also be weighed and considered.

It is plain to see that many of Canada's native peoples live in social and economic conditions that are appalling in a country with the third highest standard of living in the entire world. There has been a little verbal sparring about whether these individuals would now be enjoying a pastoral existence of self–sufficiency if they had been left as the sole inhabitants of this vast land that we know and love as Canada.

The present reality is that Canada is home to more than 27 million people from many other lands due to a policy of immigration that has been maintained by Canadian governments from the very first one to this present one. The process of immigration will not be reversed. Our duty therefore is to make decisions on behalf of all Canadians that are good and right and just and in light of current and foreseeable future realities.

For decades Canada's decision makers have attempted to ensure that the needs and aspirations of Canadians of native origin are met and looked after by the creation of a huge bureaucracy costing in excess of $10 billion each year. That is over $10,000 per capita for Canada's 997,000 aboriginals. Unfortunately very little of this money actually reaches the individuals for whom it was intended. Instead, it is used to fuel an ever growing bureaucracy.

It is painfully evident this multiplication of tax funded bureaucrats, advisors, consultants, lawyers, studies, programs, grants and politicians has done little to assist the plight of the vast majority of native peoples. Instead, a deplorable state of dependency, surrender of initiative and erosion of pride and values has resulted.

Does the agreement before us resolutely and energetically redress this ineffective approach of the past? No, not at all. Instead, it leaves in place the approaches that have allowed the present state of affairs and then incredibly adds to them with yet more boards and councils.

Will self–esteem and initiative be restored to the Sahtu people through receiving a windfall of thousands of dollars to each individual? There is no provision, no process put in place that would permit this newly acquired purchasing power to be used to hold the Sahtu's own leaders and advisors accountable to them. I strongly recommend that this element of democratic accountability be considered an essential dynamic in the coming self–government negotiations.

Further, the agreement is silent on any obligation for the Sahtu to be subject to the federal laws of Canada, including the charter. This requirement surely ought to have been made explicit in the section dealing with the provision for negotiation of self–government agreements.

The biggest concern raised by this agreement is the precedent it sets. It is not difficult to show expansive generosity with land that few Canadians will ever need or use when the number of people compensated is minuscule, less than 2,000.

What happens when the same process affects a land base that is directly vital to the personal and economic interests of not only a significant number of Canadians but to municipal and provincial governments as well? How will the Government of Canada then be able to offer the same level of land and cash to significantly larger numbers of native people? If it cannot, will it be able to justify to those claimants a different level of compensation and settlement? Have these fundamental issues of fairness and equity been thought through?

Since everything awarded to one group must be paid for from the resources and work of the rest, this is a question which also will affect the interests of all of us as the claims process proceeds with other native groups across the country. This is especially so because, as others have also pointed out, the settlement awarded here does not extinguish or even diminish the huge cost of existing programs extended to native peoples.

I would like to say that the federal government ought to be praised for many aspects of this proposal. It recognizes the need to move expeditiously to resolve such claims. A resolution of this nature is long overdue in fairness to native Canadians and for certainty to all. The cost of such settlements increases dramatically when there is delay in reaching agreement.

We would also applaud the fact that the people affected were directly consulted and their approval obtained prior to proceeding with this agreement. There is also a healthy element of self–determination in the proposed arrangement when it comes to resources and land use. I believe Canadians would support that especially if it could lead to self–sufficiency and placed the Sahtu on the same level of contribution to the country's well–being as other Canadians.

I also believe that so long as all Canadians are subject to the same federal laws and charter, an accommodation of community customs and values at the local judicial level will benefit the administration of justice in the region.

In short, there is much that is positive in this agreement. However I believe this government needs to accept the many expressions of concern about the specifics of the agreement and consider them in the constructive spirit in which such criticisms are intended.

The deficiencies in the agreement ought to be rectified and addressed before the bill is passed in this House.

(Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a committee.)

MIGRATORY BIRDS CONVENTION ACT, 1994

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (for the Minister of the Environment) moved that Bill C–23, an act to implement a convention for the protection of migratory birds in Canada and the United States, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

• (1545)

Mr. Clifford Lincoln (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as part of its plan to modernize Canada's wildlife legislation, the federal government has brought forward this day amendments to the Migratory Birds Convention Act.

In 1916 Canada and the United States signed the migratory birds convention to protect species of migratory birds common to both countries. Bird populations were declining rapidly at the turn of the century and in 1917, Parliament implemented the convention by passing the Migratory Birds Convention Act which regulated the hunting and use of migratory birds and prohibited their trafficking and commercialization.

The legislation also provided for the establishment of migratory bird sanctuaries. Today there are a total of 101 migratory bird sanctuaries in Canada covering roughly 11.3 million hectares of land.

[English]

There have been only minor amendments to the act since 1917. It has become suddenly outdated. It no longer provides our migratory birds with the protection they need. Seventy–seven years in the continental management of migratory birds have taught us some important lessons. It is time to put these lessons to work and to modernize the legislation through early action on the bill.

The government's amendments to the act will update the definitions in the act. It will make them appropriate for migratory bird protection as we enter the 21st century. The act's prohibitions will be clarified.

The provisions of the act are being modernized, particularly with regard to administration and enforcement, because the old act no longer provides effective means or penalties to deter law breakers. This is especially true with regard to poaching and with regard to illegal commercial uses of migratory birds.

As is pointed out in the global convention on biological diversity which Canada signed, a strong and effective legislative program is an important part of any strategy to conserve and protect our natural resources.

[Translation]

Poaching is a serious crime. By killing protected migratory birds, poachers destroy a wildlife heritage common to all Canadians and to all inhabitants of countries which share, benefit from and depend on these birds. Amendments to the legislation call for increasing possible fines to a maximum of $25,000 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, or both. Provision is also made for additional fines in an amount equal to the monetary benefits accrued as a result of the commission of the offence. Furthermore, under the proposed amendments, the courts would be able to make sentencing orders directed at the lawbreaker. The courts would be given increased authority to deal with lawbreakers. Provision is also made by issuing tickets.

Moreover, amendments provide for harsher treatment for illegal commercial transactions such as the sale of products, the sale of companion birds and the illegal organized hunting of large numbers of birds. Fines for illegal commercial transactions would correspond to the nature of the offence and could include the seizure of weapons, vehicles, boats, aircraft and even companies used by the guilty parties in the commission of the offence.

[English]

Updating the Migratory Birds Convention Act will help ensure that populations of birds are maintained at sustainable levels. Amendments to the act were developed only after extensive consultations with affected interested parties, including the provinces and territories, the aboriginal groups, conservation groups and other non-government organizations, hunters and ordinary citizens. The proposed changes have been requested by all provinces and territories and by many interested groups.

• (1550)

The federal government carries out its responsibilities for migratory birds through a strong partnership with the provinces and territories. Provincial and territorial wildlife agencies assist in migratory bird enforcement. Various types of protected areas form one network for havens for migrating wildlife, whether they sanctuaries be federal, provincial or territorial in jurisdiction.

These amendments will strengthen that partnership even further. For example, with the agreement of the provinces and territories, designation of conservation officers for the purposes of enforcing the Migratory Birds Convention Act will be made easier. Any seizures of illegally obtained wildlife could be sold with the proceeds going to the provinces, the territories or the federal government as appropriate.

The amendments will help us become better and more effective stewards of our migratory bird sanctuaries as part of an overall concept of flexible landscape and ecosystem management. For example, at certain times of the year, such as the breeding season, quite strict protection measures might be called for, perhaps to prevent beach goers from walking on plovers' eggs. At other times of the year uses may be more flexible. Good law, good enforcement and good management can help us sustain our ecosystems.

[Translation]

Set in the broader perspective of both the Migratory Birds Convention Act and the convention it implements, this is one of the safeguards concerning one aspect in a series of global or hemisphere-wide partnerships to protect birds and other wildlife as well as their habitats.

These partnerships take the form of land conservation programs like the Canadian Wildlife Service Latin American Program in which Canada and its Latin American neighbours join together to preserve the southern habitats of our common visitors. They also include the Biodiversity Convention, a global instrument as I indicated earlier.

This spinoff from the UNCED recognizes the value of wildlife and its habitat for the world. And this value stems from the fact that fauna and flora are part of a natural heritage without compare, represent a major socioeconomic resource and play a growing role as a general health status indicator for increasingly stressed ecosystems. Gulls and cormorants are valuable for instance to show the level of environmental disruption in the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence region.

We must not forget the important contribution to our economy made by activities related to fish, fauna and flora. As a matter of fact, Statistics Canada indicated that Canadians and American tourists have spent, in 1991 alone, $1.4 billion on recreation activities involving water birds. Not only has spending in that area helped maintain over 30,000 jobs, but it has generated close to $1 billion in personal income and $743 million in federal and provincial tax revenues.

I would like to stress that only very minor changes were made to the Migratory Birds Convention Act. We must therefore proceed as quickly as possible with these amendments.

[English]

The provisions of the act are being modernized particularly with regard to administration and enforcement because the old act no longer provides the effective means of penalties to deter law breakers. This is especially true with regard to poaching and illegal commercial uses of migratory birds. As pointed out in the global convention on biological diversity which Canada has signed, a strong and effective legislative program is a key part of any strategy to conserve and protect natural resources.

• (1555)

Therefore the government's amendments to the act will update definitions in the act. It will make them appropriate for migratory bird protection as we enter the 21st century. The act's prohibition will be clarified.

I urge all members of the House, regardless of political party, to support the bill very strongly. It represents a big step forward in our common goal toward sustainable development.

[Translation]

I hope that all the hon. members of this House will strongly support this bill.

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, as assistant critic for the environment and sustainable development, it is a pleasure for me to speak on Bill C–23.

This bill seeks to modernize and update a law dating back to 1917. To understand it better, I think that we have to go back a little into our history and look at the situation at the turn of the century. In the early 1900s, there was considerable exploitation of migratory birds and trade in them. As a result, their numbers dropped drastically. The need to intervene to end this illicit trade and to protect the species was increasingly urgent.

In 1916, Canada and the United States signed the Migratory Birds Convention. The next year, in 1917, Parliament passed the Migratory Birds Convention Act. The provisions of this Act seek to regulate the hunting of migratory birds and to prevent traffic and trade in them.

Through permits, this law controls the use made of migratory birds. Several aspects of the 1917 law are obsolete today. For example, the penalties provided in the Act are no longer what society is entitled to expect. Fines from $10 to $300 are provided for infractions. Bill C–23 as presented today increases these penalties very significantly.

Amounts of up to $5,000 and even $25,000 provided in clause 13(1) will deter poachers, we hope. The evolution of our society and the example of penalties alone show the importance of updating and modernizing this law, of strengthening the enforcement rules and clarifying the procedures.

For us in the Bloc Quebecois, several aspects of this law are of great interest. As I said in the introduction to my speech, it was very necessary to update the legislation. In particular, we hope to add that not only birds, their eggs and nests are protected but also their embryos and tissue cultures.

We think that this provision is essential; given the evolution of biotechnology and the amazing possibilities that exist or will exist in this regard, this provision is most desirable. Clearly, however, such a scientific achievement was unimaginable in 1917 and the law could not include such a clause.

According to various environmental groups, millions of wild birds are illegally captured, poisoned or driven from their nests throughout the world. Therefore it is appropriate for us to legislate in this way in view of this phenomenon.

We learned in the Saskatoon Star Phoenix last January and in La Presse that 1,000 of 9,600 bird species were in danger of extinction; that is, more than 10 per cent of our birds could disappear very soon. We agree that the situation is urgent.

• (1600)

An article in the March 24 issue of La Presse contained some comments on the seriousness of the situation. The author showed that 70 per cent of existing species in the world are in decline. According to one study he quotes, the illegal trade in wild birds is a growing threat to the species, especially in Southeast Asia.

World Watch, an American magazine, gives some of the reasons why the number of birds is decreasing in Canada and throughout the world, and I quote: "Most bird species are in decline because the natural balance is upset by the global expansion of mankind".

Of course, the problems caused by deforestation due to farmland expansion or urban spread, industrial and domestic pollution are but a few of the factors contributing to the declining number of birds in Canada and throughout the world. In North America alone, deforestation may have caused the alarming reduction in bird population in 250 species breeding on its territory.

As I said earlier, we must speak up on the illegal trade in birds. According to a study by the World Wide Fund for Nature, this lucrative trade is growing by leaps and bounds. In the last 20 years, 2,600 species have been identified among those traded. This commercial activity is flourishing in Southeast Asia. To the five million birds traded each year must be added an estimated three million in China.

We are in a position to realize that this kind of trade affects much more than our two countries. We are legislating on a bilateral Canada–U.S. solution but we must also see the problem as a whole.

Serious allegations have led us to consider this problem from an international standpoint. Some airlines will not transport wild birds. That is fine. However, the article from the WWF goes on to say: "Singapore proclaimed itself the hub of this trade for the whole region". Because of loopholes in the legislation, wild birds illegally exported from Indonesia, Thailand or Malaysia become legal goods when they go through Singapore.

You might say we are a long way from our bill on migratory birds in Canada and in the United States, but we are not. Environmental problems such as acid rain, the ozone layer, dangerous goods and many others know no boundaries. And the impact here of these various problems require us to take a stand.

Clearly, Bill C–23 is a positive measure in this context. We cannot oppose a good initiative. However, the international scope of the problem probably requires a worldwide approach as well.

It is because problems related to the ozone layer have such an international dimension that the Montreal Protocol was signed with several countries. The issue of importing and exporting dangerous goods could not be solved with a national piece of legislation. Again, several sovereign states had to agree on regulations concerning the exchange and transportation of such goods. Canada could be the leader in this field and set, through an international convention, standards which would provide some protection to this species.

I will conclude by reaffirming my support to Bill C–23, but I also want to remind you of some proposed legal principles for environmental protection and sustainable development, which are approved by Canada.

Article two of these principles provides that: "States shall conserve and use the environment and natural resources for the benefit of present and future generations". Article three says: "States shall maintain ecosystems and ecological processes essential for the functioning of the biosphere, shall preserve biological diversity, and shall observe the principle of optimum sustainable yield in the use of living natural resources and ecosystems".

• (1605)

In article 8, we see that the States shall co–operate in good faith with other States in implementing the preceding rights and obligations.

These are only 3 of the 22 principles for environmental protection, as found in the Brundtland report entitled Our Common Future.

I would urge the Canadian government to look forward when it deals with environmental protection and sustainable development, but to keep in mind all the agreements already signed. In this case, we have no other choice but to protect the migratory birds. However, we should be careful in doing so not to impinge on other jurisdictions. Too often, our legislation grants too much discretionary power to the minister, who can choose to enforce only parts of the law. We do not think this is the case with this bill. That is why my party and I want the bill to be referred to a committee who will seek to improve it.

Together, let us protect the endangered species.

[English]

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East): I am very pleased today to stand and say that the Reform Party is in support of Bill C–23 at second reading. It is an act to protect migratory birds. Of course, we think of birds and wildlife together.

I have the good fortune of coming from a very wonderful constituency. Of course all members in the House say that, but my constituency is so wonderful that it happens to contain three of Canada's national parks. My riding has Kootenay National Park, Yoho National Park and Glacier National Park, which gives you an idea of the grandeur of the area I represent.

In addition, we also have an area called the Columbia River wetlands. The Columbia River wetlands are 180 kilometres long. They are comprised of a 26,000 hectare flood plain. I would like to read a short section from a brochure by B.C. Wildlife with respect to the Columbia River's hydrological cycle.

> The habitats within the Columbia River flood plain provide food, shelter and cover for an exceptionally large number of birds and mammals. Waterfowl comprising the most abundant and observable species group utilize the wetlands for breeding and brood rearing, for refuge during the flightless periods of the moult, and for feeding and resting during spring and fall migrations. Single counts have revealed more than 15,000 ducks in the autumn, more than 1,000 whistling swans in the spring.

I should say that I also have the good fortune of living just south of this area. I have seen these whistling swans in the lake in front of my home. They are absolutely beautiful birds.

> The rare trumpeter swan also appears in migration. Breeding Canada geese number some 1,200 pairs. Other birds sharing the wetlands are loons, gulls, terns, rails, bitterns, hawks, bald eagles, ospreys and 100 or so species of songbirds. Colonies of great blue herons comprising some 300 pairs constitute the second largest concentration in western Canada.

Up to 90 per cent of the elk, 70 per cent of the white tail deer and 15 per cent of the moose in the upper Columbia basin depend on these wetlands for their survival.

This gives us an idea of how magnificent and pristine this area is. Therefore I have a personal vested interest in Bill C–23.

At the conclusion of what I just read I mentioned the fact that there are also big game. We actually have about 25 per cent of the hunting in British Columbia for big game within my Kootenay East constituency.

I should mention it is not just an environmental issue although that is important enough, but it is also an economic issue. We have guide outfitters, taxidermists, sports shops, camera stores, saddle and outdoor equipment makers. In addition there are campgrounds, restaurants, motels, gas stations, automobile dealers, tire shops, grocery stores. All benefit from these wildlife resources, particularly during the fall hunting season when business would otherwise be slow.

We happen to be on one of the three western flyways. Depending on what happens with respect to the amount of water on the prairies, we may have up to tens of thousands of birds migrating overhead in the fall and again in the spring. It is indeed an absolutely magnificent area.

The major reason I stand in support of Bill C–23 is because it is the foundation and cornerstone of being able to co–ordinate the regulators and the regulation.

Members should know that the British Columbia conservation data centre which is a section of the wildlife branch of the Ministry of Environment, Lands and Parks in British Columbia has an exhaustive list of birds that are actually protected within our area. There are the western grebe, the bald eagle, peregrine falcon, sharp tailed grouse and long billed curlew. I could go and on with the number of birds that we are very, very proud of in our area.

I can report there is a tremendous level of co–operation between the regulators and the industrial users in my constituency. All of the forest companies are working in co–operation with the B.C. fish and wildlife branch. They are involved in doing cut blocks in co–ordination with that branch. In some cases they are taking as little as 30 per cent of the standing timber to come up with a particular kind of configuration for certain birds or animals. In other instances they are doing other things.

Often when thinking of the word environmentalist, speaking for myself I think of placards, protests, arrests, or civil disobedience. If we really want to see environmentalists anywhere in Canada, we should turn up at the rod and gun organizations in our constituencies. These are people who are going out of their way, putting their own blood, sweat, tears and money into preserving and improving the environment. In preparing for this presentation I took time to speak to four such groups.

One was the Kimberley Wildlife and Wilderness Club. It pointed out that with respect to migratory birds the biggest single item that has worked against them has been the inclusion of hydro power. I must admit I had always been a great fan of hydro power up until the time I started to look at this. The impact hydro power has had on migratory birds has been singularly devastating.

I mentioned blood, sweat and tears. The Golden and District Rod and Gun Club notes it has a gander lander. A gander lander is simply a manmade place where the geese can land, so it is called a gander lander. Over the past 15 years the Golden Rod and Gun Club has been involved in constructing between 100 and 105 gander landers. Five or six times during the winter months members go out and spend the whole day upkeeping and maintaining those.

In addition I spoke to members of the Elkford Rod and Gun Club. One of their concerns was with respect to snags. These are tall dead trees which are required for nesting for certain kinds of birds. I am happy to report that although a lot of them have been destroyed in logging operations for the protection of the people who are actually doing the logging, the B.C. forest service has just implemented a snag program. It is going out to the bush and identifying these snags and is taking steps to leave them standing so that they can be nesting places for birds. This is done in such a way that it is a safe process under workers compensation.

Members of the Sparwood and District Fish and Wildlife Association had two issues of concern. One issue of concern which I am sure all Canadians share is that whatever we are doing with Bill C–23 or any other bill, because this has the potential of overlapping on native issues, we take some time and see how those things relate.

The final thing they pointed out, which may come as a surprise to some people, is that they are actually having a population explosion of grizzly bears. There is an area down in the far southeast corner of my constituency, in the bottom corner of British Columbia, that is a remote area with a certain amount of logging and basically there are very few humans in that particular concentration. As a result the grizzlies have actually reached a point at which they may become a problem.

• (1615)

These rod and gun club members are law–abiding citizens. They are committed to the wildlife, they are committed to the environment. Something that I do not understand, because I am not a hunter, is that they are also committed to hunting. Last time I looked hunters used guns.

These people as law–abiding citizens believe in safe storage. These people as law–abiding citizens follow all of the rules for responsible use. These people expect me and other people in this House to stand up against the imposition of certain city values that seem to be pushing them into a corner.

Unfortunately the imposition of city values may come from the fact that many birds arrive in the city dead, packaged and in freezers and there is no recognition of what went into that dead bird arriving in the freezer, much less the enjoyment that these people have in a responsible way of enjoying hunting during the fall season.

We support Bill C–23 because it supports the migratory bird protection and finally we support it because it reflects the values of responsible, active, participating environmentalists, law–abiding Canadians.

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, at the outset let me congratulate the parliamentary secretary, the member for Lachine—Lac–Saint–Louis, for his opening remarks and for having set the tone for this debate and also for having ensured that there will be a thorough examination at the committee level so as to provide for consultation with interested Canadians.

Also I would like to congratulate the member for Terrebonne and the member for Kootenay East for having put forward such interesting observations that will certainly add to the quality of the examination and also because they give life to what otherwise would seem a rather stultified and bureaucratic piece of legislation. It is not stultified. It is not a dull and uninteresting piece of legislation.

On the contrary, I would argue that this is a very important piece of legislation being introduced by this new government today in the House mainly for three reasons. One, it is important because the movement of migratory birds has enormous significance for our farmers, for the role that birds play in the ecological balance and in maintaining a control of insects in the open agricultural environment. That role of course is well known but it is never underlined and highlighted enough.

Second, to the urban dwellers the arrival and departure of migratory birds and their staying in Canada during the good season is a source of enormous pleasure. That pleasure is not limited to bird watchers. It is a well known shared interest that Canadians have for the presence of this magnificent species.

Third, the fact that our literature and our heritage are based on the presence of migratory birds is witnessed alone by the fact that we have found it over the decades desirable to produce banknotes and coins reproducing some of the better known migratory birds in Canada.

For all these reasons it is quite safe to assume that deep down in the subconscious of the Canadian psyche there is a tremendous attachment to wildlife and therefore the migration of birds means more than just what that poor term conveys. It is an attitude toward nature. It is an attitude toward wildlife and essential pleasure is derived from it which cannot be easily described with plain words as I am attempting to do today.

• (1620)

For these three reasons I would say we are debating here in this House a piece of legislation that is significant for us and can have very significant repercussions for future generations of Canadians as other speakers have already highlighted, in particular the members for Terrebonne and Kootenay East.

This bill will allow for the creation of sanctuaries. It will ensure the management of areas important for the protection of migratory birds. It is important to note that at the present time we have in Canada some 101 bird sanctuaries protecting roughly 11 million hectares which are covered for that purpose.

If we look at the new act it is intended to broaden the definition of migratory birds. This is important because it will include sperm, embryos and tissue cultures. This is intended as a protective measure against development in biotechnology which may take place in future years. It is a very good clause that is proactive and of particular value.

Under this bill regulatory authorities will be established. One can only say that on the whole this bill is most laudable and very well prepared.

The contentious parts, however, that could be discussed and raised today relate, as is usually the case with these kind of bills, to fines and enforcement. Very briefly, I would like to draw attention to the fines which under the present legislation, before this bill comes into force, are a mere $10 to a maximum of $300. They are only levied upon summary conviction. Evidently there is here a vacuum that must be filled and we must say that this legislation is long overdue.

In the proposed bill the maximum fine will be $5,000 for summary conviction offences and up to $25,000 for indictable offences.

The question is are these fines really sufficient? I am sure there are a variety of views on this in reply to this question. In other words, is $5,000 adequate to deter someone from harming, killing or possessing and illegally trading protected species?

From the comments made by the member for Terrebonne I would be inclined to conclude that this fine is not enough, that the legislators should give the judge sufficiently broad range of fines and let the judge decide how strong the fine should be. However, the penalty should be as strong as it can conceivably be because it will also serve a purpose not just this year and next year but probably 10 or 20 years from now when this legislation is likely to be amended, but we do not know for sure. Therefore the question of fines is one that raises a number of interesting questions.

The same can be said about enforcement. Enforcement officers will be appointed under this legislation. Their powers will be more consistent with other federal and provincial conservation legislation. Subsection 13 addresses this particular aspect of enforcement.

The question is whether a person who commits or continues to commit an offence for more than one day should be penalized or whether a limitation of one day is one that ought not to be deleted so that there is no reduction in the offence that is contemplated by the judge.

I would be inclined to think the enforcement section needs a good examination by the committee to make it stronger. It is true that the amendments will become strong deterrents to those who would traffic in wildlife. There is no doubt that they read very well. We have to make sure that there is enough strength in the Canadian Wildlife Service and in the provincial affiliated departments to carry out what is in the legislation.

Therefore I must bring to members' attention a statement made recently by the Animal Alliance of Canada in which a recommendation is made to stop the continued erosion of the numbers of wildlife enforcement officers, that the current vacancies of five enforcement people be filled and the remainder of 29 person–years be completed to bring the enforcement officers to a level that was promised in 1991, which is just above 30.

One must wonder whether in a country as large as Canada with such a large federal jurisdiction it is realistic to expect an enforcement of this important legislation with only 30 enforcement officers or thereabouts. Evidently the answer is no and evidently we will have to address this very important question.

Resources must be allocated to enforcement. These 30 or so positions must be increased, otherwise Canada is running the risk of not being able to meet its obligations under this legislation, under the Cites legislation as well as the Wild Animal and Plant Protection and Regulation of International and Interprovincial Trade Act. That is quite a lengthy title for that matter.

There are a number of questions that ought to be put on record on second reading. I would simply reduce them to the following.

Is there sufficient power provided by this bill so that the present minister and future ministers can undertake all the necessary action to ensure the protection of migratory birds?

Is the scope of this convention broad enough now that Canada has entered into NAFTA? Should initiatives not be launched at the political level as well as at the technical level to broaden the scope of the Migratory Convention Act so as to include Mexico and both Central and South America since as well we all know the movement of birds does not respect boundaries?

This convention is binding only on North America. If the scope of the convention is not broadened, a number of species could be in danger in the years ahead.

Many of our Canadian species do straddle two continents. We have to understand that all wildlife is really world wildlife, not just limited to Canada. Our ability to enjoy the presence of migratory birds in Canada depends also on the ability of protecting the species in those regions of the world where they spend their winter.

Therefore, the Canadian songbirds as we know and appreciate them depend on the rainforests of Central and South America. This is a political message that we have to carry to the international fora to ensure that this convention is broadened to its largest possible scope. Otherwise Canada will have a very limited chance to improve the survival of the species in the decades ahead.

• (1630)

We are debating today not just what would be the reality of the nineties but most likely the reality of the first half of the next century since this kind of bill does not reach the floor of the House of Commons that frequently.

In conclusion I would say that the changes proposed to the act are essential. They are very desirable. They are timely. We must work together to ensure there is a co–ordinated effort to achieve the protection of migratory birds.

We must ensure that the fines are a very strong deterrent. We must do our best to find ways to ensure the enforcement of the proposed act is carried out in every area of the federal jurisdiction at least. I suppose there could be excellent co–operation between provincial and federal services. We must ensure that the powers to create new sanctuaries are implemented and that the existing sanctuaries continue to be protected.

Finally, as I just mentioned and before I sit down, I would really make a plea to the Minister of the Environment to consider taking an initiative personally to ensure the scope of the convention is enlarged to include all the Americas and to provide the necessary protection in decades ahead.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 38, I wish to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Mercier, social programs; the hon. member for Chicoutimi, electronic highway.

[English]

Mrs. Karen Kraft Sloan (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in support of the bill to amend the Migratory Birds Conventions Act. I commend my colleagues on both sides of the House for their sensitivity and support of the bill. In particular I support my colleague from Davenport who has examined the bill carefully and has put forward some very sincere concerns.

Along with the Canada Wildlife Act, this act urgently needs updating to come into line with current environmental legislation in both Canada and the United States. Many provisions of the act as it now stands are ineffective or are simply not in harmony with related federal, provincial or territorial legislation.

Today I would like to focus on how the bill will affect one particular group that is following the updating process very closely, and that is Canada's First Nations. In fact the bill now before the House is only one of three initiatives in this area having particular importance for First Nations. The other two are the effort to amend the Canada–U.S. migratory birds convention of 1916 and the implementation of an interim policy on enforcement, especially the provisions on water fowl harvesting by aboriginal people.

The 1916 convention is a binational agreement governing the conservation of migratory birds in Canada and the United States. In our country the Migratory Birds Convention Act is the enabling legislation for the implementation of that agreement.

Regulations under the act control the hunting of migratory game birds during certain periods of the year. They also establish closed seasons to protect breeding, nesting, brooding and moulting birds at other times of the year.

These and other provisions complement measures taken by the United States, the provinces and territories, wildlife groups, the private sector and individuals to conserve this valuable wildlife heritage.

In many cases the different authorities and sectors have worked in close co–operation toward that common goal. One outstanding example of such a partnership is the North American water fowl management plan.

• (1635)

In some areas of Canada, especially the north, migratory birds have traditionally been an important food source for aboriginal peoples. First Nations continue to rely heavily on this source at different times of the year. In certain cases activities that are protected by aboriginal rights are not covered by the provisions of the Migratory Birds Conventions Act. For example, the hunting by natives of migratory birds during the closed season from March 10 to August 31 or the collection of eggs. Of course aboriginal people also hunt birds during open seasons. Hunting migratory birds does more than provide food to First Nations. Traditional hunting activities have a great significance in aboriginal culture. Preserving that culture means preserving Canada's wildlife resources.

In its present form the migratory birds convention fails to provide for closed season harvest and egg collection by aboriginal people. That omission can be rectified only by amending the convention itself, a step that requires negotiation between the United States and Canada. As I mentioned we are seeking to initiate the necessary negotiations. They should take place later this year.

First Nations take a significant proportion of the migratory birds hunted in Canada. The latest estimates suggest that aboriginal people harvest between 250,000 and 750,000 ducks and roughly 350,000 geese each year. For ducks that represents 13 per cent of the Canadian harvest and 6 per cent of the total North American harvest. For geese the figure represents 32 per cent of the Canadian harvest and 12 per cent of the total North American harvest. Geese constitute a major food source for some aboriginal communities, notably along the Ontario and Quebec coasts of James Bay.

Given the magnitude of the annual harvest and our desire to safeguard the subsistence harvesting needs of First Nations we must work in co–operation with aboriginal communities. We need new partnerships to achieve the shared goals of conservation and management of ducks and geese.

An amended convention will promote such partnerships, particularly in the form of co–management agreements, self–government agreements and the wildlife management provisions of comprehensive claims agreements.

Already co–management with aboriginal people is being implemented for the conservation of caribou, polar bear and other species. The approach is generating the needed data on harvest which can serve as a basis for agreement on harvest objectives. We wish to build on this success in our future efforts to amend the convention.

Earlier at workshops organized through Canada representatives from government, aboriginal communities, wildlife groups and others discussed options for closed season harvesting. These consultations provided valuable guidance for the coming negotiations with the United States on amending the migratory birds convention to allow for hunting and egg collection by natives.

Of course the amendments to the convention and to Canada's legislation and regulations must respect aboriginal and treaty rights to hunt migratory birds. To ensure that they do, thorough consultation is a must. That is how we will achieve the best possible provisions for addressing aboriginal concerns.

Consultations are now under way on such changes to the convention with the full participation of aboriginal organizations, the provinces and territories, and environmental and conservation groups. It will not happen overnight, but discussions to this date have been encouraging. What is more, Canada and the United States are now working on convergent tracks as we prepare for formal negotiations.

Among the changes now under consideration by hon. members to the Migratory Birds Convention Act, one provision concerns the procedure for amending the convention itself. The bill before the House will allow the schedule to the act setting out the convention to be amended by order. The change will ensure that Canada can promptly fulfil its obligations to the United States, the convention and all those affected by an amended convention, in particular aboriginal peoples.

Until such time as the convention is amended an interim enforcement policy governs our application of the Migratory Birds Convention Act and the Canada Wildlife Act in the areas of closed season hunting and egg collection by aboriginal people. This policy gives top priority to conservation. It will remain in effect until after passage of the bills modernizing the two acts and until the convention itself is amended.

• (1640)

The interim enforcement policy also stresses consultation and co–operation, two very important elements in any effort to build partnership for conservation with the First Nations.

There are pressing reasons for proceeding with the present amendments to the Migratory Birds Convention Act. It requires time to lay the groundwork for amending the migratory birds convention so that it takes into account the needs of aboriginal peoples.

While we continue to do that, however, we must safeguard the resources themselves. We must ensure that they are used sustainably. To do this Canada must act at once to update its wildlife and migratory bird legislation, strengthening enforcement and modernizing administration.

Any delay could jeopardize Canada's ability to ensure sustainable population levels for migratory birds and other wildlife. Let us consider the need to deal with the illegal commercial sales of murres and other migratory birds. That is only one reason we cannot afford to postpone these amendments.

For the benefit of Canadian wildlife Canada must proceed with the updating of the Migratory Birds Convention Act and its companion, the Canada Wildlife Act. At the same time we must continue extensive consultations with aboriginal people to meet their needs and concerns. The proposed amendments to both acts will in no way prejudice the outcome of these broader initiatives.

Canada's wildlife needs protection and it needs it now. That is why the government has introduced the bill now before the House to amend the Migratory Birds Convention Act, and that is why the bill deserves swift passage.

Mr. Bernie Collins (Souris—Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, to help hon. members in considering the bill now before the House allow me to offer some background on migratory birds and Canada's efforts to protect and conserve them.

The Migratory Birds Convention Act provides protection for over 400 species of migratory birds in Canada. Among them are water fowl, sea birds, shore birds and song birds. In all it is a remarkably wide variety.

Environment Canada's Canadian Wildlife Service works to ensure that all species of migratory birds will continue to survive and benefit future generations of Canadians. Safeguarding migratory birds requires many different measures because the birds themselves have such varied habitats and ways of life.

In every case, however, there are the same basic components to the strategy pursued by the wildlife service. It monitors bird populations. It informs Canadians about the status of birds and their habitats. It co–ordinates multi–party efforts to preserve habitats. It establishes and enforces regulations to curtail the abuse of birds.

In some cases research is needed to understand how human activity affects the chances for birds to survive. Sometimes special plans have to be made for the recovery of endangered bird species. The wildlife service deals with these needs as required.

In every case a broad ecosystem approach is essential involving many stakeholders. That approach is central to the work performed by the Canadian Wildlife Service.

The issues demanding attention are highly diverse. For example, tree harvesting may affect migratory song birds. Pesticide runoff from farms may harm water fowl. Commercial fishing nets may trap and drown sea birds. Spills of oil and other harmful substances may jeopardize entire sea bird colonies.

One crucial step that must be taken is to identify critical habitat for migratory birds not only in Canada but throughout their flyways. In this instance many of Canada's migratory birds winter in Latin America and the habitats must be protected. With this in mind the Canadian Wildlife Service has established a Latin American program to further Canada's interest in migratory birds wintering south of the U.S.–Mexico border. The program seeks to identify the needs of migratory birds so that they can be included in conservation planning.

To this end it relies heavily on co–operation with other countries and international organizations. That co–operation must be seen in the memorandum of understanding between the Canadian Wildlife Service and the American and Mexican wildlife agencies to conserve migratory birds and their habitats in Mexico.

• (1645)

The service has also helped established international initiatives. One of these is these is the international waterfowl census of the International Waterfowl and Wetlands Research Bureau. Another such initiative is the Western Hemisphere Shorebird Reserve Network. The network's objective is to identify and protect critical areas for the migration of shorebirds. Under this initiative the Wildlife Service has worked with countries throughout South America to develop an atlas of coastal shore bird habitats.

Here in Canada two hemispheric shorebird reserves have so far been identified, both of them in the upper Bay of Fundy. These have been twinned with three wetland sites in Suriname designated as hemispheric shorebird reserves in 1989. Work is proceeding to identify other important sites in Canada and to secure their designation and protection under the network.

Game bird species present a special challenge. They are an important recreational resource, translating into significant economic activity. At the same time we must see that this resource does not depreciate. In other words, we must ensure that it is used in a sustainable manner.

Canada manages migratory game bird species through an annual regulatory process for monitoring and controlling hunting. Associated with this process are population surveys. A hallmark of the process is consultation, in particular with the provinces and territories and with the American government agencies.

The Canadian Wildlife Services follows a two pronged approach in managing game bird species. One component of that approach is regulation and compliance; the other is habitat enhancement. Both efforts draw heavily on national and international input. Within Canada there is a notable contribution from the provinces and territories and increasingly from co–operative wildlife management boards involving aboriginal groups.

Internationally Canada works with the flyway councils set up to manage the birds according to their natural migratory pathways. We also work with the North American Waterfowl Management Plan Committee.

To support the consultations of developing game bird regulations, status reports are prepared. These publicly available documents give information on game bird populations and explain proposed changes to the regulations. The status reports are distributed to many Canadian and American organizations with an interest in migratory game bird conservation and with reports these organizations are in a position to influence the development of regulations.

The Wildlife Service also publishes an annual newsletter entitled "Bird Trends". This deals with the population status of Canadian birds. A top priority of the Wildlife Service is promoting public awareness about migratory bird issues. This is the first step toward fostering the volunteer networks on which the service relies for data collection.

Together with the Canadian Nature Federation the service sponsors Birdquest, a public information and education project on migratory birds. Birdquest encourages a basic understanding of the ecology of a bird, populations, and it does this by teaching participants about bird identification, bird study and bird conservation.

Those who successfully pass through Birdquest qualify to join one of the service's volunteer based programs. These play a key part in supporting migratory bird conservation initiatives and they help the service identify problems and implement solutions.

More important, the Birdquest program encourages Canadians to become actively involved in initiatives that contribute to migratory bird conservation. One of the most notable initiatives to protect migratory birds is the North American waterfowl management plan. This unique undertaking offers a forum for international agreement on a broad range of waterfowl management issues. It also provides the focus for action to enhance waterfowl habitat.

Under this co–operative agreement a series of joint ventures are targeting species inhabited areas of special concern.

• (1650)

In Canada the aims are to secure important waterfowl habitats throughout the country, to address the serious decline in western waterfowl populations, to initiate the collection of long–term survey data for eastern duck populations and to delineate and monitor the distinct breeding populations of Arctic nesting geese.

The north American waterfowl management plan brings together Canada, the United States and Mexico. It is a formal representation from Canadian provinces and territories as well as American states. Among its key contributors are the federal government, departments in Canada and the United States alike. It also involves many non–government organizations.

We can find broad co–operation in most of the activities of the Canadian Wildlife Service. With the United States the service works to conserve migrant songbirds through a program called Partners in Flight. With the aboriginal people, the service joins in co–operative wildlife management boards. With Canada's leading environmental non–governmental organizations, the service has a long history of joint projects.

Above all, with the provinces and territories, the service works to ensure the enforcement of the Migratory Bird Convention Act and to preserve ecosystems as habitats for wildlife and to tackle the problems of endangered species.

These are efforts that directly benefit all Canadians. Through the amendments to the Migratory Bird Convention Act it will be possible to reinforce these efforts and for that reason I support the passage of this bill. I urge all hon. members to do the same.

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, as a strong advocate of wildlife conservation I am pleased to speak in support of this bill to amend the Canada Wildlife Act.

Wildlife has a special place in our country. It is part of a heritage we all value. In the north many Canadians still earn their living by wildlife harvesting. Throughout the country wildlife related activity is a cherished form of recreation for an overwhelming majority of people.

Our challenge is to see that this heritage is passed on to future generations of Canadians. At the moment I am regrettably unsure that we will succeed.

Wildlife populations in Canada today are under considerable stress. More and more species are being designated as endangered and some populations are experiencing declines. But the outlook is not entirely bleak because while the dangers are greater than ever before, so is the support for wildlife conservation and so is our understanding of what it takes to protect and conserve our living natural resources.

Back in the 1970s when the Canada Wildlife Act was passed we thought mostly in terms of protecting individual species that were at risk and our efforts were limited by a failure to recognize the wider social and economic benefits of wildlife.

That recognition is now becoming more common. We know that wildlife activities make a significant contribution to Canada's economy. In hard dollar and cent terms we need to maintain our wildlife to maintain our prosperity, our communities and our traditional lifestyles. That is why close to 90 per cent of Canadians want better protection for our wildlife.

We also have come to recognize that working with individual species is not necessarily the best way to conserve wildlife. Certainly this is justified in the case where a particular species faces special threats. We have realized that each species is part of a web of life on which it depends and which it helps sustain. Tear apart that web and many species may no longer be able to survive. Patiently mend the web and you may help save not one but dozens of species.

• (1655)

In other words, we have understood that the most effective way of ensuring the health of wildlife is by ensuring the health of the ecosystems in which they live. No creature can long exist outside its accustomed habitat. Our task, first and foremost, is to protect key ecosystems, to conserve essential habitat. This is how we can ensure that future generations of Canadians will enjoy the benefits of a rich wildlife heritage.

In 1973 our predecessors in this Chamber were far–sighted enough to know the value of habitat protection to wildlife conservation and they incorporated that approach into the Canada Wildlife Act. The act allows the Minister of the Environment to acquire lands for the purpose of research, conservation and interpretation. Under the act, 45 national wildlife areas have been established in the intervening years, covering 287,000 hectares of territory.

The areas are managed by the federal government in co–operation with provincial and territorial authorities as well as non–government organizations. They complement an extensive system of national and provincial parks and other protected areas which encompass much prime wildlife habitat.

Internationally as well we have seen a growing appreciation of the need for an ecosystem approach to wildlife conservation. That is what underlines the North American waterfowl management plan, the Ramsar convention on the conservation of wetlands of international importance and, most important, the historic global convention on biological diversity adopted at the Earth Summit in 1992.

Among other things, the 1992 global convention calls for each signatory nation to establish a system of protected areas as a way of conserving biodiversity. To meet our commitments under the convention Canada must now redouble its efforts on this front.

We made a promising start in November of 1992 at the first joint meeting of Canada's federal, provincial and territorial ministers responsible for wildlife, parks and environment. The tri–council meeting called for development of Canadian biodiversity strategy. It also gave fresh impetus to the effort to complete Canada's network of protected areas, including areas representative of Canada's marine natural areas.

That effort has been defined in different ways. At times the call was to set aside 12 per cent of our country's territory as protected areas. But more important than achieving a particular figure is protecting representative samples of the Canadian ecosystems. Inevitably that means protecting key habitat on which our wildlife depends.

The bill now before the House will improve our ability to do that. It broadens the definition of land in the existing Canada Wildlife Act to include both land and marine areas alike, out to the 200 nautical mile limit. This wider definition will put the administration of the act in line with the ecosystem approach. Under the amended act it will be possible to establish new national wildlife areas protecting habitats where wildlife reproduce, as well as associated offshore areas in which they feed.

The more extensive our network of national wildlife areas the better will be our protection for wildlife. Already this network covers a diverse array of landscapes and ecosystems throughout Canada and they support such varied activities as hiking, photography, bird watching, grazing or haying, and hunting, all in a manner compatible with the wildlife conservation objectives of a given area.

Allow me to describe a few of the national wildlife areas in existence or shortly to be established. In New Brunswick this year we will see the designation of Portobello as the province's fifth national wildlife area. This designation will protect over 2,000 acres of wetlands where waterfowl breed and stop on their annual migration as well as the Old Growth Forest where moose, whitetailed deer and black bear still roam.

• (1700)

In Quebec, Cap–Tourmente is an area that combines archaeological and wildlife significance. This site of the north side of the St. Lawrence River was established primarily to protect the habitat of the world's only greater snow goose population but it also contains remains of prehistoric as well as more recent times. Here Samuel de Champlain built a dwelling and a stable in the early years of European colonization.

In Ontario the Long Point national wildlife area forms a core of an international biosphere reserve. This fragile sand based ecosystem on the shore of Lake Erie contains unique habitats, including a significant portion of the remaining Carolinian forest and critical wetlands.

In Saskatchewan Last Mountain Lake is North America's oldest waterfowl refuge. Parliament first set aside land here in 1887 and this year it will be formally designated as a national wildlife area.

Yukon will get its first national wildlife area in 1994 with the designation of Nisutlin River Delta under the Teslin Tlingit land claims agreement. The area will protect approximately 5,200 hectares of inland river delta used by waterfowl as breeding grounds and a stopping point for their migrations.

In particular, it will shelter the tundra swan, a species listed as vulnerable with only 15,000 individuals in existence throughout the world.

Nisutlin is especially significant for the part being played by the first nations in its creation. In the Northwest Territories Polar Bear Pass has been the national wildlife area since 1986. It has also been recognized as a wetlands of international importance under the Ramsar convention and a significant biological site under the international biosphere program. This Arctic oasis supports some of the largest concentration of birds and mammals in the far north.

In the eastern Arctic huge numbers of sea birds nest at Coburg Island or at Nirjutiqavvik and it provides feeding habitat for the beluga, the narwhal, the walrus, the polar bear and three species of seals. A national wildlife area will be created there in 1994 under the terms of the Nunavut final agreement. The area will protect 3,450 hectares of land area and 14,350 hectares of water area for a total of 17,800 hectares.

The Inuit of the community of Grise Fiord will have a direct say in the management of the land use decisions affecting this area.

Far to the south of the island at the mouth of British Columbia's Fraser River, Alasken national wildlife area has been in existence since 1976. This is an important staging area for migratory birds, including the lesser snow geese from Wrangel Island in the Russian Arctic.

This is only a small selection from the list of Canada's national wildlife areas but it shows the variety and richness of these sites. It also shows the flexibility of a concept of wildlife area under Canada's Wildlife Act.

In Ontario's Long Point, for example, virtually all human activity must be closely monitored to avoid ecological damage. In constant, buildings standing at Alasken from before the site was designated now are used as offices of the Canadian Wildlife Service's Pacific and Yukon regions.

Other wildlife areas are open for many types of recreational activities, including closely regulated hunting, fishing and trapping.

• (1705)

In other areas local native people continue to exercise their traditional wildlife harvesting rights. That flexibility is one of the keys to the success of the national wildlife areas.

In many cases the sites that we seek to designate are of great importance to particular communities and groups. Our challenge is to gain their support and co–operation, to find ways of working together for common goals, including the goal of wildlife conservation.

This is truly sustainable development at work. Perhaps the greatest value of our national wildlife areas is that they give us a model for sustainable development, one that we should apply more widely. This House has an opportunity of doing exactly that by amending the Canada Wildlife Act. I am confident that hon. members will appreciate the importance of this bill and will give it swift passage.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I listened with considerable interest to the presentation of the members opposite.

I am wondering if the member opposite is aware that the penalties under the migratory birds act are in many respects much more severe than any penalties envisioned under the Young Offenders Act. For those watching this debate on television who may still be awake, I wonder if the member would comment on that.

Mr. Culbert: Mr. Speaker, first of all I will comment on the portion of the migratory birds act that you spoke of. Quite obviously those penalties you may consider overly severe. I consider them reasonable and severe in order to protect our migratory game birds.

As you know from the—

The Deputy Speaker: I appreciate that the hon. member is new, but would he please address his remarks to the floor. We do not refer to other members as "you". We say "the member", rather than "you".

Mr. Culbert: I apologize, Mr. Speaker. Certain the comments that have come forth in the question are appreciated. We are well aware in this House in recent weeks of the concerns that have been expressed on the Young Offenders Act.

Members on both sides of the House have heard the replies with regard to those questions from the Minister of Justice. I am not going to try to second guess him. I will wait for the hon. minister to bring forth his proposals on the Young Offenders Act and how he intends to make those amendments.

As far as the migratory birds act, I am in support of it. We may have to strengthen those penalties in future years in the protection of our wildlife.

Mr. John Finlay (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise in support of Bill C–23, an amendment to the Migratory Birds Convention Act.

I note that this act was written in 1917. I do not think millions of passenger pigeons were flying between the United States and Canada across Lake Ontario in 1917 but there had been millions of them before the turn of the century.

After 75 years it is high time that we revised this act and amended it where necessary. Rachel Carson in her book Silent Spring alerted all of us to the dangers of pesticides and herbicides among bird populations. We have to keep that in mind. The situation has certainly not improved since that time and more needs to be done.

I know we are working hard on whistling swans. I would still like to see some bluebirds in the spring. There is even a dearth of warblers. Canada has a particular responsibility in this regard. Hundreds of species fly north to nest in our northern wilderness each year and fly south again in the fall to take colour and song to our southern neighbours so that we particularly must be cognizant of our role in maintaining biodiversity with respect to birds.

• (1710)

I would like to bring forward the results of an important survey made by the Canadian Wildlife Service in 1991. It surveyed 103,398 Canadians and it provides information on the socioeconomic benefits of biological resources in Canada. This was the third such survey since 1981 done by the Canadian Wildlife Service and some of the important findings are as follows.

In 1991, 18.9 million Canadians, 90.2 per cent of the population, took part in one or more wildlife related activities, devoting a total of 1.3 billion hours and $5.6 billion to these activities.

The majority of Canadians, 86.2 per cent, stated that it is important to maintain abundant wildlife and 83.3 per cent stated that it is important to protect endangered or declining wildlife populations.

On the economic side an estimated 1.8 million Americans visited Canada for fish and wildlife in 1991 and spent $842 million on these trips which provides us with a significant balance of payments in this area since that is five times the amount Canadians spend in the U.S. on such trips.

A second report is being prepared which will examine in more detail the impacts resulting from wildlife related activities on the Canadian economy in the form of income and jobs.

I quote from the Minister of the Environment: "The conclusions I draw from this survey are that Canadians remain strongly committed to the protection and conservation of abundant and diverse wildlife and that spending on wildlife related activities makes an important contribution to the Canadian economy. Those are among the reasons why the federal government is dedicated to working with the provinces, territories, environmental groups and the private sector on initiatives such as wetlands conservation and the protection of Canada's biological diversity".

Birds such as the golden plover and the Arctic tern travel thousands of kilometres twice each year from Canada's northern reaches to South America. Birds do not know anything about municipal, provincial or national boundaries. It therefore behooves us to do the best job we can in amending the Migratory Birds Convention Act to assure the world that biodiversity will continue and that our feathered friends will be here for many years to come.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take about five or ten minutes to speak on this bill.

I am in support of the bill and congratulate the minister and the parliamentary secretary for their work in this regard as well as all officials of the environment department.

I want to take this occasion to raise an issue of local concern, one that affects very much the citizens of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell with regard to wildlife, particularly migratory birds. Perhaps when I introduce this subject some members might think that it is trivial issue. I want to assure members that it is not. It is indeed a very important issue for the agricultural community of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

[Translation]

As you know, Canada geese spend the winter in the United States and come back in the spring to nest in Ungava, in northern Quebec.

• (1715)

[English]

Until some years ago the migration route of these birds was somewhere around Kingston, Ontario, and the birds would land, approximately 120,000 of them, on Wolfe Island and from there move north flying approximately in a north–northeast direction. For reasons that officials of the Wildlife Service of Environment Canada do not understand fully to this day, the birds have changed their migration route and are gradually flying farther and farther east. They now fly between Ottawa and Montreal. That is approximately the route.

[Translation]

They first stop in my riding and then in the Papineauville area. In fact, there is a Canada geese festival celebrating these beautiful birds on their way north.

They are a magnificent sight and like all my constituents I like to see them fly above. However, there is a community in my area which, for obvious reasons, finds that less enjoyable, and that is the farm community.

As I said, the birds stop in our area and their number can reach 75,000 to 80,000 at once. If the area was forested, they would do little damage. Even in a corn field they would not do much harm. But in a field of alfalfa or tender grass, very rich in protein because they grow on rich soil, they can play havoc. The losses suffered by farmers in my area are enormous.

I have here a report prepared by the Ministry of Agriculture which puts the losses at $240 per acre, and we are talking about hundreds and hundreds of acres destroyed every year. On several occasions, I asked the federal government to help these farmers. Unfortunately, I never obtained anything with the previous government.

I believe there are three solutions or three elements of solution to the problem we have in my riding. First, I think the agriculture departments of the Ontario provincial government and the federal government should implement a policy for compensating specific site owners, a program similar to the crop insurance they have in Quebec. In other words, if one specific producer loses part of his crop, he should be eligible. The Ontario plan does not allow for the analysis of such local losses. To be eligible, losses have to be regional and of course birds do not land on a complete region; they visit one site, destroy 300 or 400 acres at a time, but not the fields around that area. Therefore, that plan should be modified.

Second, there is a problem with the approach used to control birds when they decide to land on one specific field.

[English]

Until about three years ago farmers in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell were given permits by Environment Canada to shoot down one bird. The farmer would receive a permit to kill one bird. After killing the bird he would turn it upside down, pursuant to instructions given by Environment Canada, and spread out the wings. They are very huge birds. With the bird turned upside down it can be viewed from the sky by other birds and of course they would never go near that farm for the rest of the season. That was working reasonably effectively.

Three years ago Environment Canada took the position that the birds were gradually dwindling in numbers and we could no longer afford to do that.

[Translation]

That might be true, but I have a problem with that. If it is true the bird belongs to an endangered species, how come hunting those birds is permitted in the fall? If all that is true, why not prohibit fall hunting? In the past, I never succeeded in getting my point across to officials in charge of those issues.

• (1720)

It seems to me that if there must be control, it should be in the fall, when after all, it is a luxury to hunt them, not a necessity as it is in the spring when farmers should be allowed to shoot them. After all, perhaps only 25 farmers would be allowed to kill one bird each to avoid such serious losses.

Anyway, this was turned down. Instead, farmers were given, at great cost to taxpayers, guns and blank cartridges to scare them off. But, needless to say, these animals are extremely intelligent, over and above everything else, and once you shoot at them three or four times without hurting them, they are no longer afraid of your gun. So much so, Mr. Speaker, that farmers bought automatic propane guns that shoot once every half hour, or something like that.

[English]

Farmers in the area were explaining to me that for the first day the birds would leave when the shots were heard. On the second day they would leave about five minutes before the shots were heard. On the third day they would just tip their head up, listen to the shot and tip it back down again and continue eating. That is how effective that particular Environment Canada fiasco was for my electors. All of this was a tremendous expense for the taxpayers.

Finally last year I thought we had the solution where Environment Canada offered to the electors of my area to establish a series of wildlife refuge areas.

[Translation]

Three areas had been designated as bird sanctuaries, one along the South Nation River, the other one near the Ottawa River, and the third one not far from Cob Lake, in my riding. Everything was planned, but unfortunately, the government withdrew its offer to supply funds. My constituents did not appreciate that at all. It happened under the former government, of course, not ours.

Still, material losses are nonetheless great, and that is what I want to bring to the attention of the House. As I said, to hon. members who deal with issues concerning the whole country, this may seem to be just a local and rather unimportant issue, but I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that when you lose—and I have the estimate here—when you lose $240 per acre and when you lose suddenly 200 crop acres, it is not very funny.

Several constituents of mine, several farmers in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell suffered losses because of that. There are two things I hope for. First, I hope that the federal government will convince the Ontario government to amend the crop insurance program so that these farmers can be compensated.

On the other hand, I hope that a solution will be found, either proposing sanctuary measures or restoring the program allowing each farmer to eliminate one bird every season, all the more so since, as I was saying, only about twenty farmers are involved.

I am not raising this point to tell you that I am not one of those who want to keep protecting that species, quite the contrary. However, I must stress that when people realize that no one wants to hear them, it sometimes happen that they take the law in their own hands. But there is no winner under such circumstances, because people will cause damage and will no longer respect these birds. What I want to do is make sure that that species will be protected. After all, they are a Canadian symbol and, what is more, they are very unique birds. I have been briefed about Canada geese.

[English]

For those of us who are English speaking, they are known as the Canada goose, a symbol of our nation until we put the loon on the dollar. Before that I guess the Canada goose would have probably been the most famous bird we had. It still is a beautiful creature.

• (1725)

I want to raise these concerns because they affect greatly the electors of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. At this time of year I am deluged with phone calls from farmers who see their crops being lost because of the damage being done. It is the role of the government that makes these laws, laws that I support, to ensure that they are made in such a way so as to not sacrifice the agricultural community. Both can co–exist quite well if we put our minds to making sure that that co–existence does not mean that one community is sacrificed for the other.

It does not have to be that way. All we need to do is work co–operatively. I am confident that with people like the Minister of the Environment, the parliamentary secretary who is a very able person in the area, that we will succeed where we have failed before in preserving the crops of the farmers of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

[Translation]

And who knows, by establishing sanctuaries such as these, as we could, and as the department had suggested a year ago, perhaps we could increase the number of people who would go and see these beautiful creatures in their habitat. And the appreciation for these great birds would increase if we all worked together. That is, in any case, what I wish for, and I hope the department will examine that issue, which is very important for those I have the honour to represent in this House.

[English]

That being said I want to go on record supporting the initiative that is before us today and to again ask the government to think of the electors of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and the problem they have in this area of wildlife management.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois–Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate and thank our colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell for his speech. One can see how sensitive and knowledgeable he is about the subject.

I have a technical question to ask him. He mentioned a measure suggested which would allow farmers who suffer damages to kill one animal per season. I fail to see how this could possibly change or improve the situation, and I fail to see what impact this could have.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, that is an easy question to answer. When the program was in place, it had a very positive impact since birds which flew over the area and saw one of their own, dead and turned on its back to afford them a better view, would get scared. It is as simple as that.

That approach was so efficient that, according to departmental experts, birds would not go within about one kilometre of the site where they saw a dead bird.

When you study these birds, and I had the opportunity to do so since these birds are a problem in my riding, you understand how intelligent they are. In fact, they are so bright that, at the risk of repeating myself, they would only need a couple of days to tell the difference between a real rifle and one that is used only to make noise without hurting them.

However, it is interesting to observe such a phenomenon and to see that these birds will do everything possible to avoid an area where they feel threatened.

I would like to say that this problem is different every year. Apparently, it has something to do with the heat of the earth. For example, birds base the speed at which they head for the north on the degree of thawing. If the earth does not thaw fast enough, they will stay in my riding for maybe three weeks. Can you imagine the damage they can make during that time. Sometimes, like last year, they only stay for about five or six days, because the earth warms up more rapidly. Maybe the frost was not so bad, or things were warming up more rapidly, or something like that.

After a short stay in our area, they resumed their journey to the north. Needless to say that, with the very cold weather we had this winter, I suspect these birds will stay a little longer in my riding this year, unfortunately for our farmers, but fortunately for bird watchers.

• (1730)

That is probably why they will stay with us for a few more days, even though they have been in this area now for two or three weeks.

[English]

(Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a committee.)

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I think you would find consent to suspend the sitting until such time as the House is ready to deal with the adjournment debate.

The Deputy Speaker: The deputy whip may not be aware but I believe the House is ready to deal with the matters on the late show.

Mr. Boudria: I was not aware the members were already present in the House. That being said, I amend that to move that we proceed immediately to the adjournment debate and that Mr. Speaker see it as the time of adjournment.

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

INFORMATION HIGHWAY

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, on April 25 last, I put a question to the Minister of Industry asking him to explain the absence of representatives of the cultural community on the committee in charge of defining the government's strategy for the information highway.

I also conveyed to him my concern over the fact that the provinces were not involved in the process. Today I would like further clarification to be provided with respect to these two questions.

I represent the riding of Chicoutimi. The Saguenay region was the first in Quebec to welcome a multimedia centre, an investment of $80 million which will result in 250 jobs. I feel concerned by the electronic highway.

In the Throne Speech and again in the budget speech, the government announced it had the intention of putting forward a Canadian strategy for developing the information highway.

As we all know, the government has appointed an electronic highway advisory board. This board has 29 members, including one from my riding in the person of Mr. Charles Sirois, and I am very pleased with that.

Among these 29 members are representatives from the cable broadcasting, broadcasting and telecommunications industries, but none from the cultural industry. But there are living strengths, creative forces and expertise only waiting for an invitation to share their vision.

The cultural community is structured. It has its own structures and experienced representatives. Why are they excluded from this process? In the name of what? The artisans of the cultural industry cannot be ignored when dealing with this issue.

Besides the establishment of an infrastructure per se, there is the content of the information travelling on this electronic highway. One of the objectives of the board is to strengthen the French and English cultural identities; yet the board has no representatives from the cultural community. There is a glaring contradiction in there. How can this operation be credible when the committee does not include any representatives of the cultural community, despite the extra dimension and the extremely important expertise they could bring? This is not a whim but a matter of representation. Culture will not be affected only indirectly; it is at the heart of the electronic highway.

Although the committee includes 29 members, the Minister of Industry did not appoint any representative of the cultural community. Industry, however, is well represented. They apparently preferred to leave out players who could have made a necessary, useful contribution.

Under its mandate, the council is being asked to deal with copyright and intellectual property issues and to come up with results. Is this not an admission that workers in cultural industries make a considerable contribution? Why are these players absent from the process defined by the government, then?

The Ostry report recommended creating a ministerial committee and provincial participation as well. The government ignored that. Instead, the electronic highway will be developed behind closed doors, with only one player and in the federal arena. Excluding the provinces and the cultural community is a bad start in designing the electronic highway.

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to discuss the concerns raised by the hon. member for Chicoutimi regarding the government's strategy on the electronic highway.

The government has already stated clearly that it has three main objectives in that regard: to promote job creation; to give every Canadian access to that highway; and to reinforce Canadian sovereignty and cultural identity.

[English]

I wish to assure the hon. member that the government was and continues to be very aware of the information highway's cultural dimension.

The advisory council will contribute to the dialogue on this subject. I believe we should all be appreciative that so many prominent men and women have accepted to donate their time and effort in this vital cause. By its very mandate the council will reach out to Canadians. In so doing it will help to identify key policy issues as well as to involve a wide range of stakeholders.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Chicoutimi said that the cultural community was not represented on the advisory council.

In selecting the advisory council members, the government tried to appoint the most qualified people, those who can best put their knowledge and experience to the service of all Canadians.

In that perspective, I believe that the government should be congratulated for appointing such remarkable Canadians to the advisory council on the electronic highway.

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5) the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted.

The House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, a number of order in council appointments made by the government.

Pursuant to Standing Order 110(1), these are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-245, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act and the Auditor General Act (review of budget speech).

He said: Madam Speaker, I am most pleased to rise and table this document with the House. It amends the Financial Administration Act and the Auditor General Act. Its intent is to review the revenue estimates provided to the people of this country and my colleagues through the budget process. In years gone by revenues have been largely inflated and we feel a more accurate assessment of whether they should be is necessary. This bill will take care of that.

PETITIONS

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

Mr. Pat O'Brien (London—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition today signed by some 250 residents of southwestern Ontario, including my riding of London—Middlesex.

These petitioners call on the government to amend the National Energy Board Act in order to provide intervener funding in the matter of interprovincial pipelines. With these petitions I would note that the total number of petitioners in southwestern Ontario is now at 1,000 calling on the government to take this action.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege to present a petition signed by 50 of my constituents with respect to section 241 of the Criminal Code of Canada, which has to do with euthanasia.

In part the petition reads: "The Supreme Court of Canada recently upheld section 241 of the Criminal Code of Canada in the Rodriguez decision recognizing that section 241 was enacted to protect all individuals, including the disabled, the terminally ill, the depressed, the chronically ill, the elderly. If section 241 were to be struck down or amended such protection would no longer exist and our most vulnerable members of society would feel an implied pressure to end their lives".

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY—TAX REFORM

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre) moved:

That this House implore the government to initiate immediate consultations with Canadian taxpayers and provincial governments on the creation of a fair and integrated reform of the entire tax system which incorporates the principles of equity, efficiency and effectiveness, thereby reducing the tax burden on Canadians.

He said: Madam Speaker, on behalf of the whip of the Reform Party I would like to advise the House that pursuant to Standing Order 43(2) our speakers on this motion will be dividing their time today.

Someone once said that you cannot get there from here. Nowhere is this saying more applicable than to the Canadian government's reliance on a confusing, complicated and convoluted system of tax and revenue collection. I rise on this opposition day as the first of many Reform speakers to call on the government for a complete overhaul of Canada's taxation system.

The Chair read the motion so I will not do the same.

Every year Canadians spend countless millions of dollars on accountants and lawyers to have their income tax prepared. The 2,091 page Income Tax Act is an unmitigated mess of rules and regulations and is screaming for reform, as are millions of Canadians.

This red book, which is not to be confused with the Liberal red ink book, has in the rules and regulations and various forms that make it so confusing that all the people who tried to do their own tax returns this year had a hard time coming up with the right answers, myself included.

The Liberal government with its red ink book promised to find ways to achieve tax fairness, simplicity and harmonization, implying some sort of reform to our tax system itself. Are Canadians truly getting the changes that they demanded and were promised? The answer is no.

After six months all we hear in answer to our questions is "jobs, jobs, jobs". All the Liberal government has done is pass old Tory bills, introduce no new bills of their own and we have not been able to question the government whatsoever on the direction that it wants to take this country.

What has happened is that the Liberals have dangled reform in front of the noses of Canadian taxpayers but they have not delivered.

In question period yesterday—I hear an hon. member talking who was not here, so he might listen to this—the Prime Minister stated that the only way to reduce taxes is to get Canadians back to work. This is a noble gesture, but has the Prime Minister not considered that it is the high tax burden that Canadians face which is stifling our economy and economic growth?

The fact is that revenue collected from personal income tax has more than doubled since the 1984-85 fiscal year. Tax collected from corporations has remained stagnant at approximately $10 billion because profits have been sluggish due to our recession.

Canada's overall tax burden has become the second highest of the G-7 countries in recent years and the taxpayers, as we all know, have moved to the underground economy that is valued anywhere from a low of $20 billion to a high of $120 billion.

The government has failed to address the problem. In its last budget it increased spending by $3.3 billion instead of holding the line or reducing the spending. This makes the private sector less productive which leads to greater unemployment. Will governments acknowledge that they are in fact part of the problem and not the solution?

The current high taxation rates serve as a temptation for government to keep spending at its current levels which will not solve our problems of high debt and high unemployment expeditiously. We must learn to live within our means like all Canadians and cannot look to the Canadian taxpayer before accomplishing this goal.

It is our belief that to stimulate the economy and to increase revenues for government, lenders, investors and consumers must possess a larger pool of disposable income. In this light, the Liberals should start by throwing this Income Tax Act out the window and replacing it with a completely new, entire tax system.

Why not reform the tax system? I would submit to the finance minister that less is more. Lower taxes will mean more revenue to the government. In this vein I would recommend the implementation of a flat tax on individual and corporate income. This model may work. We would suggest to start with a premise that would require input and consultation with Canadians, the provinces and individuals in the House, that the first $12,000 be tax free. One per cent of charitable donations would be deductible, but RRSPs would be limited to $5,000 to $6,000 for deductions so that the wealthy would not get the higher amount of deductions. There would be a spousal deduction and a child care deduction, and that would be it. We would draw a line, multiply it by 15 per cent or 20 per cent and send in our tax return.

• (1015)

Corporations would pay the same rate. The difference with corporations would be that their dividends would be deductible. We would not be taxing that and giving it out as after tax dollars. Dividends to individuals who invest would be deductible and taxable in the hands of the recipients. All investments in the future, all loopholes, exemptions and deductions defined here with rules, exceptions and counterexceptions would be gone. We would be investing as individuals with after tax dollars, and the corporations would be paying us based on their profits.

The objective of this tax would be threefold. It would simplify the current complicated tax forms so that all Canadians could understand them. It would restore equity in the tax system, eliminating the perception that one group of taxpayers is favoured over another and people with the same level of income would pay relatively the same amount of tax. The inequity right now is that there are people making $100,000 a year and one person pays $40,000 in taxes and the other person pays $20,000 because they might have better advice or they might have better borrowing power. That is not fair. Third, this tax would eliminate the triple hits that Canadians are taking in their pocketbooks with PSTs, GSTs and income taxes.

Under this system there would be no loopholes for anyone and we would be rid of the expensive bureaucracies now required to co-ordinate tax collection.

In National Revenue and Taxation, Customs and Excise, there are 44,000 employees at a cost of $2.2 billion. Savings to the Department of National Revenue in tax collection and the monitoring of all personal and corporate tax exemptions would be in the billions, not just the $36 million the government has proposed to save by the wonderful amalgamation of two deputy ministers, one of taxation revenue and the other of customs and excise. We need more savings than just $36 million out of a $2.2 billion budget. That is ludicrous and the government should be embarrassed.

Introducing a simple, fair and integrated system of taxation would lower these costs substantially while checking the powers of the bureaucracy. If the bureaucracy in Canada is left unchecked it will continue to increase costs and taxes, continuing the country on its present downward spiral. Canadians will never have an opportunity to pay less taxes in a current year than they did the year before.

An example of the high cost of the bureaucratic action was brought to my attention by a CA firm in Calgary, Bogle, Duska, Robinson and Perry. Mr. George Duska did an analysis in a six-month period. The number of forms and taxation slips whether or not they were required that changed for him to do his job on a file, to make copies and do the necessary changes, was about an inch and a half thick over a period of a month and a half.

Witnessing the cost in changes in tax forms that had taken place over the past 10 years, Mr. Duska did an analysis of the revised tax forms over the six months to see if these changes were truly necessary. In his opinion 16 per cent of the revisions were required by the tax system, while 84 per cent "were useless and a waste of taxpayers' money". This indicates that as usual bureaucracy is out of control.

I challenge the government and cabinet to give existing standing committees more authority to look at the expenditures and the budget estimates. They should let them come back to cabinet and recommend cuts, prioritize them and cut off the bottom two, to start the government toward a balanced budget. It is a small area relative to government expenditures, but it illustrates the fact that our present system is becoming a bureaucratic nightmare.

I would like to conclude by educating the Liberal government, which might be nearly impossible, on the reality of the private sector, not the perceived reality of the Liberal government. Government overspending results in the raising of tax dollars. Higher taxation means less capital available in the marketplace which leads to a drop in demand. When demand drops, consumption drops, businesses close their doors and the cycle continues.

This vicious circle is the main reason why over one million Canadians are unemployed. It takes money to create wealth. The government takes too much of it and then wonders why unemployment goes up. Business people in the House know this but politicians in the House do not understand this. They do not understand the difference between the spending of debt capital, borrowed money and equity capital, especially when the government has not paid back $1 of the money it has borrowed since 1968, the first years of Trudeau.

Is that not embarrassing? Who in the House borrows money from the bank and has never had to repay $1 of it over 23 years? I would venture to guess nobody. Why is the government being treated differently or why is it treating itself differently? The private sector understands the difference. It is time that politicians did as well.

It should not be beyond our means to create a more equitable system of taxation, one that inspires prosperity for Canadians and economic growth for the country. Let us work toward the restoration of public trust in taxation and create a tax system that reflects the principles of equity, efficiency and effectiveness, thereby reducing the tax burden on Canadians.

We must listen to the comments of all members in the House today and see if we come up with some solutions. The real problem is a balanced budget. It is important. No tax system in the world is good if it does not address the real problem. If we continue to spend $160 billion and do not raise $160 billion, we are contributing to the problem, not solving it.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry): Madam Speaker, I begin by congratulating the Reform Party for initiating the debate on comprehensive tax reform. I also humbly correct the member because he made a statement that the government had failed to address this problem.

I would like to clear the record because we have started the process of addressing this problem. We started it in the finance committee. Just yesterday the Prime Minister reiterated our election commitment that the GST was going to be killed. I think that is what he said. It is important for Canadians to know this. They cannot think, because we campaigned for three years for tax reform, that we came here and did not begin the process. We have not solved it yet but we have started.

I remind the member that I had the privilege of appearing before the committee last week on the single tax which many of us on this side of the House have been working on for the past few years. It is a very difficult and complex issue. The member announced that.

I have a question for the member. When a single tax is designed, or a proportional tax, one basic principle is flushing out all corporate loopholes, all tax preferences. Some would call them grants. Will the Reform Party be consistent on that and agree, as those of us who support single tax agree, that when we flush out all those preferences we will flush out all preferences that pertain to the energy sector in the province of Alberta?

Mr. Silye: Madam Speaker, I would like to respond to the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood on the GST replacement and the work in the finance committee.

Although the intentions are honourable, we will really end up at the end of the day with a new tax that replaces an old tax. They will still try to collect $15 billion out of the pockets of taxpayers. They say that is a solution. We can simplify it and make it less expensive to collect but nevertheless it is still a tax. It is a band-aid approach to the problem. The real solution to the problem is an entire review of the tax system so that we do not have to worry about the GST replacement and we only have to tax the one time.

With respect to corporate profits, the whole concept is that currently the Income Tax Act and the income tax system are being used to drive social and economic policy. We have to design an income tax system solely for the collection of revenues to pay for the government programs people want. The responsibility of politicians is to find out what the people want and raise the money to do it.

If they come up with a program to support the oil and gas industry, to support the coal industry or to support manufacturing, fishing, forestry or whatever, then they should treat them all the same and not be selective with specific subsidies at a particular time that distorts the marketplace, that confuses the marketplace and that creates unfair competition within the industry. At that time they might be favouring a certain type of industry. Within that industry those who know how to make a profit will be making a profit and those who do not will be getting the subsidy. In a way that is rewarding failure.

The system of a flat tax, a proportional tax or a single tax—I do not care about the name—is an important concept. The principles are important. If we can get members of the House to accept certain principles and concepts, we will go a long way toward solving the problem. No company or industry, even if it is in the city of Calgary where I have worked for 23 years, would object to the fact of eliminating all complications, pretax and after tax. If we just deal with after tax dollars and we all had more disposable income, it would really purify and clean up the system.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest): Madam Speaker, I am particularly pleased to rise today to speak to the motion. It is near and dear to all our hearts, particularly at this time of the year when we have just gone to the well to pay our taxes.

The underlying consideration that must be part of a tax structure is the element of fairness. Members will know that all of us as Canadians do not mind doing our share, but we want to know with absolute certainty that we are doing our fair share and that there are no privileged persons and corporations in our society doing nothing and living off the sweat of others who contribute.

I will spend a few moments speaking to the issue of the corporate tax structure in Canada, particularly with a view to small and medium sized businesses. The question is: Does it do the job? Does our tax structure do what we want it to do or does it not?

Members will know many different types of taxes affect business in Canada. There are income tax, payroll tax, capital tax, sales tax and property taxes. Each of these affects business differently according to the firm's sector of activities and its size. The elemental question is: Is it fair and does it work? Does it do the job?

We know the tax structure is different for small and large firms. Why is it different? It is different because payroll and property taxes account for a larger part of the small business tax burden than they do for large firms. These taxes that small business bears are independent of profit. It does not matter how much profit a company makes. It has to pay payroll taxes, the municipal taxes, the taxes on water and sewer and all those sorts of things. These taxes weigh more heavily on a small business than they do on a large business.

Over the years governments have shifted the tax burden from corporate income tax to payroll and property taxes. All governments favour these forms of taxation because they provide a more stable revenue stream than income taxes which rely on profit.

The negative impact on the development of the economy, the fairness of the tax system and the structure of the tax system should be a cause for concern as we go away from corporate taxes which are a result of profit and payroll and other taxes which are not profit oriented.

For example, taxes related to profits account for a significant portion of the overall tax burden: about $36.5 billion in 1992 representing 73 per cent of the $50 billion of direct corporate taxes paid in 1992. Therefore 73 per cent of the corporate taxes paid in 1992 had nothing to do with income.

At this point I wish to acknowledge the source of much of my comments today. It is "Growing Small Business", a budget document presented by the Minister of Industry. Most of what I will speak to today is in the government's budget documents. I thank the Canadian Federation of Independent Business for also providing me with some information.

• (1030)

There is also indirect taxation of business inputs that are not related to profits. These taxes are levied by federal and provincial governments and are paid by businesses when they purchase goods and services. Examples of this type of tax are the excise tax on fuel and provincial retail sales taxes. About one-third of provincial retail sales taxes is collected on business input. Input tax credits under the GST reduces this on a federal level.

The current tax scheme in Canada is a burden on existing small and medium sized business. Just as important, it is a disincentive for those who wish to start their own businesses. Therefore if the government is to realize its goal of creating more and more jobs, it makes sense that the government would also reduce the tax burden and subsequently reduce the tax disincentive for people to be entrepreneurs, to get into business and create their own jobs.

Although the government realizes that unfair taxation is a problem for business and this realization is acknowledged in the budget documents, it is reluctant to do anything to rectify the situation.

The government as a matter of fact went so far as to announce in the February budget that it is unable at this time to offer any tax assistance to small and medium sized business. Instead it has put the pressure on banks to allow easier access to loans.

I submit that the problem is not exclusively access to loans. The problem is to be able to retain cash in a small or medium sized business to employ more people, to expand the business, to get involved in other businesses. The government must realize that all the start-up capital in the world will not assist small business unless businesses are profitable and are able to retain cash in the business.

The problems facing businesses go deeper than just taxes. It is the result of a flawed philosophical approach to business. It is proven that small business creates up to 80 per cent of the jobs in Canada. Yet all governments continually put impediments in place that take away from business the ability to grow and prosper.

Government after government has used small and medium sized business as a cash cow to balance the books. The current Liberal government must become the exception to the rule if it is to realize on its promise to create jobs. Claiming to want to create jobs yet not making changes in the tax environment for small and medium sized business just will not wash.

Small and medium sized business must be allowed to retain capital for reinvestment in the business to create the jobs that are so desperately required in our economy. Capital from small businesses should not be taxed until it is taken out of the business.

I would like to spend just a few moments if I may to speak to the equity position of taxation in business, small business versus large business or multinational business.

I have a list of many businesses in Canada that have from $26 million to $111 million in pre-tax profits which in the year 1992 paid no taxes whatsoever. A member of this very House some years ago coined the phrase "corporate welfare bums". Ladies and gentlemen, that phrase was apropos then and it is apropos now.

Canadians would be absolutely horrified to know of the tentacles large business has in this very House in Ottawa which is nothing but a siphon for business to get money from the government to promote whatever business has the tentacles and the ability to get into the House. I submit that individual Canadian taxpayers earning $7, $8, $10 an hour should not be subsidizing any corporations. If a business does not have the ability to compete on its own, it should not be in business.

As this debate unfolds and as we move along we have to understand that the basic element of fairness has to be part of our tax system. As the day progresses we will be speaking to the notion of a single tax or a flat tax. The premise behind this is so that everyone understands that the system is fair, that nobody gets away with anything, that we all contribute equally according to our means.

• (1035)

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham): Madam Speaker, I would like to comment on some of the provisions the Reform members are making today.

One is that the system is complex and indeed it is complex. Our society over the years has become more complex and that is a fact of life.

One of my observations on the income tax system has been not so much that it is complex, but I think some of the things that the members have been drawing attention to is the fact that we keep changing it all the time. In fact 1972 was a major time of amendment and reform to the income tax system, as was the early eighties. Now members are proposing another change to the system. Every time we change the system it means we do not understand it any more. It takes us another 10 or 15 years to understand the system.

I would like to suggest to the member that possibly a more beneficial method is just to leave the system partially alone. We need to change some things where some are getting better benefits out of the system than others.

I would like the member to deal with another aspect which is the main part of my question. With the flat tax Reform Party members are proposing today, how can they justify the shift in tax burden from upper income groups to the middle class?

Essentially the mathematics are very simple. If we have to collect x number of dollars from the system we are going to have to collect it from various aspects of our tax system. Right now our tax system is progressive. By definition it has to follow that with the flat tax they are proposing today there is a reallocation of tax burden from the upper income group to the middle class. Could the hon. member explain that?

Mr. McClelland: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question and the opportunity to expand on a couple of aspects of this single tax.

I think the hon. member's point about changes is that we have not been changing the tax system; we have been tinkering with it. There is a saying in the manufacturing industry that we have lost the handle. That means when you have tinkered with something so often and so much you do not know where you started and you lose the handle.

We have lost the handle with our tax system. All the tinkering in the world is not going to change it. We have to go back to ground zero and reinvent it. We have to keep in mind the kiss principle: keep it simple stupid. It must be kept simple and direct. If a book three inches thick is needed to define the tax law and you have to be a Philadelphia lawyer to figure out how you are going to pay the taxes, then obviously people feel there are loopholes for some and not for others.

As far as equity in a single tax is concerned, who is going to get nailed? Obviously you are only going to nail the middle class. That is where the money is.

To presume the high income earners in our country are paying a fair portion now is to presume there are not such things as a capital gains exemption, that there are not all kinds of tax incentives to help people at the higher end of the income level. These are not available to people at the lower income level.

To presume that things are fair and equitable in the tax system now, I just do not concur with the hon. member's premise. I think it is not fair now and it needs to be fair. The tax system is only able to get resources from people who have them. We have to understand that.

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to lead off the debate for the government side today and to thank the member for Calgary Centre for putting such an important issue in front of the House.

There is not a member in the Chamber who does not have to deal from time to time with the question of tax reform. I was interested in the interventions first from the member on our side, the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood. He has been a great advocate of tax reform. The member for Durham just rose. He sits on the finance committee, as does the member for Niagara Falls. Since joining the House, all of them in their own way have been very active on the question of tax reform. I thank them for their contributions. I am sure all members will join me in wishing to hear more from them on questions of tax reform.

• (1040)

The motion itself at first glance has much to contribute to the debate. The first part reads:

> That this House implore the government to initiate immediate consultations with Canadian taxpayers and provincial governments on the creation of a fair and integrated reform of the entire tax system—

After looking at the first part of the motion I would like to get the House to consider where we have come from on the question of tax reform and where we might be going.

The question of taking on the whole issue at one time at one level is quite attractive. It would be very nice to find a simple solution to the question of tax reform in this country, but the reality is that tax reform has been a very difficult process.

Post-World War II Canada usually uses the Carter commission with its after the fact cliché that a dollar is a dollar as the beginning of tax reform efforts which now stretch over 30 years. Successive governments including our own back in the 1960s and 1970s have done more than their fair share to instil a better sense of fairness in the tax system.

However, the job remains a daunting one. It is one in which we need the advice not only from members of our own caucus but also members from all parties in this House to find the best way to improve Canada's tax system.

I hope each member in the House is most conscious of the tax system since the period for filing income tax returns has just ended. It is not just an abstract issue to members; it is one each of us as individuals contribute to annually, as well as daily through the consumption taxes. To remind Canadians, when members of the House of Commons and the Senate speak about tax reform, they are not just speaking about something in someone else's life, they are also speaking about something in their own lives. Therefore they are very conscious of the need to make things fairer at all times.

As the member pointed out in the lead speech, the legacy of the last 10 years has been an increased shift to individual personal tax. This has caused a great deal of concern among Canadians on the question of fairness. At the same time in the business community the question of payroll taxes and the ever increasing burden of weekly and monthly remittances to provincial, local and federal governments drive small businesses to distraction and are a constant concern of big businesses in their investment decisions in Canada.

We on this side of the House join the opposition in seeking ways to improve the tax system. We probably would differ on the ability of a government to find one solution to the entire question of tax reform. One of the great frustrations in governing is of course that every solution requires biting off a chunk of the problem and dealing with it in a practical sense. Tax reform is an ever evolving process.

I would like to share with the House the ways in which we have begun to deal with the issue of tax reform at this time. There are three benchmarks for this government.

The first one is that in our platform before the election we set out tax reform as a major initiative. Part of the commitments we made to Canadians is to make progress on questions of taxes and tax reform during our first mandate.

Also, one of the first measures taken in this House was the approval of the work being done by the House of Commons finance committee, of which I am a member. There are at least four other members of the committee in the House of Commons today participating in this debate. The committee has sought to reform the GST.

To observe the rules of the House, I will not dwell on the work of the committee. However I will make it part of the public record that in view of the witnesses who have been heard, the experts who have come in to help the committee and the wisdom of the members themselves, we are very much convinced the committee will produce a report which will be used as a tool by the Minister of Finance in his efforts to deal with the provincial governments.

The second part of the motion deals with the negotiations with the provincial government. We would agree in the motion with the reality that we cannot sell the question of tax reform on our own.

Consumption taxes are perhaps the best example. There are 11 regimes in this country of which 10 are active in consumption taxes. Some provinces have differential rates. All 11 regimes tax different commodities and different services at different rates. It is very confusing for the consumer and we have set out as our highest priority in tax reform to bring some order out of the chaos and the GST/consumption taxes in this country.

• (1045)

Again, on behalf of the Minister of Finance I thank my colleagues in the House and in committee for their work. Like them, I look forward to seeing a report some time in the next month, on schedule, which then can be taken to the provincial ministers of finance and contribute to an ongoing national debate on tax reform.

The third initiative that we have taken and that I would like to spend some time on is our February budget. Our February budget considered a number of measures to eliminate tax loopholes and inequities in the system. This is why in the budget we also announced that we would be rolling back unemployment insurance premiums of 1993 to deal with the question of the high cost of payroll taxes.

Although the changes that we made to the UI system were minor, we consider that to be an important first step to indicate to Canadian businesses that we are conscious of the cost of payroll taxes. Often forgotten in this is that the worker bears a very high cost on a weekly basis for these premiums. Any initiatives that we can take to cut back on his or her weekly premiums is appreciated.

During the prebudget consultations, Canadians told us that payroll taxes like these are a major barrier to job creation. We heard that message and we acted. These prebudget consultations are also bottom line proof that our pursuit of a better tax system is firmly rooted in a commitment to consultation with taxpayers and with other levels of government.

As I noted at the beginning of my speech, the question of tax reform will take us several years. Next fall is the second stage in the work of the finance committee. The Minister of Finance is required by orders of the House to report for the first time in our history to the finance committee with an economic statement.

The finance committee will then proceed with several weeks of hearings in a more public prebudget consultation process. I personally take this as a benchmark of changes in the attitude of the Canadian government toward taxpayers in the organization of the budget, the expenditures and on the revenue side.

I ask those Canadians who are watching this debate and those members of the House who are participating in this debate not to consider it to be a sole opportunity to contribute toward tax reform but to proceed to prepare for the finance committee in the fall and to bring forward ideas for tax reform, to bring out ways that we can make the system fairer and to put those into the public realm for debate, discuss it with members of Parliament on the committee. Write a letter. For those members who have their own projects, bring it to the attention of the committee.

One of the most interesting aspects of the GST hearings was a number of members of Parliament who came forward to present their ideas on GST reform. Around 24 or 25 members participated in this debate. I thought it was a very healthy process. Although my memory in the House is not long, I think it has been a while since members felt it efficacious to go in front of a committee in that number and present their own ideas.

The fact is that officials from finance and other departments that deal with tax issues meet with their provincial counterparts year in and year out to discuss proposals for changes and improvements. The broad policy review process that the February budget outlined includes areas where tax concerns are being studied and Canadians are being consulted.

This reality that consultations are taking place on tax improvements is just one reason why today's motion, although it is a good start, may perhaps do discredit to the tax reform process inadvertently if it is not appreciated in the reading of the motion that the complexity of the issue is respected. No one can bring to the debate a holier than thou attitude that one solution will solve all of that.

This is what I personally find disturbing inasmuch as the verbal game playing and intellectual cynicism in the motions, invocation of a triple-E solution of equity, efficiency and effectiveness goes together without creating other problems. Again, I want to assure Canadians that in developing tax policy these principles have been and will continue to be recognized as critically important by the government and the officials in finance and Revenue Canada.

• (1050)

Unfortunately, Canadians should recognize that these are not principles that always work well together. In fact sometimes just the opposite is the result. It is just this conflict that the opposition has chosen to ignore in its original motion.

A bit of common sense history and philosophy will make it clear why this motion could contribute more to solving the challenges of tax reform. As Canada's income tax law gradually evolved over the past 74 years it has been shaped by several key forces which I would like to review for the House.

The first is the use of the tax system to do more than just generate government revenues. It has also been a tool to carry out economic and social policies from child care assistance to research tax credits that play an important part in our national well-being. But each of these measures has needed specific and often intricate legislation on definitions, rules and procedures.

A second force in shaping our modern tax system is the increasingly sophisticated tax planning evolved by individuals and corporations seeking to reduce their tax liability. This perfectly legal and entirely understandable activity has a clear corollary. We have had to put in place correspondingly sophisticated tax law in order to preserve the government's tax base.

A third force is the evolution of the economy itself into one that has become more sophisticated and complex with every passing year and one more deeply tied to global currents and competition. Here again there is an unfortunate corollary. The fact is that it is becoming often impossible for a tax system to be truly simple, truly fair and truly effective given the extraordinary variety and complexity of commercial and other situations it must accommodate.

Let me give just one high tech example of what I am talking about. We would all agree in the House that the high tech industry is the cutting edge of the new economy and that research in these areas is something that the tax system should encourage. That is something virtually all the participants in our prebudget consultations agreed on. But what about the situation where a company, say Ottawa's Bell Northern Research, used equipment to make experimental microchips and yet uses the same equipment to produce proven commercial chips? Is this research equipment or manufacturing equipment? How do we determine the equipment's tax status? Especially, how do we determine its tax status without developing fairly detailed rules?

If we eliminate any tax benefits for research facilities all we are doing is inviting Canadian researchers and manufacturers to move to jurisdictions where those benefits are available. Those are the sorts of real world situations and issues that tax policy makers must not ignore and they must not be ignored in the consideration of a resolution such as the one we have in front of us.

A key element of a fair and equitable tax system is that it provides both taxpayer and government with all possible certainty. If you do not know what your obligations and entitlements are, you can never be sure you are not at a disadvantage. Only explicit law can be certain. To be explicit a law must be somewhat complex. It must cover all known eventualities and then be updated as new conditions warrant.

I suspect that many critics of the government might try and argue the fact that many tax measures require interpretation. There is evidence that current laws fail this goal of certainty. What they do not realize is that radical simplification which must use sweeping generalities would actually make the act more ambiguous and ultimately increase the amount of interpretation necessary.

I wish that reality was not so demanding on all of us. But wishful thinking and rose coloured spectacles are poor guides for policy and do Canadian citizens no favours. This is exactly the case when it comes to one form of tax simplification that some hon. members in this House have been known to espouse, what I call the seductive flat tax proposal. How much simpler, how much fairer it would be if there was just one rate of tax to be calculated on all income. Simpler perhaps, but perhaps not. Fairer? Well, that depends on your definition of fairness.

I suspect that many Canadians would not find a flat tax system less equitable and fairer than the current progressive system. After all, to be revenue neutral individuals in top income brackets would enjoy lower taxes while tax increases would be necessary for lower and middle income filers.

The fact is that high income Canadians pay a considerably larger share of the total tax bill than their size as a group in the population. The lowest income groups pay a relatively small share of the tax take. Is this equitable? Not in the sense of mathematical equality. Is it fair? I suggest that most Canadians agree that those facing economic hardship who must devote the bulk of their incomes to basic necessities do not deserve to have their tax burden increased. This government is committed to avoiding tax increases among low income families.

I hold that justice without compassion is more tyranny than equity. By the same token, a tax system that places narrow numerical simplicity ahead of social conscience will be a betrayal of the values of mutual support and sharing that are a cherished part of our national Canadian fabric.

It is also worth pointing out that the complexity in our tax system is not so much the result of having more than one tax rate. Let me again remind the House that complexity stems from a wide variety of complex situations that arise in the real world. The current tax system takes into account the reality of differing individual and family circumstances.

For example, special measures such as the child care expense deduction provide relief to families which incur these expenses. Other measures such as the charitable donations credit encourage contributions to the voluntary sector. Under the 1994 budget we in fact made it easier for Canadians to contribute to voluntary associations.

Under the flat tax system such measures should not exist. If they are maintained then we are right back to the exemptions and credits in calculations that many of us wrestle with each year. The only difference would be in using one tax rate instead of the current three, hardly a dramatic improvement.

That leads me directly to another problem I have with today's motion. That is perhaps the intimation that is implied, that there is some silver bullet or some simple one-step solution to these problems. However, there is no national consensus as to exactly what that one simple solution might be.

At the start of my remarks I mentioned the series of cross country prebudget consultations that the Minister of Finance and myself engaged in. It might interest the member to know that while some participants wanted fewer rates and brackets, others took the opposite stance and urged us to increase the range of brackets and make the rates even more progressive. There was also real wisdom in the comments made by one Toronto participant who observed that one taxpayer's loophole was clearly another's entitlement.

Madam Speaker, I hope I have not, if you will, taxed the patience of the House too much by highlighting the real world conditions and obstacles that make a simple, fair and effective tax system such a challenge. It is a challenge that this government will continue to accept. I know that my colleagues here will have much to say on the action that we have taken and the activities underway to meet this goal.

The challenges that must be overcome cannot be overcome by pretending there are magic cure-alls. Progress is not made by glibly lumping together principles that undercut each other. Success will not be achieved by pretending that panic and haste can achieve more than patience and steady sensible progress.

In my speech I highlighted some of the problems that we have in developing proper tax regimes for corporations working in a very competitive international environment, with very difficult trade and tariff regimes. In the last few days I have had an opportunity to deal with people in the garment manufacturing industry, for example, whose whole world is being turned upside down by changing tax regimes and tariff regimes. We are all aware of just how difficult individual Canadian families are finding the tax system and how it leads members in this House to be impatient for a new system. I quote a famous American jurist, Oliver Wendell Holmes, who said: "Taxes are what we pay for a civilized society".

That I guess is the message that I would like to leave with this House, that as we deal with taxes we also deal with the legitimacy of this country in the way that taxes provide us with the resources to do things together. Trying to change the tax system and to make it fairer also implies that we remember the usefulness of these taxes for everyone. I thank you for this opportunity to contribute.

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Madam Speaker, the motion before the House today asks for more consultations, and today we may hear quite a few statements full of good resolutions in this respect.

I think we heard this in what was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who is also a member of the finance committee and who said he wants more equity in the tax treatment of individuals and more equity among the provinces.

I would like to give two examples: one concerning individuals and one which concerns the provinces. Although the hon. member must be familiar with these examples, he did not mention them at all in his speech. However, it is now time to act.

As far as individuals are concerned, during the election campaign it was made clear that family trusts were a tax benefit that was unacceptable to most Canadians. However, there was nothing about this in the last budget. Maybe next fall the finance committee will consider the issue. We are still waiting for information from the Minister of Finance, and they tell us they will have the information but we are still waiting. If the committee starts considering the issue of family trusts next fall, this means there will be nothing in the next budget.

We must not forget that this measure was introduced by a Liberal government and extended by the Conservative government at the end of its mandate, and now they are trying to play for time instead of dealing with this obvious injustice.

As far as provinces are concerned, the last example which contradicts what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre just told us, refers to how the federal government treats Quebec tax credits for research and development. Quebec has introduced a tax system that benefits research and development, researchers and universities.

The system is simple: companies are allowed a tax credit of 20 per cent on research expenditures if they do the research alone and 40 per cent if they do the research in co-operation with a university. This is a very successful program. However, the federal government decided that the tax credit allowed by Quebec was to be considered as a subsidy, which was contrary to common practice. And it still is.

This means that the federal government imposes a 39 per cent tax on tax credits allowed companies and universities by the Government of Quebec. But not a word about this, although for years, the Quebec Minister of Finance has been asking for a review of this unacceptable tax treatment by the federal government.

Has anybody heard of any changes in this respect? Not at all, Madam Speaker. So if they want to be fair to the people and fair to the provinces, I wish the hon. member, who is a member of the finance committee, would respond to these two specific issues. It is time to act.

Mr. Walker: Madam Speaker, I will talk first about the family trusts issue. The government announced in the budget that this issue would be referrred to the finance committee but, at the present time, the committee is very busy with the GST issue, the budget issue, Bill C-17 and other bills. I think that, in the fall, the committee will start examining the family trusts issue. But at this time, it is too busy with the other bills.

The second issue is very important for all the nation, because research matters and tax matters in the research field are very difficult to settle. Within the government, the Departments of Industry and Finance are currently examining our research policy directions. I hope to see changes before the next budget and also, I say to the hon. member that it is possible that changes will be made to the family trusts issue if the finance committee thinks that might be a major problem for the next budgets.

[English]

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to make a comment and ask a question of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

I am disappointed to hear that he is against the exploration of an integrated flat tax system or single tax. I am also challenged to see here that he says it is seductive. It is unfortunate that when suggestions are made that seem to have a lot of encouraging inducements to looking at them they are labelled as too simple.

Why do people in politics feel that the problems are so complex and that tax reform is a difficult process? I believe the parliamentary secretary has already listened to the Department of Finance too long. That is an incorrect and false premise. He should think for himself. He should look at the problems and try to use some common sense and he will see that this is where that will lead him. Not that I am that intelligent but that is where my nose led me and Lord knows it is long enough.

The other comment I have is that we in the Standing Committee on Finance are looking at a replacement for the GST, but that is a band-aid approach to the real problem. Why not cure the entire illness with a surgical overhaul of the entire tax system?

We have a year and a half to do it; a year and a half to just come up with a band-aid and the illness will have grown worse, and then our problem will become even greater.

The hon. member also took credit for the wonderful consultative process that this great Liberal government has now introduced to the principles of democracy. Taking credit for consultations is nothing new. If that is all the credit it wants to take, it can have all of it.

What would be new is after we consult with provinces and individuals the government actually listens and implements their suggestions. I hope this is something that will happen.

He also criticizes flat tax. This is where I am leading to my question. He states that as the current system is progressive, it would eliminate progressivity. It would introduce regressivity because it is a flat tax and we are taxing the poor.

Lower income earners would be tax exempt. Upper income earners would lose their tax loopholes. They would not get these wonderful deductions that they are getting now and they would pay tax on every dollar earned. For instance, higher income people can lower their tax rates from a 50 per cent rate down to a 30 per cent rate and this I know from personal experience. That would be eliminated and they would be paying tax on everything.

Therefore, collectively from individuals and more significantly in terms of corporations this is where we get more tax out of corporations. After my comments here and specifically to his questions, would the parliamentary secretary apply some common sense and would he be willing to request the Department of Finance and the department of revenue and taxation to crunch some numbers to illustrate or highlight the difficulties to this House of a system like this with no exemptions?

Why not put the Departments of Finance and National Revenue to work instead of listening to them saying that it is too complex and it will not work? Put them to work and make them prove to this House that a system like this does not deserve more consideration.

Mr. Walker: Madam Speaker, the member for Calgary Centre has put me on the horns of a dilemma: do I think for myself or do I listen to the department?

t That is not necessarily two different issues, but I like to think that I can still keep my own counsel when I listen to other professionals giving me advice.

The last point is a very serious point. In this case I am not speaking for the department. I have some doubts about the flat tax. It does not mean that I think there should not be an open discussion. I have listened to my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood bring this up several times. I really do hope the finance committee takes a look at these ideas in the fall as part of the deliberations for the upcoming budget.

If it will help the committee to have a presentation on some of the data and some of the intricacies, either publicly or with the hon. member individually, I would be more than happy to take that request to the department and we can arrange something. I do not think the resources of the government should be, if you will, cornered by the government and I do not have any intention of doing that.

If I appear to be critical of a different way of approaching taxation, it does not mean that I am not willing to open up the doors and make sure that is fully explored in the coming months. The member has given this a lot of thought. We have our disagreements but that does not mean that it should not be looked at properly and thoroughly.

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue): Madam Speaker, I am extremely happy to participate in today's debate on a subject very close to my heart. When I decided to run for political office, I had two major goals in mind: the first, of course, was to bring about full sovereignty for Quebec, and the second was to create a fairer, more equitable tax system, since it accounts for a large part of the social contract between individuals and the government and is presently the cause of much of the dissatisfaction people feel for their elected representatives.

Today's debate is also, in my view, very timely. Yesterday was the deadline for filing income tax returns. Many people likely spent the weekend working feverishly at the last minute to properly complete their tax returns. Just yesterday, I was completing a tax return for a friend. I enjoy this task, but I know that many people find the process quite difficult and quite complex. There must not be many people who are totally familiar with the ins and outs of the Income Tax Act, given its complexity. Year after year, new amendments are made. The end result is an extremely complex piece of legislation.

The same could be said of the Goods and Services Tax to which some Liberal members made reference a while ago. This tax is also extremely difficult to understand and fraught with complexities and regulations. The GST legislation is almost as voluminous as the Income Tax Act.

In moving his motion, the hon. member for Calgary Centre touched on one alternative that he would like to discuss. While I do not necessarily agree with the aims or technical aspects of his proposal for a single tax rate, I do think that all options deserve to be weighed. This is a serious proposal, one that should be given due consideration.

Having said this, I do have some reservations, although I am not an expert on this single tax. First, I am not convinced that this would really be a more progressive, more equitable tax. Of course, a single tax rate that would apply to all incomes may seem rather simple, but would it really result in a system that was fairer and less regressive than the current one? I somehow doubt it, because there are many ways to avoid declaring income. This option would have to be carefully considered.

On the other hand, it does not leave us any leeway in using taxation as a social and economic development tool. I know this is one of the arguments of those in favour: taxation must not be a social and economic development tool; alternatives must be found.

Personally, I think it can be a very useful tool. Let me give you an example. In 1987, in my region, the economy was going full steam. We came very close to full employment, with 6 per cent employment rate, and we were doing very well. One of the main reasons for this success was mining exploration, an activity strongly encouraged by way of deductions for flow-through shares.

Toward the end of that expansion period, the governments attacked this deduction, and you should have seen the tremendous impact this had on our region. Today, research does not even ensure availability of sufficient reserves any more. Trouble lies ahead ten years down the road, maybe less, because we are not discovering enough mineral reserves. Problems are already starting to show up in our region, and that is a serious situation.

But we used to have a tax incentive, a tool that allowed and encouraged people to make investments. You know how risky it is to invest in a mining exploration company. The taxpayer would put money into shares, but in recognition of the risk factor, the government shared the risk via tax incentives.

Interestingly enough, this is not a direct subsidy by which the government gives money to people and tells them: "Go and do research". Instead, the government is supporting investments made by individuals in the private sector. So, the risk is shared. I think this is the sort of interesting tools afforded by the tax system. Let us not be mistaken in thinking that only high-income taxpayers took advantage of this; many middle-income people in our region were attracted by all the spin-off benefits their investments could have. The nice thing was that when you picked a company that struck an interesting deposit, then, it was almost like winning the lottery.

How can we encourage these businesses? I would like those who support this kind of tax to explain how they will promote economic development, especially in higher-risk areas. The government has a duty to intervene when investments may be insufficient due to various factors. That is what I wanted to say regarding this tax.

Now, if we look at the current tax system as a whole, I think that, to resolve any problem, we must follow a certain procedure. First, we must analyze the situation carefully; make a diagnosis; identify alternatives and make a choice. But there is also a subsequent step that the government often forgets: following-up on the choices that were made. The Auditor General often talks about it. Many government programs are not assessed properly after their implementation. The same goes for tax measures. That is why we think it would be interesting to look at overall expenditures—not only budget but also tax spending—to examine, assess and follow up on them and to study their impact in the last few years.

Of course, the Liberals were full of good intentions when they were in opposition. It led them to write the red book that I will not quote because I sent it to recycling when I realized it was only wishful thinking. Very little is put forward in this House. I would like the Liberal government to be a little more serious. They cannot always fall back on the argument that their four-year mandate gives them enough time to act. There are always things that need to be done. We cannot wait for four years. They can rest easy, they will not run out of things to do. And we can start right away.

Earlier, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance talked about the committee's heavy workload due to the GST and Bill C-17. However, when the GST report is tabled on June 1, the committee will then be free to deal with family trusts in June. Parliamentarians will be available in June as Parliament will still be sitting. Yes, there will be other minor bills but given how long we worked on the Goods and Services Tax, we could examine family trusts.

However, the government should give out information and put figures on the table. But they prefer to wait until the fall to gain time, to stall for another year; other issues will be raised and they will find other reasons to prevaricate. Playing for time is the best way to avoid dealing with a problem. And that is what they are doing. And they ease their conscience by saying that it is in the latest budget and that they will start to do something. Hold on there—we shall see; I have my doubts.

In the past, some people dealt with taxation. There were important commissions, the Carter commission, the Rowell-Sirois commission; at that time principles were expressed that are still current today. We should deal with them instead of starting all over. The public feels frustrated and their frustration is rather justified. Often, committees and commissions of inquiry are set up to analyze problems. They identify the problems very well and produce very fine three- or four-volume reports; a huge number are printed and copies are available everywhere, but often these recommendations remain on the shelf. Although the problem must be restated for today's conditions, these reports often contain some very worthwhile things.

As I said in my introduction, the tax system is an important part of the social contract; it is how revenue is collected from taxpayers to pay for the government's expenses. Individuals now have a terrible feeling of unfairness which puts a very strong pressure on them to somehow right the balance. What do they do? They encourage the underground economy because they feel that it is the right thing to do for themselves. And you must understand where they are coming from, given some data from the 1980s.

For example, look at the wealthiest 1 per cent of the population. I have some reservations about the figures that I will give, but I heard them from the member for Gatineau—La Lièvre. Even if they are not totally accurate, they certainly are indicative of the trend.

• (1120)

In 1980, the highest percentile, the richest 1 per cent, owned 16 per cent of Canada's total wealth. Ten years later, with the recession in the early 1980s and the economic slowdown in the late 1980s, this top percentile held 26 per cent of the wealth, an increase of 10 per cent in the 1980s.

It is not surprising to hear middle-class people say that they feel they were strangled in the last decade, that they felt a lot of pressure. People live with it every day and resent it and that is what spurs on our underground economy.

Let me give some other figures, Madam Speaker. Let us look at government revenue, starting with 1981, so that we can better see what happened. In 1981, federal and provincial governments together collected $34 billion in personal income taxes. In 1991, that amount had reached $100 billion.

Let us now take a look at corporate income taxes. In 1981, $11.7 billion were collected in such taxes, compared to $18.3 billion in 1991. Obviously, the progression is far from being the same, which explains why a small percentage of Canadians were able to get richer. If you look at the breakdown for each province and the federal government, you can see that the pattern is the same everywhere.

I want to say a word on personal income tax, because last Friday we learned something which nearly went unnoticed and which is almost outrageous. Revenue Canada employees complain about political interference when auditing corporations. Last Friday, I raised this issue in the House. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Revenue said that there was no concrete evidence justifying an inquiry. I am sorry, but 300 persons filled out a questionnaire.

As you know, when a survey is conducted by sending out a questionnaire, there is always a space for comments at the end. People usually do not fill out that part. They just quickly answer the multiple-choice questions. However, in that case, 300 people out of 4,000 filled out that part of the questionnaire. Three hundred people bothered to make comments. More than that in fact, but 300 complained about political interference when auditing some company files. This is really serious.

Of course, you may think this was the case only under the previous Conservative government. But how do you know it is not also occurring under the government opposite? After all, once the Liberals and the Conservatives find themselves on the other side of the House, their policies are pretty similar. In fact, they are quite similar, and that is a real concern.

We also referred to the GST. I was not going to discuss this tax, but I have to do it. I am not sure that Canadians and Quebecers fully understand the commitment made by the Liberal Party during the election campaign. The Liberals said they would eliminate the GST, but they also whispered that they would replace it with something else. That was mentioned in the following paragraph. I am not sure how people reacted. However, I can honestly tell you that residents in my riding did not believe the Liberal Party. They felt that the Liberals would somehow take the same amount of money from their pockets. Whether the Liberals were going to change the name or the structure of that tax, people were reluctant to trust them.

I will not get in to what is being done in committee. I am a member of the committee, so I know perfectly well what is happening there, but I must say I am concerned. We get the impression that the expanding underground economy is connected only with the coming into effect of the GST, but it is far more complicated than that, and just reforming the tax is not going to restore confidence, especially since the objective is quite clear. The instructions of the Minister of Finance are to find an alternative that will produce as much revenue: $15 billion. The rates may be different on certain products but on the whole, the objective is still to take another $15 billion out of taxpayers' pockets. How do you expect the consumer to perceive this as a major and effective reform? I agree that in the case of businesses, there are a lot of things that can be done to simplify the system, which would bring costs down, and consumers would benefit to some extent.

However, they are certainly not going to reduce operating costs by $15 billion. That does not make sense. The cost of administering the tax, which is very high, is around $600 million.

A number of Liberal members tend to confuse the issue when they talk about GST administration costs. Now, I do not necessarily want to defend this tax, but I would like to explain what we are talking about here. The total revenue is around $29 billion, but businesses are entitled to claim an input tax credit, which is quite common in the case of a value-added tax. If we take away the cost of input tax credits for businesses, not a tax that must be paid but a refund, and we subtract as well the tax credits for low income individuals, we have $15 billion left.

It is simple mathematics. A number of government members are saying it costs 50 per cent to run the system and to get a dollar you have to spend 50 cents, but that is just not true. It costs $600 million to run the system, and their calculations are all wrong.

It is still too much, of course. However, with this political rhetoric, they are just spreading rumours. This is irresponsible, and they should take the trouble to check their facts.

So what is the answer? I see I have only five minutes left, but I could talk all day about taxation and tax reform.

We must start with a comprehensive evaluation of all tax expenditures. Consider what they were used for and what the objectives were. Were those objectives met? The department publishes information on tax expenditures connected with individual and corporate income tax. When we read this information, we see that a number of data are not available. In the report published this year, the latest year available is 1991, and a number of data are still not available. Is it because they were not calculated or evaluated? I agree in some cases it is very difficult, but in other cases, it is definitely quite feasible.

Is it because they don't want to reveal this information? Is that what the Liberal government and the Minister of Finance mean when they talk about transparency and profess to be very staunch advocates of government transparency? I am not certain, but I hope not. I hope they plan to produce reports that are far more serious. We can give them the benefit of the doubt, since they had only recently been elected. Perhaps this reflects a tendency on the part of this government, but in any case, we will no longer accept publications such as this one.

There are two sides to a balance sheet, the revenue side and the expenditure side. Regardless of the measures taken to improve the fairness of the tax system and the way in which revenues are collected, we cannot forget that there is a serious problem on the expenditure side. Revenues are collected to cover expenditures, but these expenditures are exorbitant. Consumers, who are also voters, view a number of these expenditures as wasteful, and rightly so. The first step toward significantly reducing government spending is to eliminate this waste.

The Prime Minister has told us that it is the responsibility of committees to review spending item by item. The members on this side of the House are not afraid of this task and are ready to take a go at it. I am happy to see that Reform members are also willing to take on this task. However, when we introduced a motion calling on committees to have the responsible ministers testify, only two of the fourteen committees agreed to the motion. Two out of fourteen! Another shining example of the Liberal's brand of transparency!

There is the Minister of Finance, although this is not the biggest operating budget, and there is also the Minister of Human Resources Development who manages a fairly large budget. But does he intend to testify? It is almost scandalous.

Before concluding, I would like to mention a number of areas on which we are prepared to concentrate our efforts. Mention was made of family trusts. I know that one of my colleagues will be speaking about this issue later and that my colleague from Rosemont spoke about it earlier. There is also the matter of a minimum corporate tax. We currently have a capital tax which is a form of minimum tax. However, since it is possible to reduce the tax level to zero, this is not a real minimum tax.

The year 1987 is notorious for a figure now making the rounds in Canada. That year, a number of corporations earned $27 billion in profits without paying a penny in taxes. That is a shocking statistic. The public is hard-pressed to believe that the tax system is fair when it hears statistics like these.

• (1130)

Also scandalous are tax havens, the tax treaties signed with other countries that allow people to evade the tax system to some extent. These were repeatedly denounced by the Auditor General. We will be looking into it shortly at the Finance Committee and I hope the minister will give us clear indications on what he intends to do.

The measures announced in the budget are clearly insufficient and will not solve the problem. We have to review all tax treaties and put into place a truly operative minimum income tax system. One such system was introduced in the United States by Ronald Reagan, who is hardly the greatest socialist in the history of mankind. Why could we not do the same thing here? In terms of corporate tax, the situation is much better in Canada than in other countries.

So, there is food for serious thought here and I would like to draw this parallel with the GST before closing, Madam Speaker. When the tax on business inputs was removed, who gained from the introduction of the GST? The businesses with inputs on which the tax was removed.

Since my time has run out, Madam Speaker, I will simply tell you that we have been in favour of a tax system reform for a long time and are prepared to work at that. The government should act responsibly and, in the year to come, the days to come, it will have to put something on the table so that we can start real discussions and find real solutions to a problem perceived as very serious by consumers and voters.

[English]

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to compliment the hon. member for Témiscamingue for a very good presentation. I feel he has made some very good points, especially his suggestion—the most important of all and I implore the government to listen to it—which is to look at all the options.

On his point of progressivity, he was worried and concerned, as previous members have expressed, that a flat tax might enter into that territory and make it regressive. As an economist I would think he has read about Albert Laffer, an American economist, and the Laffer curve—not like a joke. The answer to progressivity is that currently within our system we have all these loopholes. We have different segments of taxation at the high end, different incentives, various rates and the graduated taxes. Therefore our tax rates have to be high to get the same amount of money.

Where lower in the curve, by having no tax loopholes and no exemptions, the kind that you need down here—I am not talking about personal deductions—you generate the same amount of money. As the hon. member for Témiscamingue would like to have fairness and equity, that is where the equity would come back in. It eliminates a lot of the rules, addressing his specific point on flow-through shares and how the lack of deductibility or the lack of incentive to invest would impact negatively in his riding.

An individual currently at the high end who makes these investments, who is obviously in the upper middle or upper income, is taxed at the 50 per cent rate. If their taxes were reduced to 15 per cent of income and they had 85 per cent of disposable income they could still make that investment in their ridings. The corporation, after it made its profit, could give a return on investment to that individual through dividends taxable to the individual. With the change you would have to make, the corporation would be able to deduct that dividend. The key to it all is with the corporation. The high marginal tax rate for corporations after they use up the first $200,000 of taxable income which is tax free or taxed at a lower rate is 50 per cent. You could lower that tax rate for a corporation from 50 per cent down to 15 per cent as well.

The principle of our taxation system is that if you give a deduction that somebody has to pay the tax on it is eliminated. It takes it out of the Laffer curve and brings you back down and now you are treating dollars with more respect. You are treating real dollars and governments can then focus on just generating the revenue they need to pay for the social and economic programs that they have, subsidies, whatever it may be because you do need those. You are dealing with true dollars, after tax dollars, instead of this complicated, confusing abomination.

Basically my intervention here is to make a comment on what the hon. member had questioned about this system of a single or flat tax.

[Translation]

Mr. Brien: Madam Speaker, I understand the point made by the hon. member for Calgary Centre on progressivity. Just to reassure him, when one studies economics, one cannot help but hear about such a well-known economist as Mr. Laffer.

• (1135)

We also study his curve, which looks a lot like decreasing performance curves based on the same principle. That being said, it is still possible to make the system progressive with different tax rates.

Certainly, an individual with a 50 per cent tax rate can use a number of deductions to bring his actual rate down to 30 per cent. Except that if the 20 per cent deduction is a productive investment in the economy made jointly by the private sector and the government, in my opinion, it would be even more efficient than if the government did it directly, because it would be a private initiative. I would feel reassured by such a system; it would be much better than leaving everything up to the private sector.

One philosophy is fundamentally different, namely the role of government in society. I am one of those who believe that the government has a duty to intervene. And the tax system enables it to pick its targets. In the system favoured by the hon. member for Calgary Centre, all sectors are treated equally. His rationale is this: Competition will be very healthy because every type of business in every sector will face the same competition, will not have the advantage of tax incentives, but will be served by the government. Which may sound positive.

However, as a society, when we want or would like to help certain sectors because they are going through temporary difficulties, because we want to promote them, or because we think they have potential, the tax system does not give us much room to manoeuvre. We would need direct subsidies.

I am not sure it would really be more efficient than a shared-risk formula. But I must say that the current system has become so complex, so bogged down, that even the objective of coming up with a shared-risk formula between the government and the private sector loses some of its efficiency because of that very complexity.

So I want to reassure the hon. member that I understand his point of view. But we may have different philosophies on the role of government in society. Since he quoted an economist, I can quote him another who may be recognized one day as a major success or failure; there is Mr. Keynes, who was in favour of major government intervention, and the Keynesian state. It may have been too much, but government intervention also had a multiplier effect.

So for every economist who says one thing we can find another who often says the opposite. It is somewhat unfortunate as this often gives economists a bad reputation, but economics is not an exact science, it is a human science and it is up to us to decide which theory we want to favour.

[English]

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his comments.

We are discussing tax policy today and some of that gets fairly dry after a while. I would like to focus on the aspect of what tax policy means in a country like Canada. As the member suggested, I was preparing my tax return just yesterday as well, unfortunately having waited to the last minute.

When I was preparing my return, I was focusing on the fact that everybody else in this country was doing the same thing, that people who have problems with child care expenses and so forth were the same people in Newfoundland and in British Columbia.

It is very important for a country to have a focus. It may not be a happy one that we have on filing our tax return but still it is a focus on what unites us as a nation.

I am interested in some of the comments by the member. One thing was on some of his statistics on wealth creation and concentration in Canada. I heard those very same figures just yesterday and I do not believe them either.

I wonder if the member could focus on why he would not believe in the figures and then build a whole argument based on them.

He was concerned about simplification in the system and I agree that this is one thing we have to do. I do not necessarily believe in a flat rate system but I do think we can make it a little simpler.

I note that yesterday people in the province of Quebec had to file two tax returns, not just one. I wonder if he would reflect on the fact that it is making things complicated for the people of Quebec to have to file two tax returns.

I would like to ask him a question on harmonization. I note that with the GST the province of Quebec attempted to harmonize with the GST but not very effectively. I wonder if he could focus on his commitment to harmonize the GST in Quebec.

• (1140)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I give the floor to the hon. member for Témiscamingue, who unfortunately has only one minute to speak.

Mr. Brien: Madam Speaker, I will answer within one minute. First, I did not say that I did not believe the figures on which I based my argument on the distribution of wealth. On the contrary, I believe that they are indicative of the trend. I am not sure that they are accurate, but they are indicative of the trend.

Now, as for simplification, he mentioned that in Quebec we have to complete two income tax returns and pay two taxes. He talked about harmonization. On that, I will simply answer him that it is the reason we members of the Bloc are here. The way we want to simplify is to have only one tax. We do not want to have just a federal tax return; on the contrary, we want to have just a Quebec tax return. That is the reason we are here; we want Quebec to take over and become sovereign. We want Quebec to control all these revenues and all these taxes. It is political independence and that is the essential role of the Bloc Quebecois. So in that sense I think we are very consistent.

[English]

Mr. Walker: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I do not interrupt the House too frequently but the member suggests that the department is not doing work when in fact it is. I would like to bring to the attention of the House that the studies referred to have been done, and there are several studies on tax expenditures.

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge): Madam Speaker, thank you very much for the opportunity to second the motion of my hon. colleague from Calgary Centre. The motion before us is very straightforward. It asks for a major tax review under the current circumstances that we face as Canadians.

As has been mentioned by the hon. member for Durham, all of us have just faced the rigorous task of doing and redoing our income tax for 1993 so we know the problems that are there. They are very fresh in our minds as well as in the minds of all Canadians. It is very appropriate that we have this motion before us today in which we are looking at better ways of utilizing the income tax system, better ways to apply excise tax, a better way to apply consumption taxes. The review today is very appropriate.

There is no way that all of us in the House are going to agree on the fact that there may be only one way to do it. There are a variety of ways of approaching tax review and tax revisions.

What I want to do today in my few moments is look at it under the criteria of whether taxation is fair, whether there is simplicity, efficiency and effectiveness. In his earlier remarks the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance mentioned that the government accepts those principles in evaluating the tax system. I would have to accept him and the government at their word that they have a criteria and that if there are to be revisions, the revisions or the changes in the tax policy would be based on those very basic principles.

When we look at the taxation system we have to recognize that there is no real consensus as to what the problem is. I do not believe we have a consensus in Canada nor will we have in this assembly here today as to what the solution is. I think we must look first of all at what the problem may be.

I believe that the problem stems from the overspending of governments. That is the first major problem that we must deal with. No matter how we collect the taxes, it is very frustrating when Canadians say that we as legislators and leaders waste the money that they give to us. We have to deal first with the problem of overspending. The major question before this assembly is how it should be done.

Canadians are certainly overtaxed. They believe they are no longer receiving value for their tax dollars, and Canadians are certainly correct on that premise. It is very obvious when we look at the current circumstances and the finances of this country. For every dollar that Canadians send to Ottawa, and this is on the downscale rather than the upscale, 65 cents is applied to government program spending, programs for Canadians.

Why is that happening? We have a $500 billion plus debt facing us.

• (1145)

Second, in the current budget $41 billion is being applied to interest payments which do nothing in terms of productivity or helping people in Canada with regard to health programs, social programs, transportation programs or whatever they may be. The interest payment takes away access to the positive use of a tax dollar.

In terms of the government's plan we also face another $100 billion of debt in the next two to three fiscal years being added to the current $500 billion debt. This means that of the tax dollar, the $1 that comes to Ottawa, the amount available for programs will certainly be less than 65 cents. It will most likely approach a 60-cent dollar to run our country. That is not good enough.

The point I want to make is that there cannot be effective tax reform without effective expenditure reform and dealing with the debt and the deficit of the country. This is not to say that GST and tax reform are not necessary. I only wish to point out the futility in trying to fix the tax system without reigning in the spending of governments.

Let me deal with defining a fair tax system. That will be the thrust of my remarks today. How do we put together a fair tax system? I will list six points which I feel are relevant.

The first is equity. A fair tax system implies equity. Equity implies that Canadians feel that all taxpayers are sharing equally in the tax burden. Any redesign of a tax system must distribute the burden of tax equality among Canadians.

The second is punishing success. A fair tax system does not punish success. Equity demands that Canadians be allowed to keep the rewards for working harder, for working smarter and for being successful. This component of tax reform is often overlooked. It is often an area wherein those putting together tax policy say that a person is earning a lot and let us take it away from him or her. It is not fair. By overtaxing the monetary rewards of success the incentive for Canadians to invest in a future for Canada is removed. We rob ourselves by punishing success through the taxation system in this land of ours.

The third is dealing with the less fortunate. What should a tax policy do there? A fair tax system does not punish the unfortunate in our society. A tax system that overtaxes those who cannot defend themselves is a double hit on the less fortunate in our society.

The fourth is a point that is often made. I know it has been made many times in this assembly. There is only one taxpayer. On that basis I make two points. First, we must recognize that taxation of businesses eventually falls on individuals. It does so through lower wages, higher prices, reduced dividends and an internationally uncompetitive industrial base. While I am not advocating the elimination of taxes on all businesses, we should recognize that a corporation of any size does not bear the burden of these taxes as is often assumed. These taxes are borne by one taxpayer or individual Canadians.

The second way our tax system must recognize that there is only one taxpayer is with respect to provincial and federal powers of taxation. The current overlap of consumption taxation means that Canadians face 10 different sales taxes. This increases the cost of doing business and overly complicates the tax system.

Last I want to deal with what I call economic choices. A fair tax system does not bias the economic choices of taxpayers. Through special cases and exceptions the current tax system discriminates against certain activities and promotes others. Canadians more than ever before are recognizing their activities to avoid tax. This is what we mean when we talk about a tax revolt.

The tax system should not be a mechanism for a large range of public policy initiatives. My hon. colleague from Calgary Centre covered this point earlier.

• (1150)

These public policies are often designed with all the best intentions. They often result in the reorganization of economic activity in a way in which they were not intended in the first place. When this is done, the true cost of policy is difficult to determine and the reorganization of economic activity creates negative and unintended consequences.

In the last few moments I have I want to raise the following question. How does our current system stack up? Let us look at equity first of all. Canadians do not feel that everybody is paying their share. Second, in punishing success, our current system punishes success. Third, we now have a tax system with a marginal tax rate that at many points exceeds 50 per cent, the percentage believed to have a disincentive effect to earn more. The economic effect of this damaging policy is nearly impossible to measure as it must measure what Canadians are not doing but could be doing under a better and fairer tax system. The fourth point is punishing the less fortunate. Today many people are paying taxes with incomes of $7,000. Last I would make the point with regard to complication. It is clear that a current tax system is complicated with the many forms of tax that are before Canadians. What is the solution?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry but the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham): Madam Speaker, I thank the member for his comments. I will comment on possibly two aspects.

First he talked about punishing success. I note the income tax system currently has approximately three rates: for those incomes under $25,000, $65,000 and over $65,000. Over $65,000 it hits roughly 45 per cent. Depending on what provinces do it could get up to 51 per cent.

That system has been in existence in Canada for 10 or 15 years. The rates on higher incomes have been higher in the past than they are today. I have not seen a whole outflow of people leaving the country because of this policy. Could the member comment on that aspect?

The second one is the comment about the delivery system. We are using the income tax system to deliver social policy or whatever. Could the member comment on what is a successful system to deliver social benefits? I think of child care expenses, GST rebates and so forth. It seems to me that if we want to simplify government maybe we should be focusing on the income tax system as a method of delivery. Could the member talk about that aspect?

Mr. Speaker (Lethbridge): Madam Speaker, with regard to the first point in terms of what is fair and what does not act as a deterrent to persons investing, taking risks, being successful and encouraging success, in a sense that is what creates our economy, when a tax system does that and does not act as a detriment to investment.

To stand and say that I could judge what the rates should be and whether the three rates we have in place today are fair or not would be difficult. The point I wanted to make in my presentation was that the cost of government today is too high. People, no matter where they are, whether they are in business, private individuals, in labour or whatever, are paying a rate of taxation up front in many cases of 25 per cent as wage earners. They are paying 25 per cent. They are sending it to Ottawa through their income tax forms. That is too much. We are taking away too much from people that they could use for their own personal reasons. That is a deterrent.

The only way we are going to deal with that is to bring the cost of government down. That is the whole thrust of the objectives of the Reform Party. We must bring the cost of government down so that there is more money in the hands of the people. That is the point I make there.

The next point is with regard to using the Income Tax Act or other tax policy for social purposes. I have found in my travels and in the hearings of the finance committee on the GST that every time we tried to use the tax system for social policy it created inequities. For example, when we were in Quebec City a professional group made a presentation to us and said: "We are not exempt from GST". Another professional group that appeared before the committee prior to that one had said it was exempt. Which professional organization should have had the exemption and which should not have? We could go down the line and find other social organizations. Some are exempt from GST and some are not. The tax is applied unfairly.

• (1155)

Social policy initiatives should go through the budget process. In this assembly we should determine what types of benefits we will pay to which group, make it an expenditure program as such and deal with it directly rather than indirectly through the tax system.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak on the need for simplification of the Income Tax Act.

The Income Tax Act was introduced in 1917. As we all remember it was to be a temporary tax to pay for the first world war. At that point Canadians had an obligation to defend democracy and freedom around the world. In order to do so they introduced a tax which they called the income tax. It was to help pay for the war but it was only to be a temporary situation. After the war when things were back to normal the tax would be eliminated. That was 77 years ago. The war has been over for 75 years and we still have the tax.

There are basically two things in the world we can count on: one is death and the other is taxes. The bad news is that death comes but once and taxes every year.

Back in 1986 the government at the time suggested that it would introduce tax reform because taxes were far too complex. Back in those days we had 10 different categories or 10 different brackets to reach the maximum marginal rate of income tax. The government said that it would reduce those 10 brackets to 3 brackets and that the taxes would be much simpler because it eliminated 7 different categories or brackets of increasing levels of taxation.

It did not say that it would leave the top bracket where it was and take a bit off the people at the bottom or that the middle class would get a bit of a break which the government would recoup later. It called that tax simplification or tax reform.

I have here the 22nd edition of the Income Tax Act published in August 1993, all 2,091 pages. I am an accountant. This may make sense to a layman, but as an accountant I have a hard time dealing with the complexity of the Income Tax Act. There are statements and sentences that go on for hundreds of words without a period to indicate the end of a sentence. The complexity and the meaning of the Income Tax Act test the abilities of the wisest, the most intelligent and the most expert in the country.

I sit on the public accounts committee. We were examining people from the Department of National Revenue and the Department of Finance regarding a loss to taxpayers of $1.1 billion that was pointed out by the Auditor General because the government that wrote the legislation could not understand the meaning of its own words. The resource sector disagreed with the interpretation of the words. It ended up in court. The government lost. The resource sector won. Taxpayers are out $1.1 billion because of the complexity of trying to define the true meaning of one simple clause in the Income Tax Act. All 2,091 pages of the act give some idea of the complexity.

• (1200)

Capital gains was introduced back in 1971 by the Liberal government at that time. It was deemed to be a tax on increasing wealth. However at that point in time this country was at the threshold of a decade of tremendous inflation. Capital gains in essence became a tax on inflation.

Capital gains was not a tax on increasing wealth but a tax on inflation and the government knew that. It knew people were not getting richer. If you bought a house in 1971 for $25,000 and sold it for $100,000 in 1981, the actual value of your wealth may not have gone up, but in terms of actual dollars it went up significantly. The government said: "You have to pay a large part of that in tax". It was a tax on inflation, not on wealth creation.

Along came the Tory government which said: "We would like to give our friends a break". So the Tories brought in the capital gains exemption saying it was going to be phased in over a number of years. They envisaged that the first half a million dollars of capital gains was going to be tax free. Remember that the average person on the street really does not get the opportunity to have half a million dollars in capital gains. However the intent was: "We are going to give it to the taxpayer and we are also going to segregate it into things such as the capital gains exemption for farmers". They were going to be different.

As time went on the government realized it could not afford this measure it was introducing so it capped the capital gains exemption at $100,000 but said: "Wait a minute. We are going to add some complexity to this. What about the farmer and his half a million capital gains exemption? Is he going to get both?" No, he can only get one, half a million dollars.

As one accountant explained it to me, we are going to have two buckets. There will be a big bucket for the farmers which will hold half a million dollars capital gains exemption. Inside that big bucket will be a small bucket which contains the $100,000 capital gains exemption. When the small bucket runs over then that of course is subtracted from the large bucket.

The concepts being put forward belie the comprehension of the average person on the street. When someone does not understand the tax he is paying, how do we expect him to pay it voluntarily and willingly in a democratic society? This is why we are finding that coercion and pressure are becoming more and more the order of the day. That statement has come right from the Minister of National Revenue who has said he will not tolerate people who evade taxes and so on. Yet the people on the street cannot understand the tax they are being asked to pay.

This government has to listen. When people fill in their tax returns they write the cheque saying: "I am mad at the government. I don't know why I have to pay all this amount of money. My accountant says I have to pay it but I don't understand it. I feel I pay far too much and I am being ripped off". We have a problem. This government has to explain to taxpayers how the taxes are arrived at. Having 2,091 pages of small print is not the way to go about it.

We have seen complexity added to the Income Tax Act as a kind of smoke and mirrors attitude to collect more taxes. Ten years ago the government introduced limitations on the Canada savings bond accrual.

Canada savings bonds are a Canadian institution. We have been buying them since the war to help the government fund its debt. Some people bought the compound interest bonds. They keep them for seven years, cash them in and get all the interest at once. Maybe that was their plan, with the high income they would keep them until maturity when they retired. The government said: "No, you cannot do that. You have to report the interest at least every three years".

As an accountant filling out income tax returns many times I had to tell people who had compound Canada savings bonds that they cashed in at maturity: "Wait a minute, you should have reported this three years ago". They said: "Well nobody told me". The Bank of Canada knew these people were holding compound bonds but it did not tell them they had to pay taxes.

When we finally make the adjustment we have to go back three years. The government says: "Fine, thank you very much and here is the interest owing because you are three years late in reporting". Is that the way for government to endear itself to the taxpayers?

I could go on. Time after time after time there is unneeded complexity which is useless and is there to basically generate more revenue through penalties, interest and other maintenance for the government. It feels that the taxpayer can be squeezed unceasingly.

• (1205)

My time is up. I could go on, but I think I have given some indication that reform is long overdue.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I do not have a question. I will begin on debate but I believe there is another member who might have a question.

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his comments. We seem to be talking about simplicity, making the system simple. Like him, as an accountant preparing tax returns over the years it has been my observation that the problem with the system is not that it is complex. The real problem is that we keep changing it every year. The complexity and the reason people do not understand it is that it changes year after year. The reality is we should stop fiddling with it.

Could the hon. member comment on why he wants to continually fiddle with the system and make it more complex so that people will not understand it next year either?

Mr. Williams: Madam Speaker, I understand the member's point that we should stop fiddling with it. However I say ask the taxpayer on the street how we arrive at the amount of taxes due by him and he will say he does not know. We add up the income, take a percentage, and that is what is due. That was the old way of doing income taxes.

Many of my former clients ask me why it has to be this complex when 40 years ago it was a dead simple one page form. We have added and added complexity. Today we cannot get by without our computers. Even as an accountant I have to rely on a computer to do the complex forms because I feel it is more accurate than trying to figure it out myself.

The time people have to spend even trying to get their minds around complex issues like the cumulative net investment losses. That is where a loss which may have been claimed five years ago comes back to hit you with a bill for interest because you had forgotten that you claimed for a deduction five years ago and it now affects your taxes payable this year.

There is no need for that. It used to be that your income this year was what you reported and that was it. Now we have RRSPs that have a multiyear basis, capital gains for a multiyear basis, cumulative net investment losses on a multiyear basis, and on and on and on.

There seems to be no end to the opportunities the government takes to add complexity rather than simplicity to the tax return.

Mrs. Karen Kraft Sloan (York—Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I have been listening with great interest and following the direction of the debate. It appears the Reform argument is coming from two possible areas. One is that we should have a very simple income tax form which I certainly agree with, but also that social policy measures should not be part of our income tax system.

If I were to go back to my constituents they would be appalled to learn the Reform Party is advocating banishing registered retirement savings plans. So many Canadians find this as the only way they can contribute toward their retirement years.

If you look at a registered retirement savings plan, as has already been noted, there is some complexity with it. If we did not have them on our forms it would indeed be a very simple form to fill out. It is clearly a direct social policy measure that the Canadian government is looking at helping Canadians save for their retirement.

I am appalled and I think my constituents would be appalled that the Reform Party is advocating something like this.

Mr. Williams: Madam Speaker, let me put the matter straight. Is anybody in the Reform Party advocating that we eliminate RRSPs?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Williams: Thank you, Madam Speaker.

• (1210)

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to participate in this debate. I believe I am on debate, Madam Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, on a point of order. There should be more comments.

I heard an hon. member say he got along fine without me and I am glad to see him again too.

Madam Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties and I think you will find there is unanimous consent for the following motion:

That, notwithstanding any standing order:

The Standing Committee on Finance is instructed to report Bill C-17, an act to amend certain statutes to implement provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 22, 1994, no later than May 25, 1994;

The report stage of the said bill shall be on May 26 and May 30, 1994 and at 15 minutes before the expiry of the time allotted for government business on May 30, 1994 the Speaker shall put all questions necessary to dispose of the report stage of the said bill without further debate and any divisions necessary shall be taken immediately;

The third reading stage of the said bill shall be on May 31, 1994 and at 15 minutes before the expiry of the time allotted for government business on May 31, 1994 the Speaker shall put all questions necessary to dispose of the third reading stage of the said bill without further debate and any divisions necessary shall be taken immediately.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Ringuette-Maltais): Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval): Madam Speaker, I would like to obtain some information.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Ringuette-Maltais): I give the floor to the hon. member for Roberval.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Madam Speaker, normally, 48 hours must pass between report stage and third reading, since amendments are not acceptable less than 48 hours before.

I would just like to make sure that if there are only 24 hours between report stage and third reading, the opposition's amendments would be in order if presented 24 hours in advance. It is just to make sure that the time provisions of our Standing Orders would of course apply to this motion.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, of course, when amendments are moved by any member in the House on this bill, they are considered by the Chair and the Speaker will decide at the beginning of the debate at report stage.

Regrettably, with this motion, we specified that the debate would begin 48 hours after the report, but we will have only 80 hours. So it will be a little harder for the Chair and also for members, but that is the arrangement we made.

[English]

The report from the committee will be received on May 25 and the debate will start on May 26. We have arranged for the debate to start on that day.

Those days have been designated because they are long days in order to give the opposition every opportunity to debate this bill on a reasonable basis. We could have the debate on a Friday but it is a short day. In order to lengthen the opportunities for the opposition, we have agreed to have the debate on the Thursday and Monday instead. That is the reason we have shortened the notice period for the report stage. However I think it is a reasonable compromise and that is the reason for it.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Madam Speaker, I would like to be sure that I understood correctly. It is not to create problems; on the contrary, it is to avoid them. I did not quite get what the hon. member was trying to convey to me, so I would ask him the question again.

Since there is only one day between consideration in committee and report stage, we would then leave it to the Speaker to decide whether or not he accepts the amendments presented. Accepting the motion as is without specifying whether amendments would be in order would mean that throughout the last day of the committee's work—I believe that I just said report stage and third reading; sorry, I meant that there would only be one day between committee stage and report stage. This means that no amendment would be acceptable on the last day, which would be basically contrary to the spirit of the rules of procedure of parliamentary committees.

• (1215)

[English]

Mr. Milliken: The standing orders would require that the notice of the amendments be given on the day after the report. So the report will be received on May 25 and presented in the House during Routine Proceedings that day. Obviously the notice of the amendments would have to be given before six o'clock that day to be considered the next day. Normally you have an extra day.

The Chair will have the amendments by six o'clock and will be able to work on its ruling overnight and communicate with the parties. If there are a lot of amendments it may mean an all-night work session for the Chair.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Ringuette-Maltais): Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Ringuette-Maltais): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY—TAX REFORM

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry): Madam Speaker, I am appreciative of having the opportunity to participate in this debate because it is an issue very near and dear to my heart. It is an issue that is near and dear to the heart of every member of Parliament. You cannot be in public service today without hearing from your constituents that they are frustrated with the current tax act of Canada.

When you test a tax system it should stand up to three basic criteria. First, is it simple enough that the person on the street who basically has to be responsible for participating in the tax system can understand it? On simplicity the tax act of Canada fails.

Second, on fairness we have heard time and time again of examples within the tax act where people who are making millions of dollars a year are not paying anything and people in the lower income spectrum, sometimes under $50,000, paying more than multimillionaires. When it comes to the test of fairness, it does not pass the test of fairness either.

When you talk about the third criteria, efficiency, my goodness when it comes to efficiency there is no one in this country who would stand up and say that the current tax act is an efficient system.

I must start off by reminding everyone in this House that the Prime Minister during the last election led the debate on tax reform. He led the debate. He said it in the red book. He came to Toronto on more than one occasion. I can vividly remember in the control room of CFRB when they confronted him on the issue of tax reform. The Prime Minister, then the Leader of the Opposition, said our government will be committed to comprehensive tax reform and it will have to meet the tests of simplicity, fairness, and of course efficiency.

We have been in office for just six months and we have started the process of addressing comprehensive tax reform. I believe the finance committee has done a terrific job going across the country and listening to all the different ideas that were presented.

The previous government moved arbitrarily on the GST, without proper consultation, and it ended up getting us all in a mess. It ended up fracturing the confidence of Canadians. It destroyed a good part of our retail industry, not to mention that it exacerbated an underground economy beyond our ability to calculate right now. The underground economy it is said could be as high as $30 billion to $40 billion.

• (1220)

I say to the members of the Reform Party that they are not alone in their quest for comprehensive tax reform. All of us on this side of the House are on the same pathway as they. I have to caution them, and I say this humbly to the members of the Reform Party, that it is not easy to reform the tax act of Canada.

I believe that I can say that from a bit of experience. I began this journey on tax reform four and a half years ago when the Prime Minister of Canada at that time, Prime Minister Mulroney, and Michael Wilson would stand up on this side of the House and when we would criticize the GST they would say: "Come up with an alternative. Don't just criticize it. Come up with an alternative". A group of us got together and said: "This is going to be an interesting exercise". We came up with this idea called the single tax system.

I want to spend a couple of minutes explaining why we called it the single tax rather than the flat tax. I think it is very important to understand this point. I believe it is essential in advancing comprehensive tax reform further down the path.

For years there has been an attempt to reform the tax system. The number one alternative for debate was called the flat tax. The problem with the flat tax system was that the proponents never took into account the constituencies that needed to be addressed when it came to progressivity. In other words, and I am not suggesting the Reform Party is doing this because I have listened carefully to their speeches, the flat taxers tended to say: "No credits for seniors, no credits for families with children, no credits for charitable donations, to heck with the RRSPs". The flat tax system developed a very bad name. It was: "Here is the gross revenue. You have one single credit and then after that you are 20 per cent, over and out".

The seniors in our community, families with children and charitable organizations, the most disadvantaged in our community who we should care about the most, started to look at the flat tax and said: "The social side of the equation is being ignored in the flat tax system". Regrettably the flat tax got a very bad name. The biggest slam against the flat tax was it was not progressive.

A group of us who were dealing with this problem and doing the research said: "We can't go with that name because if we are going to get acceptance we have to design in the tax form credits that will make sure that those people who are most disadvantaged in our society are looked after right up front". We came around to this name called the single tax, a single rate of tax, corporate and personal.

We designed the personal side of the form. I am sure many members have seen this form. It is a relic now because it is draft two which was done in about April 1989. We are now at draft 19. In five years seven or eight of us have been listening to thousands and thousands of Canadians, probably about 100,000 Canadians over five years who gave us advice and input on how we could refine it. I only bring this point out that it took five years because most of those points that people made were good points. It taught me a big lesson.

• (1225)

Even though I wanted to come in in one year or two years and reform the tax system, I realized that a package this complex could not be done overnight. Believe me, I am not being defensive. I still support the idea of a single tax. One cannot just do it. It is not like putting something in the microwave and 20 seconds later, it is there, ready to go.

Going back to the personal side of the single tax, we started off with the following premise. We must for starters make sure families with children are recognized in the single tax. Therefore they must have a credit. We then said that the seniors need to feel comfortable with this tax act, therefore they need to have a line in the tax act and a credit.

Another line that we put in the credit was for charitable donations. I want to tell members that that 1 per cent line for charitable donations is essential. When we did our early research on this issue we called Drs. Hall and Rabushka from the Hoover Institute at Stanford. They said to us: "Do not make the mistake, Dennis, that we made when we started. We scrubbed the charitable donations line. We said no more charitable deductions".

They told us that the charitable organizations went to their local politicians and went to the press and they were such a force that they condemned the system even before it got out of the gate.

One has to have a line in one's tax act for charitable donations. One can cap it, but one must be generous because ultimately one is going to need those constituencies supporting the system if you are going to pull it off.

Then we said that we cannot do away with the RRSP structure. The RRSP structure is almost a part of our fiscal framework. We put that in the act but we capped it. Of course there was the basic deduction.

After all, there are those deductions or those progressive credits. I want to put the emphasis on progressive because the biggest criticism of this project is that it is not progressive enough. One can design progressivity into the act or into the card. At any rate after those progressive features were designed, we told them that after their basic income and those deductions they could take a single rate of 20 per cent.

On the corporate side, because one needed to have a fully integrated system, we said that there should be a very progressive credit for small business on the first $50,000, no tax. After that, it is their basic corporate expenditures and after those corporate expenditures and their basic depreciation is put in place, there is a single rate there as well.

That is the direction that we have been working on. We believed that would accomplish a number of goals. The most important thing is simplicity. I think very few people would argue that this system is not simple. There it is. One can see it. One can fill it out. It is very straightforward.

The next most important thing is to make it doable and that is the challenge that we have in this Parliament.

• (1230)

There are difficulties in moving a tax system that primarily ran and to this day runs the economy of Canada and now we are saying, those of us who support this type of idea, that we want to stop running the economy of Canada through the tax act. We basically want to make it a tax collection unit; no more preferences, no more loopholes, flush them all out with those exceptions that I mentioned for seniors, families with children and charities.

I have to say to the Reform Party that the transition from the current system that we are in to a single tax system is really the debate that we have to engage in because that transition period is the real challenge.

I do not believe the challenge is one of whether or not we are going to generate enough revenue because right now the current tax system is so flawed that some experts say the underground economy is over $40 billion or $50 billion and growing. The notion of a simple, fair tax system is reinforced by the underground economy right now.

There is another factor and it is called having a globally competitive tax system and I do not believe we have been talking about that issue enough. Our tax system right now is driving people not only underground but offshore. In other words, our achievers, our entrepreneurs who are creating real wealth are starting to leave. Over a million Canadians are in California right now and we did a survey and found that many of them are there because of our tax act.

I believe that one of the reasons we should investigate comprehensive tax reform which the Prime Minister and our party have supported is that we need to reverse the capital flows. We have to design a tax system that causes the capital to flow back into our country rather than flow out. The current tax act is not doing that very well.

People from time to time come to me and ask how I could support somebody making $60,000 a year paying 20 per cent and someone making $1 million a year paying 20 per cent. Is that not unfair, inequitable?

For me it is not. There are many others in Canada who believe two things. Number one, the harder you work and the more you achieve and the more you earn, you should at least be able to keep some of it in your pocket. There is another thing. Right now there is no guarantee that we are getting anything on the person who is making $1 million or $2 million whereas in the single tax it is airtight. We are going to get that 20 per cent no matter what, including family trusts.
In other words, under a single tax system all income is in the loop, it is airtight.

I suggest that if we had a system like that then those people, whether they be scientists or doctors or people who have achieved entrepreneurial wealth, rather than being tempted to leave would stay. Not only that but we would see other capital from around the world coming to our country because we would have a competitive tax system, a tax system that respected wealth creators, job creators, a tax system that respected people who have achieved through their intellect all kinds of scientific discoveries.

• (1235)

I want to say that we on this side of the House support the pathway that leads to comprehensive tax reform. However, at the same time I want to say as someone who has been engaged in this debate for a long time that it is not an easy task. This transition period is going to be a very tough period.

Let me give an example and let us deal with the energy sector right now because many of the Reform members are from western Canada and I know that the energy sector is very important to their constituents.

Right now in the tax act there are billions of dollars of tax grants to the energy sector. Under the single tax all of those grants or those preferences are gone, eliminated. When a company from the province of Alberta that has been used to getting these tax deductions, some of which are actually in the billions, finds that all of a sudden they are gone, it is a tremendous kick to the cash flow of that particular company. It is going to come running up to Ottawa or to members in their constituency offices saying it is out of business if that tax credit is cancelled.

Therefore, we are going to have to have a transition period because we are going to have to analyse whether that entire tax grant should be eliminated.

My own view has always been the following. Any grant, whether it be a direct grant in a line department or an indirect grant through the tax act, should always be linked to the policy objective of creating jobs. The problem is that because these tax grants are buried in the tax act there is no accountability as to whether they are meeting the policy objective.

I am going to close in 30 seconds. I want to say to the members of the Reform Party that we have to make sure when we move those grants into the line department we link them to job creation. If they do that, where they are transparent and accountability, we could have a successful tax act.

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver): Madam Speaker, I very much enjoyed the speech of the hon. member. In fact, I hope he has the ear of the revenue minister and is managing to get some of these changes put into effect without too much delay.

I hope the hon. member will listen to my speech later on today about tax saturation because I think that is a point perhaps we have reached here in Canada today. Taxes are too high and part of the reason is that the spending is far too high.

I hope the hon. member will admit that is part of the problem. I certainly hope that it does not take a debt crisis as it did in New Zealand before we can come to grips with this tax situation and actually turn it into something fair.

I agree with the member regarding the complexity of the system. He implied a few times that millionaires do not pay their fair share of taxes. I would like to explore that a little. I would like to know if the member can give me a list of the reasons or ways millionaires do not pay tax other than because of a family trust, which he mentioned. I would really be interested to know. If millionaires can avoid paying taxes in some way legally then those same ways should be available to any average taxpayer in this country. If those ways are there I would like to know about them because I think I am paying too much tax as well.

I wonder if the hon. member could explain the ways millionaires escape paying tax.

• (1240)

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I want to begin by saying to the member that in no way, shape or form did I mean to cast aspersions on the people who are generating great personal wealth in this country. Neither did I want to say that they were not paying tax through illegal means.

The bottom line is that there are opportunities that exist for tax deductions or tax options within the tax act that would allow a person with great wealth to reduce that income tax payable.

I am not going to get into any specifics today, but I did give an example in a recent householder. I will give the one example that was actually advertised in a magazine a couple of months ago: "Now your income tax dollars can help you invest in a beautiful home in the sun". I am sure members remember that ad: "This investment opportunity is designed to be of maximum tax benefit to individuals like you with a total family income of over $50,000 per year, Intelevest Group. You can either redirect your income tax dollars to help you invest in luxurious townhouses in beautiful Sarasota or you can continue to send all that hard earned money to the government in income taxes".

In other words, this is an example of how the tax preferences discriminate against those with lower income tax. In other words, you would have to be over that amount. It allows a higher income earner to use his higher income to participate in this luxury townhouse rental income at an after tax cost of zero. That is one specific example but there are many others.

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, I would like to compliment the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood for his statement, his intervention. I appreciate very much the way he has laid it out, citing simplicity, fairness and efficiency.

As I was listening I realized that he talks about the doability of it as well. I am pleased to hear the practical thoughts he has. This Parliament is not the first Parliament to take a run at tax reform. Names like Carter and Macdonald are well known in this exercise. As I have read about these other attempts there has always been the story of the obstacles that have been placed in the way of simplifying the tax system and of reforming it.

I was wanting to ask if the hon. member would perhaps outline some of the obstacles to tax reform. Who are the vested interests that resist reforming the tax system so that it may pass the test of simplicity, fairness and efficiency so that it is a doable tax system?

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I would like to deal with the question in two parts.

First, naturally there are people who have thought for years, on behalf of industry, to put their tax preference or their tax loophole or their tax break, whatever you want to call it, into the tax act. Those people who have fought for years and worked over the Department of Finance for their special privilege are defenders of the status quo. They believe in that with the same passion as the member would believe in his particular approach.

However, I am going to say that the biggest obstacle to tax reform in my mind are the people of Canada. The people of Canada are not interested in tax reform. They talk about it a lot and I know we talk about it. I am somebody who has worked on the issue for five years, but when push comes to shove it is not the kind of issue that makes people roll up their sleeves and get turned on about. I know there are tax groups out there that band together and rally from time to time. In relation to the whole, Canadians at large, they are a very small number.

• (1245)

In fairness to the member, my biggest frustration with the issue of tax reform in the last five years—and my party has been supportive of the issue—is that we cannot seem to get the people of Canada charged up and asking for tax reform. They have little moments or little flutters when they call about it, but there is no real thrust from the people.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, I will be very brief. I compliment the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood on all the work he has done for the last four or five years. We would like that to snowball and not have to wait another three or four years before something happens.

In defence of his simple, fair and efficient tax system, whether we call it a flat tax, a single tax or proportional tax, how many more years is he willing to wait before his government supports or rejects the proposal?

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): They are playing hardball with me today, Madam Speaker.

First let me be very specific. I have always said that the single tax is an effort to advance the tax reform debate in a constructive, open way. If there are better ideas out there than the single tax, I welcome them. In other words if it is proportional tax or if the men and women of the finance committee come up with some new tax design that is better than the single tax, as good as or whatever, I am for it. I do not want to be in a position—and the Prime Minister has said he does not want to be in that position either—of defending the status quo. He said it again yesterday.

We must understand that it is most important not to make the same mistake the Conservatives made. They came in so quickly with this GST that they fractured and tax shocked the people of Canada. That set us back 10 years.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East): Madam Speaker, my topic as it relates to the subject today is that Canada is an exporting nation. Our livelihood, our personal incomes depend on exports. Our present tax system must be altered to maintain our international competitiveness because our national economy depends on it.

On January 27 I rose and spoke in the House. If I may I would like to repeat a small part of what I said then. It was interesting that in a recent news article in the Kimberley Bulletin a headline read: "Cominco irked at city tax rate". The complaint of the mining company was that the major industrial tax rate in Kimberley was 69 per cent higher than the tax rate in Cranbrook. In justifying the position of the city, the mayor of Kimberley argued that Cominco taxes were high but said that the tax rate was justified. He said that the mining company has had it easy on taxes because it did not start paying taxes until 1968 when Cominco was incorporated into the city limits. The mayor said: "That is when Cominco started shutting down plants and laying off people".

I am not criticizing the mayor of Kimberley for his comments. I simply cite that quotation as an accurate representation of what happens when an industry is taxed. The fact is that when taxes go up jobs in an industry decrease.

Capital for mining is fleeing Canada. The country of Chile is one of the greatest beneficiaries of this flight. It has an effective tax rate of 15 per cent. Countries like Mexico and Papua, New Guinea have a mining tax rate of 35 per cent. The Philippines and even the United States have a tax rate on mining companies of 38 per cent, whereas the mining companies in the province of British Columbia suffer a mining income tax rate of 50 per cent for hard rock mining. In coal mining, although it is hard to believe, in four years between 1987 and 1991 the B.C. coal industry paid $454 million or almost half a billion in direct taxes while net returns to the industry were only $8 million. I say taxes kill jobs.

I am a member of the standing committee on the environment of the House of Commons. We are concerned, as we should be, about carbon dioxide emissions. The objective is to return CO2 emissions to 1990 levels by the year 2000. I support that objective. However we must recognize doing that, particularly if we do it by taxation, will have a very detrimental effect on the electric power industry in Alberta.

I represent British Columbia and I have Canada's largest coal mine in my constituency. Therefore I am very concerned about the informal discussion there has been about green tax and about carbon tax. If we use taxation to alter behaviour then we kill our ability to be internationally competitive.

If we want to change behaviour I suggest we may choose to institute penalties. We may choose to institute levies. We may choose to institute fines but they should be considered to be as revenue neutral as possible. In other words taxation is for the purpose of raising revenue. If we manage through green taxes and carbon taxes to alter behaviour, having altered the behaviour we lose the revenue. It is totally contrary and totally counterproductive.

Most of my constituents and perhaps a lot of constituents of members of the House suffer from the same problem and the same concern about the overlapping of all the levies, the penalties, the fines and the permits.

I have a letter from a business in my constituency which was written to the Prime Minister, a company in the business of blacktop. In part it reads:

> Over the past three years, we have kept a record of government permits, inspection and controls from different levels of bureaucracy. To everyone's astonishment, we were exposed to, hassled or intimidated by 35 different government officials all looking for their pound of flesh. Furthermore, if we don't take the time from our busy schedule to treat these people as "all important" we could face costly delays and problems.

Being in a smaller constituency businesses have to deal with many municipalities. When they do so they come up against city engineering which has material specifications, traffic control rules and regulations. They also have independent assessments with respect to fire department regulations and registration. They need a business licence and a municipal licence for registration of trucks. That is at the municipal level.

At the provincial level these firms have to deal with—and this is amazing—the pesticide branch for a permit, pollution control branch for a permit, gas inspection for inspection, electrical inspection, employment standard branch for an audit, gravel pit inspection, safety permit and bond. What is very interesting about the gravel pit inspection is that within the provincial jurisdiction they have to deal with the mines department and with workers' compensation. In certain situations with respect to the gravel pit they cannot comply with both sets of regulations. Within that single provincial jurisdiction they have to work with conflicting regulations: motor carrier inspection, dangerous goods inspection, safety inspection, weight restriction, over width permits, over height permits, provincial sales tax audit and licence, paving branch inspection and standards, material inspection branch, workers' compensation inspection, workers' compensation audit, pressure vessel inspection and permit, fire marshal inspection and regulation, and air use permit.

I should mention what struck me as terribly weird was that they actually pay for the amount of air they consume. It just goes on and on: air use permit, traffic control permit, ICBC licensing and regulation, and capital tax.

Then there is the overlap of many of these regulations into the federal jurisdiction: Canada pension plan rules, regulations and audit; UIC rules, regulations and audit; and Revenue Canada income tax and corporate tax. Included in that would be remission of taxes collected from employees; GST rules, regulation and audit; radio licensing and regulations; Public Works Canada material supply inspection, electrical inspection, mechanical inspection; and finally more inspection and regulation under work hazard training.

This is indicative of what we are doing to the people of Canada. Whether we are talking about individuals or about businesses, fundamentally we are regulating these people out of existence. We are fining. We are getting permits. We are finding all sorts of ways at various government levels to get more and more money from people.

I suggest as I started that Canada is an exporting nation. Our livelihood, our personal incomes depend on exports. Our present tax system must be altered to maintain our international competitiveness because our national economy depends on it.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak today about reforming the tax system. I want to talk today about the tax revolt which has started across the country. It has been going on for some years but it is becoming more predominant. I am going to cover why and how that is.

I want to talk a bit about why people are angry today about taxes, how we got here in the first place, what the government is doing about it, and the result which is the tax revolt itself.

We often hear people asking: "How do we own a small business in Canada today?" A lot of people respond by saying: "If you want to own a small business in Canada today, buy a large one and wait two tax years". While some find those words humorous they are quite discouraging. In fact they are very true in most cases.

Why are we angry? There are three fundamental reasons. First, there is little value in the tax dollar people are getting today. They see smaller disposable incomes and increasing costs. That is one of the reasons we are angry.

Second, people across the country see governments as fat cats spending inappropriately, spending well beyond their means. Quite frankly that is at all levels of government.

The third reason we are angry is that there is only one taxpayer. The trouble is that all three levels of government see only their perspective in raising taxes. It is like the infrastructure program of the federal government. It says it is spending only $2 billion, but it is spending $6 billion of taxpayers' money. It is $2 billion provincial, $2 billion municipal, and $2 billion federal.

Taxpayers do not really give two hoots about who is sharing in the small packages of dollars. They care about the big package and how much it is costing us.

How did we get to where we are? This all started with a temporary tax measure to support the war spending in 1917. Since then all levels of government have the feeling that even though there is no war they can get into the pockets of the average citizen on virtually everything they can name.

• (1300)

Also, we got here because of incompetence and mismanagement. We do not have to go very far to see the mismanagement and incompetent spending. I refer to a couple of items from "The Tales of the Tax Trough" by the National Citizens Coalition. It found that we spent $37,363 to study the effects of colour in advertising. We also spent $58,000 for an examination of what it is like to work for the Dominion grocery stores. We spent $21,566 to examine experimental studies of interactive gestures.

Those kinds of costs go on year after year after year and in the same year after year after year governments say they are going to make a change. However the taxpayers do not see that; they only see more government rhetoric.

Another way we got here is because Canadians are passive people. We tend to think that governments are going to pull us out of this crazy spending, but it never seems to happen.

The tax revolt is going to go on. It is going to get larger and larger. There are several formal tax revolt structures in place in this country. I am going to speak about those in just a second.

What has this government done? We have already seen that this government has tacked on about $3 billion more in expenditures, but it has said that revenues should increase to offset that. Governments have played that trick on Canadian taxpayers for two generations now.

The government promised to spend about $1.5 billion on child care, if the economy should rise about 3 per cent. But it says: "No, it is not $1.5 billion. It is only $750 million because the provinces have to contribute $750 million". Well, their $750 million and the federal government's $750 million is $1.5 billion to the taxpayer. That is what we have to get into our minds.

The government has closed some bases which was a little premature because they are into a one year study. I have said before it is like bailing out a sinking ship with a thimble. We owe $40 billion. Getting $750 million here and there or $2 million and saving a few on perks and so on is not enough. We have to go deeper.

What is the result? We are into an underground economy the size of which nobody can estimate but we know it is big. The last election was part of the result. We saw a party virtually disappear off the face of the political map.

Then we have the revolt. A number of organizations are springing up across this country and I have talked to two of them. One is the Tax Revolt Network News run by Gerry Rogers in Halifax. He prints a monthly document and I will be quoting from it. There is also a gentleman by the name of Gebert from my home riding of Fraser Valley West who is well aware of Mr. Rogers' activities. By no means is this a limited list. There are all kinds of people out there.

I did get a call from a fellow by the name of George MacDonald in Calgary who is on a fixed income. He basically said: "Why not add the museum in the Prime Minister's riding to the cost of the inordinate expenditures, or the $100,000 grant to study riddles", and so on and so forth. That just came from Mr. MacDonald a few minutes ago. People out there are sick and tired of this.

Let me quote the Tax Revolt Network News: "Today nobody trusts governments will do what they say they will do, or say what they are planning to do without deceit". Gerry Rogers is a small businessman. He is not a politician. He is just ticked right off.

Other things in the Tax Revolt Network News: "The system is too complicated. A small business should be able to run and be accounted for by a person of average intelligence with a basic high school education. Please, governments, do not lend us money and do not give us grants. We are capable of governing ourselves. We need a more participatory form of government for the 21st century".

• (1305)

Another quote: "Taxes can be lowered without law breaking. The secret in the control of politicians and their pathological need to tax and spend: Control the money. Take away their privilege of taxation and borrowing and they will become more reasonable to deal with". This is all over the place in this country.

Another fellow has formed a citizens tax coalition. One hon. member talked about banding together from time to time. These people are not just banding together; this is big stuff in this country. I quote: "The thing Mr. Rogers and I have in common is the contempt for the political system that ignores common sense in taxation. It is bound to result in chaos in our economy. The first casualty will be our system of government followed by the politicians who failed to represent the wishes of the people who elected them".

I have one more quote which is interesting. It goes back a little bit. The quote is this: "The national budget must be balanced. The public debt must be reduced. The arrogance of the authorities must be moderated and controlled. Payments to foreign governments must be reduced if the nation does not want to go bankrupt. People must again learn to work instead of living on public assistance". This is not my quote; it came from a senator of ancient Rome, Marcus Tullius Cicero speaking in 55 B.C. What has changed since 55 B.C. you ask. Not much in this country.

The Romans misread the mood of the people and the civilization went up in flames. We are in danger of that happening too and I think this Liberal government should take heed.

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester): Madam Speaker, I truly enjoyed the hon. member's remarks, particularly the humour. When there is humour and wit in a taxation debate it does make it a lot more enjoyable.

One comment is in terms of the Rogers report on taxation revolt out of Halifax. My riding of Cumberland—Colchester is in Nova Scotia, that beautiful province. Just yesterday I attended a ribbon cutting and sod turning ceremony at a factory. It is a manufacturing plant of Intertape Polymer Group. This factory has been in existence in Truro for close to 20 years. About every five years it has been able to expand with a little bit of Atlantic Canada opportunities or ACOA funding.

Yesterday we presented it with a grant of $1.5 million. Seventy per cent of that was federal funds and 30 per cent was a provincial co-operative sharing financial grant. The amount we presented as government of $1.5 million was matched with $9.8 million from the plant. This was to expand into new products that would go on the international marketplace. It already employs close to 400 people and will take on an additional 45 people. These are long term sustainable jobs.

The point I wish to make is that the manager of this plant had to compete with his other plants. One in Florida, one in North Carolina, one in Ontario, one in England, and the one in Nova Scotia: five manufacturing plants that manufacture a plastic tape that goes on the back of carpets, that makes polysacs for carrying all kinds of large bulk products. This fibre is made, competed with and sold internationally.

This plant in Truro was able to get the $9.8 million from the conglomerate because we were able to assist a little bit with an ACOA grant in the Atlantic region.

That is the benefit of cost sharing, stimulating, promoting those jobs. As the hon. member will know, in our red book we did advocate jobs for this country. If he has read the recent reports the economy today is at the highest it has been in the past five years. It is growing. It is growing slowly but it is growing and he must agree that we have taken some appropriate measures by reducing those taxes, the 3 per cent in the UI premiums. That was a constructive, positive measure to increase jobs and to increase job potential for this country.

• (1310)

I wanted to point out to the hon. member the fact that when we do cost share as a government, if the owner or manufacturer puts in a substantial amount and there are long term jobs, long term sustainability in manufacturing for the export market, I must remind him of the tremendous products, then it is a good investment and we are on the right track.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, good comments from the hon. member. I assure her it is not easy getting a laugh out of a tax revolt or a tax system in this country but one has to try once in awhile.

There is such a thing as government trying to assist business. I guess it is the perspective one has on how it is done. I can name time after time where government has put money into business and it has just gone out the back door. It has been a waste.

I spent some time down in Halifax not too long ago. Many people I talked to down there said: "Get rid of ACOA. It is just another tax bonus for those who can get into the trough".

I was in Anglemont up in the Shuswap in British Columbia this weekend. A fellow there said: "A friend of mine is going to start a business. He just got a $17,000 grant to start a business". I know the name of the business but I will not say it here.

The fact is that perhaps his friend should have borrowed the money from a bank or a business somewhere. You cannot just go around this country handing out tax dollars from the people of British Columbia or Alberta to somebody in the territories who wants to start a business. That is what is ticking people off today. Their money is being given away to some businesses that are totally unproductive.

Westray mines in Nova Scotia is a good example. That mine kept a lot of people working but it was tax dollars being transferred right across this country. What was the end result? There never was money earned in that place and many people died in a very unfortunate accident.

I received a letter not too long ago from the Canadian Kennel Club after my criticism of its receiving a $5,000 bilingualism grant. The club told me it had an income of $4 million to $5 million, yet it was getting a $5,000 grant. What for? Let it spend its own money.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry, the hon. member's time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise during this opposition day to debate the motion tabled by the hon. member for Calgary Centre which reads: "That this House implore the government to initiate immediate consultations with Canadian taxpayers—"

I do not know if the hon. member remembers, but before tabling his budget, the Minister of Finance consulted Canadian taxpayers across the country. Thanks to modern technology, those who did not participate in these consultations were able to follow this exercise on TV. Consequently, the first point mentioned in the motion does not accurately reflect the situation.

Also, since the motion talks about initiating consultations, I thought that, especially in the case of the Reform Party, details would have been provided as to the kind of consultations to hold, because such a process costs money. What about expected results? I have not heard anything concrete on this since the debate began this morning.

The motion then refers to consultations with "provincial governments on the creation of a fair and integrated reform of the entire tax system—" I believe the hon. member is alluding to tax harmonization and I agree with the Reform Party on that. I think that the Minister of Finance has already had meetings with his provincial counterparts, and it goes without saying that there is work to do. I also believe that, in its efforts to determine how to replace the GST, the finance committee is reviewing this whole issue.

• (1315)

This government has taken concrete measures since it took office. The hon. member mentioned earlier that we grant subsidies to companies or institutions and that this was a bad investment. We did say during the election campaign, as well as in our red book, that subsidies to companies will be drastically reduced, and I believe we are doing that. So we are going in the right direction concerning this aspect of public finances.

In fact, we have taken several realistic measures to put some order in public finances. During the election campaign, we did not make unrealistic promises, as did the Conservatives and the Reformists who promised to totally eliminate the deficit in three or five years.

The federal administration also includes the vision of a society. This is why it is not as easy as the Reform Party would have you believe to make cuts to reduce the deficit.

We made a very logical and realistic proposal in our red book. We said that we were going to lower the deficit to 3 per cent of our gross national product, over a period of three years. And when he tabled the budget, the Minister of Finance showed how he was going to fulfill that promise.

This is what we managed to do in the six months since we took office. The results are starting to show.

Reform Party members are very critical of the infrastructure program, and this from a political party that believes in public consultation and local government. I have been a member of Parliament for ten years now, and every time I meet mayors of municipalities, members of municipal, provincial and regional councils and members of the Federation of Canadian municipalities, they always demand federal involvement in an infrastructure program, because that is our role as a government. The Reform Party has no vision. A government must have a vision of society. A modern society without a modern and adequate infrastructure cannot develop its economy, and our economy must be in good shape if we are going to reduce the deficit and the debt. And that is what we are doing.

We responded initially to a request from the municipalities and we put this request before the provinces, which agreed to share the cost three ways. We will not only create jobs needed in the short term to boost economic recovery but also respond to a real need for infrastructures in our regions, our communities, our towns and our villages. The infrastructure program will help communities and existing entrepreneurs to expand and help new entrepreneurs get started.

It is not just a matter of dollars and cents. We must have an all-encompassing vision, which the Reform Party does not have when it insists on talking about a tax revolt.

To my knowledge, there have always been protest movements, and these are sometimes necessary because they make us think. As members we often sit in this House five days a week and do not always have time to go and listen to our constituents. However, we don't think we can say there is a revolt. Of course some people are angry, and a few may have good reason to be, but I think that today we should be more constructive and try to get together and deal with these problems with the government, and I think we should stress the positive aspects so that we can suggest how the government should deal with these problems. We did.

Speaking of consultations, as part of our parliamentary reform at the beginning of this session, our first item was to ensure that members of the finance committee would be able to prepare the next budget with the Minister of Finance, something unheard of in the past. Until now, the contents of the budget were announced to members in this House at the same time as they were to Canadians watching on television, in other words, when the budget was brought down in Parliament.

Members of Parliament will be able to contribute. This system will enable us to submit proposals, make suggestions and express the people's concerns to the Minister of Finance. That is what we call real consultation!

The motion reads:

> —implore the government to initiate immediate consultations with Canadian taxpayers—

That is what we have been doing since the opening of the session. In fact, that was one of the commitments we had taken during the election campaign.

We, members of Parliament, are here to represent the people of Canada. As such, we can let the Minister of Finance know what they think and the committee will be able to prepare a budget, together with the minister, and to tackle the problems facing the Canadian economy. This way, we will be prepared to face the problems of the 21st century, have a sound financial position and be able to compete in the modern economy.

On September 4, ten years ago, I was elected federal member of Parliament and I have spent at least six of the past ten years examining problems the small and medium-sized businesses are grappling with. In the budget speech, I was pleased and proud to notice that the Minister of Finance had tried to settle once and for all the question of small business deductions. Small business need tax deductions, but the Income Tax Act allowed large corporations to take advantage of the system, up to $200,000 worth in income. The Minister of Finance corrected the situation and he will certainly address small business.

In the budget also, large corporations like financial institutions were told that they would have to pay their fair share. Of course, complaints were received from the Restaurant Association because deductions for entertainment expenses were reduced from 80 to 50 per cent. The Minister of Finance's budget actually established equity, as requested in the motion before us, but this means everybody has to do his share. I must admit that the federal government was dragging behind in that respect. Measures to that effect had long been in place in Quebec, as well as in Ontario and in the United States. I am sure that restaurant owners will realize that their businesses will not suffer from these measures; the fact that people can only deduct 50 per cent of their expenses will not stop them from going to the restaurant.

It is therefore very important to pursue our efforts in that area. That is in fact the first thing we will do after receiving the finance committee's report on the GST. Consumption tax is a major element of our tax system. We are going to provide the Canadian people with a fair and equitable tax system. We will start by finding an equitable alternative to the GST and I hope that this time, the provinces will accept to harmonize their programs with ours and that we can have a tax system that everyone can understand.

• (1325)

Madam Speaker, you and I come from Quebec. Today, someone who goes to a service station or a garage to get their car fixed would have trouble understanding their bill. As an accountant myself, I have difficulty understanding my bill.

Because there is a 4 per cent tax, a 7 per cent tax, a 9 or 8 per cent tax, and every tax kicks in after a certain amount. So the small entrepreneur who should be in his garage working as a mechanical specialist and serving his customers is busy with all this paperwork, and God knows what will happen in two or three years, when the auditor from the revenue department drops by his garage. Did he figure out the taxes properly?

Imagine how our small and medium-sized businesses feel who have to live with this GST system. I think this year we should make the effort to design a consumption tax system. Because with our financial situation, we cannot tell Canadians that we will abolish the GST and that there will be no consumption taxes.

The Right Hon. Prime Minister, whether in opposition or in government, has always been very clear: we will replace the GST. However, once we have dealt with this important part of the tax system, namely consumption taxes, we will move on to the other part of the system, income and capital taxes. What system should we have? I think with the structure, reforms and regulations established in this House by our parliamentary committees, especially the finance committee, we will be able at this time next year, with the next budget, to really put our fiscal house in order and give hope to Canadians that we can have a fair, equitable and efficient tax system.

But it is only by working together and supporting the Minister of Finance—and I am confident that our finance minister will see it through to the end. Before becoming involved in politics, he was a businessman; he knows the problems, he listens to Canadians—and I am sure that together we will succeed.

I know that the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre would like to participate in this debate so, Madam Speaker, with the consent of the House, I will sit down and allow him to speak his mind.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): On a point of order, the hon. member for Calgary Centre.

Mr. Silye: Madam Speaker, do we not get to ask some questions of the hon. member for Saint-Léonard?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The member was asking if he finished early whether he could give a chance to the member for Gatineau—La Lièvre to make comments or ask questions.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to congratulate the member for Saint-Léonard for his contribution to today's debate. I am a little disappointed that he has just focused on the GST as a partial solution to our taxation problem. Perhaps he is too busy being the Liberal whip to put full concentration on this area of taxation.

He brought up a point about the cost of consultation and as a Reformer I feel I should address this particular issue. Current hearings are always held by most standing committees, especially the Standing Committee on Finance.

With the replacement tax for the GST provincial governments are certainly encouraged to look at the issue of harmonization and therefore the government and/or committees will be meeting with provincial finance people. When they are doing that and for the same cost at the same time the government can be bringing up other areas of taxation that provinces, individuals or witnesses may want to contribute toward an overhaul of the taxation system. In the next year and a half, at no extra cost, this extra review can be initiated with Canadians and provincial governments.

On the order of public finances the member indicates that he feels his government is bringing order to the public finances. I counter that position as a comment by saying that the government has increased overall spending by $3.3 billion and is concentrating on the revenue side to generate more revenue for the government.

By borrowing $2 billion on the infrastructure all the government is going to get back at most is $400 million in taxes with the extra jobs it creates if it creates them.

• (1330)

That will be a net loss on the infrastructure program so it is headed the wrong way.

I compliment the hon. member for Saint-Léonard as party whip for handling the budget of the Board of Internal Economy. I do not know whether it is $250 million or $270 million, but he and his committee, and I believe it was through his efforts, came up with a $5 million saving for this House and the taxpayers of Canada.

I wish that he would take his insight and his understanding of how cuts should really work and apply it to the Department of National Revenue. When the deputy minister of National Revenue and Taxation was asked to come up with some cuts, he came up with an amalgamation of two departments. Out of a budget of $2.2 billion all that he could come up with, not that it is insignificant, was $36 million.

On a proportionate and percentage basis, I would like to know if the hon. member would be willing to serve as the cabinet minister of National Revenue and Taxation. He knows how to cut.

Mr. Gagliano: Madam Speaker, maybe the member should speak to the Prime Minister.

I thank him for his congratulatory remarks. With the help of some of my colleagues, we realized the cuts that the member mentioned. The budget of the Internal Board of Economy for 295 members of Parliament and this House is between $200 million and $230 million a year. Five million dollars may be saved by the end of the year and we hope to save even more. This is not a big reduction but we have to start somewhere.

We have to start from the top. That was the aim of this government. The Prime Minister did it with cabinet. We collectively did it here in the House. We are giving a good signal to the public administration in all departments. I would not like to pick on only one department. The member mentioned national revenue. It should be all departments.

The Prime Minister is reminding every cabinet minister on a daily basis to make sure that they are responsible. We are going that way.

In terms of consultation, the member and I agree. The rules are already in place through the finance committee. The least expensive consultation that we can have is through the finance committee of this House. We are doing it on the GST. Once the GST is finished, I am sure that with the budgetary process that we have in place this fall the finance committee will look at all the other tax expenditures and we will make progress.

Like I said, we all have to participate. I could quote letters. It is incredible how such a thing could happen. We are trying to serve almost 27 million people. We have a system, but it is a complicated system. If all of us sincerely want to help we can do our own little thing for which we are responsible as a member of Parliament. We can go a long way.

I hope that in this 35th Parliament this new spirit of co-operation and so on that we have shown in the past four months will continue. I am convinced that in the end we can achieve a greater result and Canadians will be better off. We run for office and get elected so that we can help Canadians feel good about this country. We want them to be better off. They can compete and look for a bright future.

I thank the member for his congratulations. Our difference is not that far apart. Sometimes we have to look at more than just dollars and cents. The hon. member said that through taxes we may get only $100 million back from our $2 billion. I do not want to dispute those figures. I did not do the calculation.

• (1335)

We also have to look at the wealth and the infrastructure that we put into our communities that will help to create a better business structure, a better lifestyle which in general helps people to feel better and feel more secure in our communities and therefore be more productive and more active.

That is the problem in our society. If we make sure that all Canadians are active, I think we will reduce the deficit and the debt and we will have a better society.

Mr. Gérard Asselin (Charlevoix): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to address the House this afternoon on the subject of the government's tax system. Since the Bloc Quebecois was elected last October 25, it has tabled a motion calling on the government of Canada to strike a committee to review all government spending.

For many months now, the Bloc Quebecois has been demanding an in-depth review of the tax system, the aim being the elimination of tax inequities. Having brought down a $164.7 billion budget providing for a spending increase of $4 billion for 1994, the Liberal government should review its spending practices because it has chosen the easiest course of action, which is to raise taxes.

Finance minister Paul Martin's recent budget sets a second record in this House, what with a deficit of $9.7 billion and $110 million in interest charges per day. Given the current state of the economy and the high levels of unemployment and poverty in Quebec and in Canada, the $110 million in interest charges which the federal government pays to financial institutions could surely have been put to some other use. It could have been invested in a variety of other areas such as social housing or in business recovery programs aimed at job creation.

There is an urgent need for the government to review the entire tax system. Furthermore, as I stated earlier, it is also very important that the government agree to the motion presented in this House by the Bloc Quebecois which calls for a committee to be established to review government spending item by item and to give the government some control mechanisms.

When the Minister of Finance appeared before the Standing Committee on Finance, of which I am a member, I asked him whether it was the public servants who were mismanaging programs, or the politicians who were spending too much. Of course, since the minister wanted to protect some public servants and deputy ministers, he had to take full responsibility and reply that it was the politicians who were spending too much.

I believe that politicians should give themselves monitoring tools, because they are the ones who must take responsibility when the government tables a budget and has a deficit. Every four years, political parties have to go before the best judges of their actions: Canadians and Quebecers. We cannot afford a budget like this one, with a deficit of $39.7 billion. The government is trying to eliminate a deficit by creating another one.

You will remember that when the Conservatives tabled a budget with a deficit of $32 billion, the largest ever at the time, it caused an uproar. The Liberals just hit the roof. This was unprecedented. But this was just rhetoric on their part to get elected. Indeed, the Liberals' recent budget is proof that they are no better managers than the Conservatives of the time.

It is important that the government implement all the Auditor General's recommendations. His services are costly. In fact, it costs the government $60 million over three years for this audit of its books, a job which the Auditor General has always done well and will continue to do well. We are not asking for cuts affecting social programs, low-income and single-parent families, or social housing. We are asking the government to make cuts in its own fat. It is the Auditor's mandate to find out where that fat is, and he does a very good job at that.

The Bloc Quebecois is also asking that a committee be set up to review all government expenditures. The Reform Party agrees with us on this score. This committee would include members of all political parties, mainly the government, the Bloc Quebecois and the Reform Party, who, along with the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue, would take a look at all expenditures which are not essential to the operations of this House.

It is important that the government give itself means to control each department. And if in its budget, the government approves the budget for the Department of Transport, and if the Minister of Finance includes in his budget a budget for health programs for the Department of National Health and Welfare, the officials who run this program must be responsible for its administration, and the ministers responsible for their respective departments must be accountable for those departments.

A minister who is there just for the prestige is pretty useless. I think ministers should be responsible for their individual departments and for the programs in those departments. If the minister does not do his job or if the official doesn't do his job, in that case, let us get someone else. However, we cannot afford to approve a budget with a $39.7 billion deficit, knowing full well that in the end, if the economy or employment recovery is not up to expectations, we may end up with a deficit of $45 billion or even $50 billion.

Public servants and the ministers in their respective departments must be aware of their responsibilities and administer the programs and budgets they have been given to administer by the government.

I have been sitting on the finance committee for about two months, and we heard many witnesses for the municipalities, Chambers of Commerce, unions of municipalities, restaurant owners, and so forth, and everyone is trying to find ways for the government to raise revenue without affecting the consumer. I think the government should stop worrying about how to raise revenue, because workers and consumers are already paying far too much.

What the government should worry about is how to cut its spending, and it doesn't take very long to find out how to do that. What it takes is a good committee that looks at departmental budgets item by item. Its work would be cut out for it. For a start, we should act on all the recommendations made by the Auditor General. We pay too many taxes and too much income tax, and we should try to eliminate monumental mistakes like the contract at Pearson Airport in Toronto. This is the only federal airport in Canada that makes a profit, that generates a total of $50 million annually, and the previous government decided to privatize it.

Did the government decide to reward indirectly those who had contributed to the election campaign? The Bloc Quebecois is asking for a public inquiry to prove that the present government did not enjoy certain advantages as result of actions taken by the previous government, actions which have penalized taxpayers in Quebec and Canada. Quebecers and Canadians pay too much tax, and people are wondering whether they are getting their money's worth.

• (1345)

We pay taxes to the federal government and to Quebec. We turn over $28 billion per year in taxes to the federal government, in addition to paying provincial taxes, the GST, the TVQ, municipal taxes and school taxes.

Quebecers are prepared to pay a single harmonized tax, one that would give the provincial government control of all tax dollars and combine the GST and the TVQ into a single tax for a single country. This will come to pass when Quebec achieves independence.

As I was saying, workers and consumers are the ones left to pick up the tab. From the moment he is born, a Canadian child owes $20,000 to the federal government. And this same child will be paying until the day he dies.

Allow me to explain myself, Madam Speaker. As I was saying, when a child is born, he inherits a $20,000 share of the deficit. From the time they are old enough to attend grade school and high school, CEGEP or university, students pay taxes on books, goods and services and computers, etc. In short, even their education is taxed.

For parents who must incur a number of expenses related to their children's education, the process can be quite costly. Not every municipality or region in Quebec or in Canada has a CEGEP or a university. There is a CEGEP in the Charlevoix region. However, when students wish to go to university, they must travel outside the region and this can be very expensive.

A student from Baie-Comeau who decides to further his education in Montreal or in Quebec City will probably have to pay anywhere from $8,000 to $10,000 per year. Quite often, his father or mother, or sometimes both, end up unemployed, or even on welfare because a plant was forced to close, jobs were cut or a contract terminated.

If the student wishes to stay in school, he is forced to rely on loans and bursaries. When they graduate from university three or four years later, students find themselves $20,000 to $25,000 in debt and this, without any guarantee of finding work when they get out of school.

Naturally, these parents cannot afford to pay the required $8,000 to $10,000 a year and the child, having taken out loans, often must abandon his studies, for lack of funds.

There should be a tax deduction form for parents, to help children who study away from home. Let me explain. At present, when a couple divorces and the father is ordered to pay alimony to his ex-wife, the portion of his income which is paid in alimony is tax deductible. On the other hand, the same parent, if he is a good father and puts one, two and sometimes as many as three children through university, incurs very high expenses, but the money invested by parents in the education of children attending university is not tax deductible. The government should come up with programs to help, through the tax system, working taxpayers who pay to send their children away to get an education. These young people are our future. I also think that it would help prevent dropping out.

It is also urgent, both at the federal and the provincial level, that vocational schools be reopened. There will always be intellectuals with the skills and financial means to enter university, but there are also young people who do not have the skills or the financial means to go to university. There is an intermediate level that used to exist in the seventies—I am talking about vocational training.

You know that these jobs are increasingly occupied by women. Equal pay for equal work! These would be much sought-after trades because in construction, we will always need plumbers, electricians, carpenters, mechanics and the likes. There are only two classes: labourers, almost like welfare recipients, and professionals. But the construction market will always exist and I think governments should re-open vocational training centres to help those who lack the skills to go on to university.

The government tried to compensate for taxes by promising "jobs, jobs, jobs" in its red book. They will have to take action. Six months after the Liberal Party was elected, 23,000 more people live on social assistance in Quebec. They have exhausted their unemployment insurance benefits and are now on welfare. As I said last week when the Prime Minister declared that the unemployment rate was down 2 per cent in Quebec, it is because social assistance has gone up by 2 per cent.

The only reasonable thing in the Liberal Party's platform is the infrastructure program. Of course, this program will help small municipalities and some regional county municipalities. But $2 billion for the infrastructure program is not enough. The Federation of Canadian Municipalities recommended that the government should invest at least $15 billion in the program. The infrastructure program will not cure the unemployment cancer. Part of the problem in Quebec and Canada can be solved by a $2 billion infrastructure program, but not all of it.

One does not treat a broken leg with a Band-Aid or a general cancer with aspirin. The government must inject more money into this program to create jobs and help municipalities; this, in my opinion, would turn a good program into an excellent program. Again, what ratepayers do not have to borrow, they do not have to pay. I will be happy to resume my comments after question period.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, after listening to the member for Charlevoix who dealt with many subjects, I will come back to the issue of taxation, because that is what we were discussing this morning.

• (1355)

He talked about the need to reform the tax system. Of course many people have called for that. The hon. member is on the finance committee. Last night, I had the opportunity, as a member of Parliament, to testify before that committee and talk about the need for tax reform. In the brief I presented, I spoke of the need to reform the tax system.

There is something we can refer to. Twenty-five years ago, maybe more, there was a well-known royal commission of inquiry on the tax system, the Carter Commission. Twenty-five years later, the Carter Commission's recommendations are still valid today. The tax system must be improved to make it fairer and more equitable. We need consider only a few figures to realize that in the past 15 or 20 years, the tax system has worked against the welfare and interests of the middle class, which for all practical purposes is the backbone of any modern economy.

Of course, in a society like ours, when the middle class has disposable income, the economy is moving. But as the years go by and taxes are so high that incomes go down, we see the problems that we have in Canada now. These are only some indications of the reform that must be made to our whole tax system, including the GST, of course, which was a disastrous error for the country.

I would like to draw your attention to some figures and show you how unbalanced our system is. Back in 1980, the richest 1 per cent of Canadians at that time held 16 per cent of all the wealth and income in the country. That is just to give you an idea. Ten years later, only ten years, which is not much in the history of a country, in 1990, the same top 1 per cent held 26 per cent of all the income and wealth in our country.

Did those people invest? Did they make wonderful investments in the country? Not at all. They used the tax system to their advantage. Please note that everything they did was not illegal, far from it; it was legal, they were protecting their own interests. They used the tax system; they found loopholes in the act to protect as much as possible their wealth and revenue. This gives you an idea of the imbalance which prevails.

Another figure also shows that problems exist. Everyone agrees that the accumulated deficit is enormous, but 44 per cent of that deficit is due to compound interest. This means that 44 per cent of our accumulated deficit is not due to any actual spending. That part of the deficit is the result of compound interest. As you know, interest rates were very high for a period of 12 years. Even our interest rate was one third higher than the American average for 12 consecutive years. You can see the damage caused by that situation to an economy.

Is my time up, Mr. Speaker?

The Speaker: No, not yet. The hon. member has about six minutes left. He can resume after Question Period, that is after the vote which will take place this afternoon. I remind the hon. member that he must always speak to the Chair.

It being two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

[English]

RIGHTS OF THE FAMILY

Ms. Roseanne Skoke (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, in recognition of International Year of the Family my statement is prepared in defence of the family.

The conventional terms of debate in matters of political, economic and legal issues tend to focus on individual rights and the rights of state, not the rights of the family.

This is unfortunate and must change, for the family is the most important reality in our lives. To redefine the family to include homosexual and lesbian relationships is immoral, unjust and a violation of the rights of the family which are well founded in both Canadian and natural law.

The family unit is the basic institution of life and the solid foundation on which our forefathers built this great nation. The protection of families, family life and family values must be a priority with this government.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Quebec): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the member for Saint-Léonard said that the future government of Quebec will reject multiculturalism and will not uphold its commitments to cultural communities.

The member's statement is a perfect example of the kind of disinformation which is being spread around by advocates of a Trudeau-like multiculturalism, an archaic concept whose noble and bold principles no longer ring true in Quebec.

Quebec sovereignists are resolutely forward-looking. They are actively promoting, both in Quebec and in this House, a free society where social, political and economic policies make room for everybody, no matter their origins.

For us, Bloc members, as for the members of the Parti Quebecois, there can be no doubt: a sovereign Quebec will respect the rights of its communities in a free, democratic and French society. That is the truth.

AYRTON SENNA

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, the auto racing fraternity was saddened by the death of Ayrton Senna in a racing accident Sunday during the Grand Prix at Imola. Senna, three time world champion and a hero in his home country of Brazil, died doing what he did best. He was the acknowledged master of his craft and surely he seemed immortal.

His death is very similar to the untimely end of Canada's equally talented driver, Gilles Villeneuve.

To Ayrton Senna's family, his country and to all his close friends I extend my sympathy and my support in this sorrowful time.

JUSTICE

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Get tough with criminals is the message I am hearing in my riding, Mr. Speaker. Chatham, Ontario, with a population of only 43,000, is still reeling in shock and horror at the brutal murder last week of seven-year old Daniel Miller at the hands of a teenager.

Some residents are calling for vigilante justice and curfews. Mothers with kids in elementary school are calling me. Their children are afraid to go to school.

Let us beef up our justice system so Canadians feel secure that criminals are punished with more than a slap on the wrist. Calm and level heads must prevail. With sinister events recently in Chatham and Hull shaking our faith, I encourage and support the Minister of Justice as he reviews the Young Offenders Act.

The nation is waiting for the minister to act.

GENERAL MOTORS

Mr. Ivan Grose (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, today I address you to correct an impression that was left with this House last Thursday.

It was suggested that the largest, most efficient, highest quality General Motors plant in the world was in the federal riding of Durham. That is incorrect. Since this happened a letter and a telephone call have come to me. I therefore want to set the matter straight.

The aforementioned General Motors plant is located in the federal riding of Oshawa. The citizens of Oshawa have honoured me by sending me to this Chamber to defend their honour and pride against all those who would deign to move the best corporate citizen in this land into an adjoining riding.

I promise my constituents to be ever vigilant and never allow this type of hijacking of any of our assets.

MEDIC ALERT

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to remind the House that May is Medic Alert month. Medic Alert is an emergency medical information network accessible around the world. Over three-quarters of a million Canadians rely on Medic Alert bracelets and necklets to ensure emergency medical personnel are aware of their specific needs, whatever they may be.

Life Underwriters Association also holds an awareness campaign each May to promote the benefits of Medic Alert to Canadians.

• (1405)

Medic Alert identification can help save the lives of people suffering from diabetes, epilepsy, asthma, food and drug allergies and any hidden condition.

Please join me in congratulating the Medic Alert Foundation and the Life Underwriters Association for their excellent contribution to the health of Canadians.

LA SAINT-JEAN

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond-Guiral (Laval Centre): Mr. Speaker, Quebec's national holiday, la Saint-Jean, is a very special moment when all Quebecers have the opportunity to renew their commitment to their native land. Last year, over 200,000 people took part in the march down Sherbrooke street, and close to one million viewers watched the parade and the show on TV.

This year, several corporate partners from the business and communication sectors will help finance the festivities. Moreover, all Quebecers will be able to chip in by purchasing one of the 500,000 tickets which will be sold across Quebec at 5,500 different outlets.

The Bloc Quebecois strongly urges all Quebecers to give a hand to the National Holiday Committee so that, this year, the celebrations are once again a magical time of solidarity for all Quebecers.

CANADIAN NAVY

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, last Sunday Canadians remembered the Battle of the Atlantic. Canadians have enjoyed 50 years of peace and security in large part due to the contribution of the courageous sailors of the Canadian navy.

Today the navy has as its mission the continued assurance of this peace. Canada has the world's longest coastline and is a major trading nation with busy seaports on both coasts. Her maritime interests are undeniable, particularly the fisheries.

Our navy plays a significant international role in NATO and made no small contribution to bringing about the end of the cold war. In peacekeeping operations the professionalism of our navy is respected around the world.

Today almost 1,000 Canadian sailors and airmen are off the coast of Haiti and Yugoslavia doing their part to support UN operations.

As we remember those sailors of World War II, I call on all Canadians to also remember the men and women of the Canadian navy who serve us so well today.

KILLER CARDS

Ms. Colleen Beaumier (Brampton): Mr. Speaker, serial killer cards have an adverse effect on our youth by glorifying the deeds of violent murderers. I encourage all members of the House to support the ban on their production and distribution.

Over the past six weeks I have received letters from high school students in my riding telling me that they fear growing up in a society in which violent murderers are rewarded with the production of commemorative trading cards. They tell me they fear that peers who collect these cards will come to look at violent murders as a quick and easy way to achieve fame rather than seeing murder for what it really is: a cruel end to many lives beginning with the victim and ending with their family and friends.

Youth in Brampton are demanding an end to the production and distribution of these cards.

For the well-being of our children and for the well-being of the type of society this generation hands down to them, I again ask all parliamentarians to support a ban on the production and distribution of serial killer cards.

CANADIAN FORESTS

Mr. Derek Wells (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, it is National Forest Week and I would like to acknowledge the contribution that forests make to my riding and to all of Canada's social, environmental and economic well-being. Next to the fishery the forestry sector is one of the largest employers in South Shore, with 270 companies employing over 5,000 people with exports valued at $150 million a year.

The designation of Lunenburg county by the Canadian Forestry Association as the forestry capital of Canada for 1996 and the previous designation of Queens county in 1987 indicate just how significant this resource sector is. Forests are a part of the natural beauty of South Shore and serve to make it a popular tourist destination.

Most important, forests are a key component of our natural environment. They moderate the climate, prevent erosion, improve air quality and provide wildlife habitat.

This week we should not only be thinking about what our forests provide for us but what we can do to provide for them.

KILLER CARDS

Mrs. Sue Barnes (London West): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my concern and that of my constituents about the importation of serial killer cards and serial board games into Canada.

We do not need products that exploit violence and cruelty. It is appalling that in the midst of the recent senseless shootings and the flare-up of violent crime some would go to any length to promote and commercialize serial killer cards and serial board games.

• (1410)

I am heartened that the Minister of Justice tabled in this House on April 20 draft amendments to the Criminal Code and the custom tariff. These draft amendments would prohibit the sale or distribution of offensive material such as serial killer cards and serial board games to children under the age of 18.

Let there be no doubt that I along with my colleagues in this House will do my utmost to effectively deal with the commercialization of crime and still work within the Charter of Rights and Freedoms of our country.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup): Mr. Speaker, the agri-food sector is presently faced with an upheaval the like of which we have not seen in thirty years. During the States-General of the rural world and the Trois-Rivières Summit, Quebec took the lead and agreed on principles which will govern the agriculture of tomorrow. The challenges of globalization are enormous and Quebec committed itself to developing a competitive agricultural sector which would build on the social and economic strengths of the regions.

The future depends on the decentralization of powers towards regional decision-making units better in touch with reality. Unfortunately, shared jurisdiction in the area of agriculture and very different interests in the main agricultural areas of Canada, is not really helping the initiatives of Quebec farmers.

In this context, Quebec sovereignty is the necessary tool which will allow Quebec farmers to stay in the game.

REFERENDUM '94

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, at a news conference this morning Referendum '94 on proposed amendments to the Young Offenders Act was officially launched.

Referendum '94 is believed to be the world's first ever electronic referendum. In the next few weeks every registered voter in North Vancouver will be receiving a confidential PIN number which will allow them to vote by dialling a 1-900 number, using their touch tone telephone to enter PIN identification and then voting yes or no to the questions on the electronic ballot.

North Vancouver high school students 15 years and older will also take part in the vote using a special series of PIN numbers that separates their vote from the vote of the registered voters.

A Canada wide 1-900 access will permit all Canadians to be part of an opinion poll on the same three questions that will be asked to the voters of North Vancouver in Referendum '94.

BANGLADESH

Mr. Walt Lastewka (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, in the wake of the severe cyclone which battered the Bangladesh coast and offshore islands yesterday I would like to extend sincere condolences to the people of Bangladesh.

Winds of over 200 kilometres per hour and heavy rains swept over the area bringing widespread damage to crops and property. The Canadian High Commission in Bangladesh has confirmed that there have been many casualties from this storm.

I know all members of the House join me in mourning this terrible loss of life and property.

Our condolences are also extended to the members of the Bangladesh community in Canada. We join with them in mourning the passing of their friends and loved ones.

FISHERY OBSERVER CONTRACT

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John): Mr. Speaker, it has been brought to my attention that there are severe problems with the recent awarding of the fishery observer contract to Biorex.

This year the contract was up for renewal and the government went with the lowest bidder, Biorex, to save money. This saving is being consumed by the fact that the government has decided to train these inexperienced observers from Biorex under funding from CEIC. It is clear that by paying for this training the government is spending the same if not more by awarding the contract to Biorex when the government could have awarded the contract to the Scotia Fundy observers who are already trained and experienced.

How can the government justify spending $1.9 billion on a fisheries aid package while at the same time put 50 experienced and trained observers from Scotia Fundy out on the street?

BOSNIA

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of the House the plight facing children in war torn regions across the world, specifically in Bosnia.

Last week I attended an international conference on genocide in Bosnia-Hercegovina. One of the impressions from this meeting is how much some European nations are doing for the children and some women at risk, and how comparatively little Canada is doing. The most recent numbers I have been able to obtain indicate that Canada is only taking a mere few dozen children for temporary safe haven. For a society as generous and caring as ours I find it hard to believe that we have not done more.

• (1415)

As well, I want to invite all concerned members of this House to speak up on this issue and to consider forming a coalition to find ways of bringing together federal and provincial governments, private corporations and community groups in a joint effort to do what is right.

History will judge us harshly if we stand aside and allow an entire generation to be sacrificed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

MOHAWKS FROM KANESATAKE

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, three human rights organizations jointly condemned the intimidation and acts of violence suffered by Mohawks from Kanesatake. The Native Women's Association of Quebec, the Civil Liberties Union and the Canadian Action Committee on the Status of Women ask Quebec and Ottawa to intervene in order to guarantee respect for the rights of all those who live on this territory. These organizations are joining their efforts to those of local organizations that today met with the minister for the same reason.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Does the government intend to act on this request by three human rights organizations, especially considering that band leader Jerry Peltier did not even bother to consider meeting with these three organizations?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the reports are disturbing but these particular incidents are a matter for provincial jurisdiction. The Kanesatake area is not an Indian reserve and, as I said, these incidents are a matter for the province and should be brought to the attention of the Sûreté du Québec or the Government of Quebec.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, considering that several Mohawks have suffered intimidation, especially women whose Indian status had been newly restored, and considering the major role played by the federal government in maintaining law and order through the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, does the government intend to intervene and act on this distress call?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as I just said, maintaining law and order comes under the provincial government, and the RCMP has no role to play in this kind of situation.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, Michèle Rouleau, ex-president of the Native Women's Association of Quebec, said according to certain newspapers that if what happened in Kanesatake had happened anywhere else, criminal charges would have been laid.

Will the Prime Minister promise to intervene in this matter, since he has said repeatedly that the law should apply equally to everyone in Canada?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the administration of justice is a provincial matter, and complaints, if these matters come under the Criminal Code, are handled by the Attorney General for the Province of Quebec.

[English]

If the hon. member is talking about possible breaches of the Criminal Code then this is a matter strictly for the Attorney General of the province of Quebec and I would be happy to draw his attention to the concerns that have been reported in the press.

CHILD SUPPORT PAYMENTS

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, a decision handed down by the Federal Court-Appeal Division today confirms that the custodial parent should not have to pay tax on support payments and that the federal government has apparently wrongly collected several millions of dollars in taxes.

Can the Minister of Revenue tell us whether he will act upon this decision or appeal it before the Supreme Court?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of great interest to us. As the hon. member must know, in the budget tabled on February 22, reference was made to the federal-provincial family law committee which is expected to report to us on a number of issues relating to children and family and indeed more specifically, on the one raised by the court in the decision rendered today.

• (1420)

Our biggest concern, I must say, is first and foremost financial support for children and second, tax fairness. I can assure you that we will take into consideration the court's decision as well as the report of the federal-provincial family law committee.

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, more specifically, are we to understand that the Minister of Finance intends to implement the court's decision or that he will appeal it? Furthermore, how substantial are the amounts involved?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has to understand that the court just handed down its decision late this morning. We have received a copy of the decision, but have only had the chance to glance at it. We will now have discussions with the Minister of National Revenue, the Minister of Justice and certainly officials from our respective departments.

After that, we will be in a position to provide you with the answer you are looking for, but as I just said, our biggest concern is financial support for children and tax fairness.

The Speaker: I would remind the hon. minister that the hon. members must always address the Chair.

TAXATION

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday the Prime Minister in response to a question from the member for Calgary Centre said that Canadians cannot expect any tax relief "until all Canadians who want to work find jobs". This statement surprises and alarms business people, investors and unemployed Canadians who believe that tax relief is necessary to create jobs.

They feel that the Prime Minister has put the cart before the horse. My question to the Prime Minister is this. Does he or does he not believe that tax relief is necessary to create jobs and reduce unemployment?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have an economic policy that was enunciated in the budget and we said that the priority of this government was to create jobs.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): It is still the same.

We would like to be able to reduce taxes at this moment but it would increase the deficit. If the hon. leader of the Reform Party is telling us to increase the deficit, fine, we will consider that.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, you can reduce taxes without increasing the deficit if you reduce spending.

What we are trying to get at is the connection between tax relief and job creation. Let me put my question another way. Yesterday one of Asia's top bankers, Mr. David Li, told a conference that Canada was an unattractive place to invest Asian capital because of high taxes, public debt and unnecessary government regulations.

In other words, Mr. Li and his clients are reluctant to invest more in job creating activity in Canada because of our high tax and spending level.

My question to the Prime Minister is this. What does he have to say to Mr. Li and thousands of other investors like him who refuse to invest more in job creating activity in Canada until they see lower taxation and spending levels?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development -Quebec): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Reform Party is absolutely right when he says—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): I do not blame members for clapping. They do not have much chance.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): I'm sorry, Mr. Speaker, you can clap too. I take it back, Mr. Speaker. I withdraw.

• (1425)

The Speaker: I do not want the hon. minister to withdraw. I want him to get on with it.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Suitably admonished, Mr. Speaker.

It is for that reason that in the most recent budget we did not increase taxes. We recognize the burden that Canadian taxpayers face. At the same time it is the reason that one of the essences of the unemployment insurance reform being undertaken by the Minister of Human Resources Development was in fact not only a freeze of the anticipated increase in unemployment insurance premiums brought in by the previous government but an actual rollback next January 1.

The leader of the Reform Party referred to an intervention by a Hong Kong banker. May I just say that the International Monetary Fund last week said that Canada was going to lead all of the G-7 countries, either be number one or number two, in terms of growth and employment and it was going to be leading in low inflation. The fact is that the International Monetary Fund said that this country is creating jobs at a rate that it has not seen in a long, long time.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, contrary to what the Prime Minister said yesterday, it was the Minister of Finance who said a while back in this House that taxes are a cancer on job creation.

Millions of hard pressed Canadians are looking for a light at the end of the tunnel. They are looking for tax relief before they will spend more or invest more in job creating activities.

My question for the government is this. The government professes to have a target for deficit reduction. Does the government have a target for tax relief? Can the Prime Minister or the finance minister tell Canadians when they can expect real tax relief from this government?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development -Quebec): Mr. Speaker, the exact quote was that payroll taxes are a cancer on job creation and our target is next January 1.

PURCHASE OF PROPERTIES AT OKA

Mr. Maurice Dumas (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In a letter sent on December 20, 1993 to owners of houses located south of highway 344 in Oka, the minister wrote: "I can assure you that I am paying particular attention to this very complex issue." Five months later, these families are still waiting for concrete action from the government, since the evaluation of these houses was completed on December 15, 1993.

My question is this: How can the Minister of Indian Affairs explain such a delay in buying the properties located south of highway 344, when he has had all the information needed to settle the issue since December 15?

[English]

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I had what I thought was a very fruitful meeting with the APIK members. I just came from it. I have a statement that they have agreed to.

[Translation]

I promise to meet as soon as possible with Mr. Christos Sirros and APIK representatives to solve the problems of the properties located south of highway 344 and four enclaves and the security of that territory.

[English]

I hope that satisfies the hon. member.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Dumas (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, five months later, still nothing, despite the special attention that the minister says he is giving these desperate people.

Why does the minister not solve the problem of these 25 families right now?

[English]

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member knows that the former government purchased approximately 90 pieces of property which the Mohawks still have not taken over. Notwithstanding that, we allocated money for renovations and allocated money for a housing committee.

I dropped the precondition to negotiations that we would have to solve north of 344 before I would be prepared to bring a recommendation to cabinet. The meeting today was along those lines. Its progress is moving in the right direction.

I am very sympathetic to the problems that people south of 344 are facing. There is gunfire. I am not talking about a bit of gunfire. I am talking about thousands of rounds going off as early as last Saturday night. It is not a problem that they created. It is a problem that exists and a problem that we are prepared to solve.

• (1430)

I am glad the hon. member is inviting the federal government to go into Quebec and solve problems.

CANADA HEALTH ACT

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, "the Canada Health Act is the law of the land", to quote the health minister. My question is for the Prime Minister. Should the law of the land be applied equally to all Canadians?

[Translation]

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, Ontario is ignoring a principle of the Canada Health Act by refusing to reimburse Canadians fairly if they get sick in the U.S.

The Speaker: Would the member please put his question.

Mr. Hill (Macleod): This is specifically forbidden in the act. The Canada Health Act is unravelling.

Will the Prime Minister review the act, not to punish the provinces but to provide good health care for all Canadians?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there will be a meeting in June of all representatives of the provincial governments, the federal government and other people involved in health care services in Canada. This meeting will be presided over by the Prime Minister.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

Yesterday, this minister clearly indicated to this House that the Atlantic fishery workers unions had been consulted about the individual contracts that workers must sign, thus committing themselves to undergo training or do community work in order to receive their benefits. We checked and the unions were never consulted on this.

How can the minister reconcile the statement he made yesterday in the House with the confirmation that was given to me afterwards by the head of the fishery workers union, who said he had never been consulted on the issue of the individual contracts?

[English]

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I look forward to the opportunity to answer the member's question and in the process to set the record straight. I know the member is much interested in having the record set straight.

The straight facts are that all major unions associated with the Harvesters Council of Canada, all provinces of Atlantic Canada and the province of Quebec, all stakeholders on the private side, and literally everybody who moves, walks, talks, breathes and has any interest in the fishery, have been more broadly consulted by the Minister of Human Resources Development about this policy—and I might add by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans—than on any other policy heretofore introduced by a government anywhere on the planet earth.

Yes, this is one of the matters that was discussed.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, no consultations were ever held on the individual contracts. Despite what the minister said yesterday and today, this is an extremely important issue as workers must sign contracts committing them to do certain things in order to receive benefits. This question was never looked at and the unions were not consulted on it.

Can the minister now promise to meet with them to discuss this issue before putting this system in place?

[English]

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the question is a bit late because the Minister of Human Resources Development and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans committed months ago, not only to the dozens of meetings we have already held but to the many more meetings that are to be held to ensure that the program is properly implemented.

• (1435)

Despite the very difficult and real circumstances, despite the impact on people's lives, from which none of us gets any joy or seeks any advantage, may I say that one of the reasons this has gone superbly well has been the completely open attitude, the flexible attitude, the caring attitude and the consulting manner of the Minister of Human Resources Development, and that will continue.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Can the minister tell us: Do rank and file aboriginal peoples in Manitoba really want self-government at this time?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the question is: Do rank and file aboriginal people of Manitoba want self-government at this time? The response would be yes.

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

In the last six months I have received over 60 examples from Manitoba describing instances of misappropriation and fraudulent use of band funds, mismanagement of band funds for unauthorized purposes, interference of band leaders in the deliveries of programs, and fear and intimidation tactics including assault and band memberships being forcibly removed from the reserves.

In the self-government agreement being negotiated—

The Speaker: Order. I would ask the hon. member to please put his question.

Mr. Chatters: How will the minister assure the protection of individual rights and how will aboriginal leaders be held accountable to rank and file aboriginal people?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the premise of the hon. member's question is that we cannot trust these people because they cannot handle their affairs. I do not accept that premise.

What I see out there are honourable chiefs, honourable members, 400 of whom met at The Pas and unanimously said: "The time is now. We like your policy. We are prepared to work with you", and I intend to work with these people.

PUBLISHING INDUSTRY

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage. According to this morning's Toronto Star issue a secret memo, addressed to all members of the cabinet, told them what strategy to use when dealing with Ginn Publishing. They were advised not to make any statement on the sale of this company, and also to dismiss all possibilities of inquiry on the matter by a parliamentary committee.

Could the Minister of Canadian Heritage confirm the existence of such a secret memo and tell us if this is the reason why an inquiry on this sale has been rejected by the cabinet and by the Parliamentary Committee on Canadian Heritage?

[English]

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, the secret memo the member refers to is so secret that none of the ministers involved had seen it or heard of it in fact until this morning; but I am told there was some advice contained in a communications memo prepared although I am not sure by whom.

They tell me that it said among other things: "Be boring and dull". I can assure the hon. member I have been doing my best to fulfil that qualification. It has worked so far, has it not?

An hon. member: Some things come naturally.

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I am outraged at seeing the government turn into a farce a question dealing with Canadian Heritage.

• (1440)

How can the Minister of Canadian Heritage still pretend he is defending the Canadian Heritage when his only concerns are to give answers that leave no trace since they are strictly oral and to blindly follow this memo instead of trying to shed light on this sale to American interests?

[English]

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, as I was about to say a moment ago, the important thing that was also contained in this memo was to grind down the questioner with facts.

Unfortunately the facts have not been of great interest to the hon. member who has put a number of questions on this file; but the facts include the fact that when Investment Canada approved the acquisition of Maxwell Macmillan limited by Prentice-Hall, it approved the acquisition of a company which was in receivership.

The result of the acquisition was the preservation of about 100 jobs in Canada, as well as the acquisition of a series of undertakings given by Prentice-Hall and its owner, Paramount, with respect to the distribution of publications within Canada, as well as the continuation of as many employees as possible.

There is a series of undertakings there. We received undertakings which we think are meaningful and which made this a good deal for Canada.

The facts are not of a lot of interest around here a lot of the time, but it is time members started to take recognition of the fact that in this case we got a good deal for Canada.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplemental to the one previously asked in the House with regard to today's Federal Court of Appeal decision on child support payments and is for the finance minister.

In recent weeks many members on all sides of the House have spoken in support of changes to the Income Tax Act with regard to how child support payments are taxed.

Will the minister please take into consideration those members' views before making any decision on the approach the government will take?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development -Quebec): Mr. Speaker, it is particularly appropriate that this question would be put to me today by the member for Nepean who has shown such a consistent interest in this subject and in fact has her own bill before the House.

As the member knows and as a number of members in the House know, prior to the last budget there was extensive consultation. It was as a result of suggestions made by members in the House, and particularly in this caucus, that in the last budget we made reference to the potential disparities that might exist and our intention to await the decisions of a federal-provincial family law commission dealing with this subject among many others.

I can assure the member that we will take her advice and the advice of other members in the House into account. Our major concern is that the financial support for these children be as good as it can possibly be and that tax equity be maintained.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

The minister had the opportunity for some tough talk over the weekend. He promised to get tough and to close loopholes for deportable criminals.

Last week the immigration and refugee board gave refugee status to a man convicted in Canada of raping an 18-month old child.

In light of this fact could the minister tell the House exactly what concrete measures have been taken during his tenure to toughen up and to protect Canadians from criminals his department allows to stay in Canada?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I said last week and I repeat that in the large number of cases of individuals who appeal to the immigration appeal division my department is not in favour of staying or overturning those deportations.

The member ought to use his words very carefully because it is not true when he characterizes my department as being against the individual's deportation.

Second, I think the member owes it to the immigration file not to suggest somehow that the entire situation is out of whack. The member should not consider immigration in the way we sometimes consider airplanes, by the ones that do not land, because 99 per cent of the airplanes land at our airports seven days a week, 24 hours a day.

• (1445)

It is the same for immigration. Of the 1,100 cases appealed last year only 16 in terms of criminality were overturned. I admit that some cases ought not to have been overturned and I was very honest and candid with one case last week.

Before last week I said it is not incompatible to have a fair and progressive immigration policy which also means being tough in applying the law to those who seek to break or abuse it. We are not backtracking on that. We will be bringing those amendments to this Chamber so that we can target those individuals who by their actions give all immigrants a black mark.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, it is that one plane crash that causes horror and devastation. That is the one we are talking about today.

Here is a fact. Just two short weeks ago this minister disbanded the permanent residents unit which tracks down and apprehends the most dangerous deportable criminals in Canada. This is the sort of criminal this minister's appeal division and refugee board seem to enjoy putting on Canadian streets.

My question for the minister—

The Speaker: Order, order. I am sure the hon. member is going to put his question. I encourage the hon. member to not in any way impute motive to any other member in the House. It makes things that much more difficult. I am sure that if the hon. member would want to withdraw any imputation of motive to the hon. minister, I would invite him to do that before he continues his question.

Mr. Hanger: Mr. Speaker, if I have said something that offends this minister, then I withdraw it. However, I am talking about his department.

My question to the minister is this: How can this minister in good conscience continue to preach about getting tough and at the very same time disband that unit which provides Canadian families the most protection from dangerous deportable criminals?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I said last week that this member does not have a monopoly on virtue or concern and that I do not take any pleasure whatsoever in seeing those individuals who do not merit our consideration walking our streets. The member should do justice to how all members feel about a number of cases.

In answering the question I am going to ask the member to get his facts right and perhaps he could listen. For example, in Ontario since 1992 there has been a reduction of general immigration staff from 1,560 to 1,040. In the meantime, in Ontario, in terms of investigative enforcement officers, the staff has increased from 50 to 60. Five of the six individuals who were reduced in Toronto at the behest of this minister, those individuals have not been reassigned. They are still there.

Also, the unit was not—

The Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Joliette.

PUBLISHING INDUSTRY

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, in the week-end issue of The Ottawa Citizen, it was reported that the cabinet had turned down a strategy preventing foreign take-overs of our cultural industries.

My question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage. Can the minister confirm this information and could he shed some light on the reason why he refuses to put in place measures to protect Canadian cultural industries so as to avoid another fiasco like the Ginn Publishing disaster?

• (1450)

This time, I hope that the real Minister of Canadian Heritage is going to rise and answer my question.

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage): Mr. Speaker, to this day, I have not presented the cabinet with an overall policy concerning the protection of Canadian cultural industries. Therefore, the cabinet has not taken it into consideration nor made a decision in this regard.

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I did not say policy; I said strategy.

I have a supplementary. In view of the fact that 80 p. 100 of school books in Canada are sold by foreign-controlled companies, can the Minister of Canadian Heritage, the real one, tell us when he intends to present a policy to prevent what is left of our publishing industry from falling into foreign hands?

The Speaker: I would remind all hon. members that when they are addressing a minister, it is the real minister they are talking to. So, there is no need to mention it, please.

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage): Mr. Speaker, there is already a policy and I intend to give it some more teeth.

APPLE INDUSTRY

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

Next Monday, May 9, there will be a large protest at the Osoyoos border crossing in south central British Columbia. The protest is being staged by B.C. fruit growers angry at the inaction by this government on the issue of dumping of Washington apples into Canada.

According to figures supplied by the growers, the industry has lost $1.6 million after only eight weeks of dumping. By the time the Canadian International Trade Tribunal gets around to hearing the complaint, the industry estimates that $25 million could well be lost before the dumping is halted.

Yesterday the minister said he needs proof of damage from the industry. Will the minister acknowledge that industry has supplied the proof and undertake self-initiated action before the Canadian International Trade Tribunal now, before any more growers are hurt by this inaction?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as I said yesterday, this problem arose because the Canadian International Trade Tribunal, a Canadian body, ruled against the Canadian apple growers.

It is therefore imperative if we are to win in a subsequent appeal to that body which would follow a national revenue ruling, that we have the clear evidence to make sure that its previous decision is overturned.

The dilemma the hon. member and I have in this instance is that very much the same evidence was provided in the initial hearing of potential damage and was rejected. It is therefore imperative before we go before the Canadian International Trade Tribunal for a second time that we have what I would describe as an airtight case in this regard.

As I said yesterday and will repeat today, the consequences to the Canadian apple industry of a second defeat probably would be catastrophic.

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre): Mr. Speaker, indeed I agree with the minister that we need to have good factual information. He is quite right in that. I believe the B.C. fruit growers are fully aware of the difficulty that is there. They believe these numbers are correct.

I challenge the minister to recognize that we are dealing with perishable fruit that cannot wait five or six months. Will the minister act now to speed up the process involved and have the complaints heard by the Canadian International Trade Tribunal so that others will not suffer in the same way in the future, that is, the next crop that is coming up.

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, certainly I agree with the hon. member that it is particularly important to make sure this damage to the industry which I believe is taking place does not continue in the future, particularly into the next crop year.

• (1455)

It is important to note this is a fairly technical area. We have to have information on costing. We have to have information on import pricing. We have to have information on injury.

I will be quite willing on the representations of the hon. member and indeed the hon. member who questioned me yesterday in this regard to review once again with my officials the information made available to us from the apple growers. We will check with legal counsel once again to see whether at this point we have evidence which can guarantee a win.

Let me repeat that it would be thoroughly irresponsible for me or any other minister to—

The Speaker: The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

ADVERTISING CONTRACTS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works. Following a statement by the Prime Minister on November 4, the government announced its plans to review its policies with respect to the awarding of advertising, polling and communications contracts. Is the Parliamentary Secretary now in a position to inform the House of the corrective action the government intends to take to clean up the mess inherited from the previous government?

[English]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services): Mr. Speaker, it was on November 4 that the Prime Minister made a clear and unequivocal statement to Canadians that the former government policies with respect to polling, advertising and communications would be reviewed.

This review is now complete. There will be new guidelines announced in the very near future. They will respect the principles of accountability, fairness, openness and transparency.

It is because of efforts such as those undertaken by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works and Government Services who have spearheaded the charge for change in this area that this government will return integrity to government and will return integrity for Canadians.

[Translation]

I am very pleased to announce that new guidelines will be adopted. These will show that our policies are equitable, fair, open and transparent for everyone.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICE

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. The weekend newspapers reported that the RCMP was currently investigating an alleged case of influence peddling within the Correctional Service of Canada and the National Parole Board and that certain charges could be laid very shortly against employees.

Can the Minister confirm that an investigation is indeed under way into allegations of influence peddling within these agencies and that charges could be laid against certain commissioners?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that an investigation is under way, but I cannot provide the House with any additional information at this time.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, in light of his response, can the minister tell us whether the allegations of influence peddling involve any persons other than those mentioned in the weekend newspapers?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the RCMP and the Correctional Service of Canada are currently investigating this matter very thoroughly. When additional information becomes available, I will be happy to convey it to the hon. member.

CHILD SUPPORT PAYMENTS

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. It is on a matter that has been discussed earlier today.

As we heard, a landmark decision was rendered today by the Federal Court of Appeal that will fundamentally change the approach to child support payments in this country. Justice Hugessen ruled that Suzanne Thibodeau was discriminated against on the grounds that the inequity, the inequality created for separated custodial parents is discriminatory and imposes a burden on them not imposed on others.

The Federal Court has taken the lead in recognizing the importance of stabilizing the family unit, whether you are together or apart. Will the minister follow suit and do the same?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, may I take the hon. member's question to relate to the issue of appeal.

If the hon. member is asking whether we are going to appeal the judgment, may I first of all say that although I have received the reasons over the lunch hour, I have not yet had the advantage of reading them. I know there is a dissenting judgment. I will be reading them with care and interest. It is a very important judgment. Once I have had an opportunity to consider the judgment I will be speaking with the client ministry to determine from a policy perspective what the minister would like to do and to make my recommendation.

• (1500)

Let me say that once I have read the judgment I will be happy to discuss the matter further with the hon. member. However, I take it her question related to appeal and that is my response if that was the point she wanted to raise.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, having heard the hon. minister I have no supplementary question. I thank him for his answer.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

The tragedy of youth crime is a ticking time bomb in this country, yet the minister has said that he does not expect a bill to be passed by this Parliament until late this year, possibly next.

These delays are simply not acceptable. In light of the urgent need for changes to the Young Offenders Act will the minister fast-track his agenda and will he give his undertaking to this House that a bill will be passed before this House adjourns for the summer holidays?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, any such undertaking would require a degree of control by a member of Parliament over the process of government that I am not sure any of us possess.

However, let me respond directly to the hon. member's question. I respect and to a large degree share the hon. member's sense of urgency in this issue. As I have said in the past, as recently as yesterday, I expect that within weeks I am going to introduce legislation in this House with respect to changes to the Young Offenders Act that we think are in the public interest.

Let me also emphasize to the hon. member that while we are concerned about crime in this country, it is not the enactment of a change to a statute, it is not the introduction of new legislation that is going to come to grips with the underlying problem we face. Quite apart from the criminal justice system we have to take a wide ranging, holistic approach to crime in this country if we are going to make real progress.

Yes, there will be changes to the Young Offenders Act but I hope the hon. member realizes that is one of a variety of responses that we must muster to this social issue.

BILL C-91

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry. It concerns Bill C-91, the drug patent legislation.

Since this bill passed in the last Parliament drug prices have skyrocketed and Canadian consumers are being gouged with high prices for prescription drugs.

The minister knows this to be true because he has stated he will be reviewing Bill C-91 soon. The minister is also aware that the Leader of the Opposition supports the wishes of multinational drug companies in Quebec.

To the minister, is the government going to continue to play politics with people's health by waiting until after the Quebec election to make any changes to this bill or is he going to repeal this disastrous legislation now to protect all Canadian consumers?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, certainly the member's position is clear on the issue. I thank him for that.

As the Prime Minister said in the House last week, the review that was promised during the election campaign is one which is ongoing. We are looking at the question of prices. We are also conscious of our international commitments under the Uruguay round. Likewise we are conscious of the fact that the present legislation, Bill C-91, contains within it a statutory review mechanism which will occur prior to the completion of this Parliament.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, during my supplementary to the minister of Indian affairs, the member for Hamilton East shouted "racist" at me and I find the remark very offensive and insulting. I would ask the Speaker to ask the member to withdraw that.

The Speaker: I will review the blues and if it is stated in there I will take whatever action is necessary. If it is necessary I will come back to the House.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT AGREEMENTS ACT

The House resumed from May 2 consideration of the motion that Bill C-22, an act to respecting certain agreements concerning the redevelopment and operation of terminals 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson International Airport, be read the second time and referred to a committee; of the amendment; and of the amendment to the amendment.

The Speaker: It being 3 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the subamendment to the motion for second reading stage of Bill C-22.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY—TAX SYSTEM REFORM

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

Mr. Gérard Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate being able to continue after Oral Question Period. Earlier, when I rose, I was followed by a parliamentary secretary who made a comment. When the time comes to vote on the Bloc Quebecois motion for the creation of a committee to review public finance management, I hope that the parliamentary secretary, who is a Liberal member, will make good on his comments and support our motion.

I explained that a child is burdened with a $20,000 debt the minute he is born. I also talked about students and workers, and I would like to follow up by telling you about the elderly. Our seniors are overtaxed. These people have paid school, municipal, provincial and federal taxes throughout their life. Many of these people raised large families but managed to save a bit of money in RRSPs to enjoy a more comfortable retirement. Unfortunately, the government is still going after these people by forcing them to pay tax when they cash in their RRSPs.

Indeed, in his recent budget, the Minister of Finance decided to tax all seniors with a revenue of $26,500 and up. School and municipal taxes still have to be paid by those who keep their home. Retired seniors with a low income still pay the provincial sales tax as well as the GST. Many people who have reached the age of 65 continue to work because they do not have the means to enjoy a comfortable retirement. Seniors should benefit from major exemptions, so that people can retire no later than when they turn 60, or even 55 if possible.

That would open up new jobs for our young people, for those who graduate from university and wait for the government to create jobs.

The government will tax seniors till the very end, that is until their funerals. Undertaking and burial services are taxed. The GST applies to those services as well as to the cost of a coffin. We will have paid all of our lives and until our death.

The government is racking its brains to find new sources of revenues, but it will choose the easiest solution and increase taxes. The government urgently needs to set up a committee to review the reduction of government expenditures. In its red book, the Liberal government said it wanted to get rid of the GST. Of course, the government wants a hidden tax, that would increase from 7 to 12 per cent. It also wants to tax food, education, books, computers, all basic education needs, prescription drugs and health care.

The Bloc Quebecois will strongly oppose any effort by the government to tax prescription drugs and health care among other things, since poverty is rampant in Quebec and in Canada. A lot of people cannot even afford bread and butter.

I think the most urgent thing is to set up this committee. We are going through harsh economic times, and the cost of living is still very high for low-income and very poor families. More and more, wages are being frozen and people are working at the minimum wage. We have to deal with high levels of unemployment and welfare, smuggling, the underground economy, a rise in criminal activity and the fact that our prisons, in Quebec and in Canada, are more and more packed-full. Who pays for all of this? It is our society and our workers.

Under the Conservative government, we were told that the GST was supposed to reduce the deficit, but the deficit has grown ever since. Despite GST revenues of $14 billion, the deficit has tripled during the last nine years the Conservatives were in office.

Finally, I hope the government will set up a committee made up of course of government members who are responsible for running this country. In the latest budget, the Liberal government showed its inability to efficiently manage the public finances. If that committee is to be increasingly efficient, the government should add to its team a group of Bloc Quebecois members because they really want the government to lower taxes or at least freeze them for years to come.

They will have to review all the overlapping and duplication occurring in this government. In Quebec, we do not need the federal government to manage our health program, nor do we need the federal government to manage our education and occupational training, our manpower or our social programs.

It is urgent to cut on travelling expenses for ministers, senators, members of committees and parliamentary associations. Last week I attended a on Public Works meeting and asked the Minister of Public Works if he was ready to say in front of the committee that he would issue a public call for tenders in the papers to give those who wanted to bid the chance to do so; I also asked him if he would accept the lowest bid coming from a compliant bidder. He answered no, that he could not commit himself to that. The government must manage public funds; if businesses were managed like the government, they would all go bankrupt a few weeks after opening. Not a single business is managed like the government.

• (1535)

As a member of the finance committee, if the Liberal Party government invites me to do so, I will be happy to assist and work hard to find places where we can cut out the fat from government operations, items that could bring the budget down.

In conclusion, I would like to congratulate the members of the Bloc Quebecois and of the Reform Party who are concerned and worried because of the increase in the last budget.

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is to be commended for his tremendous understanding of senior citizens. Like me, the hon. member represents a rural riding. When we are in a rural area, we realize that the problems may not be as obvious to the government as the problems of our big cities. I have tried to listen carefully to what the hon. member had to say.

In our area, there are seniors who worked all their lives to save a few dollars, and it certainly was not easy. These people worked in factories. They worked in the fisheries. They worked on farms, and I am referring to my own constituency. And, the government is going to take some of those hard-earned savings away from them. When we consider the multinationals which pay practically no taxes and family trusts which are not taxed at all, I say there is some incredible injustice in this country, and especially in rural communities.

I have a brief question for the hon. member. He said, and perhaps he would like to repeat what he said or rephrase it: Is there not another way to let senior citizens take advantage of the few years they have left, people who worked from the age of 7 until 65, at one, two or three jobs, and who worked for as long as 18 hours a day?

I speak on behalf of these people in rural areas and also on behalf of people in the cities, because they worked very hard as well. Is there no other way to get more taxes from the big corporations? He commented on that, and I wish he would expand a little on family trusts and duplication.

There is also the forestry sector. A lot is being done, both provincially and federally. One example is the so-called sociétés de la Vallée, which have a staff of engineers and technicians. What often happens is that two technicians from different associations turn up at the same place, so would it not be a good idea to have only one technician visit the landowner and be able to offer the whole range of services instead of having two technicians going separately, each with his own proposals? I would like to ask the hon. member whether he could expand a little on this.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I must admit that the hon. member for Matapédia—Matane did listen very carefully to my comments about seniors.

As I said earlier, seniors pay taxes from the day they are born until they retire. Even after they retire, the government still finds a way to claw back by taxing any income of $26,500 or more they derive from their pension funds, their RRSPs and other financial resources they managed to set aside while raising their families.

• (1540)

Today's families are a little smaller than they used to be; families with 9, 10 or 12 children were not uncommon when I was growing up. Today, they are not as common but it was hard for the man who was the sole income-earner in his family to support his family and save some money for retirement at the same time.

I also said, and I am sure that in my riding of Charlevoix, from Petite-Rivière-Saint-François to Baie-Comeau, some seniors have enough money to survive, but many more were farmers, worked for minimum wage, or had to leave the region, while the mother had to raise the children on her own.

Of course, as the hon. member for Matane said, the committee we want to set up could look at family trusts, for instance, and also look at the additional corporate revenues the government does not want to tax, preferring to tax capital.

We have our work cut out for us. We have been elected for the next four years and I think we in the Bloc Quebecois must not be prevented from doing our job. Liberal members opposite often accuse us of criticizing government actions. I hope they do not want to prevent us from doing our job.

I am convinced that the silent majority is not here in this House but in people's living rooms; they may be watching us on TV and when they see us on the street, in stores or in other places, they congratulate us and tell us they agree with our comments in this House.

I did not complete extensive studies in accounting and I am not a tax expert either. I am a construction worker like most people in my riding and that of Matane. I am pleased to represent them and be able to address them as equals.

So, Mr. Speaker, I think I have taken enough time to respond to my colleague from Matane—Matapédia and I will let others take part in the debate.

[English]

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak to hon. members on a subject that is close if not always dear to the hearts of Canadians.

[Translation]

Taxes mean jobs for the unemployed, hospital beds for the sick, better schools for our children. They affect the quality of life of our seniors and the protection and support of Canadians in need.

They affect modern transportation and communication systems, investment and competition. They concern workers' compensation, pension plans, health and safety, environmental and labour standards.

[English]

Taxation gives governments the resources needed to provide Canadians with the social and economic programs that they need and demand. Ultimately, the discussion of taxation is a discussion about our prosperity as a society.

Taxation has traditionally been a contract between citizens and governments to deliver these programs in exchange for the moneys that Canadians give as a result of their hard work and based on their financial ability.

In recent years we have seen the viability of that contract renegotiated as reflected in the phenomenon of the underground economy and also in smuggling. Faith in that contract and the trust that is needed to maintain it will dissolve unless governments give Canadians the best possible value for their tax dollars.

[Translation]

The government is determined to act in such way that Canadians again trust their government. Without that trust, we will be unable to provide the necessary programs, to reduce the deficit and eventually to lower the tax burden of Canadians.

• (1545)

[English]

We must let the public know what is going on, what the choices are, and why we are making those choices.

As revenue minister my commitment is to ensure at all times the integrity of our voluntary tax system. I recognize public confidence in our tax system is something that we have to earn. I and all members of the Department of National Revenue work every day to do just that.

We are working to reduce the burden of compliance, to ensure Canadians get real value from the revenue administration, and to guarantee fairness throughout the tax system.

Revenue Canada has come a long way in its efforts to improve administration.

[Translation]

We believe that we must be attentive to the needs of individuals and companies. We must adapt to a constantly changing society and to the business community.

[English]

We must be fair and equitable and I believe we are. We must be transparent and we are. We must listen to Canadians and we do.

Specifically we have a problem resolution program to help find solutions for taxpayers with difficulties. We have a voluntary disclosure policy for those with special problems, particularly problems of non-compliance. We have a declaration of taxpayers' rights to ensure equity in the system.

We listen on an ongoing basis and we consult with the provinces, the small business advisory committee, the large business advisory committee, the charities consultative committee, the seniors advisory committee, and the members of Parliament who act quite properly on behalf of their constituents in bringing problems or difficulties to my attention.

Tomorrow marks six months, the half-year of my time as Minister of National Revenue. In that period 1,165 letters have come to me from elected officials. Virtually they have been exclusively from members of the House and senators, although occasionally I get letters from members of provincial legislatures, mayors and city councillors.

I repeat that it is quite right and proper for representations to be made to the Minister of National Revenue by members of Parliament. I assure members of the House in all parties, all of which have sent me correspondence about concerns of their constituents, that all such letters are treated by us as fast as we can and as thoroughly as we can. The reviews we give to the cases are as fair as possible. I should add that in every case the decision ultimately rendered is entirely in accordance with taxation laws.

We have introduced in Revenue Canada a very successful E-file program that processes returns more quickly and gets the money owed to Canadians back to them faster than ever before. At the present time returns or refund cheques on E-file run about 11, 12 or 13 days. Of course that is an average. In some cases we get cheques out to people within the week.

Through the administrative consolidation of customs and excise and taxation we have created opportunities for significant administrative savings for taxpayers. This one measure alone, Bill C-2, the first substantive bill introduced in the House after the new government took office, has already resulted in a saving of approximately $30 million through improved administration.

[Translation]

We are working with the provinces to tackle the underground economy through co-operation and increased exchange of information. I must add that Quebec was the first province to conclude an agreement with the federal government on this subject.

• (1550)

[English]

The solutions of today require co-operation among all Canadians, individuals, businesses and governments, because the totality of the three levels of government represents the real tax burden on Canadians. There may be three levels of government, but it is certainly true there is only one level of taxpayer.

Federal, provincial and local governments must adopt a harmonized approach to ensure a fair and integrated tax system based on the principles of equity, efficiency and effectiveness, words that are in this motion.

If all three levels of government work together—and that has certainly been the cry of witness after witness before the finance committee—we can have in the future the possibility of reducing the tax burden on Canadians.

[Translation]

The department and I as revenue minister regularly meet with representatives of the provinces and we will continue to do so in order to obtain tax administration improvements quickly.

Canadians want solutions to tax problems when these arise. Canadians want reform but not disruption.

[English]

That is what we are doing. We are implementing reforms on a constant, ongoing basis, always with a strong sense that Canadians whether as individuals or in their businesses have invested a great deal of time and effort in understanding the existing tax system.

When we reform various elements of the system we need to give everyone the time to understand and accommodate the changes, the time to build on the knowledge they already have, rather than throw everything out and start again.

The motion we are debating today seeks equity, efficiency and effectiveness in the tax system. The government, the Minister of Finance and myself in particular are seeking to give substance to those principles with a pragmatic approach in which the benefits of change are constantly being weighed against the cost of disruption. We are also trying to do so with a high degree of sensitivity to the reality that these principles must be balanced.

Equity sometimes comes at a cost in terms of efficiency, for example. It is fine to pursue lofty goals, but when the lofty goals conflict one has to recognize there is a need for compromise and understanding. That spirit has motivated our approach to reform in taxation so far. However I should add we are under no illusion that balancing these forces and these reforms certainly does not preclude action.

Let me just read the titles of some bills which we have had in the House since Parliament began in January of this year. The first bill, Bill C-2, an act to amend the Department of National Revenue. It is the one I mentioned earlier. It is the consolidation of the administration of customs, excise and taxation in one department.

Bill C-5, an act to amend the customs tariff, to which royal assent was given on March 24 of this year. This extended the general preferential tariff for certain countries to June 30, 2004 unless an earlier date is fixed by order in council.

Bill C-9, an act to amend the Income Tax Act. Bill C-11, an act to amend the Excise Act, the Customs Act and the Tobacco Sales to Young Persons Act. Bill C-13, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act. Bill C-15, an act to amend certain income tax law amendments.

These are the acts relating to improving revenue administration in Canada which have been introduced in the House since January. We all know the number of acts that have been introduced is not extensive. We are relatively new in this Parliament but let us think about how many acts have related to the revenue portfolio and to the concept of improving and refining the tax system. We have had a veritable torrent of bills that all have as their objective improving the tax system.

• (1555)

I believe the record of reform the motion seeks is already here. I can promise the House and members who have spoken that there will be more. However as we do it, I wish to add, we will continue to be very sensitive because in our view there is a baby in this particular bath that we need to take care of very carefully. The reason I cannot support the motion is that in essence it would throw out the baby with the bath water, would throw out the bathtub and in essence gut the House as well.

The approach of the motion would not achieve the equity, efficiency and effectiveness that I believe we all seek. It would only serve to create confusion, resentment, fear and costs, all of which we in government—and I am sure members of the opposition—should seek to avoid in the tax system.

Canadians are sensible people. They do not want change just for the sake of change. They want improvements with the minimum disruption that can be had to achieve those improvements. That message is coming through loud and clear in the hearings of the finance committee dealing with replacement of the goods and services tax.

We in government have heard that message. We heard it before the election. We heard it from our constituents after the election and specifically in the finance committee on the GST, again an area of reform of the tax system I did not mention in my listing of the bills. We have heard it there time after time after time.

The government will continue to change the tax system in areas where the benefit clearly outweighs the cost. We will continue to seek to improve the operation of the tax system and the efficiency of the department that administers it, namely the Department of National Revenue. We will continue to consult and discuss with other governments, with individuals, with experts, with academics, and with businesses. We will continue to enforce the law as it is written until it is changed by a vote in Parliament.

Our effectiveness in this regard is essential to securing the one true essential of an equitable, efficient and effective tax system: the long term confidence Canadians have in the tax system and in the value of the services they receive from the government. When we act against tax cheaters and smugglers we are acting to support that confidence. It is not fair at all that jobs are lost because of tax cheating or smuggling. It is not fair when revenue is lost because some people are dishonest, when the deficit grows and when legitimate business is forced to compete unfairly against those who evade their taxes.

[Translation]

Because of individuals who do not pay their fair share of tax, it is difficult, if not impossible, for governments at any level to satisfy Canadians' demands for economic growth, lower deficits and meaningful jobs for the unemployed.

Canada is a wonderful, successful country, the envy of the world. But I ask members of this House and all Canadians the following question.

[English]

Can we afford to have one sick child turned away from a hospital because lost revenue has created a lack of beds? Can we allow honest and productive Canadians not to enjoy retirement in reasonable comfort and happiness because tax cheating has destroyed the value of their pensions? Can we tolerate a single business to close and lay off hardworking Canadians because we cannot guarantee a level playing field with their competitors who do not pay their taxes as they should? Clearly the answer is no.

We seek the objectives of equity, efficiency and effectiveness for the tax system. We believe we can achieve that, as I trust I have shown in this speech today, by constantly striving to improve the system. I support, and I am sure all members of this House support, equity, efficiency and effectiveness. But the method of completely throwing out the present system, completely throwing it out to change, is not in my view in the interest of this country or the Canadian taxpayer.

• (1600)

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member's speech. He touched on a few areas. One was the underground economy. There are a few questions that I would like to ask the hon. member.

He talked of a new tax to take the place of the GST. People are a little bit apprehensive about this. Everyone wants to see the GST cleaned up, me especially, but people are starting to worry that maybe this new tax might include all consumption of food and so forth. They worry about the startup costs on this. Are we looking at another startup cost along the lines of the GST?

There is another thing I would like to ask the hon. member. When I started to work I enjoyed working two shifts. It paid me to work two shifts. Today workers sit down and they figure out right to the hour when it no longer pays them to work because taxes now take over. I see this as a lost revenue because the jobs do not get done. In many cases they get put over to be done the next year. Small outfits that hire people in the bush and so forth make up to a certain amount of capital and then when the tax bite becomes too big they lay the people off to go on unemployment insurance. I wonder if the minister has looked into this area at all.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the series of questions which he has asked.

He talked first of the replacement for the goods and services tax, the GST. On that I think we are generally aware in this House that the committee, members of the Reform Party, members of the Bloc and members of the government party are at the present time sequestered writing a report and suggesting alternatives to the GST. To suggest whether the tax that they might be writing, of which indeed I do not know what they may be writing, would affect food or some other product not currently taxed is difficult, indeed impossible for me to answer directly as I am sure the hon. member recognizes.

He talked correctly of the apprehensiveness of people when faced with a new tax. I suggest to the hon. member that in fact was very much the theme of what I said this afternoon. People want to have certainty with the tax system as far as it is possible as well as having improvements here and there.

This is why I stressed that this incremental approach to improving the tax system is probably the best way because it reduces apprehension. You are able to deal with one section here, another section there. You are not saying: "Look, we are throwing the whole tax system out the window and starting afresh". That would be a point where perhaps the apprehension which the hon. member has correctly identified would come closer to panic.

That is why I believe it is very important in a resolution such as this to make sure that we recognize the importance of that incremental approach. That is why I listed all those bills that have been brought before this House, plus the reference to the finance committee of the GST. All that work has been going on in the last four months by members of Parliament of all parties as they discuss these bills to show Canadians that we are trying to improve the tax system, trying to get better results and more efficiency.

I think his concern over apprehension of it by taxpayers is something which I completely share and was indeed very fundamental in what I said this afternoon.

He also mentioned startup costs, if I may just continue on that. Once again that is a very important consideration. A lot of time and effort is invested in any tax system. There were many millions of person hours spent studying it, working on it, preparing it. Tens of hundreds of thousands, probably millions of person hours were devoted over the last three or four weeks as people in Canada prepared their tax returns.

• (1605)

It is important for governments not to get carried away by bland ideas and great principles and ignore the practicality of making changes to the tax system.

I thank the hon. member for his questions.

[Translation]

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to put my question to the Minister of National Revenue who said earlier that Canadians were responsible people, and I am sure Quebecers are as well, in particular the people of my riding.

On the other hand, I wonder if the minister himself is acting responsibly because while over $10 billion is devoted to unemployment, while funding for the business assistance program is frozen, employment centres in my riding are telling me they are out of money. Self-employment assistance, the SEA, is frozen and enormous amounts are paid in UI benefits, but people who want to start up a business cannot get any assistance. When the BDC in our ridings cannot manage directly the capital stock, then it is not clear; you must become profitable. The BDC is almost turning into a credit union or a bank.

Here is my question to the minister: Is this what he calls being reasonable, practical? If he is serious about helping the people in my riding, in Quebec and in Canada, should the way to go not be these programs that can help the small and medium-sized businesses and self-employed workers put their businesses in order? All that my constituents and those in other ridings as well want is to create jobs for themselves. They do not want UI benefits. They are proud people, very proud people indeed.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, I agree that what we want and what Canadians want are jobs. I agree with the hon. member—and I congratulate him on his remarks—that the problem we are facing today is job shortage combined with difficulties starting up new businesses. I agree that this makes for a very difficult situation.

I must add that it is very difficult for a government with a $500 billion plus debt to ignore the national debt, to ignore the deficit and to create jobs to help businesses. Not all programs are frozen. There is the unemployment insurance program and other programs he mentioned. That is why it is very important to get a report on this, a report that the Minister of Human Resources Development and member for Winnipeg—South Centre is presently working on. We must try and change the system and help the unemployed find work instead of providing assistance directly to them in the form of money.

I know that there will be differences of opinion in this House between parties, between members from either side of this House. Differences could even be expressed between members from the same party. I must say however that, like the hon. member who just spoke, I am convinced there is a need to provide jobs for Canadians who are presently out of work.

The only thing I can say to finish answering his question is that I wish I could come before this House and announce that we have money to do this or that or a new program to implement. I really wish I could. Unfortunately, there is this debt, this absolutely enormous debt we have, and a deficit which is much too high. Given this burden we have inherited from the previous government, this burden which has become huge, especially with this problem, we cannot do all we would want to do. What we are trying to do is to plan structural changes such as those the Minister of Human Resources Development will submit to this House in the coming months and try to spend the money available as wisely and efficiently as possible.

I do hope the hon. minister and myself, as well as other hon. members and ministers, will have the chance to discuss the best way to use what little money we can devote to this task.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. As agreed yesterday, the time provided for the consideration of the opposition motion will be extended by 20 minutes due to the recorded vote taken earlier this day. Therefore, Private Members' Business will start at 5.50 p.m.

Resuming debate. I wonder if the hon. member for North Vancouver could give the Chair some indication as to whether he will be taking up the full complement of 20 minutes or if in fact he will be sharing his time with a colleague.

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, members of the Reform will be sharing their time.

At election time there are always promises from politicians that they will change the tax system to make it fair and equitable.

Election after election they make these promises. Despite these promises being made election after election, it seems that a large group of taxpayers have decided in the last couple of years to take things into their own hands.

What I am talking about here is that most taxpayers have now reached the tax saturation point. They have started acting in ways both legal and illegal to avoid the amount of tax they have been paying. For example, Department of Finance figures list tax revenues for September 1992 at $11.07 billion and a year later in September 1993 at $10.17 billion. That is down 8.13 per cent.

Total revenue for April to October 1992 was $64.94 billion and a year later April to October 1993 $61.22 billion, a reduction of almost 5.75 per cent.

While these direct tax revenues were dropping and making it impossible for the government to meet its deficit targets the major indirect tax, the GST, was also down slightly year over year from about $15.2 billion to $15 billion. These drops in revenue seems to point toward the possibility that the tax saturation point has indeed been reached. It could well be that any further attempts by this government to increase the tax burden will result in further reductions in revenues.

Taxpayers have decided as I mentioned earlier that the system is unfair and that they will not pay any more of their earnings into the black hole of federal government spending. As I also said earlier reductions in the amount of taxes paid is being achieved through both legal and illegal means. Legally, by leaving a job where taxes are deducted at source and starting a little home-based business, a lot of taxpayers are discovering that they can deduct many expenses that they could not before.

We know also that there is an underground economy that avoids the GST by negotiating cash deals for services. This in turn leads to lower income declarations by the people providing those services. The end result is that income tax revenues are lower as well.

Of course there is much argument about the size of the underground economy. Most people if they were honest would say that they do know somebody who has paid cash for the GST discount on jobs around their home. People are not afraid to admit this because they know that it is widespread. The feeling in the community is that the government already gets too much money and they are not giving it any more to waste.

We often hear in the emotional rhetoric of groups like the National Labour Congress that corporations are not paying their fair share of the taxes. The proof is in the fact that the percentage of total tax revenues being paid by corporations has dropped.

Anyone who does even a little bit of research can see that this is a silly argument. Corporations on average have been making less money. Many of them have had large losses over the last few years. Clearly, if they do not make any money or have a loss they will not pay any taxes. Of course their percentage of contribution to the tax take has dropped. This does not mean that corporations are not paying their fair share. In fact the tax rate for corporations has increased over the last five years.

I have heard from time to time members on the government side advocating higher corporate taxes and even implying that if we could just get these evil corporations to pay more taxes the deficit would be solved.

• (1615)

To those who would try to increase taxes on corporations, I would like to say the following. Corporations are no different to people in the way that they react to overtaxation and the reason that they are no different to people is that they are people.

A corporation no more pays taxes than a tractor pays taxes or a lap top computer pays taxes. It is the people who own the shares in the company who pay the taxes.

I never sat behind a corporation in school or rode on a bus with a corporation or spoke on the phone to a corporation. Yet corporations are faced with income taxes, payroll taxes, property taxes, T-1s, T-4s, T-5s, AMTs, T-778s, TCTBs and in fact they are tee'd off, as my colleague from Calgary Centre mentioned yesterday.

The owners of small corporations are usually a few members of the same family or partnership of friends. The ownership of large corporations is their shareholders, often the pension funds of these very same unions that complain that the corporations are not paying enough taxes.

The number one cost to business these days is taxes and those costs have to be passed on to the consumer just like any other cost the business faces. Those same groups who demand that property taxes should be higher for those greedy landlords then complain when the tax increases are passed on in the form of increased rents.

I repeat again that anyone who thinks that a corporation is going to act any differently to an individual is dreaming. A corporation is formed in the first place by an individual or group of individuals who get together and use their tax paid money to form that corporation.

The corporation will then cross-border shop. It will use all the available tax deductions and it will even move to another country if it perceives that the conditions in Canada are unfair. The excessive government taxation levels of today have led to corporate tax saturation as well as personal tax saturation. The loss of thousands of jobs as companies move to locations where the tax burden is lower is a disgrace.

I have mentioned in this House before that my New Zealand background has made me very familiar with the debt crisis experienced in New Zealand in 1984. As a result of that crisis, the New Zealand government learned that New Zealanders had reached tax saturation point and that the government would have to spend less and tax less.

Ten years later according to an analysis released by the Toronto-Dominion Bank on April 25, 1994, just this last week, there are some dramatic comparisons that can be made between the Canadian and New Zealand economies. Two years ago, for instance, it cost New Zealand 90 basis points more to issue 10-year money than it did for Canada.

Now it costs New Zealand 150 basis points less than it costs Canada. In that same time New Zealand's unemployment rate has dropped from above 13 per cent down to 9 per cent and the real GDP has risen to 5 per cent. There is a budget surplus expected this year of almost $1 billion. This massive improvement is a direct result of the New Zealand government's decision to spend less and tax less. The Canadian government could do well to learn from that lesson.

The Toronto-Dominion Bank's outlook for the Canadian dollar continues to be bearish because of the failure of this government to recognize the seriousness of its taxation and spending problems.

In closing, I would urge the government to recognize that we have indeed reached tax saturation point and that it should first develop a plan to get control of federal spending and second, to work toward a simplified, single tax system in keeping with the spirit of the motion before us.

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on the motion before the House today. I would like to begin by talking about the role of government in a free society.

The cornerstone of freedom and justice requires acknowledgement of at least one fundamental principle: each person owns him or herself. We in Canada accept this principle and indeed embrace it because the antithesis of self-ownership is of course slavery which western democracies have condemned. I do not believe anyone in this country would ever knowingly endorse slavery.

• (1620)

An operational definition of slavery is that a person toils while having no ownership rights to the fruits of his toil. They are owned and/or controlled by someone else. Therefore, private or collective theft is an attack on the principle of self-ownership; a person works hard to produce tangible benefits, for example a car or a television, a house or money, and the theft of this violates the principle of self-ownership. Murder, kidnapping, assault and other acts of violence are also an attack on the principle of self-ownership and therefore must be prohibited.

Self-ownership also implies that two or more individuals should be free to engage in peaceable voluntary exchange without interference by third parties.

The protection of these rights, called natural law by philosopher John Locke and others, constitutes the proper role of a moral government. In other words, the role of government is to protect people from domestic aggression, protect the nation from foreign attack and, through a judiciary system, resolve disputes arising among its citizens.

Contrast this ideal with what has happened in Canada over the past three decades. There has been a concerted attack on the principle of self-ownership through the tax system. The federal government has gradually increased taxation levels to a point at which today the average Canadian has to work for more than half a year just to pay his or her tax bill.

We like to consider Canada a free country, but just how free are we when we are forced to give up half of everything we produce? In my view we have all become, to a large extent, slaves to Revenue Canada.

I ask the House if this is not in fact the case. Furthermore I ask just because our tax system has the force of law behind it, does that make it morally right?

South Africa had a system of apartheid for many years. That was also backed by the force of law, enforced by the state. Did the fact that apartheid was state sanctioned make it morally right? What about slavery in the United States in the last century? Was slavery morally right just because the government decreed it was law?—of course not.

In fact, apartheid and slavery represent the ultimate abuse of the principle of self-ownership. With the rise of the welfare state or state socialism all governments, including Canada, have in varying degrees made significant departures from moral government functions. The welfare state is immoral because it violates one of the basic foundations of self-ownership, the right to own what one produces.

State socialism is a political process whereby property that rightfully belongs to one person is confiscated and given to another to whom it does not belong.

The primary justification for this attack on self-ownership, at least that led by otherwise decent people, can be found in people's desire to do good things like help the poor, care for the elderly, help the sick, or create a fair income distribution.

While these may be commendable objectives, the fact of the matter is that government does not have any resources of its very own. Acknowledgement that government does not have any resources of its own forces us to recognize that the only way governments can give one citizen a dollar is to first, through intimidation, threats and coercion, confiscate that dollar from some other citizen.

If you do not believe that Revenue Canada uses intimidation, threats and coercion, just try not paying your taxes and see what happens.

In a moral society voluntary exchange should be maximized and involuntary exchange minimized. A society which maximizes voluntary exchange can be described as embracing free enterprise or a market driven economy. The opposite of a market economy is, of course, a command economy. There is ample empirical evidence as we approach the end of the 20th century that command economies do not work. The former Soviet Union is a graphic example of this.

It is no coincidence that individual freedom and liberty are virtually non-existent in a command economy because governments which maximize involuntary exchange must rely on the force of law and the force of a police state to achieve their aims.

Command economies by their very nature are immoral and in fact evil. The elite political apparatus uses the power of the state to coerce citizens to accept their economic dictates.

• (1625)

What I find disconcerting is the extent to which Canada, which prides itself on being a free country, has moved toward involuntary exchange.

Consider that the average Canadian must work until sometime in July to become free of his tax burden. The first six months of each year are spent producing wealth which is confiscated against his will through taxation. This money is then spent on a variety of government initiatives and programs that the taxpayer in many cases would not support on a voluntary basis.

Walter Williams, the renowned professor of economics at George Mason University, characterizes this as economic rape. In a free market business cannot get a dollar from me unless I voluntarily give it first. If a special interest group wants my money it will have to come to me first and convince me that it truly does represent my interest before I choose to give it the money.

Consider Canada today. Canadian businesses and special interest groups can get my money from me whether I choose to give it to them or not. They only have to come to Ottawa to get permission.

For example, when the directors of Massey–Ferguson, International Harvester or Bombardier want my money, when representatives of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women or the arts community needs some dough they could come knocking on my door and ask me but they know that I would probably tell them to get lost. They know that and so they come to Ottawa to secure the assistance of the government to force me to give them my money.

Thomas Paine warned that government, even in its best state, is but a necessary evil; in its worst state, an intolerable one.

We are all aware that government needs money to operate, to perform its legitimate role. This money has to be obtained through taxes which of course constitutes coercion. However, if government limits itself to its moral functions coercion is minimized.

The federal government has strayed from this ideal, far from this ideal. When we see billions of dollars shovelled out to Canadian business and industry, to special interest groups, to subsidize money losing crown corporations and in direct transfers to Canadian families that already have incomes of over $100,000 a year we know the taxpayer has been had.

There is no justification for which this is acceptable. This is a perversion of government, a direct assault on the individual liberty of our citizens and a serious violation of the principle of self–ownership. I would argue that since we work more than half of the year to pay our taxes we are more than one–half slaves to the dictates of this federal government.

The most disturbing news is that with our massive debt and ongoing $40 billion deficit Canadians are destined to continue as slaves to a greater and greater degree.

Until government reduces spending in a meaningful way this will not change. Therefore, while changes to income tax could surely make the system fairer and more user friendly the government must couple this with serious spending reductions, with the idea that Canadians have a right to self–ownership and will make better economic decisions on a voluntary basis than this government ever will through its top down, command management.

People in countries with larger amounts of economic freedom are far richer and have greater human rights protections than people who live in countries where state socialism prevails.

The free market with its supporting institutions of private ownership of property and voluntary exchange not only advances the human condition but promotes a more moral relationship among people. The most important case for free markets is its consistency with and promotion of fundamental moral principles and respect for human rights.

Our tax system, more particularly the level of taxation in Canada, stands in dark contrast to the ideals of freedom, liberty and self–ownership.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I was astounded to hear the hon. member's speech. I thought I was listening to something in 1790. This is 1994, I should remind the hon. member. We are in the 1990s. It has been 200 years since the people he quoted wrote what they wrote. I think he quoted Locke and Paine. Old Tom Paine has been dead about 200 years as I recall, the hon. member can correct me. What he wrote was relevant in his day, but surely to goodness this is grossly antiquated at this point in time. Things have changed.

When I was a student of politics I remember reading Tom Paine and some of Locke's stuff. It was regarded as dated then and that was 25 or 30 years ago. I think the hon. member really ought to update his authorities and come up with something of the late 20th century in which we now live. To go back and quote these people as a basis for saying that we are now half slaves is frankly unbelievable and unacceptable.

I noted the hon. member in his speech did not mention a thing about the benefits we get with the taxes we pay. This is something that members of the Reform Party seem to forget with monotonous regularity. They harp about government programs that are wasteful. He referred to grants to artists and to the National Action Committee on the Status of Women as examples of grants he thought were wastes of money. However he never told us where the cuts were going to come. If we cut those grants, whether it be the grants to artists or grants to the national action committee, we would not save very much money and he knows that.

What he really is talking about is cutting off the poorest of the poor at the bottom of our social ladder and telling them: "You people will have to make do on your own. We are going back to 17th century living where the poor get their money from a church or some other charitable organization and nothing whatever from the government".

Ms. Clancy: The deserving poor.

Mr. Milliken: The deserving poor, as the hon. member for Halifax says. If that is what the hon. member is saying, let him and his colleagues stand up and say it. Let them tell the House where the cuts are going to come because he knows all the government programs alone make up a very small percentage of the total federal budget. If the government was eliminated tomorrow there would still be a deficit on the books of the Government of Canada. He knows that to administer all the other programs there is a cost.

I ask him to come clean with Canadians and tell us which programs he is going to cut. Is it medicare? Is it old age pensions? Is it the Canada pension plan or what? It has to be one of those and he knows it.

Mr. Scott (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his comments. I would like to say that the first cut we proposed was to the MPs' pension plan, for which we did not get any support from the other side of the House.

I would like to say further that just because the words of Aristotle and Plato and Jesus Christ were said 2000 years ago, does that make them any less relevant today? Is the truth not the truth? Is right not right and wrong not wrong? Does right become wrong or wrong become right just because 200 years have gone by?

I ask the hon. member to consider that the reason these people are quoted is because they spoke the truth. They had a fundamental understanding of the way society could best construct itself to operate in a manner that allowed personal freedom and liberty to exist. The hon. member laughs but he is not listening to the words.

Furthermore, the cuts the Reform Party proposed during the election campaign were very detailed. Obviously the hon. member has never looked at them but it is there for all to see. It is very comprehensive. It is probably a little outdated now because the cuts are going to have to be even more severe based on the deficits we are running. We made that plan on a deficit that has since ballooned significantly.

I will close by saying that the information is there. If the hon. member would like I will make sure he gets a copy of that.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I was just driven to my feet by the riveting speech of the member opposite. I too could not quite believe what I heard but it was entertaining. It was a bit of comic relief in the Chamber which we do not often get.

I would just like to follow up on the comments of my colleague from Kingston. It is easy enough to sit down and be critical. It is easy to tell the Canadian public that you can solve all of the ills that afflict government and their personal situations. It is easy to say that you can solve the deficit situation overnight. It is called cutting, cutting and cutting. But when you cut, cut, cut you create another problem. You inflict pain on the people who can least afford to have that pain inflicted.

During the election campaign members of the Reform Party were quite good at going around talking about how they were going to control the deficit. Each and every time they were asked tough questions such as: How would you deal with the national defence budget? Would you cut Canada's standing forces by 40 per cent? "Oh no," they said. "We do not want to talk about that right now. We would just cut".

When you ask them about Canada's health care system and whether or not the proposals they were putting forward would jeopardize the integrity of the Canadian health care system and how those cuts would affect it, they did not want to answer.

Therefore, I want to ask the member this question. He mentioned during his speech that Canadians are slaves to the government and that they do not choose every expenditure that the government makes on their behalf. I think that is true. Since he is in a condemning mood today about all the programs that past governments have spent money on, does he believe the taxpayers in Canada were consulted before they started paying for his leader's suits and car?

• (1635)

Mr. Scott (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address the last comment first. The taxpayers of Canada are not paying for that. That is coming from party funds.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Scott (Skeena): Furthermore when we look at the spending program—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I think we would all like to hear the answer to the question. The hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Scott (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, when we look at the spending of government over the last couple of decades and we look at the billions of dollars that have been shovelled out to grants and subsidies to Canadian business and industry, when we look at the billions of dollars that have been shovelled out to foreign aid through CIDA to countries that do not need it and where the rank and file people of those countries do not benefit but the governments do, when we look at the Auditor General's report when he talks about the massive amounts of government waste, those are the things that Canadians are keying in on.

If the hon. member on the other side thinks that Canadians are in the same mode as he is, that they support the massive government spending that is going on right now, he is in for a very rude awakening down the road.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am delighted to take part in the debate today.

While we are having a plethora of quotes from great minds of the 18th century, perhaps we could get in a quote from the 20th century. I am particularly interested that the hon. member for Skeena picked out the National Action Committee on the Status of Women to suggest as being unworthy of government funding.

Is it not interesting that the hon. member would pick a women's group and I wonder if he would go so far as to extend that to other women's groups as well.

Mr. Harvard: REAL Women.

Ms. Clancy: Yes, indeed, thank you to the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James.

I would tell him that there is a very famous quote with regard to where women fit in our society. I would quote that well known 20th century philosopher, Chairman Mao Tse-Tung, who said women hold up half the sky. It might be interesting if the hon. member looked into that just a bit. The quotations of Chairman Mao in his little red book are almost as relevant to the workings of this House as the rantings of the 18th century mind of Mr. Locke and some others. However that is a mere bagatelle and we will continue to the matter at hand.

I am particularly delighted to take part in the debate today because I think it is terribly important, as it frequently is in this Chamber, to put a human face on the work we do here. I am always delighted to be in the Chamber to hear my colleague and good friend from across Halifax harbour, the member for Dartmouth, as well my colleague and good friend, the member for Kingston and the Islands because the experiences in their own lives frequently puts a human face on the work that we do here.

We talk about cuts. I say this with the greatest of respect, because it is a long tradition in the House that we do not impute motive and that each one of us as parliamentarians understands that every other one of us as parliamentarians, is here to do the best job he or she can do according to his or her lights. We are here to represent our constituents and to do the best we can as well for all the people of Canada. We represent very different views, but the reason for us being here is the highest. Consequently I want to talk about some of those groups that exist on government largess, those groups that my friend from the other side perhaps in his lack of comprehension or just in his lack of experience thinks are not worthy of government attention.

Let me talk about women's groups in particular. Let me talk about transition houses. Let me talk about women's centres. Let me talk about women's health centres. Let me talk about shelters for young people. Let me talk about shelters for women who have recently been released from prison. Although coming under the specifics of provincial funding, all of these receive grants in varying amounts from either the women's program under human resources or under Employment Canada or under other government programs.

Let me tell members how important these are. I believe that the hon. member in his own soul knows that these things are important too. He says he does not. Okay, he asked for it. Let me tell him about the women who are driven from their homes in the middle of the night in fear of violence, in fear of their own lives, in fear of the lives of their children.

Let me tell him about the women who are attempting to reconstruct lives after serving a prison term, after being helped through a group, for example, like Stepping Stone in Halifax which helps prostitutes get off the street and get back into normal society.

Let me talk about women who desperately seek to improve their level of education so they can break the cycle of welfare. Let me talk about people in general, but mostly women because the vast majority of those people suffering under the yoke of poverty in this country are women.

Let me say what would happen to them if the kind of federal funding that the hon. member in his pardonable but perhaps frightening level of knowledge wants to remove from the federal budget. Let me tell the member what would happen to them.

Places like Byrony House, a transition House in Halifax would be shut down. Places like Phoenix House, a shelter for young people would be shut down. Places like the St. Leonard's Society which assist people who come out of prison and who are trying to make a new start would be shut down.

We have already seen what happens when cutbacks meant that a great number of people suffering from various kinds of mental illnesses have had to be released on to the street. We have seen in the last 10 years, the years of the Mulroney government—the hon. member should pay attention, he may learn something—what has happened when a lack of compassion has contributed to an ignorance level and people do not see what is happening to the big picture.

Go to the streets of any major city in this country. Go to my city of Halifax, a small city, and see the number of young people who are on the streets. See the number of people with various kinds of mental disorders who are on the streets because there is no place for them and because the funding is not there.

Go to Montreal and Toronto and Vancouver and Winnipeg and Calgary and Edmonton and you will see them. Is this what you want in your country? Is this what you want to be the legacy of your children? Is this what you want the world to say Canada stands for and Canada means?

If it is, I have to say that it is not what I want and it is not what anybody on this side of the House wants from the hon. member for Saint-Maurice who is the Prime Minister to the latest elected backbencher on the government side.

On this side of the House, we have a history and a tradition that says that you can do two things. Yes, on that side of the House too, as my hon. friend from Ontario reminds me, along with the rump as well. We have a history and a tradition in the Liberal Party that says the two things that drive the engine of government are not incompatible and those two things are compassion and fiscal responsibility. People who believe that the two do not go hand in hand with the greatest of respect, just do not understand the way government works.

• (1645)

We on this side of the House have a great tradition of reform in the best sense of the word. This is the party of Joseph Howe. This is the party of Wilfrid Laurier. This is the party of Lester Pearson. And thank God, this is the party of Pierre Elliott Trudeau and the party of Jean Chrétien.

The question of reform has always been near and dear to the hearts of Liberals because it is reform with a compassionate face. It is reform to ensure that Canadians have a standard of living that is second to none.

My hon. colleague from Dartmouth asked the learned members on the other side where they would cut. I can remember, and I know the hon. member from Dartmouth remembers this as well, five or six years ago the hon. member for Dartmouth, the hon. member for Willowdale, who is currently the chair of the finance committee, and I went out for supper after a committee meeting. We talked about the jewel in the crown of Canadian social programs, and that is medicare.

The hon. member for Dartmouth's history is in a small coal mining town on Cape Breton Island. I came from not too far from there myself, but was brought up in a larger city. The hon. member for Willowdale was brought up in the city of London, Ontario.

We discovered that each one of us had the experience in our early childhood of seeing members of our families seriously ill and prevented from getting the kind of medical care needed. Actually, in my case it was not prevented. My father had an illness for three weeks. When he died, my mother was cleaned out. There was no money left. Everything was gone because this was pre-medicare. The hon. member for Dartmouth's father suffered an industrial accident which devastated his family financially. The hon. member for Willowdale had a similar experience.

The three of us talked about this. I remember it so well. It impressed me so deeply that the three of us, coming from our different experiences were utterly committed to the fact that never in this country should Canadians have to worry about medical care. Never in this country should Canadians have to think that they could not get treatment or medical services that are life sustaining without a complete and utter danger of bankruptcy within their family.

I was seven years old when my father died. I remember the devastation of his death, obviously. But I also remember what clearly was a fear in my mother's heart because she was left a widow with no resources. My father had been a pretty successful businessman. But there was no medicare and three weeks in a hospital cleaned out everything they had managed to save and compile in 10 years.

That is unacceptable. That is not even something which should be allowed to be contemplated. When hon. members from the Reform Party talk about cuts, when they talk about user pay which with the greatest respect is absolutely one of the dumbest theories I have ever heard of but I leave that for another debate, when they talk about these things I wonder if they have truly investigated and looked at the situation.

I would advise the hon. members to go into the Library of Parliament and look at an all-party report, a unanimous report done by the health and welfare committee in the first two years of the last Parliament.

The report talked about the kinds of changes that would deal well with medicare. Unfortunately that report has never been given the kind of light it needs. It talks about preventive medicine. It talks about the kinds of things for example that the province of Quebec is particularly good at. I forget the name and I do not know if any of my colleagues here can help me, but there is a name for medical centres in the province of Quebec—

Mr. Boudria: CLSC.

Ms. Clancy: I thank the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. Yes, CLSC.

There is something similar in my own riding, the North End Community clinic in Halifax. A particular form of community based medicine can save us a lot of money. This is clearly the way we are going to have to go and not to what I call band-aid, short sighted remedies like user pay.

• (1650)

This government and the red book that is the basis of this government's policy in this Parliament has a commitment to the people of Canada in the creation of jobs, in the creation of dignity, and in the absolute commitment to the fact that all Canadians are equal in the area of opportunity.

You are not somehow a second class citizen because you live in one part of the country as opposed to another part, or a second class citizen because your family tradition is to go down to the sea and fish rather than get a university degree, or rather than go to the farm and plough, or whatever. Canadians have an equality of opportunity and a right to have those opportunities and the services of their government from sea to sea to sea.

It is not something you will be more entitled to if you live in an urban riding. It is not something you will be more entitled to if you live in Ontario. It is not something you will be less entitled to if you live in the Northwest Territories.

It certainly is not something you will be less entitled to if you happen to be franco-Canadian—if I can say that, French Canadian—or if you happen to be a member of an ethnocultural group that did not necessarily get here 400 years ago.

The point is that we in this government are committed totally to the marriage of compassion and responsibility. As well, the point is that in spite of the meanderings I hear from time to time from our learned colleagues on the other side—

An hon. member: Diatribes.

Ms. Clancy: That, too. Diatribes. At any rate, the meanderings and diatribes from the other side.

There is something I have wanted to talk about for some time and this appears to be a good time. One hundred and seventy-six ridings in this country sent Liberals to the House of Commons. Out of 295 ridings that makes—

Miss Grey: A majority.

Ms. Clancy: A majority. Exactly. I am delighted to see that the hon. member from Beaver River understands that.

The hon. member for Beaver River has been here for a little while. Maybe she has a better grasp of it because some of her colleagues seem to think that the policy bus is driven by the opposition. We are here to say that the policy bus is not driven by the opposition; the policy bus is driven by the government. And the gas in the policy bus on this side goes back—

Mr. Stinson: What happens to the people?

Ms. Clancy: The people are on the policy bus with their 176 MPs.

Mr. Stinson: Then why do you make them push?

Ms. Clancy: They do not have to push because they know where the wheels are.

Hon. members on the other side do not seem to realize that all they have to do in actual fact is look at the most recent polls. Call me naive, but it looks like people are relatively happy with what is happening on this side of the House. Not just in Atlantic Canada where they are more than happy, but it looks like right across the country the approval rating for the Prime Minister and for this government is fairly high.

Now that cannot last forever and those of us who have a little experience in politics understand that. But the point is that you do not cut your cloth in policy on the government side of the House according to prevailing winds. You cut it according to what is best for Canadians, what is a tried and true policy, what is something that has been proven to work, and what is done in the judgment of a Prime Minister who has 30 years experience in this House of Commons and in every major portfolio in the Government of Canada.

That is the kind of policy and the kind of work and the kind of government Canadians want, deserve and have asked for. That is the kind of thing a number of the hon. members on the other side could certainly benefit from listening to. But again—

Mr. Grubel: Regardless of cost.

Ms. Clancy: Somebody is yelling over there. I do wish he would keep quiet.

At any rate when I conclude my remarks I promise the hon. member I will give ear to any comments he wishes to make, at least briefly.

• (1655)

The motion today in somewhat florid language states that this House implore the government. The government does not need to be implored. I do not think there has been a government in the history of Canada that has gone further in consultation with Canadians.

In case hon. members across the way have forgotten, the Minister of Finance met with Canadians from all walks of life in five major centres across this country. I happen to remember the minister at the meeting in Halifax saying: "Tell me where to cut. Where do you want me to cut?" I remember him listening and I remember him reacting.

The hon. member across the way says he did not listen. I trust the hon. member got a few letters for example from the doctors and a few other people in this country. The hon. minister did listen.

What this government does best and will continue to do is it listens. This government with its majority, put here by the vast majority of Canadians, will continue to listen. It will continue to remember that the most important thing for government is to remember compassion, to remember humanity, to remember equality and to remember who put us here.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of the hon. member. I was amused. I appreciated the spelling. That was wonderful, but I think the Hansard people do quite well.

Let us remember another party that was here recently. It had a majority of approximately 170 as well and we know where it ended up. Let us remember you can go from great heights to great depths here. If we are going to brag about how we have done, the increase in this party was not half bad either going from one member to 52. Mathematics is not my strongest point but our percentage increase was pretty marvellous.

Nonetheless, let us get on to more serious things rather than spelling particular words and meandering and diatribing, if I can make that a verb.

The hon. member talked about compassion and responsibility. We agree with that on this side of the House. What we need to realize is the best thing we could do is to show and exercise compassion to the people in this country who truly need it.

I appreciate the hon. member's comments about women's shelters and transition homes. They are necessary. The only way we will be able to preserve those and to make sure that medicare stays strong and solid in this country is to get a grasp on the deficit. That will make sure those programs remain strong. We cannot just continue to spend our way into oblivion and then say we are committing ourselves 100 per cent to this. The debt will destroy it. My friend knows this. The debt will destroy those programs faster than anything else.

Let me talk about the National Action Committee on the Status of Women. As a woman I may have more right or responsibility or whatever than my friend from Skeena to say I believe that many of these groups which are funded by government should be funded by the people who believe they exist for a particular reason. They are the ones who should be looking after them. Let us make sure we are not always coming to government begging for money to perform the tasks we think are important. If I believe groups are worthwhile, I will fund them.

The most responsible and compassionate thing government could do would be to eliminate and lower tax loads and frustration levels for people in this country who are feeling totally overburdened. As a citizen I should be able to see the light at the end of the tunnel. I should be able to relieve my tax burden so that I can turn around and exercise compassion humanly, individually to fund some of those groups I think are important.

I would like the hon. member to prove to us that raising debt loads, raising deficits and raising taxation levels in this country are compassionate.

How is the government ever going to be able to exercise true compassion by spending the legacy of the children she talks about? What about the legacy to our children? To whom are we leaving this exorbitant debt? You cannot go on one side and then the other. The hon. member talks about the legacy of children. What about the legacy this government is leaving to children, which is the enormous debt that it will never pay off?

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Beaver River for her comments. I must have missed something which I suppose is possible but unlikely. However I have just a couple of points in case the hon. member has missed something.

The government has not raised taxes and the government has not raised the debt. Indeed the government is lowering both. Perhaps if the member paid attention to the comments of the Minister of Finance she would realize that.

I listened, I listened hard, and the member for Brant said to me as she went across to her seat: "Have they said where they are going to cut?" I did not hear them say where they were going to cut. They said they were going to cut the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, a favour whipping post, I might add. May I say that on occasion the national action committee and I have not always seen eye to eye on process although our goals are very similar. It may come as a raving shock to members on the other side that according to most statistics and most polls over 90 per cent of Canadian women, whether they call themselves feminists or not, happen to hold the same goals as the national action committee.

Probably what the hon. member does not know is that some groups belonging to the National Action Committee on the Status of Women such as women's institutes, the United Church Women of Canada and the YWCA of Canada, mainstream women's groups, hold very strong views and are part and parcel of the group. I do not want to cut the funding to them.

Perhaps the hon. member, not having a whole lot of experience in the area of feminism and gender equality, would not know that women making 60 cents for every dollar that men make have to do fairly basic things like pay the rent, feed their children and a few other important things. They do not have a lot of money to give away. Governments are important in this regard. We are not going to cut off our noses to spite our faces which appears to be the kind of thing the hon. member is advocating.

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make the observation that while I chose to quote Paine and Locke, the hon. member chose to quote Chairman Mao. Chairman Mao, aside from having a very small mind, was responsible for one of the most atrocious, unspeakable genocides committed under his leadership in China. If she chooses to hold him up as a model, I guess that is for Canadians to see.

The hon. member imputed that my party was against supporting people in Canada who genuinely require support. That is totally false. I made that very clear in my points. I do not know how the hon. member can equate the National Action Committee on the Status of Women to people out on the streets or in Canada who really need assistance from the government.

Third, she is quite right. They are driving the policy bus. I am glad I am not on it because that policy bus is careening down the street right now at the rate of $100 million a day. There is a dead end coming up pretty shortly. They are the ones who will be responsible because they are in the driver's seat.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member for Skeena got up because I wanted to make a comment. I am not particularly going to deal with the meanderings of the hon. member in his last comment, but he did talk earlier about something very dear to my heart. I happen to know it is dear to the heart of the member for Rosedale sitting over there as well, not to mention a few other members in the House, and that is the whole question of arts funding.

Along with the compassionate face of government and the kind of funding that we in the Liberal Party with our 150-year history in the country will continue, may I say the country that does not funds its artists, the country that does not make representation on behalf of its own culture, is the country that has no soul. The country that has no soul will wither on the vine. If the hon. member would like to see the country wither on the vine, I am sure one the fastest ways to do it is to say that we as a federal government should not be funding the arts.

I can also say I would be very interested to see how many hon. members on the other side would be prepared within their own communities to stand and deny the kind of general small group funding they were probably working on. I saw a number of reports in the newspaper about how they worked on their SEED grants. Did they cut in their ridings all those SEED grants to all the groups they mentioned? I doubt it. If they did, I think that getting off the plane when they get home, even after flying economy class, would be a bit more difficult than they heretofore encountered.

• (1705)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): There is only a very brief period of time left for questions or comments so we will keep it short.

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I rise because I am shocked and dismayed. I listened to two colleagues on my side deliver their speeches. I was awaiting a rebuttal from the other side because my colleague suggested there was no tax relief in sight for Canadian companies. I was awaiting the plan that I know exists on the other side but we never got it.

When the hon. member for Halifax stood I thought we are going to get it. This is not a sharp shooter. This is a Gatling gun. I thought she would mow down that false notion but she did not do so either. I feel compelled now to inform the House what the Liberal plan is.

The Liberal plan is to raise the taxes of Canadian companies. If the Liberals raise those taxes a notch higher, those companies will then qualify for tax exemptions as non-profit organizations. That is the Liberal plan. I am surprised they did not share it with us.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): A closing comment from the parliamentary secretary.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I am going to say on the advice of the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell very slowly that we did not raise taxes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Mercier—Social programs; the hon. member for Richelieu—Hibernia project; the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona—VIA Rail; the hon. member for Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies—Hibernia project; the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup—Unemployment insurance.

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to switch gears a bit and talk in a non-partisan way about some matters which I think are extremely important for the country.

The debate I just witnessed, the shouting, the unpleasantness that took place here and the emptiness of the political rhetoric are the kinds of things that have turned so many people against politics. It is a sad thing to observe, sitting in the Chamber.

I would like to talk about the fact that the underground economy is widely discussed in Canada these days. In these discussions the need for lower taxes and the reform of the taxation system are regularly linked. In my remarks I will expand on these subjects drawing heavily on information which I have obtained as a member of the Standing Committee on Finance on possible changes to the GST and during a recent Fraser Institute conference on the growth of the underground economy in Vancouver.

During the recent hearings of the finance committee many witnesses noted their concern that the GST had been a major cause of the growth of the underground economy, the loss of government revenue, and the precarious state of the government's fiscal condition. These witnesses reflected their own experiences as well as those shared by researchers and the general public. There is widespread agreement that the underground economy was encouraged by the introduction of the GST. This tax induced evasion because it is visible and imposed on every consumer purchase.

Evasion is encouraged additionally by the fact that consumers do not face any penalties for non-payment of the tax. Evasion is particularly high among small firms that supply services with a high labour content. In these industries honest owners are forced by competition from just a few bad apples into operating outside the law.

The GST is not the only determinant of the underground economy. High marginal tax rates on personal income provide incentives that often reinforce the reward of evading the GST. If you are hanged you might as well be hanged for a sheep as for a lamb. Onerous regulations of business and large surcharges on labour costs mandated by the government also encourage firms and workers to operate outside the regular economy.

There are strong incentives for persons receiving unemployment insurance or welfare benefits to work in their own households as well as in the underground economy without reporting their incomes. These social security systems penalize beneficiaries with 100 per cent tax rate on reported income above only a very small amount.

• (1710)

Many people are particularly concerned about the growth of the underground economy because it appears to be accompanied by a change in public attitude about the morality of tax evasion. In a recent survey 71 per cent of Canadians indicated that "most people would cheat on their taxes if they knew they could get away with it". Seventy-nine per cent agreed that people who pay all the taxes they should are fools. Can we believe that? Thirty-two per cent considered acceptable the evasion of the GST by other people.

Some analysts believe that social capital in the form of honesty, which in the past has made Canadians among the most compliant in the world in the voluntary filing of their income taxes, may have been lost irretrievably.

However it is important that the government at least try to get Canadians to return to their traditional honesty by tax reforms that simplify compliance and reduce incentives to cheat by the lowering of both marginal and average tax rates. Unfortunately the lowering of tax rates under any taxation system cannot take place until spending is cut and increased revenue due to economic growth has eliminated the deficit.

Government success in this challenging task is likely to increase further the public's incentive to evade taxes because the level of real government services per dollar of taxes collected will be falling and ultimately reach a rather low level. This phenomenon is due to the fact that in the absence of debt payment a balanced budget provides the people of Canada with a dollar's worth of government services. However in a few years the debt payments of the federal government are likely to be about $50 billion annually.

If by that time program spending remains at its present level of $125 billion and economic growth under the present tax structure yields $175 billion the budget will be balanced. At that time each dollar of taxes will provide for less than 70 cents of traditional government services. Taxpayers will have little trouble rationalizing evasion on the grounds that taxes are not providing value for their money.

During the finance committee hearings and in the public media it is often suggested that the government's financial crisis could be eliminated if only somehow it were possible to tax the underground economy. The validity of this proposition depends decisively on the size of the underground economy and the possibility of forcing it into the open.

The Fraser Institute conference saw some academics present estimates of the underground economy as high as 15 per cent of national income. On the other hand government statisticians and economists suggested that it represent 5 per cent of national income at the most and that it is probably more like 3 per cent. The difference between these two estimates is due to the use of different methods for the estimation of a phenomenon that by its very nature is not known and attempts to remain hidden.

The academics use strong assumptions about the demand for money by the public to finance regular and underground economic business. Some have found the demand for cash is higher, the higher our tax rate. In fact the amount of cash used by the public is much larger than can legitimately be used in the regular economy. The excess amount is believed to be used to finance underground activities.

Analysts in the employ of the government use sophisticated accounting data to check for the growth of discrepancies in balances which if measured completely and accurately should be zero. They also engage in sensitivity analyses of data which show the academic estimates imply phenomena that simply are not observed in the real world by any standard of measurement.

Some part of the observed differences in the estimates are due to definitions of the underground economy. Government estimates focus on the amount of income that goes unreported to the tax collectors on the one hand and is unrecorded by Statistics Canada on the other. The academic estimates include illegal activities which may be as much as 1 per cent to 2 per cent of the national income.

Some academics know of the professional bias of government analysts who prefer not to be reporting that they have done their job poorly and that they tend to make continuous adjustments to their data to avoid the development of the kind of large errors the academics claim to have discovered.

While this criticism is probably unfair, there was the astounding revelation that the U.S. Internal Revenue Service has doubled its official estimate of the amount of tax evasion after a new head had been appointed. He is alleged to have decided that the estimate of 5 per cent evasion, twice that given by his predecessor, would strengthen with congress his case for more tax collectors. The IRS is now investigating its own internal auditors. Some academics noted that official positions on the issue now imply that Canadians are 10 times as honest as Americans in filing their income tax returns.

Dr. Don Drummond, deputy minister of finance for fiscal affairs, put much credence in the maximum of 5 per cent figure for the underground economy. Importantly, he noted that this figure represents a serious problem. It equals about $35 billion and, at $17 of federal revenue per $100 of national income, it amounts to about $6 billion of foregone taxes. This is not enough to eliminate last year's regular deficit of $42 billion but enough to help significantly the fight for a balanced budget.

However, it is unlikely that the full 5 per cent of the more or less officially admitted maximum underground economy can ever be brought into the open and made taxable. Yet I would argue that the lowering of taxes might make for more tax revenue than the $6 billion suggested by the government representatives.

For one, returns from after tax legal income would rise relative to the returns from illegal activities. More important, there would be reduced incentives to produce in the informal unmeasured household sector. This effect will be enlarged considerably when the economy recovers and the number of persons on welfare and UIC is reduced.

It is believed that persons on social assistance use much of their free time to work in this unmeasured sector which is not included in the official estimates of the underground economy. They would do less of this kind of work, hire others to do it and pay with income from their own formal work. Many economists believe that this tendency would be strengthened even more if the pending redesign of social programs makes it more difficult and less rewarding to remain on social and UIC assistance.

Let me conclude by summarizing my argument. The underground economy in Canada is large and policies that result in shrinking it would result in significant increases in tax revenue. The federal government has the opportunity to achieve this outcome by the lowering of average and marginal tax rates, the elimination and simplification of regulations and the reform of the social programs.

The issues and opportunities are clear. It is time to act on them.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, first I want to thank the hon. member for Capilano—Howe Sound for his representation. I thought you spoke very well. It was anything but an inflammatory speech, quite unlike some of the speeches made earlier by your colleagues from the Reform Party. You began your speech by complaining—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I remind all members to direct their statements, questions and comments through the Chair, please.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, I will try to follow your admonition.

I wanted to remind the hon. member from Capilano—Howe Sound that he should not have to look any further than his own colleagues to find the source for the partisan debate that has taken place in the last hour. The members of the Reform Party have done very well painting supporters of this government as the terrible oppressors of the taxpayers.

There is naturally a very legitimate debate over what is right and proper about taxes.

• (1720)

I suspect that there is not a Canadian anywhere who does not have at least some partial legitimate complaint about taxes. I find that acceptable. Too many of the speeches from the Reform Party members this afternoon have been monuments to greed and selfishness.

The parliamentary secretary made the comment this afternoon that the Reform Party members do not know anything about the way government works. I suspect that she is wrong on that point. I think they know very well how government works, and very often government gets in the way of their greed and their selfishness. All I hear from them is: "I don't want to share. I want to pay less. How can I get out of my responsibilities?"

They talk over and over about their rights, but never once do they talk about their responsibilities. We do have responsibilities to each other. The member from Skeena even invoked the name of Jesus Christ. I think he has nerve to use that name in this particular debate because his entire intervention was about greed and selfishness: "How can I get out of my responsibilities? Give me more as an individual but allow me to pay less. Allow me to contribute less to Canadian society."

These speakers contribute to this victimization syndrome that besets this country. We hear it from these people all the time: Politicians are rotten, leaders are rotten, Parliament is rotten, every governmental institution is rotten, you are the victim and you must cry out because those people in Ottawa and other capitals around the country are the oppressors. You do not have any responsibilities whatsoever. You are supposed to be on the take. You take everything for yourself. You do not contribute anything to your community. I think that is very irresponsible.

I have a question for the most recent Reform speaker. Tell me about your responsibilities. Where do your rights end and your responsibilities begin?

Mr. Grubel: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity after this almost ranting and raving question to respond to challenges about my motives and the motives of my colleagues.

I know my friends here now very closely. They are as compassionate and concerned about the future of Canada and the welfare of individuals at least I would argue as some of the members on the other side. Obviously there is no merit in us having a dispute, an argument, over who is more compassionate. What a rational debate in government and in society should be about is how do we carry it out, how do we do it?

The reason why I have left a comfortable life as a professor, short of retirement, is because I am so worried that the future of our social programs is in jeopardy. We are very, very close to losing it all. This would not be the first industrial country of the world where this has happened.

I am more compassionate, I assert strongly to the member opposite. Let us have an argument on who is more compassionate. I am more compassionate. On top of that, I have a brain, a brain which says to me that it is not just a heart or a stomach with which I have to make policy. I have to look at the world around me. As I look around at the world I see this government predicting an extra $100 billion deficit in the next three years.

• (1725)

At a 6 per cent average that means $6 billion more spending just to serve the interest on the part of the debt they have created in six years. Do you know how much we can spend on social welfare with $6 billion? That does not count all the higher interest we owe on the already existing $500 billion. We are on a treadmill with the spending cuts we are making. The increases in revenue—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order, please. I regret the hon. member's time has lapsed.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I am rising today to speak to this motion by the hon. member for Calgary Centre on reforming, simplifying and making more equitable our income tax and other tax systems in Canada.

I originally had planned today to speak primarily on the issues of fiscal federalism in the few minutes that I have. In this country right now we are undergoing a series of studies and serious examinations of a number of policy areas that include social policy, not just transfers to individuals but transfers to provinces, and we have a budget that is impacting on a number of transfer programs to provinces, both this year and in future years.

All of those things are really proceeding in a number of different ways. There are intergovernmental negotiations going on. We do not have any details about that but we know it is happening. We have a social policy review. Of course we have budgetary policy and a review of the GST.

There is a wide number of studies into issues of fiscal federalism but there is no overall integrated approach to making the tax system fairer and more efficient between levels of government. That is the primary point I want to address today, some of the things that some organizations are putting out that could be done, some of the things that our various academics have proposed.

I have been sidetracked somewhat by an issue that I got into last week. It came up on the floor of the House yesterday. I want to digress and spend most of my time on that because it seemed after what was said yesterday in the House that it was a perfect opportunity to address this particular issue because it is really so relevant to the way taxes and the tax system are functioning in our country today.

I am referring to the mini controversy we have over the federal overseas tax credit. This is a tax credit that is available to Canadian workers who are working overseas for six months or more of the year, enduring hardship and separation from their families and work related expenses in that capacity. There have been recent stories, one in particular in Alberta Report, that draws attention to the fact that the federal revenue department is basically considering retroactively disallowing the use of the overseas tax credit by certain Canadian workers, much to their detriment.

This story appeared and has been on the scene. I know members of Parliament, not just myself but other members have been making inquiries into this particular matter for some time because this has been on the public record now for a couple of months. They are not getting very far with Revenue Canada I understand.

I am not a tax expert and I am not a lawyer. I would never claim to be for obvious political reasons. By implication neither am I a tax lawyer. But I did find this story quite interesting. Given the government's current unwillingness to address the issue I decided to raise it in the Commons in statements.

Yesterday in response to one of these gratuitous set up questions we have periodically, the Minister of National Revenue said I had erred in my statement and provided the House with some incorrect information and that there were in fact no legislative changes involved in this area.

What is wrong with that statement is that it has nothing to do with what I in fact said to the House or what the problem is here. Mr. Speaker, you may have seen the movie last year, The Firm. It was one of my favourite movies last year. In one particular scene—it is about tax lawyers—Gene Hackman plays Avery Tolar speaking to Tom Cruise who is playing Mitchell McDeer. He is teasing him about his upcoming tax law exam. He has a multiple choice question for the young upstart. He says: "What is the difference between tax avoidance and tax evasion? Is it: (a) what the IRS says it is? (b) A good tax lawyer? (c) Five years in jail? (d) All of the above?".

• (1730)

Just to Canadianize that we will substitute Revenue Canada for the IRS, the Internal Revenue Service in the United States, and I think the same applies here. The point I am making is that whether there have been legislative changes is too often irrelevant. Tax law in this country rarely has much to do with legislation.

We recently have been passing in this House tax changes that were brought in by the previous government, well over a year before its defeat in some cases. We have been passing those things. We have been agreeing to them on this side. We have no choice. They have been implemented for some period of time. Legislation has little to do with it and little to do with the question I raised.

The question I was raising was not a question of legal technicality or of the latest version of Revenue Canada tax rules. It has to do with the administration of the tax system in the country and the application of tax law which often leads to the second point I was raising, the far more important point, the whole issue of tax fairness and in particular issues of scope and timing.

Timing in this case is the whole issue of retroactivity of administrative and application changes in terms of the administration of the law. Scope is in terms of the application of this particular provision to some workers and not others, in particular this one provision that depending on how interpreted or how applied affects workers of foreign parented companies differently than workers of Canadian parented companies whether or not those workers are Canadian.

These are very important questions and I do not profess, nor did I in my statement, to know the right answer or what the correct policy should be. I do not know and I can understand that there are certainly legitimate costs involved in these kinds of working arrangements.

My point is that if we are going to administer a sensible, fair and improved tax system in this country it is important that we take these kinds of issues seriously and listen carefully. Neither of those things was reflected in the kind of answer that the minister gave in the House to this dilemma yesterday.

Specifically, whether or not one agrees with the overseas tax credit it is not difficult to understand the concept that fairness and retroactivity of application are two entirely different things. We should be very careful in retroactivity of either legislation or application especially when it involves substantive tax penalties for some people.

Second, it is also not hard to understand in terms of fairness that all Canadian workers should be treated as equally and as equitably as possible. I happen to believe that in the kind of new economy we are moving into capital, with the porous international borders we have and with the technical evolution we have and with many of the well run countries in the world, will do a pretty good job in the long haul of taking care of itself. I do not think it needs protectionist measures such as this.

I noticed that the revenue minister rationalized this measure as effectively a protectionist support for Canadian based companies. However, Canadian labour in the future is going to need not necessarily our help in the old sense of giving handouts but help in the sense of ensuring its full participation in this dynamic, capital driven economy. This kind of tax measure is a perfect example of one that is driven by needs, old kinds of protectionist, nationalist needs that are not consistent with the needs of Canadian workers.

• (1735)

Whether this particular tax credit is essential or well structured or not, I do not know. I do know that if a Canadian worker is participating in his economy, whether here or abroad, surely the application of that should not be based on the status of his employer. Canadian workers and Canadian labour should be the focus of those kinds of measures.

I see, Mr. Speaker, you are asking me to wind up. I did want to spend my time on that. I hope the government is listening and I hope it takes not just the big concerns that we have about the tax system but some of these smaller day to day tax problems that Canadians have much more seriously in the future.

Mr. Andrew Telegdi (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I note that the motion was moved by the member for Calgary Centre and the speaker who just spoke is from Calgary West. Somehow I find it to be a more reasonable combination from the members of the Reform Party.

I have two questions for the member. Earlier in the debate the member for Dartmouth posed a question to the member for Skeena on the issue of the expenditures by the leader of the Reform Party in terms of cars, suits, money that was supplied by the Reform Party coffers. The member for Dartmouth said that was funded by taxpayers' money. The member for Skeena jumped up and said that was not the case.

Could the member for Calgary West tell us how Reform Party funds are subsidized by the taxpayers through the tax credit system.

The next question is I am sure most members of this House and members of the Reform Party would agree that part of the problem is that economics is trying to do a balancing of demands and we have demands coming from various sides. Obviously we ended up with a deficit that was greater than was predicted beforehand, so the government does not have the option. We have to deal with the reality as it is handed to us.

The Reform Party keeps referring to our program, that we are going to increase the size of the debt which I guess we are and that is well known. We also are committed to bringing down the deficit. The Reform Party even in its budget would have increased the debt. In light of the new expenditures I am sure it would have increased even more.

I wonder if the Reform Party does not believe that by forever trying to say that there is a fiscal crisis in the country it is hurting the situation in the financial markets just as the Bloc is hurting the financial situation in the markets when it says that the country is going to break up.

I would like to have answers to those questions.

Mr. Harper (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if I have enough time to answer both of those, but let me try.

The hon. member raised a couple of issues in terms of the recent expenditures of the Reform Party executive. It is a well known fact that I had indicated I was not happy with the structure of those particular expenditures and I had recommended to the council that it go about receipting any legitimate expenditures that our leader incurs. The executive council of the party I understand has in fact endorsed that kind of a policy.

The reason I said that was that we are here in the House of Commons, the Reform caucus, trying to get our current non-taxable, non-receiptable expense allowance that we all enjoy of $21,300 a year receipted. This is one particular expenditure. This type of expenditure should not occur. It should not occur in the Reform Party and it should not occur in this House of Commons where in addition to being non-receiptable it is also non-taxable.

• (1740)

I would hope that having gone though that particular controversy and kept our policy consistent as we did that we now have the support for the hon. member for the scrapping of that particular kind of non-tax allowance that we as members of Parliament all enjoy. I would expect to get that support.

The member also asked me more specifically whether Reform Party funds have a subsidy component. The answer in my view is that they do because of course they are funnelled through a tax credit system that all political parties enjoy.

We have urged that this government bring forward legislation to end that kind of special tax credit status for political parties in a number of areas. We have urged that we do this for all political parties. If the members of the government feel so strongly on that particular issue I would urge them to take action on it as soon as possible.

Ms. Susan Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak about important issues relating to this motion, two issues that are currently eroding the very fabric of Canadian society. The issues are the underground economy and smuggling.

They are issues that are eroding fairness and equity in this country. The underground economy and smuggling are national problems. They are complex problems without simple answers or simple solutions and they are wearing away the respect that Canadians have for law and for the fairness of our tax system.

There are some in our society who feel that evading taxes and smuggling goods are acceptable activities. These people believe that no one is hurt. The fact is people do get hurt.

Underground activity and smuggling are not victimless crimes. They hurt the law-abiding majority of Canadians who obey the law. They are putting honest business men and women out of business. Legitimate business is forced to operate against competition that is not contributing its fair share to the economy.

Honest companies have trouble being competitive both at home and abroad and are forced to charge higher prices to compensate for their own honesty. Jobs are lost. The deficit grows and honest taxpayers carry an unfair load. The playing field is not level.

The greater the illegal activity, the less tax revenue available to governments for essential services and social economic programs. Governments have less revenue to maintain the current high quality of our health care system and our social safety net.

As a result all government programs, including pensions, education, development of the infrastructure, will in due course be at risk.

In 1993 smuggling cost the federal treasury over $1 billion in lost revenue. It cost provincial treasuries another $1 billion. Depending on the estimate, the underground economy ranges from 2.5 per cent to 3 per cent of GDP to over 20 per cent. This means that $20 billion to $140 billion is going untaxed each year. That is billions of tax dollars that the federal and provincial governments do not have to reduce the deficit and finance health, employment and social services.

Because of underground activity it becomes difficult if not almost impossible for governments to meet Canadians' demands for economic growth, deficit reduction and meaningful jobs.

It is clear to me that those who enjoy society's benefits while refusing to contribute to its maintenance are taking advantage of others. They are taking advantage of their honest friends and neighbours. These people whether they realize it or not are expecting others to pay their way. They are expecting their friends and neighbours to pay for the general services they enjoy, including roads, hospitals, schools, fire and police services, while they improve their own personal financial situations. To be extremely blunt, they are freeloaders.

• (1745)

We cannot allow this kind of selfishness to continue. The integrity and the future of our tax system depends on bringing these people back into the legitimate economy. Canadians have to know that everyone is paying his or her fair share. Canadians need to have confidence and trust in government and in the way their governments handle their money.

As the Minister of National Revenue has publicly stated, tax evasion is not a game. It is a serious issue with serious consequences. It burdens honest taxpayers and hurts businesses throughout the country through unfair competition. While everyone wants the benefit of lower taxes, it must be achieved in line with the law and not by breaking it.

We want tax evaders to voluntarily rejoin the legitimate economy. However we must also continue to send the message that if they continue to deliberately evade taxes we will do all we can to identify and convict them.

I appreciate the opportunity the parties opposite have provided to send this message again today. Tax evaders and smugglers should know that we intend to put a halt to what they are doing. I also appreciate the opportunity to send a strong and clear message to honest Canadians. The law-abiding majority of Canadians need to know that we recognize the fact that they are carrying an unfair share of the burden because of tax evaders and that we are taking action to lift it.

The opposition asked that we sit down with the provinces and with ordinary Canadians to consult on these issues. That is something we do all the time, every single day.

For example, the government recently joined forces with the province of Quebec to combat the underground economy, tax evasion and smuggling, and to improve the way we are using the resources allocated to addressing these issues. Under the new arrangement Revenue Canada and Revenue Quebec have strengthened their relationship in all areas of enforcement with the goal of identifying cases of fraud, non-filers, non-registrants, to sharing access to electronic audit selection systems, co-ordinating audit investigation and collection activities, sharing the results of enforcement measures, sharing the results of research into the causes and symptoms of tax evasion and non-compliance with tax law.

Additional measures under this arrangement include developing complementary audit strategies, putting together joint audit teams to conduct joint audits and investigations, and exchanging the results of these activities.

Furthermore, the government is working closely with the other provinces on these issues as well. Together these measures will allow us to better target our audit activities and improve the ability of both levels of government to co-ordinate their investigation and collection programs. It will also further strengthen the initiatives to combat non-compliance that the Minister of National Revenue announced on November 24, 1993.

Under these latter initiatives Revenue Canada set up special audit teams to focus on business sectors that demonstrate high levels of non-compliance. Targeted sectors include the construction, jewellery, hospitality, home renovations, car repairs and other service sectors.

Revenue Canada also reassigned more resources to auditing, increased the number of joint GST-income tax audits that it conducts and began cross referencing the GST and income tax data bases in order to improve the identification of those not reporting income.

Between 1991-92 and 1992-93 the department added 245 income tax auditors to its field operations, increased the number of income tax audits by 10,000 and raised $200 million in additional taxes. In addition, the amount of corporate income tax collected per auditor rose approximately 280 per cent between 1985-86 and 1993-94.

In short, we have and we are continuing to take action to ensure that the majority of Canadians do not suffer because of those who purposely evade and cheat. We simply cannot allow a minority of individuals to avoid the law.

Everyone must pay their fair share, no more, no less. We owe it to the law-abiding majority of our citizens to ensure that they no longer have to shoulder an unfair burden. It is unacceptable that others who refused to meet their tax obligations can still take advantage of the same services and benefits.

We must continue to enforce the law to its fullest extent to ensure fairness to honest taxpayers. We must be prepared to take all necessary steps to weed out those participating in smuggling and tax evasion. If we are going to maintain the integrity and fairness of our tax system we must send a strong message that participating in the underground economy and engaging in smuggling activity will be a very risky and costly decision.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 5.50 p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(19) proceedings on the motion have expired.

It being 5.50 p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before proceeding I have a notice concerning tomorrow's business. I have received written notice from the hon. member for Yukon that she is unable to move her motion during private members' hour on Wednesday, May 4, 1994.

It has not been possible to arrange an exchange of positions in the order of precedence pursuant to Standing Order 94(2)(a).

Accordingly, I am directing the table officers to drop that item of business to the bottom of the order of precedence.

Pursuant to Standing Order 94(2)(b) private members' hour will thus be suspended and the House will continue with the business before it prior to private members' hour.

AUDITOR GENERAL ACT

The House resumed from March 25, consideration of the motion that Bill C-207, An Act to amend the Auditor General Act (reports), be now read a second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, if Bill C-207, which is a private member's bill tabled by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, is passed, it will allow the Auditor General to report to the House as often as he deems necessary.

Moreover, the Auditor General will be able to table a report to the House as soon as that report is completed. This procedure is already in effect in the British Parliament in London, where the Auditor General routinely tables some 40 reports every year.

In early 1993, the Association des diplômés de l'École des Hautes Études Commerciales de Montréal presented a brief to the Committee on the Budget and Administration, which had been asked by Quebec's National Assembly to review public services financing. In its brief, the Association recommended that government programs be automatically reviewed at regular intervals, and that effectiveness studies of government initiatives be released as soon as they are available.

If the federal government allowed the Auditor General to report to the House as often as he deems necessary and table any report as soon as it is completed, it would comply with these two recommendations of the Association des diplômés de l'École des Hautes Études Commerciales de Montréal.

Right now, the Auditor General publishes a report once a year, in which he mentions cases of mismanagement, inadequate financial commitments and tax losses. In the two weeks following the report's release, the media draw public attention to the Auditor General's findings. Some cases described as real horror stories are then forgotten until the next report is published, a year later.

• (1755)

The tabling of reports throughout the year would help maintain taxpayers' interest regarding the way their country is managed. Government management would become more transparent. After all, transparency is what the Prime Minister promised us during the election campaign.

In its twelfth report, tabled in the House on May 28, 1986, the public accounts committee said that, sometimes, comprehensive audits are completed several months before the tabling of the report. The committee added that since these audits can take up to two years, some of the findings may no longer apply once the report is sent to the committee.

The benefits of tabling several periodic reports have already been demonstrated in a number of parliamentary regimes, including England, Holland, Germany, Sweden, Australia and New Zealand. Canada should be quick to follow the example of these countries. The public accounts committee would be better able to fulfill its role as Parliament's auditing committee responsible for the sound management of public funds. The federal government would save hundreds of millions, even billions, if reports were tabled sooner. The Public Accounts committee would be able to look at the Auditor General's recommendations in a timely fashion, and ask that appropriate remedial action be taken as soon as possible after an audit.

Several periodic reports would also help the Auditor General to plan his office's work for the year more astutely. The resulting savings in resources could lead to a greater number of audits conducted with identical resources at a time when the Auditor General's budget is being cut, like those of several other departments.

Given the government's annual budget of over $160 billion, is this not reason enough to give the Auditor General more latitude in his auditing operations? The public accounts committee would have more recent reports available and would be able to expedite its work while the officials being evaluated were still in office. As Chairman of the public accounts committee, I have too often heard deputy ministers and heads of agencies, when plied with questions by members, give one of the following answers: "I was not there at the time" or "That happened under the previous administration".

This bill, the purpose of which is to allow the Auditor General more latitude and room to manoeuvre, has been introduced in the House on several occasions in the past, but without any success. I will come back to that a little later.

The Bloc Quebecois supports this bill, as does the Reform Party. When in opposition during the previous administration, the Liberals also supported this bill. Why then, now that they are in power, are the Liberals reluctant to support the efforts of their colleague from Ottawa—Vanier to ensure greater transparency and to allow the machinery of government a faster response time by allowing the Auditor General to report as often as he deems necessary and to report studies to the House immediately upon their completion?

I wish to congratulate the member who sponsored this bill and assure him that I will vote in favour of Bill C-207. What I find deplorable, Mr. Speaker, is the lack of strong support for this bill from the government and the Liberal caucus. If the government supported the member for Ottawa—Vanier, we would be dealing with a government bill. We have been told that the Liberal caucus is divided on this issue and that the government is being pressured by senior officials.

This is an example of a double standard. Now that it is in power, the government is keeping mum and letting a member take the initiative, hoping that the bill will die on the Order Paper, as was the case with Bill C-262 given second reading on October 19, 1987 and Bill C-288 given second reading on July 18, 1988.

Inaction has become this government's trademark. Let us leave things as they are for fear that in two or three years' time, too high a profile on the part of the Auditor General or his too frequent reports on very specific or timely issues will alert taxpayers to the mismanagement on the part of this Liberal government, or worse, to its inability to take the required action to contain the debt.

As I said earlier, I support Bill C-207 introduced by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier and I also agree with his statement to the effect that, and I quote: "Let us not have the bureaucracy tell us what we should be doing in this House".

Bill C-207 which was introduced on January 20, 1994 was the sixteenth initiative presented to Parliament since July 18, 1980 calling for the Auditor General Act to be amended.

• (1800)

We had the first and fifth reports of the public accounts committee tabled in the 32nd Parliament. There was also a question to the House from the chairwoman of the committee during that same Parliament. In 1985, we had Bill C-250 and in 1987, Bill C-262; then the report of the Senate Committee on National Finances; Bill C-288, introduced in this House in 1988; Bill C-228 in 1989 and finally Bill C-344 introduced in 1992 by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, as well as Bill C-207 we are debating today.

What has happened since July 18, 1980? Liberals lost power in 1984 and came back in 1993 and today, the sixteenth try for such a bill, it is still in the making. It is high time to act. If there was not so much resistance from the government machine, this bill would have been passed a long time ago.

The present mandate of the Auditor General and the procedures he uses, including the mandatory tabling of an annual report, go back to 1977, the year the Auditor General Act was passed by this House.

Since then, the flow of information has been multiplied by ten, information systems have evolved, public finances have deteriorated, managers have been made accountable to Parliament, and the Auditor General's office must be able to keep up with new procedures in the area of public account auditing. The Auditor General himself, in his note of March 22, 1994, to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, was saying and I quote: "— it seems fairly safe to say that periodic reporting is becoming the norm around the world. In our view, this would be a good time for Canada to join the trend".

[English]

Ms. Judy Bethel (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in support of Bill C-207. I contribute to this debate from my own experience with an effective relationship between elected persons and an auditor general.

The city of Edmonton was one of the first municipalities to appoint an independent auditor general. The experience has been beneficial to both the council and local taxpayers. The focus of the auditor general's work has gradually shifted from financial accounting to evaluating value received for tax dollars spent.

Independent audits play an important role in finding the most cost effective way to deliver public services. That is what we need in Canada today to help restore public confidence in public services. In keeping with the shift to value for money auditing, the auditor general provides information to elected representatives in a timely fashion so elected people can prevent waste, not just point fingers after the damage is done.

Each year city council and the auditor general develop a work plan including a timeframe for the completion and discussion of specific audits. Special audits are considered when they are completed. The auditor also tables an annual report with general recommendations and progress reports on individual departments. In this way the audit function and the corresponding focus on value for money in public service is a continuing focus and not a once a year bad news report.

A problem solving approach by the auditor has helped build good working relationships with both department officials and elected representatives.

Based on this experience I support the direction of Bill C-207 to provide more timely information to Parliament and prevent waste through the consideration of individual audits once they are completed. I believe it will assist in meeting public expectation and ensure that taxpayers receive good value for every tax dollar in Canada.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C-207 which is the act to amend the Auditor General Act. The bill has been introduced by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. It is noteworthy that the member is a former chairman of the public accounts committee and now sits on the government side and is introducing this particular bill.

• (1805)

The first thing we should note is that this bill is not a partisan bill but is what I call a good government bill. It is long overdue and therefore my sincere thanks to the member for Ottawa—Vanier for introducing the bill.

The bill basically has two major provisions. One of course is to allow the Auditor General to report to this House more often than once a year. We all know that once a year there is a feeding frenzy by the media to read through that voluminous report which is 600 to 700 pages of all the problems, mismanagement and waste of taxpayers' dollars he has found.

Since he is basically restricted to reporting only once a year, quite often the information we receive is a year old by the time the Auditor General is finished with it. He may have conducted his audit some months before but it sits on his desk for a whole year until such time as he produces his annual report.

The report is then referred to the public accounts committee which may take another six months or so before it gets around to dealing with the points the Auditor General has raised. It is not inconceivable, in fact it is more than likely the information being discussed and acted upon in the public accounts committee could be 18 months old, if not closer to two years old before it is dealt with effectively and responses and remedial action taken. Quite often the civil servants involved may have moved on to new positions.

It therefore becomes quite difficult for the public accounts committee to act as effectively as it perhaps could if the Auditor General were allowed to report more frequently.

I would hope if the Auditor General is given the authority that he would report to this House on a frequent basis, after every audit upon the completion of the audit. In that way the information can be referred to the public accounts committee and it can act swiftly and timely on the information provided.

For example, right now the public accounts committee is dealing with an issue where $1.1 billion of revenue was lost through a problem in finance, justice and national revenue. That is $1.1 billion of taxpayers' money. We are now going back to find out what has caused the problem. The Auditor General knew about this a long time ago but because of the current restrictions on his ability to report, he was unable to do so until January of this particular year. The information is old.

Let us make sure that we as the people responsible to the constituents of this country can make a serious and real difference.

We also have the opportunity of the Auditor General being more responsive to directions from this House. For example, the standing committees may require information from the Auditor General. They would ask him to conduct certain audits if it comes to their attention there is mismanagement, waste, or something going on in any particular department, crown agency, and so on.

These things have to be looked at seriously in light of today's situation where we are $500 billion to $550 billion in debt and that amount is growing every day. Anything that can be done in the light of good government to ensure the taxpayers' money is spent honestly and responsibly can only be good for this country.

I have talked to the Reform caucus. The bill is endorsed by the Reform Party as a whole. I certainly wish the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier success in shepherding this bill through its various stages to ensure it becomes law in this land.

As a member of the public accounts committee I think it is going to be beneficial to the public accounts committee, to the Government of Canada and to the taxpayers. I can support the bill wholeheartedly.

• (1810)

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak in favour of the act to amend the Auditor General Act with regard to reporting.

Make no mistake about it. Canadians are going to hold this House responsible for every red cent the government spends. They see it as a duty of Parliament to ensure the highest standard of responsibility in government. It is the duty of this House to ensure that tax dollars entrusted to us are used prudently and for the purpose which Parliament allocated them.

I have concerns for the ability of the members in this place to fulfil their duty without sufficient information provided in a timely fashion. We have at our disposal an excellent instrument to ensure sound management, the Office of the Auditor General of Canada.

Annually, the Auditor General submits a report to this House in which he reviews the manner in which the nation's business is carried out by the various departments, agencies and crown corporations. He takes into consideration not only purely fiscal concerns but also the performance and mandate of the organizations he is reviewing.

The Auditor General also makes recommendations for improving operations from time to time. Indeed the Auditor General's reports are thorough. The latest ran to some 700 pages. They are deserving of the fullest consideration by members of this House. Over the years a massive amount of waste and poor administration spending in government has been brought to light by the Auditor General.

Earlier this year he reported on the National Arts Centre, a crown corporation. He found serious deficiencies in the manner in which the corporation was managing its finances. With an annual budget of $40 million a year and a staff of about 300, the Auditor General found serious deficiencies. This is a cause for serious concern to all Canadians.

Surely good stewardship of public money is not too much to ask. In fact, the Auditor General's annual report has been almost bursting with recommendations for improved management, for better performance of mandates as well as dire warnings regarding the practices of the federal government at times.

Indeed this report is probably the taxpayers' greatest friend. It is unfortunate then that more time is not available for members to give every topic in the report their fullest attention when the report is presented. Time however does not permit such a full debate. Unfortunately by the time the estimates find their way through committee much of the good work has been forgotten.

Government needs to spend a little more time discovering whether all those tax dollars we squeezed from our constituents are being spent to good effect.

At one point, being a brand new member in this House full of ideas and questions, I decided I would take on the task of trying to discover how effective various government job creation programs had been over the years. I discovered that no one had taken the time to follow up on these programs in any scientific way over a long period of time. Just think of all the billions of dollars that have been poured in this direction and we cannot even prove it even created one real long term job.

The work of the Auditor General is monitoring the activities of government in a very real, very necessary way indeed.

The private sector I would submit has its own controls on efficiency and productivity. It is called competition. Government has no such control. The best control the taxpayers have is full disclosure of the fiscal management of the government and accountability for it.

I will use a word that I hear often on the other side of the House, transparency. It is a word that we hear often. The Auditor General's office provides such transparency, that window into the workings of the government operations.

• (1815)

This transparency will be enhanced by the provisions of this bill that we are considering here today, allowing the Auditor General to report when he considers the matter to be timely. This will make his recommendations that much more effective. Rather than allowing the problems to run unchecked until the annual report is tabled, urgent concerns can be dealt with when they are uncovered and should be dealt with that way.

Over the years several auditors general have called repeatedly for parliamentarians to be supplied with adequate information in a timely fashion related to the management of government agencies and crown corporations to ensure the achievement of those organizations' objectives. In the task force report on crown corporations' accountability prepared by the Canadian Council of Public Accounts Committee in July 1992 it was stated: "Legislators are generally not supplied with adequate information related to the achievement of crown corporation objectives".

What is troubling about these observations is they have been noted time and time again. The litany of waste continues unabated no matter how often we talk about it in this House.

It seems to me that part of the problem lies in the House getting its information in one large, somewhat indigestible serving at the start of the year. Maybe if we took it in bite sized portions we would be able to deal with these matters easier.

The massive document tabled in this place contains a wealth of information, but little time is allowed to analyse, discuss, debate or act on it. In some cases the problems revealed are very old problems and rarely ever come back to this House to be dealt with.

On page 23 of the current report the Auditor General states: "Parliament is not being provided with the information that would enable us to assess the desirability and affordability of sustaining programs at their current levels within the context of their commitments". He goes on to call for cyclical reviews of all statutory spending programs such as unemployment insurance, international aid and income support. This would be more possible within the framework of the bill under discussion here today.

Further in the report he comments on the current program evaluation. He says: "Based on the office's government wide findings, I am forced to report that the evaluation regime is not working as intended". He also underlines the necessity for objective reporting. "Evaluations for example of crown corporations which originate from within the organizations themselves are unlikely to treat objectivity with the problems encountered".

There are in fact several concerns here which I share with the Auditor General and which I suspect are shared by many members of this House. The issue comes back again to accountability.

In the bill before us we see measures which permit the Auditor General to do his work more effectively and thus permit this House to do its work more efficiently. It is also my belief that no crown corporation should fall outside the mandate of the Auditor General's scrutiny and thus the scrutiny of these members to ensure the performance of their mandates and good fiscal management.

It seems to me that in this Parliament we have a dedication to accountability which has been endorsed by all sides of the House. The government on page 12 of its red book states: "Whether it is in health care or regional development we think that it is important to measure the long term outcomes and consequences of our policies and programs and that is why we have placed so much emphasis on evaluation, innovation and finding the best practices".

Similarly the Bloc Quebecois has had its calls repeatedly for accountability in government. So we are all in accord on this. In fact if we examine the record going back over many years, we have the recommendations of the public accounts committee, the auditors general committee and many members of this House, including the member for Ottawa—Vanier, supporting the changes included in this bill.

• (1820)

I call on all the members of this House to support Bill C-207. It is time to make these changes, changes which will strengthen the ability of Parliament to manage the nation's business with the care with which Canadians demand that we do it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The question is on the motion of Mr. Gauthier. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

(Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a committee.)

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I wish to seek unanimous consent of the House to suspend until 6.50 p.m. for the Adjournment Debate or at the call of the Chair, whichever comes first, for the benefit of hon. members. If we have succeeded in recognizing that all members present for the Adjournment Debate have returned to the Chamber earlier than 6.50, we could perhaps proceed earlier. That is why I chose to make the request for 6.50 which is the scheduled time for the adjournment today or at the call of the Chair whichever comes first.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I thank the hon. member for his intervention.

The House has heard the suggestion of the hon. member. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The House will stand suspended to the call of the Chair or 6.50 p.m.

[Translation]

Maybe I can help the House. I believe that the government deputy whip's intention was to give members who must answer for the government the chance to arrive in the House.

That was the reason for his intervention. The House will now stand adjourned to the call of the Chair or 6.50 p.m.

The member for Richelieu on a point of order.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Is there consent from the members opposite for the members who are present to make their four-minute statements now; they could get their answer from the parliamentary secretaries later on, in order, when they get here? We could start right away.

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, events are overtaking us. One parliamentary secretary arrived in the interval and we are ready to proceed with at least two of the adjournment debates now. I understand another one is in the lobby. That is three out of the total number. Therefore we could start.

The only thing is that the Chair may need to redo the order of them in order to accommodate the members that are present. That being said, yes, perhaps we could proceed now if the House is agreeable. If that is the case then we could call it immediately as 6.50 p.m.

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, on March 22 last, I put a question to the Minister of Human Resources Development which read as follows: "Does the minister not agree that the first phase of consultations on social programs was a sham?" The Committee on Human Resources Development was rushed and forced to submit a report under nearly unacceptable conditions which explains why the opposition presented its own minority report.

At the same time as the committee was rushing through its hearings, the minister had asked other groups to carry on consultations and, then, without consulting either the Committee on Human Resources Development or the House, the minister embarked on a series of pilot projects that give an idea of the true colour of his reform for which he has not presented a draft yet.

I asked the minister to put his plan on the table as soon as possible so there could be a real debate, instead of proceeding piecemeal with pilot projects which are not just for a few months but which, in the case of New Brunswick and fishermen and fisheries workers in the Atlantic provinces, will go on for five years.

I find this approach rather disturbing. I may add that recently, when the minister appeared before the Committee on Human Resources Development, he suggested that phase 2 consultations, which are to take place as soon as his plan is tabled, should not start until mid-August, and the committee will have no choice but to ask for a postponement.

That being the case, would the minister agree that he intends to use pilot projects, and especially those that include such aspects as a guaranteed minimum income and employability measures as a first step towards introducing a guaranteed minimum income program throughout Canada and then forcing reluctant provinces to follow suit?

We must not forget that the budget says specifically that after 1996, there will be no more negotiations on the Canada Assistance Plan. The government has announced that as far it is concerned, it may end the co-operation on social assistance by Canada and the provinces, so that the government could use the funds to set up a new Canada-wide program, and of course a federal cheque would be very convenient as part of a project or platform in a pre-referendum campaign.

That being said, we think the minister should put his action plan on the table as soon as possible so Canadians will be able to see this ambitious proposal for themselves. We must not forget that the provinces, and especially Quebec, have every reason to be concerned, since these consultations on the reform of social programs will apparently cover the following topics: education, social assistance, job training, the disabled and family policies, all of which come under provincial jurisdiction with the exception of unemployment insurance.

We can conclude that phase one was a sham. Let the minister put his plan on the table and show us that these pilot projects are part of a policy we can talk about, because it will be out in the open.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member, who I think is a member of the human resources committee, would ask such a question and give such a speech.

[English]

The hon. member knows full well that the consultation process on which the minister has embarked is a great success. It has worked extremely well so far and I will provide details in the course of my answer.

[Translation]

On January 31, the Minister of Human Resources Development announced a reform process that would introduce legislative changes to social security programs before the end of the year. The government is now proceeding with an open and transparent reform of social security that will be the subject of consultations.

The government is thus showing its conviction that reform is only possible if based on a wide consensus favouring an approach to social security that is comprehensive and focused on people. The government is developing an action plan that will be the basis for change and for public discussions on the issue of social security. It will identify the main thrusts of reform and clearly define the issues to facilitate debate and help to make better choices among the proposed options.

The standing committee plays an important role in the reform process. Since the beginning, it has held hearings on social security—and the hon. member was there—during which committee members received over 250 briefs and presentations from organizations and individuals across the country. The committee's report tabled on March 25 confirms the willingness of Canadians to redesign our social safety net, especially with regard to children and families, young people, the unemployed and underemployed adults.

After the government publishes its action plan, the committee will hold a second, more extensive round of consultations. Every Canadian will have the opportunity to participate in the revamping of our social safety net in the course of this year. During this process, unions, the business community, the provincial and territorial governments, social program clients, community groups and the entire Canadian population will be invited to express their opinions. And the hon. member will be there as a member of the committee.

We must be optimistic in preparing for our collective future. The government and this House will show the leadership needed to initiate a national debate in order to improve social programs. I salute the work of the standing committee and I encourage other members to act as catalysts in their communities to bring the social security reform process to a successful conclusion.

I hope the hon. member herself will participate in the process.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, recently I asked a question of the Minister of Transport with respect to reports that a proposal had been made by Railex Inc., an American transport corporation, to VIA to buy everything of VIA west of Winnipeg on the condition that everyone who works for VIA west of Winnipeg be laid off and that the company be able to rehire only those it wished to rehire.

I asked the Minister of Transport what the government's attitude was toward this proposal and he was fairly unequivocal in his answer and I was grateful for that. He said that the government was not considering that particular proposal. That is the good news. The bad news is that in the course of my question I also asked him about the report which I understand is now on his desk or in the department somewhere; the report made as a result of the task force conducted in Manitoba by the member for St. Boniface and the member for Churchill with respect to the future of VIA in Manitoba.

I did not like the way the minister talked about the fact that these particular hearings were not mandated by the government but they were a useful opportunity for constituents to voice their concerns and I sort of got the feeling that this was not a high priority for the minister in terms of making a decision with respect to the future of VIA.

I see that perhaps it will be the member for St. Boniface who will be answering the question so he might want to shed some light on this. Certainly people in Manitoba and people who appeared at the hearings as I did had the impression that they were not just engaging in a public relations exercise or just hearing people, they also had been given some kind of mandate by the minister for human resources, the minister from Manitoba, to arrive at recommendations that would in some way be heeded by the government.

I would certainly like some clarification on that because a lot of people came forward, particularly in northern Manitoba, to express their views. At the same time I would like to repeat briefly what I said at those hearings and what I continue to believe ever since I came into this House.

In my maiden speech I spoke about the necessity of revitalizing passenger rail service in this country, 15 years ago, and I continue to believe that it is a major failing on the part of successive governments not to have invested in passenger rail infrastructure, new passenger rail infrastructure and equipment so that passenger rail could be a thing of the future rather than something which is increasingly regarded as a thing of the past or a thing only to be marketed to affluent tourists coming to Canada for land cruises or various other experiences of the Canadian Rockies, but not a service available to ordinary Canadians at reasonable prices.

I think for environmental reasons if for no other reason we have to revive passenger rail and I would hope that at some point we will get a statement from the government as to its policy on this.

I have another concern. I heard the minister on a couple of occasions talking about the negotiations that are going on between VIA Rail and its workforce. One gets the impression, and I hope I am wrong, that the minister in particular is trying to set up the workers at VIA, saying he would have liked to have done this but because VIA Rail workers were not willing to give up X, Y and Z that they have achieved over the years through collective bargaining, they are now going to have to do A, B and C.

I think that would be unfair in the extreme. If the government has the imagination to embrace passenger rail, it should be willing to put policies in place that do not ask the workers there now to give up things that they have won over the years in terms of job benefits, et cetera.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for his question about Railex. I am grateful for this opportunity to provide him with an answer.

[English]

You will perhaps recall, Mr. Speaker, that Railex's proposal was unsolicited and it was a proposal concerning VIA Rail.

I simply want to reiterate the Minister of Transport's response wherein he indicated that the government is not looking at this particular proposal. As it was presented it is not acceptable.

I want to stress once again that Railex's letter was an unsolicited proposal. I should add that realistic proposals for the betterment of government operations, whether they be VIA Rail or other, are always welcome.

The member made mention of several initiatives under way at VIA Rail. Indeed there are several before VIA Rail at this point. One of the most significant and perhaps the first one is the negotiations to which he has referred currently under way with the unions. It has been said many times that VIA needs to know what its financial commitments are so that it can develop and present a plan to the government for consideration.

• (1840)

In no way is the minister or the government trying to influence those negotiations. The plan that will be submitted by VIA Rail must recognize the financial reality facing both this country and VIA Rail.

Right now there is very little that I can add, but let me make one more point. There was reference to the task force that was co-chaired by my colleague, the member of Parliament for Churchill, and myself. Indeed we have completed that report and we are in the process of sending it to the minister. I do not say that to answer the point that was raised, that is, where it is at this time. It will soon reach the minister's desk. I do not know exactly where it is at this point but the member can rest assured that it is completed and it has been sent out.

I should also point out that I am encouraged by the minister's response wherein he indicated that he will look at it very seriously.

The taxpayers who support VIA and its customers all want the same thing; namely, a national, sustainable, affordable and efficient passenger transportation system.

[Translation]

My colleagues and I will do everything we can to reach that goal.

HIBERNIA PROJECT

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, I asked the Minister of Natural Resources a question about the Hibernia project and the answer was extremely disappointing. That is why I would like to use what is commonly called the "late show" to obtain some clarifications from the parliamentary secretary, and I hope that the clarifications or commitments will be more specific than what the minister said.

You must realize that Canadians have invested $3.5 billion in subsidies, contributions or loan guarantees in this project. Add to that what the companies in the consortium received as exceptional tax credits, since all their investments or losses are tax creditable. Earlier, the Bloc Quebecois, when we had only eight members here, had proposed that the project have 60 per cent Canadian content, but that amendment was rejected. Now the material comes from Norway or other European countries duty-free. All this means that the cost is now about $5.5 billion and we are told that construction might cost another $1 billion over budget. Must we stop the hemorrhage?

When the project was born some time between 1975 and 1980, it was estimated that the world cost of oil when Hibernia came into production would be about $60 to $70 a barrel. Now it is $12. The cost of producing a barrel of Hibernia oil will be about $25, and Canada is committed to paying the consortium the difference between the cost of $25 and $12. For every barrel produced, $13 of taxpayers' money will be paid to those multi-billion-dollar companies to compensate them for the difference between the world price and their cost of production. We are headed for an unacceptable financial abyss.

I quote Claude Picher, a specialist in economics who writes regularly in La Presse. He said this: "When the project began or even when it was first discussed, the world was concerned about running out of oil. Then came cars with better gas mileage, energy efficiency in offices, factories and homes, less energy-consuming production methods, alternative sources of energy, hydro-electric and nuclear development and decreasing dependence on OPEC".

Based on that, it is clear that this project should have died. When you have a natural resource, is it right to pay people to come and take it? Normally, when you have a gold mine or a major natural resource project, people pay you to get the resource. Here, we are paying to give away our resource. That is unacceptable.

• (1845)

The first partner that realized that this was futile is Gulf. It lost an incredible amount of money but decided to stop this massive drain of capital. Today, Gulf is laughing up its sleeve. Since the government was not able to find another partner, it poured another $400 million, as partner itself, is spite of having promised to give a subsidy and a secured loan, but not to be part of the consortium. Indeed, the government is now the fourth partner in the consortium, and it has invested $400 million. But there is worse still. Mr. Picher, the economist, says: "Since oil companies do not want to take risks, the government made a commitment to absorb 40 per cent of cost overruns".

The minister mentioned the figure of eight per cent. It is on that eight per cent that I want a clear explanation and answer, because the government will in fact absorb 40 per cent of cost overruns. This is not normal and I will conclude by quoting again Mr. Picher who says: "The tragedy regarding the sickening Hibernia issue is that these companies would never have undertaken such a project without the generous help of the federal government. That help allowed them to go ahead with a minimum of risks. In this episode, it is Ottawa, and not Mobil, which is taking the big risk. The government is completely broke. Taxpayers are being bled white. We have to cut in social programs. Yet, at the same time, over $5 billion in public monies have been wasted in this senseless dream. This is raving madness".

We have to put a stop to that. Will the government understand, as it did in the case of the helicopter contract? It seemed easier to make a decision when it affected Quebec. Does the government understand, as it did in the case of the helicopter contract, that we can no longer afford a frivolous expenditure of $4 to $5 billion? Will the government put an end to this waste?

[English]

Mr. George S. Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Natural Resources): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Richelieu for raising the matter of Hibernia and cost overruns.

In her response the minister informed him that the government and its partners were awaiting a report to identify the extent of potential cost overruns and that the government's share was 8.5 per cent. This has not changed. The only problem we have is that we still do not know the full potential cost overruns, but we do know that from the government's point of view we will be responsible for 8.5 per cent of those overruns. Once we have the detailed report we will be able to share it with the members so they will have a better idea of exactly what is going on.

The owners and the project managers are continuously looking for cost efficiencies and improvements to the design to ensure that the profits to be produced by this project will be maximized. We will not take any precipitous action on the basis of a few headlines without thinking through the implications.

There will continue to be changes in the project schedules and costs reflecting changing circumstances, alternative designs and other factors. Until such time as it is in the Canadian interest to alter its participation in the project we will continue to meet our commitments.

I would also like to point out that we are working with our partners, and it is the private sector which is largely involved in this project, to ensure that industrial and employment benefits will flow to Canada during the construction phase and keep those benefits enhanced.

I should say to the member opposite that Quebec based companies, by way of their proximity to the industrial base and their competitive position, have managed to win a significant share of the contracts derived from the project. Of almost $3 billion in contracts awarded to the end of March this year Quebec was second only to Newfoundland in terms of the value of the contracts awarded.

The federal government on behalf of all Canadians holds an equity position of 8.5 per cent in the Hibernia project. We will have that share in the eventual profits from the development; the economic, industrial, and employment benefits that are derived during construction.

I see my time is finished, so I will wait for the next question and finish off on the other points.

HIBERNIA PROJECT

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask questions on the very same subject.

Indeed, as my colleague the hon. member for Richelieu remarked, last week, both the English and the French newspapers reported that over and above the amounts already spent, the Hibernia megaproject was expected to have a $1 billion cost overrun. That figure was given by Petro-Canada.

• (1850)

Of course, as the Minister told us then, the government of Canada is going to be responsible for 8.5 per cent of any cost overruns, that is an amount of $85 million.

In addition, there is another commitment to a $1,7 billion loan guarantee that had already been made, which represents an additional amount of $175 million. For the benefit of the viewers, I would like to remind them that $1 billion is worth $1,000 million. If that billion of dollars were to be paid in income tax, to give a rough idea, it would take 250,000 families paying an annual income tax bill of $4,000 to pay out that billion of dollars. Megaprojects involve astronomical costs.

Following up on those media reports opposition members, particularly the hon. member for Richelieu and myself, asked a few questions. I asked the minister how she could still suggest that the project would be profitable when the deficit is already huge, apparently, and only half of the project has been completed.

The answer by the minister was inadequate because she more or less told us that she was relatively confident that the project would be profitable 10 or 15 years from now. When you take a look at that project, you soon realize that, right from the start, nothing seemed to work properly.

First of all, huge amounts of money were spent. In his 1992 report, the Auditor General wrote that he had examined the project and found a lack of control over costs, poor monitoring of spin-offs, an insufficient rate of return, an inadequate analysis. He also said that there was no link between the money invested by the government in this kind of project and the return companies must have.

So it was, legally speaking, if you will, disguised subsidies. As for the benefits from building the Hibernia project, one would have expected that they would try to get the very most from them. But, as my colleague, the member for Richelieu, said, many materials which were used in building Hibernia were bought elsewhere, often tax-free.

As for the economic reasons which gave birth to this project, we can very seriously question them today. Everything, of course, was based on an analysis of oil prices ten or fifteen years ahead. It was based, for example, on the value of the Canadian dollar, which is not guaranteed for the next ten or fifteen years, on an average inflation rate of 5 per cent until 2017, which is absolutely unpredictable for the moment, on high oil prices and on keeping to a strict schedule and strict budgets.

We already see that the schedule will not be adhered to and that budgets have already being exceeded. Under these conditions, I ask the following question to the department again: Is it possible to have the exact figures showing that this project is profitable? That is the question.

[English]

Mr. George S. Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Natural Resources): Mr. Speaker, I will just highlight a few other factors for my friend opposite. What this project will do for Canada and for all Canadians is move us closer to a situation of energy security and so we have to take some chances.

When we first got involved in the oil industry 40 or 50 years ago we took chances then. We are taking a chance on energy security now with Hibernia. We also are giving an opportunity to Newfoundland, and I find it somewhat passing strange that members from Quebec would be opposed to Newfoundland achieving the possibility of energy security and an opportunity to diversify their economy, particularly considering the economic hardships that they are now facing with the crisis in the fisheries industry.

Hibernia will generate 5,300 jobs over this period of time, many of them in Quebec. The private sector is involved by roughly 90 per cent. It is not government that is fuelling and running this project, it is the private sector.

The report on the overruns has not been delivered yet as it is too early to say what the overrun might be. Why jump the gun? Let us wait to see exactly what is going on before we make a move.

• (1855)

The leader of the Reform Party crystallized the issue very quickly. It will cost more to get out than to complete now. In the interest of taxpayers' dollars we are wiser to go forward for a number of reasons.

The first one is that it is a good project. The second is that it will be beneficial to Newfoundland. It will also be beneficial to Canada for energy security. During the process jobs will be created in Newfoundland, elsewhere in Atlantic Canada, and in Quebec.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup): Mr. Speaker, on April 15, 1994, in answer to one of my questions, the Minister of Human Resources Development mentioned that the unemployment insurance changes would throw, and I quote, "only 19,000 people" on to the welfare rolls. That is the kind of callous answer one would expect from an official, "only 19,000 people", because, to me, 19,000 individuals is a lot of people. Every time a government program puts people on welfare, it is unacceptable.

That answer is an example of the negative signs the Minister of Human Resources Development has been giving concerning the upcoming social program reform. When you are about to undertake such an important review as the social program reform, you must give out some positive signs to ensure that the people are willing to embark upon such projects. But we are only getting negative signs from the government. First, it decided to increase the number of working weeks needed to be eligible to UI benefits. Then, it decreased the number of weeks of benefits. The government will reduce the employer contribution, but only in 1995. Finally, there is the whole issue of old age pensions, which will now be taxed if the pensioner has an income of over $25,000.

What do you think people who will be affected by the social program reform are expecting? They are looking at a reform which is a charade and a sham, while the benefits people deserve or to which they are entitled in the difficult economic circumstances we have today are being reduced. In the case of the elderly, they stand to lose some of their hard-earned savings.

They could have taken a far more positive approach, and I would like to ask the government whether it could not have designed some models for success instead of just giving negative examples. Could it not have approached specific groups in the forestry sector, for instance, where people from the Lower St. Lawrence area came with a proposal for the minister at a press conference? Members of Rural Dignity submitted a project that would use unemployment insurance funding to create jobs in the forestry sector.

If we consider technicians and engineers, how about launching the high speed train program, because now even the president of VIA Rail says it is a viable project? The Young Liberals of Quebec who represent the Quebec Liberal Party, which is a federalist party, say it is viable. The HST is a good project for everyone, but apparently, the federal government is dragging its feet for some unknown reason.

My question is this: Could the government, instead of repeatedly taking negative action to deal with a sluggish economic recovery and initiate its reform of social programs, give us instead some positive signs that will produce concrete results?

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows full well that the signals sent by the government are not always negative; in fact, they are almost always positive. On that subject, he also knows that the government has proposed changes to the UI program which were well received almost everywhere in Canada because, in spite of adjustment difficulties, the people can see that the government's objective is to create jobs in Canada.

The UI changes cannot be seen in isolation. This government has indicated before that the changes represent a first, but interim, step in giving Canadians a sense of new direction. The hon. member knows that full well.

If, in the redesigning of the social security system, we find out that different changes are needed, we will make them.

[English]

The changes made to the UI program were designed to put people back to work. The UI premium rate reduction that is proposed for January 1 next year will provide significant financial relief to businesses. By 1996 there will be 40,000 more jobs in the economy than if budget changes had not been made. The hon. member forgets this point.

The government has also ensured the changes that are being made are sensitive to those with the greatest need. Accordingly the government decided to look at the needs of individuals with low incomes and with dependants and to provide more adequate coverage for those Canadians. These individuals will receive a 60 per cent benefit rate; others will receive a 55 per cent benefit rate. Of course the hon. member neglected to mention that in his presentation.

Our proposals for the unemployment insurance program will encourage job creation, work and opportunities while discouraging dependency and non-productivity. I am certain Canadians will agree we need to start a process of change that will lead to a future of hope, opportunity and prosperity.

The government is committed to working with the provinces to initiate new programs targeted at the most chronically unemployed Canadians. The government has dedicated $800 million over the next two years for strategic initiatives to test out new approaches to social security.

The federal government has also taken initiatives to stimulate Canada's growth in the global economy. Two examples include an increased emphasis on technology and innovation and improved access to capital for small business.

[Translation]

A strategy for job creation requires a multi-faceted approach including many elements such as social security and labour market adjustment policies, learning policies, policies affecting how work is distributed, industrial, trade and technology policies, infrastructure development, and tax policies.

STU SHOULDICE

Mr. John Finlay (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate today a gentleman from the riding of Oxford for doing his part to protect mother earth.

Mr. Stu Shouldice from Woodstock was recently inducted into the Recycling Council of Ontario's Waste Reduction Hall of Fame. Mr. Shouldice and his family regularly recycle 95 per cent of their household waste.

Mr. Shouldice was reported to have said that increased recycling by all levels of government depends on the will of the people and how badly we want a pollution free world for our children.

I congratulate this gentleman on behalf of this House and on behalf of all those who can learn from the example he has set.

GARDA FAMILY

Mr. Maurice Godin (Châteauguay): Mr. Speaker, on April 6 last, Citizenship and Immigration Canada served the Garda family with a departure notice taking effect in a few days.

Today, I learned from the office of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration that the minister will not intervene in favour of the Garda family. This is extremely disappointing. The minister must spare the Garda family the humiliating torments suffered by the Maraloï family. He must defer the notification of deportation as long as it has not been proven that the Garda family does not have to fear for its life, should it return to its country.

Since the beginning of this whole process, several years have gone by and the Garda family is now well integrated in my riding of Châteauguay, and we will do everything we can to keep it.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I recently received a copy of a letter sent to Revenue Canada by Mr. Barrie Carter, a constituent of mine from Smithers, British Columbia. It reads:

> Please find enclosed two post-dated cheques to cover taxes owing. However, I think it only reasonable that the minister of revenue assure me that my money will not be spent on golfing trips by government officials on government jets.
> Like all Canadians, I do not object to paying my share of taxes providing the money is spent in a reasonable manner. Therefore the minister should have no trouble making that assurance to me before the cheque dates become due.

This letter underlines the hostility that is generated when Canadians see their hard earned tax dollars spent in a frivolous or cavalier manner.

CONTRAVENTIONS ACT

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, as we head toward Victoria Day weekend and the beginning of the traditional tourist season I would like to share with the House public concern over Bill C-46, the Contraventions Act.

The Contraventions Act received royal assent October 15, 1992 but to the disappointment of many Canadians it has not yet been proclaimed.

The act sets out a ticketing procedure for dealing with minor federal offences. The act will allow enforcement officers to properly police Canada's inland waterways and ensure that residents and tourists can enjoy summer water activities in a safe and secure manner.

The reason given for this delay has been the need to co-ordinate the bill's implementation among the provinces. I have been told that this process which has already taken 18 months will take at least another 12. This delay of two and a half years means that more of my constituents will be at risk on the waterways. It is unacceptable and I urge the Minister of Justice to expedite the process.

NATIONAL NURSING WEEK

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of National Nursing Week, May 9–15, 1994.

The theme this year, "Nurses Make the Difference", catches the essence of the great contribution that this profession makes to the health care of all Canadians.

Since the time of the first nurse in Canada, Jeanne Mance, nurses have remained the keystone of the Canadian health care system.

I commend all nurses in Canada for their high levels of commitment, skill, dedication and caring service to our people.

BOSNIA

Mr. David Iftody (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address once again the horrific circumstances that children in Bosnia live with day after terrible day. I have been asked by the children in my riding of Provencher what we can do to help them.

During World War II Canadians helped to evacuate children from danger zones for their safekeeping. Currently a number of European nations are actually helping to evacuate children of the Balkans. Canada has yet to take this step.

This is indeed one way we can help the children of Bosnia. It is my greatest hope the government will take the steps necessary to help preserve those most innocent in the Balkans during this, the year of the family.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Maurice Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, on March 24 last, in Tunisia, Dr. Marzouki was arrested and jailed after declaring that he would run for president.

• (1405)

His arrest can only be explained by the fact that he had denounced certain undemocratic electoral rules and given interviews to western newspapers.

Dr. Marzouki, who is a former president of the Tunisian Human Rights League, is well known in Quebec for his many conferences and publications on human rights and democratic development. It is therefore extremely shocking to learn that his fundamental freedoms have been violated.

Consequently, the Bloc Quebecois demands that the federal government put immediate pressure on the Tunisian government to free Dr. Marzouki.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville): On Sunday, May 1 in the Ottawa Sun the Canadian Police Association accused the Minister of Justice of using selective use of statistics and disputed his claims that there was no law and order crisis in Canada.

Statistics Canada figures show that in 1961 just before we stopped imposing the death penalty, there were 233 murders for a murder rate of 1.2 murders per 100,000 population. In 1992 there were 732 murders for a rate of 2.6 per 100,000.

Canadians know this is a massive increase in the number of murders despite the justice minister's reassurances to the contrary.

Over 90 per cent of my constituents are telling me they believe in capital punishment. If Canada is a true democracy then our laws should reflect what the majority of Canadians want. I ask this government for a binding referendum on the death penalty.

HAMILTON WEST QUESTIONNAIRE

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the constituents of Hamilton West for responding so quickly and vigorously to the questionnaire in my spring householder. In less than two weeks I have received nearly 2,000 responses and they are still coming in.

In addition to providing detailed comments and opinions on a number of important issues such as doctor assisted suicide and peacekeeping, many people seemed to appreciate the fact that someone was actually listening and interested in what they had to say. These are people like Norma who wrote: "I just want to say I appreciate your efforts at getting feedback from Canadians and I feel like there is someone in Ottawa who is actually listening to us".

With all the chirping that is going on about direct democracy from the members over there in the third party, and in this day and age of laptop computers, voice mailboxes, megabehemoth information superhighways, is it ever comforting to know that so far good old–fashioned pen to paper seems to work best.

I would like to point out that this form of direct democracy is available to each and every one of us. I encourage all members of this House to use it.

GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS

Mrs. Carolyn Parrish (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to draw attention to a Tory legacy of waste and gross excess in government publications.

We are all accumulating dozens of annual reports from crown corporations and government agencies for the 1993 fiscal year. Each attempts to outdo the other in flash, ostentation and wanton waste.

One of many flagrant examples of excess is the 1993 report of the Royal Canadian Mint. At only 26 pages it is over one–quarter inch thick on glossy card stock with four colour pictures of management and partial clear coating on select sections. The cover is richly embossed in gold foil. It is impossible to recycle and literally must have broken the mint to produce.

CMHC whose purpose is to maximize housing assistance for Canadians in need produced an annual report that is outrageous with exotic half–page die cuts, expensive graphics and heavy coloured stock.

We must denounce this type of waste. We must encourage simple economical reports that set the tone of this new government and reflect the frugality and practicality that all Canadians are expecting of us.

NATIONAL FOREST WEEK

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, this is National Forest Week. The aim of this national event, which is celebrated each year across Canada, is to heighten public awareness of the importance of our forest resources.

Our forests are a key part of our country's economy. No one knows the value of our forests better than the residents of Quebec's rural areas. I am thinking here, of course, about the residents of the Gaspé region. For generations, sawmill operators, Canadian forestry workers and their families have earned their living from our forests.

Throughout our history, an entire people has benefitted from the use of this great Canadian natural resource. Efforts to develop and regenerate our forests must continue.

• (1410)

Therefore, I call on Canadians to reflect upon the importance of our forests, Canada's treasured heritage.

MEMBER FOR YORK SOUTH—WESTON

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal member for York South—Weston declared yesterday that the Canadian Security Intelligence Service should investigate the activities of the Bloc Quebecois and the Parti Quebecois.

Such a declaration is totally unacceptable. It seems the requirements of democracy are too much of a burden for some members who would like the federal government to illegally interfere once again in the major decision Quebec is about to make.

Quebecers remember. They remember the arrests without warrants, the wiretapping, the break and enter searches which occurred during the days when the federal government readily mistook, some would say deliberately, legitimate and democratic aspirations for illegal actions.

I truly hope that the member for York South—Weston is the only one in this House to wish for Quebec and Canada to relive such a dark period of their history.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are astonished that the Department of Canadian Heritage is giving away 70,000 tax dollars for a study of riddles.

Student tuition fees are increasing steadily. Workers are forced to take wage cuts. Someone with a brain tumour can wait over a month just to get a CAT scan.

Why, when we face such serious problems, would any government minister allow such a senseless waste of our tax dollars? Is there not anyone in charge who cares that we are losing ground on health care, education and financial stability?

This government seems to think that Canadians are cash cows to be milked to fund every silly program that comes along.

The only riddle this government should study is why the finance minister seems unable to understand that frivolous spending hurts job creation and funding for health care and education.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CODE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, as we celebrate with South Africans the birth of a new democratic South Africa, Canadians are proud of the role we played in maintaining economic sanctions against the old South Africa.

That pride is called into question by some of the things that have been said recently by the Prime Minister and the Minister for International Trade in which the linking of trade to human and political rights has been seriously downplayed.

At the Marrakesh meeting to sign the new GATT agreement, which brought the World Trade Organization into existence, the minister was quoted in the Financial Post of April 9 as saying that he was reluctant to follow the American proposal for an international labour code.

Without such a code, the world's multinationals will be allowed to prey even on the child labourers of the developing world and the process of globalization will certainly continue on its present race to the bottom.

I call on the Minister for International Trade to overcome his conservative inhibitions, to see labour as a trade issue and to take the lead in designing an effective social and labour code under the World Trade Organization.

Globalization without global community and global standards is nothing other than moral anarchy.

INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAM

Mrs. Jane Stewart (Brant): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in my riding of Brant I had the privilege of announcing that the city of Brantford would be the first Ontario municipality to receive funding under the Canada–Ontario infrastructure works program.

With 15 per cent unemployment, one can imagine the open arms with which the announcement that $12 million would be spent locally in our community to restore our infrastructure and get our people back to work was received.

Brantford is not the only municipality that feels so strongly about this program. Fully 630 municipalities in our province have made applications for funding.

I would like to congratulate our government for working so expeditiously with the province and with the municipalities to get this program up and running. I would like to say to the Prime Minister how honoured I was to make the announcement, effectively an announcement that makes good his promise to help get Canadians back to work.

SOUTH AFRICAN ELECTIONS

Ms. Jean Augustine (Etobicoke—Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to report to this House that I have just returned from South Africa where I was a member of the Canadian observer mission to witness the election that took place last week.

Our team was dispersed in different parts of the country. I observed in seven areas of the eastern cape around East London, Transkei and Ciskei, including the second largest black township in the country. We visited polling stations in hospitals, prisons, nursing homes, churches, schoolrooms, as well as city halls. We witnessed voter registration and saw evidence of voter education.

From our observations we determined the elections to be fair and free of intimidation and violence. A majority of the electorate was in a position to vote and did so. Logistical, administrative and inadequate distribution of materials were challenges which did not daunt the voters' enthusiasm to cast their ballots.

• (1415)

The South African people are to be congratulated for their tremendous achievement toward the goal of democracy.

CARMAN LEMCKE

Mr. Murray Calder (Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, millions of Canadians during the 1950s and 1960s watched the television series "The Andy Griffith Show".

Just recently I had the pleasure to honour the retirement of Carman Lemcke, police chief of Shelburne, a town in my riding. During Mr. Lemcke's 37–year career he never wore a gun. Carman is the longest serving police chief in the province of Ontario and possibly Canada.

One humorous story is the tale of hands–up–Harry. Two bank robbers tried to make a withdrawal while Carm was working in his front yard. Mr. Lemcke went to the local hardware store, borrowed a rifle and set out on foot to capture the two robbers. The getaway car left early leaving hands–up–Harry to become a story regularly told in Shelburne.

On behalf of myself and the people of Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe I would like to wish Carman and Rose a happy, healthy and long retirement.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

RESTORATION OF DEMOCRACY IN HAITI

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. This week, the UN is to consider a draft resolution proposed by the U.S. to issue a 15–day ultimatum to the Haitian military junta and reinforce the trade embargo. At the same time, President Clinton took a tougher stand by clearly evoking the possibility of armed intervention to depose the military rulers he rightly accuses of killing innocent civilians.

My question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs, who has just arrived. Can the minister give an update on the negotiations at the UN concerning the ultimatum proposed by the American president and can he indicate whether Canada supports this proposal?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs): Mr. Speaker, naturally, we hope that a solution will finally be found to the long–lasting impasse in Haiti. We are making every effort to support the elected president, Mr. Aristide; we think he should return to his country. We think, as the American president said, that General Cédras and the chief of police of the city of Port–au–Prince must resign. We continue to believe that a total embargo is the only effective way to subdue the military.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we know that the Canadian policy is to suggest and try to convince the allies to impose a tougher military embargo. So far, however, the American president had not clearly stated his position, in particular on increasing the pressure he wants to exert on Haiti, since he is now hinting at armed intervention.

I ask the minister whether the Canadian government endorses the idea of armed intervention as proposed by President Clinton in case the Haitian military rulers refuse to comply with the proposed ultimatum.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in response to questions, the U.S. president stated that he was not ruling out any option, any alternative. I must say that Canada did not contemplate the possibility of armed intervention, whether multilateral or unilateral, as we are convinced that stiffer economic sanctions would overcome the military junta and that it is appropriate to impose effective sanctions, which involves the participation and co–operation of the Dominican Republic in particular. We think it is still possible to make the military rulers resign without having to resort to armed intervention.

• (1420)

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, according to the dispatch I read, President Clinton went further than what the minister said. He did not simply say that he was not ruling out any option, he specifically said that he was not ruling out the option of armed intervention, which is an important distinction when a U.S. president makes statements on such vital issues.

I therefore ask the Minister of Foreign Affairs whether he can tell us today if his government received assurances that the proposed reinforcement of trade sanctions will not lead to an increase in black–market activities controlled by the military junta and the Haitian police.

[English]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that Canada supports the return of President Aristide to Haiti.

We believe that a total embargo could bring about the withdrawal of the military people who are holding a suffering population hostage.

If the Americans and a number of other countries through the United Nations pass a resolution to bring a total embargo against Haiti, it is possible the embargo will not be a very long one. It will become very clear to the military people that they cannot stay there and they will resign in the following hours.

It is time to show unequivocally the military people there that they cannot perpetrate the denial of the vast majority of Haitians who voted freely for President Aristide.

TAX FAIRNESS

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, in a decision handed down yesterday, a court ruled that alimony received for child support should not be taxable. In fiscal terms, this is a decision with major financial implications. Yesterday in the House, the Minister of Finance was rather vague as to what his government intended to do about this decision, stating, and I quote:

> —our biggest concern is financial support for children and tax fairness.

Can the Minister of National Revenue clarify what the Minister of Finance means by concern for tax fairness? Are we to understand that the government plans on making child support payments no longer taxable?

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the member rightly points out, the decision yesterday is perhaps one of the more important decisions in the equation dealing with child support payments.

Under the Canadian judicial system we have 90 days to consider the decision and what actions the Government of Canada with the assistance of the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Justice will take. The Minister of Finance will be revealing that decision and will speak to the House at the earliest possible convenience.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Will the minister undertake to review the Income Tax Act to ensure, in real terms, greater fairness in the tax treatment of families, with tax fairness being a central concern in the context of the International Year of the Family?

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this issue is foremost in tax fairness. As the House knows, it has in front of it motion M–14 from the member for Nepean on the issue of child support. It is a votable motion and the minister and the government look forward to hearing the wishes of the House on this issue.

The minister and other members of the government are quite happy to meet with members of the whole House to talk about this issue. There is also a federal–provincial–territorial task force on the question of child support. We consider this input to be also very important in our consideration.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

As the Prime Minister is aware there is increasing evidence that Canada's health care system is in trouble: hospitals being closed, long lines waiting for surgery, provinces rationing services. At the root of the problems are inadequate arrangements for financing health care.

Does the government acknowledge that health care financing needs to be completely reformed and that Canadians are now prepared to accept substantive amendments to the Canada Health Act?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Health and on behalf of the Government of Canada I would like to commit the government to our full support for the Canada Health Act. It is a very important instrument in ensuring that every Canadian has access to health care, not because of the size of their wallets but because of the size of their health problems.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I gather that the government and the Deputy Prime Minister will not concede that Canadians would rather have major changes in health care financing than to suffer further cuts in services.

For example, a Compas opinion survey on this subject is being released in Toronto today. It reveals that 58 per cent of Canadians are prepared to accept health care financing mechanisms not permitted by the Canada Health Act, even including user fees, in order to save health care.

Does the Deputy Prime Minister accept that the Canada Health Act should be amended to permit the provinces greater flexibility in health care financing?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think the member is on very dangerous ground when he chooses to pursue policies because of polls.

I have a copy of another poll done by Insight Canada Research. This poll is from last month and states that only 16 per cent of Canadians support user fees.

I would suggest to the member that he take a look at the red book commitments of the Liberal government. We will be meeting with our provincial counterparts in June to examine the whole issue of how we can better deliver health care, but we do not see user fees as a solution to the problems of Canada's health care system.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, we could argue all day about the validity of polls.

I suggest to the ministers that if they contrast alternative financing mechanisms with the alternative of losing the service, a majority of Canadians favour the alternative financing mechanism.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister this simple question. If the choice is between further cuts in health care service or changing the financing provisions of the Canada Health Act, which alternative does the government prefer?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, it is a false choice.

If we look at one area of health which is of great concern to women, it is in the whole area of birthing. Anyone who has gone through the process knows that birthing is a natural part of life. It is not necessarily a medical problem. Provinces across the country increasingly are looking to alternative birthing methods, including the use of midwives. It has recently been embraced by the province of Ontario, including les services de sages–femmes dans la province de Québec.

It is a creative way of delivering a service to healthy women to have babies in a healthy fashion. This creative way actually saves money for the system.

That is what my counterpart, the Minister of Health, is going to be examining with her provincial colleagues when she meets with them in June.

The Speaker: Colleagues, I permitted the last question but I would prefer in future if questions were not hypothetical and a little more direct. If that could be the case we would do better.

REPRODUCTIVE TECHNOLOGIES

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

Yesterday at the annual meeting of the World Health Organization in Geneva, the Minister of Health said that the misuse of reproductive technologies like cloning and genetic engineering to choose a child's sex must stop.

• (1430)

Does the Minister of Justice agree with his colleague, the Minister of Health, who at that prestigious forum emphasized the importance of criminalizing some reproductive technologies such as genetic engineering and cloning?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as I said as recently as last week in this House, the Department of Justice is working with the ministry of health examining the 300 recommendations that came from the royal commission on reproductive technologies in February. Very few of them actually deal with the justice system to the extent to which they recommend changes, for example, in the Criminal Code.

Representatives of justice and health are preparing recommendations for cabinet arising from the royal commission and touching upon all of the issues in relation to reproductive technologies.

Rather than deal piecemeal with this or that part of the proposals, my approach to date has been to await the completion of the work of those officials and bring forward to cabinet policies that we believe are in the public interest and that act upon the recommendations of the commission which spent a long time looking at these complex questions.

In response to the hon. member, I say that rather than identifying policies a bit at a time we are looking at the recommendations as a whole. We will be coming forward through cabinet with the government policy probably in the fall of this year.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, does the minister realize that the government's slowness in acting to regulate and control new reproductive technologies proves that this issue is not a priority for the government, despite the minister's statement in Geneva, and that its inaction will have a major impact on ethics and research?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that conclusion follows.

First, it is a matter of priority. For example, we have designed topics and background materials for the meeting of deputy ministers in mid–June. Deputy ministers of health across the country will be meeting. We will be consulting them with respect to their views and the provincial and territorial perspective on some of these issues. We will be preparing discussion papers over the summer to elicit the views of the research community on some approaches we can take to the recommendations of the royal commission.

It is a matter of priority. It is not something we are going to act upon next week. We are going to consult. We take the issue very seriously. We will come forward with policies probably late in 1994 to deal with these issues. They are matters of concern and of substance, but we are going to deal with them methodically.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Health I would like to direct this question to the Prime Minister.

The Speaker: As was mentioned before in Question Periods, it would be preferable if the matter of whether members are here or not is not mentioned. Would the hon. member please put his question.

Mr. Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, let us talk about women's health.

A recent Halifax Chronicle–Herald article detailed the case of Mary, a single mother who was waiting for orthopaedic surgery. During this time she has been unable to work because of severe pain. In Mary's words: "They are all talking about prevention but the fact that I have not had surgery is an example of not using prevention".

If this government is serious about prevention as a means of solving our current health care crisis, why does it continue to rely on rationing of essential health care with its huge cost in human suffering to shackle Canadians to an obsolete Canada Health Act?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that the Liberal government is strongly committed to the establishment and accessibility of health care across the country.

If we actually followed the member's advice and torpedoed the Canada Health Act, the difficult situation that patients are facing now across the country would be exacerbated because what we would end up with would be one system where if people had money they could get the operation and another system for those people with no money. We will not support that system.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, we are not talking about torpedoing any act. We just want to make it better so that Canadians will have better health care for always. The system is broken. To fix the system we need innovative, cost effective and compassionate solutions.

• (1435)

We cannot do this under the current act. Does this government care more about the Canada Health Act or the health of Canadians? What solutions does this government offer today? We want answers, not rhetoric.

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, one of the principles of the Canada Health Act is universality. One of the things that is banned by the Canada Health Act is user fees.

When the member talks about rhetoric, he suggests that we make the Canada Health Act better. The fact is that the five principles upon which the Canada Health Act is based are the very principles which have many countries around the world looking to Canada as one place where you can get care no matter what the size of your pocketbook.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In a letter to the Prime Minister, dated April 26, 1994, the chairman of the Kanesatake Chamber of Commerce blames the carelessness of the federal government particularly for the collapse of native businesses and for the alleged misappropriation of federal subsidies by the band council, in an unstable situation where public security is concerned.

Since the chairman of the Chamber of Commerce is accusing the Kanesatake Band Council of misappropriating federal subsidies, would the Prime Minister make public any information he might have on these allegations?

[English]

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, perhaps after Question Period my good friend can show me the letter, we can talk quietly and I can give him whatever information I have.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean): Mr. Speaker, I hope I have better luck with my next question, which deals with business.

What real measures does the Prime Minister intend to take in order to alleviate the alarming financial difficulties Kanesatake businesses are faced with, given the unstable public security situation caused essentially by the carelessness the federal government has shown in matters under its jurisdiction?

[English]

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I might remind the hon. member that it was not this government that brought the army out. It was not this government that would not negotiate.

This government is bringing the Mohawk people here to Ottawa and dealing with them. The government of Quebec is bringing the Mohawk people to Quebec City and dealing with them. We will deal with the reeves, we will deal with the mayors and we will deal with the people. We do not create problems, we solve them.

ABORIGINAL SELF–GOVERNMENT

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Yesterday the minister said that rank and file aboriginal people in Manitoba want self–government. What I am hearing from more and more aboriginal people is that they have serious concerns about the accountability of self–government. However, many of these people feel too intimidated to publicly speak out.

Can the minister explain how he was able to determine the view of rank and file aboriginal people and how they are directly involved in the negotiation process?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, dealing with the specific question, how do I know I am dealing with the rank and file? At the meeting where this was discussed two weeks ago there were 60 chiefs all elected by the rank and file. There were 400 people, all from Manitoba, all accountable to the rank and file. They almost unanimously after getting their direction from the chiefs, from the rank and file, want self–government. They have been waiting 150 years for it and they are ready to move on it.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, it has been reported that many aboriginal people are afraid of self–government because they do not know if or how their individual rights will be protected.

With regard to the self–government agreement now being negotiated in Manitoba, can the minister explain if and how these individual rights will be protected and how aboriginal leaders will be held accountable by the people they purport to represent?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member suggests that the aboriginal people are not ready for self–government. Might I remind the hon. member that they have been held under the Indian Act in a situation of paternalism and assimilation since 1850, acts that we passed here in Canada.

• (1440)

It is our doing, incorrectly, in bringing in the Indian Act that has caused this paternalism and this fear. We are trying to break that because we have created it. In the four years that I hope we are here and I am in this ministry that Indian Act that was passed is going to be gone.

MIL DAVIE SHIPYARD

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Yesterday, the Quebec Minister of Industry and Commerce had a secret meeting with the federal ministers of Industry and Transport. According to the daily Le Droit, the review of drug patent legislation, the high–speed train issue and the construction of the Magdalen Islands ferry were on the agenda.

Can the Minister of Transport tell us if, during that meeting, he gave a positive reply to the Quebec Minister of Industry regarding the awarding to MIL Davie of the contract for the construction of the Magdalen Islands ferry and the multipurpose smart ship?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, during the meeting with the Quebec Minister of Industry, we discussed of course the need to provide an adequate ship for the transport of people, goods, trucks and cars from Prince Edward Island to the Magdalen Islands. We informed the Quebec Minister of Industry that the government of Canada intends to ensure the safety of people making that trip, and we hope to soon be able to make a decision, in co–operation with the Quebec government, as to how we can best help these people who urgently need adequate and safe services.

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, this answer is exactly the one I was given last January 18.

Now that the Minister of Transport is in possession of MIL Davie's business plan, as the Minister of Industry said Monday in this House, will he recognize that the two contracts for the "smart ship" and the ferry are essential to MIL Davie's survival, and when can we hope to get an answer regarding these two issues?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, first, the hon. member will certainly realize that the Department of Transport is not responsible for the smart ship issue. However, those who are familiar with MIL Davie's history understand how important that industry is for workers.

As regards the ferry between Prince Edward Island and the Magdalen Islands, the priority for the Department of Transport and the government of Canada is to ensure the safety of Magdalen Islanders and others who use the ferry.

Obviously, the decision as to whether MIL Davie's recovery plan will work must be made by the Quebec government and the company itself, which is trying its best to solve its problems. There is no doubt that discussions will continue. I want to assure the hon. member that the issue of safety for people who currently travel on a ship which is causing enormous problems, the Lucy Maud Montgomery, must be settled and this is something we want to do as quickly as possible. The link with the future of MIL Davie makes things more complicated, but we try to be as understanding as possible.

RWANDA

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, as you know it is increasingly difficult to remain indifferent to the situation in Rwanda. Yesterday the UN Secretary–General, Boutros Boutros–Ghali, asked the Security Council to reconsider its decision to reduce UN forces in Rwanda.

My question which follows that of the hon. member for Rosedale and other interested members in this House is this: Is the minister willing to support the Secretary–General, take the lead of the Security Council and ensure an adequate world response to this immense tragedy?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I want to assure him that Canada is certainly actively pursuing various avenues with other members of the UN to try to help the people in Rwanda.

• (1445)

Brigadier General Dallaire, a Canadian, is in charge of the UN forces there. He is certainly pursuing all avenues to try to bring the factions to their senses and to stop them killing each other.

We do not belong to the security council. Therefore it would be difficult for us to lead the discussion there. I take the recommendation of the member in good spirit. Certainly Canada, through some members of the security council, could pursue initiatives to try to lead to a greater presence of UN forces there.

More important, when the factions have stopped this terrible slaughter, Canada will be ready to move in with humanitarian assistance to help rebuild that country.

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

Yesterday the chairman of the National Parole Board confirmed that the vice–chairman of the board's prairie region was involved in five decisions to release convicts who, once released, went on to murder seven people.

Given the minister's comments that his first priority is to achieve safe homes and safe streets for Canadians, could he please tell Canadians what action he is to take in this regard?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the information in question is something that concerns me greatly.

I am proceeding to get all the facts surrounding the individual's participation in these decisions. Once I have these facts I will be discussing the matter further with cabinet colleagues.

I want to add, as I have informed members of the House, that it is my intention on behalf of the government to bring forward before too long legislation to create an accountability system for members of the parole board.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to hear that. While we are waiting for that system of accountability, while we are waiting for this amendment, and since we obviously have parole board members presently releasing dangerous offenders into the community, is the minister prepared to put a moratorium on paroling dangerous offenders before other innocent victims die?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the cases the hon. member has been referring to took place, if I am not mistaken, three to five years ago. I am very concerned about these cases. I want to work and I am working to try to ensure that these kinds of cases are not repeated.

The parole board is an independent judicial tribunal, something akin to a court, operating under legislation passed by the House. I want to see what authority I have to make sure that the parole board functions properly.

However I think the hon. member should rethink his suggestion because it implies a course of action that may impede the protection of the public in the long run rather than help it.

INTERGOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. The October 26, 1992 referendum was held in Quebec according to the Quebec legislation on referendums and paid for solely by the Quebec government. However, through its taxes, Quebec paid for part of the federal government's expenses, and the previous government had promised to reimburse this sum which amounts to $26 million.

My question is this: In all fairness for Quebec, has the minister decided to grant this request which has been presented several times to the federal government, and more precisely in this House, on January 28 last?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know, the previous government had not come to a final decision regarding the reimbursement of referendum expenses incurred in Quebec, and neither have we.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

Last week, in response to a question on the future viability of the Canada Pension Plan, the minister stated: "It is certainly actuarially sound and has sufficient contingency funds within it". Yet according to a recent OECD study on public pension plans we in Canada would have to dramatically increase contributions or increase the pensionable age by 16 years to age 81 to make our plan actuarially sound.

Could the minister explain the huge discrepancy between his statement and the OECD report?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification): Mr. Speaker, when I made the statement last week we were talking about a report that pertained to the immediate situation of the fund which is actuarially sound. It is in full reserve and there is no contemplated need for major changes.

The OECD study he refers to is one that projects a substantial change in the population of Canada over the next 20 years when there will be a much larger proportion of people at retirement age. It is for that reason the Minister of Finance announced in his budget that we would be establishing a major white paper, green paper or task force to look at a number of options that have to be considered in relation to those changes in population.

I hope the hon. member will have something constructive to offer when that paper is put forward.

Mr. Monte Solberg (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, there are two reports now including the one he referred to last week that suggest we need big changes in the Canada pension plan if it is to remain solvent.

Certainly we will be participating in any discussions on the future solvency of that plan and we would like to offer something.

I would ask the minister to make it clear, first of all, that we have a problem today with that. I would encourage him and his government to show some leadership by bringing forward a discussion on this matter as soon as possible so that Canadians could be assured something is being done about the plan and their future pensions will be safe.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification): Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat if I might that in the budget of last February the Minister of Finance clearly stated that we saw a need to look at the whole question of security in retirement programs for Canadians because of changes taking place in population and other factors.

The Department of Finance, the Department of Health, and my department are presently preparing the kinds of facts and figures so that Canadians can have an honest, rational and open debate.

We would hope to table it in the fall, as soon as it is ready. At that point in time I would welcome the participation of the hon. member and all other members of the House because I think it is an important issue.

It is important for the hon. member to recognize and not to create any false sense that the system as it is presently constructed is under any kind of threat. It is a very sound system but we must prepare for the future.

INTERGOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Martin Cauchon (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. Lately, some people have delighted in saying that relations between the provinces and the federal government, and specifically between Quebec and Ottawa, have broken down completely.

Can the minister advise us today on the status of federal–provincial relations and tell us what steps he intends to take to co–operate with the provinces and to reassure Quebecers that federalism is indeed alive and well?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question because it gives me an opportunity to put a number of issues discussed over the past few weeks into perspective. Within a federation, it is natural for conflicts to arise between the federal government and the provinces. I feel that this government has been relatively successful in recent months at resolving conflicts.

For example, not only do we have the infrastructure program which has been a success across the country, and particularly in Quebec, but we also have a number of agreements such as the St. Lawrence action plan which provided an additional $191 million to the $526 million infrastructure program. This extra money will be spent in Quebec. We have also negotiated agreements on the Sainte–Marguerite River, the Montreal Botanical Garden and, most important, on equalization payments.

AIDS VIRUS IN PRISONS

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General, and it is not a planted question. In June 1992, the Solicitor General mandated a committee of experts to make recommendations on preventing the spread of the AIDS virus in prisons. The main conclusion of the report tabled a few days ago is that the most important thing to protect inmates' health is a vigorous AIDS information campaign.

Does the Solicitor General share this conclusion and what directives does he intend to issue and what measures does he intend to take to apply them in the actual prison environment?

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago, as the hon. member said, the expert committee on AIDS in prisons tabled its final report. At that time Correctional Service Canada published a detailed response. I support the conclusions in that response which among other things includes a vigorous program of information.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, since January 1992, condoms, rubber dams and lubricant have been made available to prisoners. According to the committee, the next step is to provide bleach and instructions for cleaning syringes used in tattooing.

Does the minister share this forward looking approach to prevention in a prison setting?

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as I have said, I support the response of Correctional Service Canada which includes a pilot project in that direction.

There are certain parts of the committee report which Correctional Service has not accepted and I think for good reason. This is all set out in detail in the response of Correctional Service which, as I have said, the Minister of Health and I support.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice who has been musing about banning private ownership of handguns.

The 1,054,000 registered handguns in the country have a value of at least $300 million. Is the hon. minister considering compensation, or will big brother be going door to door and confiscating what is now legally owned property of Canadian citizens?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I have made clear that I am going to work with my colleagues in caucus and cabinet to bring forward proposals to achieve stricter gun control in the country. I think there is broad support for more effective control, and that includes particularly handguns which are not used in hunting.

Dealing more specifically with the question the hon. member has asked on compensation, that is one of the issues we have to look at. This party and this government are coming to these questions with an open mind. We are going to be sensitive to the ownership rights the hon. member has referred to and compensation is a matter we are going to be dealing with.

I am aware of the issue. I do not have a response today because caucus has not dealt with it, nor has cabinet. However, I can assure the hon. member that the process is going to be undertaken and that we are going to develop a position on this very important issue.

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, for 20 years I had an occupational permit to carry a handgun as a field geologist in the mountains of British Columbia. I rarely used it. I rarely carried it but as a free man, as a Canadian, I had the right to make that personal decision myself.

There are legitimate reasons for civilians to own these weapons. To some working people, including timber cruisers, prospectors, trappers, bank messengers and the like, they are tools, not toys.

Will the minister listen to the advice of his own backbenchers and thoughtfully reconsider his position?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I have three points very briefly.

First there is no right in the country to bear arms. The ownership of firearms is a privilege which is accorded by government under certain strict circumstances.

• (1500)

I do not wish to make light of the point made by the hon. member but the fact is we are not after those persons. Let me put it this way. The object of any such measures would not be to make life more difficult for those who have legitimate reasons connected with their occupation to carry firearms. Rather, it is in recognition of the fact that the use of firearms, handguns in particular, in the commission of homicides has risen from 33 per cent to 52 per cent in the last four years.

We will be thoughtful in the development of our policies through caucus, which is going to discuss these matters, and cabinet, which will form the policies that we will bring forward to the House.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs. Yesterday, Lebanese Canadians demonstrated on Parliament Hill against actions in Lebanon that they consider oppressive and contrary to human rights and freedoms. I would like to ask the minister what the Canadian government's position is regarding these accusations?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have read the Amnesty International report and asked our ambassador to raise this issue with the Lebanese officials. When I receive further information, I will gladly pass it on to this House and to the hon. member in particular.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on the same point of order I raised yesterday.

After making the request of the Speaker of the House, I consulted the recorder for Hansard who sits in the House during Question Period and I was assured that person heard the remark made and noted the remark on her paper. Yet it does not appear in Hansard. In my opinion that raises questions about the procedures of the House.

Again, I find the remarks offensive and insulting, particularly coming from the office of the Deputy Prime Minister. I would ask the Speaker again to have that member apologise and withdraw the remarks.

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the member makes reference to the fact that the comments did not appear in Hansard and somehow draws some references to the staff of the House of Commons.

Certainly from the perspective of the government staff of the House of Commons, in particular those people who record comments, they are doing a terrific job and should in no way be under any kind of a cloud because of this kind of comment.

That being said, what I said yesterday which I will withdraw if the Speaker finds it offensive, when there were questions raised and insinuations made about the status of the role of Indian chiefs in certain provinces, accusing them of everything ranging from assault to—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: Order. I think I heard the hon. Deputy Prime Minister say at the beginning that if the statements were made she would withdraw the statements. Is that correct?

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, what I said was that the questions involved were racist. If the Speaker finds offence at my characterization of a question I will so withdraw any comment.

The Speaker: The withdrawal of course is accepted categorically as it was said.

I wish to assure the hon. member that the procedures of the House were followed to a T. I informed myself of this. I would like to go to the next matter.

PETITIONS

IMMIGRATION

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition that has been signed by over 100 residents of Saint John.

The petitioners pray and call upon the House to consider an inquiry into the time it is taking to process the applications of immediate family members who have been deported. Under the 1994 immigration plan the time required to process applications involving immediate family members has been reduced to less than six months.

Mrs. Lovella Szezendor–Grey from Saint John has undertaken the sponsorship of her husband, Antonio Grey, who was deported to Guatemala on April 21, 1993. Over a year has passed since Mrs. Szezendor–Grey started the proceedings with immigration for the return of her husband. I urge the House to look into this matter to expedite Mr. Grey's application.

This petition is presented with my concurrence.

CRIMINAL CODE

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 36, I would like to present a petition signed by many people from the constituency of Beaver River.

The undersigned residents of the province of Alberta draw the attention of the House of Commons to that whereas under section 745 of the Criminal Code of Canada convicted murderers sentenced to life imprisonment without chance of parole for 25 years are able to apply for review after only 15 years, and whereas the murder of a Canadian citizen is a most reprehensible crime, therefore your petitioners request that Parliament repeal section 745 of the Criminal Code of Canada as soon as possible.

POSTAL SERVICE

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to submit a petition on behalf of citizens of Saint–Louis–du–Ha! Ha! who want cuts in postal services to stop. These petitioners ask that postal services be restored to past levels.

• (1510)

PLIGHT OF THE ELDERLY

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of submitting a petition signed by more than 600 residents from my riding of Québec–Est and the surrounding region.

The petitioners want to draw the attention of Parliament to the plight of the elderly in Quebec: 53 per cent of men and 82 per cent of women who reach the age of 65 need government assistance to make ends meet; 40 per cent of seniors aged 65 and over are entitled to the guaranteed income supplement, which merely keeps them at the poverty level. Moreover, only 5 per cent of people aged 65 and over have an annual income exceeding $50,000.

Therefore, the petitioners call upon Parliament to refrain from taking any measure to reduce any benefit, pension, social program, assistance or existing advantage for seniors, or to impose any tax or other levy having the effect of reducing their income.

I fully support this petition and I urge the government to act upon it.

KILLER CARDS

Ms. Jean Augustine (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a number of petitions from several of my constituents. These petitioners call on the House to amend the laws of Canada to prohibit the importation, distribution, sale and manufacture of killer cards and to advise producers of killer cards that their products if destined for Canada will be seized and destroyed.

TOBACCO PACKAGING

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to present a petition, approved by the Clerk of Petitions, from my riding of Carleton—Charlotte.

This petition, presented to me on Friday afternoon past, states: "We the undersigned, being residents of the province of New Brunswick, draw the attention of the House to the following: That the Minister of Health is proposing legislation requiring plain packaging of tobacco products consumed in Canada, action which we feel is ill–considered and likely to have detrimental effects on ourselves and our community without demonstrable benefits to Canadians. Therefore, your petitioners request that Parliament refuse to enact any legislation requiring plain packaging of tobacco products to be consumed in Canada".

ETHANOL

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to rise in the House, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present petitions of several hundred names from my riding of Kent requesting the continued exemption of the excise tax on ethanol fuels.

The petitioners cannot understand why the government is delaying this when in opposition it demanded the banning of MMT and the withdrawal of the excise tax on ethanol.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 it is my honour to present a petition bearing 494 signatures. I understand that these signatures were collected at one point in the space of two days.

The petition states: "Whereas there is no statistical evidence that existing gun control laws have any negative effect on criminal activity; whereas existing and publicly proposed gun controls carry the potential for confiscation of lawfully owned property by law–abiding citizens; wherefore the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to turn its attention with respect to firearms control away from law–abiding citizens to the criminal element and allow the holder of a valid firearms acquisition certificate, whether or not a course or test was taken to obtain it, to renew the said certificate without the necessity of a course or test".

I concur with this petition.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mr. Murray Calder (Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have three petitions which I wish to present today from the residents of the hamlet of Kenilworth and area.

The first petition calls upon Parliament to change the Young Offenders Act to ensure that transfers for violent offenders to adult court be improved and to increase the penalties for those convicted.

WITNESS PROTECTION

Mr. Murray Calder (Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the second petition calls for improved witness and informant protection through the formation of a separate government agency.

KILLER CARDS

Mr. Murray Calder (Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the third petition deals with the issue of serial killer cards.

SERIAL KILLER BOARD GAME

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table petitions signed by 480 people pursuant to Standing Order 36. These petitioners call upon Parliament to ban the importation into Canada of the serial killer board game. This brings the grand total of signatures I have so far tabled in this House on this issue to 109,940.

CANADA WILDLIFE ACT

Hon. Douglas Peters (for the Minister of the Environment) moved that Bill C–24, an act to amend the Canada Wildlife Act and to make a consequential amendment to another act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Natural Resources): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure and honour to be introducing today for second reading, legislation to conserve and protect Canada's wildlife, in particular amendments to the Canada Wildlife Act.

Of all the responsibilities of Environment Canada one of the most important is the stewardship of wildlife.

Canadians care very deeply about wildlife. One of the most powerful values that all Canadians share is our tremendous pride in Canada's environment and magnificent natural heritage. Canadians everywhere have a strong desire to protect and restore the various ecosystems that make up our environment. No component of our natural heritage is more precious than Canada's wildlife.

The beauty of wild plants and animals, the idea of free creatures living in nature are very appealing to all of us. We value wildlife for many other reasons as well, for example, as a source of recreation, as an important social economic resource, as an integral aspect of the lives of native people, even as a potential source of medicines as yet unknown.

This government and Environment Canada take the responsibility for wildlife very seriously. We are taking action to fulfil those responsibilities on a number of fronts.

We are modernizing and strengthening federal wildlife legislation. At this very moment the government is drafting regulations which will enable it to proclaim the wild animal and plant protection and regulation of interprovincial and international trade act. These regulations are very important and will significantly strengthen Canada's ability to protect its wild plants and animals from poaching and smuggling and are now being developed under a consultative process that includes all stakeholders which is the way this government functions.

As members will recall, on Monday we debated amendments to strengthen the Migratory Bird Conventions Act, one of the cornerstones of wildlife protection in Canada.

In addition Canada and the United States are on convergent tracks in preparation for formal negotiation of amendments to the migratory bird convention.

• (1520)

Let me now turn to the Canada Wildlife Act. The Canada Wildlife Act was passed in 1973. It authorized the federal government to undertake research studies on wildlife and in collaboration with the provinces carry out a vast array of conservation activities to help wildlife, including the protection of species threatened with extinction.

While the act adequately responded to our needs back then, amendments are certainly required in order to reflect our needs today. To date wildlife conservation has focused on certain species or specific groups of species.

[Translation]

Today, we generally agree that we need a more comprehensive approach to conservation, an ecosystem approach, which takes into consideration all roles and values of ecosystems, including all animal and plant species and their needs in terms of habitat. This is indeed the recommended approach in the document "A Wildlife Policy for Canada" approved by federal and provincial ministers responsible for wildlife in 1990.

This kind of approach is the basis for the amendments proposed to strengthen and update the Canada Wildlife Act.

[English]

For example, the current Canada Wildlife Act defines wildlife as all non–domestic animals. The updated act will expand the definition of wildlife to include all wild organisms. The new definition is consistent with wildlife policy for Canada. It will better enable a shift in research and conservation efforts toward a true ecosystem approach. It also puts the act in line with the convention on biological diversity which was ratified by Canada in 1992.

The modernized Canada Wildlife Act will provide an extended framework to help protect all species in our ecosystem. It is important to note that with provincial agreement the new act will help preserve habitat. We found out through hard experience that it is almost impossible to save a single species of plant or animal in the wild without first preserving its habitat.

Close to my own riding of Moncton we have seen this borne out. The Western Hemisphere Shorebird Reserve has been established at Marys Point. A sister reserve in South America has been established to protect the habitat of semipalmated sandpipers among other migratory species of birds.

It is a healthy habitat that permits the survival of species. That is what the ecosystem approach is all about. You cannot talk about saving the eagle without also talking about water quality, about fish population and other habitat.

This applies to Canada's marine environment as well. Traditional wildlife protection has focused on terrestrial wildlife species and their habitats. The marine application of the present act is set out at the 12–mile territorial sea limit. Critical wildlife habitat, however, including areas important to seabirds and breeding and feeding grounds for whales extends far beyond the 12–mile limit.

The modernized Canada Wildlife Act includes provision for the establishment of marine national wildlife areas out to the limit of Canada's 200 nautical mile territory. Regulatory authorities related to activities in marine protected areas would be established.

The extension of the Canada Wildlife Act to the 200 mile limit could help us significantly in sustaining the biodiversity and other associated benefits of marine ecosystems.

No legislation can be effective if it cannot be applied and enforced effectively. Therefore the modernization of the Canada Wildlife Act will improve the administration and enforcement of the act in a number of ways. All of the administration and implementation provisions of the act are being updated, streamlined and made consistent with other federal conservation laws.

Some of the more significant of these revisions deal with enforcement. Penalties are being toughened to reflect the serious nature of crimes, such as poaching and the destruction of protected habit that threaten Canada's wildlife heritage.

• (1525)

Potential maximum penalties under the Canada Wildlife Act are being increased to a possible fine of $25,000 or a jail term of six months, or both. The act will provide more flexibility to the courts and enforcement officers in ways that will improve compliance and enforcement.

For example, revisions to the act will provide authority for the issuing of court orders and will enable conservation officers to issue tickets for certain offences. This will give more options in dealing with offences and punishment so that the best and most efficient means are available to respond to the violations.

At the same time where a violation is of a minor nature, such as a record keeping violation, a ticketable offence can be created. Rather than requiring a court appearance, an officer will be able to give a ticket so that the ticket can be paid directly. This will ensure fairness and relate to the severity of the offence.

Community service will become an option in the sentencing of convicted violators. This will encourage judges to assign penalties where they might otherwise be reluctant. If the community service relates to wildlife, as seems very likely, it will provide tangible conservation benefits as well.

It will become possible to use court orders to prohibit the continuation of activities harmful to protected areas. Persons who have damaged ecosystems in national wildlife areas could be forced to pay the cost of remediation. It is under the authority of the Canada Wildlife Act that many areas of key significance to Canada's wildlife are protected.

At present 45 national wildlife areas comprising 287,000 hectares have been set up under the act. Although many diverse species are found in them, most current wildlife areas have been established for their importance as habitat for migratory birds.

Furthermore, our national wildlife areas help Canadians meet many of their international wildlife management obligations. For example, our national wildlife areas help us meet our international commitments under the convention on wetlands of international importance, commonly known as the Ramsar convention.

Canada also has commitments under the circumpolar agreement on the conservation of Arctic flora and fauna component of the Arctic environmental protection strategy, the global convention on biodiversity and a number of bilateral and multilateral agreements to conserve wildlife and habitat.

All of these commitments would be difficult if not impossible to meet without our system of national wildlife areas and the Canada Wildlife Act. The revised act will help us and the international community to do a better job of preserving wildlife heritage.

It is particularly appropriate to be speaking about the Canada Wildlife Act today. I want to use this occasion to call the attention of the House to the fact that Canada has recently received formal notification that the Creston valley wildlife management area has been registered as Canada's 32nd wetland of international importance under the Ramsar convention.

Canada is a leading participant in this international environmental treaty that is promoting the conservation and wise use of wetlands the world over. In fact over 30 per cent of total wetland area designated under the convention is located within Canada.

Our network of important protected wetlands now spans all the provinces and territories in Canada. The Creston valley wildlife management area, the latest Canadian Ramsar site, is the first to be designated as entirely owned and managed by the province of British Columbia.

The Creston valley site covers 6,970 hectares on the floodplains of the Kootenay River. It contains fresh eutrophic lakes, ferns and lowland river delta wetlands. The Creston valley is a major feeding habitat for migrating species on the western flyway and regularly supports over 100,000 waterfowl during migrating periods.

I and this government salute British Columbia for nominating this area which is vital to a wide range of international migratory species. Environment Canada is proud to have assisted the people of British Columbia in seeking the Ramsar convention designation for the Creston valley.

Canada has committed itself to setting aside and safeguarding 12 per cent of its total land mass as protected natural space. Our national wildlife areas and the Ramsar convention sites are helping us to set aside that 12 per cent of Canada's habitat as protected areas.

• (1530)

What about the other 88 per cent of Canada? Birds are independent creatures. They fly where they want to fly and often the places that are most important to them fall outside our Ramsar sites, national wildlife areas, national or provincial parks.

We have to make room for wildlife in the other 88 per cent of Canada as well. We have to influence general land use management in such a way that we humans do not drive out the other species with whom we share our ecosystem.

In this regard initiatives such as a North American waterfowl management plan are extremely important. Under the plan three nations, Canada, the United States and Mexico, are working together to preserve populations of wildlife and their habitat. The North American waterfowl management plan is a leading global example of a concept of wiser use that is promoted by the Ramsar convention.

Under the plan, Canada has pioneered new and innovative ways to protect wildlife and habitat in the other 88 per cent. Under the plan concepts of wise use are finding their way into land areas and wetlands not under the direct control of governments.

Numerous organizations such as Ducks Unlimited, the Nature Conservancy of Canada, and Wildlife Habitat Canada are effectively promoting stewardship by private ownership. Partnerships have been forged with farmers and many other landowners to protect wildlife and the habitat in our vast food growing regions. It has been shown that many of the practices beneficial to wildlife also benefit agriculture, both economically and in such areas as soil conservation.

In effect, the plan is exploring new ways to do business and provide leverage to federal funds. For example, every federal dollar invested in activities under the North American waterfowl management plan is matched by an additional $6 from other donors of which approximately half comes from American sources. This type of leverage is possible because diverse partners and interests can gather together under the umbrella of the North American waterfowl management plan and develop and agree upon common goals and objectives and put into effect their shared vision.

Shared interests can lead to shared objectives. Diverse people and organizations can get together and find, sometimes to their surprise, that they have things in common and can work toward the same goals. This type of bridge building, of people, organizations and governments working together is precisely the kind of co–operation envisaged by the wildlife policy for Canada and it is very important as we try to discover new and effective ways to take us toward the goal of sustainable development.

In addition to agricultural partnerships, partnerships are also being formed with other major land use sectors in Canada. For example in Nova Scotia and in Newfoundland, North American waterfowl management plan agreements are in place. Bowater–Mersey and Krueger–Cornerbrach Pulp and Paper, two large forestry companies, manage and protect tens of thousands of acres of wetlands while maintaining profitable forestry activities.

Clearly the North American waterfowl management plan exemplifies sustainable development in action.

[Translation]

Sustainable development is the key to long term economic and environmental health. By keeping wildlife populations in good health, we will be able to contribute to the social, cultural and economic well–being of Canada, as well as to the ecological and biological processes necessary to sustain life.

A Statistics Canada study on the importance of wildlife for Canadians reinforces this opinion. In 1991, Canadian residents, and 1.8 million American visitors attracted to Canada by its wildlife, spent a total of $9 billion on sport fishing and other wildlife related activities.

• (1535)

[English]

Canadians think that wildlife is important, and we engage in all sorts of wildlife related activities. In fact the popularity of these activities is at an all–time high. Over 90 per cent of Canadians participate in one or more wildlife related activities. We watch, photograph, feed, study and hunt wildlife. The billions we spend doing these things contribute significantly to national and provincial economies in the form of income and jobs.

Given these facts, given the importance of wildlife to Canadians, it comes as no surprise that Canadians are highly supportive of wildlife and habitat conservation. Given the fact that 83 per cent of Canadians feel that it is important to protect endangered species and declining wildlife populations, it comes as no surprise that Canadians are willing to work together and work hard to try to preserve our precious wildlife and its habitat.

Passage of these amendments to the Canada Wildlife Act will make the job a bit easier. I urge all members to support the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, in the middle of the 20th century, we saw our planet from space for the first time. Historians may eventually find that this vision had a greater impact on thought than the Copernican revolution of the 16th century, which upset the human self–image by revealing that the Earth is not the center of the universe.

From space, we see a small and fragile ball dominated not by human activity and edifice but by a pattern of clouds, oceans, greenery, and soils.

Humanity's inability to fit its doings into that pattern is changing planetary systems, fundamentally. Many such changes are accompanied by life–threatening hazards. This new reality, from which there is no escape, must be recognized—and managed.

This introduction, Mr. Speaker, is taken from the very first chapter of the Brundtland report dated 1987. We must, each and every one of us, recognize its importance and never forget it.

We are here today to debate Bill C–24. This bill amends the Canada Wildlife Act, which was passed in 1973, and its purpose, as stated by the department, is, and I quote: "to permit the Government to conduct wildlife research and to undertake various activities related to wildlife conservation and interpretation". The provinces are responsible for managing wildlife, except for most species of migratory birds, fish and mammals.

This bill, in somewhat the same way as Bill C–23, is bringing existing legislation up to date. It is basically an update, with a few new provisions. Nothing indicates, upon review, this bill might infringe upon the responsibilities of Quebec or any other province in Canada. But as I said earlier, we can no longer afford nowadays to ignore the environmental question, particularly with respect to biodiversity.

We need only think of endangered species, as mentioned in chapter 6 of the very important Brundtland report, "Our Common Future". The introduction to this chapter reads as follows: "Conservation of living natural resources—plants, animals and micro–organisms, and the non–living elements of the environment on which they depend—is crucial for development. Today, the conservation of wild living resources is on the agenda of governments; nearly 4 per cent of the Earth's land area is managed explicitly to conserve species and ecosystems, and all but a small handful of countries have national parks. The challenge facing nations today is no longer deciding whether conservation is a good idea, but rather how it can be implemented in the national interest and within the means available in each country".

All of us here in this House today are convinced of the importance of saving endangered species, as the countries which signed the Brundtland report were. The problem is how to do it.

• (1540)

It is not necessary to point out that it is vital to humanity to save these species. Just think of agriculture, medicine and industry to see the economic importance of wildlife species. A recent Statistics Canada survey indicated that spending on activities of all kinds related to fish and other wildlife species contributed $11.5 billion to GNP and created some 250,000 jobs. Protecting endangered species is vital for the whole economy, whence the recent terminology "environment and sustainable development".

Governments have come to realize that it is impossible to separate economic development issues from environmental issues. Everything is interrelated and, again, we must aim for a global vision, a global position on environmental matters.

What about hope in all this? Some people may accuse us of being idealistic and utopian, but one does not have to go very far to come up with several success stories. The decrease in infant mortality rates and the increase in life expectancy rates, in the number of adults knowing how to read and write and in the percentage of children attending school are some of the success stories allowing us to believe in the evolution and improvement of the environment. They seemed impossible to achieve but they were because of the goals set out in the bill. This bill applies to animals, wild plants and other organisms and to their habitats.

We thus want to ensure that an element of the ecosystem essential to the survival of an endangered species is protected too. That is why the term "wildlife" was substituted for the word "fauna" throughout the bill.

Extending the definition of fauna to all wildlife, in accordance with the Convention on Biodiversity ratified by Canada in 1993, makes environmental measures more consistent.

A few examples from "Our Common Future" make us realize the economic potential of maintaining and preserving our ecosystems.

First of all, there would appear to be plants containing hydrocarbons, not carbohydrates. Since some of these plants exist in regions which have become useless because of activities such as surface mining or hydrocarbon extraction, the same report says that coal, among other minerals, could be regenerated by soil cultivation of hydrocarbons. And, unlike an oil well, an oil plantation or fuel farm would never dry out. Imagine the savings, as well as the benefits from an environmental point of view.

Let us take a look at corn crops in the United States. In the early seventies, some fungus seriously damaged corn crops, causing losses of two billion dollars. Recently, a primitive kind of corn from Mexico was discovered. This wild corn is perennial, while the other kinds are annual. Crossing this corn with commercial varieties of corn would translate into savings on ploughing and seeding. The genetic qualities of this plant, which was almost extinct, would allow savings of hundreds of millions every year in the United States alone.

The preservation of wild species ensures our survival and allows us to make enormous savings.

The amendments in this bill do not concern only endangered species. Indeed, the scope of the legislation is extended to include inland waters and territorial waters—we are referring here to the 200 nautical mile limit—so that the government can create protected marine areas to ensure the survival of endangered species. However, and this is very important for us, if provincial jurisdiction is involved, the federal government will have to come to an agreement with the province concerned. Moreover, this amendment will have the effect of significantly increasing the protection of our marine ecosystems, which are important for our wild species. Protecting ecosystems in an intelligent manner contributes to the major goals of sustainable development.

• (1545)

Clause 13 of Bill C–24, which amends section 11 of the act, clearly defines the duties and powers of wildlife officers as well as their role with respect to the provinces. This provision clarifies the specific duties and functions of wildlife officers and others involved in this field.

Clause 15, on the other hand, significantly increases the amount of the fines that can be awarded. These may range from $5,000 up to a maximum of $25,000 or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months. Hopefully, the new fines provided for in the legislation will discourage potential lawbreakers and poachers.

Pursuant to the legislation, the minister may acquire lands for research, conservation and interpretation purposes involving migratory birds and, if it is in the national interest, other species, including endangered ones, in which case he acts in co–operation with the provinces. There are currently 45 national wildlife preserves in Canada covering a total area of 287,000 hectares.

In conclusion, I would like to draw a parallel between the Canada Wildlife Act, Bill C–24 and sustainable development. Sustainable development is defined on page 8 of the Bruntdland Report as the ability of humanity to do the following, and I quote: "to ensure that it meets the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs".

The report also stresses the following point, and I quote: "There is a growing need for effective international co–operation to manage ecological and economic interdependence. Yet at the same time, confidence in international organizations is diminishing and support for them dwindling".

Therefore, it goes without saying that we on this side of the House support this bill designed to update the existing legislation and to clarify certain roles and responsibilities. You can rest assured, Mr. Speaker, that the Bloc Quebecois will continue to support initiatives that promote the environment and sustainable development, provided they are respectful of existing jurisdictions.

[English]

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, as the parliamentary secretary has stated, the purpose of Bill C–24 is to amend the existing Canada Wildlife Act.

At the outset may I say as environment critic that the Reform Party supports these long overdue amendments to the act that was first proclaimed in 1973. Since proclamation there have been a few minor amendments, but by and large the act is much the same as it was when introduced 20 years ago. Canada's wildlife legislation clearly needs modernization.

Bill C–24 is relatively simple and straightforward. However that does not mean we should just give it a rubber stamp of approval. This is the first real opportunity we have had in 20 years to sit down to review the act clause by clause and to amend the bill so that it meets the needs of the 21st century.

We must ensure the bill is all encompassing, for it is not enough simply to attempt to protect wildlife. I am pleased to see that the bill addresses a wider range of organisms. The broadening of the act to include all living organisms allows the government to protect all endangered species.

Back in 1973 when the wildlife protection bill was first passed it was said that the world was losing one species per year. Today there are 258 species on Canada's endangered species list. Only last month 20 new fish, mammals and plants were added to the endangered species list.

Some of these species include the western harvest mouse in the Okanagan and southern Alberta, the Pacific water shrew on the lower B.C. mainland, the King rail in southern Ontario, and the short–eared owl in most of Canada.

These species are largely endangered by pressures from the urban and agricultural sprawl. Habitat loss, industrial pollution and urban development contribute largely to the plight of Canada's wildlife. However the broadening of the act to include endangered species should be tempered in its use and particularly in how it is applied.

• (1550)

The United States with its endangered species act is not in my view the direction this country should be going. The amendments in Bill C–24 are appropriate as they cover measures necessary to protect endangered species without going to the extreme measures pursued in the United States. Too often the species in question, for example the spotted owl in the Pacific northwest, is simply the tool used to achieve another objective. In the case of the spotted owl the goal is forest preservation and the owl is simply used as a stepping stone to attain another goal.

In Canada we must ensure that our legislation is directed toward the endangered species in question and that the revised act cannot be used or abused to achieve other goals.

This will also require the co–operation and understanding of the provinces as there is an overlapping of jurisdiction. In protecting wildlife and wild organisms the act should be applied with care so as to avoid overstepping other jurisdictions. The wider discretionary powers granted to the minister by the bill must be exercised judiciously.

I would now like to step into the past for a moment and draw on my previous experiences to show where areas within the bill are appropriate and long overdue.

In my capacity as a forester for a large woodlands operation on Vancouver Island part of my duties included overseeing the land base of 250,000 acres. This involved dealing with many federal and provincial agencies, including fish and wildlife, and on numerous occasions dealing with wildlife offences.

In our area of operation there had been a particularly successful transplant of Roosevelt elk from northern Vancouver Island to the Nahmint Valley where a series of severe winters had virtually wiped out the local elk population.

During the mid–1980s, 13 young bull and cow elk were transported and released to join a single old bull who was the only survivor of the original herd. As an aside I want to say that old bull was delighted to see those cows coming off the back of the transport truck. Four of the cows were equipped with radio collars in order to study the migration patterns and habits of the elk. It was truly a success story, and in four years the herd had multiplied to 24 animals from the original 14.

There was also a sense of pride and ownership in the community as many different groups including wildlife clubs, provincial agencies, forest companies and the community at large had banded together to make this happen.

Unfortunately this story has a dark side as four of the best breeding cows, three with radio collars, were shot illegally. To add further insult only the hind quarters of one animal were removed. The others were left to rot.

The individuals responsible were subsequently caught and processed through the courts, but they only received extremely light sentences. The local residents of Port Alberni were particularly upset with the light sentences. My point is that although I realize the situation I described is within provincial jurisdiction, similar instances occur in federal areas such as our national parks.

I am particularly pleased to see the bill address the areas of enforcement and punishment, for too often the penalty does not fit the crime. However the bill puts some teeth into areas that up until now have lacked strength.

The bill increases penalties to include a maximum $25,000 fine and a maximum six months in prison. It also creates indictable offences for the more serious infractions.

However there is one area that does not appear to be covered in the bill. It is the illegal possession and sale of endangered or protected species animal body parts. We are all familiar with the plight of the African rhino. Its tusk brings poachers huge profits for its final use as an aphrodisiac in Asia. What we are not as familiar with is that this type of atrocity is also going on in this country.

In my former job I have come across black bear carcasses where only particular organs were removed, the remainder of the animal abandoned. Why? It was because the sale of these animal organs in Asia brings big dollars where they are required in ancient remedies and tonics.

• (1555)

Body parts commonly being exported to Asia from Canada include: black bear gall bladders, claws, paws and teeth; seal and sea lion genitalia; beaver genitalia; deer and elk antlers in velvet; and eagle and falcon beaks and claws.

British Columbia currently has legislation directed toward possession and sale of animal parts. It is my hope that the minister will be receptive to examining those portions of the B.C. legislation that may be applicable to the bill, with the intention of further strengthening the Canada Wildlife Act to prohibit the possession and sale of animal body parts.

Another area of the bill which has been updated is that pertaining to nautical wildlife. Whereas the old act applied to the old 12–mile limit, it has now been expanded to include the 200–mile limit. This increased area of jurisdiction will play a key role in the protection of water mammals and fish stocks. Regulation making authorities related to marine protected areas have also been established in the bill, and this will allow for enforcement. Other administrative and implementation provisions such as inspection, search, seizure, custody and forfeiture are all provided for in the bill which will hopefully allow these provisions to be effectively carried out. However all these powers need to be exercised with discretion.

Other areas that deserve comment are those directed toward the recovery of costs. In light of Canada's current financial situation it is most appropriate to recover costs related to the management of public lands and protected marine areas. It will mean reduced government expenditures and a more self–sufficient system. It will allow for greater financial sustainability in policy over the long term.

In conclusion, we support the bill and look forward to examining it in detail in committee with the purpose of refining it to best deal with the wildlife concerns of the country into the next century.

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport): As we all know, Mr. Speaker, Canada is in many respects the envy of the world, particularly when it comes to the diversity of its ecosystems and wildlife and the geography that makes such richness possible.

However recent studies have revealed that we have 11 extirpated species under the general heading of mammal, bird, reptile, fish and plant. We have nine extinct ones under the general heading of mammal, bird and fish species. Under the general heading of at risk species we have 258 mammals, birds, amphibians, reptiles, fish and plants. This list is by no means exhaustive.

The questions we have to ask ourselves in this important debate are: Why are so many species at risk? How come we already have so many extinct and so many extirpated species? Is it due to habitat destruction caused by humans? Is it due to thoughtless trafficking in animals because of greed?

It seems habitat destruction and trafficking are the two major reasons. Whatever the combination of causes, it underlies the need to increase our efforts in protecting wildlife and ensuring that the destruction of wildlife and wildlife habitat destruction do not occur.

The act is a good measure. It is a good step in the right direction. As others have already indicated it is very timely and badly needed. It allows, for instance, the minister to purchase, acquire or lease lands for the purpose of research, conservation and interpretation in respect of migratory birds and—this is the interesting angle—in the national interest and with the support of provinces other species including endangered species. So there is a broadening of a very important concept in relation to the acquisition of land.

• (1600)

Presently in Canada there are 45 national wildlife areas encompassing roughly 300,000 hectares, as the member for Terrebonne already indicated in his intervention. The provinces have indicated to the federal government that the existing penalties are no longer appropriate and that administrative and enforcement procedures need to be streamlined. Because of this, a number of changes have been proposed.

As the member for Comox—Alberni has already indicated, the definition is no longer limited to any non–domestic animal but includes wild organisms, animal, plant or other organisms and their habitat. The broadening of the definition encourages an ecosystem approach to conservation and brings the act far beyond the traditional approach for protection which in the past has been limited to just the higher order of animals.

Much has been said by those who spoke before me on the establishment of protected marine areas. I also welcome these, because this step has potential positive implications for areas within the 200 nautical mile limit and provides authority for the protection of marine animals and mammals.

Until now the marine ecosystem and its diversity has remained largely unprotected from the perspective of habitat protection and the application of the act has been limited just to the 12 mile limit. Therefore it has become critical that the wildlife habitat, including breeding and feeding grounds for whales and areas of significant concentration of seabirds be extended beyond the 12 mile limit. This is a very good development.

I was very interested in the comments made by the member for Comox—Alberni on enforcement. One often wonders about the effectiveness of fines and whether the right level is achieved. Certainly there is no doubt that what is being proposed in the bill is an improvement. Until this bill is passed, enforcement agencies in the field are reluctant, we are told, to charge offenders because of inappropriate penalties and the time required to follow up in court proceedings.

Hopefully the amendments will allow the wildlife officers to have broader authority in inspecting wildlife specimens, including the provisions regarding inspection, search, seizure, custody and so on. The minister will also have powers to appoint persons or a group of persons to be employed by the government as enforcement officers.

While the amendments to increase penalties are welcome and desirable, they will mean very little if the necessary resources are not allocated to enforcement. At the present time the federal jurisdiction has only 30 enforcement positions, all of which are not filled. As the member probably knows, coming from Alberta, a lot of criticism has been directed through the federal government at the fact that enforcement powers have been declining, as has the strength of the Canadian Wildlife Service.

• (1605)

The parliamentary secretary waxed eloquently at the beginning of his speech, stating: "Canadians care deeply about wildlife". He is right. The question is this: Can fewer than 30 enforcement officers do the job? All they can do is answer telephone inquiries but not much more. Therefore this aspect of implementation and enforcement requires attention.

Fines have been increased. I will not go into the details of what is being proposed but I have to ask this. What is the value of a polar bear, what is the value of a spotted owl, what is the value of a bald eagle once the species has entered the endangered category? The monetary value expressed through the fine is not adequate to express the damage caused to the totality of our culture when an endangered species is removed by one number.

I am a bit puzzled about the effectiveness of the fines proposed, whether they go far enough in becoming really preventive. There is definitely an improvement in the proposed amendments to section 13 which make a person liable for a separate offence on each day on which an offence is committed. That is good. It will allow a court to multiply fines by the number of specimens in the possession of the offender. The member for Comox—Alberni made reference to possession of wildlife that ought to be taken into account when we go through this bill clause by clause.

Section 13 allows the court to impose additional fines if the court deems that the person has made earnings from the offence. Although this will be difficult to prove it is a good step in the right direction.

Clause 15 of the bill among other things adds a new section for special orders of the court which allow the court to order those convicted to remedy the harm, pay for remediation of all activity that could lead to repeat offences, perform community services and the like. That is highly commendable.

Now we come to what is probably the heart of the bill. Section 8 deals with endangered species. Here the minister has been given permissive powers, in co–operation with one or more provincial governments, to take measures as the minister deems necessary for the protection of any species of wildlife in danger of extinction.

This terminology has good potential, but is it strong enough? Does this section provide adequate protection or do we need new legislation for the specific protection of endangered species? This is the question that ought to be addressed. I am sure it will be addressed in committee. If we do not come to grips with the question of endangered species and their protection, future generations of Canadians will not be able to enjoy them.

The International Union for the Conservation of Nature in January of this year in Argentina adopted an interesting resolution which in effect repaired a protocol under the convention on biological diversity which deals with diversity in the forest. It is a good step in the right direction.

The question is this: How does Canada rank in the international sphere? Are we doing enough to protect species that cross borders?

• (1610)

What about the Porcupine caribou in northern Alberta and in Yukon territory? That herd resides and moves between Yukon and Alaska. While the Canadian land is designated as a wildlife area, one section of the calving region is in the United States. This land is described as 1002 lands and is very important because it is the calving ground of the herd and is in danger of being destroyed because of oil exploration.

Therefore, should oil exploration be permitted on the north slope, which is this 1002 land in Alaska, or should it be, as I would of course argue in favour, banned for the protection in the centuries ahead of these particular herds which move across the border? This is a cross–border issue. We must, I submit, ensure that species and populations such as the Porcupine caribou herd are not threatened through exploration and exploitation of natural resources. Since this is an international matter I would urge the Minister of Foreign Affairs to raise it at the appropriate time in Washington.

It seems to me as we look at this bill and the overall situation in the nineties that we need international agreements on the preservation and protection of water and land wildlife. We are losing species compared to the richness of 50 or 100 years ago. In other words, there is a constant attrition and diminution in the richness of species that can be documented.

If future generations are to have any wildlife to enjoy, then we need to do much more for the species in danger of extinction and for the cross–border species in particular.

I will conclude with a thought that I am sure troubles all of us. It is more than that, it is a reflection. I wonder whether fines, enforcement, laws and regulations can do the job. It seems to me that they can only go so far.

What is needed as a complementary measure to Bill C–24 is an intensive education program. We have to have education aimed at all ages, an education aimed at all groups and promoted at all levels. Every Canadian should know what is endangered in our ecosystem, either on land or in the water, whether it is a plant, an insect, a mammal, you name it.

Every Canadian through this educational effort should be mobilized to protect wildlife. Every Canadian should be asked to help in the protection of endangered species because in a democracy the most effective instrument is education.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, the bill the government is introducing this afternoon is aimed at amending the Canada Wildlife Act. Enacted in 1973, this legislation will be made more efficient by the new provisions. The environment is indeed an evolving sector in need of constant readjustment.

• (1615)

I am very happy to take part in the debate this afternoon, being the fourth member of the Standing Committee on the Environment and Sustainable Development to speak on Bill C–24, immediately following its chairman, the member for Davenport.

Over the past twenty years, this act had been left unchanged. It was intended, first, to allow the federal government to conduct wildlife research, and second, to protect wild animals, especially those on the endangered list. The amendments before us today appear to be quite justified since they are mainly aimed at giving more teeth to this piece of legislation regarding the protection of our wildlife. The proposed changes are in four areas.

First of all, the amendments extend the act to cover the internal waters and the territorial sea of Canada up to 200 miles. Before, the limit was only 12 miles. This will allow the government to create protected marine areas across a larger territory. Among other things, such areas will serve to protect endangered species. It is of the utmost importance to be able to take care of these species since they are threatened by the pollution in our waterways, even if they do not come under our jurisdiction. Naturally, endangered species have no way to protect themselves against such negative impact, and we cannot pick up their distress calls if we are not in the field to notice the devastation.

Another amendment deals with living organisms and throughout the French version of the act, the word "faune" is replaced by the expression "espèces sauvages". That way, animals, plants and other living organisms and their respective habitats, are all protected. If we care about the habitat of these wildlife species, we also make sure that all the ecosystem elements their survival requires will be protected as well. In past years, we focused on animals and only animals. From now on, this legislation will give the government all the authority it requires to protect the producers, the first links in the food chain which of course feeds the consumers. We will also deal with the decomposers to ensure perfect recycling.

Plants are the first link in the food chain which nourishes herbivores and carnivores alike and which ends with man. This reminds me of the story about Isle Royale most of us have heard. Authorities had introduced herds of moose on that island. There were no predators so the moose multiplied at an alarming rate. What happened? There were too many, the whole herd was weak and sick, individuals were aggressive with each other, vegetation was scarce, the whole island was heading towards disaster. There was overgrazing, so the animals had to dig up plant roots in order to survive.

Fortunately and just in time, authorities who did not want to allow hunting, reintroduced on the island the moose's natural predator, the wolf.

A pack of wolves was reestablished on the island. At the beginning, food was plentiful and there was a population explosion, while the moose population dwindled. However, after thirty years, a perfect balance was reached on Isle Royale, to everybody's relief.

This is the kind of balance that humans and the government should strive to achieve. Previously, we did not protect habitats. We could also talk about clear–cutting. When hundreds and hundreds of contiguous hectares are ruthlessly stripped of all trees, clearly habitats are being destroyed.

Animals must move out and search for a similar habitat. However, when they find one it is likely already occupied by other individuals of the same species. You know how it is, when you have a territory you try to defend it, to keep intruders at bay.

Other times we see the total disappearance of a habitat, very often crucial for endangered species. This amendment is in keeping with the Convention on Biodiversity that Canada ratified in 1993. Several members already mentioned it.

At the present time, the term used excludes domestic animals. As it becomes increasingly clear that all elements of our environment are closely interrelated, it would obviously be inefficient to protect a mammal or a bird when it cannot survive in its natural habitat.

The third amendment defines the duties and powers of wildlife officers, who will have more leeway with regard to offenders. Although the hon. member for Davenport spoke at length on this earlier, I would still like to deliver this message.

The last amendment deals with fines, which will be much higher. Provision is made for a $25,000 maximum fine or a six–month prison term or both for more serious offences.

This measure, which is intended to discourage poaching, should be proceeded with. By the way, Mr. Speaker, when I was in my riding of Frontenac on the weekend, I read in the county newspaper, the Courrier Frontenac, that people who had burglarized dozens of cottages and summer homes were sentenced to less than two years in prison—which is reasonable in my opinion—but since provincial jails are overcrowded, the journalist figured out that the time spent behind bars varies from 1.8 to 24 per cent of the sentence.

While listening to the hon. member for Davenport earlier, I figured out that six months in prison multiplied by 30 days a month amounts to 180 days. So 1 per cent of that would be 1.8 days, let us say two days. The bill may provide for a prison term of six months but even if the judge sentences the offender to six months, it should be a little less with good behaviour. But if the prisoner only serves 1.8 per cent, 2 per cent or 4 per cent of his sentence, it is a little disappointing for the judge, and our wildlife officers will eventually lose all motivation.

The Disraeli chief of police told me of the time he testified in court in Sherbrooke, some sixty kilometres away. On his way back, he stopped for a hot dog, french fries and a Coke and when he got to Disraeli, the man he had testified against and who had been convicted was already there. Maybe he spent too much time eating his hot dog! That just goes to show how sentences are not always appropriate.

The measures proposed today will protect wildlife species more efficiently and will also ensure special attention is given to endangered species. The public already knows some of these species. The beluga whale, for example, at the mouth of the Saguenay, the bald eagle, the peregrine falcon, the prairie dog, the grizzly bear, the bison which was endangered just two decades ago.

Allow me to go off on a tangent once again. I am lucky enough to live in the country. Last Sunday morning, for the first time, I saw a bald eagle on my land. I called my wife and children so they could see it and there we were, in front of the patio door with our binoculars, filled with wonder at the sight of that bald eagle. I hope it has a mate so they can reproduce on our land. All this to tell you that even if I have lived in that area for many years, last Sunday was the first time I had the opportunity to see there a bald eagle, which is the emblem of the United States.

Other species are not as lucky. The preventive measures we seek to introduce will allow us to foresee the problems and to act, rather than react after the damage is done. Instead of waiting until some species are on the verge of extinction to do something to preserve them, we will be able to take measures to maintain their numbers at a level that poses no threat to their continuing survival.

I will tell you another story. You probably know that the Government of Quebec had to legislate in order to save the beaver, the one on the reverse side of the nickel, the symbol of hard–working people. In Quebec, during the depression, beaver was actively trapped for its pelt or its meat. Times were hard, families were large and feeding them was not easy.

The government prohibited all trading in beaver pelts as well as trapping. Populations started to build up again. Maybe I have a keener eye than most but on highway 417, coming to Ottawa, about 15 kilometres from the national capital I see trees, trembling aspens, cut down by beavers. I noticed them again no later than Monday. This to say that beavers are now plentiful, they are on the outskirts of Ottawa and Hull, along the 417.

I urge hon. members using this road to be on the lookout, they will see the fallen trees. Perhaps authorities will deport the beavers, the way they deported the Acadians, if they do too much damage along highway 417.

I remind you also of the passenger pigeon which, in North America, has come to typify the devastating influence of humans on wildlife. It is now extinct. Of course it was not exactly a smart bird, it would come close to human dwellings. As I said before, people were poor and hungry. These birds were easy to catch and very good to eat.

• (1630)

Do not believe that the only purpose is to save some very rare species so that we can boast that we have rare birds in our backyard, as I was just telling you earlier about the bald eagle. Protecting their habitats lets our wildlife live in a healthy environment that is the best possible one for them.

I will draw a parallel with Bill C–23 presented in this House last Monday. One amendment made to that act on migratory birds concerns embryos, sperm and eggs.

One may question the importance of protecting these items and wonder even more what these items can be used for. If you look a little closer, you quickly see that with biotechnologies becoming more and more prevalent, it is good planning to regulate potential problems that may arise.

This bill also amends a law that might not seem very important, except that saving our wildlife depends on it. If we do not want to always be in a race against time to protect our endangered species, we must take proactive measures.

One possibly contentious aspect concerns federal and provincial jurisdictions, since they are not always clearly defined when it comes to the environment. Take the example of a non–navigable waterway, which is under provincial jurisdiction; if it were navigable, then it would be under federal jurisdiction.

It is interesting to note that, under the provisions of this legislation, if the jurisdiction of a province comes into question, the federal government—and I certainly hope it will abide by the letter and the spirit of the law—will have to reach an agreement with the province concerned.

To conclude, I think it may be worthwhile to remind this House that nature is exquisitely sensitive as well as self–contained. On this blue planet of ours, we have something called the food chain. This chain could be compared to the huge chains big contractors use on their power shovels. Every time a plant or animal species is extinghished, it is one more link being weakened. Eventually, this link will break. Naturally, it would be catastrophic if one of these links broke. That is what sustainable development is about, as my colleague from Terrebone so aptly described it earlier, based on the Bruntland report. If one of these links were to break, then our children's future and that of generations to come would be seriously jeopardized.

It is well known that a chain is only as strong as its weakest links. So, seeing that some links are getting weaker, it is high time that we all worked together to make our planet a better place to live, basically. At this stage, I can say the government can, of course, count on the Bloc Quebecois' support. As my colleague from Terrebonne said, we will always endorse policies to protect our environment and make this planet a better place for future generations.

We are growing old, so this will be for generations and generations to come.

I will close on this, but I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, that by the end of the day, you will have become very knowledgeable in matters of the environment. I can see you listening with great interest to all the speeches made this afternoon on Bill C–24, including the remarks of four members of the Standing Committee on the Environment who have spoken so far, with perhaps a fifth one to come.

[English]

Mrs. Karen Kraft Sloan (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, over two decades ago Parliament passed into law the Canada Wildlife Act. This was a key piece of legislation in the effort to protect our country's wildlife. It enables the federal government to carry out wildlife research and, in co–operation with the provinces, to undertake a wide range of conservation interpretation activities for wildlife and its habitat including the protection of endangered species.

Since 1973, however, we have seen far–reaching changes in our approach to environmental issues. These changes necessitate updating of the act. We have come to see the crucial importance of the interrelationships between these issues and the need to integrate the environment and the economy. We also recognize that the issues we face are complex. To address them successfully we need co–operation across jurisdictions and even across borders.

This new understanding lies at the heart of sustainable development or sustainability. Sustainability recognizes the need to keep human activities within the limits of the ecosystem's capacity to sustain. It means integrating economic and environmental goals. It also means building a wide network of partnerships to achieve these goals.

At the United Nations earth summit in 1992 the world community gave its support to sustainable development. In the area of wildlife it adopted the convention on biological diversity. Canada was one of the first industrialized countries to sign this unprecedented agreement.

Signatories to the convention must regulate or manage biological resources to ensure their conservation and sustainable use and must establish a system of protected areas to conserve biodiversity. The convention calls for conservation efforts to consider all species within an ecosystem and requires countries to develop legislative provisions to protect endangered species.

We have welcomed the new international commitment to maintaining biodiversity because wildlife has a special importance to our country and to the vast majority of our people. Canada is indeed fortunate in still having natural spaces largely untouched by development where wildlife abounds in a free state. We all take pride in our vast wilderness areas and the creatures that inhabit them. They help to define the identity of our country.

As well, Canada's living natural resources make a major contribution to our economic well–being. According to a Statistics Canada survey on the importance of wildlife to Canadians in 1991, expenditures associated with all types of fish and wildlife related recreational activities contributed at least $11.5 billion to our gross domestic product. They generated $4.4 billion in tax revenues and provided 250,000 jobs.

The same survey shows that over 90 per cent of Canadians took part in wildlife related activities during 1991, devoting to them a total of 1.3 billion days and $5.6 billion. Those figures indicate that wildlife plays a major part in Canadians' recreational life. Further, 86 per cent of Canadians support wildlife conservation.

For all these reasons we must ensure the health of Canada's wildlife. The amendments to the Canada Wildlife Act will help achieve that goal.

● (1640)

The bill under consideration will broaden the scope of the Canada Wildlife Act to apply not simply to non–domestic animals but instead to all wild organisms. That shift will bring the act into line with the biodiversity convention.

The bill will also make it possible to create marine natural wildlife areas, not only within the 12 nautical mile limit as at present, but all the way out to the 200 nautical mile limit. This will allow much greater protection of the Canadian marine ecosystems important to wildlife.

The amendments establish regulatory authorities for marine protected areas. They strengthen enforcement related provisions. They will help deter illegal activities such as poaching by setting a maximum penalty of $25,000 and/or six months in jail for serious offences.

These changes will help ensure that future Canadians enjoy the same benefits we do from flourishing wildlife populations. However protecting Canada's wildlife is not a task for the federal government alone. To a large extent managing wildlife is a responsibility of the provinces and the territories. Only by working with them can the federal government promote our national wildlife objectives.

Canadians can be proud that the different levels of government have a record of strong co–operation on wildlife issues. In 1990 the federal and provincial governments adopted the wildlife policy for Canada. This calls for effective legislation conserving wild animals and plants and ensuring that all uses are sustainable.

It also calls for penalties that pose effective deterrents to the illegal use of wild species. More recently federal, provincial and territorial governments together have been developing a Canadian biodiversity strategy that will set out the manner in which Canada will implement the 1992 global biodiversity convention.

That same co–operation is central to the Canada Wildlife Act. For example, the act provides for co–operative management areas on provincial lands. While the federal Minister of the Environment will have the authority to appoint provincial officers as wildlife officers, these appointments will be made only with the agreement of the provinces concerned.

The amendments define the authority and powers of those officers and provide for inspection and search and seizure procedures in accordance with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Federal and provincial governments will also continue their co–operation on the management of endangered species. That co–operation dates back to 1988 when the responsible government agents launched the RNEW organization and strategy.

RNEW stands for recovery of nationally endangered wildlife. Its goal is to have all agencies and organizations work as a team to rescue species at risk from extinction and to prevent vulnerable species from becoming at risk. The need for such teamwork is all too clear because the list of species designated as endangered is growing ever longer while the list of recovered species remains all too short.

RNEW brings together the directors of federal, provincial and territorial wildlife agencies plus the heads of three major national wildlife organizations: the Canadian Nature Federation, the Canadian Wildlife Federation and the World Wildlife Fund Canada. These officials set up a team to prepare a management plan for the recovery of a particular endangered species, a plan eventually to be carried out by the responsible governments in co–operation with universities and conservation organizations.

Successes achieved through the RNEW program are gratifying, but they must not make us complacent. There are more cases by far in which Canada's wildlife populations are suffering from the effects of such problems as loss and degradation of habitat, overharvesting, poaching, disease and the impact of toxic substances. Yet the few successes are invaluable because they clearly show us the way forward. That way is through co–operation of the different levels of government and concerned groups outside government.

The amendments to the Canada Wildlife Act reinforce that co–operation. They will enhance protection for Canada's wildlife and help us advance the goals of sustainability.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, in speaking in support of Bill C–24 I am going to take a somewhat different angle or attack to it than has been taken to this point.

We have been speaking an awful lot about issues concerning enforcement, search and seizure and all of these things which of course have to be a part of an act if it is going to be workable.

I would like to talk about some of the people in my constituency and I believe all across Canada who presently are involved, not in the enforcement but in the enhancement of the whole issue of wildlife.

There is a network of people who belong to organizations like rod and gun clubs all across my province, indeed across Canada. In British Columbia some of the networking is interprovincial or international in scale. For example, there are the Rocky Mountain Elk Foundation, Ducks Unlimited, Trout Unlimited, Foundation for North American Wild Sheep, Canadian Wildlife Federation, and on and on.

Simply stated, networks are people talking to each other, sharing ideas, information and resources. These networks which are fundamentally informal exist to foster self help, to exchange information, to change society, to improve productivity and work life, and to share resources.

The hunters, trappers, guides and fishermen of Canada however are facing a crisis, a turning point in history. They have always been low key. Their way is not confrontational. Their way is to work in co–operation not confrontation. They not only value the privilege to carry out their sport, but also to work hard with real dollars to maintain healthy wildlife populations in British Columbia and across Canada.

For example, within British Columbia there are approximately one million homes. Of this number about 50 per cent or half of them contain a hunter or fisherman, based on licences sold. Of course, there are also thousands of homes that contain non–hunters and non–fishermen.

Then there is a number containing anti–hunters and anti–fishermen. The anti group is by far the smallest of the three categories, but you do get more publicity if you are anti. You do not necessarily have to know what you are talking about to get press. There is a feeling that only antis care about wild animals or fish. The so–called let them be group, they have a management by lobby philosophy. A lot of what they do has nothing to do with science. They are very simplistic and feel that if hunting and fishing cease, everything will be fine. They could not be further from the truth.

It is my experience that hunters, fishermen, trappers and guides are very poor at getting their conservation message out. So in my small part I am trying to do exactly that.

Most of the government wildlife agencies also have difficulty getting their message out. What we find is that the media seems to be mostly on the anti side of everything, particularly if it is spectacular and there is some kind of confrontation involved. Most of the material put forward by the media on the subject of wildlife management is so distorted that it is almost embarrassing when people take a look at what the real facts are.

There is a desperate need for government to understand and provide public support for wildlife management through organized sportsmen. It is a positive thing if done the right way. Because of course we are always concerned in the nineties about being gender neutral or gender specific or whatever it is to express ourselves correctly, let me say that I was in a home in my constituency just a couple of weeks ago and was admiring some of the beautiful trophy animals they had mounted there. I was about to compliment the husband on that when it turned out that indeed the wife was the person who had gone out and done such an excellent job. I recognize that it is a growing sport and a growing interest no matter what a person's gender. Across Canada the impact of a century of hunting, trapping and sports fishing is quite well documented. As a matter of fact most wildlife species are more abundant now than they were 75 years ago.

• (1650)

These species are all more abundant: the elk, the moose, the buffalo, antelope, mule deer, beaver, sea otter. As a matter of fact on Monday in this House when I was speaking on the migratory birds act I mentioned that in one part of my constituency they have very much an overabundance of grizzly bears. I suggest that probably the reason those bears are thriving as they are, even in an active logging operation area, is because many of the loggers are hunters and fishers and support this kind of wildlife and outdoor activity.

Most rod and gun clubs stand for scientific resource management. They oppose management by lobby. Resource decisions rather than political ones should be made on the basis of scientific evidence. We must manage more intensely as population expands. Those who use the resource are the ones who really work for it on the grounds of purchasing and enhancing habitat for all species. Many funds are set up exactly for that purpose.

I stand in support of the principles of Bill C–24. I believe that it will be an important part of the infrastructure required to give us the regulations or the ability to bring forward regulations that will help these dedicated people, indeed all Canadians, to be able to protect wildlife.

There is an issue that keeps on coming up in this House and it is directly related to what we are talking about here. These rod and gun club people, these people who enjoy being out of doors, enhancing wildlife, indeed putting much of their own blood, sweat and tears into preserving and protecting wildlife also are hunters and they are under attack. They are very much under attack at this particular time.

These are people who join these wildlife organizations, pay their dues, not only as membership fees, but pay their dues in terms of their time and energy and effort.

These people currently are under attack by many different, probably well meaning people across Canada. I cite as an example one organization that purports to have "over 5,000 Canadians" count as individual supporters of this particular organization.

Let us compare this organization to the wildlife or rod and gun club organizations. I read from their bylaws where they say there shall be no membership fees or dues unless otherwise directed by the board of directors.

What kind of commitment is there on the part of these people when they will not even put up their membership fee to be part of this lobby group to go after people who are currently enjoying the out of doors and the whole area of recreation in the wild.

At the risk of perhaps putting too many things together, I also suggest that on the same page I read and I quote: "Members shall apply for admission as such by completing a membership application," this is important, "in such form as the board may from time to time approve or by otherwise representing to the corporation in a manner satisfactory to the directors that they are interested in furthering the objects of the corporation".

I am not a legal person. I have never been involved with the law but when I read this I say to myself that if I wanted to increase my membership list and I was not charging membership fees anyway, I would put out a petition in support of the objects of my corporation.

• (1655)

When I receive this back under these terms and conditions, obviously these people are interested in furthering the objects of the corporation which is the ban of all guns.

I suggest that when we compare the level of commitment of the people, the lobby, that is currently going after the law–abiding citizens who are members of rod and gun clubs who enjoy the out of doors to the commitment of the people who are spending time in the bush, who are going out and are enhancing our environment and protecting our environment, obviously they come down on one side and not the other.

Further to that, yesterday I took part in a meeting between our party and this coalition and other supporters of the coalition. I was absolutely astounded to find that one of the people there said that we needed gun control to prevent suicide. Really, if our society is currently toying with the idea of legalizing doctor assisted suicide, what in the world are we doing on the other side of the coin harassing legitimate gun owners all in the name of stopping or trying to prevent suicide?

I stand in support of Bill C–24. I restate that I stand in support of the principles of Bill C–24 because I stand in support of Canadians who are going out into the bush and making our environment better. I support them in every way. They are the people who make Canada Canada.

Mr. John Finlay (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have listened all afternoon with great interest to my colleagues, the hon. members for Moncton, Terrebonne, Comox—Alberni, Davenport and Frontenac, York—Simcoe and Kootenay East.

I share the concern they have made known with regard to Bill C–24 and Canada's natural heritage. I hope I might add a little something in the way of information to the debate. I will be brief.

Wildlife has helped shape Canada's identity. Wildlife related activity as the last speaker has just pointed out is a cherished recreational activity for a large number of Canadians. For native Canadians, wildlife harvesting is a vital component of an age old but sustainable lifestyle. For Canada's economy, as we have heard, wildlife activities make a contribution measured in the billions of dollars.

All these are cogent reasons why we should protect Canada's wildlife. We shall be better able to do so with passage of the bill now before the House amending Canada's wildlife act. The amendments bring the act into line with our latest understanding of wildlife, with the latest international agreements, particularly the North American water fowl management plan, the Ramsar convention on wetlands of international importance and the global convention on biological diversity and with the planned Canadian biodiversity strategy.

This modified act will recognize that an ecosystem approach is the best way of protecting wildlife. In other words, we can save wildlife by saving the habitat on which they depend. One of the key ways which our country is doing this is by establishing national wildlife areas or NWAs under the Canada Wildlife Act.

The purpose of these areas is to conserve essential habitat for migratory birds and other species, especially endangered wildlife. At present there are 45 national wildlife areas covering approximately 287,000 hectares of habitat. Another six sites have been designated to become NWAs.

• (1700)

National wildlife areas exist or are planned in all provinces and territories except Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island. These areas protect a wide variety of critical habitats.

In British Columbia the wetlands of the Alaksen NWA and the Fraser River estuary are an internationally significant stop–over point and wintering area for large numbers of migrating birds.

On the other side of the country Pointe de l'Est is one of the few remaining nesting sites in Quebec for the piping plover, a bird listed as endangered in Canada.

At the Suffield NWA in Alberta the short grass prairie and sand dunes are home to the burrowing owl and the ferruginous hawk, both threatened species. Part of the endangered Arctic population of bowhead whales frequents Isabella Bay in the Northwest Territories, the site of a proposed marine NWA. In this case the opportunity to extend the boundaries beyond the 12 nautical mile limit of this NWA depends directly on the passage of this bill now before the House.

For each of these areas the Canadian Wildlife Service conducts public consultations as an integral step to preparing a management plan. The plan specifies which activities are to be allowed under permit within the NWA, for example, perhaps oil drilling, livestock grazing, or haying. The management plan may also specify how to improve habitat in such ways as planting native plants to provide food and cover for wildlife or digging ponds to make the landscape more inviting to waterfowl.

Conservation is the main purpose of the national wildlife areas but it is not the only one. Under the Canada Wildlife Act public education and research, as the hon. member for Davenport pointed out, are also goals.

In most NWAs visitors are allowed to hike, canoe, take photos and watch birds. Traditional uses may be allowed to continue. Some management plans provide for trapping, hunting and fishing. All these activities are carefully regulated to prevent declines in wildlife population levels and deterioration of habitats.

In some NWAs research takes precedence. For example, at Scotch Bonnet Island NWA on Lake Ontario access is restricted because the island is used for long term studies of the effects that environmental contaminants in the food chain have on wild birds in the great lakes.

At Polar Bear Pass in the Northwest Territories as well as at other NWAs the focus is on archaeological and biological research.

Many of the sites protected as national wildlife areas have also been accorded international recognition. Cap Tormente in Quebec is one of several NWAs that are also wetlands of international importance under the Ramsar convention. The Shepody NWA in New Brunswick is a western hemisphere shorebird reserve.

This international recognition shows that the world community appreciates the value of our national wildlife areas. This House must do the same by passing the amendments now under consideration.

NWAs also involve key partners outside the federal government in the work to conserve our wildlife by conserving wildlife habitat. They are managed by the federal government in co–operation with provincial and territorial authorities as well as non–governmental organizations.

Some important areas have been protected thanks to donations and leases from the Nature Conservancy and other non–government partners through land transfers from other government agencies or with the help of funds from other habitat protection programs such as those of Wildlife Habitat Canada and the North American wildlife management plan. Recently the establishment of NWAs has been a part of land claim settlements reached with aboriginal groups.

All these groups have become involved because they know that while wildlife needs our protection, Canada equally needs our wildlife. This is a part of our heritage, a part of our present and it must be part of our future.

• (1705)

As we work to make the transition to sustainable development we know that we must safeguard the health of our environment as a way of ensuring our prosperity. Wildlife provides one of the best indicators of environmental health. The signs are that we must do still more on its behalf because such actions ultimately benefit us all.

That is why I strongly support the amendments to the Canada Wildlife Act. It will extend our ability to protect wildlife throughout Canada and in the oceans which wash our shores. This is in the interest of all Canadians. I urge hon. members to support this measure and give it swift passage.

(Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a committee.)

CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS ACT

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry) moved that Bill C–12, an Act to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act and to make consequential amendments to other acts, be read a second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to begin debate on second reading of Bill C–12, an Act to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act and to make consequential amendments to other acts.

As a piece of federal framework legislation, the Canada Business Corporations Act helps promote the competitiveness of Canadian businesses. It is a key element of our national economic union and our internal market. The act must be kept up–to–date so that the government can use modern technology to provide better services and to improve administrative efficiency. It must also respond to the emerging challenges of a rapidly evolving global market.

[English]

This new law must be fair. The Canada Business Corporations Act will continue to provide a practical balance of interests among shareholders, creditors, management and the public.

This House will recall that the CBCA came into force on December 15, 1975 in order to revise and reform the law applicable to companies incorporated to carry on business throughout Canada. At that time the CBCA was heralded as an exemplary act, a model to be followed in Canada and abroad. For nearly 20 years it has acted as a model and promoted order and fairness in the corporate environment.

The CBCA is important to the competitive position of small and medium sized businesses as well as for the many large corporations registered under it. Over half of the top 500 companies in Canada are registered under the Canada Business Corporations Act. Approximately 190,000 corporations in Canada are covered by the provisions of the act.

However, after nearly two decades we need to update the provisions of the CBCA. Business practices and legal developments in a number of areas such as shareholder communications and the roles and responsibilities of directors have evolved considerably since the act was originally passed.

• (1710)

Corporations today must take into account the intensified competition of an international marketplace and the globalization of capital markets. Our framework laws must take into account increased share ownership by institutional investors and the holdings of shares through intermediaries.

The Canada Business Corporations Act must keep pace with the changes that are driving the competitiveness of Canadian industry. It must be amended to ensure that it will continue to be a useful tool for Canadian businesses and a model for others to follow.

The legislation before us today represents the first of two phases that will reform the framework legislation which governs federally incorporated businesses. We are introducing these amendments now so we can move quickly on a number of technical but important reforms. They represent a first step in renewing the CBCA. They will be followed by more substantive revisions after consultations with all interested parties.

Hon. members will note that the legislation before us provides for a parliamentary review of the CBCA within three years. We intend to introduce substantive amendments when the act comes up for review. Hopefully we will be in a position within 18 months to proceed with the review, but at the very latest we will have an opportunity to review the need for further amendments within three years.

In the meantime, Industry Canada will consult extensively with those who have a stake in the CBCA. We have prepared a consultation package and hope to complete our consultations and have draft recommendations ready for review by the government within 18 months.

[Translation]

The phase II consultation package deals with such issues as the liability of corporate directors, shareholders communications and other substantive issues. The package has been submitted to interested Canadians, including corporate executives, corporate law experts, institutional investors, shareholders' representatives, the accounting profession, business associations and other stakeholders.

After we have heard back from those who have a stake in reforming the CBCA, we will recommend to Parliament further amendments to the act to reflect business and community needs.

[English]

I want to emphasize that the legislation before us is a necessary first step. It enables the government to proceed with some important technical changes to the CBCA while we prepare for more substantive revisions. The primary objectives of the legislation before us lie in four areas and I would like to go over each of these briefly.

First of all, the legislation provides for improved service to federally incorporated companies. It brings the CBCA in line with technological advances and permits the introduction of more equal service across the country.

[Translation]

In the years that have passed since the CBCA came into effect, technology has revolutionized the way in which business is conducted. The drafters of the 1975 legislation could not have foreseen the day when, for example, fax machines would be used to transmit key corporate documents. They could not have known that, within a few decades, electronic data interchange would have the potential of reducing the paper burden for business.

[English]

I must confess that in my days of practising law here in Ottawa it was quite convenient to act as Ottawa agents for firms across the country as we delivered and collected documents from the corporations branch of the then consumer and corporate affairs department.

I suppose I really ought to apologize to some of my former colleagues still in practice in Ottawa that we are now making it possible for firms across Canada to deliver their documents directly and electronically.

My friend from Toronto says "hear, hear". The one benefit of the old rules was that we found ways to collect fees from Toronto law firms.

The director who administers the CBCA through the corporations directorate of Industry Canada receives a variety of notices and documents from corporations, directors, shareholders and others.

Many representatives of CBCA corporations have requested that facsimile transmission and electronic filing and issuance of documents be permitted under the act. The CBCA director has begun to accept some documents transmitted by facsimile, but there are certain impediments in the existing act to the use of modern technology.

• (1715)

The amendments before us provide broad regulatory making power to prescribe the form and other details of electronic filing and issuance of documents. They authorize the CBCA director to deal with the technical details. These changes will result in eventual same day incorporation from all regions of Canada, not just the national capital region, thus again saving money to industry across the country.

CBCA corporations and others will have easier access to the information that the corporations directorate provides.

[Translation]

I would like to emphasize that while we want to amend the act in order to better enable the corporations directorate to keep abreast of modern information technology, clients will still be able to use paper–based communications if they prefer.

[English]

The second broad area that the amendments before us address is the need to simplify certain corporate government procedures and record keeping and filing requirements. For example, the amendments will permit current directors to appoint a limited number of directors in the time between shareholders meetings if the corporation's articles so provide. While shareholder democracy is safeguarded by the limits placed on this power, the change will give CBCA corporations the flexibility to react quickly and with less expense to unforeseen events.

Under the amendments shareholders can also elect a reduced number of directors at the same shareholders meeting that they approve the reduction. As the law now stands shareholders can vote to reduce the minimum number of directors but must wait until the next meeting to elect that reduced number of directors.

Another amendment would permit the CBCA director to exempt the filing of specified classes of documents when they are publicly available elsewhere. This will reduce the burden of multiple filings of certain documents and thus the costs incurred by CBCA corporations.

[Translation]

In keeping with the trend towards reducing paper and administrative costs for users of the CBCA, the amendments will establish a six–year period for which accounting records and files must be retained. Currently, the CBCA gives no direction to corporations as to how long such records must be maintained.

[English]

The amendments will eliminate public financial disclosure now imposed on large, privately held CBCA corporations while maintaining disclosure to shareholders. The CBCA currently requires public disclosure of the financial statements of privately held CBCA corporations whose assets exceed $5 million or whose gross revenues exceed $10 million.

Mandatory public disclosure of financial statements of large private corporations is not required by the provinces, nor is it required by the laws of our major trading partner, the United States. The CBCA therefore places federally incorporated companies at a competitive disadvantage and increases their compliance costs. This may discourage foreign businesses from establishing in Canada, certainly under federal jurisdiction.

Shareholders of privately held companies will continue to be protected because an audit can only be waived if all shareholders agree. Financial statements will still be prepared and sent to shareholders in any event.

Financial statements of all corporations, not just those that are federally incorporated, must be disclosed to Statistics Canada through other legislation such as the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act. This information is publicly available on an aggregate basis.

The third broad theme of these technical amendments is clarification. Some amendments have been introduced to clarify the language of certain sections of the CBCA through changes to the French or English versions or through the use of better terminology. For example, revised definitions of control and subsidiary are proposed in order to capture the whole chain of corporations under the ultimate control of a holding corporation, thus simplifying amalgamations and financial assistance within corporate groups.

Finally, the fourth area addressed by the bill before us is efficient administration. The act now requires that before an administrative dissolution of a corporation can take place the CBCA director must give notice of the decision to dissolve a corporation in, among other things, a local newspaper.

• (1720)

By removing this requirement for publication in a local newspaper the CBCA director will be able to move expeditiously against defaulting corporations. This will help encourage companies to comply with the public information filing provisions of the law. Also, the government will avoid a publication cost of almost $1 million over the next few years.

The amendment will not affect the statutory requirement to notify directly the corporation in default and each director personally, nor the requirement to publish notices in the Canada Gazette and the Canada Corporations Bulletin.

[Translation]

To promote effective administration, the amendments before us also include provisions to strengthen the CBCA rules governing corporate names. For example, under one proposed amendment, corporations will be prohibited from using words such as "Limited", "Limitée" and "Corporation" in names other than their corporate names.

[English]

Industry Canada is committed to the continued modernization of the CBCA. We will proceed with the technical amendments of the kind I have outlined today. In the meantime we will continue to work with the Canadian business and professional communities to design more substantive changes to the law. Our overall objective is to help the conduct of business in Canada and to contribute to the competitiveness of federal corporations.

The amendments before the house render the CBCA more efficient. They simplify filing and record keeping requirements and certain corporate grievance procedures and they allow for technological innovation.

They also allow for improved service to corporations governed by the CBCA by reducing overall paper burden and the cost of compliance under the act. Overall they make the CBCA a more useful instrument to businesses and investors who use it.

This government is committed to helping small and medium sized Canadian business. We want the CBCA to serve Canadian businesses in their bid to become competitive at home and internationally.

[Translation]

They also allow for improved service to corporations governed by the CBCA by reducing paper burden and the cost of compliance with the Act. Overall, they make the CBCA a more useful instrument for businesses and investors who use it.

I hope that my hon. colleagues from both sides of the House will join me in supporting this legislation and in helping ensure its speedy passage. Thank you.

[English]

I know late in the afternoon it is hard to find enthusiasm for a bill on the Canada Business Corporations Act and I do find myself concerned that I will contribute further to my generally perceived image of being rather dull and boring. However, it is the best we can do with the Canada Business Corporations Act.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: Before giving the floor to the hon. member for Trois–Rivières, I must make a statement concerning the time reserved for Private Members' Business tomorrow, May 5. The hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk has informed me in writing that he could not present his motion during private members' hour tomorrow.

[English]

Since it has not been possible to arrange an exchange of positions in the order of precedence under Standing Order 94(2)(a), I must direct the table officers to drop the item of business to the bottom of the order of precedence.

Pursuant to Standing Order 94(2)(b), Private Members' Hour will thus be suspended tomorrow unfortunately and the House will continue with the business before it prior to Private Members' Hour.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois–Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in this debate and I agree with the minister when he says that this bill may be part of the government strategy to sometimes be dull and boring. Indeed, this is not a romantic piece of legislation, and it does not generate a lot of controversy.

As you know, Bill C-12 is an act to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act and to make consequential amendments to other acts.

• (1725)

Therefore, this legislation purports to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act. It allows for the implementation of technological innovations such as electronic filing and facsimile transmission of documents, it simplifies certain statutory procedures and record-keeping and filing requirements, and it makes the administration of the Act more effective.

Its object is to modernize the federal Canada Business Corporations Act. This act, which was passed in 1975, is a commercial law regulating about 190,000 Canadian businesses which were incorporated under it.

Half of the 500 largest businesses in the country were incorporated under that legislation. The government wants to amend the act in two stages, Bill C-12 being the first of those two stages.

A review of this legislation shows, as we in the opposition see it, four major changes which will allow businesses to improve their operations from a technical point of view.

The first of these changes is the fact that businesses will now be able to use electronic means to transmit documents. This should facilitate communication between businesses and the department.

Another provision allows current directors to appoint, under certain circumstances and if the rules of the corporation so provide, a limited number of directors. It must be pointed out that until now shareholders were the only ones who could appoint the directors.

The third change is to the effect that, from now on, companies will have to keep official documents such as accounting records and files for a minimum of six years. Obviously, we agree that this measure should help reduce the paper burden, but we wonder if a period of six years is sufficiently long.

Finally, privately-held corporations will no longer have to disclose financial information. This measure is criticized by the Order of Chartered Accountants, which worries about the impact it will have on the accounting profession. We must also realize that this measure will remove an injustice that may have existed before, in that provincially licensed companies had an unfair advantage because they did not have to disclose such information; federally licensed companies will now have the same status.

It is not easy to take position on such a slim bill. However, we must realize that, like other bills, it will take up a great deal of time and energy. That is why opposition members feel uncomfortable with this bill because there is still so much to do. There is so much to do with regards to the economy, to small and medium sized businesses and their development, that the government is not doing. Let us take, for instance, the paper burden small and medium sized businesses especially must carry, just to serve the government.

According to some studies, these businesses spend one out of five days dealing with government red tape. The government is aware of that, as it acknowledges in the red book. On April 28, the Minister of Industry announced a 29-member committee would be set up to study the issue of red tape among other things. As everyone knows, including the officials of his department, there have been numerous reports and the solution proposed by the government—it is like a reflex of this government—is to form a committee to study the issue; 29 people from coast to coast will consider the issue of government red tape. It is a waste of time.

Some adjustments would probably be easy to make, however. Knowing how competent federal public servants are, they could consult with their provincial counterparts, including those from Quebec, who are very competent.

• (1730)

Adjustments could be made to the program, and the procedure that companies must follow for exports, for example, could be simplified. Why not try to come up with ways to make it easier for small and medium sized businesses and others to export, which is vital for the economic development of Canada and Quebec? Why not refine what is offered to small and medium-sized businesses to encourage research and development? The Liberal Party of Canada made a big issue of it in the red book.

Why not ask officials, without striking a committee, to find ways of streamlining the forms, of reducing the delays in order to help small and medium sized businesses effectively, tangibly, pragmatically to do research and development? We know how complicated it is; I worked on it before. It is extremely complicated for a company to qualify for research and development tax credits, for example.

Easy ways must be found to help companies in that regard, just see to it. Companies must be helped to find ways to modernize their equipment, to give them the training that exists on the market to increase their productivity, to be more competitive internationally. Everything must be done to ensure that companies take the total-quality approach more and more. This is essential if we want our companies to be recognized, both here as subcontractors and internationally. Today, with ISO 9000, there is an international standard to help make sense of all the complexity in the world and to identify the companies considered qualified by a third party and those that are not. All our companies must be encouraged to come up to the ISO standard.

Even more serious, not only do we see no government interest or concern for these small things, which could really turn the situation around for small and medium–sized businesses if the government cared. Not only do we not sense any willingness on the part of the government, but we are moving backwards in areas such as military conversion programs, about which the government was very eloquent in its red book and made a lot of commitments. However, not a word about conversion was said by the minister, in the Throne Speech or in the budget speech, even though there are areas, in Quebec for example, where the military industry is very important. We will address the issue of the military industry tomorrow. The military industry must be revamped everywhere in the West, because of the evolution of the geo–political situation. As everyone knows, the Cold War is over, at least in the form we have known it until now.

We must make some adjustments to help industries move from military to civilian production, but there is no co–operation in this area. The government does not seem to be really concerned, since all it did was skim over the issue in some of its speeches. However, we have companies in Quebec, like Oerlikon and Paramax, which are in trouble. They have lashed out against the government. They cried for help again fifteen days ago. Help us, because if you do not and we do not get any more military contracts, thousands and thousands of jobs will be lost. Only in Quebec, the military industry has already lost 11,000 jobs in the last five years. These were high tech, high paid, and high–knowledge jobs. That is not the kind of jobs we can afford to lose in Canada and in Quebec, where the economy is already staggering, as we all know.

The situation with MIL Davie is also very important for the Quebec City area. If I am not mistaken, it is the largest company in the Quebec City area and it depends on government contracts. It needs the help of the federal government through a project that would meet a need, and I am talking here about the Magdalen Islands ferry. There is also another project, the smart ship project, which is important for the future of Quebec and Canada. Among other things, this multifunctional ship will be used to help settle regional conflicts as well as for UN peacekeeping missions. These projects should be a priority, but the government does not seem to have the political will to move on them.

• (1735)

This is an issue, and not only the Bloc Quebecois says it, since the Quebec Minister of Industry, Commerce and Technology, although he may be a Liberal and a federalist, has recently denounced the Liberal government by saying: "You see, you even wrote it in the red book". I heard it with my own ears on the radio. He was alluding to some form of political will by saying that it was nice to have written it, but what was behind the text? Where is the political will? We have not heard anything about that since.

It is not crying wolf to talk about this issue and to repeat that, if we do not do anything, we should be aware that we might have another brain drain, as we did in the late 1950s. Meanwhile, the Americans are developing their economy, they are here, they are everywhere, they are the giants and, as with the Avro Arrow in the late 1950s, they will come and get the best people from Canada and Quebec to develop their economy.

Another issue where we are going backwards is the fight against unemployment and the so–called job creation. Drawing from the red book, the government implemented the infrastructure program, indeed, $6 million in Canadian investments, including $2 million from the federal government. This program is supposed to be the main action and, so far, is the only one coming from this government to fight unemployment. The number of unemployed stands at 1.6 million, and this program will create 45,000 jobs. We must suspect that a very good number of these infrastructure jobs are seasonal, temporary jobs such as repairing sewers, roads and bridges. This will create many temporary jobs; of the 45,000 jobs created they say that 15,000 will go to Quebec.

They have nothing more to say and quite the contrary they brag about it. Weeks and months are passing by and this is all they have been able to find. They see this as a panacea and they think that this will solve the problem of 1.6 million unemployed. It is a shame to have so little imagination, to lack that much of the courage required to find another solution. I find this outrageous.

If there were a political will, there is an initiative that could go ahead readily, whatever the Prime Minister thinks of it, and that initiative is the high speed train. The project, which would link Quebec City, Trois–Rivières, and Windsor, could go ahead immediately but the government went wrong in that case. During the election campaign, the Bloc Quebecois supported the cancellation of the helicopters contract and everyone agreed to that. There was nevertheless something implied in what the leader of the Bloc Quebecois, the member for Lac Saint–Jean, said. It was that we should take the necessary steps in order that the expertise and all the budgets allocated to the helicopters be used for immediate and imminent development of the high–speed train. The government retained a part of the suggestion, since it cancelled the helicopters contract but as a result, thousands of workers lost their jobs.

I do not think this is the way to go to ensure economic development. We should note, and this is not coming from us but from the president of VIA Rail who said last week, and he should know what he is talking about, that the HST would create 127,000 jobs over a period of 10 years. Furthermore, according to the scenario favoured by the president of VIA Rail, this would require absolutely no additional funds from the federal government.

That project would have many technological spin–offs and create jobs of all types, high technology or more simple ones, in all regions of Ontario and Quebec. Its impacts would be highly beneficial, mainly, as you have guessed I am sure, in the St. Maurice Valley, if first, it is implemented, second, the line is built on the north shore and third, the HST stops in my riding, in the regional capital of Trois–Rivières.

The third issue, and this one is dramatic because we can even talk about negligence in this case, concerns pharmaceutical products; the influence of lobbies is felt everywhere, most of all the lobby of Ontario members and ministers from the Toronto area.

• (1740)

There are two types of drug manufacturers, those who create new drugs and do research and development, and generic drug manufacturers, who copy existing drugs. Most of the first ones are located in Quebec where they do research and development.

Last Monday, I met a representative of the Canadian Drug Manufacturers Association. You need to know that it takes from 10 to 12 years to develop a new drug, before it is certified, licensed, tested and what not. I am told that it costs an average of $360 million to develop a new drug.

That industry is concentrated in Quebec. Bill C–91 was passed under the former government with the support of the Bloc Quebecois and over the opposition of the Liberal Party of Canada, although that party was divided over the issue. I could come back to that later. That bill extended to 20 years patent protection for drugs developed by those innovative companies. New drugs cannot be copied.

The proposal before us would provide for an immediate review of Bill C–91 even though the bill itself specifies such a review will not take place before 1997. And this, again, much to the dismay of the Quebec Minister of Industry, Commerce and Technology, being the federalist and Liberal that he is, who was reported in Le Devoir on April 28, 1994, as saying: "The federal government's decision to review the legislation protecting drug patents for 20 years is creating uncertainty and its indecisiveness is scaring away potential investors in the strategic sector of pharmaceuticals. A $50 million investment was to be announced last week but was postponed owing to the federal government's indecisiveness".

The Quebec manufacturers' association strongly opposed any attempt by the federal government to review this act.

Finally, I will quote from La Presse, which is hardly sovereigntist and neither is its editor, Mr. Alain Dubuc, who wrote in an editorial comment yesterday: "The research investments matter is neither a joke nor a multinational piece of cake. The Trudeau era policy"—this should ring a bell for the members opposite—"of eliminating patents was a disaster. Canada's pharmaceutical industry literally dies away, with research funding dropping to 3 per cent of sales, as compared to approximately 14 per cent in the United States, France and Germany. Bill C–22, which repaired the blunder, was a success; from 1987 to 1991, companies invested nearly $1 million, half of which in Quebec—

[English]

Mr. Fontana: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We all appreciate this history lesson but I thought we were on Bill C–12 regarding the business corporations act. I am sorry, I do not see the relevance whatsoever of the member's comments with regard to Bills C–91 and C–22. I thought we were talking about Bill C–12.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if you could direct the member to speak to the bill before this House.

The Deputy Speaker: I think that is the first time the relevance rule has been raised in this Parliament, as least when I have been in the chair, and it is a rule that the parliamentary secretary will know is observed more in the breach than in the respect.

[Translation]

Perhaps the hon. member who had the floor could speak to the point, that is the bill presently before us.

• (1745)

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, I would like to demonstrate that the government should have other priorities than Bill C–12 and should not tackle such things as reviewing the pharmaceutical legislation the way they have been doing. That is the point I want to make, and they are not through hearing about it. As far as I am concerned, I am not through talking about it.

Bill C–22, which was tabled before Bill C–91 and cleared the air, was a success. Between 1987 and 1991, companies invested almost one billion dollars, half of that amount in Quebec, to such an extent that in 1991, research reached 9.7 per cent of sales in 1991 compared to the 3 per cent rate under Mr. Trudeau. While this is a marked improvement, it does not make up for lost ground.

How can a country complaining because it is lagging behind in research by contrast to other countries and also because it is not part of some high tech industries manage without one of the major high tech industries? The red book recognizes that our research is lagging behind. I will come back to that later.

We will not give up on the issue of pharmaceutical patents, which is critically important for Quebec. In fact, the pharmaceutical industry typefies Quebec industry. It is one of our finest industries, and we will not let the lobbying of members from Ontario, especially from Toronto, lower Quebec economy to such an extent.

I think that something happened last week, when my colleague, the member for Laurier—Sainte–Marie, quoted Confucius when responding to the minister of Industry who himself had quoted Shakespeare, a bit nastily, I must say.

The member for Laurier—Sainte–Marie quoted Confucius and said: "Culture is like jam; the less you have, the more you spread it". That struck me. I thought about it last week, if I remember well, while working on my lawn. I wondered why my colleague for Laurier—Sainte–Marie had quoted Confucius in those terms. After having given this matter much thought, I finally realized that it contained a message, a subliminal message. There was something symbolic about it. By "jam", he meant "in a jam". In a jam because of the failure of the government. Failure, especially if you make a report card after six months. I believe the government is celebrating that anniversary of its official and legal victory.

If you take a look at the situation, I think "in a jam" is the right expression. Let us recall, for instance, the issue of cigarette smuggling. Without the determination of the Official Opposition, we might still be discussing this whole issue. In the meantime, smuggling was flourishing in Quebec, resulting in loss of revenues for the government—which, in itself, was terrible enough. Also, because of civil disobedience, a whole climate was created where everything was challenged—our institutions, the role of the government, respect of the law, even social peace.

The government argued that there was no evidence of smuggling. It took weeks, but the opposition did not let go, and finally the government took the necessary measures.

Take another example, the Collège militaire royal de Saint–Jean. Here again, I want to show you—in case the member does not understand —that there are more important things to do than discussing minor bills such as this one. And, in our opinion, when the government does act, it does not necessarily act in the right way.

Mr. Fontana: Time.

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, I am allowed 40 minutes.

When the government acts, we know the results.

An hon. member: A fine mess, a jam.

Mr. Rocheleau: Yes, the military college was another fine mess. The Liberal government is forced to admit they have neither the desire nor the money to maintain the only francophone military training institution in America.

• (1750)

In tomorrow's Canada, in order to receive military training, francophones will have to go to a most anglophone city—which is all right—that has no facilities to make them feel welcome. The government say they have no choice. They have neither the desire nor the money to go on. That gives an idea of the Canada in which Quebecers will have to live, if they decide to remain a part of it.

What can we say about social program reform besides saying that again the government is in a jam? When one is obviously and deliberately taking it out not on unemployment but on the unemployed, not on poverty but on the poor, when the only thing we know about the government is that they will consult for two years—only to cut $7.5 billion in social programs at the end of the consultations, the situation is serious! When it is the unemployed and not unemployment, and the poor as opposed to poverty that are attacked, I say we are in a jam!

As for manpower training, the federal government stubbornly wants to keep jurisdiction over it. However, everybody in Quebec, employers as well as union leaders, school board members, Department of Education or Quebec government officials, whether federalist or not, everybody agrees that vocational training should be entirely under Quebec jurisdiction. But no, the government, for reasons known only to itself, is stubbornly hanging on to manpower training, after a two–year study involving goodness knows who, whereas everyone in Quebec is saying that it should withdraw from this area.

The last issue has to do not only with the government opposite, but with the federal system as well. I will not hide the fact that for sovereigntists like myself, it is very good news indeed to know what the rules of the game are in this country. The Supreme Court has just given us some idea of what they are with its ruling on telephony and communications where it said that however distinct Quebec might be, it had no rights over this field.

[English]

Mr. Fontana: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I know that this member may not have much respect for this institution but I am sure he would have respect for the Speaker.

I thought I heard the Speaker give some guidance to this member and ask him to stick to the subject matter which is Bill C–12. That is what we are discussing today. Opposition day is tomorrow. There are plenty of opportunities in this House for this member to speak about anything else he would like.

Surely Canadians, taxpayers, who are watching this institution would expect that the hon. member would respect the wishes of the Chair and stick to the subject matter we are discussing today, Bill C–12, and not ramble on about everything that this House has done or will do in the foreseeable future.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I ask for your guidance for this member who just does not seem to get it.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. colleagues, as I said a while ago, it is extremely difficult to say whether a comment pertains to the subject matter before the House or whether it does not. Therefore, I would ask all members for their co–operation in complying with the Standing Orders and speaking to this bill. I think that all members can appreciate how very difficult this situation can be for the Chair.

Mr. Rocheleau: Let me congratulate my colleague on his intellectual rigour. It shows that he must not come to the House often. In fact, I have not often seen him here myself. Mr. Speaker, you will surely agree with me that it is difficult to discuss this bill for 40 minutes, given that it is a slim piece of legislation and, as the minister said, a rather dull and boring one at that. Furthermore, unless he talks nonsense, a member has a right to use his speaking time to discuss subjects which he deems to be timely.

As I was saying, the Supreme Court handed down a ruling concerning telephony and communications which gives the federal government full jurisdiction. It is the federal system which is at issue here and I will not hide the fact that Quebecers are deeply interested in this subject.

• (1755)

The federal system is at issue here. To say that telecommunications—telephony, for example—come under exclusive federal jurisdiction is to deny Quebec's distinctiveness, one of the key points of the Charlottetown Agreement, which by the way was unanimously rejected.

In other words, for the hon. member's information, as Quebecers and Canadians must ponder the situation, I hope that Quebecers will realize that if they ever decide, in a referendum, to remain within Canada as a province, they will have to accept centralization.

That is the conclusion to be drawn from such measures. Decisions concerning the military college, social program reform, manpower training, telephony and communications all reflect a growing tendency on the part of the federal government to centralize major powers in Ottawa, and to consider provincial governments henceforth as regional governments. This is the context in which Quebecers will be deciding, in a referendum, whether or not to keep Quebec in Confederation.

In the time I have left, I want to come back more sensibly—my colleague will be pleased—to the issue of Bill–C–12. I said earlier that the government must have better things to do and you only have to look at all the statements and the promises of the red book to see what I mean. I want to quote what it says about research and development, technology, small and medium–sized businesses, and economic development. On page 52, it reads: "It would also create a climate that encourages pre–competitive research in various sectors of the Canadian economy. A Liberal government will further strengthen R and D, especially in small and medium–sized business, by encouraging technology partnerships between Canadian universities, research institutions, and the private sector that emphasize the commercial applications of research and development". For your information, Mr. Speaker, that is precisely what is going on in the pharmaceutical industry.

Again, the red book says: "A Liberal government will continue to support basic research, including the provision of stable funding for the granting councils, the National Research Council, and the Networks of Centres of Excellence".

It is so nice that I could go on and on. It is so very interesting but that goes back to last fall. Since then—and that is the complaint I have against this government—the government has not kept its promise—for which it was elected by Canadians from Ontario and the Maritimes, among others—but it introduced minor measures like Bill C–12. As I said at the outset, Mr. Speaker, it is a waste of time, a waste of energy and a waste of money to deal with such an issue.

Reading the red book and seeing the negligence of this government, I am led to say that it is more and more obvious, and absolutely necessary, that people take charge of their own destiny all across Canada, and particularly in Quebec, in every region of Quebec.

I want to tell you that as far as people of my riding, the riding of Trois–Rivières, are concerned, they have already started to do so. This is wonderfully exemplified by the re–opening of the former CIP Forest Products plant, which had closed down, causing the loss of 1,200 jobs, if memory serves me well. This plant has just re–opened, thanks to the involvement of the Fonds de solidarité des travailleurs du Québec; and if it has been re–opened, we must understand that it is because its workers had never given up. They made all the necessary representations, they made everybody aware that it was unacceptable that such a large plant, in a city like mine, Trois–Rivières, could close down for good. They managed to get the Fonds de solidarité involved. I take this opportunity to congratulate them for that.

There are other areas where people of my riding have understood and are doing something. First of all, at the CEGEP of Trois–Rivières, which is famous for two things, its Centre for Metallurgical Technology and its Centre for Pulp and Paper Technology, two specialized centres which are increasingly serving the needs of metallurgical as well as pulp and paper industries all across Quebec.

• (1800)

And secondly, at the Université du Québec in Trois–Rivières, there are also people with a sense of imagination and vision who have set up a research group on small and medium–sized businesses to make sure that more universities know the problems of such businesses in order to better train young people and give assistance, even on the spot, in terms of consultation, to small and medium sized businesses everywhere in Quebec.

In a field which has a very bright future, there is also a hydrogen research centre which, you have to admit, is a high–tech field. This hydrogen research centre is attracting more and more attention and, given the importance of this product for the future, could have a remarkable development in the coming years.

Lastly, I would like to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that l'Université du Québec à Trois–Rivières is the only institution in all of Canada to offer a doctorate program in paper engineering. This is another illustration of our region's capacity to show its resourcefulness and its determination to take charge and make its presence felt more and more in Quebec as well as abroad.

In closing, and my friend will be happy, I would like to talk about Bill C–12 and say that we all know that it is the first part of a two–part law, the second part of which will come in three years and address much more important issues related to the operation of small and medium–sized businesses, like the responsibility of directors, insider trading, for example, and take–over bids.

It seems that these issues, and the government is still consulting, will be addressed in two or three years. The position of the Official Opposition is that we cannot oppose such a bill; although it is uninspiring, it is important in its technical aspects, and we understand that it makes technical changes which should improve the operation of our businesses. Consequently, the Official Opposition is for this bill, in spite of everything.

[English]

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will address my remarks to the contents of Bill C–12. I resist corroborating the opinion that was expressed by the member opposite that if the bill is really not a major bill then it should not receive major debating time. If there are major points to be made then let us make them. However we have to be very careful not to abuse our privileges.

Bill C–12 as I understand it represents amendments to the Canada Business Corporations Act which will govern approximately 190,000 Canadian federal business corporations, including over 50 per cent of Canada's top 500 corporations.

This is the first phase of amendments designed to improve the competitiveness of Canadian business, simplify filing and record keeping requirements and certain corporate governance procedures and allow for technological innovation. The bill also begins the process of modernizing federal corporate law.

Amendments to Bill C–12 are purported to be of a largely technical nature. While this is in essence true we feel certain amendments could have ramifications far beyond the technical level.

We applaud those amendments to Bill C–12 that will result in simplifying filing and record keeping requirements and certain corporate governance procedures, allow for the technological innovation and better service to all regions of Canada, enhance the efficiency and effectiveness of the administration of the CBCA and clarify the language of the act through changes to the French and English versions and through the use of better terminology. It will promote good governance in corporate enterprises—at least that is what the intent is—facilitate efficient and flexible business management while protecting investors, including minority shareholders, and foster a fair and efficient marketplace.

It is purported to provide flexibility for corporations to act quickly and with less expense to unforeseen events by permitting current directors to appoint a limited number of directors in the time between shareholder meetings, if the corporation's bylaws permit that to happen.

We recognize that these measures are part of the government's commitment in the speech from the throne to focus on small and medium sized businesses. We encourage measures that are designed to improve the competitiveness of Canadian business. By encouraging internal trade within Canada and by helping business pursue an active international trade policy, we can place our federal corporations in a better competitive position.

We would be pleased if the reforms that are currently within the amendments to the CBCA accomplish all of these objectives. Certain provisions however require closer scrutiny and should be noted.

First, the provision to eliminate public financial disclosure for larger privately held corporations may allow certain public companies to transfer assets to private companies under their control and thereby avoid financial disclosures of these private subsidiaries.

Sections 16 and 17 regarding financial disclosure, while apparently not significant to the minister, being simply of a technical nature, should be recognized as a substantive departure from the current provisions. They are not technicalities as suggested by the minister. They should be studied by the committee with a promise to consider moving them to the second part of the amendments to this act.

Notice is hereby given as well that two other matters are of concern to members of our party and will be drawn to the attention of the committee studying the bill. They are, first, the new section, 258.2, which allows the director to exempt notices or documents from having to be sent to the director in the prescribed circumstances. This is potentially a very wide provision if the governor in council chooses to prescribe wide circumstances.

We have been advised by department officials that this is intended to apply only to cases where documents are publicly available elsewhere. To make sure this is the sole reason, an amendment to that effect is required. The amendment could be something like this: "If a notice or document is required under this act to be sent to the director must be made public by some other provision of or made pursuant to another act of Parliament other than this act, the director may, by order made subject to the condition that the other provision has been complied with and any other conditions the director may consider appropriate, exempt the notice or document from the requirement under this act that it be sent to the director".

The second amendment that ought to be looked at refers to section 8(2). This section provides a previously unregulated period for which records must be kept. The minister mentioned that presently the act is silent on this and that we need to recognize under the Income Tax Act and the provisions thereof that claims to be made by the minister may be made for six years back and the limitation on actions in contracts in most and maybe all provinces is six years after the cause for the action arises.

In light of these provisions it seems strange to have a six year minimum, as longer record retention is generally mandated by other legislation and by common sense. It would appear to be better either to leave out this provision or to avoid redundancy and to have a longer period, say eight or ten years. Eight years would certainly cover the income tax provision and meet most contract litigation needs.

There is a second reason why the provision which will see record keeping reduced to six years may be inadequate. Litigation procedures may be started after six years so the requirement should be, in our opinion, probably something like ten years.

The second phase of the reforms that are being talked about here should also be referred to at this time. We are alerted that consultations for phase two reforms have apparently started already. They includes issues like the liability of corporate directors; shareholder communications both between the corporation and the shareholders and also among shareholders; citizenship and residency requirements currently imposed on boards of directors; financial assistance granted by the corporation to directors, officers, shareholders and others; and governing insider trading and takeover bids. Each of these areas are very substantive in nature and will require very careful and detailed examination and study.

Their importance to the federal business corporations and to Canada's competitiveness is clear. The expansion of directors' liability may be leading some qualified people for example to refuse board appointments. For a corporation to be successful, qualified people must be willing to serve on boards and once there to take bold steps in order to compete in the global marketplace.

We also encourage commitment to continued reform. It is absolutely amazing this particular act has not been revised over the last 20 years. If we compare business practices of 20 years ago to today and the competition that exists out there I find it almost unbelievable that the act still fits. It does not fit too well and that is why it is before us today. So we are encouraging continued reform.

The proposed amendments require the minister to submit within three years of this bill receiving royal assent a report to Parliament on the provisions and operation of the act, including recommendations for further changes to the law.

We heard the hon. minister say about an hour ago that within 18 months he expects to bring this forward. I certainly would encourage him to meet that deadline.

In general we support the objectives of the bill. We recognize the government's efforts to meet one of its promises as set out in the speech from the throne. However we would caution the minister from viewing all of the amendments to this bill as technicalities. While in some instances this is essentially true there are other areas, as demonstrated in the text of my speech so far, that require closer and more cautious scrutiny.

I am confident that once this bill is referred to committee, government members will agree that some safeguards must be implemented to protect shareholders, the corporate structure and finally the Canadian marketplace. Once this is accomplished I believe Bill C–12 will meet its objectives of promoting a fair and efficient marketplace and an economic climate that is conducive to sustained growth and job creation.

We look forward to the referral of this bill to the committee. We will take the opportunity then to ensure that Bill C–12 meets its objectives in a manner satisfactory to all sides of the House.

(Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a committee.)

Government Orders

RAILWAY SAFETY ACT

Hon. Douglas Peters (for Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C–21, an act to amend the Railway Safety Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise today to present for second reading a bill to amend the Railway Safety Act. I understand there is agreement that we do all three readings hopefully before the hour of adjournment.

The bill, which will help reduce accidents and fatalities associated with Canada's railway system, will create an offence for trespassing on federally regulated railway property.

• (1815)

A similar prohibition in the Railway Act was revoked by proclamation of the Railway Safety Act in 1989. By reintroducing the prohibition we will put teeth into the Railway Safety Act by giving railway companies a strong deterrent.

Effective and enforceable legislation in conjunction with public education should help reduce trespassing related incidents on railway lands. The three *e*s to enhanced railway safety are education, engineering and enforcement. I am pleased that this enforcement initiative will enable law officers, especially railway police who are empowered to enforce federal legislation, to charge trespassers found on railway lines.

This legislation is clearly in the interest of public safety. Trespassing on railway property is one of the most frequent causes of fatalities and injuries related to railway operations. The incidence of accidents to trespassers is increasing. In fact, last year for the first time the number of trespassing fatalities surpassed the number of lives lost at level crossings in Canada.

An estimated 100 people are struck by trains each year while trespassing on railway right of ways. Almost half of these people are killed and the remainder are seriously injured. Many of these people are habitual trespassers, and an unfortunate number of accidents involve young children and students. These are tragic statistics.

The government has introduced this bill as a means of reducing the terrible consequences that can result from trespassing on railway lands. Trespassing commonly occurs near schools, parks, recreational facilities and commercial or residential locations which have high pedestrian traffic, urban areas such as Montreal and Toronto.

The reasons for trespassing include shortcuts to commercial establishments, schools and residential areas, and the use of railway tracks by children as play areas. Unfortunately a railway right of way is a dangerous time saver and far too often becomes a deadly playground for young children.

There is also a major problem of homeless people using railway property as living or resting areas. Many trespassers make use of railway property with total disregard for their personal safety and this is of major concern to Transport Canada.

Fencing and highly visible signage put in place by railways have not been sufficiently effective in discouraging trespassers. Let me emphasize that the penalty provisions contained in the act are broad enough, up to $5,000 on summary conviction, to create a major deterrent to repeat offences.

Reinstatement of the prohibition against trespassing will assist police in reducing the incidence of this dangerous practice on railway property and hence the number of accidents and fatalities. The onus for enforcement would rest with the railways through their police forces and there would be no demand on government's resources as a result of this amendment.

The original anti–trespassing provision in the Railway Act was not included in the Railway Safety Act when the latter legislation was proclaimed in January 1989 because it was felt the matter could be addressed effectively through subsequent regulations.

A review by the justice department has determined that due to the nature of the prohibition, the provision should be established as part of the legislation itself and not as a regulation. Transport Canada has worked with railways to improve safety in areas of heavy trespass; measures such as increased railway policing, barbed wire top fences and other steps to discourage trespassers have been introduced as a result.

The amendment will not affect individuals such as native people and prospectors in remote areas who may need to cross tracks on a regular basis to reach trap lines and mineral claims. The purpose of the amendment is to enable railway police forces to take action in areas of continual and dangerous trespasses.

In conclusion, let me emphasize that the federal government is committed to working with the railways to reduce accidents and fatalities associated with Canada's railway system. This addition to the Railway Safety Act strengthens this important piece of legislation and in conjunction with public education should help remedy the problems of trespassing on railway lands.

The Deputy Speaker: Before recognizing the member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans I would like to ask the House if it is true the other parties have given unanimous consent for this bill to go through all three stages and be passed today?

Mr. Guimond: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Official Opposition, I can confirm that there is such a consent.

The Deputy Speaker: Very well. Does the Reform Party concur?

[English]

Is the Reform Party prepared to give unanimous consent to the three stages passing today?

Mr. Gouk: We are, Mr. Speaker.

• (1820)

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, as transport critic for the Official Opposition I would like to make a few comments on that bill. The first purpose of this very short, but nevertheless important bill is to ensure equivalence between the French and English versions of the Railway Safety Act. The second is to prohibit unlawful access to line works.

I can tell you that I am doubly concerned about this bill. In my riding of Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans there is a rail line that people at CN call Murray Bay. It goes from Limoilou, in Quebec City, to Clermont, in Charlevoix, which means that it crosses the entire riding.

While I was preparing my notes and rereading the bill, I remembered two events that I would like to share with you. They are tragic events for the families involved. Some two or two and a half years ago, in July, a 72–year old person was hit by a CN train in front of the Basilica in Sainte–Anne–de–Beaupré, in my riding. I can tell you that in a community the size of Sainte–Anne–de–Beaupré, such an accident creates quite a commotion.

The second event, as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport just mentioned, involved a child. Last year, a six–year old boy, on his way home from school in Ville Vanier, in the Québec–Est riding, was hit by a Via Rail train which was going through a residential area at high speed. There was a coroner's inquest. We are still waiting for his conclusions. I can tell you that listening to the testimony of the father, who was deeply affected, was heart–rending—I do not mean that the mother was not affected—but the testimony of the father left me with extremely painful memories. I can tell you that, as the father of two children, I was shaken.

Having said this, I will refrain from saying that this is a good bill even if I would like to. I do not know if I am becoming a seasoned parliamentarian, but I do not dare say this was a good decision because when one does, there are usually ministers, whose good faith can be questioned, who are only too happy to mention in response to our questions: "But you said the government had made a good decision in this bill". So I will refrain from saying it. It is unfortunate that the rules of the British parliamentary system, and our friends opposite's vision of it, prevent me from saying this is a good bill, although I am tempted to say so.

I can tell you why I consider this bill important. By the way, short lines are referred to as C.F.I.L. in French. Perhaps I should take this opportunity to enlighten my francophone colleagues from other provinces. Instead of using the expression "short lines" in French, we should say C.F.I.L., which stands for chemin de fer à intérêt local. We know that railway companies, whether it is CN or CP, are more interested in selling lines.

I think that if we have local operators trying to make a profit with their line, it would be unfortunate to see railroad safety adversely affected. I feel that this bill, which guarantees a level of firmness regarding the implementation of certain safety standards, is a good piece of legislation. And as regards short lines, we, parliamentarians, will have to be watchful and ensure that operators comply with a minimum of safety rules.

• (1825)

To conclude, I want to say that the Bloc Quebecois did not object at all to the grouping together of all three reading stages. We support this bill, which is primarily aimed at increasing railroad safety.

I forgot to mention recreational use of land on which a railway line is situated. For example, in my riding, as in several others, snowmobiles make increasing use of that land. To some extent, this bill is to protect from themselves such people, who take unwarranted risks. As you know, the snowmobile was invented by a Quebecer, Mr. Bombardier. Its usefulness has been demonstrated and this invention has had an impact across Canada and throughout the world.

In conclusion, we support this bill.

[English]

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, we recognize this as an important but non–contentious piece of housekeeping legislation designed to improve rail safety. As such the Reform Party supports the bill.

We support it going through three readings and we offer our co–operation in that regard. We do not wish to take up the House's time in any further debate or comment on it so that we can finish with the bill and get on to the more important and pressing matters coming before the House.

(Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported and concurred in.)

The Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? By unanimous consent, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Hon. David Anderson (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Fontana: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Transport, I want to thank both parties for the quick passage of this very important bill.

It does show that when an important piece of legislation needs to be put through the House in fairly quick order all parties can move, and I want to thank them.

Mr. Guimond: Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that I do not think things will go as fast with Bill C–22 on the privatization of the Pearson airport.

(Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.)

The Deputy Speaker: It being 6.30 p.m. the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

WORLD WAR II

Hon. Lawrence MacAulay (Secretary of State (Veterans)): Mr. Speaker, later today I will have the honour of leading a delegation of veterans to Italy. This pilgrimage will mark the 50th anniversary of the Italian campaign of the second world war.

Veterans from across the country representing all of the regiments and units which participated in the campaign will travel with me to sites throughout Italy. Together we will retrace the steps of Canadians who fought for democracy in Italy between 1943 and 1945 and pay tribute to those who gave their lives for freedom.

The story of the Canadians in Italy is a special chapter in our history. The first Canadians stepped on to the beaches on July 10, 1943. Well planned and decisive, the successful allied landings in Sicily marked an important turning point in the cause of freedom.

Then came 20 long gruelling months of fighting in which our troops proved themselves time and time again—Ortona, Monte Cassino, the Liri Valley and the push to the Lombardy plains and the industrial north of Italy. These fierce battles tested our Canadians fully and in every case our troops showed their exceptional ability and determination. Their proud record brought them respect from friend and foe alike.

All three of our services saw action in the Italian campaign. The flotillas of the Royal Canadian Navy successfully brought our troops ashore and, together with the merchant navy, kept them well supplied. The Royal Canadian Air Force provided vital air support, bombing strategic enemy positions. The infantry and armoured divisions of the Canadian Army renewed our country's reputation as the home of courageous and accomplished soldiers. The "red patches" of our Canadian Infantry Corps were some of the toughest troops in Italy.

Our troops left Italy and went on to northwestern Europe where they gained further honours in liberating Holland. But in Italy the important role they played in driving back the German army contributed to the downfall of the Third Reich.

I ask all members of the House to pay a very special tribute to the Canadian veterans of Italy who 50 years ago helped return freedom to Europe and brought such great honour to our country.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Godin (Châteauguay): Mr. Speaker, I would like first of all to thank the Secretary of State for Veterans for taking the trouble to pass on to me, within a reasonable time, the text of his statement.

As the Official Opposition critic, I will be privileged to be part of that pilgrimage which will take us to Italy, in order to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the campaign to free Europe from Nazi control, a campaign in which Canada participated.

Certainly Canada must remember the incalculable price that the world had to pay in order to protect rights and freedoms. It must remember those efforts that were made in that terrible war, even at the cost of our innocent citizens' life. Veterans are still here to remind us of the courage that they showed in those events. So I agree with the Secretary of State that it is important to make sure that those events are never forgotten.

• (1010)

Canada also has other duties toward its veterans. It must never forget the situation that they are living in today. It seems to me that their living conditions should be of prime importance, since that is the best way for us to show our gratitude to those who fought for the preservation of these values and these collective interests. If it is essential to commemorate our veterans' achievements, it is even more essential to guarantee them decent living conditions.

The Bloc Quebecois is proud to salute all these people who made sure, 50 years ago, that Italy found the road to freedom.

[English]

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the secretary of state for veterans affairs for taking the lead in organizing this, if I may, pilgrimage to Italy to recognize the contribution of the Canadian forces who participated in the Italian campaign.

As has been mentioned, the Canadians landed in Sicily at Pachino Beach on July 10, 1943. After having assisted in the conquering of Sicily, they moved up the Italian peninsula. They were involved in the downfall of the famous Gustav line. On May 11 they commenced the attack on the Gustav line and four days later it collapsed.

They moved on to the Hitler line and on May 23 they breached the line with the loss of 1,000 casualties. This enabled the allied forces to combine with the American forces who had landed at Anzio, just south of Rome prior to that. This campaign for the first time saw a Canadian corps in the field commanded by a Canadian general, in this case, General E.L.M. Burns who later became famous as the commander of the first peacekeeping force recommended by Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson.

Moving up the Italian peninsula, the Canadians fought with great determination and great capability. At the Guthic line just south of Rimini on August 25, it took them five days to break through this last foothold before they moved into the plains of Lombardy.

By 1945 the Italian campaign had pinned down 27 German divisions and unquestionably had a great impact on the outcome of the war with D-Day. During the Italian campaign, some 92,757 Canadians served in the Italian campaign. Of those 5,500-plus were killed, 20,000 were wounded and 1,000 were taken prisoner.

Canada won three VCs, Victoria Crosses, the highest commendation during that campaign: Captain Paul Triquet of the Royal 22nd Regiment, Major Mahony of the Westminster Regiment and Private E.A. Smokey Smith of the Seaforth Highlanders.

It is not only appropriate that this return to honour and commemorate the Canadians who participated in the Italian campaign should be done, but it is appropriate that all parties should be represented in it. This is non-political. It is a Canadian venture and I commend the secretary and the members of the party who are going to Italy. It is not only right but fitting that Canadians remember the Italian campaign.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. David Anderson (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-27, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Income Tax Application Rules, the Canada Pension Plan, the Canada Business Corporations Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and certain related acts, be read the first time and printed.

(Motion deemed adopted, bill read the first time and printed.)

SEXUAL ORIENTATION

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a petition on behalf of 187 constituents from Lethbridge.

They present the petition requesting that Parliament not amend the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to include the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

I so present the petition to Parliament.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Deputy Speaker: Are the questions allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I wish to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 33(2)(b) because of the ministerial statement Government Orders will be extended by nine minutes.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY—CONVERSION OF MILITARY INDUSTRIES

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve) moved:

That this House condemn the government for its unacceptable delays in developing and implementing a genuine strategy for the conversion of the defence industries to civilian production, which would save and create new jobs in high technology sectors.

At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the House that if the Official Opposition has felt necessary to use its allotted day to deal with industrial conversion mechanisms and propose solutions, as the government will see, it is because we believe there really is a feeling of urgency. The reason why I raise this feeling of urgency is that we remember that 10,000 jobs have been lost in Quebec in the sole sector of defence material production and in the sector of arms production and that as many and even more have disappeared in the rest of Canada, where it is said that 47,000 jobs have been lost since 1987.

Despite the stagnation of markets, despite the urgency of the situation, the government is making no progress. This government, in spite of its commitments, and we will come back to that, has given no real indication of its will to go ahead in that sector. There was no indication whatsoever in the Speech from the Throne, nor was there anything in the Budget brought down recently.

Of course, the difficulties that the defence material and arms industries are facing encompass much more than the national market. We of the Official Opposition are well aware, because we are responsible members, that the difficulties result from changes which have taken place in the international order. What kind of reality are we talking about when we deal with arms production? We are talking here about an international market worth $450 billion. Evidently, the streamlining, the adjustments made in these markets affect not only Canada but also Europe and the United States. I think it would be useful to point out that since 1987, Europe has lost 600,000 jobs in that sector and the United States 700,000. If you add that to the Canadian reality, it is easy to understand that the change is world-wide.

This is even more of a concern because jobs lost in the area of armament or defence production are high technology jobs; many studies show that jobs found in the area of defence equipment and military weapon production generally are better-paying for the employees. It is even said that these jobs pay 36 per cent more than comparable jobs in civilian industry.

Mr. Speaker, the causes of that streamlining are well-known. It began with the fall of the Berlin wall, which had been the symbol of the cold war for two generations. Because of the cold war various nation-states, including Canada, ratified a number of treaties providing for a limitation of the production of both nuclear arsenals and conventional weaponry. It is easy to understand that limitation treaties mean less contracts for producers.

Let us take as an example our neighbour to the south. Five or six years ago, when George Bush was President, the Pentagon was told to prepare for a significant reduction of its purchasing power. Even though it was the main source of defence contracts, the Pentagon will nevertheless have its purchasing power reduced by 27 per cent between 1993 and 1997. Of course, the whole thing will impact on Canada and Quebec since we are closely linked to the American defence market.

We must note also that arms deliveries to Third World countries dropped by more than 61 per cent between 1988 and 1992. Up to now, rationalization efforts have mainly focused on ground-based systems. Contracts for such systems dropped by about 77 per cent. Also, naval contracts, for which Quebec had some expertise, were reduced by 26 per cent. Thirdly, the aviation industry, with an important production centre based in Montreal, registered a 23 per cent drop in its contracts.

This is why the government should urgently propose a real conversion strategy. We should not forget—and we will keep reminding the government and the people listening to us—that while I speak, jobs are being lost and, despite the disappearance of tens of thousands of them, the government has not offered the slightest help, it did not propose anything to companies willing and even anxious to undergo conversion.

Mr. Speaker, it might seem strange, but Canada, a medium power, a peace-loving country, which never was the main belligerent in any war, was nevertheless an important producer of arms and auxiliary equipment. In fact, Canada ranks eighth in the world when it comes to arms production.

As for arms exports, we are ranked fourteenth in the world. I mentioned the difficulties experienced by the American market, and this is very relevant for Canada and Quebec since 70 per cent of the Canadian production of arms and military equipment is sold on international markets, and 80 per cent of that on the American market.

• (1025)

Therefore, the situation is worrisome, it is here to stay and it is structural. We cannot pretend that Canadian and Quebec defence industries are going through a temporary crisis. All indications point to a structural crisis caused both by the international situation and problems more specific to North America.

If the Official Opposition chose to have this debate, it is not only because the stakes are very high for English Canada, but mostly because the streamlining process is of the utmost importance for Quebec.

It concerns Quebec to the highest degree since there are some 650 companies, either prime contractors or subcontractors, which are directly involved in contracts awarded by the Department of National Defence. Quebec firms had gained expertise in four specific areas, namely communications electronics, aerospace, shipbuilding, and ammunition.

In spite of this expertise—which had been developed mainly through DIPP as we will see later—and Quebec's know-how in the four sectors I just mentioned, 10,000 jobs have been lost in Quebec since 1987, due partly to the international situation. As you can appreciate, the loss of 10,000 jobs in a market like Quebec is, to all intents and purposes, absolutely catastrophic. I say catastrophic, because these jobs, as was mentioned earlier, are in the high-tech field and if the conversion program is not implemented, there is no indication that Quebec will ever get them back.

As a member from Montreal, one of, if not the nicest city and region in all of Quebec and Canada, I must point out that the Island of Montreal is the centre of defence arms and materiel production.

Mr. Speaker, I want to back up my statements and focus on specifics, so that the government cannot accuse us of being vague and of not basing our demands on concrete facts. As you know, I have always made it my duty when speaking in this House to deal in specifics. Therefore, the following facts are for the benefit of the Minister of Industry who is honouring us with his presence today and who, I am told, will be taking part later in the debate. I would like to remind him that Montreal is affected most of all by the current crisis since 60 per cent of all contracts awarded either go to or are carried out in the Montreal area.

For example, between 1987 and 1992, a total of 15,000 sole-source contracts were awarded annually to the Montreal region. For those who are familiar with this issue, and I could name names because there are people in Quebec who have studied the conversion question, Montreal is considered the leading centre of military production in Canada, accounting for 26 per cent of all contracts awarded in the country.

We are shocked, saddened, worried to see the Montreal region, a region which has had its share of hardship these past few years—Montreal was said in the committee on social programs reform to have become the capital of poverty—suffer a 40 per cent overall decrease in economic activity from the defence industry over the past six years, while for the whole of Quebec, the decrease was 25 per cent.

So, there is a sense of urgency, an urgency that makes all the more unacceptable the attitude and inaction of a government the intentions of which in that respect are yet to be known.

• (1030)

But, in the past, back in the days when they were in opposition, the Liberals, the big guns of this government, had made firm commitments in terms of reconversion. They were aware of the need and supported this necessary transition. This transition stage is required because the good old days when governments could award lavish defence equipment contracts are gone, for ever.

If I may, I would like to quote three former members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition who had endorsed wholeheartedly the conversion process, but now seem conspicuously silent. I am referring to the current Minister of Human Resources Development, Mr. Axworthy, the current Defence Committee Chairman, Mr. Rompkey, who was the opposition's Defence critic at the time, and Mr. Jim Peterson, who was their Industry critic.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order! I would simply like to remind all members that whenever they refer to other members, the proper practice is to call them by their official titles, for example parliamentary secretary, or member for such-and-such a riding.

Mr. Ménard: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for this breach of order. But you will still allow me to quote these three members whose constituencies I do not remember.

These people were saying, "We must expand the mandate of Industry, Science and Technology Canada's $200 million DIPP from developing defence technology to helping the industry convert and diversify into areas such as environmental technologies and high-tech peacekeeping technologies".

That is smart thinking, Mr. Speaker. And that is what we in the Official Opposition are demanding. We are telling the government that there is an urgent need to act on defence conversion and that this could be done by adjusting a program not currently used for conversion. However, if the government's intentions are serious, there is a program that would allow us to make conversion budgets available to businesses. It is the DIPP or Defence Industry Productivity Program.

We must never forget that this program, which in fact has promoted research and development, has been in place for over 20 years. It enabled businesses to conduct market studies and refine technologies mostly aimed at the defence industry. We think that the program which kept Canadian industries somewhat dependent on defence markets should now help them to pull through.

We say to the government that DIPP, which already had large budgets, $300 million in good years, but today it is more like $225 million, we say to the government that this is the vehicle to use. We will not accept an argument that DIPP is already being used for conversion. Because if they tell us that, we say to the government, "If this vehicle is really being used for conversion, come with us and meet various companies in the Montreal area that are having these problems. You will see that with these funds, they cannot really convert."

We say to the government that any conversion solution must involve regionalization, given the obvious fact that Canada's military industries vary enormously from one region to another. Each region has developed its own military specializations, so that each regional specialization has its own needs.

Obviously, an industry that makes munitions will not have the same needs, the same process, the same expectations for conversion as one that makes telecommunication satellites, for example. The Canadian reality is that each region has developed a very specific type of defence equipment production.

We must keep in mind that this debate is about the future and shows how forward-looking the Official Opposition is. I see my colleague opposite nodding and I am pleased to see that he agrees that we see things right.

• (1035)

One must never forget that conversion is a medium-term process, lasting five, six, or seven years. Now is the time to lay the groundwork for conversion. We must recognize that certain regions are further ahead than others in their reflection process, because they know, and this is a basic point to keep in mind, that no conversion is possible without hard and constant co-operative work. In Quebec, we have come quite a long way in this regard.

We have come a long way with this co-operative work because, immediately following the recession of 1981, this approach to economic recovery was taken into consideration by the major players in Quebec, including the labour unions, starting with the CNTU, which just this last year organized a seminar on the subject. Even the Conseil du patronat, which can hardly be suspected of having any sympathy for sovereignty, apparently has easy access to ministers. There is also the current Quebec government; we are not talking here about some obscure future separatist government, but rather about a conventional federalist government ready for commitment, and which is asking the federal government to give its businesses access to available funds for conversion.

The government will have no choice because of the direct relationship that exists. That is precisely what the Official Opposition is attempting to show today, namely that there is a direct connection between the dependency of Quebec businesses on defence industries and the lay-offs now taking place.

I will give you six very real examples which should prompt the government to act much more speedily than it has up until now. I could have given about 50 examples, but I will only mention six, because of the limited time at my disposal.

Between 1990 and 1994, Bendix Avelex, an avionics company which depends on the military market for 70 per cent of its production, laid off 35 employees. As you will see, the more dependent companies are on the military market, the more massive are the lay offs.

Expro, which you will soon hear about in great detail, since the hon. member representing the region concerned will later make a presentation, makes ammunition. That company is also dependent on the military market for 70 per cent of its production and laid off 300 employees.

Héroux, an aeronautics firm, is dependent on the military market for 80 per cent of its production and had to lay off 131 people.

MIL Davie, which is well-known and which we talked about several times in this House, depends on the military market for 91 per cent of its production and laid off 2,740 employees—yes, Mr. Speaker, 2,740. This is unacceptable! It is a shame and a social disaster!

Oerlikon, which is well known, builds ground-based and missile systems. It is 100 per cent dependent on the military and had to let go 410 employees. As for Paramax, it is 100 per cent dependent and it laid off 1,000 people.

I do not know if the Minister of Industry is as shaken as I am, but I can hear him. I share his feeling of helplessness and I offer him my co-operation and that of the Official Opposition. We are telling this government that action is urgently needed. Stop procrastinating and let us work together; we, the Official Opposition, are willing to co-operate.

In the past, government members have said that we were only concerned by issues affecting Quebec, that we did not have a national vision and that we did not truly assumed our role. Now, this is an issue which concerns all regions of Canada, and particularly Quebec. And what we are saying is that, if the government is really serious about this, it should recognize that it does have that instrument, which, if improved, could help us to truly support businesses that really want to proceed with a conversion process. And let me remind those who are listening to this debate that this instrument is the Defence Industry Production Program or DIPP. We will see how serious the government is, since important budgets are involved in this program; we are speaking of $225 million.

For the program to be efficient, this budget must take into account local factors as well as local stakeholders, the main people concerned, who must work together and cooperate to achieve conversion.

You indicate to me that my time is up, Mr. Speaker. I simply want to tell the government that we want nothing more than to co-operate on this issue because we truly and honestly believe that time is of the essence.

• (1040)

[English]

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I begin by saying through you to the member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve that we welcome this debate today and we welcome the spirit and tone that he has put forward in his remarks. We too are going to be constructive and specific in responding.

By the way, I do share the hon. member's view that his riding in Montreal is one of the most beautiful parts of our country. One day when he comes to Toronto he will share the view that I have of my city.

The conversion of military technology to peacetime use is something to which we in this government are committed. The member cited many examples of how people through layoffs, et cetera, were in a disastrous state, unemployed, highly skilled people. We are aware of that. We are moving.

We have to expand our thinking and maybe look at new types of instruments to help in this conversion. I want to give a specific example. Amortek is a company in Stratford, Ontario, that made military fire trucks. About a year and a half ago the need for military fire trucks was really not there. It converted to making an environmental garbage truck that handles wet, dry, and recyclable garbage all in one unit.

It used its skilled labour to do the conversion. It did not get any grant money from the Government of Canada. What it did was enhance its marketing team by one or two people and participated in a few more trade shows in South America and the United States. It used the resources of the Export Development Corporation for credit lines and guarantees and a combination of those instruments, plus its banks are becoming a little bit more receptive to this type of environmental technology that is exportable. Right now the company has so many orders it cannot fill them.

I think it important that we communicate to those people who are in this conversion mode that they cannot just rely on the old system of funding because we are in a very difficult fiscal framework and we have all acknowledged that. I know the member acknowledges that.

Could the member not see that we could use the existing instruments like the Export Development Corporation, the chartered banks and some of the new creative funds they have and the enhanced marketing services of the export marketing development unit of the department of the minister of trade. Maybe through a little bit more creative thinking we could bridge that transition and that could help us get people back to work a little more quickly without adding further to the deficit and debt.

Could he consider that as a possible option?

[Translation]

Mr. Ménard: Mr. Speaker, as you know, it is always a pleasure to debate with the member opposite, probably the most faithful listener I have, but I think the hon. member is mistaken on several counts. First of all, I specifically stated, at the beginning of my speech, that the tightening of the market is closely linked to international conditions. Now, I feel the question put by the hon. member is somewhat partisan, since it implies that the businesses I talked about are a little passive, that they depend on the government and are not really unhappy about the whole situation.

• (1045)

I found that a bit strange, Mr. Speaker. Do you not think that a business which has been operating on a specific market and which has to lay off 600, 700, 800, 900, or 1,000 workers would have, all by itself, considered developing a strategy plan to find some new niches and some new markets?

In fact, in some cases, businesses have, on their own, presented the government with a conversion plan. In a number of cases, the government was provided with conversion plans, and there is supporting material to prove it. However, according to professor Bélanger, whom I hope the hon. member will have the privilege to meet some day, there are structural obstacles to conversion.

First, in many cases, these firms do not know the new markets as well as the ones they used to operate on. Very often, in order to proceed with the conversion process, they need to change their production technology, which requires significant capital expenditures, something they cannot always afford.

But should this whole debate not rather deal with the fact that the DIPP, for historical reasons which cannot be denied, tried to maintain in a state of dependency a number of businesses involved in research and development in the military sector? Is it not socially responsible for the Official Opposition to argue—notwithstanding trade fairs, which I know the hon. member likes a lot—that there will be no conversion without a comprehensive approach, without the government's support?

Nobody says that that conversion process has to be the exclusive responsibility of business; no company says that either. Professor Bélanger interviewed people from over 80 companies. They are ready to play their part, they are aware that there is an element of strategic planning involved, and they also know that it is incumbent upon them to take the first step. No company denies that.

But we have to recognize that the government has a responsibility. It must take a comprehensive approach to this issue, provide a tool that will give impetus to the process and make funds available because of the studies that often have to be conducted. I am not talking here about annual funding. I am talking about funding a process over five to seven years.

I partly agree with my hon. colleague, and I will conclude my remarks by saying that, yes, businesses must take the initiative of looking for new markets, but they have the right to expect the government to provide them with a tool, and we are telling the government that the tool they need is the DIPP.

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, first, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve for the soundness of his remarks.

We, in the Bloc Quebecois, consider the conversion of defence industries to be of great importance and we think that government members too, when sitting in the opposition, believed that to be important. It seems that changing sides in the House also means suddenly changing argument.

So I have a question for my hon. colleague. I would like him to explain the position of the Bloc Quebecois and also the different stages it would be important to go through. Government members opposite keep saying they want to listen; so I hope that at some point, after we have explained to them one last time what it is they should do, they will stop listening and finally take action.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve has only a few minutes left. He should keep his answer short.

Mr. Ménard: Mr. Speaker, in school I was always told I had an exceptional talent to sum things up. My colleague is quite right when he says we should remind the government that three main steps should be taken.

Mr. Speaker, is the hon. member across the way trying to interfere systematically so I have less time to give my answer? So, there are three main steps.

First of all, the government should make tools available to businesses which, in many cases, have specific conversion plans in mind.

Mr. Speaker, I do not understand what the minister is saying.

• (1050)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I regret to interrupt the member, but the period reserved for questions and comments is now over. The Hon. Minister of Industry has the floor on debate.

[English]

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member suggests that we make tools available to these companies, what he really means is a cheque book. That perhaps is where I should begin.

I would like to make a few general remarks about what the hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve has said this morning. I do welcome this debate. It is an opportunity for us to talk about an important aspect of industrial policy, that being defence conversion, but I want to put it in the broader context.

I have a few comments though arising from the hon. member's remarks. First of all, let me say how pleased I am that the Bloc Quebecois members are interested in talking about defence conversion. Realizing that their political objective is to create a new country, one which would have no army, navy or air force, one would have expected they would be anticipating massive expenditures on defence itself. If they succeed in their objective they may as well anticipate that. Therefore defence conversion is not what they should be concerned about, but in fact the creation of a defence industry.

Second, it occurs to me from listening to his remarks that he described the loss of jobs in this sector as a social catastrophe. I agree with him, if he means that any unemployment is catastrophic to the persons involved.

We have experienced over the last number of years many job losses in Canada in many sectors. We have seen it most recently in the fisheries in Atlantic Canada. We have seen it, although it is recovering well right now, in the automotive sector in Ontario. We have seen it in industries in western Canada. As we live at the moment with 11.5 per cent unemployment, 1.5 million Canadians out of work, for those people it is a catastrophe.

I suggest however it is no greater catastrophe for those in the defence industry than for those in any other industry. What we really are talking about—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I know that members feel very strongly about these issues. Of course this is the place for that debate to take place, but I think we all want to do it in such a fashion that we maintain the respect of all our constituents.

In all fairness to members on either side of the House, given the strong views, I would ask members to allow one another to debate and I will do my utmost to maintain that debate in the most respectful fashion.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I have three children at home. I am used to talking when others are talking, so it is not really a problem for me and there are children here too.

The other comment I make arising out of the remarks of the member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve is the notion which appears to underlie his basic thesis which is that we should give money to individual firms in order to assist them in converting.

He mentions DIPP and that is an important tool of industrial development. In fact it has historically given money to firms. As we revise DIPP, and I will say more about this in a few moments, what we have been doing is essentially making DIPP a refundable, repayable contribution to assist firms in developing products for markets.

There is quite a distinction between a strategic approach to an industrial sector and one which focuses on bailing out particular firms by writing cheques for taxpayers' money.

As we talk about defence conversion most members will agree that what we have here is a very complex process. I do not think there are simple answers or formulas. Furthermore Canada's position with respect to defence conversion is unique among industrialized nations. The hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve and many of his colleagues need to be informed about exactly what it is we are attempting to do. Let me try to provide some perspective on just where we are coming from in Canada in this area of industrial conversion.

• (1055)

In the red book we stated that many opportunities are available for industries which recognize and exploit the trends in global markets. We knew that the time had come to help defence industries to make the transition from high tech military production to high tech civilian production.

[Translation]

We are determined to achieve this objective. For that matter, we have made great progress in developing an effective strategy.

[English]

Our defence conversion program has three major components: first, redefining Canada's defence policy; second, rationalizing the military infrastructure in Canada; and third, rationalizing the defence industrial base. Really what we are talking about here is the third of these points, rationalizing the defence industrial base.

[Translation]

Our defence industry is largely composed of fully diversified businesses, most of which depend only moderately on military markets. For these businesses, the rationalization of our defence sector does not pose major problems. Sales of military material will be maintained at a relatively high level, but companies like CAE Electronics, Canadair and Spar will be able to make gains on both commercial and military markets.

[English]

We have a second group of companies capable of further diversification. These companies have the technology, skills and the manufacturing base to achieve long term growth in non-military markets. However, they may need assistance in analysing the most advantageous areas for diversification. This is where a broadening of the criteria for the defence industry productivity program, DIPP, will be particularly applicable.

We have a third group of companies. They are the strong niche players in the global military market. They fully expect to continue to grow and prosper in this market and nothing will be gained from attempting to discourage this growth. While they may remain primarily defence oriented they nonetheless are innovative and contribute to the advancement of technology which often leads to substantial commercial applications.

Finally, we have a fourth group of companies whose futures are very much in doubt. These are companies that are heavily dependent upon the domestic defence market, companies with little or no readily commercialized technologies. They have little export potential and may not be able to compete in the international marketplace. Conversion for these companies would likely be cost prohibitive and their futures must be managed on a case by case basis.

While we can make predictions about each of these groups of companies and their future prospects for growth and diversification, there are very few certainties. What it really boils down to is the fact that the future of defence companies in Canada will hinge on the defence market itself and the ability of companies to diversify into other product lines.

The future demands of the domestic defence market will not really become clear until we have completed a defence review. That is not something which is done overnight or even over a couple of months.

[Translation]

It is clear that we cannot wait for the completion of the defence sector review. Canadian businesses cannot wait. We are all very well aware of the fact that competition is intensifying on international markets; no one can afford to wait for the results of a review to be published. Therefore, the government must go ahead, resolutely.

[English]

Our main objective is to reduce the dependence of Canadian firms on defence sales. We want to encourage a greater focus on research and development, on dual use technologies to support product development and on improving market access.

• (1100)

In pursuit of these objectives there are a number of principles that I believe will guide us toward success.

First, the process must be industry led. It only makes sense that industry is in the best position to determine how it will meet the challenges and recognize the opportunities presented by defence conversion. There is a role for government in all of this, and it is a very important role. The government can facilitate that conversion by providing some assistance in identifying market opportunities and removing barriers to growth.

Second, defence conversion should not imply massive subsidies. There is no room for bailouts, for attempting to rescue companies that have suffered through market disruptions. Simply put, such an approach would be fiscally irresponsible and in the long term would do no one any good. What resources the government does have at its disposal—and I do not think I need remind anyone in the House that those resources are limited—should be focused on support for entering new promising markets. They should be focused on innovative projects and initiatives that will continue to contribute to economic growth and the creation of high value employment.

[Translation]

The government is aware that its primary responsibility is to the citizens of this country, the taxpayers of Canada. They would not accept massive financial help programs because it would go against the present thrust which is to try and reduce our huge deficit. But, they need not worry about that, the government will not launch such programs.

[English]

To that end we will be utilizing to the extent possible existing programs. That does not mean they will be infused with a flood of new funding. We are looking at what works, what does not work, and what can work better. We are asking industry to be innovative, and we intend to be equally innovative in the design of policy and program initiatives.

[Translation]

If we ask the Canadian industry to diversify its activities, if we exert pressure to achieve conversion, we must help companies respond to the needs of the military as well as the requirements of the commercial markets.

[English]

In order to do this we will work to introduce early into the procurement process industry views that can shape specifications to meet military requirements and diversify into production for commercial requirements.

Simply put, there is no room for the one-off, one of a kind military products of the past. No one can afford them. They do not fit into any logical equation for promoting competitiveness, innovation and economic growth.

It is no secret that governments, any governments, are always ripe for a little simplification of procedures and administration. This is an area we are looking at very closely. It is an area where changes will have to be made. The system as it exists now in Canada makes it difficult, if not impossible, for companies to support efforts in both military and commercial markets.

In fact the U.S. is already moving in this area and we will be following in the same direction.

I have a couple of final points to make, if I may. In no way do we intend to pursue a course that is defence conversion merely for the sake of defence conversion. By that I mean that the government has no intention of subsidizing the conversion of defence industries into commercial activities and commercial sectors that are already effectively serviced by existing firms. This is one of the dangers in the argument that was being made by my friend from Hochelaga.

[Translation]

I will not go any further into that, but I will just point out that when people try and criticize the government for not doing enough to help defence industries switch to civilian production, their arguments only underline the fact that this is a complex question, that many did not take the time to research fully.

• (1105)

[English]

No one gains when the end result of conversion is oversupply in another commercial sector. In fact the results would likely be more damaging than they would have been had there been no conversion effort at all.

[Translation]

Finally, job creation is still an absolute priority of the government and yes, certainly, the process of conversion of defence industries could result in the creation of new and very interesting jobs. However, we should not forget that this will lead to disruptions within the labour force. The market will take care of some of the affected workers and many of the highly qualified defence industry workers will find jobs in other sectors.

There is no doubt, however, that there will be some problems with less qualified workers. In those cases, to help the workers involved, the government will use, as much as possible, its industrial and community adjustment programs as well as programs geared to human resources.

[English]

I only mention this because it is an element of the whole question of defence conversion that is often ignored by those who wish to give advice or criticize. There are some knowledge gaps out there. There may be some knowledge gaps in the House. Over the course of the debate I hope we can perhaps fill some in.

For my part I am eager to hear the recommendations and suggestions of opposition members on this matter, especially those who have within their constituencies companies or sectors that have been affected by the changes in the international environment, particularly with respect to defence acquisition.

[Translation]

I should add that when we talk about the private sector we should remember that the shareholders and the managers of the companies also have obligations.

[English]

Shareholders and managers of companies have an obligation to invest in their own strategic development, to invest in marketing and to foresee changes that are coming.

We stand here today in 1994, almost five years after the Berlin wall fell. The fact that companies in the defence sector face significant challenges should not come as a surprise this year or last year to those companies. Government is prepared to work with companies that are trying to make conversions, trying to develop products that have dual use, or trying to find new markets for their goods.

Let us never lose sight of the fact that governments do not solve problems for firms. Firms, individual enterprises and individual shareholders have a big responsibility to help solve their own problems.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I will try to keep my cool, but it will not be easy. I will do it out of respect for the Chair.

I feel I have been watching excerpts from a movie which got rave reviews in Quebec. It was called "The Unbearable Lightness of Being". With all due respect to the minister, I cannot understand his discourse. No later than March 26, 1993 A.D., Mr. Speaker, the Liberals, who were then getting ready to assume power, were calling for the solution we are offering in part today.

Because the Official Opposition claims that the government must play an important part in the conversion process, the minister began his remarks as follows: "The hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve—yours truly—suggests that the government make its cheque book available to these companies". In part, Mr. Speaker, in part. We do not see anything wrong in doing so; as a matter of fact, we believe it is acting responsibly. Why do we think that the government should give them money? Because, through DIPP, these companies have become dependent on government funding.

Does the minister not agree that most companies facing the difficult task of converting, have adopted or presented the government with their own conversion program? Today, the minister follows a laissez faire approach and tells us that it is up to the private sector to adapt. Yet, the Liberals were even more interventionist than we were, because in addition to recommending adjustments to the DIPP, they demanded the following in the second part of their press release entitled Liberals Announce Defence Conversion Policy issued on March 26 of 1993: "The establishment of an Economic Conversion Commission, with the participation of industry and labour, to facilitate and coordinate the process of conversion in the 100,000-job defence industry".

One would think from this press release that the Liberals agreed with our position that state intervention was essential to the conversion process. Therefore, I cannot understand the government's lack of commitment or why it has backed off and flip-flopped on this issue. We do, however, agree with the minister about one thing, and that is that unemployment affects everyone. Happiness, they say, may be the absence of misery. This is the kind of sophistry that is served up to us here today.

I will agree with the minister that unemployment is catastrophic for everyone, but will he agree with me that the money spent by the government on the conversion process will spare some people their jobs and allow them to continue investing in the economy? I fail to understand why no connection is being drawn between implementing a strong, immediate and urgent conversion strategy and the benefits that would accrue from it, in terms of national production and unemployment. I hope that the minister will review his position, that he will take a much more interventionist approach and that he will show some leadership. I have been told that he can count on the co-operation of his colleague, the Minister of Finance, and I know that the two ministers are prepared to work closely together. Their co-operation and the will of the opposition will ensure that we work together on this issue.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is trying to misrepresent what I said. In my remarks, I tried to explain that in a strategy for the conversion of defence industries, we need to have, first of all, in the private sector, the sort of initiative that can provide direction to every company affected.

Take for example Paramax, now Unisys GSG, the prime contractor for the helicopter contract the government cancelled on November 4.

[English]

I am quoting from a Canadian Press article published in the Gazette of April 19, 1994:

> Paul Manson, president of Unisys GSG—says the company may end up better off than it might have had it carried the multibillion dollar helicopter contract through to its conclusion.
> "We've gone through the worst of the setback from the helicopter", he said.

The articile goes on:

> He said Unisys is using the expertise gained in military work for commercial contracts, especially in the field of total systems integration. "Once you would sell a mainframe or a mini-computer or a PC and then walk away", he said.
> "Now we're involved in the whole package—maintenance, software, systems and integration.

The article goes on:

> The cancellation cloud may have had a silver lining in that it forced Unisys into diversification at a time of "intense downward pressure on defence budgets".

My point is simply that I hope this indicates a success for the particular company. It has a highly motivated very professional manager as president, Mr. Manson. He has done a good job trying to anticipate where his company can find new successes. He spent a fair bit of time discussing strategy with Industry Canada. We have tried to be helpful to him as a government should be in identifying opportunities and in looking for possibilities.

• (1115)

Indeed the DIPP fund may prove useful in this exercise again as a repayable contribution to research which will lead to the production of new products to sell into new markets.

This is a very clear strategy. It is not a do-nothing strategy as the hon. member has attempted to characterize it. It is a practical pragmatic strategy that reflects two things, first of all the important contribution that these firms make to Canada's base of highly skilled, highly educated technical people. Second, it reflects the reality of the fiscal situation of the Government of Canada.

With all due respect to the hon. member who makes quotations from press releases at a time when the government in office was projecting $30 billion deficits, times have changed. Any government is forced to see how it can make most effective use of the resources that it has available.

If he has practical suggestions on that or if he would like to come forward and say that he thinks the DIPP fund should be increased by another $250 million and here is where we take the money from then let him suggest that. So far, other than his ranting and raving I have not heard any specific suggestions from him as to what it is exactly he wants us to do.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, mine is a very brief intervention because I know the time is short. I would ask the minister if he could provide us with the figures on the DIPP program as to how much was invested and what the payback was in the most recent figures he has available.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I could not answer that question off the top of my head but I will certainly undertake to get that information to the hon. member as quickly as possible.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Resuming debate. I will take the occasion to remind all members on both sides of the House that for a member to be given the floor he must seek the floor and of course that means to rise at your chair. We speak about or refer to these unofficial lists that we have, which are somewhat helpful at times, but in the end members seeking the floor of course are those who will be recognized by the Chair.

[Translation]

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, after reading the Bloc Quebecois motion, I have more questions than anything else. The motion reads as follows:

> That this House condemn the government for its unacceptable delays in developing and implementing a genuine strategy for the conversion of defence industries—

This certainly raises questions. I am pleased to say first of all that some of my questions were answered by the first speaker, the Bloc critic, and also by the Minister of Industry.

Before listening to this morning's speech, I had decided that I should speak for the motion for one part and against it for another, based largely on the interpretation of certain key words in the motion.

[English]

In listening to the first speaker, the member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, some of the answers came clear to me. One was that first of all he was making a very Bloc Quebecois statement, one that is enshrouded a little in mystery. In fact, it was partly brought out by the Minister of Industry saying: "Why are they talking about this defence industry when their long term motivation is to withdraw and perhaps have no armed forces at all". That part of it is still a bit of a mystery to me.

• (1120)

I noted also that the speaker talked really only about Quebec. He did mention regionalism. I think regionalism is a very great consideration to all Canadians partly because we do not see sufficient consideration on the part of the government about regionalization or the necessity for developing different regions. We see a total concentration, it seems to me, on one at a time and giving way to political considerations rather than human or industrial ones.

The main question I had in listening to the Bloc spokesman was what is the motivation behind the motion. I think that came very clear that the motivation was to get money for industry in Montreal. I do not think that is sufficient. Perhaps it needs money. Perhaps it needs help. Perhaps it needs government leadership. However, to just say: "Let's have more money for Montreal or for Quebec" is not acceptable. It should be put in the context of what is needed in the rest of the country.

I heard the statement by the Minister of Industry in response. I have to say that the thrust of his statement was good. I did agree with a good part of what he said. He said there should be no question of just giving cheques to industry, that industry must take the initiative itself.

I would put a little caveat in here in saying that the government must show some leadership for industry, but the minister said it correctly in saying that the defence market has to take care of its own. It has to be market driven and, he said very clearly, there must be no major subsidies or bailouts. I could not agree more with what the minister says in that regard. He wound up in effect saying the whole process must be industry led. I agree with that also.

Having in a cursory manner described what I heard from both of these presentations on the part of the Bloc and on the part of the government, I have to admit that my own thought processes on this process were much more objective. I am looking at the context of the world situation, of Canada's foreign policy, Canada's defence policy and what industry has to do within that whole milieu.

Let us see how objective I am.

[Translation]

The motion introduced by the Bloc Quebecois refers to unacceptable delays in developing a genuine strategy.

[English]

My comment on that is that some delay is inevitable in that it must await the evolution of foreign policy and defence policy. That review is under way now. We will not see anything until the end of September. There is an inevitable delay there.

Having said that I have to criticize the government for some of its dealings with defence policy. For example, that it did a whole base closure program before the defence review was done.

• (1125)

That does not make good sense to me. I know the government was under the gun to save money. I agree with the government and compliment it in the sense that it has allowed the Department of National Defence to rationalize its own infrastructure. The government did well in that regard, but there is a certain backwardness to putting the closures ahead of the defence review.

Coming back to the motion, let us talk about the development of policy. Here the point to be underlined I would think is that government leadership is required. The government should be talking very seriously with industry, not but bailing it out but saying here is what we foresee, here is what is falling out so far from the defence review, which incidentally I understand is being done in a pretty non-partisan way by the special joint committee on that and good for them.

The government nevertheless can take some leadership here. It should be talking with industry, perhaps it is but we do not know about it, saying here is what we see in the medium term and the long term. Let us look ahead 5 years, 10 years, 15 years and let us build on the strengths of Canadian industry today as demonstrated in the field of electronics, communications, extrasensory perception—not ESP, sorry—but the remote sensing as practised by and developed by firms like MacDonald Dettwiler of Richmond. These are the areas where Canada is a leader. Government I think should be sitting down with industry and saying, fine, how can we exploit the advantages that we have in this country in these industries to give us a long term benefit of employment.

While at it the government should make a firm resolve to have no political patronage or interference once the policy has been decided. If you look back over a number of governments, Mr. Speaker, that is precisely what you will find. When the Bloc talks about contracts for Quebec, what I have seen from a western point of view is the scandalous putting aside the contract of Bristol Aircraft of Winnipeg on the F-18 maintenance and giving it through pure political patronage to Canadair in Montreal.

That sort of thing has to stop. I hope the government will take a lesson from the past and say yes, it is resolved to do that.

In the development of policy I would urge the government to do a continuous strategic review of our defence policy, update it from year to year. The government should not leave it hanging in the balance for five years at a time and then say, now we must do a review. It should do a continuous, ongoing strategic policy reassessment year by year so that we do not have to make these sudden shifts, some of which of course affect industry. If industry cannot see what the long term prospect is and be able to adjust year by year to smooth things out, it does not know where it is.

The final point in the development of policy is that I would encourage the government to please get more public input. The public of Canada is very supportive of defence and the armed forces in time of war, but it is not that supportive as it is uninformed during most of peace time. Therefore I would encourage the government please to get the public more involved in the review of policy.

We have been talking about developing policy. In implementing this policy the emphasis must be on industry rather than government. Again I take the words of the Minister of Industry and emphasize them.

• (1130)

Government must emphasize research and development. It has a role to play. We have a fairly sizeable research and development expense year by year in national defence. I suggest that it should be more tightly attuned to what is going on in industry to give us more bang for the buck.

I agree with the motion when it calls for more jobs in high tech. That is the direction in which we must be going. Look at what has happened in the past because of government policy. Look at the Avro Arrow. The Avro Arrow has been talked to death over the years but I would like to bring it back as a reminder. It had wonderful potential for Canadian industry but it was chopped and thousands of jobs were lost because of a political decision. That sort of thing should not happen.

Closer to our time, perhaps not as severe but nevertheless of high impact is the EH-101 helicopter decision. I understand clearly that the government of the day, the Liberal Party, as part of its election campaign, said that it would cancel the contract. It stuck to its promise. By sticking to its promise, it hurt the country and it hurt industry. I am not sage enough to say how the government could have got around breaking its promise but if it had had an all party review of that project, perhaps that would have given them the answer.

The predicament the government got itself into by cancelling the EH-101 contract is that it says: "Fine, we are probably liable to $250 million in cancellation charges" but the word is that perhaps those cancellation charges will be as high as $1 billion. Whatever the figure is, we have nothing for our money and yet we still are going to have to pay out hundreds of millions if not billions of dollars to acquire a replacement helicopter.

The Bloc is talking about good paying jobs and high technology and they were there with the EH-101 contract. Ten per cent of the manufacturing of every helicopter produced worldwide would have been done in Canada. That would have meant a lot of jobs and a lot of money.

People will say that we are at peace. We are not at peace and I will come to that later. I remind members that some of the applications of this helicopter are peaceful as well as warlike. It had a naval version, a transport version and a passenger version and I think we are going to see more of this helicopter in the future.

I have heard estimates there is a market for 800 such helicopters. More recently I heard that the U.S. marine corps is thinking of buying 500. Think of the market that Canada has lost. Think of the jobs. Think of the high tech job creation we have lost by putting that behind us.

• (1135)

Let us talk generally about the defence industry. When anyone says defence industry it sparks emotion. It sparks emotion on the part of the general public which says it does not want a military industrial complex. I agree with the public that we do not want a military industrial complex that drives the government, such as we saw in the former United States model. We do not need that in Canada.

At the same time, however, we must be realistic and recognize that there is a defence industry. It will continue, we can be a contributor, and government should take its leadership role in asking industry what it can do best and how can government best encourage it without necessarily giving them dollops of money.

The idealism that gets involved, the exaggeration that is involved when one says defence industry, should really be moderated in Canada. It is too much of an extreme view when we hear people saying: "Oh, you can't even say the word defence industry because it is bad". The fact is there is a positive role for the defence industry, not just in employment but in creating new products for the good of all people. The government's role vis-à-vis the defence industry must be one of preserving a minimum base for that industry throughout the years ahead.

In this connection there is an organization called the Canadian Defence Preparedness Association, which I understand gave testimony to the joint committee in the last day or two. It has a real role to play with the government. Its objectives, if I may read it, are "to foster an industrial framework to achieve both the sustainment of forces in being and a modest mobilization capacity in times of conflict." I think that is a worthy objective.

What government can do in conjunction with a group like the Defence Preparedness Association and other defence minded groups is to look ahead and ask how they may co-operate. Can we have the production of aircraft, for example, that are stressed so as to land on rough terrain but have an application, a use, in time of peace but are available to the government, to the Canadian forces in time of emergency?

The answer, if the government looks long term, is yes we can have things like that. Can we have, for example, roll on roll off ferries that are in day to day use, let us say with B.C. Ferry Corporation in British Columbia, subsidized to a degree by the Canadian government? If we can have these used in peacetime but also available in time of emergency, we have something that is a good combination for peace and war, if you will.

There are other things that the government can do in its leadership role vis-à-vis organizations such as the Defence Preparedness Association. One such is legislation. It should be listening to these organizations and asking how we can best support the militia or members of the militia by ensuring that they have a job once they come back from either peacekeeping operations or militia training. Things of that order can be done.

Implicit in the Bloc motion, or at least my interpretation of it, is that we are now in a time of peace. If that is so, I have to say we are not there yet. You simply have to look at Rwanda, the situation in Somalia and the situation in the former Yugoslavia. You can look anywhere in the world and if there is no trouble there right now, you can see it coming in the future.

• (1140)

In summary, there is good and bad to be said about this motion. I was cheered by the reply of the Minister of Industry. I think the government is going in the right direction. However, government can do much more in the planning sphere to create jobs and to make better life for us all.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on what the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan said about the F-18.

I think it would be a good idea to remind the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan of the historical facts on the F-18. We need to place the F-18 events in their historical context. In this regard, we must remember that during the referendum debate, after our friends opposite got involved, in particular the hon. member for Saint-Maurice, who was already a minister in Mr. Trudeau's Cabinet, Quebecers were promised a carrot: "If you vote against the Parti Quebecois' proposal to give them the mandate to negotiate eventual sovereignty with all related commitments, we promise you, first of all, that the superspecialized F-18 will be built in Quebec". That was the carrot.

And I remember in the 1980s seeing follow-up analyses saying that, according to the experts, the promises were never kept. Either I misunderstood the member from the Reform Party or he does not know—that is his right—but I hope we will no longer hear such remarks, as though Quebecers' concerns were whims, to use once again the words of the hon. member for Saint-Maurice.

I would like to suggest to my dear colleague from Nanaimo—Cowichan, who is responsible for recruiting Reform Party members in Quebec, that such comments will not help him in his task.

Mr. Ringma: Mr. Speaker, I obviously did not express myself clearly in English because the hon. member misunderstood me or he does not understand the F-18 situation.

First of all, there were no promises to build the F-18 in Quebec; it was to be built in the United States but a few parts would be built here in Canada. The contract I mentioned was only for the maintenance of this plane and it was awarded to Winnipeg-based Bristol Aerospace, which had it in the bag but, as the hon. member said, the government decided that it should still give Quebec something even if it lost votes in the West or upset Westerners. It did not matter; they had to give it to Quebec.

The contract was awarded for political reasons, and that must stop in Canada.

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, first I want to tell the hon. member that indeed, and Quebecers are aware of it, there are frustrations in Western Canada, where people may have the impression that Quebec gets more than its fair share. However, I want to remind the hon. member that, among large provinces, both in terms of population and size, Quebec is undoubtedly the province with the highest unemployment rate and the largest number of poor in cities. It is a state, or at least a province, where there are numerous problems. And I personally do not think that Quebec is asking for more than its fair share, far from it.

• (1145)

I want to point out to the hon. member one thing which was overlooked. If we proposed to discuss today the conversion of defence industries, and if Bloc Quebecois members talk more specifically about Quebec, it is because a consensus already exists in our province between the City of Montreal, the Quebec Liberal government, the unions and the Conseil du patronat.

Mr. Speaker, the situation in Quebec is such that we must absolutely find a way to ensure the conversion of this industry. As my colleague from Hochelaga—Maisonneuve mentioned earlier, out of 57,000 jobs, 11,000 have disappeared since 1988.

The situation is disastrous and even catastrophic. The Reform Party member did not say that we are in times of war, but he seemed to imply that there are conflicts everywhere. We must be serious and believe that it is possible to have peace. I think it is reasonable to say that we are less in danger than we were 20 years ago, and that the need for arms is also less than it was 20 years ago.

I find it somewhat unfortunate to think that we must continue to arm ourselves. In conclusion, I want to tell the hon. member that there are frustrations in the West. However, the Bloc Quebecois is well aware of those frustrations and we have a plan for the future of Canada which will eliminate those frustrations once and for all. Our plan will ultimately put an end to the constant bickering between us by creating parallel systems, in harmony. This is what Quebecers hope.

[English]

Mr. Ringma: Mr. Speaker, I would agree with my hon. colleague that indeed we want to work side by side in peace not just with Quebec and all of Canada but elsewhere in the world.

Absolutely there is no one who likes peace more than a professional military person. Having put in my 35 years, having seen the terrible results of war, I could not agree more. Let us go for peace.

Having said that, I look around the world. I look at the two Koreas. I look at the situation in Vietnam and Cambodia. I look at Sri Lanka, the Tamils vis-à-vis the rest of India. I look at the Kashmir situation, Afghanistan, on and on. You cannot look at any part of the globe and say there is peace around the world because peace is not there. Therefore the assurance of peace is certainly being threatened. Anyway, that is getting far too much into philosophy.

[Translation]

We are aware of the unemployment problem in Quebec, but I wonder why the problem is more acute in that province. I believe Quebec has all the necessary tools: intelligent people, hard workers, industries, the river, transportation, everything.

So, if unemployment is more severe in that province, I wonder if it is not partly a matter of policy.

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, as industry critic for the opposition, I am very pleased to take part in this debate on a motion put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, for which I want to congratulate him. His motion concerning industrial conversion reads as follows:

> That this House condemn the government for its unacceptable delays in developing and implementing a genuine strategy for the conversion of defence industries to civilian production, which would save and create new jobs in high-technology sectors.

• (1150)

This motion shows how concerned we, in the opposition and in the Bloc Quebecois, are about this whole issue of industrial conversion, given the current situation.

You have to realize that the problem is very acute and the situation is very serious. During the last few years, defence expenditures have decreased. In fact, in only seven years, from 1987 to 1994, they have dropped by 10 per cent. According to some experts, defence expenditures are expected to fall by another 25 per cent in the next few years. This 10 per cent drop in activities has had devastating effects throughout the West. In Europe, for example, 600,000 jobs have already been lost. In the United States, 700,000 jobs disappeared in five years. By the year 2000, about 1.6 million jobs will have been lost because of the reduction in military production. Here, in Quebec, as was mentioned earlier, 10,000 workers in the defence industries have already lost their jobs.

According to some analysts, in Quebec, there are about 650 businesses directly or indirectly involved in military production.

Around forty of those are mainly and fundamentally involved in military production, a high-tech sector where much emphasis is put on research and development. So, we are talking about highly-qualified workers, who are highly paid, and, as you know, for every job in this high-tech industry, there are five indirect jobs.

Faced with this very serious problem, there is only one conclusion to be drawn. We urgently need a strategy for the conversion of defence industries to civilian production. The nature of manufacturing must be changed.

Here is Canada's position in the world market: in 1992, Canada was the eighth arms producer in the world, with a production value ranging from $3 to $7 billion, depending on the products. We should know that 70 per cent of these products are exported and that 80 per cent of our exports go to the United States.

In view of the reduction of military activity that was talked about earlier and that has caused the loss of 700,000 jobs in the United States, we can already see how the situation is threatening for Canada and Quebec, since the market is constantly shrinking.

Once again, that is another way of seeing the urgency of the situation and the need to redirect all military production effort at the present time.

We should also know that the federal government's intervention in military production has been specifically a type of intervention called the Defence Industry Productivity Program, better known as the DIPP. The DIPP is defined as follows:

> The main mission of this program is to support businesses in the defence industry, mostly in aeronautics and avionics, to facilitate and consolidate research and development activities, to establish suppliers networks in by-products and components for these sectors, and to promote investments and exports in these high-value added manufacturing sectors. The objectives of the program are to assist defence businesses in remaining competitive in the world markets and the Canadian market.

In 1989-90, three years ago, the DIPP had a budget totalling $300 million.

• (1155)

In 1992-93, the budget was only $226 million, a reduction of a little over 25 p. 100. This means that Quebec received $168 million dollars in 1989-90, and only $80 million in 1992-93, a reduction of 52 p. 100, whereas the total budget has been reduced only by 25 p. 100. Given this, the Opposition now feels that this program must be revisited and that the DIPP mandate of military equipment promoting agent must be changed, so that part of this budget will be allocated to the conversion of defence industries into civilian production.

The Opposition is not saying anything new when making such remarks. For once that we agree with the Liberal Party, let us capitalize on that. I believe we agree with them more than they agree among themselves. This may be the difference between this side and that side. On this side, one can make remarks, on the other side, one must implement them. This is not always easy. Power is painful and difficult to assume. We understand it.

The press release of March 26, 1993 says a lot about the intentions of this government. This press release was cosigned by the leader of the Opposition, now prime minister, the present minister of Human Resources Development, the present member for Labrador and his colleague for Willowdale, who was then the critic for industrial affairs. It states three major commitments. "Expand the mandate of the Defence Industry Productivity Program (DIPP) of the Department of Industry, Science and Technology, which has a budget of $200 million, in order to add to it a support element that would facilitate the conversion and diversification to areas such as environment technology and advanced technology for peacekeeping".

Second recommendation: "The creation of a commission of economic conversion in co-operation with industry and labour in order to facilitate and co-ordinate the conversion of the military industry which today employs some 100,000 workers. Sign conversion agreements with the United States, which import 80 per cent of our military equipment production". And finally, "the conversion of military bases" which has already started. We can already see the position taken by the Liberals.

There is one aspect that I would like to draw to your attention because I think this is the source of the hesitation of the government regarding the role of the state in that area. Yet, the Liberal Party was very clear at the time, that is only 14 or 15 months ago which is not a whole life time.

I would now like to quote the second paragraph on page 3 of their press release: "The Liberal Party believes—and we are reliably informed that this is the cause of the hesitation of the government—, believes that the mandate of the state is to take initiatives that are in line with the evolution of the international scene and that create jobs for Canadians. A plan must be adopted to encourage our military equipment industries to turn away from that type of production and export. We commend the sub-committee of the House of Commons on arms exports which adopted our view in its report of September 1992 and made useful recommendations that were in good part inspired by liberal ideas".

Being consistent, the Liberal Party underlines this fact in its red book, which led many Canadians to support them especially in Ontario and in the Maritimes. The red book, on page 55, reads as follows:

> The defence industries today employ directly and indirectly over 100,000 Canadians. The end of the Cold War puts at risks tens of thousands of high-tech jobs. A Liberal government will introduce a defence conversion program to help industries in transition from high-tech military production to high-tech civilian production.
>
> Specifically, a Liberal government will expand the mandate of the Defence Industry Productivity Program (DIPP) to assist in a conversion and diversification.

• (1200)

That is what the Liberal Party says.

> DIPP is the primary grant and loan program designed to influence the development of a defence industrial base in Canada. Administered by Industry, Science and Technology, it aims at developing defence technology and strengthening Canadian and North American defence industries.

So, the Liberal Party was already agreeing to fund the defence conversion using the DIPP budget.

Oddly enough, we have not heard a single word about that since the red book has been released, neither in the Speech from the Throne nor in the Budget Speech.

The Bloc position is more or less the same. I will explain it briefly. It aims at creating, in three steps, a conversion fund flowing from the industrial diversification fund. The fund would mainly consolidate and complement the assistance coming from existing programs in order to provide military facilities and businesses with adequate and long term support in their conversion and diversification process. It would also bring about consultative committees on conversion at local and regional levels, when the scope of conversion and diversification activities would warrant them. It would help in establishing an independent committee that would review the various existing programs that could be helpful and to put forward amendments and other improvements that could be required. That committee will propose a framework to ensure coordination between the different levels of government in order to avoid overlappings.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, I can remind you of the position taken by the Bloc that was largely inspired by the position taken during the campaign in the debate on the cancellation of the helicopters contract. The Bloc Quebecois supported the position of the Liberals, who sensed that power was within their grasp, and said that the contract should be cancelled provided that, let us not forget that, the money earmarked for this contract and the know-how needed to build the helicopters was transferred to a civilian project which would benefit a lot of people. The Bloc had clearly indicated that a high speed train linking Quebec City, Trois-Rivières and Windsor met both criteria.

Unfortunately, the government acted upon only one of those two recommendations, and cancelled the helicopter deal. Since then, Canadians and Quebecers have been left hanging, without any compensation whatsoever.

Therefore, DIPP should be modified so that, instead of promoting defence production as it does now, it helps military industries to convert to civilian production.

One must realize that, in Quebec, there is a solid consensus among all the stakeholders in this vast project, including the Quebec government which has expressed its impatience several times already through its Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology, Mr. Gérald Tremblay. No matter how federalist and Liberal he is, he did not mince his words and said, on April 11 last:

> In its red book, the federal government promised to make available to DIPP, significant sums of money for converting defence industries to commercial production. We are presently negotiating with the federal government. We want to know how much money will be made available, when and for which company.

These are the very words spoken by the Quebec Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology.

The Conseil du patronat du Québec, which—you will admit, Mr. Speaker—is not necessarily a natural ally of the Bloc Quebecois, is another stakeholder. A few months ago, precisely in September 1993, it held a symposium entitled "Rendez-vous économique 1993", and came up with two main recommendations pertinent to our present debate. Recommendation 31 said that the federal government should provide adequate financial support for the conversion of industries dependent on military contracts.

• (1205)

This financial help would last as long as it takes to adapt, convert and diversify defence industries.

The implementation of conversion and diversification activities would be planned by conversion committees, made up of representatives from industry and labour in the affected communities and representatives from the Government of Quebec. This is the position of the Conseil du patronat which, in its first recommendation—and this is very relevant to the concerns of the Official Opposition—said that the federal government should give MIL Davie a contract for about $6.5 million to design, and then another contract for $200 million over three years, according to the figures of the Conseil, to build a prototype of the "smart ship" we hear so much about.

This ship would fill urgent and recognized needs of some federal departments, but it would also be the prototype of a series of similar ships for the international market, a promising and expanding market. This is the position of the Conseil du patronat, but it is supported by the CNTV and the FTQ. So, the Government of Quebec, the Conseil du patronat and the two largest unions in Quebec all agree on that point. The CNTV said in a press release dated October 31, 1993:

> Between 1987 and 1992, Quebec lost 11,000 of its 57,000 jobs in the military sector. Jobs are still disappearing. Since more than 60 per cent of contracts are awarded to companies in the Montreal area, it is essential that forces stick together to obtain a realignment of government industrial policies, especially in the military sector which comes under federal jurisdiction.

Two days earlier, on October 29, Mr. Fernand Daoust, then president of the FTQ, had said:

> Considering that the future government wants to cancel the helicopter contract, we want to know the projects which will be put in place to provide the 8,000 jobs for 12 years that the Prime Minister is going to abolish without serious analysis of the issue.

As we were told a moment ago, the decision to cancel the helicopter contract, without any compensation, demonstrated a total lack of vision.

To show you how serious the situation really is in Quebec, I will quickly give you the level of dependency of companies. Let me name a few just to show how serious the situation is: Bendix Avelex Inc. depends on military contracts for 70 per cent of its production; Canadian Marconi, 55 per cent; Héroux, 80 per cent; MIL Davie, 91 per cent; Oerlikon and Paramax, 100 per cent in both cases and SNC Technologies, 95 per cent.

As far as job losses are concerned, Bendix lost 350 jobs, Anachemia Canada Inc. 68, Marconi 1,480, MIL Davie 2,740, Oerlikon 410, Expro Chemical Products Inc. 300, Héroux 131, Paramax 1,000, Pratt and Whitney, 200 and I could go on and on; Vickers lost 350 jobs.

This goes to show how much we hope the government will abide by the promises it made to the public; when governments shamelessly treat commitments that way, I think we have a right to be worried about democracy. It could mean they can say anything to the constituents but after election day, fight shy of their commitments and I think this is very serious. When we speak like this, the figures do not seem like much but we must remember that when we talk about unemployed people, we are also talking about human lives, families, careers, educated people leaving the country, brain drain or the outflow of know-how.

Somebody told me this morning we can even use the term hemorrhage. In my view neither the economy of Quebec nor that of Canada can afford such a hemorrhage.

In conclusion, if, as we wish, the government takes action to help the DIPP and point it in a new direction, I hope it will do so according to generally accepted practices and will respect conventions. The minister mentioned it before, it is not enough to talk about manpower adjustment committees; I know these committees, I worked with them for eleven years; they give good results in traditional circumstances.

The money given must be administered by committees where the employer and the union concerned will be duly represented, along with representatives of the region. The context must be considered and the government of Quebec has to be consulted, since it is very sensitive to that issue and very interested. These committees must study the situation on a case by case basis, according to the type of activities carried out until now. Indeed we must realize that manufacturing ammunition and making satellite telecommunication devices are two operations that are very different.

These committees should examine the situation, ensure that a dialogue is initiated and reach a consensus about the new orientations and the changes that need to be made to everyday management practices. This is a proven formula that should work. I really hope the government will act upon the positive proposal put forth by the opposition today, which is to see that the situation improves. It particularly makes sense if we recall the government's pretensions, with its slogan "jobs, jobs, jobs", and the 11,000 jobs lost in the high technology sector. We have to demand a minimum of consistency on the part of this government.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I begin by saying to the member that the unemployed people of the member's community are as important to us as people in any other community in this country. Whether it is someone unemployed in the defence industry or any other sector of the economy, we feel that it is our responsibility as a government to do our very best to put everyone back to work. That was our campaign, putting people back to work, and we are looking at this in a comprehensive way.

I want to pick up on something that the Minister of Industry said earlier in his speech. It had to do with the responsibility of management of defence industries to develop a strategic approach and to look at new markets for new opportunities for their highly skilled and highly trained staff. I think that he hit on something that is very important for all of us to dwell on.

I go back to an experience I had when I was in the private sector for a while after I left here in 1984. I worked for a multinational organization called Magna International. There are many unique qualities of the Magna Corporation. One of the unique qualities of the management team that I noticed at that time was it began a conversion from defence production in 1982. In 1980 it was an organization with about $400 million to $500 million in sales. About one-third of its sales were in defence related products, radar systems and machine guns.

I think most people would recognize that in terms of the quality of its products it is probably ranked with anyone in the world. In 1982 the directors of Magna said: "We are going to do a full conversion into the automotive parts manufacturing sector". It was a very tough transition period. It was tough for management, tough for the toolmakers and tough for everyone on the shop floor. They were entering, even though there was some foundation experience because the company had been in the automotive parts business for about 25 years at that time, into a whole new field because the technology in the automotive parts business was becoming very sophisticated with computer aided design and computer aided manufacturing. The management team at Magna decided that it would move into the new economy, become highly specialized, get the latest equipment, develop systems and components, and be the most competitive in the world.

This story is not based on theory. Over the next 10 or 12 years we saw a company grow from about 3,000 employees doing about $600 million in sales to today where it is employing approximately 20,000 people and doing over $4 billion in sales. The relevance of this example is that the leadership of the corporation took the leap into the new economy, searched for new markets and searched for new products.

I had the pleasure of working there for two years from 1984 to 1986. What impressed me aside from the conversion and the commitment to the conversion of the highly skilled staff was the management shift. Management moved out of the traditional markets of North America in terms of the auto industry because prior to the conversion from defence most of their orders were going to General Motors, Chrysler and Ford. When they decided to do the full conversion they knew they could not just rely on those three manufacturers of automobiles.

The leadership of that company went to Japan, went to Toyota, and said that it had a company that could make a quality product at a price as competitive as Toyota. It asked for an opportunity. It said that it had the highly skilled staff and the technology. Lo and behold it was successful. It brought back orders from Japan and Germany.

That is a principle or an approach many companies in the defence industry have to look at. That was the point the minister was trying to make today in part of his speech.

It is not a question of the government saying that it would not help or that it would leave them alone. The minister said in his speech that DIPP would be redesigned and would be more on a loan basis. We are also using other instruments of government for support like the Export Development Corporation. That is the kind of message members of Parliament have to communicate to industries that are having a difficult time making the conversion.

It was interesting that as I was sitting here a couple of other examples were brought to my attention. The story of Securiplex Technologies of Montreal is about the successful conversion of a company that was well established in the defence industry. Recently it obtained a $26 million order for a control system from Bombardier in Belgium.

• (1220)

There is another example. ATS was founded on Montreal's south shore in 1979. It originated as a small company specializing in the testing of ammunition. Recognizing the fact that it had limited business opportunity, the company sought to take its considerable expertise in developing software systems to new markets.

Today the original business is history. The future of the firm is in an entirely new market that it could claim to have invented: the simulation of air traffic control towers and control rooms. There is an incredible market all over the world for this company that reinvented itself.

We inherited a very difficult fiscal framework. The minister said in his remarks that during the campaign we talked of some $30 billion in deficit and now we are hitting over $40 billion. This is a shock to the budgetary system of the country very few of us expected.

When I say leadership I do not just mean the chief executive officer. I mean the production manager, the lead tool maker and the people on the shop floor. Securiplex, Magna and ATS had to take on a leadership thought process. Companies going through conversion should do this, along with having a redesigned DIPP and the banks beginning to look at the new economy and knowledge based industries. We have heard time and time in the last two to three weeks in the industry committee that the banks were beginning to look at small and medium sized organizations, not at the strength of their balance sheets but at the strength of the mind and the character of the persons involved.

When we are dealing with companies going through this very difficult period we have to help them along the path to new hope by showing other examples. I say to the member for Trois-Rivières, as a former employee, as a former senior officer of Magna, that I know the former chairman went many times to help companies in Quebec with conversion. Today there would be leaders in Magna who would be happy to share their experiences with companies in the member's riding that might be having difficulty in making the conversion.

Companies that basically were successful making the conversion remember the pain. They remember the experience. By and large most of them are willing to share it. That is the type of direction we have to take.

I hope the member realizes that we cannot write grant-type cheques for any industry in trouble. We do not have the room to do so because of our tight fiscal framework, but the minister said that DIPP was being redesigned to become more of a loan situation. We will help them through it in that way, combined with other resources. I believe that is the approach we must work on over the next conversion period.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Questions and comments. I recognize the hon. member for Trois-Rivières.

Some hon. members: No, no.

Some hon. members: Yes, go ahead.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order, please. The hon. parliamentary secretary may have directed questions to other hon. members in his remarks, but having concluded his remarks, if the hon. member for Trois-Rivières wishes to ask a question or make a comment on the hon. parliamentary secretary's remarks at this time, he has the floor.

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but disagree with what my distinguished colleague just said because it contradicts the Liberal Party's own platform.

In view of the disastrous economic situation we are facing, with 11,000 high-tech jobs lost in Quebec alone over the past five years, we are being told that it concerns only the private sector. Personally, and it was also the Liberal Party's position last fall, I consider the public interest is at stake and that the state—and I could quote again from the document I read earlier—should play a leading role in promoting recovery.

What we are saying is not to spend without thinking, but rather—that is at least how I see things personally—that the minister should ask companies where jobs are continually lost because they are no longer able to obtain contracts: "Where is your conversion plan? Show us a decent plan, a plan that is well thought out, well structured and pragmatic, a plan with a vision and we will help you."

The government's present position however is more along the lines of washing its hands of the matter, leaving it up to free market and free competition and relying on companies that have proven more innovative than others such as Magna International Inc., a Montreal business mentioned earlier. Perhaps these companies have had a keener eye, more business acumen and more vision. Perhaps not all companies are to blame, but I think that this government has the duty to question these people in the public interest, because we cannot let this go on, with engineers and skilled technicians finding themselves out of work and possibly getting ready to put their skills to the service of foreign economies. Our economy may never recover from that.

I think it is the role of government, not only that of the private sector, to manage the economy sensibly, like a reasonable man as we used to say. The Liberal Party said, and I agree: "The government obviously has a social responsibility in this matter."

[English]

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I guess I have not put enough emphasis on government participation for the hon. member. I was not saying that the government should walk away and not assist businesses in the process of conversion. We never have. I was suggesting that the balance should be one where we do not ignore other success stories in the conversion process.

In other words, as a government we should not think we are the only ones who have the solution. We will aid. We will support. We must bring into the discussion people who have already had success in the conversion exercise.

The member is not opposed to that. My point is that we have to start. We have to make sure that we do not create a sense of false hope. In other words we are not running away. However it must be much more of a joint venture with government giving advice, government giving some form of assistance where possible, maybe not in grants but through some loan guarantees and bringing in other experts who have achieved success. That is the point I was trying to make to the hon. member.

• (1230)

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member that this is a complex issue. That is why, as I mentioned in my statement, we must approach it as tactfully as possible, and abide by the rules. We must call upon all existing resources of businesses that have already had the foresight to proceed with conversion. These resources should be used by businesses planning to convert. As I said, when a business intends to convert with the help of the state, all stakeholders must be genuinely and completely involved, that is the employer, labour unions and regional players because this process can sometimes have a tremendous impact on a region. The Quebec government must also be involved because of its thorough knowledge of this question within the Quebec context.

Of course, this does not preclude—and this is the way the issue is set out—seeking out all those who have some expertise in this field to help speed matters along and ensure that case by case, the situation improves and production is geared to new markets. I think this is one point on which we all agree.

[English]

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, we are beginning to agree. The approach that the member for Trois-Rivières just suggested is essentially what I was trying to communicate in my remarks.

As the minister said, we need to develop a strategic approach and that is what we are attempting to do. We cannot just look at these difficulties in isolation from the work that the minister of human resources is doing. It cannot be looked at in isolation from what the industry committee is doing or what the Minister of the Environment is doing.

In my view we have not spent enough time today talking about the potential in environmental technologies. We must become a nation that measures its strength not by its armaments but by our environmental technologies. That is an area where I think most people would agree there is terrific potential.

There is another thing, a final point I want to make. This is actually a plug. On May 17 a group of members of Parliament from both sides of the house, 10 of us, are going to Beijing with people from over 100 small and medium sized businesses, not the big businesses that tend to go on these missions. We will be looking for new markets, new opportunities.

We all know that the Asia-Pacific region is just exploding with opportunity especially for small and medium sized business. There might be all kinds of opportunity for people who are currently in the conversion process and looking to that region of the world for new markets and new potential.

As the Minister of Industry said earlier this morning, it has to be a comprehensive approach. We have to get the financial institutions on side. The Export Development Corporation has to be working. The human resource component is helping people get retrained for the new economy. We have to beef up our ability to go out and sell abroad. We are not very good hustlers in this country. We tend to be staid. We are not as aggressive as some of our American friends to the south or the Germans or the French. One of the things that we as parliamentarians have to do is encourage our small and medium size business community to hustle a little more beyond the boundaries of Canada.

• (1235)

I realize I only have a minute, but that is something that we as members of Parliament can do to support the small and medium size business sector. We go with them.

The only problem that I have is that members of the Reform Party do not want to come with us when we take these small and medium size business people on these trips to try and forge new markets because they do not think these trips are that productive. However, I hope eventually they will see that they are very important to the small business community and they are not junkets.

[Translation]

Mr. Laurent Lavigne (Beauharnois—Salaberry): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak today on the motion before us. First of all, I would like to say that last week, on an opposition day, we had a motion with which I showed the Liberal government's inaction on agriculture. I spoke last week to show, with supporting figures, that this government was really not doing enough about agriculture in Canada, especially in Quebec.

This week, we are speaking up to denounce again this government's inertia on the whole issue of the conversion of military industries to the manufacture of useful civilian items. I care about this issue and that is why I chose to participate in the proceedings of the defence committee, to look at the whole issue of defence more closely. What interested me on the defence committee was the whole issue of the conversion of military factories to civilian uses.

To my great dismay, this famous committee has met at least fifteen times, if not more. First, I must say that there was a standing committee, which I joined, and then the government called for the addition of a joint committee, made up of MPs and senators, besides the standing committee on defence.

At every meeting I attended of either committee, I always added the whole question of industrial conversion to the agenda because it was never there. Every time I asked the question on one committee or the other, they wondered whether the defence committee was the one to deal with conversion and today they again raise the question as to whether the defence committee will discuss conversion or will pass it on to the industry committee.

It is total confusion now. In the end, we do not know which committee will have to deal with defence. The government has already been in office for six months. Many military factories, especially in Quebec, have to work with their employees every day to try to keep those jobs, and we are still discussing which committee, the standing committee on defence or the joint committee on defence or the committee on industry, is to deal with industrial conversion.

I noticed that the joint committee was much more concerned with preparing trips to Oslo, Brussels and eastern and western Canada. Take a good look at the schedule of the joint committee for the coming weeks and months, Mr. Speaker, and you can see for yourself. I think that five, six or seven trips have been planned to see how other countries in the world go about defining a new defence policy. I have nothing against that but, in the meantime, there are men and women working in our defence factories and we should talk about conversion for their sake. Meanwhile, we are discussing the trips we will have to make to see how other countries deal with the end of the cold war, how they will redesign their defence. This may have to be done but not at the expense of conversion.

Certainly, since the end of the cold war, people throughout the world are calling for a disarmament and peacekeeping policy rather than an armament policy. And this makes me the happiest man in the world. If every country in the world could pursue a disarmament and peacekeeping policy, I think that, as the evidence shows, disarmament and not war makes people happier. Except that it has major economic repercussions.

We know that for many years the richest countries in particular built defence factories to arm themselves. They armed themselves to the teeth. Until the east bloc collapsed, we lived with the stress of the cold war between east and west. In the meantime, of course, our defence factories were kept busy. People were hired to make ammunition, guns and shells. They were working but not, in my opinion, for a good cause. I prefer disarmament to armament and so much the better if we are already there. Except that, as I was saying earlier, one of the economic repercussions of disarmament may be unemployment. It has already started.

But, at that time, the government was proud of the factories making its guns, ammunition and shells. And it was making them work at what was called "cost plus". They were told, "Make the equipment and we will pay you whatever it costs". Since these plants could take the time they wanted or just about, the workers were not very efficient because they were not competing against other countries.

The country that had built these plants bought the equipment at cost. So if workers took one and a half instead of one month to make a gun, they were paid for a month and a half. Consequently, defence industries now wanting to switch to civilian production have to improve the profitability of those new products which will compete on the market.

I listened to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry and he seemed to evade his responsibility by saying that the issue concerns the private sector and not the government. Yet, the government was quite pleased to have these industries when it needed them. Now that it does not have the same need for these companies, it lets them down. The government has a duty to ensure that these defence industries are able to switch to civilian production.

As you know, arms production has been experiencing difficult times since the late eighties. This is an enormous market estimated at over $450 billion worldwide. Indeed, it is a market which involved billions of dollars. There has been a drop since 1987, and especially in 1994. It is expected that this $450 billion figure will drop by 25 per cent in the next few years. As a consequence of that pattern, 600,000 jobs have disappeared in European defence industries since 1987.

In the United States, the figure is 700,000, while in Quebec the drop is proportionally the same. This sector is in a state of collapse. It is being abandoned but the government cannot let down all these plants, employers and employees, chemists, engineers and qualified workers after using them for its needs and the needs of its military forces.

Now that we no longer place orders, we do not have the right to abandon these industries. That is why I urge the government to take money out of the defence budget, or the environment budget, or any other budget for that matter, since it all comes out of our pockets anyway, and to use that money to provide these plants not with hand-outs, but with assistance in areas like research, development, expertise, or capabilities. I urge the government not to let these plants down, because in the next few days, weeks and months, these plants will need to turn around their whole production.

The jobs in those sectors were mostly in Quebec, and especially in the Montreal area. The impact on its economy is significant. The cancellation of the famous helicopter deal did hurt for sure, but we, in the Bloc Quebecois, were all for it, except that the government forgot one thing. After cancelling the deal, which saved Canadians $5 billion to $6 billion, the government should have used parts of the savings to set up an Industrial Conversion Assistance Fund, which it chose not to do.

The government let the defence industries down and pocketed the $5 billion to $6 billion it saved by cancelling the helicopter contract. Yesterday, I was watching televison and I saw the prime minister who was taking stock of his first six months in office, and bragging. He said "one of our first achievements" is the cancellation of the helicopter deal, which he had promised to do during the election campaign.

And at one point, reporters asked the Prime Minister who had just enumerated his good deeds if he did not make mistakes. The Prime minister scratched his head and said: "I cannot think of any."

If I had been next to the Prime Minister, I would have whispered this to him: "Mr. Prime Minister, during the election and even before that, when you were in the opposition, you gave us a lot of hope and made a lot of great promises concerning industrial conversion programs and when you cancelled the helicopter contract, you should have proposed that program, but you did not." That is a mistake the Prime Minister should have mentioned to the reporters, yesterday, when he was taking stock of his first six months in office.

The Prime Minister and the Liberal government on the other side have so—I am tempted to say—lied to us, if I may, although it may be too strong a term in this House, but this is almost the case. I could quote government members when they were in the opposition, as well as provincial members. When it was in the opposition, the Liberal Party was a keen advocate of conversion. They wanted an assistance program that would help businesses to take over other markets than the defence market.

So, they promised to develop a program to help businesses move away from military production. The Liberals reiterated their promise in the red book. Almost every day in Question Period, the Prime Minister continuously refers to his red book and the need to create jobs, jobs and more jobs.

And yet, once in office, all these good intentions went unheeded, so much so that even the Martin budget said nothing about a conversion program for defence businesses.

On the other hand, the Prime Minister speaks a lot of his famous infrastructure program. If it creates jobs, that is great.

• (1250)

The infrastructure program will create about 45,000 jobs. But what good will it do to create 45,000 jobs, temporary jobs that will last six months or a year, if the government allows 60,000 existing jobs to be lost in our military industries and allows plants to close permanently? I think that the government could have kept a portion of the one billion dollars it will invest in its infrastructure program and used it to help the 60,000 workers in the defence industries keep their jobs. What good will it do to create one job if two are lost elsewhere? We are not moving forward by doing that, we are going backwards.

On March 26 1993, some MPs, namely Mr. Axworthy, Mr. Rompkey and Mr. Peterson, said—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I simply want to repeat once again that, in this House, people must be referred to by their title, such as parliamentary secretary or hon. member for such-and-such a riding, and not by their name.

Mr. Lavigne (Beauharnois—Salaberry): Mr. Speaker, I was not sure if I should name them, but I am reading a text dated March 1993, when these people were not in government. Anyway, it is these three Liberal members, who were in opposition at the time, who said that the military businesses assistance program had to be reformed for the conversion of these businesses to civilian production.

They said jointly: "It is necessary to expand the mandate of Industry, Science and Technology Canada's $200 million Defence Industry Productivity Program (DIPP) which is aimed at developing defence technology". There already is a $200 million assistance program for military businesses, but as the members said at the time, it was necessary "to add to that program a new component that will help the industry convert and diversify into areas such as environmental technologies and high-tech peacekeeping technologies". The Liberals said that. They were encouraging our defence industries to penetrate the environmental sector.

Let us take as an example a business in the riding of Beauharnois, Expro, which manufactures gunpowder and shells and which, for the past few years, has been taking part in a soil decontamination program. Those people are now struggling to survive, since 70 per cent of their orders were government defense production orders. Now that they hardly get any such orders, they have to redirect their operations. They are now working on a soil decontamination program, which is related to the whole question of environment.

However, they need support, they need studies and research, and the government could and should get involved in that area. Otherwise, what will happen to those people who worked for many years at making gunpowder and shells and who are hardly making any today? We know also that the company had major sales on the United States market; they had many orders from the United States. But the Americans too are tightening their arms program and have significantly reduced their orders, and therefore the orders for Expro are going down.

Going further than what the Liberals were saying when they formed the Opposition, the present Prime Minister did not hesitate to say that defence industries were industries of the past. Liberals were saying that Canadians deserved a government that could show the way, a government that could bring forth new ideas and new strategies, a government that could help them adapt to change.

• (1255)

The defence conversion policy is an example of how a Liberal government intends to meet the needs of Canadians in the 1990s. That is what the present Prime Minister constantly repeated during the campaign and when he was Leader of the Opposition.

After having said such things, it is unacceptable to abandon the defence industries that cry out for government assistance. The government is turning a deaf ear to their pleas.

Finally, the then opposition critic for Industry, Trade and Commerce admitted realistically that unless we develop a defence conversion policy for the 1990s, we could lose tens of thousands of jobs. If the present Liberal government is aware of all that, why does it not take action? They said so, they seem to have all the relevant information, they are aware that we will lose jobs, that we are already losing some—11,000 have been lost already—and it is escalating, but they take no action. During the last campaign, the key words for the Liberal Party to get elected were jobs, jobs, jobs. The government should make an effort in that area, they should give more assistance by making funds available to help defence industries make a conversion they are only too willing to make.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, these are comments of a general nature. The hon. member may wish to comment and he may not.

It seems to me when we stand in this House and challenge the government, there is also an obligation upon us to provide some constructive alternatives as to how government approaches the matters of the day, the problems and issues facing all of us.

In the hon. member's statements for example he mentioned that the military industry is an industry of the past. That may be true but an alternative, and one perhaps the government should look at soon, is to redefine the role of the military in Canada.

Rather than challenging and saying the government is not doing anything, it would be far better to say it is time that government looked at some alternatives for using our military personnel. It should look at how our defence industry can be changed to meet the new environment in the global considerations facing us today. There was not a single constructive alternative for Canada that I heard in the hon. member's presentation, not a single one.

The hon. member is asking questions about conversion, but what about the root problems that face Canada today: high taxation, a huge debt, an unstable dollar, an insecure economic community, high unemployment. There was not a single thing I heard that was a constructive alternative to addressing those issues and those are the root problems facing Canada today.

We can talk about committees in this House that dither around in deciding that maybe they will do this today, maybe they will do that. Maybe it will be the defence committee that will look at the issue today or maybe it will be trade and industry. However it is our obligation and responsibility as members of this House to start looking at some of those root problems. We must start providing the government with some constructive alternatives rather than standing and complaining about a particular position Quebec is dealing with. Unemployment in Quebec is every bit as much an issue for all of Canada.

I would like the hon. member to respond to those comments if he so wishes. I would be interested to hear what the hon. member has to say.

[Translation]

Mr. Lavigne (Beauharnois—Salaberry): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who asked this question could read everything the Liberal Party said when it was in the opposition.

• (1300)

All the alternatives are there. In my remarks, I blamed the government for its inaction. I did not criticize it for not doing the impossible. There are indeed ways to ease the conversion of our defence industries. The Bloc Quebecois suggested the establishment of an assistance fund. Incidentally, the Liberal Party agreed that such a fund should be set up to help the conversion of defence industries. Labour unions, the CNTU and the FTQ, and the Quebec Liberal government are waiting for some action on the part of the federal government, but I am sorry to say that nothing is forthcoming.

In my riding, there is a plant that manufactures shells and gunpowder. Purchases by the Canadian army represented 70 per cent of its order book, but the Canadian army is buying less and less. That firm decided to convert its operations to cleaning up contaminated soil. It has professional engineers, architects, and chemists. A whole group of qualified employees work on that project, but they need government support. They do not necessarily need money, maybe just technical help, but they do need it. Yet, the government turns a deaf ear to their requests. True enough, we have a $500 billion debt, and we should not let it increase unduly. But we are letting unemployment rise. In the manufacturing industry, we lost 11,000 jobs in the last four years.

The government spends $1 billion without flinching to create 45,000 jobs, supposedly, through its infrastructure program. We are not asking the government to spend $1 billion on restructuring defence industries, but only to offer some kind of help to the people in those plants. Waiting for the plants to close and creating more unemployment is not going to help the economy either.

We already have much too much unemployment, so this government should make it its duty to help the workers whose job is at risk before they lose it. As I was saying earlier, what good is it for the government, with its infrastructure program, to create jobs, on the one hand, if it does not help the defence industry workers and loses twice as many jobs, on the other? That is not progress, it is a setback.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be given this opportunity to rise on this issue which is extremely important for many Quebecers.

I would like to thank the hon. member opposite for drawing attention to the future of defence industries. Over the years, these industries have been creating many jobs in our province and will continue to do so.

The future prosperity of defence industries is essential to Quebec's future prosperity as a part of Canada and North America. Quebec and its industries can adapt to technological changes and developments that are occurring in the world.

Once again, I congratulate the hon. member for the interest that he is showing in asking this question, and I would like to speak on that major issue for a few minutes.

In defence industries in Quebec, there are many small businesses and less than 20 medium or large businesses. These industries are very concentrated and the majority of sales are made by medium and large businesses.

All these businesses, regardless of their size, have seen their defence product sales progressively decreased over the last years. And, in view of the shrinking of international military markets that is projected, we can assume that this trend will continue.

Sales of defence products on European markets have radically decreased, causing the loss of 150,000 jobs in the last three years. This represents 10 per cent of the labour force in the aerospace and defence sector.

In America, the experience is similar with large reductions in military procurement matched by significant job losses, more than 3,000 in the last three years. Both European and American industries have been faced with a serious industrial adjustment problem. In various countries, the government has responded in various ways. It is tempting to look to solutions such as those proposed in the United States for the problems facing Quebec's aerospace and defence industry.

• (1305)

I believe we can learn from others. I am confident that some of the lessons we might learn from others in defence industry conversion are universally acceptable. For example, there are a number of internal and external obstacles to defence industry diversification and conversion. These include a narrow client base, lack of experience in export or commercial markets, over-engineered products and small product runs. External obstacles include shrinking global defence markets, difficulty in attracting capital and market protectionism among others.

The various approaches adopted worldwide by governments to deal with their defence industry conversion problem all address these common elements but the approaches are often tailored to the particular circumstances unique to their defence industries.

As a general rule, none of these programs envisage getting out of military markets. Instead the first goal of diversification is normally to retain a viably industrial base. Many governments have dealt with this issue in a regional or community perspective and have given their support accordingly.

Many of them have set up committees where all parties concerned are represented, including governments, unions and the industry. The so-called dual use technologies—that have both civilian and military applications—are often a criterion on which governmental assistance for research and development is based.

One of the key objectives of all those programs consists in maintaining knowledge-based industries and quality jobs related to the high technology which is part of those industries. The efforts we are making to help in the conversion of the defence industry in Quebec are within the spirit of that objective.

Even though several of the approaches that I have just described could apply to the Quebec defence industrial base, I think that it would be wrong to use, for example, an American-style solution in Quebec. There are some noteworthy differences in the conversion of the defence industrial base in Quebec, in the United States and in other parts of the world like Europe.

Basically, the conversion of the Canadian defence industrial base in Quebec is different and unique. Many Canadian defence industries in Quebec could be described more appropriately as aerospace and defence industries because, unlike many other countries, Quebec has diversified a lot of its production. It produces a great variety of commercial products and, of course, defence materiel.

The Quebec industry is different, too, in another important area. The aerospace and the defence industries sell many of their products and services to world markets. Therefore, in order to succeed, it must produce first quality materiel at competitive prices. Like other Canadian industries in the aerospace and defence area, Quebec industries are looking for a ready market for high-tech products. They export sub-systems and components that are sold mainly to principal contractors in the aerospace and defence materiel area all over the world.

This is remarkable. A country as small as Canada is sixth in the world for the sales of the aerospace and defence materiel sector, which exports between 70 and 80 per cent of its total production. We should be proud of those dynamic firms and their workers who bring a high contribution to the economy of the province of Quebec and of Canada.

As my remarks show, Quebec industries in the area of aerospace and defence materiel are different in several regards from similar industries in other countries. I realize that several aerospace and defence materiel industries are facing an uncertain future in the years to come. Nevertheless I have reasons to believe that because of their achievements, the aerospace and defense materiel industries in Quebec are able and willing to meet that challenge.

I hope I have clearly explained today the significance of recognizing the unique character of Quebec industries in the aerospace and defense materiel area. By building upon their relative force compared to the majority of the industries in the rest of the world, Quebec industries are well on the way to the diversification of their production and the conversion of their technology.

As was announced recently in the budget, the federal government intends to change the Defence Industry Productivity Program in order to support the changes that the Quebec industry of aerospace and defense materiel is carrying out. I am confident that support from the federal and provincial governments for Quebec's aerospace and defence industry will help create the proper environment for the changes to continue.

As I said before, given the very unique situation existing in Quebec, it is probably not appropriate to think about implementing solutions adopted in Europe and the United States. We all recognize that production diversification in the defence equipment industry presents many challenges. As we said earlier today, the task is not an easy one and there are no miracle cures. But it certainly does not mean problems are unsolvable. There is a solution and there will always be one.

Some major efforts are being made in the private sector in Quebec and they benefit the aerospace and defence equipment industry. The government will continue to fully support those efforts to make sure this industry can continue to face the challenges and seize the opportunities which will arise in Quebec, in Canada and all over the world.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I would like to know if the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General still intends to share his time with the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Very well. There will be a five minute period for questions and comments to the member who just spoke.

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the speech of my colleague, a member from Quebec. I think he drew a good picture of the situation. He presented the facts globally, discussing the problem that could ensue.

I have a question for him. Is it not the role of a responsible government to stimulate, encourage and assist the implementation of policies that could facilitate the conversion of defence industries? In this perspective, as a member of his caucus, is he committed to promoting such action so that ultimately, in Quebec and elsewhere in Canada, we really get a conversion policy that will allow regions to survive?

As you know, 11,000 jobs have been lost in Quebec since 1988. It is most important for us that the government, of which my colleague is a member, come up with solutions. It is about time they stop telling the House they are aware of the problem, that they know all about it. Everybody knows the problem but we are waiting for the government to take a firm stand. We expect this government that was elected to govern to present us with policies that would bring about a fast recovery in this sector and the conversion of the defence industry. I would like to hear his comments in this regard.

Mr. Gagnon (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, this government has presented its job creation program in its Budget and, these last few weeks, through the Minister of Human Resources Development. New technologies are the order of the day, of course. The government would like Canadians and Quebecers to get more involved in sciences.

I believe that diversification is in the cards for the near future. We know all about the defence industry, or rather its sorry state brought about by the end of the cold war. Since 1989-90, we have been living in a new world, a different world, and I believe that the government is committed to bringing about a greater diversification of Canadian industries to increase our competitiveness. I think that what we have achieved in the past six months—we have been in office six months already—for instance, the infrastructure program, the job creation program, the youth programs, the budget cuts, shows a certain maturity and exemplary fiscal responsibility. I believe that we are going to stay the course with regard not only to the military sector, but also to the Canadian industrial sector as a whole.

• (1315)

[English]

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to speak on this topic which is so important to a large number of Canadians.

I thank the hon. member opposite for focusing attention on the future of the defence industry. It is an industry which over the years has provided much employment across Canada and will do so in the future.

The future prosperity of the defence industry is vital to the future prosperity of Canada. As a vibrant part of Canada and North America, its industries can keep pace with global change and technological advancements.

I applaud the interest of members in raising this question and I would like to speak for a few moments on this matter.

European markets for defence sales have dropped remarkably leading to a loss of 150,000 jobs over the last three years. That is 10 per cent of the workforce in the aerospace and defence sector.

In America the experience is similar with large reductions in military procurement matched by significant job losses, more than 300,000 jobs in the last three years.

Both European and American industries have been faced with a serious industrial adjustment program. In various countries governments have responded in various ways. It is tempting to look at solutions such as those proposed in the United States for the problems facing our industries.

I believe we can learn from others. I am confident that some of the lessons which we might learn from others in defence/industrial conversions are universally applicable.

The term defence/industrial base defies easy definition. Companies that make military products are obviously included but it is important to consider the broader picture. These are many firms that market commercial and dual-use products in addition to the military sales. Of course the military itself uses many of these products. For example when our peacekeeping troops needed a soft desert boot, not a normal item in the Canadian forces supply system, we bought commercial products.

Another reason the defence industrial base is hard to define is that like all products military ones are composed of many components. When you get down to basics these components are pretty small, things like screws, nuts, bolts, washers, and rubber gaskets. One would not normally think of these as defence products but in fact we could not build military products without them.

Having made these cautions I would like to provide a brief overview of Canada's defence industries. Canada's defence industrial base is quite small by world standards. Depending on how widely it is defined it contributes about 1 per cent to 1.5 per cent of Canada's GDP and about 70,000 jobs. That is about 1 per cent of the Canadian labour force.

A large majority of the firms are small or medium in size, having sales below $100 million per year.

The defence industry is largely foreign-owned, about 60 per cent, especially the larger firms.

This is not to say that the defence industry is not important. While small it nevertheless contributes to Canada's economy in important ways. The products it produces generally fall within the realm of high technology, many of these at the leading edge.

As a consequence it generates highly skilled, highly paid jobs which are not only nationally important but which also make a substantial contribution to both regional and local economies.

Another main benefit derives from the fact that these companies are highly export oriented. These revenues help our balance of payments. The defence industry is highly specialized in niche markets such as subcomponents in aerospace, electronics and communications sectors.

Our companies are well respected in specialized fields such as major aircraft components, flight simulators, satellite subsystems, unmanned air vehicles, armoured vehicle fire control systems and magnetic anomaly detection systems. Their successes in both the civilian and military markets improve the overall competitiveness of the Canadian economy.

Along with the aerospace industry defence firms perform more R and D than the rest of the Canadian industry although somewhat less than their competitors in other major western nations. One finds defence industries throughout the country and the regional distribution has been slowly changing over time.

The munitions sector is a small sector which produces excellent ammunition and small arms. Companies involved in this sector include SNC and Expro, Bristol Aerospace, and Diemaco in Ontario. This sector is naturally highly dependent on DND purchasing. Exports and export potential are modest. Reduced spending in this sector by both Canada and the U.S. presents a special challenge in this sector.

• (1320)

In conclusion, Canada's defence and defence related industries are small but a vital sector of our economy. While the defence industry could never be considered to drive the economy it does make an important contribution in crucial high tech sectors.

While Canadian shipyards have historically focused on the domestic market, St. John's Shipyards is currently exploring other marketing opportunities. In addition to its expertise in the commercial sector St. John's Shipyards has acquired valuable expertise in constructing naval vessels as a result of its contract for the Canadian patrol frigate. This expertise will assist the company in its search for offshore sales.

The military vehicle sector is a very small, highly specialized, subset of the Canadian automotive sector. Two companies are currently producing vehicles for DND. Western Star located in Kelowna, B.C. produces DND's fleet of light trucks. In the great city of London, Ontario the diesel division of General Motors produces light armoured vehicles, the best in the world, with huge export markets.

Efforts to market these vehicles internationally have been very successful. They are being sold in the United States and Saudi Arabia and further exports are likely.

On the aerospace side it is estimated that the top four companies, Bombardier, Pratt and Whitney, Bell Helicopter and Spar, account for some 45 per cent of production. Defence sales represent about 25 per cent of their revenues. On the defence electronic side it is estimated that 80 per cent of the output is exported. There is significantly greater reliance on defence sales for revenue.

This sector, particularly the aerospace side, is well positioned to survive reductions in defence spending. The defence electronic side is less well positioned and smaller companies with limited product lines and a high dependence on defence sales face greater challenges.

The shipbuilding repair and marine equipment sector relies mainly on government procurement. There are few commercial opportunities. Despite the rationalization of shipyards in Ontario and Quebec and rationalization currently under way in B.C. excess capacity still exists in Canada.

Historically, due to population density and patterns and the need for concentration of manufacturing for the war effort Canada's defence industries were highly concentrated in Ontario and Quebec. The defence industrial base is generally conceived as consisting of four main sectors. The largest sector is the aerospace and defence electronic sector which produces complete aircraft, various aircraft components and parts, navigation and space equipment and other defence electronic equipment. This is the most diversified sector by producing a mix of commercial, dual use and military products.

I think it is important to note that this government's commitment is to ensure that the high skilled, high tech jobs that we have in the defence industry are maintained, that in fact we work toward transition of those industries where possible. But we must not forget that Canada needs a strong defence industry. Where applicable and where appropriate we will continue to do what we can to maintain that, but at the same time look at opportunities to be able to move into transition for those defence related industries which may find lesser and lesser markets in the future. We must make sure that we have adjustment programs for the workers, adjustment programs for the industries and take advantage of the great high skills that the workers have, as well as the high technology that the defence industries now have.

We welcome this opportunity to debate this very important issue.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to my colleague opposite and I noticed that parliamentary secretaries speaking on this motion are fond of talking from an historic perspective. They paint a clear picture of the situation, which shows that they are well informed. However, as I said earlier, the government was elected to make decisions. Unfortunately, they are well aware of the problems. They know what is going on. Perhaps they should be sitting on this side of the House.

• (1325)

However, since Canadians chose them to form the government, I think it is high time for them to stop reviewing the situation. While this government seems to have a very clear picture of all that is wrong, Canadians and Quebecers expect it to make decisions and to move forward.

This morning, the minister spoke to us about the deficit. He said that he could not make any decisions at this time because of the deficit. During the election campaign, it was the Conservatives who focused on the deficit. The Liberals, on the other hand, talked about the jobs, jobs, jobs that they were going to create. But that does not seem to be happening now. The feeling in Canada is that we have simply traded in one government for another identical one. As far as this debate is concerned, nothing substantive has been put on the table.

In conclusion, I have a question for my hon. colleague. Does he not feel that it is important for a government to stimulate, encourage and help private enterprise? In this particular area, 11,000 jobs have been lost in Quebec and I think the government should be doing something. I would appreciate his comments on this point.

[English]

Mr. Fontana: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question of the hon. member. He should realize that we have only been in government six months. We understand and our commitment to jobs has not wavered at all. In fact, some of the announcements that we have already made as a government with respect to the infrastructure program or support for small business or support for research and development will pay big dividends in terms of job creation.

Our commitment to jobs is not any less today than it was before the election. Our red book talked extensively about a change in the economy. One of the changes in the economy is with respect to the defence sector. I think historically we should realize, and I tried to point this out in my speech, that in terms of what is happening in Europe and in the United States, Canada in fact is facing some of the same challenges.

I hope the member is not suggesting that we close down the whole defence industry in this country because that is thousands and thousands of jobs. We realize there is a need for defence industries and we have some of the best in the world right here in Canada, including in London, Ontario where we have many.

In Quebec and B.C. we have great industries. They are serving a useful purpose. Whether or not that purpose is still justified 10 or 15 years down the road no one knows. I think our red book says, and I would point this out to the member, that defence conversion consists really of three points: (1) redefining Canada's defence policy and the role of the military. As he knows there is consultation now on what that defence policy should be; (2) the rationalization of defence infrastructure, and that means looking at how we can assist these industries, communities and workers. As I said, these workers are very highly skilled, in high paying jobs. We need to look at how we can have adjustments for these workers; (3) the conversion of the defence industrial base to reduce the dependency on defence sales. I think that is important. We cannot cast out those industries and those workers just like that. We need to work with those companies, utilize their highly skilled workers, utilize their high technologies and be able to look for commercial applications of those things.

The member should realize, as I tried to define in my speech, that certain materials and certain parts produced by certain companies are not only defence related industries. They, in fact, serve a dual purpose. We ought to take advantage of making sure that this country faces the new economy by relying on the high skilled jobs that the defence industries have and also their technology.

We are prepared to work with those members and all members to ensure that we provide employment in this country.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the whip of the Reform Party I would like to advise the House that pursuant to Standing Order 43(2) our speakers on this motion will be dividing their time.

• (1330)

Before I speak to the motion, I would like to address some remarks made earlier by the member for Beauharnois—Salaberry who evidenced some concern with the aspect that the standing joint committee on defence was not addressing the problem that we are dealing with in this motion today.

I would like to go on record as saying that my concept of the standing joint committee on defence policy is to establish what it is that Canadians want from their defence department. He mentioned that we are travelling across the country and this is true. We are travelling from coast to coast. We are visiting every capital with the view of seeing informed Canadians on the aspect of defence and also to talk to people off the street who want to come in and make their views known.

We are also going to Europe and to the United States to establish with the appropriate agencies the importance of the Canadian defence contribution to their plans and our plans for mutual defence and obviously now in security.

The main thing I think that we want to do is establish a criteria whereby the security of the world is enhanced and thereby Canada's ability to operate in the world both industrially and tradewise will be better.

As I see it, the motion submitted by the member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve is basically a demand for more funds to support industrial conversion. There is in my mind a defence aspect to this, but a very minor one. This is basically a matter of industry.

The defence aspect of it I will discuss a little later, but right now I would like to speak to the industrial aspect of it. The defence industry productivity program, a program whereby the federal government gives some $200 million-plus to various defence industries to support research and development and defence aspects, has been in place for some time.

In point of fact during our election campaign, the Reform Party was against this program. The rationale for that was that if private industry and private citizens do not see the value of investing in such programs, why should the Canadian taxpayer.

Since my election I have been approached by a number of people in these industries and they have pointed out that there is a very valid reason for this. In fact there is a good repayment program. I accept this and am willing to look at it again, but I also know that in some cases this money has been granted to very dubious projects and that there has been a tremendous amount of this money that has just disappeared never to be returned to the Canadian government.

The defence industry covers many sectors. Among them I would mention aerospace, electronics, ship construction, aircraft construction including many components, avionics and communications mainly involved in the defence area in command and control but very, very adaptable to civil industries as well.

Many of these companies have international links which provides them access to merging technologies and global markets. A great deal of Canada's high tech industry in fact has evolved from defence research and development or procurement projects. There are some 800 companies employing over 60,000 people who are active in the defence related industries in Canada.

The Canadian Defence Preparedness Association provided a briefing to the standing joint committee the day before yesterday. They represent some 60 companies and said categorically that they have had great success at conversion.

The Aerospace Industries Association of Canada, which represents a large number of companies in this field, is evidence again of a very successful conversion program from defence to civil industries. In the past their ratio of output went from 70 per cent defence and 30 per cent civil to today, where it is exactly reversed. Their output now is about 30 per cent defence and 70 per cent civil.

This is where I am getting back to the impact of how industry impacts on defence. Obviously there are certain industries where Canada must retain a defence production capability and it is in those areas that I think the government should be involved. They may not be completely economical but they are of overriding importance to our ability to maintain a defence posture and government may have a place in there. It is not only prudent but necessary that government may do this.

However I think basically it should be left to the managers of industry to decide how they run their businesses, what products they get into and which avenues they should follow.

It brings a question to mind that if government directs the conversion of industries from defence to civil, does the government also then have to assume some responsibility for the success of those companies? If they move them from an area where there has only been a defence relationship into a civil one and the company fails, does that mean the government has to pick up the tab for that? I do not think that is the way it should be. I think that is an industry situation which should be covered by the industrial manager.

Indeed if the conversion is into an area where there is already a surfeit, too much capability, it could in fact result not only in the company that converted into that area failing but also other companies that were in there. There is a rollover effect there.

I think it is without any question the responsibility of the managers of industry to find and occupy the appropriate niches. If I may use the analogy, there is not much call for chariots any more, so a chariot manufacturer would not be a very viable occupation or a business. But that company might very well develop into bicycles or cars. On the other hand they have to accept the fact that there are many other competitors and they would have to be prepared to meet that competition.

It is the responsibility of the industry concerned to say this is no longer viable and where are we going to go to maintain our industry.

I think there is a place for government in industry in providing support. That support should be in the areas of perhaps providing a strategic analysis, to say to industry: "This is where we see Canada emerging, this is where we see the marketplace going, this is an area that you might look at to exploit in future".

I think government, as the minister said earlier, should be in the business of, wherever possible, removing barriers to trade. We should enhance the ability of our industries to compete on the world market. We should not subsidize them; we should enhance their ability to do it on their own.

I think probably the most tremendous impact the government could have on our industry, whether it be defence, whether it be civil or whether it be the conversion thing, is to bring the spending habits of the government back into line to balance the budget, to lower taxes. This in itself, in and of itself, would create a far more vibrant industry, it would result in far greater employment and to a large extent it would solve the problem that we are dealing with.

In conclusion I would just like to say that I do not believe that the government has too much place in the conversion from defence to civil industries. Certainly as I have mentioned, there is a road clearing process that it could do to remove the barriers, to enhance the trade, to indulge or enter into trade agreements, reciprocal agreements with other countries and other areas. Other than that I think the industrial base of a country should be run by the industrial managers who are concerned with it.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest): Mr. Speaker, if I may have the indulgence of my hon. colleagues in the House, I would like to read the opposition motion. For those watching on TV who might have just joined us, it might be interesting for them to know exactly what we are discussing.

In the affairs of this House the opposition parties from time to time have the opportunity to bring forth subjects of debate. We get relatively short notice. I think it is quite interesting that we get relatively short notice, perhaps as much as a day in some instances, and we then debate the issue brought forward by the opposition.

Today the Bloc has brought forward this opposition motion which is being debated in the House:

> That this House condemn the government for its unacceptable delays in developing and implementing a genuine strategy for the conversion of defence industries to civilian production, which would save and create new jobs in high technology sectors.

• (1340)

I do not know if I want to condemn the government for not doing this. There are many, many things we could condemn the government for, but I do not think this is one of them.

It is my opinion the government should keep its fingers out of business and out of the marketplace. It should let the marketplace decide who will be the winners, who will be the losers, who will be successful and who will not. It is survival of the fittest.

Why was it such a big shock to the defence industries that they were going to have to change? Was it because it happened overnight? Did we have this incredible industrial military complex that drove the economy and the country? No, it did not; and no, we have not.

Canada has never had a particularly large military industrial complex. Most of our sophisticated military equipment was purchased offshore. Many members would know, as would those watching, that one of the blackest days in the history of our country, at least in my opinion, was the cancellation of the Avro Arrow. By and large that put Canada right out of the high tech aerospace industry. Ever since that time we have been trying to force feed industry into areas of the country that may or may not need it, that may or may not get the industry because of political connections, political power, or power of the voter.

I submit that our country can no longer afford to artificially pick winners and losers. The fact of the matter is that if our world has changed and our country's defence posture has changed to the extent that the defence industries in a particular part of Canada, whether it is in Ontario or Quebec, are harmed because things change, then so be it.

It is up to those industries to convert or to find another use for their capital, for their people, for their industries. If they do not, they have every right to go out of business just like anybody else. Were this not the defence industry, if this were an industry of garment makers in Winnipeg, would we be having a debate in this House today that this House would condemn the government for not supporting garment workers in Winnipeg? I think we would not.

I want to acknowledge the help given by the Canadian Defence Preparedness Association in preparing the background paper I am using in my debate. It is interesting to note that Canada's defence industry, like most industry in Canada, is concentrated in Ontario and Quebec. For example, western Canada and Atlantic Canada each contain about 15 per cent of the total defence industry, whereas 70 per cent is in Ontario and Quebec, with 40 per cent in Ontario and 30 per cent in Quebec.

It is generally a high tech industry which is research and development intensive. That is particularly and precisely the kind of industry we want. However research and development in high tech industry is industry that depends upon the people who are part of that industry to stay alive. It is a fast moving industry. What is unique and innovative today could be tomorrow's hash browns.

We cannot have the government deciding where the high tech industry is going to be. The marketplace has to decide where the high tech industry will be and who will be the winners and losers.

It is also very interesting to note that according to this paper 70 per cent of the output of the manufacturing of the so-called defence industry in Canada is for the commercial or the civil market. At the same time, 70 per cent of this defence market we have in Canada supplies 70 per cent of the requirements for the Canadian defence department. That tells me that our defence industries in Canada by and large are already fairly diverse. They are not, as they are for example in many places in the United States, entirely dependent on the manufacture of one item, such as an aircraft. For instance, in Canada we have seen nothing like the decimation of the aircraft industry in San Diego. It was highly dependent on military contracts for all of the research and development. The defence budget in the United States as compared to ours is just absolutely enormous.

• (1345)

We do not have the same critical mass in the defence industry to start with and our defence industry, although concentrated primarily in Ontario and Quebec, is fairly balanced between these two provinces. It is not totally 100 per cent dependent on military manufacturing to stay in business according to this paper. That seems to me to be a fairly solid and a fairly good way to run a business.

Historically as a nation there are some areas where we have decided we were going to pay a premium in order to maintain an industry of our own. One is ammunition manufacturing. I think there is a place in Toronto that manufactures ammunition. Ammunition could be purchased offshore but we buy our ammunition at home.

I wonder whether free trade and the relationship we have under the GATT, but particularly under NAFTA, would allow for this kind of protectionism anyway.

I would also point out to my hon. friends that one of the reasons that people in other parts of Canada who do not directly benefit from the manufacturing heartland of central Canada, being Ontario and Quebec, just go crazy is the fact that it always seems to be necessary to protect the manufacturing base in central Canada. We have this insane situation even as I speak that we have to negotiate to break down interprovincial trade barriers.

We have 11 governments at the table trying to negotiate the decimation of these insane trade barriers. Think about it. That is more people at the table negotiating the removal of trade barriers within Canada than were sitting at the table to negotiate the removal of the trade barriers between the United States, Mexico and Canada. There were only three parties at that table and we have 11 in Canada.

We are debating a motion on whether our government, our taxpayers, people earning 10 bucks an hour, paying two or three bucks an hour taxes, should come to the federal government so it can decide who will be the winners and who will be the losers and we find ourselves subsidizing an industry for which there is no need.

We have to break down the trade barriers within Canada so we can be competitive within Canada. If we cannot be competitive within our own borders how on earth can we presume to be competitive in the world environment?

Let us put the horse before the cart. Let us get rid of internal trade barriers. Let us get our construction, our manufacturing, our capital resources, our people working together, and let us let the marketplace pick the winners and then compete worldwide. I submit that if we take that kind of approach we will be winners the world over because we can compete without government help, without government subsidy in any market in the world.

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I hope one day people like the hon. member for Calgary Centre will give up their ideological vision and understand the real economic situation in Canada and other countries.

The hon. member said that the military sector is fundamentally a high-tech industry, and we know full well that it will become less and less important in the years to come in North America, and even more so in the United States than here, in Canada. We should not forget that the American companies are our main competitors.

For many, many years, most of the federal research and development subsidies went to defence industries, in areas like telecommunications, development of new products or aeronautics. Governments used a good deal of their research and development subsidies for military purposes, because they wanted the armed forces to be in the vanguard of progress in aviation and telecommunications. Also, the development of new products was always crucial to the other two sectors. That is why the United States have a competitive edge in these sectors, where research and development is concerned. Now, of course, we must seek new ways of doing things. We are indeed in favour of the reduction in military production, but at the same time we must ensure that all of the research and the discoveries that can serve civilian purposes are not abandoned simply because some of these businesses go bankrupt tomorrow morning, after the government decides all of a sudden to cancel major contracts, like it just did with the helicopter deal.

For our country to be competitive at the international level, we need more than rhetoric; we cannot only tell the government never to interfere. We have to take into account the source of our competitiveness. Obviously, for years, the defence industry has been one of the main sources of our competitiveness in the non-military sector. The Americans set up a program for the conversion of defence industries to civilian production. They also developed alternative national strategies in areas like R and D, telecommunications, development of new products and aeronautics. They now have alternative strategies to replace the defence industry as instrument of R and D.

The Bloc Quebecois is only suggesting today that the government give us precisely what our competitors are getting. We can talk about being competitive at the international level and revel in rhetoric, but 80 per cent of our business, especially in the industrial sector, is with the United States. Thus, we need the tools, we need a transition process to maintain our competitiveness.

As you said it yourself, these businesses have already decided to go for the civilian market. We just have to get things moving toward conversion from defence to civilian production, since we must cut substantially our military spendings to reduce the government's budget and deficit. And this must be achieved without ever losing our competitiveness in the high tech sector. That sums up the precise and straightforward position of the Bloc Quebecois.

[English]

Mr. McClelland: Mr. Speaker, I respect my hon. colleague's opinion and I share some of the opinions he just put forward.

However there is a contradiction. I recall in my presentation saying that if there was an epiphenomenal moment in Canada where we said goodbye to high tech it was when we said goodbye to the Avro Arrow 35 years or so ago. We were world leaders and we said goodbye to it. Ever since that time we have relied on offshore industries for our high tech aircraft or high tech defence materiel. The nucleus, the germ of it comes from offshore. I agree 100 per cent.

Therefore, if I agree with that and the contention that my hon. colleague brought forward, he must also agree that if we are getting that high tech initiative offshore we cannot also be getting it onshore. We cannot depend on both. The defence industry has been a high tech driver in Canada. Of that there is no question.

We look at the satellites and Canadarm and those kinds of things. They could be considered defence and defence oriented, but those things are not going to come to an end. We are still going to have satellites going up. We should all say a prayer for Anik E2 up there somewhere. God knows what it is doing. However, the whole high tech industry is not going to dry up and go away.

We need the vision of the people who are the shareholders of those companies that were in that business. That is what their job is. The job of the directors of those companies is to anticipate, to see where they should be putting their energies in the future. Perhaps it is in the environment. Perhaps it is in extracting minerals from difficult places.

• (1355)

My point is that it is not the role of government to decide what that initiative should be. It should be the role of industry and the owners of industry. They will do a far better job than we will. When we went through our orientation, no one said all of a sudden when we passed through these doors that we would become venture capitalists with the ability to pick winners and losers in the marketplace. It did not happen.

Mrs. Georgette Sheridan (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this topic which is so important to a large number of Quebecers. I would like to thank the hon. member opposite for focusing attention on the future of the defence industry. It is an industry which over the years has provided much employment in the province of Quebec and will continue to do so.

The future prosperity of the defence industry is vital to the future prosperity of Quebec. As a vibrant part of Canada and North America, Quebec and its industry can keep pace with global change and technological advancement.

I applaud the interest of the member in raising this question and I would like to speak for a few minutes on this important matter.

[Translation]

The Quebec defence industry is made up of many small companies and fewer than 20 medium to large ones, the vast majority of sales being made by the latter.

All these companies, small and large alike, have seen their defence sales dwindle over the past few years. In light of the falling business activity on the defence markets, it is reasonable to assume that this trend could well persist.

[English]

European markets for defence sales have dropped remarkably, leading to a loss of 150,000 jobs over the last three years. That is 10 per cent of the workforce in the aerospace and defence sector.

In America, the experience is similar, with large reductions in military procurement matched by significant job losses, more than 3,000 in the last three years. Both European and American industries have been faced with a serious industrial adjustment problem.

In various countries, government has responded in various ways. It is tempting to look to solutions such as those proposed in the United States for the problems facing Quebec's aerospace and defence industry.

I believe we can learn from others. I am confident that some of the lessons we might learn from others in defence industrial conversion are universally acceptable. For example, there are a number of internal and external obstacles to diversification and defence conversion.

These include a narrow client base, lack of experience in export and commercial markets, over-engineered products and small product runs. External obstacles include shrinking global defence markets, difficulty in attracting capital and market protectionism among others.

The various approaches adopted world-wide by governments to deal with their defence industrial conversion problem all address these common elements but the approaches are often tailored to the particular circumstances unique to their particular defence industries.

As a general rule, none of these programs envisage getting out of military markets. Instead the first goal of diversification is normally to retain a viable industrial base. Many governments have approached this question as a regional or community issue focusing their support accordingly.

Many have formed committees involving all of the stakeholders concerned including government, trade unions and industry. The so-called dual use technologies, commercial and military, are often a criterion for government R and D support.

One key objective of all these programs is to maintain knowledge, intensive industries and the high quality, high technology employment which is part of it.

The Speaker: The hon. member has just begun her statement and she will have priority when we resume debate.

It being 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

[English]

SPINAL HEALTH WEEK

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the week of May 1 to May 7, 1994 is Spinal Health Week. The program was established in 1985 to initiate and maintain good spinal health habits in children.

It is sponsored annually by the Ontario Chiropractic Association, a voluntary membership organization that represents more than 1,350 Ontario chiropractors. Its objective is to provide public education and promote research to improve the quality of health care for the citizens of Ontario.

Eight out of ten Canadians suffer from back pain during their lifetime. The incidence is increasing. A healthy lifestyle including proper posture, exercise and good nutrition is the key to prevention.

Please join me in wishing the Ontario Chiropractic Association a very successful Spinal Health Week.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, one of the promises contained in the infamous red book pertains to accountability. However, when key questions of importance are asked in question period relating to federal overspending, health care, native self-government and criminal justice, the government consistently demonstrates an unwillingness or inability to answer.

The only time the government answers any questions is when one of its own members asks the Liberal question of the day.

We on this side of the House are asking legitimate questions affecting the lives of Canadians. Where is the accountability and when will question period become answer period? Canadians want and deserve straight, hard answers to these questions. Reformers will keep demanding the government fulfils its promise to be more open and accountable.

PALESTINIAN SELF-GOVERNMENT

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, Israel and the PLO signed in Cairo an historical agreement regarding Palestinian self-government.

Following several decades of political and military conflict, Yitzhak Rabin and Yasser Arafat have agreed on an action plan for the creation of a Palestinian territory in the Gaza Strip and in Jericho.

This agreement marks the begining of the end of a long and difficult armed occupation of Palestinian territories. Certainly apprehensions persist on both sides, but it is now up to the parties to show their good will and lay the foundations for co-operation between the Israeli and Palestinian people.

We congratulate negotiators on both sides on this truly remarkable achievement. This agreement goes a long way toward bringing lasting peace to the Middle East, and we hope it will be received favourably by all those who live in the region.

NATIONAL FOREST WEEK

Mr. John Loney (Edmonton North): Mr. Speaker, the week of May 1 to May 7 marks this year's National Forest Week. Each year the Canadian Forestry Association bestows on a municipality the title of forestry capital of Canada.

I am proud to inform the House that the city of Edmonton was chosen as the 1994 forest capital. I am delighted that the people of Edmonton have been recognized for their commitment to promoting the contribution of urban and rural forests to the city's environment, economy and social development.

Edmonton is a green city, noted for having one of the largest urban parkland areas per capita in all North America. These forested areas are enjoyed by local residents and by numerous visitors. Edmonton is also the gateway to the huge northern forest lands of Alberta which are becoming increasingly important to the diversification of Alberta's economy and to Canada's forest sector as a whole.

Allow me to congratulate the people of Edmonton and all the forestry workers in my region whose contribution has made 1994 a memorable year for my city.

BOSNIA

Mr. Reg Alcock (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, last week I had an opportunity to attend an international meeting of parliamentarians concerned about the situation in Bosnia-Hercegovina.

I was proud as a Canadian of the work that Canada is doing there. I wish to commend the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Minister of National Defence and the men and women who are on the ground in Bosnia-Hercegovina doing important work. I cannot help but wonder whether or not we can do more.

During World War II Canadians opened their hearts and their homes to the children who were caught in war zones. I would urge us to think about doing the same again to provide some relief for those people who are in such terrific danger and to get the children out of the way of the bullets.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker, high licensing fees for taxis and limos at Pearson airport are forcing operators on to the unemployment lines.

Each year rising insurance rates, gas prices, vehicle maintenance and licence fees along with poor business have made it impossible for operators and their families to survive.

It is like the tobacco smuggling problem. High licensing fees are driving legal operators out of business and have opened a window of opportunity for non-licensed operators to illegally scoop fares.

I call upon the Minister of Transport to direct the airport authority to lower its licence fees. Lower fees would ease the financial pressures on the operators and put an end to illegal fare scooping.

BOSNIA

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond-Guiral (Laval-Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the House to an intolerable reality that we have the power to alleviate. I am talking about the plight of children in Bosnia. More than anybody else, these children are innocent victims of an unbearable conflict.

A great many European countries are welcoming Bosnian children with open arms, but Canada's welcome remains discreet, too discreet, Mr. Speaker. Canada has a reputation of being a generous nation. Our involvement in peacekeeping activities is ample proof of that. But we can and must do more. We must welcome in our country these children held captive of a blind war which turns their lives into hell on earth. We cannot remain insensitive to their plight because by failing to act, we would in fact be condoning this war and its inhumane consequences.

GAZA-JERICHO ACCORD

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, for the second time in a week the world has witnessed the peaceful conclusion of long and sometimes frustrating negotiations toward true democracy.

Like the South African election, the historic signing in Cairo yesterday of an agreement to end 27 years of Israeli occupation will bring to an end the senseless killing of so many innocent people.

In any successful negotiation there must be flexibility and an understanding on the part of both sides. The winners here are not those who sat at the bargaining table. The real winners are those millions whose lives and futures will be greatly improved.

Let us hope the actions taken here by these leaders will be an inspiration to those involved in conflicts in other parts of the world that there is a better way.

The world today is indeed a better and safer one as a result of the dedication and hard work of negotiators on both sides. I ask all members to join with me in an expression of gratitude to those whose efforts brought this difficult situation to a peaceful conclusion.

PALESTINIAN SELF-GOVERNMENT

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians were no doubt moved by the scenes from Cairo where representatives of Israel and the PLO finally signed an agreement on self-government for the Palestinians. It is important to mention the courage and vision of the architects of this peace, Yitzhak Rabin and Yasser Arafat.

We know that change will not come overnight. Much bitterness remains, but this first step is very significant. The parties have decided to settle their disputes through negotiation. We must continue to help the partners build mutual trust, which we hope will lead to a broader lasting peace that will extend to the whole region.

CITIZENSHIP

Mr. Gar Knutson (Elgin—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I rise to comment on the recent announcement concerning citizen court judges.

On behalf of my riding I would like to express sincere thanks to the minister of immigration for this step. Not only does the minister's plan promise to save the government money and end a cycle of patronage, but it puts more meaning into the proceedings surrounding becoming a Canadian citizen.

Those who are concerned with the deficit or patronage should be well pleased with the minister of immigration for a job well done.

GAZA-JERICHO ACCORD

Mr. Sarkis Assadourian (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, historical and joyous are two words which best describe the Gaza-Jericho accord, signed on Wednesday, May 4, between the PLO and Israel.

This unprecedented agreement offers new hope for a region which for many years was torn apart by bloodshed and religious differences. I wish to extend my warmest congratulations and best wishes for a lasting and progressive peace to all Palestinians and Israelis affected by the accord.

The true impact of the agreement can only be realized through honest and mutual co-operation from both sides.

It is my hope that the Government of Canada will continue to offer its support for lasting and constructive peace throughout the entire region of the Middle East.

MULTIPLE SCLEROSIS

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to announce in this House the official launching of the carnation campaign for multiple sclerosis, which will take place next weekend.

Multiple sclerosis is the most common neurological disease among young adults in Canada; it is estimated that over 50,000 Canadians and Quebecers have this disease, for which there is no treatment so far. We must also mention that Canada has one of the highest rates of multiple sclerosis of any country in the world. Given the seriousness of the situation, the Multiple Sclerosis Society of Canada hopes to raise $2 million in its national carnation campaign.

• (1410)

I am therefore pleased to join the Multiple Sclerosis Society of Canada in asking hon. members and all Quebecers and Canadians to support this worthy cause.

BOSNIA

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of all Canadians the tragic plight of children in Bosnia.

None of us has been unaffected by the misery in Bosnia that we witness nightly. The children deserve a special degree of compassion. Untold thousands are homeless. Thousands have lost their parents. We do not know how many are languishing as refugees.

I urge Canadians to remember these innocent victims. I especially urge Canadians to support the work of Bosnian Children's Relief. I do not need to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that in your riding five Bosnian children are now safe and secure, having been granted a safe haven by Bosnian Children's Relief, but there are many more.

I call on the minister of immigration to review the guidelines relating to the granting of temporary safe haven visas for children.

With the help of the government, Bosnian Children's Relief could do much more in helping to preserve the innocence of children caught in an adult nightmare.

BOSNIA

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, the children of Bosnia are the greatest victims of the daily carnage occurring in that part of the world. Thousands of children have been deprived of their childhood. They have seen their fathers murdered and their mothers raped. They have had their homes burned and all too often been uprooted as their village has been "ethnically cleansed".

The deliberate shelling of schools, hospitals and other non-military targets has killed and permanently disabled many children of Bosnia. All the children of Bosnia will carry the psychological scars for many years to come.

Do those who have unleashed this madness in the name of some twisted notion of a greater nation not realize that the welfare and happiness of children is the future of their nation? Do they not realize that inflicting the suffering they have on children will only produce a sick nation whose citizens will have to live with the shame and guilt for generations to come?

I join my voice with all humanity in imploring, hoping and praying that the carnage will stop.

BOSNIA

Mr. Julian Reed (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Canada-Croatia parliamentary friendship group and as a member of the parliamentary committee on human rights, I rise in the House today with so many of my colleagues in a joint effort to honour the victims of the present war in Bosnia-Hercegovina.

From the selfish pursuit of territory and the inhuman drive known as ethnic cleansing, over 200,000 souls have lost their lives in what is today not the only but one of the bloodiest parts of the world.

Countless more have been physically injured, psychologically tormented and driven from their homes as refugees. Thousands of these deaths as well as refugees have been children on whose shoulders lie the only hope for a more tolerant world.

As parliamentarians, citizens and humanists, let us welcome refugees to Canada from this area of conflict in the world as from such other areas and let us celebrate their courage.

OFFICIAL OPPOSITION

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, earlier this week I watched as the Leader of the Opposition explained on the CBC his reasons for separation. He said: "All we want to do is manage our own money; that's all". Not once did I hear the words language or culture.

If all Canada represents to the Official Opposition is dollars and cents then I urge the government to take the same tough stand it has taken with my own province, British Columbia, over medicare. All provinces would like more control of their own affairs but not at the expense of destroying our country.

If the true agenda of members of the official opposition is simply economic sovereignty let them say so and quit confusing the issue and their supporters with the pretence of a francophone homeland.

On behalf of all Canadians who love this country more than just the income they derive from it, I urge the government to fully explain the costs and ramifications of economic freedom to Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

• (1415)

MULTIPLE SCLEROSIS DAY

Mrs. Jean Payne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, all members know that today is Multiple Sclerosis Day and that is why we are all wearing carnations.

It is estimated that 50,000 Canadians have MS but the number of people affected goes far beyond those who actually have the disease. Family and friends deal with the associated health problems each and every day. I have seen up close the impact MS can have on people.

Medical research is needed to find the causes of MS, effective treatments and ultimately a cure for the disease. However research is expensive and requires a lot of money.

I urge the people of St. John's West to support the National Carnation Campaign for the MS Society of Canada in its efforts to raise $2 million for medical research. This Mother's Day please buy a carnation to help find a cure.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

RWANDA

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Violent fighting continues between the Rwandan army and the rebels. This massacre which has already killed at least 200,000 people must stop. However, the UN assistance mission to Rwanda, now reduced to some 449 soldiers, is completely overwhelmed. Faced with his humanitarian responsibilities, the UN Secretary General has asked the Security Council to send peacekeeping reinforcements to Rwanda.

Can the Deputy Prime Minister tell us whether Canada intends to support the request of the UN Secretary General and make a direct contribution to the reinforcements requested by Mr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Foreign Affairs clearly stated yesterday that Canada intended to call on the UN Secretary General to help find a solution to Rwanda's problems.

We are very, very concerned about the thousands of people now in refugee camps and also very, very disappointed with the continuing massacre. We are currently talking about the possibility of broader intervention.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, beyond concern and disappointment, I think that Quebecers and Canadians expect the government to indicate clearly what it intends to do, especially with regard to a very specific proposal from the UN Secretary General himself.

So what is Canada's position on this request: is it yes or no? In particular, I would ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether she admits that, without a UN intervention force, it is totally impossible to set up any medical or humanitarian operation that Rwandans so urgently need.

[English]

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, it is unfair of the Leader of the Opposition to characterize Canada's response as mere concern.

We have been on the ground. We are on the ground. We continue to be on the ground both with a physical presence and financial assistance. We are working very closely with the United Nations and the Security Council to ensure that the solution we find will meet with regional support, but more important, will reach out to those hundreds of thousands of people who have been left homeless as a result of this massacre.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, while we are making speeches, while we are speaking and expressing our feelings, hundreds of thousands of people are being killed in that country, a country that is very close to Canada because of our international policies and aid programs. We have had a presence in that country for close to 100 years. What are we doing to prevent this slaughter? Some rivers are now jammed with the bodies of the people killed. We must go beyond words.

I ask the government whether the presence of an intervention force would prompt the rebels and the Rwandan army to negotiate a ceasefire that would end these barbarous events which require our intervention.

[English]

Hon. David Michael Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition should understand that the commander of the UN forces in Rwanda is a Canadian and he is continuing to work under very difficult circumstances.

• (1420)

We have detailed an additional 10 personnel to take the place of the Belgians, who had to leave the country, for logistic and other support to keep the airport open. We have been putting in humanitarian aid on a daily basis. It has been Canada with its Hercules flights that has ferried out nearly 1,500 people and ferried in thousands of pounds of relief supplies.

This morning one of our planes was hit by three shots but no damage was done. The plane is being repaired in Nairobi. It had a BBC reporter on board.

I want to underline the fact that this is a very dangerous theatre of conflict. Whatever we decide to do in terms of incremental action has to be thought through very considerably.

TAXATION SYSTEM

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the ruling by the Federal Court of Appeal on the taxation of child-support payments has reopened the debate on the inequities of the taxation system for families. The ruling said that the Income Tax Act was discriminatory, because it treated differently divorced parents and other individuals in similar circumstances.

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Does she agree that we should review all the fiscal measures dealing with child support and custody?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, clearly we recognize the inequities of the present taxation system. This is why, in a large part at the request of the women's caucus of the Liberal Party, the Minister of Finance started a discussion of this in his budget.

It is equally obvious that this court ruling will have a very direct impact on the income of many families. We are studying the direct implications, and the Minister of Justice as well as the Minister of Finance indicated yesterday that we can expect a decision on this in the very near future.

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary to the Deputy Prime Minister. Does she not agree that this ruling and its consequences show the need to proceed without further delay to an in-depth reform of the whole taxation system, a system which should be based on equity, fairness and the absence of loopholes?

[English]

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I repeat that the Minister of Finance recognized and understood the inequities in the tax system when in the budget he launched a process to review this very provision. In fact, he was encouraged to do so not only by the private member's bill launched by the member for Nepean, but also by the strong presentations he received from the membership of the women's caucus of the Liberal Party.

I can assure the hon. member that the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Justice and all members of the government are going to be working very hard to make sure that present inequities in the tax system are eliminated.

ABORIGINAL SELF-GOVERNMENT

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

I am sure that the minister will agree that the establishment of any genuine democratic government must rest on the consent of the governed. The minister has told the House that he is proceeding with the establishment of aboriginal self-government in Manitoba and that he has obtained the consent of the chiefs.

Would the minister tell the House clearly and explicitly whether he also intends to seek the consent of the aboriginal people of Manitoba for this new form of government?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure if my friend is suggesting another referendum but I think he is.

Probably in the long run this is going to depend a lot on how the aboriginal people govern themselves. The way they govern themselves now is to always go back to the people. They go back to the people much more than we do. They have more self-government now. I see some of the hon. members nodding. Anybody who has done aboriginal work realizes that they are consulting all the time.

A short answer to the question is that there probably will be referendums at the band level if they go along on the same basis they are now.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his reply. He knows that sometimes leaders will agree to constitutional arrangements which the people will not approve if they get a chance to vote, as in the case of the Charlottetown accord.

• (1425)

Will the minister tell the House what would be wrong with seeking the democratic consent of all the aboriginal people of Manitoba to this new form of government through a formal referendum mechanism?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the leader of the Reform Party, the way it looks like it is playing out now is that the leadership after consultation with the membership has decided on dismantling, to take it subject matter by subject matter starting with capital, forestry and so on.

At some point they will take back what they think is an appropriate self-government arrangement to their people. I am hopeful that if the leadership is wise and does the job wisely, as perhaps we have not done on our side in the past, that the people will ratify the agreements.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister is saying that there may be a referendum on this issue in Manitoba. We would like more clarification.

The chances of securing the consent of the aboriginal people of Manitoba to self-government would be enhanced if it were made crystal clear that any such government would be legally required to respect the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Can the minister give the House an iron clad guarantee that any aboriginal self-government arrangement established in Manitoba will give aboriginal people full protection of their personal rights and freedoms under the charter?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, that is a good question. The rights and freedoms under the charter as they are now expressed apply to provincial and federal governments. I think we have to be cognizant that when we make these transfers that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, about which I feel very strongly, should be transposed into the negotiations.

The Leader of the Opposition will be happy—not the opposition leader but the leader of the Reform Party, hopefully the opposition—

Some hon. members: Soon, soon.

Mr. Irwin: Perhaps some day the government. The leader of the Reform Party makes a valid point. The next legislation that will be before the House dealing with aboriginal people he will see clearly that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms will apply. That will be some time this month.

SOCIAL PROGRAM REFORM

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday, in his press conference, the Prime Minister, far from being more sympathetic to the provinces' reluctance regarding the social program reform, said that he would go ahead with it.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister confirm that her government intends to proceed with the social program reform one way or another, as the Prime Minister said, and even without the provinces' support?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, what the Prime Minister said yesterday is exactly what he has been saying since the beginning of our mandate. We are negotiating in good faith to find a solution. Obviously, if we cannot come to a solution, we will proceed only in those fields which are under federal jurisdiction. This is exactly the position adopted by the Opposition leader when he disagreed with his government during certain negotiations, in 1989.

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, how can the Deputy Prime Minister reconcile her comments with the fact that, except for unemployment insurance, all the other areas which would be included in the reform are under provincial jurisdiction?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said and keeps saying that he wants to find good solutions. What is most important to him, and what should be most important to all politicians, is to have jobs for workers. Unemployed people in Montreal, Shawinigan or Dolbeau are very interested in government projects but less interested in federal-provincial bickering. We are trying to use a fair and equitable approach and we are negotiating in good faith.

SELF-GOVERNMENT

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of aboriginal affairs. We seek the assistance of the minister in responding to written communications sent to us by our original peoples other than chiefs.

Will the minister tell us how he has responded to the fears and concerns expressed in these written letters about native self-government because his answers to these letters will help us in answering ours.

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, that is not a question.

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I am very surprised.

Does the minister tell me that he has had no letters from these native people? I would ask him how he will respond to this. The members on the opposite side support self-government. We want the minister to realize that we as Reformers support the same self-government for native people. We have had genuine fears of concern addressed to us about this.

Would the minister explain why he refuses to open up the process to all Canadians to alleviate the concerns of those people not directly involved in the negotiations?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, in the words of Allan MacEachen, that's better, it's a question.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Yesterday, the Prime Minister took stock of his government's first six months. The unemployment rate remains unacceptable, the economy is stagnant and no real government expenditure control or economic recovery measures have been implemented.

Can the Deputy Prime Minister confirm that the turnabout announced yesterday by the Prime Minister on the subject of his participation in the Quebec election can be explained by the fact he has nothing to show Quebecers except for the climate of confrontation his government has created on various issues?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the only confrontation climate created in this House is the one the member from the other side is generating by not striving to find real economic solutions; he just keeps ranting because he does not want Canada to succeed.

The Speaker: Order! I would appreciate it if members would refrain from using certain words they have been uttering during questions and answers and also if questions were not so loaded.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, how can the Deputy Prime Minister speak of government achievements when, since January 19 this year, the government has presented almost nothing to us and no important and significant bill on economic recovery and job creation has been tabled to date?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know, a budget is an important document for job creation in this country. It just so happens we did present a budget. We have already approved millions and millions in Canadian investments for projects in Quebec which will give jobs to real workers and not to those who refuse to work and just keep bitching.

The Speaker: Order. The members should please consider their words before using them. As I said, some terms are slightly loaded. I will ponder upon terms like bitching and will come back to you on this.

CONTRACTING

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. I certainly expect an answer, not like that last outrage that my colleague got.

A recently released Treasury Board report indicated that the federal government spent $5.2 billion last year contracting out services. Talk about a place to cut in this budget. That report did not indicate who received the contracts, on what basis the contracts were issued, and how values for these contracts were established.

To clarify this situation I would like to ask the President of the Treasury Board to immediately table all information that his department has currently. Also, will he indicate from 1990 on what those contracts were?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure): Mr. Speaker, the information that the member refers to is part of the review of efficiency of programs that we are undertaking with the public sector employee representatives, the unions, in an effort to find savings in government spending so, as we said in the budget, we can help to shorten the period of the wage freeze. Information was provided to that extent.

We are still undergoing our review of contracting and contracting out. I might add that that $5 billion does not just include the kind of contracting out that the unions are concerned about but includes all contracting; everything from doctors for aboriginal communities in the north, for example, to the repairing of planes and ships for the Department of National Defence.

Certainly whatever information we can provide for the member and for other hon. members of the House we are quite willing to provide as part of the review of contracting out which will be dealt with not only by the Treasury Board but also by the government operations standing committee.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West): I thank the hon. minister for a decent answer, Mr. Speaker.

More than 36,000 of these contracts were issued in 1992–93 alone. Some suspect that the contracts were given to friends of government rather than being issued on the basis of merit. This report also indicates that contracts were granted without public scrutiny and almost half were issued without a tender process.

Will the President of the Treasury Board agree that all future government contracts must be subject to public tender process?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure): Mr. Speaker, the period of time we are referring to in the statistics is of the last government, not this current government.

This Liberal government is dedicated to cost efficiency, to spending the taxpayers' money wisely, doing so in a fair and open fashion, a transparent fashion, so that people can see how their money is being spent. We intend to bring about reforms and changes from what the last government did in terms of contracting.

CANADIAN MUSEUM OF NATURE

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage.

There has been more troubling revelations regarding the Canadian Museum of Nature. This morning, at a press conference, representatives of the science community asked that the questionable lay-off of several scientists be investigated in view of the fact that it has far-reaching consequences. It gives a bad name to the museum and jeopardizes its research activities as a whole.

Given these new facts, is the Minister of Canadian Heritage willing to reconsider and, without delay, ask for a public inquiry with a view to hearing the testimony of all the people involved in this matter?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage): Mr. Speaker, I have already had the opportunity to speak several times on the problems that have been brought to light regarding this museum.

The person I rely on in this matter is the Auditor General of Canada who has the trust not only of the government but also of this House. He said he would perform a special in-depth audit of the museum's operations and finances. I understand that the museum board of directors has requested that this audit be conducted without delay. Once we have all the facts and the Auditor General's conclusion, we will be able to pass judgement.

• (1440)

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, does the minister realize that this museum has a unique responsibility in Canada to perform basic, theoretical and applied research, and that any delay, given the time it will take the Auditor General to conduct an audit and elected representatives to hold a public inquiry, seriously jeopardizes the mission of the museum and its reputation in the scientific community?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's remarks, which are more a comment than a question, start from the premise that the museum is guilty as charged, even before we have the facts and know what is really going on. I am aware of the criticisms that have been levelled and I take them seriously. Soon we will know the facts.

SEA KING HELICOPTERS

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

The future of the Canadian military Sea King fleet is once again before the public with the recent crash of a Sea King at the cost of two lives with two other airmen seriously injured.

Although meticulously maintained many of these aircraft are older than the pilots that fly them and there is a need for the government to make a decision soon to replace this fleet.

I ask the Minister of National Defence if he can assure this House of the airworthiness of the remaining Sea King fleet and indeed will he give a commitment that this government does intend to replace these aircraft?

Hon. David Michael Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to acknowledge that we extend our sympathy to the families of the two airmen killed and the other two that were seriously injured in this particular crash.

I know it is of great concern to the hon. member because these helicopters are based at CFB Shearwater in the hon. member's constituency. These helicopters are well maintained, otherwise we would not fly them.

This party in the election campaigned against the EH-101 helicopter because we felt it was too expensive a solution for the helicopter needs of the government. We never denied that there would have to be some replacement at some point in time for the Sea Kings. The Sea Kings are airworthy until the year 2000.

I want to assure the hon. member and other colleagues in the House that we intend to fly them. They will do the search and rescue work and other naval reconnaissance and anti-submarine patrols. They will keep flying until the year 2000 because they will be well maintained.

I believe once the defence review is over later this year, we will have some answers as to the kind of equipment that we will need to discharge our future obligations.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Ridiculous statements from senior cabinet ministers continue to plague the government, not only today but yesterday when the Minister of Human Resources Development said that if people with jobs would not work overtime there would be more jobs for unemployed Canadians.

Can the Deputy Prime Minister tell Canadians if legislation to limit the work week is currently under consideration by this government?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, in the month of February the Minister for Human Resources Development launched an analysis of the whole issue of how we work.

In fact not only limitations on overtime, but job sharing, flexible work hours and different ways of working are challenges that we have to face to meet the needs of the real workforce.

I happen to know in my own constituency at the steel company there are many people who would like to be called back to work, but unfortunately overtime sometimes prevents that. That is one of the things that the minister's panel is looking at but there is certainly no legislation proposed at this time.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, the minister's statement of yesterday implies that hard working people are the cause of unemployment.

Using the minister's logic, if the Deputy Prime Minister herself worked overtime she would be contributing to unemployment.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister not agree that her minister's logic and her own logic are flawed and do not address the real problem in this country, that high taxes are forcing people to work longer hours and high deficits and debt are causing unemployment?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think what the Minister of Human Resources Development is recognizing is what many Canadians are recognizing and that is the workforce is changing drastically.

• (1445)

In the old days we could expect to work specific hours of the week but that does not always work in every particular occupation. What he is suggesting is something we should all be looking at. Is there a possibility for us to be examining flex time? Is it possible for us to look at job sharing so that for example women who may have home responsibilities could comfortably combine those with paid work outside the home?

These are all creative ideas that the minister is examining. I wish the member would open his heart and examine some of those positive solutions with us.

CANADIAN MUSEUM OF NATURE

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage. Despite the fact that we tried everything possible and imaginable to bring the minister to shed some light on the management of the Canadian Museum of Nature, he still refuses to hold a public inquiry. Yet, some troubling points remain and since the minister wants to know the facts, does he not think that the internal inquiry report should be made public and will he put pressure on the museum's board to make it release the conclusions of the report?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage): Mr. Speaker, this is an internal report commissioned by the management of the museum which has an arms-length relationship with the government. This does not mean that I do not care about what goes on there, and I will see how we could provide more information to our colleagues opposite.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, should I remind this House that the present director of financial services, who started at the beginning of 1994, was previously employed by the company hired by the board to prepare a report on the museum. Does the minister not think that this is a rather strange coincidence? Why does he not suspend immediately and without pay the director of the Canadian Museum of Nature until we know the conclusions of the inquiry presently conducted by the Auditor General's Office?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage): Mr. Speaker, the doubts raised by the hon. member regarding the management of this museum and its inquiry are precisely the reason why I will be relying on the job being done by the Auditor General's Office.

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

In 1972 Valmond Lebouthillier received a life sentence for second degree murder. During 19 years of incarceration he had a history of violence and unco-operative behaviour but he was still given full parole in September 1991. In June 1992 he exposed himself to women, but a suspension warrant was cancelled. Two months later he stabbed and sexually assaulted a woman.

Despite a number of internal inquiries critical of the board's decision, one of the board members involved in this decision was given a job at the parole board's Ottawa headquarters evaluating the work of other board members.

Will the minister acknowledge to this House that problems with the National Parole Board go beyond just one or two isolated incidents and that the entire parole system must be re-examined?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has indicated a number of concerns that arose before this government took office.

We are committed to working to improve and strengthen the parole and correction system. I have already said that I, on behalf of the government, intend to bring down legislation before too long to achieve this purpose. I look forward to the support and encouragement of the hon. member to achieve these objectives.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley): Mr. Speaker, I am encouraged by the words, but this government has frequently congratulated itself for having the courage to cancel multi-billion dollar helicopter deals and Pearson airport deals to save taxpayers money.

Why does the Prime Minister find it so difficult to cancel some $100,000 governor in council appointments that may save taxpayers' lives?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, this Parliament has created the National Parole Board as an independent semi-judicial body, akin to a court.

• (1450)

I think it is a very serious matter and has to be proceeded with due care and attention if one is considering revoking an appointment. I do not think the hon. member would want to create a set up where there is political interference or the possibility of accusations of political interference in the decisions of the parole board.

As a result, I take the hon. member's point very seriously. We are looking into the concerns underlying her question. Certainly we will not shrink back from taking action that is justified by a serious consideration of all the facts.

TRADE

Mr. David Iftody (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of agriculture.

The Americans are falsely accusing Canadian wheat farmers of dumping their product into U.S. markets and the U.S. has mounted trade sanction attacks against us.

Can the minister advise this House where Canada stands? Will the minister defend the legitimate rights of our Canadian grain producers?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food): Mr. Speaker, the short answer to the hon. member's question is an unequivocal yes.

As I have said on many occasions, we will not roll over and play dead. Canada will defend this country's vital interests, including those of Canadian grain producers. I have made that point on a number of occasions, as has the Prime Minister, the Deputy Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, the Minister for International Trade, and the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

We want a negotiated settlement with the United States. We are prepared to negotiate fairly and in good faith for as long as it takes to get such an agreement. In the meantime we have made it absolutely clear that unilateral trade action by the United States against Canada will be met with vigorous and determined response by Canada.

CUSTOMS TARIFFS

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères): Mr. Speaker, after the question asked by my hon. colleague, this one will probably be a little tougher.

In announcing its intention to raise its tariffs on Canadian durum wheat and barley, the United States apparently wants to import less Canadian grain and, in turn, to challenge under the NAFTA provisions the maintenance of the GATT-defined tariffs that Canada intends to impose on products subject to quotas such as poultry, eggs and milk, where Quebec accounts for over 40 per cent of Canadian production.

My question is for the Minister for International Trade. Can the minister state in this House that the government does not intend to cave in to American pressure on tariffs and that it will not strike any kind of bargain with the various agricultural sectors in order to facilitate negotiations with the U.S. on exports of durum wheat and barley?

[English]

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we are not linking products in our discussions with the United States. We are not linking questions pertaining to the tariffication of dairy and poultry quotas with those of grain. We are not linking the rights of Canadian grain farmers to other issues. We are dealing with both issues quite separately.

[Translation]

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères): Mr. Speaker, can the minister tell this House which provisions will prevail in trade disputes between Canada and the U.S., that is whether or not GATT will take precedence over NAFTA, and could he table in this House the legal opinions on which his answers are based?

[English]

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that Canada's position has been clearly conveyed to the United States on numerous occasions. That is that our belief, our conviction and our best legal advice without question is that the GATT rules take precedence over the NAFTA.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Charlie Penson (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question today is for the Minister of National Defence.

On two previous occasions, January 26 and February 15, I have asked the minister about the excessively high rates his department pays for the household moves of military personnel. I have never received a satisfactory answer.

I am well aware that the minister has managed to get a 10 per cent reduction in the last tender due to adverse publicity, but this has only scratched the surface of waste and mismanagement.

I ask the minister again today, what is he doing to bring more open and fair competition to defence department household moves?

• (1455)

Hon. David Michael Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think it depends on one's perspective. There are a number of moving companies in Canada, a couple of hundred I think, that are involved in the whole movement of household effects for national defence. We have to move a lot of employees around the country.

We are assured at the moment that we are getting the best deal and we are always trying to seek improvements. I know there are some members in the House, and the hon. member is one of them, who believes that we are not getting the best deal, but I have yet to see the proof. If he has the proof, I will certainly study it.

Mr. Charlie Penson (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, that seems to be a little bit more smoke and mirrors. The Prime Minister has stood in this House and repeatedly asked for ways to save money. It has been suggested that in this department there could be a $25 million saving.

The Ottawa Citizen and the member for Waterloo have both called for an inquiry into the wasteful way in which household moves are conducted. Will the minister come clean with taxpayers and order such an inquiry?

Hon. David Michael Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are not going to order an inquiry. We are looking into every aspect of spending in the department, as my colleagues are in their departments. If we think we can get a better deal for the taxpayers, we are not wedded to one particular solution.

COLLÈGE MILITAIRE ROYAL DE SAINT-JEAN

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for federal-provincial relations.

Next week, the Quebec Minister of Education will meet with the minister responsible for federal-provincial relations in an effort to convince Ottawa to preserve the military vocation of the Collège militaire royal de Saint-Jean.

Can the minister tell us how the federal government intends to respond to the Quebec government's request to preserve the military vocation of the college in Saint-Jean, an essential condition for maintaining university level courses at this campus?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal): Mr. Speaker, I have already had the opportunity this week to discuss the future of the Collège militaire royal de Saint-Jean with Minister Chagnon. Obviously we are going to proceed with the measures announced in the budget and reduce the number of military colleges to one. However, negotiations are continuing and I think they could prove to be productive and satisfactory to both parties.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the justice minister.

Today, if Scott Farion from Edmonton were alive, he would be celebrating his 18th birthday. Instead, his life was cut short when he became Edmonton's first murder victim of 1994. So today his parents are grieving their loss rather than enjoying his birthday.

The tragedy of this case is that Scott's murder could have been prevented. Scott's alleged killer is a 16-year old repeat offender who was out on probation for another crime at the time of the murder.

What can the minister tell Scott's parents today to assure them that this government plans to get tough with young offenders?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I believe that case may still be before the courts. Therefore I do not want to comment on the facts of the case apart from expressing my sorrow at the description of the tragedy that has been given by the hon. member.

The hon. member knows, and I have told the House, that I will be bringing forward legislation in June to change the Young Offenders Act to reflect longer maximum sentences for serious violent crimes among other things. I have made that clear.

Let me go on to say that in the face of such tragedies, it is important in my respectful view to bear in mind that the simple change of a statute or enacting another law is not going to change much unless at the same time we come to grips with the conditions that lead to this kind of offence.

This government is committed not only to the kind of effective legislation we need, and the member will see it soon, but also to an attack on the underlying causes of crime. That is what we intend to do.

GOVERNMENT INFRASTRUCTURE

Mrs. Brenda Chamberlain (Guelph—Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works and Government Services.

It is widely accepted that a sound electronic infrastructure will greatly improve the efficiency of government. How is public works and government services taking advantage of tomorrow's technology to increase efficiency, improve services and reduce costs for the Canadian taxpayer today?

• (1500)

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services): Mr. Speaker, this department, government services and public works, now provides 70 per cent of the telecommunications services for the government.

It is profiting from the new electronic infrastructure programs that are available. Let me give examples very quickly. We have a program, the Electronic Mail Network, which connects 120,000 public servants across the country. It saves Canadians $55 million per year. We have introduced an automated public service compensation system that saves Canadian taxpayers $44 million a year.

INFORMATION HIGHWAY

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry.

There is a growing concern that the information highway will be controlled by a few monopoly companies. I would like to ask the minister has the government defined what is in the public interest as it concerns the information highway? How should that public interest be implemented, protected and enforced?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, the question is a very good one.

I am sure the member is aware that the advisory council on the information highway has its first meeting today. In the booklet we produced on Canada's information highway with the announcement of the advisory council, we set out our objectives, including competition, jobs, accessibility and affordability for all Canadians.

Those fundamental principles and objectives are the ones that we are seeking to define. The means by which we achieve them over the course of the deliberations of the council during the next few weeks and months will define our view of the policies that should be pursued. We will be seeking the input of members of the House as well as the broader Canadian community about the impact of the regulatory environment in which we are going to operate.

It is a very important file, one on which the government will act with great care and with great interest in what the hon. member has to say to us about it.

The Speaker: Order! The hon. member for Laurentides has the floor on a point of order and I believe, also has the unanimous consent of the House.

POINT OF ORDER

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW MOTION M-280

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, I believe you will find that there is unanimous consent to move the following motion:

> That motion M-280, in the name of Mrs. Guay (Laurentides) in the Order of Precedence of Private Members' Business, be withdrawn and replaced by Motion M-294 in the name of Mrs. Guay (Laurentides), which is listed in today's Notice Paper.

The Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(Motion withdrawn.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, could the Government House Leader please tell us what is on the agenda for the next few days?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to make my statement, which is quite straightforward. I think the Deputy Prime Minister will agree with me on this.

Ms. Copps: Yes. Absolutely.

[English]

Mr. Gray: Anyway, tomorrow the House will resume consideration of Bill C-22 respecting Pearson airport. If this is completed at second reading, we will turn to Bill C-25 to amend the Canada Petroleum Resources Act. If there is time, we will have Bill C-26 regarding the National Library.

Monday the House will resume business where it left off on Friday. When this is completed, we will proceed to Bill C-27, the income tax technical bill. On Tuesday, the House will consider the motion in the name of the Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food in order to debate matters of importance to Canadian farmers.

I understand that discussions are going on aimed at having the House sit into the evening to accommodate all those who wish to participate in this important debate.

In any event, the House will resume business from where it left off on Monday and Thursday will be an allotted day.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY—CONVERSION OF DEFENCE INDUSTRIES

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

Mrs. Georgette Sheridan (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, one key objective of the government in introducing these programs is to maintain knowledge in intensive industries and the high technology employment which is part of it. This, of course, is also an objective of our efforts to assist in the conversion of the Quebec defence industry.

While many of the approaches which I have just outlined would be applicable to the Quebec defence industry, I believe it would be a mistake to try to impose, for example, a U.S. style solution to the Quebec situation.

[Translation]

A number of quite marked differences exist in terms of defence industry conversion between Quebec and the United States and even other parts of the world, like Europe.

Basically, the Quebec defence industry conversion is unique and different from any other. A fair number of defence industries in Quebec would be more appropriately referred to as aerospace and defence industries. I say this because, unlike many of its international competitors, the Quebec defence industry has already diversified its production considerably. It is producing a wide range of commercial and defence products.

[English]

Quebec's industry is unique in another important respect, one in which we should all take pride. Quebec's aerospace and defence sector sells a large proportion of its products and services in world markets. To do this successfully it must, and in fact do, produce world class products at competitive prices.

Like the rest of the Canadian aerospace and defence industry, Quebec firms focus on high technology market niches. They export subsystems and components sold primarily to aerospace and defence prime contractors in countries around the world.

This is a remarkable achievement. A country as small as Canada ranks sixth in the world in total aerospace and defence sales, with between 70 and 80 per cent of all production exported to other countries.

We should be proud of these companies and of the workers in these dynamic industries who make this significant contribution to the economies of Quebec and Canada.

As my comments indicate, Quebec's aerospace and defence industries are in many ways different from their counterparts in other areas of the world. I realize that many aerospace and defence firms face uncertain prospects in the years that lie ahead. But I am also confident that based on their past track record Quebec's aerospace and defence industries can and will rise to this challenge.

[Translation]

I hope I have demonstrated today the importance of recognizing how unique the Quebec aerospace and defence industries are. By building on their relative strength in relation with the majority of industries in the rest of the world, Quebec industries are well on the way to diversifying their production and converting their technologies.

As mentioned recently in the budget, the federal government intends to change the Defence Industry Productivity Program (DIPP) in support of changes in the Quebec aerospace and defence industry. I have good hope that all the support provided by both the federal and the provincial governments to the Quebec aerospace and defence industry will foster conditions favourable to the pursuit of changes.

As I said earlier, given the unique circumstances of Quebec, it may not be appropriate to consider applying in that case solutions used in the United States or in Europe. We all recognize that product diversification in the defence industry presents multiple difficulties. As indicated earlier today, this is no small task and there is no quick fix.

But this does not mean that problems cannot be resolved. They can and will continue to be resolved. Major efforts are already being made by the private sector, efforts which are proving successful in the Quebec aerospace and defence industry.

• (1510)

[English]

The government will continue to be a full partner in these efforts to ensure that this industry continues to deal successfully with the challenges and the opportunities which will come to Quebec in the future.

Ms. Jean Augustine (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, we have had much discussion on the commitment of the government to defence conversion. Indeed we have indicated in both the Liberal plan for Canada "Creating Opportunity" and the budget the important role that the defence industry productivity program will play in this commitment.

I would like to mention some of the principal aspects of the role which the defence industry productivity program, or DIPP, can play in defence conversion. We believe that the effective use of this tool can contribute to the continuing reduction of the industry's dependence on defence sales.

DIPP, created in 1959 under the auspices of the Canada–U.S.A. defence production sharing agreement, supports the federal policy of participating in international co–operative production sharing agreements. It also plays a major role in supporting Canadian high technology defence related industries like aerospace.

Today Canada's defence industries are characterized by the international scope, high risk and intense competition both in Canada and abroad from subsidized foreign firms.

Under the current program DIPP makes repayable investments to qualified firms for research and development, source establishment, buying against production machinery and for conducting market feasibility studies. The program is market driven and industry led.

The government considered these as essential and desirable features which will continue in any new conversion program. These features can ensure that Canada remains internationally competitive.

The defence industry productivity program has been instrumental in the success in building high technology industries and generating substantive exports and creating jobs across Canada. Since its inception 35 years ago the program has brought extraordinary benefits to Canada. I would like to mention a few.

Seventeen hundred projects have been completed. The Government of Canada has contributed $3.4 billion to those projects. The program has leveraged $280 million from other governments, primarily the U.S.A.

Canadian industry itself has invested $6.8 billion. These projects have generated sales for Canada of between $25 to $40 per DIPP dollar invested primarily to the export markets.

In total around 60,000 person years of employment, most of it high tech, have been maintained in Canada's aerospace and defence industry sectors.

The program has been reviewed by the industry and considers it extremely successful as well as essential for their future growth and development.

The introduction of a viable defence conversion diversification component under DIPP must take into account the global context within which the program is situated: the substantial reductions of defence expenditures by major industrialized countries; the worldwide restructuring of the aerospace and defence sectors; Canada's obligations toward the GATT and other agreements; Canada's fiscal constraints in industrial infrastructure.

The challenge therefore is to introduce a defence conversion and diversification component that will best help firms wishing to diversify while at the same time ensuring that the projects being supported will have a reasonable chance of success.

Although the program was not specifically designed for defence conversion, it has nevertheless reinforced the conversion of Canada's defence industry through its flexibility and responsiveness to market conditions.

For example, sales of the aerospace and defence sector are now 70 per cent commercial versus 30 per cent military. This is the reverse of the mix that we had in the 1960s. However, in view of the new global realities, we must intensify and focus our conversion efforts so that we can attain the new objectives.

Consultations so far have raised a number of important issues that we will have to resolve before we finalize the new component. We will have to recognize that some firms in successful niche markets may not wish to convert and that some may be inconvertible. We may have to modify standard existing DIPP performance criteria to accommodate defence conversions. Repayment options are also to be considered.

From the analysis to date the government is considering the following five activities as candidates eligible for support: defence conversion market feasibility studies, research and development assistance for new technologies, limited capital assistance for tooling and retooling on an exceptions basis, a training component through Human Resources Canada, and change of corporate culture perhaps for such activities as total quality management.

At the moment low on the list of potentially eligible activities are such items as software development, joint ventures, acquisitions, strategic partnerships, and shutdown of a production line or facility.

Although the new components of contribution programs such as DIPP will continue to assist companies in identifying new opportunities and in developing dual use technologies and commercial products to meet new opportunities, we will have to be careful. As members on all sides of the House are very much aware, Canadians want governments to spend carefully and look for high value for money spent to ensure maximum benefits at least cost. They also want us to put our best efforts into long term job creation.

The defence industry productivity program has indeed been one of the most productive programs which the government provided to benefit companies, employees and communities across the country.

As we heard earlier in the debate, since DIPP came on stream 35 years ago the success stories have been many, varied and extraordinary. The program can be a most effective tool for reducing the dependence of our industries on defence sales and for expediting the conversion of companies from defence production into commercial success in the new global marketplace. We can look forward to the defence industry productivity program serving as a catalyst to help ensure our economic future.

In Etobicoke—Lakeshore we look forward to those programs in our midst. As Canadians we will share in the challenge, fulfilment and prosperity which await those who respond to the needs of our training partners around the world in the 21st century.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint-Jean): Madam Speaker, I listened carefully to the hon. member's speech. Now, in this debate on conversion, I could not help making a little aside on Oerlikon, of course, which is a major company in my riding, and I will have a question for the hon. member.

Oerlikon is a pathetic situation. I admit, I also have a confession to make. At the time, I was in the peace movement and when Oerlikon came to Saint-Jean, even if it provided 700 jobs, what we foresaw as a long-term scenario is happening.

• (1520)

When a company stops making military equipment, very often it just closes down and moves elsewhere. Even if attempts at diversification have been made, and I will come back to that, the apocalyptic scenario which we feared is taking place in Saint-Jean. Perhaps parts will continue to be made for another year, to be stored in warehouses for future supply needs, but once that is over, I think that Oerlikon is likely to close.

At one time, it maintained a certain level of employment. In the riding, 735 jobs depended on Oerlikon, and now it is down to 325. When the contract ends, none will be left.

I remind you that Oerlikon produces low-altitude air defence systems, that is guns which can hit planes invading a territory. With the changed international situation, of course, these contracts are worthless. Although Oerlikon has made a big effort to sell a lot elsewhere in the world, I think that this equipment is no longer needed today. Only $90 million is left for the final year of operation of a $1-billion contract. Then nothing will be left.

I want to point out that unfortunately the federal government did not do its share when Oerlikon wanted to diversify. I thought that there was an attractive opening at the time. They wanted to diversify 25 per cent of their production to laser treatment for environmental protection. That was an interesting approach to diversification. Unfortunately, the federal government did not support it.

I agree with my hon. colleague on DIPP, but would the solution not be an industrial conversion fund instead? Would the hon. member promise to defend within her party the idea of a military industrial conversion fund? That industry has tremendous brain power and human resources and also money invested in infrastructure, so there is surely a way to capitalize on this immense human potential and on that infrastructure.

Can she at least tell us if she can make her caucus realize that the way to diversify is really to have a military industrial conversion fund?

[English]

Ms. Augustine: Madam Speaker, I say to the member that maybe he has given us a bit of history and maybe that history predates the present government.

The company is currently pursuing export markets. There is support from the present minister to ensure that Oerlikon can diversify and look at all the options before it.

The government is providing full support for all marketing efforts. It will review all the proposals. It is working with everyone in terms of coming forward with as many proposals as possible to work toward diversification.

[Translation]

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis): Madam Speaker, as the member for Lévis, I am pleased to participate in this special debate, which results from an Official Opposition motion, on the conversion of defence industries to civilian production.

In my riding, there is an extremely important company which is in jeopardy because of the existing situation. I am referring to the MIL Davie shipyard. In fact, until just a few years ago, this company was the largest shipyard in Canada.

The conversion of defence industries is undoubtedly an important issue for Quebec. As you know, military equipment industries have been experiencing difficulties since the end of the Cold War. It is estimated that, since 1987, the demand on the international market has dropped by close to ten per cent. According to international experts, this drop may very soon reach 25 per cent. In Quebec, since that same year, 11,000 of the 57,000 jobs in that sector have already disappeared.

If there is a company which illustrates the urgent need to convert military industries, it is the MIL Davie shipyard. One year ago, the company developed a business plan to switch from military to civilian production. This plan is not only designed to give back to MIL Davie its status of best shipyard in Canada, but also to make it a leader at the international level. The plan includes two transitional contracts. One concerns the construction of a ferry for the Magdalen Islands, for which there is a demonstrated need, while the other provides for the construction of a multi-purpose strategic ship for peacekeeping missions and environmental interventions, called "smart ship".

Unfortunately, the shipyard and the thousands of related jobs are in jeopardy because of this government's apathy. MIL Davie urgently needs to convert to civilian production, since this shipyard is among those Quebec industries which rely the most on military contracts.

Let me give you some interesting data compiled by the Groupe de recherche de l'industrie militaire et de reconversion, which is affiliated to the Université du Québec à Montréal. Until now, 91 per cent of MIL Davie's production has been related to military equipment contracts. MIL Davie is also in fourth place among the 16 companies identified by the UQAM group, after Oerlikon, which has so far been dependent on the military market for 100 per cent of its production, as well as Paramax and SNC Technologies, which depend on that market for 95 per cent of their production. Yet, the Liberal government only offers lame excuses to justify the delaying of its decision on the transitional contracts for the Magdalen Islands ferry and the "smart ship".

The latest of these excuses is the one provided by the Minister of Transport who, in early March, demanded a copy of MIL Davie's business plan before making a decision concerning the two contracts. But, as I said earlier, this business plan has been available for a year already.

Obviously, before making such a decision, the government must ensure that there is a real need for these ships. However, that need has been demonstrated in both cases.

Let us first look at the Magdalen Islands ferry. The useful life of the ferry which has been in use for over 28 years, the Lucy Maud Montgomery, will end in less than two years. After that, the ship will not be safe enough to get its certificate of seaworthiness, which is required by the federal government.

The Magdalen Islanders also consider that the Lucy Maud Montgomery is bad for business in their area, because the ship no longer meets the needs of the people. For example, the tweendeck is not high enough to accommodate some types of trailers and trucks.

On February 11, the mayors of the Magdalen Islands communities toured MIL Davie main dockyard, the only world-class dockyard in Quebec for now. All of them unanimously recognized the need to replace the Lucy Maud Montgomery. On February 22, these same mayors and representatives of the Coopérative de transport maritime et aérien, the company operating the ferry service, reached a consensus and all agreed that a new ferry was needed.

I am going over all of this because there seems to be some confusion created by the hon. member for Bonaventure, among others, about the possibility of replacing the ferry by a used ship. In January, and more specifically on January 18, the day after the opening of this session, the minister of Transport stated, in answer to questions put by our colleague, the hon. member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans and myself, that, where the Magdalen Islands ferry was concerned, an announcement would be made soon. Following pressures made by stakeholders, we were told that when the minister said soon, he really meant a couple of months. That was on January 18.

The only other time I heard the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine comment on this very important issue for his constituents was in an article run by the local newspaper, Le Radar. The hon. member had nothing else to say but complain that the whole issue of the ferry service was his responsibility, not the responsibility of the Bloc Quebecois.

To tell the truth, he must have been outraged by one of the headlines in a previous issue of Le Radar, where it was said that never before had the Magdalen Islands been talked about so much since the arrival of the Bloc Quebecois in Ottawa. If I had been the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine I would have felt piqued as well.

Nevertheless, March and April have come and gone. We are still waiting for an answer while the workers are being laid off by the hundreds and while Magdalen Islanders are wondering what their member and their government are doing.

If a decision is made shortly, the new ferry could be delivered in time, that is when the Lucy Maud Montgomery has to be replaced. I will take 9 to 10 months to prepare the final drawings. Then, construction will take 12 months and sea trials another month. The Liberal government has dragged its feet long enough, it must act now.

Let us now talk about the smart ship, a multi-purpose supply and general transport ship. The Canadian Armed Forces and the Department of Environment need that type of ship, the former for peacekeeping or humanitarian aid operations, the latter to intervene in case of a major spill. This project is by far the most important for the future of MIL Davie, because it would allow the development of a new organizational culture and new modes of production.

The concept was developed by the MIL Davie shipyards of Lévis. Plans, modelling and prototype development are done under the direction of an associated company, MIL Engineering System.

The construction of this type of ship would fit into the review of the Canadian defence policy, a review made necessary by the end of the cold war and the increase in the number of peacekeeping or humanitarian operations because of local conflicts.

The new international environment, a result of the end of the cold war, might very well increase the risk of such conflicts and Canadian Armed Forces have developed a sought after know-how in the area of peacekeeping. As matter of fact, the Canada 21 Council gave another boost to the smart ship project on March 16. This private council has been commissioned to review the Canadian defence policy in the new context of international relations. Its membership includes former politicians of various affiliations, some fairly well known like Donald MacDonald and Gérard Pelletier, both former Liberal ministers; former military officers like Admiral Robert H. Falls; and business people and economists of renown.

The Canada 21 Council recommends that the Canadian government cancel the planned purchase of three submarines and acquire instead three multi-purpose supply ships, or smart ships, to provide operational support to peacekeeping missions. These three ships proposed by the council would replace the AOR combat support ships, such as the Protecteur, which are nearing the end of their operational lives, and which are not multi-purpose and cannot transport vehicles nor launch small landing crafts or amphibious vehicles in great numbers. As a matter of fact, they are only used to supply navy ships at sea.

Moreover, the smart ship can be used for a whole range of logistic operations. It can be used as an aircraft-carrier and hold up to 24 transport helicopters and 600 troops for airborne operations. Such a capacity could be a real asset if, for example, Canadians or citizens of allied countries had to be evacuated on a moment's notice, as in Rwanda, for example.

• (1535)

At the present time, to transport the equipment of Canadian troops, we have to charter private ships, mainly foreign. And then it takes several weeks before our soldiers receive their heavy equipment and their combat vehicles. One smart ship could transport one battalion group with its equipment, armoured vehicles, tanks and artillery. It would have been very useful for our mission in the former Yugoslavia.

In the event of a natural disaster, the smart ship can be quickly transformed to carry a whole range of vehicles such as trucks and ambulances, building materials and equipment, water tanks, fuel tanks and bridgelayers.

Close to 200 containers holding food, clothing, tents and other supplies can be stored on the main deck. This feature would have been appreciated especially in Somalia and in Florida, after hurricane Andrew.

Moreover this ship can carry chemical dispersants, and devices to contain and absorb spills. It can accommodate a clean-up team of 600 and be used as a command, control and communications ship.

Recently, a director of MIL Davie told me that the Department of National Defence has enough information available to it this spring to convey its decision right away to government officials. A favourable decision would allow MIL Engineering System to proceed to build a model of the ship at a cost of only $6.5 million.

Time is of the essence here. It is highly probable that most of MIL Davie's competitors are now familiar with the smart ship concept. Rumours are swirling that other shipyards have taken up the idea and intend to have their own engineers take a look at the concept.

If we delay too long, someone will steal our idea, possibly foreign competitors who already possess the necessary technology to apply the concept developed by MIL Davie.

The smart ship project is the most important transitional contract, one which would allow MIL Davie to proceed with conversion. By building the smart ship, MIL Davie hopes to develop new production modes and to change the way shipyards in Canada operate.

The challenge ahead is a formidable one. The company hopes to be able to build this ship in 390,000 hours, instead of the normal 800,000 hours. The Danes have accomplished this feat and if a strategic agreement can be reached with them, MIL Davie could rely on help from a shipyard in Denmark, which currently ranks third in the world in this field.

MIL Davie would need new, more powerful cranes and its staff would have to be trained in computer-assisted design and production techniques and in the use of new procedures such as plasma welding.

The Quebec Minister of Industry and Trade has expressed his concern about the federal government's commitment to defence industry conversion and with good reason. However, the Quebec government is not alone in supporting conversion. The Conseil du patronat du Québec, not known as an advocate of sovereignty, also supports this process.

I would like to call to mind the resolution passed by Rendez-vous économique 1993, an economic summit meeting organized by the Conseil du patronat in Montreal. This resolution called on the federal government to extend adequate financial support for conversion to all industries that depend on military contracts. This financial support would continue for however long it took to complete the adaptation, conversion and diversification process.

In recommendation 1B, the Conseil du patronat du Québec also called on the federal government to award a $6.5 million design contract and three-year $200 million construction contract for the smart ship prototype. This would also be the prototype for a series of similar ships for the international market, a highly promising and expanding market.

• (1540)

With the expertise acquired in building the smart ship, MIL Davie wants to enter the international market for commercial ships between 40,000 and 70,000 tons. It is estimated that half the current fleet of oil tankers and bulk carriers should be scrapped and replaced in the next few years. Moreover, the rise in global demand due to the increase in international trade is estimated at 2.5 per cent until 2005.

Under these conditions, average demand should grow by 30 per cent from an average of 780 ships per year in the last ten years to an annual average of 1,025 ships until 2005, with peaks of 1,500 ships weighing over 2,000 tons. Since the average ship lasts 23 years and almost half the fleet is 15 years old or more, large orders are to be expected.

When they were in opposition, some influential members of this government's Cabinet, like the current Minister of Human Resources Development who was the critic on External Affairs, clearly stated that the Defence Industry Productivity Program had to be redesigned for the conversion of defence industries.

In a March 26, 1993 press release from the Office of the Leader of the Opposition, the current Minister of Human Resources Development noted: "Canada has a golden opportunity to stake out new market niches for the Canadian defence industry in peacekeeping and environmental technologies". We can only conclude that the Liberal government is suffering from amnesia today.

On April 19, I asked the Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Defence whether the contract for building the smart ship would soon be awarded to MIL Davie. He told me it would not happen before 1995. This answer shows this government's lack of concern for the tens of thousands of defence workers whose jobs are threatened. At MIL Davie alone, excluding companies like CAE, Canadian Marconi, Oerlikon, Paramax and many others, nearly 2,800 jobs would be lost. The shipyard would probably have to close for an indeterminate period of time or even permanently. Another 8,000 indirect jobs would vanish in the Quebec City region. So it is very important.

While I have a few minutes left, so you will not feel that MIL Davie and Quebec complain or demand too much, I will quote some figures concerning contracts awarded since 1986 to various shipyards in Canada. The ferry Smallwood, $130 million to MIL Davie; destroyer modernization, $286 million to MIL Davie but $1.2 billion to Toronto-based Linton; frigate construction, $400 million to MIL Davie but $6.2 billion to Saint John Shipbuilding; defence contract adjustments, only $263 million to MIL Davie; the Pictou ferry, $50 million to the Pictou shipyard; minesweepers, $450 million to Fenco Halifax.

In conclusion, I would like to come back to the press release of March 26. Just before, I would like to say that I did not complete the list, but in all, $13 billion was invested in the marine sector, of which the MIL Davie shipyard got only $1.094 billion, or about one thirteenth.

I come back to the press release in which the Leader of the Opposition, who is now the Prime Minister, said this: "Canadians deserve a government that can lead the way, a government that brings new ideas and new strategies, a government that helps them adjust to change. Our defence conversion policy is an example of how a Liberal government would meet the needs of Canadians in years to come".

I have only this to say to this government in conclusion: "Prove to the workers of MIL Davie and the employees of the 649 other defence companies in Quebec that what you said, Mr. Prime Minister, when you were in opposition was not just empty words".

• (1545)

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I would like to address a brief comment to my colleague from Lévis. I know that he is familiar with the employer, MIL Davie, which is located in his riding. As the Minister of Industry and the Minister of Transport have already indicated in this House, the government is perfectly aware of the important role this company plays in the economy of the Quebec City region. The government has also received MIL Davie's business plan, which has first to be approved by the government of Quebec as principal stockholder.

Why does his party insist on raising this issue today, when the hon. member and his colleagues know the government has the matter well in hand, is working on it, advancing it? The hon. member and his colleagues know full well that we are looking into the problem of industrial technology transfer for the benefit of employers in Quebec and elsewhere in Canada.

Mr. Dubé: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member, whom I know well given that he chairs the parliamentary committee on Human Resources, of which I am a member myself, for his question. What is the cause of my concern? Simply the facts. We heard that a business plan was tabled recently. I was not only concerned, I was also disappointed to hear the Minister of Transport mention just recently that he was waiting for a business plan. He even said so in a letter to the City of Lévis, the City Council of Lévis.

Last August, a few weeks before the election was called, MIL Davie officials presented this famous business plan to the present chief of staff of the present Prime Minister, who was a candidate in Quebec City, and to all the Liberal candidates in the Quebec City region. Considering that the Prime Minister's chief of staff already knew about this business plan then, one cannot come and claim eight or ten months later never having heard of this plan.

Like many other people of Lévis who took part in the election campaign and all the workers, I can remember the Prime Minister visiting Lévis days before the election and saying he agreed with the business plan. The fact of the matter is that this plan he had been shown minutes earlier provided for two transition contracts, that is to say the Magdalen Islands ferry and the smart ship, as well as for some infrastructure assistance. All this has been known since last August.

Now, the government was elected a few months ago. It is understandable that it would take until January to settle in, but I will remind the hon. member that, when I rose in my place on January 18 to inquired about the ferry to the minister, his answer was: "Soon". Later we learned that for him, "soon" means two months. If I am not mistaken, two months from January 18, that would bring us to March 18. We are now in May. Two months may not seem like a very long time, but for workers loosing their jobs a hundred at a time every week—there were 3,000 of them this time last year, but at this rate there may soon be only 400 or 500 of them remaining; that is 2,500 jobs lost, and it will be 2,800 by the time December comes around—to hear the government answer it is looking into the matter is becoming unacceptable. Hundreds of workers are waiting for an answer.

That kind of situation worries me. That is the reason why I wanted, as the member for Lévis, to take part in this debate on the conversion of military industries to civilian production. I rise not only for my own riding, but also because for the whole Quebec City region the MIL Davie shipyard accounts for a total payroll of $150 million. If you count all indirect jobs created by sub-contracting, it represents for the 10 ridings of the Quebec City region an economic activity of $600 million.

As you know, that type of venture yields secondary benefits. Therefore it is extremely important. Besides, that issue has been recognized by the Conseil du patronat and by all economic organizations of Quebec as a top priority. The present Liberal government knew that when they were in opposition and during the election campaign. And they still know it today. We are now in the month of May 1994 and no answer has come yet.

Meanwhile, the rumour has it that the contract might be given by tender and that there would be other shipyards, in the region of the hon. member by the way. And there is the smart ship—a concept that belongs to and was developed by the MIL Davie. At the beginning, that original idea was presented in a business plan in private but today it is becoming more and more public. But as months go by nothing happens.

I am not the only one to be worried. The Minister of Industry and Commerce of Quebec, Mr. Tremblay—I guess I can call him by his title since he is not here—is also getting impatient. A few weeks ago, a coalition of all federal and provincial political parties, including the Quebec City members of the federal Liberal Party, supported the position of the MIL Davie. Despite that, there was no answer. This situation is indecent.

I am once more urging the government—and it may be the last time—to respond at last and to stop penalizing the region of Quebec City because it has not voted for the Liberal Party. If that is the reason, it is dangerous. I have warned the government that there will soon be, in a few weeks, in a few months, a provincial election that could have major consequences for the future of this country.

[English]

Mr. Barry Campbell (St. Paul's): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate. Let me reinforce the comments made earlier today by the Minister of Industry with reference to defence conversion.

The plan recognized that the time had come to help defence industries make the transition from high tech military production to high tech civilian production.

[Translation]

We are determined to reach that objective and we have already accomplished significant progress towards the development of an effective strategy.

[English]

Our defence conversion program has three major components: First, defining Canada's defence policy; second, rationalizing the military infrastructure; third, rationalizing the defence industrial base.

Later today in this debate my colleagues will describe the government's policy and program for expediting the first two components of our overall strategy. We will also discuss the nature and direction for defence conversion of the industrial base.

Conversion of defence production can be described as industrial adjustment with an added element of national security. To understand the scale and scope of the challenge which Canada faces one must appreciate the evolution of Canada's aerospace and defence industry.

We have followed a path quite different from that of almost every other nation in the western world. We have long maintained a relatively small domestic military procurement budget. In order to sustain themselves and indeed to grow Canadian defence firms pursue two avenues. The first has been to focus on export markets. The second has been diversification.

As I said the Canadian aerospace and defence industry pursued export markets as suppliers of components for the manufacturers of major military systems such as radar systems to detect low flying aircraft and military flight simulators. Their clients were generally not governments but defence companies world wide. Canadian manufacturers have designed, developed and sold world-class high tech products aimed at buyers of sophisticated, specialized equipment and our industries have produced these special components at competitive prices.

• (1555)

By contrast most of the western world's defence firms have relied on large domestic military sales. They have produced entire systems for a closed and essentially less competitive market. They have had little export focus and have sold almost exclusively to their national governments.

In many countries domestic military budgets were cut back severely at the end of the cold war. The shifts in geopolitical power required nations to re-evaluate their defence role.

Suppliers in other countries which focused on a domestic market for major weapon systems found themselves suddenly without a traditional market. Add to this equation the fiscal and budgetary problems facing all western governments and the result has been what might be described as a double whammy of radically different requirements and a rapidly shrinking market.

The inevitable results: Significant downsizing, rationalization and large layoffs, what we all too readily identify with defence conversion.

[Translation]

But here in Canada, defence industries are faced with a very different reality. Most have concentrated on export sales. The size of world markets, as well as the number of world suppliers, are diminishing.

The reduction of military spending at the international level could put out of business some competitors of Canadian companies and thereby create new market opportunities.

[English]

Canadian industry reliance on Canadian government procurement is already small by world standards and it is declining. In aerospace for example, 30 years ago defence products comprised 65 per cent of total sales. Today defence sales are less than 30 per cent of sales and projections indicate that by 1997 the percentage will fall to 25 per cent.

These figures indicate that in Canada defence conversion has been going on as a gradual process for almost 30 years.

The sudden and precipitous changes taking place in the United States and Europe in the defence industries will not occur in Canada to the same degree. For example, between 1991 and 1993 in the United States the aerospace and defence sectors lost almost 300,000 jobs. That is 10 per cent of their workforce. In Europe the experience has been similar. Over the same period, 150,000 people have lost their jobs in defence and in aerospace.

In Canada, in marked contrast, we have lost 5,000 jobs in this sector and forecasts indicate they will be regained by 1998.

Our successful Canadian manufacturers aim at small niche markets around the world. The export focus of Canadian manufacturers of subsystems and components has cushioned our industry from the worst of the fallout occurring in the United States and in Europe.

As I stated earlier, the other major factor in our success in avoiding severe contractions has been diversification.

[Translation]

A large number of defence industries have developed technology which can be sold for both military and commercial purposes. These companies have gained the necessary skills to successfully manage operations producing both military and commercial products.

The Canadian defence industry is in a good position to make the necessary transition from a high tech military production to a high tech civilian production, as illustrated by the changes which have occurred in recent years.

[English]

Canada's defence industry comprises more than 500 firms. The majority of them have already begun the diversification process both in commercial and military production and in domestic and export sales. On average 60 per cent of sales by Canadian defence firms are for the commercial market and only 40 per cent for the defence market. Many of these firms also have strong export sales. More than 80 per cent of all commercial sales are to export markets and 35 per cent of defence sales are abroad.

• (1600)

The only notable exceptions are the large shipbuilders in the Atlantic provinces and in Quebec and the munitions manufacturers in Quebec. In recent years they have depended almost entirely on defence production.

In United States, defence conversion has been quite different. The U.S. defence industry has been a domestic market nearly 40 times that of Canada. It produces large scale, fully integrated systems. These include, for example, military aircraft, submarines and sophisticated weapons systems.

[Translation]

Until now, a large number of American defence industries have been almost totally dependent on domestic military sales. These industries do not follow the Canadian tradition of either diversifying, being geared to operations, or relying on an important volume of commercial sales.

An American solution to a typically Canadian situation is a highly unlikely solution.

[English]

As I mentioned earlier, Canada's solution is threefold: first, a defence policy review which will of necessity take time to complete; second, the rationalization of bases and defence infrastructure, both of which elements will be addressed by the minister of defence; third, the rationalization of Canada's defence industry base, a complex question but one on which progress is being made.

In the Liberal plan for Canada "Creating Opportunity" the government made a commitment to expand the mandate of the defence industry productivity program to assist in the conversion and diversification of the industry.

I am pleased to say that earlier this year the government followed through with a provision in the budget to redesign, DIPP for 1996–97. This will help industry convert from defence to high technology civilian production. This is the first step in redirecting existing government programs and initiatives. We are also proceeding on other fronts and will be announcing further initiatives soon.

Some elements of the government's support program, however, must await the report of the defence policy review and therefore will not be fully developed for some time.

[Translation]

This type of measured response will be problematic if the Canadian context for the conversion of military industries is similar to that of Europe or the United States. As I pointed out, the situation is very different in Canada. Generally speaking, Canadian companies are in the unique position of being much less vulnerable to military world market slowdowns than their foreign competitors.

[English]

This is not to say that Canada does not face challenges in expediting a smooth transition. Rather the defence industry and therefore some Canadian workers face a unique situation.

Canadian companies are generally well positioned in international markets. They have strong order books. They have good employment prospects. They have solid, diversified international export markets for both their commercial and defence product lines.

There are some exception to the quite strong positions enjoyed by many companies in Canada. These exceptions include munitions and shipbuilding where a number of specific problems generally beyond the scope of a defence conversion program continue to cause concern. We will address these problems through a combination of defence conversion programs and other programs that can help provide solutions.

I have outlined the unique challenge facing us in the matter of conversion of defence industries. In some, while the defence conversion problem in Canada is similar in scope to that in other parts of the western world, it is not by any means of the same scale.

Sales and employment prospects vary by company: some positive, some neutral, sadly some negative. Specific problems affecting a particular firm require specific solutions. We do not need to embark on sweeping programs offering sweeping and expensive solutions. Programs that are carefully targeted require careful preparation.

Targeted programs take time to develop but in my view are the most effective in the medium term. It would be naive to assume that the defence conversion problem in Canada can be solved overnight.

[Translation]

The solution which the government is in the process of developing will be responsive to market forces, fiscally responsible, properly directed and effective.

• (1605)

[English]

As specific elements of the program take shape in the near future, the government will be providing information on the scope of its provisions.

The member who brought forth the motion also brought to the attention of the House a most important question. As I pointed out, companies in the Canadian defence industry have long diversified their products and their markets. They have been carrying out, some of them for as long as 30 years, what the defence industry in other countries is just beginning to try, that is to produce other products and to market in other markets.

[Translation]

The government is determined to continue on the path to success with policies and programs which meet the needs of all the Canadians who are part of the industry.

[English]

Those companies in sectors where the challenges have been more demanding and more difficult are to receive the attention and assistance of this government which understands the problems and intends to contribute to the solutions.

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I rise today to oppose the motion put forward by the Bloc. However I want to say at the start that I am personally concerned for the jobs of some 137,915 persons who the 1986 census showed were employed by the defence services sector. Their employment is threatened by the Liberal strategy of slashing defence spending before it has completed a full study of Canada's defence needs.

The Reform Party caucus believes that announced cuts of $7 billion to the Department of National Defence over the next five years prejudged and pre-empted the outcome of the defence review and should not have been made until Parliament, together with the Canadian people, had determined the mission of the Canadian Armed Forces for the 21st century.

Once the mission is determined we can make careful and well planned decisions on the military's main functions and organizational structure and on Canada's long term needs for hardware, bases and personnel.

The cuts announced by the government are already having impact on the defence industry. As I have said I strongly object to the government's action of cutting defence first and asking questions later.

I strongly oppose any suggestion that the government should fund the changeover of defence companies to civilian production. I oppose using Canadian tax dollars for this purpose for several reasons, not least of which is that half these firms are foreign owned.

I would also oppose using Canadian tax dollars for this purpose because as a Reformer I do not think on general principle we achieve anything good by providing grants to private industry. On the contrary, it goes against the grain that taxpayers should on the one hand be trying to operate their own companies while on the other hand competing with a company their own tax dollars may be propping up.

For instance, over recent years it has been a tactic of the old line political parties to spend some $160 million per year through the defence industry productivity program, which is almost like a regional development program, to dole out tax dollars to the military industry concentrated mainly in southern Ontario and southern Quebec. Such grants should be quickly phased out.

To understand this particular motion we must first define what we are talking about when we discuss Canada's defence industry. I note that figures being quoted in the House today have varied greatly so it is hard to know whose figures are correct.

Despite the discrepancy in figures we need to try to get to a general understanding of what the defence industry produces and how it compares on the world scale. In analysing world-wide arms production, nations are generally divided into three tiers or levels of production. The first includes nations like the U.S., which basically produces and sells anything it or its allies need. The first tier accounts for some 60 per cent of the arms transferred in the past decade.

Canada is in tier two with such countries as France, Italy and Spain, which together account for some 25 per cent of annual global arms exports. These countries do not have a big enough home market to benefit from economies of scale and must depend on exports to be competitive. Canada exports in large measure to the United States with which we jointly produce many weapons.

• (1610)

There is a third tier of wild card arms producers like China, India and Israel that can produce large amounts of less sophisticated, functional but cheap weapons on short notice. Among global arms producers Canada ranks about eighth, producing some $3 billion worth of military goods per year or about one per cent of the world total. Regarding more conventional weapons, according to the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute and for the period 1986 to 1990, Canada was the 14th largest exporter of major conventional weapons in the world.

Concentrated in southern Ontario and Quebec, the Canadian defence industry involves about 1,000 companies with special experience in what is called the new knowledge based industry, specifically aerospace electronics and communications.

Robert Gillespie, former assistant deputy minister in the Department of National Defence, gave the following description of the defence industry:

> Our industry is composed of only a few large companies with sales in excess of $100 million per year. The vast majority of firms are in fact quite small and very few of those produce purely military products. The industry is over 50 per cent foreign owned with U.S. companies dominating the group and is very heavily dependent on the export market.

There has been great fluctuation in Canadian military exports over the period 1959 to 1991. For example, 1974 and 1975 were low years, each at $280 million. In 1985 the industry hit its recent peak at $1.9 billion in exports, with a similar amount in 1991 during the gulf war build-up and actual combat.

Research was based on three factors: first, public domain listings of unclassified prime military contracts awarded by the Department of National Defence; second, military export contracts arranged by the Canadian Commercial Corporation on behalf of foreign governments, primarily the United States; third, Pentagon contracts placed directly with Canadian companies, together totalling about 80 per cent of all Canadian military production.

According to research covering those three factors the top six Canadian military prime contractors are: SNC Industrial Technologies Incorporated and Bombardier, both of Montreal; Computing Devices Company of Ottawa; Standard Aero Limited of Winnipeg; Allied Signal Aerospace of Rexdale, Ontario; and Bristol Aerospace of Winnipeg. All six companies had total value reported prime contracts during fiscal year 1990-91 in excess of $100 million. For three of the six, their estimated or reported military sales were less than half of total sales.

Of the top 20 Canadian military prime contractors, accounting for some 60 per cent of reported military prime contracts in Canada, according to the same three factors which I listed earlier, 11 companies of the top 20 had estimated or reported military sales of less than half of total sales. Incidentally eight of those top 20 companies are located in Quebec. I believe we can see the source of the Bloc's concern with this issue.

What kinds of things do these companies produce? Although Canada does rank 14th in world-wide production of conventional weapons, the Library of Parliament has provided me with a list of some 180 companies engaged in producing defence electronics and avionics. These folks produce a whole lot of things that most people cannot even pronounce, let alone manufacture. Many of them are part of the new knowledge based economy, their employers being well educated, not to say out and out brilliant.

Because of the brilliance of these people and the highly specialized nature of what they produce, I seriously doubt that a notoriously inefficient federal government could do anything really helpful for these industries and would only end up throwing tax dollars at them, an approach which I strongly oppose.

• (1615)

Moreover, as I have shown, a large number of defence industry companies have less than 50 per cent of their production going into military purposes. Hopefully they can convert a greater percentage of their operations to non-military purposes. Because of the talents of the employees of these particular high tech companies, it would be a great loss to Canada if the employers were to shut down and the employees moved to the United States. Remember, we are talking about an industry that is already half foreign owned.

However, I am certain the sales and marketing offices of the bigger companies and probably the presidents of the smaller companies have long since smelled the coffee in so far as the end of the cold war is concerned. Certainly they have been hard at work tracing and developing new markets which could increase their non-military sales.

Even the average man or woman on the street is well aware of the remarkable growth in the knowledge based industry for such things as fax machines, personal computers and the transportation industry. Given the great land mass of Canada, we truly have become a world leader in communications, a technology needed all over the world for everything from moving information, people and goods to distributing TV signals or predicting the weather. I have great faith that Canada's technological leadership in this sector of the world economy cannot only be maintained but will grow steadily.

In conclusion it is high time for the government to smarten up its own overall defence planning. I also believe one of the worst things any of us could do to a given industry would be to encourage the government to increase its involvement and further upset the functioning of a free market economy.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I listened with some interest to the remarks on this motion by the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap.

I found it somewhat strange that he would mention a concern on behalf of his party for the defence cuts which the government introduced in the budget. At the same time as saying that these cuts were premature he argued that we should not support the conversion of our defence industry to civilian purposes and to help in the redirection of that technology into areas of greater demand.

Perhaps the member could elaborate on what seems to be a paradoxical position from his party's perspective. Why is he opposing cuts? Is that not what is party has been calling for? Why is he opposing economies which have been made with great difficulty and after much soul searching by this government? What other cuts is he proposing in order to keep the defence budget higher than this government has recommended?

Mr. Stinson: Madam Speaker, we have always stated that there have to be cuts in military spending, but we have also stated that the studies should be done before and not after the cuts. It is rather foolish to make the cuts and then say they have to put them back in place again. The studies should be done before the cuts are made. That is what we are saying on that level.

As far as subsidizing an industry that was subsidized coming in is concerned, remember this industry was subsidized coming in and now government wants to subsidize it going out.

If the government is looking at subsidization levels what becomes more important here? Private enterprise tries to compete. It pays taxes but those tax dollars are being used in many cases to form a company that it has to compete against. It is pretty tough when a company is not being subsidized to compete against a subsidized company. They do not have the same worries, many times not even the same responsibilities.

• (1620)

I would like to raise another fact when talking about subsidization. We have to have priorities. Can anyone in this House answer this question: Why are we subsidizing companies in direct competition with companies in private enterprise when we are shutting down hospitals? This absolutely makes no sense to me, nor to anybody else in the House, but I am willing to listen.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in this debate because major aerospace firms and Canadian Forces Base Winnipeg are located in my riding of Winnipeg St. James.

In the red book this government identified the world-wide restructuring of the defence industry as a major issue for maintaining high technology jobs in Canada.

In speaking to the government's commitment to defence conversion, I must first be clear that it is not a passing fancy or for that matter a platform for simplistic grandstanding. The global market for the defence industry is already in the process of restructuring. This government will encourage a sound and structured response that will hold up for the long run, that will meet the needs of industry and the highly skilled workers in that industry.

The need to change is being driven by global markets for Canada's defence industry is particularly vulnerable to change. This cannot be otherwise when 50 per cent of the Canadian defence industry is foreign owned, mostly by U.S. companies. That has already been pointed out in this debate. The majority of Canadian defence firms supply subsystems and components and carry out subcontracted manufacturing for prime U.S. contractors. Indeed, most Canadian exports go to the United States.

The global giants, the American prime contractors, have been rationalizing their organizations and just as important for Canadian suppliers, their manufacturing processes. They are starting to drive this process down their supply chain, down to the suppliers of subsystems and components where Canada has developed its edge.

Furthermore the giants are diversifying into commercially advanced technology markets, squeezing our smaller and more diversified companies. The aerospace and advanced electronics industries in Canada could be vulnerable and they must be ready to adapt. This government is preparing to assist positively and in concert with industry.

I can assure members of this House and in particular the member for Nanaimo—Cowichan who suggested this morning that the government should talk to the industry leaders in the west that this government has been doing just that.

On March 3 of this year the hon. Minister of Western Economic Diversification, the parliamentary secretary for finance and I all met with the chief executive officers of 10 leading western aerospace and defence companies. We discussed the sector's views on defence conversion in the context of science and technology policy and the new long term space plan.

This broad focus is part of the western economic diversification's new direction to work with industry and the provinces through strategic initiatives, that is to deal with structural economic issues at their root and on a co-operative basis rather than treating the symptoms as they appear in individual companies.

The March meeting was the first of what will be a series of meetings on the subject and which will include an expanded list of companies right across the west. The next meeting will be later this spring at which time the private sector will present a broad strategy along with recommendations for specific activities required to facilitate defence conversion in western Canada.

We are listening to the leaders of industry and working closely with them as part of a broad concern for the health of the aerospace and electronics industries in the west. For instance we are fully sensitive to the immediate impact that can be felt from the defence cuts. We have worked closely with industry to ensure a smooth transition to new requirements.

This has been done with specific companies such as Bristol Aerospace which is located in my riding. We have also worked with Bristol and other companies in the west to help as they pursue opportunities in international markets.

All of this is part of the national issue of restructuring the Canadian defence industry. It is done to safeguard the positive contributions the industry has made and continues to make to Canada's economic well-being, while building something viable and sustainable for the long term future without side-swiping in the process the advanced technology companies that have already diversified and have already taken action for the future.

The blueprint for defence conversion contained in the red book sets out a program to pursue strategic and fiscally sound alternatives for high tech job creation. The program is to focus on alternative military requirements, dual use products and sustaining research and development.

Two major objectives were set, namely conversion of military bases to alternative uses, and economic conversion and diversification of the defence industry toward alternative military and civilian goods, including the development of peacekeeping technologies.

This government has already started down the defence conversion road. Those base closures that were long overdue have been announced as part of the recent budget. An example of the concrete conversion action being taken as a result of the base closures is the activity surrounding Defence Research Establishment Pacific in Victoria, sometimes referred to as DREP.

Defence Research Establishment Pacific is to close on March 31, 1995 as part of the reduction of defence infrastructure. However, there is tremendous potential here to build upon the critical mass of ocean industry and science which is resident in Victoria and centred at DREP.

For example, there are many companies both large, such as MacDonald Dettwiler and Associates, and small, such as Barrodale Computing with just 10 employees, which have transformed the science contracts they have undertaken with DREP in the past into major commercial opportunities.

To maintain this flow from research into a commercial business, western economic diversification in the next few days will commission a study of the opportunities open to the ocean industry based upon the critical mass existing in both the private and public sectors in Victoria. Science does exist at Defence Research Establishment Pacific. Highly competitive, high technology companies, world-class firms are already in place.

The Department of National Defence wishes to see the technology transferred to industry and the academic community, such as the University of Victoria, and is anxious to build further momentum. What better ingredients could be found for converting a defence establishment into a sound commercial enterprise than this one which is focused upon a growing, vital ocean industry?

Our defence conversion blueprint also set out the objective of diversification toward alternative military and civilian goods. This too is already getting under way with a number of alternate use concepts being actively examined by industry itself and government. This goes beyond program and policy responses on a broad sectoral front to the specific activities of individual companies which are right now pursuing the opportunities that are presenting themselves.

An example of government support to a winning defence conversion strategy is EDO Canada Ltd. of Calgary. This company has been manufacturing fuel tanks for the CF-18 fighter jets using composite materials.

In January of this year it won its first major commercial contract by which it will supply lightweight natural gas fuel tanks for General Motors 1994 Chevrolet Caprice and Corsica models. This contract will be worth $2.5 million to $5 million annually. To quote company president Doug Moore from a Calgary Herald article of January 12, 1994: "The contract is the result of the commercialization of our aerospace technology". It is also the result of this government's application of the industrial and regional benefits policy to defence conversion.

• (1630)

General Motors as part of its contractual commitment to the federal government for the sale of light armoured vehicles has agreed to undertake millions of dollars of industrial benefits in Canada.

The agreement of the government to allow IRB credit for GM or to GM for the EDO sale helped to cement for EDO a strategic alliance that it had been working on for some time. This is part of an ongoing government program with continuing discussions which could lead to a similar kind of contract for another growing western high technology manufacturer. Again IRB credits from the light armoured vehicle purchase could be an incentive to solidify the deal.

I want to conclude by saying that this government knows what defence conversion does not mean. It is not moving defence companies into mature commercial markets. It is not intended to be done in isolation from other economic activity and it cannot happen instantly. It most certainly cannot mean wiping out the existing defence industrial base.

I have described what defence conversion is or is not. This government has an equally clear understanding of what it should be and can be with a carefully planned program. Defence conversion can help defence dependent companies reduce their dependency on limited products and customers. It can be a co-operative effort between industry, labour and government to foster strategic alliances for pursuing international markets.

It can be an opportunity to work with our counterparts in the U.S. especially in fostering the development of dual use technologies. I assure members that it will broaden the industrial base for overall economic growth.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, the Bloc Quebecois has introduced a motion saying:

> That this House condemn the government for its unacceptable delays in developing and implementing a genuine strategy for the conversion of defence industries to civilian production, which would save and create new jobs in high-technology sectors.

I congratulate the hon. members from the Bloc Quebecois for thinking about jobs. I hope they will raise, in Canada and in Quebec, concern for Canadian jobs. When I refer to Canada and Canadians, I mean all provinces, including Quebec. Their objective of separation is certainly not the ideal recipe for job creation. We need to belong to a strong community, a strong family, large and co-operative enough to develop its own industries.

We were informed today of the policies and programs which would guarantee the success of the conversion of defence equipment manufacturers into companies active on international markets. However, it is not simply a question of policies and programs. The main factors are the entrepreneurial spirit, the measures taken and the results achieved.

There are many examples of success. One of them is Securiplex Technologies of Montreal. This is the story of a successful conversion by a company which was well-known for its defence equipment. Recently, they had the good fortune of getting a $26 million contract from Bombardier BN, in Bruges, Belgium, for the production of a control system.

This system will electronically detect and extinguish fires in the 254 shuttle-cars that will be used in the Chunnel.

It is based on the system designed by Securiplex for damage control on warships and presently installed on 12 new Canadian frigates and ships of the British Royal Navy.

This system uses microprocessors to monitor and control the sensors and fire-extinction devices, as well as other security systems. It was developed under a procurement contract negotiated with the Government of Canada through the Defence Industry Productivity Program.

• (1635)

Since the completion of this project, and with the help of Industry Canada, Securiplex marketing has been targeting commercial companies. This firm is actively pursuing the industrial security market, especially in North America, Europe and the Middle East.

Among its achievements are the contracts it won to supply sophisticated fire detection and extinction systems for the headquarters of the European Economic Community in Brussels, the Alba power plant in Bahrain, in the Middle East, and the Hibernia drilling platform off Newfoundland.

ATS is a rather impressing example. It was created on the Montreal South shore in 1979. Originally, it was a small company specialised in ammunition testing. Aware of the limitations of this activity, it sought to put its considerable expertise to good use by creating software for new markets.

Today, this company has nearly entirely changed its field of activity. Its future lies now in completely new opportunities it created, namely air control tower and room simulators. Training air controllers is of the utmost importance, and yet nothing has been done to update training methods.

Presently, ATS is executing major contracts awarded by international customers. DIPP played a crucial role in the development of this firm's technological capacity. ATS was awarded its last contract in January 1992, and since then it has not asked for another loan.

The common denominator to these success stories is the fact that these manufacturers of defence equipment were able to adapt to the new reality and meet the demand of a new market. It is also our government's commitment to help these industries diversify. The pessimistic outlook of some concerning the future of our aerospace and defence industries does not reflect reality. As a whole, the news regarding defence industries is rather good.

For example, many members know that one of the leading Canadian aerospace and defence electronics firms is CAE Electronics Limited of Montreal. This company is a world-class operation in every respect. It is the main supplier of commercial aircraft flight simulators and records important sales to similar defence markets.

CAE Electronics employs more than 3,000 people, with scientists, engineers and technicians accounting for half of the workforce. Annual sales of nearly $350 million are made by the Montreal offices and the figure is expected to increase next year. The company has been experiencing tremendous growth and expansion for the past three decades. Annual sales now in excess of one billion derive primarily from exports.

The company is now busy expanding its facilities in order to welcome clients from around the world who will attend courses focusing on some of the most advanced technologies in the world, from aircrafts to ships. Several years ago, CAE Electronics acquired a major U.S. competitor called Link. This company is now truly world class with a diverse client base. Nevertheless, it continues to manage the electronics side of the business from its offices in Montreal.

However, CAE Electronics still needs the support of the government. This is especially true in the case of the project which it is carrying out with the American National Aerospace Administration and which involves exploring the application of virtual reality in the cockpit. Without the support of the Defence Industry Productivity Program, projects like this which are vitally important to the future of CAE Electronics would be impossible to carry out.

• (1640)

That is why the federal government has indicated in the red book it was determined to maintain this important program. CAE also takes an active part in other defence conversion projects, some of which in sectors far removed from traditional defence activities. It is currently involved in a marketing project for an artificial heart designed at the Heart Institute in Ottawa.

However, CAE still considers defence as an important part of the corporate strategy in its business plans. Defence contracts do account for the best part of its commercial activity and offer unique opportunities to explore the limits of technology applied to training and simulation.

The federal government plans on continuing its partnership with CAE as well as with a number of other innovative, creative and flourishing companies. The Canadian taxpayers' investments in companies such as this one have never been more important. CAE and the Montreal area can expect to prosper thanks to these investments. CAE has undertaken to design, develop and market new products and new services to meet the needs of the population in the 21st century.

There are many more success stories in the defence industry, stories of companies that have expanded their lines of activity and prospered by identifying a need and meeting it commercially.

Defence conversion is nothing new for many Canadian companies, and their success is envied by their competitors.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 38 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Manicouagan, Labour Relations; the hon. member for Rosedale, Rwanda; the hon. member for Laurentides, Anti-flu Vaccines; the hon. member for Lévis, the Olympic Games of 2002.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford): Madam Speaker, it is always for me an honour, a pleasure and a privilege to speak in this House on behalf of the people of Shefford who elected me.

As you know, Madam Speaker, my region of Granby has been hit hard by the unemployment problem plaguing the country. In this speech, I want to express my support for the defence industry conversion program. I strongly support the motion of my colleague from Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, which condemns the government for its inaction in this vital sector with the potential to create high-tech jobs.

How can the government sit on its hands on such an important issue after making firm commitments in this regard in the last election campaign? As you know and since they talk about it all the time, these commitments can be found in the Liberal Party's red book and in a March 26, 1993 press release.

What is now left of these moral commitments? To impress upon the government the meaning of the words "active", "alert" and "enterprising", I will quote the motion of my colleague from Hochelaga—Maisonneuve:

> That this House condemn the government for its unacceptable delays in developing and implementing a genuine strategy for the conversion of defence industries to civilian production, which would save and create new jobs in high-technology sectors.

• (1645)

I think this motion clearly expresses the goal we want to achieve, namely to convert defence industries to civilian production and create high-tech jobs. In the light of this information, I remind the government that it must honour its commitments and quickly develop a genuine strategy for the conversion of defence industries.

The main reason underlying my position is that, with the collapse of the Soviet Union and the end of the cold war, spending on defence industries is no longer based on the initial strategic foundation. Thus, as a member of the Joint Committee on Defence, I still maintain that the amount spent on military defence is quite high and we need a moratorium to stop the waste of public funds. However, in making cuts in military spending, we must act fairly to the provinces and the various components of the defence industry.

Although the EH-101 helicopter project promised economic benefits for Quebec, we in the Bloc Quebecois were opposed to this program, but we insisted on the need to ensure economic and industrial benefits for Quebec through a project like the high-speed train, and these benefits are not yet forthcoming.

In fact, the government is dragging its feet on several issues that are important for economic recovery. They often quote the red book but they do very, very little. Nevertheless, the companies that were penalized when this helicopter contract was cancelled urgently need government support to convert their defence activities. Since the new world order began, military industries have had a rough time, as everyone here will agree.

The arms production market, estimated at over $450 billion worldwide, has dropped significantly since 1987, by almost 10 per cent. International experts say that it could drop another 25 per cent in the next few years. The main exporting countries, including Canada, are thus directly affected by this problem.

As you probably know, Canada exports about 70 per cent of its production to international markets, of which 80 per cent goes to the United States. Under Canada–U.S. agreements, we are thus tied to this market. Since the late 1980s, the U.S. defence budget has steadily declined. What will the impact be on our local industries?

In this specific sector, the most conservative estimates are that more than 1.6 million jobs will be lost throughout the world by the year 2000. That is a lot. This prognosis is hardly promising for Canada's military industry. In Quebec alone, more than 650 companies of all sizes work directly or indirectly in military production.

In Quebec, the most dynamic sectors are communication electronics, aerospace, shipbuilding and munitions. More than 11,000 jobs in Quebec's military industry have been lost since 1987. The impact is considerable.

• (1650)

Here are some specific examples of layoffs between 1990 and 1994 in Quebec companies that produced weapons or components: Marconi, 1,480 layoffs; MIL Davie, 2,740 layoffs since 1990; Oerlikon, 410 layoffs; Paramax, 1,000 layoffs; Pratt & Whitney, 200 layoffs; Triplex, 200 layoffs; Vickers, 350 layoffs; and there are others. This is scary! It is unbelievable! Just compiling these figures is an exacting process. Between 1990 and 1994, no less than 7,391 jobs have disappeared in those Quebec companies which are formally identified as producing systems or subsystems for military use.

These figures, which merely represent the tip of the iceberg, confirm the dramatic drop in military production for Quebec alone. You can imagine what the figures are for all of Canada.

This illustrates why the need to convert military industries is so urgent and vital for the survival of our manufacturing and high tech industries.

We must act quickly to ensure the conversion of defence industries to civilian production. The elected government has a fundamental role to play in this sector of the economy. So far, federal government support to our defence industry has essentially taken the form of procurement contracts and direct assistance to industries.

This support is mainly given through the Defence Industry Productivity Program, or DIPP. It seems that it is through this program that support for the conversion of defence industries will come.

The program aims at helping military industries remain competitive on international and Canadian markets. Considering the collapse of world and domestic markets for military equipment, a thorough review of the program is a logical and necessary step.

The most appropriate solution to help our defence industries is undoubtedly the implementation of a conversion program funded with DIPP's budget.

In fact, the House of Commons Sub-committee on Arms Export asked, in its recommendation 18, that the DIPP be extended so as to include assistance for conversion and diversification. The Liberal members who sat on that sub-committee signed the report, thus confirming their party's position when they formed the opposition. Is it possible that such a change could occur when you change sides in this House? This is incredible! It is unacceptable!

Considering that stand from the Liberals, and given the need to implement a conversion program to help defence industries, it is important that the DIPP plays an accessory role in this transition from military to civilian production.

While ideas seemed to have been developing for some time, and while consultations seemed to support a quick transformation of this program into a conversion program, it now seems that the Liberal Party is hesitant to launch such a support program. The Liberals are now undecided. What happened to them since they took office? It is hard to tell. What happened to those nice promises made on every platform by the Liberals during the election campaign?

Even the leader of the Liberal Party, the current Prime Minister, tried to outmatch everyone else in a press release dated March 26, 1993, where he said: "Canadians deserve a government which can show them the way, come up with new ideas and new strategies, and help them to adapt to change. Our defence conversion policy is a good example of how a Liberal government", as he put it, "would meet the needs of Canadians during the 1990s."

• (1655)

Unfortunately, I must say that all these promises went unheeded, so much so that, in his budget, the Minister of Finance kept quiet about all the new programs the Liberals had promised.

If the government does not develop a defence conversion policy for the years to come, Quebec and the rest of Canada stand to lose tens of thousands of jobs in technological industries. Our capacity to create jobs will keep eroding, and the government is very much aware of the situation.

Recently, when questioned by my colleague, the hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, the Minister of Industry was rather smug and cynical. He said that the federal government already has all the tools needed to promote conversion and that the existing programs were enough to help them fill their mandate. Is this the new tactic the Liberals are going to use?

The Minister of Industry probably confused the support provided to military production within the DIPP program with a conversion program that the government has yet to develop.

The Minister of Industry should, as soon as possible, review the existing programs. He would notice a difference between what he thinks is out there and the conversion program we are proposing.

By the way, I urge my colleagues opposite to read the statement released, on March 26, 1993, by the office of the then leader of the opposition, now the Prime Minister of Canada.

With the help of the current Minister of Human Resources Development and others, they came up with these proposals, while they were sitting in the opposition. People say life is easier when you are in the opposition, but still, if you are serious, when you are in office you try to do what you said you would do. At the time, the government promised Canadians jobs and now all it is talking about is the deficit. It was the Conservatives who talked about the deficit during the election campaign, not the Liberals. The Liberals promised us jobs. What happened?

The Liberal government has fallen into the trap. Caught without any conversion policy, the government must, once again, trust the market forces. Can you imagine? They keep telling us: "Wait and see. Wait and see." That is exactly what we are doing. We are waiting.

For its part, the Bloc Quebecois firmly believes that the government must take initiatives that can provide jobs for our fellow citizens.

A plan to encourage manufacturers of military equipment to move away from this type of production and export and onto other fields. A well-defined strategy is the key to success for the conversion of high-technology defence industries to civilian production.

Defence industries are a pillar of the high-technology, research and development sector, and our competitiveness and our future depend in part on high technology. That is very important.

A strong industrial fabric is essential to economic prosperity and job creation. High technology offers high-paying jobs and, furthermore, it uses our natural resources as well as products and services from our enterprises.

I want to enunciate the three main recommendations of the strategy we advocate. First, the government should create a conversion fund as part of its comprehensive industrial conversion strategy.

• (1700)

The main mission of this fund would be to improve and add to the assistance provided within existing programs, with the objective of ensuring defence facilities and businesses an adequate and long-term support in their conversion and diversification undertakings.

Second, the government will have to create conversion advisory committees at local and regional levels. Finally, the government will have to form an independent committee to examine the different existing programs that could be used.

Needless to say that this strategy must be aimed first and foremost at completely reforming the DIPP.

The federal government must assume a part of the responsibilities. When you are elected, you must assume responsibility for these businesses' dependency towards arms production.

My intervention today indicates well that we will continue our representations, and I hope that the federal government will respond as soon as possible to the legitimate expectations of businesses from Quebec and Canada.

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to know that the member opposite has read our red book and is now aware of this government's priority which is job creation.

It is what we have been trying to achieve over the last six months, since we came to power. I think we have been quite successful.

Not to mention all the programs we have created, the infrastructure program has been implemented to help the small and medium-sized businesses that need our support.

I also want to stress that the Minister of National Defence has stated that the whole defence policy is now under review, including the industries that need to diversify their activities and produce other goods than nuclear equipment. We all agree that Canadians do not want any more production in that area.

The member mentioned that between 1990 and 1994 there has been a great number of layoffs. Why have we been elected? Because the previous government did not have a job creation program. Nor dit it have a Canadian vision for this country. There has been a problem in the area of job creation. We have been elected on that platform. Job creation is in the red book.

As far as Quebec is concerned, as a member coming from that province I can say that on this side of the House we are not concerned only with Quebec but with all of Canada and the unity of this country. If members opposite want to help job creation, they have to help us first with the programs aimed at creating jobs all over Canada and stop talking only about the Constitution or splitting up this country.

We have not changed our minds even if we are not sitting on the same side of the House. We are true federalists. Job creation has always been one of our priorities.

Could the member tell me why the current program does not meet the needs of businesses in Quebec or elsewhere in Canada?

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for her statement which seems very honest.

Let me deal first with the infrastructure program. It is true that program was implemented by the new government and it is an excellent program. You all know that what we need now in Canada is job creation.

That program will create jobs, but there are conditions.

• (1705)

First, there are small municipalities, in my riding and elsewhere, which cannot respect all of the program's requirements and have problems obtaining a program because of that.

Second, the infrastructure program will not develop high technology for the future of Canada and Quebec; let me say I am happy to mention the two together because the Bloc Quebecois is a sovereignist party, yes it does want sovereignty, but not a brutal and independent one. We wish to maintain relations with the rest of Canada. Since you are also from Quebec, my province, Madam Speaker, you know there will always be close relationships between Quebec and the rest of Canada.

However, Quebec is different. Everybody knows it. We hear it all the time. Just listen to the people sitting next to us, that is what they say. We are different. The day it will be accepted as a fact, everything will be easier. There is one important thing for the government, for the party in office. The Liberals are in office now, so they are able to consult the most intelligent and most competent persons in Canada and in Quebec and ask them what to do. If the government does not know what to do, it holds the necessary authority to at least do that.

I think the problem with our government is that it consulted a lot without presenting us with a legislative agenda equal to our expectations. As for the DIPP, all I can say is that we are experiencing delays. It is not functioning. Funds are frozen. We have the funds; now we should invest them the right way.

I think if the government is serious, it must consider the motion of the Bloc Quebecois and act upon it.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I find it amusing to see the hon. member for Shefford panic and think that things are going from bad to worse in Quebec. That would be true if the sovereigntist government were to go off to sulk in a corner and to do as it pleased. The hon. member did not do his homework. When he did his research, he forgot to read the budget. If he had done so, he would know that the Liberal government will broaden the DIPP criteria to include more industries.

I would like to remind him what Paul D. Manson, a former Canadian Forces Chief of Staff and now the president of Paramax, said about his company: "Nearly two years ago, we created a task force to explore business opportunities in the civilian sector. We identified four or five very promising areas. Our parent company also extended its support and increased our budget for research and development. We answered some calls for tenders and, before the end of the year, we should have good contracts."

The hon. member, who is a sovereigntist and a separatist, should be trying to create a Canadian industrial family, instead of sulking and trying to leave us. He should be doing something constructive and positive, such as creating interactive jobs throughout Canada.

Mr. Leroux (Shefford): Madam Speaker, I listened to the remarks of my colleague and I found them quite cynical. I think both sides of the House will agree that this hon. member's attitude was rather carefree in the past. Contrary to the hon. member, I think that the best that can happen is for Quebec to finally opt for self-determination.

• (1710)

On the other hand, you can quote all the letters from all the company presidents in the world, this will not change the fact that 11,000 jobs were lost in Quebec. Each and every person who was laid off did not necessarily write a letter, but the fact remains that 11,000 jobs were lost. What we want is for the government which was elected to create jobs to roll up its sleeves and finally get things going for the benefit of our country.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate today, for a few minutes, and particularly so as a member of the government party.

Since the election, last October, the Liberal government has taken to heart the commitments in our red book, the commitments that had been presented to Canadians after much reflection and debate within our political party.

For this government, jobs are the priority. Since its very first day in office, the new government began to keep its promises and implement policy initiatives designed to create jobs, to revive the economy, to spur economic growth, all things that Canadians had been deprived of during the last years of the Conservative government.

The February 24 budget we presented to the Canadian public was a continuation of the initiatives the government had begun to put implement. There was the infrastructure program that will create jobs directly, renew the infrastructure across Canada and kick-start the much needed economic growth. In the last budget, the government put the emphasis on small and medium-sized businesses as the engine of the economy, with several initiatives designed to sustain them across Canada, so that they can create jobs.

We also put the emphasis on the electronic and high tech sectors, which in our opinion are other engines of the Canadian economy. We have started to examine several areas of government policy and activity through in-depth reviews of foreign policy, defence and social security, a field I am involved in as chairman of a House committee.

We have taken measures to build up the confidence of Canadians in political and governmental institutions. Canadians have responded, as can be seen in the polls and in the decreased contempt they feel for politicians and the government. These measures have been taken under the guidance of a Prime Minister who is a man of experience, who feels a strong and sincere passion for Canada and the future of Canada, and who sees how this country can become one of the guiding lights of the 21st century.

• (1715)

Quebecers have benefitted from federal programs and initiatives. The recent budget included measures to promote job creation in Quebec. That province was largely spared when severe cuts were made in Atlantic Canada, for whom defence spending is very important. It is not easy for those provinces.

The federal government took part in many joint programs with the Quebec government and Quebec firms to create jobs, particularly in the defence and high technology industries in Montreal, Quebec City and elsewhere.

It seems strange that the official opposition, which wants to take Quebec out of Canada, should always be saying, through this motion and its remarks today, that the federal government does not give enough money to Quebec and does not give enough contracts to Quebec firms. This is ironic and even inconsistent for a party dedicated to Quebec separation.

When the official opposition talks that way, it should think about the benefits for Quebecers of the presence of Quebec in the Canadian federation, and it should try to co-operate with the government in order to create jobs that will keep the economy going. It should strive to build a better Canada instead of breaking up this great country.

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis): Madam Speaker, the member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, whom I know well since he is chairman of the human resources committee, of which I am a member, today criticizes the role of the Official Opposition and links it to sovereignty. Before doing that, however, he talked about a few things, and I would like to refresh his memory on certain facts. He said that Quebec was spared by the Budget in terms of cuts.

I would like to ask him, after the many demonstrations made not only by the Official Opposition, but the Government of Quebec as well, if he really believes that the federal government spared Quebec when it closed the Collège militaire royal in Saint-Jean, the only francophone military college.

I will not restart the debate held earlier, but I am still anxiously waiting for the government to take action in the MIL Davie case. There was no response, as we said a little earlier. I do not want to restart the debate, but we had no answer whatever on this subject.

As for the helicopters, the government speedily cancelled the contracts that the Conservatives had made. However, unlike Bill C-22 on Toronto's Pearson Airport, which we are now discussing, there was no compensation.

Formerly, when the federal government withdrew from certain projects, it created a regional development fund, as in the case of Laprade. But in this case, there was nothing of the sort. Yet, the jobs on the line were very high-tech ones.

In this respect, you know, the member should share his concerns with us because his region is having problems with unemployment and fishing. He should himself be worried about the situation. I understand that this afternoon, he is on the other side, he is a member of the government, he does not dare to express his concerns. According to what I heard, I do not think a lot of progress was made in his province, Nova Scotia, since the Liberal Party's election, because unemployment is still very high. Quebecers are preoccupied because they lost 11,000 hich-tech jobs. It is up to the government to respond.

We, in the opposition, proposed this debate today because we feel that the conversion from military to civilian use is extremely important. Maybe it is not the most important issue, but it is one of the most important. Therefore, instead of accusing us of debating on the Constitution, the member should stick to today's issue, which is the problem of defence industry conversion.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cap-Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, first of all, I wish to thank the hon. member opposite for his question and also for his participation in the Human Resources Development Committee, where he made a very useful contribution on behalf of his party. But in responding to some points that he has raised, I said that Quebec had been considerably spared by the defence cuts in the budget. I say this because it is true and because other parts of Canada have suffered much deeper cuts in terms of funds, dollars and jobs.

If we had followed his party's guidelines, the cuts would have been much deeper in Quebec and elsewhere. But I think that what the hon. member must remember is that, for example, on the MIL Davie issue, I am not an expert on that, but from what I understand, it is under discussion by both levels of government. There is a plan and both governments are discussing it, and that is what they have to do in a country such as ours. And that is what we need in order to find solutions to our problems. With that, I think the hon. member should, as he has been doing on the committee, and his party also should participate constructively in solutions that we must all bring to the problems, not only in Quebec, but in other areas of this country as well.

[English]

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member this. The motion relates to the unacceptable delays in converting the national defence industry to civilian production, but minimum reference was made to that actual approach in his presentation.

I would like him to expand on that theme a little bit, if indeed there is a program along this line and if there is some delay in this that could possibly be speeded up.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question. To my knowledge the process of defence conversion is well under way, as has been mentioned by previous speakers. The government is assisting this process.

I did not feel the need to go into a great deal of detail since those points have already been made by those closer to the issue than myself.

• (1725)

We are well aware that parallel to a restructuring in the defence sector, which is proceeding and which will be informed by the debate and by the review on defence policy now taking place, as well as other initiatives which the government is taking to promote the high technology and information sectors of our economy, that we will assist and support the conversion of industries currently developed to focus mainly on military production, into other activities.

It is not something that takes place overnight. It is a process in which the government is assisting. We are not following the Reform Party's approach which would have been, as I understood it, not to cut defence and not to support conversion, which I find rather contradictory certainly in the light of the changes that are taking place not only in Canada but around the world in this very important sector of our economy.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Seeing no further members rising—

LABOUR RELATIONS

Mr. Bernard St-Laurent (Manicouagan): Madam Speaker, my question would probably be for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Development of Human resources.

Since February 20, 400 employees of the QNS & L of Sept-Îles in my riding of Manicouagan are locked out. Federal law does not forbid the employer, the IOC mining company, to hire scabs, which naturally makes the situation extremely tense and even ready to explode.

Since nothing hinders its activities, the company refuses to negotiate with its employees even if they want to work.

• (1735)

I would like to ask the Liberal government if they agree that the absence of a federal anti-scab law is the reason for the deterioration of negotiations between QNS & L and local 9344 of the steel workers' union. I would also ask the government if they intend to intervene in that labour dispute and thus help the workers?

[English]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to respond on behalf of the government to the hon. member's question and I thank him for taking such an interest in the workers in his constituency.

The question of restricting the use of replacement workers during legal work stoppages raises a number of complex issues, including the need to ensure that necessary services are provided to the Canadian public. Protecting the public interest is of particular relevance in the federal jurisdiction as the Canada Labour Code governs many industries which provide necessary services.

While the code does not prohibit the use of replacement workers, it does provide protection for workers engaged in legal work stoppages. The code prohibits an employer from disciplining an employee for engaging in a legal work stoppage. As well, an employer cannot discipline an employee for refusing to perform the duties of another employee who is involved in a legal work stoppage.

Once a work stoppage is terminated, employees are entitled to return to their employment in preference to any persons hired to replace them.

Despite the complex nature of labour relations within federal jurisdiction, the existing system generally works as intended. Most collective bargaining negotiations are settled by the parties in direct negotiations. Of those that do require conciliation officer assistance, more than 90 per cent—many people do not realize this, Madam Speaker—are settled without a work stoppage.

Part I of the Canada Labour Code has been designed to balance the rights and responsibilities of labour and management. This careful balance ensures that the collective bargaining system functions effectively in the vast majority of cases. For this reason it is important to consider the issue of restricting the use of replacement workers during work stoppages only in the context of a comprehensive review of the code.

At a future date in the context of the full review, extensive consultations will be held and full consideration will be given to all representations on this subject.

I hope this answers the hon. member's concerns.

RWANDA

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, it is a bit reluctantly and a bit, if I may say, obscenely, that I would ask the following question to the Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, because of the horror and the deep sadness of the intolerable events that are occurring in Rwanda. It is really hard for us, here, in this House, to imagine the situation out there. Let us just think about the 1,500 Rwanda nationals who live here, in Canada, and fear for the life of their families and friends.

[English]

I know the Canadian government is taking action in this very difficult situation. I asked the minister the other day if it was not possible to conceive of a surgical strike, a surgical operation whereby someone could go into Kigali and at least allow the innocent civilians who are trapped there in this incredible situation an escape route.

I asked the minister to use his best efforts to see whether through the United Nations this could be done. We have heard on the news that the United Nations is talking about this. Well, the talking is going on and the killing is going on.

We know that this situation requires a regional solution. We know that the Organization for African Unity is there. The Organization of African Unity needs some political will behind it. The Canadian government has earned a great deal of respect and goodwill in Africa. It can provide a political impetus to the process. It can also provide logistical support to the process.

• (1740)

What is being done at this time to try to resolve this situation? I have spoken of a surgical operation and providing the logistical and political motivation to the Organization of African Unity so it is able to step forward. We can give it the strength, give it the ability to carry out an operation which only it can achieve.

[Translation]

I would like to end my question, Madam Speaker, the way I started it. Africa is far away, but I believe that what we will do in this situation will determine how that Canada will respond in similar situations that are likely to occur in this more and more unstable and troubled world.

[English]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs): Madam Speaker, unfortunately the civil war continues to claim numerous lives in Rwanda. We are in contact with the UN, the Organization of African Unity, friendly countries and other NGOs in order to determine how best to come to the aid of the Rwandan people.

Next week the Prime Minister will be meeting with the president of the international committee of the Red Cross to exchange views on the provision of humanitarian assistance.

CIDA has already provided $3 million in emergency aid since April's outbreak of violence. General Dallaire I must point out again continues to play a key role in leading the United Nations assistance mission to Rwanda. As an intermediary between the warring factions and as a participant in the humanitarian operations he has done his utmost to attempt to obtain a ceasefire with the assistance of the other seven Canadian soldiers.

Before deciding what action to take, the Security Council is awaiting a reply from the African countries to the Secretary-General's request for assistance. Canada's eventual contribution will be considered in light of the Security Council's decision.

The Security Council is apparently leaning toward a regional solution with OAU participation funded by the United Nations. The RPF and representatives of the government have travelled to Tanzania to negotiate a ceasefire but are not talking to one another. However, they talk separately to the Tanzanian facilitator.

The Department of Foreign Affairs received the Rwandan ambassador earlier this week to encourage his government to negotiate in good faith and end the killing once and for all. A similar message has been transmitted to the RPF via his representative in New York. Politicians of both sides were told that Canada will have a long memory toward those who exert responsibilities and do not use their power to put an end to these massacres.

The Canadian Forces Hercules operating out of Nairobi into Kigali was shot at this morning after landing in Kigali. There were no injuries and damage was superficial. Flying has temporarily ceased until the situation at the airport has stabilized.

I thank the hon. member for Rosedale for bringing this crisis to the attention of Canada's Parliament. I also want to congratulate him on the excellent work he is doing in the whole area of foreign affairs.

FLU VACCINE

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides): Madam Speaker, last April 26, I questioned the Minister of Public Works and Government Services about the purchase of flu vaccine. His answer reflected his decision on that issue. However, everything was not said about the purchase of that vaccine. There are still some questions left concerning the role of the minister as buy broker for 4 million units of vaccine for the benefit of the provinces and territories. I would like to state a few disturbing and somewhat troubling facts about the process which led to the federal government's decision on that issue.

In 1993, the contract for the supply of the flu vaccine was awarded entirely to Bio Vac. The call for tenders for 1994 was issued on December 8, 1993. The tender closing date was January 7, 1994 at 2 p.m.

Two bids were received; Bio Vac from Laval was offering the vaccine at $1.70 per unit and Connaught from Toronto was offering a made in the U.S.A. vaccine at $1.46 per unit.

• (1745)

Connaught's bid being lower, the federal minister who bought the vaccine seemed to prefer its American vaccine. That is when dumping allegations were made to the effect that Connaught was selling this very vaccine for close to $3 in the United States, but charging us $1.46 for it. Faced with this dumping issue the minister extended the bidding period from January 7 to 18. At that time, we were well aware the government was hesitant and delaying its decision. We knew the situation was rather tricky considering that jobs were at stake, as well as a large investment in biotechnology, proposed by Bio Vac in Laval.

Another extension was announced, from January 18 to February 3. All this time, the Minister was under pressure to rapidly award the contract to BioVac. In a letter dated January 27, the Quebec Minister of Industry, Commerce and Technology asked Minister Dingwall to decide quickly in favour of BioVac.

On March 25, the minister told the House that he was looking for a Canadian solution to a serious Canadian problem. On April 20, the minister announced that he had decided to split the difference and that his Canadian solution was to buy two million American vaccines. The minister, as a Canadian broker, was responsible for the lay-off of 26 employees with his Canadian solution, jeopardising at the same time a $32 million investment in biotechnology in Laval.

This unacceptable decision raises some questions. What explanation can the minister give for the fact that his negotiations increased the average cost of the vaccine from $1.58 to $1.77, causing an additional expense of more than $750,000 to taxpayers?

Second, given that the minister will now pay $1.77 per dose, why did he refuse, on January 7, 1994, at the close of the first call for tenders, to award the full contract to BioVac at $1.70 per dose?

Third, can the minister tell us why, as a Canadian broker, he buys American vaccines at a cost of $1.69 per dose while BioVac's initial bid was $1.70? How can he explain such a cheeseparing saving of 1 cent on two million doses of vaccine, or $20,000, compared to 26 jobs lost? Has the minister analyzed the economic cost of these 26 job losses? Finally, why is he buying vaccines made in the U.S.A. when they could be entirely produced in Canada? The minister's Canadian solution is a bad joke.

To add a final touch to this already gloomy picture, rumour has it that the minister asked BioVac to sign a letter stating its satisfaction with the deal. What unmitigated nerve on the part of the minister!

The federal broker-minister is not transparent in this case. He acted in such a way that he penalized a Canadian firm and disregarded the taxpayers' interests. His decision is senseless and thoughtless. We ask the minister to disclose all the facts and to table, if he has the courage to, all documents pertaining to this case.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Before recognizing the hon. parliamentary secretary, I just want to remind the hon. member for Laurentides that she should not use the name of a minister but his or her title instead.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to respond to the hon. member and clarify yet again the federal government's role in this important matter.

All members will surely agree that the availability of influenza vaccine for school children and the elderly across Canada is an issue which should be far removed from partisan political considerations. The health and safety of Canada's children and the elderly is this government's first priority. I hope the same is true for my friend across the floor.

I am proud of the role that the department of the minister to whom I am parliamentary secretary and the federal government have played for the past twenty-one years on behalf of the provinces and territories.

With Public Works and Government Services acting as the purchasing agent of the vaccine on behalf of a joint federal-provincial-territorial committee, we have been able to achieve the economies of scale which bulk purchases represent. The price per dose for one large national order is lower than if a number of smaller purchases are made by the different jurisdictions.

The result is a sterling demonstration of joint federal-provincial-territorial cooperation and efficient use of taxpayers' dollars.

• (1750)

Members should note that the value of these purchases is now approximately $7 million per year, of which 99 per cent is paid for by the provinces and territories. The federal government uses and pays for less than 1 per cent of the vaccine.

As has been announced in this House on several occasions, and following a competitive process, an agreement in principle was concluded on April 13, 1994, between the federal-provincial-territorial committee and two Canadian drug manufacturers. The contracts will be split 50/50 between IAF BioVac in Laval, Quebec, and Connaught Laboratories in Willowdale, Ontario. These contracts are scheduled to be signed later this month. I should point out to the House that the hon. member mentioned that there was a significant reduction in one particular year, but if we look at the average for the last three years, the proportion has gone from 38 per cent then to 50 per cent now. That is 12 per cent more.

Prices are lower than in past years, and they are going down. This year's price of $1.77 per dose is lower than the 1992 and 1993 prices.

To reiterate, both companies, the provinces and territories have agreed to this arrangement. In questioning the government on this issue, the member and her party have made a number of factual errors. If one did not know better, one might conclude that there is a deliberate attempt to mislead members of this House and the Canadians we represent.

I sincerely hope that this is not the case.

2002 OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis): Madam Speaker, on April 22, I asked the Deputy Prime Minister a question about the federal contribution to Quebec 2002. That was a two-part question. First, I asked her when her government would appoint a negotiator to determine with Quebec 2002 the amount of funding needed.

"Soon", answered the Deputy Prime minister. On this issue, I am quite satisfied, since the daily newspaper Le Soleil reported, on April 30, that the federal government had appointed, a day or two before, Mr. Laurent Tremblay, executive director of the Quebec office of the Department of Canadian Heritage, to act as spokesperson for the federal government. One week is not that bad a delay and we are satisfied with this part of the answer.

But we fail to see why it took six months and a question in the House for the federal government to reply to an organization's request. Six months is a long time. Will we need to press the government in the House on all issues so that they finally reply to organizations' requests?

We were satisfied with the answer we got this time. A negotiator was appointed within a week. Unfortunately, negotiations have not started yet and the deadline for Quebec 2002 has not been changed. Indeed, the final bids must be in by August 18. They would like a definite answer from the federal government within the next month, by the middle of June.

That was the second part of my question. I asked the Deputy Prime Minister if she was prepared to give a mandate to a negotiator modelled on what was done for Calgary in terms of federal assistance when it bid on the 1988 Winter Games. I have not received an answer to my question, either from the government or from the negotiator.

I would like to remind this government that although governments do come and go, it does have some responsibility since in 1992, the former prime minister did make a verbal commitment. However, since a new government is in office, this commitment needs to be reaffirmed and confirmed, since we are dealing with relatively tight deadlines.

Calgary received $240 million in financing guarantees. I cannot understand why the federal government is so reluctant to commit to a similar amount when a study has shown that this project would generate in the neighbourhood of $200 million in terms of direct and indirect jobs, the GST and so on. Why is the government taking so long to decide when it could earn these kinds of revenues? Quebec is asking for equal consideration for the 2002 Games, that is $240 million in financing guarantees, without any indexation.

This financial guarantee is extremely important to the residents of the Quebec City region in terms of helping them prepare and present their bid for the Olympic Games. They need some assurance that federal assistance will be forthcoming. A great many concerns are being expressed at the local level. Without assurances of the usual government assistance, people are getting worried.

I hope that I will receive a clearer answer today than I did last time.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Canadian Heritage): Madam Speaker, on several occasions in the past few months, the government of Canada has expressed support for the group of Quebec residents promoting Quebec City's bid to host the 2002 Olympic Games. This is a very important issue which must be considered carefully to ensure the success of the entire operation.

[English]

The federal government has already committed $2.8 million toward supporting Quebec's international bid efforts before the International Olympic Committee. The Minister of Canadian Heritage led a Canadian delegation in February to Lillehammer while promoting Quebec's bid for the winter games.

[Translation]

The federal government's financial commitment could add up to several hundred million dollars. You will agree this is a substantial amount. That is why this commitment has to be considered carefully beforehand. Not only has the Minister of National Heritage asked his officials to work diligently on this, but before a final answer can be given to the organizing committee, he will have to consult with his Cabinet colleagues whose departments will be involved.

Hosting the Olympic Games in Quebec City in 2002 requires major financial support from the various levels of government, but this project must also receive unequivocal support from the local people; without this support, holding a sports event of that magnitude would be unthinkable.

[English]

IOC will make its final decision in Budapest in June 1995, after making a preselection in January 1995 when it will invite four finalists to pursue their bids.

The member can rest assured that the minister is taking the August 18, 1994 deadline for the preselection applications into account. An answer will be announced as soon as possible.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It being 5.59 p.m. this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

(The House adjourned at 5.59 p.m.)
