Whether, taking all circumstances into consideration, a greater or less quantity of seed is better, each farmer must decide for himself. No castiron rule will suit alike every variety of iron rule will suit alike every variety of soil and every degree of fertility. for origin or pretext the name liberal, which a certain number of Canadians who are good Catholics assume or by which they are designated in purely political questions. Others, over-zealous, have taken this as a term of disparagement and applied to those who used it innocently all the condemnations the Holy See pronounced against the real liberals or the revolutionary party. Now, as I have said before, the name of a simple political party was alone in question, and we know that in Great Britain, as in all the British possessions, the name of liberal is used in a sense entirely different from anywhere else; there it designates a political party whose tendencies and aims have nothing in themselves opposed to the principles of Catholic orthodoxy. I wish to insist upon this well established point, occause, in France, there have been newspapers that have sinned in thus very matter, also through excess of zeal or erroneous information. It is, moreover, by this distinction that Mgr. Conroy has been ruled in putting an end to the useless struggle to which I have referred. By his prudence as well as by his zeal and talent of persuasion he has known how to pacify the minds of men, dispel misunderstandings, and draw more closely around the Catholic for Canada the bonds of the most unfailing and perfect charity. It is fitting to add that in this work of pacification the failing and perfect charity. It is litting to add that in this work of pacification the delegate apostolic found powerful auxiliaries among the most influential of the clergy and the episcopate. In fine, peace has been established to the satisfaction of all."

It originated in the rear of the Tower Hotel and spread with great rapidity destroying properties wned by Mr. Currie, Ed. Seery, Mackay, John Macpherson, Elijah Clarke Ald. He claims that a regi. ment and a half of the Russian cavalry and four battalions of infantry are totally destroyed.

A special from Tiflis says that it estimated that the Russians captured in the battle 32 battalions of Turks, 4 brigades of artillery, 100 officers and 2,000 horses. is reported that the Russians made an attack in force upon Plevna on 20th inst., but were repulsed. The Turks reconnoitred on the Roumanian bank of the Danube beyond Salazo Island. Osman Pasha telegraphs the enemy attacked his position on the right wing on Friday. The attacking party consisted of only one battalion and some sappers, and was repulsed. This affair seems of itself to have been utterly unimportant, but it was probably a feint to draw Osman's attention from Gravitza, as a Bucharest semi-official paper of Saturday evening announces that the Roumanians had twice heroically attacked the second Grivitza redoubt, but were repulsed.

A telegram dated Poridin, Saturday, says the Roumanians captured the redoubt Friday after three vigorous assaults, but during the night the Turks, collecting all their forces unexpectedly, after a most sanguinary contest retook it. A despatch of the 22nd inst. to the Standard from Bucharest says the Rus-

Allasa's PROMISE.

From time to time, at considerable intervals, news caine of the young man in Glasgow, and it was good news. He was getting on well at college; his master was in every way considerate; he was ready to help him to some sort of work better suited for him. But at the end of those letters which Ailasa read aloud to her mother, the girl said to herself, "And why does he not come back to see his old friends?"

One day there was a great commotion

The young man was in no hurry to protest against her taking all this trouble. On the contrary he accepted her offer eagerly; and the mother thought him a prudent lad to think of his clother.

"Ailasa," said he, as they walked across the moor in the twilight, "you will never forget that is a promise you helf given me this day."

"I will never forget that Alister Lewis," she said simply. "But if you fore it is not every one that would come back from Glasgow to marry a poor lass.

"That is a good thing, Duncan Lewis," she answered. "You have kept off the drink like a prudent man. It is not every one has so much money on the bank at Stornoway."

Three months went by before they got a letter. It was on the evening of a warm autumn day that Ailasa saw the solitary figure of the postman come over the level moors; and in the distance—in the midst of the glow of rich solitary figure of the glow of the glo leena and Darroch, and if I shall see them any more. That is all the news. If you would send me a letter with the news, that would be a great pleasure to me. I was thinking I would like to send you a book if you will take it from me; but if you do not wish to take the book from me you will tell me about that in the letter with all the news. And I hope your mother is very well; and I remain, dear Ailasa, your faithful friend, Alister Lewis."

The young girl did not look at the book. She read and re-read the letter, and har face was full of pride and gladness. Had he not prospered famously in the far city, where they had already so far recognized the erudition he had picked up in Darroch that they were going to admit him to the great University? And he had maintained himself, keeping himself free from debt, and he is a word of the second that is more in the bank at Stornoway; and I was saying that I would come and look after the farm at Carn-Slean, "That is ferry good of you, Duncan Lewis," said Ailasa, with some surprise; he was not ordinarily generous.

"But this is it, Ailasa," said he was not ordinarily generous.

"But this is it, Ailasa," said he was saying—I was saying that I would come and he far on one to take care of you if your mother was ill. And I was saying—I was saying the tarm at Carn-Slean, and they walked hand in hand, as they had often done in their childhood. They spoke little, but there was a proud and confident look on the young man's face. Mrs. Macdonald like to he word I was wishing to speak to you, Ailasa Macdonald."

The girl looked more and more astonished, and then turned, as if for guidance, to her mother. Mrs. Macdonald had began to peel some potatoes for supper, and was apparently not listening.

"To be your wife, Duncan Lewis' Allasa," said he word I was wishing to speak to you, had often done in their childhood. They spoke little, but there was a proud and confident look on the you and they walked hand in hand, as they do the care of you if your mother was a proud and confident loo
