

The Weekly Monitor.

BRIDGETOWN, OCTOBER 17, 1877.

Instead of our usual editorial this week we give some practical remarks from an article in the October issue of the "Canadian Insurance Advocate" in reference to the danger there is in neglecting to look after the flues, stove pipes and heating apparatus of our homes. The season of the year is upon us when it is absolutely necessary for comfort to have our dwellings warmed by artificial means. The nights too, are growing long, and the use of lights have to play their part to a larger degree than in midsummer. When we consider the heart-rending calamities that are almost daily chronicled in the press, of persons losing their lives by fire, it behooves every householder to take the necessary precaution to prevent as far as possible the destruction by fire of his premises. This can only be done by looking after the heating apparatus that we have in use. Before any stoves or pipes are put in use every chimney and flue should be thoroughly examined, in order that no crevices be left through which sparks could find their way out and ignite the surrounding woodwork. Only last week we had to chronicle the destruction of a house near Port George from a defect in the flue in which a fire had been lighted for the first time this fall. The remarks below are to the point.

The entertainment given in Victoria Hall on Thursday night, the 18th inst. by the ladies of St. James's Church assisted by a number of their friends belonging here and elsewhere, was a very grand affair, and remunerative likewise some $50.00, which was realized by the sale of tickets and refreshments. Those who took part in the performance executed the various portions assigned them with great credit. The music provided for by Mrs. Goodwin and Mr. Bristowe was up to their usual standard and the singing as a whole good.

Sessions.—The October term of the Court of Sessions will be held at the Court House, Annapolis Royal, on Tuesday next. Below we give the names of the Grand Jurors for the ensuing year: Charles Troop, Albert Randolph, Charles Parker, Wallace Saunders, Joshua Miller, Charles B. Potter, Wm. VanBuskirk, David D. Milner, Fred. Wentzell, James John, John Stevens, Robt. H. Young, Albert Wheelock, D. P. Milberry, J. D. Winchester, N. P. Marshall, Jas. Farnsworth, James Phinney, J. R. Longmire, Jos. A. Willet, Millidge Marshall, Ab. Balcomb, Theo. Marshall, Joseph Copeland. Drawn in open Court, 5th Oct., 1877. Signed, H. W. SARRIS. Edward Bartheaux, J. P., A. W. Corbett, J. P., Associate Justices, Geo. R. GNASAN, Proth'y.

BOSTON AND VICINITY.

(No. 7.)

In taking a view of Boston from the surrounding hills, the impression is received that its population is multitudinous; and yet that impression fails to impart an adequate idea of the swarming tens of thousands that "live and move and have their being" in that great city. As an illustration—everybody knows that a bee-hive, naturally, is a large insectile community; but in gazing upon it in ordinary times, only a few of the industrious honey-makers are seen. When they swarm, however, and clouds of them are simultaneously buzzing overhead, one gets a tolerably correct idea of the numbers that are the residents of a box of less than two cubic feet in dimensions. It is just so as regards the people of a populous city. No one doubts that they are numerous; but it takes a gala-day to bring them out, to impress a stranger with the multitudes that inhabit the thousands of domiciles that are huddled together in a city like Boston. The visit of President Hayes in the last week of June, gave me an opportunity of obtaining a somewhat comprehensive conception of Boston's teeming population. Miles of street, open windows and house-tops were all alive with human beings feverishly intent upon seeing a live President. Thousands—men, women and children—were all agog to catch a glimpse of the man, who is the temporary monarch of a great Republic, who, after performing the duties for which he was elected (like a subsiding wave of the sea that sinks back into the "vast deep" whence it arose) becomes again a private citizen.

The notion has been entertained, more especially in Europe, that the government of the United States is unstable—that it is peculiarly liable to popular outbreaks—and that the property in all parts of the Union are perilously insecure. The circumstances connected with the late Presidential Election—the mode adopted to settle the indecisive result at the polls—and the intensity of party strife at the time, all conspired to engender fears that disorder and anarchy would ensue. But the discontents, exhibiting their love of political order and reverence for the integrity of the Union, bowed in submission to the decision of the tribunal that was constituted to finally settle the matter. The respect shown the President by everybody in Boston is another proof of the order-loving and law-abiding tendencies of our republican neighbors. It is well-known that although the State of Massachusetts, as a whole, is largely Republican, the City of Boston is preponderantly Democratic; yet the citizens during the Presidential visit exhibited no political hostility, and both parties concurred in manifesting respect for the Chief Magistrate of the nation.

Such crowded streets—such enthusiasm—such boisterous huzzing—and such apparent respect for exalted position transcended everything of the kind I had ever seen or heard before. Everybody seemed to vie with everybody in manifesting respect for the President. There was no procession on the part of the populace, for it was utterly impossible. The centre of the street was kept open for the military escort that was in attendance, and the side-walks of the streets through which the distinguished stranger passed, were compactly jammed with open-eyed citizens of both sexes and of all ages. The route through which the President passed was pre-known; and everybody aimed to get a desirable standing place, and every square foot of available space inside the curbstone was occupied by an eager sight-seer. There, too, were thousands at the windows and on the house-tops. The feeling that prevailed the whole community in reference to the exalted visitant, seemed to me to be universal and intense. But the multitude along the streets did not all belong to Boston. The railway cars that morning brought into the city tens of thousands from the interior and from the suburban towns and villages. Military battalions and brigades, splendidly uniformed, on horse and on foot, preceded and followed the President and his cortege. As the soldiers and volunteers passed along, martial music added to the interest of the scene. Band after band poured its thrilling tribute of melody upon the air, more pleasing to the ear than the uproarious huzzas of the crowds on the side-walks. It was said that there were twenty thousand in the military ranks that escorted the President. The movement of the procession was slow, affording every body the opportunity of getting a full view of "the observed of all observers."

The kindness of a stranger accorded to me a comfortable seat in a shop-drove, where I was favorably situated to see the President, his suite, and his military escort. The chief object of attraction was Mr. Hayes himself. He is a man in the prime of life, his hair slightly tinged with grey, possessed of a comely good-natured countenance. His eye seemed quick and restless at the time, looking upon what was around him with deep feeling and intense gratification. In his physiognomy I could discern nothing indicative of high intellectuality. His position proves that in his mental calibre, he is elevated above mediocrity; but I could not perceive anything in his features to denote a facile breadth or reason of intellect. He probably has a large share of common sense, which is often more conducive to judicious and successful statesmanship than towering genius, and accompanied by distorting eccentricities. Nobody believes that he possesses the dignified political purity of Washington, or the large-mindedness of Jefferson; yet it is justly recognized as the business of Jackson, or the indefatigable purpose which animated Lincoln in the most terrible crisis of his country's history; but, nevertheless, he may prove to be good President. It is not his brilliant occupation of the national chair, he may be admirably adapted to ally and harmonize the discordant party elements that predominate during the administration of his illustrious predecessor. I was a good deal struck with the commanding phisognomy of Sherris, one of the President's Cabinet Ministers. In his countenance, intellectual superiority, decisiveness and intrepidity were unmistakably depicted. But Mr. Everts, the national Attorney General, is distinguished for his fine and dignified phisognomy, with few marks of extraordinary ability, and yet he is celebrated for professional cleverness.

Although President Hayes remained in Boston two or three days after the day which I have attempted to describe, visiting Harvard University and other places of historical interest, I did not see him. I am, however, convinced that he is in the street with Boston's populace gazing at him. His visit gave me the opportunity of being in Boston at a time when its population was stirred by unwonted excitement, and when multitudes were thronging the streets.

PATRICATION ON STATOR?—Colorado comes to the front with a sensation in the shape of a stone figure said to have been discovered in the fossil beds by a "rook sharp" of good repute, Mr. W. A. Conant. It seems almost too soon after the Cardiff hoax to hope to palm off another image of that kind on a too credulous public. It is certain, however, that Barium, who happened to be in Denver at the time, offered $20,000 for the figure and $5,000 more if Prof. Marsh rendered a favorable verdict after examination. Prof. Conant, however, refuses all offers, and is bringing his discovery East. The figure has a generally human shape, with unusually long arms and a well-defined rudimentary tail. Barium's fortunate presence lends such a suspicious air to the whole transaction that he has felt constrained to write a letter explaining how he came to be at the West. Prof. Conant seems to be sincere in his belief that the discovery is a great one, and we shall hear more of it very shortly.—Christian Union.

Among the novelties at the coming Paris Exhibition will be a youth of fourteen, with feet shaped precisely like his hands. He can use them for the same purposes, and plays upon the piano with both hands and feet, having a peculiar chair which enables him to thrust his body into the necessary position.

MARRIAGE OF THE ADMIRAL.

The marriage of His Excellency Vice-Admiral Sir Astley Cooper Key, C. B., to Miss V. Barton, at the Bishop's Chapel, there was an immense gathering of the female youth and beauty yesterday forenoon.

They crowded the church, they thronged the streets, and they climbed over the fields surrounding the church. Shortly before noon the bridal party arrived, comprising the bride and groom, and a large and brilliant retinue of guests.

The ceremony was performed by His Lordship Bishop Binney, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Morton, of H. M. S. Belerophon. An officiating choir, composed of the daughter of Miss R. Key, Miss M. Keo, Miss M. Archibald, Miss Binney, and Lieutenants DeCrispigny, Hamill, Saville, and Chamberlain, sang the nuptial hymns.
