House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Tuesday, April 26, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury) presented the fourth and fifth reports of the select standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.

Mr. Hanson moved that, with the consent of the house, the fifth report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): I desire to lay on the table of the house orders in council P.C. 922, 914, 915, 916, 926, 927, 928, 929, 945, 946, 947, 949, 950, 951, 952 and 953 passed pursuant to the provisions of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932. All of these orders in council deal with the payment of moneys.

EXCISE ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. SPEAKER: The bill standing in the name of the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe (Mr. Laflèche) will be withdrawn by consent.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker on behalf of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), who is unavoidably absent, I should like to move, seconded by Mr. Stevens, that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act to provide for the appointment of a deputy commissioner, and the employment of extra constables in emergencies, and to make further provisions respecting the counting of service in the great war and in the civil service and customs-excise preventive service by officers and constables, for the purposes of pension.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES RESPECTING MEASURES TO RELIEVE DISTRESS

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the governor in council to enter into agreements with all or any of the provinces respecting relief measures in such province or provinces; and to pay out of the consolidated revenue fund such sums as in his discretion may be required to meet the obligations created by such agreements; to provide for special requirements in the national parks and in the drought stricken areas of the province of Saskatchewan; to assist in defraying the cost of the sale and distribution of products of field, farm, sea, river and mine; to loan money to any province on such terms as may be agreed upon and to guarantee the repayment of moneys borrowed by such province and to assist any province in any way that may be deemed necessary or advisable to provide for the relief of distress and the support and maintenance of those requiring assistance, and to loan money to and guarantee the payment of money to any public corporation or undertaking.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

CONVERSION LOAN

RULING OF MR. SPEAKER ON POINT OF ORDER RELATIVE TO STATEMENT OF THE HON. MEMBER FOR SHERBROOKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the orders of the day are proceeded with, I desire to make a statement. On Thursday, April 21, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) raised a point of order, upon which I reserved my decision. At that time the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) rose in his place and in part said:

Mr. Speaker, one week ago to-day I directed the attention of the house to an observation which had been made in the course of the budget debate by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard). What I said upon that occasion will be found at page 2170 of unrevised Hansard. The hon. member was absent for a period of days, but now he is present in his seat I would ask him either to support or withdraw the remarks to which I made reference at that time.

The hon. member for Quebec East, then leading the opposition said:

Before my hon. friend for Sherbrooke rises, I think, Mr. Speaker, that objection to words uttered in the course of a debate must be taken at the time the words are uttered. If I remember well, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance was in the very seat he now occupies when the member for Sherbrooke was delivering his address. The hon. minister did not say a word at the time, he did not take any objection, and I do not think it is in order for him to raise the question to-day.

The Minister of Finance in replying, said in part:

I do not propose to discuss the point of order at all. It is only a question of the general fitness of the character of the remarks and the charges implied in them, and I should think the hon. member for Sherbrooke would be the last person to wish to shield himself behind any point of order.

The hon. member for Quebec East then said:

Behind the rules is always good shelter for a member of parliament.

I then reserved my decision. The statement of the Minister of Finance made on April 14, and which appears at page 2003 of Hansard, was as follows:

I regret that the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) is not in his seat, but I believe this matter to be of such importance that I should refer to it at the first opportunity, so I would ask the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), who is leading the opposition at the moment, to be good enough to direct what I have to say to the attention of the hon. member.

It has been brought to my notice, sir, that during the course of his remarks in the budget debate the hon. member for Sherbrooke referred to the conversion loan, and stated that he had advised the people of his district to convert their bonds. Then at page 2157 of unrevised Hansard, he went on to say:

"I told these men, 'If the government want you to convert your bonds I think you should do so.' They converted their bonds. What happened? Insiders of this government did not convert their bonds; the people of Sherbrooke and the eastern townships did."

With respect to that statement I have to observe that the hon. member said either too much or too little, and I must ask him either to withdraw his remarks or to substantiate the facts.

The hon. member for Quebec East may have misapprehended the purport of the remarks of the hon. the Minister of Finance who did not allege that the words used by the hon. member for Sherbrooke were unparliamentary or that his language in itself was objectionable in the sense that it was unparliamentary. What the minister did suggest was that grave charges were implied in the remarks of the hon. member for Sherbrooke and he invited him either to withdraw the implications or to support them.

My ruling is that though there is no rule whereby the hon. the Minister of Finance may insist upon it, if the hon. member for Sherbrooke wishes to make an explanation of the remarks in question, he is not estopped from doing so by the rules or usages of the house.

[Mr. Speaker.]

PRIVILEGE—MR. SAUVE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ARTHUR SAUVE (Postmaster General) (Translation): I wish to state that the words which were imputed to me by the newspaper La Patrie, in its report of a meeting held at St. Eustache, on August 9, 1931, and to an extract of which my attention was drawn in the speech of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger), at page 2243 of Hansard, 1932, were never made by me neither at that meeting nor elsewhere. I mentioned that fact, at the time, by telephone to Mr. Dufresne, the news editor of La Patrie. I may say that no such statement appears in the reports of other newspapers.

CORRECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I rise, not to a question of privilege, but to ask as meekly as I can that the records of the house be corrected in connection with what occurred yesterday when I did rise to a question of privilege. On page 348 of the votes and proceedings will be found the following two lines and a half:

On the orders of the day being called, Mr. Neill quoted a speech delivered by the hon. member for Cariboo, Mr. Fraser, on March 22nd ultimo, and endeavoured to reply to a part of it as a question of privilege.

In that there are only three errors. In the first place I did not quote a speech delivered by the hon. member for Cariboo; I quoted one statement made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber); in the second place, it occurred, not on March 22 ultimo, whatever that may mean, but on April 22, and in the third place I endeavoured, not to reply to a part of it, but to contradict a definite misstatement.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1932-33

REFERENCE TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I should like to move that the house revert to the order of motions in order that I may move that certain estimates that were tabled a few days ago may be referred to the select committee on railways and shipping. The motion was in the hands of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), but he is confined to the house and it would expedite business if we could revert to the order of motions in order that I may make the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the house we shall revert to motions.

Mr. BENNETT moved:

That the estimates tabled Friday, April 22, 1932, being resolutions Nos. 314, 315, 316 and 317, be referred to the select standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.

Motion agreed to.

RELIEF WAGES—INCOME TAXATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): May I call the attention of the Minister of Labour to a statement that appears in the western papers to the effect that the province of British Columbia is to collect income tax on relief wages? As this government pays a portion of the money, surely the minister will not be a party to such a ridiculous course.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Monday, April 25, consideration of the motion of Hon. E. N. Rhodes (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Ralston, and the proposed amendment to the amendment of Mr. Gardiner.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I regret that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), on account of an indisposition which I trust may be brief, is prevented from occupying his seat in the house this afternoon. I should like to join with others who have spoken, in congratulating him upon the method of presentation of the first speech which, as Minister of Finance, he has delivered in this parliament. We all expected that with his large parliamentary experience, he having filled the position of Speaker of the House of Commons as well as that of Premier of his own province, he would, in the presentation of his budget, give us a statement that at least in form and method would be exemplary. I think in that regard none of us has been disappointed.

I should also like to congratulate very warmly the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) upon the most effective reply which he made to the address of the Minister of Finance. I doubt whether it would have been possible for anyone to have made a more incisive or penetrating analysis of the speech of the minister, or to reveal in more complete fashion the consequences which have followed in large part from policies of hon. gentlemen opposite, and which have been so greatly deplored by the Minister of Finance himself though attributed by him as being due in greatest measure to world conditions.

The speech delivered by the Minister of Finance has the distinction, if such it may be called, of being the most depressing and gloomiest picture that has ever been given to the House of Commons, of conditions in the Dominion of Canada. I say that regretfully, realizing that this is due in part to a condition which exists throughout the world, but also in part to policies of hon. gentlemen opposite which have been put into force since they have come into office. In almost every particular the facts as presented by the minister were the direct opposite of what all of us, irrespective of the political parties to which we belong, would have wished them to be. Where we should have liked to see increases, there were figures representing decreases and where we should have wished to see decreases, the statistics given represented increases. There were increases in the public debt, bringing the public debt to a point higher than it has reached at any previous time in Canada. There were increases in taxation, making the tax burden heavier than it has been at any former period. The total figures as regards both indirect and direct taxation stand higher than they have been at any time of our history. The figures with regard to increases of borrowings indicated larger borrowings on the part of the administration than has ever before been the case except during the period of the war in reference to war matters, and I should also except those borrowings which have been for purely productive purposes as for example the construction of great railways throughout the country. I am speaking now of borrowings necessitated to meet actual current conditions. Where we might have hoped for some evidence of decreases in the general cost of government, there has been but little. With regard to trade, where we had hoped the figures would show that our trade was at least holding its own, the decreases were very considerably greater than they have been at any time within the period of a year. Similarly the decreases with regard to revenue have been greater than they have been in previous years, particularly from one source which I shall mention later. And finally, it is generally conceded that the purchasing power of the Canadian people stands to-day at a lower figure than it has been at any former period. Along with all this there are the figures with relation to unemployment. We were told by hon. gentlemen opposite that if their policies were put into force, unemployment would be speedily ended. But the figures this year as given by the Minister of Finance and referred to by him indicate that unemployment is worse than it has ever been in the history of the Dominion. So I say, Mr. Speaker, that the picture of the country's condition which has been presented by the Minister of Finance is the gloomiest, the most dismal, the most depressing that has ever been depicted by any minister of the crown in this house.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have endeavoured to make it appear that this condition has been due to world conditions. I wish to say that world conditions have had a great deal to do with it, but what there has been of ill effect in world conditions has been greatly intensified by the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite. In speaking of the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite I refer to three in particular. First, the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to the Imperial conference of 1930. If that conference was a disaster, was a tragedy, was a fiasco, as we all know it was, this was due more than aught else to the method of approach of the Prime Minister and the proposals and policies which he presented to the conference; it was due to the manner in which Canada's position was presented in London in 1930. If great good is to come, as we hope it may, out of the conference of the present year, which is the postponed conference, there will have to be a vast change in the manner of approach by Canada's representatives and in the policies and proposals which are presented in the name of Canada to the conference. There will have to be many changes, some of which I shall indicate a little later on.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

But in addition to the policies with respect to the conference, there are also the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to the tariff. I submit that those policies have had a very far-reaching influence in bringing about the disastrous effects which are felt so widely at this time. We know that at the special session of parliament the tariff was raised to heights almost inconceivable, and that again at the last session the tariff was raised still higher. In the budget which hon. gentlemen opposite have brought in this year there is a still further increase in the tariff notwithstanding that such is said not to exist. I am referring, of course, to the so-called excise tax which has been increased 200 per cent and which in reality is an increase in the tariff. These increases in the tariff have had the effect virtually of prohibiting the entry of goods to any considerable extent into this country. The tariff has ceased to be what we used to speak of as a protective tariff. It has become, as it has been described by some of the journals of hon. gentlemen opposite, a prohibitive tariff. It is a tariff different in kind from anything that Canada has ever had before, and that prohibitive tariff has had a very serious effect upon trade, and having affected trade, it has had a very serious effect upon business generally and upon human well being throughout the country.

Then there has been the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite in the administration of the tariff, a policy which time and again has been referred to in the course of this debate as having led to great uncertainty and great instability as respects the tariff. We have often heard in this house of the importance of stability and certainty in regard to all taxes and in particular with respect to the tariff, but I venture to say that even hon. gentlemen opposite will not for one minute deny that the tariff as it has been administered under the present government has been unstable, has been uncertain, has been of a character which has caused the business community to be filled with dread from day to day as to the conditions with which they might be faced on the day following. The instability of the tariff as the result of the way it has been administered, in addition to the prohibitive rates of the tariff itself, have had a far-reaching effect upon the trade of the country, and through trade upon business, upon taxation, upon unemployment, and upon all the other matters which have an economic relation one to the other.

Then I might add that had hon. gentlemen opposite been prepared to accept some of the suggestions which were made from this side, that conditions would not have been as bad as they are.

Mr. COTNAM: We have had you for ten years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will just endeavour to be polite for the time I am speaking, I will thank him very much. I am going to ask you, Mr. Speaker, from now on kindly to have order kept this afternoon. I have not interrupted an hon. gentleman on the other side speaking in the house this year except to ask a question, and I am entitled in speaking on this great question of the tariff and of the Imperial conference, as I intend to do this afternoon, to have a proper hearing from hon. gentlemen opposite and no interruptions.

I was about to say that we on this side had made in the course of the debates in this house several suggestions which had they been accepted by the administration would, I believe, have been of service to the country. But they have not been accepted, and as a consequence expenditures and borrowings have been on a much larger scale than otherwise would have been the case.

I refer, first of all, to the suggestion that was made at the special session, and again at the session of last year, that there should be called immediately a dominion-provincial conference for the purpose of discussing between the dominion and the provinces financial arrangements as they affect both parties; that before the government entered into the policy of making grants in aid, for all kinds of purposes, and to all sorts of amounts, there should be not merely a one-day conference between the Prime Minister and some of his ministers with the premiers or other ministers of the several provinces, but a gathering that would occupy several days and which would go into the whole question of the relation of the dominion to the provinces in the matter of subsidies, in the matter of grants in aid, in the matter of what particular obligations should be shouldered by the provinces with respect to social services and what particular obligations should be shouldered by the dominion. I say that had a conference of that character been held before the Dominion government began to make these vast loans to the provinces and to enter upon increased grants in aid in one direction or another, and to carry out some of the extravagant schemes on which it has embarked, a large saving would have been effected, and, as a consequence of that saving, there would have been less in the way of borrowing and less in the way of taxation necessary at this particular time. May I again say that I hope that such a conference to consider the financial arrangements between the dominion and the provinces may be held at the earliest possible moment. I do not consider the conference held a few days ago, the one-day interview which took place, as at all the kind of conference that could begin to discuss financial relations as outlined from this side of the house at different times in the course of the debate. I do think that now that we have before us in the very resolution which was introduced this afternoon notice of a bill to give further money to the provinces and to allow the ministry again more or less of a free hand in the expenditure of public moneys for relief purposes and the like, there should be an immediate conference held in which it would be possible to set out definitely the limits on each side with respect to what is to be undertaken by the provinces, on the one hand, and by the dominion on the other, and what is to be expected in the way of grants supplementary to those undertakings.

The other suggestion which was made from this side, and which I think has everything to commend it, was that an unemployment relief commission should be appointed to administer federal relief funds, that there should be some body specially charged with the administration of the vast sums being given to the provinces, and in part paid out directly for relief. Two years have gone by in which a great deal of very valuable material might have been gathered to guide this house in subsequent legislation on unemployment, but we have, as I have said repeatedly nothing to show at the present time for the millions that have been expended on relief except the additions to the public debt, and what appears in the way of statistics in the blue books. We have no report from any body indicating wherein some scheme of unemployment insurance would help to meet the situation more effectively. We have had no opinions of experts dealing with this question, which of all the economic questions of the day necessitates expert opinion.

So I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that while world conditions may be responsible to a very considerable extent for what the country has been suffering, the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite, intensifying as they have the adverse effects of world conditions, have made things infinitely worse than otherwise would have been the case.

The effect of these policies has been shown particularly in the matter of trade. It is with respect to trade that we get at fundamental facts in connection with a country's progress. The trade figures which I shall give in a few moments will indicate the extent to which the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite have been directly responsible for the dislocated condition in which things are to-day. Before I quote the figures, however, I wish to read what was said from this side of the house in reference to the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite at the time those policies were introduced and again at the last session. At page 16 of Hansard for the year 1931, will be found reference to the policies then being introduced, and a statement as to their probable effect. At that time I said:

> The great question in the course of this session and this parliament is going to be whether the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite will serve to promote or to cripple the trade of the country. I believe it can be shown that the most serious of all the results of the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite will be the very certain contraction in trade that we shall find on all sides, a contraction that will affect all classes; whether they be employers of labour or employees, whether they be the heads of large industries, transportation companies, financiers, wholesale merchants, retail merchants or others, all are going to feel the effects of the contracted trade of this country as a result of the policies hon. gentlemen opposite are putting into force.

I ask if that prophecy has not been fully fulfilled. May I continue with a reference to be found at page 54 of the same volume:

> May I state further that already we are beginning to experience—

And this was as a result of policies inaugurated at the special session.

> —in a very critical way the effects of the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite as put through at the last special session. Look at the figures on trade and see how trade is diminishing. Look at the figures with respect to national revenue and see how the national revenue from customs dues is shrinking. Wait until the budget comes down and see what the additional taxation will be. Already we can see the effect upon the western farmers in loss of purchasing power. The western farmers not being able to sell their grain, and the producers generally not being able to get rid of their surplus products, where are we going to get the purchasing power to stimulate our industries? It may be true that here and there, where a protecting wall has been thrown around an individual industry, there has been created a temporary boom. That undoubtedly happens, and will happen in certain cases where competition from without is suddenly checked. But what takes place after the point has been reached where there is no one to purchase the products of the industries thus artificially stimulated? When the demand falls off, what will happen to the transportation companies, the banks, the wholesale and retail businesses of the country? What is to be the lot of every householder in the land when we experience more contraction in the trade of the country?

That was said at the last session of parliament in reference to the policies of the previous session. I repeat it concerning the policies of this session. The effect has been and will again be felt through a reduction of trade, felt in regard to revenues, in regard to taxation, in regard to debt, in regard to unemployment. As to the significance of the balanced budget I shall have a word or two to say in a moment. I will also make a statement as to the significance to be attached to the so-called favourable balance of trade.

So that there may be no gainsaying the exact position, I should like to give the figures with respect to trade for the last three years. These figures are taken from the National Revenue Review for the month of April. First I shall give the figures for the fiscal year 1929-30, then for the fiscal year 1930-31, and then for the fiscal year 1931-32. I shall read only the totals, but with the permission of hon. members I should like to put the figures on record in tabular form.

	Fiscal Year 1929-1930	Fiscal Year 1930-1931	Fiscal Year 1931-1932
Imports	$1,248,000,000	$ 906,000,000	$ 579,000,000
Exports—
Canadian	1,120,000,000	799,000,000	576,000,000
Foreign	24,000,000	17,000,000	11,000,000
Total trade	$2,392,000,000	$1,722,000,000	$1,166,000,000

What is the significance of these figures? They show, Mr. Speaker, that since the present administration has been in office during the last two years—and I shall give my reason for confining the statement to the present administration—the trade of Canada has been more than cut in half. That is a tremendous cut. I repeat, the trade of Canada has been more than cut in half in that short period of time. I put the whole responsibility on the present government for this reason. It was at the special session that these high tariffs were first imposed. It was at the last session of parliament that further increases were made in

Speaking of world conditions, undoubtedly there are, in the main, three which have affected the situation in Canada and elsewhere. The first is that of debts and reparations; that is a legacy of the war, and is not a matter with which this parliament can deal effectively to any extent if at all. The second is the mishandling of the gold of the world, and the general disorganization of currency and credit as related to the supplies of gold. The third is the matter of high tariffs which have been imposed against international commerce. High tariffs have been imposed by the governments of other countries as well as that of Canada. It will be noticed that all three conditions are very considerably inter-related. More and more the economists of the day are pointing out the inter-relation between the effect of high tariffs and the inability of other countries to meet war debts and reparations. More and more there has been pointed out the relation between high tariffs and the present condition of credit and currency in international relations. More and more has attention been drawn to the very serious effects of high tariffs upon trade between the different countries. They are inter-related. These are problems each of which is international in character. Some of them to a greater extent than others are capable of solution by national effort. Of these conditions, the one arising out of tariffs, is the one with which a single nation can do most on its own account. Every nation is in complete control of the tariff it itself imposes. On the other hand no single nation can deal by itself with any condition of world credit or currency, nor can it deal by itself with the problem of war debts or reparations.

If the Liberal party have at this time in its amendment to the budget drawn attention specifically to the tariff and its effect upon present conditions it is because we believe first of all that the tariff has been the most serious of all factors responsible for the intensification in Canada of adverse world conditions, and in the second place, that it is one which can be dealt with in the most practical way at this time. We have done so, not because we do not appreciate that the other factors are important, but because we believe this is the most important and the most practical one to be dealt with by this parliament at this time. More than that, we say it is the most immediate one in view of the matters to be considered at the forthcoming Imperial economic conference which is to be held in this city in the course of the next three months. These are some of the reasons which have caused us to emphasize the importance of the tariff at this time.

There is another reason. We believe that the vast increase in taxation which has taken place this year has been necessitated in large part by the loss of revenue which this country has suffered in consequence of the tariff ceasing to be a tariff for revenue and becoming a highly protective, I should say, a prohibitive tariff. I wonder if hon. members realize the extent to which the revenue of this country, as collected from customs dues, has fallen. It is a very significant thing that our trade has been more than cut in half. I think it will be found that the revenue of the country from customs duties has been nearly cut in half as well. The Minister of Finance in dealing with this matter said:

> Customs receipts fell to $102,800,000 reflecting the drop in the value of imports occasioned by a number of factors, such as the further decline in prices, the unfavourable exchange rate as regards importations from the United States and generally the policy of encouraging production in Canada.

The policy of encouraging production in Canada! That ought to have been called, "The policy of discouraging production in Canada." It is the policy that is indicated by protective tariffs—that is what is meant by the phrase—of tariffs raised to a point which has made it next to impossible for producers in the great basic industries to develop those industries as they should be developed in this country. May I give the house the total customs import duties for the last four years:

1929-30	179,000,000
1930-31	131,000,000
1931-32 (estimated)	102,000,000

Now, the total receipts from taxation in these years were as follows:

1928-29	$395,000,000
1929-30	378,000,000
1930-31	296,000,000
1931-32 (estimated)	273,000,000

What do these figures show? They show that the percentage of customs receipts to total receipts was 47 per cent in 1928-29, 47 per cent again in 1929-30, that it dropped to 44 per cent in 1930-31, and it is estimated that it will drop this year to 38 per cent. From 47 per cent in 1929-30 customs receipts have fallen to 38 per cent for this year, 1931-32. The total decline in revenue in 1930-31 was $89,844,530. This was due mainly to diminished customs receipts amounting to $48,220,965. In other words, the tariff, instead of being a tariff for revenue and as such a means of avoiding the necessity of increasing the income tax and sales tax, and the necessity of deducting ten per cent from the salaries of civil servants and the like, has resulted in this decrease, which goes a very long way towards accounting for what in these particulars the government has found necessary to make good.

Now, the Minister of Finance has said:

> We would be recreant to our duty if we failed to face our problems with determination and at whatever sacrifice fully meet our financial obligations, balance our budget and preserve our national credit in the eyes of an observant financial world.

Just here may I draw attention to the highlights in the speech of the Minister of Finance, intended evidently to offset the sombre effect of the speech generally. One was that the budget had been balanced; another, that there was a favourable balance of trade, another that there had been no increases of the tariff this year and finally that the forthcoming economic conference was going to help meet the situation now confronting Canada; I would say, with regard to the first three of those statements, that they are inaccurate and misleading. It is not true that there is a balanced budget. So far as any significance is to be attached to the fact that there is a favourable balance of trade, it is a significance that vanishes the minute one realizes that trade itself has diminished to the exent which has been indicated, and that it has been so diminished by the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite in the manner stated. The statement that there have been no increases in the tariff is not correct, for this year there has been imposed a two per cent excise duty, so-called, which is a duty to be levied on all commodities coming into this country, whether they have been duty free or not heretofore. An excise duty is something that is placed on commodities within the country; but this two per cent has been imposed on commodities coming into the country, and it is as much a tariff as any other piece of tariff legislation enacted by this parliament.

May I draw attention to the fact, that, in considering the effect of the additional two per cent excise duty, account has to be taken of the scale of the tariff schedules prior to the bringing down of the present budget. It might have been expected this session that some tariffs would be reduced, especially as the economic conference was in the offing. There was reason to hope that, at least, the government of Canada would have done as the British government has done—give some indication to other parts of the empire of its intention to proceed in a friendly way by means of preferences, which would mean the lowering of duties against other parts of the empire. This has not been done, but quite the opposite. So there is really nothing of which hon. gentlemen opposite may boast in the statement that they have not again put up the tariff higher, even if this further two per cent excise had not been added. I should like also to direct attention to the fact that the excise duty is placed on goods as valued for duty. The average duty is about 30 per cent at this time; so that the excise, when you take it at three per cent as it is now, equals nearly 3.9 per cent. In other words, we shall have when the resolutions of this budget go into effect pretty nearly a four per cent increase in the tariff on everything coming into Canada at the present time on account of a so-called excise tax. How in the face of this increased excise tax, which brings about a condition of tariff legislation higher than we have ever had in the country or than exists I believe in any country, can hon. gentlemen opposite boast that the tariffs this year have not been altered in any particular?

I said that hon. gentlemen opposite were seeking to have it appear that the budget had been balanced. Let me read the statement of the Minister of Finance himself on that matter:

> Having detailed the revenues from all sources and the expenditures under the appropriate divisions, the net result of the accounts for the year may now be indicated. With ordinary revenues of $327,719,000 and ordinary expenditures amounting to $378,743,000, the resulting deficit on ordinary account is $51,024,000.

The resulting deficit on ordinary account is $51,000,000. Where can there be a balanced budget with a statement such as that? But that does not even take into account the special expenditures which have had to be made within the year, and which the Minister of Finance in his own statement proceeds to give:

> Special expenditures, including $49,282,000 for unemployment relief and wheat bonus as previously detailed, total $55,138,000. As an offset to this amount, $7,022,000 was received in special revenues, leaving a balance not provided from income of $48,116,000. In addition there are the capital expenditures of $16,975,000 and loans and advances non-active of $3,390,000. The amount, therefore, of the increase in debt for the year is $119,505,000.

An increase of $119,000,000 in the debt! And yet hon. gentlemen opposite would have the country believe that the government balanced the budget this year! May I point out that, during the time the Liberal administration was in office, every dollar that was spent on capital account was met out of current revenue, and there was no adding to the public debt because of capital expenditure. Notwithstanding that, the public debt of the country was reduced during that period by from $200,000,000 to $300,000,000. But may I emphasize this point: The stress that has been placed upon the necessity of balancing a budget has been based by hon. gentlemen opposite on the example of Britain. We have been told over and over again that Britain was faced with a serious situation, that it was found absolutely necessary to balance the budget, that they balanced the budget in Britain; and, therefore, we must do the same thing here. Did Britain leave out of account in the balancing of the budget the amount spent on unemployment relief? Did she leave out of account the amount spent on the dole? Did she leave out of account the amount spent on road work and the like? I have taken care to look up what the Chancellor of the Exchequer of England said about balancing the budget in relation to these payments for unemployment relief, and I will read to the house the statement which will be found in volume 13, session 1930-31, at page 298. Mr. Phillip Snowden, speaking as Chancellor of the Exchequer, said:

> . . . An unbalanced budget is regarded as one of the symptoms of national financial instability. . . . I would point out to the house that . . . apart from all foreign implications, an unbalanced budget is a very serious thing for this country itself. Apart altogether from outside opinion, it would be necessary for ourselves to put our financial position into one of undoubted security and stability. A deficit itself may not be a very serious matter, because unexpected expenditure might be necessary during the currency of the financial year —expenditure unforeseen when the budget was introduced. It is not a deficit at the end of the year that matters so much, as whether measures are taken or not to meet that deficit. The serious thing is whether the country takes steps to meet that deficit and to balance its budget. If it fails to do so, then naturally grave doubts arise as to the financial stability of the country. . . .
> Before I begin to deal in detail with the income and expenditure of the year, there is one thing vitally affecting the budget to which I want to call attention. . . .

I direct the attention of the house to the word "vitally", as used in the connection mentioned.

> The government have decided that borrowing for the unemployment fund and the road fund must cease, and this decision must apply to the current financial year. Accordingly, the whole amount of what the road fund would have required to borrow, and the amount which the unemployment insurance fund would have required to borrow when its present powers are exhausted, will have to be borne as a charge on the votes this year, and the estimates to implement that decision will be presented in due course. In taking this step, the government have been actuated by the desire to place the stability of the budget beyond question. The adoption of borrowing as an expedient to bridge a temporary deficiency in a fund when there is a prospect that it can be repaid is perfectly justifiable, but there is clearly a limit to which that borrowing can be carried on, otherwise it would become an unbearable mortgage upon the fund—in this particular case the unemployment insurance fund—and it would be a source of danger to the stability of the budget. We cannot afford any longer to increase the debt. Despite the very heavy burden that this will be in the budget, there is no choice in the matter.

Elsewhere, the Chancellor stated that the current year's charges would amount to £25,000,000 for unemployment borrowing and £9,000,000 for the road fund. That was the way in which Great Britain balanced her budget, and hon. gentlemen opposite, after citing the example of Britain, come along and seek to convey the impression to the country that they followed Britain's example and balanced their budget, whereas in the pretended balancing of the budget they have left out altogether the one thing which the Chancellor of the Exchequer says is vital.

Much the same thing might be said with regard to representations made with respect to the favourable balance of trade, so-called. Whether, in reality, a balance of trade is significant, because it is favourable, depends, of necessity, upon the total volume of trade. If your tariffs have been so arranged as practically to prohibit trade in one direction, and thereby make more difficult any trade in the other direction, to come along and say that, by this arrangement of tariffs, you have been able to get a favourable balance is to make a statement which may be wholly correct, but one which also is wholly misleading. The fact that the balance of trade is favourable under the circumstances I have mentioned ought to be a cause for regret rather than one for praise or commendation.

Moreover, as is well known, periods of great prosperity in this country and in the country to the south have often been years of unfavourable balances so far as trade was concerned. Why was that? The reason is that everything depends upon the state of development of a country. If a country is borrowing from abroad for the purpose of development, as was the case in this country when we were constructing our great railways, during the period of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's régime, or the period during which the Canadian Pacific railway was being constructed, one would expect an unfavourable balance. That circumstance, however, did not signify anything adverse with regard to the position and development of the country. It was only the outcome of an investment which was going to bring its return later on. I need not, I believe, go further into that question; I think it is quite clear.

As to the third matter of which I spoke, that is, the excise tax being an increase in the tariff, I think on that score also I have said enough for the moment. May I, however, direct attention to the last point to which I referred, namely, the significance and importance of this budget in regard to the forthcoming Imperial conference. There is nothing that I can see in the budget which, read across the sea or in any portion of the world where there is a British dominion, will bring aught of encouragement to any government of the British Empire. I do not know how we in Canada would have felt if, when Britain introduced her duties, she had put up the tariff against Canada as well as against foreign countries, in the way this government has been doing ever since it came into office. So far as this year is concerned, Canada and all parts of the empire had a right to expect that, in the budget preceding the conference, there would be something that would resemble a gesture of goodwill, something indicative of an attitude of friendship towards the other portions of the British Empire. But I will deal with that further in a moment. May I repeat that it is because of the facts which I have mentioned that the Liberal party brought down this year an amendment limited particularly to the tariff. If the house will permit me, I would here like to put the Liberal amendment on record:

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"this house is of the opinion

"that increases made by the present administration in the customs tariff have been arbitrary, ill-considered and inordinate, and have had the effect of stifling agriculture and other industries, restricting trade and commerce, and increasing unemployment;

"that the fixing of values for duty purposes by orders in council is an interference with the inherent right of parliament to regulate duties and determine taxation, and has had an unsettling effect on commerce, a depressing effect on business, and has been detrimental to the interests alike of producers, importers, distributors and consumers;

"that a reversal of the present fiscal policy in relation to customs tariffs and an immediate resumption of parliamentary direction and control with respect thereto are essential to a revival of trade, and improvement in business, and to the ultimate return of prosperity in Canada."

That amendment was followed by an amendment moved by hon. members of the Progressive party in the far corner, and, if the house will permit, I should like also to place that amendment on record so that the two will be side by side:

That all the words after the word "that" in the said proposed amendment be deleted, and the following substituted therefor:

Whereas, in Canada there exists an ample supply of natural resources to provide for all primary needs, and

Whereas, we have developed an efficient industrial machine capable of producing more than sufficient of the requirements of our people, and

Whereas, notwithstanding this our external and internal debts are increasing enormously—large numbers of our citizens are in dire need and exist through governmental and charitable relief, and a large proportion are faced with declining purchasing power involving a lowered standard of living, and

Whereas, in our opinion these conditions are attributable to fundamental defects in the present economic system, and

Whereas, it is therefore necessary that parliament, the agency with the widest legislative powers, should take the initiative in the task of reconstructing national production and consumption with a view to the widest possible use of commodities on a basis of human needs, and

Whereas, the control of finance is a basic element in such reconstruction, affecting as it does industrial plant establishment and develpment, the distribution of goods and the price level of goods and services.

Therefore be it resolved, that in the opinion of this house, as a first step towards general economic reconstruction, our financial system should be nationalized, and provision be made to issue immediately sufficient money to bring the value of the dollar as speedily as possible to that point at which the major portion of our debts were incurred during the war; stabilize the dollar at this point internally and thereafter manage credit and currency issue to secure and maintain a stable price level within Canada.

With regard to the Progressive amendment may I say that it relates exclusively to the question of currency and credit. It is in the nature of an amendment dealing with financial reform, whereas the amendment moved by the Liberal party might be described as having to do with tariff reform. I want to say quite frankly that I think hon. members who are responsible for this amendment are to be congratulated for the time, the thought and the study they have given to financial questions.

I think they are right in looking upon questions of credit, particularly the involved problem of the world's supply of gold and its distribution, and matters of currency, as all-important questions that cannot receive too careful attention. But I do submit that they might have hoped to get more in the way of sympathetic reception for their views had they taken a different means of presenting them to the house. I cannot see why it was necessary to wipe out completely the Liberal amendment in order to bring their amendment before the house; they might have amended the Liberal amendment, if they had wished to do so, by adding something with reference to credit, currency and the like. Their subamendment goes farther than that, it strikes out the whole Liberal amendment; it is equivalent to saying: We do not regard this tariff situation, affecting as it does trade, taxation and all the rest of it, as at all comparable to what we have in our subamendment. I can hardly believe that the hon. members responsible for the subamendment are sincerely of that view, that they really meant that, but that is the effect of the subamendment in the way in which it is introduced.

I shall now deal with the subamendment. May I say that to what is expressed in the preamble, no exception could possibly be taken. The preamble relates very largely to prevailing industrial conditions and the existing depression. It is a mere statement of fact. However, it goes on to give the reasons why the depressed condition is what it is, and these reasons are set out as follows:

> Whereas, in our opinion these conditions are attributable to fundamental defects in the present economic system, and
> Whereas, it is therefore necessary that parliament, the agency with the widest legislative powers, should take the initiative in the task of reconstructing national production and consumption with a view to the widest possible use of commodities on a basis of human needs, and
> Whereas, the control of finance is a basic element in such reconstruction, affecting as it does industrial plant establishment and development, the distribution of goods and the price level of goods and services.

May I point out that while it is true that some of these conditions are attributable to the present economic system, that system is not a matter for which Canada alone is responsible nor which Canada alone can change. The present economic system is something for which many countries are jointly responsible and if there is to be any alteration, I venture to say it will not be brought about by the action of any one country but by cooperative action on the part of many. It will be probably one of the most difficult things in the world to bring about. I agree with those in this house who have said that it is impossible for any thinking man or woman to view conditions as they are in this and other countries, conditions of plenty on the one side, with distress and starvation on the other, without realizing that there is something wrong with the existing condition, but I do not agree with those who hold the view that parliament can remedy everything, governments can remedy everything. Governments can do a certain amount, parliaments can do a certain amount, but I believe that the fundamental things which in the long run are going to be of greatest effect in improving and changing social conditions will be the things done outside of parliament by voluntary action of a cooperative character.

In this regard may I refer to what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) said the other day as to the necessity of a new motive in dealing with social and industrial problems. I agree that we need a new motive and that industry should be considered as being in the nature of social service. I agree that everyone who has to do with industry, no matter in what form his contribution be given, whether it be the capitalist who contributes his capital, whether it be labour which gives its labour, whether it be managerial ability which gives its skill, or whether it be the community which makes its contribution in a thousand and one forms, all of these who are engaged in making a contribution to industry are doing something in the nature of social service. If we would take that view, I think probably we would be starting on the right road toward a solution, our efforts would be more effective than by opposing what may be said as to the need of some new motive.

May I direct attention to this fact: After all, the golden rule is the rule which underlies all social service. If parliament could by enactment of the golden rule enforce or bring about its application to any extent, we would not be sitting to-day in this house waiting for something of the kind to be done, it would have been done by public bodies many hundreds if not thousands of years ago. The golden rule will be brought into force only through a process of education, a process which began in its highest form nearly two thousand years ago, and which has been making extensive headway despite what might be said to the contrary. However, it is a process which has a long way to go before it begins to govern and control the actions of men in their financial and business relations. Let us hope that the agencies that are seeking to develop that new spirit and that new attitude will be furthered in every direction possible, that the hands of those who direct them will be strengthened and their work enhanced, but we must not deceive ourselves into thinking that any parliament on earth is going to be able to bring about a permanent change in social and economic conditions. Parliaments cannot do everything but because we may have to wait some time for another motive is to my mind no reason why, to the extent of our ability both in and out of parliament, we might not do very much towards helping to bring about better social conditions.

Frankly, my view is that the crux of the whole situation lies not so much in any outward reorganizing of industry according to any particular model but rather in the control of policy by those who make any contribution to industry. As I see it, the present system of industry, the so-called capitalistic system, is a system organized largely on the basis of the single control of industrial policies by capital investors. It is the capitalist who invests his money who has the say in the choice of the board of directors; it is the board of directors that appoints the management; it is the management which in a large part dictates the policies of the industry under the direction of the board, and which has to do with determining rates to be paid to labour and the prices or rates to be paid by the consumer for the commodities produced and the services rendered. Looking broadly at the changes which are taking place in different parts of the world, it seems to me that what is being attempted in one part is an endeavour to substitute for that single control on the part of capital, single control on the part of some other factor contributing to industrial development. As I see the movement in Russia, the emphasis is laid largely on the single control by labour. In Prussia before the war great emphasis was laid on the single control of the community organized as the state, state socialism in a highly developed form. I believe that a large part of the conflict which arises in these matters comes from the effort of one factor contributing to industry seeking to gain a monopoly of control and failing to realize that the secret of any change which is going to be permanent, enduring and worth while lies not in the substitution of monopoly by some other factor for the one which exists. The secret lies in the doing away altogether with monopoly of control and the substitution in its stead of joint control of industrial policy.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

At the risk of being considered indiscreet, may I outline a practical experiment which may help to explain what I mean in a concrete way. I do not want any part of what I say to be taken too literally, I should like the matter to be considered as being tentative, but I bring it forward with a view to disclosing the kind of thing I have in mind. I spoke of substituting joint-control in all matters pertaining to industrial policy for single control. Consider the railways of this country. So far as the Canadian Pacific Railway is concerned, it is under private management; and for the most part control is in the hands of the directors who are appointed by those who have capital invested. The Canadian National system is a government-owned road. There the control is largely that of the directors who have been appointed by the government of the day which, in its action in that regard, is supposed to represent the people. Whether the directors fairly represent the different classes in the community, one has to examine for oneself; see who they are, and what their previous relations and associations may have been. At any rate, each of these systems is controlled as respects the policies which govern by certain groups of gentlemen who represent very definite interests.

We have, in the railway commission, a body which also has to be considered in connection with the railways of the country. It is in a very real way representative of the community, of consumers and producers. It is a body which has been appointed by parliament to see that rates are subject to control. The extent to which it is truly representative of all groups must again be decided upon examination of those who sit upon the board and who have the controlling influence there. Attention has been given to the representation of labour and also of the farmers on that board, and, to that extent, it comes close to representing the sort of thing I have in mind when I speak of joint-control by all interested groups as being essential in the determination of policy.

If it be a good thing to have all classes represented in that way on the railway commission, why should such representation not be an equally good thing with respect to the management of the railroads, whether they be under government or private ownership? That is a point I should like to have considered. Why should there not be on the board at Montreal, whether it be of the Canadian Pacific or of the Canadian National, representatives of the great brotherhoods, such as the locomotive engineers, firemen, conductors.

trainmen, maintenance of way men and others, railwaymen who are giving their lives daily in the service of their roads and who have brought into being their large eminently efficient and well managed organizations? Why should their representatives not be seated on the board of directors, having their voice, along with representatives of capital, in the shaping of railway policy? Why should the community generally, taking it broadly, not have directors chosen, not merely by a government exercising its own will in the matter, but by a government having regard for the different elements that go to make up the nation, choosing as its appointees amongst others men who would be representative of the agricultural interests, and of other great interests such, for example, as the commercial and business interests organized in chambers of commerce, boards of trade and the like?

I venture to say that a joint board fashioned in that way, directing the affairs of the railways of the country and having the determination of policy, would have a very far-reaching effect in reconciling the different interests concerned. I doubt very much whether, under a board so arranged, there would be extravagances in the construction of too elaborate hotels, of palatial ships or what in other directions would be regarded to-day as unnecessary if not wasteful expenditure. I doubt very much whether matters might not be so arranged as to make possible the continuous employment of those who are giving their lives to the railway service. Why should not a great industry like the railways be so organized as to take care, under some system of unemployment insurance with the aid of the state in some way, if you like, of all who enter its employment? If such were the case, we would not have lay-offs such as we have at the present time. What can be more tragic than the condition we are hearing about from day to day in the press and in the house of hundreds, yes of thousands of men who have given their lives to the railway service of the country, being laid off at this time without any remuneration whatever? If the railways were organized in the way I have indicated, I believe in the result matters would be so arranged that the unemployment situation would be cared for along with the rest. It would become part of the obligation upon the industry to see that it was run in such a way that those who have their labour as well as those who have their capital invested in it would be cared for.

While undoubtedly a step of the kind suggested would have to be a gradual one, while it would have to be effected by a little here and a little there, a tending in that direction, taking a single industry in a single country at a time, an example I submit would be set to other industries and to other countries and in that way a natural evolution would come about in industrial management and particularly in control of industrial policy which would go a long way towards improving social and economic conditions. After all, does not each of these parties receive at the present time a certain recognition for its services? Does not capital receive its remuneration in the form of interest? Does not labour receive its remuneration in the form of wages? Does not the community receive its recognition in the form of services performed at a particular rate? Does not management receive its recognition in the salaries paid to it? If all receive recognition for their services in that way, why should not all also receive recognition in the matter of having a voice in the shaping of policy with respect to conditions generally under which they all have to make their respective contributions.

Mr. MOORE (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): Why did the right hon. gentleman not do that while he was in office?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will take the trouble to look at some of the things I have put on record, he will find that I advocated a step of this kind long before I came into office. May I also point out to my hon. friend that while we were in office, I helped to carry out part of the program by seeing that labour was given a place on the board of management of the Canadian National Railways. We were moving very distinctly in that direction.

Mr. STEVENS: The same man is there now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We also saw that agriculture was given its representation. These things do not all come about in a day, but come about they will in the course of time. I am not surprised that in any effort to deal with social reconstruction opposition comes from hon. gentlemen opposite.

As I was saying, recognition comes in these different forms. I think it should be given equally in the matter of control of industrial policies. If that course is taken in one industry, and in one country it will, I believe, be taken in other industries and in other countries and we shall soon have a condition which will prevent the dislocation of industry whether arising from strikes or lockouts, or from other causes that can be at least partly controlled by those who are concerned in the industry itself. I should like to develop that idea a little further, but I feel it is necessary to go on with the other matters already touched upon.

May I come back now to the other part of the subamendment of the Progressive party? It is as follows:

> That in the opinion of this house, as a first step towards general economic reconstruction, our financial system should be nationalized, and provision be made to issue immediately sufficient money to bring the value of the dollar as speedily as possible to that point at which the major portion of our debts were incurred during the war; stabilize the dollar at this point internally and thereafter manage credit and currency issue to secure and maintain a stable price level within Canada.

That is the substance of the subamendment. It suggests two things: first, the nationalization of our financial system and, second, the direct adoption of a policy of inflation. May I in the first instance ask this question of those who have moved this subamendment: If our financial system is to be nationalized, whom are you going to entrust with that work? Are you going to entrust the government opposite with it? Are you going to entrust hon. gentlemen opposite, who have dealt with the tariff in the manner in which they have, under the freedom which has been given them, to nationalize the finances of this country? Yet that is what this amendment is suggesting, because it is addressed to parliament as it exists at the present time. May I ask another question? Were a Liberal administration in office would you entrust a Liberal administration with that task? May I ask still another question? Were you in office yourselves, would you undertake the work of nationalizing the finances of the country? I do not believe that any group of persons who have given thought to these matters would attempt a task of that kind in Canada at this time. And, if we ourselves would not undertake a scheme such as this, what would be thought of Canada by other countries if it were announced to-morrow that this House of Commons had attempted any such task as the one indicated in the subamendment?

With respect to the inflation of currency, may I draw attention to this further fact? It is a well known circumstance that it is very difficult to discover just what exact amount of inflation is going to serve the purpose that may be in view. Who is going to determine whether there is enough inflation? Inflation has a way of gathering momentum to itself. It is easy to step on the accelerator, but it is very hard to put on the brakes.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Miss MACPHAIL: They seem to have put on the brakes now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is fortunate if it is in regard to inflation, because to my mind inflation certainly is one of the last cures that would be helpful in the present situation. Would inflation increase the purchasing power of any one overseas? Would not inflation, if it is carried to the point indicated in the amendment, help very much the holding classes to-day as compared with others? Let me read a statement by Mr. Keynes, whom hon. gentlemen to my left have often quoted:

> To restore the value of pre-war holdings by deflation means enhancing at the same time the value of war and post-war holdings, and thereby raising the total claims of the rentier class not only beyond what they are entitled to, but to an intolerable proportion of the total income of the community.

Is that sort of thing what is desired by those who have moved the subamendment? You cannot deflate or inflate currency in such a way that it will help only those who have next to nothing, and not help in some cases those also who may possess something. Each works all around. Inflation like deflation is a two-edged sword when it comes to dealing with financial matters.

Moreover, may I ask if some of these problems are not very much beyond the bounds of a single nation to deal with? Is it not true that apart from these problems, being international in character, other factors enter in a very real way which, even so far as international cooperation is concerned, it is very difficult to control? A very learned address was delivered in this city not very long ago by a great economist who has been quoted many times in the course of this debate, Sir Josiah Stamp. What did he say?

> No economic machine can stand against undue optimism or undue pessimism. In getting the world right, there are two separate sets of problems to be faced: (1) national problems to be solved by ourselves, and (2) international problems which cannot be solved by any one nation, but can be solved only by the complete and frank merging of interests which interrelate. Such problems are the gold problem, tariffs and the dislocation of markets.

There is here a reference to the psychological factor as well as the economic, and may I, in speaking of the psychological factor, ask those who are advocating the course set out in this subamendment whether the credit of Canada in the eyes of the world would be improved if to-morrow an announcement were made that this country had decided to inflate its currency? I do not believe it would, and I do not believe my hon. friends feel that it would. Then if it would not, why should we pass this particular subamendment at this time?

The question of a managed currency is a very large one. They are experimenting with it to a considerable extent in some countries, in Great Britain, for instance, at the present time. But Great Britain has back of her an experience in international finance that no other country in the world has, and an experience in the matter of banking and currency which no other country in the world possesses. Can we not afford to wait a little and see how the experiment works out in Great Britain before seeking to oppose our efforts to hers or to rival her efforts by our own? That is the point I wish to bring out at the moment.

May I add this further fact? Great Britain, as the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) has indicated, is experimenting with managed money. But has she experimented with inflated currency? Has she ever attempted to meet her currency problems in that way? She has not. Well, if Great Britain is to be cited as an example worthy of emulating, I think we might emulate her in that particular as well as in others. I do not, however, wish to dwell unduly on this point. I merely wish to point out that there are strong reasons for hesitating to accept this particular amendment at this time, not by any means with a view to indicating that we are not sympathetic to a study of the problem, or as indicating the absence of a desire to see some measure of reform effected, but just because we have to deal with things in the light of conditions as they are in this country and in this house at the present time.

Furthermore, the method suggested in the subamendment, if put into effect, would, I believe, defeat the very ends which its advocates themselves have in view. What does the subamendment say?

> That . . . our financial system should be nationalized, and provision be made to issue immediately sufficient money to bring the value of the dollar as speedily as possible to that point at which the major portion of our debts were incurred during the war.

To do it immediately—to do it speedily—to issue sufficient money to bring the whole thing up to the desired level at once. What would be the effect of that? What about all the wage-earners in this country and those with fixed incomes generally? If this course were followed, every one of them would be affected adversely. Every person on fixed income or on a wage, if the currency were to be speedily and immediately inflated, would be the loser. I venture to say that those who have framed this amendment would not wish anything of the kind. It may well be that inflation, properly administered, might, in certain circumstances, help to meet a situation, just as the administration of some kind of a drug may help to have a certain effect upon a patient if given in sufficiently small doses over a long enough period of time. But to try to inject the drug all at once and work an immediate cure, might only kill the patient; and, with all due respect to my hon. friends, I am afraid that such would be the effect if the course they here propose were to be put into force as they suggest all at once.

Apart from the reasons I have mentioned, it can hardly be expected that we of the Liberal party, no matter how sympathetic we may be with the desire to see currency problems properly dealt with, questions of credit, gold and the like properly studied, and such action taken as can properly be taken with respect to them—it can hardly be expected that we can support a subamendment which asks us to reject all that we have in our own amendment and to support what is given to us instead. There is no reason why, because each of us cannot get his own pet panacea accepted, we should seek to rule out everything else. We have said nothing in our amendment about a number of other important problems for the simple reason that over and over again, where an amendment has referred to more than one question, we have been told by those who are criticizing us to-day that our amendment would have been very much improved if we had confined it to one question instead of referring to a great number. For that reason, among others, we have drawn our amendment in the form in which we have.

I come now more in detail to the amendment which the Liberal party has presented to the house.

Mr. IRVINE: I should like to ask a question, although I hesitate to interrupt the right hon. gentleman. Would he not admit that if the subamendment were followed, as he has been outlining it, it would help those in debt? Does he not realize that managed currency does not mean an inflation of the type he describes?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Managed currency may not mean an inflation of the type I have described, but the amendment of the party to which my hon. friend belongs does mean that. It is with that aspect of the matter I was dealing. With respect to managed currency I have suggested it would be much wiser, before experimenting ourselves, to wait and see what happens as a result of the experiments now taking place in Great Britain.

In regard to helping those who are in debt, I cannot believe any course that is not fundamentally sound is going to be of lasting benefit to anybody. It is only that thing which is fundamentally sound that, in the long run, will be of any real service to the great body of our people. I think one fundamentally sound step would be to bring high tariffs down to something like a level which would permit trade between this and other countries. That is why the Liberal amendment stresses the present tariff position in Canada. It draws attention to the fact that the tariff is far from what it should be, if trade is to exist on any scale in this country.

I realize our amendment has been criticized on the score that it does not deal with more than one subject. I hope I have already answered that point sufficiently.

Another objection raised, by hon. gentlemen opposite, and by some people outside this House of Commons, is that we are debating over and over again, the old question of tariffs. We are asked: Are we going to stick to orthodox economics, as they are called, instead of breaking out into new fields? May I point out, in the first place, that the tariff issue in Canada to-day is altogether different from what it has ever been in this country before. Would any of the former leaders of the Conservative party regard the present tariff as a protective tariff, would they not regard it as a prohibitive tariff? You will find, in their utterances which appear over and over again in Hansard, the statement that they see no necessity for a protective tariff being raised to the point where it becomes a prohibitive tariff. The tariff as we have it to-day is different from any tariff that has existed previously in Canada. It is out of all proportion and beyond the bounds of common sense with respect to the requirements of industry and the needs of this country. It has been made what it is deliberately and for a specific purpose. It was made in its present form to enable the Prime Minister to adopt his blasting tactics, as he has termed them, in order, as he believes is possible, to force other nations to change their attitude towards Canada. It is part of the paraphernalia of economic war in which the present administration believes.

It is the method the present government has deliberately chosen to deal with our economic problems. We have blasting on the one side, and blockading on the other. I would remind hon. members that blockading is one phase, and blasting the other in economic war. We are blockading our ports. The ports of Canada to-day are blockaded against the entry of goods as effectively as has been many a port during a time of war. The trade coming into this country and going out of it as a result of the increased purchasing power which might come from those who sell their goods abroad are alike affected by the blockade. I say the question is entirely different from the one with which Canada has been faced at any previous time.

To revert to the Liberal amendment more in detail; will hon. members opposite deny that the changes in the tariff have been arbitrary? What about the fixing of the values of gasoline; what about oak flooring; what about electric fixtures; what what about a multitude of other things we have heard discussed in this chamber? Will anybody say those changes have not been made arbitrarily? Will any hon. member in the Progressive party say those changes were not ill-considered? Will members of the government say they have not been ill-considered? If they were not, why in many cases did the government change them the day after they were put in effect, as they did first of all with respect to the prohibitive duties on glass. We know that innumerable changes were made one day and in some form or other were changed by the government either the next day or a short time afterwards.

What about the regulations in regard to the pound sterling? One course must have been right, and the other wrong, or one would not have been changed for the other. We know the government did not take only one course with regard to the pound sterling; it did one thing one day and another another. One of those changes must have been ill-considered; I leave it to the government to say which one it was. Will hon. members say there have been no inordinate increases in the tariff? Let me mention a very few things. By way of example, there is the duty on silk georgettes, of 85 per cent; on crepe de Chine, of 70 per cent; on cotton backed silk, of 96 per cent; on pongee silk, of 125 per cent; on men's worsteds, 60 per cent; on French serge, 63 per cent, and on men's woollens, from 85 per cent to 140 per cent. I select that list because it affects the clothing of the people in Canada which represents a serious item of expenditure in the cost of all. I might run through other tariff items and show where changes have been made of 50 per cent in some cases, 100 per cent in others, 150 per cent in others, 200 per cent in others and 250 per cent in others. If those are not inordinate increases, what could be considered inordinate? I do not think I need describe the effect of such tariff increases on industry, because that ground has been well covered by hon. members who have already spoken in this debate. Will anybody say the fixation of the tariff in the manner in which it has been done, namely by order in council, has not had a serious effect upon the business of Canada? Will anybody say it was ever intended by the constitution of this country and those who had to do with the framing of the British North America Act that the making of the tariff should be transferred from this House of Commons to the cabinet in the way it has been transferred by action of the government itself.

I do not at this time wish to debate the constitutional question which arises in this connection, although I think time might be well taken in a discussion of that matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. gentlemen opposite laugh; they laugh at anything which affects the constitution, because nearly everything being done to-day on any large scale by hon. gentlemen opposite is subversive of the constitution. May I point out to them that when they talk about parliament being supreme they forget that parliament is supreme only within certain limits. Whatever supremacy the British parliament may have with regard to matters in general, we in Canada, until we amend the written portion of our constitution—and we are supreme in the sense that we can amend it at any time we wish—until we amend it we are subject to it, and it is only within the limits of the constitution as there set forth that we are free to act. Will hon. gentlemen opposite say that this Dominion parliament, in its supremacy, can make laws with respect to those matters which by the constitution are assigned to the provinces? They will not. There is a limitation to the supremacy of parliament in the constitution. What is the difference between the limitation upon the executive as embodied in the constitution, and the limitation which I have just described. The constitution sets forth certain legislative powers. Those powers are confined to the two houses of parliament and the King's representative. That is the only body which can legislate with respect to anything, and particularly with respect to taxation. Another section of the act deals with the powers of the executive, and there is not a word which gives the executive power to legislate. Similarly there is another section dealing with the powers of the judiciary. I do not know whether hon. gentlemen will say that under the act, as it now stands, parliament in its supremacy can transfer to the judiciary, legislative powers. They could in Britain, if they wished to do so, under the supremacy of parliament, and nothing intervening to restrict them. We in Canada could do so if we wished, but we would first have to amend the British North America Act. When it comes to the imposition of taxation there is no right either constitutionally or legally which the government has to impose taxation in the form of duties by order in council, I care not under what authority they may claim that right. It is a right that might be given were the constitution so amended, but it is not a right that at present exists. There is no authority whatever to do anything of the kind. I think that the business houses which are asking the government to give them a fiat to test in the courts whether they are not entitled to compensation from the crown for the hundreds of thousands of dollars of which they have been robbed by the orders in council which have been passed are perfectly right in their contention, and that they should be given such permission.

Let me read what the president of the Robert Simpson Company has had to say in this regard. I refer to this particularly because the Robert Simpson Company is only one of many large commercial houses scattered throughout the country, whose business interests have suffered by unwarranted action on the part of the government; these commercial houses employ as large numbers of people as do our factories, and they also serve the consuming public in quite as effective a manner. In his last address to the shareholders of his company, the president of the Robert Simpson Company said:

> The new tariff changes have penalized us seriously. Especially is this true in respect of those schedules which provided specific duties, revaluations of certain articles, revaluation of depreciated sterling exchange, and other currencies, and the wide application of dumping duties in respect to these valuations, as well as in respect of exchanges covering shipments of American and European purchases, whose currencies continue on the gold basis. The trading loss to us in 1931 ran into several hundred thousand dollars. The drastic contraction in imports—the practical prohibition of operations, which for many years have contributed greatly to the economy of business as a whole—presents a very serious problem.

There, I submit, is one of the strongest reasons why the amendment which we have before the house at the moment should receive the support of all who believe in confining legislation on tariff matters to the commons, and in doing away with the practice which has grown up under this administration of egislating on the tariff by orders in council.

Referring again for a moment to what is termed the timeworn discussion of orthodox economics may I say that nearly all the great questions which have occasioned controversy during the years are of that character. What is older than the question of the relative values of socialism and individualism? The whole argument for each will be found in the writings of Plato on the one hand and of Aristotle on the other, and from their time down to to-day the economic organizations of the world have been debating the relative values of those two opposing forms of social organization. Similarly they have been debating whether or not high or low tariffs or no tariffs at all were the better policy for the country concerned. No apology need be offered for bringing up what although an old question, at this present time arises in a form in which, in Canada, it has never hitherto arisen.

I have already drawn attention to the fact that we have brought forward this amendment because the subject is something we can deal with ourselves in a practical way. We can deal with it in a way that will help relieve the burdensome condition of the taxpayers of Canada and will be of service in many other directions.

A great deal has been said about Canada pointing the way. The Minister of Finance himself in his speech said he hoped that we would point the way at the coming economic conference. While the countries of the world to-day are seeking for a lead, particularly in the matter of the lowering of tariffs, why should we in this country run in the very opposite direction of putting up tariffs to a point higher than they are in any other country of the world at this time? We know moreover that high tariffs are no remedy for industrial ills. We know that in Australia and in the United States—countries that are cited over and over again as being high tariff countries—the condition of unemployment is, if anything, worse than it is in this country. We have our own experience in this matter. To-day we have the highest tariffs that Canada ever had, and we have the largest amount of unemployment we ever had. Moreover, in Australia, the people are rebelling against high tariffs. I have here, although I will not take the time to quote from it, the report of the tariff board of Australia, which was presented to the Australian parliament a short time ago. That report is one of the strongest condemnations of high tariff evils that has ever been put out by any public body. It condemns high tariffs, shows how they have operated against the interests of the people of Australia, against even in many cases the interests of the very manufacturers themselves in whose behalf they were supposed to have been passed; it outlines the abuses to which high tariffs have lead, and it states, just as a former premier of Australia, Mr. Bruce, stated recently in London, that high tariffs have had their day, and that no good could be expected from them in the way of helping either industry or social conditions.

Moreover, in this country we have had the example of a practical test of the relative value—of high and low tariffs in periods of depression. When the Liberal administration came into office over ten years ago, Canada was in the throes of an industrial depression. Did we put up the tariffs? On the contrary, we lowered the tariffs—lowered them with respect to the duties on the implements of production, lowered them with respect to many things affecting the necessaries of life, lowered them in a way which would help the producers of the great basic industries and consumers generally. And what was the result? In a little time our trade began to increase, it increased, and increased, until it exceeded the bounds of anything that had been known in the way of trade and commerce since confederation. With that example before us there is no necessity of making an experiment in an opposite direction for a longer period than that experiment has already been in operation.

The Prime Minister has referred time and again to using the tariff as an instrument of national policy. He has said that it should be used to afford equality of opportunity, that is should be used for the purpose of fair competition, and in that connection he always cites the manufacturing interests of the country. May I say that I agree with him that regulations should be made to prevent dumping; I also agree that the tariff can be used, and ought to be used, effectively to safeguard the legitimate standards of labour in this country. But my right hon. friend goes further; when he says we should use this instrument as a means of bringing about what he calls "fair competition and equal opportunity," he extends the tariff to unconscionable heights in an effort so to do. I put this question to him: If the tariff can be used as an instrument of national policy by raising duties to help the manufacturing industry of this country, why might it not also be used as an instrument of national policy to help the great primary, basic industries of the country in their production by lowering the duties? If it can be used as an instrument of national policy by increasing duties, it can also be used as an instrument of national policy by decreasing duties. I think the time has about come in this country when what is most needed is a tariff which will help us export commodities, rather than a tariff that will help to prohibit importations. But to be just and effective, a tariff of the kind would require as an auxiliary something in the nature of a tariff board the membership of which would have knowledge of conditions in other parts of the world. Last year we heard a great deal about the necessity for a tariff board. We were held here for days by the government insisting their bill should go through in the form in which it was drafted, assuring the members of the board ten years of office no matter what happened. What has become of the board? We have heard nothing further about it. If there was ever need of a tariff board it was when the currency question was to the fore in Great Britain. If we had had a tariff board at that time we would not have taken the slam we did at Great Britain in the year we are to have her representatives here to meet us and other representatives of the Empire in an economic conference. Our friends opposite treated Great Britain in a way that our neighbours to the south, another great competitor of Great Britain, did not begin to do.

May I stress as a further reason which I think ought to appeal to all this year—the figures which I have given of the effect of the tariff as it is upon revenues. There is no doubt at all that the revenue of this country has suffered tremendously through the customs receipts having fallen to such a low point. Why should we impose additional taxes on the great body of the people, direct taxes in the form of sales tax, income tax and the like, when by a reversion to a moderate tariff, we may have a tariff that will serve all the purposes that are needed in the way of protection of industry, that will also help the great basic industries by permitting something in the way of competition within the country, that will be of service to the great consuming public as well, and will at the same time help to give us much of the revenue which we need at this time. These are the reasons which have actuated us in bringing forward the amendment in its present form.

There is one other matter with which I would like to deal, and it brings me to the final part of what I have to say. I refer now to the forthcoming Imperial conference. That conference is going to deal with questions of trade, and of tariffs as affecting trade, more than with any other questions. That is the strongest of reasons, if there were no other, why the amendment which has been presented should be brought before the house at this time.

In regard to the Imperial conference, may I say first of all that nothing is going to be gained by exaggerating the significance of that event. It is a great event, a great national event, a great inter-imperial event, and let us hope it will prove to be also a great international event, but nothing will be gained by saying it is the greatest event since the Reformation. Nothing will be gained by saying it is going to mark a new dispensation. Nothing will be gained by saying, as the Prime Minister himself said when he landed in Halifax last December, that it will be the greatest event of the kind that ever occurred within the empire. I do not think this exaggeration is going to help things at all. Let us hope the conference will help to increase trade between this country and the other parts of the British Empire. If it does that, it will be a great event; but this object will not be helped along by super-exaggeration.

If it is to be the great event that hon. gentlemen opposite say it is to be, is it not surprising that, up to the present time, though we are within three months of the event itself, and I hope within three weeks of the prorogation of this parliament, we have not thus far had any discussion of the questions that are to come before the conference. The government has not brought forward any statement with regard even to the agenda, and when we have asked for information we have received only curt, and, I might almost say, rude replies. If the event is so important, I submit that this house is entitled to a little more information than we have had up to the present time in reference to it. A day or two ago, I asked the Prime Minister if the agenda had been prepared, and if we could be told anything about it. I also asked whether committees had been formed here in Canada. What was the reply? The reply was that we could not get any particulars with regard to the completed agenda; nothing was said about any other particulars. With regard to the committees, we were told that it was not in the public interest that it should be made known what these committees were. We were told that there were committees, but it was said that it was not in the public interest to disclose who composed the committees or what they were doing. I submit that such information is very much in the public interest.

More than that, I say that the moment the Prime Minister made that statement, the government recognized it had been a mistake, and took good care to see that the error was rectified by the leader of the party in the other house. On the day following, the leader of the government in the Senate gave to that chamber, and through it to the country, a fairly complete statement of what he said he understood were the different committees that had to do with the business of the conference.

May I direct attention, Mr. Speaker, to this fact: The treatment of the house this year, with regard to getting information on these matters, is no different from the treatment of the house in other years. Hon. gentlemen opposite I assume would like to have the cooperation of those on this side. I ask how can they possibly expect cooperation, and how can it conceivably be given, if we are told nothing whatever about the subjects on which we are to cooperate, and if we are denied even the views of the administration with respect to what they intend to put forward at the conference? I do submit that it was an indignity to hon. members of this House of Commons that they should be denied information which the government found it necessary to give to the Senate on the following day.

But this conference is only the postponed conference of 1930. In September of that year, I asked a question of the ministry with regard to the agenda of the conference then about to take place. I was told by the Prime Minister that we could not have the agenda, that it was a secret matter and he did not intend to give it to the house. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) addressed some other questions to the Prime Minister, as to whether there would be an opportunity to discuss the agenda and whether he might be told certain things about it. He also received a reply which was to the effect that it was none of his business, and none of the business of any of us on this side of the house to discuss matters pertaining to the Imperial conference. Let me show how differently an opposition is treated in the parliament of Great Britain. On July 30, 1930—and remember it was in September that our Prime Minister said that he could give us no information, because it was a secret—Mr. Stanley Baldwin, who was then leader of the opposition, directed a question to the then Prime Minister. I am quoting from English Hansard for July 30, 1930, at page 474:

> Mr. Stanley Baldwin asked the Prime Minister whether he is in a position to make any statement as to the agenda for the Imperial conference?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

> The Prime Minister (Mr. Ramsay MacDonald): The Imperial conference will afford an opportunity for a general review and discussion of all matters, both in the political and economic spheres, of common interest to the members of the British commonwealth under the following heads:
> (1) Inter-Imperial relations.
> (2) Foreign policy and defence.
> (3) Economic questions.

Then are set out the details of what would happen on the political sphere, followed by details with respect to the economic sphere. They are given under headings, and I think I had better read those main headings to the house, because this was the agenda of 1930, and we shall in all probability have exactly the same agenda in 1932 because this is the postponed conference. If the Prime Minister of the country cannot give this information to the house, perhaps, on this occasion, the leader of the opposition may be permitted to do so. Here is the agenda:

> On the economic side of the following will be the main headings:
> (a) General question of the trade of the empire, including capital investments and establishment of branch industries, the effect of successive tariff changes and the extent and effect of inter-imperial tariff preferences, and also of other factors such as cartels, etc.;
> (b) bulk purchase and price stabilization;
> (c) development of inter-imperial trade by trade commissioner services, exhibition and general publicity;
> (d) oversea settlement;
> (e) the past and future work of the Imperial economic committee, the Empire Marketing Board and the Imperial Institute;
> (f) questions of cooperation in agricultural research (including cotton growing), forestry and minerals;
> (g) special meetings of experts on industrial research and standardization;
> (h) Transport and communications, including review of the work of the Imperial Shipping Committee and the Oversea Mechanical Transport Council, survey of steamship services, development of civil aviation, cable, radio, broadcasting, postal and news services. Under this heading would come also the question of the proposed agreements relating to merchant shipping legislation recommended in the report of the conference on the operation of dominion legislation.

Why could not that agenda have been given to this House of Commons at the beginning of this session as well as at the special session of 1930? It was given to the British House of Commons in July, 1930. They make no secret of the agenda in Britain; they have been discussing it from day to day. But I think I know the reason; it is that hon. gentlemen themselves are not familiar with the agenda and have given little or no study to it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I direct attention to the question I asked the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon) a day or two ago and to the minister's reply. I refer to Hansard for April 22:

Mr. Mackenzie King: I would like to ask the minister one question. Could my hon. friend tell us whether the subject of migration and settlement within the British Empire will be one of the matters taken up at the forthcoming Imperial conference?

Hon. W. A. Gordon (Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization): That hardly comes within the scope of this item, but I imagine matters of that character will be discussed, though to what extent or from what angle I am not prepared to indicate at the moment.

Mr. Mackenzie King: As I understand it, then, the minister's reply is to the effect that he imagines this may come up but at the present time he cannot say.

That was the position of the minister who deals with the question of settlement. The question of oversea settlement, immigration, in other words, is to be on the agenda for discussion, and all the minister can tell us is that he imagines it will come up. If that is the position of the ministry with respect to one subject on the agenda, what may we think of its present position with respect to the other subjects? I suppose each minister, if asked, would reply that he imagines the matters in which he is interested will come up, but that he cannot say. Yet we are within three months of the opening of the conference. I say to the Prime Minister that from one end of this country to the other, there is indignation being expressed at the lack of preparation on the part of the government for this important event. It is felt in this city more than anywhere else. There are officials who know that, at the last moment, they will be expected to furnish this and that in the way of information, but not until a day or two ago, when this question came up, were they told anything about what they will be expected to have in the way of preparation.

Mr. CAHAN: Is that statement true?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That statement is true.

Mr. BENNETT: It is absolutely untrue.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not believe it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend may not believe it, but I know in a very direct way that there has been a good deal of complaint that very little has been said.

Mr. CAHAN: I cannot help that, but that statement is utterly untrue.

Mr. BENNETT: Absolutely.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I have the right from what I have heard to make a statement of the kind, and I repeat it.

Mr. CAHAN: Not an untrue statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Officials in the departments of the government are worrying themselves over the question of how at the last moment they are going to get data which they ought to have been asked to prepare not one or two months ago, but a year ago. If such is not the case, why did not the government make a statement about this matter before?

Mr. CAHAN: The officials have not taken that view.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My information is that the matter has been left pretty largely in the hands of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. I have been told that a committee of that association has been meeting with committees from Great Britain, and, between them, they are trying to see how they can divide up the trade in manufactured articles between Great Britain and this country. I say to hon. gentlemen opposite that the people of Canada are not going to be satisfied with a mere division of interests, so far as the manufacturers are concerned, between Great Britain and Canada as a solution of the trade question as it concerns those parts of the empire. I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to deny that that is the kind of investigation being held at the present time by officials or agents of the manufacturers' association.

Mr. CAHAN: I know what the manufacturer's association is, but I know the statement as applied to them is untrue.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I repeat that, if this conference is the important matter which we know it to be, then the House of Commons should have had at the very beginning some intimation from the government as to what its policies were going to be, and that there should have been long before this an opportunity for discussion of the matters relating to the conference. We were told by the Prime Minister that we would have an opportunity to discuss matters pertaining to the conference when the house in committee was considering the vote for $250,000 to meet the expenses of the conference. One moment is to be left for the discussion of matters relating to the conference, and yet these matters cover the great questions of tariff, trade and migration. We have thus far had no chance whatever to discuss them, nor have we had the slightest intimation from the Prime Minister as to what the policy of the government will be when the time comes.

In support of what I said a moment ago in connection with the artificial division between Great Britain and Canada of the trade in manufactured articles, I contend that this is no new idea, nor is it one devoid of grave objections. I suppose as strong an advocate of British preference as there has been at any time was the late Lord Milner. Speaking in Montreal before the board of trade as long ago as 1908 Lord Milner said:

> And as regards the position between Canadian and British manufacturers let me say just this: A good deal of harm was done at one time by the idea that the policy of preference aimed at an artificial division of industries between Canada and the United Kingdom, certain kinds of manufactures being, so to speak, appropriated to Canada, and the United Kingdom being left undisturbed in the exercise of others. I do not believe in such an artificial limitation, but I do believe that, with reasonable tariffs and mutual preference, there will be something like a natural adjustment.

The artificial arrangement which we hear of as being contemplated is something along those lines. In textiles for example, there are certain grades of very high quality which we do not manufacture in this country. Great care may be taken at the conference to see that these are left with British manufacturers. They will be allowed to come in at low rates of duty, and the well-to-do benefited thereby. On the other hand, there are coarser grades which affect the great body of the people, and great care may be taken to see that these are protected from anything in the nature of competition from Great Britain. Other things might be mentioned as well. But this is the kind of thing which is being currently rumoured, and perhaps the Prime Minister will tell us when he speaks, whether or not the rumours are true. I repeat that the people of Canada are not going to be satisfied with any artificial division between this country and Great Britain. What will be expected from the conference will be a greater opportunity to trade with Great Britain in a perfectly free and natural way.

If the conference is to be a success, there are some things that are fairly self evident. There will have to be a change in the way of doing things from the way in which many things were done at the time of the last conference. In the first place, there will have to be a better atmosphere created than was created prior to the conference in Great Britain. We all recall, and recall with a great deal of chagrin, the atmosphere which was created prior to the economic conference in 1930, and as a consequence of which the conference, in the words of another former prime minister of a British dominion, was a complete tragedy. That is the way it was described by a representative of another part of the empire; the conference of 1930, viewed from the economic side, was considered to be a tragedy. If that tragedy is not to be repeated, we must not have a repetition of the circumstances which led up to it

First of all there was the raising of the tariff immediately in advance of the conference. Let me say again that I cannot understand the point of view of hon. gentlemen opposite when, just on the eve of the meeting of this conference, on top of all they have already done in the way of raising the tariff, they add a two per cent tax against all goods coming into Canada from Great Britain, and this at the very moment when Great Britain, in imposing her tariff against foreign countries, takes care not to put a single cent of new duty against goods from Canada. When the British House of Commons was discussing the question of tariffs, an hon. member moved that there should be a certain tax levied against the dominions, as well as against other parts of the world. I suppose he had in view somewhat the same idea as our Prime Minister prior to the last conference—that there would be a certain bargaining value in such a step. What did Mr. Thomas, the Secretary of State for the Dominions, say? He rose in his place and stated that such action would be an insult to the dominions. That shows how the British people must feel in regard to the action of hon. gentlemen opposite. They feel that the putting of a tax against goods from other parts of the empire, immediately prior to the conference, is an insulting thing. I do not think the term is too strong to use at a moment when members of the same family are about to meet together to consider how they may best further each others' interests.

In addition to the necessity of a change of atmosphere, there will have to be a very distinct change in the method of approach. We remember the Prime Minister of Canada going to the last conference, and, before any discussion had taken place, stating to all and sundry the basis upon which alone Canada would be prepared to negotiate. I hope the Prime Minister of Canada will remember that this time Canada is the host and that his attitude, whatever it may have been while he was in Great Britain, will be a little different towards those who come to Ottawa from other parts of the empire as guests of the Dominion of Canada. What did the Prime Minister say before the proceedings had started at the last Imperial conference? First of all, he said that he was the leader of the Conservative party in Canada; that the Conservative party stood for protection; that any policy he was prepared to consider must be based on protectionist principles; that the policy of his government was known as "Canada first"; that "Canada first" meant no goods would be permitted to come into Canada from abroad which could be produced or manufactured in this country; and that the only basis upon which he was prepared to consider any question of trade was that of what he called empire reciprocal tariffs. He gave his own definition of reciprocal preference, or "empire preference" to give the exact term he used. What was this "empire preference"? It was a preference to be created, not by reducing in any particular the existing rates of duty, but by adding to them to the extent of a ten per cent increase. He went a step further: He said he would not agree to discuss the matter with any part of the empire until all had adopted the principle of protectionist tariffs which would enable them to bring into being a reciprocal, empire tariff along the lines which he had indicated. Only on those lines could there be any discussion or consideration of the question. He went even further and said: We will not consider any alternative; no alternative that can be suggested will be satisfactory to us as compared with what we have proposed. What he had proposed was, in effect—this was exactly the way in which it was received by the British government—that Great Britain must change her fiscal policy, in consideration of which her people would be allowed to send to Canada such goods as could come in over a tariff wall which would keep out anything produced or manufactured in this country. That was what Mr. Thomas designated as "humbug." There must be no more "humbug", so far as the Imperial conference is concerned. If it is to be a success, all such methods of procedure will have very speedily to be dropped. My right hon. friend will not be able to get anywhere with his "Canada first" policy as a basis of negotiation within the empire. The people of Britain have already said, members of parliament of the mother country have already stated very emphatically, that they are not going to be satisfied with any trade agreement that will exclude from Canada all goods which can be produced or manufactured in this country.

I have not time to go into the matter fully, or to make clear the British attitude in that regard. I could quote at considerable length from statements that have already been given to the public. In this connection however I point out how different the attitude of Britain is from that of Canada. All the public men of the different political parties in Britain who have spoken have stated with one voice that so far as the conference in Canada is concerned, their representatives should come here, not riveted to any particular formula or policy, nor with the desire to get what they wish particularly for themselves, but rather with an open mind to try to discover what may be for the common good. Speaking in the British House of Commons on January 27, Mr. Thomas said:

> "We shall go there, not riveted to any creed or dogma but with a single-minded desire to effect a real settlement and I am sure the dominions will not only realize—as they do realize—the advantages of their association in the British Commonwealth, but if they reciprocate in the spirit with which we intend to go there, there ought to be no doubt of the success of the conference.
> "While it is quite clear," Mr. Thomas said, "you have what is called a conflict of particular interests, frankly I see no reason whatever why this conflict cannot be merged into a common recognition that the interests of all are more important than those of any section.
> "In that connection the British government will go to Ottawa quite prepared to depart from certain well known principles that have hitherto existed in this country. In fact there will be no embargo, so far as the British government is concerned, to the points of policy they will be prepared to discuss.
> "But having said that from our point of view it is equally necessary to keep clearly in mind that we have a very distinct point of view and interest in the policy of the dominions themselves. No conference will be successful, lasting or beneficial if it is assumed that all the concessions will be on one side."

Later, on February 22, he said:

> Don't let us go to Ottawa in a haggling spirit, but let us go and see what we can throw in the common pool for the benefit of all.

I might quote similarly from Mr. Neville Chamberlain, Sir Austen Chamberlain, the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin and numerous other speakers, including some of the premiers of the other dominions. Let me take, by way of example, Mr. Forbes of New Zealand who, in an interview given to the press on February 25, said:

> In accordance with her traditional practice in empire affairs New Zealand will not go to Ottawa with any desire to bargain unduly with Great Britain. Any bickerings over tariff questions will be avoided at all costs.

And so, with respect to every voice that has come from across the water to this side, there has been the note that those who attend the conference are coming not wedded to any particular policy, but with an open mind to see how they can further to the greatest degree possible the well-being of all.

Before this debate is concluded, the Prime Minister should give us the assurance that Canada's attitude will be of like character, that she will enter this conference with a perfectly open mind, and will not hold to the theory that the only goods to be admitted to this country from Great Britain will be those which will come in over a tariff high enough to keep out those things which are produced or manufactured within our own borders.

If this conference is to be a success, the Prime Minister will also have to give up the idea of seeking to make his adjustments with Great Britain on a bargaining basis. I should like to have said a good deal about this idea of bargaining as a means of negotiation between countries. Whatever may be said about bargaining between Canada and foreign countries, the same arguments do not apply to an attempt to bring about agreements between this country and the other British dominions, and, in particular, they do not apply to an attempt to bring about an agreement between the mother country and Canada. An attitude very different from that of bargaining as commonly understood will have to be taken in connection with Great Britain at this Imperial conference if the conference is going to be a success. I hope the Prime Minister, when he speaks, will give to the Canadian people an assurance that, in seeking to arrive at an agreement with Great Britain, he will proceed, not on a bargaining basis, but more in accord with the attitude taken in this country during the last thirty-three years in negotiations with Britain with respect to tariff preferences.

There are two methods of tariff preferences: one, the granting of preferences by voluntary act; the other, a reciprocal preference arrived at as a result of joint agreement. A reciprocal preference leads to what is known as a locked agreement, one which sets out in specific terms the basis of trading, necessarily restricting the matter of trading as regards both time and the number of commodities, and also limiting, to some extent, the freedom of the nations concerned to trade with the other countries of the world. Such agreements will not help to strengthen the ties of the British Empire and they will not help to improve trade relations between this and the mother country. For thirty-three years Canada has granted to Great Britain a voluntary preference. Now that the British government have changed their fiscal policy, they, too, are in a position to grant a voluntary preference to this country; and they have done so. That is their attitude as indicated at the present time. I submit that, at the conference, Canada's interests will be more substantially furthered if the results attained are brought about by voluntary concession through concurrent legislation than by means of locked agreements between Great Britain and this country. I believe that is the view held by the Canadian people generally.

The bargaining method is based on the theory that trade is in the nature of war, rather than of exchange. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion), who I see smiling at what I say, just about two years ago remarked that trade was war. I corrected him at the time by pointing out that trade was in the nature of exchange.

Mr. MANION: The people corrected my right hon. friend.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He should change his theory in that regard. Especially so far as the mother country is concerned, let us seek to negotiate on a basis which will have regard for trade as in the nature of exchange which is mutually beneficial and which were it otherwise would not be engaged in. Similarly may I ask: Why need we seek to further trade by means of limited agreements, these locked agreements that I have indicated, restricting negotiations in other directions, when to the degree to which the countries interested consider such action advisable it is possible to have that free flow of trade which comes from the removal of tariff barriers?

If bargaining is to be the basis of negotiations between Canada and Great Britain, then I ask on which basis is the bargaining to take place? Is it to take place on the Canadian basis, which has been described by the Prime Minister as the protectionist basis? The Prime Minister says: We will consider no bargain that is not based on the policy of "Canada first." If we are to negotiate on that basis, it means that Great Britain will have to put up her tariffs against Canada to a point equivalent to that at which Canada has put up her tariffs against Great Britain. That will prove to be a very serious thing for this country. What benefit shall we derive in Canada from an arrangement which will not permit any increase of trade worth having, and which, moreover, will threaten the very important position which we now hold in the British market.

I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite are familiar with the fact, that, while Great Britain has a twenty per cent tariff as against foreign nations, there is a provision that that tariff does not come into effect, so far as the dominions are concerned, until the fifteenth of November next. But on the fifteenth of November, unless in the meantime an arrangement has been made which is satisfactory to Great Britain, that twenty per cent tariff as matters now stand will apply against Canada as well as against foreign countries. In what position will we then be in regard to our markets in Great Britain? Great Britain has kept her bargaining power very much in reserve but it is none the less very real. She has said that nothing will take place, so far as the dominions are concerned, until the fifteenth of November, but, as I understand the provisions of the British import duties, this twenty per cent tariff will then become applicable against Canada and the other dominions, subject to any special arrangements or modifications that may be made at the Imperial conference. That is a very serious thing. Nothing could be more so.

I ask then, if you are not going to negotiate on the protectionist basis which is Canada's present basis are you going to negotiate on the free trade basis which is the basis that Britain by her present attitude is evidently prepared to adopt? The Prime Minister of Canada has already said that he will not consider the free trade basis at all. As a matter of fact, the basis Great Britain has before her at the present moment is the free trade basis, with no duties at all against goods coming in from the dominions. But the Prime Minister at the Imperial conference said: No, we do not want any free trade within the empire; that will defeat the very object we have in view. Well, if he is not going to negotiate on a protectionist basis, or on a free trade basis, he will have to negotiate on a basis which is somewhere in between the two; I wonder where the Prime Minister is going to get in the period of time that the conference will sit trying to negotiatate on some basis somewhere in between the two?

The Prime Minister and the government would be well advised to drop altogether this idea of seeking to bargain with the old country in any arrangements that they make at the conference. They would be well advised to take a generous attitude in the matter of trade which will enable British commodities subject to the provisions of a revenue tariff, to come into this country and be of service to our consumers and to those engaged in the great basic industries, and thus in turn enable our commodities to find a place in the markets of Great Britain and elsewhere throughout the world.

Another thing my right hon. friend will have to forego is this attitude of his that there can be no alternative proposition. The last time Great Britain hinted at a quota as a possibility, Britain was told the proposition could not be entertained. The Prime Minister will have to examine the quota question very carefully, and my advice is that he examine quotas very, very carefully to make perfectly sure that the quota, after all, is going to serve Canada to the extent to which the Prime Minister when he returned from England at the close of last year said that it would.

A further matter my right hon. friend will have to change is legislation with respect to the tariff by order in council. I think he has already received word from the British government that it is impossible to make any trade arrangements if the government is going to retain in its own hands the right of fixing specific duties and putting on commodities valuations of its own for duty purposes; in other words, if the government is going to retain in its own hands the power to change the tariff from day to day. That is something the Prime Minister will have to change if any successful arrangement is to be made at the conference.

My right hon. friend will also have to change his theory of making Canada a national economic unit—this idea that Canada should be made a self-sufficing unit, producing within its own borders everything that it needs. That conception comes from the time of the ancient Greeks and the Greek city-state, when the state and the city were one and the same. The city-state of the day had to be self-sufficing because of the political and social organization of the age. But in our time the countries of the world are all interdependent, and the economics that are going to suit the present day are those which relate to the interdependence of nations, rather than to the idea of single states as national economic units. But what is the idea back of this theory of Canada as an economic unit? It is entirely a protectionist device to enable the government to keep out as much in the way of trade as it is possible to keep out of this country.

The economic unit idea, so far as Canada is concerned, is linked up with another economic unit idea which the Prime Minister might just as well dismiss as a subject of discussion at the conference, and that is the conception of the creation of an imperial economic unit. That is another theory which imperialists have held for a great many years—the idea of making out of the British Empire some kind of imperial economic unit.

The Prime Minister, when he came back from England last December, talked about an end to the idea of the empire being a political unit. He said we must now seek to make of the empire an economic union; the term "economic union" and "economic unit" are interchangeable. The mere fact that the Prime Minister made that statement, and emphasized so strongly that the empire was no longer a political unit but must now become an economic unit, made me think at the time that, like the lady in Hamlet, he "doth protest too much."

I think what the Prime Minister has in mind is this very conception of the empire as an imperial economic unit. That is the significance, I believe, of the three per cent excise tax imposed by the combined impositions of the last and the present budget. I think what the Prime Minister is aiming at is to bring into being when the conference meets here, with the aid of others with whom no doubt he has already conferred, some kind of an imperial Zollverein whereby there will be imposed so far as all the dominions and Great Britain are concerned, an innocent looking little tax like this three per cent excise tax in order to unite them all in a manner which will also serve to separate them all from the rest of the world. The effort will be to have a similar tax imposed by Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Newfoundland, the Irish Free State and Britain, to apply against goods coming in from foreign countries; so far as trade within the British Empire is concerned the effort will be to have it agreed that this tax will be wiped out by each part against the others. Or as an alternative means to the same end, a corresponding reduction made by each in its existing schedules. The country will then be told that within the empire tariffs have been lowered. If that is his objective, may I say that that will raise a very, very large question, one of the most serious questions ever raised in this country, because along with that idea is associated the conception of some form of fund—to be jointly and centrally administered; at one time the effort has been to create such a fund for the purpose of imperial defence, at another for the purpose of imperial organization, at another for the purpose of imperial marketing; it will be said to be, at this conference, for the purpose of imperial development. Always there has been some little fund to be devoted to imperial purposes. This time it will be to carry out this idea of making the empire a self sufficing unit. The proceeds of the 3 per cent excise will be the contribution to be made to the common fund. Once an economic unit is thus established, it is evident that to carry its policies into effect there will have to be something in the nature of a central organization at headquarters to administer the affairs of an economic empire; and the moment centralized policies are discussed there is an immediate return to the political empire which the Prime Minister says we have now got away from. Well, if we have got away from the political empire, do not let us attempt at the conference, or at any other time to bring about an empire that is to be centralized for economic purposes, because that will work just as much injury to the interests of the empire as the other kind of centralization will. So far as the empire's interests are concerned they will best be served by allowing each part of the empire to continue to enjoy complete freedom of fiscal control, a fiscal freedom just as complete as each part enjoys at the present time.

May I conclude by stating the positive course which I think ought to be taken by the government at the conference? That course, adopted in Canada thirty-three years ago, of giving a voluntary preference to Great Britain, was introduced in the year 1897 by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Fielding. A preference of 12½ per cent was then given to Great Britain. The next year it became 25 per cent, and shortly afterwards 33⅓ per cent. When the late Liberal government was in office that preference was increased still further by a ten per cent discount on commodities, under the British preference coming into Canada through Canadian ports.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have sought to convey the impression that that preference was something given to Great Britain without benefiting Canada. That, however, is not the case. The preference was given in the form in which it was because Canada felt she would gain in trade, that trade itself was in the nature of valuable exchange, and would not exist unless it were beneficial to both parties. Through that arrangement Canada was giving a distinct advantage to her consumers in the cost of living and a distinct advantage to her basic industries in the matter of costs of production. Moreover, Canada was doing something to hold a good customer, a customer who was taking five times as much from her as she was getting from Canada.

As Sir Josiah Stamp said in his address, let us not seek to estimate the value of relations within the British Empire on any purely mercenary basis, but let us look ahead for generations, and realize that the attitude taken to-day may have repercussions in the years to come which may be very serious indeed. I should like to have called the attitude of voluntary concession, all interests considered, the Canadian attitude. The statement of Sir Josiah Stamp describes the Liberal attitude in the matter of voluntary concession. I think at least I am justified in calling it the Liberal attitude in connection with the British preference, because the Liberal government initiated that policy, and the only increases given under the British preference in Canada have been given by Liberal administrations. I am prepared to concede, and am glad to recognize the fact, that every Conservative government since that measure was introduced, with the sole exception of the present administration, kept the British preference where it was. There was a decrease in the preference on one or two commodities for a short time during the period of the war. The fact remains, however, that the governments of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden and of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen alike recognized that the policy of British preference was one to which in the circumstances as they existed no exception could well be taken, and one which was of great advantage to Canada. They maintained the preference and the method of its application had passed from the realm of partisan discussion and had become what many of us had hoped was a national attitude. I trust on mature consideration the government will feel that that is still the best attitude to take. I am sure, if they treat Great Britain in that spirit, they will get from Great Britain, so far as consideration for Canada is concerned, a much better arrangement and a much better bargain than they will get by sitting down and discussing particular items and restricting trade in one way or another through locked agreements reached as a result of bickering as well as bargaining.

So far as the Liberal party is concerned, we will cordially welcome whatever extension of trade between Great Britain and Canada the government may find it possible to effect. They may go into the conference with the feeling that so far as the opposition is concerned, we believe they will protect Canada's trade to the extent of seeing that no interests which should be carefully considered will be jeopardized, and that they may go as far as they like in the matter of the furtherance of trade among the different portions of the British empire. If they adopt an attitude of the kind I have described they may expect the support of hon. gentlemen on this side of the house. We will not, however, support any narrow, circumscribed view of the question of trade between Great Britain and this country. Our attitude has been made clear, and was made clear in the last budget of the Liberal party presented preparatory to the conference of 1930. Our attitude to-day remains what it was in 1930. That budget denoted a further lowering of the duties against Great Britain, with a view to increasing the preference and transferring to Great Britain trade which formerly had taken place between Canada and other nations. That change did not affect adversely a single interest in this country, and it would have helped very materially trade among the different parts of the empire.

There is one thing to which we will take exception,—and to which exception should be taken not only in Canada but in every dominion and in Great Britain herself—we will take exception to any tariff arrangement which will shackle the freedom of any self-governing dominion, or of Great Britain herself, in the matter of any trade arrangements which we or she or they may wish to make with countries outside of the empire. We will oppose any measure which may shackle and bind subsequent parliaments. No one has been more eloquent than has my right hon. friend in his statements that no one parliament should bind a subsequent one. He should, before the conference, make it clear to the people of Canada that he will see to it that, whatever arrangements are made, subsequent parliaments will not be bound so far as their fiscal freedom is concerned. Short of binding subsequent parliaments, of restricting or limiting freedom to trade with other parts of the world, of not failing to allow freedom of trade with the world in general to the extent to which we may wish to carry it on, the government may rest assured that it will have the support of the opposition in the furtherance of the largest possible measure of trade between the different parts of the empire that it can bring about.

At this point I should like to answer one representation my right hon. friend has made in other discussions. He said that the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier had adopted a bargaining method similar to his own when he was in England in 1902, and the right hon. gentleman referred to a resolution then passed as evidence of the truth of his assertion, Sir Wilfrid Laurier did nothing of the kind. The situation in 1902 was this: Great Britain had placed a duty on foodstuffs coming from all parts of the world in order to raise revenue needed as a consequence of expenditures made during the South African war. It was a temporary measure for revenue purposes only. What Sir Wilfrid Laurier said was that Canada would expect Great Britain to remove the tax, so far as Canada was concerned, because we had given Great Britain a preference in our markets. He urged that, at a time when Great Britain was imposing a tax, she should give us a preference in return for the preference we had given her. That attitude was vastly different from the one taken by my right hon. friend at the last Imperial economic conference, when he urged that Britain must change her fiscal policy and impose taxes before we would cooperate with her. Sir Wilfrid Laurier always said he felt perfectly sure that any time Great Britain changed her fiscal policy and as a consequence imposed customs duties, she might be depended upon to give Canada a voluntary preference, just as Canada had given her a preference. So I believe she will act, and so I am sure the people of Canada generally believe she will act. If in that spirit we enter into negotiations with the mother country, I think we may expect of the coming conference a large measure of increase in trade within the empire, together with a strengthening of inter-imperial cooperation and inter-imperial good-will.

So far as the Liberal party is concerned, that is the objective we hope may be realized as a consequence of the forthcoming conference. We trust the conference will serve as an important factor in the increase of trade between different parts of the empire, and particularly between Great Britain and Canada. Along with that we trust it will mark the beginning of a closer cooperation in many directions among all parts of the empire, and will point the way, let us hope, to a reduction in tariffs by the other countries of the world, and to a beginning as well, so far as Canada is concerned, of more in the way of trade with all other nations.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, much of the debate to which we have listened, including the speech this afternoon, would seem to indicate that there is no appreciation by the opposition of the fact that we are in the midst of a world crisis. After listening to the address this afternoon one would think that we were in the ordinary, humdrum existence of fairly good times and that the old story, revamped, was being told again; that Industry and Humanity was once more to be quoted and the four points therein enunciated made known to the public again; that these tales which the people have grown weary of hearing were to be revamped and retold as if we were in the midst of ordinary circumstances, and that conditions in this world had not changed from those normal conditions under which parliament meets.

Well, sir, we are in the midst of the greatest crisis the world has ever seen. Most of us have done some reading with respect to these matters, and we have formed definite understandings and convictions as to the situation. I suppose some books make a greater impression upon our minds than others, depending to a large extent upon our appreciation of the opportunity the author may have had to study the problems at first hand and indicate as soundly as might be possible a general summary of conditions. The gentleman who for ten years was economic adviser of the League of Nations, and whose name is known to all within sound of my voice, expressed himself a few months ago with respect to existing conditions, in these words:

> Then came the depression. In intensity and in range beyond all previous experience, with a duration and with subversive consequences which none can yet with confidence forecast.

Proceeding further, he uses these words:

> The first thing that is overwhelmingly clear is that this is a world depression in the fullest sense. It is world wide in the range of its effects; its causes, however originated, are clearly related to defects in the world system; and there is the strongest presumption that such remedial measures as may be possible will require the concerted action of many countries.

That is the firm and considered conviction of one who, having had perhaps greater opportunities than any other through being in the very centre of the world movement, is able to express an opinion of value. But I submit that any stranger coming to this house and sitting in the gallery for the last few weeks, or hearing the address this afternoon, would be wholly unconscious of the fact that the great currents that move the world are out of course, that conditions have changed and we are face to face with the greatest crisis of which there is any record whatever.

To-night I venture to direct attention to the fact that we are dealing with realities and not with theories, and that those who have been charged with responsibility for the administration of government during the last few months have had placed upon them a responsibility greater than has fallen on most governments in this country. I go further and say this, that it is quite apparent that this fact is being understood more and more by the people of this country. When the right hon. gentleman proceeds to give advice in that ponderous fashion which is his own, and when he undertakes to tell us how we should conduct the business of this country, I can only say to him that most people who have business to transact, most people who have a stake in Canada, and most people who are concerned about its future are thankful for the fact that he is not charged with responsibility at this time. More, I tell him that leading supporters of the Liberal party of years gone by gladden my heart from day to day with communications expressing gratitude that we are transacting the affairs of the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Could my right hon. friend tell us who they are? Perhaps among them are the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) and the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion).

Mr. BENNETT: No, neither. Not a day goes by without a letter coming to me from some part of this country, gratefully acknowledging the service being rendered to Canada by this government. What is more, very seldom do I see men of the Liberal faith who do not express grateful thanks for the fact that the task of administration is not in the hands of the right hon. gentleman opposite. In fact, there are those who sit behind him now who have told me the same thing.

Let us look for a moment at world conditions in the light of the events of the period from 1914 to 1918. In 1919 there met in Paris representatives of most of the nations of the world, among them representatives of this dominion. They made their voices heard, indicating their views as to the effect of existing conditions upon this country. What were those conditions? First of all there were food shortages on a scale never before known. Raw materials were scarce and unavailable for manufacturing. Communication by sea and land had been disturbed. Shipping was no longer available in the ordinary commercial sense. The transport of the world had broken down because of the dislocation brought about by the war. In addition, all the organization of finance and industry was disturbed. There were staggering debts such as mankind never before had contemplated. There was a change of mental attitude and habits on the part of the people of the world. In some countries there were revolutions, in others real starvation, in others great impoverishment; in others passions were aroused by the results of the war, and national prejudices had been stimulated. Worst of all, the world had lost millions of its very best and finest men.

That was the condition in 1919. I could amplify it, but I think that would be unnecessary. It is within the memory of most members of this house what those conditions were, and yet so courageous are men that there was shown a grim determination to reform, to reorganize, to readjust and to march forward. It is one of the striking things in history that of all the matters of which we have record to-day there is nothing that equals the recovery of the world in the years from 1919 to 1925. It is one of the most amazing and astounding matters of which we have any record. In the meantime there were the conferences at Locarno and at Genoa; the rehabilitation of Austria, Bulgaria and Greece; the great naval disarmament conference at Washington. Everywhere men were endeavouring to lay the foundations for peace and prosperity.

An hon. MEMBER: Order and good government.

Mr. BENNETT: Order and good government; not in the sense in which hon. gentlemen mutter it under their breath, but in the very broadest sense they were laying the foundations of ordered peace and regulated prosperity.

The League of Nations, which had come into being at the end of the war, was discharging great functions in a manner satisfactory to increasing numbers of people. Everywhere men filled with courage and hope were going forward to their allotted tasks. It is true that conditions in Europe were not as favourable as they were in other parts of the world; among the belligerents of Europe conditions were anything but satisfactory, but there was steady improvement. Figures supplied by the League of Nations show that seven years after the war production had increased by 18 per cent as compared with 1913, while population, because of the great losses of the war, had increased only 6 per cent. That meant better standards of living; that meant that the world was better able to take care of the conditions under which its people lived. Although in 1925 international trade in Europe had fallen, the average man on that continent was better off than he was in 1913.

Then come the next four years, from 1925 to 1929. Without taking up too much time to deal with this matter, I need only bring to the memory of hon. members of this house the fact that almost every country had again based its currency upon gold—Great Britain in 1925 and other countries at varying dates —for the purpose of having a universal standard of values and a universal medium of exchange. Industry had been reorganized, which made possible greater production; trade had been expanded consequent upon the increased production, and crude products, according to the figures of the League of Nations, had increased at the remarkable rate of 4½ per cent per annum. The process of manufacturing had, of course, added greatly to their value.

These are the conditions to which I refer; that is, world trade had outrun world population—in 1929 the one had increased by 18 per cent as against an increase in the case of the other of 6 per cent. Europe's increase in production or trade had increased by the enormous figure of 22 per cent over what it was in 1913. It had regained its pre-war position, and it might be said that ten years after the great war, ten years after the representatives of this dominion met the representatives of other nations in Paris, the world had increased its productiveness to a point far beyond what it had been in the years before the war. The business cycle reached its peak in 1929.

Let us look for a moment and see what were the conditions then prevailing. You had a steadily increasing production which had outrun population; you had an expansion of trade; you had conditions vastly improved over those of 1913; you had adjustments rapidly taking place in every part of the globe, starvation had disappeared, impoverishment was not known and the world was getting back to real normal conditions where men buy and sell, make and exchange and trade and do business from one end of Christendom to the other.

What happened in 1929? By that year we had reached the peak of the cycle. Some hon. members may doubt whether or not there are cycles in business, and upon that point you will find that great authorities express divergent opinions. In the very nature of things I think there must be something in business cycles; but, at any rate, in 1929 the business cycle had reached its peak. However, there were other forces at work. You had, for instance, difficulties in connection with the conditions obtaining in Europe, brought about, not by reason of what was taking place there but because of what was taking place on this continent. In no part of the world had recovery been equal to what it was on the American continent. The reason was obvious. Because of a late entry into the war the United States had accumulated a vast wealth, estimated by some economists to be as great as forty billions of dollars, as a result of her production and trade prior to her entering into the war. The result was that there was prosperity on this continent such as we had never had before, and during the war years this country shared to some extent in that prosperity.

[Mr. Bennett.]

It was one of the very strange anomalies of life that along with the destruction of men and materials which took place during the Great war there was a distinct improvement in the prosperity of the countries engaged in the production of the means of destruction. That was so particularly upon the American continent. Then came that feverish expression of mass psychology, so often found upon this continent, and speculation became rampant to a scale never known before. When I say never known before, I am but quoting the words of one who has studied the matter from every angle and standpoint. Men, women and children—when I say children, I mean boys and girls under the age of twenty-one—were all engaged in speculation.

Speculation has a well-defined place in economics. Although I am in no sense an economist, I know the conditions under which speculation sometimes becomes a highly beneficial state, that is, speculation based upon judgment. For instance, there are men who with a rising market think it desirable to make large investments, and then they realize upon those investments and take the benefit of the rise in the market. There are others who speculate upon margins, and the psychology of the people upon this continent being as it is, speculation upon margins reached a scale almost impossible for one to express. I recall, that when I was in the place now occupied by the right hon. gentleman opposite, I expressed to this house the view that unless something was done to curb this reckless speculation, the result would be inevitable and disaster would be certain. Of course, to make a statement like that is like baying to the moon; in the midst of speculation, no one pays any attention to an opinion of that kind. When you found ten and twelve per cent being paid for money in order that speculation might be carried on, when you found what you thought were reasonable men exchanging five per cent bonds for securities which yielded two per cent for speculative purposes, you knew reason was dethroned and men had capitulated their judgment to the speculative craze. The result was apparent in every part of the world but, as I say, particularly apparent upon this continent.

What was the result in Europe? All you have to do is to read the bank returns of Europe and you will find that there was a constant drain upon their resources in order to send money to the great centres of finance upon this continent. That drain became so great that legislation was enacted for the purpose of preventing the further weakening of the resources of European countries. It did not stop; it continued and in the end the boom burst. Do you recall the break in values? Do you realize what it meant? It meant that suddenly the pyramiding of conditions which had been going on in this era of speculation had brought about such a situation that, top-heavy, it broke and prices reached a low level, such as we had not seen before, and equalled only during recent months as a consequence of something to which I shall presently refer.

So we passed into the year 1930. In that year there were evidences of the foundations being more firmly established, the bottom being reached and improvement beginning. If any hon. members have stood in a field and watched a flying machine suddenly just raise its nose from the ground before it takes the air, they will realize exactly what I mean when I say that there were some evidences of a slight improvement. At that moment men were beginning to take fresh hope and they continued to do so. We in this country, owing to conditions to which I have on more than one occasion alluded, namely, the almost sudden diminution in the prices of our principal crop for the purposes of ready new wealth, found ourselves in a more difficult position than some other countries, but we were making a certain progress, very little it is true, but some.

Then there was an event the significance of which I always think hon. members with whom I have spoken do not fully realize. It was the passing of Great Britain from the gold standard. The effect of that upon the world was greater than any other single event which confronts us at this time. The world's banker, so to speak, had become insolvent; that is the way in which it was regarded. Sometimes, when I listen to or read the speeches that have been delivered during the last few days, I feel that very few members seem to realize that practically the greatest part of the world's business was transacted on a basis of sterling. Bills were drawn from Scandinavia and other parts of Europe expressed in terms of pounds, shillings and pence, because this was a stable exchange that had been created, not in five or ten nor yet in a hundred years, but over a period of hundreds of years the basis of trading as it is known on Lombard street had been established. Far off in South America the importer, drawing his bill upon an acceptance house in London, attached to it the insurance policy and the bill of lading. When they reached London they were taken around to the acceptance house which accepted the bill for whatever amount it might be. Then it was sold by the broker and ultimately found its way into a joint stock bank and finally into the Bank of England. Those were the methods by which England over a period of centuries had established herself as the financial centre of the world. The war had created an interruption, but in the end nothing could take from her that position which had been established by long habit, by centuries of such dealings as I have indicated. So the Lombard street system became known all over the world. Dollars had no significance except in the terms of exchange value for pounds, shillings and pence. If any hon. member had visited Europe in 1921 and 1922 as I did, he would have found that a five-pound Bank of England note was the readiest form of exchange that could be carried with one, because in every country, whether it be France, Germany, Austria, or Switzerland, it was always exchangeable on account of the fact that it had a reputation; there was behind it a history, a fixed value. After 1925, when England went upon a gold basis again, there was never any question of the exchange value of the pound sterling. In our money, it was $4.86; on the exchanges of other countries its value was established by their bankers and known to everybody.

Under those conditions, after credits had been established that it was believed were ample to take care of any demand that might be made, suddenly, without much warning, the bank was unable to meet its obligations in gold; there was no longer a free market in this commodity and England went off the gold standard. The repercussion, the effect of this upon the world we are only beginning fully to realize; in every part of Christendom that is so; in the far east, in the far west, in every part of the world, that is so. Even to-day, notwithstanding the fact that the pound has not been stabilized, although the other day we heard Sir Josiah Stamp say that it must be—and the value may be $4.86, may be $4, may be any other figure so far as we are concerned, but it must be stabilized—bills are still being drawn upon England from Scandinavia, central Europe, every part of the world, and the sterling area is being extended day by day because it still represents the medium of exchange with which men are accustomed to deal, about which they know the most and in which they transact their international trade.

That being so—and I think every hon. gentleman will realize how fully that is true—the disturbance that came about by reason of the happening to which I have just alluded, was felt tremendously in this country. It will be recalled that President Hoover, in an endeavour to meet the situation, had granted a moratorium with respect to debts to last for a year. Yet so sensitive had trade become, so disorganized were finances, so difficult was the situation with respect to short term credits, with the two weeks and a half it took to adjust the matter after the Prime Ministers' conference in London, that the full benefits of the moratorium were lost. As illustrating the solidarity of the world from the standpoint of credit and the effect on the world at large of incidents which are small in themselves, hon. members will perhaps recall one of the opening sentences in the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), when he referred to an occurrence in Austria in June, 1931. It will be remembered that the largest of the Austrian commercial groups found itself insolvent because one of the directors said: I think we should revalue our securities. In doing so they found on present values this institution, with which the whole life of Austria was wrapped up, had become insolvent. This condition spread to Germany. The Bank of England loaned them £4,500,000, a very large sum, and that credit France had subsequently to take up in part. It is told by Sir Arthur Salter that on that day he was in New York; he went into the office of the governor of the Federal Reserve Bank and found him telephoning on the one hand to London and on the other to Chicago. He said he had just been speaking to Montagu Norman who had informed him that the situation in regard to the Austrian bank was very bad and was spreading. Just as in 1914 a single shot bringing death to one person caused disaster to the whole world; so this happening in Austria spread over all Europe and had the result, coupled with the withdrawal of money from that continent, of bringing about disaster there.

What was our position? We have to deal with realities and not with theories. Those charged with government in this country, with the awful responsibility of endeavouring to maintain the credit, the solvency of Canada in the eyes of the world, had upon them a responsibility which they could not shirk and which they would not if they could. What was their position? What was ours? Confronted with that situation, we were just 10,000,000 people in a world of 1,600,000,000. We were caught in the current. We were like a small boat which, moored at the bank of a stream, is caught up by a tidal wave and swept along with the current. That was our position, and yet day after day I have listened to and read the speeches of members of this house who talk of the condition of Canada as though it were something normal, akin to the condition of the nineties or of 1921 or of 1922, instead of which we were caught by a current in the greatest crisis the world has known.

Mr. GRAY: We did not hear that in the campaign.

Mr. BENNETT: You certainly did not, because the campaign was over in July, 1930. I have been endeavouring to point out just as clearly as I could that in 1930 there were, according to the evidence of every authority, signs that this country, in common with every other part of the world, was making progress towards ultimate improvement. But if one blinds one's eyes as my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Gray) would; if one will not see because he does not wish to see, or having eyes to see, sees not; if he does not take note of conditions as they are and observe the changes that time has wrought, it is not my fault.

Mr. GRAY: I heard the right hon. gentleman in Sarnia.

Mr. BENNETT: I tried in 1930 to point out as clearly as any man could, and I believed then as I believe now, that if it had not been for the abnormal conditions to which I have alluded, and the existence of which no man can deny, Canada would have attained that degree of prosperity which it reached during the years when it reflected the changed conditions in the world. When I hear hon. gentlemen opposite talk of the prosperity of Canada and of our great advancement in export trade from 1925 to 1929, I wonder if they have read the figures. Do they realize that that but reflects conditions in the world at large? Canada did not stand differently from other countries except in this, that being a new country rich in raw materials, we did march forward rapidly with respect to exports until we had attained to the position of sixth among the exporting countries of the world. And to-day, notwithstanding the greatest depression that the world has ever seen, we stand fifth among the exporting countries of the world, being exceeded only by Great Britain, France, Germany and the United States of America. There is no record in the economic history of the world of a people so small in numbers, a country so vast in area, having made such progress under present conditions.

Mr. SANDERSON: Does the Prime Minister take credit for that?

Mr. BENNETT: There is one thing he would not do: he would not accord it to you. I trust the hon. gentleman knows what I am talking about. Let us go a step further. I have been endeavouring to point out that in 1930, at the very time that this government came into power, the conditions which had been steadily improving were, for the reasons I have indicated, showing—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: All you have to do is to read, and I will tell my hon. friends where they will find it—in Sir Arthur Salter's last book. Those were the conditions. What were we to do?

Mr. BOUCHARD: What you promised.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly, and that is what we are doing, and what is more, what we propose to do. There are men in this house who will not permit their intelligence to work lest the conclusions might not be favourable to their own party. There are those who will not exercise their reason with respect to these matters. They must endeavour to make political capital out of a situation that is beyond the control of themselves and of their party and of parliament.

There is just one comment I should like to make upon the address which was made this afternoon by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). He said: There are some matters which this parliament cannot control. A modest expression of fact, but that is so. Confronted with that situation what would you have had your country do? We did the only thing that a government similarly situated could do, and I am going to point out to you that the authority that was cited in this very seat by the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), when the League of Nations in 1924 indicated that tariffs were standing in the way of the world's progress, advised Hungary in 1931 that she should use tariffs to lessen her imports. Why? You get back to the old question. Some hon. members here smile or laugh or giggle when you talk about the adverse balance of payments. I wonder if they have paused for a minute to understand the full significance of what is involved in that. Here you have two things to consider, what a country buys and what it sells. The balance of what it sells over what it buys is the visible evidence of its having a balance on the right side. If on the other hand it buys more than it sells, there is a visible balance against that country. Sir Arthur Salter puts it very clearly, and he himself is a pronounced free trader, as I shall presently point out. Then there are invisible things that go to counterbalance these matters, such as the interest payments that come to Canada from her investments abroad—and we have some investments in every part of the world; the tourist trade that comes to this country to the amount of $250,000,000 a year, and which when you deduct the $76,000,000 that Canadians spend as tourists abroad gives us a favourable balance in tourist traffic alone of $175,000,000, a very large item in making and shaping the commercial credit of this Dominion.

What did we find when we came into power in 1930? It was the proud boast of the late government that Canada of all the countries of the world had been the only one to lower her tariff since the war.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Hon. gentlemen say, "hear, hear". Well, I will tell you what you did by that: You made it just that much easier for Canada to have an adverse visible trade balance.

Mr. DONNELLY: That means nothing.

Mr. BENNETT: I suspect that that is true in the hon. gentleman's case, but I am presenting my argument to those to whom it means something.

Let us proceed a step further. The house will remember that in 1929 the then Minister of Finance, in introducing his budget, explained that the Dominion of Canada had a favourable trade balance of over $120,000,000. That was a matter of proud boasting on the part of the hon. gentleman. He said that we had a favourable trade balance of $123,000,000, representing the excess of what we had sold over what we had bought. But what had happened by March 31, 1930? The hon. gentleman was still in power then. What happened was this, that in that twelve months the favourable balance of $123,000,000 had been lost and there was an unfavourable or adverse balance of $100,000,000. In other words, the imports were $1,248,000,000 and the exports were $1,144,000,000, or an adverse balance of over $103,000,000. Just think what that meant. From Canada being in a position where she had over $123,000,000 of free credits coming in from the excess of exports over imports, by the end of March, 1930, she found herself in the position where she bought during that year $103,000,000 worth more than she sold.

Mr. YOUNG: What caused the decline?

Mr. BENNETT: The very conditions to which I have alluded, and the fact that during the period following the war the then government had lowered the tariff of this country so that it became a dumping ground for the other nations of the world. But what happened?

An hon. MEMBER: Nothing.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly; nothing. Hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, and they did nothing about it. When the budget was delivered in 1930, no effort was made to stem that adverse balance. But the right hon. gentleman this afternoon, speaking with pride with respect to that budget, talked about its affording greater opportunities for freedom of trade. That meant what? Taking from Canada further markets, and we could not place our exports in other countries because they had raised their tariff barriers against us. I put it to this chamber: Is it not common knowledge that during the period from the end of the war until 1930 every country in the world had raised its tariff barriers, not against Canada alone, but against other countries as well? Why did they do it? In order that they might build up a favourable trade balance, and not have to borrow money to pay their debts. For, in the end, when you have more imports than exports an adjustment has to be made to bring about a favourable balance. If there is a gap it must be bridged, and it can be bridged only with fresh capital coming to this country or by borrowing.

Ramsay MacDonald put it more powerfully when he said, "If you continue thus to buy more than you sell, in the end you will become insolvent the same as any individual." That was the position of the Dominion of Canada. On March 31, 1930, we had an adverse trade balance against us such as I have indicated. In the month of July of that year the Conservative party took office, and in September we met in this House of Commons. What was the first thing we did? The first thing we did was to endeavour to provide against a continuance of a loss which meant insolvency to the Dominion of Canada. There is no gainsaying that fact, as Sir Arthur Salter points out, and as every economist points out. While in the city of Halifax during the last year the right hon. gentleman was bemoaning what we had done, England was passing a bill prohibiting imports. Why did England do that? Because, as Mr. MacDonald pointed out, England was threatened with financial ruin. Her statesmen saw with a clear vision that if she continued to buy more than she was selling, with her freight revenue cut off, with the extent of her investments lessened, stark insolvency was the only end in sight.

When we came into power we immediately took steps at least to endeavour to correct that adverse condition, and put this country into a position of solvency. The right hon. gentleman keeps on shutting his eyes to the facts, but I will put to him this: What would have happened to Canada if we had not done it? There is no denying the situation I have described. No one attempts for a single moment to deny that unless some step was taken, disaster was inevitable. I cannot expect, in the very nature of things, that gentlemen who have tied themselves with prejudices will for a single moment lend their ears to what I have to say. I do, however, say to them this—and they will find it in every book written on economy—the greatest free traders among them must know that only one thing could be done, and that was to take steps in that direction.

As I have said, those steps were taken. We took them, frankly, because we believed that was the only way it could be done. If hon. members ask me to call a witness, a disinterested party, I call Right Hon. Walter Runciman, President of the Board of Trade in England. I find a speech he made the other day in which he, a born free trader, a man who served in a free trade government, a man who made free trade speeches in England, found himself confronted with a situation, and consented to duties against imports of 50 per cent, and in some cases 100 per cent. Here are his words:

> "The recently imposed general tariff reduced imports directly by £8,000,000 and indirectly by £16,000,000," he said. (The pound was quoted yesterday at $3.78.) While unemployment was increasing in the rest of the world, Great Britain reduced her jobless by 486,000.
> "As a result of strong steps taken not a moment too soon by the government last November, we can look back on our policy with satisfaction," Mr. Runciman said, "The result, while preserving our purchasing power abroad for more pressing needs, has been to give home industries an impetus exceeding any since 1921."

He applied—late, it is true—the principle we applied in 1930. What is more, if hon. gentlemen will read the speeches made on the hustings in England during the last general election campaign, they will find recorded in the magazine Time that Mr. Chamberlain, again and again pointed out that what Canada had done England could do. We did the only thing that could be done. I admit it is very difficult to have gentlemen realize that we are not living in the age to which the right hon. gentleman referred this afternoon. We are not living under those conditions, and if my argument is based upon sound premises —and I believe it is—it will have to be admitted that the conditions which obtained from 1929 onward were brought about by a world crisis, from which we are now, I trust, slowly recovering.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the Prime Minister permit a question?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it possible for all countries to have a favourable balance of trade at the same time?

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to that. This afternoon the right hon. gentleman was greatly interested, apparently, in other countries. My concern for the moment is for the country I have been elected to govern. When he asks the question which he has just now put—"is it possible for every country to have a favourable trade balance?"—I say that is not a matter about which I am concerned at the moment, so long as I can see that my country is properly attended to. That is my point. That is what Hon. Walter Runciman said when he imposed tariffs against importations ranging from 50 to 100 per cent. That was his position. That is what he is doing for England, and what he is doing for England we are doing for Canada. The only difference is that we did it first.

I ask any hon. member of this house to go and tell his constituents that he is in favour of a policy which will commit Canada to larger obligations abroad, which will have to be paid either in goods or in services, or with gold. When the goods and services fail, as they do, there is only one way payment can be made, and that is with gold. Gold can be got only by borrowing or by fresh capital coming into the country. Go back and tell your constituents that. Go back and tell them that you sat through a session of parliament and voted and worked for the purpose of seeing that your country owed more money abroad, and in the end became insolvent. Go and tell them that.

Mr. SANDERSON: We will tell them what the right hon. gentleman said during the campaign of 1930.

Mr. BENNETT: I will admit there are some hon. gentlemen who are incapable of understanding that, but for the moment I am not addressing them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: I have now indicated the position of this country in 1930. I have shown the position that other countries have adopted. France accepted that principle and adopted it. Here is the real crux of the problem: if every country imposes tariffs against the other the difficulty to pay obligations that are due abroad becomes increasingly great.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: That is true. But we have no power to control the tariff of the United States, nor that of France, nor of Spain, nor of Italy, nor of other parts of the world. We know they have imposed tariffs against our goods and that they are competing with our production by making the same goods that we ourselves are making. Now, what happens? If they raise their barriers against our goods going into their country we cannot pay in goods for any goods we buy from them; we have to pay them with the proceeds from the sale of our goods elsewhere.

Mr. SANDERSON: Couldn't you blast your way in?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what we are doing. But let me go a step further. If all the countries in the world are unwilling to buy the products of one country, and seek to dump their products in that country, is there here a man who would not take the steps necessary to protect his country against them? Is there one who would not?—except the member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson). Is there any other one who would not?

An hon. MEMBER: Lots of them.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not believe there is an hon. member in this house who, finding other countries without question raising barriers against the products of this country, would say that this country should be an example to all Christendom—take down our tariff barriers and let there be dumped into our markets that which is produced abroad. I do not believe it. But that is what it means.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. BENNETT: Just that and nothing else.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Hon. gentlemen opposite can shake their heads about it for a week, it will not change the fact that that was the condition that confronted this country. Let me give an illustration. Complaint has been made that we have by orders in council protected this country from that form of economic loss. It is true. Complaint has been made that there were changes in these orders in council from time to time. That is true. It had to be true, because the price at which the foreigner would sell his goods in these markets was anything he could get as long as it was gold. That is the real position. I mentioned the other day that felt hats were brought in from a certain country and offered here at thirty cents apiece—$3.60 a dozen. I will not go into the details of these matters; the hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) did so yesterday. Now, are we to let that continue or not?

An hon. MEMBER: We need hats.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly; and we make them at home.

Mr. MANION: We need something under them, too.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that to continue or not? Reference has been made to the fact that we changed the value of the pound sterling for duty purposes. Let us look at what we did do. The London Times said we were within our rights in doing what we did. Why? Parliament placed a duty upon imports from Great Britain based on the value of the pound being $4.86. A twenty-five per cent duty on that meant $1.21—we will say $1.22 for the sake of argument. When the pound fell to $3.60 that meant 90 cents duty. Parliament having given a protection of $1.22, had authorized this government by a section in the statute to protect the country when that fell to 90 cents. And we did it. We will do it again to-morrow if necessary. What would have happened if we had not done it? That is all you have to ask yourselves.

An hon. MEMBER: What would have happened?

Mr. BENNETT: Every industry in this country engaged in that particular line of activity would have been snuffed out of business unless that action had been taken.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh no.

An hon. MEMBER: Utter rot.

An hon. MEMBER: You don't believe that.

Mr. BENNETT: I not only believe it; I know it, I have seen the cost figures.

An hon. MEMBER: Nonsense.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course there are within the constituencies of hon. gentlemen opposite industries that will give you the day and the date with respect to it, and the figures as well.

An hon. MEMBER: Nonsense.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BRADETTE: The right hon. Prime Minister knows that many industries are being closed on account of the tariff policies of the present government.

Mr. BENNETT: Why, the hon. member surely with his recently acquired knowledge knows better than that. I mentioned the pound sterling. The same thing happened with respect to other matters as well. Wherever it was necessary for the purpose of protecting—I use the word deliberately—the industrial life of this country that has been built up during all these years from being destroyed by the dumping upon our markets of the products of any country at any price they could get, we took the proper steps to that end. And what is more, I believe that any government occupying our position would have done the same. Let me go a step further. Do you suppose Hon. Walter Runciman took that step lightly? Do you suppose that the government in which you have as strong free traders as he and Mr. Samuel took that step lightly? Why did they do it? They did it because every other country in the world had protected its industrial life from destruction, and they said, "The time has come for England to do the same."

Mr. YOUNG: Did Mr. Samuel say that?

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Samuel, I said, was in the government that did it.

Mr. YOUNG: Did he approve?

Mr. BENNETT: He did not approve of the tariff, but he approved the prohibition against importations; he made no protest against it. There is the story. Every country in the world without exception, Mr. Speaker, occupies that position. England was the last; England now is in that position. England has placed a tariff upon her statute books.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not against the dominions.

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to the Imperial conference—yes, against the dominions in some cases. She has placed a statute on her books containing those provisions to lessen imports.

Now, may I quote an eminent authority as to the reason why that has been done. It is rather worth reading because he makes it perfectly clear as to the reason—that there is no other method by which it could be done except this method which I have mentioned. I propose to read these words to the house because they are the considered opinion of a very eminent authority, and I do not believe the position can be put any more clearly than it is put by this gentleman. When he says there is no other method, it seems to me it must be clear that he would not say so lightly, because if there is any other method it would at least have been known to all the people in the country. I quote:

Unhappily, nearly all the consequences of this crisis, threatening one country after the other with the dangers that its currency would be forced off gold, or that it would default on its foreign obligations, or both, have been to deepen the economic depression. This is true both while countries are still striving to keep their currencies on gold and when they have ceased to do so. When the strain of an adverse balance is draining the gold reserves, and when new credits cannot be obtained, the situation can be relieved only by a change in the balance of trade; that is, by a reduction of imports and an increase of exports. The first is attempted by new tariffs and prohibitions which reduce the world market and therefore cause a fall of prices, and evoke retaliatory measures which continue the same process. The second, an increase of exports, can be successfully achieved only—if at all and that with great difficulty—by a desperate selling on any terms, which again forces down world prices and again provokes new tariffs in other countries. These results are illustrated in the course of the creation of Germany's export surplus in 1930-31; a vivid picture of the reactions on neighbouring states was given by the Swiss delegate at Geneva in September.

Yet, disastrous as the general result is, it is extremely difficult to see what other course any single country can adopt in the emergency. We find, for example, even the League of Nations' Financial Committee, which in 1924 had in striking terms advised Hungary to adopt a more liberal trade policy, counselling her in 1931 to restrict her imports in order to ease the strain on her currency resulting from large annual foreign obligations with no corresponding exports surplus.

In addition you will find these words in another part of the same article:

The only way in which the balance could have been adjusted without this result was that countries with a positive balance and a gold surplus should have encouraged imports by a reduction of tariffs and a monetary policy designed to increase their prices. But the first effect of this, however salutary to the world position as a whole and in the end to the creditor countries themselves, would have been to injure home production already suffering from the depression; and this action was not taken. Meantime the process continues. Some countries have declared "moratoria" of their foreign obligations, others are likely to do so; while in yet others a similar declaration will be avoided only because the creditors, acting together, prefer not to claim what would be refused if they did and thus save some remnant of their debtors' credit.

And again these words:

In some way or another the gap in the balance of payments needs to be bridged. But it must certainly be narrowed before it is bridged. Debtors' obligations must be reduced: and, if possible, their real burden must be lightened by an increase in gold prices. The balance of trade must be changed; debtor countries' exports must, if possible, be increased, and their imports must be reduced (as they are being); creditor countries, on the other hand, should import more and must lose exports (as they are doing). The much narrowed gap, must then be bridged. This can be only to a small extent by further gold movements; for the rest, it must be by new foreign lending. Or perhaps it would be more exact to say that, to the extent to which new lending is not forthcoming, the gap must be narrowed by a change in the balance of trade till it can be bridged.

I commend these next words to this house:

There is no other method.

And the word "no" is in italics.

An unbridged gap means, and can only mean, failure of the debtor to pay. And failure of one debtor drives other debtor countries (and creditor countries too, if their assets are frozen and their obligations immediate) along the same path. So long as this process continues we shall be in an ever widening circle of disaster.

I commend those words to this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Who is the authority?

Mr. BENNETT: Sir Arthur Salter, who ranks as one of the foremost authorities in the world at the moment, having spent ten years with the League of Nations as economic adviser. Sir Arthur Salter says there is no other way; that way we commenced to follow in 1930, and have pursued since.

One word with respect to tariffs. I have said in this chamber so frequently that it must be within the knowledge of every hon. member that I only look upon tariffs themselves as being the instrument that lies at our hand for the purpose of enabling us to accomplish the end here indicated. Whether it is a high or a low tariff is not the question. Is it a tariff sufficient to enable us to accomplish the end we have in mind? That end is the preservation of the credit and the solvency of your country and mine.

I have referred to these matters for the purpose of indicating that nothwithstanding the attacks that have been made and the suggestions that we have gone at this in a haphazard way, it has been a well-considered plan which, so far as I am concerned, was in my mind before I assumed the responsibilities of office. It is a plan that, so far as I am concerned and while those conditions obtain, will be the guiding principle in any policy that we may place upon our statute books. In other words, after sixty-five years of effort, now with lower wage levels, with lower living standards, and with a desire on the part of exporting countries to receive gold at any price, we cannot afford to say, "Here is our market; take it." We cannot do that, and we will not. What is more, I am willing to submit to the people of this country whether, in an emergency and a crisis such as this, we should not have recourse to every lawful means that lies within our power for the purpose of effectuating the solvency and the credit of our country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask one question? In that connection does my right hon. friend recognize—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am trying to follow the right hon. gentleman, I hope with due deference. What I wish to ask the Prime Minister is this: In connection with what he was stating a moment ago, does he recognize any distinction to be made between a tariff that is protective and one that is prohibitive, for the purposes he mentions?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly. As pointed out in the extract from which I have read, it may well become highly desirable that it should be prohibitive. It becomes of the utmost importance, because otherwise you only accentuate the evil you are endeavouring to cure. That is the reason it is done, and that gives me opportunity to make some reference to what the right hon. gentleman quoted this afternoon from the address of the president of the Robert Simpson Company, with regard to his inability to import certain goods into this country from continental Europe, except under tariffs that he thinks are prohibitive. The answer to that may be given in one word: p-r-o-f-i-t-s. That is the answer, and no one knows it better than the gentleman who made the statement. When you find, as Mr. Burton was quoted as having said this afternoon, that he wished to get goods from continental Europe at 30 cents on the dollar, paying a normal tariff, you find that he would thereby place in an intolerable position every man or woman in this country who is endeavouring to maintain the economic life of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to interrupt my right hon. friend,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope this will not be regarded as an interruption; I have asked the Prime Minister for permission.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. SPEAKER: If the right hon. Prime Minister wishes to permit an interruption he has a perfect right to do so, and I would ask hon. gentlemen on both sides to leave the debate in the hands of those conducting it.

Mr. BENNETT: If the right hon. gentleman wishes to ask a question, I am glad to permit him to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The point is this: Mr. Burton is not here to speak for himself, and his name has been brought into the discussion—

Mr. BENNETT: By the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —this evening by the Prime Minister with relation to his objection to the duties. My understanding is that the exception taken by Mr. Burton was to the changes made in valuations on orders that had been previously placed, not with regard to orders placed after changes had been made in the tariff.

Mr. BENNETT: I was referring to what was read this afternoon by the right hon. gentleman. He brought Mr. Burton's name into it and read his address to the company's shareholders. He endeavoured to impress upon this country through that statement that Mr. Burton found that business was being circumscribed by reason of the action we took. My response is this: Profits undoubtedly were restricted, and because we denied to him the right to bring from Czechoslovakia and central Europe the goods he mentions at 30 cents on the dollar, and indicated that we do not propose to have our balances destroyed and our country made the dumping place for these products, we are attacked by the leader of the opposition.

Perhaps this would be a fitting place to refer to the statement made as to the favourable balance of trade so far as Great Britain is concerned. I wonder if this house realizes that instead of there being a favourable balance of trade with Great Britain, we have just the opposite. The visible balance is favourable, but we owe large sums of money to Great Britain, estimated by Professor Taylor of McMaster university to be $148,000,000. We must have an increasing visible balance in order to overcome the invisible balance which is against us. In other words, we owe millions and millions of dollars for interest on money borrowed, and that has to be paid; we owe for our public debt, and that has to be paid; we owe for shipping and services, and they have to be paid—we have to sell less than is bought from us in order to overtake and adjust these balances. The old rule, simply stated, is this: Every lending country should have more imports than exports and every borrowing country should ship out more than they buy. Canada, being a borrowing country, should be in the latter position; our great neighbour to the south, being now a lending country, should be in a different position. But she is not, and that is one of the great factors in the dislocation of world commerce. That fact is susceptible to exact proof. The United States loaned many millions of dollars to South America, the United States suddenly became the world's lender without having the great previous experience which belonged to London, and the result was that in a few years she had loaned as much money as England had in half a century or more. All this has brought disastrous results. These things are learned slowly; the mechanics of them do not come easily, and the result was, when the United States maintained high tariffs in order that she might have greater exports than imports although she was a lending country, that the loans turned out to be bad. That is the answer with respect to that.

The situation being as it is, we have taken the steps to which I have referred. I shall not insist on the word "tariffs"; so far as we are concerned you can call them anything you like; I care not what you call them as long as they are instruments in our hands to enable us to accomplish the end I have indicated. That is all there is to it so far as we are concerned. A complaint is made that our tariff is very high, that we pass orders in council to fix values for duty purposes which make it very difficult for the merchant to carry on his business. I have received one letter which indicates a willingness to make a sacrifice. A communication was received, not addressed to me personally but to another, in which a gentleman says: Unfortunately I must see certain sacrifices happen to my own enterprise, but Mr. Bennett is right, and this must be done.

An hon. MEMBER: Always right.

Mr. BENNETT: No. It must be done and we have done it. I am not unmindful of the criticism that may be urged because there have been changes, but how can these conditions otherwise be dealt with?

An hon. MEMBER: Try an embargo.

Mr. BENNETT: The position is so simple that I believe it commends itself to every hon. member in this house. When you find an evil and have the means to remedy it, you must remedy it or you are recreant in your duty to this country. Believing as we did that this method afforded a remedy for an admitted evil—I say it is an evil—we took the remedy at our hands to overcome it.

The adverse balance of trade had reached $103,000,000 when hon. gentlemen opposite left office, and that adverse balance had been changed from a favourable balance of $120,000,000 prevailing only the year before. We did not come into power until the first of August, and the collections of duties for the first six months of the year were substantially the same as for the second six months, indicating that so far as tariff changes were concerned, the effect upon the duties had not been very marked.

I come now to another point mentioned this afternoon by the right hon. gentleman, and I deal with it now because it seems to me to be a convenient place to do so. He said: Look at the way trade has fallen. The League of Nations' figures show that world trade has fallen of by one-half, but notwithstanding that fact Canada has moved up to fifth place among the nations of the world. But allowance must be made for the change in values. I wonder if there is any realization in this country at the present time of what these changes in values mean? I looked up some of them the other day just because I desired to be informed, and I found that during the last few years values had so changed that while Canada's exports were substantially the same, the values placed upon them were, in some instances, only 60 per cent of what they had been, and in one case, only 50 per cent. That is a matter of considerable importance to this country at this time. It is pointed out also that our customs revenues have fallen off greatly during the past year; that also is true, but I wonder if hon. gentlemen have taken the trouble to observe that in one item alone, spirituous liquors, there has been a decrease of $6,000,000. If hon. gentlemen had taken the trouble to look up these facts they would have found that the duty paid on this commodity dropped from $20,000,000 in 1931 to $14,000,000 in 1932. For the twelve months ended March 31, 1930, we collected $25,000,000; in the next year we collected $20,000,000 and last year only $14,000,000, and the tariff was not changed. The revenue on that one commodity decreased $6,000,000, which is a very good illustration of the contraction in world trade. The figures of the League of Nations, as I have said, show that the international trade has decreased by one-half.

Mr. McINTOSH: Ours has dropped sixty per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Our what?

Mr. McINTOSH: Our trade.

Mr. BENNETT: Our trade, as I shall presently show, consisted practically of sales of raw materials or partly fabricated materials, such as lead, copper, zinc, wheat and pulp and paper. While there has been a diminution during the last twelve months of the quantities sold, nevertheless the values represent only about sixty per cent of the figure per unit in preceding years.

Let me go a step further. In the case of agricultural products, we were selling a few pounds of butter—we are now selling large quantities of butter. But the price is a world price that is fixed in London so far as we are concerned.

Mr. VALLANCE: It was not called that at the last election.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it was. The hon. gentleman himself may not have put it in that way.

Mr. VALLANCE: At the last election the right hon. gentleman did not put it in that way.

Mr. BENNETT: I did say this, that the average—

Mr. VALLANCE: Be honest, now.

Mr. BENNETT: I would ask the hon. gentleman to take that back. The leader of the opposition said he would not permit any interruptions. I shall not permit an hon. member to say: "Be honest." I ask the hon. member to withdraw that.

Mr. VALLANCE: All I wish to say is that the right hon. gentleman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. VALLANCE: —be honest. In the last election—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Be a man.

Mr. BENNETT: I insist that the hon. gentleman withdraw the term "Be honest."

Mr. VALLANCE: The statements made by those who are sitting behind the Prime Minister to-day—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the question.

Mr. VALLANCE: There are members from Saskatchewan and the other western provinces who are sitting to-night behind the Prime Minister because of statements he made during the last election. If he says the statements he made are not true, I withdraw the remark.

Mr. BENNETT: I still insist that the hon. member withdraw.

Mr. VALLANCE: If the Prime Minister says the statements he and his followers made are untrue, I withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER: This afternoon, when the leader of the opposition was speaking, on a very slight interruption from the government side he appealed to the house for order while he was speaking. It did not become necessary at any time for the Speaker to intervene. Since the Prime Minister has begun his speech, there have been constant and disorderly interruptions from the opposition. I would ask that they kindly desist.

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to point out that as regards the falling prices of agricultural products, the Dow, Jones average index of industrials on January 2, 1931, was $169.84. Their index figure for April 19, 1932, on these same industrials was $58.91, or in other words a depreciation of virtually two-thirds. The Dow, Jones averages for rails during the same period was $98.63 as against $20.05 on or about April 19, 1932, or only about twenty per cent left of the values at the first of the year, 1931. The cash price of No. 1 northern wheat on January 2, 1931, was 53¼ cents; the cash price of No. 1 northern wheat on April 19, 1932, was 64½ cents, showing an increase in value from that time of 11¼ cents per bushel, or approximately twenty per cent. I mention that merely for the purpose of indicating that the depression has been world-wide and it has affected not only agricultural but other products as well.

In support of what I have just been saying, I have in my hand a report from the Bureau of Statistics showing that in 1929, 177,006,369 bushels of wheat were sold for $215,000,000 and that in the twelve months ending on March 31, of this year 191,315,933 bushels or about 14,000,000 bushels more brought only $115,000,000, or approximately $100,000,000 less. What has happened with respect to wheat and flour has occurred in a greater degree with respect to industrial shares and other securities in this country. Notwithstanding all that may be said, notwithstanding what the leader of the opposition said this afternoon as to the gloomy budget that was presented to the house, the fact remains that so far as we have a record, Canada occupies a better position than that of any other country of the world. Although our position is one of great difficulty, nevertheless this is the situation. Exports for last March are the highest we have had this year, namely, over $41,000,000. March exports of newsprint showed an increase of 580,000 hundredweight over February. It is true the price is low. March imports of raw material, including cotton, have increased by nearly 3,000,000 pounds over the figures for February last year, a gain of 22 per cent. Our exports to Great Britain show remarkable increases in some directions over March of 1931, as follows: fruits from $99,000 to $282,000; barley from $13,000 to $111,000; sugar from $5,000 to $9,000, whiskey from nil to $1,000; cheese from $44,000 to $86,000; furs from $708,000 to $742,000, unmanufactured leather from $143,000 to $172,000; meats from $143,000 to $358,000; fibres and textile products from $77,000 to $108,000; cotton from $9,000 to $35,000 and so on.

Prices of silver have risen and we have increased our exports of that commodity. Our export of nickel has increased. The production of copper has increased from 19,675,016 pounds in January to 22,428,571 pounds in February; blister copper from 15,971,151 pounds in January to 17,376,689 pounds in February, and lead from 19,048,424 pounds in February, 1931, to 20,154,613 pounds in February, 1932.

We have made corresponding increases in other exports. That indicates only one thing, not that we have yet entered upon that prosperity which is our due, but that we are showing signs of recovery from world conditions and that those signs are even more marked in this country than they are in most countries to which we could refer. The significance of this is found in an article in one of the leading western papers in which three or four stocks were taken and the price lists given showed that they had shrunk even more than had other commodities, if you will, during the same period. I do not propose to say more on that phase of the discussion that has taken place in the house. I have endeavoured to indicate why the actions taken have been taken. They have not been taken by accident; they have been taken deliberately; they have been taken not for the purpose, as has been suggested, of showing how high a tariff may be made, but with one design, and that I have already indicated.

The only other important point to which I think I might direct attention is the observation made by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth as to the sale of our conversion securities. I think it is unfair that that matter should remain upon the record without some reference being made to it. He made the statement that the sale of those securities at the high rate that prevailed when the national service loan was carried out this fall was at too high a rate and it was very hard upon those who accepted conversion securities a year ago. A year ago the hon. gentleman made a speech and this is what he said:

> It is not a remarkable financing operation, then, for the people of this country to be induced to take the premier securities of this dominion at 4½ per cent. We are glad that it has been successful, but I wish to say in all frankness that in my opinion and judging by other public financing the rate which was paid and the terms on which the loan was made were exceedingly generous, if not high, so far as those who got those bonds are concerned.

So that the leading financial critic of the opposition thought the four and a half per cent conversion rate was somewhat too high. The matter is very simple: four and a half per cent for long-term securities is regarded as a reasonable rate and was so regarded. The people made the conversion, the exchange because they believed it was a sound business thing to do. Just as in other countries the same conditions brought about the same results; if they were generous in their response it was because of their courage and faith in their own country. Now we are told, because their securities have shrunk in value as compared with present day values, the government has been guilty of bad faith, because the same hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth said:

> I think the people have a right to complain of this financing and to say that perhaps too much credit is not due to the Prime Minister in connection therewith. My hon. friends may applaud if they wish but I submit that it would have been only justice to the people of Canada had the Minister of Finance paid to them the tribute which was due and acknowledged the part which they took when they turned in their bonds for the conversion loan. These people accepted a loss and that loss has continued to grow as the months go on. I know quite well the difference between the prices of long term bonds and short term bonds, and I realize that the national service loan and the conversion loan were two entirely different things. I do not think the right hon. minister can gve too much credit to the investors of Canada for their having put through the conversion loan.

We have given them credit, Mr. Speaker, for so doing; for it of course was the proper thing, and when you find that United States securities have fallen on the market by ten points I think it will be admitted that the maintenance of prices in this country has been exceedingly creditable to the people themselves.

But I wonder if the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth has forgotten that a conversion loan was made by the previous administration, I think in 1922, when $114,000,000 was converted into $29,000,000 maturing in 1927 and $85,000,000 maturing in 1932, a part of which we converted and have taken care of. The government of that day gave 5½ per cent bonds in exchange, and a month's interest as well. I wonder if the hon. member had overlooked that fact. Having converted the 5½ bonds into 4½ bonds, we believed we had done good business for this country—and more, that we had established a market for long term securities that would be profitable to the investor. Due to the world conditions to which I have referred, our securities have depreciated in value like those of all other countries, but the rise in our securities will, I believe, if I am any judge from what is taking place at the present moment, be equal to that of any other country in the world.

When the hon. gentleman referred to the fact that our revenues have fallen far short of our expectations, he was good enough to note that I prefaced what I said on that occasion with the words "if the present rate of business was maintained." I have pointed out clearly that there has been a shrinkage in business with the result that the revenues anticipated have not been received, and I gave one instance not very long ago in which $6,000,000 less has been received from duties on intoxicating liquors alone, without any change in the tariff at all. That seems to be about the only matter to which I desire to refer in the hon. gentleman's lengthy speech. The Minister of National Revenue dealt yesterday with the hon. gentleman's observations with respect to the increase in duties by order in council through the fixing of values, and I have already indicated clearly to the house the reason why that action was taken.

The amendment that was moved by my hon. friends opposite and to my right involves the consideration of another matter as well. I have very little to add to what was said in that respect this afternoon by the right hon. leader of the opposition. But I would like to read these words from the Macmillan report, because when it is suggested that we should cut our bonds in two, that is that the man who had $200 should have only $100, I feel quite certain that no such radical thought as that implies could have been in the mind of the hon. gentleman. About $150,000,000 of these securities change hands annually through the Department of Finance. They are the recognized and standard security of this country, and to say that this country is to repudiate one-half of its obligations, part of which are payable in New York, in gold, part in Canada, in gold, and the balance in our currency, would be to create a condition which is almost unthinkable. I quote these words from Lord Macmillan's report, and if ever words were applicable to the subamendment they are to be found in the language here employed:

> It is no doubt true that an essential attribute of a sovereign state is a power at any time to alter the value of its currency for any reasons deemed to be in the national interest, and that legally, therefore, there is nothing to prevent the British government and parliament from taking such a step. The same may be said of a measure writing down all debts, including those owing by the state itself, by a prescribed percentage—an expedient which would in fact over a considerable field have precisely the same effect. But, while all things may be lawful, all things are not expedient, and in our opinion the devaluation by any government of a currency standing at its par value suddenly and without notice (as must be the case to prevent foreign creditors removing their property) is emphatically one of those things which are not expedient. International trade, commerce and finance are based on confidence. One of the foundation stones on which that confidence reposes is the general belief that all countries will seek to maintain so far as lies in their power the value of their national currency as it has been fixed by law, and will only give legal recognition to its depreciation when that depreciation has already come about de facto. It has frequently been the case—we have numerous examples of recent years—that either through the misfortunes of war or mistakes of policy or the collapse of prices, currencies have fallen so far below par that their restoration would involve either great social injustices or national efforts and sacrifices for which no adequate compensation can be expected. The view may be held that our own case in 1925 was of this character. The British currency has been depreciated for some years. It was obvious to the whole world that it was an open question whether its restoration to par was in the national interest, and there is no doubt in our minds as to our absolute freedom at that time to fix it, if it suited us, at a lower par value corresponding to the then existing exchange. But it would be to adopt an entirely new principle, and one which would undoubtedly be an immense shock to the international financial world, if the government of the greatest creditor nation were deliberately and by an act of positive policy to announce one morning that it had reduced by law the value of its currency from the par at which it was standing to some lower value.

I commend that to my hon. friend (Mr. Gardiner), and I am sure that he will realize that what would be true of a country such as Great Britain would be doubly true with respect to a new country like Canada, which invites capital to its shores and gives it the assurance, so far as an implication is concerned, that in this country the investment of capital will be protected and the contractual obligations of the country to pay, whether in gold or otherwise, observed to the last farthing. On that ground I desire to point out to the hon. gentleman that the amendment proposed involves conditions and involves results, by implication as well as directly, which would be ruinous alike to the credit and to the future development of this country.

There is only one other observation that I desire to make with respect to the remarks of the hon. gentleman, and that touches upon his effort to make it appear that the changes in the income taxation have been what he is pleased to call in favour of the rich men. Let us look at that. The correct way to put it is this: A man with an income of $4,000 a year will now pay 80 cents on every $100. It is true that the taxation begins at a lower level than it did before. The man with an income of $10,000 will pay $3.54 on every $100; the man with an income of $20,000 will pay $8.65 on every $100; the man with an income of $50,000 will pay $17.92 on every $100; the man with an income of $100,000 will pay $25.25 on every $100; and the man with an income of $1,000,000 will pay $47.66 on every $100. To say that the man with the $4,000 income has his tax increased one hundred per cent is not putting it fairly. What happens is that by reason of the reduction of the exemption the man with the $4,000 income will pay 80 cents on every $100. It is not fair to put it on a percentage basis. If you increase the tax from one cent to two cents you are increasing it by one hundred per cent, but to put it in that way does not clearly indicate what the actual increase is. In this case I submit that the hon. gentleman has not stated the matter fairly so far as the result is concerned.

There was one striking thing this afternoon, and during the last few days, which must have been interesting to the members of the house. It has been suggested that in these days of distrust and suspicion and unrest we well might have introduced in this country what the right hon. gentleman mentioned as a labour administration. When I saw the novel sight the other day of the right hon. gentleman moving down to the right for the purpose of hearing more accurately the observations of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth); when I saw the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) coming down to the front and moving down to the right that he might not escape a single utterance of that magic eloquence; and when I saw the leader of the Liberal party in Ontario, the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn), moving down to the front to catch those pearly words of wisdom, I could not help but think that they were saying to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, by their actions, if not in words: Remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom. I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was flattered and gratified at this apparent attention to his utterances. But I realize that after all there must be a reason behind this, and so I looked into the matter with some degree of care, I find that during the last few weeks the great Liberal party has suddenly blossomed forth with a new organizer. Mr. Vincent Massey, at one time minister extraordinary and envoy plenipotentiary to the United States of America, has now become collector extraordinary and minister in ordinary of the Liberal party. I do not make that statement in any sense unthinkingly, because if any hon. member is interested and will turn to page 4383 of Hansard of last year he will find an explanation, not in my language but in that of the leader of the opposition himself, describing the qualities of the organizer of a party. These qualities are not in his words alone, but he has quoted from the words of Mr. J. A. Spender in his life of Sir Robert Hudson, who was so many years organizer of the Liberal party in Great Britain. Speaking of Senator Haydon, who was organizer of the Liberal party in those days, the right hon. gentleman said:

> And may I say that if I were asked to describe the relationship between us, as I have believed it to be all the time, I would do so in the words which are used here by Mr. Spender in reference to the one who held the office of chief organizer of the Liberal party in Britain. So far as Senator Haydon's relationship and my own are concerned—

And then the following words are quoted:

> —life behind the scenes was one of cheerful and loyal comradeship between men who honestly believed in the policy and principles of their party, and were convinced that in serving it they were serving their country.

And when one recalls the somewhat acute criticisms of the new organizer, which were made within the memory of those within this house, one wonders how that greater comradeship will manifest itself in years to come. Further he says:

> What else is said in this volume by way of appreciation of this man who was chief organizer of his party?

Then the following is quoted:

The confidence that Hudson at once inspired in men, even rich men, wary of their pockets, was extraordinary. Rich men would give him thousands when they would not have given Prime Ministers a penny piece, and yet Hudson had nothing to offer them in return save his good-will, for the federation possessed neither patronage nor power and never attempted, or would have been allowed, to interfere with the arrangements of the whips' room.

That ends the quotation, and the right hon. gentleman continues:

That is the position in England. The chief organizer of the party had to do with the obtaining of party funds, and he obtained them from different persons.

So we have now described the qualifications of the new organizer, because I think there has been no change in the attitude of mind of the right hon. gentleman of the qualities which are necessary in a great organizer. In the words I have quoted, Mr. Spender properly described Sir Robert Hudson as having the ability to get thousands of dollars from rich men when prime ministers would not get a penny. It is fitting that one possessed of such wealth should find himself in that position, because it will be exceedingly interesting to the farmers in the west to learn the sources of this ancestral fund.

Let us proceed a step farther. Recently the hon. gentleman, Mr. Massey, made a trip across Canada. Ostensibly his trip was made for the purpose of addressing Canadian clubs. He spoke to them of conditions in Manchuria, the situation in Shanghai, and the differences between Japan and China. In the evening he gathered together a faithful few and unfolded to them the plans for the future.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Very good.

Mr. BENNETT: When I see my hon. friend from Edmonton laughing so heartily I know he has had some report of the meeting in Edmonton. And so, they were gathered together in the evening for the purpose of indicating just what should be done to dislodge the present administration. It was felt that a direct attack was hardly the most desirable, but the usual oblique attack was the one most to be desired. So plans for the future were reduced to writing, and as a result I hold in my hand a typewritten copy which was left by Mr. Massey with those whom he had called into conference in western Canada. When I am reading it I am sure my hon. friends from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) will realize that in it they find a great tribute to their worth. It is not called, "The Policy of the Liberal party."

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. VALLANCE: Is this from Calgary?

Mr. BENNETT: He stopped at Calgary—in fact, he had six people with him there. That was in the evening, after the meeting, of course. He had a magnificent gathering at the Canadian club.

Mr. VALLANCE: Sixty thousand at the next election.

Mr. BENNETT: I would not be so positive. Then, proceeding to Fort William they gathered in a few of the faithful and no one of them took exception and said, "I hardly find it possible to adopt these principles, because they are at variance with my idea of things." He was grateful enough, so it is reported. He himself said: "While there is a good deal of unrest in the world, you can get more votes and more power this way than the other." The document I have before me is not entitled, "The Policy of the Liberal party," but at the head I find the words: "The League for Social Reconstruction." I shall read it:

The league for social reconstruction is an association of men and women who are working for the establishment in Canada of a social order in which the basic principle regulating production, distribution and service will be the common good rather than private profit.

The present capitalist system has shown itself unjust and inhuman, economically wasteful, and a standing threat to peace and democratic government. Over the whole world it has led to a struggle for raw materials and markets and to a consequent international competition in armaments which were among the main causes of the last great war and which constantly threaten to bring on new wars. In the advanced industrial countries it has led to the concentration of wealth in the hands of a small irresponsible minority of bankers and industrialists, whose economic power constantly threatens to nullify our political democracy.

I do not wonder my hon. friend from West Edmonton finds it difficult to maintain his usual sober appearance. It continues:

The result in Canada is a society in which the interest of farmers and of wage and salaried workers—

He gets them all.

—the great majority of the population—are habitually sacrificed to those of this small minority. Despite our abundant natural resources the mass of the people have not been freed from poverty and insecurity. Unregulated competitive production condemns them to alternate periods of feverish prosperity, in which the main benefits go to speculators and profiteers, and of catastrophic depression, in which the common man's normal state of insecurity and hardship is accentuated.

We are convinced that these evils are inherent in any system in which private profit is the main stimulus to economic effort. We therefore look to the establishment in Canada of a new social order which will substitute a planned and socialized economy for the existing chaotic individualism and which, by achieving an approximate economic equality among all men in place of the present glaring inequalities, will eliminate the domination of one class by another.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is the Prime Minister reading from statements by H. W. Wood of Calgary?

Mr. BENNETT: No. This is by Mr. Massey, the new organizer of the Liberal party. This is the parlour socialism of that party. But wait until you hear the rest of it:

As essential first steps towards the realization of this new order we advocate:

(1) Public ownership and operation of the public utilities connected with transportation, communications, and electric power, and of such other industries as are already approaching conditions of monopolistic control.

(2) Nationalization of banks and other financial institutions with a view to the regulation of all credit and investment operations.

(3) The further development of agricultural cooperative institutions for the production and merchandising of agricultural products.

(4) Social legislation to secure to the worker adequate income and leisure, freedom of association, insurance against illness, accident, old age, and unemployment, and an effective voice in the management of his industry.

(5) Publicly organized health, hospital, and medical services.

(6) A taxation policy emphasizing steeply graduated income and inheritance taxes.

I am sure the hon. gentleman from Acadia has heard that.

(7) The creation of a national planning commission.

(8) The vesting in Canada of the power to amend and interpret the Canadian constitution so as to give the federal government power to control the national economic development.

I commend that to the members from Quebec. There go your provincial rights, there go your provincial constitution.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Not at all.

Mr. BENNETT:

(9) A foreign policy designed to secure international cooperation in regulating trade, industry and finance, and to promote disarmament and world peace.

The league will work for the realization of its ideal by organizing groups to study and report on particular problems, and by issuing to the public in the form of pamphlets, articles, lectures, etc.,—

I hope the difficulty will not be so great—as indicated by the right hon. gentleman last year—in getting money to print them.

—the most accurate information obtainable about the nation's affairs in order to create an informed public opinion. It will support any political party in so far as its program furthers the above principles; and will foster cooperation among all groups and individuals who desire in Canada the kind of social order at which the league aims.

This is not the production of Mr. H. W. Wood, as the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) said; this is a copy of the document left by the new organizer of the Liberal party.

Mr. VALLANCE: Who is he?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Vincent Massey. I commend this new declaration to the consideration of the house because it indicates that change for which we have all been waiting, namely, an effort to take advantage of what may be described as the unrest and the distrust incident to the present economic condition and to capitalize it for party advantage through the oblique attack of the establishment of social reconstruction.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Will the Prime Minister permit one short statement? The document which he has read was published in the April issue of the Canadian Forum, and has nothing whatsoever to do with Mr. Massey; it is issued by an organization which is extending across Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: All I can say is that the hon. gentleman might speak for himself. This was left by Mr. Massey at one of our western cities.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the Prime Minister a question?

Mr. BENNETT: Surely.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the Prime Minister's authority for saying Mr. Massey is the new organizer of the Liberal party?

Mr. BENNETT: A current report stating that rooms had been rented in this city by him and that he was about to establish himself there as the head of the organization.

An hon. MEMBER: About?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my right hon. friend that there is no thought in the world of Mr. Massey being appointed organizer of the Liberal party, nor do I think he would accept such a position. I hope Mr. Massey will accept the position of president of the National Liberal Association, which is quite a different position from that of organizer of any party; but he has not agreed to accept that position as yet, although I repeat, I hope he will.

Mr. BENNETT: If he is president of the National Liberal Association I might have known he would hardly accept a position by the name I have indicated. Part of the literature sent out by that association I had the privilege of reading to-day. From a perusal of that document you would not think this country was passing through a crisis or anything else. It is one of those rather amusing documents not intended for serious consumption; and the sudden gathering of a few of the faithful in Halifax not long since was, I presume, for the same purpose.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the Prime Minister—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the Prime Minister give the house his authority for stating that this document was left by Mr. Massey in the sense of being political propaganda? Because that is the implication he endeavoured to convey.

Mr. BENNETT: I certainly endeavoured to leave that impression. At a gathering of a small number of people it was left with them by Mr. Massey. But as the hon. gentleman says, a document similar in terms did, I believe, appear in the Canadian Forum. You see that is the way it is done—never attack directly; do it obliquely.

I wish now to direct my attention for a few moments only to the matter that the right hon. gentleman referred to this afternoon—the Imperial conference to be held in this city this year. It is said by him to be regarded as the adjournment of the former conference. I believe it is not so regarded; at least I am so informed. It may be that the conference of 1930 was a failure. The right hon. gentleman said it has been described by someone as a tragedy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: By the Prime Minister of Australia.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, Mr. Scullin.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And the ex-Prime Minister, Mr. Bruce.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Bruce was dealing with another phase altogether.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Just let me proceed.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

An hon. MEMBER: He doesn't like it.

Mr. BENNETT: Do not be so anxious to interrupt without being able to offer any contribution of assistance. I am always willing to be interrupted by those who have any suggestions to make that call for an answer, but the suggestions that come from the hon. gentleman who has been making them sotto voce are not calculated either to enhance the debate or to render any contribution to our knowledge. Whether or not the conference was a failure is a matter of opinion. So far as my position in it is concerned, it seems to afford great satisfaction to a number of gentlemen opposite to endeavour to have it said that I am responsible for what they conceive to be the failure of the conference.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, if they are interested in reading Hansard they will find that as long ago as 1928 I had said that if we had power my first effort would be to endeavour to call an economic conference of the British empire in this city. I went to London with a very definite idea in my mind. I gave expression to it, and I believed it would be received exactly as it was received. But I said there was a principle that had to be settled first. Those who will do me the honour of reading what I said will find clearly stated the principle that must first be settled. The electors of Great Britain settled it. As soon as they had settled it I invited the representatives of every part of the British Empire to come to this city to a conference, and the date has been fixed for the 21st day of July. They are coming, so they say. Therefore the purpose which I had in mind in 1928, which I never failed to keep before me, the one ambition that I entertained if we did come to power I hoped to see realized. In that regard may I say that I have under my hand the memorandum left by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1902, when he ceased to agree with his colleagues and took a definite stand with respect to Imperial preference. It is true it was not followed by action, it is true it was not followed by any considered effort to achieve it, but when I read it it will be realized that we at least have now seen accomplished that which he said should be accomplished but failed to accomplish, as did his successors in office. Let us look at it. Because of the misstatements that have been made from time to time, year after year, I am going to take the trouble to read this into Hansard. It has to do with the conference of 1902 beginning at page 36. The Canadian ministers handed in the following memorandum to explain their attitude on this question, that of preference. Listen to these words:

Memorandum by Canadian Ministers

This subject has frequently engaged the attention of the conference. At an early stage Mr. Chamberlain suggested that the question could most conveniently be considered by the representatives of each colony. . . .

They were then called colonies, not dominions.

. . . placing themselves in communication with the president of the Board of Trade, Mr. Gerald Balfour, and the officials of that department. Accordingly the Canadian ministers had several protracted interviews with these gentlemen, and discussed the whole subject very fully. Opportunity was also taken to present the Canadian view to Mr. Chamberlain. Now that the conference is drawing to a close, it is desirable that the course of the discussion, and the conclusions reached by the Canadian ministers, should be outlined and placed on record.

From the beginning of the proceedings the Canadian ministers have claimed that in consideration of the substantial preference given by Canada for some years to the products of the mother country, Canadian food products should be exempted in the United Kingdom, from the duties recently imposed. Representations to this effect previously made through the High Commissioner for Canada were supplemented by the ministers, both in writing and in the personal interviews with the imperial ministers.

Mr. Chamberlain, on behalf of the Imperial government, was unable to agree to the proposals of the Canadian ministers. He represented that the Imperial government, while highly appreciating the good feeling manifested by Canada in the granting of preferential treatment, did not think the material results to the trade of the United Kingdom were as great as the Canadian ministers claimed. He further said that the change desired by Canada would be an important departure from the established fiscal policy of the kingdom, and that if the proposals could be entertained at all, as to which he was not prepared to commit himself, it would be necessary for Canada to offer some material tariff concessions beyond those which she had already voluntarily given.

I would say that sounds like bargaining.

The Canadian ministers, therefore, submitted a memorandum on the subject of the advantages already received by Great Britain from the Canadian preferential tariff, with a view to showing that these were of much value, and entitled to weight in the consideration of the whole subject.

While urging that the benefits of the preference were such as to entitle Canada to the desired exemption from the duties on food products in the United Kingdom, the Canadian ministers stated that within certain limitations they were prepared to consider the request of Mr. Chamberlain for further concessions in return for the desired preference in the markets of the United Kingdom.

Is that bargaining or is it not?

While it was not deemed necessary to enter into questions as to the wisdom or unwisdom of the policy adopted by all governments in Canada, of raising the revenues chiefly from customs duties, the Canadian ministers pointed out that under that policy large industries had grown up which had to be considered in connection with proposed tariff changes.

I wonder what more than that was said by this government.

Large reductions of duties had been made in recent years, especially on British imports. It was feared that in some lines of importance further reductions might create a disturbance of trade which would not be conducive to the welfare of the country. But the Canadian ministers pointed out that the Canadian tariff was by no means prohibitive, that large quantities of goods were imported, and that a great proportion of these came from foreign countries. In any lines in which it appeared that the goods would be manufactured in Great Britain it might be possible to so readjust some duties as to give an additional advantage to the British manufacturer, and thus turn over to him a volume of trade which at present is held by the manufacturers of foreign countries.

Is that bargaining or is it not?

The Canadian ministers stated that if they could be assured that the Imperial government would accept the principle of preferential trade generally, and particularly grant to the food products of Canada in the United Kingdom exemption from duties now levied, or hereafter imposed, they, the Canadian ministers, would be prepared to go further into the subject and endeavour to give to the British manufacturer some increased advantage over his foreign competitors in the markets of Canada.

Is that bargaining or is it not?

Meanwhile the Canadian ministers determined to present to the conference a resolution affirming the principle of preferential trade, and the desirability of its adoption by the colonies generally, and also expressing the opinion of the prime ministers of the colonies that His Majesty's government should reciprocate by granting preferential terms to the products of the colonies in the markets of the mother country. The Canadian ministers desired to have it understood that they took this course with the strong hope and expectation that the principle of preferential trade would be more widely accepted by the colonies, and that the mother country would at an early day apply the same principle by exempting the products of the colonies from customs duties.

Listen to these words, Mr. Speaker, which constitute the mild threat about which we have heard. Perhaps in this age it was expressed more vigorously, but we gave utterance to exactly the same thoughts here contained.

If, after using every effort to bring about such a readjustment of the fiscal policy of the empire, the Canadian government should find that the principle of preferential trade is not acceptable to the colonies generally, or the mother country, then Canada should be free to take such action as might be deemed necessary in the presence of such conditions.

London, August 11, 1902.

I wonder what hon. gentlemen opposite will say now.

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend permit me a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. RALSTON: Will my right hon. friend permit me just to remind him that at that time the fiscal policy of Great Britain was the imposition of duties, and all that was being suggested by the Canadian representatives was the hope and the expectation that Great Britain would reduce its tariff as against Canada. My right hon. friend—

Mr. BENNETT: I have read it.

Mr. RALSTON: But that is what it says.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. gentleman might take his seat. I do not desire to enter into a discussion with him.

Mr. RALSTON: My right hon. friend offered in exchange—

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has said that the fiscal policy of Great Britain at that time imposed a duty upon corn, and that Canada desired to secure free entry for her wheat into the markets of the United Kingdom. But I have read the memorandum, and it speaks for itself. It is a bargaining memorandum, and it speaks for itself. It is a bargaining memorandum and it threatened England, saying that unless she did give a preferential tariff Canada would take such steps as might be regarded as necessary.

Mr. RALSTON: It speaks of hope and expectation.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps after the hon. gentleman has read it he will understand it.

Mr. RALSTON: I have read it.

Mr. BENNETT: That must have been a long time ago.

One more thing, Mr. Speaker. It has been suggested that this government is not making any active preparation with which to meet the conference. This government will discharge its duty to the full in that regard. If the agenda which was read, and which was made public in July of 1930, was prepared by the British government, as I believe it was, at the time it was being prepared the right hon. gentleman was Prime Minister of this country.

That is clear. All that I know of the agenda with respect to the 1930 conference was what I said I found in the despatches in the office when we took over. The agenda for this conference will be prepared, as we believe it should be, after we have had what consultation it is possible to have by cable, and if those people who are desirous of attacking any effort which they think redounds to the credit of those making it will just bide their peace and await the event, they will discover that this government is ready and prepared to deal with every problem that will be met with by that conference in a manner worthy of this dominion and of the knowledge which is possessed by those who will represent it.

I do not propose to say more in this respect. I do not propose to traverse the ground as to what shall or shall not be discussed at that conference. As to its importance, on the one hand the right hon. gentleman minimizes it, and on the other hand he magnifies it. It is one of the difficulties of the party opposite that they can see no merit in any proposal that does not originate with themselves. This party sat in opposition for long years, in good repute and ill. During that time in the country in which I live it was almost an offence to call oneself a supporter of this party, but during all that time I kept one constant beacon light before me; I had the firm belief and faith that in such a conference lies the best assurance of the development of every part of the British Empire and of my own country as well. I deny the right of any man to say that you do not promote the growth and development of the commonwealth of British nations as you promote the growth and development of that part in which you live. It has been said by reputable statesmen in Great Britain that there must be supreme confidence in our ability to develop our country and start on a new pathway of progress. We believe that this empire consists of an aggregation of units; this commonwealth of nations consists not of one but of many, and the development, the prosperity and the wealth of each makes for the advantage of the whole. To that end we have at least devoted as much time as we have been able to find under the conditions under which we labour here. Every day brings a new problem; almost every hour brings some difficulty with which we have to deal, and if the opposition decides to take two or three weeks to discuss problems for the purpose of preventing us from being able to go about the country's business, they must accept the responsibility. We should like to be engaged in considering these problems, and the opposition must accept full responsibility for what has transpired, as they said they would.

But, sir, in conclusion I desire only to say that we met this country at a moment of the greatest difficulty in the world's history. We met it at a time when there was evidence of improvement, but that evidence has been dissipated. We are now confronted with an even greater difficulty, the second effort, as I describe it and as Sir Arthur Salter and others describe it. We are now confronted with the second effort towards world rehabilitation, towards prosperity and towards overcoming the depression. A second effort always is more difficult than a first; when you are beaten back it takes more courage to call up your reserves of strength, vigour and determination than it does in making the first effort. But this government, these gentlemen who sit here, have earnestly and honestly endeavoured to discharge the great responsibilities which rest upon them, with an eye single to the advancement of this country. We have suffered much, we have endured much; this country's people have endured much, our population has suffered much, and those who would endeavour to turn that suffering into narrow party capital are entirely forgetful of their obligations to Canada. However, I have not lost my faith in the people of this country.

Mr. SANDERSON: The people have lost their faith in you.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) would stand in his place to make his statements, it would be much better.

I am willing to balance the confidence which the people of this country have in the government against the confidence they have in the opposition. I believe that they fairly and clearly appreciate and realize the burden, the difficulties and the responsibilities under which we labour. I believe nothing more clearly expresses the thought which is in the mind of every hon. member who sits to the right of the Speaker than the words of the poet laureate:

> Though much is taken, much abides; and though
> We are not now that strength, which in old days
> Moved earth and heaven; that which we are, we are;
> One equal temper of heroic hearts,
> Made weak by time and fate, but strong in will
> To strive, to seek, to find, and not to yield.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question, question.

Mr. NEILL: I hear the rabble rabbling, I hear the sounding brass and the tinkling cymbals.

I rise with not the least intention of answering in any sense the able speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) because I realize that I am entirely not in a class which enables me to do so, more especially without preparation. But even with my mediocre knowledge and ability it seemed to me that on one or two occasions there was some rather astute skating on very thin ice. The Prime Minister made the claim that Canada was seeking to obtain and hold a favourable balance of trade. When the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) asked him what would happen if every nation adopted that policy and how could every nation have a favourable balance of trade, the Prime Minister evaded the situation by brushing it aside and saying he was not concerned about the other fellows, he was concerned only with Canada. That was the position taken for many years by the United States; as long as they were the principal tariff country and other countries, especially Great Britain, were free trade, they could work that game of playing both ends against the middle, but that has ceased to be any longer possible. I think it was Sir Josiah Stamp who told us the other day that you cannot make tariffs to-day for a few months or even a year or two ahead, you must look ahead for a decade or even two decades.

Following out that principle, I humbly submit that if the nations of the world go on as they are doing and build up tariff walls without considering what will happen when all nations have similar walls, there will be trouble. The result will be that in time every nation will be driven to protection, every nation will have a tariff wall around itself and will be engaged in trying to grab or steal a little trade from its neighbour or some other nation. We will be driven more and more into what I would call exotic internal trade, that is, to give it its final extreme analysis, we will find Canada growing our oranges while tropical countries grow their own wheat. The net result of this stealing and grabbing will not increase the total trade of the world by one iota. The end of all these tariffs wars, if indeed they do not end in physical war as has so often been the result in the past, will be compulsory universal free trade. Every nation will then produce those articles which it is best fitted by climatic or other conditions to produce; it will be able to sell cheap and buy cheap and each individual will have greater purchasing power, each individual will buy not only more necessities but more luxuries of life and in that way we will overcome two of the greatest obstacles confronting us to-day, one the lack of markets and the other, overproduction. In that way we would increase markets instead of trying to steal them from each other. I submit that is more like the ultimate solution than building up a favourable trade balance and hoping and praying that the other fellows will not have brains enough to do the same thing.

I was very much impressed by the opening remarks of the Prime Minister when he told us with almost bated breath that we were in the midst of a world crisis, how solemn, how serious the condition was, what a strain it was upon the government, what long hours it entailed and what a serious condition confronted them. Yet, sir, that impression was rather dissipated later on when I found that, in spite of this world crisis, the Prime Minister of all Canada had time to condescend or shall I say, to descend to discuss at considerable length such a petty matter as a supposed organizer of the Liberal party, a matter which surely is one entirely concerning the Liberal party and no one else. I was listening, expecting to hear him reveal next the source from which I buy my milk or to whom I sell my potatoes. There was also an attempt made, somewhat unworthy, I think, to fasten upon the supposed organizer some propaganda that had been picked up somewhere and an effort made to connect it up with the Liberal party, which was exploded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), who announced it had been published months ago and was the propaganda of a society which had no connection with the Liberal party or with Mr. Massey. If those are the matters that engage us in this serious crisis, perhaps it is not so serious, or else it is not being taken in the right spirit. That is all I have the time to discuss in connection with the remarks of the right hon. gentleman.

I was going to remark in rising that I was refused three minutes yesterday and I shall take forty minutes to-day. I should like to make just a few remarks—and very few will suffice—to answer the observations made last night by the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Plunkett). The situation as regards the relief condition in British Columbia is very simple. A committee of the house was appointed to investigate it, there being seven Conservatives and four Liberals on that committee. The whole and obvious purpose of the investigation was, as I told the house, when speaking here on March 1, to whitewash the government. That was achieved in abundant measure, pressed down and running over. The whitewash was put on so thick that for a moment it almost concealed the truth and the facts. But whitewash is a powder and it needs to be mixed with some liquid. Instead of the liquid of truth, they used the slime of political exigency. Then when the air and sun of popular opinion got at it, the slime evaporated and the powder blew away and revealed the dark, damning facts as black as ever they were before.

Much comment was made regarding a gentleman called Major H. Brown, in Vancouver, who dared to be a Daniel, who dared to stand, not alone, as he has many friends, but aloof from his party friends and to say that the whole proceeding of the investigation was a farce, which, indeed, is the fact. I may say he is a very reputable citizen, president of the board of trade and manager of a big steamship company. This is my comment on Major Brown:

> Major Brown in saying his say, and in standing by his guns when challenged, acted the part of a good citizen. In speaking as he did, he was merely giving voice to the thoughts and suspicions which have been turning over and over in the minds of scores of thousands of British Columbia people during the past weeks. Mr. Brown was making public opinion articulate, and in censuring him the members of the legislature merely passed a vote of censure on a very large number of their constituents.

I said that those sentiments are mine, and so they are, but I have merely adopted them from an editorial in the Vancouver Province from an extract which I have read word for word. That newspaper is taking a broad and timely stand in this matter. I am not going to say any more on the subject; I am satisfied to leave it to the people of British Columbia, each in his respective district, who, I am aware, know the facts and who, I am equally assured, will remember them.

The hon. member for Victoria dug up a couple of cases of fraud with an insinuation or suggestion that this was quite common among the idle men. To cite the cases of two out of 30,000, 40,000, or perhaps 50,000 men is not a very conclusive argument; but why did he not tell the house of the waste of thousands and tens of thousands of dollars on the road foremen, and straw bosses, who by reason of their political affiliation were given big wages, men well fixed and comfortably off, some of them employing men at home on their farms and getting wages running from $8 to $10 a day, this meaning simply that so many more destitute men had to go without work on account of the large sums of which these politically appointed bosses received the benefit? Why did he not tell the house of the item to which I alluded on the orders of the day, where the British Columbia government—I almost blush to say this since I come from that province myself—announced an income tax on relief wages. Imagine a man receiving maybe three or four days' work a month being taxed on income upon those miserable dollars, collected before payment. Is this conceivable? It is hardly believable if it were not given the authority of a circular issued by the provincial deputy minister of public works. I think that statement ought to be embalmed in history as an example of supreme political stupidity, and the minister who gave instructions for that order to be issued should be embalmed also so that children could look at him in a museum and say: That is the man who performed such an act. That also will the people deal with when the time comes.

I wish to protest against the statement made by the hon. member in connection with the young people of our country and particularly of British Columbia. He was speaking about the university of that province, so I presume he was alluding to the students there. He said:

> University students of to-day seem more capable and informed upon communism, atheism and companionate marriage than they are upon political economy or any national virtue. . . .

I consider that to be a gross slander, wholly unjustified, upon our young people. I challenge him to give a single instance of companionate marriage occurring among the male students and the co-eds in the University of British Columbia. My own daughter went to that university and when she came back she was not talking communism, atheism or companionate marriage, which is a euphemistic term for free love. I am satisfied there are thousands of our young people, clean living, clean thinking boys and girls, to whom that statement is equally applicable. I deplore, I deprecate the hon. member's using his privilege in the house to make such an observation as he has done. Even a carrion-eating vulture keeps his own nest clean.

Let us pass from the parish politics of the hon. member for Victoria, to the bigger interests of Canada. Might I say in passing, I have no ill-will at all towards the hon. member—just pity! I am addressing myself now to the Canadian situation. We might well say: "Watchman, what of the night?" For surely we are passing through a time of political darkness in the history of this country. My deskmate, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), at the beginning of the session made the statement that Canada was looking to the government to give us a lead out of our distress. I agreed with him and he and I made a compact that we would not at the beginning of the session vote want of confidence in the government, to give them an opportunity to develop their policies. The session is nearly over and we might well ask ourselves now: What have we got? We started this parliament, it will be remembered, with the echo in our ears of the grandiose pledges on which the party opposite rode into power. We are all familiar with them, and I shall repeat only one:

> Find work for all who are willing to work or perish in the attempt.

These are brave words. They have a fine sound, a magnetic ring, one well calculated to appeal to and capture the imagination of the hesitating and waiting nation and they did capture it, and the Prime Minister received his mandate. But alas and alack the conditions were not fulfilled, the goods were not delivered, but the honourable author of them did not perish in the attempt. Rather he has gone on to higher and higher peaks, seeking the goal of unrestricted authority and unlimited power. But, sir, there was perishing although he did not do it. The perishing, unfortunately, was done by the people. The middle class became poor, the poor became destitute, and the destitute became starving.

What have we had in the last two years? Two years of enormous budget deficits. Two years of enormous and almost unparallelled increase in taxation, and to-day in spite of the great increase in taxation we have every reason to believe that there will probably be a further deficit next year and a further increase in taxation.

Now I come to the question of unemployment. There are two phases to that question. There was the pledge to end unemployment, and the pledge to relieve the distress caused by unemployment. We are nearing the end of the session and we have not yet seen either in the speech from the throne or since any word or suggestion of legislation calculated to end unemployment as such. As regards the relieving of distress we have had a conference lasting one day or one day and a half, a conference which the members on this side frequently advocated last year and were howled down and ridiculed every time they made the suggestion, a conference which if it had been held a year ago would have been productive of greater good and more far-reaching effects than can now be the case.

What else have we got? We have the resolution on the order paper to-day couched in the usual somewhat vague language of resolutions indicating that a measure will be brought in authorizing the government to enter into agreements respecting relief measures with the provinces, and it talks about providing for the relief of distress and the support and maintenance of those requiring assistance. We are entitled to draw from that the conclusion which the words imply, that the only relief granted will be in the form of what is called direct relief. We are strengthened in that belief by the fact that the representatives of the province of British Columbia and one of the other provinces, when they returned home after the conference recently held, announced publicly in the press that this government had decided that there was to be no more relief work but only direct relief. It may be said that that is only conjecture. Well, it is the best that we have to go upon, and reading the language of the resolution, coupled with the statements made by the provincial representatives, and they made their statements separately, it has all the earmarks of being correct. So apparently we are committed to the pittance of a dole, in spite of the decided statements made by the Prime Minister during the election campaign when he said: I will not tolerate the dole; as long as I am Prime Minister of Canada no such system will be inaugurated. But now we are going to get the dole, and the most debasing form of the dole. It has not even the benefits that attach to the dole in Great Britain, where at least some self-respect is left to the recipients, because when they work they contribute towards the fund. But here it is straight charity, and no work. It is lowering to a man's morale and worse than anything that we have yet encountered. If I may judge the future by the past, and I think that is a reasonable thing to do, this dole will be filtered out through the channels of the provincial governments and absolutely through the political party machines.

I come to another subject. I am beginning to fear that the members of the cabinet are not living up to the confidence which the people reposed in them. It is said in scripture that when the leaders lack vision the people perish. I am not speaking of the rank and file. They are all right. The people of Canada do not appreciate how generally decent and honest and hard-working and willing to do the right thing the rank and file are. The people only see the government and the government's policies, but the rank and file are generally decent and honest and all right. The men on the treasury benches may be all right. I hope they are, but they are keeping some pretty strange bedfellows these days. They are worshipping strange gods. We have different kinds of gods from what there were in the old days when people worshipped idols of wood and stone, but still we have strange idols to-day which are just as inimical to the welfare of the nation. When I look over there I think I see them worshipping certain strange gods, the gods of the bankers, the gods of the big railway and transportation business, the gods of the manufacturers' association, the gods of the millionaires, and above all and permeating it all, the god of power. The blood lust for power is like a fatal fever that burns itself up with the heat that it itself engenders, until finally the victim of the lust for power, just like the victim of some drug, finds himself in the position where he calls to high heaven: "Give me power, more power; never mind at what price, or suffering or sacrifice. Let me ride the juggernaut car of power over the prostrate bodies of the Canadian people and trample under foot the liberties which the Canadian people now enjoy." When I look over there and see the worshipping of these strange gods, I notice that there are some gods missing. I do not find there the god of the workers, the god of the unemployed, the god of the hungry. I do not find there the God of our christian faith, the great Founder of which in His gentle precepts taught us to aid the sick and the suffering and the oppressed, and when he taught those great principles, he was not afraid of being accused of paternalism or socialism, which is the cry always put up to-day when we seek to alleviate the lot of people less fortunate than ourselves. All down through the ages there has never been a greater socialist depicted than the Saviour of mankind Himself.

Some days ago the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) told us that he wanted to go back to what he called the good old times. I suppose he was alluding to thirty or forty years ago. Following that up, I suggest that these worshippers of strange gods had better go back, not forty or fifty years, but two thousand years, go back to the worshipping of idols of wood and stone. They at least were harmless; they could do no harm even if they did no good. When the British were fighting the Maoris, the native race in New Zealand, the Maoris spent a lot of time putting a taboo on a certain mountain in the belief that the great spirits would prevent any white man trespassing there and would prevent the British soldiers pursuing them. Again, during the Ashanti expedition on the Gold Coast, the British soldiers as they marched to Kumasi, the capital, found the road on each side besprinkled with fetishes, little scraps of tinsel, little bits of coloured paper and cloth, scattered over the bushes in the belief that it would stop the oncoming of the white man. At least the exercise of these beliefs by these benighted people was harmless, but the gods worshipped by my hon. friends opposite are not harmless. They are selfish and greedy and class conscious. It it a worship that debases the good instincts of its devotees. It preys upon humanity; it preys upon those better traits that distinguish us from animals. Biblical history tells us that Aaron the high priest allowed the children of Israel to set up a golden image and worship it. For that he was forbidden to lead them into the land of Canaan, the promised land, but was compelled to die in the wilderness. If my hon. friends opposite do not change their gods and worship the gods of the common people of Canada I am afraid the same fate will befall them. I am not afraid of the future of Canada. We are a virile race. There is a saving remnant amounting to millions, who have not bowed the knee to Baal and have not worshipped before the golden calf. In the hands of those people lies the future saivation of Canada. We want another Moses, to lead us out of the wilderness of depression. We want another Elijah to teach us more faith in Providence, more faith in each other and more faith in our own ability and courage. We want another Nehemiah to lead us back out of the Babylon of poverty. It is my earnest hope and prayer that this rebirth of Canada may come soon.

Mr. GOTT: I was paired with the hon. member for Kent, Ontario (Mr. Rutherford). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): I was paired with the hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BOULANGER: I was paired with the hon. member for Lake St. John (Mr. Duguay). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): I was paired with the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. McGILLIS: I was paired with the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: The vote is on the amendment to the main motion.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to delay the house for more than a few minutes, but to-night the Prime Minister brought into the debate the organization known as the League for Social Reconstruction. As I happen to be the honorary president of that league—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, you were good enough to defend the Prime Minister against disorder a little while ago; I must ask for the same right.

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless the hon. member wishes the vote to go over until to-morrow it will be necessary to have unanimous consent to proceed after eleven o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Unanimous consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead!

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, as I happen to be the honorary president of the organization, I feel it incumbent upon me to clear it of some of the aspersions that have been cast upon it by the Prime Minister. I am not certain whether or not Mr. Massey is a member of the society, but I do not imagine he is. However, the Prime Minister sought to make a great deal of political capital out of the fact that apparently Mr. Massey had left in the city of Calgary a copy of the manifesto issued by this organization. As a matter of fact—

An hon. MEMBER: Massey's in de cold, cold ground.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. gentleman does not like it and I have no doubt the Prime Minister does not like it either. I will make my speech, and I will take my time to make it. I have already told the house that I intended to take only a few minutes. If hon. members opposite will do me the courtesy of maintaining order I will be brief. I say the Prime Minister has brought in the name of Mr. Massey—

An hon. MEMBER: You told us that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —and linked with it the League for Social Reconstruction. An effort was made apparently to show there was something very curious about this league; that it represented a new political alignment of some kind, that this manifesto was delivered to the faithful after a lecture had been given to the Canadian Club, and all that kind of thing. Now, as a matter of fact, as I attempted to say in a word to the Prime Minister, the organization of this society was publicly announced some time ago. The organization was commented upon and the manifesto published in the April number of the Canadian Forum. The Canadian Forum is quite a reputable journal published in Toronto by J. M. Dent and Sons. It is obvious that the Prime Minister and his immediate associates do not read such journals as the Canadian Forum. I know in some quarters it is considered to be somewhat of a high-brow journal; perhaps that is the reason why the Prime Minister does not read it. I should like to suggest that there are a great many papers being published in this country with which the Prime Minister seems to be out of touch, and there is a very considerable body of public opinion which does not follow the lead of the Prime Minister and some of his colleagues. For this reason I propose to read two or three paragraphs from an editorial which appeared in the April issue of the Canadian Forum. They are:

Canada lags behind most other countries in her political thinking. But the experience of the last two years has produced a growing number of men and women, even in Canada, who have become very sceptical about the ability of our capitalistic system to produce an efficient or a happy society. Most of these sceptics are probably still more sceptical about the ability of our particular Canadian leaders in finance, industry, and politics to give us any guidance in our crisis.

An hon. MEMBER: Did you write that editorial?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The question is asked, did I write that editorial?—I did not. That question emphasizes the remark I made a few minutes ago, that a good many hon. members of this house seem to be quite oblivious to the currents of public opinion which are so strong at the present time. The article continues:

But individual critics are helpless by themselves; and there exists no organization in Canada to which such men and women can attach themselves with much enthusiasm. In the hope of helping to fill this gap a group from Toronto and Montreal held a meeting two months ago and decided to launch the League for Social Reconstruction.

I may say that I was not present at that meeting nor had I anything to do with its being held. However, that is by the way and I shall continue with the editorial:

The founders of the league conceive of it a kind of Canadian Fabian society, although they are quite conscious that it does not include in its present membership any Bernard Shaw or Sidney Webb or Graham Wallas or Beatrice Potter. But they hope that it may form the nucleus around which may gather a good many of those unattached critical spirits who find no haven in either of the two national political parties, and whose circumstances do not make it possible for them to join labour or farmer political movements.

As is indicated by that last paragraph, this is not a political but an educational movement. The members of the organization may be Liberals or Conservatives; some may be farmers or labour men, but apparently they do not find themselves very much in sympathy with either the official Liberal party or the official Conservative party as they are constituted to-day. They also confess that as the labour and farmer movements are organized to-day, they do not find a place. I continue reading:

What is most needed in Canada is a clarification of our political and economic ideas. Even if the members of the new society accomplish nothing much more than to work out by discussion among themselves the practical steps in a socialistic program as applied to Canadian conditions, they will have served some purpose.

I know a great many members here are terribly frightened by the words "socialistic program."

An hon. MEMBER: Louder.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, since I cannot obtain order in this house, I would ask you to call it eleven o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member asked for five minutes of the time of the house, but he has exceeded that time limit by over two hundred per cent. If he wishes to bring his remarks to a close within anything like five minutes, I am inclined to think the house would permit him to do so.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have not been able to obtain order, and I propose to finish my speech at a time when I can make myself heard.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, April 27, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Third report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Stinson.

Second report of the joint committee of both houses on the printing of parliament.—Mr. Robinson.

CANCELLING OF CONTRACTS

Hon. ARTHUR SAUVE (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of laying on the table of the house copy of the correspondence in connection with the contracts cancelled without notice since september, 1930.

Mr. DUPUIS: More unemployed!

Mr. LAPOINTE: The mill is working!

Mr. SAUVE: Owing to precedents and the act.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You do nothing else.

Mr. SAUVE: Future will tell.

NEW ZEALAND TRADE AGREEMENT

TABLED BY MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE—INTRODUCTION OF BILL

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to lay on the table of the house a copy of a trade agreement between Canada and New Zealand. I shall at the same time lay on the table, for the convenience of members, should they desire to peruse it, a copy of the customs tariff of New Zealand; and I should also like to lay on the table, for inclusion, with consent of the house, in the votes and proceedings and for the convenience of members, copies of two schedules, duplicates so far as items are concerned, of those that are in the agreement, but setting forth the Brtish preferential rate, the intermediate rate, the general rate and the rate to New Zealand, so that members may have before them printed in the votes and proceedings a comparison of rates in the schedules.

It might be appropriate for me, in laying this agreement on the table, to make a few observations in regard to it.

The history of trade relations between New Zealand and Canada dates back a considerable time. Certain minor arrangements were made between the two dominions during the period between 1900 and 1925, but it was in 1925 that the Dominion of Canada and the Commonwealth of Australia completed a trade agreement, and on October 1, 1925, by order in council, the provisions of the Australian agreement were extended to New Zealand. But on April 12, 1930, notice was given to New Zealand for the cancellation of the said order in council, this cancellation to come into effect at the end of a period of six months, or on October 12, 1930.

The withdrawal from New Zealand of the privileges of the Australian treaty resulted in New Zealand on October 20, 1930, withdrawing the British preference applicable to Canadian motor cars, engines and tires. On June 2, 1931, New Zealand further withdrew from Canada the British preferential tariff on all remaining items. This resulted in a decline of trade. I have before me the figures from August, 1930, down to March, 1932, showing a decline in trade to the month of December last and from December to March a considerable increase in exports to New Zealand. It is of course, expected, with great assurance, that as a result of the consummation of this treaty, that trade will again rapidly increase.

I might point out that the treaty is of a form similar to that with Australia. The main feature is that each of the dominions extends to the other the British preferential rate, with the exception of certain schedules (a) and (b) set forth in the agreement, and under these schedules each country extends to the other certain rates of duties specified therein. But I think the main emphasis should be placed upon the fact that the British preferential rate applies to all the other items not specified in the two schedules.

I shall refer briefly to the main features of the articles of the agreement. Article 1 sets forth where Canada agrees to give New Zealand the tariff treatment specified in schedule (a). Article II provides for concessions to Canada by New Zealand of the British preferential rate with the exception of certain items set forth in schedule (b). Article III is an interpretation clause. Articles IV and V suspend the anti-dumping laws of Canada and New Zealand respectively as regards each other, with this proviso: if one country notifies the other of importations of any goods which would prejudicially or injuriously affect producers or manufacturers of similar goods in the importing country and remedial measures satisfactory to the importing country are not put into effect by the exporting country within thirty days, then the dumping law of the importing country may be applied.

The difference between this procedure and that provided by article IX of the Australian treaty is that the dumping law instead of the general tariff is applied to prevent the importation of goods detrimental to the importing country.

Article VI corresponds to article VI of the Australian treaty in allowing each country to levy special duties such as primage, excise and special charges. That is a more or less formal article. Article VII enables each contracting party, upon giving three months' notice to the other, to increase the rate of duty on any goods in the schedules and in form gives, I might say, to the schedules flexibility which does not exist in the Australian treaty.

Article VIII extends the concessions to New Zealand to the products of western Samoa. Article IX extends the privileges of the agreement to the Cook islands. These two are either mandatory territory or territory annexed to New Zealand, and with respect to these two protectorates of New Zealand Canada gets the British preferential rates.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Will the minister explain the meaning of primage duty?

Mr. STEVENS: It is a duty that New Zealand imposes similar to the excise tax which we impose in Canada. It is applicable to all goods. I may say in regard to that article the duties or taxes that are imposed must be applied to all countries irrespective of where the goods come from or what the agreements are. This, briefly, is an outline of the agreement. In a moment, under the next order, I shall ask leave to introduce a bill.

INTRODUCTION OF BILL

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 62, respecting a certain trade agreement between Canada and New Zealand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is there anything further to add by way of explanation?

Mr. STEVENS: I might explain the bill very briefly. Clause 2 provides that the trade agreement is approved and declared to be in force and the law of Canada. Clause 3 empowers the governor in council to make such orders and regulations as may be necessary to give effect to the agreement. Clause 4 is the usual provision that in case of there being anything inconsistent with the agreement, the agreement shall prevail. Clause 5 provides that the act shall come into force on a date to be fixed by proclamation by the governor in council and published in the Canada Gazette.

Our understanding is that New Zealand is anxious that the treaty shall come into force at the earliest possible day, as soon as the two governments can agree to fix a date. I might add that New Zealand tabled this agreement at ten o'clock last night, which would synchronize with three o'clock Wednesday in New Zealand. It was our intention to have tabled the agreement last night but it will be recalled by hon. members that that opportunity was not presented. I may add by way of explanation that the statement appeared in the press this morning because we had fully anticipated the tabling of the agreement last night, and in courtesy to the Canadian Press a copy of the agreement was handed to them in time for publication. But as I said, circumstances did not permit of our tabling the agreement last night.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

WHEAT PURCHASES FOR RELIEF

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia):

1. Was a quantity of wheat purchased in 1931 to be made into flour for relief purposes, if so, how much and where was the grinding done?

2. Was a quantity of flour purchased by or for the relief commission in Saskatchewan, if so, from whom purchased and what amount?

3. Were tenders called for the work of grinding the flour and for the purchase of flour, if so, what are the names of tenderers, the prices quoted in each case, and amounts purchased from each?

4. Were purchases made by the government or by the commission, and were tenders received by the government or by the commission?

Mr. BENNETT:

1. Originally, options were secured for 1,672,000 bushels of wheat, which would produce 380,000 barrels of flour, on the basis of 4 bushels 24 pounds to the barrel. On September 5, the quantity was reduced to 250,000 barrels, and options for 1,100,000 bushels of wheat were retained. The option price of wheat was 53 cents per bushel. The order for grinding was placed with the Canadian National Millers, and they advised the order was distributed as follows:

	Barrels
Quaker Oats Co., Saskatoon	23,409
Spillers Limited, Calgary	9,545
Lake of the Woods, Medicine Hat	43,409
Ogilvie Flour Mills Co., Medicine Hat	43,409
Western Canada Flour Mills, Calgary	43,409
Maple Leaf Milling Co., Medicine Hat	43,409
Robin Hood Mills, Moose Jaw and Saskatoon	43,409
Total	249,999

2. The relief commission in Saskatchewan advised that quantities of flour have been purchased by the commission from local sources in Saskatchewan. The government has not particulars indicating from whom it was purchased and in what quantities, but efforts are being made to secure the same.

3. No. See answer to No. 1. The price agreed upon was $3.40 per barrel on the basis of the options supplied f.o.b. the mill, with a milling in transit rate supplied by the mill to the ultimate point of destination.

4. The arrangements made to secure the wheat for milling purposes were made by the government before the prorogation of parliament last session, but the details were not completed until September. The deliveries were directed by the commission, which paid the accounts therefor.

ST. VALLIER, BELLECHASSE COUNTY, POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. BOULANGER:

1. Did the Civil Service Commission hold an examination to replace Mr. Eusebe Marceau, as postmaster of St. Vallier, county of Bellechasse?

2. What is the name of the person who was recommended by the Civil Service Commission to replace Mr. Marceau as postmaster of St. Vallier?

3. Was the person recommended by the Civil Service Commission appointed as postmaster of St. Vallier to replace Mr. Marceau, if not, why?

4. What is the name of the person who was appointed postmaster of St. Vallier as successor to Mr. Marceau, by whom was the appointment made and why was said person appointed?

Mr. CAHAN:

1. Yes.

2. Alphonse A. Bérubé was assigned to the vacancy on the 19th January, 1932.

3. Mr. Bérubé was rejected by the department under section 24 of the Civil Service Act, as unsuitable.

4. Under the act it then became necessary for the commission to make another assignment to the vacancy, and accordingly a certificate for the assignment of the candidate next in order of merit, Mr. Leopold Boulanger, was issued on the 21st March, and the department has advised the commission that this gentleman reported for duty on March 31, 1932.

OFFICIAL HISTORY OF THE WAR

Mr. COOTE:

1. How many volumes of an official history setting forth Canada's participation in the great war have been published to date?

2. How many have still to be published?

3. How long has this work been in progress?

4. When will it be completed?

5. Who wrote: (a) whatever volumes have already been published; and (b) the volumes, if any, that have not yet been published?

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

1. One volume has been issued to date, namely the History of the Medical Services, written by Sir Andrew Macphail.

2, 3, 4 and 5. The material necessary for the writing of a general history of the war is being compiled by the historical section, general staff. The exact number of volumes to be published cannot, at the present time, be determined, nor is it possible to say when this history will be completed.

CUSTOMS DUTIES COLLECTED—AUTOMOBILES

Mr. COOTE:

What was the amount of customs duty collected in each of the calendar years 1923-1931 inclusive, on (a) automobiles; (b) motor trucks; (c) automobile parts?

Mr. RYCKMAN:

(a), (b) and (c):

Customs Duties Collected on Imports of Automobiles and Parts Entered for Consumption in Canada during the *Fiscal Years ended March, 1923 to 1932

Fiscal year	Automobiles, passenger	Automobiles, freight	Automobile engines	Automobile parts, n.o.p.
1923	$4,133,321	$ 651,541	$1,140,784	$ 4,313,674
1924	3,316,370	661,566	1,389,707	5,123,078
1925	3,038,852	466,068	1,185,566	4,290,851

FORT FITZGERALD AIRPORT

Mr. SPENCER:

1. Is there a Royal Air Force airport at Fort Fitzgerald?

2. If so, what sum of money has already been spent on it?

3. What sum is expected to be spent at Fort Fitzgerald during 1932?

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

1. There is a Royal Canadian Air Force sub-station at Fort Fitzgerald.

2. $25,696 has been spent on this sub-station up to March 31, 1932.

3. The sub-station at Fort Fitzgerald is being kept on a care and maintenance basis during 1932, the cost of such maintenance is not expected to exceed $500. No provision has been made for any other expenditure in connection with the sub-station.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CARLETON, BONAVENTURE COUNTY—LIGHTKEEPER

Mr. MARCIL:

For a copy of all reports, letters, telegrams and other documents relating to the appointment, by the Civil Service Commission, of Leo Labrecque, a veteran, to the position of lighthouse keeper at Carleton, county of Bonaventure, Quebec; also a copy of all documents in connection with the dismissal of said Labrecque by the Minister of Marine, and the appointment of Mr. J. E. Martin, of Carleton, Quebec.

SANFORD, YARMOUTH COUNTY—REPAIR WORK

Mr. MARCIL (for Mr. Ralston):

For a copy of all paysheets, stock bills, reports, correspondence, and other documents in connection with the repair work done under the Department of Public Works, at Sanford, Yarmouth county, in March, 1931.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 26, consideration of the motion of Hon. E. N. Rhodes (Minister of Finance) that Mr.

Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Ralston.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, last night I had not intended to speak for more than a very few minutes although I said nothing about "five" minutes. Perhaps the Speaker misunderstood me. I can quite understand that because very often I find it difficult to hear him from this end of the chamber. When it became impossible to secure order last night it seemed that the only thing that could be done was to wait until to-day. May I express my appreciation of the attitude of members opposite at this end of the chamber who did make an effort last night to maintain order while I was speaking. Since the debate has gone over until to-day I should like to extend my remarks a little further.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in the earlier part of his speech yesterday gave a survey of the whole economic situation, and whether or not one agreed with him in every detail, I think we must all admit that it was a very fine presentation from his point of view. However, after that, although he had deprecated party politics in view of the crisis that exists, he himself proceeded to discuss matters in a most partisan way, even descending to ordinary ridicule of the positions and speeches of those of us on this side of the house. He referred to Mr. Massey and to an organization known as the League for Social Reconstruction. I think someone must have been telling the Prime Minister some cock and bull story; for he evidently thought to explode a bomb in the house: it proved to be only a dud. He said that Mr. Massey had travelled through the west ostensibly for the purpose of addressing Canadian Clubs, but in reality after his addresses gathering together the faithful in order to reorganize them and to present to them another program. In the words of the Prime Minister:

> So plans for the future were reduced to writing, and as a result I hold in my hand a typewritten copy which was left by Mr. Massey with those whom he had called into conference in western Canada

The Prime Minister then proceeded to read into Hansard the manifesto as issued some two months ago by the League for Social Reconstruction. In answer to a question by the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) the Prime Minister said:

> This is by Mr. Massey, the new organizer of the Liberal party. This is the parlour socialism of that party.
> [Mr. Marcil.]

Now, so far as I have been able to ascertain Mr. Massey had nothing whatever to do with the drawing up of that manifesto. It may be that he left some copies of it with some of his friends, for there are printed copies. I am very glad indeed to think that this kind of program has appealed to Mr. Massey, and I hope it will appeal to a great many members of this house, but certainly Mr. Massey is not an organizer for the League for Social Reconstruction, and the program of this organization is very different, I would say, from that of the Liberal party.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask if Mr. Vincent Massey is a member of the league?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Not so far as I know, but I really do not know. May I say that this term, social reconstruction, seems to have rather stuck in the crop of the Prime Minister. It was first used here in Canada, if my memory serves me, by the late Sir John Willison, or at least he was one of a group that had a great deal to say about social reconstruction just after the war. I do not think that the program of the group under discussion is just that which Sir John Willison would sanction, but the phrase it seems to me is a perfectly good one.

Last night I attempted to read an editorial which had appeared in the April number of the Canadian Forum giving something of the history and purposes of this organization. It is not a political party, but rather an educational organization, and seeks to draw into its membership those who are not content with the existing social order, but are trying in some constructive way to draw up plans which will help to reestablish a better social order than we have to-day In fact it is working along the lines of the Fabian society of earlier days.

I can remember over thirty years ago while doing some reading at Oxford attending a meeting of the local Fabian society when Mr. Bernard Shaw came to address the students of the university. There is no doubt whatever that he and Sidney Webb, who is now Lord Passfield, and Mrs. Webb did an enormous amount toward collecting information concerning social conditions in Great Britain, and disseminating that information among the people. The new organization to which I have referred proposes to do in Canada a similar work. I read a few more lines from the editorial:

> It is intended to publish pamphlets on various aspects of our Canadian problems, and gradually to build up a body of information on such questions as public ownership and the social services, about which there is so much material available in England and the United States, but so little in Canada.

The article goes on to speak of the membership, and then follows the concluding paragraph as follows:

Mr. J. S. Woodsworth, M.P., has accepted the honorary presidency of the league. A provisional executive committee is in charge of its activities for the first year. Its members are Professor F. R. Scott of the faculty of law, McGill university; Professor King Gordon of the Union Theological college; Professor E. A. Havelock of Victoria college, Toronto; Mr. J. F. Parkinson of the department of political economy, university of Toronto; and Professor F. H. Underhill of the department of history, university of Toronto. The secretary is Miss Isabel Thomas, 760 Spadina avenue, Toronto. The following manifesto is being issued by the league. . . .

Then follows the manifesto which the Prime Minister read into the record and about which he spoke with such scorn. On account of the bearing of this manifesto on the very points we are discussing in this debate, I should like to offer a few comments. I read from the manifesto the following:

The league for social reconstruction is an association of men and women who are working for the establishment in Canada of a social order in which the basic principle regulating production, distribution and service will be the common good rather than private profit.

It does seem to some of us in this house, as to a great many people outside the house, that we are approaching a time when the profit motive in industry will have to be replaced by something else. That is the firm conviction of a group in parliament but also that of a great many people in different parts of the world to-day. We take it the present system is showing its bankruptcy through the unemployment, the seeming over production and general stagnation prevailing at the present time. Reading again from the manifesto, I find the following:

The present capitalist system has shown itself unjust and inhuman, economically wasteful and a standing threat to peace and democratic government.

May I point out that with nearly half a million people unemployed we have a most wasteful system in Canada. Nothing could be more wasteful than to have all these idle workers, and have our machinery working only part time. Undoubtedly such conditions are a standing threat to peace and democratic government. That is true locally, because we find on the order paper to-day provision for the securing of a larger force to protect us, for the enlistment of more constables. If such measures are necessary it must be that present conditions are a menace. When we look at the world at large any careful student of international affairs must recognize that rivalry in economic affairs is a distinct menace. Turning again to the manifesto I read:

Over the whole world it has led to a struggle for raw materials and markets and to a consequent international competition in armaments which were among the main causes of the last great war and which constantly threaten to bring on new wars.

Can anyone controvert that statement; I think it is perfectly sound. Almost every historian of any standing recognizes that the main causes of wars in modern days are of an economic nature. I read on:

In the advanced industrial countries it has led to the concentration of wealth in the hands of a small irresponsible minority of bankers and industrialists, whose economic power constantly threatens to nullify our political democracy.

This manifesto was written before the Manitoba provincial savings office episode. It would seem, however, that nothing could better illustrate the truth of the passage I have just read than the fact that the banks dare dictate to a provincial premier when he is to call a legislature together. We thought that was a prerogative of the crown, or the crown as represented through the Lieutenant-Governor. We find now however that the banks can dictate when a legislature is to be called, and what is to be put on the statute books or to be removed from those statute books. Reading again:

The result in Canada is a society in which the interest of farmers and of wage and salaried workers, the great majority of the population, are habitually sacrificed to those of this small minority.

That is what hon. members in this corner of the house have been trying to say in connection with the budget which has been under debate, namely that essentially it is a rich man's budget, and the poor people are being taxed into greater poverty. Essentially it represents the transfer of wealth and power from the poor to the rich. I read on:

Despite our abundant natural resources the mass of the people have not been freed from poverty and insecurity.

Can anyone deny that. And, further:

Unregulated competitive production condemns them to alternate periods of feverish prosperity, in which the main benefits go to speculators and profiteers, and of catastrophic depression, in which the common man's normal state of insecurity and hardship is accentuated.

I think that manifesto well describes the situation we have in Canada to-day—and not only in Canada, but in the world at large. I think that the gentlemen who drew up this manifesto, some of whom have had excellent opportunities to study economic conditions and to know the histories of various nations, have put their finger upon the sore spot in our present civilization. To continue reading:

> We are convinced that these evils are inherent in any system in which private profit is the main stimulus to economic effort.

That of course is an opinion, and I admit any man is free to deny that interpretation of the situation. Then comes the last sentence:

> We therefore look to the establishment in Canada of a new social order which will substitute a planned and socialized economy for the existing chaotic individualism and which, by achieving an approximate economic equality among all men in place of the present glaring inequalities, will eliminate the domination of one class by another.

Then there follow some of the steps which, it is considered, will help towards the realization of the ideals above set forth.

I pause for a moment, Mr. Speaker, if possible to get a little better hearing. I know that this subject is not considered to be of vital interest by a great many men in the house, although I venture to say that within the next twelve months a great many more hon. members, as well as people outside the house, will be giving more careful consideration to the fundamental ideas outlined in the statement I have just been reading.

The Prime Minister spoke of some industries that exist in Canada to-day. Unfortunately in a speech lasting over two hours he said nothing whatever about the greatest industry we have, that is the care of the unemployed of Canada, which far transcends any other industry in this country, for we are told we have some 500,000 unemployed. If that estimate is at all nearly correct, it means that their care, together with that of their families, is the biggest responsibility that lies upon this country at the present time. The Prime Minister was very careful to go into details of the way in which he had, as he thought, established the credit of Canada, but he did not go into details as to how our destitute people were going to be saved from the dreadful situation in which a great many find themselves to-day. An editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press of April 25, contains this passage:

> Winnipeg's biggest individual industry—in numbers of persons on its rolls, in amount of money expended on its upkeep, and in its general effect on the rest of the city—is undoubtedly the business of unemployment relief.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

The article goes on to state that from January 1 to April 6 the total administration costs for the married men's section, the single men's department, and the women's section was $39,484.97—nearly $40,000 for administration alone in the past three months. No municipality can very long carry a burden of that kind. In addition to that, on April 20 there were 1,147 men laid off from the Transcona and Fort Rouge shops. We in Winnipeg are at our wits end to know what to do with these great masses of unemployed men. The situation in Winnipeg is more or less typical of almost every section of the country. Yesterday I had people in to see me from Hamilton and Stratford. In this morning's Citizen I noticed an editorial entitled Work for Destitute Women, from which I quote two or three sentences:

> . . . Relief of destitute women in Ottawa has been carried on during recent weeks by the Local Council of Women. . . . Work has been provided for about six hundred women week by week. . . . There are at present no prospects that more work will be given out to Ottawa's needy women next Tuesday. They received none yesterday. They are desperately asking themselves what can be done. . . . This Christian community can hardly face with equanimity the sight of women walking the streets, hungry and without means of existence. There is surely something more to be done. But, with no constructive lead from those in authority to provide the workless and poverty-stricken in this land of stored granaries with even a bare existence, it remains with the public to see that at least their women are protected.

It is an appalling thing that here in the capital there are six hundred women absolutely without proper sustenance.

I wish I had the time to answer some of the arguments put forward by the Prime Minister. He went to a great deal of pains to justify his position with regard to the so-called favourable balance of trade. I believe that the Minister of Finance stated that that stood for the year at $25,000,000. Neither he nor the Prime Minister has since pointed out that the March returns show an adverse balance of $17,000,000, which would seem to cut off the greater part of the so-called favourable balance that had been laboriously built up during the preceding year. I do not think there is a great deal in the trade balance in any case. Again the Prime Minister, while he carefully analysed the relationships between our trade and that of Great Britain, pointing out invisible items, did not analyse the trade situation existing between the United States and this country in which there are also some very important invisible items.

The Prime Minister quoted with great approval the Macmillan report, but I wonder whether he would be prepared to stand by all the conclusions in that report.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I quote one paragraph:

We are emphatically of the opinion that, even if a further fall of wholesale prices be avoided, their stabilization at approximately the present level would be a serious disaster for all countries of the world alike; and that the avoidance of such an event should be a prime object of international statesmanship.

Again the Prime Minister quoted very approvingly the last book by Sir Arthur Salter; in fact the fore part of his address was very largely based upon this book. I almost wondered before he got through whether he had read the book himself or simply followed a memorandum that someone had given him, because he spoke in the most glowing terms of Sir Arthur Salter and said of him that he ranked "as one of the foremost authorities in the world at the moment." Now, what does Sir Arthur Salter say? Let me quote:

To what goal shall any new reform be directed, and by what methods will it best be achieved?

As to the ultimate goal, an economist could only give one answer—the lowest possible, uniform, and stable tariff-levels.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

Apart from "revenue" as distinct from "protectionist" duties, there are perhaps two kinds of desirable exceptions, one economic, one social. First, emergency tariffs or prohibitions are justifiable against sudden and temporary dumping, designed to kill a competitive enterprise; and, secondly, for social or similar reasons, some countries might foster certain activities which they consider a desirable element in the national life. It may be, for example, that it is worth while for a given community, in the interests of a varied social life, to sustain some economic loss in order to avoid the specialization in a few activities which complete freedom would involve.

But, if we believe in world trade at all, its economies and advantages, a tariff to compensate for differences in wage-level, or in cost of production is mere nonsense.

Again.

A so-called scientific tariff usually means one which is based on the principle of compensating for differences in costs of production. This either represents a mere fallacy, or it is a policy destructive of international trade in anything except the few things that cannot be produced at home at any cost however exorbitant.

And again

Indeed, if we believe in international trade, the only mitigating circumstance about what are usually called "scientific tariffs" is that they never are in fact scientifically framed and applied, for if they were trade would disappear. But if this is not their principle, what is? Let us face frankly the fact that the operative principle underlying the flexible, varied and changing system is usually just this, and nothing more: that those interests which are so organized as to exercise the strongest political pressure get protection, or the highest rates of protection, at the expense of the rest of the community.

The evil consequences are illimitable. Time, energy, attention, money that should be devoted to improving processes, are devoted to persuading politicians. The system offers the highest rewards, the richest spoils, to those who can most successfully corrupt the government. The machine of government itself—in the widest sense, including the ministry, the civil service, the parliament, and the electorate,—cannot under these conditions, and does not, remain honest and competent enough to perform its primary tasks.

Mr. COOTE: Is that Sir Arthur Salter?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I say that Sir Arthur Salter is the man whom the Prime Minister quoted and of whose words he said:

That is the firm and considered conviction of one who, having had perhaps greater opportunities than any other through being in the very centre of the world movement, is able to express an opinion of value.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I know the house is very anxious to vote, and so am I.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. IRVINE: I knew you would all agree. But I want to ask the indulgence of the house for, I hope, not more than ten minutes. I want first of all to make a statement with regard to the amendment now before the house, since it happens that we have to vote upon it in a very few minutes, and in view of the remarks made by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in that regard yesterday afternoon. In the second place I want to correct what really amounted to a misrepresentation of the position taken by this group with respect to financial credit as expressed in the subamendment which was defeated last night.

With regard to the amendment, the right hon. leader of the opposition wondered how it was that we of the Independent groups could not attach our subamendment to the amendment. I want to read one section of that amendment, which will make clear our position:

> . . . . this house is of the opinion that increases made by the present administration in the customs tariff . . . have had the effect of stifling agriculture.

Whether agricultural conditions are worse or better as a result of the alterations in the tariff by the present government is a fitting subject for debate. It might be very well contended by the right hon. leader of the opposition that agricultural conditions have been aggravated by tariff increases, but we do not hold the view that tariff increases by the present administration have stifled agriculture, because agriculture was stifled before this government came into office. The point in the amendment to which we take exception is this, that the entire emphasis is placed upon tariffs, and we do not think tariffs, higher or lower, can solve the problems of agriculture to-day. We therefore advanced a suggestion which we in this corner thought would come nearer to the heart of the problem. Of course we may be wrong in that, but we are just as much entitled to our opinion in that regard as hon. gentlemen to our right are to theirs. I think that will make clear why, from our point of view, though many may have agreed with the amendment, we could not agree with that part of it which says the tariff is either cause or cure of all our economic ills.

For a few moments I should like to answer what I think must be regarded as misrepresentations made by the right hon. leader of the opposition and acquiesced in, in one particular, by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), in regard to the suggestion on finance and credit advanced in the subamendment by the group in this section of the house. Of course I do not charge either of these right hon. gentlemen with having deliberately misrepresented us; I say that their interpretation of our position in effect misrepresents our attitude. I readily agree that there is much room for differences of opinion on questions of finance and credit, but while we are willing to have honest disagreements we do not wish it to go out to the country that we were advocating what was suggested yesterday afternoon by the right hon. leader of the opposition. He objects to the nationalization of finance. We put forward the point that a matter so vital to the economic life of the state as finance, financial credit and real credit, if you like, cannot safely be left to the guiding hand of private interests for private profit, and we do not see any other institution in Canada but this parliament and this government that is in a position to speak or act for all the people. The right hon. leader of the opposition in effect approved of this principle when he put forward his tentative suggestion, which is very interesting and with which I quite agree, in respect to the joint control of industry. There he recognized the necessity of taking from the control of one particular class the whole destiny of the industrial life of the state. We recognize the same principle in connection with finance, and we say this government is the only institution in Canada that has the power to speak for all the Canadian people or to take charge in their name of such a thing as finance, which means much to industry.

Then the right hon. gentleman asked who should do it. He wanted to know if the present government should be entrusted with that task. Our reply is that if the present government will control finance as effectively as they have increased tariffs we are willing to let them do it. If hon. gentlemen to my right should come into power, and if they will effect the control of finance as adequately as they brought about deflation after the war, we will gladly give them the opportunity to do it. If the party in this corner of the house comes into power we will show you how to do it, whether you like it or not.

The right hon. gentleman also objected to the issue of money in sufficient quantities to bring the value of the dollar to the point where it was when the major portion of our debts was contracted. We brought forward that suggestion in the subamendment, and referring to this point the Prime Minister said, "It is suggested that we cut our bonds in two, that is, that the man who had $200 should have only $100." That really is not the true position; for if inflation were to be carried out even on the grand scale misrepresented by the right hon. leader of the opposition, it would not mean that a man with a $200 bond would be paid off with $100. It would mean that the man who had a $200 bond would be paid $200, just as he would be to-day. But where would the difference come in? In effect what the Prime Minister said is true, but unfortunately the reverse is true also. That is to say, if we deflate, then the man who has a $200 bond will be paid $400, and unfortunately that is where the trouble comes in. The right hon. leader of the opposition was in power when that was done, when we went back on the gold basis, which is deflation. The war debts of Canada, as well as our private debts, which were contracted under an inflated dollar, were doubled. We want to correct that mistake. I do not know whether or not the Liberal party have come to the point where they admit that it was a mistake, but from this corner we warned them before they took that action; we told them it was a mistake. England knows now that it was a mistake, and everyone admits it. We want to correct that mistake in Canada, but not by a wild inflation. As a matter of fact it would not be inflation at all, were price levels raised by the issuance of credit; because in the first place it would counteract the deflation which was carried on in this country after the war. In the next place, inflation is not necessarily brought about by issuing more money; inflation is a condition only brought about when more money is issued than there are goods to stand opposite it on the business counter. In other words, so long as price levels remain reasonably stable there cannot be inflation, so that to charge us with asking for wholesale inflation is not the truth. We do not propose to start paper mills issuing money ad lib. to anyone who wants to come and get it, which is about what was suggested yesterday afternoon. We propose to correct a mistake made by the previous administration, and to bring the dollar that we have to pay back to the value of the dollar when we contracted our debts, or, as it might be stated, to raise price levels. Nobody would wish to stabilize price levels where they are now. The section of the Macmillan report just read by the previous speaker (Mr. Woodsworth) points that out very clearly; it shows that we cannot think of stabilizing the price level where it is. If you are going to increase that price level to a reasonable point for stabilization, you can do so only by the issuance of more money. There is no other way of doing it and we provide in our amendment, and have advocated in this debate, that this should be done deliberately in Canada, the state taking over the issuance of money; for that is the only institution that should control it. The leader of the opposition made much of the word "immediately" in the subamendment.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Suppose I owed a thousand dollars to a loan company. How could I pay that debt more easily if we had inflated money? How would inflation affect a debt that I already owed?

Mr. IRVINE: The question is, of course, a fair one, and I should like to take time to answer it quite fully. But surely my hon. friend will see without much debate that if he borrowed one thousand dollars when the price of wheat was one dollar per bushel, then he could pay one dollar of his debt with one bushel of wheat; but if later on deflation took place and the price of wheat dropped to fifty cents, he would have to give two bushels of wheat to pay a dollar of his debt. The converse is true with respect to inflation; that is, raising the price level to where it was when the debt was contracted, the farmer, instead of having to give three bushels of wheat to pay one dollar of debt contracted during the war, will be in a position where the amount of wheat required to pay the debt when the debt was contracted will pay the same amount of debt now. That is the thing we are trying to accomplish. There may be better ways than the one we have suggested, but no one has proposed such ways. I want to be careful that the interpretation of our point of view which the leader of the opposition placed upon our amendment should not go unchallenged into the country. He was very particular about the word "immediately," and spoke about the danger of doing anything suddenly to change the values of currency and credit. He suggested that if we did not administer the doses of medicine to the patient very gradually the patient might die on our hands. Apparently it would satisfy the leader of the opposition to let the patient alone, but if so, very shortly he would have to inject some embalming fluid into a corpse. We think it would be better to start to give the patient the necessary medicine at once. All we mean by the word "immediately" is simply that the time has come for us to make a beginning. We do not expect to cure all the evils of our present system in a few minutes, but we say that a beginning must be made and made as soon as possible.

In answer to the question I put to the right hon. gentleman, as to whether or not the issuance of money as prescribed in the subamendment would assist the people of Canada to pay their debts, he said:

> I cannot believe any course that is not fundamentally sound is going to be of lasting benefit to anybody.

That is a fine statement; but agreeing with that principle, I cannot understand how it is that the right hon. gentleman would lend his abilities to sustaining a system which is fundamentally unsound. For if the financial system had not been fundamentally unsound, it would not now be necessary for us to make proposals to improve it. Is it a sound system to double debts so that they cannot be paid at all? Surely no one will say that is sound. Is it an unsound system to bring the values of money to the point where debts were contracted, so that people can pay back those debts in equal value? Surely that is a sound principle. And that is all we asked in the subamendment. Or, to express it another way, we want to bring the price of commodities up to that level where it was when our debts were contracted. That is an honest policy; it is a sound policy, and to do otherwise is unsound. We did otherwise and it was unsound, and that fact is very largely responsible for the position in which we find ourselves at the present time.

In dealing with inflation, I think that the leader of the opposition became a little confused, because in quoting from Keynes he read an extract dealing with deflation, which entirely proves our point and disproves the point which he was trying to make. He said:

> Would inflation increase the purchasing power of any one overseas? Would not inflation, if it is carried to the point indicated in the amendment, help very much the holding classes to-day as compared with others? Let me read a statement by Mr. Keynes, whom hon. gentlemen to my left have often quoted:
> "To restore the value of pre-war holdings by deflation means enhancing at the same time the value of war and post-war holdings, and thereby raising the total claims of the rentier class not only beyond what they are entitled to, but to an intolerable proportion of the total income of the community."

Precisely; but that is deflation, not inflation. That is what was done, and we want to correct that by the very opposite action. The bondholders of this country, by manipulation of finance, have doubled the debts of the people and made it impossible for them to pay. We want to do the very opposite. Price levels must be raised, or to express it in another way, issue sufficient money to bring commodity values back to where they were, so that every person in Canada would be able to meet his contractual obligations, and where the nation might ultimately hope to extricate itself from the burden of debt which is now upon it.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

1. Resolved, that schedule A to the customs tariff, being chapter forty-four of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, as amended by chapter seventeen of the acts of 1928, chapter thirty-nine of the acts of 1929, chapter thirteen of the acts of 1930 (first session), chapter three of the acts of 1930 (second session) and chapter thirty of the acts of 1931, be further amended by striking thereout tariff item 409q, the several enumerations of goods, respectively, and the several rates of duties of customs, if any, set opposite thereto, and by inserting the following item, enumerations and rates of duty in said schedule A:

Tariff Item	—	British Preferential Tariff	Intermediate Tariff	General Tariff
409q	Complete parts for repairs, if imported on or before the thirty-first day of March, 1933, under regulations prescribed by the Minister.
	(i) For the implements of machinery enumerated in tariff items 409c, 409e, 409f, 409g, 409j, 409o, 409p and 439c	Free	10 p.c.	10 p.c.
	(ii) For the implements or machinery enumerated in tariff item 409b	Free	7½ p.c.	7½ p.c.
	(iii) For the implements or machinery enumerated in tariff item 409d	Free	6 p.c.	6 p.c.
	(iv) For the implements or machinery enumerated in tariff items 409h and 409n	Free	10 p.c.	15 p.c.
	(v) For the implements or machinery enumerated in tariff items 409i and 409k	Free	17½ p.c.	17½ p.c.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I assume that the calling of the item is purely formal and that it is not intended to continue?

Mr. BENNETT: In the absence of the Minister of Finance, who unavoidably is still detained at his house, I move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

FISH INSPECTION ACT

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries) moved the third reading of Bill No. 6, to amend the Fish Inspection Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

FRONTIER COLLEGE ACT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 53, to amend the act of incorporation of the Frontier College.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

On section 1—Power to confer degrees.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Would the minister explain the bill?

Mr. CAHAN: In the year 1922 parliament passed an act to incorporate the Frontier College, by chapter 77 of the statutes of that year. The objects of this college were defined in section six of the statute, as follows:

(a) To promote education among Canadian working men and women and Canadian immigrants; (b) To promote higher educational training and instruction for teachers and social workers among Canadian working men and women and Canadian immigrants.

The objects were very praiseworthy indeed, but under section ten of the act the college was authorized to confer degrees. The college has recently applied to the government of the province of Ontario to be brought under the operation of the Education Act of Ontario and to secure certain rights, privileges and emoluments which may be conferred under that provincial statute. In order that the college might be brought under that statute an agreement was entered into on the nineteenth day of December, 1931, between the Frontier College and His Majesty the King in the right of the province of Ontario as represented by the Minister of Education for Ontario. One provision of the agreement was that section ten of the act of incorporation should be repealed, and so at the request of the government of Ontario concurred in by the Frontier College, I am simply asking by this bill that section ten be repealed in order that this college, which was incorporated by a federal statute, may be brought under the operation of the Education Act of Ontario. All parties have agreed, and I have formal agreements signed to that effect.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act to provide for the appointment of a deputy commissioner, and the employment of extra constables in emergencies, and to make further provisions respecting the counting of service in the great war and in the civil service and customs-excise preventive service by officers and constables, for the purposes of pension.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as is pretty generally known, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have now entered into agreements—probably I should say the government has entered into agreements on their behalf—with the three prairie provinces and the three maritime provinces to take over the ordinary provincial police forces of those six provinces. The police forces of the provinces are being consolidated with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The agreements in respect to which these forces are taken over are practically the same, with the exception of some very slight variations. There is a fixed sum of so much per man allowed as payment by the provinces to the federal government. Then there is a fixed amount for expenses in connection with the transportation of prisoners and the like.

These agreements are all based on the Saskatchewan agreement passed three years ago. In the act authorizing the Saskatchewan agreement there is provision for the inclusion of other provinces. In the view of the commissioner commanding the force it is necessary to have a deputy commissioner to assist him in his work. That is the main object of the present bill, but in addition there are other minor proposals. The bill which will be introduced is quite long, and by reason of the amalgamation a great many amendments have been made necessary. As a result of the amalgamation there will be a considerable saving to the government of Canada, brought about by the abolition of double overhead which has existed heretofore in all the provinces affected, and particularly in those in the west. When the estimate for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is before the house—and I expect it will be either to-morrow or the next day—I shall give the details of the proposed expenditures, and I think I shall be able to satisfy the house that compared with the expenditures in the past there will be a very large saving in expenses in the administration of the force.

I think that is all I need explain at this time.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the minister tell us what increase there will be if the amalgamation of the various forces becomes effective?

Mr. GUTHRIE: An increase in what?

Mr. HEAPS: In the personnel of the force?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the personnel will be in the neighbourhood of 2,000.

Mr. HEAPS: But the 2,000 will not represent the increase in the force brought about by the amalgamation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No; the force was about 1,250 strong; it was increased by 200 or 250 last December. The full increase will bring the whole force up to about 2,000. However I shall have exact information when we are considering the estimate.

Mr. CAYLEY: That is for the six provinces?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must remind hon. members that we are not in committee.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Have any representations been made by the province of British Columbia?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes. During last summer and autumn there were negotiations. Indeed, they were continued until quite recently this spring. I was under the impression that similar arrangements would be made with the province of British Columbia, but up to the present time that province has not agreed to come in. Within the last four or five weeks I have received communications from that province, but at least for the present they have rather definitely refused. They say they will maintain their own constabulary at the present time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does the same situation prevail in regard to Ontario and Quebec?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes; they have not come in.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is there any arrangement in the agreement providing for the taking over of the constables now employed by the provinces?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes. All the constables now employed will not be required in the force. As my hon. friend knows, however, in the force there is a record of the work hitherto performed by each constable, and they are being selected having regard to their services, their adaptability and their past record. Speaking from memory, I will say there were 115 in the Manitoba force, and 85 have been taken over. The same proportion would follow in regard to the other provinces.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In regard to seniority, will the old members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in the various provinces affected by this legislation have seniority over the new members of the old provincial police forces now being taken in?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the old members will continue to hold their seniority. However, I should like to give a more definite statement when the estimate is before the house.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is no reduction in the number of constables employed in the various provinces, as a result of the forces being taken over by the federal authorities?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No; I do not think there will be any reduction in the number.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Will the customs-excise preventive officers be reengaged at the same salaries?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They will be engaged as enlisted men at the regular pay of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. A list of preventive officers has been prepared by the Department of National Revenue. It is on the recommendation of that department they have been taken in. I believe about half the staff of the preventive services will be absorbed in the mounted police; the rest will not be required.

Mr. VENIOT: How many of the provincial police in the province of New Brunswick have been brought in under this service? Probably the minister would prefer to answer under the estimate.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I should think about ninety per cent.

Mr. VENIOT: In the province of New Brunswick there is a difference between provincial police and constables.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, there is in every province.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes. Two years ago the provincial police of New Brunswick were put under a pension system. Will the pensions of those drafted into the Royal Canadian Mounted Police begin two years ago, or only from the time they were drafted in?

Mr. GUTHRIE: In each province the provincial government must make good any deficiency in regard to the pension fund. The only province that has undertaken to do so is Saskatchewan. For instance, in Alberta the fund which has been accumulated by the province up to the present time is not sufficient to carry the pensions in force in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Unless Alberta is prepared to pay the additional amount, the pensions will have to be reduced to bring them into harmony with the amount of money that is now available in the hands of the province. The provinces are to hand over such funds as they have accumulated for the purpose of pensioning their own men in the new force, but only so far as the funds will extend. In the agreement with Saskatchewan the province has undertaken to pay it all; their men will be placed upon the same plane as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in respect to pensions. The other provinces have not yet agreed to do so; they may eventually. But the expense of doing so will have to be borne by the provinces.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Will the time served in the provincial forces be counted as service in the new force?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, if the necessary amount of money is forthcoming it will be.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Is a specific establishment to be provided for each province?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No. A plan is being worked out by the commissioner to carry out in each province under the mounted police the scheme which heretofore has been working in the prairie provinces only. There will be a headquarters in each province, and I suppose there will be various posts according to the localities that are deemed most desirable.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Then the service will be interchangeable?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Oh yes; that is one of the merits of the system we believe.

Mr. COOTE: Under this agreement will the same number of police be maintained in Alberta? I understand from letters I have received from High River that the police station at that point has been closed, although located there for forty-five years. The people are rather alarmed, and an effort is being made to have it reopened. Will the number of police to be maintained in the province be reduced compared with the number of provincial police formerly?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, there will be practically the same number in every province as heretofore. With regard to High River, I am sorry to say it is the intention to close the post. These posts are selected by the provincial administration, and Edmonton has advised us that the High River post should not be maintained any longer.

Mr. COOTE: The provincial government has advised that?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. MALCOLM: The minister stated that in some instances the amount of the pension fund standing to the credit of the provincial police would not be sufficient to carry out the agreement which these men had with their respective provinces. These men having made a contract with the provincial authorities, it seems to me very unfair that they should be transferred to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the provincial governments relieved of the responsibility of carrying out their bargains. Apparently the men because of this transfer are going to suffer after having contributed their share to the provincial pension fund.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I fancy it is a matter between the men and the provinces. I understand that practically all the men are in favour of the arrangement. They do not look to this government to make it good.

Mr. MALCOLM: Naturally not.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is purely an actuarial matter, and the amount can be definitely ascertained.

Mr. MALCOLM: Quite.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But to pay the scale of pensions payable to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police would require a greater amount than is now in the hands of the provincial governments. We cannot bind the provincial governments to make up that amount. Saskatchewan has done so; Alberta and Manitoba have not done so as yet. However, that is a matter between the former constabulary of the provinces and the provincial governments. It is now under consideration, and I think in the case of one province there is only a difference between them of $20,000.

Mr. MALCOLM: The minister does not state the amount of money they will receive from the provinces. Will it be less than the amount required to carry out the agreement which the provincial police had with their provinces?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It will carry out the agreement they had with their provinces, but it will not pay the pensions payable to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. MALCOLM: Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the scale of pension in each case?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is higher in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. HEENAN: What rates of pay were the men receiving under the provinces, and what will they receive under the dominion?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I know the policemen get $2 a day and certain allowances. I do not know what they got from the provinces. We agree to maintain, say, 150 men at $1,000 a man, and we receive from the province $150,000; in addition we receive the actual expenses in connection with the transportation of prisoners and the like. In some cases that has been fixed at a definite sum, but in the case of Saskatchewan we have had to do a lot of accounting, and we obtain the actual expense that we incur. It would be far better if we could arrive at a definite sum in each case. Last year we received from Saskatchewan $25,000 for the transport and care of prisoners. We have fixed a definite sum with Alberta of $50,000, and I think the same with respect to Manitoba. Saskatchewan is now anxious to have a definite sum fixed in regard to its prisoners, but we have not yet been able to agree upon an amount.

Mr. POWER: Does this legislation cover the amalgamation, if I may so call it, of the customs preventive service with the mounted police?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, this legislation does not.

Mr. POWER: Is it the taking over by the mounted police of the entire preventive service?

Mr. GUTHRIE: This legislation does not cover it; that is done by order in council under the act which authorizes rearrangement of departments of government. This provides for the preventive service in this respect, that time served heretofore in the preventive service shall be counted to the credit of these men when they join the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. POWER: For pension?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. POWER: I was under the impression that a large number of employees of the preventive service were on a purely temporary basis, and consequently were not entitled to pensions. Am I right in that?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There are some temporaries no doubt, and they are not entitled to pension.

Mr. POWER: They were not under the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. GUTHRIE: A lot of them were not. A great many of them are going to be let out of the service as unnecessary.

Mr. POWER: Has the minister some kind of statement to make as to the procedure to be followed with respect to employees of the customs preventive service generally? I am asking that question because I have heard from Quebec that a number of former employees are being let out of the service, and are not being given an opportunity to join the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Whether they are not being given that opportunity because they are too old, incompetent, or for some other reason I do not know. Perhaps the minister could make a statement with regard to that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think perhaps that is the reason—that they are too old, or some of them may be incompetent. At all events, they have been selected on their records with the department by the officials of the Department of National Defence. Then these names, which were approved by that department, were submitted to the commissioner of the mounted police, and I think to-morrow I will be able to answer the question which more immediately concerns my hon. friend and which is on the order paper, as to the names of those in the province of Quebec who are being retained. I think there are fifty names on the list. I should have it here to-day, but I left it in my office. I will bring it to-morrow, and the names of the fifty selected are all given.

Mr. POWER: On what is this selection based?

Mr. GUTHRIE: On the records in the Department of National Defence. The selection was made by that department and the names were submitted to the commissioner.

Mr. BROWN: Have you that for every province?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the system for all the provinces.

Mr. BROWN: Will you have a list of the selections in all the provinces?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That list has not been compiled as yet; the selection has not been completed.

Mr. POWER: What is to become of the people who have been in the service for some considerable length of time? Have they been given notice or a gratuity in lieu of notice?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I assume they will be treated as other officials of the service are treated. Temporary employees will be allowed to retire on the terms applied to similar retirements in other departments. I do not know just what they are. Those who are entitled to retirement allowance will receive it, but as a means of economy as much as anything we have decided not to take over all the members of the service. We do not require them all, and in that way a very large saving will be made.

Mr. VENIOT: Under the general act or regulations ten years service is required before any return is made in connection with superannuation. A person leaving the service before completing ten years does not get back the five per cent he has put in. Under the regulations adopted two or three years ago the customs preventive service was brought under the pension system. Some of these men will be let out under this reorganization. Would the minister look into the matter and let us know later on, if he has not the information now, whether these men will lose the amount they have paid into the pension fund, or whether that money will be returned to them.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will look into the matter. I cannot say offhand, but they will be given whatever is provided by the law.

Mr. VENIOT: If I am not mistaken there is no provision for them when they are retired by reason of their services not being required.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think in that case they get a gratuity, and not a pension.

Mr. VENIOT: But they may have paid in more than the amount of the gratuity.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My recollection is that they get what they paid in, with some interest.

Mr. VENIOT: If that is so it is satisfactory.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I believe if they are dismissed they do not get anything.

Mr. POWER: May I ask if the counting of service in the great war for pension purposes is a new principle being incorporated in the act?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is a new principle in the mounted police act.

Mr. POWER: Formerly when persons joined the police after having served in the great war, that service was not counted for pension, as I understand it, but it will be counted under this new legislation. Is this going to be a sort of blanket provision, taking in those who were members of the police force prior to the amalgamation of the customs preventive service, or will it deal only with those who are to benefit by this particular legislation?

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend probably knows that a great many members of the mounted police joined the forces and participated in the great war. Up until they left for the war their time counted for pension, but while they were away it did not count, and on their return a great many of them rejoined the police force. The provision is that such men who served in the great war shall be able to count the three or four years thus spent in connection with pension, and the same privilege will be given those in the preventive service. Any time they spent overseas will be counted towards pension, just as if they had served in the police force.

Mr. POWER: Perhaps I did not make myself quite clear. I quite understand the situation in connection with those mentioned by the minister, that is, men who prior to the war were members of the mounted police. It would be a very curious anomaly indeed if the time they spent at the war could not be counted for pension; I think we all agree on that. But I was asking the minister whether or not the time served overseas by a recruit who may join to-day, or who joined two or three years ago, will be counted with his police service, in connection with his pension.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The case could hardly arise under the present regulations, because they provide that no one shall be taken in who is over twenty-eight years of age. A man who is twenty-eight years of age to-day would have been a very young man at the close of the war; he would not have been able to serve.

Mr. POWER: Did the same regulation apply in the preventive service?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, but the preventive service would be included under this provision, and any member who served in the great war would be able to count that time.

Mr. POWER: I understand that civil servants who served in the war had that time counted for pension.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is right.

Mr. POWER: If a member of the customs preventive service served during the war, and is now incorporated in the mounted police, his time in the service and his war service would both count for pension?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. POWER: Now take the case of a man who joined the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, say, in 1925 or 1926 when, so far as I know, the regulations were not so severe and when the age limit was not twenty-eight years. Would the time he served in the war be counted for pension?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, certainly.

Mr. POWER: That would not be so under the legislation previously in force?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No. That will be provided for in the bill which I propose to introduce.

Mr. POWER: Then I want to congratulate the minister.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Under whose jurisdiction will the police in the provinces come? Will they report to and be directly controlled by the officials of the Dominion government or the officials of the provincial government, or will they come under a dual control in respect of the different acts which they may enforce? That is, would they come directly under the control of the dominion in regard to the enforcement of purely federal laws, and would they report to and come under the control of the provincial authorities in respect of provincial matters?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They will be directly under the control of their own officers, and under the immediate control of Major General MacBrien, the commissioner. My hon. friend will see under the act that for certain purposes the force is under the Department of Justice, and for the time being the Minister of Justice is designated as the minister in control. But in each of the provinces where the system is now in operation we have a divisional officer, a superintendent, who is directly in touch with the attorney general of the province, and the administration of law is largely carried on through that superintendent and the attorney general. The supreme control of the force, however, is certainly with the commissioner at Ottawa.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: But in the actual working out of the act the control, for ordinary every day purposes, will be divided in accordance with the particular law which may be enforced?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think that is a fair statement of what is taking place.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Where will the deputy commissioner be located—in Ottawa or somewhere in the western provinces?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think in Ottawa. I had a discussion with the commissioner to-day and he said that the pressure had been so great here that he would have to have someone with more authority than now existed and that the deputy commissioner would be stationed here with himself.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think that is an additional plum.

Mr. HOWDEN: Will the age regulation be observed in the transference of men from the provincial police to the Royal Canadian service?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Not as regards the men already in the service.

Mr. MacLEAN: Regarding the division of work, and the men in the preventive service of the provincial police who have been taken in in each province, will there be a sharp division or will they work in cooperation? Are their duties the same? Will the duties of the provincial police be defined by the province?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They will be under one control, and I should think there would be cooperation in every respect between them; but that is a matter about which I could not give definite information.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): What will become of the heads of the provincial police in each province?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Those who have been favourably reported on as good officers are retained.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): In what capacity?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I cannot tell; that will be under the control of the commissioner too, I fancy.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Will they receive the same salary?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I cannot say. They will be police force salaries.

Mr. POWER: What is the salary of the deputy commissioner?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It has not been fixed; it will have to be fixed in the bill.

Mr. GARDINER: Where the mounted police have taken over police duties in the provinces, which of the two governments will determine the number of police required for all purposes?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They have been determined by the provinces on the basis of a three-year agreement. They name the number and pay one thousand dollars per man.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Guthrie thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 63, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

TRUSTEES DEFINED—DISPOSITION OF FINES

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 42, to amend the Criminal Code. (Trustees defined. Disposition of fines).

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Payment of fines in Ontario to municipalities.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I desire to withdraw this section. The circumstances, briefly, are these. Section 2 was placed in the bill at the request of the government of Ontario. The effect of passing the section would be to allow the government of Ontario to dispose of all fines which are recovered in that province, as is permitted in all the other provinces of Canada to-day. In 1922 the government of Ontario induced this parliament to pass a special clause applying only to Ontario, which provided that these fines should go back directly to the municipalities. I received a request early in the year, asking me to go back to the old system that prevailed prior to 1922, and allow the fines to go directly to the province, the province to deal with them. Since I introduced the bill I have received word from the attorney general of Ontario that he proposes during the summer or autumn to call a conference of the municipalities of Ontario in regard to this question. A great many of the municipalities are not agreeable to the section now proposed. He says he will confer with them, and he has asked me to withdraw this clause of the bill for the present session and will advise me at the next session whether the province of Ontario desires it. Under these circumstances, if the committee is agreeable, I would move that it be withdrawn.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is no relationship between the two sections of the bill?

Mr. GUTHRIE: None at all.

Motion agreed to and section withdrawn.

Bill as amended reported, read the third time and passed.

NATURAL RESOURCES

REFUND OF MONEY RECEIVED PRIOR TO TRANSFER TO WESTERN PROVINCES

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Minister of the Interior) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to provide that the governor in council, upon the recommendation of the Minister of the Interior may authorize the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of any sums of money received in connection with the administration of the natural resources prior to the transfer thereof to the western provinces, which His Majesty is under any legal or equitable obligation to refund, and that an annual statement be laid before parliament of all moneys refunded hereunder.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will the minister explain the resolution?

Mr. MURPHY: When the Department of the Interior was administering the natural resources of the western provinces, the regulations and practice in many instances called for the payment of moneys to the department in advance of the granting of rights. In some cases the moneys were tendered as guarantee deposits; in other cases, as advance payments; in other cases, the regulations provided a drawback. In all these cases, it was customary to refund any over-payment as speedily as determined.

In addition to the foregoing, there were cases where settlers made improvements on homesteads which they afterwards abandoned. Re-entrants for the same land paid the department the value of the improvements and it was customary to refund this amount to the cancelled entrant as soon as it had been collected from the reentrant, provided the municipality in which the land was situated certified that no unpaid taxes had accrued meanwhile.

Again, under the authority of an order in council of May 29, 1925, certain regulations governing the conversion of patented preemptions or purchased homesteads into soldier grants were established. Under these regulations, which were subsequently continued, settlers who had paid in full or in part for their preemptions or purchased homesteads, and who were entitled to soldier grant entry by reason of their military service, were permitted to convert their preemption or purchased homestead, as the case might be, into a soldier grant and obtained a refund of the purchase price.

So long as the department was receiving the revenue from dominion lands administration, no question arose as to the policy followed consistently by succeeding administrations. The refunds were made from current revenue. However, with the passing of the control of the natural resources to the provinces, the source of revenue disappeared.

Generally speaking, the applications may be roughly classified as follows:

(a) Petroleum and natural gas prospecting permit deposits: in addition to the prescribed rental, each applicant for a permit was required to make a deposit of forty cents an acre, which was returnable upon evidence being submitted that an equal expenditure had been incurred in prospecting operations on the location held under permit.

(b) Dominion lands: when homesteaders gave assignments to railway companies for areas acquired for right-of-way, the railway company, at the request of the department, instead of paying the consideration money over to the entrant, forwarded it here to be held in trust, pending the issue of patent. When the department ascertains that the entrant has become entitled to patent, it has been the practice to refund the money to him.

(c) Moneys paid to the department in connection with yearly licences and permits to cut timber on dominion lands: this department is holding certain sums which have been received in connection with the disposal of timber rights on dominion lands in the four western provinces, either in the form of deposits made as a guarantee that the permittee will pay the prescribed charges and conform with the timber regulations, or of credit balances which have arisen in favour of the permittee or berth-holder during the course of his operations.

(d) Seed grain: an occasional settler who has paid an instalment on seed grain indebtedness charged against the land for which he obtained entry, upon abandoning such entry has been permitted to obtain a refund of the sum so paid by him.

(e) Preemptions converted into soldier grants: the practice there has been as previously mentioned.

(f) Improvements left on cancelled homesteads or leases: the explanation is the same as was given under another heading.

(g) Soldier settler timber permits: refunds of dues paid in connection with settlers' timber permits on soldier settlement land from time to time as patents are issued by this department.

(h) Timber permit issued—no timber cut: refunds of dues paid on timber uncut under permits issued prior to the transfer of the resources, as the refunds are applied for.

(i) Grazing leases: moneys paid for improvements in connection with grazing leases which are refunded to the party who left the improvements on the land.

(j) Hay permit refunds: where no hay has been cut or where amount covered by permit is not available.

The total amount applied for to date is $51,140.75, although that may not be the total amount applied for as applications may come in now or later.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The language of the resolution is rather broad in the authorization it gives to the governor in council to pay sums of money which the crown is under any legal or equitable obligation to refund. Will the various cases which my hon. friend has mentioned, be indicated in the bill, or will it be rather in the nature of a blank cheque, leaving it to the discretion of the government as to whether the crown is under any equitable obligation to pay the sums which may be claimed from it?

Mr. MURPHY: The language of the bill follows pretty much that of the resolution—

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is pretty broad.

Mr. MURPHY: —but the intention is to continue to make payments out of the consolidated revenue fund on the authority of the governor in council on the same principle as that on which payments have been made, as a matter of legal right or of grace, during the past number of years. The hon. member will understand that these payments have been made for many years out of moneys which were received when the dominion was administering the resources and the department was in possession of current funds. Now that that revenue has dried up owing to the transfer of the resources, this simply gives the minister power, under authority of the governor in council, to make these payments out of the consolidated revenue whereas formerly they were made out of the current revenue of the department.

Mr. BENNETT: No power conferred under the bill to be founded on this resolution will be greater than that exercised by the minister before the resources were turned over, that is, the power conferred upon the governor in council will not be greater than that exercised by the governor in council heretofore.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The power exercised by the minister is under what law?

Mr. BENNETT: When the resources were administered by the dominion, the minister exercised his power through an order in council and returned moneys by order in council as regards claims that were sometimes equitable with respect to homesteads and matters of that kind, and sometimes purely legal. There is no longer a fund except the consolidated revenue fund out of which the moneys can be paid. This is to authorize the same order in council upon the recommendation of the minister for the payment of moneys that might be held in trust or otherwise on an order in council and that heretofore were paid out of departmental funds.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Will this cover all claims originating prior to the return of the resources?

Mr. BENNETT: It is intended, as the minister has said, to cover those claims which have not yet been adjusted, but which must be settled in some way because they arose prior to the time the resources were turned over. The money is now in the possession of the dominion. In some instances a legal claim exists; in some cases it is purely equitable. This is to enable the minister now to deal with those moneys out of the consolidated revenue fund through an order in council just as heretofore he himself used to have an order in council passed and a cheque could be issued accordingly. That cannot be done except by the authority now conferred, owing to the resources themselves having been turned over to the provinces, and the moneys formerly in the departmental fund being in the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): Is it proposed that this legislation shall apply to the railway belt in British Columbia and the Peace River block?

Mr. MURPHY: It gives the minister power under the authority of the governor in council to make refunds out of consolidated revenue fund which were formerly made by the minister through order in council.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): And it would apply to the railway lands in British Columbia?

Mr. MURPHY: Any individual heretofore entitled to a refund in connection with lands or grazing or hay or timber permits would still be entitled to it, and the minister under this legislation would be able to make such refund under the authority of the governor in council.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): What I have in mind is the case of a preemptor who took up a piece of land. On that land there was timber, and when he cut the timber and disposed of it he was obliged to pay a royalty on it. The royalty was imposed on the distinct understanding that when he had secured his patent the amount of the royalty would be refunded to the settler. They have had difficulty in British Columbia since the return of the natural resources in getting a refund, and I suppose that this legislation is to give the minister authority to pay back amounts of this nature. Is that correct?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. MURPHY: That is correct.

Mr. GERSHAW: As the question of interest has come up, I would ask if the department pays interest to a man where there has been delay for months or years in paying the principal?

Mr. MURPHY: To the best of my knowledge there would be no interest paid to an individual. He would get his principal back without interest.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Murphy thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 64, to authorize the refund of moneys received in connection with the administration of the natural resources.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EASTERN BANK OF CANADA

BANK CIRCULATION REDEMPTION FUND—PAYMENT TO ESTATE OF THE LATE ANGUS MCLEAN

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That the Minister of Finance be authorized to pay to the executors of the estate of the late Angus McLean, of Bathurst, New Brunswick, the sum of $5,000, being the amount of the bank circulation redemption fund at the credit of the Eastern Bank of Canada, which was incorporated by chapter 28 of the statutes of 1928, but did not commence business.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: There are a number of non-contentious resolutions and bills standing in the name of the Minister of Finance, none of which I would ask the house to consider if they dealt with controversial matters. This particular resolution is non-contentious, perhaps the committee will deal with it.

Shortly, a bank was incorporated called the Eastern Bank of Canada, and into the bank circulation redemption fund there were paid certain sums of money, including $5,000 by the late Angus McLean. The bank did not function. All its bills have been paid and certificates to that effect have been given. Mr. McLean is dead and his executors are entitled to this money, but it requires a statute to take it out of the fund.

Mr. VENIOT: The bank was not incorporated.

Mr. BENNETT: It was incorporated by this parliament.

Mr. VENIOT: A bill was passed by the Senate and came to this house in 1929. Mr. McLean was not the original incorporator. Mr. Taylor was the promoter. The only question I want to ask is, have the interests of others been fully protected who were as deeply interested in this bank as Mr. McLean was when he was alive? Are they clear of all responsibility?

Mr. BENNETT: The moneys paid in were returned to everybody except Mr. McLean, and had he been alive the sum mentioned in the resolution would probably have been returned to him. With the lapse of time this money went into the fund, and it is now possible to withdraw it only by the authority of a statute. The necessary releases and so forth will be furnished to the minister before payment is made. The money is not that of the government; it belongs to Mr. McLean's estate.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Bennett thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 65 respecting the Eastern Bank of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. BENNETT moved the second reading of the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: By consent.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: This, of course, is being proceeded with now only by consent. Is the bill printed, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): Yes, but not numbered.

On the preamble.

Mr. COOTE: What is the number of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): It is not numbered and not distributed. The present procedure can be had only by consent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is the bill printed?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it printed in English and French?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): As hon. members have not the bill before them I shall read the preamble which we are now discussing:

Whereas the Eastern Bank of Canada (hereinafter called "the bank"), was incorporated by chapter seventy-eight of the statutes of 1928; and whereas the bank did not commence business; and whereas the subscribers to the capital stock of the bank, other than the late Angus McLean, deceased, of Bathurst, New Brunswick, have been refunded the amount paid by them on their respective subscriptions; and whereas the affairs of the bank have been wound up and the executors of the estate of the said Angus McLean, deceased, have made application to the Minister of Finance for the payment out of the bank circulation redemption fund of the amount at the credit of the bank; and whereas the sum of five thousand dollars deposited by the bank under the provisions of the Bank Act in the bank circulation redemption fund represents moneys subscribed and paid for shares in the capital stock of the bank by the said Angus McLean, deceased; and whereas it is expedient to obtain the authority of parliament for the payment of the amount of the bank circulation redemption fund at the credit of the bank to the executors of the said Angus McLean, deceased; Therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

Preamble agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): Section 1 is as follows, and comes under the heading "Payment authorized":

1. The Minister of Finance may pay to the executors of the estate of the late Angus McLean, of Bathurst, New Brunswick, the amount of the bank circulation redemption fund at the credit of the Eastern Bank of Canada.

Mr. POWER: Under what authority were other subscribers paid?

Mr. BENNETT: Other subscribers were paid their money in their life time. When the bank was wound up, the money not having been placed in such a position, it was no longer available to honour the cheque of the individual who gave it. In other words this fund is really in the consolidated revenue fund, having been transferred there, and it is technically part of the bank circulation redemption fund, but cannot be withdrawn except with the authority of the statute, which was legal authority for the other payments. That is my information, but I shall speak to the minister about it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Are there any other parties claiming it?

Mr. BENNETT: No, there is no claim of any kind. It is as much their money as it is possible for anything to be their money.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. BENNETT: In view of the circumstances, I will not ask for a third reading of the bill to-day, but shall have inquiries made so that I may answer the question of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) as to the exact authority under which other payments were made.

EMPIRE PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER CONCERNING ATTENDANCE IN BERMUDA OF MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it being nearly six o'clock, I desire as a matter affecting the privileges of this house, to refer to an editorial appearing in the Ottawa Journal of Wednesday, April 27, 1932. The editorial is headed "A Nice Little Joy Ride." The last paragraph is as follows:

There will be hard cynical people, of course —perhaps some of them have been feeling the economy axe—who will complain; who will think this is just a nice joy-ride at the country's expense. And there may be some even who will wonder why the grand passion for economy didn't reach out to include votes for a Parliamentary Association to help some of its members golf amid zephyr breezes that kiss the breakers on coral reefs. But they really mustn't. Our tired legislators, and particularly those who have been attending the strenuous sessions of the Senate, need this little vacation; especially as they are going to kill two birds with one stone and help save the empire while saving themselves.

I may say that Bermuda sent invitations, through the Clerk of the House as secretary of the Empire Parliamentary Association, inviting a certain number of members of the Senate and the House of Commons to visit Bermuda at the expense of the government of that place. No money of this country has been voted for the purpose. The sum appearing in the estimates that is paid to the Empire Parliamentary Association is paid for publications and is remitted in its entirety to the secretary of the association for that purpose. It is wholly incorrect and absolutely unfair to say or suggest that those who have been selected, or have agreed to go to Bermuda as guests of the Bermuda government have been taking money from this country for that purpose. The report is as inaccurate as it possibly could be; it is unfair to this parliament and to the gentlemen who have gone from this chamber and the Senate to Bermuda. It is a little difficult to understand why such a statement should have been made.

[Mr. Bennett.]

PARLIAMENTARY LEADERS

PRESS REFERENCES TO RELATIONS BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have just been reading an editorial appearing in the Ottawa Journal of Wednesday, April 27, 1932, immediately below the one to which my right hon. friend has just referred. It may affect the privileges of the house, and certainly is a matter of personal privilege. The article is headed, "Mr. Bennett and Mr. King," and begins as follows:

According to despatches sent out to Winnipeg and Toronto papers, Premier Bennett and Mr. Mackenzie King have ceased to be on speaking terms, have no personal nor social contacts. This, if it be true, is a pity.

The article continues at some length. So far as I am concerned I was not aware that I had ceased to be on speaking terms with my right hon. friend. It is quite true I have not felt able to accept some of the invitations he has kindly extended, but beyond that I have not been aware of any personal difference with the Prime Minister.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad the right hon. gentleman has made the observations to which we have just listened. I have had no occasion to speak to him and therefore I cannot be said not to be on speaking terms with him. The last occasion I had the opportunity of speaking to him I did not observe anything in his conduct which would indicate that he was unwilling to speak to me. Perhaps I spoke first on that occasion, but inasmuch as there have been very acute differences between us, in connection with which he said he would not accept any statement made by me, I assume the newspapers concluded that as a matter of intelligent discrimination I might decline to make any.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 5.45 p.m.

Thursday, April 28, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury) presented the sixth report of the select standing committee on railways and shipping.

Mr. Hanson moved that the report be referred to the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I beg to lay on the table of the house three copies of order in council No. 857, dated April 16, 1932, passed under the authority of chapter 165 of the revised statutes of Canada, providing for the consolidation of the preventive service of the National Revenue department with the mounted police.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. GIROUARD:

1. Has the Royal Canadian Mounted Police replaced, in the province of Quebec, the officers of the Customs preventive service, if so, since what date?

2. Who has been appointed head or superintendent of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in that province?

3. What are the names of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police acting in the province of Quebec in lieu of the former Customs preventive officers?

Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police in taking over the preventive service on April 1, 1932, has absorbed most of the former members of the preventive service in that province.

2. Superintendent Thomas Dann.

3. All members of the force in the province of Quebec act in endeavouring to prevent infractions of the Customs and Excise Acts. The following members of the former preventive service have been taken over in the province of Quebec and are now members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police:

1. J. A. L. Arsenault; 2. J. T. E. R. Allard; 3. J. R. Bourassa; 4. L. B. Brault; 5. A. W. Anderson; 6. W. Mack. Brady; 7. P. A. Chapados; 8. L. C. Cahill; 9. J. C. E. C. Delorme; 10. H. A. SHUBENACADIE, N.S., POST OFFICE BUILDING

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. What is the total cost to date of the post office building recently constructed by the government at Shubenacadie, Nova Scotia?

2. What was the contract price for this building?

3. (a) How much did the government pay the contractor for extras; (b) of what did such extras consist?

4. (a) What was the contract price of the heating apparatus in this building; (b) how much did the government pay for extras for heating?

5. (a) From whom did the government obtain the sewerage rights for this building; (b) what amount did the government pay for these rights?

6. (a) Who built the sewer; (b) how much did the sewer cost the government?

7. (a) What was the cost to the government of the water supply to this building; (b) where is the water obtained; (c) is the water supply satisfactory?

8. (a) Was the inspector on the construction of this building appointed by the Civil Service Commission; (b) if not, on whose recommendation was he appointed; (c) what amount was he paid for his services?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. $20,464.61, including site.

2. $15,124.90.

3. (a) Nil. (b) Answered by (a).

4. (a and b) Heating equipment included in general contract; no information as to amount.

5. (a) Permission to connect to Municipal sewer obtained from Robert Gass, warden of the municipality of East Hants; (b) Nothing paid for rights to connect to sewer but agreement states: "The Department to contribute proportionately to the value of its property to any cost of upkeep for repairs. A right of way was obtained through the property of J. A. Kirkpatrick for this sewer for the sum of $80.

6 and 7. Sewer, well and pumping outfit constructed by J. B. Caddell for $600. Water supply is obtained from the well and no complaints have been received by Department regarding the supply.

8. (a) Yes; (b) Answered by (a); (c) $604.83.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

MONTREAL HARBOUR ELEVATOR—SAND PURCHASES

Mr. GARDINER:

1. From what companies was sand purchased through contractors for construction of the elevator at section 42, Montreal harbour?
2. What are the names of the owners of these companies?
3. Were any members of the harbour board or harbour board officials interested in any of these companies, either directly or indirectly?

MONTREAL HARBOUR—PIERS AND ELEVATORS

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Were contracts let to the Atlas Construction Company and to Barnard and McQueen for the construction of piers and elevators for the Montreal harbour commission from 1922 to 1930?
2. If so, what were the contract prices?
3. Were these prices the lowest tender?
4. From whom did the Montreal harbour commission purchase British Columbia timber from 1922 to 1930?
5. What prices were paid for same?
6. Were any contracts made with lumber companies that were owned wholly or in part by the Montreal harbour commissioners or officials?

MONTREAL HARBOUR ELEVATORS—GRAIN OVERAGES

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Were there any overages of grain accumulated in the Montreal harbour commission elevators during the years 1922 to 1930?
2. If so, what were the overages in each of these years?
3. To whom were such overages sold?
4. What money was realized by the sale of overages?
5. What disposition was made of the proceeds?

MONTREAL HARBOUR—CANADIAN IMPORT COAL COMPANY LEASH

Mr. GARDINER:

1. What was the rental named in the lease from the Montreal Board of Harbour Commissioners to the Canadian Import Coal Company?
2. Were any special privileges allowed in this lease that did not apply to the leases granted to the other coal dealers?

[Mr. Baribeau.]

3. Was the entire Bickerdike pier leased?
4. If not, what portion was leased?
5. Were there any other tenants on this pier?
6. Was lease approved by order in council?
7. If not, why?
8. If lease was for an annual rental that was not adequate and not approved by order in council, will lessee be called upon to pay a further amount to make up the deficiency?
9. What coal was purchased from the Canadian Import Company by the Montreal harbour commission?
10. Was a proper check made to see that full weight was received?
11. What were the prices paid by the Montreal harbour commission to the Canadian Import Coal Company for the different grades and varieties of coal?

PRIVILEGE — Mr. MACKENZIE — (VANCOUVER CENTRE)

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, arising out of an article in the Ottawa Journal of to-day dealing with a debate which took place in another place yesterday, and in which the following words are used:

The committee—

It is referring to the Beauharnois committee of last year:

—representing three political persuasions, heard the evidence and adjudicated thereon. It was a fact beyond controversy that the report was adopted unanimously by the committee.

I wish, sir, to state again as I stated last year on the thirtieth day of July, 1931, as will be seen by page 4373 of Hansard of that date, that that statement is entirely incorrect. I so informed the chairman of the committee at the final sitting of the committee on July 28, 1931. I so informed my right hon. leader and my colleagues on this side of the house, and my right hon. leader so informed the Prime Minister last year before the debate of July 30, 1931.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES RESPECTING MEASURES TO RELIEVE DISTRESS

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the governor in council to enter into agreements with all or any of the provinces respecting relief measures in such province or provinces; and to pay out of the consolidated revenue fund such sums as in his discretion may be required to meet the obligations created by such agreements; to provide for special requirements in the national parks and in the drought stricken areas of the province of Saskatchewan; to assist in defraying the cost of the sale and distribution of products of field, farm, sea, river and mine; to loan money to any province on such terms as may be agreed upon and to guarantee the repayment of moneys borrowed by such province and to assist any province in any way that may be deemed necessary or advisable to provide for the relief of distress and the support and maintenance of those requiring assistance, and to loan money to and guarantee the payment of money by any public corporation or undertaking.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that this resolution is very similar to the resolution that preceded the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act which was introduced last session, and the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act which was introduced at an earlier stage of the present session. There is, however, one feature of the present resolution which makes it markedly different from the previous ones. The previous resolutions proposed to give to the governor in council power to pass orders in council with respect to peace, order and good government. That particular power is fortunately conspicuous by its absence from the present resolution, and I would like to say to the government how glad I am that they have seen the force of the objections which have been made from this side of the house to the governor in council taking to himself the power to legislate with respect to peace, order and good governnment. With that objectionable feature removed, the resolution in its present form is infinitely less objectionable than the previous resolution.

However, the present resolution still contains the objectionable feature of allowing the governor in council at his discretion to take moneys from the consolidated revenue fund for the purposes which are stated, and only in a general way, in the terms of the resolution. I do not believe it would be possible to add anything to what has already been said from this side of the house with respect to the wrongfulness of that method of proceeding. It has been asserted over and over again that the supreme obligation of the House of Commons is to maintain unrestricted control over the destination of all grants, and to that end it is essential that any grants of public money from the consolidated revenue fund should be made for specific objects designated, and the amounts required therefor should also be specifically named. I would like it to be understood that we on this side oppose as strenuously as we did, heretofore, in the last session and in the earlier part of this session, the feature of this resolution which leaves it to the discretion of the governor in council to take from the consolidated revenue fund whatever amounts of money he may wish to take for the purposes named in the resolution. It is another blank cheque which the administration is asking for itself, notwithstanding the obvious objections to that course which have been made only too plain in the course of debate in this house.

There is a feature of the present resolution that I would like to draw to the attention of the Prime Minister. It seems to me that in its terms the resolution is ambiguous, the extent to which criticism may be directed against the resolution and the bill itself will depend upon its exact terms when that ambiguity is removed. As the resolution reads, it would appear at first sight that it had relation to agreements to be made between the dominion and the provinces, and that all the moneys that were to be taken from the consolidated revenue fund would be taken solely in connection with those agreements under the terms thereof. On the other hand, the resolution read in a different way would appear to give the governor in council power to take money from the consolidated revenue fund not only for the purposes named in the agreements with the provinces but also for other purposes which may not relate to any agreements with the provinces at all.

Moreover, there is a further ambiguity in that it does not appear whether this resolution relates exclusively to what may be required for the purposes of unemployment and farm relief. I should like the Prime Minister to indicate before we go into committee whether the resolution is intended to be restricted to unemployment and farm relief or whether it goes further than that. Let me make clear by illustration the meaning of what I have just said. The resolution reads:

> That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the governor in council to enter into agreements with all or any of the provinces respecting relief measures in such province or provinces; and to pay out of the consolidated revenue fund such sums as in his discretion may be required to meet the obligations created by such agreements.

The first sentence, that is to say that comprised in the five lines from "that it is expedient" down to "agreements," is quite complete in itself. It makes it apparent that the governor in council is asking for powers to make agreements with the provinces and to take from the consolidated revenue fund moneys for the purpose set out. The resolution goes on, however, to name other purposes, and it is not clear from the resolution whether these purposes are such as must in some way be related to the agreements made with the provinces. The resolution reads:

To provide for special requirements in the national parks and in the drought stricken areas of the province of Saskatchewan;

That one provision is ambiguous in itself. It is not clear from the reading of it whether it relates to special requirements for national parks, generally—parks in British Columbia and Manitoba, as well as in Saskatchewan—or whether it relates solely to national parks in Saskatchewan. As I read it, the English would relate exclusively to parks in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. BENNETT: I think there is only one park in Saskatchewan.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: The plural form is used in this instance.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then it is intended to go beyond the one province, although the terms used do not make that clear. It reads:

To provide for special requirements in the national parks and in the drought stricken areas of the province of Saskatchewan;

The Prime Minister has cleared up that point, and has indicated that there are two separate purposes, namely, to provide for special requirements in the national parks, and for special requirements in the drought-stricken areas of the province of Saskatchewan. Then another purpose is:

To assist in defraying the cost of the sale and distribution of products of field, farm, sea, river and mine;

That may be an entirely separate matter from anything relating to unemployment relief.

Mr. BENNETT: That was in the bill of last session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the bill of last session that power was given, but it was given only for unemployment relief purposes. The bill of last session was designated as one dealing with unemployment and farm relief, and I should like to know whether this particular provision is intended to be restricted in the same manner. If it were given another interpretation it would of course permit the government to bonus the products of field, farm, sea, river and mine for any purpose and in any connection. If such is the case it ought to have its place among some of the resolutions which have been brought down by the Minister of Finance in connection with the budget, rather than to form part of a resolution concerning unemployment and farm relief.

The next group of subjects mentioned relates more specifically to the loaning of money. There again it is not apparent whether the loans must appear first in some agreement, or whether this is a separate power which the administration is seeking to take to itself. The resolution reads:

To loan money to any province on such terms as may be agreed upon and to guarantee the repayment of moneys borrowed by such province and to assist any province in any way that may be deemed necessary or advisable to provide for the relief of distress and the support and maintenance of those requiring assistance,

Then, finally—

And to loan money to and guarantee the payment of money by any public corporation or undertaking.

That last clause is very wide, indeed. If it has no relation to the agreements that will be drawn between the federal government and the provinces, it is simply a request for authority from this house to enable the government to loan money to and guarantee the payment of money by any corporation or undertaking. Whether or not that has to do with the emergent condition existing at the present time, and is a part of unemployment and farm relief legislation, is not made clear. From the wording no one can say whether or not it is simply a provision to help any particular corporation or undertaking the administration may wish to help.

I do not desire to be critical of the resolution until I understand its terms perfectly, and see the bill that is based upon it. There will then be time to bring its features further to the attention of the house and the country. I ask the Prime Minister first to make clear whether or not the resolution is intended as an unemployment relief resolution, and whether all that is in it is to be construed as relating to the problem of unemployment and farm relief, or whether it is in the nature of a series of separate measures, one relating to unemployment and farm relief, and another relating to the powers of the government to loan moneys and to guarantee moneys loaned to provinces and corporations, and to make grants of public moneys to public corporations and undertakings. Further, is it also a measure to give the government power to assist in defraying the cost of the sale and distribution of products of the field, farm, sea, river and mine, wholly independent of the degree to which the actions of the government in that regard may be related to unemployment and farm relief.

When the bill is introduced hon. members on this side of the house will wish to discuss the matter at greater length. At the present time, however, so far as the principle of discretionary power is concerned, I should like to emphasize again that we protest as strongly as ever against the government being granted powers to take at its discretion from the consolidated revenue fund of the country, without limitation and with but little in the way of designation of the uses to which they are to be put, whatever moneys are required for the several purposes herein mentioned.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the resolution stands in the name of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) who will be prepared to answer the questions asked when the resolution is in committee. However in the light of the statements just made by the leader of the opposition it seems fitting that I should make a few observations.

At the meeting of the representatives of all the provinces of Canada held in this city a few days ago we discussed fully the question as to how they considered it would be best to deal with the future. They were most emphatic in their expression of the opinion that no good purpose would be served by stating an amount in any bill of this character. One premier said that he objected strenuously to that being done, because it would place him in the embarrassing position of endeavouring always to have it said that he had obtained his full share of the money. Other representatives expressed similar opinions.

As to the soundness of the view of the leader of the opposition to the effect that a blank cheque is undesirable I have nothing to add to what I have said on previous occasions. It is not the general principle upon which parliaments or legislatures proceed. However in the cases to which I referred some time ago, without going over them again, parliament has found it necessary at times to do so. That is, the limitation must be one which in times of emergency is imposed by reason of the financial condition of the country itself. No government will undertake financial obligations that it cannot for the moment meet, and the experience we have had during the past year makes it abundantly clear that the powers sought must in some way be provided to enable the situation which has developed in some of the provinces to be met. The provinces in the west believe they will be able to meet their ordinary expenditures during the present year. They have endeavoured to adjust their budgets to meet their necessities, and have done that by increasing taxation and reducing appropriations.

The considered opinion expressed the other day at the conference was that while in some instances they might fall short of the full realization of their hopes, they expected they would balance their budgets. In the meantime, however, for reasons I shall not again state, it is desirable that the credit of the dominion should be sustained and protected by protecting and sustaining the credit of the provinces. During the progress of the discussion on this measure, when it becomes a bill in committee, full information will be given as to the amount of money we have had to advance to the provinces.

I am not unmindful that the leader of the opposition has suggested that a conference might have been held between the dominion and the provinces dealing with these financial problems. But the provinces affected have at the moment expressed the view that they are not in a position to readjust their whole field of taxation, and we certainly are not in a position to contemplate the changes that some of them would like us to make. But one fact is apparent, that the financial burden of most of the provincial legislatures has become well-nigh intolerable on their respective populations. For instance, you have now in some parts of this country two income taxes, provincial and federal; you have two income taxes in some provinces by reason of cities imposing income tax. It is not calculated to improve our position abroad by having such a burden of taxation imposed upon the people of the country. Protests, of course, have been made on the theory that the income tax should be a tax collected by only one government in the state—whether it be federal or provincial is a matter that has not yet been determined. For instance, on one occasion at a conference here it was urged by the provinces that they should be left free to collect taxes from individuals, and that the dominion should collect taxes from corporations. As the greater part of the income tax is paid by corporations and the portion of it paid by individuals is relatively small, these provinces thought that they might adjust the burden against individuals in such a way as to enable it to be more equitably borne than if there were an income tax against individuals by the dominion and also another by the provinces.

These are questions which I do not think any member of the house will conclude that we are in a very good position carefully to discuss and determine at this time. The provinces have had a very, very difficult experience, especially the newer provinces with a scattered population and large areas, and they felt that it was undesirable to place in a measure of this kind a sum of money that might be available for the purposes indicated in the resolution. I was not averse to it on general principles, but I do believe that they are sound in the objections which they take, and it is for that reason that this measure appears in the form in which it is.

The minister himself will explain to the committee the view of the provinces as to the undesirability of making contracts for public works on a large scale, or by municipalities rather than by the provinces themselves. Their financial situation that showed some sign of improvement, as I have indicated already, has not responded as was expected by reason of events in 1931, to which I have already referred. And so we are asking for power to advance money, if need be, to the provinces, by loans or guarantees, and it is not to be limited to purely unemployment purposes. It was not intended, at least in the bill, so to limit it. Some of the provinces expressed the view that while they do not expect to call upon us to any great extent, they may be compelled to do so. For instance, since we extended the operations of last year's act we have had to make substantial advances to some of the provinces to meet the difficulties of their financial situation. The minister will explain that when the house is considering the details of the bill.

With respect to the two matters mentioned by the leader of the opposition, namely, work in the national parks and relief in the province of Saskatchewan, I have only to observe that several of the western provinces are of the opinion that within the national parks there are opportunities for work to be done that might take from the cities and towns a substantial number of single men who would do some work for subsistence, plus an allowance that the provinces propose to make to them, and that that being a work which under our constitutional division of power devolves upon the federal government, we should be in a position to make a somewhat different agreement with respect to that than we would with respect to ordinary matters within provincial jurisdiction. I may illustrate it by pointing out that a highway is under construction from Jasper through to Banff. It is a purely scenic or tourist undertaking. Doubtless it will attract when it is finished within four or five years hence large numbers of people to this country, and will assist very materially, I believe, in adjusting the adverse balance of trade. The experience has been that the tourist trade is the largest invisible item that we have. To that extent we are doing some productive work when we undertake such a construction program. But in that matter the provinces would feel that their contribution is somewhat different from what it would be under normal conditions.

The question of assisting to defray the cost of the sale and distribution of the products of field, farm, sea, river and mine was in last year's legislation. It might or might not technically be regarded as a relief provision. I say frankly to the right hon. gentleman that last year I had not so regarded it. Primarily it was intended to enable us to deal with financial difficulties that might be experienced with the pools in obtaining from the banks adequate credit if they had the large crop that they expected, and inasmuch as their physical assets of elevators and terminals had been mortgaged, we took that power last session; we exercised it also because the crop was somewhat larger than expected. Had that power not been there we would have been placed in a difficulty by reason of the circumstances which I have already explained to the house. When the provision was made last session, we made it large enough to meet a situation that might conceivably develop in respect to matters other than those covered by the operations of the pools.

The next items, particularly the last two, deal with the question generally of providing credit facilities if they become necessary. I can only say this to the house at the moment. It is perhaps known to every one that in the United States it became necessary to create a credit corporation for the purpose of meeting a situation which happily has not reached anything like the proportions in this country that it has there. I endeavoured the other evening to point out to this house—I am afraid I did not succeed as I should have liked—the seriousness of the situation that immediately confronts the people of the North American continent, arising not from lack of wealth, but from conditions to which I alluded, because there has been such a tremendous shrinkage in values—the assets of the financial institutions having been to no inconsiderable extent, especially in the great republic, loaned on securities that are no longer active, but are now of the category, of what might be called frozen assets—that any government seized with a sense of responsibility must, I think, anticipate the possibility of having to deal with a situation in which the same attitude of mind may be taken as was taken in the United States. The minister has in his hand a report for the first three months of this year, January, February and March, of the operations of that corporation, and it is rather an illuminating document. He will make reference to it as the discussion in committee proceeds, if the questions necessitate it being done. I thought—at least, it is the view that the government has—that it would best conduce to the satisfactory disposition of the situation, having regard to the immediate demands of the moment and what we conceive may be the possible demands of the future—and which we hope will not be made upon us—if we place upon the statute books legislation that will enable the government to meet the difficulties which may arise. That is the purpose at least of the provisions at the end of the resolution.

The minister is precluded by the rules from speaking again at the moment, but what he had in his mind—if I might so state from what he said to me before we came into the chamber—was that if the house went into committee of the whole on this resolution a very frank and full discussion in the way of constructive suggestions on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite might take place, and that the resolution would not be moved out of committee to-day, but after discussion had taken place for some little time the minister would move that the committee rise, and the bill will be predicated upon what is believed to be the general view of the house as to the measure that will meet the exceptional and emergent conditions under which we are gathered together at this moment.

While I do not desire to be regarded as an alarmist in any sense, I am one who tries to measure as best I may the play of forces that have to do with conditions in a country such as this, and the influence of the conditions prevailing over one-half of this continent is unhappily too frequently reflected in our own country. If conditions which now exist should work in a way which is conceivable a very great strain would be placed upon our whole financial structure, and we only seek from the house authority to meet that emergent condition. If on the other hand conditions operate as we hope, and as many of us believe that they will, then we do not desire to exercise that power. But we believe it would not be the wish of any member of this house, or of the people of Canada, that if these conditions should arise, in the interval of time before the house could be called to meet that emergency we should not be able to take some measures to alleviate conditions and support the financial structure of the country.

I am not going to dwell upon the difficulties. I only say again to the members of this house that if they had had the experience that unhappily has been mine from September, 1930, to the present moment in connection with the whole financial operations of this country, with falling revenues—perhaps attributable to the fact that the customs revenues are lower, though there is a difference of opinion as to that—I know they would realize that the gravity of the situation is not wholly reflected by the figures, but that conditions are now operating in this country the ultimate direction of which we are not able to control. Subject as we are to the currents and influences of world conditions, we can only ask that the house should frankly express its opinion when this measure is in committee of the whole, and if I might venture to do so I would suggest that this be done in no narrow party sense but rather in the larger sense of doing what is purely an emergency act. We do not ask this in order to have powers conferred upon the executive, but merely to enable your country and mine, at a moment of stress and strain, to function if that stress and strain becomes so exceptional as to demand the exercise of these powers. If, without prejudice to any rights, the house might go into committee, the minister could deal with every phase of this matter as freely as possible, as I have said it is not the intention to submit the bill to the house until after the discussion has taken place on the resolution standing in the name of the minister.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I should like to ask the Prime Minister one question. What is meant by the words "public corporation" in this resolution?

Mr. BENNETT: They mean just what the words "public corporation" mean in law, a corporation in which the public is interested, as distinguished from a private corporation.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Such as an insurance company?

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose there are some insurance companies which are family corporations; I do not know, but the use of the word "public" broadly and generally with respect to a corporation means one whose shares and ownership are in the hands of the public, as distinguished from private individuals.

Mr. POWER: Consisting of more than thirty-five persons.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I am sure the procedure which the Prime Minister has outlined to be followed in connection with this measure is very satisfactory to many of us in this house. However, there are one or two matters of general importance which I think might be considered at this stage. We have not been informed whether or not this is the only measure dealing with relief that is to be brought down this session, but I presume it is. If that is so it seems to me right that at this stage we should consider the whole question of the method of relief.

We have been given no report as to what took place at the conference between the Dominion and provincial governments, but some of the representatives of provincial governments have given indications, as they have gone back home, that there is to be a radical change in the whole method of relief and that public works are to be given up, with direct relief to be adopted as a principle. If that is so it seems a very serious matter indeed, and one that should be dealt with by this house. I can understand very well that when it comes to details the administration will have to arrange matters with the various provinces; I can understand that there is something to be said for leaving the amount to be expended rather indefinite, so there will not be rivalry on the part of the provinces. But as to method I do think it would be disastrous if we were to give up the idea of anything in the nature of unemployment insurance or anything in the nature of extensive public works and settle upon what is after all the very worst type of dole, the mere giving of relief. The Prime Minister will agree that the dole is bad; he has so expressed himself, yet I think that is what is involved.

I can quite understand that the provinces and the municipalities themselves are not in a position to carry on extensive public works. I know that is true of the western provinces, but that does not altogether settle the matter, because if necessary the Dominion itself still has the resources with which to carry on public works, even though these are located within the bounds of the different provinces. When we consider the welfare of the men, women and children involved in this problem of unemployment it does seem that we should not let our relief scheme degenerate into mere assistance in the form of doles.

Now let me give one or two examples. The other day in the west we had the suggestion that some assistance should be given the municipalities and provinces that were attempting to establish people on the land. Personally I do not think that such a scheme is a solution of the economic problem involved, but I do think it might be considered a better relief scheme than simply the handing out of doles. It ought to be made clear to us whether or not the policy of this government contemplates entering into arrangements with the provincial governments with regard to a relief scheme of that kind. The Prime Minister has indicated that possibly some special arrangement might be entered into with regard to unemployed single men who might be sent out into our parks or highways. I was very glad indeed to hear him make that statement, but it seems to me that kind of policy might be very considerably extended. For example, recently in the city of Ottawa a plan has been proposed by the Canadian Red Cross to place a number of these men on a farm where they might at least earn their own subsistence and thus be saved from the demoralizing tendencies that we all know exist in connection with our relief agencies. I should hope that it might be possible to extend this principle of providing work for men, other than the large groups of single men who are now congregated in a few of the large western cities.

Just one other matter. The resolution gives authority to loan money to any province on such terms as may be agreed upon. One province at least has expressed one way in which it would like to arrange this matter of loans, and I think this is particularly significant as following the episode in connection with the provincial savings office of Manitoba. I quote from the votes and proceedings of the legislative assembly of Manitoba of Thursday, April 14, 1932, the following resolution:

> That whereas, under the existing federal legislation, the provinces have not the right to establish banks;
> Whereas, the payment of interest on money borrowed from the banks, and elsewhere, has reached such proportions as to absorb a heavy percentage of provincial revenue;
> Whereas financial policy is closely related with the wellbeing of the people as a whole; and,
> Whereas the creation of a bank under provincial control would, to some extent, facilitate the financial transactions of the government of the province;
> Therefore be it resolved, that this legislature urge the federal government, at the present session of parliament, to amend The Finance Act and The Bank Act so as to enable any province so desiring, the right to establish a provincial bank, and to enable the Minister of Finance of the federal government to make advances of currency to the provinces of Canada upon pledges of security, in a manner similar to existing power to make advances to existing banks.

I would ask the Prime Minister whether he has received this resolution passed by the legislature of Manitoba, and whether or not his government has in contemplation any revision of the Bank Act or of the Finance Act along the lines requested.

Mr. BENNETT: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will answer the hon. gentleman's question at once. First, banks and banking under our constitution, section 91, are solely within the jurisdiction of this parliament, to the exclusion of provincial power; secondly, if the province of Manitoba desires to establish a bank it can, under the provisions of the Bank Act, incorporate a bank in this parliament, or direct that to be done, and establish such bank in the manner prescribed by the Bank Act; and, thirdly, this parliament could not confer the power sought except by an amendment to the constitution itself, if by the resolution in question it is intended that we should confer upon a province power which the British North America Act declares belongs exclusively to the dominion and which the dominion cannot by mere legislation pass on to a province. I had received a copy of the resolution, transmitted through official sources, and the answer which I have roughly drafted and will forward is the answer which I have now given. But it does seem idle that a legislature should waste its time passing resolutions that this parliament should exercise an unconstitutional power for the purpose of endeavouring to confer an unconstitutional authority upon a body which, under our constitution, cannot exercise it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask whether it would not be possible, without any violation of the constitution, that the provinces should be given the same right under the Finance Act that is now possessed by the banks?

Mr. BENNETT: No, because they are not capable of supplying the security under which that power is exercised. I will give the hon. gentleman a concrete case. The banks are now overloaded with the securities of the province to which he refers, and under the provisions of the Finance Act they could only grant the banks a limited amount on the deposit of these securities; and the treasury board has to fix the extent to which the advances could be made from time to time, having regard to the solvency and credit conditions that obtain in the province in question. I think the hon. gentleman will realize that if the power he mentions were exercised, the whole financial structure would be destroyed over night. I may add that the question of the appointment of commissions was discussed with the representatives of the provinces, and the minister will give to the committee the information in that regard which he mentioned the other day.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Arthurs in the chair.

Mr. POWER: I do not see anywhere, in the authority which it is proposed to confer upon the governor in council, the right taken by the government to carry on with purely federal public works.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not there.

Mr. POWER: Am I to understand that that is done because it is not the policy of the government to carry on with purely federal public works other than those which have been voted in the estimates?

Mr. BENNETT: That is right.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the Minister of Labour inform the committee whether there are likely to be any changes in the attitude of the government towards the cost of relief as between the federal and the provincial governments?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Perhaps at this stage I might make some general observations with respect to this resolution, in order to convey to the committee shortly what the present situation is, as I believe it to be with the information I have at hand. I trust the committee will bear with me while I briefly review the work with respect to unemployment and farm relief since the first legislation of 1930. The first legislation became effective in 1930, and the total amount that has been spent up to date through the agency of the federal government, the provincial governments and the municipalities, is approximately $150,000,000. This, of course, is the combined expenditure of the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities.

The total amount contributed by the Dominion government in respect to this sum is a little over $48,000,000. The separation of the figures pertaining to the provinces and the municipalities is not at the moment complete. In some cases the division between the provinces and the municipalities is based on the cost of labour only, and until accounts are received it is not possible to arrive at the exact figure. However, the total contribution of the municipalities and the provinces to the total expenditure of approximately $150,000,000, is slightly over $100,000,000.

In connection with the work carried out up to March 31, I may say that in a measure this is reflected in the report of the director of unemployment relief tabled some weeks ago. In bringing this report up to date, it is shown that employment has been given to 741,465 different individuals. Of course, this is for varying periods of time. Of that number, 404,823 have been given employment since September, 1931, and 336,642 were given employment under the legislation of 1930. Under the 1930 act 7,500,000 man-days of work were provided, and to March 31, under the 1931-32 act, approximately 10,000,000 man-days, a total of about 17,500,000. The average wage paid would not be very informative as the rates vary from those paid to labourers in remote rural districts to those paid to skilled mechanics in the industrial centres.

In addition to the expenditures made for public works, as previously referred to, the Dominion government has contributed to direct relief under the 1930 and 1931-32 legislation. The basis of contribution has been that the Dominion government pays one-third of the municipal expenditures, the provinces also paying one-third. In connection with unorganized districts where the provinces had to bear the full load, the Dominion government pays 50 per cent and the provinces the balance. This statement may be qualified with respect to those areas commonly known as the dried out or drought areas in southern Saskatchewan, which were dealt with on a different basis. The contribution of the federal government for direct relief under the 1930 act was $3,475,972; the total expenditure by the municipalities and provinces was in the neighbourhood—this figure is only approximate, but I believe it is fairly correct—of $10,000,000. Under the 1931-32 act the dominion has paid out in direct relief a total of $3,146,738. This is the dominion's contribution to date in respect of direct relief to a total expenditure which probably amounts to—again this figure is approximate, but I believe it is fairly accurate—$12,000,000. This does not include the amounts advanced to the Saskatchewan relief commission.

The accounts do not reach the federal government immediately after the expenditures have been incurred, and the total expenditure for direct relief made by the provinces and the municipalities can only be estimated at the moment. Accounts are being received daily and it can be readily understood that each succeeding day shows a change in the total. The setup of the relief commission in Saskatchewan is purely a provincial one and to enable the commission to carry on funds have been supplied to the province by way of loans from the Dominion government. In those areas that have suffered a three year successive crop failure and representing over 76 municipalities, the Dominion government has disbursed 100 per cent of the relief. In those areas where the conditions were not so acute and the situation not so difficult, the Dominion government has contributed 50 per cent. The accounts of the Saskatchewan relief commission are being audited, but the report for the month ending March 31 indicates that the total expenditures by the relief commission to that date totalled approximately $8,745,822.80. Relief has been given to 55,374 heads of families who had 249,183 dependents. Glancing at these figures hon. members can readily understand the magnitude of the work and the task which confronted those charged with the administration of relief in those areas. In addition there were individual cases numbering 278, so that the total number given relief through the Saskatchewan relief commission was 304,835. Up to March 31, the expenditures of the commission include approximately $500,000 for seed grain, but the April accounts will presumably indicate a further and larger expenditure in this connection. I believe the advances for seed grain—I can readily confirm this through the Department of Finance—have been $4,000,000.

The matter has been fairly well discussed in this chamber and I feel sure that hon. members are aware of the difficulties which confronted the provinces with respect to discharging their external obligations. Without assistance from the federal government, the provinces were unable to take care of loans falling due. In addition to loans made to the provinces in respect of their external obligations, further loans were made to enable them to pay their share of the relief contributions, above referred to, and in addition the Dominion government also advanced its agreed-upon contribution, crediting to these loans and advances the accounts as they were received and audited.

When a province—this refers to the western provinces—found itself unable, under the terms of the agreement entered into, to contribute its share of the moneys for relief and employment, the Dominion government advanced to such province not only the percentage which we had contracted with the province to pay, but also the province's portion of the contribution, taking as security provincial treasury bills which bore a rate of interest which equated the interest the dominion had to pay. I believe the rate was 4½ per cent. Loans and advances were thus made to five provinces—British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario. The Ontario advance was really not an advance for any considerable duration, covering only a few days while accounts were being adjusted. The standing of the loans and advances at the present time is as follows:

The total loans and advances made to the provinces aggregate $43,418,499.87. To Ontario there was advanced $2,500,000. This total sum has been retired by accounts credited to the advance. The advance stood for only a few days, and was made pending federal payments which were then under way and pending the auditing of the accounts.

To Manitoba there was advanced $5,594,-314.67, against which there has been credited $1,198,064.48, leaving the present outstanding balance of Manitoba's loan $4,396,250.19.

The total advance for Saskatchewan was $12,534,934.12, against which accounts credited amount to $1,100,592.66, leaving a balance of $11,434,341.46. In addition to this $12,534,-934.12 there has been advanced to the Saskatchewan Relief Commission, including the $4,000,000 which was advanced recently for seed grain, $9,250,000.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Is the total advance for Saskatchewan, including the relief commission, $21,000,000?

Mr. GORDON: Approximately so. That includes the amount which the Dominion government is committed to advance to the province under the agreement.

The total advances to Alberta were $6,142,-586.39, against which accounts have been credited amounting to $1,044,845.95, leaving a balance of $5,097,740.44.

The total advances to British Columbia were $7,396,664.69, against which accounts have been credited to date amounting to $1,971,040.81, leaving a balance of $5,425,623.88.

From day to day, as hon. members know, as the accounts come in for payment and are approved in the office of the director of unemployment relief, the appropriate recommendation to council is made and I have endeavoured to lay on the table of the house daily the orders in council subsequently passed.

Mr. HEAPS: As of what date are the figures which have just been given by the minister to the committee?

Mr. GORDON: They are as nearly as possible up to date.

I am not going to burden the members of the committee with any discussion following the remarks made by the right hon. leader of the opposition with respect to whether or not by following the course which this government is presently adopting we are torturing the constitution or straining the sections of the British North America Act. I listened with a great deal of interest to the discussions which took place on this question when a similar resolution was before the house some time ago. I listened with interest because, as hon. members know, I have been for many years engaged in the practice of the legal profession, and I will not say by any means that the observations made by many members of this chamber on that question were not helpful and interesting; but I think we are beyond and past that at the moment. Whether or not the government was right then or whether or not the government is right now in connection with the constitutional aspect of the case, we have committed ourselves to this course, and by the success or failure of the efforts that we make we shall have to be judged.

I am not going into any laboured argument with respect to the method that should or should or should not be employed in order that on the one hand the greatest opportunity to work may be afforded to those who have an earnest desire to go to work, or on the other hand as to what this government in conjunction with the provinces and municipalities should do in order to afford relief to those who by reason of misadventure caused through present conditions find themselves in want and lacking the necessities of life. Under the agreements which were entered into with the provinces last year we approved the suggestions of the provinces with respect to supplying work throughout Canada through the medium of building necessary public buildings, to the extent sometimes of probably anticipating future needs, and in some cases, I will have to admit, future needs for some years to come. That was a huge undertaking, as hon. members will readily understand. Many of the municipalities, hundreds and thousands of them, although I have not the exact number at the moment, availed themselves of the opportunity to participate under those dominion-provincial agreements, and very large undertakings were started, jointly financed by the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion, pursuant to the terms of the agreements which are set out in the report as tabled. As time went on it became apparent that many municipalities and provinces in their programs of works were very likely to imperil their financial stability by reason of the works outlined. Some months ago I was quite anxious about that situation, and from time to time I had occasion to have interviews with the representatives of the various provinces in respect to it. Then this spring, as the minister in charge, I communicated with the premiers of the various provinces asking them to come to Ottawa to exchange views—they to give advice to this government and we to give advice to them—as to what methods should be employed in order that the greatest good could be accomplished with the least possible expenditure of money and casting the least possible burden upon the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion.

On April 8 the provincial premiers came to Ottawa, and on what remained of that day and throughout the following day the whole situation was considered with a view to checking up on the work accomplished and to formulate a course for the future. I think I am stating it fairly when I say the premiers and those representing the provinces were unanimous in the decision that the provinces and the municipalities within those provinces were financially unable for any length of time to carry on the program of public works projected, or to carry out the scheme formulated since the last session of parliament. Further, it was the opinion of provincial representatives and myself that there had been started public works, a portion of the cost of which would become a charge upon the municipalities and provinces, which probably should be discontinued, because the municipalities and provinces, and probably the dominion, would not be able to continue them.

Then we considered what could be done for those who would be destitute. Using the term "destitute" I refer to those who would become so if some opportunity for employment was not afforded, or if they did not find work themselves during a time when works might be discontinued. That situation was discussed at great length. At this point I should like to make an observation for the benefit of those who have the interest of labour at heart—and I believe that applies to all hon. members. Speaking to those hon. members who have given particular care and study to labour matters, I suggest that they do not harbour any feeling of anxiety with respect to the course which, with the exception of a few details, was agreed upon; I do not want them to think that the standards of living and of wage scales in this country are liable to be imperilled or endangered by reason of wages, or so-called wages—subsistence I call it—which may be paid to those who are out of employment and must be kept from destitution. In my view there is a vast difference between standards of living and wage scales, and relief to those who are suffering. I do not think there is any man in the Labour group who will not agree with me in that distinction.

The provinces proposed that wherever possible they should set up camps where work could be done, where men would not be left idle, places where requirements of food and other necessities would be given, and some amount of cash subsistence advanced by the dominion and the provinces. The number of men who would have to take advantage of such an arrangement is not capable of any accurate or nearly accurate determination. The provinces believe, however,—and I am not in disagreement with them,—that that is a course which might well now be followed. There are camps in the northern and near northern parts of Ontario where work is being carried on, where single men need have no fear that they will starve through lack of employment. Care can be taken of such men in those camps. Relief in the cities will be a subject of agreements to be made with the various provinces, if the legislation founded upon this resolution receives the favourable consideration of the house.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has spoken about the possibility of placing people upon the land. After listening to the conflicting viewpoints expressed in this chamber by those hon. members who know something about farming I am at a loss to know whether to-day a man should be on a farm or in a city. The majority of views as expressed would seem to indicate that no matter where a man may be, whether he be on a farm or in a city, in Canada or anywhere else in the world, he is in a very bad way.

Mr. MARCIL: On a farm he could grow something.

Mr. GORDON: Yes. I am not persuaded that there is no opportunity on the farms of Canada for those who are experienced in farm work, probably they would not make a fortune, but they would make something. In that connection, I noticed an editorial in the Toronto Globe which dealt with fortunes—a report of a meeting in the city of Hamilton addressed by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) in which he said that members of this government were all millionaires. That is a great compliment to myself. I know that in the years gone by probably it could be truthfully said that I was not a man without some wealth; at the present time I am afraid I would have to be described otherwise. But I have comfort in the thought that the only fortune worth anything to anybody is the fortune that you have spent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GORDON: A question was asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre with respect to giving persons with agricultural experience and a desire to go back upon the land an opportunity through the medium of legislation, which I trust will be favourably received by this chamber, and which has been under consideration, I think, by members of all stripes of political opinion. I can only repeat what I said a few days ago when the immigration estimates were before the house, that having reviewed the efforts of the past with respect to state-aided colonization, I am not at all persuaded that any such scheme should be entered into by the federal government. There are various reasons I could advance why I think that sort of scheme is unsound. I may be pardoned if I refer to the constitution again. Placing people upon the land within a province is peculiarly something for the province itself to attend to. I think there need be no argument about that. The reason why the Dominion government embarked upon the scheme of soldier settlement is well known to all members. I will not condemn that scheme in its entirety; no one could; but there were many cases, I am afraid, where those who went upon the land had not the agricultural experience nor any real desire to do so—if they could identify the desire by reason of their past. That in a measure spelled their ultimate misfortune, and perhaps resulted in their agreements being rescinded. Then again, as I have said before in this chamber, I believe that if a person starts in on any piece of land where the element of speculation is in large measure reduced to a minimum, and does so for the primary purpose of being able to make a livelihood, if he is saddled with any considerable debt that very debt will spell his ultimate disaster. Because I do not think, taking year in and year out, there is any very considerable number of farmers who combine the capacity to operate a farm successfully with that knowledge of finance which will enable them to discharge any considerable debt from the products of their farms. But I do think there are many people in Canada who have been brought up on the farm—and I am sure everyone recognizes this—who went to the industrial centres attracted by the high wages prevailing in recent years; and there is another class, the sons and daughters of farmers who as they grew up finding there was not room for them on one homestead drifted into the cities. I have concluded from the great number of communications I have received from all parts of Canada that there is such a class of people to-day who would gladly go back to a farm. They have no money and are depending upon direct relief, either through the agency of the city in which they live, through provincial governments, through this government, or through all three combined, or through their church or some benevolent society. When I say "go back to a farm" that is probably a misnomer. If we think it over carefully we may conclude that the better expression would be "go forward to a farm," because I think that probably when the last analysis is made if Canada is to survive—and I am just as confident as I am standing here that Canada will survive—in large measure it will be by reason, as was said in this house some years ago, of the products of the first six inches of her soil.

Mr. NEILL: In connection with the minister's remarks, I notice the front page of the morning's papers carries an announcement of a scheme favoured by himself to enable families to go on the land. Is that some misunderstanding?

Mr. GORDON: I am just coming to it. I have had this question up a number of times during the past year. Our efforts, such as they were, were not devoted to dangling a loan or a gratuity before people to induce them to go forward to the land, but rather to place before people who had gone to the towns and the cities—people who had formerly been on the land and still had some money, but were out of employment and saw their little fund dwindling in rent and other expenses that are associated with urban life, and in whose family circle there was a desire to preserve what they had and reestablish themselves—I say our efforts were directed to placing before those people the desirability of returning to the land. That is what the colonization branch of the department has devoted itself to up to the present time. I do not want to boast about these things, because it is only one's duty to do the best one can, but if through good luck one happens to have some measure of success perhaps he may be pardoned for mentioning it in the process of spreading upon the record the facts with regard to the question of unemployment generally. The forces at work did meet with a measure of success. I believe, at least to a large measure, we have exhausted that class of people, but there is the other class who know how to farm, who want to go back to the farm and who are on direct relief. The government have concluded that instead of devoting our share of direct relief to that class of people we will meet the proposals of such of the provinces as care to enter into that scheme, and we are ready to enter into an agreement with those provinces on terms such as may be agreed upon. I trust that this legislation will not be too long delayed, though I do not say that for the purpose of trying to restrict discussion, because I would like very much to have the views of hon. members on all angles of this subject. If the provinces still think this a sound proposal, the government is ready to devote what would be its share of direct relief to a fund to be set up by the municipality affected—and this has been the proposal from some of the provinces—and contributed to by the province and any other agency that cares to take an interest in solving this problem of unemployment. I think in doing this we will not be embarking upon any unsound principle.

Mr. POWER: Before the minister leaves that point I should like to ask a question. Is it the intention of the government simply to take the money which would be devoted to direct relief, we will say $3 or $4 or $5 a week, as the case may be, and instead of giving that to the man if he remains in the city, give it to him if he goes on the land? Is that what the settlement scheme amounts to?

Mr. GORDON: I was going to say that the details and the agreements that are in contemplation have not been worked out. The western provinces have submitted varying proposals, all along the same line. My own view, whether or not the provinces agree with me—and as hon. gentlemen know conditions differ in various provinces—is that this government might well capitalize, for some period in the future, the sum of money which we feel we will be obliged to pay for direct relief, and make that fund available together with the funds the province and municipality affected may be able to subscribe in order that the family may be placed upon some available land. Of necessity the provinces will have to undertake the administration of such a scheme, and I believe they are very willing to do so, but great care will have to be observed to see that wherever possible the lands upon which those people go are crown lands, so that the fund available will not be exhausted by having to purchase land from someone else. I can well imagine that if we start out with a plan under which these funds would be hung up, then there would be at least one class in Canada who would not be ranked among the unemployed; they would be the real estate agents. That will have to be avoided.

Mr. POWER: If I correctly understand the suggestion of the minister it is this, that to those who wish to go on the land there will be given a lump sum, we will say the relief for ten, twelve, fifteen or twenty weeks capitalized, with which it is proposed they shall buy whatever may be necessary in the way of implements or live stock, or perhaps that they shall pay their transportation expenses to the land, but in addition I suppose the minister believes that he will have to continue paying relief to these families after they get on the land until such time as they obtain a crop, so those who go on the land will receive a good deal more than those who stay in the cities. Is that the proposal?

Mr. GORDON: I would scarcely subscribe to that; the provincial premiers with whom I have had occasion to discuss the matter did not think so. For instance, in the province of Manitoba they believe that with a fund of $600, contributed from the three sources, a family can get along. Of course the lump sum would not be given to a man going out on the farm; that would be absurd. The proposal is that each province should administer such funds under commissions set up by the separate governments. I may say that in discussing the question of administering relief by commissions the premiers of the provinces concluded, with great unanimity, that under the provincial machinery already at hand they could administer the funds perhaps better than by a commission set up for the purpose, because the advice of such men as might be appointed to these commissions is always available. So far as this government is concerned I have heard—and I presume other members have heard also—that these relief funds are being used in this or that province, which may be under a Liberal or Conservative or Progressive government, for the benefit of the supporters of that government and to the exclusion of those who are not of the same political faith. I may tell hon. members of this chamber that I will need a lot of convincing before I will believe that at a time like this there is a single premier of any province of this country who would turn aside a worthy, needy, destitute person because of his political persuasion, his religion or anything else. I do not believe it.

Mr. POWER: But what about the definite engagement entered into between the federal government as represented by the minister and the government of the province of Quebec, wherein it is laid down that the work shall be divided fifty-fifty on a political basis? The minister knows that on certain road work in the province of Quebec it was understood between the representatives of the federal government and the representatives of the provincial government that where the federal government supplied fifty per cent of the funds there should be fifty per cent Conservatives employed. This is a new kind of non-partisan arrangement. I have been told, and I have every reason to believe it to be true, that in the Lake St. John district, where they were constructing a portion of the trans-Canada highway, they had to build two wings to the camp, a wing for the Conservatives and a wing for the Liberals. The inspectors appointed by the federal government were appointed to see that the Conservatives got fifty per cent of the work and supplied fifty per cent of the material. More than that, they had to have two foremen, one Liberal and one Conservative; two timekeepers, two chore boys and two cooks, for fear that the good Tory workmen would have to eat Liberal pork and beans. I think the minister knows that; I am not stating this by way of criticism, but I understand it is a fact. I have some files here to show that federal inspectors have written to certain municipalities to tell them that they understand that up to the present seventy-five per cent Liberals have been employed, and that now the municipalities will have to turn around and employ seventy-five per cent Tories in order to make up for the surplus of Liberals employed before. That seems to me to be supremely ridiculous. I think I can show official letters to that effect. It is ridiculous when we are dealing with matters of unemployment. I am not bringing this up in any offensive sense.

Mr. JACOBS: Surely that is not in writing; it must be a gentleman's agreement.

Mr. POWER: It was well understood; I do not think there is any doubt about it. The minister will admit that this was one of the conditions laid down with the province of Quebec last autumn, when that province received assistance in building the transcontinental highway, that fifty per cent of the material and fifty per cent of the labour should be supplied by the Conservatives and fifty per cent by the Liberals.

Mr. JACOBS: Was that agreed to by Mr. Taschereau? Was he a party to it?

Mr. POWER: Certainly; Premier Taschereau had no objection. He was getting fifty per cent from the federal government and he said, "If that is the condition under which you want us to carry on, well and good."

An hon. MEMBER: Was it his stipulation?

Mr. POWER: I understood the stipulation came from the other side of the house. Up to that time these works had been carried on by the provincial government, and in that province there has not been much question about fifty per cent Tories; we were not bothered with political questions at all. It was only when the federal government decided to grant some money that they thought they were entitled to a share. I was told of a municipality in Gaspé where a $2,000 grant was made to the municipality. The federal inspector said, "How many persons are employed here?" They replied, "One hundred." He said then, "How many Tories?" and they told him there were only ten Tories unemployed in the whole village. He then said, "That is too bad, but you will have to fire the ninety Liberals and bring me ninety Tories from some other parish and we will do that until such time as the money is exhausted." Now, we hear endless stories of that kind, and I sincerely hope that under the new scheme that sort of thing will not happen again.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What about the Labour party or the Farmer party?

Mr. POWER: That is another difficulty. I am not talking about the Farmer party. The difficulty is that the well to do farmers worked on unemployment relief while unfortunate labourers in the village did not get any jobs at all.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Have you well to do farmers down there?

Mr. POWER: We had up to a year or so ago.

Mr. NEILL: If the fifty-fifty scheme could be extended to British Columbia, it would at least be better than last year's methods.

Mr. POWER: In the villages in our province there are a large number of rentiers; usually they take up residence in the village after they have retired from farming. They are retired farmers who have considerable money, or at least suffiicent money to live on. We also have the wealthy class of farmers immediately surrounding the villages and who to a large extent are the political leaders on one side or the other. When these unemployment relief moneys came to be distributed, the first to benefit were the rentiers. who, it is true, are unemployed, not having worked for years, because, as I say, they are retired farmers. They were the first unemployed who got jobs; and under the system that was in vogue the second group to get employment were naturally the political leaders of both parties. If the Liberals had fifty per cent of the work, they naturally thought, knowing the generosity of their Conservative friends, that the Conservatives would look after the poor unfortunates who had no jobs, and accordingly they took their most important men and, to get political kudos, gave them jobs. Unfortunately the Conservatives, I imagine, followed the same line of action. The result was that the labourers, the poor people in the villages, got no work, while the wealthy, important people, prominent from the political standpoint, got all the work. That should be corrected, and I do not know how we are going to overcome such a situation so long as we follow what I might call the bipartisan principle. After all, political parties are made up of human beings like anyone else, and they will naturally, if they are not charged with the direct responsibility of looking after unemployment, do what they can to help themselves. I commend that thought to the minister's consideration.

Mr. GORDON: I have no doubt that in the administration of a fund like this there will be some abuses in some sections of each province. These abuses will crop up and it is very difficult to administer such a statute as this without having such things arise. I know of my own personal knowledge of a number of individual cases where men who did not need employment registered as unemployed. It happened to be in a town in the older part of Ontario with which I was pretty well acquainted, and I inquired about these men who had registered. To my certain knowledge they had been unemployed for ten or fifteen years; they were living on their income. Nevertheless they were unemployed. They registered but they did not get employment. I do not know whether it was a desire to be thrifty that inspired them to overlook the fact that there were other people, without any income and without employment, whom it was intended to assist. I do not think I am overestimating it when I say that there are tens of thousands registered as unemployed who really, in the sense of being unemployed as we understand it, are certainly not unemployed. They are not without work in that sense, they are not destitute, and they are not at all in the position of those whom it is intended to help. With respect to what the hon. member for Quebec South has said, I do not know of any agreement with the province of Quebec regarding the supervision of work. There might have been some written agreement, but if there was an agreement, either written or verbal—

Mr. POWER: I do not know whether it is written or verbal.

Mr. GORDON: I suppose the premier or the government of Quebec agreed to the plan. Personally I can only reaffirm what I said before. I cannot be persuaded that the premier of any province in this country is going to deny to any needy, worthy and destitute person, the benefits which may flow from the legislation of that province or of this government. I may be quite unsophisticated, not having been in politics very long and being a newcomer to this chamber. For that reason I may not quite appreciate the refinements—and I use that word advisedly—of political life. But so long as I can, I should like to believe that those who administer the public affairs of this country and of the provinces, regardless of political complexion, will adopt no attitude that would be unfair, indeed cruel, to those who are entitled to help from this government, from the provinces or from the municipalities.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think the committee is entitled to know whether there is an actual arrangement along the lines indicated by the hon. member for Quebec South. The minister is in charge of the department and he ought to know whether there is such an arrangement.

Mr. GORDON: I will give the hon. member the benefit of all I do know about it, and it is this. In the working out of the legislation in each province it was considered advisable in the opinion of the government and in the opinion of the provinces that some representative of the federal government should be appointed to survey the work going on and the method employed in connection with the funds being contributed, not only by this government but by others. Reports are made almost daily as to the conditions prevailing in different localities and as to the way the work is being carried on. I shall be glad to look up this information before this debate is closed and give detailed information to the hon. member with respect to whether or not there exists such an agreement as has been suggested.

Mr. MARCIL: I had the pleasure some time ago of sending to the minister a copy of a resolution passed by the county council of my constituency asking for an extension of time to carry on works authorized by this and the provincial governments. These works have not been proceeded with owing to climatic conditions and it will not be possible to proceed with their completion until May or perhaps June. I should like to know what consideration has been given to this request and whether or not everything is to be dropped on May 1? I might add that the county council represents all the municipalities in the county.

Mr. GORDON: I was just coming to the point raised by the hon. member. At the conference held on April 9 with the provincial premiers and where, as I have said, there was a degree of unanimity as to the course to be pursued with respect to works which were under way or to be dropped, a conclusion was reached which was reflected in a telegram despatched to the premiers of the provinces. Perhaps I should read this telegram in order that it may go upon record. It reads:

Referring to clause 13 of agreement between Dominion and province providing that all works shall be completed not later than first day of May, 1932, would inform you with regard to extensions of time beyond this date as follows:

Firstly, the time for concluding all works presently under way and not capable of being finished before first of May next may be extended to permit of such works being finished provided that such works are, in the opinion of the provincial and federal governments, of such a kind and character that the stopping of same would cause loss by reason of their non-completion, for example in the case of buildings, sewers and works of like character;

Secondly, where contractual undischarged obligations under entire contracts exist, the time for completing such works in order to fulfil such contracts and discharge such obligations may be extended;

Thirdly, works, such as roadwork, will be discontinued on the present basis and following your expression of view at recent conference between provinces and Dominion, the Dominion agrees to your proposal to contribute under agreements to be hereinafter entered into, toward direct relief and subsistence.

That statement is founded upon the assumption that this house will agree in the legislation presently to be brought down.

Would request you forward list of schedules recommended for extension soon as possible with dates to which extension is desired so that same may be considered and formal approval given such as approved.

At the time of the conference the premier of Quebec suggested that his province would grant assistance towards the carrying out of the ideas contained in the telegram I have just read, and stated that he would have a representative from his province come to Ottawa in order that we might have the benefit of his guidance and advice. On the day before this telegram was despatched, I addressed the following letter to the premier of Quebec:

You will recall that when we had the conference with the various provincial representatives you suggested that in order to minimize as far as possible the carrying on of works under the present program passed the end of this month, you would send a representative of your government to Ottawa to cooperate with the officials of my department in order to detail what works should be completed and what works could be abandoned.

I have given this matter some thought since the conference and I am persuaded that your suggestion is a good one. I would be pleased, therefore, if you would send a representative of your government who could check over works presently in hand in the province of Quebec with the officials of my department so that we may have the benefit of your representative's advice as to what works must be concluded, and what works may be set aside.

Under date of April 23 I received the following answer both to my telegram and letter:

I duly received your telegram of the 21st and your letter of the 20th instant, and beg to confirm the telegram which I sent you this morning, and which reads as follows:

"Letter and telegram received. We approve of general plan as outlined by you. Writing."

I think that your plan, as detailed in your letter, is on the lines which were discussed at the late conference. We are having prepared a list of the works actually commenced in our province and, as soon as completed, early next week, a representative of our province will go to Ottawa to discuss that matter with your officers.

Yours sincerely,
L. A. Taschereau.

The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) can see the course which has been outlined. Of course, I am not acquainted with the situation in the hon. member's constituency to which he refers, but I have no doubt that the provincial government is well acquainted with this situation and that it can be taken up with and satisfactorily disposed of by the officers of my department and the official from Quebec.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the minister be kind enough to bring down a copy of the list in connection with Quebec?

Mr. GORDON: I shall be very glad to show the hon. member the list.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister referred to the willingness of the government to contribute to a fund which any province might be willing to raise for the purpose of restoring ex-farmers to the land. The resolution states that the government shall have power to loan money to any province for any purpose whatsoever. Are we to understand that the government can loan money to a province in order to establish a man on the land and then make its own contribution?

Mr. GORDON: This government would not loan money to a province in order to enable it to pay its share unless the province, like some of the western provinces, found itself to be in such a position financially, as to be unable to pay its share. If agreements can be made with the provinces, we are prepared to capitalize for a period ahead. As I said, one of the provinces has suggested that the fund should not be less than, I think, $400; another has suggested $500 and another, $600. They were very modest amounts. In the case of a family on direct relief, a family selected I trust by a body of people who understand something about farming and who will prepare a list free of poor selections, we will capitalize ahead the sum we feel we would have to pay as a contribution for direct relief, and the dominion, the province and the municipality affected will contribute in equal parts. That is the present scheme, although it has not been reduced to writing with any of the provinces. The whole sum would not be given to the individual but advanced to him as he gets settled on the land, and everyone who is able to become self-supporting in that way will at least be off the unemployment shelf for a time and will be able to take care of himself and his family. Some of them may not stay there, but undoubtedly some will. Others, when times get better, and I hope that that will not be too long delayed, will no doubt be attracted back to industry in the cities where they formerly received good wages. That in general is what I have in mind, and that is the substance of the communications which I have made to the various western provinces particularly, in answer to the proposition put forward.

Mr. YOUNG: That does not answer the question. The question is, will this government be willing, in addition to advancing the three or four or five hundred dollars, as the case may be, to advance to the province its share of the undertaking?

Mr. GORDON: A loan to the province?

Mr. YOUNG: A loan to the province to be advanced to the settlers.

[Mr. Young.]

Mr. GORDON: If the province enters into an agreement such as I have indicated, and finds that by reason of the paucity of money in the province it is not able to advance its share, then the question of a loan to the province—I presume the hon. member has in mind a loan on the security of treasury bills or some other satisfactory security—would have to be taken into consideration. Speaking at the moment for myself only—I cannot speak for the government—I would say that this government would loan the province its share of the contribution, but I imagine that that matter will be referred to in the bill.

Mr. YOUNG: And would you advance to municipalities also which are unable to carry one-third of the cost?

Mr. GORDON: No. The municipalities are the creature of the province, as the hon. member knows, and we do not deal with them. It would be hopeless if we started in to do that.

Mr. HEAPS: There is one matter which the minister has not referred to, and upon which I should like some information. It is as to the amount of the responsibility which the federal government will assume in the matter of direct relief which is granted by the provinces and the municipalities to the individual. At the present time I believe that the federal government assumes one-third of the cost. I wonder if the minister could inform the house whether the government has undertaken to assume a larger share of the financial burden, thereby helping both the provinces and the municipalities.

Mr. GORDON: The agreements have not been changed.

Mr. HEAPS: Is it the intention of the government to assume only one-third of the cost of direct relief as they have been doing up to now?

Mr. GORDON: Perhaps the hon. member has not noticed the memoranda drawn from the agreements already entered into, as set out in the report of the director of unemployment relief, in which is given the percentages of direct relief which the Dominion government has heretofore been bearing. I presume that the hon. member is particularly concerned with the province of Manitoba, in the unorganized parts of which the federal government has contributed fifty per cent; but no change has been made from the agreements as set out in the report of the director of unemployment relief. There has been no conclusion arrived at as between any province and the Dominion government with respect to any change in the proportion which the Dominion government will assume in the matter of direct relief.

Mr. HEAPS: This is a question of very great importance to many other parts of this dominion as well as Manitoba. The amounts given out in relief by some of the municipalities in the west have become so enormous that it is almost impossible for many of the municipalities to carry the burden. I had hoped that under present conditions this government would assume a much larger share of that cost of relief than evidently, according to the statement just made by the minister, they are willing to do. I hope that the decision of the minister is by no means final and that the government will in the very near future announce to the country at large that they are willing to assume a much larger share of the cost of direct relief than they have been doing up to the present time. According to the plans which have been communicated to the committee by the minister, it is evidently the intention of this government as well as of the provinces to discontinue completely capital expenditures on public works of any kind, and instead there is going to be resort to a policy of direct relief for those who find themselves without work and without the means of subsistence. The cost therefore of relief for the ensuing year is going to be considerably less than it has been in the past year, and if such is the case, in view of the fianacial position of many of the provinces throughout Canada, will not the federal government agree to assume a much larger share of the cost of direct relief than they have been bearing up to the present?

Mr. DUPUIS: I rise to support the remarks of the hon. member (Mr. Heaps) in asking the federal government to assume a larger share of the cost of direct relief. In my own constituency, the municipality of Delson is composed largely of working men engaged in the brick industry. At the present time owing to the fact that there is hardly any construction work being done in the large cities like Montreal, some of the brick yards in Delson and Laprairie will not open this summer. They hardly opened last year. By now from 250 to 350 heads of families are out of work in these villages. They comprise practically the majority of the people in the village of Delson. The municipality derives its revenue from taxes imposed on these working men, and at the present time the municipal council is unable to provide one-third of the cost of direct relief. It will not be able to meet its obligations, and so I think it is the duty of the government, provincial or federal, to come to its rescue. I presume there are many other municipalities throughout the dominion in a similar position.

Speaking for the farmers, I would ask the minister if there will be any provision in the bill to help not simply the born farmers now living in the city, but the farmers at present on the land, many of whom are on the verge of bankruptcy. Owing to the fact that they cannot sell their products they have no revenue; many of them have mortgages on their land, and creditors are forcing payments. The result is that many farmers are facing obligations they will not be able to meet, and many are sold out by the sheriff and thrown on the street. In my view the first obligation of either the provincial or the federal government is to help the farmers now on the land and guarantee their present obligations. There has been some discussion and expression of opinion in connection with a moratorium in favour of the farmers. I do not wish to discuss the merits of that proposal, so far as obligations are concerned, but I think it is the duty of the government to help them. There are many hundreds, yes, thousands of farmers who cannot meet their obligations owing to the present crisis, and it is the first duty of the government to come to their aid. What is the use of bringing farmers from the cities if we do not help those actually engaged in farming who are in need of assistance?

I should like to revert to a remark made by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), that there had been some abuses of relief measures by those who were not in need of assistance, and that in consequence some who were really unemployed and without means had to suffer. I should like to call the attention of the minister to my remarks during the special session of 1930. At that time the matter of unemployment was under discussion, and the government was asked to define the word "unemployed." If the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) were in the house he would recall that before I spoke he begged the government to define that word. My remarks on that occasion were as follows:

> It will soon be found that some of the unemployed have other resources and that a certain proportion of them will not be needy, and then it will not be necessary for this government or any other body to help. Consequently I think the hon. member for Bow River was right in suggesting that there should be a clause defining the word "unemployed," . . .

As one hon. member remarked this afternoon, surely the agricultural class contains some who are badly in need of help and are just as deserving as . . .

—any other class in the community. The Minister of Labour admitted, after the remark by the hon. member for Quebec South, that there had been some abuses. Due to what? Due to the fact that the word "unemployed" was not defined. I think it is the duty of the government to define that word and to come to the rescue of only those who are in actual need, not only among the workingmen but among the farmers.

Mr. MITCHELL: Remarks of hon. gentlemen have dealt particularly with the provision of food for the unemployed. In connection with relief, however, there is another problem of great importance, namely that of rent. In the municipality from which I come relief is costing $10,000 per week. That applies only to married men and their families, and does not include single men. The provision of work carries with it also a psychological factor, namely that the unemployed have something to look forward to. I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for North Winnipeg that it will be necessary to increase the proportion paid by the federal government to the provinces and municipalities. If unemployment conditions are not improved the government will have a very serious situation on its hands. People cannot be turned out on the street; they have to be taken care of. From my own practical experience I would say that the fact that roofs have been put over the heads of the unemployed, and that they have been given some work to do has gone far to keep the situation in hand.

Some comments have been made in connection with sending men into the camps of northern Ontario. If in the present year no more are sent than were sent last winter, the government will be touching only the fringe of the problem.

Mr. GORDON: How many were sent?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know, but I know the effect.

Mr. GORDON: I am told over 40,000 were sent.

Mr. MITCHELL: There were only 200 or 300 from Hamilton. I was in the council at the time, and very close to the situation, although I cannot give the exact figures. The matter of unemployment overshadows every other problem confronting this government and parliament.

[Mr. Dupuis.]

As I explained a few days ago, some credit should be given to the mayors and councillors of municipalities for the able manner in which they have handled the situation. Whether we like it or not we have to assume the responsibility of taking care of the unemployed and keeping them housed. I could say a great deal more, but I shall not take further time.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Is it the minister's intention to depart from the policy adopted last year of having part of the public works done under the heading of unemployment relief? I take it from the remarks of the minister he is not aware at the present time whether or not the same policy is to be followed. I find in the report of the Dominion Director of Unemployment Relief certain expenditures under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act of 1931 on behalf of the Department of Public Works. Is it the intention of the government to extend relief under similar circumstances in the coming year?

Mr. GORDON: At the moment no program of public works has been agreed upon with the Department of Public Works. I assume—I do not want this to be taken as the last word because I have not heard it discussed so far as the government is concerned —that the normal program of public works will be carried on. But the policy with respect to the closing out and finishing of works under legislation which becomes inoperative at the end of the month is disclosed in the telegram which I sent to each of the premiers of the various provinces following their own request at the conference on April 9.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps I can make it simpler for the minister. He no doubt has before him the report of the director of unemployment relief. At page 66 he will see there are a number of items which are clearly public works. They appeared last year under the heading of unemployment and farm relief. Is it the intention to follow a similar policy this year, or has the minister reached the point where he is able to say what will be done?

Mr. GORDON: I am sorry I cannot give any direct answer to the question, but certainly before the legislation comes down I shall be in a position to do so.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps the minister will be able to answer this question, although he was not minister at the time these estimates were put in. Did these estimates originate with the department of public works, or with the Department of Labour under which comes unemployment and farm relief?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Chairman, perhaps I can give the hon. gentleman the desired information. After the act was passed a very careful and complete survey of conditions throughout the dominion was made, and the Public Works department was asked to suggest a program of works which it might undertake, calculated to relieve unemployment. In pursuance of that request the chief architect, the chief engineer and the district engineers made reports. Following these reports a schedule was prepared and submitted to council, and an order in council was passed approving the program. Then the works were undertaken so far as circumstances permitted and so far as it appeared necessary to grant relief in particular localities. The scheme had to be looked at as a whole; for instance, in some cities the municipal authorities themselves and the province were carrying on work that very substantially, and in certain instances entirely, took care of relief. In those cases some of the works set out in the schedule for the Public Works department were not proceeded with.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Then I take it that what appears on this page 66 under the heading of unemployment and farm relief covers public works originated by the Public Works department after the public works estimates had been submitted to and passed by the house. Is that correct?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): They were particularly referred to in the discussion of the bill. It was pointed out at the time that one of the methods by which unemployment could be relieved, was by undertaking purely federal works.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is exactly the thing against which I protest. These are public works pure and simple which might very well have been put in the department's estimates. When the minister says this afternoon that at a time like this nobody would want to be favouring one political party rather than the other, I take it he believes these works should not be confined to ridings that are represented almost entirely by Conservatives, but that there should be something like a fair distribution. If not that, what does he mean? As I have said before, you will find on an average that these items for harbours and rivers in Ontario—items which this house had no opportunity of passing on—have been allotted to Conservative ridings to an extent six times greater than to Liberal ridings. I feel very jealous of my friend from the province of Quebec who speaks of a fifty-fifty division. If my hon. friend will run his eye down the column on page 66 he will see that of items totalling $216,442 only about $12,000 represent public works in Ontario Liberal ridings. My hon. friend contradicted me when I made that statement before; I have since checked it up. I shall be very glad if he can convince me that a greater amount has been allotted to Liberal ridings. If the minister has not his mind made up now to alter that policy, I would very strongly urge him to alter it for the coming year. These are public works which the members of this house have a right to pass upon, they should not be undertaken in this way, and nobody can justify such a policy, particularly in view of the fact that the report says that relief will be granted without any attention to political affiliations, race or religious views. Nobody can tell me it is purely an accident that the appropriations in ridings represented by government members are six times as great as those in ridings represented by opposition members.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): When my hon. friend spoke the other evning on this subject he was endeavouring to leave on this house the impression that the Public Works department had started out deliberately to discriminate between expenditures in Liberal and in Conservative constituencies. I told him he was all wrong in that assumption, and I repeat it now. The greatest care was exercised—

Mr. ELLIOTT: If my hon. friend will allow me: On reference to Hansard he will find that I said that in figuring out the relative relief granted, apparently Conservative ridings needed about six times as much relief as ridings represented by Liberals. He said that that was not right. If he goes over these figures I am sure he will be satisfied that I am right.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am endeavouring to combat the impression and the inference to be drawn from my hon. friend's statement, and I want to point out to him that while his figures may be accurate the inference he is seeking to have drawn from them is not sound. Let us consider the province of Ontario, of which my hon. friend is speaking. There are very few constituencies on the waterfront, represented by Liberals, where anything could be done. If my hon. friend starts at the east of the province he will go to Trenton before he finds a constituency represented by a Liberal. Then he will have to go past Toronto and along lake Erie until he gets down to the southwestern part of the province before he finds another such constituency. In making a survey of the harbours and rivers where works could be done it just happened that the larger number of constituencies where works could be undertaken and were needed were represented by Conservatives. It was not a question of political patronage at all; it was a case of carrying on works that were necessary. I am glad to say that the greater number of constituencies where the work could be done were represented by Conservatives.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Just a word in answer to my hon. friend. I am glad this discussion has taken place, because my hon. friend now states that on checking up the figures—I take this to be the effect of his remarks—he finds that he was labouring under a misapprehension when he contradicted me before.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I still contradict the general impression my hon. friend was trying to leave. His general figures may be correct.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend forgets that the contradiction was with regard to the figures, and of course a general inference can be arrived at only from the figures. That is the best test. After all, the ridings on lake Erie still are on that lake. Take Elgin, for instance; my hon. friend will not find it in the list.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): If my hon. friend will look it up he will see that it was very well cared for under the former administration.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I may say that was the fact with practically all ridings in this country under the former administration. The point is this, and I hope the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Public Works will be able to get it: This is not the way to bring down public works estimates. The address by the minister this afternoon is the best evidence I can find that he does not believe these works should be done in this way. Public works should come under the Department of Public Works, and the Minister of Public Works should take responsibility for the estimates and for the manner in which they come down. Here is an item to which we might as well refer while we are on this subject:

Haileybury breakwater and harbour for seaplanes, $67,000.

That was the amount authorized, and $17,809 was the amount expended. I submit that this is not the sort of estimate that should be brought down a month or so after the house rises; I submit this properly should be considered by the house when public works estimates are up for discussion. I do not want to introduce a political element into the discussion, because I quite agree with the minister that this is not a time when matters of that kind should influence the manner in which public moneys are expended, but I do say that you cannot avoid it if you follow the course which was followed last year. I hope we will have from the minister an assurance that he intends to adopt a different course for the coming year.

In regard to unemployment relief, the need for this relief in Canada is not limited to ridings which are on the water. There is not a riding in this country that does not require assistance by way of unemployment relief. At the close of last session hon. members representing the different ridings were told that the government would be glad to receive representations as to what works might be carried on. At that time I directed the attention of the minister to the fact that in a great many inland ridings such as those to which my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works has referred, where you do not have harbours and rivers, one of the things that could be very well done by way of unemployment relief—and I urge this upon the minister now—was the elimination as far as possible of those level crossings which are such a menace to the travelling public in many parts of this country. It is altogether beside the point to say that those ridings which do not happen to be on the water do not require the expenditure of money on public works of some kind at a time like this. No people are going through harder times than the people in many of these inland ridings, and I want to urge strongly upon the minister that something of that kind should be done during the coming year. It will give employment to workmen and teams generally, and if a great many of these sections of the country are to carry on during the coming year work of that kind must be carried on in addition to the usual farm work.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): I want to take this opportunity to congratulate the minister and the government on their forward-looking ideas designed to help people in the cities of Saskatchewan to get out on the land and maintain themselves. I know that representatives of the cities of Regina, Moose Jaw and Saskatoon met during the winter and formulated a plan similar to that outlined by the minister to-day. They went to the provincial government with their scheme; the provincial government lent a hand in that direction, and I know that the people in my constituency, and I think I can say the same thing for the cities of Regina and Moose Jaw, certainly will greatly appreciate this announcement.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): May I direct the attention of the Minister of Public Works to a slight political inaccuracy? Trenton happens to be represented in this house by a Conservative and not by a Liberal. The port of Oshawa, however, happens to be represented by a Liberal. On behalf of my constituency may I express my appreciation of the treatment we received last session in connection with public works, but may I also point out that last year again the harbour was congested, as I think the records of the department will show. There is urgent need for further work this year at the port of Oshawa. I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Labour to a telegram I have just received from the Oshawa Property Owners' Association, which I may say is headed by some of the most prominent men of the city. The telegram reads as follows:

> Large proportion of home holders of Oshawa unable to pay rent, interest or taxes. Situation serious. Something must be done.

Am I correct in advising my constituents that their immediate problem must be dealt with by the provincial and not by the federal government?

Mr. GORDON: I must assure the hon. member that the Dominion government cannot embark on any program which would take care of landlords or municipal taxes generally. I do not think I need assure the hon. member of that.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I wonder if the minister would be kind enough to elaborate a little on the latter part of his statement. I understood him to say that as regards commitments already entered into between the municipal and provincial authorities the time for these works was going to be extended either by common agreement or by order in council, I do not know which. In view of numerous requests I am receiving from my part of the country, I should like to know whether the tripartite agreement between the municipal authorities, the provincial governments and the federal government has absolutely ceased and whether no commitments with respect to the municipalities will be entertained for the future. I am receiving a good many requests from different municipalities at the present time, and if I understand the minister correctly there is no question of entering into any further agreement for future commitments between the municipalities, the provinces and the federal government.

Mr. GORDON: Any agreement entered into with the municipalities in the future will, of necessity, be entered into with the province concerned. So far as this government is concerned, after the provincial conference held in the middle of April, it was made apparent by the provincial premiers themselves that the cost of carrying on works such as had been carried on in the past was entirely too great a burden for the municipalities and for the provinces as well, and I think I can safely say that the cost to this dominion was also a burden. When the legislation is approved, agreements will be entered into with the provinces whereby, I trust, a contribution will be made—the basis has not yet been determined because the agreements have not yet been entered into—by means of which loans or advances will be made by this government to the provinces for the purpose of taking care of the destitute people for whom the provinces have primary responsibility.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the word contribution used by the minister now refer to contribution for direct relief as well?

Mr. GORDON: It refers to direct relief.

Mr. HEAPS: In other words, the amount the federal government will assume in the cost of direct relief is not yet a definite factor so far as this government is concerned.

Mr. GORDON: It has not yet been definitely determined, but I hope it will be immediately on this legislation receiving the approval of the house, if it does receive approval.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I understand the minister's words, they are to the effect that as regards seeking to meet the unemployment problem by providing work, which I think was the intention at the outset, that has been abandoned as a policy, and that hereafter whatever may be given will be given for the purpose of relief. Whether at the instance of the provinces or the municipalities is a secondary matter; but as to the policy of the government, as I understand it now, and as the minister now enunciates it, it is that hereafter the policy will be to grant relief by contribution but not to establish public works.

Mr. GORDON: I do not think the right hon. gentleman has quite correctly interpreted my observations. The work as carried on in the past under that plan or program will not be carried on in the same way in the future because, as was plainly indicated by the premiers of the various provinces, they had reached the point where they could no longer finance it. The question now arises, if this legislation receives approval, of entering into agreements with the various provinces in regard to the loaning of money by the dominion to the provinces for the purpose of taking care of their unemployed who are without subsistence. As to the details of these agreements, I can only say that they have not yet been determined, and, of course, they cannot be determined until this legislation passes the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That bears out what I have said. The minister's last words were that from now on loans would be made to the provinces to enable them to meet cases of need. So far as the federal government's policy is concerned it will be one of contributions or loans to the provinces for relief purposes, but as regards a policy of any direct provision of work by the federal government, that policy, if it ever existed—and I understand that it was the original intention—has been abandoned. That is correct, is it not, except in regard to works which at present are being brought to completion?

Mr. GORDON: That is substantially correct, yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: There is only one thing to which I wish to direct the attention of the government in connection with this resolution. During the past three years a certain portion of Saskatchewan has had no crop, although I am pleased to say that as a result of the rains this spring it seems likely that there will be a crop in that dried out area. The great problem which the people in that portion of the country have on their hands is to get the land again under cultivation, to get stubble on the land to hold it down from drifting and blowing. I would urge on the government the absolute necessity of not being too penurious in handing out seed grain. They should be generous and should give to the people enough seed to enable them to get all the land they possibly can under cultivation. In most of this land there has been no crop for three years and it is drifting and blowing about from place to place. The farmers are endeavouring to get stubble on the land to hold it down and if sufficient seed is not handed out, as some farmers are complaining, they will not be able to get their land under cultivation. If they cannot hold it from drifting we are liable to have the same thing repeated another year. I urge upon the government the importance of being generous, having regard to the conditions. If it is wet, give the farmers plenty of seed so they can get all their land under crop.

[Mr. Gordon.]

Mr. CASGRAIN: Under this legislation will farmers in need of seed grain in the province of Quebec be able to obtain it by applying to the department? I have received numerous requests from farmers in my constituency who are in need of seed grain this spring. Will there be ample provision in this legislation to enable them to obtain it?

Mr. GORDON: Am I right in assuming that the hon. member has taken the matter up with the premier of his province?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I have not taken it up immediately because I thought that under this resolution, which is quite wide in its scope, it might be possible to cover this situation. Before I shall be in a position to answer adequately those who have communicated with me, I think it will be necessary for me to have an expression from the minister, not necessarily now, but after recess.

Mr. GORDON: Up to date, so far as my information goes, and I think I am fairly well informed on the subject, no representations have come to the dominion from the province concerned. I am subject to correction in this, but I do not think that the premier of Quebec has made any representations with respect to the matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My information is that the Minister of Agriculture of Quebec last year made application to the Department of Agriculture for seed grain and was told that there was nothing for him.

Mr. REID: Can the minister give any information in regard to British Columbia? I understand that they were making representations to carry on works. They have large camps and road projects which were started and left uncompleted. Many of the municipalities appealed to the provincial government some two or three months back to carry on municipal projects. The minister stated that all the provinces had agreed at the conference to go on with direct relief, but my information is that British Columbia wanted to carry on unemployment works.

Mr. GORDON: I have no desire to appear to be disrespectful to the hon. member, but if he will turn to my remarks as they will appear in Hansard and will follow the terms of the message sent to the premiers, he will see just what was arrived at. Certainly, we will not shut down works which have been approved of and started and where the shutting down would cause a loss. For instance, where a building is without a roof we will go on and complete it. There are entire contracts—I use the term in a legal sense—which have been entered into and which of necessity must be fulfilled. It was the unanimous opinion of the premiers that any works in the nature of buildings which would not have been gone on with in the ordinary course should not be started for the time being, because it was thought to be beyond the capacity of the provinces and the municipalities to pay for works of that character. It was felt that all work hereafter should be in the nature of direct relief wherever possible.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Post Office—Outside Service, salaries and allowances, $15,620,000.

Mail service, including mail service by air, $14,690,000.

Miscellaneous, including $5,000 to provide for payment of compassionate allowances to employees injured while in the performance of their duties or to other persons injured while performing duties in any way connected with the postal service or in protecting His Majesty's mails, or to the dependents of such employees or other persons who may be killed while so engaged, payments to be made only on the specific authority of the governor in council, $1,000,000.

Yukon territory, $141,100.—Total, $31,451,100.

Mr. NEILL: I wish to bring before the minister a matter about which I have had some correspondence with him from a different angle. It is a matter to which I think Canada owes some consideration. I refer to the case of those men who took pensions from the Pacific cable board, or rather from their successors, entitled International Communications Company, Limited. The situation is this. As the house may remember, the Pacific cable board was jointly owned by Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand and Canada in certain proportions, and the board operated a cable to Australia. For reasons which I need not go into they decided to sell out, which they did some years ago to the International Communications Company, Limited. I would refer to the debate on the subject in this house when the matter came up on May 14, 1929. I then stated that the Canadian terminal of the cable was in the constituency I represented at a place called Bamfield, and I wanted to know if the employees of the board who entered its service somewhat as one would enter the government service here, with an understanding as to continuity of service, pension and so forth, would in the transfer have their rights as to continuity of service, pension and so forth safeguarded. The Postmaster General said that that provision was to be found in the agreement signed by the contracting parties. There was some debate about it, in which the member for Acadia took part, and further on the Postmaster General said:

> The agreement provides that the company shall take over the existing staff of the board subject to and in accordance with the provisions set out in the second schedule thereof.

The Postmaster General went on to say that the rights of these employees were fully protected by the agreement to which I have referred. Following that up, the Postmaster General sent me a letter dated May 15, enclosing the second schedule of the agreement, and I want to comment on one or two of its clauses. Subsection 1 of section 2 thereof says that the company would employ the old employees of the Pacific cable board on at least as favourable terms as those they had been enjoying. Then it came to the question of those who, owing to the changed conditions, did not wish to continue with the new company but decided to take their rights of pension and so forth under the old board; there was a period of five years allowed during which they could exercise that right, and this is what was to happen if they did so exercise it. I quote:

> The company—

I differentiate between the board and the company, the board being the old organization and the company the new one. It provides that the company will pay to any man quitting under those conditions,— > —compensation of such amount by way of pension, gratuity or otherwise, as he would have received from any pension or provident fund of the board or from the board itself in accordance with its usual practice if he had retired on grounds of ill health from the service of the board.

Section 4 provided that any dispute between any employee of the company should be referred to the decision of a single arbitrator to be appointed by the Lord Chief Justice of England. That was the old provision.

To put the matter shortly, the trouble arose because faith was not kept with these employees in the matter of their pensions. I quote now from one of these employees' letters:

The following rule was made by the board (the old board) on March 22, 1922, prior to the payment of the first pension in Canada on March 31, 1922.

This is the rule:

It has been decided that as the pension fund is not a trust fund payments made in Canada on account of pensions or death gratuities will be at the standard rate of $4.87 to the pound and not at current rate.

This letter continues:

This rule was displayed for our information at the time we notified the company that we did not wish to transfer to it, and was not rescinded at the time we retired; this definite assurance influenced our decision to retire.

As indeed it well might. It goes on:

The company now states that this ruling is obsolete as the pension fund was constituted a trust fund on December 17, 1923, and that the regulations date from that time.

Mr. STEVENS: The company changed it?

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

The staff was not advised of the change in the pension fund status. Consequently the rule of March 22, 1922, was never cancelled.

Rule 28 of the pension fund—

This is one of the regulations:

—reads, "the pension fund will be kept in sterling money and all payments out of the fund whether by way of retiring pensions, gratuities or return of contributions will be made in sterling."

Then this man states what I have already said:

Clause 2 of section 3 of the second schedule definitely fixes responsibility for payment of pensions to non-transferees upon the company, and that the company must pay them in accordance with the usual practice of the board.

Then I have another letter from him in which he states:

The company does not control the pension fund. It only acts as an intermediary between the trustees of the fund and the pensioners. The company receives all retiring pensions in London from the fund in sterling and transmits these pensions to retired officers living in Canada, Australia and New Zealand.

Then later on I find the following:

The board has always paid pensions at par, but the company pays at par in Australia and New Zealand where sterling is at a premium of 25 per cent and ten per cent respectively and at current exchange in Canada where sterling is at a discount. This means the company absorbs all exchange profit but stands no exchange loss.

Then, I find the following sentence:

If all pensions were paid at par as the board was accustomed to do, the company would still make a handsome profit.

[Mr. Neill.]

The sums they save by paying pensions in New Zealand and Australia, exchange being so much in favour of the British sterling, would more than compensate for the loss that they would sustain in paying at par in Canada. In plain English, the company is guilty of sharp practice. It receives the money for the pensioners who are living all over the world. Where sterling is at a premium they pay at par, and where it is at a discount they refuse to absorb the loss. For about twelve months they have been making as high as thirty per cent in Australia and a considerable percentage in New Zealand. They paid at par in Canada as long as the exchange was normal, but now because it has dropped they propose to pay in Canada at the current rate of exchange. As I said before, even if they were all paid at par the board would make money under these conditions. Incidentally—and probably this has nothing to do with it, although it shows the need for these men to get what is their due—these pensions are on a very low scale indeed. They are a disgrace to any public body paying them. If I remember rightly, some men who had a very considerable number of years in the service—I forget the exact number—had only £30, or $150, per year. One of those men held a responsible position, and had to exercise very considerable ability. Under those circumstances the least they could do would be to keep the bargain which they had made, and which they undertook. This is a matter of considerable consequence, and although I am now speaking of an individual case there are and will be more. The fact is, moreover, that there is a principle involved. In recent years we have heard talk—more than I care to hear—of some proposal to transfer our radio and telegraph services to private corporations. I have heard the promise made, "You do not need to worry about your employees; we will take them over and treat them right." The present instance is a fair example of the reliability of those promises.

I hope the government realizes its responsibility. These employees are Canadians, and enlisted, so to speak under our service, and under a board on which Canada had representation. When we transferred those employees to another body we had our obligations. We took care to see that their rights were protected. Now, however, the ensuing company has defaulted on its obligation. We considered we were safeguarding the rights of those men, but now the company has repudiated them. I think it is up to Canada to make a very vigorous protest. It is useless for Bill Jones or William Smith to enter a case. One man with a pension of only £30 a year cannot hope to litigate against a wealthy company. What chance would he have? I would suggest, however, that Canada, through her high commissioner, would have a great deal of influence in a matter of this kind. We have heard very often the boast or claim—and it is a true claim, and one of which we may well be proud—that under any circumstances or in any case the British government stands behind its citizens. That has always been the case. No expenditure of time or money or effort was ever wanting when Great Britain was advised that even the meanest of her subjects were in danger of the action of any foreign power. The knowledge of that has protected the British citizen many times not only as to property and rights but also as to life. I suggest that we in Canada should do no less. Our honour is involved. This may be a small matter, but it is one in which we should take an interest. If this company discovered that Canada was taking active steps or any active interest they would probably give way. I have not exaggerated the facts or tried to make an ex parte appeal, as if I were acting as a lawyer. I have merely recited the facts. They simply find it more profitable to repudiate their bargain and pay at par. But if it is right that they should pay at par, why did they not do that with Australia and New Zealand? Now when they find they are going to be out a little bit they purpose repudiating their bargain.

Something similar has occurred in connection with the employees who have remained on. They are taking up the matter themselves through an association; I shall not speak to that for the moment. The last Postmaster General and also the present one have made recommendations to Sir Campbell Stuart. This, however, is a matter which has come up more recently, and the phase of it I have outlined cannot be denied. There is no merit in the action taken by the company, and I do hope the Postmaster General will make an investigation and take appropriate action.

Hon. ARTHUR SAUVE (Postmaster General): The remarks of the hon. member are very interesting, but I must say the matter does not come under my department; it concerns a private British company.

Mr. NEILL: The minister has not appreciated my point; I suggest it does come under his jurisdiction. These men were in his employ—or in our employ, if you like. We traded them off without their knowledge or consent to a British corporation. We stipulated that in so doing that corporation must take care of those men under the terms at the time of their enlistment. They acquired a very valuable franchise and property from us.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That was under the Postmaster General.

Mr. NEILL: It was the Postmaster General who made the contract. Hansard reveals where I asked the question, "Are those men going to be protected?" And the Postmaster General replied, "Yes, I have protected them. They come under the second schedule to this agreement." Although the Prime Minister is not in his seat he could support me in my statement that I had urged that the agreement be made part of the act. I foresaw the day might come when the bargain would be under consideration. The present Prime Minister supported me in my view, and arrangement was made by the then Minister of Justice to insert it. It is certainly our business to see that Canadian subjects are treated properly, especially when we have traded them off in that way. We should follow them up and see that the deal we made on their behalf is fulfilled.

Mr. VENIOT: Perhaps I can make an explanation which would help to clear matters. I think it was in 1929 that Canada relinquished her claims or rights to the cable system in which she was then interested. In that was included the cable to Cuba.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We were owners of part of it.

Mr. VENIOT: We were paid so much, in the end. In relinquishing her claim, however, Canada entered into an agreement with this corporation by which they were to protect the men then employed so far as pensions were concerned. I take it the Postmaster General has jurisdiction to see that that agreement is being carried out.

Mr. NEILL: Hear, hear.

Mr. VENIOT: That is as far as he can go. I would ask the Postmaster General to have the matter looked into carefully by the Justice department to see wherein this corporation has failed in carrying out the agreement which was scheduled to the act at the time.

Mr. SAUVE: The question is under consideration.

Mr. VENIOT: In order to simplify matters, Mr. Chairman, if the committee will look at page 61 they will find only two main items in this vote totalling about $32,000,000. In the past it has been the custom to discuss under either of these main items any subject pertaining to the department. On page 63 will be found a summary of the expenditures. We could perhaps wait until each detail item there is called and discuss it separately, but I think better progress would be made if we follow the usual practice.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The whole item has been called.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. SAUVE: Mr. Chairman, before entering into discussion of post office estimates in their details, perhaps the committee will allow me to give a summary of the main operations of the department. I do not intend at this moment to take up the time of the committee with an explanation of details, but in the course of discussion I shall be glad to give any information which may be called for by the committee.

The Post Office estimates show a decrease of $4,688,875 from those of the preceding year. This has been effected by reducing every one of the four main items, and indicates a real endeavour to balance revenue and expenditure during the fiscal year 1932-33. The important point in connection with these estimates is that the total is lower than for any year since 1925-26 as the result of drastic cuts. In fact the total reduction in post office estimates during the past two years is more than six millions of dollars.

Turning for a moment to the question of revenue and expenditure, I might say for the information of the committee that an encouraging factor in connection with the financial position of the Post Office Department is a marked reduction in expenditure. According to the latest figures available, the expenditure for the fiscal year which closed on the 31st March, 1932, will not exceed $34,315,000, a decrease of over $1,975,000 as compared with the fiscal year 1930-31. Another factor is that the revenue for the fiscal year which closed on the 31st March last is estimated to be over $31,900,000, an increase of nearly $1,500,000 over the fiscal year 1930-31. In the latter year the deficit in postal operations was $5,876,496, but for the fiscal year which has just closed it is estimated that the deficit will not exceed $2,368,000, a reduction of over $3,500,000 in one year.

If the revenue remains at present levels during the fiscal year 1932-33 it will equal, if not exceed, the department's expenditures as provided for in the estimates now before the committee, and the deficit which has existed for several years past will have been wiped out in a period of two years.

In view of the policy that the post office operates for service and not profit, I do not consider it necessary that the postal service should show any marked surplus, but a deficit is undesirable, and I wish to assure the committee that every endeavour is being made in the administration of the department to render the best possible service at the lowest possible cost.

The reduction in revenue, caused by business depression, forced me to reduce the cost of the air mail service to $225,000 from $1,300,000, which was the figure for 1931-32, a reduction of $1,075,000. This reduction was not effected for pleasure but from necessity. It is usually much more agreeable to grant than to refuse. In these times of depression the task of reducing expenses, salaries and the number of employees, is extremely painful and presents a problem which, not being entirely solved, demands prudence and the greatest foresight. A great portion of these reductions are but temporary. It will be necessary, however, to limit expenses in future, taking into account not only the government's finances, but the real needs of the country, as well as the various other means of transportation which have absorbed huge amounts of public funds due to previous lack of forethought.

Mr. VENIOT: Before going into any questions with the minister, may I be permitted to refer briefly to the remarks he has just made. Let me say at the outset, Mr. Chairman, that the minister is quite right when he states that the Post Office Department should not be run with a view to showing a marked surplus. Let me add that in 1927 when the reduction in the cost of postage from three cents to two cents showed that for some time there would be a considerable deficit each year, I as Postmaster General brought the matter before the house. It was fully discussed, and the opinion was then expressed that, no matter what that deficit might be, while it would be well to balance our accounts as soon as possible, yet the mail service should not be allowed to depreciate in any way.

With that object in view I proceeded to lay out a program for the development of greater service in Canada, and without boasting at all I think I can say I was successful to a considerable extent in giving Canada, from 1927 to 1929 and 1930, one of the best mail services of any country in the world. I feel proud of that. I do not take the credit to myself personally as minister; I freely give it to the energetic, efficient and industrious staff who assisted me. They considered public service the very first thing that should be attended to. The extension of mail routes by train to sections of the three prairie provinces and British Columbia entailed a heavy expenditure, but both sides of the house were unanimous in authorizing the then Postmaster General to proceed with the work, after the program was laid out and it was shown that there would be deficits.

In addition we inaugurated an air mail service, and on that point permit me to say that I am indeed disappointed that the government has seen fit almost completely to destroy the foundation then laid for air mail service in Canada. It is true that the service was costly, but when I spoke on this subject last year I had facts and figures which I laid before the committee and by which I showed that if the services were continued the deficit would become less each year. At that time it appeared that the services would be continued, because the estimate for 1931-32 was no less than $1,500,000 or a little more than the estimate for 1930-31. It was believed all over the country that these services would be carried on, but we have seen what has happened. I am not blaming the Postmaster General for this, nor am I blaming any official of his department; the government as a whole must take the responsibility and the blame for what has been done.

What has been the result? At that time I pointed out that if the services were carried on over the routes then established, the worst that could happen would be a deficit for all the routes of about $390,000. It must not be forgotten that week by week, month by month and year by year the volume of business carried by the air mail was increasing. In 1930 it increased by more than 25 per cent, and it had not fallen off at the end of the fiscal year, 1931, when the then government brought in an estimate of $1,500,000 as the amount necessary to carry on the service. If it had been carried on this year as fully as was anticipated when that estimate was brought down, with the increase to three cents on what was known as the two cent air mail services there would have been an increase in revenue of about $190,000. The increase from five cents to six cents on what was known as the five cent routes also would have brought in a large increase. Let the department take the figures, and what will they find? They will find that every two cent route, such as the Magdalen islands route, the north shore route to Anticosti and the Mackenzie river route to the Arctic circle, as well as the routes to isolated mining districts, showed a surplus for the year. There was a deficit of $650,000 on the five cent routes, but as I said a moment ago the traffic was increasing, and there was every reason to hope that this year the deficit would not have been more than from $350,000 to $390,000.

Now let me put this point: The United States, with a deficit of over two billion dollars, and a deficit of $60,000,000 on postal service, is not cutting down the air mail service. Great Britain, with millions of a deficit, is not cutting down either. Why is that? It is because Great Britain sees in the air mail service, just as we in the former government saw in the Canadian air mail service, a connecting link of empire, a connecting link with Europe, and ultimately a transatlantic service of which Canada would be the pivotal point on this continent. We saw that; we had the information in our possession, but that program has been dropped, though these other two countries are spending large sums of money on their air mail service in spite of their deficit. An immense amount of work was done and large sums of money were invested in order to carry out this program in Canada. There was a great forward movement in civil aviation of which postal aviation was the groundwork and foundation, because without it commercial aviation cannot be carried on in Canada. All that has gone by the board. Companies invested millions of dollars in equipping themselves to carry air mail, with the encouragement of the government, but to-day they see the capital they invested going to waste. The machines that they bought for that service cannot last until the government decides, two or three years hence, that an improvement in conditions will allow them once more to go on with the service. If any service in the country is essential to the progress of Canada it is the mail service of the Post Office Department; there is no question about that. Take, for instance, its effect with regard to other countries. When we lowered the rate to the Argentine Republic in 1929—we not only lowered the rate on first class matter but we raised the poundage of parcel post, extended it and reduced the rate—an additional revenue of nearly $200,000 was brought to the department. And when Canada was placed on the penny postage rate with England the department secured additional revenue. Now the rate has been raised to three cents and that advantage has been lost. If any account could be obtained with regard to mail communication between Canada and foreign countries, you would find that the service has been going down since the increase in postage. I predicted, when the increase in postage was put on, that the value of postage going through the mails would be affected, not so much by the depression as by the fact that we were imposing an additional tax upon those who could write; for people who can post eight letters for sixteen cents are not going to write four letters on which they will have to pay twelve cents. When the rate was raised on newspapers from one to one and a half cents per pound, the department lost revenue, and this revenue was lost by the shortsightedness not of the officials of the department nor of the minister but of those who undertook governmental retrenchment in a department of which they had no real knowledge or experience. The revenue from newspaper postage has declined notwithstanding the increase of one half cent per pound. The Montreal Star circulates three thousand papers in this city alone, but these papers are not being sent through the post as formerly, because the increase would cost the Star $80,000. To-day they are sending packages to distribution stations in Ottawa and elsewhere, not by the mail, as they did under the one cent rate, but by express; and within a radius of fifty miles of the great cities of Canada all the large newspapers are making more use of trucks and express, sending their papers to district news agents. They are using these conveyances more than they did under the one cent rate. We have lost revenue there by want of foresight, of judgment and of a proper discussion and understanding of the situation. I predict that the revenue lost by the mail service on newspapers alone will amount to over $225,000 a year.

It was in 1928, I think, that, as Postmaster General, I introduced a bill in this house reducing the rate on newspapers from a cent and a half to one cent. What was the result? In the next year there was an additional revenue of $250,000 from newspapers alone, and we are losing that now since we have raised the rate to a cent and a half. So that it is not always wise to increase rates; it does not always bring the expected volume of business. Very often it has the opposite effect, lowering the volume of business done by the department.

The minister tells us that the decreases amount to $4,600,000. How does he arrive at that figure? He lops off $1,000,000 from the air mail service and he is going to lose revenue by so doing. We are going to lose a revenue, which we shall never get through the ordinary mail service, of over $600,000, by lopping off that $1,000,000 and discontinuing that service. That is another want of foresight.

An hon. MEMBER: What did that cost us?

Mr. VENIOT: That cost $1,500,000, and last year about $253,000 was spent of the amount voted, which was $1,500,000. The minister will save $4,000,000 by lopping off $1,000,000 on the air service, but that is not the worst feature. What about the reduction in the frequency of service in a great many places in Canada—a reduction due to the taking off of trains which heretofore carried mail to isolated places in the dominion? The lopping off of train service has not been followed by a corresponding addition to the mail service, because in many instances where the train ran daily and carried daily mail, now that the train service has been curtailed and, instead of reaching these people daily, reaches them only three times a week, there is no corresponding service to take the place of the service given by the trains on the other three days of the week. True, the service is given in some places, but I know places where it is not; the service has been lopped off.

I have here the number of renewed mail contracts last year in the maritime provinces. And what do I find? I find that $32,370 less has been paid under these renewals than was being paid under the contracts as they existed before the renewals were asked for. What does that mean? Every hon. member who occupies a seat in this house to-night and who was here in 1929, will recall the onslaught made on the Postmaster General of that day because he was not increasing the contracts or would not put mail carriers on a monthly basis. I have here a circular issued to the public. Our friends opposite will recognize it, for every one of them used it. It called upon the people to vote against the then Liberal government because of the stubbornness and hardness of heart of the Postmaster General of that day, who would not increase the remuneration mail carriers were receiving under a system that gave them seventy dollars a month. At that time Mr. McKinnon referred to the other night by an hon. member from Quebec, was on the stump in every county to which he could get. He was canvassing on that very issue, and he did more than canvass, he gave the mail contractors with whom he came in contact the promise which he had from the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), who was then in opposition, that the program and policy laid down in 1929 by myself would be changed. My genial friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) said it was a disgrace for me as Postmaster General to pay such meagre pittances to our mail contractors. Mr. McKinnon said that he would get this contract system changed. The Postmaster General, bolstered up and advised by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) and even the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) promised that if his party got into power the law would be changed. When I asked how this was going to be done, I think it was the Minister of Trade and Commerce who said: Put us there and we will show you how we will do it. We put them there—at least we did not, but the people did—and how did they do it? They reduced by $32,370 the renewals of former contracts. When we claimed that we had to abide by the tender system, hon. members opposite contended that we did not have to take the tenders as they came in; if they were not reasonable we could adopt a new system. What do I find under the present administration? Not only were they dissatisfied with the tenders that came in, but orders have gone forth to the district postal inspectors to get in touch with so and so and advise him that the department considers his tender too high and wishes to receive a reduced tender. I have reports before me which cannot be denied. This is how our friends opposite, who were so solicitous for the welfare of the poorly paid mail contractor, have acted. They said that their hearts were bleeding; they have bled so much they have no more consideration for the poor mail carrier.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Is the hon. member opposed to the tender system?

Mr. VENIOT: I will be like Paddy; I will answer my hon. friend's question by asking a similar one—what is your view?

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I think it is only fair that the hon. member should answer my question.

Mr. VENIOT: I have answered it.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I do not think so.

Mr. VENIOT: If my hon. friend reads Hansard, and I know he does, he must know that I am on record in 1929 as having refused to depart from the tender system. That is the reason why my Conservative friends, then in opposition, were so bitter in their attack upon the department of which I was the head. I believe in the tender system; I am for it today, I always was for it and I hope it will never be changed.

Speaking about the tender system brings another question to my mind. I have in my possession somewhat of a revelation in connection with the tender system. The record shows that for the Hatfield Point mail contract, the old contractor was the lowest tenderer. There were six or seven tenders and the third or fourth highest tenderer was a young man of eighteen years of age.

An hon. MEMBER: Eighty years?

Mr. VENIOT: No, although I know of one mail contractor who is eighty-six years of age and does not miss a trip. The district postal inspector reported that this young man was not fit for the position; he was not of an age to enter into a contract, he had no vehicle or horses, but notwithstanding this report, word was sent to this man to lower his tender. He lowered his tender by ten dollars, which brought him below the lowest tenderer, the old contractor, and he was given the contract in spite of the report of the inspector.

An hon. MEMBER: What government was that?

Mr. VENIOT: The present government.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Did not the hon. gentleman, while he was Postmaster General, dismiss men who had made the lowest tenders and who were really responsible?

Mr. VENIOT: Did I which?

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Did you not dismiss them?

Mr. VENIOT: No, I did not.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I can name a case right now.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. VENIOT: All right, go on.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I refer to the case of Mr. Robert Reynold, of West Glassville. He was a reputable gentleman, well qualified to carry out the work, but was dismissed by the hon. member simply because of his political affiliations.

Mr. VENIOT: I know the hon. gentleman does not deal in politics.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Neither do you.

Mr. VENIOT: I know he does not deal in politics, but let me read one of his letters. This letter is dated July 24, 1931, and is in connection with a post office in the hon. member's constituency. He writes to the Postmaster General as follows:

The time surely has come when this post office should no longer be a plaything for the few Liberals who are trying to use it as such in that locality. Mr. Barter has never given his personal attention to it. It is not his intention if he were appointed to do so, but to farm it out to somebody else.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Hear, hear.

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friend does not know what he is saying "hear, hear" about, because he wrote the department in connection with Mr. Barter, and Mr. Barter has produced sufficient evidence to the department to prove that my hon. friend's statement was not well founded.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. VENIOT: Take your medicine now, My hon. friend wrote:

I have learned only yesterday that he does not even live at Lakeville himself but at Avondale.

Now what do we find? The hon. gentleman made that statement when he knows that that man lives within the rural route district.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): How far away?

Mr. VENIOT: Not over two miles from the post office.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): That is not correct, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friend himself writes:

—some few miles away from this place.

He admits it himself.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): It is more than two miles.

Mr. VENIOT: A few miles cannot be very much more than two miles, if I understand the meaning of the English word "few". Instead of my not telling the truth, as the hon. gentleman has stated, I produce his own letter before this committee which shows that he did not tell the truth.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. VENIOT: It is all right for him to make such a statement about me without being called to order, and you are delighted to hear him make such a statement. You do not call him to order.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I did not make a statement that was not correct.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. VENIOT: You did. I have your letter here in which you say:

Under the circumstances I desire to protest very strongly against his having anything to do with the office again.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Hear, hear.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not intend on rising, Mr. Chairman, to go into this matter at the present time. To discuss the minister's statement was all that I intended to do, and later on to come back to these things. But I know the tendency of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton so well. I have been acquainted with him for a long number of years and I have seen him when he is cornered; I have seen the corns on his political toes trampled on so hard that he could not keep quiet, and therefore I prepared myself in advance.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): Order. The hon. member for Gloucester has a right to make his speech.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): Please state the question of privilege.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): The hon. member for Gloucester has made a statement from his place in the house that is not correct, and I think it is only right that he should be asked to qualify it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): Will the hon. member quote the statement to which he refers.

Mr. VENIOT: That is not a point of order, Mr. Chairman, when the hon. member says that I made a statement that is not correct and he does not specify the statement. Surely it cannot be the letter I read.

What are the circumstances connected with this very nice letter, this charitable, friendly letter, not political in any sense of the word? This man Barter was a returned soldier. He himself and three or four of his brothers went overseas. He came back and became assistant postmaster at Lakeville. When the postmaster retired—he had been appointed by the Civil Service Commission—this man applied for the position of postmaster, and he was appointed to that position in 1930, if I mistake not. However, Hansard will show, because I put the whole record on Hansard last session. Then the office was moved to a store known, I believe, as Miss Wilson's store. At all events there was a young lady in charge and she was put temporarily in charge of the post office. The reason for the change as stated in the department records was that the post office was not centrally located, but the postmaster was never notified of that and never was asked if he could furnish a more centrally located site for the office. He was summarily dismissed for that reason, which was no reason at all for dismissal unless it was a case of a postmaster refusing to obey the orders of the department and finding a proper site, which does not apply here. The vacancy was advertised. There were several applicants, among them the young lady temporarily in charge of the post office, and this man Barter. Not having been dismissed for any valid reason he was entitled under the Civil Service Act to apply again, and the Civil Service Commission issued a certificate in his favour some time in the month of January, but from that time down to the present no permanent appointment has been made by the department. One of the reasons why it has not been made is this letter from the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton—and the hon. gentleman says that he does not interfere in public matters politically. I say that the reason there has been no permanent appointment is found in that letter; and according to the investigation, according to the reports, according to the record of this man when he was postmaster up to 1931, every statement made in that letter is disproved as to residence, as to his being a political partisan during the time he was engaged as postmaster. They put forth every effort to discover something against this man in order to dismiss him. They could not dismiss him for political partisanship, and so overnight somebody thought of this other ground for dismissal, and he was dismissed on the ground that the post office was not centrally located. Let me go on.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): You are labouring pretty hard.

Mr. VENIOT: Not labouring as much as you will have to labour to answer for your political sins in the county of Victoria-Carleton.

Let me now point out another step that was taken to bring about this reduction in expenditure of $4,600,000. Up until last fall regulations had been in force in the department for a number of years governing the working hours of the men in the large cities, the postal clerks, the postal messengers, the distributors, the mail delivery men in the cities. Under those regulations the men had to work so many hours on a Sunday and so many hours at night before they could be paid overtime for additional work. We find that that regulation has been changed and that the hours which the men have now to work before they can begin to earn overtime pay have been extended one and even two hours. In addition this took place just about the time that the ten per cent cut in the salaries of these men was decided upon. Not satisfied with a reduction of ten per cent they added to the working hours, which is equivalent to a reduction in salary. They did not, however, consider the effect of the new regulation, because the circular sent out claims the right to bring the men back to work in order to complete a certain number of hours, even if they have to go two, three or four times, if necessary, to the office. What does that mean? To the men living in large cities it means extra expenses in carfare, and so on. Here again they are taking away from the men in an effort to meet the reduction in expenditure of $4,600,000.

The Postmaster General refers to the revenue of the department. He has said that with the curtailment of expenditures, the cutting of salaries, the lessening of the frequency of mails between certain points in Canada, the savings of a million dollars per year in air mail service, he hopes within the next two years to wipe out the deficit. I hope so, too. If I were in his place, however, I would not boast about wiping out a deficit in two years, if in so doing the mail service in Canada is in part destroyed. If within the next two years the Postmaster General wipes out the deficit at such a cost in service to Canada, then I claim he is not doing justice to himself or to the Canadian people.

I do not intend to go any further into the remarks made by the minister. I have several cases to place before him, not with the intention of advancing any personal criticism. When in office I was accused of allowing outside political influence to affect my judgment in the administration of the Post Office Department to the extent of causing injury to others. If such injustices have taken place since he has been in office I do not place the entire blame upon him. He came into office as a new man; he began working in a department where it had taken me a long time to learn the ropes and how to handle this, that or the other case. I do not place the entire blame upon the minister. He may not have had the courage to resist—I am not referring particularly to outside influence, but the influence of those sitting around him, the members of the government who advise him and discuss matters with him. In the government of to-day there are five or six ministers who on every occasion condemned the former Postmaster General for doing the very things the present Postmaster General is doing to-day. He is not acting in his own name, but in the names of his colleagues who place matters before him for his attention. In some cases the law is violated, in others there is an abuse of power, —all to carry out the will of and promises made by members of the cabinet sitting with him in council. Those same gentlemen sat in opposition and at every move made by the former Postmaster General they would suggest that political influence had been used. Those same gentlemen to-day are to blame for the injustices done to employees of the Post Office Department throughout Canada, injustices done to mail contractors, and in connection with the dismissals of postmasters.

Accusations were made against me to such an extent that one might have thought I deserved to be locked behind the bars. During my four years in office I dismissed 164 postmasters for political reasons. What is the record of hon. gentlemen opposite who condemned so severely the former Postmaster General? They uphold and applaud the present head of the department because after only eighteen months in office he has dismissed 454 for political reasons. With those remarks Mr. Chairman, I shall take my seat, but may speak to other matters which come up later.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, without attempting to be boisterous along the same lines as has the hon. member for Gloucester—

Mr. VENIOT: You could not if you would.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): —I dare to say just a few words in refutation of what the hon. member has said concerning the postmaster at Lakeville, and the dismissal of postmasters in my constituency. Last session the hon. member made a laboured attempt to make it appear that the postmaster at Lakeville, Carleton county, New Brunswick, who had been dismissed, was a returned soldier with five or six dependent children. That statement was not correct. The postmaster at Lakeville to whom he referred was Mr. Barter. He has not one dependent child. His children are able to take care of themselves; and he does not live in the vicinity of the Lakeville post office, but at a distance of three or four miles from that place. When my hon. friend tries to make it appear that the Civil Service Commission has not dealt fairly in this instance he is certainly making a laboured attempt which cannot be justified by the facts.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. VENIOT: I never said a word about the Civil Service Commission not dealing fairly with this matter.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I did hear the hon. gentleman say—

Mr. VENIOT: You did not.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I did hear the hon. gentleman say certain representations had been made to the Civil Service Commission, and they had taken no action.

Mr. VENIOT: I made no such statement, and Hansard will show that I did not. I said representations were made to the Post Office Department, and no action had been taken.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. VENIOT: I have a perfect right to get up and correct a statement made by an hon. gentleman when he places words in my mouth that I never uttered.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I am perfectly willing that hon. members to-morrow should read Hansard to see what the hon. gentleman did say.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We will do it.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): The facts are that in this particular case Mr. Barter was appointed because of political partisanship, the post office was removed from a central point in that locality, and in the new location the revenues decreased by at least forty per cent. Just to please my hon. friend and some of his supporters in that particular locality the post office was removed. It remained there until this party came into power, when I asked for it to be placed back at the old central point where it would best serve the public interest. Mr. Barter does not live in that locality at all. The lady who has the post office at the present time does live in the locality, the post office is now centrally located, and it is giving the people full satisfaction; but my hon. friend wants to have it moved away again. These are the facts so far as this post office is concerned.

Now, if my hon. friend wants to be sincere I would ask him to explain just why it was that without cause he dismissed Mr. Robert Reynold from the postmastership of West Glassville and took from him the mail contract which he had tendered for and rightly got. Was not the reason simply that Mr. Reynold was opposed politically to the hon. gentleman, and the latter's friends asked for his dismissal? Mr. Reynold is one of the most reputable gentlemen in that particular section of the country. I would ask him also why he dismissed the old postmaster at Centreville, Mr. Clark, who had been giving the public good service for over fifty years. His son was acting as his assistant. The ex-Postmaster General dismissed that old man, and broke his heart. I would ask him these questions—questions that are really pertinent to this discussion. I want my hon. friend, if he can, to explain to this committee why he took those steps under the circumstances. I think the hon. gentleman's record so far as dismissals are concerned is too well known for him to attempt to make himself appear as one who will do something to-day in order to rectify matters of this kind. We all know there are certain cases through the country districts where postmasters perhaps ought to be dismissed, and there are other cases where postmasters ought not to be dismissed; but my hon. friend while he was head of the department sought on every possible occasion to dismiss without cause postmasters who were really qualified to perform their work in the best interests of the public, and to put in their place men who were not qualified in any way whatever.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If I may bring the discussion back from New Brunswick politics, Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw the attention of the committee to another aspect of the economy program. It is rather interesting to note that the post office is one of the very few revenue-bearing departments. The Minister of Finance told us the other day in his presentation of the budget:

> Collections from the various public services, it is estimated will total $54,000,000. Post office, which is the major contributor under this head, will show an increase of $1,500,000 due to the raise in postage rates and because postage stamps may now be used for certain excise stamp taxes. The post office revenues are estimated at $31,748,000 as against expenditures estimated at $34,550,000. This does not include disbursements made by other departments on account of post office, nor does it, on the other hand, give any credit for handling the mail of the various branches of the public service free of charge.

Now, with a department of this character which has been revenue bearing, and in fact profit producing, in the past, and has only recently fallen behind because of the general depression, it does seem as if we ought not to carry such ruthless economy into that department. The Postmaster General told us a few minutes ago that the post office was run for service and not for profit. But he went on to say he believed the best possible service should be given at the lowest possible cost. I think in a general way of course we would agree with that statement, but it does seem to me the cuts which are being made to-day in the salaries of postmasters and in the amounts granted in some cases to rural postmasters are altogether beyond reason.

There is no class of public servants which have greater sympathy from the public at large than the postmen who bring our letters daily to our doors, and I want to refer to them particularly to-night. We in this corner have had a rather interesting experience. A few years ago we were cooperating very closely with the Conservatives, who then sat at my right, in pleading for higher salaries for postal employees.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The trouble is there has been a reversal of roles, and to-day it is the former Postmaster General, whom we attacked very bitterly at that time, who is appealing for better treatment of postal employees.

Mr. VENIOT: I am merely asking hon. gentlemen opposite to keep their promises.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The Tories never keep their promises.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I hope in this case they will keep their promises. I pleaded then for higher salaries for postal employees; my position is the same to-day. I think the lower paid employees are not given enough remuneration. But unfortunately instead of salaries being raised they are now being cut. I desire to call the attention of the house to a circular recently issued by the Post Office Department, P.S.B. 196, dated April 11, addressed to postmasters throughout the country. These are the first two paragraphs:

> The postmaster is advised that the item which for some years appeared in the estimates to cover overtime and statutory holiday pay, has been deleted from the estimates for 1932-33. Moveover, the amount provided for salaries for 1932-33, even outside of the ten per cent deduction, has been greatly reduced.
> These facts leave the department no alternative but to modify the regulations governing overtime, hours of duty and compensation for work performed on statutory holidays.

That is, we have this situation: The expenditures of a department that has been revenue bearing, that has been so well managed that in the past it has brought some profits, and which this year may suffer a slight decrease, is being cut down in part by the reduction of the salaries of the ordinary postmen. They with other civil servants are asked to lose ten per cent, and in addition are to suffer still further reductions and losses. The next three or four paragraphs of the circular show what economy means in the case of the postmen. It must be remembered also that this circular was issued without any consultation whatever with the postal employees. It has been the custom in the past, when alterations were to be made in working arrangements, to call the postal employees into consultation. Certainly when the postmen asked for increases there were always conferences between the employees and the department. Nothing of that kind has been done in this case. Concessions which have been gradually won through years of steady effort are taken away at one stroke of the pen. I continue reading from the circular:

The regulation weekly period of duty will continue to be forty-four hours, and the departments wishes, if possible to so arrange the staffs that it will not be necessary to call upon any employees to work more than that period.

On the very face of it that takes away the regulation week. It still exists as a kind of pious ideal, but in practice the employees cannot depend upon their regular weekly work. Undoubtedly an effort will be made to increase this period whenever any emergency arises. I read further:

In order to perform the work with the money available, however, it will be absolutely essential to arrange the staffs so that the number of employees on duty at any particular time of the day will not exceed the number actually required to perform the work in hand at that time.

Again, on the face of it that may not sound very serious, but in practice it means that there is to be such rearrangement, as is indicated in the succeeding paragraphs, as will materially increase the time worked by each employee. It means that the most rigorous efficiency methods are to be applied and that in their application there will be a cutting down of wages and an increase in the time worked. I read further:

It follows that the eight hour daily period of duty cannot, in all cases, be subject to a minimum spread of hours, or even to two attendances. Moreover, the concession granted by the department whereby seven hours night work and six hours Sunday work have been considered as a full day, can be no longer operative.

As I understand the situation, this means that the postal employee may be called out two or three or four or five or six times during the day. Formerly his work was spread over a certain period of time, so that he would not be called more than twice in the one day. This meant that he knew what hours he would be free, and could employ those free hours. It meant that he could go home and spend the evening with his family. Only the other day I had a letter from the wife of a postman who said very bitterly that she supposed that from now on she would never know whether her husband would be home regularly to spend the evening. He might be called out and his period of work extended in a most arbitrary fashion. Further than that, the period of night work is to be increased and the six hours when worked on Sunday will no longer constitute a day's work. I read further:

The department desires, however, to maintain the forty-four hour week wherever possible—

I do not know how much that may mean; it depends very largely, I take it, on the local postmaster.

—and to keep Sunday work to the minimum.

Again, the effect of these words "to the minimum" depends very largely upon the local postmaster and upon the amount of work at hand at any particular time.

The fact that no money is provided in the estimates for the fiscal year 1932-33 makes it impossible to continue the granting of compensation to employees at the rate of time and a half for time worked in excess of the weekly period and extra remuneration for work performed on statutory holidays.

In the past, if men worked beyond their regular time they were paid time and a half, which meant that the department, wishing to be as economical as possible, would not very often overwork these men, and the men could count on that. In rush times, however, the men were willing to go back and work because they received added compensation. The same applied to working on statutory holidays, but now those concessions are to be swept away.

Mr. CAYLEY: Is it suggested that this is merely a temporary arrangement?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, there is nothing to indicate that. In brief, as I understand it, this circular means first that there is to be a decrease of staff. That is a very serious thing at this time of great unemployment. I need not labour the matter in this committee, Mr. Chairman, but it does seem to me that at a time when there are hundreds of thousands of men out of work and not knowing what to do, the government departments ought not to be cutting down in this fashion. It is not that there is not enough work to do; there is work enough, but the reduction is being made only by working the men longer hours. It would seem to me that during a period of unemployment the reasonable thing would be to cut down hours, say from the eight hour day to the six hour day, but instead of that according to this circular the working day is being lengthened at this time when so many are unemployed and need work.

Mr. HEAPS: No extra pay.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Further, it not only means no extra pay, as has been suggested, but it means an actual decrease in pay. It means that the postal employee is being cut down by his ten per cent reduction; it means that he is being cut down to the extent of his statutory increase, and in the third place he is being cut down in the amount that he hitherto has received for overtime and for working during statutory holidays. This involves a very serious reduction in the remuneration of those who are already underpaid. It also means a general worsening of conditions because of the irregularity which henceforth must characterize the work of the postal employee.

I should like the Postmaster General to explain very definitely the reason why the department has taken this action. I should like him to justify it. A week or so ago I directed that question to him, and his only reply was to hand me a copy of the circular and say that at some other time he would be willing to make whatever answers I required.

Mr. SAUVE: I gave you a statement also.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, just a brief statement, but does the minister think this statement is good enough? I feel quite certain it is not good enough for this house, and I would like to have some real justification for this action, the results of which I have been trying to outline. I think the public expressions of opinion already have had an influence with regard to this matter. I do not know whether or not the circular has been put into force. If it is not already in force I hope it will be cancelled, and in the meantime if there is any justification whatever for it I hope the Postmaster General will proceed to give that justification in as great detail as possible.

Mr. SAUVE: In view of the economic situation due to practically world-wide conditions, and in view also of the government's policy to effect economies wherever possible, it was necessary to make a careful study of the postal service from an administrative standpoint and to reduce the estimates to an amount which would be more in accordance with the postal revenue. With very few exceptions, post office expenditures have shown an increase each year over the preceding year since confederation, and while there has been an enormous growth in the revenue of the department during this period, there has been considerable variation in the receipts from year to year, with the result that during the past ten years there have been only three in which there has been a surplus. For the five-year period ended March 31, 1931, there has been a steadily growing deficit, which for the year 1930-31 amounted to nearly $6,000,000. In the interests of good administration, this unfavourable balance could not be allowed to become larger, inasmuch as the Post Office Department was functioning only at the expense of other revenue producing departments of government. This is the reason why last year we reduced the estimates for 1931-32 by nearly $1,375,000. That reduction, together with the increase in revenue since the introduction of the three cent postage on July 1, 1931, which I mentioned in my introductory statement, has brought an increase of $1,500,000, and this will result in reducing the deficit for the year just closed to about $2,368,000 as compared with a deficit of $5,876,000 for the fiscal year 1930-31. While this million and a half dollars is an improvement, it does not represent a normal increase in postal revenue, being the result of an increased postage rate; and unless business improves to a considerable extent in the very near future, the revenue of the department for the fiscal year 1932-33 will show very little improvement over that of the fiscal year ended March 31 last.

From the above it will be as readily apparent to the committee as it was to the department that if any real effort were to be made towards improving the financial position of the department it was necessary to reduce the estimates and at the same time retain the three-cent letter rate.

Mr. DUFF: What is the difference in revenue between the two years?

Mr. SAUVE: The deficit in 1930-31 was $5,876,000 and the deficit in 1931-32, estimated, was $2,367,000, an estimated decrease in deficit, in 1931-32, of $3,508,749.

Mr. DUFF: The minister did not understand my question; I did not ask what the deficit was. What I want to know is what the revenue for 1931 was, as compared with 1930.

Mr. SAUVE: We have a million more this year.

Mr. DUFF: What was the gross amount each year?

Mr. SAUVE: If the hon. member will allow me to finish my statement in answer to the ex-Postmaster General I will give him the figures he asks for.

Mr. DUFF: The minister was speaking a moment ago about revenue, and I should like to know what the revenue was last year and what it is this year up to the end of March.

Mr. POULIOT: The minister is not working now; he is labouring.

Mr. SAUVE: The revenue in 1931-32 was $31,947,750, and in 1930-31, $30,416,106, an increase of $1,531,644.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the minister please give the figures again for 1932?

Mr. SAUVE: In 1931-32 the estimate is $31,947,750.

Mr. DUFF: That is the estimate for this year. I want to know the amount collected last year and the amount collected the year before—the actual figures; that is only an estimate.

Mr. SAUVE: The hon. member will find the answer at page 10 of the report of the Postmaster General.

Mr. DUFF: A moment ago the minister gave the estimated revenue for 1932 as $31,947,000; in his budget speech, the Minister of Finance gave the estimated revenue as $31,748,000. There is a difference of $200,000. Who is right, the Minister of Finance or the Postmaster General?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Both are wrong.

Mr. SAUVE: I thank the hon. member for Quebec East for his answer.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Mr. Chairman, the honourable Postmaster General—

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): In all fairness for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), who just asked me a question, would my hon. friend from Laprairie-Napierville allow me to give the former a few explanations?

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): At all times I have dealt fairly with the hon. Postmaster General and I am quite willing to go on doing so for another few minutes.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I would ask the hon. member to supplement his statement with the words: "In order to enable the minister to act courteously towards the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre."

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): In the meantime we are acquiring knowledge.

[Mr Duff.]

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): What information may be secured is so much more added to one's knowledge.

Mr. SAUVE: In answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) I may say that the postal employees in the city offices who are civil servants enjoy the advantages of sick leave, special leave and annual leave, and in addition have been granted the following:

(a) Payment for overtime at the rate of time and a half;
(b) Additional payment for work performed on statutory holidays;
(c) Seven hours night work to be reckoned as eight hours;
(d) Six hours Sunday work to be reckoned as eight hours;
(e) Daily period of duty not to extend over ten hours.

The payment for overtime and the additional payment for work performed on statutory holidays has, up to the present year, been authorized by an item in the estimates. Because of the economic conditions which prevail, this item does not appear this year, and there is neither money nor the authority to make payments under these headings. The extra time allowed for night and Sunday duty was a privilege granted to the men at a time when conditions were more favourable. Under present conditions it is felt that an employee should work eight hours a day, but he is not asked to work more than forty-four hours in any week. This is the work period usually accepted by labour organizations all over the world.

Mr. HEAPS: That is not correct.

Mr. SAUVE: That is my information. It should be borne in mind that while postal employees have all the benefits which accrue to them as civil servants, they have also been granted privileges usually given, only to employees who are paid an hourly rate. While some of these privileges previously granted are now being refused, no hardship will be caused to the postal workers. I might add that these conditions are only temporary and are made necessary by the present economic situation and decrease in business.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. DUPUIS: I have the floor.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to your saying who has the floor, but I do object to another hon. member saying it. May I ask, Mr. Chairman, who has the floor?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis).

Mr. DUPUIS: A few moments ago I was courteous enough to yield the floor to the Postmaster General, and I should like to keep it now. I have very great esteem for hon. members in the far corner, but I think they get a large share of the floor.

For a few minutes I shall continue the argument raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Having been a civil employee in the railway mail service, I know something about what these employees have to do at the present time as compared with what they had to do when I was a member of the staff. The information I have received from friends who are still in the service is to the effect that under the present régime they have to do twice as much as they had to do under previous régimes, either Liberal or Conservative, and in spite of this they receive less money. For instance, these men used to have to work only three or four days a week, but now they are forced to work every day and sometimes on Sundays. The question as to who has the floor being put aside, I am completely in accord with the argument raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I think the postal employees should receive the same consideration as employees in other branches. Eight hours a day may be the rule for other branches in the postal service, but that is not the regulation in the case of the railway mail clerks. If the suggestion put forth by the hon. member is adopted by the department it would mean that more citizens would be given work and a chance to care for their families, and fewer would require direct relief.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if you will allow me, I will speak in my own language because, like the Postmaster General, I am more familiar with that than with English.

(Translation): Mr. Chairman, I regret having to bring before the house a matter that should never have been raised but I feel it my duty to do so as a matter of public interest. On several occasions, the present government boasted of the high plane of their politics. I still recollect how, during the first session it was my privilege to attend, the then Prime Minister, in his spurts of high flown eloquence, would enthuse over the great principles of freedom and statesmanship. And indeed, my admiration would then go to the hon. leader of the opposition at the time, not only on account of his glibness, but also because he soared above petty politics.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): Do you mean the leader of the opposition at Ottawa or at Quebec?

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): I also remember, as stated by my hon. friend the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), the former leader of the opposition at Quebec; I remember his characteristic eloquence, his poise, and the dignified tone of his remarks; I remember how, in his accustomed flights of oratory, he used to advocate those great principles in the days when he was honoured with the leadership of that wonderful opposition in the Quebec legislature—

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Oh, how touching are these words!

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Inspiration is lacking.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): You will get all the inspiration you want from the people at the next election.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): It is starting.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Unless the political life of the hon. minister should end in the Senate.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): That would be worth while.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): I remember—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): He is sly.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): I remember how he strongly stood for ideal principles; but what a change has occurred since, and that to my great sorrow, when the very same men—the former leader of the opposition in this house and the former leader of the opposition at Quebec—came into power, after the 30th of October, and assumed the responsibility of government. What a change has taken place, and how startling that change was! What did we find? As far as I am concerned, I found a condition for which I must express my appreciation to the hon. Postmaster General. During the first days of the session, after the good people, who at one time had taken stock in the promises made by our hon. friends on the other side of the house, and realized that they could not expect anything, they made a rush to secure the jobs under the control of the powers that be. And then, the hon. Postmaster General was deluged with such a large number of applications that he knew not which way to turn. I still remember his first replies—as they may be found in the public records. For instance, to those asking for the dismissal of a rural mail contractor he would reply—

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): What item is my honourable friend speaking on?

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): I will give it in French and should the hon. Postmaster General so desire—

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): It is in order to discuss any matter.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): I will quote it in the English language.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I simply wish to take note of it.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): I refer to item 281, on page 63, which also includes: "Mail service by ordinary land conveyance comprising rural mail delivery". Is the hon. minister's wish gratified?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes; it is so that I may better catch the meaning of the statement.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): If that be practically the only power left to you; catch it. To revert to my argument, I remember the Postmaster General saying at the time: "We cannot dismiss rural mail contractors so long as such employees are doing their duty, because they are not under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. They are just contractors and, consequently, we cannot dismiss them unless it be established that they are guilty of political partisanship while discharging their duties and have been remiss therein as a result of such activities."

To make my point clear, may I quote from Sessional Paper No. 381, 1931, respecting rural mail delivery routes No. 1 and 2, at Sherrington, county of Napierville. The minister received from his political friends in that district, numerous letters informing him that a man by the name of Roch Lussier, who, may I say incidentally, is a farmer, the father of thirteen children and the supporter of his aged parents, respectively 80 and 84 years old and both living with him—

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That is of no account to them.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Here is the answer made by the honourable minister through the Deputy Postmaster General. The letter is from Mr. L. J. Gaboury, Deputy Postmaster General, under date of Ottawa, 8th September, 1931, in answer to a Mr. Rivet who had made application for the position of rural mail carrier. The third paragraph reads:

In connection with the activities of the contractor during the last eleciion I may say that the department calls upon the contractors to perform their mail service in a satisfactory manner, but nothing in their present contracts prevents them from exercising their rights as private citizens. However, I may add that the department disapproves any active political partisanship on the part of the contractors while discharging their duties.

In this particular case, although at the request of his political friends the defeated candidate in my constituency had brought his influence to bear on the honourable minister, in spite of that, I say the Postmaster General was reluctant to deal with dismissals of that kind—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): He is weak.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): I hold him to be a good citizen, a good Canadian; I admired him when he was in Quebec and I dislike those who maliciously say of him: "A man may shine as a subordinate officer and be a failure as leader". I do not agree with them; I admire the Postmaster General; the only weakness I find with him is that he is too easily caught. A few minutes ago, he stated how fond he was of apprehending; personally, I rather think he enjoys being apprehended—I mean in his disquisitions, of course.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Do not attempt it.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Then, after pressure had been exerted upon the hon. minister, an investigation was granted in the case of Roch Lussier. What came out of that inquiry? A horrid crime, in the eyes of the Conservatives. On the 28th of July, 1930—the hon. minister still remembers the unexpected victory achieved by his party—

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Unexpected and fortuitous.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): The Conservative party had come into power, but the member for Laprairie-Napierville, a Liberal, has been elected. So, on election night, the citizens of Laprairie-Napierville celebrated my success; they "wetted" it, may I say, and I am sure, the honourable minister will not blame them.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): It was raining heavily.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): A storm was raging.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): To such an extent that the fire department had to be called upon. I beg your pardon, that was the following day. On the night I refer to they were celebrating the election of the Liberal candidate.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Poor Roch Lussier happened to be there. Such was the outcome of the inquiry. The next day, the news came that throughout the country, the Conservative party had won the election, and then it was that, the friends of the Conservatives, of Mr. Bennett and the Postmaster General, in order to keep up with the Liberals of Sherrington, also held a celebration, but with much more bluster. At any rate, they only acted as my hon. friends opposite always do: At the least thing that happens to them they smash their desks—

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): They lose their heads.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation):—In their noisy enthusiasm.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): When the price of butter goes up.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): When the price of butter is increased a cent—

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): They rejoice with drums beating.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): —they beat the drums, and when the price of butter goes down, they may be seen scurrying away through the lobbies, with long drawn faces and as mute as fish. But, on that particular night the enthusiasm of the hon. Postmaster General's friends rose to such a pitch that a scrap seemed impending. And so some of our friends, the parish authorities themselves, decided to put an end to the celebration and, were it to become too noisy, to call out the fire department,—and, as it appears, poor Roch Lussier was one of the crowd. Such was the crime discovered against that employee.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): A fire hose crime.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): And notwithstanding the letter, a really touching letter, written by Roch Lussier to the Postmaster General, on the 15th of May, 1931, in the hope of enlisting his sympathy, and part of which read as follows:

I am just in receipt, from Mr. Taylor, district superintendent at Montreal, of a letter advising me that my contracts for rural mail delivery shall expire three months from to-day.

Note that to an inquiry previously made by him, the hon. Postmaster General had replied that Lussier's contract would not expire until 1934.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): He forgot all about it.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): And Mr. Lussier goes on:

I imagine you are not aware of the fact that I am the father of eleven children and that I also support, in these hard times, an old man of 84 years of age. You are reducing my family to absolute want; and I sincerely hope, hon. sir, that you will take pity on the poor man I am, who besides being crippled, must provide for a large family.

And because of his having joined others who were celebrating the victory of the 28th July, that unfortunate employee was dismissed—

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): He shall pay for that.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation):—in spite of the statement repeatedly made by the Postmaster General that these employees could take part in politics provided they did not do so while discharging their duties.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): He shall pay for that.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Mr. Chairman, there is another case to which I would like to call the attention of the hon. Postmaster General; I refer to the case of the postmaster at Laprairie. The case is familiar to him. I see him shaking his head and laughing at the same time; but I know that inwardly he does not feel like laughing.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I am not laughing at the case.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): The hon. minister is familiar with the case. I may point out, Mr. Chairman, that my intention in referring to these matters is merely to show how we in the province of Quebec have cause to be ashamed of the position taken by the Postmaster General in connection with these dismissals since he is in charge of the department. I wish to bring this before the committee because the case is typical of the practice generally followed in every constituency of the province of Quebec. Indeed, it is humiliating.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): When we see the conditions obtaining in other provinces, when the other members of the government as well as the former members of the cabinet, are real statesmen and are above petty politics; when we see the hon. Postmaster General stooping down to such pettiness, we are ashamed of our own province, of our race. Such policies should cease and the Postmaster General should try to vindicate his position before the committee. That is the only reason why I rose in this committee.

Reverting to the case of the postmaster—

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): You are hurting your own party.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): No, I am not hurting my own party; the hon. minister is wrong in saying that. I know beforehand the argument he will resort to; he will try to claim that his predecessor in office followed the same course. Yesterday, when he intimated having made two dismissals, I protested, saying: "More unemployed", and I heard him reply: "We have precedents." I fancy that in his own opinion—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. gentleman has spoken twenty minutes.

Mr. HEAPS: He may speak forty minutes.

Mr. DUPUIS: I once made a speech of twenty minutes, and was cut off at the wrong point. I should not like a similar occurrence on this occasion.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I was saying that yesterday the Postmaster General was invoking precedents. Without admitting his argument, which is a specious one, I am wondering how such a responsible man as the Postmsater General could avail himself of a precedent in itself unacceptable. When his friends were sitting on this side of the house, it was considered by them a poor policy to dismiss employees at random, with or without sufficient grounds. But, I revert to the hon. minister's argument who claims I should not appeal to their own precedents. When my friends were in office and made dismissals, they only did so after being satisfied beyond doubt that the man was guilty of actual partisanship, and that the offence had been of frequent occurrence, day in and day out, year in and year out. Personally, I know of requests made to us, as well as to the late Roch Lanctôt, during the many years he sat in this house; I also am aware that for a period of five or six years, Mr. Lanctôt repeatedly declined to have anything to do with dismissals.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): And the simple reason was that as a rule, the granting of such requests for the dismissal of an employee results in an injustice being committed, and from a political standpoint, the procedure is also unsound inasmuch as for every vacancy there are as many as 20, 30, 40 applicants, and only one can be appointed. The hon. Postmaster General did not know that, but he will realize it at the next election.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): He shall pay for it.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): I now come to the case of Césaire Gagné, a venerable old man whose only fault was that of being a Conservative. I refer to one of those requests for dismissals with which Mr. Lanctôt would have nothing to do. For a period of for four or five years, Mr. Lanctôt had disregarded the pressure brought to bear upon him, but finally as result of repeated demands from the majority of the electors in the parish of Sherrington, an inquiry was granted. I was present at the hearing, and what was the result? When Mr. Patenaude would visit the constituency, Mr. Gagné would rush to the hall where the meeting was held and act as chairman. And, it was also established that in election time the committee rooms at Sherrington were located on Mr. Gagne's premises in his own garage. Such were the political activitivities that were brought to light.

Is Mr. Noël Fontaine's case similar? Fontaine had been, during fifteen years, one of the principal Liberal organizers of Laprairie-Napierville. He was a carriage maker by trade; when automobiles made their appearance in this country, Noël Fontaine, like all other carriage makers, had to give up his trade. When the position of postmaster became vacant, Mr. Roch Lanctôt, who was of a generous disposition, deemed it his duty to help this citizen, he had him appointed postmaster. Then, quite content with his new post, Mr. Noël Fontaine notified us, previous to the election of 1930, that he was entirely through with politics, because of his age, he did not wish to jeopardize his position, the only means he had of earning a livelihood. The hon. Postmaster General is aware of these facts. Mr. Fontaine notified me of his decision. I approved of it. He did not leave the premises of the post office neither before, nor during the election, nor after, except to fulfil his duties as a citizen.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): And, to go to church.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Mr. Fontaine did not even vote. It was proved at the inquiry held that Mr. Fontaine was not present at any meeting, neither liberal nor conservative; he did not even vote. What happened? An inquiry was held—the petty system of holding investigations, which I call the paltry system of third class politicians of instituting investigations simply with the idea and determination of creating vacancies to appoint friends. That is the attitude taken by the hon. Postmaster General.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): This system of holding inquiries was introduced by the Liberal party, in 1923.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Yes, that is a fact, but to hold serious inquiries, not the German way of investigating, but inquiries according to the principles of liberalism, to do justice to whom justice is due; not inquiries held with the well set determination of dismissing those charged with political partisanship. Not inquiries simply to cover up one's failings or simply to throw dust in the people's eyes, but real inquiries.

The inquiry held in connection with the case of Noël Fontaine constitutes the greatest injustice ever committed. Had it only been an exceptional case in the administration of the Post Office Department, I would not have mentioned it, but this is a general practice. I can say without fear of being contradicted, that in all ridings of the country, but especially in Quebec, similar cases have happened.

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): The victim.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): What happened? You will find in the Sessional Paper No. 198 with reference to the case of Noël Fontaine, postmaster of Laprairie, at page 44, a letter from the Rev. Mr. Picotte, parish priest, addressed to the Deputy Minister, Mr. Gaboury. The hon. Postmaster General knows about this letter, for I must acknowledge that his deputy minister is very competent and keeps him well posted on matters concerning his department. I feel certain, without asking him, that his deputy minister drew his attention to this letter. What has the parish priest of Laprairie to say?

Mr. Noël Fontaine, the present postmaster feels anxious over certain charges lodged against him. At the request of this gentleman, who is a parishoner of mine, I am pleased to inform you that the post office is well managed and that I know of no complaint in that respect.

As to his supposed active political partisanship, I believe this charge is entirely unfounded—

This is from the parish priest himself.

—and I am led to believe that he kept entirely out of politics, not even casting his vote, which, however, is an undeniable right.

I have nothing else in mind than to protect a parishoner against charges which I believe to be unfounded.

Does the hon. Postmaster attach any importance to the letter of the parish priest of Laprairie? Not in the least!

I shall read to the hon. Postmaster General another letter, one from a friend of his, who took an active part against me in the election, he used his influence and time in an effort to elect my opponent; I am speaking of the letter of Mr. Emilien Lamarre, residing at Laprairie, an honourable citizen. He is one of my best friends during 365 days in the year, the only exception, is election day.

What has Mr. Emilien Lamarre stated in his letter addressed to the deputy minister—who must again have referred it to the hon. Postmaster General:

Sir,—

As a Conservative having taken an active part on behalf of Mr. Gustave Monet, at the last election, I take the freedom of submitting to you the following facts:

"Mr. Noël Fontaine, the postmaster of Laprairie has been charged with active political partisanship at the last election.

It is, however, acknowledged here in Laprairie that Mr. Noël Fontaine took no active part in the election and that he even did not cast his vote."

This is a Conservative who speaks; did the Postmaster General again put no faith in him? He disbelieves parish priests and even his own friends.

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): It is a foregone conclusion.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation):

In making this statement, I do so for justice's sake.

These are the words of Mr. Lamarre.

I trust that an old man, the father of a family, who fulfils his duty well, will not be thrown on the street, through false representations.

What did the hon. Postmaster General do? Notwithstanding these facts, Mr. Noël Fontaine was dismissed, he was thrown on the street and, to-day, this man is without work and entirely unable to work.

What were the findings of the investigations? I shall quote them. It was not shown that Mr. Noël Fontaine took an active part in politics, but the statements of the parish priest of Laprairie and Mr. Lamarre, to the effect that the postmaster had taken no active part in politics were corroborated. The evidence showed that two sons of Mr. Noël Fontaine had driven voters on election day. What is the law in this respect? The hon. Postmaster General referred me to the provisions of the act in answer to a letter I wrote him. My letter was as follows: Sir. In my interview with you last session, you assured me that Mr. Noël Fontaine would not be dismissed. Why did you dismiss him? The hon. Postmaster General in his answer stated: "I am obliged to conform myself to the provisions of the act, with reference to the findings of the commissioners holding an inquiry." By virtue of what act? Pursuant to article 55 of the Civil Service Act, which I shall quote to the house—

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): The minister is supreme in such matters.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): The minister is supreme in such matters? He had not the right to act as he did, under the circumstances, because the only reason given by the commissioner holding the inquiry was that two sons of the postmaster had actively participated in the election. Who is the postmaster? The sons? I shall quote the words of the hon. Postmaster General himself when he said to me: "Those boys are not the postmaster, but Mr. Noël Fontaine is." Article 55 of the Civil Service Act reads as follows:

No deputy head, officer, clerk or employee in the civil service shall be debarred from voting at . . .

The same article continues:

. . . but no such deputy head, officer, clerk or employee shall engage in partisan work in connection with any such election or contribute, receive or in any way deal with any money for any party funds.

Was Mr. Noël Fontaine guilty of this? Was this proved at the inquiry? Not a word, in this respect, was mentioned in the findings of the commission.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): who was the commissioner?

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Mr. Bruno Nantel,—a fair-minded man otherwise, but who probably had received instructions from the Postmaster General. He had instructions to dismiss Mr. Noël Fontaine, and he performed his task.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): That was done everywhere, in all counties.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): I shall read the findings of the commissioner:

After hearing the evidence of witnesses, I find:

That the postmaster of Laprairie, Mr. Noël Fontaine, did nothing to prevent his sons, Fernand and Gérard, from participating in the contest, at the last Dominion election, the latter living under his roof and being under his control, also in preventing his wife from attending meetings, etc. . . .

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): What a crime!

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): That is the crime that Mr. Noël Fontaine is guilty of.

[Mr. Dupuis.]

Where is it stated in the act that the sons or the wife of a postmaster have not right to fulfill their duty as citizens?

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): It is a Tory statute.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation):

That the postmaster sought to influence the vote of the Alfred Beaulieu family or at least that of Mrs. Alf Beaulieu, by pointing out the fact that the Beaulieu family were much more in the obligations of Roch Lanctôt, deceased, and former Liberal member, than in those of Hon. Mr. Patenaude, former federal minister, and this, on the eve of the election.

I wish to draw the attention of the house to the fact that, we Liberals, seek qualifications rather than party affiliations. I might state on my behalf that—in the findings of the inquiry the name of Mr. Beaulieu, a Conservative is mentioned—if the Deputy Postmaster was allowed to speak he would state that I, Vincent Dupuis, after being returned for the riding of Laprairie-Napierville, did all in my power to obtain a promotion for this Conservative. Why? Because he was a competent man, and that I wished to follow the example of other provinces by giving preference to competent people rather than to those with only a political record to their credit. The son of Mr. Alfred Beaulieu, who is mentioned in the findings of the inquiry was appointed to a position with a salary of $3,000 to $4,000 per year.

In contrast with this we have the stand taken by our friends opposite throughout the country but especially so in Quebec, by the hon. Postmaster General.

I, therefore, beg the hon. Postmaster General on behalf of his province, which is also mine, to amend his shabby ways, cease dismissing people for the sake of dismissing, and to rise to the level of the great political questions of the day, as he must have noted that there are, in Ottawa, questions which are worthy of his attention.

For instance, the interest which he should take in the welfare of the farming class. When the government of which the hon. Postmaster General is a member, granted a five cents premium per bushel of wheat exported by the western farmers, what did the Postmaster General do? Did he ask for the same grant for Quebec and the eastern provinces? Did he request a grant of a single cent as a premium on butter; he who talked so much of butter during the last election; he who bewailed the sad fate of farmers who were paid, at that time, only 30 to 40 cents per dozen eggs and 40 cents per pound of butter? Did he bestir himself?

The hon. Postmaster General is partly responsible for the new trade treaty with New Zealand. A five cents entry duty is levied on butter; New Zealand, on the other hand, allows a premium of 5 cents, which makes up for the entry duty levied here.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Is the hon. member, at present, discussing the estimates?

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): I am referring to that subject. I state that the hon. Postmaster General has no right—

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): That is a fact, sir.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): —to lower himself by meddling with such petty matters.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I shall willingly answer questions with reference to the administration of the Post Office Department.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): I did not catch the hon. Postmaster General's statement.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member may criticize the Postmaster General on the administration of his department when the house is in committee, but he is not entitled to express all the grievances he may have against the government, he must restrict himself to the discussion on the estimates.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): It does not behoove the Postmaster to teach me a lesson. As he avails himself of precedents, he has but to cast his eyes around him, and he will find numerous precedents, it is not necessary for him to look across the floor, he will find more evidence of this fact on his own side. The hon. Postmaster General is not only responsible for his department but also for the other departments. I have always understood that, according to the constitution and public law, a member—the hon. Postmaster General is a member also—is not only the representative of his riding but of the whole country.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Hear, hear!

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. gentleman has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. CASGRAIN: But, Mr. Chairman, since the hon. Postmaster General put a question to him, the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville has a right to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Interruptions are not counted in the forty minutes; necessarily they cannot be; and in any event the hon. member has had his full forty minutes.

Mr. DUPUIS: Mr. Chairman, as your decision constitutes a precedent, I should like a ruling of the house. The rule, I think, is to the effect that when a member speaking in committee of the whole is stopped by another member, who in his turn makes a speech, the previous speaker has the right to speak again for forty minutes.

Mr. CASGRAIN: We ask for a ruling.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): That is not what happened. The hon. Postmaster General made some remarks, not a speech.

Some hon. MEMBERS: He made a speech.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): It was not in the nature of an interruption of the speech to the extent of giving the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville the right to speak for another forty minutes.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville having sat down, there is no rule to prevent his getting up and speaking again now.

Mr. DUPUIS: The hon. ex-Postmaster General was so treated a few minutes ago. His forty minutes had expired, another member rose, and after he sat down the ex-Postmaster General spoke again. I do not know whether there are two standards of weights and measures in this house—one for the Tories, another for the Liberals; I do not think so. However, I desire to speak for only a few minutes, and I will proceed in French.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I have but a few words to add. I do not think that the Postmaster General is very convinced of the wisdom of such a policy and I hope he regrets now the way he acted under pressure from his friends.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): He has the regret but not the firm resolve.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): I trust that he will have the firm resolve and that—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury) (Text): Am I to understand the hon. member is now finishing his speech.

Mr. DUPUIS (Text): Yes, I suppose the chairman is following me all right? I am making my concluding remarks. (Translation) I was saying that the hon. Postmaster General must now regret his shabby political policy.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member is now laying a charge against the former Postmaster General.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): I beg your pardon, I did not catch what was said.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. mem- is laying a charge—

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): I am no more there.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): I wish to find out what the Postmaster General said.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. mem- is laying a charge against the former Postmaster General.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): He will soon again be the Postmaster General. Is that what the hon. Postmaster General wishes to know?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): What beautiful language!

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): It is prophetic.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): I may say to the hon. Postmaster General that should he not be reelected at the next election, it will be no misfortune for the country which does not seem greatly satisfied with him.

I therefore beg the hon. Postmaster General to abandon this petty policy, I beg of him not to continue making shabby dismissals which have been far too numerous to date, and this, on behalf of my province. I further beg of him to follow the example set by Quebec members and be sufficiently broad-minded to take an interest in questions which concern the whole country, and as I stated, especially those relating to the farming class, in fact to all classes of society, and this, not simply by speeches on hustings, at election time. As the Postmaster General holds an important post in the Cabinet I trust that he may use his influence and that of his province, one of the oldest of confederation, to obtain for it the same advantages which are granted to the other provinces.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Mr. Chairman, on February 18, last, the hon. member for Megantic put a number of questions to the Postmaster General with reference to a Mr. MacKinnon who travels all over Quebec and Canada, for the purpose, I think, of obtaining $5 subscriptions. According to Hansard of April 14, 1932, I find that there was sent to mail contractors on July 19, 1927, a notice which ends as follows:

Mr. MacKinnon obtains money under false pretences when he threatens the mail carriers to have their contracts cancelled, while at the same time making promises to them.

S. Tanner,
Administrator of the District of Quebec.

[Mr. Sauvé.]

I wish to inquire from the hon. Postmaster General what steps he intends to take in this matter. When I read in Hansard of February, 1932, the questions put by the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge), as well as the answers to these questions, I wrote personally to the 42 mail contractors of the county of St. Johns-Iberville, to inquire whether they had had the visit of a person named Garfield MacKinnon, requesting them to subscribe $5 to form part of a mail carriers' association. I received their answers and, out of 42, I find that 38 have paid the sum of $5 to Garfield MacKinnon. I have in my possession about thirty receipts given to mail contractors of my county.

May I ask the hon. Postmaster General what steps he intends to take with reference to Mr. Garfield MacKinnon, who for the last ten years has been travelling throughout the country exploiting mail carriers. This same question has already been put by the hon. member for Megantic. The latter's speech on April 14, last, showed that the defeated Conservative candidate in Megantic, at the last dominion election, had approved of the mail carrier's meeting held by MacKinnon for the purpose of obtaining subscriptions. I think that, after all the information gathered, the Post Office Department should act. The hon. Postmaster has always been a champion of the farming class; he is also aware that most, if not all, of those who hold mail contracts are farmers. I have here a letter from a widow residing in my county who paid $5 to this person. He has been living at the country's expense for the last 12 years, by soliciting $5 subscriptions. He went through the county of St. Johns-Iberville, during the first days of December and I think, he visited the county of Megantic in the month of January. It would only be fair and reasonable that instead of dismissing employees, the Post Office Department and particularly the Postmaster General should look into the case of Garfield MacKinnon who obtains money under false representations. I heard that his case had been investigated. I wish to state that more haste was shown in holding inquiries against public officials charged with political partisanship, especially in my county. A public employee was charged with having taken an active part at a political meeting, in August last. Two days after a commissioner called on him; a mockery inquiry was held and as the commission had instructions to find him guilty, he was dismissed.

Previous to resuming my seat I wish to inquire whether the government intends to have MacKinnon arrested; the latter has been roaming over the country for more than twelve years robbing mail contractors.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Answer!

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): No.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wonder to whom I should first reply.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Laprairie is quite close to Two Mountains.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Will you allow me to answer? The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked some questions a short while ago. He made a few remarks and intended to make others. The hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville made a long plea—

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Which impressed me strongly.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): —in connection with a number of dismissals. The hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville (Mr. Rhéaume), without giving me an opportunity to reply the hon. member for Napierville, puts to me a series of questions.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): That is unfair.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Since I have but five minutes left to reply, I shall begin by answering the last speaker and I shall reply to the hon. member for Napierville tomorrow. The hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville contends that this man MacKinnon has been operating in Quebec, for the last ten years.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Twelve years, since 1920.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): He was then at work when our hon. friends opposite were in power. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) who was Postmaster General then, is also a friend of the farming class, he however, allowed this MacKinnon to carry on as he is doing to-day. I take it for granted that the hon. member for St. Johns did not wish to charge the member for Gloucester, then Postmaster General, with sacrificing the farmers' interests or illtreating them. Why did the former Postmaster General not act then? I shall inform the hon. member: it is because he had no legal right to do so. I cannot blame the former Postmaster General; he was right. This man MacKinnon is a former employee of the Post Office Department. He wants to organize a mail contractors' association. He is entitled to do so. He is free to carry out his plans and the Postmaster General has no right to interfere by having him arrested. If there is ground to take proceedings, it behooves the Justice department to do so, but even the latter department—such is the information I have gathered from the department's legal adviser —cannot interfere.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): What is his name?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Mr. MacKinnon calls on mail carriers, invites them to join the association, promising them protection and requests a contribution of $5 to found and maintain the association.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): This is rather high in these hard times.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Will the hon. Postmaster General allow me to ask him a question? Is it not a fact that this Mr. MacKinnon contends that he is acting under the authority of the Post Office department.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): No, I am not so informed.

Mr. FERLAND (Translation): Was he not accompanied by the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe (Mr. Laflèche), so as to advertise his association in the county of Richmond Wolfe?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I am not aware of this.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): He shot through like an arrow (la flèche).

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I wish to be fair, I have no interest whatsover to shield this Mr. MacKinnon; however, the department looked into the matter, and I drew the attention of the officials in my department to the speech of the hon. member for Megantic, the latter was given the reasons why we could not act.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Yes, I have them here.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): He cannot contend, therefore, that we acted in bad faith. I think that we supplied him with all the explanations which he required. Again, I state that if it can be shown to me that it is possible to take proceedings against MacKinnon, I am ready, on behalf the Post Office Department to do everything possible. In a number of cases as much as my authority permitted me, I intervened; however, I am not as imprudent as to overstep my powers.

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): Did the Postmaster General notify the rural mail carriers to be on their guard against this man MacKinnon?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Certainly. All inspectors were notified. On March 8, 1932, we wrote to all inspectors.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): It was somewhat late.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): It was also late, three years ago. He had been carrying on this business for 9 years.

Mr. DUBOIS (Translation): Better late than never.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Does the hon. Postmaster General, according to his argument, contend that a person is entitled to roam over the country stating: we shall found an association and you shall contribute $5 towards it? He did this for ten years. No association was ever founded. He can be of no benefit to mail contractors. I have in my possession letters in which this Mr. MacKinnon contends that he is so authorized by the Post Office Department.

The government should have this gentleman arrested, order an inquiry and summon witnesses.

The following is what one letter contains:

In answer to your letter with reference to Mr. Garfield MacKinnon, I must say that he called at my house on December 1, 1932. He stated that he was a mail carrier in Ontario, working on behalf of mail carriers with the approval of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) who had promised him a salary increase for all mail carriers.

This Mr. MacKinnon, requests a contribution of $5 from all members of the association.

Here is a gentleman, who travels through the rural districts and obtains money under false representations. He makes use of the Prime Minister's name, and contends that he is the president or secretary—sometimes he is president and at other times secretary—of an association which has no existence. A person who obtains $5 worth of goods under false representations, is arrested, and here is a person who, in the county of St. Johns-Iberville alone, enticed 38 mail contractors out of a 42, and obtained $190—he enticed a few hundreds in Megantic county—yet the Post Office Department has no authority to have him arrested and take proceedings against him.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): In reply to the hon. member—I suppose that he expects a reply—I do not think that the department can take legal proceedings against this person simply because he wishes to found an association and charge $5 to each member. I should like to have the views of the former Postmaster General on this matter. He studied this question himself, when he was Postmaster General and must have reached the same conclusion as I have this evening.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): If the hon. Postmaster General will allow me, it is the first time that I hear a minister state that people can roam over our rural districts, make false representations and obtain money on the strength of it, it is the first time, I say, that I hear a minister of the crown state that the law cannot reach these people. The hon. Postmaster General stated a short while ago that it was amazing that this man had not been arrested before. I may say to him that up to this year, it had been impossible to obtain conclusive evidence, clear proof of false representations made by this Mr. MacKinnon. This year, thanks to the activities of the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge), evidence has been supplied to the Postmaster General, evidence which shows that MacKinnon visited our rural districts, that on three particular occasions he obtained money by threatening the mail contractors that unless they subscribed $5.00 each they would lose their contracts. The hon. Postmaster General has three affidavits in this respect. He is therefore, to-day, in possession of sufficient evidence to have this man arrested. The hon. Postmaster General cannot contend to-day, that under the Liberal regime, we did not carry out our duty.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I do not contend that.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): The hon. Postmaster General must realize that it is always difficult to obtain the necessary proof in such cases, and it is only lately that the department has been able to obtain them. There is no doubt that MacKinnon obtained money under false representations. I feel certain that the Postmaster General has not given the question the attention it deserves. we shall again take up the matter to-morrow...

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): He will think it over.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation) ...and I shall inquire from the Postmaster General what he intends to do with reference to this person.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, April 29, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

DRY DOCKS AT TADOUSSAC

Mr. PIERRE-F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting a petition from the citizens of Tadoussac, in the county of Charlevoix-Saguenay, requesting government aid in connection with dredging at the Tadoussac dry docks.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. S. C. ROBINSON (West Essex) moved that the second report of the joint committee of both houses on the printing of parliament presented to the house on Wednesday, April 27, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I beg to lay on the table on behalf of the Minister of Labour, who is confined to his house to-day, orders in council Nos. 958, 972, 973, 974 and 975, all dated April 28, 1932. One of the orders in council refers to the regularizing of the undertaking in connection with the Manitoba savings office. Another deals with the advance made to Saskatchewan for the purchase of seed grain; another with the advance made to the province of Manitoba for the purchase of seed grain, and another with the advance made to the province of Alberta for the purchase of seed grain. The others deal with the ordinary contracts.

GRAIN CHARGES AT CHURCHILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. B. M. STITT (Nelson): I desire to ask the Minister of Railways a question based on an article which appeared in MacLean's magazine under date of May 1, under the title of "Churchill a Mistake." I do not intend to burden the house by reading the whole of this ridiculous article, but I just wish to say in passing that the article in question is the most distorted conglomeration of wild guesses and half truths that ever appeared between the covers of any magazine in the history of journalism in Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. gentleman put his question?

Mr. STITT (Nelson): The paragraph on which I wish to base my question, Mr. Speaker, appears on page 12 and reads:

> The test shipments of 545,000 bushels of wheat made from the new seaport last September cost the taxpayers of Canada over $1 per bushel for the Churchill grain elevator alone.

The question I would ask the minister is just how much truth is there in that statement?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Of course the handling of grain through an elevator does not cost anything like $1 per bushel, and if the article in question is referring simply to the handling of grain I would say that that costs around one cent or a little more per bushel. I did not see the article and I do not know whether it is including interest and maintenance charges, and so forth. But so far as the handling alone of grain through an elevator is concerned it costs from one cent to one and one-half cents per bushel to handle it through the elevator, leaving out any storage charges.

PRIVILEGE—MR. SMITH (VICTORIA-CARLETON)

On the orders of the day:

Mr. B. F. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I wish to correct an impression left on the house last night by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) in connection with the post office at Lakeville. The words to which I refer appear at page 2472 of Hansard, where he states that when Barter came back from overseas he became assistant postmaster at Lakeville, and that when the postmaster died Barter applied for the position of postmaster, and he was appointed to that position in 1930.

I wish to correct that statement, Mr. Speaker. I know that the hon. member for Gloucester would be the last man in the house who would want a statement to go out which was not correct, and the statement in question is not correct. The postmaster referred to is still alive, but was dismissed by the ex-Postmaster General for political reasons.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I can correct any mistakes I make without depending on the hon. gentleman.

LAUNCHING, P.E.I., WHARF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): I have received a number of letters and telegrams to date urging that repairs be made to the wharf at Launching, Prince Edward Island, in time so that the farmers will have a chance to move their fertilizer over that wharf, and I would ask the minister to take these representations into his early and favourable consideration.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): I can only say in reply to the hon. gentleman that I have no knowledge of the situation at this particular wharf, but I will have inquiries made and see what can be done to remedy any defects which may exist.

NEW ZEALAND TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 62, respecting a certain trade agreement between Canada and New Zealand.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the discussion begins on the second reading of this bill, may I ask the government if they have considered a point which came up when we were discussing the Australian treaty. The Prime Minister at that time drew the attention of the house to the fact that where there were certain resolutions to be passed by the committee of ways and means which affected the treaty, they must be passed before the bill respecting the treaty itself would be considered. I do not mention the point to create embarrassment in any way, but where there is a rule of procedure attention ought to be drawn to it. I have before me the Prime Minister's words on the point as they are recorded in Hansard of July 15, 1931, at page 3770, as concerned the Australian treaty. My right hon. friend said:

> I consulted the clerk at the table with respect to the matter, and he advised me that under the practice of this house the bill should not be proceeded with until such time as the tariff items in the agreement had been sanctioned by the committee, following which the bill to confirm the agreement will be introduced.

A little later on he said:

> These resolutions are now before the committee of the house, and the proper course is to take no further step until the committee have completed consideration of the resolutions which were placed in the votes and proceedings the other evening and proceeded with yesterday by consent of the house, for which I thanked the right hon. gentleman yesterday since it enabled us to advance practically all the items.
> I think there are very few items outstanding: we will dispose of those this afternoon.

To make clear that I am not seeking to embarrass the situation in any way, I would suggest that if there is any such regulation the procedure might be regularized if the house went into committee on the resolutions and took in advance up the one or two items that are mentioned. This may not be necessary; I am not sure.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the right hon. gentleman in this instance overlooks at least the fact that the items of wool and hides are not in the treaty at all, and therefore as far as the treaty is concerned may not be dealt with. It was because of difficulties of that character that they are in separate resolutions, which will be introduced by the Minister of Finance, and of which notice has been given as appears from the records of the house. Therefore the difficulties to which the right hon. gentleman refers do not arise.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The items, however, have been placed as they are in the resolution in consequence of something that has been done under the treaty?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is another thing. However, they are not in the treaty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Thank you.

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (North Bruce): Before the Minister of Trade and Commerce proceeds with the second reading of this bill, cannot he make to the house a statement with regard to the general principles of the treaty? The desirability of a treaty with the sister dominion of New Zealand is not at all controversial. I believe the country has received with considerable satisfaction word that a treaty has been concluded, and I also believe both political parties are glad that a treaty has been consummated.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps I might help the hon. gentleman. It was the intention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in moving the second reading of the bill to make a statement. Perhaps my hon. friend did not observe that he was about to do so.

Mr. MALCOLM: Thank you.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in moving the second reading of this bill it is not my intention to go into any elaborate explanation of it. I thought the best procedure would be merely to make a very brief statement, and then when the house is in committee we shall have the material on hand to deal with any questions that may need elucidation.

The new trade agreement with New Zealand is a very simple arrangement. It includes two principles, which perhaps are somewhat new in trade agreements. One of them is in the Australian agreement. It is a protective clause which permits the two governments by mutual agreement to come to an understanding upon any one item that might temporarily cause embarrassment to either country. We think it is a very happy addition to trade agreements, and our experience in connection with the Australian treaty has carried out our expectations in that regard. The other principle in the New Zealand treaty, which is not included in the Australian treaty, and which we also think is of merit, is that it is possible for either country to vary the rate of duty on any item in the schedule upon giving notice to the other contracting party. Of course they are at liberty to vary the rates of duty in the tariff generally. So that the treaty is a little more elastic than any treaties that have been entered into by this country with other countries in times gone by. By this process we confidently hope that we shall avoid the necessity of abandoning what may be recognized as, generally speaking, a good agreement because of some difference over any one or more items. That is virtually all that is new or different in this agreement from any other trade agreement.

I should like to add this further observation, that the terms of this treaty have been arrived at after careful consideration by the representatives of both dominions, and we believe it represents the very best that can be secured, having in mind the interests and the rights of each country. It must be obvious of course, and no doubt is present in the minds of all hon. members, that to any bargain there must be two parties, and that neither party can expect to have everything precisely suitable to its interests and its views.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: The representatives of the two dominions have endeavoured to arrive at what is thought to be fair and equitable and acceptable to both parties.

There is this also to say—and I think the house and the country should recognize it at once—that Canada being numerically and in the magnitude of its business the larger of the two dominions, naturally has perhaps a greater share in what trade will result from this interchange between the two dominions. Furthermore our products are very much more diversified, and in the manufacturing lines of course tremendously more advanced, than those of New Zealand. Consequently we shall perhaps profit more by the treaty in the volume of trade than it is possible for New Zealand to do. That was recognized from the commencement. On the other hand, there are a number of articles in New Zealand of comparatively minor importance in which not much trade has developed in the past, but which we hope may develop considerably. These are items which do not conflict in any way with the products of Canada, but in relation to which up to the present very little trade has resulted. The expectation is that by settling between ourselves the status of trade benefit will accrue to both parties. I repeat also what I said the other day when the resolution was before the house, that we must not lose sight of the fact that in both instances each country accords the other the full British preference on items not recited in the schedules.

These are briefly and very sketchily the main features of the treaty. It is not with any desire to be discourteous to the house that I do not make any extended statement now; I feel it will be better to leave detailed explanations to the more informal procedure in committee of the whole, when I shall be very happy indeed to reply to any questions that may arise.

May I add this statement? Naturally we are anxious to conclude this matter as early as possible and to get the treaty into operation from Canada's standpoint for this reason above others, that this is particularly the buying season in New Zealand and in expectation of the treaty many orders are outstanding waiting the conclusion of the treaty, and it will be a distinct advantage to both countries to have it concluded at the earliest moment.

I wish therefore, Mr. Speaker, to move the second reading of the bill and to reserve to the committee stage any detailed remarks.

Hon. CHARLES A. STEWART (West Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, would my hon. friend mind enumerating briefly some of the more important commodities in the interchange of which we hope to obtain a larger volume of trade with New Zealand.

Mr. STEVENS: I should be happy to give all the details but I do submit that it would be better to let that matter rest until we come to the schedules.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I point out to the minister that he has been dealing with this matter for over a year, while the members who are interested have had it before them for only twenty-four hours. It is not easy, as my hon. friend will readily understand, to appreciate difficult schedules such as these and be able to ask intelligent questions in connection with them. It does appear that we might be given some information now. I should not like to say what are my impressions of this treaty at the present time because they may be entirely wrong, but I think my hon. friend might indicate briefly some of the important commodities which are affected, and how they are affected as compared with the treaty which was cancelled.

Mr. STEVENS: I submit this is getting to a strictly committee stage and, if the hon. member would agree, I would very much prefer to deal with those questions in committee where we can talk very frankly. I hope we will go into committee very quickly; at this stage it would be difficult for me to answer the queries that may be directed by hon gentlemen opposite. I hope the house will agree to that.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

On section 1—short title.

Mr. POULIOT: On this section I desire to say a few words with regard to this legislation. First I offer my sincere congratulations to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and to the government as a whole for trying to improve conditions of trade in this country. That requires courage, and I am very glad they have shown that courage.

As the minister pointed out, a treaty is nothing more than a bargain; on the one side one country sells and on the other side that country buys, and the bargain must be satisfactory to both sides. Those are elementary principles with which everyone is familiar. But may I point out, quoting from memory since I have not the exact page of Hansard, that during last session I heard the Prime Minister say he had some anxiety about our trade with the Antipodes. In that respect may I say he had no one but himself to blame. What I am about to say now is nothing unpleasant; I simply desire to recall what was said during the last campaign by the right hon. gentleman and others. Yesterday I would not have made these remarks, because of an event in which we all rejoiced and which made the Prime Minister's face beam, but to-day it is different; we are about to examine cold facts. I quote from the Montreal Gazette of June 14, 1930, where I find a news item headed "Promises Repeal of Treaties Bad for Agriculture." The article is by Thomas Green, staff correspondent for the Canadian Press, and is dated Calgary, Alberta, June 13, 1930:

In clear and emphatic terms, Hon. R. B. Bennett, Conservative leader, last night gave his pledge that if returned to power every treaty entered into by the Liberal government injurious to Canadian agriculture would be abrogated.

Canada, the Conservative leader declared, had been placed in a position of importance in respect to the tariff on agricultural products under treaties made by the Liberal administration.

"I pledge myself that every treaty entered into by the government harmful to Canadian agriculture will be abrogated if I am returned to power," he exclaimed.

Mr. Bennett scored the government for discontinuing aids to agriculture.

And so on. On July 14, 1930, according to the Montreal Gazette of July 15, the Prime Minister addressed a meeting in Sherbrooke, Quebec. One of the sub-titles of the newspaper article is "Dairymen need help." Speaking of the people who attended the meeting the article states:

They were not all Sherbrooke people. Far from it. There were many city folks, but also dairymen, from various parts of the townships, who wanted to hear some one with authority talk to them of the grievance they had so much at heart, namely New Zealand butter, for the eastern townships and Chateauguay-Huntingdon are the parts of this province which have their very existence in dairying, and many of them have been following the will-o-wisp of American trade, and when the United States put an end to this trade found themselves captured in the rear by New Zealand butter. So the dairymen were out in force.

At that meeting the right hon. Prime Minister is quoted as having said:

Do you think this government of ours has any right at all to make treaties? asked Mr. Bennett, as he proceeded to tell how the countries with which Mr. King has made treaties had raised their duties against Canadian wheat and other primary products. In all treaties the rights of Canadians had not been safeguarded, said the speaker.

The report of the meeting ends there; it is too bad it is not extended.

I wish the house clearly to understand my point. I do not blame the government for bringing in this legislation; I said that in my first remarks, and I repeat it, but during the election the stump speakers of the Conservative party were saying from every platform in the province of Quebec that if the farmers were in bad shape it was because of the New Zealand and Australian butter that was coming in, and that it was a gross mistake on the part of the government, almost amounting to treason, to let that butter enter Canada. I see my good friend from South-east Grey (Miss Macphail), some hon. members from Nova Scotia and others from different parts of Canada and I am sure they heard the same thing in their constituencies. I see my good friend from Compton; I am sure he made the same statements. In addition, since the opening of this parliament I have heard that view expressed by my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Thompson) who was formerly a director of the Ontario dairymen's association, by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel and by the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon, (Mr. Moore) who all said they were against the importation of butter from the other dominions. I respect their views; I do not ask them to vote against the legislation before us to-day, but during the whole campaign the farmers were told that it was a great mistake to import so much butter from outside Canada.

Why did we import butter? Canada imported butter to a large extent—I will not quote the figures because they are well known to every hon. member—because production was not equal to consumption. It was because, when President Hoover introduced his high tariff legislation in the United States, the farmers of Maine, of New York and other states came to Canada to buy Canadian cattle. Our breeders were offered high prices for their cattle, and they sold them, and as they had less cattle the production of milk and butter consequently declined with the result that we had to import these commodities, so that the gap between production and consumption had to be filled. Tourists were coming to this country and spending, at that time, according to the statistics, two hundred million dollars, and when they asked for butter we could not expect to offer them axle grease. That is why butter had to be imported from the other dominions; the reason was that production had gone down in this country. That has been clearly explained. At that time, notwithstanding imports of thirty or forty million pounds, the price of butter was twice what it is now. In 1929, the price of butter, as quoted by my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) last year, was 38·1 cents odd—I am speaking from memory. In 1930 it was 31·60, according to the figures the hon. gentleman gave last year. But when my hon. friend gave his figures of imports and exports he forgot to mention production, which, of course, is an essential point, and it was my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) who noticed this omission and brought it to the hon. gentleman's attention. A day or so after that I came in with the statistics showing that if we had to import butter it was because, as I have just pointed out, our production was not equal to our consumption. I will not insist any more upon that; it is elementary. But during the last election every Tory speaker in every rural constituency where cattle are bred told the farmers that the Mackenzie King government has to be blamed for such importations. My hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) took this attitude. The Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) who is one of the ablest dairymen in Quebec, did the same. The hon. gentleman confounds water with milk—the salt water of the St. Lawrence. All these hon. gentlemen, including, I have no doubt, the hon. member from Long Lake (Mr. Cowan), said to the dairymen of the country, "You farmers are in bad shape because the Mackenzie King government is importing so much butter." An hon. member whose constituency I have forgotten, but who seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne at the first session this government was in power, also told the farmers that the King government was responsible for bringing in so much butter. I see my hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Gobeil); I am sure he said the same thing and promised to have the situation righted. He is too honest to deny it. He said to the farmers, "If you are not selling your milk and butter at a high enough price, it is because the King government is importing so much butter from Australia and New Zealand." But what did it profit the farmers here to have a Canadian market if they could not sell their butter at a reasonable price? They were not getting as reasonable a price as some people near to my hon. friend are getting for their preserves. I see my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Belec); he too, I am sure, said the same thing. Now, I do not suggest that they did not make these statements in good faith. I see my hon. friend from that fine constituency of which Prescott is the county seat (Mr. Casselman); his attitude was the same. I had occasion to speak in a certain Conservative parish, a beautiful little place, and to discuss the butter question with a distinguished lawyer from Montreal. For the first twenty minutes I spoke only about butter; I did not discuss any other subject. In his thirty minutes that gentleman was very much embarrassed to give any reply because my quotations were from Hansard; immediately after I had finished the quotations I gave him the volume so that he might make himself familiar with the situation. But he had nothing to say in reply. Again I ask, What does it mean to the Canadian farmer to have a market in this country if he does not receive a decent price for what he has to sell?

Mr. GOBEIL: What about other markets?

Mr. POULIOT: My genial friend is following in the footsteps of the Prime Minister; when he is asked a question which he cannot answer he asks one himself.

Mr. GOBEIL: I am not ashamed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He admits it.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not wish to be disagreeable to the hon. gentleman, but he knows that on every platform members of his party were saying to the farmers that the reason they were not getting a decent price for their butter was that the Mackenzie King government was importing so much of this commodity from Australia and New Zealand; it was because of the competition. Was not that what was said?

Mr. GOBEIL: At the time, yes.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the hon. gentleman for his admission; he is a very good witness. But he is more candid than he was when that statement was being made. At that time he was either dishonest or ignorant, and I do not know whether it is a greater insult to be called ignorant or otherwise.

Mr. GOBEIL: Coming from you, it does not matter.

Mr. POULIOT: Nescient, perhaps. I met these people on every platform, and this is what they were saying: "Shame to those in power! Let us put a stop to this." I see an hon. gentleman from one of the constituencies in British Columbia. He is interested in this matter and I am sure that he will tell us that in that province the catchword given by the then leader of the Conservative party, the present Prime Minister, was, "We will abrogate these treaties as soon as we come into power." But there was no necessity to abrogate them because Mr. Dunning, the Minister of Finance of that day, had declared on May 1, 1930, in the course of his budget speech, that he had given notice to the governments of New Zealand and Australia that the agreements would come to an end after six months' notice. But what was most important was this, that we had then a very good trade with Australia and New Zealand; those dominions were purchasing many commodities from us, such as pulpwood, paper and so forth. The reason Mr. Dunning did not cancel the treaties completely but intimated instead that they would be concluded in six months was that he wished to have some satisfactory agreement evolved in the meantime at the Imperial conference of 1930, so far as these two dominions were concerned. It was most essential that we should retain our trade with these dominions, and what I sincerely regret is that at the time the present government came into power a serious mistake was made through the absence from his department of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That minister was ill, and I do not know which one of his colleagues took charge of his department, but a mistake was made by someone who knew nothing about trade. I am sure that if the Minister of Trade and Commerce had been in Ottawa, things would have been very different, and this country would have kept its trade with New Zealand and Australia, so that it would not have been necessary to introduce this legislation this year. These arrangements should have been made last year according to an agreement previously entered into at the time of the Imperial conference. However, we must take things as they are. I congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce upon being persuasive enough to make the Prime Minister understand that trade with other countries is essential and that the Canada first policy, the erection of high tariff walls around this country, is a mistake which should be remedied.

I come again to what was said on the Tory stumps during the last campaign. It was stated l'agriculture se meurt dans la province de Québec—agriculture is dying in the province of Quebec. This was the statement made by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil), the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Belec), and by other hon. members from the rural constituencies and I have no doubt the hon. member for Long Lake said the same thing.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): I never heard of it.

Mr. POULIOT: I know my hon. friend would not be saying that in French, but I have no doubt he said it in English. He would not complain that agriculture was dying in the province of Quebec, he would rejoice in it. Probably he issued circulars to the effect that agriculture was dying in the province of Saskatchewan. There is one minister of the crown, the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) who understands the French language, and I am sure he is fully aware of what was distributed during the last campaign by the central Conservative office. I heard so much during the last campaign that I cannot help but quote from the publications issued by the Tory party in Quebec. One of these reads as follows:

Australian Treaty—Dairy Industry

The Canadian market has been handed over to the Australian farmers; we are permitted to sell our printing machinery, automobile parts and paper on the Australian market. It is a bargain of dupes.

Canada is an agricultural country and we should keep our domestic markets for the benefit of our farmers.

In order to obtain advantages abroad for three Canadian industries, we sacrificed to Australia our dairy industry and home markets, and this, to the detriment of our farmers who make up 63 per cent of our population.

This Australian treaty, at its face constitutes an economic error; at least the King government could put up the plea that Australia had conceded to us certain advantages.

To-day, owing to the shortsighted policy of the Dominion government, our dairy industry has been ruined through intensive competition by New Zealand; the millions of dollars paid out to protect our farmers serve in transporting to our markets, in cold storage, thanks to Canadian grants, butter and other foreign dairy products.

The disbursements made by our people are utilized to develop foreign dairy industries, to our detriment.

How can we explain such a faulty system?

This is the reason for the order in council benefiting New Zealand, and the treaty favouring Australia.

I try to follow the teachings of the Lord by loving my neighbour as myself but I find that although I may love Tories, I cannot love Toryism. Most of the Tories I know are very likeable, but Toryism is very hateful. I quote again:

(Translation)

Canadian modern liberalism has set in motion a system of administration disastrous in its effects, which, however, affords to the leaders of the system an opportunity of praising up the government by displaying the seemingly genuine results of an artificial prosperity. Our natural resources were exploited without discretion or discernment, to the advantage of foreigners and to the detriment of our people. Our forests have been cut without making any provision for reforestation; our Liberal governments granted vast timber concessions; the keen competition of timber limit owners, created an overproduction of paper, and the market being unable to absorb the entire output, manufacturers had to lower their prices. This decrease in prices made the payment of interest on bonds issued, uncertain, resulting in the discontinuance of dividends on preferred and common stocks. Finally we had to solve what is known as "the paper crisis."

Federal Liberalism to avert the disaster which threatened provincial Liberalism, had to find markets for the overproduction of our paper and thus preserve the profitable friendship of timber limit owners.

The Liberal party was doing its best to improve trade in connection with paper, pulpwood and so on, but because of this action it was strongly attacked. The article continues:

(Translation)

There lies the reason of the Australian treaty, it explains the order in council granting to New Zealand, without receiving anything in return, the same advantages that we had conceded to Australia in schedule II of the treaty.

Liberalism boasts of being the true and disinterested protector of all that is dear to us, yet it sacrificed lightly the vast natural resources that Providence had placed at our disposal. Liberalism boasts of taking a great interest in the farming class of our province, yet it sacrificed the dairy industry of Quebec to the benefit of the New Zealand farmers. Liberalism loudly proclaims its ostentatious patriotism; it also gave evidence of being very fond of the people at election time, only to obtain their support and vote. Liberalism exhausts its lungs in proclaiming its disregard of private interest, yet it leaves the masses in the lurch so as to set aside for its own advantage the farsighted and generous friendship of the privileged few whom it has gorged with favours of all kinds, in order to enable it, when the opportunity arrives, to draw from them election contributions of which it is so fond. The country is bled to death, Liberalism is maintained in power.

As I see a good Liberal with the hon. Postmaster General, I shall inquire from each of them, whether it is not a fact that, in their respective counties, the Conservative party distributed this campaign literature? They are unable to deny the fact.

The following is another extract of this document:

(Translation)

Agriculture is dying: who killed it?

Farmers: read what follows, and you will know how and by whom this crime was committed!

Ever since 1925, the King government has forced on parliament the Australian treaty and adopted by order in council the New Zealand convention.

By these treaties, the King government handed over the Canadian market to foreigners, in exchange for a few miserable concessions to industry.

What I have quoted will give an idea of the literature which was distributed throughout every rural parish, municipality or borough in the province of Quebec, and I have no doubt the same publications in English were distributed to the English farming districts. One thing that strikes me in connection with this butter question is the fact that the Tory party used this commodity as a stepping stone to power. During the campaign it was said that the Canadian markets were of no interest, the results were what counted. The fact is that the farmer received much more for his butter when we were importing sufficient to make up the difference between production and consumption than he does now when the production equals or perhaps is more than the consumption. The hon. member for Compton said during the campaign that we must have Canadian markets. At the same time he used despicable words about lawyers. I am a lawyer, I defend farmers and if the hon. member is still a farmer, I shall attempt to defend him against himself. It is hard work for a lawyer to delve into these statistics in order to get at the truth, but I do this with pleasure in order to show my electors, who are farmers, the deep interest I take in their welfare.

The other day I asked the Minister of Marine why he was saying that the government had stopped the importation of butter. They did not stop it completely; some butter still comes in. Otherwise the new treaties could be considered as a joke by Australia and New Zealand. An hon. member points out it is somewhat strange that although we are on an export basis, we still import some butter. The plain question I asked the Minister of Marine, was this: "Are you in favour of a reasonable price for butter with importations, or a very low price without importations?" The answer he gave me was this: "I am in favour of a reasonable price and I am against importations." Fancy a minister of the crown saying that, when he knows very well that last year the house had voted for a treaty with Australia and that it was ready to vote for one to-day with New Zealand! I do not wish my words to be misconstrued; I am not against this treaty; I know we must make some sacrifices in the matter of trade, because trade cannot be one-sided. I know the minister is well disposed, but I speak about those who deceived the people during the last election by making false statements regarding the dairy business. A moment ago I mentioned that Mr. Dunning, in his budget speech of May 1, 1930, said that he had notified Australia and New Zealand that the treaty would come to an end six months after the notice was given, and in the meantime the duty on butter was increased. The duty was four, six and seven cents a pound, and when the present government came into power, they increased that duty to eight, twelve and fourteen cents a pound. The duty under the Dunning budget did not please the people because it was not enough. The Tories were saying on every hustings: The duty is not enough; we will increase it in order that you may receive a fair price for butter. The ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce, I am sure, has heard the same statement made. Every one on this side who has been on the same platform with a Conservative speaker at a joint meeting, has heard him say the same thing. They were deceiving the people; they were saying that as soon as the right hon. gentleman who is now Prime Minister, gets into power, he will raise the duty on butter in order that the farmers may receive not less than forty of forty-five cents, and perhaps fifty or sixty cents a pound for their butter. In my constituency, a Tory candidate said: I shall see to it that the leader of the Conservative party raises the duty in order that you may get at the very least forty cents a pound for your butter. What does it mean to a farmer if he does not get a decent price for it? What does it mean to the hon. member for Compton? His friends will laugh at him. They will say: The Canadian market as it is means nothing to you because you get nothing out of it.

The Tory government were true to their word; they increased the tariff; the four cents became eight cents, the six cents became twelve and the seven became fourteen, or twice as much. Then what happened? This is mentioned in a return that I received last year and that was signed by the Secretary of State, showing that when the tariff on butter was the highest, the price was the lowest. It is perhaps on account of that return that the Prime Minister should be advised by his supporters that they have decided to return to the Liberal policy of reducing tariffs in order to secure trade. Last year the duty on butter under the Australian treaty was five cents, notwithstanding the fact that the Australian government is paying a premium on this commodity; this year under the New Zealand treaty the duty is also five cents.

I do not wish to detain the committee much longer on this, but to sum up, let me say that the Canadian people were grossly deceived by every Conservative speaker in Quebec and in each of the eight sister provinces, when they said first of all, that it was due to imports of butter that the price was low, and when they told the people that under a high tariff the price of butter would be reasonable, just as good as it was the previous year. The people were deceived both ways and now this legislation is introduced into the house. I have no objection to it; it is an experiment and we shall see how it works, but I regret the, if I may say so, silly satements that were made first by the Prime Minister and repeated by his own organization under the control of General McRae in order to deceive the people. This is the feature I oppose most strongly. The public can now see that the guiding star of liberalism is still leading the Conservative party when they want to do the proper thing; to do this they have to come back to the old Liberal trade policy. At the present low price of sixteen or seventeen cents the butter makers are still making money because they do not reduce their manufacturing charges. We shall see whether our trade with Australia and New Zealand increases. If it does, it will bring money into this country. Men will get more work; they will receive bigger wages and if they earn more money, they will be in a better position to pay higher prices for their butter.

Mr. COWAN Long Lake): Will the hon. gentleman, then, support and join the Conservative party?

Mr. POULIOT: The Conservative party does well only when it follows Liberal policies.

In conclusion I hope every Conservative member who spoke against the New Zealand and Australian trade agreements will go back to his electors and tell them: "We must be honest. We must confess that we made a mistake. We do not say that we lied, but we certainly made a mistake when we said that high tariffs would bring fair prices for farm products to the farmer. We apologize to you for making that mistake." That is what every Conservative member should say to his constituents, and I hope the government will see to it that a copy of those agreements is sent to farmers everywhere, not to discourage them, but to show them that this government is coming around to the good old policies of the Liberal party, not with regard to butter alone, but with regard to trade in general with other nations throughout the world.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Chairman, I had intended to make a few observations on the second reading of the bill, but the second reading was passed with such bewildering celerity that I did not have the opportunity on that occasion. I do not believe, sir, that it is of any material use during a discussion such as this to dwell unduly upon the past except in so far as the actions of a party or the inaction of a party in the past may have affected the present situation. I should like, Mr. Chairman, to occupy a little time in going back to the origin of the treaty with New Zealand. Reading section 5 of the Australian treaty as assented to on the 27th day of June, 1925:

> Subject to the provisions of The Customs Tariff, 1907, the governor in council may, by order in council, extend the said advantages to goods the produce or manufacture of any British country.

And section 6 reads as follows:

> The governor in council may make such orders and regulations as are deemed necessary to carry out the provisions and intent of this act and of the said agreement, and may, upon giving six months notice to the government of the commonwealth of Australia of his intention so to do, order and direct that the tariff concessions extended to Australia by this act shall cease and determine, whereupon they shall cease and determine accordingly.

Now I come down to the year 1930 and to the criticisms that were made by hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were sitting to the left of the Speaker, in respect to the New Zealand treaty. I am reading now from the report of the president of the National Dairy Council for 1931. Therein it will be found that they made representations to the tariff board, which was then in existence, in regard to the New Zealand tariff. I quote the words of the president as found on page 6 of the annual report:

> At the last meeting an appeal to the tariff board was decided upon. The hearings were held in January, 1930, and several months later the government announced an increase in the butter tariff of precisely the amount we asked for. At this point I wish to remind you very definitely that we took the view that a tariff of four cents per pound against the southern dominions, where the imported butter all came from, was about as high a tariff as the industry could obtain any permanent benefit from. We used the argument that a tariff higher than four cents would damage the cheese industry and would introduce very wide and unmanageable fluctuations of price into the butter market if we were to alternate from an import to an export basis and back again, as we have done many times in the past forty years.

Again:

> We told the government that four cents was enough for the reason that it was all that could be permanently advantageous.

Now I wish to refer to the statement made the other day by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the provisions of the Australian treaty of 1925 were extended to the sister dominion of New Zealand on October 1, 1925, by a special order in council. Notice was given in this parliament on the 12th of April, 1930, as was stated by the minister of the termination of that arrangement with New Zealand, the arrangement to terminate on October 20, 1930, and on the 20th day of October, 1930, as the minister also stated the other day, New Zealand withdrew her preference from Canadian goods, on motor cars engines, and tires, and on June 2, 1931, she withdrew her preference on all remaining articles. I come now to the declaration of policy made by the Minister of Finance when speaking in this parliament on May 1, 1930, because this has a very distinct bearing on the situation which has since developed in Canadian trade. Mr. Dunning upon that occasion used these words:

> With respect to New Zealand, as already intimated to parliament, the government of Canada has proposed to the government of that dominion that a direct trade agreement be negotiated to supersede the present arrangement.

We hope to be able to arrange for meetings of representatives of both countries in the near future in order to endeavour to reach a mutually satisfactory agreement. In any event, the present arrangement will cease on October 12, next. Following that date, Canada will extend her full British preference to New Zealand, pending the completion of a direct agreement.

Then we had the general election of 1930, and we have just had a very vivid and truthful description by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) of the campaign of misrepresentation which was carried on at that time. Those who represent agriculture and the dairy districts of this country realize that the situation of the dairy farmer and of the agriculturist to-day is infinitely worse although they have had the alleged benefit of the eight cents tariff since that day in October, 1930. As against the lack of benefit to the dairy farmer and the agriculturist, may I briefly indicate to this house what has happened to our Canadian trade? I will give the total imports of Canada from New Zealand first:

Year	Value of goods imported
1930	16,282,719
1932	1,080,230

Now I will give the total exports from Canada to New Zealand:

Year	Value of goods exported
1925	$15,083,368
1932	3,728,500

It will be noted that in 1932, after New Zealand very properly adopted a policy of retaliation, our exports to that country dropped from over $19,000,000 in 1930 to $3,728,500.

Take the alleged favourable balance of trade, which is so frequently referred to by hon. gentlemen opposite. Here are the figures:

Year	Favourable balance for Canada
1925	$13,892,069
1926	13,854,626
1929	4,597,109
1932	2,648,270

Now I shall deal very briefly, because there will be an opportunity to discuss them more fully when the schedule is taken up, with a few of the items which are covered by the agreement. Take the article of butter, for instance. Here are our import figures:

Year	Imports
1925	$ 60,000
1932	17,000

Take raw wool, and Mr. Chairman, I am very interested to know what will be the attitude of certain members of the Conservative party who earlier this session voted for a resolution asking for a tariff on raw wool with respect to placing wool on the free list, with a depreciated currency in New Zealand. Our raw wool importations were:

1925	$ 230,000
1929	1,173,000
1932	305,000

These are the figures for our importations of hides:

1925	$145,000

Then let me deal with the export figures, and these are of particular interest to anyone who is a student of our trade conditions. These figures, I think, form the most startling picture of how the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite in raising the duty on New Zealand butter to 8 cents a pound on the very day when the Prime Minister of that dominion sat on the floor of this house has absolutely paralyzed our export trade in that quarter. These figures are the most startling in the whole tragic picture.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I put these figures on Hansard to give the committee an actual picture of how our export trade with New Zealand has been strangled by the tariff policy of this government. I certainly commend the treaty as far as its general principle is concerned. But I must express, especially on behalf of the people of British Columbia, our regret at the undue delay in bringing this treaty before parliament. That there is similar regret in New Zealand is evident by this quotation from the Auckland Herald of March 21, 1932:

> Telegrams are pouring into the office of the Minister of Customs, Hon. W. Downie Stewart, seeking light on the present state of negotiations between New Zealand and Canada regarding the trade agreement tentatively reached at the Honolulu conference in December and January. An unexpected hitch has since arisen at the Canadian end, due, it was believed, to Canadas preoccupation with urgent domestic problems.
> Mr. Stewart is unable to make any public announcement on the subject at the moment, but it is believed likely that a statement will be forthcoming within the next few days.

I propose now to deal very briefly with one or two items in the schedule, which items perhaps the minister will kindly note so that he may deal with them in his reply later. In votes and proceedings, No. 57, at page 374 will be found the items on schedule A to which I am about to refer. Item No. 16, eggs in the shell. I recall that last year substantial complaints were made by our friends opposite when a similar item was inserted in the Australian treaty to be operative for only two months in the year. Will the minister be good enough when he replies to let the committee know if he has received any complaints from the poultry raisers of British Columbia in regard to this particular item.

Item 93, apples, fresh, in their natural state, free. Has the minister received any complaints whatsoever from the fruit growers of British Columbia or any of the other provinces in regard to this item.

Items Ex. 169, Ex. 171, Ex. 178. This group of items covers books, novels or works of fiction; books, printed; advertising and printed matter. Has the minister received any complaint in regard to these items?

Item 305-306b, building stone, other than marble or granite. This is admitted free for the first time. The minister is aware that we have building-stone quarries in British Columbia and in some of the other western provinces. Has he received any complaint in regard to the item?

Item Ex. 549, wool, not further prepared than combed, free. Has he received any complaint from some of his own followers or from outside sources in regard to the presence of that item in the treaty?

Now I come to schedule B. Item Ex. 137, socks and stockings of silk or artificial silk. I see the total duty is 39.8 per cent for Canada as against 28.9 per cent under the British preferential tariff. It seems to me that is a very poor consideration for the Canadian exporters of these articles.

Item 333 (1), cultivators; harrows; ploughs; drills; sowers; seed or grain cleaners and separators. I see the rate to Canada is 36.75 per cent, as against the British preferential rate of 12.25 per cent—about three times as high against Canada.

Item 389, passenger cars, valued up to £200 sterling. I see the duty is 20 per cent against Canada if the cars contain from 50 to 75 per cent Canadian content, as against 10 per cent under the British preference, while the rate on cars with more than 75 per cent Canadian content is just the same as the British preferential rate. It would seem to me that our manufacturers will have some difficulty in exporting cars to New Zealand containing 75 per cent Canadian content.

Then I wish to draw to the minister's attention items 403, 404 and 405, which I think are of particular interest to us in British Columbia. Those are the main comments I have to make in regard to the treaty. The general observation I wish to make is this, that the Liberal party in Canada was the party that initiated the policy of trade treaties. The Liberal party was the party that initiated the policy of Imperial preferences in 1897, and I welcome any policy of trade treaties which contain terms advantageous to Canada. I welcome that policy because it is one which will break down the barriers of high protection. I think the government of the day has pursued a wrong course; first of all they erected very high tariff barriers, and then they used the height of those barriers to bargain with other countries. We welcome any expansion of trade, especially by trade treaties within the empire, and for these reasons I commend the principle of this legislation, though I may desire to make some comments with regard to the details at a later stage.

Mr. NEILL: I have some appreciation of the difficulty with which the minister was confronted in negotiating this treaty, and I have no doubt that with his customary thoroughness and energy he not only did the best he could but possibly the best that could be done under the circumstances.

[Mr. I. A. Mackenzie.]

The difficulty in negotiating a treaty of this kind with New Zealand is pre-eminently due to the fact that New Zealand, more than any other country of which I know, is wholly agricultural and pastoral in its exports, so anything it exports to Canada must come directly in conflict with agriculture in this country, which makes it very difficult to deal with the situation. I would have been interested if the minister had replied when the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) asked him to amplify, or even illustrate, what lines of business from New Zealand he expected would be increased in consequence of this treaty, because I know, from some examination and after having lived there, how little New Zealand can export that will not come in direct competition with one branch or another of agriculture in Canada.

I think the only three products that New Zealand exports and which we do not produce ourselves are rabbits, flax and kauri gum, which is a minor product used in making scents and soaps. It is dug up in the swamps of New Zealand, so we need not grudge them that trade. The same applies to rabbits, so long as they are not brought here alive. With regard to the flax, I am sorry to see anything done to facilitate its entry to this country. It is an inferior article, and has one almost dangerous quality about it. It will make apparently strong rope, which will stand a heavy strain if that strain is applied gradually, but it has the unusual quality of snapping like a lead pencil if you give it a sudden jerk. It is a native product, grown in the swamps of that country.

I would like to make only one comment in regard to the preliminary part of the treaty, and then there are one or two comments which I have to make when we come to the particular items, which I hope we will be permitted to take up one by one. I notice that we are given a preference on Canadian lumber, but unless I am wrong that preference is arrived at by leaving the duty against Canadian lumber where it was and increasing the duty against lumber from other countries. Of course that does give some preference, but it is not one highly calculated to increase the demand for our product.

Then there is the question of our fish. Probably there is a plausible explanation, but after examining the item here I do not understand it. The minister comes from British Columbia, and he must be sufficiently familiar with the need for a preference on British Columbia salmon to see that this preference is given, but the item rather puzzles me. By this item

New Zealand gives us a preference on "fish, potted and preserved, namely salmon, including any liquor, oil or sauce." Our canned salmon is not potted or preserved; there is as much difference between preserved fish and canned salmon as there is between jam and canned fruit. It seems to me that canned salmon should come under item 35a, which deals with "canned fish, not including fish paste," but as I say I am sure there must be some explanation, and I only mention the matter so it will not be lost sight of.

I also notice that the preference on this preserved salmon is very small; it is not nearly as large as the preference given by Australia. I see that under item 123 we give New Zealand a preference on shell fish known as toheroas, in sealed tin containers. We let that article in free, but they do not let our main fish product in under the same terms. The articles in which British Columbia is particularly interested are lumber, fish, paper and pulp. Pulp enters New Zealand free in any case, so we get no preference there, and no preference is given to newsprint. There are six paper items, and we are given a preference on only one. These are the things that somewhat detract from what we had hoped we would get from this treaty.

There is one other comment I should like to make with regard to articles IV and VII. Article IV deals with the method by which the government proposes to stop the importation of goods when such goods are coming in to the injury of our citizens. Under the Australian treaty that section stated that goods, the produce or manufacture of Australia, imported under the provisions of article I, should not be subject to the provisions of section 6 of the customs tariff of Canada. That section excluded the application of the dumping duty. In the New Zealand treaty the wording is different:

> . . . shall not be subject to section 6 of the customs tariff of Canada unless previous notice has been given by the government of Canada to the government of New Zealand that the importation of such goods would prejudicially or injuriously affect the producers or manufacturers of similar goods in Canada, and if, at the expiration of a period of thirty days from the date of such notice, remedial measures satisfactory to the government of Canada are not put into effect . . .

Then Canada can apply the dumping duty.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is overlooking section 9 of the Australian treaty. This is an improvement; it lessens the time limit.

Mr. NEILL: I rather doubt if it is an improvement, but I was just going to compare them. In this case, if the government are not satisfied with the way goods are coming in they can give thirty days notice and then apply the dumping duty. Under the treaty with Australia they did not do that; if the remedial steps were not taken within three months the ordinary general tariff applied. That is the comparison I desire to make. This dumping duty is a matter of policy, and if the government choose to apply it instead of letting the ordinary duty prevail, I have no objection, but I should like to show how it will work. They give New Zealand thirty days notice, and if at the end of that time remedial measures have not been taken the dumping duty goes into effect. That would seem to give a man whose goods were on the water at least thirty days in which to have those goods received and sold in Canada, but there is a further clause included:

> At the option of the government of Canada any importation thus complained of, other than perishable goods, may be held in bond during the said period of thirty days.

That is the objectionable feature. It will be possible for this government, without notice at all, to increase the duty over night on an article already on the water, by the application of the dumping duty.

The British government—it has been alluded to here—has already expressed the opinion, or perhaps the hope, in connection with the coming conference, that Canada will abandon the system of enforcing the dumping duty overnight, so to speak, because it leads to great uncertainty when a man buys goods and does not know, while they are on the water in transit, what is likely to be done by means of that duty. It has always been held that a somewhat unreasonable tariff is preferable to a state of uncertainty, when it is not known whether the tariff may go up or down suddenly. Under the Australian treaty they had to give three months' notice and not thirty days; and under that treaty they could not hold goods in bond. But now, to-morrow morning, it could suddenly be announced, "We will give you thirty days' notice and hold your goods in bond, unless they are perishable, and at the end of that time we will apply the dumping duty." So that we have rather put one over New Zealand in that regard.

An hon. MEMBER: New Zealand can do the same to us.

Mr. NEILL: That is quite right; I was wrong in saying that we put one over them because it is fifty-fifty.

Mr. RALSTON: If New Zealand's act is as strong as ours.

Mr. NEILL: I am not familiar with the situation there, but they have a dumping act. I do submit, however, it will lead to uncertainty if such a situation as I have described exists. The other item was in connection with Article VII. It states that they cannot raise the duty unless by mutual agreement—that is, the regular duty—and until after three months' notice to the respective governments. I notice that in the trade treaty between New Zealand and Australia the same condition exists, except that it is six months in that case. Three months' notice, with a country so far away as this, would probably work out rather awkwardly. As a matter af fact, I imagine that a good deal of the benefits or otherwise of this treaty will not be fully ascertained until the treaty has been in operation a year or two. On general principles I am glad to see such a treaty inaugurated, and with the explanations which I feel almost sure the minister can give in regard to salmon and lumber, I hope the treaty will be of advantage to our province and to Canada generally.

Mr. STEVENS: Before we get into too wide a discussion I might reply to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni on the points they have raised. I see very little good purpose to be served by entering into a long discussion about what might have happened, or about what was said during the campaign. I will accept the opening suggestion of the hon. member for Temiscouata when he said that we were confronted with facts and that we should deal with those facts. That invitation I will accept. May I say to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, in regard to the citations of a falling-off in trade with New Zealand, that there was no doubt a very substantial and serious decline in trade. But it must be borne in mind that New Zealand's imports, which of course would include exports from Canada, dropped from a total of £43,000,000 in the year 1930, to £25,000,000 in 1931. That is, all imports, and of course that accounts for a substantial portion, although I am not suggesting that it accounts for them all. It is well to keep that fact in mind. My hon. friend also cited several items which I shall refer to very briefly. As regards eggs in the shell, it will be recalled that under the old trade arrangements they were free the year round. In this item they are free during the months of December, January and February, which is, of course, a restriction as compared with the old treaty.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. MALCOLM: Were not those the only months in which they came in free?

Mr. STEVENS: They did not come in and they are not likely to come in.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Did none come in last year under the Australian treaty?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, I was mistaken; there was $53 worth from Australia. With regard to apples, this is a reciprocal item. We have a very handsome business with New Zealand in apples in the season the opposite to their productive season, and there is no objection from British Columbia in this respect.

Mr. NEILL: Does not New Zealand charge one penny per pound against nothing on their apples?

Mr. STEVENS: There is a duty against our apples but they have reduced it by half.

Mr. YOUNG: What about the three per cent excise tax? Will that apply to apples?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, that will apply to all the items.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister must not forget that British Columbia is not the only apple-producing province in Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: That is quite true. I am not certain whether we export to New Zealand any apples from eastern Canada, but we do export to them from this Dominion a substantial quantity of apples—three or four times as much as we import from New Zealand. As I say, I am not sure about the export of apples from Nova Scotia; I imagine that they find their way chiefly to Great Britain.

Mr. ILSLEY: The minister says there is no objection on the part of the apple growers. Have the people who are interested in the production of apples had an opportunity to express their opinion?

Mr. STEVENS: It must be remembered that the item simply remains free. It is not made free in this treaty as against a previous duty; it simply remains as is, if I might use that expression. There is no change. As regards the item referring to books, it will be noted that these are books the product of New Zealand. They have certain native authors there and they have asked that this be done, and we felt that, for the production of New Zealand authors, we could very well afford to place this item on the free list. It is really a gesture of courtesy more than anything else.

Mr. YOUNG: Suppose we bought one of these books in New York; it would not come in free.

Mr. STEVENS: It is not likely that it would come in through New York; they would rather ship the book direct to Canada. The people there are largely of Scottish descent.

Mr. CAYLEY: But the whole trade agreement is based on the assumption that goods will come through Canadian ports.

Mr. STEVENS: Virtually, yes. There is a slight modification in one of the articles, as will be noticed. With regard to items 305 and 306, these relate to a soft building stone, a variety of limestone which is very excellent for interior work. It can be easily worked. We import very large quantities of Indiana limestone and it is hoped that some of it will be replaced by this product. Several years ago some of this stone was imported into Vancouver and used in some of the buildings there for easily carved arches, window sills, copings and work of that kind, for which it is eminently suited. As regards the wool items, they simply remain free as they are at the present time. We decided that until the Imperial conference was held it was inadvisable to disturb the duty on wool under the British preference, so that New Zealand simply has the same rate as the British preference, namely, free as it is now. But it is proposed —and this was done as one of the terms of the arrangement with New Zealand—to impose a duty under the intermediate and general tariffs, while the preferential will remain undisturbed until the whole subject is discussed at the Imperial conference. In regard to socks, stockings and so on, there are in this schedule a few items which it will be noted are considerably different in some cases from the British preferential. These are acceptable to our people who are exporting such articles. While the rate on stockings is somewhat higher than the British preferential rate, it must be remembered that our main competitor in this connection is the United States. The rate to the United States is 67·3 per cent while the rate to Canada is 39·8 per cent. In discussing schedule B I ask hon. gentlemen to note that New Zealand has imposed some very high rates of duty. Of course, that is her business and not ours.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Would not the British importer come in under that 30 per cent?

Mr. STEVENS: I am advised that our people can compete under this rate. It will be noted a surtax and additional tax has in many cases been imposed and above the ad valorem rate. This is due to the necessities of raising revenue and as it is New Zealand's business, it is something about which we cannot explain.

Mr. NEILL: Does the surtax include the primage, or is it extra?

Mr. STEVENS: Primage is applicable to free goods while the surtax is applicable to dutiable goods. In connection with item 333 (1) cultivators, harrows, ploughs, drills, sowers, seed or green cleaners and separators, it will be seen that the rate to the United States is 42·87 per cent while the rate to Canada is 36·75 per cent. We would have liked to have had a better rate but that was the best we could get. We are given an advantage against the United States, which is our main competitor in this class of goods. The next item is one in which we are interested. It reads:

> Unspecified agricultural implements, including ploughs, cultivators and seed drills, hand-worked; ploughs, single furrow mouldboard, not exceeding 266 pounds; also certain parts of ploughs or harrows.

This item is free with a 3 per cent primage.

Mr. RALSTON: It is the same all the way through?

Mr. STEVENS: It is free as against the other item which is dutiable.

Mr. NEILL: Ploughs and cultivators appear in both items; how can they be subject to two separate duties?

Mr. STEVENS: It is a different classification. Automobiles is perhaps the most important item to us and I am at liberty to state that the rates are satisfactory to the Canadian producer. A large proportion of the automobiles which we will export to New Zealand will come under the 75 per cent Canadian content class which it will be noted carries a rate of 20 per cent in the case of Canada and 40 per cent in the case of the United States. In the case of the 50 to 75 per cent Canadian content, we have an advantage as against the United States but some disadvantage as against Great Britain. However, the cars manufactured in Canada are not the type manufactured in Great Britain and our main competitor is the United States.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That rate is not any lower than what we enjoyed formerly.

Mr. STEVENS: I will have that information looked up and give my hon. friend an answer later on. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has referred to the fact that it is difficult to find items which New Zealand could export and which would not be competitive with Canadian goods. There is no doubt that was one of the difficulties with which we were confronted, but we believe we have worked it out as satisfactorily as possible.

I was rather sorry to hear the hon. member's comments in connection with New Zealand hemp. I have taken some trouble to investigate this matter and I find that New Zealand hemp has proven satisfactory to a number of large manufacturers. During the past year I went out of my way to get our manufacturers to interest themselves in the importation of New Zealand hemp. Although this hemp may not be as good as the sisal from Mexico and the hemp from Manilla in the manufacturing of binder twine, as it has a tendency to curl when it is passing through the eyes of the binder—

Mr. YOUNG: Why encourage it?

Mr. STEVENS: We are not encouraging it particularly for binder twine, but it has proven to be very satisfactory in the manufacture of cordage and considerable quantities are now being purchased from New Zealand. Perhaps the hon. member is not acquainted with the latest developments in the production of this commodity and does not realize that the article has been vastly improved today.

Mr. BROWN. Why is binder twine allowed to come in free under all schedules?

Mr. STEVENS: At the request of New Zealand it was put in free along with hemp, but it is free in any case.

Mr. BROWN: Do we import any binder twine from New Zealand?

Mr. STEVENS: I will have that information looked up.

Mr. BROWN: It is something like the hay and straw in the Dunning budget.

Mr. STEVENS: No, not necessarily. I think hon. members should keep in mind the fact that we hope to develop considerable business in lines which have not previously been developed. I do not wish to harp on this point, but I must say that we have been importing a large variety of goods from the United States and it was felt that a large part of this business might profitably go to New Zealand.

I can assure the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that the lumber item is entirely satisfactory to the British Columbia interests, and I think to the eastern interests as well although they are not affected in the same way. The same observation applies to fish. The description in schedule B is the precise description used in the tariff nomenclature of New Zealand, and there is no question but that it includes canned salmon.

Mr. NEILL: The minister will admit that it uses the words "potted and preserved"?

Mr. STEVENS: That is quite true, but it includes salmon.

Mr. NEILL: It says preserved or potted salmon; it does not seem to include canned salmon.

Mr. STEVENS: In New Zealand potted and preserved is the description used for canned.

Mr. MALCOLM: There is an item of canned salmon in the New Zealand customs schedule; what does that refer to?

Mr. STEVENS: I am speaking from memory, but I do not think canned salmon is mentioned.

Mr. MALCOLM: Oh, yes.

Mr. NEILL: Item 35 (a) covers fish, canned, not including fish paste.

Mr. STEVENS: That is unique to the trade agreement between New Zealand and Australia and does not enter into the general schedule; it is left out entirely.

Paper is provided for in the treaty under a satisfactory arrangement. I would remind the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that while a very wide range of paper is not mentioned in the schedule, we get the British preference in regard to the whole of that classification, and this will be of distinct advantage to Canada.

Reference was made to article IV and my hon. friend was under some apprehension that the operation of this would not be satisfactory. I believe he indicated he thought perhaps it was a little unfair. Let me give a brief explanation in regard to it. Article IV must be compared with the article in the Australian treaty dealing with the suspension of section 6 of the customs tariff, that is the dumping clause. It will be noted that in the Australian treaty section 6 is completely suspended and abandoned as far as Australia is concerned, but that article IX, which makes provision for notice where a commodity is being imported prejudicially to the interests of the importing country, provides a remedy in that the commodity goes under the general tariff. In the New Zealand treaty the matter is dealt with somewhat differently. Section 6 is suspended, but only after notice and then at the expiration of the notice, which is only one month as against three months in the Australian treaty, all the dumping clause provisions of the Canadian tariff apply. This is a different method of treatment, but it is the formula presented to us by New Zealand when we were negotiating and the principle being more or less the same, we accepted the New Zealand formula which I think is, shall I say, a little more rigid than that in the Australian treaty. It is different, but equally effective.

Mr. MALCOLM: Does the minister not think thirty days is too short considering the time the goods are in transit? It might be injurious in the case of either country because goods are not transported to and from Canada and New Zealand in thirty days.

Mr. STEVENS: In case of notice the matter will be dealt with by cable.

Mr. MALCOLM: There is nothing to cover that.

Mr. STEVENS: It is accepted and the experts of both countries assented to the idea that a cabled notice would be accepted as sufficient.

Mr. MALCOLM: Must it be accepted by cable?

Mr. STEVENS: Not necessarily; but of course my hon. friend will bear this in mind: it is the injured country, so to speak, that will give the notice. If they give the notice in writing, that is their funeral, if I may use that expression. If they are anxious to give the notice, they will cable and the period of thirty days is an added protection to the importing country; inasmuch as it has been accepted there can be no complaint on the part of the other country.

Mr. NEILL: I have no objection to the minister using the dumping clause instead of the other method that he used in the Australian treaty, but I should like him to answer this question: Will the method adopted of having only thirty days' notice and having the stuff in bond, not have the effect that the dumping provision can be imposed at a moment's notice and that this will lead to disintegration and uncertainty of trade? That is the point.

Mr. STEVENS: I think not. The theory behind that is this, that the exporting country, whether Canada in the one case or New Zealand in the other, may be presumed to export certain goods on consignment. If they export on consignment, there should be no objection to those goods immediately on arrival being placed in bond until such time as the holder, the consignee, is prepared to enter them for consumption. Otherwise this might happen—

Mr. NEILL: He might lose his sale?

Mr. STEVENS: No, the goods might be exported on consignment and be allowed to lie indefinitely in the importing country, with the latter being able to take no action, but the presence of a large quantity of consigned goods in any market always has an injurious effect upon prices in the importing country where those goods are, as it were, hanging over the market. It was to obviate the danger of that that this form was adopted.

Mr. NEILL: But in case of selling goods on order, would not a hardship be created if the duty were raised while the goods were in transit?

Mr. STEVENS: We must read the article in this sense: first, it must be shown that the importation of the goods is going to affect injuriously manufacturers or producers in the importing country. That is the basis of the whole thing. Then a thirty-days' notice is given by cable—it is presumed in every case it would be given immediately by cable—that such goods are entering prejudicially. Then it is expected that the two countries by agreement will apply some remedial action. That is, we will assume these goods are billed at a figure that is calculated to injure the importing country. The exporter might undertake not to release the goods except at a price that was consistent with or similar to that of goods in the importing country.

Mr. MALCOLM: The minister must remember that those goods may be already sold by the importer. What will he do to fulfil his contract?

Mr. STEVENS: Any importer of goods—

Mr. MALCOLM: This may be true in the case of Canadian motorcars going into Australia; they may be all sold under contract.

Mr. STEVENS: That applies whether this provision is present or not. The importing country may change its tariff at a moment's notice.

Mr. NEILL: Three months.

Mr. STEVENS: But I am speaking of importing in the absence of a treaty. The importing country might change the tariff while the goods were in transit whether they were sold or not, so that in this nothing is being imposed upon the importer that is not present against him whether the treaty were in force or not.

Mr. MALCOLM: I submit to the minister that the very idea of a treaty is to give assurance of sale and certainty of business at a known rate of duty, so that business can be conducted and contracts entered into and carried out. If under the treaty anything is permissible that may destroy the business Canada enjoys with New Zealand, it is dangerous. The government of New Zealand might destroy a Canadian contract.

Mr. STEVENS: That feature is present, but I would point out to my hon. friend that it is equally present whether you have a treaty or not.

Mr. NEILL: Under the treaty you have three months.

Mr. STEVENS: In the absence of a treaty that same eventuality might occur, so there is not imposed by this any risk on an exporter that is not present in normal trade. The provisions of the treaty, of course, postulate cordiality, good will and common sense, and a friendly attempt to adjust any difficulties. That is the basis of the whole thing. It provides for a friendly method of adjusting what might otherwise be a provocative and difficult situation.

Mr. YOUNG: This section says that section 6 of the Customs Tariff, which is the dumping clause, shall not apply, but it makes no mention of sections 35 to 43 of the Customs Act, which give the minister power to raise the duties by fixing values.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend will recognize that the sections of the Customs Act to which he refers have no real effect unless under section 6 they are made applicable.

Mr. YOUNG: Oh yes, they have.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend will find if he studies the situation that what I say is correct. The only way you can give effect to the increased duty is by imposing the dump.

Mr. YOUNG: By increasing the valuation you increase the regular duty, and then add the dumping duty. This particular section says that you will not add the dumping duty, but it does not say that the other sections shall not apply.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: What I said applies to specific duties only, but the articles chiefly affected under the agreement are under specific rates.

Mr. YOUNG: There are some items here where the duty is ad valorem, and in such cases the minister will have power to shut the goods out at will.

Mr. STEVENS: No, because we undertake not to change the rate.

Mr. YOUNG: You change the valuation.

Mr. STEVENS: I think that that would be interpreted under the treaty as changing the rate.

Mr. RALSTON: That is what we always argued.

Mr. YOUNG: What will the port collector do?

Mr. STEVENS: He will act according to instructions given him by the order which puts into effect what my hon. friend is referring to, whatever action that might be.

Mr. MARCIL: I would like the minister to complete his speech by telling us something about butter. In the last election in the province of Quebec twenty candidates of the Conservative party won their seats in this house on this question of New Zealand butter, and I would ask the minister to tell me how the position is going to be changed by this treaty. Will the farmer be completely saved by this change in duty on butter, from one to five cents, or what is going to happen?

Mr. STEVENS: The answer to that very reasonable question is that under the old treaty the duty on butter was one cent a pound and under this treaty it is five cents a pound. That is the first point. Then under the provisions of article IV there are remedial rates which may be exercised. Furthermore, as was quoted a short while ago by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre, the dairy council when they appeared before the tariff board represented that a four cent rate was sufficient. Presumably, therefore, a five cent rate should be reasonable protection, and in the case of emergency we have remedial powers under article IV.

Mr. MARCIL: Do I understand, then, that this treaty practically means the prohibition of the importation of New Zealand butter into Canada, that there will be no importations from New Zealand under this new rate? Conditions have entirely changed from what they were when we were importing New Zealand butter into Canada. Then the farmers in the eastern townships were exporting their cream to the United States because they could get a better price and we had no Canadian butter in this country, so we imported butter from New Zealand; but now butter is being exported from Canada. We have enough Canadian butter for ouselves, and if this new rate means that importations of butter from New Zealand will be shut out, I do not see what advantage the treaty will be to the dairy farmer.

Mr. STEVENS: Might I answer the hon. member who a moment ago asked for the rates on motor cars—

Mr. VENIOT: The minister is slipping.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not understand that my hon. friend from Bonaventure expects an answer, but if he does I find myself in a very happy position. He asks what our expectations are. We anticipate that under this treaty the rather troublesome difficulties of the last two years will vanish, that the relations between Canada and New Zealand will be amicable in all respects, and that the interests of all parties will be adequately safeguarded and protected. Reasonable provision is made for adjusting any difficulties which may arise. In regard to the duty on motor cars, the duty was formerly 50 per cent on all cars. The new rate under the schedule is 26 per cent when there is 75 per cent or over of Canadian content, and 32 per cent when the Canadian content is from 50 to 75 per cent.

Mr. BROWN: I see that onions are mentioned in the treaty. Has the hon. member for South Essex been consulted about that?

Mr. STEVENS: That is a very important item. We get a special rate on onions entering New Zealand, and New Zealand gets a preference on their onions coming here, but we do a much larger business with New Zealand in onions than they do with us. It is one of those cases where there is a reciprocal trade which is advantageous to both countries.

Mr. BROWN: It pleases me.

Mr. MARCIL: Potatoes are not mentioned in the treaty. The farmer is now getting only a few cents per bushel for his potatoes. Was any attempt made to develop a market in New Zealand for Canadian potatoes?

Mr. STEVENS: We get the British preferential rate.

Mr. MARCIL: Does that mean we are going to export any potatoes to New Zealand?

Mr. STEVENS: If our exporters are enterprising enough and the market in New Zealand is attractive enough, there is a possibility, but frankly I would not expect a very much enlarged market for our potatoes in the Antipodes. There is a duty on potatoes entering New Zealand.

Mr. MARCIL: Is there any news regarding the potato situation? The situation in Quebec and New Brunswick is critical. New Brunswick No. 1 potatoes are retailing in Ottawa at 50 cents per 80 pounds. I wonder what the New Brunswick farmer is getting out of that. Is there any prospect of getting a market in Cuba or anywhere else for our potatoes?

Mr. STEVENS: I should not like to digress too far into a discussion of matters outside of the treaty, but I will answer my hon. friend by saying we are doing everything that is possible at the moment in that regard. There is a special effort being made in regard to Cuba, but I am afraid that the season is too far gone for us to expect to do much business in potatoes with Cuba this year. There is no question that the potato situation is bad, but we are doing everything we can. We have succeeded in assisting in the marketing of some of the potato crop in the maritimes, not of course to the degree that we should have liked, but we have done everything that was possible. I would rather deprecate, Mr. Chairman, getting into a discussion of items outside of the treaty.

Mr. MARCIL: I see potatoes are not mentioned in the treaty at all.

Mr. STEVENS: It is the British preferential rate for potatoes.

Mr. MARCIL: Is there any news from England about the potato situation?

Mr. STEVENS: We are working on that. It is a very difficult task.

Mr. BROWN: I am glad to notice in this treaty that the government is now recognizing the value of trade, even if it is concerned with the same articles, because in tariff discussions that have taken place in the house during the last ten years it has been frequently objected by hon. members on the other side that goods were coming into Canada in certain quantities, although similar or even greater quantities of the same class of goods were going out of Canada. I think this marks an advance in the trade thinking of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. STEVENS: Thank you very much. All compliments are welcome.

Mr. CAYLEY: I am quite well aware that the high duty on eggs from the United States will prevent any importations from that country, but in previous years we have received large importations during the winter months, December, January and February. I well remember that when I was soliciting a certain gentleman's vote during the last election he told me he would not vote for any government that let so many eggs in, and so I lost his support. I want to make sure that the government is not going to imperil its existence by allowing too many eggs to come in from New Zealand under this arrangement during those months when our poultrymen get their best prices and depend upon these returns to carry them through. I think in this morning's Journal I noticed the secretary of the National Dairy Council expressed some regret that the protection against condensed and powdered milk and casein had not been made higher.

An hon. MEMBER: It is made lower.

Mr. CAYLEY: Has there been any cooperation with the National Dairy Council in adjusting this rate?

Mr. STEVENS: I am in the very happy position of being able to assure my hon. friend by indubitable evidence that there is not any need for apprehension about eggs. The facts regarding eggs are as I have already stated them. Eggs from New Zealand have been free for many years.

Mr. CAYLEY: The duty was very low from the United States.

Mr. STEVENS: In the fiscal year 1930 Canada imported eggs to the value of $950,000, of which 98 per cent came from the United States and none from New Zealand.

Mr. CAYLEY: Under what rate from the United States?

Mr. STEVENS: That was in 1930, I think before the increase in the rate. New Zealand exports nearly all her eggs to Great Britain. Her exports to that country in 1928, 1929, and 1930 were £18,000, £16,000 and £1,400 respectively. So New Zealand's egg exports are very small. There have been no imports into Canada, although her eggs were always free; now they are free only three months of the year. So I think under that head we need have no apprehension.

Mr. CAYLEY: It was hardly worth bothering with then.

Mr. STEVENS: Quite true. With regard to powdered milk, we have no representations objecting in any way to the item referred to.

Mr. CAYLEY: I was mentioning what I read in the paper this morning.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not notice it.

Mr. MALCOLM: Mr. Chairman, the minister, I think, fully appreciates the fact that my sympathies are very much with him in his work of negotiating a treaty with the sister dominion of New Zealand. I was disappointed that he had not made just as full a statement at the outset as he has made now with regard to the features of the treaty which distinguish it from the old treaty, and which he expects will be helpful to Canada in enabling this country to secure a greater share of trade from New Zealand and on the other hand will be helpful to New Zealand in enabling that country to secure a large share of our trade.

I propose to make a few general observations with regard to the treaty itself and its desirability, which is not questioned by any hon. member in the house, nor indeed, I think by the Canadian people. I shall not worry my hon. friend the minister in putting through his treaty, with the same kind of political criticisms that we had to face from several hon. gentlemen on the other side, especially the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), when the previous treaty was under discussion. We were told that the government then in power was destroying Canadian agriculture and the butter industry because we imported some of our butter from New Zealand. The minister is not going to be worried by me with any unfair criticism at all. I quite realize what the member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has said, that the sister dominion of New Zealand is a country of whose total exports 92 per cent are pastoral products. There are such exports as kauri gum and hemp, but these are infinitesimal compared with the pastoral products which New Zealand exports. New Zealand raises sheep and is probably one of the finest sheep-raising countries in the world. Therefore she exports wool and mutton. New Zealand raises cattle; therefore she must sell hides and beef. New Zealand has probably the finest dairy herds that can be found out of doors, and therefore all dairy products, whether cheese, butter, condensed milk and milk products must be a substantial part of her export trade. No hon. gentleman on the opposite side or on this side can expect any minister of trade and commerce, past, present or future, to make a deal with the sister dominion of New Zealand without holding out some hope to that dominion that we will endeavour to take a substantial amount of these products, and no politician need go among the farmers of this dominion and tell them that their commodities will not have to compete with commodities imported from New Zealand if a satisfactory trade treaty is arranged. Therefore I am glad to have the minister stand up in the house and be as frank and as honest about the question as he was in his opening remarks when he said that any trade treaty must be a case of give and take.

But there is a feature which is helpful in promoting trade between this country and New Zealand—namely that our respective seasons are opposite to each other. This feature does relieve the situation to some extent. We can export apples to New Zealand at the very time they are required; and New Zealand can export apples to us at the very time when our apples are not ripening. There are only two or three months in the year when we have not a surplus of eggs and at that time New Zealand's hens are laying. Hansard contains a speech made by me when I was in my hon. friend's position refuting the accusation that we were allowing tremendous importations of eggs. Canada never imported many eggs. Canada always started to accumulate eggs for storage in April, and by December had 175,000,000 to 200,000,000 dozen in storage. True, in January and February we may have run short, and then we probably imported a million dozen or so from the United States. I say to my hon. friend the minister that if the eggs that formerly came from the United States can now be imported from New Zealand, I shall be very glad he has made the arrangement. Likewise in connection with any other commodities which we have to import, I would rather import them from a sister dominion than from a foreign country, whether it be New Zealand apples rather than Oregon apples, or New Zealand eggs rather than American.

There is another point with respect to the treaty that has been referred to in this discussion, which the minister has to a considerable extent cleared up; that is stability of trade is very desirable at the present time. Someone said recently—which I think must appeal to every man who is facing the difficulties of government or of business at the present time—that prosperity was largely based on faith plus activity, and that depressions were usually caused by fear plus inactivity. If business is to progress by satisfactory trade arrangements with New Zealand or with the other parts of the British Empire who will be represented at the conference to be held here this summer, there must be some faith in the country, and there must be some faith in governmental legislation which will allow trade to flow with the fewest possible obstacles. In making a treaty with New Zealand I think the minister would do well to remove from the treaty every particle of influence of order in council legislation, and let the people of New Zealand and the people of Canada know exactly what will be the rates of duty, for the period of a year. It is all very well to talk about emergencies. Emergencies may arise, but when an Australian exporter comes to Canada and establishes a market, whether it be for eggs, for butter or for condensed milk, he comes here with the understanding that his government has made an arrangement with the Canadian government whereby he may do business. If, after he has begun to distribute his product throughout Canada, some producer of that product in Canada makes a strong appeal to the minister the whole question is held up for negotiation. I submit to my hon. friend that this is not very encouraging to the man who has come here to sell his goods. On the other hand if a Canadian exporter establishes agencies in New Zealand and arranges contracts, and then someone in Australia suddenly discovers that the import comes into competition with industries already established, to have the whole question reopened is not very satisfactory to the Canadian exporter. Therefore may I submit to the minister that my principal criticism of his treaty is that the rates of duty are not definitely established. The privilege contained in sections 35 to 40 referred to of putting a value on goods by order in council in my opinion may destroy the advantages offered in the treaty. We should know definitely that we are going to have an established rate of duty into Canada, and that when New Zealand starts to do business it will not be injured by the application of the dumping duty or by an increased valuation being placed on imports.

What business may be done in Canada in condensed milk I do not know, but I do not think the business in butter will bother anyone, because the fallacy of everything that was said from the other side of the house during 1929 and 1930 has been amply demonstrated, and I have no desire to rub it in. At that time we had general prosperity in Canada. I defended the old New Zealand treaty which was an extension of the Australian treaty, and I will defend my hon. friend's treaty when he works out the details. We must buy something from our sister dominion. Under the old treaty Canada was enjoying prosperity greater than was enjoyed by any other country with a similar population. We were consuming thirty-five or thirty-six pounds of butter per capita in this country, and we were not producing enough butter to meet the demand. No country in the world ever had such a high per capita consumption of butter. The reason we were importing butter was very simple. There had grown up a trenmendous consumption of fresh milk. The condensed milk business was built up and was taking a large part of the flow of milk of many of the best herds in some of the best dairy districts in Canada. As the hon. member for Gaspe said, there was a large volume of cream going from the eastern townships to the United States, and the use of ice cream was rapidly increasing. All these lines of business were more profitable to the Canadian milk producer than was the production of butter, even at the price then obtaining. As a result Canada was short of butter to the extent of some thirty to fifty million pounds yearly. Butter importations amounted to about one-sixth of our consumption, and as a result of that importation we were doing a good business with New Zealand in manufactured goods. I said in the house and on the hustings, and I say now to my hon. friend the minister, that if he does have to import dairy products and as a result of this import he can increase the volume of manufactured goods being sold to a sister dominion, the workmen who will manufacture these goods in Canada will consume much of the condensed milk and butter and eggs imported, so on the whole the trade will be a good trade.

I hope that never again in this country or in this house will we have the exhibition of hypocrisy and insincerity that we had in connection with the criticism of our importation of butter from New Zealand. I shall not offer my hon. frend the minister any political criticism with regard to his treaty, such as was offered to us; when he is prepared to take his treaty item by item and explain the reasons which actuated him in arriving at his decisions, I think he will find that we will agree that in most instances he has made a splendid treaty. Why should we object? This government is continuing the policy which we inaugurated. I know very well that many items are included in the present treaty which were not included in the Australian treaty.

Undoubtedly it was desirable to have a new treaty with New Zealand. Agriculture is predominant in that country; it is not quite so much so in Australia, and it is not so prominent in Canada. In other words, Canada has a larger percentage of manufactured products than either of our sister dominions, Australia is following closely in our wake, but New Zealand is not so close. Therefore the treaty which might be made by the minister with Australia might not suit the requirements of trade with New Zealand. In 1925 Canada extended the terms of the Australian treaty to New Zealand, and in my opinion that was not as satisfactory as a separate treaty. I am glad the minister is making a separate treaty, and I am also glad that he has made a new treaty with Australia. Everyone has now come to the conclusion that we cannot get out of the present depression by stifling international trade, and we in Canada have agreed that the first way to build up trade is to extend our trade within the empire. Now that everyone in Canada has accepted the policy; now that both sides of the house have agreed on the principle, I hope the minister will have absolutely no trouble. The people of British Columbia should be very well satisfied, though the Fraser valley milk producers may have some grievances; as their condensed milk production is now highly developed.

Butter is on an export basis to-day, due to the lack of prosperity in this dominion. I find from the statistics issued by this government that butter consumption has dropped from 350,000,000 pounds to 217,000,000 pounds, which is a tremendous drop in domestic consumption. Little wonder that we are on an export basis; little wonder that export prices prevail. May I point out to hon. members that when prosperity reigns in Canada our industrial workers undoubtedly consume a larger amount of our agricultural products. Under the conditions which existed from 1922 to 1929, there was an excellent market in Canada for all dairy products, and it was only because prices were high here that New Zealand was anxious to export butter to Canada rather than to England. Now, with the industrial depression which my hon. friend is trying to help relieve by the creation of a market in New Zealand for certain manufactured goods, we have at home an added market for agricultural products, but our surplus supplies must still compete in the markets of the world with the products of New Zealand, Denmark and every other dairying country.

That is the situation. The New Zealand treaty was cancelled by the late government for two reasons, first because it was due for readjustment and secondly because the terms of the general treaty with Australia were no longer applicable to New Zealand. We had hoped to negotiate a new treaty in a very short time. I am not going to chide the minister for having let two years go by before bringing in this treaty. I know the difficulties with which he has been confronted, but now the question comes up as to whether under the new treaty or not he has lessened the sacrifice that was supposed to be made by the farmers of Canada under the old treaty. The farmers' wives in this dominion were told in the election that their pin money, their household money, came from butter, and that the iniquitous government which allowed this flood of New Zealand butter to come in was depriving them of a good deal of that money. My hon. friend has thrown his protective arm around the farmers' wife with a five cent tariff on butter. I compliment him on it, but I do not think it matters whether the duty is five or ten cents, because we are now on an export basis and it will take a considerable period of prosperity before Canadians will consume all the butter that is made in this country and again be on an import basis. I had not the pleasure of being present when wool was being discussed, but the farmers themselves, were told that if we in this country would follow the protective tariff system and grade down our tariffs all the way from textiles to wool, there could be protection for the farmer; they were told that there would be benefits to the farmer through a tariff on wool. Whether or not my hon. friend is going to put a duty on wool when the Imperial conference comes on, I do not know. But I do know this, that the promise which was made by hon. gentlemen opposite that, if it was to apply to textiles, it should apply right down the scale to wool, has not been kept. After listening to the speech of my hon. friend from Dufferin, about how cheaply milk and wool were produced in New Zealand, I am afraid that if the minister has given some protection to the dairy farmer's wife on her butter he has left the farmer himself to face the full force of the New Zealand competition on wool. In other words, the producer of wool is granted nothing under this treaty. My hon. friend knows that the countries from which raw wool would come would be New Zealand and Australia, should we develop the spinning of wool extensively in Canada. Certain manufacturers in this dominion have constantly said that the whole Canadian clip, of which there is a tremendous surplus in storage at the present time, could be used in Canada. It is not being used however, and the fact remains that wool growers are still open to competition from New Zealand. Nevertheless I still believe the minister has worked out a fairly good treaty. As a party we did not promise protection on wool, nor did we promise protection on butter, but we truthfully explained that there were certain benefits to be derived from trade treaties.

I do not know that the minister could have made a better treaty than he has. He had to sacrifice something; he could not have everything; and I was indeed delighted to hear him say in his opening remarks that, in order to make the treaty, there had to be a certain amount of give and take. I am going to compliment the minister on the treaty. I think his terms in connection with the automobile industry, with the lumber industry, and in connection with pulp and paper, some of which terms are the same as under the old treaty, are very good terms. I think that he has added to the list of goods for which we desire favourable entry into New Zealand, many commodities which were not included in the Australian treaty and for which the manufacturers had asked favourable consideration when the treaty was under revision. In fact, I believe the treaty is probably as good a treaty as could be made, and when it is considered item by item the minister will be able to explain the changes satisfactorily to the committee.

I do submit in conclusion, however, that no treaty, that we may make with any country is going to be as valuable a treaty, if the rates are uncertain, as if they were fixed. It is difficult for me to comment at the present time, not having studied the New Zealand terms and privileges under her customs laws. Knowing the embargoes that have been placed against imports by Australia and New Zealand, knowing the difficulties of these governments on occasion, and the means they have had to resort to—it is not easy for me, to have the faith in the productive results of this treaty, under these circumstances, that I should like. If there were an absolute assurance such as there should be if, for the short term of one year, that terms of the treaty would be carried out without restrictions of any kind; that the right was denied to either country to put in any new tariffs restrictions or embargoes, I should like the treaty better. I do submit to the minister that, with his keen desire to see this trade a success. With the reasonably favourable terms which he has made and on which he has a right to be complimented by the people of the dominion, he should not allow orders in council, or the privileges and powers under the extraordinary legislation which exists at the present time, to hamper the business of Canada by applying the dumping or valuation clause. Let business flow, under the terms of the agreement and I think the treaty will be a success.

Mr. STEVENS: I wish to thank my hon. friend for his very fair criticism. May I suggest that we proceed item by item. If we did so, seeing that I have answered the very broad and general questions of principle that have been put to me, I think I could explain the items to the satisfaction of the committee.

Mr. COOTE: I would not speak now, but for some time I have been trying to get the floor to say a few words in regard to the treaty. So far as I can see, the treaty offers advantages to the farmers of New Zealand and advantages to the manufacturers of Canada. I noticed an article in the Financial Post of April 30 under this heading:

New Zealand opens market for many companies.

Canadian auto manufacturers very pleased at new treaty.

"The treaty is very gratifying," said Wallace R. Campbell, president and treasurer of Ford Motor Company of Canada to The Financial Post. . . . General Motors hopeful. General Motors officials questioned by The Financial Post were also hopeful that the treaties would mean more business for the Oshawa plant. . . . Officials of Willys-Overland Limited tell The Financial Post that the preference on the basis of a car costing $500 in the United States means a benefit to Canada of $95 per car as against $32-$35 heretofore. This is for a car unable to qualify under the seventy-five per cent content law.

The article goes on:

Other lines of Canadian industry which expect material benefit from the new treaty announced in the Commons this week are lumber, iron and steel tubing and rubber, silk hosiery, building products and implement manufacturers.

It names certain companies that would be likely to get very direct benefits from the treaty, and then the Financial Post takes up the other side of the picture—the case of the Canadian farmers:

Just what Canadian wool growers will say about continuance of free entry to New Zealand wool is problematical. They probably will object strenuously. This concession to New Zealand, together with a lowering of the butter tariff from eight to five cents, are the two chief items in favour of New Zealand.

I think it is clear from this article that it is this writer's opinion that the advantages, so far as New Zealand is concerned, are for New Zealand farmers, and so far as Canada is concerned, for the manufacturers of Canada. In other words, the concessions given by Canada are at the expense of the farmers of Canada, if tariffs on the farm products are of any assistance, as members of the party opposite have always claimed so persistently. In the campaign the Prime Minister was reported to have said to the farmers, "I will make tariffs fight for you." It seems to me that so far as this treaty is concerned the word "for" has been left out.

As I read the terms of the treaty now before us, wool is placed on the free list while blankets bear a rate of 22½ per cent; wool travelling rugs, 30 per cent and wool floor and carpet rugs, 25 per cent. In view of the discussion which took place in this house on February 22, I am unable to understand why this treaty should contain these provisions. On that date the following resolution was moved by the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Swanston):

That, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that the government of the Dominion of Canada place a duty on raw wool that would reasonably protect the Canadian wool growers.

That resolution was adopted by a vote of the house. In speaking thereon, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) said:

Is it worth while to do something to keep alive this industry into which these men have put so much?

The hon. minister was referring to the sheep growers.

Personally, I feel that it is. If they were not efficient it would be a different thing, but they are as efficient as the sheep farmers of any country in the world. I have no hesitation in stating that we should put forward every effort to keep this industry alive.

The resolution asks that a tariff be placed on raw wool. That alone would not be sufficient to protect the wool industry. I feel that any tariff that will protect the wool industry must be on the whole schedule of wool from wool in the grease, wool scoured, wool tops, yarns and so forth. I therefore apprceiate this opportunity to put myself on record as being in favour of the resolution.

I cannot help but feel that the next time a trade treaty is to be negotiated it would be only proper that the Minister of Agriculture go along as one of the negotiators. This resolution was the subject of considerable debate, and I notice that, among others, the following members spoke in support of it:

The hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Swanston).
The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Stewart).
The hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Stanley).
The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Thompson).
The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser).
The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling).

The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson).
The hon. member for Long Lake (Mr. Cowan).
The hon. member for Queens (Mr. Myers).
The hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Loucks).
The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins).

I wonder where our genial friend for Marquette was when this treaty was being negotiated? The motion was carried by a vote of 77 to 32, a very substantial majority. So far as I can remember, all the members of the government who were then present supported the resolution. I do not think the wool industry is being treated properly when a trade treaty is negotiated which places wool on the free list but which imposes the rates already quoted against articles made of wool. During the discussion on the resolution the hon. member for Cariboo stated that 30 per cent of the imports of wool into Canada came from New Zealand—at least that is my recollection. It seems to me that the government has not been fair to the house or to itself, considering the vote on the resolution, when it negotiated the treaty now before us.

I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he did not overlook something when negotiating this treaty, and that is the question of depreciated currency. I am informed that the New Zealand pound is quoted in Canada to-day at $3.75. That means that the exporter in New Zealand enjoys a premium on Canadian funds amounting to approximately 25 per cent. In many cases that equals the tariff on the goods he is shipping into Canada. Speaking in the house on April 11, the minister very frankly and forcibly stated that we were justified in placing a dumping duty against British goods because there was a depreciation in the British pound. He put a very definite question to his friends across the chamber when he said:

> If a country with a depreciated currency were suddenly to commence shipping goods into Canada at prices obviously below the cost of production, and further assuming that such goods were on the free list and Canadian industries were threatened thereby, would Canada be justified in taking effective measures to prevent the influx of those goods?

Wool from New Zealand has been coming in free of duty and it will continue to come in free of duty. The currency of New Zealand is depreciated 10 per cent below Great Britain's currency and this wool will be coming into Canada at less than the cost of production. If a dumping duty should be applied against Great Britain because of a depreciated currency, should it not also apply in the case of New Zealand or any other country which has a depreciated currency?

Mr. YOUNG: The hon. member wants that done?

Mr. COOTE: If the argument of the hon. minister in connection with Great Britain has any weight, surely it should have the same weight in connection with New Zealand. A shipment of wool sent by a farmer in New Zealand to Canada and netting the shipper $1,000, would return the equivalent in New Zealand currency of $1,250. The Canadian farmer making a similar shipment would receive only $1,000. How can the Canadian farmer hope to compete against the New Zealand farmer under these conditions?

If there is anything in the claim of the government that protection is of value to the farmer, I think that the sacrifice which the hon. member for North Bruce said was necessary is being made by the Canadian farmer. Again using the expression of the hon. member, the giving is by the farmer and the taking by the manufacturer. I think this applies particularly to the automobile manufacturer, who has been the pet of all governments as far as tariff favours are concerned.

Before concluding my remarks I might point out that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is recorded in Hansard as having voted in favour of the resolution to which I have referred, and it is to be regretted that he apparently forgot about the resolution when negotiating this treaty with New Zealand.

Mr. STEVENS: After recess I suggest that we take up the treaty item by item.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the minister try to have available the information in connection with the New Zealand rates of duty applicable to the goods dealt with in schedule B?

Mr. STEVENS: If my hon. friend refers to the schedule in the votes and proceedings, I think he will find there—

Mr. RALSTON: I find there a column on page 377 of the votes and proceedings.

Mr. STEVENS: Schedule B.

Mr. RALSTON: Items in schedule B. What I find there is a column headed "British preferential tariff," "general tariff" and "rate to Canada." What we want is the rate which was in force under the old treaty on those items. I presume I can take it that the rate which was in force was the British preferential tariff. I want to be sure about that.

Mr. STEVENS: When the Australian treaty and the order in council extending it to New Zealand were in operation, I think it will be found that in virtually every case the British preferential applied.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not altogether.

Mr. RALSTON: Could the minister make sure of that?—because there are only twenty-five items.

Mr. STEVENS: I think I am right in that: the British preferential applied to Canadian goods entering New Zealand. Before August, 1930, the British preferential generally applied to Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: That was the British preferential generally in force in New Zealand at that time?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Our difficulty is that we do not know whether the British preferential in force at that time is the British preferential that is now set out in the schedule.

Mr. STEVENS: There may have been some modification since then. I do not know whether we have the very latest figures.

Mr. RALSTON: The situation is the other way about. the latest figures are given in this column. It is the earlier figures we should like to have.

Mr. STEVENS: We shall endeavour to get that for my hon. friend.

Mr. RALSTON: In a word, what were the rates under the British preferential tariff in force when the old treaty was in effect, against Canadian goods set out on pages 377 and 378 of the votes and proceedings?

Mr. STEVENS: We shall endeavour to get that after recess.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 47 for the relief of Eva Corker Trill.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 48 for the relief of George Senkler Morgan.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 49 for the relief of Agnes May Jack Evans.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 50 for the relief of Mabel Constance Small Cossar.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 51 for the relief of Olive Pearl Beattie Watkins.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 52 for the relief of Assad Kalil Eddy, otherwise known as Joseph Canile.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 54 for the relief of Georgina Linda McIndoe Howard.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 55 for the relief of Antonio Poliseno.—Mr. Lawson.

Bill No. 56 for the relief of Dorothy Gertrude Silcock Wilson.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 57 for the relief of Beulah Isobel Phillips Eakin.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 58 for the relief of George Seymour Dixon.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 59 for the relief of Audrey Meredith Mann Redpath.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 60 for the relief of Ethel Seigler Nissenson.—Mr. Jacobs.

NEW ZEALAND TRADE AGREEMENT

The house in committee on Bill No. 62, respecting a certain trade agreement between Canada and New Zealand—Mr. Stevens—Mr. Bury in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Is it the pleasure of the committee to take up first the schedule or the bill?

Mr. STEVENS: I think we had better proceed with the schedule first.

On article I.

Mr. YOUNG: What is the purpose of subclause 2?

Mr. STEVENS: The shipping between Canada and New Zealand touches at only two or three of the main ports; it does not touch at some of the sub-ports, and very occasionally there might be a shipment of goods which it would not pay to take to one of the main ports and transship, but which could be sent by a vessel not running direct to Canada. We are assured these cases are very few, and when they arrive it must be made clear by the government of New Zealand that it is not possible to make the shipment direct.

Mr. YOUNG: Does any volume of goods we now import from New Zealand come here through any other country?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, they are landed at San Francisco, and some at New York; just in what quantity I would not be prepared to say.

Mr. YOUNG: Supposing a Canadian importer wishes to import goods that originated in New Zealand, and finds it to his advantage to buy such goods that came in via San Francisco, would it not be in the interests of all Canada to permit him to do so?

Mr. STEVENS: The theory behind direct shipment is of course that when two countries enter into an agreement that carries preferential rates, it is only reasonable and fair that the business developed as a result of such agreement should be carried by the shipping and through the ports of the respective countries as far as possible. Of course, we have subsidized ships.

Mr. YOUNG: I cannot see the advantage in it.

Mr. ILSLEY: What is the reason for the different wording of paragraph 2, article I, and paragraph 2, article II?

Mr. STEVENS: The same situation does not occur in regard to Canada; we have no difficulty in shipping direct to New Zealand. It is a geographical difference.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is there any difficulty in shipping direct from New Zealand to Canada?

Mr. STEVENS: None at all.

Article I agreed to.

On article II.

Mr. STEVENS: This is the same as article I, except as to subsection 2.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is there any conflict with respect to the manufacture of automobiles?

Mr. STEVENS: No, it does not conflict. That is the formula adopted by New Zealand in reference to matters of this kind. We followed their own wording.

Article II agreed to.

Article III agreed to.

On article IV.

Mr. YOUNG: Before dinner I drew attention to the fact that although under this section the dumping clause did not apply, still the section gives the minister power to fix the value for duty, and therefore the increased ad valorem would apply in this case. I do not wish to move an amendment lest I be taken to desire to embarrass the government, but I would suggest that somebody on the other side move that that clause do not apply.

Mr. STEVENS: Unfortunately we could not move an amendment without throwing the treaty out.

Mr. YOUNG: I do not think New Zealand would object.

Mr. STEVENS: This article was drafted by New Zealand and accepted by us.

Mr. YOUNG: Did they know about our laws at that time?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, they know more about them than we do really. In our original draft we presented precisely the same form as in the Australian treaty; but the New Zealand representatives preferred this, drafted this, and asked for it; we accepted it. So there need be no misapprehension about it at all so far as New Zealand is concerned.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What would happen in the case of some interested party in Canada objecting to a shipment from New Zealand; would this government notify the New Zealand government that the particular article was more or less under suspension? Surely under the agreement this government would feel bound not to impose drastic methods to prevent importation as they do under the general tariff. I suppose my hon. friend had butter in mind when he entered into this arrangement with New Zealand? He did not wish to get into the same fix as did his predecessors in that regard!

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend from West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) has correctly interpreted the theory of the application of this article. It is not anticipated that it will be invoked at all, except under conditions which are extraordinary and abnormal. The whole theory of the treaty is that the two countries will carry on their business in an amicable manner with as little interference as possible with any of the terms of the treaty; but in case such a condition arose it was thought desirable—first in the Australian treaty, and then the same principle was incorporated in this treaty—not to have the whole treaty upset because of disputes on one or more items that might arise from time to time. Therefore this article was designed to meet such a contingency. It would certainly not be invoked simply by an individual indicating that he did not like the importation of a certain article. It must be shown to the satisfaction of the government that interests in Canada or in New Zealand, as the case may be, are prejudiced. I am quite certain that no government would invoke the article unless there were very sound grounds for so doing. We have found the clause very acceptable in the Australian treaty, and there has been no difficulty whatever in working it. It leads really to this, that if there seems to be some danger of competition that it is desirable to avoid, it opens the door for communication between the two governments before anything is done at all, and thus we expect any difficulty to be overcome without even invoking the article. I hope I have made that clear to my hon. friend.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have been sitting here keeping silent and wondering why hon. gentlemen behind the minister have not raised the objections they brought forward on former occasions. I see that the minister has provided a way out, which will enable them to explain to their electors when they go home why they have now agreed to a treaty somewhat similar to the one about which they raised such a fuss in 1930. There are one or two items in the schedules about which I am wondering why hon. gentlemen are not raising any objection.

Mr. STEVENS: This principle was not in the treaty before 1931.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I quite appreciate that, and I congratulate the minister on the treaty itself. More than that, I congratulate him on his ability to get around a very difficult and knotty question with regard to his own followers. May I warn hon. gentlemen opposite who were so vociferous in their denunciation of the Liberal government in their treaty negotiations with other countries, and who always found fault with the government whenever any little difficulty arose, that there will be difficulties in connection with this treaty, and they will have a great deal of yelling to do before the next election, because someone is bound to be hurt. I am all for it; the wider you can open the avenues of trade the more I will support that action. I am not alarmed about butter or wool coming to compete with Canadian products, but the amazing fact is that hon. gentlemen opposite receive it so quietly and without protest. I venture the assertion that if the Liberal government were putting this through there would be a horrible row raised by hon. gentlemen opposite, and I am not too sure that my hon. friend who is in the chair would not join in it.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The question I have in mind has direct application to the present discussion. A few days ago a member of the government outlined to us the steps it would be necessary to take in connection with goods entering Canada from Great Britain, and he described certain actions which were taken with regard to the exchange situation and the depreciated currency in Great Britain. We were told that it was found necessary to put valuations on goods and so on to meet that situation.

As I understand it, the currency of New Zealand at the moment is at a lower point than that of Great Britain, and the difficulty in connection with the exchange that existed with regard to Great Britain would exist, I imagine, to a greater degree with regard to New Zealand. Did any discussion take place on that point, or was there any suggestion that it might be necessary to take action with respect to New Zealand as was the case with respect to Great Britain?

Mr. STEVENS: I think I can explain that in a few sentences. The exchange situation in New Zealand has obtained for some considerable time, much longer than it has in England. I think it is acknowledged by all students of the subject that following a depreciation of currency prices will adjust themselves and price levels will rise.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: In the country where the depreciated currency exists.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, where the depreciation occurs. There is usually a considerable lag between the time they go off the gold standard, say, or whatever causes the depreciation, and the time when the price levels will have adjusted themselves to the new standard. In New Zealand that situation largely obtains; the price levels have risen not altogether but in substantial measure to a degree commensurate with the depreciation of the currency.

My hon. friend from Macleod this afternoon referred to the time when England went off the gold standard. If I may use the expression, England went off the gold standard with a bang. There was no notice given; she just went off that standard between Saturday night and Monday morning, and the currency depreciated very rapidly. It went down with one plunge to a very low point; there was not a gradual decline such as occurred in New Zealand, for instance; the decline was very sudden. Between the time of that sudden sharp decline and the time that prices, through purchases of raw material and so forth abroad, could begin to adjust themselves, there was an opportunity for profiteers, if you like, to take undue advantage of that situation in dealing with British goods, to their own individual advantage and to the injury of the country to which the goods were sent. This dominion recognized that fact, as did other countries, and we stabilized the pound for the time being at $4.86, or par value. Some little time having elapsed, we later allowed the price for exchange values to be $4.40.

I do not desire to argue to-night whether or not that was the correct thing to do, or whether it was right or wrong, but I do want to point out the difference in the two cases. In my opinion there is no occasion for alarm because of the depreciation of New Zealand currency, although mark you we would certainly welcome the time when the currency of the British nations and of other countries might become stabilized, which would relieve Canada as well as other countries of the anxiety, the worry and the bother of dealing with depreciated currency. I must confess that I think the situation has adjusted itself to a degree, though perhaps not fully.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Just one question; I do not want to delay the committee. May I ask if the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe and the hon. member for Haldimand approve of this treaty?

Mr. STEVENS: It is not customary to make formal reference to indivdual members in this way. I cannot speak for them, but I know that I enjoy the confidence and the good will of the hon. members to whom my hon. friend has referred.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: They are two very fine members, but may I tell the minister that during the session of 1930 those two hon. members were sent to Manitoba, to Quebec, to Nova Scotia and practically all over the country by the Conservative organization directed by General McRae, who is now in the other house, to tell the farmers of Canada as a whole that if the Conservative party came into power, New Zealand and Australian butter would not come into this country. I do not take the minister very seriously when he says the depreciated currency of New Zealand will have no effect. We have an example in what has been done in England, and that twenty per cent advantage in exchange will bring down the duty on butter. I think before this treaty is finally passed those two hon. members who spoke on this subject so often during the campaign should state their views regarding this treaty. An immense amount of literature was sent out from this building with regard to the importation of New Zealand butter, and I think the whole matter should be looked into in order to see whether those two hon. gentlemen were trying to get into power or whether they were really in earnest in the remarks they made.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The hon. member for Compton was the worst offender in the house.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I had in mind also the statement made last year by the minister in reference to Australia, whose currency was depreciated. Australia was stated by the minister to have a very material advantage over Canada in the oriental market because of the position of her currency. So, like the hon. member who has just spoken, while I hope the situation will not be complicated by the exchange I am not quite certain in spite of the explanation just given.

While I am on my feet I want to say one word about one phase of the treaty itself. It is unfortunate, but I think it is unavoidable, that in making such trade treaties with our sister dominions of New Zealand and Australia, we are inevitably confronted with this difficulty: in the main, the goods which they must sell—leaving out a long list of smaller items—the goods to which they must attach overwhelming importance must be such commodities as meats, dairy products, wool, hides and other products of the farm; and if they are to get any advantage at all from the treaty they must increase the sales of these articles in this country. This is an important matter, and I appreciate that it is unavoidable when you are dealing with these two countries whose exports are of that kind. I understand, of course, that industrial conditions in this country will be improved by the treaty and the farmers will, of course, receive some indirect benefit. There will be an increase in employment and greater purchasing power among those engaged in industry in Canada, and that will, in a degree, make up for any loss the farmers may suffer. But at the same time I cannot close my eyes to the fact that it is impossible to make a treaty with these countries without, so far as expense is concerned, making it at the direct expense of agriculture and for the direct benefit of other vocations. The amount of indirect benefit the farmers will receive is unknown, and undoubtedly it will be a counterbalancing factor, but I do hope that the minister, in the interests of Canada, and of agriculture particularly, will keep a very close eye on the importations of dairy and other products such as wool, which will come into the country. Wool will come in free while under the same treaty woollen blankets made from that wool will enter under a considerably protected tariff. I hope the minister will see to it that if it does reach the point where agriculture is threatened without some compensating advantage, some other arrangements will be made; because we all hope that, while the manufacturers of our country will receive the full advantage of the treaty and will prosper, they will not obtain that prosperity over a tariff wall to the disadvantage of the farmers. I trust that this will be kept in mind when the treaty is in operation.

Mr. MUNN: In British Columbia the lumber and paper industry will benefit by this treaty. Normally, the lumber and paper industries employ about 40,000 people, and to-day there are less than 10,000 employed in the lumber and paper industry in that province. Being in the lumber industry myself, I am glad to support this treaty. It has been said that there must be give and take in a matter of this kind, and I can assure you that when these 30,000 people who are now idle are employed, they will not be growing wool or making butter; they will be customers for the farmers producing those things:

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I recognize the indirect benefit to agriculture, and while I believe in the principle of give and take, I hope it will not be the farmers who will be giving altogether and the others who will be taking.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I suppose it is true that some people who will get the advantage of the treaty will be eating more butter than they would if they were idle, but it might be New Zealand butter. I do not think that under tariffs you can have absolute equality; you have to make the best arrangements you can. In a treaty of this kind, I do not know that I would have very much complaint about making certain sacrifices for the fishing industry, the lumber industry and some others that we have in Canada. But what about the automobile industry? We have a tariff on automobiles, and the manufacturers take full advantage of it when they sell cars to farmers and others in Canada. It is very easy to demonstrate that they do take full advantage of the tariff, and on the other hand we are sacrificing to some extent to give them markets abroad. There is an Imperial conference coming and it is just possible that there will be a chance to even things up by means of some arrangement between Canada and other parts of the empire, possibly Great Britain, and I trust that some of these manufacturers at least will be willing to give way in some cases, if it is necessary, in order to assist agriculture.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to add my protest to the protest made this afternoon against the principle of this section. This section would not be so bad if the provisions of section 6 of the Customs Tariff Act of Canada had not been completely changed and distorted out of their original application by a change in the sections from 36 to 43, which provide now that the price to be fixed for duty purposes shall be, not simply the domestic price, the usual price in the country of origin, but any arbitrary price that may be fixed by the minister. Under these circumstances, this treaty is going to be subject to all the fluctuations and instability of other items in the tariff schedule of this country, and it is a poor beginning in making a treaty, particularly one which at most is to run but for one year, to inject into it such an element of uncertainty as is contained in the provision that section 6 of the Customs Tariff Act may apply. Section 6 permits not only the charging of the difference between the invoice price of the article and the proper domestic price of the article as sold in the country of origin, but the charging of the difference between the invoice price and any arbitrary price which may be fixed by the minister. That is a poor principle to introduce into a treaty, especially a treaty of such short duration as this; and in the interests of stability and of good relations between the countries concerned it would be most desirable to leave this out. Stabilization of tariffs was one of the things on which our friends opposite went into power, but stabilization of tariffs and of economic conditions has been about the last thing they have accomplished, and I do not think that our sister dominion of New Zealand should have such a condition imposed upon her. My hon. friend says that New Zealand has consented to it, but I say that we should not place Canada in the position of having to exercise such a power as is given here. Let me give an example. Suppose any shipment of goods—I will not specify any commodity —comes from New Zealand, bought by a consumer in this country at an invoice price which he believes is right, and for some reason or other a manufacturer or producer in Canada makes representation to the government, while the goods are on the water, with the result that notice is given under this section. When the importer comes to pay duty on those goods which he has purchased at a certain price and has probably resold, he finds that section 6 of the Customs Act has been applied, the dumping duty has been put on, and he is subject to loss under the contract of resale which he has made. I submit that that is not good for the consumer in this country, neither is it good for the relations with other dominions. I protest against the principle contained in this article, which makes it not only elastic but introduces into our trade treaties the jumping-jack provision, if I may so term it, contained in section 6 of the Customs Act.

On article V.

Mr. RALSTON: Could the minister tell the committee whether or not sections 11 and 12 of the New Zealand Customs Amendment Act are the same as section 6 of our Customs Tariff Act?

Mr. STEVENS: Those sections are fairly drastic.

Mr. RALSTON: What is the collateral power? Is it to fix prices and determine the rate of duty to be imposed?

Mr. STEVENS: Section 12 reads:

(1) If and whenever the governor General is satisfied:—(a) that the existence of a duty of customs, or the rate of any such duty, or the exemption of any goods from duty, operates or is likely to operate in an injurious unfair or anomalous manner in respect either generally to the public interest or particularly to any industry, trade, business or occupation;—

And so on.

—he may, by order in council, suspend the existing tariff in whole or in part, and by the same or subsequent order in council may, in lieu thereof, impose on any goods such duties of customs, or create such exemptions from duty, as appear to him just.

Mr. RALSTON: At least that section is straightforward; it says in so many words that the minister has power to amend the tariff. It does not do it in the manner we attempt to do it, by saying that while we have not the power to fix the tariff, we can do the same thing in another way by fixing the value for duty purposes. I assume there is no limitation on the rate of tariff which can be fixed.

Mr. STEVENS: Not that I notice.

Articles VI, VII and VIII agreed to.

On article IX.

Mr. RALSTON: Is there a reciprocal rate in connection with the Cook Islands and Western Samoa?

Mr. STEVENS: We get the British preferential rate in both cases, but it is applied in a slightly different manner. The hon. member will notice the words, "subject to part XXI of the Customs Act 1913 of New Zealand." That brings the article into conformity with that act, and the effect is that we get the British preferential rate, although there are some duties which the Cook Islands are allowed to impose which are slightly different from the general New Zealand tariff.

Article agreed to.

On article X.

Mr. NEILL: Would it not have been better to have the treaty remain in force until notice of abandonment is given?

Mr. STEVENS: The suggestion was made by our friends in New Zealand that we make it for one year, due to the fact that an imperial conference is to be held at which their representatives will be present. It was anticipated that some unforeseen principle might arise out of the conference which would make it desirable to amend the article to conform thereto.

TARIFF RATES ON GOODS THE PRODUCE OR MANUFACTURE OF NEW ZEALAND

Schedule A—Customs tariff—7. Meats, fresh, n.o.p.: (a) beef and veal, 3 cents per pound; (b) lamb and mutton, 3 cents per pound; (c) n.o.p., 2 cents per pound.

Mr. COOTE: What were the importations under this item?

Mr. STEVENS: In 1931 the importation of beef from Australia was valued at $24,000; from New Zealand, $100,000; from the United States, $73,000, a total of $198,000. I am giving just the round figures. The importations of mutton and lamb from Australia were valued at $133,000; from New Zealand, $11,000; from the United States, $72,000, a total of $217,000. The importations of other fresh meats from New Zealand were valued at $5,000 and from the United States $13,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What were the rates under the Australian treaty as applied to New Zealand by order in council?

Mr. STEVENS: Half a cent a pound.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: For the three items?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—ex-8. Canned meats (other than kidneys and tongues), poultry or game; extracts of meat and fluid beef, not medicated, 15 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. NEILL: What does the "ex" mean?

Mr. STEVENS: It means part of an item.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Let us consider how article IV will work out when applied to this item. Supposing meats were coming in in large volume and under an export marketing board which might be set up, as was done in Australia under the Patterson plan, the sheep men came to the minister and said that this had a prejudicial effect upon the mutton and sheep industry. If sufficient pressure was brought to bear upon the government it might decide to take action and inform the New Zealand authorities that unless something were done to correct this difficulty within three weeks it would apply the provisions of section 6. If such a matter was turned over to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman), we know what he could do to it within a few minutes—he would tear it asunder.

Mr. STEVENS: I think my hon. friend is overlooking the fact that the duty has been increased from one-half to three cents a pound. We are expecting that that rate will have a reasonably satisfactory control over the situation, and I think this should be borne in mind when considering this question. Article IV would be invoked only in the case of an absolute necessity and not at the behest of any individual. I think my hon. friend can let his mind be satisfied on that point.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: These export marketing boards are getting to be quite popular. I notice they have one in South Africa as well as in the Irish Free State.

Mr. STEVENS: There is no doubt about that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They are talking abount having one in Canada. My hon friend knows how even the low tariff government that preceded this one invoked the dumping clause against butter coming in under the Patterson plan to such an extent as to keep it out. That is how it came in from New Zealand. Supposing they have a Patterson plan in New Zealand, they can put mutton or lamb on this market at a very cheap rate and this will be considered unfair. I know what will happen. My hon. friends will have a real old time of it and it will not take the Minister of National Revenue long to settle the matter. He will raise the tariff from stem to gudgeon in about three wiggles of a sucking lamb's tail, as the saying goes. I was hoping I would be able to take the same attitude on this bill as I did last year on the Australian treaty; but in this they are going from bad to worse and from there they propose to go to the imperial conference. This is a great training for that event. Where will it all end? I am astonished at the minister bringing down such a provision as this. For the life of me I cannot see why article IV cannot be rescinded without prejudicially affecting the treaty. Surely we can trust a sister dominion for twelve months. If we cannot, my hon. friends opposite might as well throw up their hands and admit they do not know how to run the affairs of the country.

Mr. GERSHAW: Might I ask if provision is made for the grading of these food products to ensure against disease coming in?

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. STEVENS: There is no provision in Canada for grading imports from another country. I think New Zealand has a very fine system of packing and grading of its own.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That will be attended to by the live stock branch. I think the work is under way now.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: Does New Zealand allow our beef and veal to enter? What rate do they charge us?

Mr. STEVENS: We get the British preferential rate into New Zealand.

Mr. DONNELLY: How much?

Mr. STEVENS: The New Zealand tariff is a little difficult for us to find the particular item in it, but I understand the rate is 20 per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I do not know whether this comes under the minister's department or not, but I wonder if a good deal of this mutton that is brought in from New Zealand is not sold over the counters as lamb.

Mr. STEVENS: I know, from occasionally getting my teeth into some lamb, a good deal of it is, at first, mutton. It is rather a reversal of nature, but I cannot guarantee against that.

Mr. LUCAS: I notice the rate on this item is three cents as compared with four in the British preferential. Do we get any rates into New Zealand less than the British preferential?

Mr. STEVENS: I think not.

Mr. LUCAS: I notice in several of the items the rates are higher than the British preferential.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is one item on which the minister should be congratulated. He is giving the farmers protection. This is almost the only thing the farmers have to crow about in this treaty.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They will get a little more protection and perhaps they can do with it. At present, however, I am a temporary resident of the city of Ottawa, and I have to buy lamb. It makes all the difference in the world whether you are buying or selling. Like other residents, when I buy lamb I will have to pay the three cents a pound extra duty. On a four-pound roast this is twelve cents. Now that we have a cut in our indemnities, how am I going to pay twelve cents more? I protest against it.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—ex. 8. Canned meats, viz:—kidneys and tongues: 15 per cent, but not more than three cents per pound.

Mr. RALSTON: I would point out that in this item there seems to be a reduction.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—9. Rabbits, frozen: free.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—10. Meats, prepared or preserved, other than canned: (a) bacon, hams, shoulders and other pork, free; (b) n.o.p., free.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The minister has not been so generous with the farmer on this.

Mr. STEVENS: The rate remains the same as it was.

Mr. DONNELLY: What does New Zealand charge us for our bacon, hams, shoulders and other pork per pound? We want to know whether we made a one-sided bargain.

Mr. STEVENS: Twenty per cent to us and 40 per cent general. There is a preference there of 20 per cent.

Mr. CAYLEY: What amount was imported last year?

Mr. STEVENS: None from New Zealand; about $2,000,000 worth from the United States.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Do I understand this to mean that bacon can come into Canada free and if we send it to New Zealand, the rate is 20 per cent?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I can understand some things like that happening, but it is the same four-legged porcine, whichever way you look at it. It is the same distance across whichever way you go. I should like to have the matter elucidated. I think I know the reason.

Mr. STEVENS: I have already tried to elucidate it. The rate into Canada is not changed.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not care whether it is or not. This is the situation now: it is free one way and it is 20 per cent the other. If the rate on one side is a matter of antiquity, that does not render it immune from criticism. Is this perhaps the reason? They do not engage very much in hog raising over there.

Mr. STEVENS: That is it exactly.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is very little likelihood of much coming in.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is the ground on which it can be defended?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: Then is this just for window dressing to make it look like something?

Mr. STEVENS: It is one of the few items that New Zealand requested and we did not oppose it. We considered it was reasonable and fair.

Mr. DONNELLY: But the minister says this is just the same as it was before.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: Why was it put into the schedule at all? It is just a little window dressing for New Zealand.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—13. Lard, lard compound and similar substances; cottolene and animal stearine of all kinds, n.o.p.: free

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Surely my hon. friends opposite are not going to let lard enter Canada free? Is there no protest from the other side?

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—14. Tallow: free.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the minister explain why this article has been put on the free list? It was ten per cent under the old treaty. Were there any representations about it? It seems quite a drop.

Mr. STEVENS: It was one of their requests which we have met.

Mr. RALSTON: Is any appreciable quantity of tallow imported?

Mr. STEVENS: None. It is free under the British preferential, the same as under the new Australian treaty.

Mr. MacLEAN: It is almost beyond conception how the articles mentioned in items 13 and 14 are admitted free. I notice that even our good friend the chairman (Mr. Bury) has a resolution on the order paper which we will not reach this session, asking that a duty be put on these very articles. This will be another place where it will be interesting to see how our friends on the other side of the house are going to line up behind the minister on this trade agreement. We remember how they went all over the country during the last election campaign claiming that New Zealand butter was ruining the dairy industry, and only the other night the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe advocated in this house that a bonus be given to the products of mixed farming. To my mind that was really an acknowledgment by that hon. gentleman that the policy which had been pursued by his own party had proved a failure. He came down to my county with a friend from an adjoining county in Ontario and did me the honour of holding meetings in Prince county during the election, and he told the electors there that the whole trouble was with the New Zealand treaty, that the farmers of Canada were being ruined by it. Now our friends opposite, after having increased the duty on butter up to eight cents a pound and the old treaty set aside, come along with a new treaty putting a duty of five cents a pound on butter, and by reason of the depreciated currency in New Zealand that duty will practically amount to only three or four cents a pound. By standing up in this house the other night and advocating a bonus on the products of mixed farming, our friends opposite acknowledged the failure of the policy they advocated prior to the last election, and now they are asking the people of this country to come to their assistance and pull their chestnuts out of the fire by bonusing mixed farming. I am not surprised, therefore, that a number of hon. gentlemen opposite are absent from the house to-night when this treaty is going through.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—16. Eggs in the shell: free.

Mr. NEILL: Will the minister tell us the number of the item in the New Zealand tariff dealing with the importation of eggs?

Mr. STEVENS: Many of these items are not segregated in the New Zealand tariff but are included under provisions n.e.i.—"not elsewhere included."

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. DONNELLY: What quantity came in from New Zealand last year?

Mr. STEVENS: None.

Mr. REID: Suppose New Zealand currency depreciated to a very low point and we were getting a fairly high price for eggs in British Columbia, and New Zealand attempted to ship eggs in here. Would the dumping duty then be applicable?

Mr. STEVENS: Oh yes, provided the matter was treated under article IV.

Mr. NEILL: But you have made no provision in the treaty for dealing with depreciated currency.

Mr. STEVENS: Only in the general article IV.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—43. Condensed milk, the weight of the package to be included in the weight for duty: 2½ cents per pound.

Mr. CAYLEY: Are these rates on condensed milk and on powdered milk in the next item agreeable to the National Dairy Council?

Mr. STEVENS: We have no representations from the National Dairy Council in regard to that matter.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister assured us with respect to the other schedule of articles going into New Zealand that the government had received representations and assurances from those in this country who would be affected by the New Zealand duties, that is our exporters, and it seems to me that the same care should be taken to obtain the views of those who are going to be affected by the new duties on goods imported into Canada. The practice should apply just as much in the one case as in the other.

Mr. DONNELLY: What were the imports last year?

Mr. STEVENS: Our imports were $56,000 worth.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Any from New Zealand?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. DONNELLY: How much butter and cheese came in from New Zealand last year?

Mr. STEVENS: Practically none. I have not the figures here.

Mr. CAYLEY: Has the minister figures indicating how much they produce in New Zealand?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: How does New Zealand's currency compare with Australia's? Is it lower?

Mr. STEVENS: It is higher.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I thought so. Suppose it should go down; is there any provision for jacking it up so that the protection will remain the same?

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think anyone would be warranted in expressing a dogmatic opinion, but I believe the indications are that exchange conditions in both Australia and New Zealand are improving.

Mr. DONNELLY: What is the quotation for the pound in New Zealand?

Mr. STEVENS: I did not look it up today, but I am told it was $3.77.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): In regard to the depreciated currency of New Zealand in terms of Canadian currency, what is the amount of protection we have at the present time on, say, butter? If butter is worth twenty cents a pound, will the protection be five cents per pound, or four cents, or three cents, or two cents, or one cent? I would like to know just what this means?

Mr. STEVENS: There is a specific duty of five cents a pound. The differentiation in exchange would perhaps account for something in the neighbourhood of three cents or a little better, provided—and this is where, I think, some hon. members in discussing the question have overlooked an important factor—provided there had been no changes in the price levels in the country where the depreciated currency obtains. I am quite certain the price levels in New Zealand have risen considerably. That is an indefinite and more or less indefinable factor, but it has seriously affected the advantage gained by the depreciated currency. It would be very difficult to give a precise answer, but I think one may say the actual protection is in the neighbourhood of four cents.

Mr. DONNELLY: If butter is worth 20 cents a pound, the amount of protection would vary from day to day according to the rate of exchange. In other words, our protection would not amount to anything at all, it would be wiped out; New Zealand would be getting more for their butter than we would be getting for ours.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I do not know whether I am correctly informed or not, but I understand the New Zealand currency is 20 per cent depreciated with respect to our currency. If so, and butter is worth 20 cents a pound, the rate of exchange will diminish our protection to exactly one cent a pound—where it was before the last election. If that is true it will mean we are face to face—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Every Tory will be beaten.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I am not worried about being beaten at all; that does not bother me a particle. But I remember that in my constituency, as in many other constituencies in western Canada, we told the electorate during the last election that we would keep out this New Zealand butter.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Hear, hear.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I want to know, if the New Zealand currency is depreciated to the extent of 20 per cent, whether that has been kept in mind, because if that is the situation it means the ruination of our dairy industry. I think this is a mighty serious proposition for this committee, for a question of absolute honesty is involved.

Mr. DONNELLY: It is said the pound is depreciated to $3.77. If butter was worth 20 cents in Canada on account of the rate of exchange, New Zealand would be getting about 25 cents for their butter here in Canada. In other words, they would be getting more for their butter than the Canadians could get, so they could afford to pay three cents duty and have some 22 cents clear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would commend to the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Stitt) and to the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) article IV of the treaty, which is intended to meet just such a situation as is now being presented to the committee.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): For the information of the hon. gentleman who has just come in, may I say to him that we have discussed that article very fully, and the minister gave us to understand that there was to be some respect shown for treaty rights.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is article IV in there for, just padding?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): To let them out of a tight corner.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not in a tight corner.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, you are.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let me tell the hon. member for South-Edmonton that he could not put me in a tight corner if he tried. It is suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite that the minister has said—I was not in the house during the preceding discussion—that article IV is not to apply to any specific case where it works a hardship. I do not think that is the intention of the treaty.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I say for the information of the hon. gentleman that he is wrong in designating me as the member for South Edmonton; I am from West Edmonton; but that does not make any difference. Let me add I am ready to take on my hon. friend at any time, in any place, and in any way. The hon. gentleman is in the habit frequently of expressing his opinion in a very forcible way. Well, there are other members who can also express themselves in forcible terms. I am a man of peace, but I do not take any bluff from hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have sat in this house and listened to the hon. member for twenty years, and all he ever got off with respect to immigration was bluff.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The hon. gentleman endeavoured very frequently to put me in a tight place with regard to immigration, but he has never succeeded yet, nor have any of his friends.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): May I call the attention of members of the committee to the fact that we are on item 43a of schedule A.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—71a. Timothy seed: free.

Mr. NEILL: Did the minister not get an application from New Zealand to have orchard grass seed included in the schedule? They grow a very fine quality of orchard grass, and a lot of it, and it seems to me that it would be advantageous to our farmers to get it at a low rate.

Mr. STEVENS: I think that comes in under field seeds, n.o.p., item 73.

Mr. CAYLEY: What are our importations of timothy seed?

Mr. STEVENS: A million dollar's worth from the United States; none from New Zealand.

Mr. TAYLOR: Is there any change in this item?

Mr. STEVENS: No, it was not specified in the old treaty.

Mr. HOWDEN: Have the New Zealanders timothy seed for sale in any quantity?

Mr. STEVENS: A very considerable quantity.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—73. Field seeds, n.o.p., when in packages weighing more than one pound each, free.

Mr. NEILL: I hardly think the farmers would import orchard grass or anything else on a large scale in packages weighing not more than a pound each. Farmers do not buy their field seeds in small packages.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is right. It will come under the British preferential.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—84. Onions in their natural state, including onions grown with tops, shallots, and onion sets, the weight of the packages to be included in the weight for duty, free.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think the minister can be commended with regard to this item—that is, if I understand it aright. It is free here; it had been free formerly. My recollection is that the duty in Australia used to be quite high, and I presume it was the same in New Zealand. They have some way over there of jiggling it up just the same as my hon. friends opposite have without parliament being in session. It was £4 for quite a while, then before we got through with it it was £8.

Mr. STEVENS: We have it at £1.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I commend my hon. friend. I am going to shut my eyes for the rest of the night with regard to the bad things about this treaty, because I have at last found one good thing. We will just let the bad things go until they are tried out. I think that is the best way, since we cannot change them in any case, but what are the actual facts? Formerly it was up to £6 or £8?

Mr. STEVENS: It was £4 in New Zealand.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: While my hon. friend is at it will he give the reasons why they were not both made free? There are extensive storage plants both in New Zealand and in Canada where onions are preserved in most excellent condition. They can be kept for eight or ten months and then exported to neighbouring countries. Some years ago I had occasion to look into the matter in the Okanagan valley, and I found that Australian onions could come into Canada free, but when British Columbia wanted to send onions to Australia at one time the duty against them was £8. That was very annoying when conditions were almost identical in the two countries, with the advantage on Australia's side if anything. However, this is so much better than it was before that I do not feel like criticising it, though I should like to know why any duty was left on, since conditions are about equal in both countries.

Mr. STEVENS: I think with New Zealand it is a question of revenue, since their tariff is largely a revenue tariff.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Do they need it worse than we do?

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then my heart goes out to them.

Mr. STEVENS: My heart bled for them too.

Mr. DONNELLY: What proportion of the New Zealand importation of onions do we supply? I suppose this duty excludes us and that is why we do not get into that market.

Mr. STEVENS: We export about $20,000 worth of onions.

Mr. DONNELLY: How much does New Zealand import?

Mr. STEVENS: About $100,000 worth.

Mr. GARDINER: How much did we import from New Zealand?

Mr. STEVENS: In 1931 we imported about $5,000 worth, and in 1930 about $26,000 worth.

Mr. GARDINER: The balance of trade is in their favour, yet we let their onions come in free.

Mr. STEVENS: Our exports were under a higher rate. We now have a rate of £1 which is very much lower than it was before.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—91. Toheroa soup, free.

Mr. POULIOT: Is this New Zealand pea soup?

Mr. RALSTON: I want to find out about this item, and also about item 123, which deals with New Zealand shell fish. Does the minister know anything about this at all? Is it of the lobster family?

Mr. STEVENS: No, it is a delicacy, very delicious and very highly prized by the New Zealanders. It has a very high standing in that country; it is very popular in London and has been introduced also in some of the leading hotels in Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: I could not find it in Ottawa, and though I have been in New Zealand I have not heard of it previously.

Mr. MacLEAN: Did it come in free before?

Mr. STEVENS: No, it came in under the British preferential tariff, at 15 per cent.

Mr. MacLEAN: I think this is something that should be very carefully looked into.

Mr. STEVENS I may assure my hon. friend that this article will not compete with any Canadian shell fish. Comparatively speaking, it is a high priced article and is considered more or less of a delicacy.

Mr. VENIOT: Is it put up as a soup?

Mr. STEVENS: Very largely.

Mr. RALSTON: It is also canned; item 123 shows that.

Mr. STEVENS: It is used largely in making soup, and I think it sells for 33 cents a pound.

Mr. VENIOT: It could interfere with some of our shell fish; it might come in competition with the product of the lobster called tomalley.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, it could.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—92. Fruits, fresh, in their natural state, the weight of the packages to be included in the weight for duty: (e) pears: free during the months of February, March, April and May; British preferential tariff during the other months of the year.

Mr. DONNELLY: I see the rate from February to May is the British preference, while for the other months these fruits enter free, but the British preference is free, so it would appear to be the same the year round.

Mr. STEVENS: That leaves us an opportunity to change the British preference if we so desire.

Mr. DONNELLY: What is the New Zealand rate against our fruit?

Mr. STEVENS: One penny per pound, plus a surtax of 22½ per cent.

Mr. DONNELLY: This looks very unfair. It seems that everything grown on the farm is given a preference by Canada, while everything we want to sell from the farm carries a good high duty in New Zealand, so we are getting no preference in their market at all. It seems all one sided.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—93. Apples, fresh, in their natural state, the weight of the packages to be included in the weight for duty, free.

Mr. NEILL: This seems unfair; they charge us a penny a pound on our apples while their apples enter Canada free. Why should it not be on a fifty-fifty basis?

Mr. STEVENS: We have improved our position. New Zealand imported apples to the extent of £12,500 sterling, of which Canada supplied £11,500, so we practically supplied the entire market. Now we have a rate one-half penny better than we had before. This business is in our favour; if there is any advantage it is with us.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister is wrong about that.

Mr. NEILL: How can it be in our favour if we let their fruit come in free and they charge us a penny a pound?

Mr. STEVENS: We imported from New Zealand about $36,000 worth and exported about $50,000 worth.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the minister check those figures? I obtained to-day from the department the following figures: Fresh apples imported from New Zealand, for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1932, $42,000; fresh apples exported to New Zealand for the same period, $20,655.

Mr. STEVENS: I was giving the figures for the year before; I had not the figures just given by my hon. friend. There has been an improvement of a halfpenny by this present arrangement, and I may say that the New Zealand representatives assured us that they would give consideration to a further reduction. Another point is that we have some very nice business in box shooks, which is worthy of consideration.

Mr. POULIOT: May I suggest that the apples under this item should be in the same item as passion fruit?

Mr. RALSTON: There is nothing one can say about it to change it, I suppose, since my hon. friend has entered into this arrangement, but I did not know until I began to check up that there is two cents a pound on our apples going to New Zealand while their apples enter this country free. Something was said this afternoon about the fact that there are different seasons. I know that, but you will find that our apples, many of them, are good for a month and a half yet anyway. As someone says, they do come all the year round. I submit that it is not fair to our apple growers to have this one sided arrangement with regard to fresh apples, particularly in view of the fact that the balance of trade, so-called, is against us two to one—at least it was last year. I do not think that the trade in box shooks is going to make up for the sale of fruit which is lost.

Mr. STEVENS: We were under the general tariff last year, which affected it to some extent. Now we shall go under the one penny rate, which is a halfpenny lower than last year.

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend give me the figures for the year during which we were under the general tariff?

Mr. STEVENS: The figures for 1930 show that Canada supplied £11,590 out of the £12,500 imports.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We had practically the whole market.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I am not going to object to apples or anything else coming in, but I wondered, in connection with two or three of these items, what was the significance of the words "weight of containers to be included in weight for duty." Is that for the convenience of the officials?

Mr. STEVENS: That is the customary wording in our tariff in relation to matters of this kind. It runs through the tariff generally and we are accepting the wording of the general tariff.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—95b. Passion fruit (Passiflora edulis): free.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is passion fruit?

Mr. STEVENS: It is a very delicious fruit used in the making of salads and much prized by persons of delicate taste.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—ex. 123. Canned whitebait and canned crayfish: 15 per cent but not more than 7½ cents per pound.

Mr. RALSTON: This item, I am quite satisfied, is one that does compete with our Canadian lobster. This kind of crayfish is very much like Canadian lobster. There is not a great reduction, I realize, but my hon. friend is giving to the New Zealand producer a better rate by 2½ per cent than the British preference, and in addition to that he is fixing a maximum of 7½ cents per pound, which is a considerable reduction below the British preference. I do not believe that this is in the interests of Canadian producers, particularly the fishermen who have to sell their product abroad. Our lobsters are possibly sold in New Zealand, they are sold in the British market and I do not think that this is a commodity which should have been used to provide a trading point under this treaty.

Mr. STEVENS: It is not an item of export by New Zealand to any great extent. Whitebait is the real item asked for there and represents the major portion, the duty being 15 per cent with a maximum of 7½ cents per pound. I am quite satisfied that it is very reasonable protection for any possible competing article of the kind in Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: We are more and more putting up canned fish. Isn't whitebait something like halibut in flavour? It is a rich sort of fish.

Mr. STEVENS: Canned whitebait sells at 40 cents for a seven ounce tin, so that it is nearly 90 cents per pound. It is quite common in the London market.

Mr. RALSTON: Like shrimps?

Mr. STEVENS: No, it is very small, a tiny fish.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is just a wee little thing; you have to eat the whole of it at once.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—ex-123. Shellfish known as Toheroas, in sealed tin containers, including liquid contents: free.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. RALSTON: With the same reservation.

Mr. MacLEAN: Are there any importations under these items?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—142. Tobacco, unmanufactured, for excise purposes under conditions of the Excise Act: free.

Mr. COOTE: How much tobacco comes from New Zealand?

Mr. STEVENS: None, I think.

Mr. COOTE: It seems to me I have heard the Department of Agriculture advising the farmers of Ontario to grow less tobacco this year.

Mr. STEVENS: It would be of a different kind.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—232. Casein: 12½ per cent.

Mr. CAYLEY: Do we receive any casein from New Zealand?

Mr. STEVENS: About $3,000 worth.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—ex-254. Kauri gum: free.

Mr. POULIOT: What is kauri gum?

Mr. STEVENS: It is a resinous gum obtained from a coniferous tree used as raw material in the making of fillers for linoleum and things of that kind.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—ex-280. Grease, rough, the refuse of animal fat, for the manufacture of soap and oils only: free.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is Colonel Mullins agreeing to this?

Mr. STEVENS: We import $1,200,000 from the United States but none from New Zealand.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—305-306b. Building stone, other than marble or granite: free.

Mr. BROWN: Do you need to go to New Zealand for building stone?

Mr. STEVENS: They have a very fine, soft interior stone that can be used for doorways, arches and so forth. It is easily carved.

Mr. BROWN: Is it better than Manitoba stone?

Mr. STEVENS: No. I believe that if the people would use Manitoba stone they would get better satisfaction.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—ex-535, New Zealand hemp (phormium tenax): free.

Mr. YOUNG: In regard to New Zealand hemp, the minister this afternoon made a remark which should not be allowed to pass unnoticed. He said that this hemp was inferior to sisal imported from other countries for the making of twine, and he told us that he had been busy trying to persuade the manufacturers to use New Zealand hemp. If he is busy trying to persuade them to use an inferior article and consequently to sell an inferior twine, then I think he could be better employed.

Mr. STEVENS: I am sure my hon. friend does not wish to misrepresent me. An hon. member, speaking on this point prior to my remarks, had said that it was very poor material and that it would break if given a sharp jerk. I expressed a little surprise at that and said that I had received word from a number of manufacturers that this was fine hemp for cordage purposes. I induced a number of manufacturers to send orders to New Zealand in preference to purchasing from other foreign countries. I referred to binder twine and stated that there was an apparent drawback to the use of this hemp in that it tended to ruffle or ball up when passing through the eye of the binder.

Mr. DONNELLY: What is the present duty on hemp?

Mr. STEVENS: It is free.

Mr. DONNELLY: If it is free to all countries, why does it appear here?

Mr. STEVENS: Stability.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—ex. 549. Wool, not further prepared than combed: free.

Mr. GERSHAW: How much wool comes in from New Zealand under this item?

Mr. STEVENS: I have only the percentages. In 1931, about one-half of the total imports of 2,856,000 pounds of wool in the grease came in from New Zealand; of a total importation of 5,590,000 pounds of washed wool, about 9 per cent came from New Zealand.

Mr. NEILL: Has the minister the percentages for Australia?

Mr. STEVENS: The imports during 1930-31 of wool in the grease from Australia amounted to 496,000 pounds. I might state that a large amount of the wool from New Zealand and Australia finds access to our markets through the United States or London.

Mr. SPENCER: What is the tariff on wool coming from New Zealand?

Mr. STEVENS: There is no tariff.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Again I wonder at what has become of the hon. gentlemen who about a week or so ago voted for a tariff on wool.

Mr. VENIOT: They kept away to-night.

[Mr. Young.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There are quite a few of them here, but we have not heard a single protest.

An hon. MEMBER: They are all subdued.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We on this side of the chamber are not afraid of free wool or anything else, but I am surprised at hon. gentlemen going to all the trouble they did to have a duty imposed, and then remaining silent when an item like this comes before the committee.

Mr. DONNELLY: What is the good of putting a duty on wool and then taking it off? Putting a duty on will cause the shippers to ship direct, and that is all the difference it will make.

Mr. STEVENS: We have not taken any duty off wool; it was free across the board. We are proposing, and we hope it will be carried in a day or two, an intermediate tariff of ten cents a pound and a general tariff of fifteen cents a pound, and we hope that these rates will divert the business direct to this country. We do not desire to interfere with or touch the British preferential tariff until after the Imperial economic conference.

Mr. DONNELLY: Practically all our work of a week or so ago in getting a duty put on wool has turned out to be eyewash—it does not amount to anything at all because to-night we are taking the duty off. We are simply saying: You cannot come in through the back door, you must come in through the front.

Mr. RALSTON: It seems to me that this action demonstrates to the country just how serious members were when they voted for the resolution, which was carried by a large majority. As a matter of fact, I do not think the government ever has cared very much about the wool grower. It will be remembered that a short time ago the government introduced a system of fixing an arbitrary rate of exchange in connection with the valuing of imports for duty purposes, and they passed an order in council which fixed the value of the pound at $4.40. The manufacturers of worsted and other goods made representations to the government and asked that while this valuation should apply to the finished article which they were manufacturing, it should not apply to the raw material. In other words, the Canadian wool grower was not to have the same protection given to the manufacturer. As an indication of how solicitous this government is of the wool growers, they passed an order in council on January 8, the last clause of which reads:

Notwithstanding the provisions of the order in council, and as an exemption thereto, the value of the pound sterling for the purposes of application of special duty on all shipments from Great Britain to Canada of wool, not further prepared than combed, shall be the average value thereof.

And yet the government has stipulated that in connection with other commodities the value of the pound shall be fixed at $4.40 I think we have the right to inquire from those hon. gentlemen who were so vociferous for a duty on wool why they are not protesting to-night against this item. Perhaps they want to let the minister get through his treaty; perhaps the discipline is such that they do not want to interfere. I think it would be more in the interests of the wool growers if they voiced their opinions when these schedules are before the committee rather than on an abstract resolution.

Mr. COOTE: Would it be correct to say that practically 30 per cent of our imports of wool come from New Zealand?

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think so.

Mr. COOTE: I think that statement was made in a recent debate.

Mr. STEVENS: The percentage of washed wool is 9, and the percentage of wool in the grease a little over half; it would not average 30 per cent, as the total imports of wool in the grease were 2,800,000 pounds, and washed or scoured wool, 5,590,000 pounds.

Mr. DONNELLY: Has the minister any information as to how much wool from New Zealand comes in through the United States?

Mr. STEVENS: I have had some of my staff working for months on that and other similar problems. It is very difficult to ascertain, but we have figures indicating quite a substantial quantity. Wool being on the free list, it is impossible to follow it.

Mr. DONNELLY: What quantity comes from the United States?

Mr. STEVENS: I have not the percentage of wool in the grease from the United States, but 20 per cent of washed wool comes from there. The quantity of wool in the grease coming from the United States is 511,000 pounds.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): When this bill was first introduced I felt like congratulating the government on their apparent change of heart in at last deciding that we must trade with some other country, but I could not help noticing, as we went through the items, the minister remarking in the great majority of cases, "no importations." I wonder if, after all, anyone in Canada will benefit from this treaty. If so, who?

Mr. STEVENS: As I think I stated before, when I say "no importations," that means no goods coming into Canada. The story as regards exports is different. The largest value of the treaty will be under the British preference, general articles not included in this schedule, a very wide range.

Mr. GERSHAW: The minister must realize that the sheep men will be somewhat disappointed at this item in the treaty. I am sure he understands the situation, and I hope when this item is under discussion at the imperial conference, some assistance will be given to the sheep men. Our sheep raisers are operating at present at a tremendous loss, and my information is that most of them will be out of business shortly unless they get some help in this respect.

Mr. CAYLEY: I notice in 1930 we imported from New Zealand, in round figures, 1,900,000 pounds, and in 1931, 1,744,000 pounds. Roughly speaking, that is the wool off the backs of about 200,000 sheep, and this is quite an item. I think the minister should have it in mind when he is considering the welfare of the sheep industry.

Mr. YOUNG: Wool, I take it, is like some other commodities that have a habit of finding their way from all over the world to large central markets. Buyers go to those markets and select the kinds of wool they want. According to this year's budget, it is the intention to impose a duty of fifteen cents a pound on wool under the general tariff. New Zealand wool to a large extent comes in through the United States; that is, it finds its way to the United States market where the buyers go and select what they want. Under this arrangement and the clause in the treaty which we discussed earlier in the evening, requiring direct shipment to Canada, it will be impossible for the buyers for our wool manufacturers to get the wool in the most convenient market, and it might be very awkward for them to have to go to New Zealand and select it there. In that regard there is a danger of doing real injury to our wool industry.

Mr. SPENCER: I should like to ask to what extent this wool coming from New Zealand competes with the average wool grown in Canada?

Mr. STEVENS: There is no doubt it does compete, but the whole subject of wool is very complex. I have been amazed in studying the question to find the varieties of wool it is necessary to have to produce even a given article. Carpets, which are looked upon as comparatively simple, require wool to be imported from, I think, India, to give them a certain lustre, pile and so forth. Therefore in manufacturing you must have a variety of wool. While there is undoubtedly some competition between New Zealand and Canadian wools, there is still a marked difference between the wools. It would be impossible for me, without careful preparation, to give an exact description of it, but I can assure my hon. friend there is a great difference in the types of wool produced.

Mr. SPENCER: Where wool is not competing, it should be brought into Canada free for manufacturing purposes, but the minister knows wool is being sold in Canada below cost.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I realize item 538 has been passed, but I did not at the time know that it had been called passed by the Chair. Would the minister mind telling me, if it is not too much trouble, how much binder twine, if any, has been imported from New Zealand in the last few years? I was not aware that we were importing any.

Mr. STEVENS: None from New Zealand.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is there any prospect of manufactured binder twine coming from there?

Mr. STEVENS: I think the main export will be the raw sisal or hemp.

Mr. DONNELLY: I notice the rate under the general tariff is to be fifteen cents. This is a change which the minister intends to make at some future date in the duty on wool.

Mr. STEVENS: It will be passed when the budget schedules are under consideration.

Mr. DONNELLY: It seems strange to me, when the farmer in the west is getting about four cents a pound on his wool that a duty of fifteen cents a pound should be imposed on that commodity. But when you are getting no wool from foreign countries except what comes in indirectly from New Zealand or Australia through the United States, and when it practically all comes in under the British preference, this is a camouflage to make the farmers think they are getting some concession.

Mr. BROWN: Just to show the small quantity of wool of similar quality that enters Canada in competition with our own wool, I have under my hand the figures for 1927, which I think are the latest:

Leicester, Cotswold, Lincolnshire, South Down combing wools, or wools known as lustre wools, and other like combing wools, such as are grown in Canada:

Quantity imported	Value
259 pounds	$93

If hon. gentlemen who contend for duties on wool would pay some attention to that fact, it might modify their opinion.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—553. Blankets of any material, not to include automobile rugs, steamer rugs nor similar articles: 22½ per cent.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It will be noticed that the previous items are free, but when we come to manufactured articles they have to carry duties of 22½, 30 and 25 per cent. Could the minister not have made a better deal than this, particularly when our Canadian manufacturers enjoy free raw material? I am not asking for any protection for the farmer or for anybody else, but I want to protest against this discrimination. The moment we come to a fully manufactured article, up goes the duty. The manufacturer must always have a tremendous amount of protection or we are told he cannot live. I have a list of the items of farm produce all of which come in free, but the very moment we strike wool or wool blankets or wool fabrics wholly manufactured the duty is put up over twenty per cent. I certainly protest against that. While I am in agreement with the arrangement which the minister has made, I do think this is giving entirely too much protection to men who enjoy the privilege of getting in their raw material without paying one cent of duty.

Mr. DONNELLY: How much came in under this item from New Zealand last year, and what duty do they charge against our blankets?

Mr. STEVENS: The imports are not large. These goods are more or less of a specialty of which New Zealand is very proud—high-class blankets, travelling rugs and floor rugs. The total exports of New Zealand under item 553 amounted to less than £1,000, and under item 555 the exports to Canada were only £76. Under item 572 the exports to Canada in 1929 amounted to £21, and none in 1930.

Mr. DONNELLY: What is the duty the other way?

Mr. STEVENS: It is rather difficult to get the exact classification, but I presume that this one would cover it; "rugs, n.e.i., not supplied for floor covering." We get a rate of twenty per cent ad valorem.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: There is just one point I should like to mention in reference to the question which has been raised as to the different treatment accorded under our tariffs to raw wool, for instance, and the manufactured article. I am not going to go into that whole question except to say that naturally enough, it has aroused a good deal of interest and discussion, and a good many suggestions have been made as to how, seeing that we are on a protective tariff and must be in view of conditions throughout the world to-day, the benefit may be passed along right down the line to those who carry on what is certainly an industry indigenous to this country, that is the growing of the wool itself.

I would like to make a suggestion which I have made more than once, and which I believe has merit. It is that when protection is afforded to a manufacturer, such as the manufacturer of woollen goods or of any other article the raw material of which is found in whole or in part in this country, the protection be granted upon a sliding scale and vary in accordance with the percentage of the native raw material used in the production of the manufactured article. I do believe, Mr. Chairman, that if an arrangement of that kind were made, after careful study, of course it would pass down the line to the original producer himself some of the advantages of our present fiscal system, of which the original producer at the present time has all too few. It would also encourage the greater use of our own raw materials and would inflict little hardship on the manufacturers themselves. If by so arranging the tariff that the position of the manufacturer was more advantageous the greater the percentage of Canadian raw materials he used, in manufactures, of course, where Canadian raw material could be used, such as wool, and less advantageous the greater the percentage he used of raw material brought in from outside, I believe one of the greatest objections of the farmers to the protective tariff would be largely removed. I believe also that it would encourage such native industries as the growing of wool, as well as increase the market for raw hides and leather goods and other articles manufactured in this country. This question is worthy of consideration, and if it could be worked out I believe it would redound to the great advantage of this country.

Mr. YOUNG: Those members of the house who think they are serving the interests of the farmer by asking for more protection on the things he has to sell are making a grave mistake. They know or ought to know that the price of farm products cannot be enhanced by high tariffs. They have preached that themselves many times, and to say that the farmer will consent to higher protection on manufactured goods in order to obtain a worthless protection on his own products is utter nonsense.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I think the hon. gentleman did not catch my meaning. I was suggesting lower protection when the manufacturer did not use Canadian raw material.

Item agreed to.

Schedule A—Customs tariff, Canada—ex. 572. Rugs, floor or carpet, of wool: 25 per cent.

Mr. POULIOT: Are Sarouk rugs included under this item?

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think so.

Mr. POULIOT: Because the clerk of the house bought a rug for $480. I do not know whether it came from Australia, but it was a pretty expensive rug.

Item agreed to.

TARIFF RATES ON GOODS THE PRODUCE OR MANUFACTURE OF CANADA

Schedule B—Customs tariff, New Zealand—35. Fish, viz:—

(3) Fish, potted, and preserved viz., salmon, including any liquor, oil, or sauce, 1¾d. per pound.

(4) Fish, potted, and preserved, n.e.i., including any liquor, oil, or sauce, 2d. per pound.

(Note.—The term "fish" is used in the tariff in its widest sense, and includes shell-fish, crustaceans, and other foods obtained from the fisheries.)

Mr. NEILL: I am beginning to regret, I am sorry to say, the eulogies I passed on the minister this afternoon; for I am afraid now that we in British Columbia are going to come at the wrong end of this agreement. The preference given to our canned salmon is very small. We allow the New Zealand toheroa, which is entirely a luxury, to come in absolutely free. It competes, I am told, with the higher class of lobsters, and people who can afford to have lobster suppers these hard times can afford to pay a duty. But we are allowing toheroas to come in free, and New Zealand gives us only a very small preference on our salmon. It amounts to only one penny and a quarter per pound. There is a higher duty on item 35 (4). That would apply to tinned herrings and tinned pilchards, for which we are anxious on the Pacific coast to get a market. Pilchards and herring are naturally low priced fish and the duty of twopence a pound would be quite considerable. We get a preference of only a penny a pound there, which is not very material. In the Australian treaty, as the minister is aware, he secured for us a preference of three pence a pound, or 6 cents, on salmon, which was really substantial, and, I believe, has enabled British Columbia to secure the greater part of the market.

Mr. VENIOT: It will be remembered when the Australian treaty was up I took exception to what I thought then was sectional legislation—favouring the Pacific coast in the matter of salmon more than it did the east coast in the matter of crustaceans. The minister told me that it was too late, that the treaty had been signed and he could not take the matter up, but he would endeavour later on to see if Australia would come to any different agreement. Did he consider that last year when he discussed this matter with New Zealand, and am I mistaken in thinking that crustaceans put up in cans have not the same preference as salmon put up in cans?

Mr. STEVENS: There is a very slight variation, my hon. friend will notice. I can assure him that the whole question was threshed out at great length during the discussion of this agreement. The position of New Zealand is that canned salmon is an essential food commonly used, and not competitive with any New Zealand fish.

Mr. VENIOT: Are crustaceans?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, in a sense they are.

Mr. VENIOT: Where do they get them?

Mr. STEVENS: They therefore give a quarter of a penny lower rate on salmon than on the other fish.

Mr. VENIOT: Do sardines get the same rate as salmon?

Mr. STEVENS: I think item 35 (4) would include sardines.

Mr. VENIOT: Twopence a pound?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: Where is the competition with anything in New Zealand in the matter of sardines? They do not put up sardines, and they have been importing very large quantities from Canada in past years. With the New Brunswick sardine we took the Australian market from the Netherlands. Now this is going to put us out of that market.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, no.

[Mr Neill.]

Mr. VENIOT: Why not?

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot see that.

Mr. VENIOT: It will allow the Netherlands to compete very strongly against us. In the face of that, notwithstanding the difference here in this preference between sardines and salmon, you have the extra cost imposed under the budget on the containers, which for sardines are more costly than for salmon.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend will notice that that does not apply on goods going out, only on goods coming into Canada.

Mr. VENIOT: But you have to apply for a drawback of 99 per cent. Why put them to that trouble?

Mr. STEVENS: New Zealand does not follow that practice I am told.

Mr. VENIOT: What practice?

Mr. STEVENS: The practice my hon. friend is mentioning. Australia does, but not New Zealand.

Mr. VENIOT: What practice?

Mr. STEVENS: With regard to containers.

Mr. VENIOT: We impose it on our people.

Mr. STEVENS: That is an additional protection here.

Mr. VENIOT: I fail to see it. I enter my strong protest against what appears to be sectional legislation. What is good for the Pacific coast ought to be good for the eastern coast of Canada, and the minister has no right to enter into an agreement by which a difference is made between sea food on the western coast and sea food on the eastern coast of Canada. Our fishing industry on the eastern coast along the Atlantic is in such a depressed condition to-day that the fishermen need all the encouragement possible, and even a quarter of a penny would help them.

Mr. STEVENS: We have not changed the rates at all from what they were before we went on the general tariff; we have restored the old rates instead of the general tariff.

Mr. VENIOT: If it was wrong then, why should it continue now?

Mr. STEVENS: I agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. VENIOT: I protest on behalf of the fishermen of the maritime provinces, especially in regard to the sardine and lobster fisheries. It is an outrage.

Mr. MALCOLM: Are these various rates under (3) and (4), item 35, specific?

Mr. STEVENS: They are British preferential rates.

Mr. MALCOLM: We cannot alter their ideas of the British preference.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Item agreed to.

Schedule B—Customs tariff, New Zealand—35 (4). Fish, potted, and preserved, n.e.i., including any liquor, oil, or sauce, 2d. per pound.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to add a word on this item to what I said on No. 123. Item 123 it will be remembered covers canned whitebait and canned crayfish at 15 per cent ad valorem but with a limit of not more than 7½ cents per pound. I pointed out that this is 2½ per cent below the British preference on these goods coming into Canada. When we sell our canned fish under 35 (4) to New Zealand we have a straight specific duty of twopence per pound, whether the fish is cheap or dear, plus 22½ per cent surtax. I submit that that is not fair to those who are producing canned fish in this country. It must be remembered that we are more and more developing the packing of fish in cans, even the cheaper qualities, and a specific duty is particularly hard on this fish.

Mr. VENIOT: Herring especially.

Mr. NEILL: And pilchards.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, and other fish as well. The minister says we are only restoring the old duty, but the point is these articles were not subject to any previous arrangement, as I understand it. He is now making a treaty with New Zealand for the first time with regard to these commodities, and therefore is in a position to ask New Zealand to give us a quid pro quo. But it does seem to me as if the most of the giving is done by ourselves.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. RALSTON: I am speaking of the fish items. We are reducing the duty below the British preferential rate on their fish, but on our fish they are keeping their duty up under the British preference and that British preference is much higher against us than our British preference is against them. Therefore I submit, first, even if our duty were not below the British preference it still would be lower than the duty the New Zealander imposes against Canadian fish, and secondly, we are giving them a duty below the British preference. I protest against it because I submit there is quite a business to be developed, particularly on the part of the maritime province fishermen in connection with lobsters and other fish—sardines my hon. friend has already mentioned.

Mr. VENIOT: And large herring.

Mr. RALSTON: Even the albacore or tuna is now being canned. It seems to me we might develop quite a market in New Zealand for various sorts of canned fish.

Item agreed to.

Schedule B—Customs tariff, New Zealand—137. Hosiery, viz: socks or stockings of silk or artificial silk: 32½ per cent ad valorem.

Mr. YOUNG: I notice the New Zealand duty under the general rate is 67.3 per cent, while under the treaty we will be able to export our goods at 39.8 per cent, leaving a net advantage to our manufacturers of about 27½ per cent. Has the minister any assurance from our manufacturers that they can compete in New Zealand on that basis?

Mr. STEVENS: It is expected that they can.

Mr. YOUNG: Have they given any assurance to that effect?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. We rather excel in the manufacture of hosiery.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then we do not need quite such a heavy protective duty ourselves.

Item agreed to.

Schedule B—Customs tariff, New Zealand—196. Boots, shoes, clogs, pattens, slippers, shoettes, sandals, galoshes, overshoes, and other footwear, n.e.i.: 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. YOUNG: I want to ask the same question in this regard. The New Zealand general tariff is 61.3 per cent; our goods will enter at 30.6 per cent, leaving almost a 31 per cent advantage. Have our manufacturers given any assurance that they can compete on that basis?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. YOUNG: We will remember this when the time comes to consider our own tariff.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The items are passed, but I should like to know why we are allowing raw furs to be brought into Canada free while if we wish to ship furs to New Zealand we have a pretty stiff duty against us; in fact it is almost prohibitive.

Mr. STEVENS: I hesitate very much to criticise any duty that New Zealand chooses to enforce; my hon. friend will appreciate that. There is no doubt that the general level of their duties is pretty high, but the tariff is their chief source of revenue, and for that reason they insist on maintaining these duties. It will be noticed that in many instances the major portion of the duty is made up of additional surtaxes, which have been put on for emergency purposes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I quite appreciate that New Zealand is not engaged in manufacturing to a great extent, but throughout this whole treaty raw products entering New Zealand carry a duty, while in our case we let practically all their raw products enter Canada free. I do not object to that because I do not believe we should put a duty on raw products at all, and as a matter of fact I do not think we should have a very heavy duty on anything. It does seem to me, however, that we are not getting a very great advantage by including some of these articles. Certainly there will be no advantage to the raw fur dealer in Canada.

Item agreed to.

Schedule B—Customs tariff, New Zealand—
292. Paper-pulp, for the manufacture of paper: free.

Mr. NEILL: In British Columbia we would have been very glad if we could have obtained some concession in connection with this item. It appears here on the free list, but there is nothing in that because it is free from all over the world, so we get no preference. New Zealand has a tariff item, No. 284, which reads, "paper, namely bleached sulphite or similar paper which is to be used in the manufacture of twine or imitation wickerware." That enters New Zealand free, but only if it is to be used for those purposes. I do not quite see how it could be described as "similar paper" if it is to be used in the manufacture of those articles, but we would have been very glad to obtain a concession in that regard. We call that material pulp or sulphite. Was the question discussed as to whether or not we could export bleached sulphite under this item, if it was not to be used for the manufacture of twine or imitation wickerware?

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot say very much about that, but I may tell my hon. friend that the paper schedule is very satisfactory to the people here in Canada.

Mr. NEILL: In the west?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: To those who do not make paper, but who only make sulphite pulp?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. There is some question regarding pulp, but I do not think it would be fair to New Zealand to disclose all that was privately discussed between the minister and myself. This was the best that could be done under the circumstances.

Item agreed to.

Schedule B—Customs tariff, New Zealand—
333. Agricultural implements and machinery, viz:—

(1) Cultivators; harrows; ploughs; drills; seed and fertilizer sowers or distributors combined or separate; lime sowers; seed or grain cleaners, and cellular seed or grain separators, 35 per cent ad valorem. The surtax to be levied, collected and paid under section five of the Customs Acts Amendment Act, 1930, on the goods included in tariff item numbered 333 (1) shall be an amount equal to one-twentieth of the total duty of customs otherwise chargeable.

(2) N.e.i., including ploughs, cultivators, and seed drills, hand-worked, combined or separate; ploughs, single-furrow mould-board, not exceeding 266 pounds net weight; also the following parts of ploughs or harrows, viz:—mouldboard plates unbent, steel share-plates cut to pattern, skeith-plates, plough beam forgings, and discs for harrows or ploughs, free.

Mr. YOUNG: Again the same question, Mr. Chairman: The New Zealand tariff is 42.87 per cent, while the treaty rate will be 36.75 per cent, leaving an advantage of 6.12 per cent to our Canadian manufacturers. I suppose they can compete on that basis?

Mr. STEVENS: We would have liked a much better rate but that was the best we could get. There are two plants of considerable size in New Zealand manufacturing these articles, and the New Zealand government desired to maintain a fairly good protection for them.

Mr. NEILL: The British preference is only 10 per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: But Great Britain does not compete very seriously in that class of goods.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): As a matter of fact this is an arrangement as good as we have had in the past, and our manufacturers have sent very considerable quantities of farm implements to that country.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but more under the next item.

Item agreed to.

Schedule B—Customs tariff, New Zealand—
404. Timber, rough sawn or rough hewn, viz:—

(2) Other kinds, in pieces having a length of not less than 25 feet, and having a minimum cross sectional area of not less than 150 square inches, 7s. 6d. per 100 sup. ft. The rate of customs duty set forth in the general tariff with respect to tariff item numbered 404 (2) shall be deemed to be repealed and the following shall be substituted therefor:—"9s. 6d. per 100 sup. ft."

(3) N.e.i., 9s. 6d. per 100 sup. ft. The rate of customs duty set forth in the general tariff with respect to tariff item numbered 404 (3) shall be deemed to be repealed and the following shall be substituted therefor:—"11s. 6d. per 100 sup. ft."

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I would like to ask the minister if this item includes poles and pilings. A good deal of lumber of that kind is shipped to the United States.

Mr. STEVENS: I am under the impression that poles, piling and that sort of timber would come under the general British preference.

Mr. NEILL: Of course the minister is aware of the fact that the success of this item depends upon the continuation of the subsidies to the steamships running to Australia and New Zealand. There was no item for this amount in the main estimates, and I think it behooves the government to place an item in the supplementaries.

Mr. STEVENS: Last month we did one hundred per cent of Australia's soft timber business, and the month before we did ninety-eight per cent. We are really controlling that business very satisfactorily and this item will make it easier to do business with New Zealand. We have not paid any subsidies on Australian steamship lines in the past year.

Mr. NEILL: Is it the intention of the government not to pay subsidies this year? I have here very strong resolutions passed by the lumber people of British Columbia which do not sustain the attitude of the minister.

Mr. STEVENS: Those have more to do with the China service, but in any case the matter is under consideration for the supplementaries.

Item agreed to.

Mr. RALSTON: I just want to sum up in a word, so that the committee may understand at least as I view it, what is the net result of these changes. I do not retract anything that has been said; I fully concur in the statement that an agreement is at all times desirable. If this means good will, better feeling and a likelihood of more trade with New Zealand, then by all means let us have it; but I do not think we ought to fool ourselves as to the net result of all these items in the schedules which have been passed. I have gone over the items quickly and I think the net result of these schedules, both A and B, is this. First, with regard to goods coming into Canada, the result is that on no fewer than twenty-six items the duty has been reduced—reduced on goods coming into this country in competition with Canadian goods. The duty has been reduced even below the British preference rate and also below the old treaty rate, in so far as these items were contained in that treaty. The committee will bear that in mind. Twenty-six items in this schedule have been reduced for the benefit of New Zealand, so that they are now below the regular British preference rate; and in the case of all items which were subject to the old treaty, they are reduced below the old treaty rate. Only two items have been increased, namely, the item for fresh meat and the item for butter; but even at that, both these items are still below the British preference rate. In regard to the fresh meat item, the British preference rate was 4 cents, and that has been reduced to 3 cents under the treaty. The old treaty rate was one-half cent. Butter is 8 cents under the British preference rate and that has been reduced to 5 cents. The old treaty rate was one cent. Apricots and peaches, which were not mentioned as we were going through the items, are 2 cents under the British preference and 1 cent under the treaty. So that the net result is that 26 items have been reduced for the benefit of New Zealand, below the British preference, while two items have been increased over the old treaty rate but are still below the British preference. That is what we have done for New Zealand; those are the concessions we have made.

With regard to the item of butter, I would point out that the change to the 5 cent rate will be no protection whatever for this commodity unless we use the power provided for in article IV and fix an arbitrary value for duty purposes. With exchange as it is, the 5 cents will be practically wiped out. If that provision is used and that protection of 5 cents is maintained, then what I am afraid will happen is exactly what happened before, when the 8 cent rate was put on. The butter producer in this country was fooled into thinking that butter was the best thing to produce, and the result was that too much was produced for home consumption, with the inevitable consequence that we went on the export market, and down went the price. That will probably happen under this 5 cent tariff rate. No one knows better than the butter producers of this country, after the last two years' experience, just what will happen. The duty of 8 cents did not bring them the prosperity they expected but just the reverse. In fact it was more duty than they asked for, as was pointed out this afternoon in an extract read by an hon. member. Let me read a statement made by Mr. Robinson, the president of the National Dairy Council, at a meeting in Winnipeg. He said:

It has been our opinion that three or four years must elapse before we could make up the deficiency of nearly 50,000,000 pounds of butter. The extra stimulus of the eight cent tariff, together with the enormous fall in grain prices, has caused, however, such a rapid increase in the butter made all over Canada that it now appears that we may be self-sustaining this season, and even have a surplus for export. This seems to be inevitable by next year at the latest. In all our arguments during the past few years, we have stated plainly that the effect of the tariff would be lost when export began. That is, in fact, the chief reason why we believed a four cent tariff to be more lasting than an eight cent one. We are now face to face with this condition.

At the moment, the export surplus of butter if of little value to Canadian farmers. It will cost them money this year. Thus, the immediate benefit to them of the tinkering with the New Zealand treaty that has so offended one of the best customers for our manufactured products is nil.

It is obvious that if Canada is to gain any net benefit from this rapid increase in butter production our dairymen must so improve their methods that they can meet the world on the basis of quality and price. It is conceded that this is possible but that the attainment of the ideal will be a matter of hard work over a term of years.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is a wonder he did not see that when he was protesting so strongly before.

Mr. RALSTON: That was the statement made by Mr. Robinson, president of the National Dairy Council. And that was the result of the 8 cent duty. But there was one more result. During the last election campaign, and during the debate held in this house in 1930, tears were wept about the number of cows which had disappeared from Canada and had gone over the line. It was said that there had been a decrease in the cow population of the country of 102,000, and our friends on the other side never ceased to lament about it. Even the present Prime Minister was like little Bo Peep who had lost her sheep—he didn't know where these 100,000 cows had gone. Well, I have here a statement of the cow population of Canada for 1930 and 1931; and whereas there were 102,000 cows less in 1927-28, I find that the number of milch cows in Canada in 1930 was 3,683,000 as compared with 3,513,000 in 1931, when the 8 cent tariff was on. In other words, there was a loss of 170,000 cows in one year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We shall have to have an inquiry.

Mr. RALSTON: That was under the 8 cent tariff put on by this government. Coming back, therefore, to the outstanding features of this schedule, I say that the butter item is not by any means a sure shot either for the benefit of the farmer or for the benefit of the consumer. It will be no protection if section 6 is not used, in view of the exchange, and it is a question whether it will do the farmer any good even if the 5 cent item is actually effective.

Mr. VENIOT: Is section 6 the dumping clause?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes; and what I have said has particular force in view of depreciated currency.

So far I have summarized the effect of this new treaty as regards imports from New Zealand into Canada. Now, secondly, what is the effect from the standpoint of our exports to New Zealand? What hole in the fence is New Zealand making for us under the treaty? There is not one single item in Schedule B which is lower than it was under the old treaty—not one. There is not a single item that is lower than the British preference. But there are five items that are increased against us to a rate higher than the British preference, which was the rate we got under the old treaty. Socks and stockings, item 137, has a British preference rate of 28·9, but under this treaty these manufactured goods of ours going into New Zealand will pay 39·8. Plaster-pulp sheets, plaster board and similar building materials, item 212 (13) carry a British preference rate of 24·5 per cent, and our goods going into New Zealand will pay, instead of 24·5 per cent, 42·87 per cent. In regard to cultivators, harrows, ploughs, drills, sowers, seed or grain separators item 333 (1), the British preference is 12·25 per cent, and these goods of ours going into New Zealand will pay 36·75; and in regard to item 353 (4), electric cooking and heating appliances, the British preference is 20 per cent plus 22½ per cent surtax, or a total of 24·5 per cent, while our goods going in will pay 20 per cent plus 22½ per cent surtax or 36·75. There is also one increase in the automobile item. There is an increase in passenger cars valued at over £200; whereas the British preference, on the basic duty, is 10 per cent, the treaty rate, that is to say on cars of from 50 to 75 per cent Canadian content, is 20 per cent or double the British preference. So that as a matter of fact there are really six items of Canadian goods going to

New Zealand on which there is an increase, and on none of the items for export to New Zealand is there any decrease in the New Zealand duty.

This, Mr. Chairman, is the summing up of the treaty. As I say, we are glad that an arrangement has been made with the sister dominion, but I do not think we ought to be too sanguine about the result; rather, we should hope that the fact that the agreement has been made and an understanding has been arrived at, even after nearly two years, will accomplish some good. The Prime Minister of this country insisted in 1930 that the reason why our subamendment should not pass was that we would be too long making a treaty. The minister has been nearly two years making this treaty, and I have no doubt he has had his difficulties. We can only hope that in view of the fact an arrangement has been arrived at, a substantial increase in trade between Canada and New Zealand will result. However, let me point out to the committee that should an increase in trade take place, it will not be new trade; it will be the recovery of trade lost during the past two years as a result of the policies of this government.

Bill reported.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Monday, May 2, 1932.

The house met at three o'clock.

ARMS AND AMMUNITION

NOTICE OF MOTION FOR APPROVAL OF CONVENTION FOR SUPERVISION OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE IN MUNITIONS AND IMPLEMENTS OF WAR

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by Mr. Guthrie:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the international convention for the supervision of international trade in arms and ammunition, Geneva, 17th June, 1925, signed on behalf of Canada by the Honourable Raoul Dandurand on the 22nd September, 1925, and that this house do approve of the same.

It might be that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) would desire to say something about this motion. Therefore it can stand until to-morrow, and this can be treated merely as notice of motion.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table of the house orders in council 1022 to 1025, inclusive, 980 to 994, inclusive, 1006 to 1011, inclusive, 1013 to 1017 inclusive, passed pursuant to the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act. All these orders refer to payments of money.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 69, to amend the Companies Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Explain, please.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, at the present time all Canadian companies which are incorporated under letters patent issued under part 1 of the Companies Act, all banks incorporated under the provisions of the Bank Act, and certain other companies, such as the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, are authorized by law to maintain outside of Canada registers in which may be registered transfers of stock. The government, after listening to the representations of a number of other Canadian companies which are incorporated by special statute, and companies to which part II of the Companies Act applies, have deemed it advisable to facilitate the transfers of shares in the capital stock, as well as registered bonds and debentures of Canadian companies, by authorizing all companies within the legislative jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada to maintain registry or transfer offices outside of Canada as well as in, with this safeguarding provision, that immediately the entries shall be transferred to and entered in the books of registry kept at the head office of the company in Canada or at its chief place of business. I think the measure when it is printed will appear very simple and advisable, in view of the fact that companies complain that transfers of their stock, in England particularly, are delayed for weeks sometimes because they have not the facilities which other companies have of maintaining at some bank or trust company in England a branch registry in which transfers may be registered and become legally effective.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEPARTMENT OF INSURANCE

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the first reading of Bill No. 66 (from the Senate), respecting the department of Insurance.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the first reading of Bill No. 67 (from the Senate), respecting foreign insurance companies in Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the first reading of Bill No. 68 (from the Senate), respecting Canadian and British insurance companies.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

PULPWOOD EXPORTS

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

1. How many cords of pulpwood were exported from Canada at the port of Sault Ste. Marie in the years 1929, 1930 and 1931?
2. How many cords of pulpwood were exported from the ports of Fort William and Port Arthur in the same years?
3. How many boats cleared from Fort William and Port Arthur loaded with pulpwood?
4. For what ports did they clear?
5. To what firms were the cargoes consigned?

Mr. RYCKMAN:

1 and 2. Exports of pulpwood through Sault Ste. Marie, Fort William and Port Arthur during the fiscal years ended March 31, 1930, 1931 and 1932:

	1930 Cords	1931 Cords	1932 Cords
Sault Ste. Marie.. ..	108,896	113,194	65,423
Fort William..	25,850	35,600	18,805
Port Arthur..	130,287	129,799	121,237

3. Information is not available from returns compiled in this department but could be furnished after being obtained from ports.

4 and 5. It is contrary to the established practice to give information that would disclose the business of any private concern.

[Mr. Cahan.]

CAP ST. IGNACE POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. FAFARD:

1. Was the position of postmaster of Cap St. Ignac, Quebec, vacant in 1932?
2. What are the names and occupations of all those who applied for the post of postmaster?
3. Was any one appointed temporarily?
4. Was any one appointed permanently?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. Yes.
2. Name—occupation:

Joseph Henri Bernier, store clerk, unemployed; Roméo Bernier, unemployed; Miss Camille Bossinotte, assistant postmistress; Joseph Bossinotte, acting postmaster; Joseph M. EUROPEAN IMMGRANTS—1929, 1930

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. What was the number of European immigrants who came to Canada in the year 1929 and the first six months of 1930?
2. What was the total number of European immigrants who came to Canada in the year 1930?

Mr. GORDON:

1. 65,808.
   35,597.
2. 46,915.

GREECE AND ROUMANIA—OUTSTANDING INDEBTEDNESS

Mr. JACOBS:

1. What is the outstanding indebtedness to Canada of the following governments: (a) Greece; (b) Roumania?
2. When was the said indebtedness incurred?
3. What sums were originally owing?
4. Was the indebtedness funded, and if so, in what years?
5. Have the countries in question ceased payments on account of principal and interest, if so, in what year or years?
6. If the countries in question are in arrears of payment, what steps have been taken to obtain payment?

Mr. RHODES:

1. Principal amount: Greece $6,525,000; Roumania $23,969,720.
2. Under agreements made in 1919.
3. Greece, $7,521,300.67; Roumania, $20,-449,104.49.
4. Greece, 1923; Roumania, 1922.

5 and 6. Roumania has made payments to date. In the case of Greece, principal and interest of $283,125 due 31st December, 1931, has not been paid, the postponement which applies to reparations and inter-governmental war debts having been made applicable to this debt at the request of Greece.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Sir EUGENE FISET:

1. What is the total amount authorized to date by the federal government for works on the trans-Canada highway to be executed by the provinces under the authority of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act?
2. What amount of money has been expended to date by each province on this project?
3. What amount has been paid to date by the federal government to each province in connection with this trans-Canada highway?

Mr. GORDON:

1. The total estimated cost of works to be carried out on the trans-Canada highway under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, approved to May 2, amounts to $9,996,972.71, of which the dominion government has agreed to contribute fifty per cent or $4,998,486.35.
2. No information.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

WAR MUNITION PURCHASES

Mr. DORION:

1. Did the Canadian government purchase between 1920 and August, 1930, war ammunition or other war material from any foreign country?
2. If so, when, in what quantity, for what amount, and from what country?

PENSION PAYMENTS—1931

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

What was the amount paid out in Canada last year for pensions, as follows: (a) judges and civil servants; (b) war pensions; (c) North West rebellion; (d) militia; (e) civil flying; (f) war veterans' allowance; (g) old age pensions?

VERCHERES BREAKWATER

Mr. RHEAUME:

1. Since November, 1931, to date, what amount was assigned to the village of Vercheres, in the electoral district of Chambly-Vercheres, by the federal department in charge of unemployment relief, for the construction of a breakwater or any other work?
2. How and where were the amounts assigned for such purpose expended?
3. What was the name of the superintendent and foreman of said works, the wage or salary of each: (a) per day; (b) total salary?
4. What was the reason for the dismissal of the superintendent and foreman of said works, Octavien Grenier, of Vercheres, and Jacques-Emile Cartier?
5. Were these two men replaced, if so, by whom and at what salary or wage?
6. What quantity of stone was purchased for the construction of the said works, from whom, and at what price?
7. What was the total cost of said works up to February 15, 1932?
8. What are the names and addresses of the persons employed on the work in connection with the said breakwater in the village of Vercheres, and what work was done by each of them?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that this question stand as an order for return and that it be consolidated with No. 7 on the notices of motion for production of papers, as to a certain extent the two overlap.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

MONTREAL HARBOUR BRIDGE

Mr. GARDINER:

For a return showing the amount of the tender of the Dominion Bridge Company for the construction of the Montreal harbour bridge, with particulars of all extras, and by whom authorized, and the dates of meetings of the harbour board authorizing these increased expenditures, together with the names and amounts paid to sub-contractors for material supplied; also list of properties purchased for this public improvement with the names of owners and the amount paid to each for these properties.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): In the absence of the acting Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) I merely wish to remark that some of the information asked for may be rather indefinite. I have found, from personal investigation, that this may be so, but such information as the harbour board can furnish will be made available, though it may take some time to have it brought here from Montreal and prepared.

DEPARTMENT OF INTERIOR EMPLOYEES

Mr. MUNN (for Mr. Ahearn):

For a return showing:—

1. The total number of permanent employees of the Department of the Interior who were compulsorily retired between the 1st of January, 1931, to date;

2. The total number of such employees who receive or will receive superannuation allowances;

3. The total number of such employees who were transferred to other permanent positions in the federal government service at salaries equal to the salaries they were receiving on retirement;

4. The total number of such employees who were transferred to other permanent positions in the federal government service at salaries less than the salaries they were receiving on retirement;

5. The total number of such employees who were transferred to temporary positions in the federal government service, and who are still employed temporarily;

6. The total number of such employees who received gratuities on retirement under the provisions of the Superannuation Act of 1924;

7. The total number of such employees who received returns of contributions from the retirement fund;

8. The average amount of money which will have to be paid annually to each of the employees superannuated on compulsory retirement from the Department of the Interior;

9. The total sum of money paid to such employees from the retirement fund;

10. The total sum of money paid to such retired employees as gratuities under the Superannuation Act of 1924.

ST. MAXIME DE SCOTT—PROTECTION WALL

Mr. MARCIIL (for Mr. Boulanger):

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents in connection with certain works and construction of protection wall at St. Maxime de Scott, Quebec, during the years 1931 and 1932, together with a copy of paylists and statements of moneys expended for the purchase of material and otherwise, and also showing the name of the superintendent of works.

GARNET WHEAT GRADING

Mr. MOTHERWELL:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams or other documents that may have passed between Mr. Short or any other officer of the Canadian Millers' Association and Hon. H. H. Stevens, Minister of Trade and Commerce, or any other member of the government or their respective deputies, on the subject of the grading of garnet wheat, since the seventh day of August, 1930.

LENNOX, N.S.—POSTMASTER

Mr. DUFF:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports, decisions and other documents, regarding the dismissal of Ronald H. McGillivray, as postmaster at Lennox, county of Antigonish, Nova Scotia, as well as a copy of the evidence taken by commissioner N. D. Murray, a copy of his report and also a copy of his account for remuneration and disbursements.

INDIAN OFFICE—REGINA

Mr. DONNELLY:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, since August 1, 1931, passing between the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs or his deputy and the Indian commissioners in Regina, Saskatchewan, dealing with: (a) the closing of the Indian commissioner's office in Regina, Saskatchewan; (b) the abandonment of the greater production farm near Regina, Saskatchewan.

RELIEF WORK—CHAMBLY-VERCHERES

Mr. HURTUBISE (for Mr. Rheaume):

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, contracts, paylists and other documents in connection with the work done in each municipality of the electoral division of Chambly-Vercheres, Quebec, pursuant to the Unemployment Relief Act, 1930, from September, 1930, to date. Also a return showing in detail: (a) the work in connection with the enlargement or repairs to the shed located on the wharf at St. Antoine de Padoue, the reinforced concrete work on the shores of the Richelieu river in the said municipality, in connection with the retaining wall facing No. 92 on the registered plans of the municipality of St. Antoine de Padoue; (b) the names and addresses of superintendents or foremen of said works in each parish, the number of hours and days worked, and the salary or wage paid to each; (c) the names and addresses of the men employed on the said works, the number of hours and days worked by each and the amount paid to them; (d) the quantity of stone purchased in connection with the said works, the price paid and the name and address of the person or persons from whom purchased.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ASCENSION DAY ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That when this house adjourns on Wednesday, the 4th of May, it stand adjourned until Friday, the 6th of May, instant.

Motion agreed to.

NATIVE WINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he will lay on the table of the house a copy of the order in council which I believe was passed shortly after the last session of parliament, giving permission to wine growers to fortify their wines.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): That would not be in my department; I think the Department of National Revenue dealt with the matter.

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (Minister of National Revenue): Any order in council relating to the matter mentioned by the hon. gentleman will be brought down.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES TO BE ISSUED UNDER CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS FINANCING ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Under the provisions of Bill No. 34, which enables the Canadian National Railways to borrow the sum of $61,500,000, the usual companion bill is necessary to enable the government to provide the funds. Notice of this resolution was handed to the clerk and will appear in the votes and proceedings to-morrow, in the ordinary course, but if we follow the ordinary procedure the matter cannot be taken up until Wednesday. Since the matter is rather urgent and a certain proportion of the funds is required immediately by the railway, I wish to give notice that to-morrow I will ask unanimous consent for the purpose of proceeding with this bill.

EASTERN BANK OF CANADA

BANK CIRCULATION REDEMPTION FUND—PAYMENT TO ESTATE OF THE LATE ANGUS MCLEAN

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (for the Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 65, respecting the Eastern Bank of Canada.

He said: As the Minister of Finance was absent because of illness when this bill stood for third reading, I promised the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) to obtain certain information, and as I have been familiar with the matter I am venturing, on behalf of the Minister of Finance, to move the third reading of the bill. The facts are that by resolution of the directors, passed on March 3, 1930, all the subscribers with the exception of Angus McLean were repaid the amount of their subscriptions, he being responsible for the liquidation of the accounts by an arrangement made with the subscribers. Mr. McLean settled the various outstanding accounts, so there were then no outstanding liabilities, and his subscriptions were not returned in full. At the time of his death he was the only one who had not been compensated for the money expended, and as a matter of fact he expended much more than the sum which is being returned. The sole remaining asset of the bank is the deposit of $5,000 made under the provisions of the Bank Act in the bank circulation redemption fund, and it is this money which it is proposed to pay back to the estate. That can be done only by legislation, which is the bill now standing in the name of the Minister of Finance for third reading.

NEW ZEALAND TRADE AGREEMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the third reading of Bill No. 62, respecting a certain trade agreement between Canada and New Zealand.

INDUSTRIAL PROPERTY

BILL RESPECTING UNFAIR COMPETITION IN TRADE AND COMMERCE

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 5, respecting unfair competition in trade and commerce.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

On section 1—short title.

Mr. CAHAN: Just by way of introduction I may say that the international convention for the protection of industrial property, which was signed on behalf of Canada at The Hague on November 6, 1925, by a representative of the Canadian government of that day, was ratified by the governor in council by order in council P.C. 648, which was passed on April 19,1928. So far as Canada is concerned the convention came into force on May 1, 1925.

The original Trade Mark and Design Act of Canada was enacted by the parliament of this country in 1869, the second year after confederation, and it has remained upon our statute books since that time without material changes. By the British North America Act, 1867, Canada is authorized to legislate for the regulation of trade and commerce, and under section 132 of that act Canada can legislate also to give effect to treaties made with the British Empire, to which Canada is a party. Article 10b is of this convention to which Canada gave adherence provides that the contracting parties are bound to ensure the persons entitled to the benefits of the union effective protection against unfair competition:

Every act of competition contrary to honest practices in industrial or commercial matters constitutes an act of unfair competition.

The following acts among others shall be prohibited:

1. All manner of acts, of such a nature as to create confusion by any means whatsoever with the goods of a competitor;

2. False allegations, in the course of trade, of such a nature as to discredit the goods of a competitor.

That is a general provision. The convention then provides certain obligations on the part of Canada with regard to respecting the trademarks of foreign countries which are in use in this country, and there is a reciprocal obligation on the part of some twenty nations to respect Canadian trademarks and Canadian tradenames.

This bill, after the second reading, was referred to a special committee of the house. I was selected by the committee to act as its chairman, and the committee had many sittings. It received and heard reports from various parts of Canada on the measure, which really deals with trademarks and tradenames, and is a remodelling of the Trademark and Design Act of Canada.

I am very grateful for the cooperation of the various members of that committee who gave very serious consideration to the matter, and finally unanimously reported this bill in the form in which it now appears. There are, I find, one or two slight corrections to be made in the printing, but the bill as it stands is the unanimous product of the committee. After representations were heard, and after a full discussion, a number of amendments to the original bill were adopted. I therefore ask the cooperation of this committee in the consideration of this bill, which is the best that we can produce under the circumstances. It does provide one very essential thing—protection of trademarks in this country. Where duplicate trademarks have been in vogue in times past, entitled to equal rights, we have left the courts to decide such matters; but after this bill becomes law, trademarks which are registered in this country shall apply to all Canada and shall apply to Canadian products abroad.

During the consideration of this measure we received representations, very favourable indeed, from those who were dealing in Canadian products in foreign markets, highly appreciating the fact that we were proposing a measure which, so far as we were able to do so without making the legislation retroactive, would in future provide that the trademark on any Canadian goods sold in a foreign market would represent the goods which it purports to represent, so that those in this country who produce goods of a high standard and quality will have the benefit in the foreign market of the reputation which their goods have really earned.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 22 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. CAHAN: When the committee reported the bill it was unanimously agreed that wherever the word "figures" appears we should substitute the word "numerals." In the final printing of the bill, I find, some of these changes were omitted. The word "figures" has a dual meaning and the committee decided to use instead, throughout, the word "numerals." On page 11 of this bill, section 23, the word "figures" appears in lines 33, 36, 38, 43 and 47; by some inadvertence the word "numerals" was not used instead. With the unanimous consent of the committee I should like to amend the section by substituting the word "numerals" for the word "figures" in the lines I have indicated.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 24 to 30 inclusive agreed to.

On section 31—Application to distinguish between word mark and design mark.

Mr. CAHAN: In line 20 the word "figures" should be struck out and the word "numerals" substituted therefor; in line 32 the word "described" should be struck out and the word "prescribed" substituted therefor. I beg to move these amendments.

Amendments agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 32 to 35 inclusive agreed to.

On section 36—Indexes of pending application.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, I beg to move that in line 21 the word "figures" should be struck out and the word "numerals" substituted therefor.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 37, 38 and 39 agreed to.

On section 40—Priority by foreign registration.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, I beg to move that the period after the word "provided" in the twenty-ninth line be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 41 to 45 inclusive agreed to.

On section 46—Notice of change of address of owner of registered mark.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, there is an obvious transposition of words in line 28. I beg to move that the words "the to" after the word "given" in the twenty-eighth line be struck out, and the words "to the" substituted therefor.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 47 to 54 inclusive agreed to.

On section 55—Registrar to transmit papers on request.

Mr. CAHAN: There is an obvious misspelling of a word in this section. I move that the letters "ot" after the word "relating" in the last line be struck out and the letters "to" substituted therefor.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 56 to 62 inclusive agreed to.

Bill as amended reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION OF MONEYS TO MEET EXPENDITURES AND INDEBTEDNESS IN 1932

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 34, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to authorize the provision of moneys to meet expenditures made and indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1932.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Sections 1 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 61, to amend the Companies Act.

He said: This amendment to section 85 of the Companies Act is intended to remove confusion which has prevailed since the passing of an amendment to section 63 of the Bankruptcy Act, which is chapter 11 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927. The Bankruptcy Act provided that assignments of book debts should be void unless they are registered locally under provincial legislation in any province where legislation had been passed requiring such assignments to be registered locally. Since that date every province which has a bills of sales act has amended its legislation so as to provide for the registration locally of those assignments of book debts. The banks and all other Canadian companies have complied with those provincial laws.

Recently the question was raised under section 85 of the Companies Act, which provides under section 85 (1) (c) for registration with the Department of the Secretary of State of a floating charge on the undertaking or property of the company, whether the registration of such floating charge did not include the registration of assignments of book debts, and since then some doubt has prevailed about the matter. Canadian companies which have been making such assignments believed they were fulfilling the letter of the law when they complied with the provincial statute. It has seemed to me unnecessary to provide that there should be sent to Ottawa and registered with the Secretary of State assignments of book debts which have already been registered in local registers throughout the length and breadth of the land. To do this involves greater expense, creates confusion and serves no good purpose. Therefore I have introduced this amending bill to provide, in effect, that this subsection of the Companies Act shall not apply to a floating charge created by a company, after the date hereinbefore in this subsection mentioned, on its accounts receivable or any of them.

The purpose of the bill is to avoid all confusion and to provide that the course which has been followed now for a term of years throughout Canada, namely, the registration at the local registry office, shall be effective, without duplicate original assignments having to be filed at the office of the Secretary of States.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Hanson, (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Sections 1, 2 and 3 inclusive, agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not know whether the matter comes under this act or some other provision, but is it not possible for the federal government to exercise some control with respect to financing, issuing of stock, over companies that secure dominion charters? I know my hon. friend said the other evening that it was not possible, but it seems that under the provisions of provincial charters, provincial governments have some supervision over the sale of stock.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the sale, not the issue.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The difficulty that the provincial authorities experience is that they cannot interfere with stock sold under a dominion charter, and there does not seem to be any supervision; these stocks can be increased and sold apparently without let or hindrance, whereas if a company has a provincial charter, there are restrictions upon its activities in this respect. I do not for a moment mean to charge companies with doing this deliberately, but their stock gets into the hands of brokers who seem to be able, when there is a dominion charter, to carry on this practice without hindrance.

Mr. CAHAN: It is not control over the issue of a charter which the hon. gentleman deems desirable; it is control over the sale of stock by companies after they have been incorporated. I differ somewhat from the suggestion of the hon. gentleman because I think we keep a closer supervision over the issue of dominion charters than most of the provinces do over the issue of local charters. Time and time again, when we refuse to issue a charter with certain provisions which we deem objectionable, the applicants apparently find no difficulty in securing from provincial governments charters containing the very clauses which we consider objectionable.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Will my hon. friend specify a case?

Mr. CAHAN: Take the consolidation in connection with the company to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) called attention the other day: they obtained a provincial charter which contained all the objectionable provisions to which the hon. gentleman referred. But in order to meet the situation, either last session or the session before, the Minister of Justice, who I notice is not in his seat, introduced an amendment to the criminal code which his department deemed sufficient to enable the attorney general in any province to take proceedings against those who indulged in those objectionable proceedings with respect to sales of which the hon. gentleman complains. This parliament amended the criminal code by introducing a new provision, and it was pointed out at that time to the respective provincial governments that, if they deemed this new provision of the criminal code inadequate, the Department of Justice was prepared to consider further amendments which would enable the attorneys general to prosecute offenders in connection with the sale of stocks of companies incorporated under dominion statutes. I have one remedy in mind, and although it may be a purely personal opinion, I have urged it continuously for the last twenty years: I think it is entirely objectionable that under our constitution the conduct and direction of prosecutions for offences under dominion statutes should be taken out of the hands of the attorney general of Canada, who is deeply interested in the maintenance of federal law, and in every case vested in the departments of the attorneys general of the provinces. I think sooner or later the time must come when by some amendment to the constitution, or by some other arrangement, provision may be made that the duty and responsibility for the enforcement of federal laws will rest upon the Attorney General of Canada, who is also Minister of Justice. Until such time I do not believe the condition in this respect will be satisfactory.

Mr. POWER: Does the minister include the enforcement of the criminal law?

Mr. CAHAN: There is a wide division of opinion in that connection. The fact is, however, that attorneys general in the provinces do enforce the criminal law, and I think generally speaking they enforce it very well indeed. I have in mind, however, the passing of special enactments by this parliament involving penalties. It is very seldom—at least this has been my experience—that attorneys general in the provinces can be induced to undertake the enforcement of these specific federal statutes. I believe this is a matter well worthy of consideration.

Mr. POWER: I am discussing the point only to obtain the benefit of the minister's experience. I am under the impression, however, that the federal government does appoint attorneys to prosecute under special acts passed by this parliament. Let us consider, for instance, the revenue acts, those measures concerning illicit stills. We know the federal government looks after such prosecutions. I am under the further impression that certain offences against statutes concerning the Department of Agriculture are enforced by direct prosecution on the federal government.

Mr. CAHAN: Has my hon. friend ever represented the federal government in any such prosecution?

Mr. POWER: No; I have been so long in parliament, compared with the time I have been at the bar, that I have not had occasion to appear in such prosecutions. I do know, however, that the federal authorities prosecute in matters concerning illicit stills, and the smuggling of cigarettes. I believe, also that the Dominion government prosecutes in connection with a bill which was amended in this house last year and which had to do with the quantity of fats to be found in milk. I am quite certain there are many such matters concerning which the attorney general of Canada appoints special prosecutors. I should like to ask the minister this question: Where would he make the distinction?

Mr. CAHAN: I was not attempting to draw a close distinction, but I am of the opinion and my experience has taught me that the enforcement of federal statutes through attorneys or counsel appointed by the federal government is a matter not of right but of complacent acquiescence on the part of the attorneys general of the provinces or their representatives. I have never acted for the Dominion government in any case, but I have endeavoured by laying informations to enforce the criminal law for private parties. In every case, however—and I am speaking of my experience in the city of Montreal—the direction of such prosecutions was really taken out of my hands. The provincial appointee representing the attorney general of the province, would sit alongside me in the courtroom, and say, "I am authorized by the attorney general of the province to represent him in this prosecution. I should be very happy to have your assistance, and to cooperate with you most cordially." He would always add, however, "The responsibility is mine, and in the final result I must exercise my discretion."

Mr. MARCIL: I should like to remind the minister that for many years the matter of the enforcement of federal laws has been under discussion. I can remember when this parliament passed legislation which had no effect whatever because it was not enforced by the provinces. I can remember when the observance of the Sabbath day was under discussion, and that in that connection there was a wide difference of opinion between people in the province of Ontario and those in the province of Quebec. After the bill had passed in this house an amendment was added to it in the Senate, to the effect that the enforcement of the act would be left to the attorneys general of the provinces. There is no doubt that some dominion legislation comes more or less within the rights of the provinces, and that the enforcement of federal statutes must be left to the attorneys general of the provinces.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Chairman, while I am interested in this particular phase of the discussion, I must say that I have not received the information I wanted. In the provinces under what is known as the blue-sky law a company has to go to a board, and has to secure from it consent to issue stock. We will consider, for example, a company which has the right to issue stock to the value of a million dollars, and which has issued stock to the value of only half a million dollars. To all intents and purposes the smaller sum is all the capital required for that particular business. Suddenly, however, they decide to issue the balance of the stock, and have to appear before the board and give reasons for their action. The board takes upon itself the responsibility of saying whether or not the company is entitled to issue additional stock for the purposes of its business. Not only that, but if a new company takes a charter and asks for a licence to do business in the province, it also must appear before the board and obtain a licence to issue stock up to a certain point or a certain given amount which it may require. I am not complaining about the precaution taken by dominion authorities in connection with issuing stock to the extent of $2,000,000 when only $1,000,000 is required. But I do think there is something further required, because it is evident that in two cases with which we are all familiar, an implement company and a packing company, the stock issued was altogether, beyond the capital requirements and as a result those two companies find themselves in serious difficulties to-day. I do not suppose anybody is to blame. The companies simply took advantage of their charters, but the unsuspecting public who bought stock are undoubtedly going to suffer. I must confess I could not persuade my colleagues that we needed something of this kind, but I have been asking for some supervision by the federal authorities to prevent the issue of stock beyond the actual requirements of the business. It may be said that that is undue interference by government, but if we are to do business under private auspices I know of no other way of checking this practice.

Mr. CAHAN: You would provide a federal board?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I would provide a federal board from which every company with a federal charter should secure a licence to issue stock. Prosecutions are necessary undoubtedly, but I do want to see some control over the issue of stock by companies doing business under federal charters.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, it is now some twenty odd years since I first discussed this matter in this house. I had a very strong opinion with respect to the matter then, I have a very strong opinion now. But if the hon. gentleman's ideas are given effect to, it involves the creation of a board, or court, or commission, or tribunal, which shall have power to pass upon the necessity for each capital issue and upon the character of each capital structure. Against that was urged at the time by friends with whom I discussed the matter this objection, and it is a fairly sound one, that by setting up such a tribunal with the powers indicated, the granting authority to a company to issue stock or to create forms of securities as part of its capital structure would imply that we had given such company a certificate, which involves us in guaranteeing indirectly that it was a sound enterprise in which to invest. I will illustrate that point in this way. A little less than a year ago I made certain observations with respect to a company, and certain people said at once that the government had guaranteed that the shareholders in that company would be protected far beyond what they themselves had stipulated for; in other words it was going to make them better off than they made themselves, because we said we would protect them to the extent we endeavoured to do. That illustrates the soundness of the contention namely, that there is always danger if you set up any federal or provincial tribunal, and it authorizes a given step to be taken, that it thereby implies that that step is a sound one and that the securities issued are worthy of being purchased. We have to go further than that; it is not far enough—yet, it is too far.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is that not already done in the case of insurance companies?

Mr. BENNETT: No. Insurance companies are incorporated, as the hon. gentleman knows, under a standard act, which provides that under certain circumstances they will be authorized to do business. Banks are another illustration. That is, if a certain amount of capital is forthcoming they shall be qualified to transact business. This is an entirely different matter from that to which the hon. gentleman is now referring.

Mr. SPENCER: Are we not trying to do this very thing through the utilities commissions of the provinces?

Mr. BENNETT: I am going to mention that. In several provinces this method is being tried, and yet the greatest evils I know of in connection with the sale of shares, in one of the provinces at least, has come under these very circumstances, because the mere granting of authority to sell shares is not the cause of the trouble. It goes deeper than that. The representations made to secure the sale of the shares is what becomes of vital importance, and the circumstances under which the capital structure of the company is created.

I am going to endeavour for a few minutes, if it is not too tedious to the committee, to deal with the matter, both from the standpoint of the provinces and the dominion. Each province under a decision of the privy council has power to create a company that may carry on business not only within the province incorporating it, but beyond the province; but each province can restrain and control the sale of shares only within its own boundaries. It therefore follows that a company created in Alberta, and authorized by the utilities board to sell its shares at a given price, may go into the neighbouring province of, we will say, Saskatchewan, and the utilities board having a different view of the situation, or having the same view, the shares are sold there. You thus have sales in Saskatchewan, in Manitoba, in Alberta, in British Columbia, and in every part of Canada, it having been held by the privy council that a company might exercise all the powers practically that could be exercised by an individual, if each province passed a statute that had the effect of enabling the company created in one province to do business in another. I am not going into the technicalities of the law.

There is another illustration. The province of Prince Edward Island a few months ago passed a companies act which was intended to secure to the province additional revenue from companies. The province is said to be the Delaware of Canada. Delaware, as is known, is a very small state of the American union, and its company laws are so liberal that you will find thousands of companies incorporated there doing business in New York. Not only are the company laws of the state of Delaware very liberal, but the authorities make no close inquiries with regard to the relation between capital issue and capital requirements. That situation prevails in Canada: the companies act passed by the legislature of Prince Edward Island is a very liberal one, and hon. gentlemen may recall that it is much more liberal than the company legislation of some of the other provinces. Then you have the other provinces each with its own provisions with respect to companies; in some they are incorporated by letters patent, in some by memorandum and articles of association, and in some by a combination of both methods.

Then you come to Canada. When I first began the practice of my profession we incorporated companies under letters patent under the Great Seal. Then there came an amendment to the law, and we have it now that the incorporation is issued by the Secretary of State under the seal of his department. We added to our companies act certain provisions of the English act which related to the memorandum and articles of association. It will be recalled that Mr. Asquith set up a commission to study the whole question of company law. The late Sir Frank Cust, who was regarded as the leading company solicitor in the kingdom, gave to this matter a tremendous amount of time and energy. The result was that they drafted as good a companies act as it was possible to secure. We copied part of that into our Companies Act. I think one remedy we might avail ourselves of that we have not thus far is with respect to provisions regarding the amount of capital that shall be paid up before a company begins to carry on business. As it stands now, what is done is done perfunctorily. The result is that the authority to carry on business is really no protection at all from the federal standpoint. With respect to the provinces, as I have said, the usual provision is that a company may carry on business when ten per cent of its stock is subscribed for and paid up; some merely require that it shall be subscribed. So you have capital structures created that vary from time to time in ways that I will not trespass upon the time of the committee to discuss.

The two cases to which the hon. gentleman has just referred are cases of reorganization. Shortly put, the methods of reorganizing companies are these: First, the assets of the company are valued, and very often the appraisal shows their value to be far in excess of the capital stock outstanding. In the second case, auditors report upon the average earnings of the corporation over a period of years. For the sake of argument let us say they averaged 12 per cent. Then it might be an appropriate thing to recapitalize the reorganized company on a basis of twice the former capital, because with its former earnings the company would be able to pay interest at 6 per cent upon twice the amount of capital stock formerly outstanding.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Without any real necessity for new capital.

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to that. The third point usually considered is the method by which the property is mortgaged to the hilt by a bond issue involving a minimum interest charge since bonds secured by mortgage constitute money loaned to the corporation, not money contributed as a partner but money loaned, which establishes the relationship of debtor and creditor. This is loaned at a low rate of interest, for the sake of argument we will say 5 per cent. Then the balance that remains enables a larger issue of common or some other form of stock to be made, and as the hon. gentleman just observed, as a result you have a very large issue of shares. When you have added to that the no par value provision, which I think has worked very badly in this country, if I might venture a criticism, and which is my personal opinion, has been injurious to the whole financial structure of the country, then you have the situation about which complaints have been made.

The question is how we are to remedy the difficulty. In the province of Alberta they passed a law which enabled them to charge with fraud those who made issues of capital stock, let us say, very much in excess of what was reasonably required. One case went to the privy council. It was felt on the one hand that this legislation constituted an interference with dominion powers, because the provincial officers could enter and search the premises and books and institute proceedings of a character peculiarly criminal. Nevertheless, the privy council sustained the action taken by the provincial authorities in that regard. That does not get us any further, however; that only enables the province to—shall I say—successfully raid the books of enterprises that have been promoted with an undue regard for the promoters and a disregard for the rights of the shareholders. That is not any good to the minister.

The other point of the hon. gentleman is that to institute proceedings does not get money back to the shareholders; they have lost their money. In my own view I differ from my hon. friend the Secretary of State. My opinion is that the point urged so strongly in this house by the late W. F. Maclean is sound, namely that there should be some machinery by which the federal government can maintain prosecutions for violations of federal statutes. As it stands now, none but a provincial governmental authority may prefer an indictment, which is made either in the name of the attorney general or the crown prosecutor, as the case may be. If he sees fit, for reasons good and sufficient to him, to file a nolle prosequi it follows that the case is not proceeded with. That question became acute in this house in the days of Sir John Thompson, when the prosecution of Connolly and McGreevy was under consideration. It will be recalled that the Dominion government employed very eminent counsel for the purpose of maintaining that prosecution, but the indictment had to be framed and the charge drawn and submitted to the grand jury in the province of Ontario through provincial governmental institutions and by the officials of the attorney general's department.

It will be recalled that in the United States they have federal officials and a federal marshal, the marshal of the United States. They have a federal court and also what amount to federal prosecuting attorneys, who carry on prosecutions for breaches of federal laws. That is a provision which the framers of our confederation avoided for two reasons. In the United States they have forty-eight different kinds of criminal law, and the difficulty of having each state make its own criminal law, in connection with extradition and other similar matters, made it highly essential in the judgment of the framers of our constitution that we should have a universal criminal law, as we have. The second reason was that the administration of justice was felt to be a local matter which local authorities were better able to maintain and carry on than would be the federal authority. So at the moment in this country we have a universal criminal code applicable to every province, but its administration is in the hands of the officials of nine different provinces.

Under those circumstances it is my personal view that we should have a combination of the systems prevailing in the United States and in Great Britain. In Great Britain the department of public prosecutions is undoubtedly the finest organization in the world for the administration of criminal law. Every junior official of the treasury, who is a barrister, who is appointed to a position in that department is a man of promise who, without taking silk, may look forward to being promoted to the bench. Two of the greatest of English criminal judges to-day, one the senior member of the bench and the other a more recent appointment, were public prosecutors who gained a very great distinction by reason of the prosecutions they carried on. If any of the members of this house have read the book by the late Sir Harry Poland, who was the oldest practicing member of the bar, they will recall his description of a public prosecutor. The public prosecutor decides whether a case shall be proceeded with, and no political considerations govern. The selection of the local prosecutor rests with him, and he is in control of the whole machinery. The law is put in motion and the matter is carried through to the end by the intervention of the public prosecutor. Sometimes I think that in connection with controverted elections, for example, the only way to get rid of many difficulties is to have an independent tribunal which will have no interest in sawed-off election petitions; this might get over the difficulties which have been experienced. If we had a public prosecutor charged with responsibility for the administration of justice as far as federal statutes are concerned, we might get over some of the difficulties I now see. I observe that my mind has not been working along the same line as that of the Secretary of State. As I have observed the difficulties in connection with the administration of justice with respect to federal statutes, and then realized that the entire power with respect to the administration of justice and the setting in motion of the machinery for public prosecutions rests with provincial officers, at times I have concluded that the method suggested is the one by which the matter can be best dealt with.

On the question of the capital structures of companies, to get back to what the hon. gentleman has been discussing, prosecutions do not serve the purpose he has in mind. I can recall that when I was much younger than I am now I thought the difficulty could be overcome by the setting up of a federal tribunal that might exercise powers similar to those which have been given the Board of Railway Commissioners. I thought possibly it might be a branch of one of our federal commissions. But a country must not be overcommissioned, and already there are some signs indicating that people think we have as many commissions now as are necessary, if not too many. It might be an adjunct of the tariff board, for instance, in the mind of my hon. friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young) and some of the other hon. gentlemen who think as he does, but the difficulties in the way of setting up a tribunal that gives its imprimatur, its approval and its authority for a certain course of action to be taken, are not to be overlooked. I am sure, from what the hon. gentleman has observed in connection with other matters, that he will agree that this is an argument not to be lightly set aside. I am satisfied that we must devise some method by which to prevent the reorganization of enterprises as it has been going on in this country. About that I have not the slightest doubt in the world—not any. I am sorry to say—I think it was done inadvertently—that in 1930 we put a direct premium upon doing it. There were, I think, only two members in the house who observed it, and I know the government did not think it meant what it did; but it did permit the reorganization of every business enterprise in this country, if they wanted to do it. That was the effect of that statute.

An hon. MEMBER: What was that?

Mr. BENNETT: The provisions of the statute that permitted the absorption of profits in reserve by reorganization of the capital structure. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will recall what took place. That brought about a tremendous amount of reorganization. The result was that where a company had a capital of 10,000 shares and reserves that would enable it to recapitalize and reorganize, and to issue 15,000 shares, it was done. And the results sometimes were very injurious to the whole situation.

I can only say this to my hon. friend. The life of a government is very uncertain. This is one of the matters to which, however, I have given as much thought as I could in the time I have had at my disposal during the last few months. I think something must be done in the way of federal legislation to prevent just the difficulty to which he alludes. The effect is this—and it does not require any argument, for every hon. member to follow it: A successful company that by reason of great care and thrift has accumulated large reserves, proceeds to capitalize them, with the result that the public, who might hope to get a cheaper product by reason of the company having no greater demands upon it for fixed charges, suddenly finds itself confronted with trebled, quadrupled, or sometimes—I do not know of the apt word to describe it—twenty times its former capital, and the necessity becomes apparent to everyone of providing earnings to take care of a dividend upon its shares perhaps twenty times as large as previously prevailed. This is what the hon. gentleman is aiming at, and whether it can be done without a conference with the provinces I am free to say I have grave doubts. My own conviction, if it is worth anything to the hon. gentleman, is this. If we ever get back to normal conditions, there are two things that are essential for the maintenance of our commercial life, and one is that so far as possible there should be uniformity with respect to the incorporation of companies as between the dominion and the provinces. When I say uniformity, I mean that a company denied incorporation on application to the Secretary of State's office here, should not go to some other office in a province and obtain all the powers and more, as is frequently the case, that were sought for in the federal department.

Mr. CAHAN: It has been done in every case in which I have refused it.

Mr. BENNETT: To my knowledge, it is done frequently. Secondly, and this is the more important, the reorganization of companies must be controlled where the public are as vitally interested as they are here. Where enterprises with small capital have been able to make great progress, they must be prevented from issuing enormous waterlogged securities upon which the public pay enhanced prices for the purpose of enabling them to retain those securities so that they shall be quotable or saleable in the markets of the world.

Mr. COOTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend from Macleod says "hear, hear." Well, it is easy to say "hear, hear," but much more difficult to say "there, there," when you try to do it; it is a matter of first rate difficulty. When I say that the question of watered stock is one that has engaged the attention of every legislature in the world since 1862 or thereabouts, when we first had our Companies Act,—and companies are merely partnerships with limited liability that create, by reason of the statute, an entity called a corporation rather than a partnership—one realizes how essential it is that some steps should be taken. It is all very simple to sit down and suggest that something be done, but it is very difficult to begin to take action, having regard to the fact that we have a federal constitution, under which the provinces enjoy certain powers and the dominion others. However, I should like the hon. gentleman to know that I am not only in sympathy with what he says but that I believe it must be done. I believe we must discover, by conferences between the provinces and the dominion, some means by which that action shall be taken; and if we get back to normal times during the period I am privileged to direct the government of the country, I propose that a conference between the provinces and the dominion shall discuss the question to see whether we cannot arrive at some conclusions that will prevent a repetition of the enormous injury that has been done the country as a whole, and the great losses that have been sustained by individual investors by reason of the circumstances to which the hon. gentleman has referred.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Does not the Prime Minister consider it possible to take steps to prevent the watering of stock in companies that have federal incorporation, even if the federal jurisdiction does not extend to companies incorporated in the provinces?

Mr. BENNETT: The Secretary of State has alluded to the difficulty. The moment we undertake to impose such restrictions they at once say, "We will not incorporate with you at all but will go to the provinces," as in fact they do. That has been the difficulty to which the Secretary of State has directed attention. He says it is universal; when he refuses them, not being satisfied with the capital structure, or being of the opinion that they do not comply with the provisions of the law, they go to the province. Half a dozen sections in the Companies Act would remedy the difficulty. But that means that no companies would be incorporated here; and in support of that, you have the Secretary of State saying that in every case where he has refused them they have gone to a province and obtained a charter. That has been the real difficulty.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The Prime Minister will remember that after the board was appointed in Alberta the effect was in the opposite direction; they could not get charters there and if they did not they came to the dominion.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is what I was complaining about to the former Minister of Justice during the past eight or nine years. I have only one difference of opinion with the Prime Minister, and it is this. This, of course, is a legal matter and I confess that I have not a legal mind; but if the federal authorities can control banks, insurance companies and large corporations of that character because it is in the public interest—perhaps control is not the proper word, but exercise some medium of control—then it does seem to me that the government would not be assuming any serious responsibility by setting up such a board as is suggested. This, after all, would obviate criticism of the government in the event of some company, which had a certificate from the board, going wrong. With respect to most of the public business that is done in the country by companies, by whatever means they are set up, the government of Canada and the provincial governments must assume some control or we shall drift into another state of affairs which in my opinion will not prove a huge success, namely, the nationalization of all our public business; because I confess I am not yet convinced that we have arrived at the stage where that would be a desirable thing to have happen. I am convinced that we have arrived at the stage where governments must set up some authority which will prevent the manipulation which now goes on by private individuals and corporations. Legal gentlemen will know the difficulties to be overcome but I contend that if we are to prevent complete nationalization, and I wonder sometimes if it would not be successful, it is necessary that we have some power to deal with the evils which have crept in, particularly during the past few years.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 91 of the British North America Act, dealing with the powers of parliament, in part reads as follows:

—it is hereby declared that (nothwithstanding anything in this act) the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say,—

15. Banking, incorporation of banks, and the issue of paper money.
16. Savings banks.
17. Weights and Measures.
18. Bills of exchange and promissory notes.
19. Interest.
20. Legal tender.
21. Bankruptcy and insolvency.

In connection with banks and other corporations, to which the hon. gentleman has referred, this parliament has exclusive jurisdiction to deal with the matter as well as with other matters affecting savings banks, bills of exchange, interest and legal tender. The courts have held that inasmuch as insurance companies may have provincial incorporation as well as federal there is no exclusive jurisdiction resting either with parliament, on the one hand, or the legislatures on the other. If we had exclusive jurisdiction with respect to all corporations, as we have with respect to banks, then there would be no difficulty. It has been held that insurance companies—one of the matters referred to by the hon. gentleman—do not require licences from this dominion to enable them to transact business in a province, and that their incorporation or licensing by one province will permit them, under proper conditions, to do business in other provinces. This illustrates the difficulties with which we have to deal due to the joint control of the dominion and the provinces. These difficulties have caused all our trouble up to the present moment although there is a way out which I have not ventured to express because it would not be the expression of a mature opinion on my part. I do believe that we can meet this difficulty and I promise hon. gentlemen that if it is not met it will not be because of any desire not to do so.

Mr. CAHAN: In reply to the criticism offered by hon. gentlemen—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is not criticism, it is information we are after.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not intend to cast any reflection upon my predecessors when I say that the administration of the Companies Act since August, 1930, compares favourably with its administration at any other time since the act was placed upon the statute books. It has been honestly and efficiently administered and I am prepared to refute any adverse criticism thereon. I do not think hon. gentlemen have realized the many ramifications of this subject. I, as Secretary of State, may refuse to grant a charter to-day; within forty-eight hours, an application may be made to London and a charter granted within sixty-four hours. Under the comity which exists between us and Great Britain, the company granted such a charter could carry on business in this country. I have seen that done time and time again when there were restrictions under our act to which the applicants did not wish to submit.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Would a company incorporated in London have all the powers and authority granted to one incorporated by the federal government?

Mr. CAHAN: There are extraordinary powers granted under the English companies act which are not granted under our act.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend did not get the point of my question. Would a company organized and granted a charter in London under the English law have the same right to do business, in the province of Alberta for example, as a company organized and granted a charter by the dominion?

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so. It simply makes formal registration and then proceeds to do business. Under the English companies act a man may be incorporated to do in the name of a company almost everything that can be done by an individual. There would also be the greatest difficulty under the comity which exists between us and the United States. We could hardly declare that an American company could not come in here and do business unless its capital issues were subject to revision here. These companies come in by the hundreds and thousands and do business throughout Canada. They do not take out provincial or federal charters, they are incorporated in Delaware, New Jersey, New York or some other state and they come into Canada and carry on their corporate activities without regard to the restrictions imposed upon Canadians by our Companies Act. There is a wide range to be investigated in undertaking remedial legislation.

I do not think the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) understood what I said about the administration of justice in the provinces, because I think my ideas are somewhat in accord with his. If there is any constitutional method whereby the agents or officers of this government can be authorized to enforce federal laws against over-capitalization and the breach of federal legislation in regard to companies and the government will authorize me to take action at the expense of the government, I shall see that such action is taken. The matter is rendered far more difficult by the constitutional issue discussed by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power).

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I recognize the difficulties with regard to jurisdiction but may I remind the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) that when it was proposed that we should have bank inspection it was argued that that would be dangerous because the dominion might possibly be forced to accept certain responsibilities which it would not want to accept. There was an instance in which there was absolutely no doubt that the dominion had exclusive jurisdiction.

Bill reported.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR CONSTRUCTION OR COMPLETION OF BRANCH LINES

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to provide for an extension of time from 31st August, 1932, to the 31st August, 1934, for the construction or completion of certain branch lines of railway of the Canadian National Railway Company, authorized by chapters 19, 20, 21, 25, 28, 29, 30, 32, 33, 34, 35 and 36 of the statutes of 1929.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Manion thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 70, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for an extension of the time for the construction or completion of certain lines of railway.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

On section 1—Extension of time for construction.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: What is the number of this bill?

Mr. MANION: I am afraid the bill has not yet been given a number, because, with the consent of the house, we are making more rapid progress than is usual. The bill is merely for an extension of time for the building of various branch lines, twelve in number, that have not yet been completed. The bill introduced in 1929 permitted an extension for three years to August 31, 1932. As that time will run out on August 31 of this year, this is merely giving the railway a further extension of two years for the construction of these lines, without in any way saying that it will necessarily be two years before they are constructed. That is the whole purport of the bill.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I realize that is the purport of the bill and I am not sure whether the authority is absolutely necessary; possibly it is. I have, however, before me a protest from at least one part of our western community against this further extension in completing some of the work that has already been undertaken. Some of these branch lines have been carried almost to completion. The one about which the protest to which I refer has been made has had the grade constructed.

Mr. MANION: Which one is it?

Mr. CARMICHAEL: The Hemaruka-Scapa line in Alberta. The grade is constructed, the ties and steel laid, the crossings put in, the telegraph poles erected and the wire strung, but the line is left unballasted, and because of that there has been no movement of freight of any kind from the Drumheller coal fields or from Calgary distributing points to the residents living along that line. That road serves a large part of my constituency and the people there find it necessary to bring their coal and other freight eastward on the Goose Lake line to Saskatoon and then back by Biggar and Loverna, a distance of some 320 miles further, just because this line has not been ballasted; at least that is the excuse offered by western district superintendents. Last year I had the privilege of corresponding with the district superintendent of Saskatoon and again with the divisional superintendent at Winnipeg, and in each case the statement was made that the line was not ballasted and they could not carry our coal.

I have no great objection to this extension of two years, but if it is just a matter of stalling off the work for two years, I do not know whether it is worth our while putting this bill through the house. When so much money has been expended as has been the case in this particular instance, the matter of ballasting the line to carry our coal and other freight to needy settlers should be undertaken and completed. The total mileage of this line from Hemaruka to Scapa is some forty-one miles. The residents of Loverna district point out to me their whole difficulty would be solved if the line were ballasted at present from Hemaruka to the Youngstown-Coronation line. Then by coming north and crossing this line at a point about six miles west of Hemaruka they claim, if this were ballasted, their coal and other freight coming from Drumheller east could switch north from Youngstown to Hemaruka and move eastward to Loverna and surrounding districts. What I wish to emphasize in connection with this particular line is that the ballasting of the whole road should be gone on with if at all possible. I know the minister can use the argument that funds are not available. That may be true, but I would remind him that just the other night he had some estimates put through for improvements for the Trent and other canals that are not nearly so important, and in each of the several cases there was a considerable increase of expenditure over that of the previous year. Therefore the argument that funds are not available is not going to be very weighty in this case when one considers that ballasting a matter of six miles of line will provide for the residents of some hundred or more miles of territory a much cheaper commodity. I am informed by the residents of that district that their coal costs them an average of $1.60 a ton more if they have it brought in by Saskatoon, and as a result many of them go north on the Canadian Pacific and get their coal at $1.60 a ton cheaper. Those living south of the line go south to the Goose Lake line and haul it from twelve to sixteen miles, thus saving the extra freight charges. I would like to impress upon the minister the need of completing, not two years hence, but immediately, such lines as this one which needs only a small expenditure in order to complete it and to give to the residents along there the service for which they have been waiting many years.

Mr. MANION: May I suggest to the hon. member that a refusal to pass this bill would not necessarily hurry, in fact it would delay, the completion of the line. It would mean that nothing could be done on this line after August 31 of the present year, so that supposing some time after August 31 we wished to do some work on the Hemaruka-Scapa line and this bill had not passed, we should be unable to do it because we would not have the necessary legislation. Therefore a refusal to pass the bill would not advance but would probably delay the matter.

I have not any quarrel with the hon. gentleman in regard to the completion of this line, but in this bill there are twelve lines which it is claimed are in exactly the same position. The balance involved in these undertakings amounts to $13,000,000, which under present conditions is quite a sum. As regards the line to which my hon. friend refers, the figures that I have show that the total expenditure plus 15 per cent, which is the leeway allowed, was to be $1,650,000. The amount spent is given to me as $806,000, which is just a little less than half of the total amount. I mention that merely in passing. Perhaps it may help the committee to understand the whole situation if I say what I have said many times before in regard to various branch lines which have been brought to the attention of the government and the railway, that the railway management at this time take the attitude that because of the very serious financial situation and the continually decreasing earnings, they do not believe any amount should be spent on most of these lines, that is the twelve different ones affected. If conditions improve I am sure the government would be quite pleased; certainly they would have no objection to helping the railways to make the extensions required. At the present time, however, there is the feeling that the Hemaruka-Scapa line is on all fours with other branch lines, some twelve in number, and involving an expenditure of about $13,000,000.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Does the minister suggest that half a million dollars will be necessary to ballast forty-one miles of road? According to the figures submitted that is the distance remaining.

Mr. MANION: Yes; that is true according to the figures I have had submitted to me. According to those figures the total expenditure on the Hemaruka-Scapa line, allowing a fifteen per cent leeway, was $1,650,000. The expenditures to December 31, 1931, were $806,000. Hon. members will see that half the amount is still to be expended.

Mr. GARDINER: Has the minister any information concerning the condition of that piece of line at the present time?

Mr. MANION: Yes, I can give my hon. friend the information that is before me which, I believe, is fairly complete. The distance in question is forty-one miles. The amount, without the fifteen per cent, was $1,435,000. Then the addition of the fifteen per cent made up the figure I have given. The line has been completed with the exception of the ballast, the buildings and the fences. Up to December 31, 1931, $806,000 had been expended, of which $255,990 was expended during the year 1931, details of which are given in an attached statement. Those details would not be very useful to the committee, as they enumerate details concerning engineering, grading, bridges, ties and so on. I do not think that information would be of any particular use to the committee. The statement I have before me does not give the details of the amounts still to be expended, but I have given the figures.

Mr. GARDINER: I appreciate the situation in which the Canadian National Railways find themselves, but I should like to know if the minister has any information concerning the possibility of having coal drawn on that line, even if it has not the ballast. In the early days of western Canada lines went without ballast for a period of two or three years, yet despite that fact trains ran on them. The people living in the district to be served by this road feel some service should be given so that they may be saved some very substantial amounts of money.

Mr. MANION: I cannot give the hon. member any definite information in that connection. I shall be very happy, however, to bring his comments to the attention of the railways, and if there is any way in which they can assist, I am sure they will be only too anxious to do so.

Mr. GARDINER: The statement by the hon. member for Kindersley is quite correct. Probably the minister has not the information before him to the effect that the Youngstown-

Coronation line is just about six miles west of Hemaruka. If the railway company could put a switch in there the people to the east would be served; I refer to those people six miles west of Hemaruka. If the railway could help, those people would receive a very much needed service.

Mr. MANION: I shall be very happy to draw the hon. member's remarks to the attention of the railway authorities.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am wondering if any action will be taken. I think the remarks of the hon. members preceding me have been both moderate and fair. We know about the practice of railways which in the past have constructed lines to certain points, and then left them for long periods of time. That condition requires no rehearsing. In the past it has been a serious scandal in such districts as the Lethbridge district, and others throughout western Canada. In the present instance we have a very striking illustration of the attitude of the railways towards requirements of districts. When the hon. member for Kindersley said that a back haul of about 160 miles was necessary he was understanding the facts—but perhaps wisely so. I find that at the present time to supply Little Gem, Naco, and points east of there, coal is run from Drumheller to Saskatoon, from Saskatoon west to Biggar, and from Biggar west to points of destination, a distance of 370 miles at a charge to the purchaser of about $3.80 a ton. That coal could be laid in there at about $2 a ton if the suggestion of the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) were adopted, and if it were drawn over the now almost completely constructed line, lacking only ballast. From my experience in the western provinces and from my knowledge of the territory, I am satisfied the base upon which the ties are laid is for the most part sufficiently level to enable the hauling of fairly substantial loads without great risk to the lines.

I support the contentions of those hon. members who have preceded me, and in that connection merely wish to say that I have been in communication with the Western Canada Fuel Association, the Drumheller coal operators, the board of trade of Drumheller, the Board of Railway Commisisoners, and the railways. To date I have not been able to get any satisfaction from the railways. The matter however, is still under consideration, and if the minister will add his voice to ours I am satisfied that collectively we may be able to secure some justifiable and satisfactory solution. The conditions at present are grossly unfair. Canada has paid for the line; the line is ready for use; the people need the service, but through lack of ballast they are being deliberately held up. I hope the minister will join with us in protesting to the railways.

Mr. MANION: I shall bring the hon. member's remarks to the attention of the railways.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I should like to speak to the minister concerning the Neidpath-Swift Current branch of the Canadian National Railways. There is a rumour that it is not the intention of the Canadian National Railways to put that line into operation until the year 1934. If I understand the situation correctly the road has been built, the steel has been laid, and ballasting is partially completed. I should like to find out from the minister what additional expenditures must be made in order to put that road into operation. That particular line has been agitated for the past fifteen years, and it seems to me it is in shape to give service to the district.

Mr. MANION: The remarks I made in connection with the Hemaruka-Scapa branch are applicable to the Neidpath-Swift Current branch. The Neidpath-Swift Current branch line was to cost $1,380,000, and up to the end of the year 1931, $937,000 had been spent. Therefore there is a balance to be spent of about $450,000. I can say only this, that it is in the same position as the other branch lines, of which there are twelve in all. In fairness to the railways may I add that pressure of financial conditions is responsible for the action they have taken.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Included in that figure is a considerable amount for station, grounds and so on. Would it not be possible to get the railroad in operation without that expenditure by simply putting in a loading platform or something of that kind? This expense would be very small and would give real service.

Mr. MANION: Again I do not care to offer any technical opinion, I am not qualified to do so; but I shall very gladly do for my hon. friend what I have promised to do for other hon. members, that is, draw his remarks to the attention of the railway management.

Mr. CANTLEY: When does the minister propose to complete the Sunnybrae-Guysborough road? As I understand it, 72 per cent of the construction work is already done. If the government are looking for some relief for unemployment, I do not know anything that will give more employment and at the same time carry out the original purpose of the government than the completion of this road. The minister may tell me that he has not got the money, but my understanding is that he is spending about a couple of million dollars in the Hudson bay district on the completion of some work there. I do not want to offend my friends on the other side, but my impression is that that route never will be worth much as an outlet for their grain.

Some hon. MEMBERS: A wrong impression.

Mr. CANTLEY: We have been told how popular the route is and how much grain did go out over it last year when through the minister's efforts a few thousand bushels of wheat were shipped from Churchill. Owing to good fortune and an abnormal season he was able to get two boats into Hudson bay, but it may be doubted if the same conditions will occur again in the next fifty years.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CANTLEY: All right, read the history of the Hudson's Bay Company and their experience with the route and the history of the navigation of James bay for the last hundred and twenty or thirty years; after doing so some of you may change your minds in regard to the possibility and the practicability of that port. We have spent fifty million dollars on it. How much has been spent on railways in the maritime provinces in the last twenty years?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: We spend eight million dollars a year under the Maritime Freight Rates Act. I have no objection to it.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the elevator at Halifax?

Mr. CANTLEY: The railway mileage of the maritime provinces as compared with that of the other parts of the dominion is practically infinitesimal.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: But the railway deficit on the maritime province lines is equal to that in the rest of Canada.

Mr. CANTLEY: We built and paid for most of our railways before confederation; that mileage and other roads we gave as a gift to the dominion. All that we ask is that they maintain and operate them. To-day the railway department is not doing that. The situation is not satisfactory to the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What about wharves and breakwaters?

Mr. CANTLEY: I appeal to the minister to do something to complete that road. Seventy-two per cent of the construction work has been done. Why not go on and complete the road and put it in operation? If the road were put through as originally intended it would save the department a very considerable amount of money, simply because the railway from New Glasgow to Mulgrave, a distance of eighty miles, is the worst section of road in Canada; the grades and the alignment are worse than any eighty mile section of road east or west. The operating losses on that section due to the physical condition of the road are and have been excessive. The gradients run from ·8 to over 2½ per cent, and the alignment is unequalled in any similar length of road anywhere in the country. By continuing the railway from Guysborough around to Mulgrave you will be able to do away with the operation of that most expensive section, on which a large amount of rolling stock has been destroyed; and only about 25 per cent of a normal load can be carried over it. I think the minister's department should consider this practical suggestion. What I am anxious about at the moment is to get some understanding from him that he will complete the section of the road, 72 per cent of the construction of which has already been done.

Mr. DUFF: I have very much pleasure in supporting the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley). He has covered the ground very well, and as we are anxious to get through the session, I need not make a speech on the Sunnybrae-Guysborough railway. I notice the minister in his remarks gave as one particular reason why the Sunnybrae-Guysborough road and the other branch lines cannot be completed that the Canadian National Railways did not have sufficient funds to finish the work. My understanding is that some $4,000,000 of bonds were issued and sold for the building of the Sunnybrae-Guysborough line, and consequently the railway management must be using the money for other purposes. This being so, I think the reason given by the management falls to the ground. The road should be completed.

Mr. MANION: I must confess that what the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) says is news to me. I do not think he can be correct, for the railway management could not, without the consent of the government, use money from the sale of those bonds for some other purpose. However, my hon. friend is on the special railway committee, and to-morrow I would suggest he ask about that matter. I have every sympathy for both him and my hon. friend from Pictou. They have both placed the matter before me a number of times. Unfortunately this branch line is in exactly the same position as other uncompleted branch lines throughout the country. While I very much respect the opinion of the hon. member for Pictou, the railway management do not admit that the Sunnybrae-Guysborough line is going to be such a profitable branch as he points out. However, I can only promise him as I have promised others, that the whole discussion will be brought to the attention of the railway management in whose hands the subject is.

Mr. CANTLEY: I expect you to promise me a little more than you did the other day.

Mr. SPENCER: I desire to draw to the minister's attention the branch line from Bulwark to Airways, Alberta. This line has been needed for a number of years. Last year after some delay the route was graded. People in the locality expected the line would have been completed last year, and they are very much disappointed. I can quite understand financial conditions preventing the railway management going ahead with new branch lines, but where a considerable amount of money has been expended on actual work, it seems to me it would be the course of wisdom for the line to be completed; for had it been in operation last year, a very considerable revenue would have resulted from the traffic that was available owing to the heavy crop that we had there. How much money has been spent on this line, and has the minister any estimate of what is needed to finish the work?

Mr. MANION: The branch line to which the hon. member refers has had a lesser proportion of the total cost expended on it than have most of the other branch lines that are being held up. The estimated cost is over $1,000,000 for the twenty-five miles, and the amount spent to the end of December last was $389,000, so that less than half has been expended. In the case of the Sunnybrae-Guysborough branch line for example, over three-quarters of the estimated cost has been spent, in fact in the percentage figure my hon. friend for Pictou gave he underestimated the expenditure. I do not wish to delay my own bill; the situation is just as I have told my hon. friend. The work is being held up through lack of funds.

Mr. SPENCER: If this bill goes through will these lines be finished within the next twelve or fifteen months?

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MANION: According to the bill they must be finished within two years or we will have to bring in another bill. It depends entirely on business conditions, so far as the railways are concerned. They are anxious to go ahead, and so is the government, but the difficulty is that the earnings of the road have been in the red, as they say, and there is not a very good outlook for the spending of money on branch lines, very few of which pay their way for some time.

Mr. SPENCER: Is it not a question whether the railways are not losing more money by not putting down the rails than will be saved by this policy?

Mr. MANION: They do not think so.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is it the fixed policy of the railways and of the government not to continue the construction of any branch lines until the revenues of the road improve?

Mr. MANION: In a general way that is correct, though there are a few small items in connection with the branch lines we are discussing at the moment. They will not total more than $350,000, however, which will be scattered from one end of the country to the other, so generally speaking my hon. friend is correct.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Then I suppose it would be useless for me to press further for the Mafeking cut-off?

Mr. MANION: I am afraid so.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am quite sincere in that statement. The hon. member for Pictou mentioned the value, in the matter of the relief of unemployment, of the Sunnybrae-Guysborough line, and I am equally sincere with regard to the Mafeking cut-off. I do not think my hon. friend from Pictou is a very good salesman. He is trying to sell the idea of completing this branch line of his by knocking the construction of another line. I do not think there are many successful salesmen who try to sell their goods by knocking other lines. I may tell my hon. friend that his prophecy with regard to the Hudson Bay railway will not be fulfilled if the government give the line sympathetic consideration and if proper insurance rates are obtained.

Mr. MANION: We are giving it sympathetic consideration.

Mr. MURPHY: I do not want to delay this legislation, but as a member from Manitoba who in season and out has defended the completion of the Hudson Bay railway I feel that I must say a few words in its defence.

Mr. BROWN: Deal with the Mafeking cut-off at the same time.

Mr. MURPHY: One thing at a time is a very good rule. During the fall of 1931 it was my good fortune to visit the port of Churchill, where I had the privilege of a conversation with the commanders of the boats, the Farnworth and the Warkworth, which carried the two shiploads of wheat from Churchill to the old country. They told me that on their voyage into the bay they experienced no difficulty whatever; in other words it was a very humdrum sort of trip. They simply sailed through the straits into the bay and loaded their ships in the harbour, and I have never heard that they experienced any difficulty on the return journey. The fact that they did not do so is shown by their safe arrival in the old country. I could give more of their conversation, but to do so would be to make an invidious comparison with another port of Canada, and in that I do not propose to follow my hon. friend from Pictou, who has endeavoured to fulfil his desires by belittling another route. Ships have been going into and coming out of Hudson bay for two hundred years or more, and there have been very few failures. It is true that the season is short; it may not be as safe as some other routes, but I would point out to the committee that until the last few years there were no aids to navigation along that route. Now that condition has been rectified, and if one is to believe the two commanders who brought their ships to that port, there is absolutely no difficulty whatever in making that a very navigable route in certain seasons of the year.

May I say here that we Canadians are usually prone to talk about our immeasurable resources and how we may expand this country. Why any one part of Canada should feel that the opening of another port is going to be to the disadvantage of the country rather than to its advantage passes my comprehension. If Canada is the country we think it is, then the development of the port of Churchill will work to the benefit of the whole country. If we are going to adopt in Canada a narrow, provincial attitude and contend that the country can prosper only by the development of one portion or the other, then I am afraid all our prophecies in regard to this country have been made on a wrong basis.

With regard to this government giving sympathetic consideration to the Hudson Bay railway and the port of Churchill, with the Minister of Railways I feel quite safe in saying that this government has not only given sympathetic consideration but has carried to completion the railway and the port, and to-day this route is ready for business. All that is needed is for the shippers to send their goods to Churchill, and they will get to the old country.

Mr. CANTLEY: The last sentence of the minister's remarks contains the whole picture; all that is required is for the people to send their grain through Churchill, and why the deuce don't they? Last year the minister had to go over the country with a fine tooth comb looking for cargoes; the minister did everything and implored everybody to send some grain over that route. Those are the facts, and they can be verified by Hansard of last year. My objection is that the minister proposes to find $2,000,000 this year for Hudson bay but he cannot find a dollar to complete a short section of an eastern route. With regard to my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, who has just spoken, if he will read up the history—

An hon. MEMBER: Ancient history.

Mr. CANTLEY: —of Hudson bay and its navigation, he will find that in one year out of three the Hudson's Bay Company either did not get their yearly ship into the bay or, if they did get it in they did not get it out. That is a matter of history. The difficulty has not been the lack of aids to navigation; it has been that the port has been icebound, and it will be icebound again. Through the grace of God, or the weather condition last year a condition prevailed that has not prevailed for fifty years, but you cannot count on that every year.

Mr. MURPHY: I think the hon. gentleman must be mistaken when he says we cannot count on the grace of God every year.

Mr. CANTLEY: I think the grace of God is fairly well exhausted as far as helping out the Hudson Bay railway is concerned. About all the dividend we get from that road is the enjoyment we derive in discussing it in this house. Certainly I would not belittle any legitimate enterprise in this country. The east contributed as much as any other section of the country to the development of western Canada, and all I am asking to-day is that a reasonable amount should be spent to complete a road which is now seventy-two per cent completed. The amount for which I am asking is small in comparison with what is being spent to-day on the port of Churchill. That is all I have to say about that. If anyone else wishes to make further remarks as to the navigability of Hudson bay, or to say anything about that part of the country as a summer resort, I shall be glad to hear him and give the matter respectful consideration. For my part, however, I have made up my mind fairly well, from history I have read as to conditions governing both Hudson bay and James bay, that there will not be very much grain or any other commodities moved out of the port, however much you may spend on it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Are the connecting links from Elk Point with the Saskatchewan line along the Saskatchewan river in the same category as the other lines? I should be glad if the minister would give me some information with regard to this and also the Coal lake connection. They are two lines I have been greatly interested in.

Mr. MANION: Those are not the names, are they?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not know under what names they go, but my hon. friend will remember that there are two projections from St. Paul eastward to connect with the Saskatchewan line going west. Is there any chance of anything being done on these lines this year?

Mr. MANION: I do not recognize the description that my hon. friend gives it. The names of the lines are given here but not under the description he has given. I am afraid I cannot give the information he asks for.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Am I correct in assuming that $350,000 is all that will be spent this year?

Mr. MANION: Yes; that is all that it is proposed to spend at the present time.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I can assume that nothing will be done.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend can take it for granted that the branch lines are all on the same basis.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): I was interested in the remarks of some hon. members in regard to the Hudson Bay railway. This is not a party question. Both parties are tied up to it and we have spent $50,000,000 of the people's money. I submit that it is our duty to put our best foot forward to see if we cannot make practical use of the railway, instead of condemning it after spending this money on it. I understand from the minister that the amount in the estimates this year is to provide facilities for the loading and unloading of coal, sheds for the covering of merchandise when it is shipped in and out, and other facilities of that sort. It is, I repeat, the duty of every member of this house to do everything possible to make that railway a success. I am not condemning it nor saying that it will not be a real shipping route, but after we have spent $50,000,000 on it we should try to make it a success.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I do not intend to enter into any argument about the Hudson Bay railway. Some years ago we exhausted our oratory on the question and finally both parties were convinced that it should be undertaken. What I wish to direct attention to is the fact that at least two-thirds of the money involved in that project was raised by a tax on western land. I call it a tax advisedly, because homestead land was sold to the extent of $37,000,000 to contribute to a fund used for the building of the Hudson Bay railway. So that it is not all money taken out of the public treasury in the ordinary way.

NATURAL RESOURCES

REFUND OF MONEYS RECEIVED PRIOR TO TRANSFER TO WESTERN PROVINCES

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 64, to authorize the refund of moneys received in connection with the administration of the natural resources.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY—CANNED SALMON INSPECTION

STATEMENT OF MR. NEILL ON MOTION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, am I correct in understanding that this is a motion upon which I am not restricted by the forty-minute rule?

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member wishes to debate the motion it is his privilege to do so and if the Speaker should feel he is out of order, he will be obliged to tell him so.

Mr. NEILL: That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member is not limited to forty minutes.

Mr. NEILL: I know I am not, but I wanted His Honour to say so to prevent my being cut off later on.

The matter which I intend to discuss is in connection with the Department of Fisheries, which has decided to inaugurate in British Columbia a system of inspection of canned salmon. British Columbia is the only province affected by this matter. The salmon canning industry as a whole is in accord with the idea of having canned salmon inspected. This industry is a very important one, last year's catch being valued at close to $17,000,000. There are directly employed in this industry some 12,000 people, and probably as many more are indirectly employed. When dependents are considered, it will be found that something like fifty or sixty thousand people are vitally interested in this industry, and this is my excuse for bringing up the matter.

I believe the idea of inspection is to help the sale of canned salmon in foreign countries, and also particularly in Great Britain. We hope to be able to say to Great Britain: If you will give us a preference we will guarantee you a first class article and demonstrate it by government inspection. With this principle I heartily agree, but I submit that the method proposed to be adopted is a poor one and calculated to frustrate the very object for which it is designed. In this connection two orders in council have been passed, one providing for the inspection and the other constituting a board of inspection. These are numbered P.C. 723 and 724, and these orders in council cause me to consider for a moment the difference between passing legislation and orders in council. I do not think the provisions which appear in these orders in council would have passed the house or the fisheries committee had they been brought down in the form of legislation. I desire to comment on one or two details in the orders in council, and then I shall proceed to discuss my main objection thereto.

Subsection (c) of section 26 of P.C. 723 is comprised of one sentence of 235 words, and consequently it is extremely involved. Among other things it states that certain provisions shall apply only when the salmon is shipped from a cannery or private warehouse connected with a railway, whereas these provisions should apply to all shipments. Another provision of this subsection is that each day's pack shall be identified by code markings. That is a necessary provision, but it should apply to all salmon to be inspected and not only to salmon shipped out of a private warehouse. Another provision is that railway cars loaded at such canneries and private warehouses shall be sealed before they are despatched. Who would ship a carload of salmon valued at from three to eight thousand dollars without having it sealed? It is not necessary to pass an order in council to provide for that, the common sense of the railways and the cannery officials will see that such a car is sealed before it starts on its journey. The provision should be that the car shall be sealed by the inspector, otherwise it is of no use.

I am unable to find any provision to guarantee that the cases inspected are actually shipped. I may be visited by an inspector; he comes into my warehouse and I point out a thousand cases of salmon; he inspects those cases but puts no mark or stamp upon them. He tests a certain number of cans and then tells me I can ship them; he goes away without seeing them shipped and if I desire I can ship five hundred cases of that lot and five hundred cases of a lot not inspected. All that is required is that the cars shall be sealed, and that would be done by the railway officials in any case. Subsection (d) of the same section reads:

> Application for inspection of any parcel or parcels of canned salmon shall be made in writing to the chief supervisor of fisheries for the province. Inspection shall be made as promptly as possible, but the Department of Fisheries shall not be responsible for any delays.

That is entirely too vague; the shipper should have some protection that his goods will be inspected within a reasonable time. A delay beyond a reasonable period might half ruin him. As is known, many of the canneries are much indebted to the banks and they have to finance on a very close margin; yet a man's inspection may be held up perhaps for a week, without any obligation on the part of the government except that they will do it when they feel like it. Of course the provision is "as promptly as possible". I submit that should be within four days.

In the same section is laid down the method of getting the inspection started. The man has to apply in writing to the chief supervisor. Then the chief supervisor, when he feels like doing so, reports to the board of inspection.

The board, when they have spare time from their other duties, because they have other business to look after as they still carry on their own affairs, get busy. After they have made their inspection, they report back to the chief supervisor and the latter reports to the owner. This is a great deal of unnecessary red tape when prompt inspection is necessary. We are trying to accelerate business, not to hold it back.

Then we come to section 29 (d), which deals with the way in which the salmon is to be inspected. There is a different procedure in regard to 100 cases from that in regard to 10,000 cases. The question of cost is not involved, because the cost is so much a case; it makes no difference as to cost per case whether 100 or 10,000 are inspected at one time. This provides that if you take out 100 cases at a time and have them inspected, twelve cases, or 12 per cent, are withdrawn. But if you have 10,000 cases, only ninety-six cases, which is a good deal less than one per cent, are taken out. Then one tin out of each such case is opened. The result is this: if you have 100 cases of salmon tested and inspected at the one time, one tin out of 400 tins will be opened and tested. But if you have 10,000 cases tested, only one tin out of 5,000 tins will be inspected. Why the difference? The quality is not likely to be any poorer if you take 100 cases than if you take 10,000, but in one instance the proportion is one out of 400 and in the other one out of 5,000. I do not think our British friends will consider adequate an inspection based on one out of 5,000 tins. Under the act dealing with canned fruits and vegetables, the inspection is three per cent. Of course I would not for a moment suggest that that proportion should be taken for salmon, because the cost would be prohibitive, but there is a tremendous difference between that and taking one tin out of 5,000.

Section 30 provides the way in which the inspection is to be paid for. It is to be paid for by a fee at the rate of one cent per case, this to be charged by the board of inspection and collected from the owner of the fish. Also in certain cases expenses of travelling and living are charged. I shall deal with that later on, but before I proceed I want to emphasize the point that it is a most unusual and phenomenal procedure that the canner is to pay for the inspection of his products. I question whether under the act there is any authority for this. I think it is section 4 of the Meat and Canned Foods Act which provides that the governor in council may make regulations not inconsistent with the provisions of the act. That is the usual clause. Under that they have taken power to impose a very heavy charge upon the owners of these fish. I question very much and I submit to the minister and the ministry whether that is legal under the Meat and Canned Foods Act, because it is well understood that regulations must be consistent with the act and they cannot make any large and violent departure from its provisions.

As regards section 24, I shall not take time to go into it. It is only a matter of bad drafting, but as it reads at present it does not make sense. I shall say just this, and it will be on record: The words "except as herein otherwise provided" should be struck out at the beginning and inserted after the words "provided that" in the third last line. That deals with all the minor matters, what I would call the technical points in the regulations.

I shall turn now to the requirements of the inspection. We find the first one in regulation 27(a):

> Canned salmon that are found by the board of inspection to be fresh, firm, well packed and in good merchantable condition shall be approved and a certificate in the form attached marked "A," shall be issued therefor.

What do we mean by the word "fresh"? What would the ordinary man on the street mean by the word "fresh" applied to fish? Would it not mean fish that had been anything but canned? I do not quibble about dictionary meanings, because you get various definitions, but the dictionary term is "not preserved by salting or by pickling, canning, etc." How can fish that has been in a can for three months be described as fresh? The language used in the Meat and Canned Foods Act, the original act, is "sound, wholesome and fit for human food," which I think is a better definition. According to the regulation, however, if the board of inspection finds the fish is "fresh, firm and well packed," the canner is given a certificate, the only one granted. No other grade or quality gets a certificate. To that form of certificate, there is a serious objection which I shall deal with later on.

What happens if the fish is not up to the first grade on which a certificate is granted? Section 27 (b) provides that if it is not up to that, but if it is "sound, wholesome and fit for human food," then it can be sold but it is not entitled to a certificate. What is the difference between "fresh, firm and well packed," and "sound, wholesome and fit for human food"? I cannot see much. If, however, the fish comes under the second category, that is "sound, wholesome and fit for human food," it does not get a certificate but if stamped "second quality" on each tin, it may be sold. It may also be "reconditioned" for re-examination. What does the word "recondition" suggest to our minds in connection with fish in a can? My mind goes back to Upton Sinclair's novel, The Jungle, in which were described conditions, now long past, it is to be hoped, in the packing houses in Chicago. When they came upon a mass or a boiling of meat that was so bad it actually stank, and would not pass muster in any case, they reconditioned it by doping it with benzoic acid or salt petre or some other strong preservative so that it was practically embalmed. An embalmed corpse does not smell and they then sold it as canned beef. Is that what the word means in this case? The word "recondition" is used, and I do not know any other meaning for it. How can we change something that is "sound, wholesome and fit for human food" into "fresh, firm and well packed"? I do not know how you can make canned salmon firm that is not already firm; I do not know how you can change it into being well packed unless you empty the fish out of the can and repack it, which course would be absurd on account of the cost. There is an important point I want to note here: there is in this order in council no provision for condemning rotten fish, let us say, on the first inspection. Only if it has been reconditioned and re-examined and is then found unfit for human food, can it be condemned. Mark you, it is based on that. The man whose fish will not pass first quality is privileged to recondition it. If he brings it up again, and it is then found to be rotten it can at that time be condemned—but only then. That in my view is a foolish regulation.

Section 27 (d) reads as follows:

> Canned salmon that are found after reconditioning and reexamination not to be up to "second quality" shall be confiscated—

An so on. In my opinion it ought to read:

> Canned salmon that are found not to be up to "second quality" shall be confiscated.

It should not matter when the defective condition is found. I notice further that if the fish is condemned the owner cannot sell it for fox meat. On the other hand, however, the government could have it for its own use, or sell it for the use of animals. If it is condemned and put into such condition that it cannot be sold for human food, I think the owner should be in a position to get what he can for it as fox meat.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Speaker, the order in council No. 723, of which I was speaking this afternoon really provides for only two grades of canned salmon. The first grade is not called No. 1 grade, it is not called first quality. I presume it would be called certificated, because it is entitled to a certificate which declares it has been inspected, and is "fresh, firm and well packed." The second quality is anything under that, which is found to be "sound, wholesome and fit for human food." It does not get a certificate, and it must have the words "second quality" stamped on each tin. The question also arises as to stuff unfit for human food, but I think the department will see the point I made this afternoon and will provide for its being condemned whenever it is seen, whether on the first or second inspection. At present the question only arises if it comes up for re-examination.

We will assume that inspected salmon will fall naturally into those two grades. I will put the two together to make the comparison easier. One is "fresh, firm and well packed"; the second is "sound, wholesome and fit for human food." Now, one of two things is going to happen. These distinctions are so fine that it is almost impossible to distinguish between them. What member of this house who is not familiar with the subject will say which of these two definitions he would prefer as characterizing the best grade: "sound wholesome and fit for human food;" or "fresh, firm and well packed"? If sound, wholesome and fit for human food, it must also be fresh, firm and well packed; and I suppose, inversely, if it is fresh, firm and well packed, it also will be, or should be, sound, wholesome and fit for human food. But I think what he would prefer would be a distinction more explanatory and more likely to come home to the housewife as indicating the better quality of the two grades. But the order in council reads otherwise. The chances are that the two definitions will get so merged in the mind of the inspector, that anything that is sound, wholesome and fit for human food will also pass as No. 1 and get the certificate; in which case you have a very expensive system of inspection which will only be a farce. "What's the use? It is all going to be classified as No. 1." On the other hand, we will suppose the inspector being a very experienced man, with these two definitions—to our minds so little removed from each other—can see a distinction between them; and we will suppose he certifies 20 per cent as being under No. 1, but nevertheless sound, wholesome and fit for human food. Then this 20 per cent will only be permitted to be sold if it has embossed on each tin in letters of a given size the words "second quality." You will find this in paragraph 27, subsection (c).

I protest against that policy. It will involve a heavy and a very unjustifiable loss upon an industry that is having great trouble at the present time to keep its head above water. Why? Because the wrong word is used. When you use the words "second quality" you simply damn the sale of everything so marked. There is nothing about which the human mind is so sensitive in connection with food as any suggestion that there is anything wrong with it, as fish, especially with respect to tins of canned fish; that it is something a little less than superior, a little less than first quality. You only have to put that idea into the mind of the housewife or purchaser—and you certainly do instil that idea when you mark on the tin that the contents are of second quality—and she says "no." In her mind or that of her husband the suggestion arises of ptomaine poisoning, and everything that that stands for, and they say, "No, even if it is going to cost a little more, we will pay the extra to get the genuine government guaranteed quality." Even the poorest of our people in institutions would object to that "second quality" fish, and if some got the tummy-ache they would blame it on the second quality fish, and you would have a scandal.

This suggestion of second quality appears so much more forcibly in the case of tinned fish than anything else. I think in Great Britain butchers are compelled to indicate that their mutton is frozen New Zealand mutton as distinguished from the home product. The housewife sees the mutton so marked, and she can gauge whether it is of a quality that satisfies her, and very often the only difference is that of price. But in that case she sees it; her eye is her informant, so to speak. Take second grade potatoes. The purchaser looks at the potatoes, it is only a question of cutting off the diseased pieces, no one will be poisoned, it is only a question in the housewife's mind if it pays to buy second quality potatoes. As I say, we use the wrong words when we prescribe this marking of "second quality." Let us take cheese and butter. While they do use figures, 1, 2 and 3, they do not apply the word "quality"; these articles are simply graded 1 and 2 and 3. But there again the purchaser has at least an opportunity of seeing, and sampling what she is buying. But take eggs; you cannot sample them. There are three grades before you come to No. 2—specials, extras and firsts, and then the fourth grade is seconds. There are three grades to sell the better class quality before you come to the second. Then take a another comparison that is most applicable to canned fish, that is canned fruit and vegetables. Regulation No. 15—it is taken out of the same act, Canned Meat and Foods Act—prescribes that there shall be four grades of canned fruits—fancy, choice, standard and second. There again, sir, we have three descriptions not calculated to offend the eye or mind of the purchaser before coming down to the second grade.

It would be all right if we marked this fish "Canada choice" and "Canada standard" the same as fruit is marked. That would give the cannery man a chance to sell a considerable portion of his pack which might be assigned to second quality grade, but the consumer would be absolutely protected because it is not permitted to stamp the container "second quality" unless the fish is found to be "sound, wholesome and fit for human food." What more do they want? Why condemn this commodity with the suggestion that it is second quality, and therefore inferior quality, when "choice" or "standard" would do equally well? It would not penalize the cannery man, and the consumer, as I say, would be absolutely protected.

There is another aspect of considerable danger, not from the point of view of health, but from the success of the inspection system—which is what we are trying to get at, or else there is no use doing it at all. The government certificate says: The contents of this tin have been examined, and they are fresh, firm and well packed. It says nothing about variety at all. There is as much difference between varieties of salmon as there is between hon. gentlemen who sit on the right and the left of you, Mr. Speaker; as much difference as there is between lamb and goat meat. In fact there is more difference than that, and perhaps I might give an illustration to bring it home more clearly. I will not talk about prices to-day, because the price of salmon to-day is just what you can get for it, and that is very little indeed. In the days when salmon was selling on a fair market basis the comparison would be like this: The best brand of salmon, sockeye, would be selling at $19 a case, while the lowest grade, the name of which I will not mention, would be selling for $5 a case or something like that. That gives an illustration of what the market considers to be the difference between certain varieties, both first class in their different ways. I have authority for that in section 24 of the Meat and Canned Foods Act, which says:

For the purposes of this act the varieties of British Columbia salmon shall be designated, and, if the need for such is established to the satisfaction of the governor in council, graded as provided in the regulations.

The act says they shall be designated. Is that designation to be put on the chicken house or in the family bible? Do you not think the place clearly indicated is on the can itself? It should be designated as being what it really is, and the authority is contained in the act itself. It is true that the government certificate only says the contents are fresh, firm and well packed. The government say they will not go beyond that and will not be bound by anything more, but you must understand the argument that will be advanced by the wholesaler, trying to push his goods on to the retailer, and by the retailer trying to sell them to the housewife. She will be told that the government of Canada is behind that product. This is the argument that will be used: "You cannot go wrong in buying this, because posted here on the shelf is a government certificate which says this is the best you can buy." That is what it will be interpreted to mean, because the housewife will not walk over to the shelf and read it in order to find that it only says the salmon is firm, fresh and well packed. She will take the word of the retailer for it; she will think it is the best salmon because the retailer says so. Then when she gets it home and opens is and finds it to be a lower grade, though still fresh, firm and well packed, what will she think? It will not be what she thought she was buying; it will be the $5 stuff instead of the $19 stuff, and that will lessen sales instead of increasing them. She will say, "This government inspection thing is all a joke; this is not the kind of salmon we have been getting at all." It will be a detriment instead of an advantage.

I might give a true incident out of my own experience, which occurred after I was married and came out from the old country. I suppose we possessed the ordinary intelligence of people of the old country, accustomed to bright red salmon and knowing nothing of the food values of the lower grades. We bought a tin or two of salmon and found the contents, instead of being red, to be a dirty white colour tinged with pink at the edges. I do not mean that it was unclean or that its food values were not comparatively high, but it was a dirty looking product. It looked unpalatable, and we jumped to the conclusion that it was off quality. We were suspicious and very afraid, so we thought we would try it on the cat, that if it did not kill the cat it would be all right for us. It did not seem to hurt the cat at all, but then we remembered that a cat is supposed to have nine lives, and we thought perhaps we had not exhausted them all. If we fed the cat enough salmon to demonstrate on all the nine lives we would have no salmon left; and if the cat then died we would be out both the cat and the salmon, so we threw away the salmon. I have no doubt that being a Canadian cat, and possessed of more sense or at least more knowledge than we had, it went around the corner, dug up the salmon and had a fine time eating it.

That illustrates how a person who knows nothing of the substantial food values contained in these lower grades may be led away. I find on page 36 of a market report issued by the department some months ago the following words:

Retailers express the opinion that the grade and quality of canned salmon should be clearly marked on all labels. It was even suggested that labels should distinguish between early and late pack.

There is some little advantage in the one as against the other.

What is the remedy? It is very simple one. We already have the word "Canada" on the tin, and I would suggest that we put the word "choice" and then the name of the variety. Then we would have on the tin "Canada choice sockeye" or "Canada standard sockeye," whatever the grade might be. There is further authority for that in section 15 of the fish regulations, which provides:

British Columbia salmon when packed in cans shall be designated as follows:

I will not take time to read the five designations which are mentioned one by one. The name of each is given, together with the kind of salmon that may be included under that grade. It is provided elsewhere in the act that British Columbia salmon shall be designated; here is a designation ready to hand, and we only have to use that designation and put one of those five names on the tin, coupled with the word "choice" or the word "standard" as the case may be. Then the housewife will know she is getting what she pays for; she will know she is getting a grade of salmon certified by the government, and she will get the grade that suits her purse and her inclination. If she buys sockeye she will know she is getting the best salmon she can buy, and if she buys one of the lower grades, which some people think equally good but which are not so nice to look at, she knows she will get the best or second best quality of that particular grade.

We come now to the inspection board which is constituted under order in council P.C. 724. This marks a very unusual departure from custom and everything else. In all our legislation I cannot recall a similar instance. These salmon are to be inspected, and this order in council, together with the one I mentioned previously, provides that the inspectors are to be appointed and paid by the people whose product they inspect. They may come around and condemn $20,000 or $30,000 worth of a man's product, in fulfilment of the duty they owe the government, but they are to be nominated—and that means appointed—and paid by the men with whose business they may possibly seriously interfere. Does that condition obtain in any other industry in Canada? Do the coal operators appoint the inspectors to go around their mines and say, "This is dangerous; you must spend a thousand dollars here," and so on? What would be thought if we found the coal operators nominating and paying the coal mine inspectors? It is the same with every industry. Do you find the poultrymen nominating and paying the egg inspectors? Do you find that in the dairy industry or the canned goods business? In all these cases the government appoints and pays the inspectors. In the old days, when we had the inspection of canneries, which is along the line of what I am discussing to-night, that inspection was carried on by government inspectors selected by the Civil Service Commission and paid by the government, and that work was done free of charge. To those who like to go to the United States for precedents I may say that the United States inspection of canned salmon is carried on by government paid inspectors.

I am not much for precedent; I do not believe in saying that we must adhere to all the practices of the past, but surely when we are making a new departure we should be governed by experience and common sense. These things ought to teach us what to do. In this case we are going to have this mysterious hybrid official appointed to serve the government—that is supposedly his duty—but in reality he is appointed and paid by the canners. I do not know anything else in nature that would correspond to this situation unless perhaps it is a mule, of which it is said that he has neither pride of ancestry nor hope of posterity. Whose servant is the inspector going to be? To whom does he owe loyalty? There is an old saying that he who pays the piper calls the tune. Is not that true? Is it not human nature? If the canners are so anxious to appoint these men and to pay them then I submit it would be far better to leave the matter to them and to call it a canners' inspection. It would be much better to do that because the canners, realizing that the obligation was theirs, would say, "There is no use in our having this system for which we shall have to pay unless we decide to jack up one another so that we can keep up to the mark." But now they have no responsibility, because they can put it on the government, and if they can get by with it, so much the better for them. If we are going to call it government inspection, let us have it really so.

Consider the wholesaler in Britain—because competition is keen—being solicited by one of our Canadian representatives who is anxious to sell salmon. He says, "Buy my salmon because it is government-certificated." Naturally the wholesaler is impressed; and when the agent for Soviet salmon or the agent for Japanese salmon comes along, the wholesaler says, "I prefer to buy Canadian salmon because I know it is certificated by the government and therefore I know what I am getting when the Canadian government is behind it." But the Soviet agent, or the Japanese, says to him, "Quite so; but do you know that these inspectors are nominated and paid by the canners themselves?" Well, what sort of appeal will that make to the wholesaler?

I doubt very much whether it is legal, and I should like to have the opinon of the Justice department on the question. They are putting in the regulations provision for a heavy charge, but there is no power in the act to do so, and you cannot put into regulations something for which you have no authority in the act itself. There is no power to impose a tax or a fine or a charge, whatever you chose to call it. Why pick out this one industry in Canada for a regulation of this kind?

I want to emphasize in all sincerity my belief that the three men recently picked out by the canners and appointed by the government are first class men in every respect. Never on them would fall the least shadow of wrongdoing or suspicion of favouritism. So that I am not objecting at all to the men themselves. But there is a principle involved. We might say that to-day we have a very efficient Minister of Finance; therefore let us pass a law declaring that he shall be Minister of Finance and his children after him; he has never done anything wrong and is never likely to, so that we might make his appointment perpetual. No one would think of such an appointment, and in this matter the method of selection is equally wrong. These men are brokers. It is provided in the order in council that they must be brokers of ten years' standing, accustomed to handling and selling fish, and the present appointees are O.K. But what about the future? To all intents and purposes these men are political appointees, and does anyone anticipate that forever, down the avenue of time, political appointees will always be as good as these three men? The chances are against it. Remember that these men are permitted to go about their ordinary business; they do not give up their business in order to attend to this work but are allowed to continue the buying and selling of salmon on commission. They are engaged in a brokerage business, and human nature, after all, is human nature. I do not, therefore, claim any superiority of outlook for fishery inspectors over what one would expect to find in the ordinary run of Canadian citizens. They may be a little better inasmuch as they live in British Columbia, where we have a high standard of ideals as compared with the older and more effete eastern provinces. But after all, the people in that province are just as much subject to human influences as are people anywhere else; and I say that the man who is preferred will sooner or later—not to-day but perhaps in years to come—show preference in return. I am not suggesting that he will pass as No. 1 fish any fish which he knows to be rotten; not at all. He won't do that. Indeed, in his anxiety to be fair he might even lean a little the other way and condemn fish which he should not condemn and after all that is just as unfair as passing fish that should be condemned. The irrestible temptation, however, would be for him to give the preference to his friends. Suppose a certain canner has worked hard to get me appointed; when he comes to have his salmon inspected he will tell the chief supervisor, "I should like Mr. So and So to do my inspecting," and being human myself I would naturally give him the preference. Somebody else who had not pulled for me would certainly take second place—and speed means a great deal in these inspections. Even supposing that these men are a combination of the Virgin Mary and the Angel Gabriel, and therefore not open to such suggestions; the fact remains that it leaves the door open to disgruntled people with a grudge—and such people always exist—to say that there is unfairness. Someone would be inclined to say, "If I were a personal friend of the inspector, I could have got my stuff inspected sooner." St. Paul once enjoined us to abstain from all appearance of evil, and you are just inviting the suggestion of favouritism when you provide that the inspectors shall be appointed by the very men whose business they are paid to investigate and possibly condemn, perhaps to the extent of thousands of dollars.

I come now to the method of payment. It is to be a cent a case. The last year of the government record—page 94 of the blue book—shows that there were 2,221,733 cases, which at a cent a case represents $22,000. Now, the board appointed by this order in council is to consist of three men—just three men, that is all—and if you divide $22,000 by 3 it gives them $7,400 apiece. And remember, they are not to be interfered with in the prosecution of their ordinary business. This is just a little extra on the side—$7,400 each. This is one of the complaints I make, and it has been endorsed by more than one canner, that there should not be three but at least five. I do not wish to misrepresent anything. The order in council makes provision for the appointment of two extra men should occasion arise, so as to bring the board up to five. Well, suppose there were five: the $22,000 divided amongst five would mean $4,400 each. Is not that enough, in addition to their ordinary business? Surely it should be sufficient to induce them to undertake this extra work. You must remember too that the season is a very short one, because this work has to be rushed within a few months and it is all-important that it should be done speedily. It may be said that these two men, together with the three present appointees, will constitute the board of five. They do not. The board should be five, it is true, but it is not five, and there is no use drawing a herring across the trail by suggesting that it will be five. The extra two will be called in only should the board, consisting of three, deem it necessary to have assistance. But what I might think necessary when I am in a hurry to get my salmon passed, and what the board of three might regard as necessary under the same circumstances, are two different things altogether; because the board, being paid by the case, will try as far as reasonably possible to do all the business themselves. This is obvious: it is much better to get $7,400 than $4,400. But much of the benefit of inspection depends upon prompt action—at least the benefit to the canners. I repeat, it is a very short season and the inspection must be done quickly. As you know, many of these cannery men are running on close margin; they are being carried by the banks. I have seen a man waiting with a motor car ready, at the very moment that the last case of salmon was packed into the car and the door shut and sealed—we did not need an order in council to do it—rushing to get the railwayman to sign the bill of lading, and then speeding up to the bank with the bill of lading, to make good a draft that had already been obtained. It is absolutely necessary that there be a sufficient number of men to do this quickly. The government should pay and control the inspectors as it does in other industries. The department was created two or three years ago to foster the fishing industry; it certainly was not created to hurt it. The sales tax has been increased, a duty has been put on tin which has hurt the industry without benefiting the tin man because his factory is in the middle of Canada, so why burden the industry with another $22,000? No other industry has to bear a burden of this kind. In addition to all this, the industry undergoes heavy taxation in other ways, such as licence fees, case taxes, and so on.

I shall deal with the arguments which no doubt will be raised against my contention. It will be argued that the cannery men are agreeable to these regulations, that they were consulted and were unanimous. If a meeting is held of 500 people and they are asked if they are in favour of good government, everyone would say yes, but if you ask them what they consider to be good government, there will be 499 different methods given for achieving that end. That is the situation which exists in this case. There were 60 canneries in operation last year, and I should like to know how many were represented at the meeting. I should like to know if they were really unanimous, because I have certain knowledge that some were not present. They agreed to the general principle, but who would not? There is no doubt it is a highly desirable thing, but there are differences of opinion as to the methods of carrying it out. I could quote the opinions of a couple of cannery men, but I shall not take the time. I have in my hand a copy of the draft proposal made some months ago by the canneries, also a copy of what was proposed and submitted to them and copies of the orders in council which were passed. The three documents do not agree; there is a difference of opinion on substantial points. What is it about which the cannery men are said to be unanimous? Was it their own views, as expressed in their memorial; was it those submitted to them, and which have since been changed, or was it the provisions of the orders in council? The cannery men may not as yet have seen these orders in council, or if they have, it is only just recently.

[Mr. Neill.]

Even supposing the cannery men were unanimous, which they were not, what about it? Two or three years ago this house, the pension officials and the pension commission were all agreed that we had the very last word in pension legislation. We acclaimed the fact that we had at least settled a difficult problem, but what happened? In less than ten months it was found that this was not the last word in legislation, that it did not work out as all of us hoped it would. It is possible to be unanimous about what you do not thoroughly understand, and the cannery men should be given an opportunity to consider this matter. They may be unanimously in favour of inspection, but have they been advised by their lawyers and managers as to the effect of these regulations?

Another argument which will no doubt be used is that even though this may not be exactly right, it should be tried out for a year. This is a new departure, something which we do not make very often, and it should be started right. It will be a lot easier to start right than to retrace our steps later on.

Let me summarize in a few sentences the points to which I wish to call attention.

In the first place, there are too few inspectors to do justice to the cannery men who must have prompt inspection. There are too few inspectors to obviate the suggestion of favouritism. If an inspector condemns a large portion of a man's pack he should have the right of appeal to a board consisting of more than three men. Secondly, the only provision for the condemning of fish is in connection with reconditioned fish which is then seen to be unfit for human food. Thirdly, the words "second quality" should not be permitted to appear on the can, as it would kill the sale of a perfectly good article of food. If this item is insisted on, it will put a heavy handicap upon the cannery men. Fourth, as the government certificate will be taken to mean that the article is of the very best, there may be a misapprehension on the part of the customer. The salmon should be rated as being "standard" or "choice" of a particular named variety, of which there are only five. Lastly, the system of having inspectors appointed and paid by the cannery men should be done away with.

It will be said that this is destructive criticism, but I state again that I have nothing but approval for the principle of inspection. However, I want to see it a workable system, and the cannery men do also. I am quite willing that my remarks in connection with these particular orders in council should be considered as destructive criticism. We do not need an architect in this case, we need a wrecker. A sound edifice cannot be built on a rotten foundation—let us wreck the rotten foundation and start to build an edifice which will be a benefit to the industry and a credit to the department. The regulations do not go into effect until June 1 and there is time for reconsideration. They should be explained to the cannery men so that their viewpoint may be obtained, and then an effort made to evolve a workable system. If necessary it could be left over until another year has passed. There will not be much bad salmon put up this year because economic conditions will make such a practice unprofitable. You get such a miserably low, cut-throat price for the very best grade that it would never pay to put up a bad grade—you would have to give something away with the tin as well. There is not much danger of the fish not being good quality this year.

I have endeavoured to keep away from any factious or political criticism, I simply want this matter considered. I am glad to see the former minister present in the chamber; he understands the fishing industry, and if he will look into the matter I shall be satisfied with his decision.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Maloney in the chair.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

To provide for expenses connected with the administration of Indian affairs, including salaries, supplies, relief, medical attendance, hospitalization, dwellings, agricultural activities, surveys, roads, bridges, irrigation, dyking, education, etc., and a grant of $100,000 approved by parliament in the session of 1926-27, $3,873,000.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I shall not take up much of the time of the committee, but I have a little story to tell. The incident to which I shall refer after three centuries of so-called civilization, is almost as cruel and appalling as those which took place during the days of Indian warfare. I do not intend to be hard upon the minister because he was kind enough the other day to give me some information, but it is my intention to try to prevent a bad appointment being made by the Civil Service Commission. I refer to the appointment of an Indian agent at Cacouna. On September 23 of last year the following letter was sent to the department, addressed to the minister:

(Personal.)

My Dear Sir:

I herewith enclose a sworn declaration signed by Mr. Omer Dube, ex-candidate in the last provincial election, who complains of political interference on the part of Mr. Jos. Berube, agent for the Indians, at Cacouna, Témiscouata county.

Would you please be good enough to authorize an investigation to be held as to this man's conduct during this last election.

Mr. Alphonse Garon, advocate of Rimouski, is appointed investigator for this district for these cases.

With thanks for your kind attention, I am,

Yours respectfully,

Chas. Eug. Dube.

There is no other letter from that gentleman in the returns tabled in the house. The files have been carefully combed and conscientiously weeded, and following the example of one of the most famous naturalists, Cuvier, who with a single tooth of a prehistoric monster reconstituted its skeleton, I shall try to do the same thing with this case. I wonder if the minister will be kind enough to let me see the original of the letter which was signed by the gentleman and which appears on the file. I hope he will have no objection to doing so later on. With that letter is sent this affidavit, which is very curious:

Riviere du Loup,
September 10, 1931.

I, the undersigned, Omer Dube, of Cacouna, solemnly declare that on the 9th of August, while I was candidate in the provincial election contest—

Note those words.

—I saw Joseph Berube, Indian agent at Cacouna, indulge in political partisanship, and he has even, to the knowledge of a great number of electors at St. J. B. of Isle Verte, with other persons upset the hustings on which I was, as candidate—

Note those words.

—addressing the crowd which was present.

(Sgd.) Omer Dube,
Ex-Candidate.

Sworn before me—

And so forth. Note this again, Mr. Chairman: he called himself a genuine Liberal candidate. It was in virtue of an affidavit given by a so-called Liberal candidate and transmitted to the department by a well known Conservative candidate that the investigation was ordered. But the real fact is that this man has never been a candidate, either Conservative or Liberal, because he has never made in any election the deposit required by law. This is the only publication that he issued during the last provincial election. I am sorry I have no English translation, but I shall read it in French and I am sure the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and all those who understand French will have a hearty laugh at it:

To the electors of Témiscouata North. I have the intention to canvass your votes as a candidate in this county. Last Sunday, at St-Jean-Baptiste de l'Isle-Verte, I was stoned, pelted with stones, so much so that I ascended to Heaven like Elijah in his chariot of fire; until suddenly, I was crowned by the sun's glorious rays, likewise shall I be crowned at sunset on August 24.

I give warning to my opponents that I shall carry on an honest and courteous fight.

Awaiting the evening of August 24.

J. P. O. Dubé,
Straight Liberal Candidate,
Cacouna.

The fact is that he was not a candidate at all. The matter was taken very seriously by the department, and the private secretary to the minister wrote to the Deputy Superintendent General on November 20, 1931, that ample time should be given Mr. Dubé in order that he might make arrangements for the attendance of witnesses and the holding of the investigation. He said:

I am enclosing the letter addressed to the minister by Mr. Dube, as well as an affidavit completed by Mr. Omer Dube. These may be helpful to the commissioner.

A euphemism for "executioner." He went out with a tomahawk and he was on the warpath. Then the deputy minister writes to the minister that time, not ample, should be given to make the investigation. I am very sorry that the minister acted on the letter that was sent to him, because a man who has not made a deposit in an election is not a candidate. The investigation disclosed some very amusing things. First of all, it was held on December 4, 1931, and a witness said that the agent had discussed politics in favour of the Liberal party with another person in the store. The agent at the same time is a chauffeur. This will explain something that comes immediately after. According to a letter that I received from his attorney at the investigation, what he spoke about when he discussed politics was a conversation about the price of butter during the election of 1930. If he was wrong then, I do not see why the Prime Minister and all his supporters should not be impeached. If it is a crime to speak of butter, that is perhaps the reason why all the Conservative members were silent while the butter provision was placed in the New Zealand treaty the other day. Everything has an explanation. Apparently it was a crime for him to say that the price of butter was low, but he was only repeating what the leader of the Conservative party had said on every platform in this country. He was blamed for something else, for having made a bet on the result of the election. This was in 1926 and the bet was made after the poll was closed so that it could not have influenced any voter. Someone had offered to bet and he made a bet, but the poll was closed. As I said, the man was a chauffeur and they blamed him for having driven a voter on the polling day to Bic, in Rimouski county. He was asked by the father-in-law of the voter, who was a Conservative, to drive his son-in-law to Bic in another constituency quite far from there in order that he should not be in Cacouna, Temiscouata county, on the polling day. No one could blame him for that. As a chauffeur he was paid for the trip; nevertheless he was accused of political partisanship on that account. He was simply earning money.

Then there is a complaint from the so-called Liberal candidate who was supposed to have gone to heaven. I cannot say, whether, according to the circular I have just read, he was supposed to go to heaven like the prophet Elijah, when they raised the hustings which fell—a very unfortunate incident. In the report of the investigation there was a note that I find in every report of Mr. Caron, the investigator, to the effect that the accused man did not think fit to make himself heard; so he was guilty. That is contrary to all principles of British fair play and justice.

I have something to ask the minister and I am sure he is fair enough to give me a favourable reply. That investigation took place in the month of November, and on January 13, the Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs wrote thus to Mr. Bérubé:

I beg to advise you that under the authority of an order of His Excellency the Governor General in council of the 8th instant, your services as Indian agent, grade 2, Cacouna agency in the province of Quebec, are dispensed with on account of political partisanship. I wired you to-day to this effect.

Yours very truly,
Duncan C. Scott.

Another letter was sent to him bearing the same date, January 13, as follows:

Dear Sir:

With further reference to my letter to you of to-day advising you that under the authority of an order of His Excellency the Governor General in council of the 8th instant, your services as Indian agent, grade 2, Cacouna agency, Que., are dispensed with, I have to say that the order in council states that they are dispensed with as from the first day of January, 1932.

It had a retroactive effect; it was like the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act—peace, order and good government. He acted as agent until the first of February, at which time another appointment was made. Very naturally he asked for his salary for the month of January. Then, on February 13 Mr. A. F. MacKenzie, the secretary of the department, wrote as follows:

In reply to your letter of the 6th instant, I beg to refer you to letter of the 13th ultimo, and to say that as order in council No. 3 of the 8th ultimo states that your services were dispensed with as from January 1, 1932, the department cannot pay you salary for January.

That, of course, was too late for a Christmas gift. What is due, however, should be paid, and I am now asking the minister if he will be kind enough to see to it that the salary for the month of January is paid. At a later time I shall have something further to say.

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Superintendent General of Indian Affairs): Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the hon. member has completed his remarks in regard to this matter. In reply to his question concerning the salary, I may say I know of no provision whereby Mr. Berube can be paid a salary for the month of January when the order in council dispensing with his services was passed to take effect December 31, or January 1.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry, but I shall have to continue my remarks.

An hon. MEMBER: So am I.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, you may as well take it with a smile. Then followed some correspondence between the deputy minister and the Civil Service Commission asking for the advertisement of the agency. Finally, on February 9, posters were sent out, and on the same date the secretary of the Civil Service Commission wrote to the deputy minister as follows:

It will be appreciated if you will have this competition brought to the attention of any temporary employee who may desire to compete.

The answer of the deputy minister on February 10 was as follows:

I beg to advise you that pending a permanent appointment in the position, Indian agent, grade 2, Cacouna, Quebec, as a result of the competition now pending, it has been necessary to employ an agent temporarily as the services of Mr. Berube, were discontinued immediately on receipt of order in council P.C. 3 of the 8th ultimo. We have engaged Mr. Alexis Michaud under the thirty-day clause. His services began on the first instant. I am enclosing his application also requisition, and would ask that you issue a temporary certificate in his favour.

On February 12 the deputy minister again wrote to the Civil Service Commission as follows:

I beg to advise you that we are informed by Mr. Alexis Michaud who is now temporarily employed as Indian agent, Cacouna agency, Quebec, that his is desirous of being a candidate for permanent appointment. As I know that the applications are received by you up to the 22nd instant and it may not be possible for him to fill an application before that date, it is desired that the application forwarded you with my letter of the 10th instant requesting temporary certificate for him, be transferred to the competition.

It does not appear that after that any application was sent by Michaud to the Civil Service Commission. Michaud's first application, including the signature, was in handwriting, and was declared at Cacouna on January 15, 1932, before the mayor of Riviere du Loup. The document may have been declared worthless by the department, because all in the department know that although municipal officials may have jurisdiction to act as justices of the peace, they cannot so act outside of the municipalities in which they are mayors or councillors.

An answer to one of the returns gives the following information:

When competition 21818 was advertised Michaud entered application with the Civil Service Commission.

He made that application on January 15, and on February 9, three weeks later, the position was advertised. The right answer to the return would have been:

After the competition was advertised Michaud entered his application.

And not—

When the competition was advertised Michaud entered his application.

That application was received at Ottawa by the Civil Service Commission on February 18, 1932.

The second application, a requisition for temporary employment, was sworn to at Riviere du Loup on January 21, 1932, before the same gentleman who made the recommendation to the department. It was forwarded by the Deputy Minister of Indian Affairs to the secretary of the Civil Service Commission, together with a covering letter dated February 10, 1932, which I have read, and which was received by the Civil Service Commission on February 11, 1932.

I am sorry the Postmaster General is not in his seat, but I should like to say that an application was made on January 15 and was received in Ottawa only three weeks after, or on February 18. It seems to me that is a long time for a letter to come from Cacouna to Ottawa. It would take no longer for a letter to go to the south pole or to the ends of the earth. Usually the service of the department of the Postmaster General is much better than that. The other application took more than a fortnight to reach the Civil Service Commission, namely, from January 21 to February 11. There is something very strange about this affair. The fact is that the temporary certificate for Michaud was sent by the Civil Service Commission on February 29, and had a retroactive effect to February 1. Bérubé could not be paid, although he was informed only in the middle of January, and had received no notice from the department before the middle of January, that his dismissal had taken effect. Until the end of the month he had to fulfil his duties as Indian agent, no other appointment having been made. The circumstances in the case of Michaud are somewhat different. The certificate was issued on February 29 for the month of February and also for the month of March. It would seem that he was luckier than the other chap.

I asked the following question:

On whose recommendation did the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs temporarily appoint Mr. Alexis Michaud as Indian agent at Cacouna, Quebec?

The answer to that question was:

Mr. Michaud was appointed as temporary Indian agent at Cacouna on instructions of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs.

I was under the impression that he had been recommended by someone who had known of the vacancy before it was advertised. To my great surprise I received a few days ago the following letter from the gentleman who had sworn to Michaud's application. It is as follows:

Vous auriez mieux fait de m'écrire et je n'aurais eu aucune objection à vous renseigner.

The English would be:

You should have written to me, and I would have had no objection to giving you the information.

This communication was signed by the gentleman who has the patronage for the Tory party in my constituency. When I asked for information the minister hesitated in giving it to me. As a consequence I would have to write to Riviere du Loup, to that gentleman, to get the information my good friend the minister is supposed to supply. I should think, after the letter I sent to the minister, he would have had no objection to making me familiar with the whole case.

I asked for a copy of all the correspondence, telegrams, petitions and applications exchanged between all persons of Temiscouata county on the one hand and the ministers and officials of the federal government on the other since August, 1930, about the position of Indian agent at Cacouna. The return was brought down containing no papers from Temiscouata with the exception of the applications forwarded to the Civil Service Commission. The report of Mr. MacKenzie, the secretary of the Department of Indian Affairs, reads as follows:

March 30, 1932.

As requested I visited Riviere du Loup early in March and interviewed four candidates for the position of Indian agent, Cacouna:

John Dunnigan,
David Lebel,
Alexis Michaud,
Cleophas J. Sirois.

These men all have fair qualifications, are of good standing in the community, and it is really hard to make much distinction.

This is very nice. It sounds like honey, maple syrup and Gobeil's preserves.

The present incumbent, Mr. Michaud, is in my opinion qualified to carry on the work; in fact he has done so with reasonable satisfaction since February 1st.

Reasonable satisfaction is something less than ordinary satisfaction, but it has been so drafted probably because he had been appointed agent temporarily.

The Indians, however, object to his appointment on the ground that he lives about two miles from the village.

The Indians had to wear their moccasins and snowshoes to visit him two miles away; on the other hand, it was quite troublesome for him to go down to the village in his feather headdress, wearing his wampum belt and all the insignia of his great office.

I might also say that his knowledge of English is very limited; the other three candidates are much more competent in that respect. I do not know, however, that this might be considered much of a drawback as the locality is distinctly French-Canadian. Mr. Michaud found it necessary to speak to me through an interpreter, not being sure enough of his English.

He is the only man against whom there are any serious objections, because, as Mr. MacKenzie says, the other men are all "of good standing in the community, and it is really hard to make much distinction." The whole trouble is that the worst man has been appointed temporary agent, and this is what I protest against. I have no interest in the matter, because nearly all four candidates heckled me at my meetings and voted against me. I stand up to-night for the public interest in order that the Indians may be well looked after, and this can only be done by choosing the best man for the position. But may I tell the minister that the appointment will be temporary, because I take this opportunity of advising him and his colleagues also that with respect to all those whom they have dismissed for what in their eyes is the mortal sin of political partisanship I will see to it that in some way or another they are reinstated when my party comes into power again. So the "permanent" employee will be only a temporary employee until after the next election. Mr. MacKenzie continues:

Mr. Sirois would be a very competent man but he runs an hotel during the summer season and there is objection on this score.

The trouble is Mr. MacKenzie says that Mr. Sirois runs an hotel during the summer season, while Mr. Sirois himself says that he ran an hotel in years gone by. He contends there is no objection now because he is no longer in the business. In fact in his statement he says he was glad to employ Indian waiters while he was keeping an hotel. It gave a picturesque touch in the old days when he was doing so well as host. Mr. MacKenzie adds:

He is also away considerably during the rest of the year in his capacity as a commercial traveller. This absence accounts for his not signing his application for the position, it having been prepared in his absence by his wife.

He speaks very good English, and his wife also speaks very good English. She could very well look after the Indians while he is away.

An hon. MEMBER: Are they Conservatives?

Mr. POULIOT: They are all good Conservatives, so my choice would be very embarrassing. I am not blaming the minister. I am confident he does not know the qualifications of the man he appointed. He was simply recommended to him without any reason at all. Now, there is another good man:

Mr. David Label would be quite competent and lives near the village. His father was a former Indian agent. He has a good command of English and French and knows the Indians well.

Well, if it was not his father it was his uncle; anyway, it was in the family. If he gets the job the wampum belt will come back again as a family trophy. Here is something in the report that I regret very much. Mr. MacKenzie says:

Mr. Dunnigan did not impress me so favourably. He has had little business experience.

Mr. Dunnigan is a studious gentleman and is familiar with French and English. He writes and speaks both languages well, and in fact he is a perfect bilinguist.

Mr. COTNAM: Is he a Tory?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, he is a Conservative, and the next time you see him you will like him. He is a very nice gentleman for whom I have great respect. I like him a little more than my hon. friend from North Renfrew (Mr. Cotnam) because he is not so noisy; he is a wise and undemonstrative gentleman. Not one of these gentlemen voted for me. Mr. Dunnigan is a good man; Mr. Lebel is a good man; Mr. Sirois is a good man; Mr. Michaud is not a good candidate. Unfortunately the one chosen does not speak English and is also objected to by the Indians, because he lives too far from them.

The last paragraph of Mr. MacKenzie's report is very strange:

My recommendation would be in favour of either Mr. Michaud or Mr. Lebel.

There are three good men and one bad man, and one good man and the bad man are recommended while the other two good men are left aside. I cannot understand that. If Sirois, Lebel or Dunnigan had been recommended, I would not have spoken to-night, but instead of that Michaud was recommended.

Now let us take up the Civil Service Commission. I suppose they have read the file, but they have not seen Mr. Sirois, Mr. Lebel, Mr. Dunnigan or Mr. Michaud. Having seen them, the secretary of the department says that the two best men are Mr. Michaud and Mr. Lebel. This is unfair, and I hope the minister will see to it that either Mr. Sirois, who is very well qualified, or Mr. Lebel, who told a little fib in saying that his father was a former agent, instead of his uncle, or Mr. Dunnigan, of whom it was wrongly said he had little business experience, is chosen by the commission on the recommendation of the department. May I say here that I regret very much that no representative of the Civil Service Commission examined these men. All they had to go on was the recommendation of the department. Mr. MacKenzie stayed at the Victoria Hotel, near the station in Riviere du Loup, and the candidates had to meet him there. I wonder if there was not a nigger in the Indian woodpile, who then said to Mr. MacKenzie, "Give a chance to Lebel, who is my most intimate friend. The others will not know that I have recommended him, and the minister is very discreet. He does not leave many letters in the files coming from Temiscouata county. I can trust him, and I think I can trust you to give a chance to my good friend Lebel, even if it is at the expense of the others. They will know nothing about it, and the Civil Service Commission will be blamed for making the appointment. I can say to Mr. Dunnigan or Mr. Sirois that I regret very much that they cannot be appointed, but I can say the Civil Service Commission appointed Lebel." I do not state that to be what happened, but I think that is the presumption.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: Let me state what I want carried. To sum up, here we have an Indian agency. The former agent was dismissed after an investigation, on the sworn affidavit of a so-called candidate, a gentleman who really has not been a candidate in any election in this country since confederation, and who is much too young to have been a candidate at the time of confederation. In the first place the investigation was not justified, but when it did take place what was discovered? It was stated that the former agent had made a bet, after the polls were closed, which could not have influenced any voter, and as a matter of fact he was provoked to do so by one of the candidates. Then it was stated that he talked politics, that he said the price of butter was low. Perhaps he said that to a farmer who wanted a higher price for his butter. That was held to be political partisanship. Then it was said he acted as chauffeur and drove a Conservative voter to another constituency. He was paid for his trip, but he was blamed for that. Certainly those were not good reasons for dismissing him. He cannot be reinstated now until after the next general election, but in the meantime I have great sympathy for the poor Indians. They must be looked after by someone who is able to speak both languages, and the agent must not live too far away, otherwise the Indians will wear out their moccasins and the department will find it very expensive to buy new moccasins and new snowshoes all the time.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: No; I have not yet stated my case. The minister is fair minded and I know he has been deceived. If he had known what I have been telling him I am sure Michaud would not have been appointed temporary agent. But I did not want to impose on the minister by recommending anyone, and in any case it is not my duty to do so. What I want to-night is to prevent the minister from making another faux pas. I cannot be more in favour of one of the candidates than another, because according to an official of the department, three are good and Michaud is not so good. To sum up, I wonder if the minister would be kind enough to let me know if the appointments will be made soon by the Civil Service Commission, and if he would be favourable to either Mr. Sirois, Mr. Dunnigan or Mr. Lebel rather than Mr. Michaud?

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. gentleman asked as to the appointment of the agent, but a sentence or two before that he stated that the appointment was made by the Civil Service Commission. He should direct his question to the body who will make the appointment.

Mr. POULIOT: I will send them a copy of Hansard.

Mr. VENIOT: I wish to direct the attention of the minister to one or two matters having to do with Indian reservations in the province of New Brunswick. The first case to which I would direct attention is that of Burnt Church, in Northumberland county, where a change was made in December of 1930 in the person furnishing supplies to the Indians. At that time supplies were furnished at a point within a mile or so of the reservation. Now the Indians have to travel twenty-five miles for their supplies, and I wish the minister would look into that matter.

The next complaint that has been sent to me with regard to the Indians has to do with Big Cove, in the county of Kent, where formerly the Indians obtained their supplies within a mile of the reservation. They now have to travel nine miles, and it is a hardship because these Indians have no horses. In some cases they have to hire horses in order to get to the store where the supplies are given out. I have in mind the case of one Indian whom it cost $12 during the winter to get his supplies. The store at Rexton, where the Indians obtain their supplies, will not send in those goods, according to my information, unless they have a large order which will warrant their sending it in by team. This should not continue. These Indians should not have to pay their own money, especially in these hard times, to get supplies to their homes. I know it is not the intention of the department and I wish they would look into the matter. Another point to which I would direct the attention of the minister and ask for some explanation is this. I put a question on the order paper asking what firms had sold supplies to the Department of Indian Affairs for Indian reservations in the province of New Brunswick in 1930-31. The department laid on the table a reply giving names for 1930-31 and I find on page 4 of the return that the name of Howard Brothers Limited appears as having supplied the Indians in 1931.

Mr. MURPHY: What is the name?

Mr. VENIOT: Howard Brothers of Sussex. A letter from Messrs. Howard Brothers to me states that they gave no supplies in 1931. The last they gave were in August 1930 and they were then notified that they would no longer be required to furnish supplies. They got their cheque for the August supplies in September, but they appear on this list as having supplied in 1931. I would ask the minister to look into this matter. Perhaps it is an error in copying, but at any rate they requested me to bring the matter to the attention of the minister and I replied that I would do so when the estimates were under consideration.

Mr. NICHOLSON: This item now before the house provides for expenses in connection with the administration of Indian Affairs, including salaries, supplies, relief, medical attendance, hospitalization, and so forth, and there is a reduction of $853,600 as compared with last year. I am wondering whether, in making up this estimate, the department is fully alive to the condition of the Indians in a large part of the country. I speak particularly with regard to the Indians on the great lakes between what is recognized as the Ottawa river district and the boundary line of Manitoba. In this regard, I would say that unless some steps are taken and taken at an early date to provide the Indians with some means by which they can earn their own livelihood, then every Indian in that entire district will have to be provided for in food and clothing. Last year I called the attention of the minister and of the department to what I considered to be the necessity for some arrangement being made between the federal department and the provinces by which the right of the Indians to the natural means of earning their living—that is, taking furbearing animals—would be restored to them.

For more than forty years I have watched the development of the Indians throughout that great country and have noticed a gradual rise in their standards of living, up until perhaps eight or ten years ago, since when they have been virtually driven out by a class of white trapper who has no regard for any law that any government can place on the statute books with regard to the conservation or the preservation of animal life in this country, until the Indian has been reduced to absolute pauperism. That is particularly true during this period of economic stress, when it is impossible for the Indians to get employment as guides or in ordinary vocations in the woods or with mining companies or anywhere else. They have been deprived of their own natural means of livelihood and they cannot compete with the white man in the only available avenues of ordinary work now open to anyone. Consequently, unless some steps are taken and taken quickly to provide them with some opportunity to make their own living, the department is faced with two things: Either they will have to watch the Indians starving to death or they will have to provide completely for their sustenance and clothing.

It is impossible to describe the desperate condition some of the Indians are in throughout that country. I cannot speak of other parts of Canada except from what I have gathered from persons with whom I am associated in connection with some of the work carried on amongst the Indians. But in all that country designated as northern Ontario and the watershed of Hudson bay, the Indians have now been reduced to such a state that the Department of Indian Affairs must do something for them or they will starve. They are going down and down. The inroads of tuberculosis, to which they are naturally subject, especially in their present undernourished condition, are so great among them that the Indians will disappear; and as I have said on one or two occasions in this house before, if there is any class of people anywhere for whom the Canadian nation is responsible, it is the native races of this country. I therefore urge upon the minister that a vigorous, determined effort be made without further delay to arrive at some arrangement between the federal government and the provinces, by which the Indians will have restored to them the exclusive right of taking fur-bearing animals.

Having given a lot of thought and study to the question, I say that the matter of conservation in relation to the fur-bearing animals and game birds of Canada will be at once provided for if the Indian is left in his inherent right of taking the fur-bearing animals in that country. There will be no such thing as wiping them out, as the white trapper does, going in with dynamite and other instruments which serve to destroy the sources of supply. The Indian will conserve the fur-bearing animals and the game birds and animals of the country if he is allowed exclusive jurisdiction and is given his natural, inherent right in this regard. That is the only thing the Indians have left to them, and surely we can provide that they be given that right.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member has mentioned a very real problem in the administration of Indian Affairs. Prior to the building of the Transcontinental railway the Indians inhabiting the northern parts of Ontario and Quebec subsisted, as their ancestors had done, on the products of the chase, and after that railway was built the Indians came from the northerly districts down to the railway and overcame, to a certain degree, their fear, shall I say, of the white man and his civilization, and increasingly they have made their homes along that line of railway. In addition to that, the railway provided necessary facilities whereby the white man who was interested in trapping could gain easier access to that country. Latterly the development of airplane transportation has made it that much easier for the white man to enter that district and denude the country of its game, the natural supply of food for the aborigines.

The hon. member has said that we should take steps to see to it that the natural, inherent right of the Indian to pursue game in these areas should be his. But may I point out to the house that that area is under the jurisdiction and control of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and that the dominion government have no jurisdiction over it, through the Indian department, except as regards those areas which have been set aside as reserves for the Indians, on which they may live and carry on their natural vocations. The department is fully alive to the seriousness of this question. It has not neglected the interests of the Indians, because hospitals have been built at various points along that railway and large sums of money are paid out annually for the maintenance of residential schools for Indian children.

With regard to the preservation or conservation of game, I am happy to be able to tell the committee that during the past winter the province of Quebec passed an order in council which virtually sets aside all that area north of the Transcontinental railway for the exclusive use of the Indians for trapping. At the present time a game commission in Ontario is inquiring into the preservation of game in that province. It may be, and we hope it will be, that that commission's recommendations in connection with the area north of the Transcontinental railway will follow the example set by the government of Quebec. If that is done, no doubt the Indian will be able to take care of himself just as well as did his forebears. The department is faced with difficulties in connection with this part of the country comparable only to the conditions which exist to a lesser degree in the Northwest Territories. I am not prepared to say whether or not the department has been pursuing the right course, but I am prepared to say that it is the policy of the department to endeavour to put the Indian in a position where he can stand upon his own feet and provide himself with the necessities of life.

Mr. NEILL: Has the department made any progress in getting the British Columbia government to carry out the bargain entered into in connection with Indian reserves? I understand an agreement, called the McKenna agreement, was entered into, either in 1917 or 1919, which settled a long-standing dispute with British Columbia. A new survey was to be made of the reserves; where it was found a reserve was too large for the use of the Indians, a certain portion would be given up, and in other cases where fishing sites and the like were needed, extra reserves were to be provided. When this had been done an agreement was entered into with the province of British Columbia under which that province was to deed in fee simple to the dominion all Indian reserves, suspending what is known as the reversionary rights. It was agreed that after that was done the Dominion government would have the control of these reserves and if it should happen that the Indians did not need them, they could be sold, a reasonable arrangement being arrived at as to the disposition of funds so acquired. The disposition of reserves not required was also agreed to.

Many of these reserves were in out of the way places, making the survey difficult, but I understand, that it has been completed for some years and the Dominions government is having difficulty in getting the provincial government to implement its bargain and deed over these reserves. In some cases the Indians want to sell their lands; in other cases the lands are needed for public purposes but everything is being held up because the provincial government seems to be either unwilling or unable to deed over these reserves. Is there any prospect of bringing this matter to a head?

Mr. MURPHY: Some years ago a commission was appointed to inquire into this matter and a report was made whereby certain reserves were contracted in size while others were enlarged. A survey was made following the recommendations of the commission, and that survey is on file. In order to convey undisputed title of these reserves to the Dominion government in trust for the Indians, it is only necessary that an order in council be passed by the British Columbia government.

Mr. NEILL: Why don't they do it?

Mr. MURPHY: That question should properly be addressed to another quarter. For the information of the hon. member I may say that negotiations with British Columbia are now in progress and have been for some time, but up to date they have not been successful.

Mr. REID: Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to a matter in connection with Indians which affects the people of British Columbia, and perhaps affects the people in other provinces. Reference has been made at various times to the fact that the Indians are in a destitute condition, but I intend to refer to the Indian who might be considered as well off. There are some Indians in British Columbia who might even be considered rich and who in many ways have copied the white man, especially in the ownership of motor cars. Many of them have discarded the now ancient pony and have taken to the motor car. Many of these Indians are careless in driving and accidents have occurred where other cars and persons have been damaged. The Indian, being a ward of the government cannot be sued in the courts, and I should like the minister to give some attention to this angle of this question.

Mr. MURPHY: This is the first occasion upon which this matter has been brought to my attention, and I shall be pleased to give it every consideration.

Mr. REID: This matter was brought up last year at the farmers' institute, and I was sent a copy of the resolution passed at that meeting and again at the meeting this year. The feeling is that the Indian is allowed to go free while the white man can be sued.

Mr. HOWDEN: I fancy there is no part of Canada where the Indian is more seriously pressed, particularly in the winter time, than in Manitoba. In the original treaties made with the federal government, I think at the time of Lord Selkirk, the Indian was given certain reserves in which to hunt. As these reserves were released for settlement purposes, other parcels of land farther back were provided, and at the present time the Indian is located far away from civilization. Unfortunately, the game had been pretty well cleaned out in these districts. Under the original agreement with the government the Indian had the right to hunt at all seasons of the year not only on his own preserve but on all crown lands, but since the natural resources have been returned to the western provinces and the provincial game laws are extended to crown lands, the Indian is prevented from hunting thereon. There is no doubt that the Indian is faced with many hardships but as the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) has said, he would be able to keep himself fairly well if he were permitted to hunt over all crown lands as well as over his own reserves. As the situation is now, the government of Manitoba, and I presume, those of Saskatchewan and Alberta, have game laws which protect these crown lands so that the Indians have not an opportunity to hunt on them. It would be a matter well worthy of consideration for the minister to see if he could not obtain a licence for the Indians to hunt on crown lands, because that would go very far towards relieving their condition.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member for St. Boniface says that in the original agreement or treaty entered into between the dominion and the Indians they had certain rights to hunt on crown lands as well as on the reserves which had been set apart for their use. But the natural resources agreement which was entered into between the dominion and the three prairie provinces, if I am not mistaken —and I speak subject to correction—contains a clause under which at the present time an Indian has a right not only to hunt on his reserve but also to take game at any season of the year if he requires it for food for himself or his family. The hon. member shakes his head, but I have the natural resources agreement in my room. I am going to ask a messenger to get it, and I shall read the clause.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Only for food.

Mr. MURPHY: I said for food. Therefore my statement is correct. That is the point I understood the hon. member for St. Boniface was making. Thus the rights which the Indian had at the beginning are now increased because he may take that game wherever he finds it if he or his family require it for food.

Mr. HOWDEN: I may be in error but several bands in Manitoba from time to time have appealed to me; I have had occasion to take the matter up with the provincial government following the transfer of the natural resources and if I am not mistaken, Hon. Donald McKenzie, Minister of Mines and Natural Resources of that province, gave me to understand that the provincial game laws would apply and the Indians would not be permitted to hunt.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Would be permitted to hunt for food.

Mr. HOWDEN: I am afraid some of those Indians unfortunately are not aware of that fact. I know they have been stopped by the game wardens when they were hunting for food on crown lands.

Mr. STANLEY: Recently in the Calgary police court an Indian was proceeded against under the provincial game act for killing game. Judgment was rendered against him, and I believe an appeal has been entered. So that in one instance at least judgment has been given against an Indian for shooting game on crown lands.

Mr. HOWDEN: I know several instances in Manitoba where Indians have been put in gaol.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): So far as hunting by Indians is concerned, I presume hon. members are speaking of exclusive right, because my experience in Alberta is that they hunt over any land they feel inclined to hunt over, until they are put off.

I should like to ask the minister why he has so completely and radically altered the form of his estimate this year. At page 49 the total amount to be voted is given in one lump sum, $4,107,000. Last year the estimates were spread over two and a half pages, carefully itemized by provinces, so that a member interested in one or more provinces could see at a glance what the expenditures were and with a certain degree of detail. My first question is: What is the reason for this change?

Mr. MURPHY: There is no particular reason for the change other than it makes the record more complete. I can assure the hon. member there was no ulterior motive in making the change from the former method. It has to deal with all matters pertaining to the Indians, and any member who has a question he wishes to bring up may discuss it as fully under the item as it stands at present as he could have done formerly.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am quite sure there is no ulterior motive in the mind of the minister, but if the item is voted in this lump sum there is no definite destination directed by parliament. Therefore the department will have the power to swing the entire $3,000,000, or the bulk of it, within certain statutory limitations, to even one province. The different amounts not being designated by the house and voted in that way, certain sums may be diverted to the wrong provinces.

[Mr. Howden.]

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member fears that possibly under the vote as at present constituted, Indians living in one province might benefit at the expense of those living elsewhere. I can assure the hon. member that such a policy will not be followed.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Can the minister give me the total amount estimated as the expenditure required for Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Northwest Territories? They were includued in one column last year and the total then was $1,007,639.

Mr. MURPHY: The amount this year is $821,639.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is there any decrease in the amount for the Blackfoot Indians?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If the minister would give the amounts to be voted for each province, we would have a better idea of what the allocations are.

Mr. MURPHY: The estimates for each province are as follows:

Nova Scotia, $71,460; New Brunswick, $69,124; Prince Edward Island, $9,405; Ontario and Quebec, $359,411; Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Northwest Territories, $821,639; British Columbia, $489,600; Yukon, $21,450; General, $280,500; Indian education, including the construction of school buildings, $1,750,381. —Total, $3,873,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): A reduction of $853,669.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is estimated as being required for the Blackfoot agency in Alberta?

Mr. MURPHY: Blackfoot agency, general expenses, $6,839.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That includes the requirements for the purpose of supplies for the agency, does it not?

Mr. MURPHY: It includes salaries, rations, travelling expenses of the agent, fuel and feed, miscellaneous and additions and repairs to buildings.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is the method of securing, let us say, the fuel supply? Is it by tender?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, by tender.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is the tender called for by advertisements?

Mr. MURPHY: It is not advertised; the agent calls for tenders.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The agent does so privately; do I understand he does it himself?

Mr. MURPHY: On instructions from the department.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I want to have this clear. Is the invitation to tender advertised?

Mr. MURPHY: No, the tenders are not advertised; they are not published advertisements.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Exactly; may I ask the minister how it is done?

Mr. MURPHY: The procedure followed for many years is being carried out; firms dealing in certain supplies are asked to tender.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I suppose a coal firm would be asked to supply coal. I just wish to have the matter clear, because this is an interesting point. I presume only coal firms would be asked to supply the coal for the agency.

Mr. MURPHY: That would be the natural inference, yes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Who was awarded the contract this year for the Blackfoot Indian agency?

Mr. MURPHY: I have not that information with me.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would the answer given earlier in the session be correct, namely, that it was William McConnell of Gleichen?

Mr. MURPHY: I have not that information before me. Again, however, the inference is that it is correct, unless an error was made.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I wish to direct the attention of the committee to a rather strange situation. The department does not advertise or call for tenders by advertisement. It appears that tenders are invited; by whom, I am not yet clear. Tenders were not invited from all the coal dealers in the town of Gleichen where the coal was purchased. Certain selected favourites are invited to tender, and in addition some who are not in the coal business at all and never have been are requested to tender. It may interest the committee and surprise the minister—because I am quite sure he is not a party to this—that this year's contract was awarded to a man who is not and never was a coal dealer, and that two of the regular firms dealing in coal in the town were not consulted or asked to tender. The man who got the contract is purchasing the coal from the Crown Lumber Company. I understand—and I trust my information is correct—that cheques in payment for the coal are being made out to Mr. McConnell, who, I presume, in turn pays the Crown Lumber Company for the coal shipped in.

But that is not all. This year's tender for the coal is $7.65 f.o.b. agency; $7.65 at farm No. 2 at Cluny; $8.65 at farm No. 3; $9.25 at farm A and $9.65 at farm B,—a five mile haul. We may take it, therefore, that the base price laid down f.o.b. the agency is $7.65. It happens there is another government department in the town, namely, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. They also sent out invitations for tenders, and probably through some accident the wrong person got an opportunity to tender, a person who has been tendering for about fifteen years, and whose figure was the regular market rate. That tender was for first grade jewel coal—and there is no better—to be laid down at Gleichen at $6.40 a ton.

The mystery to me is why a man who is not a coal dealer should get a contract for three hundred tons of coal. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police order was for only twelve tons, and hon. members will readily see how valueless such an order would be. That contract, however, is filled at the rate of $6.40 per ton, which is a fair price when we consider the drop in coal prices in the present year and the further drop in the costs of handling. On the other hand the Indian agency, which does not invite tenders by advertising but selects certain privileged persons who are asked to tender, awards a contract at $7.65 per ton, or $1.25 more than was necessary. That is worth while considering. The gentleman in question, Mr. McConnell, is the president of the local Conservative association. That is indeed most interesting.

Mr. McGIBBON: But not a crime.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, not a crime. It is very interesting, however, that the president of a Conservative association, who is not a coal dealer, should be awarded a contract at $1.25 above the price at which coal could be secured. But that is not all. This government has been spending money in the development of a coal mine on the Indian agency. In 1929 the sum of only $56.11 was spent; in 1930 $100.56 was spent; in 1931,—there was a real boom on at that time—the government spent $2,193. That is the information I have received from the department. There is a similar difference in the output. In the year 1929 the output was only 260 tons; in 1930, 600 tons; in 1931, 3,085 tons. The Indian agent is selling the coal, in the town of Gleichen where the agency is situated. That is first grade lump coal, and is being sold at $3 a ton. Now comes a further mystery: Why does the agent go outside the district to buy coal from the president of a Conservative association at $1.25 above the hauled-in price of domestic coal in Drumheller when he has at his own door a mine developed and operated and worked by Indians under the supervision of the department producing 3,085 tons, which is being sold around the district for only $3 a ton? I leave to the minister the elucidation of these mysteries. I am sure he is not a party to such irregularities, but I do hope he will clear up the mess. Certainly the situation is not a pleasant one in the nostrils of the people of that district. It is an affront both to good Conservatives and to people of other political persuasions, and is the sort of practice which should not be permitted to continue.

Mr. MURPHY: I have not all the facts before me, but I do not think the matter is as mysterious as the hon. member may think. It may be that the man who secured the tender did so at a price slightly higher—about a dollar a ton, if I followed the hon. member correctly. The fact, however, that there was a haulage of some five miles or more, would no doubt explain the difference.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am sure the minister does not wish to mislead the committee. The coal which was hauled five miles cost $9.65 per ton, an amount greatly in excess of $6.40.

Mr. MURPHY: There is haulage in each case?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): There is no haulage for agency coal laid down at Gleichen.

Mr. MURPHY: Is it not hauled a certain distance?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): About three-quarters of a mile, or about the same distance as it would be to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police barracks.

Mr. MURPHY: As the hon. member is well aware, there are many different grades of coal sold in western Canada. The haulage may explain part of the difference. I do not say it does; I am offering it as one explanation because I have not all these details before me. But with regard to the other matter of which he complains, namely, that the Indians have on their reserve a coal mine, I do know that is true. I may tell the hon. member that the mine was opened up under the present administration. Whereas formerly the department bought their coal outside, now that the mine on that reserve has been opened up it is not only supplying the fuel needs of the Indians themselves, but also, I believe those of the agency this fall. I may also say to the hon. member that we received some very strong protests against the present policy of the department in operating that mine for the benefit of the Indians. The Indians have not only been able to supply themselves with fuel, but they have been given work during all last winter at fair wages. They have also been able to purchase coal at the mine head, merely paying the wage cost, and selling it, as he said, in the town at $3 a ton. This is directly of benefit to the Indians—something they did not have until the mine was opened about a year or so ago.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Since the mine is producing 3,085 tons of coal, and, as the minister states, he hopes to produce a greater quantity next year, why is his department purchasing coal from outside at more than twice the amount? Is that economic? Is it common sense? If the Canadian National Railway system was run on that basis it would be broke long ago.

Mr. MURPHY: As I stated, the mine has been open only a few months, and it may be that the department was not in a position at the time—I speak again subject to correction—to supply its needs. In other words, the tenders were called for for the season 1931-32, prior to the opening of the mine. But now that we are in a position to meet those requirements, there is no reason why the coal should not be supplied to the agency from the mine provided it is suitable coal for their requirements.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister a moment ago attempted to show that there might be some explanation for this thing. I happen to know that the coal that was tentered for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police was a very fine, first class grade of domestic coal. You could not get anything better. It is the bottom seam coal. It is laid down at the Royal Canadian Mounted Police barracks at $6.40 a ton and only for twelve tons.

An hon. MEMBER: That was a gift.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): They did not have the advantage of getting it in carload lots as they can for the agency order, which amounts to 300 tons. I am glad the minister is open to reason in this matter. I do hope he will look into it, because frankly it is a disgrace. I cannot imagine anything that more reeks of the old spoils system than this thing does. The government takes office, proceeds to develop a coal mine on the reserve, produces a tremendous quantity this year, knew it was going to do so because it spent $2,193 in 1931, in addition to $56.11 in 1929 and $100.50 in 1930.

Mr. MURPHY: I think the hon. member will bear me out when I say that the mine at that time was not producing.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Not anything like the quantity that is being produced to-day.

Mr. MURPHY: Not anything at all, I think.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): There was some coal being taken out in 1930. The facts are as I have stated to the minister. The government changes office, the new government does not call for tenders by advertisement, but sends out an invitation to one or two friends in the town, and accepts a tender from one of those men, whom obviously they must have had their eyes upon all the time, or whose eyes must have been upon them all the time—the president of the local Conservative association. He gets the contract at a price that is higher than any price contracted for in the district by a government agency since 1928. Remember that. During all the period the price of coal has been going down. In 1928 it was $7.50; in 1929, $7.20; in 1930, $7.20; in 1931, $6.40. I am sure hon. members are fully as disturbed as I am about this matter and do not like this kind of thing to be done with public money. This gentleman may be a very worthy man, but why the government should have given the contract to him for a large amount of coal, 300 tons, at $1.25 over the price at which they could have secured first grade coal, is a mystery to me. Of course, the other point is that the man is not a coal dealer, and never has been. Again, for fear there may be any mistake about it, the price paid to this gentleman is $7.65 f.o.b. agency, which gives him a profit of $1.25 for doing nothing except signing a contract. On farm No. 2, Cluny—which is also in the same relation to the railway station as the Gleichen farm—the same price is quoted, $7.65; at farm No. 3, which is one mile away, the price—full allowance has been made for providing profit—is $8.65, at farm A, four miles away, the price is $9.25, and at farm B, five miles away, the price is $9.65. I can assure the minister that the contract is well worth while; it has not cost any effort or investment on the part of him who got it. It is a straight gift out of the public treasury and is a disgrace. I know the minister will pay attention to the matter and have it cleaned up.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is there a man by the name of William Tweedwell, Indian agent at Le Pas, where there is a reserve?

Mr. MURPHY: There was a William Tweedwell, at Le Pas.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Was he dismissed?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: For what reason?

Mr. MURPHY: For incompetency and misbehaviour.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Was the misbehaviour political partisanship?

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Was a man by the name of Samuel Lovell appointed agent in the place of Tweedwell?

Mr. MURPHY: He is acting temporarily.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Has the position been advertised?

Mr. MURPHY: I do not think so.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Will it be advertised by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. MURPHY: It may not be advertised, for this reason; an order in council was passed some time last year directing the Civil Service Commission to fill vacancies by appointing former members of the Department of the Interior staff who in their opinion had the necessary qualifications to fill such offices.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is my information correct, that the only qualification of this man Lovell is that he is a painter by trade?

Mr. MURPHY: I have no information on that subject.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Would the minister let me have that information as soon as possible? My information is that this man Tweedwell was dismissed for very poor reasons, and I believe the minister and his department were skating on very thin ice in making that dismissal. Then they temporarily appointed a man who I am told has had no experience in that line of work, whose trade is that of painter. The Indians might need a little warpaint or something like that, but I should like the minister to give me that information.

Mr. MURPHY: I do not think it is in the public interest or in the interest of any employee of the government to state publicly, in certain cases, everything that might be said against that individual, but I can assure my hon. friend that if he will come to the office of the department and consult the files he will not repeat the statement he made a few moments ago, that we were skating on very thin ice in dismissing this man. I do not wish to pursue the subject at greater length for the reasons I have already given, but if the hon. member persists it may not be greatly to his advantage.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I might tell the minister that since this government has been in power there have been so many dismissals for political partisanship, and the investigators have condemned men on such scanty evidence, that members on this side of the house must be expected to be suspicious. Among those dismissed from the Post Office Department or from the minister's own department I could name many who have been dismissed or suspended because of charges of political partisanship, many of which were cooked. In my own district we had an investigator inquiring into the conduct of a civil servant accused of political partisanship, whose accuser was a mail contractor, delivering the mail from the station to the post office, who acted as agent for the Conservative candidate. This was the man who made the charge against the postmaster, whom he was trying to get dismissed. If I can get the information I require privately I will do so.

Mr. MURPHY: I have no knowledge at all of anything that might have taken place with regard to the Post Office Department, but I can assure the hon. member that no charge of political partisanship was made in the case of the agent who was retired at Le Pas.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I will give the minister some information that he may remember. A certain medical man who was attending the Indians on a reserve in my district was advised shortly after the election was over, that his services were no longer required. That man never took any part in the campaign; I warned him not to do so. I feared that the promises my hon. friends were making might bring them into power, so I told him, "If you do not take any part in this fight you will be able to hold your position." He did not take any part, but nevertheless in October or November he was notified that his services were no longer required. That dismissal was unjust and unfair, and it has turned more votes away from my hon. friends opposite than anything else they could do in my district.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): In fairness to the minister and to the gentleman referred to by the hon. member for Provencher, I think I should say a word, since probably I am in a better position to know about this matter than any man in this house. Mr. Tweedwell was a very warm supporter of mine, so there could be hardly any partisanship shown in his dismissal. Mr. Tweedwell was looking upon the wine when it was red just a little too much; he got himself into difficulties, an investigation was requested and an investigator was sent up. I have not seen the evidence on which he was dismissed, but I can assure the hon. member for Provencher that the department had every justification for the action that was taken.

Mr. VALLANCE: When these estimates were under consideration last year I asked the minister a question regarding the list of firms permitted to tender on supplies for the Indians. I mentioned the specific case of a firm in connection with the supplying of flour to the Indians in northern Saskatchewan. For many years the Bishop Milling Company of the town of Battleford supplied flour to the Indians, not only under the late government but under the preceding government as well. Last year I asked why the Bishop Milling Company was not permitted now to tender for flour; in fact I wrote the minister's department, and I was told then that they were not on what I might call the eligible list. Might I ask the minister whether they are on that list now, and if they are not on it would the minister tell me why they are not.

Mr. MURPHY: I am not sure whether the firm mentioned by the hon. member has been asked to tender, but I am safe in saying that there is a firm in Battleford that is asked to submit prices. I am not certain whether or not it is the firm he mentioned a moment ago.

Mr. VALLANCE: Has the deputy minister the information?

Mr. MURPHY: I am informed that the Bishop Milling Company is asked to tender on supplies.

Mr. VALLANCE: I wish to thank the minister.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would like the minister to be good enough to revert for a moment to a question of policy. In my riding I have two Indian bands, and on the average I think they are as intelligent as the ordinary citizen of the country. Most of them are equally thrifty and ambitious, and many of them have expressed the wish to me, both individually and collectively, that they might become enfranchised and enjoy the full rights of ordinary citizens. They have never been able to do so, and for the life of me I cannot see why that should be so. A number of them went to the war and were enfranchised as a result, but their brothers, their fathers, their mothers and their sisters are still there. They are ambitious, energetic and thrifty, and are very desirous of getting the citizenship that is enjoyed by other people in this country. I should like to ask the minister if it would not be possible to give these people a little more responsibility and a little more liberty by granting them full citizenship. I do not see why a difference in colour should bar one man from full citizenship while his neighbour enjoys that privilege.

Mr. MURPHY: As I think the hon. member is aware, there is a provision in the Indian Act now whereby an Indian man or woman may be enfranchised, and Indians in different parts of Canada are being enfranchised practically all the time. It is done by order in council, after certain recommendations have been made in regard to the standing, the character and the ability of the person concerned. To the best of my knowledge there is no provision in the Indian Act now whereby Indians might be enfranchised en bloc. That could only be done if the present Indian Act were amended. The question has been given some consideration but not all the consideration it deserves, and it may well be that legislation might be introduced in this house to accomplish something of what the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. McGIBBON: I thank the minister for his assurance that consideration will be given. I was quite well aware of the provisions he has enumerated, but in the fifteen years I have been in this house I have been able to get only one enfranchised, and that took me from six months to a year. Speaking irrespective of governments, I do not think this matter has received in the past the consideration which the citizens in those bands deserve. I thank the minister for the promise that the matter will be considered, because I think it is just that it should be.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I was very much pleased to hear the minister say that the department had been successful in arranging with the government of Quebec for granting exclusive rights to Indians in that province to take furbearing animals north of the Transcontinental railway, and if I understood him correctly he said that at present an effort was being made, pending the report of the game commission appointed in Ontario some eighteen months ago, to accomplish the same object in the province of Ontario, namely, to provide that north of the Transcontinental railway the Indians should have the exclusive right in that province. So far as the Indians north of the Transcontinental are concerned, that would be a splendid arrangement. But what about the Indians south of the Transcontinental? There are two distinct bands or, as they are sometimes referred to, tribes of Indians in the northern part of Ontario and the eastern part of Manitoba. To some extent, particularly in northern Ontario, the Cree Indians found their native home north of the height of land in the watersheds of the Hudson bay, while the Ojibway Indians found their home south of the height of land, roughly speaking. If the Cree Indians get their rights north of the Transcontinental they will be amply taken care of, but they would be about in the same position north of the height of land if an attempt were made to transport the Ojibway bands of Indians from the watershed of the great lakes to north of the Transcontinental, which is only a small portion of Hudson bay watershed, because the watershed comes down one hundred miles south of the Transcontinental. The hunting grounds south of the Transcontinental are more prolific and will furnish better opportunities for the Indians, in the main, than the hunting grounds north of the Transcontinental. You will take care of one group of Indians partially, namely, the Crees, north of the Transcontinental, but the Crees south of the Transcontinental in the watershed of the great lakes will be in the position they are now in—and their position is worse than that of any Indians I know of in the country. There are three lines of railways traversing the districts from end to end of that country, and it is through these railway lines that the white hunter comes in. Then, following up what the hon. member for St. Boniface has said with regard to the Indians not being permitted to take furbearing animals or food supplies from the game in Manitoba, certainly they are not in Ontario; they are treated exactly the same as the while man is treated. They are haled before the police court if they shoot a partridge out of season, or for any act committed in violation of the game laws of Ontario, just the same as any white man. The result is that they have been reduced to a state of absolute pauperism, their only means of earning a living having been taken away from them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I suggest that a slight mistake has been made in curtailing the description of the votes. If it was desirable to have the vote all in one item, then at least the items the minister read to the committee allocating certain amounts to each province should be in the estimates. However, that is not the point I want to make at present. Will the minister give some explanation with regard to the closing of the Regina office and the allocation of the three inspectors?

Mr. MURPHY: The commissioner's office at Regina, as such, has been closed and Inspector Murison will continue, under the department here at Ottawa, in charge of affairs in Saskatchewan, Inspector Hamilton in Winnipeg for the province of Manitoba, and Inspector Christianson in Calgary for the province of Alberta.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Reporting direct to Ottawa?

Mr. MURPHY: Reporting direct to Ottawa, yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In the curtailment of the amount allocated generally to the department, how much of the reduction is estimated to be in construction of schools? Perhaps I might put it a better way: Are there any new schools under construction this year?

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Any new hospitals?

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Mr. DONNELLY: I understand that what is known as the Greater Production Farm in the neighbourhood of Regina has been abandoned. What was the reason for this?

Mr. MURPHY: As nearly as I have been able to ascertain, what is known as the Greater Production Farm was brought into existence, along with some others of a similar type, during the war years when this country was straining every effort to provide foodstuffs for the allied armies. In other years a similar farm was closed on the Blood reserve in Alberta. This year it was decided to close the farm north of Regina, because the Indian department is not engaged in the business of farming as such; that is rather outside the province of the department. I may say, for the information of the hon. member, that the farm has not been abandoned. An arrangement has been entered into with the former manager of the farm whereby he will crop the land this year with the idea eventually, in a couple of years' time, of returning the farm to its natural grassy state to obviate the danger of the land becoming weedy and thus a menace to surrounding farms.

Mr. DONNELLY: Has any of this land been handed over to the Indians to farm this year, or has it been placed in the hands of this individual to carry on farming?

Mr. MURPHY: The arrangement has been made with the individual to farm the area with the idea of returning the land to its natural grassy state, or to sow the land where needed to broom or some other variety of grass.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Can the minister advise the committee of the present stage of the negotiations between himself or his department and the government of Quebec with regard to Indian reservation lands alienated by this government? The privy council has decided that these lands must revert to the provinces and that the proceeds of any sales belong to the provinces. I understand there is now due to the province of Quebec more than $300,000 in proceeds from the sales of these lands. I think an arrangement was reached many years ago with the province of Ontario, but so far no definite conclusion has been reached as far as Quebec and the Dominion government are concerned. I understand that the department take the stand that the province must wait; they do not contest the validity of the claim but they seem to ask for some sort of moratorium. The province of Quebec in the past has been willing to agree to favours being granted to other provinces; it does not ask for any favours, but it has a right to the money received from the sale of Indian lands which are the property of the province.

Mr. MURPHY: Mr. Chairman, in one sense, I am rather pleased that the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has brought up this question. I have not all the details before me, but I think the general facts are something like these: It was understood by the Dominion government and by the Indians themselves that where a band surrendered a portion of their reserve for sale or lease, the proceeds of the sale would be held by the Dominion government in trust for the purpose of assisting the Indians. Certain lands in the province of Quebec were sold after being legally surrendered by the Indians to the department for disposal, and the province has claimed the reversionary interest in those lands. A case was carried to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which decided that the province was entitled to the reversionary interest in the lands or, in other words, that the proceeds from the sale of the lands belonged to the province. I do not dispute that that is the correct legal position, but certain negotiations have been carried on between the Premier of Quebec and myself and other officials of the government. The dominion's standpoint is that the province of Quebec could claim a reversionary interest in the lands. However, it may be of interest to the committee to know that the province of Ontario has entered into an agreement with the Dominion government whereby the proceeds of any such sales would be held in trust by the Dominion government to be used for the welfare of the Indians, and I have endeavoured to have the province of Quebec adopt a similar attitude. The Dominion government is not holding these moneys for the benefit of the crown in the right of the dominion; it is holding them in trust to be expended from time to time for the benefit of the Indians. I think there is a difference of opinion as to the $300,000 mentioned by the former Minister of Justice, the Dominion contending that that amount includes not only the proceeds from the sale of lands but also the proceeds from the sale of timber and other resources upon the lands. My main object has been to have the province of Quebec adopt the same attitude as that adopted by the province of Ontario, whereby the moneys from the sale of such lands would remain with the Dominion government to be expended for the benefit of the Indian. If this is not done, the department will be placed in this position: Unless an Indian band dies out or for some reason leaves its reserve, no further land would be surrendered by the Indians, because it would be felt that the proceeds of any sales would go to the province and the poor Indian would be denied that which he supposed was his for all time to come.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not challenge the right of the minister to enter into negotiations with the province of Quebec to try to get them to agree that this money should be kept in trust for the benefit of the Indians, but my hon. friend must agree that the money now in the hands of the government is the property of the province of Quebec. While negotiations are pending and before an agreement is reached, if it is ever reached, I do not think it is a fair method of procedure for the government to keep this money, and I do not see how my hon. friend can justify it. In order to show the view taken in regard to this matter by the government of the province of Quebec, I shall read the last letter sent to my hon. friend by the Premier and Attorney General of the province. The letter is dated April 25, and reads:

I am in receipt of your letter of the 19th instant, regarding the question of the property rights of the province of Quebec in lands comprising Indian reserves.

I regret to state that it is impossible for our government to accept the views expressed by you in your letter.

Surely, undisputed claims between Canadian governments cannot be treated in this way. After much litigation the privy council held, in the Star-Chrome case, that these lands reverted to the provinces.

Before this decision was rendered, the government of the dominion had been selling these lands. We declared, however, before the privy council that we were prepared to recognize the validity of the titles given by Ottawa before the priviy council decision, and ever since Ottawa has been disposing of the lands, the proceeds of the sale being deposited in a special trust fund. The amount due the province of Quebec is now over three hundred thousand dollars, in addition to interest. We have, however, declared that we were prepared to waive interest if the capital is paid forthwith.

I really cannot understand the stand that you take when you declare, in your letter, that the adjustment of this claim must be indefinitely deferred.

The government of the dominion is showing itself most generous for the provinces of the west and, for this generosity, I am offering no criticism. We are not applying for charity or for a gift, but only for the payment of a sum which is legitimately due to the province.

I, therefore, earnestly hope that our claim will be adjusted forthwith.

May I add that the privy council dealt with this matter in the case of the Dominion of Canada vs. the province of Ontario, in 1910, in the Indian Treaties indemnity case. You will find that case reported at page 676 of Cameron's Canadian Constitution.

Yours truly,

L. A. Taschereau.

I do not want to press the matter unduly, but I submit, even after the explanations of the minister, it is clear that the money belongs to the province of Quebec, and until any other agreement is reached and pending any negotiations, I dispute the right of this government to keep the money.

Mr. MURPHY: As I stated a few moments ago, there is no question, or at least I have never heard any, as to the legal right of the province of Quebec to the proceeds from the sale of the land. When the ex-minister read from the letter that settlement must be indefinitely postponed, this had reference to the amount claimed, not to the legal right of the province to the proceeds from the sale of the land. That is, the province of Quebec claims the right to money which was received from the sale of timber and certain other proceeds which the Dominion government feels is not included in the judgment given by the privy council. But the ex-minister, in his concluding remarks, stated that he felt that this government was not entitled to keep moneys which rightfully belong to the province of Quebec, although we were endeavouring to negotiate with them whereby the moneys from the sale of this land would be kept for the Indians. That money has been owing to the province of Quebec for some years, I believe, and the ex-Minister of Justice, although I am not sure of this, may have had the matter brought to his attention during those years.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I did not hear of it until two days ago.

Mr. BENNETT: Bad staff work.

Mr. MURPHY: Then I do not need to give any further explanation along that line. I sincerely hope, however, the province of Quebec will see its way clear to allow the dominion to retain that money in order that it may be expended for the welfare of the Indians who certainly need it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think I should lend some support to the minister in this matter, because I had a rather trying experience with the province of Ontario in regard to the same question. While there is no use in denying the fact that we were defeated in the case before the privy council, the question of ownership of Indian lands is rather beclouded. I always held the opinion that our case was not very well presented. It, however, went against us; there is no use in arguing about that, but even so, we felt we had a claim in equity. Surely these lands were set aside in the various provinces for the maintenance of Indians and the responsibility for their maintenance devolves upon the federal authorities. All the contributions the provinces made were the lands themselves.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The lands themselves—that is something.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): —the lands themselves, for the purpose of setting aside reserves for the Indians. The care, the education and all the other responsibilities fell upon the shoulders of the federal government. It is not fair to say that there is any difference between the treatment in Ontario and Quebec and that in the western provinces, because under the agreement with the prairie provinces and British Columbia there is a provision that if further lands are required, they are prepared, upon negotiation, to provide them. If in the provinces sales of land are undertaken, the proceeds remain in the custody of the federal government. It sems to me this is a question of equity, if not of law. In the negotiations with the Ontario government we were able to retain these moneys and arrangements are made whereby, in sales of reserves in that province, the proceeds remain in the custody of the Department of Indian Affairs for the benefit of the Indians themselves. It is true on a clear case of law the province of Quebec is entitled to recover that money, but to be fair to the rest of the provinces and to give the same treatment—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Quebec is paying all the time to the other provinces.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not want to enter into a controversy with my hon. friend over that question.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We shall discuss it at some other time.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not particularly with respect to Indians—

Mr. LAPOINTE: We do not borrow money, but we want what is due to us.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): As regards the question of Indian reserves in Quebec, it is only fair to expect that that province should be given the same treatment as that which prevails in regard to Ontario.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the difficulty is this: the ex-Minister of Justice overlooks the fact that the privy council has not decided that the fund, if it is paid to the province of Quebec, does not become a trust fund for the benefit of the Indians.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Let Quebec decide that.

Mr. BENNETT: If it is a trust fund for the benefit of the Indians, then as the ex-Minister of the Interior has observed, a difficulty of administration arises, because, under the constitution, with the dominion rests the responsibility for the Indians, and the extent to which the moneys thus received by the province from the sale of assets belonging to the Indians would pro tanto be available for their relief and support. I think what the ex-Minister of the Interior has said should be viewed from that standpoint. I understand the minister has suggested to Quebec, not that the moneys should not be paid in accordance with the terms of the judgment, but that, if paid, they should be regarded as a trust which may be administered by the dominion or by the province, but if by the province, by its discharging the constitutional obligation of the dominion with respect to the wards of the crown, namely, the Indians.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does my right hon. friend not think that, while these negotiations are pending, the money should go to the province to which it belongs?

Mr. BENNETT: The question has not been determined, as I understand it—

Mr. LAPOINTE: It has.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has not heard my sentence. The question has not been determined whether or not the money is earmarked as a trust fund, and if paid over by the dominion without its being thus earmarked, a question that might be very difficult would arise. That is the point which the minister has endeavoured to make with the provincial authorities. If we earmark it as a trust fund, then of course the administration of the fund would relieve pro tanto the obligations of the dominion. But this would complicate administration, because you would have the province charged with a responsibility which constitutionally rests with us.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely the judgment is clear that when Indian lands are abandoned, they revert to the provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: When they are sold, the money should go to the province, whether that money is earmarked or not. Whether it is to be administered for the benefit of the Indians or not, it must go to the province, and while this question is being discussed, I do not think it is fair on the part of the federal government to keep the money.

Mr. GARDINER: Has the minister any information with regard to the situation in relation to trachoma on the different reserves in the west?

Mr. MURPHY: I did not hear the hon. member very well, but I believe he is inquiring about the trachoma situation in the west. At the present time the department is availing itself of the services of Doctor Wall, who is an expert in that disease, having especially studied the subject in Vienna. He is making a tour throughout the west and is instructing the various doctors whose services were engaged for the benefit of the Indians in the detection and treatment of this disease. He is cooperating also with the provincial Departments of Health in their endeavour to prevent the ravages of that disease among certain elements of the white population.

Mr. GARDINER: I was very much interested in the questions asked by the hon. member for Bow River concerning the coal contract at Gleichen. I have before me a return which was tabled in this house some time ago at the request of the hon. member. Notwithstanding the fact that the price of coal has been very substantially reduced, I notice the department is paying fifteen cents per ton more than they did in the previous year. Can the minister explain this?

Mr. MURPHY: I have already informed the committee that tenders were asked for by the Indian agent, and that the lowest tender was accepted. Further than that I can give no explanation to the committee.

Mr. GARDINER: Does the minister really believe that they were proper tenders? In his own mind is he satisfied that those tenders were properly made?

Mr. MURPHY: They were proper, I suppose, in the sense that they were submitted by responsible dealers. When those dealers were tendering they knew that they were in a competitive field, and as business men they would know that they must submit prices at which they could supply the coal.

Mr. GARDINER: In view of the fact that the public was not asked to tender for the supply of coal I presume the minister would not like to say that the tenders were really competitive?

Mr. BENNETT: He said so.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister would not for one moment say that those tenders were competitive; the public was not asked to tender for the supplying of coal.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, the tenders were competitive, because the different dealers were asked to quote. I do not know what the hon. member has in mind when he suggests to the committee that those men got together in some sort of cabal and boosted the price. I do not know whether or not that is what the hon. member has in mind. Apart from that, however, I would say that as business men they would submit the lowest possible prices in order to secure the business.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not infer that those gentlemen got together with the idea of boosting the price higher than it should have been. In an endeavour to get to the bottom of this matter I should like to ask the minister how many tendered for the coal contract, the amounts at which they tendered, and the dates upon which the tenders were received.

Mr. MURPHY: I am sorry I have not that information before me.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not like to delay the item, yet I should not like to see it pass until we have some further explanation in regard to so important a matter. After all, we are spending the funds of the people, and it is the duty of this house to see to it that proper tenders are received. In all cases, quality considered, the lowest tenderer should receive the contract. In this particular instance it is quite evident that only a few people were asked to tender. I believe the committee would be justified in asking the minister to let the item stand until such time as he can furnish more information.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. GARDINER: I should like to know who were invited to tender for this coal contract. I should like to have the tenders produced, so that the committee may know whether the lowest tender was accepted, the date that tenders were asked for and when the successful tender was accepted, in order that we may determine whether or not the agency itself could have supplied this coal from its own mine at the time the tenders were received.

I should like to say a word or two about the manner in which estimates have been brought before the committee this year, as compared with that of former years. In item 201 of this year's estimates a lump sum of $3,873,000 is provided. If hon. members will turn to last year's estimates they will find a much better description of the particular purposes for which these moneys are allocated than is to be found in the estimates now before us. With all the estimates for the Department of Indian Affairs lumped in one sum it is quite possible for the department to allocate those funds to whatever purpose they may desire. Under the circumstances and in view of my past experience I do not think that is advisable. Turning to page 54 of the estimates for the year 1931-32, last year, we find that there are certain amounts allocated to each of the provinces, and the total vote was $4,516,313. Then we come to a special vote for Nova Scotia, and in that vote there is a sum set aside for salaries, another for supplies for destitute Indians, another to provide for encouragement of agriculture, another for medical attendance and medicines, another for repairs to roads and dyking, another for Indian dwellings, and the last for miscellaneous and unforeseen expenditures. Each of these items has a certain amount of money allocated to it in last year's estimates, making a total for the province of Nova Scotia of $85,960.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Maloney): I must remind the hon. member that it is now eleven o'clock.

Mr. MURPHY: Before the committee rises I should like to make one or two observations. When the hon. member for Bow River first raised the question of coal I said I had not the particulars before me. When I replied to the hon. member for Acadia I was speaking generally, as to the policy of the department in connection with tenders, and I made the assertion that the lowest tender is accepted. At that time I was not speaking of the particular case to which the hon. member had directed his remarks, but was referring to the general practice in the department. May I add that at the next sitting I shall have the necessary information for hon. members opposite.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, May 3, 1932.

The house met at three o'clock.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following letter:

Ottawa, May 3, 1932.

Sir,—

I have the honour to inform you that Right Hon. F. A. Anglin, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber this day at 5 p.m. for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

James F. Crowdy,
Assistant Secretary.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES TO BE ISSUED UNDER CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS FINANCING ACT

On the order of government notices of motion:

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I advised the house that I would ask for unanimous consent for the purpose of dealing with a bill to raise $61,500,000 for the Canadian National Railways. If hon. gentlemen will look at page ii of the votes and proceedings of yesterday they will find the resolution which is to be the basis of the bill in question. I would therefore ask leave of the house to move that the house resolve itself into committee this day to consider the following resolution:

That the governor in council may authorize the guarantee of securities of the Canadian National Railway Company made or issued from time to time under the provisions of the Canadian National Railways Financing Act, 1932, to an aggregate principal amount at any one time outstanding of $61,500,000.

His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BACON EXPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): In the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) I wish to make a correction in regard to a statement that was given out by one of the officers of the Department of Trade and Commerce yesterday and that appeared in some newspapers this morning, dealing with Canadian bacon exports. I am informed by Mr. Coats, the dominion statistician, that there are various mistakes in this statement, largely due to the changing of a decimal point which naturally multiplies some of the figures by ten. I wish to make this correction as early as possible, and this afternoon Mr. Coates will give out to the press a corrected statement in regard to exports of bacon from Canada.

LOBSTER FISHING SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Duranleau), based on the following telegram from Summerside, dated May 2:

Understand Department of Fisheries granting two weeks extension to lobster fishermen on south shore Nova Scotia. Feel this action very unfair to fishermen and packers island. South shore enjoyed last winter a season from December first to January fifteenth and this spring March first May fifteenth. Our fishermen have only two months. Market in a demoralized condition. Such extension if granted will be disastrous to our fishermen. Would suggest protest strongly against such extension.

This is signed by one of the large packers of Prince Edward Island. The question I wish to direct to the minister is whether he will give consideration to the request of the Island packers in regard to not granting this extension of time.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries): I am not prepared to say at the moment whether my department has received any request from the packers of Prince Edward Island, but we will be prepared to consider any reasonable demand they may make.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): I would like to ask the minister if he would be good enough to take into immediate consideration—and I say immediate because the matter is urgent—the request of the fishermen of western Nova Scotia for the extension of the lobster season to the end of May. The minister has said he is willing to consider any reasonable demands made by the packers of Prince Edward Island, and I hope he will have the same consideration for the request of the fishermen of western Nova Scotia.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I will be glad to consider the matter.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): As an unprejudiced person interested in the fisheries I strongly recommend to the Minister of Fisheries that this extension of time in western Nova Scotia be not granted.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): Some three weeks ago an order of the house was issued for a return having to do with the disposition of the two million odd bushels of wheat that were ground and used for relief purposes. May I ask the government if I can expect this return to be brought down shortly?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): That question was answered on an inquiry made by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McKenzie). There is no correspondence; the instructions were given verbally, and the quantity of wheat milled is mentioned in the answer to that question, which I think was given one day last week.

NATIVE WINE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (Minister of National Revenue): Yesterday on the orders of the day the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) addressed a question to the right hon. Prime Minister which had to do with my department. I understood the hon. member to ask if there might be laid on the table of the house any order in council having reference to the fortification of wines, and the hon. member stated that such order in council was passed shortly after the close of last session. I may tell the hon. gentleman that there was no order in council; proceedings were taken by the department under the regulations. A statement of what was done is under my hand and I will be glad to let the hon. gentleman have it.

DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether we may expect, before the end of the session, a report of the activities of the two members of the government who are attending the Disarmament conference. I presume my right hon. friend is in constant communication with them, and I believe we are entitled to know the results of their work, since they have been there for three months.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): If the hon. gentleman will recall the opinions that I expressed frequently in this house last year and again this year as to the movement of great events connected with disarmament conferences he will realize that very little has been accomplished, and that the acute difficulties between two of the great powers, the one speaking of security and the other of equality, have rendered it practically impossible at the moment for any definite conclusions to be arrived at. The advices that we receive from our delegation substantially indicate that there is still hopefulness on the part of those who are gathered at Geneva, and that they have not abandoned the idea that they may be able to accomplish some good purpose by their continued efforts.

In the meantime, I think the hon. gentleman has had sufficient experience in matters of this kind to know that no report, in the sense in which that word is commonly used, could be given that would be in any way enlightening to the house or to the country, beyond those reports which from day to day appear in the press.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES TO BE ISSUED UNDER CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS FINANCING ACT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That the governor in council may authorize the guarantee of securities of the Canadian National Railway Company made or issued from time to time under the provisions of the Canadian National Railways Financing Act, 1932, to an aggregate principal amount at any one time outstanding of $61,500,000.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Mr. POULIOT: I will not take up much of the time of the committee but I desire to say a few words in connection with this resolution. May I tell you, Mr. Chairman, how it came about that the Canadian National shops at St. Malo were built. It was because a piece of land, in fact a swamp, was bought before 1896 by a concern called La Compagnie des Terrains Sans Bruit—The Noiseless Land Company—in which a Conservative minister was interested and also an ex-Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. Together they bought that piece of land for a very small sum of money and tried to sell it to the Laurier government, but without success; and in December, 1911, two or three months after the Conservative government had come into power, that same piece of land was bought at a price thirty times what had been paid for it originally, thirty years before. They made a very profitable sale. After the land was acquired it had to be used for something, and it was decided to build the Canadian National railway shops on that swamp. That is the origin of the St. Malo shops in Quebec. After the shops were built they had to be equipped with men and machinery, and most of the men and equipment they imported from Rivière du Loup. The result was that they emptied the shops at Rivière du Loup. They took the men and mechanical devices from those shops to fill this plant, the outcome of graft. That is how the Rivière du Loup shops were treated by the Borden administration in 1911, and no satisfaction has been given the people there. They were ill treated in this way because of the graft of a minister—may his soul rest in peace—and of a former Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec—may he too enjoy peace before his death. That is why I take this opportunity of asking the government not to be hard on Rivière du Loup. That city has very fine shops and the men are excellent mechanics, but they suffered at that time in much the same way as the Acadians suffered in Nova Scotia long years ago. In this case it was the expulsion of French Canadians from Rivière du Loup to Quebec to man the shops there. These men had to leave their homes, which they were obliged to sell at a great loss, and they were involved in all sorts of sacrifices. Now many of them are without employment.

I submit that this matter should be taken into very serious consideration. I told the whole story to Sir Henry Thornton and some other officials of the Canadian National Railways, and I also brought the matter to the attention of the late administration. I urged that every consideration should be given the people of Rivière du Loup in view of these circumstances.

There are two parishes in the city of Rivière du Loup in which the men are engaged mostly on the Canadian National Railways. They do not receive exorbitant salaries, and they give full value in their services for what they receive. They are good citizens and employees, many of them having received letters of commendation from different governors general and prime ministers of Canada. I am sure that if there is one section of the Canadian National railways through which the Prime Minister may travel in safety and comfort it is the division between Lévis and Campbellton, when the engineer in charge and the fireman, the conductor and the brakeman, are from Rivière du Loup.

May I once more urge this matter upon my genial friend the Minister of Railways. I am not blaming him for the unfortunate conditions in Rivière du Loup, but the people there have suffered enough already and something should be done to give them redress. That is one of the oldest divisional points on the Canadian National railways. Rivière du Loup was the first terminal of the Grand Trunk railway before the building of the Intercolonial railway. I would ask the minister to see to it, if at all possible, that the people there be given justice, and that they be compensated for what they have suffered in the past. They have suffered more than the people on any other section of the railways. It must be remembered, moreover, that it is bad for the whole community to increase big shops at the expense of those located in the smaller centres. When these men quit their work they had to sell their property at a great loss; they were uprooted, and they do not feel at home in other centres. I know the minister's good disposition and I would ask him to be kind enough to see to it that the men at Rivière du Loup are disturbed as little as possible during the present crisis.

Mr. MANION: Of course, my hon. friend knows very well that the Minister of Railways has nothing whatever to do with the matter. It is entirely in the hands of the management. However, I shall gladly see that his remarks are brought to their attention.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. RHODES: With the unanimous consent of the house, Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to introduce Bill No. 71, founded on the resolution, respecting the Canadian National Railways, and to authorize the guarantee by His Majesty of securities to be issued under the Canadian National Railways Financing Act, 1932.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. RHODES moved the second reading of the bill.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PROVINCIAL FORCES TAKEN OVER; CONSOLIDATION WITH PREVENTIVE SERVICE

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 63, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, some of the clauses in this bill sceem to be rather queer but I shall wait until the house is in committee to ask the minister for explanations thereof. Our approval of the second reading of the bill must not be taken to preclude us from attacking the principle of the bill, if we deem such action necessary.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

On section 1—Appointment of deputy commissioner.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What is the necessity of appointing a deputy commissioner? My understanding at the introduction of the bill was that because of the taking over by the government of the policing of the western provinces it might be thought to be useful to have a representative of the commissioner, namely a deputy commissioner, remain in the west to act as the commissioner is acting here in Ottawa. However, the minister stated that the intention is to have the deputy commissioner located in Ottawa. I do not see the necessity of creating a new position of this kind, a position which will obviously carry a high salary. The assistant commissioners are able to do the necessary work without one of them being given the title and salary of a deputy commissioner. My hon. friend spoke of the discipline of the force, but I do not think a deputy commissioner would have more authority than have the assistant commissioners. There is probably no body of men in Canada or elsewhere where better discipline or esprit de corps exists than in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and this fact makes me a little suspicious that this is merely a move to give a good position to someone.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, may I say that in connection with matters of organization and discipline in the force generally, as Minister of Justice, I am obliged to rely almost exclusively on the advice given by the present commissioner of the force. The force has been considerably augmented since August 1, 1930, when this government came into power. The present strength is 1,550 as compared with a strength of 1,217 on August 1, 1930. In addition to this increase, certain members of the preventive service have been taken into the force. A special selection has been made of those best fitted for duty in the service, and 350 members of the preventive service will be taken into the force. When introducing the resolution I stated that upon the completion of the whole program the total force would number 2,000 but I now find it will number 2,010; the mounted police numbering 1,660 and the preventive service, 350.

As the committee is well aware, we have taken over the police forces of six provinces, whereas in the past we policed only the province of Saskatchewan. Major General MacBrien, an officer of very great ability and experience, has informed me that in his opinion it will be necessary to have someone promoted to the rank of deputy commissioner. It is true that at the present time there are four or five assistant commissioners scattered throughout Canada, but in the opinion of the commissioner it is necessary to have someone in command or control when he himself might be absent on police business. This will not involve any material increase in expense as the present senior assistant commissioner at Ottawa will be promoted to the rank of deputy commissioner and, speaking offhand, I do not think there will be any increase in salary. This deputy commissioner will have the power and authority to act as commissioner when the commissioner finds it necessary to be absent from Ottawa.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. HEAPS: Can the minister advise the committee as to the number of men taken over from the provincial governments?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have not the number, but I have the amounts to be contributed by the different provinces which give a fair idea of the number of men involved, as, generally speaking, it is computed at the rate of $1,000 per man. The province of Alberta will pay $225,000 per annum, which would be about 225 men; Saskatchewan, $250,000; Manitoba, —this is marked "estimate"—$125,000; Nova Scotia, $125,000. This memorandum was prepared before the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island agreements were signed, but my recollection is that the amount for New Brunswick is $125,000 and for Prince Edward Island, $15,000. In Prince Edward Island there will be fifteen men; in New Brunswick, either 100 or 125; in Nova Scotia, 125; in Manitoba, 125; in Saskatchewan, I would assume, 250, and in Alberta, 225.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the figure of 2,010, which the minister has given, include all the men taken over?

Mr. GUTHRIE: All the men.

Mr. EULER: How many members of the preventive service have been incorporated in the mounted police, and is that process completed?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The Department of National Revenue has selected the list and submitted the names to the commissioner of police. He is engaged now in making his selection; in fact, I think he has pretty well completed it. There will be approximately 350 men taken from the preventive service into the police.

Mr. RALSTON: Out of how many?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think 250 will not be required.

Mr. GRAY: Did the Department of National Revenue recommend the men to be taken over by the commissioner?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They made the selection and submitted it to the commissioner. Unless there be any serious reason in regard to any particular man, no change is made in the selection submitted by the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps I should ask the question of the Minister of National Revenue when we come to his estimates, but what connection will remain between the Department of National Revenue and these men who have now become members of the mounted police? The work in connection with the prevention of smuggling and so on is done in the Department of National Revenue. I should like to know what part, if any, in the administration of that work still remains with the Department of National Revenue, and how they work together with the mounted police.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think we are taking it all over except one branch. We are taking over the marine service, the special investigation branch, the secret preventive service branch, and the air wing, but one small section, which I think is called the investigation branch, is to remain in the Department of National Revenue. It is really the preventive branch pure and simple that we are taking over; that is for the prevention of smuggling.

Mr. EULER: Is there any overlapping of authority between the two departments?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No.

Mr. EULER: May I take it that the mounted police will be entirely in charge of the prevention of smuggling?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They will be entirely in charge.

Mr. VENIOT: Take the case of an international bridge. For instance, there is the St. Stephen international bridge between Calais, Maine, and St. Stephen, New Brunswick. We have on the Canadian side an officer and I think there is a customs house at the end of the bridge. Will the mounted police have anything to do with that or will the men be replaced by the mounted police?

Mr. GUTHRIE: If a preventive officer is there at present—and I think there is one—that man will be taken into the mounted police, but he will likely be continued at his post.

Mr. HEENAN: Can the minister tell us the difference between the wages which these preventive service men are now receiving and those which they will receive when the transfer is made?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not sure whether I could state that definitely. When the estimates are under consideration I shall be in a position to do so, but my impression is that they are taken on at police pay. A policeman, on being recruited, receives $2 a day with, of course, allowances; he gets his clothes and his board. After some years' service that pay is increased and naturally it is increased with the various ranks as he goes up. But I cannot now say definitely just how the pay in the preventive service compares with that in the mounted police service, although I shall get that from the commissioner when the estimates are before the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Since the provinces have agreed to this arrangement, I suppose one can hardly raise objection in this house, although I should point out that it was because of the straitened circumstances in which the provinces found themselves that this arrangement was consented to. The other day the Prime Minister told us that this would involve a saving especially in overhead, and yet I note now that already we are being asked to extend the expenditures connected with the overhead. According to a return brought down a few weeks ago I notice that in this department we have already four civil servants receiving from $4,000 to $4,900 and one, I presume the commissioner, receiving $12,000 or over. It seems rather strange with these already high salaries and with the claims made recently that the members of this force should not receive any cuts, that another highly paid official should be appointed.

I wish to point out what seems to me a very great danger of centralization of the police force of this country. I hope I am mistaken, but I think this looks in the direction of military repression. We have under our eyes the spectacle of the transformation of a police force into a military force. The other day the Prime Minister suggested that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police was, in essence, a military force and it ought to come under the same provisions and exemptions as would such a force. At least that is what I took from the statement he made. I am very much afraid that with a central authority at Ottawa we may develop an arbitrary method of dealing with the existing situation which may prove to be disastrous. We have already had brought to our attention in the last few months the spy system which has been adopted by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Under this spy system officers of the police disguised themselves and for long years carried on inquiries within certain organizations. Frankly, I am particularly concerned with the effect upon the labour organizations. Several years ago one of these police spies actually worked his way up until he became secretary of a labour union and a delegate to the Trades and Labour Council of Regina. He was a member of the communist organization, but he also became secretary of a labour union. I object to labour being considered dangerous in character and to having government officials push their way into trade union or other labour class organizations in order to spy upon them. If we are going to do that with regard to labour organizations, we are equally justified in doing it with regard to certain large companies such as banks and so forth. I fancy the latter are much more dangerous to the welfare of the country at large than are the labour organizations. Personally, I want to express my disgust at the despicable methods which in the past both under this and under the past administration have been adopted in developing the spy system. I do not know whether it still prevails or not, but a few years ago we had the police employing people from American detective firms under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and turning these men into provocative agents. Again and again when visiting in the mining camps in the west I have had labour people come to me and say: If there is any suggestion made in the way of provoking trouble be careful, because that suggestion comes from an agent of the government. I say, Mr. Chairman, that that method is beneath contempt. That officials operating under a government department should deliberately set about to provoke action and then afterwards lay charges against those who follow their lead, revolts one's sense of decency. It came out in connection with some of our Winnipeg troubles a few years ago that a certain constable in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had actually sold literature which he knew to be banned in order to lay charges against those who subsequently handled that literature. I think that a situation of that kind should not be tolerated.

Further, I note that there is to be provision made in this bill—I might as well mention it now because I do not want to take up an undue amount of time—for the enlistment of constables without pay. Either that means, I take it, that we are going to adopt press gang methods and force people to carry out certain police duties without pay, or it means that certain privileged people are to have the right to work in a general way under the police force without having to assume any very great responsibility for their personal actions. The Secretary of State told us a few weeks ago of an occasion when he had to stand off the civil and provincial police in the city of Montreal at his election booth. Now I can readily understand that if this bill is adopted it might very well be that certain people would exercise a very decided influence in political and industrial matters, and armed with the power of the law, although receiving no police salary, they would be able to dictate to the private citizens what could be done, and themselves be immune, having special privileges. I object to any provision of that kind.

Further than that, we were told by the Minister of Justice just now that the commissioner desires to be out of the city in the performance of his duties. I have no objection whatever to that, but I do think it is highly desirable that the commissioner should restrict his activities to his police duties proper. A few weeks ago Major-General J. H. MacBrien, the present commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, was reported to have said when addressing a "Vimy night" gathering in Toronto:

> It is notable that ninety-nine per cent of these fellows—

He was speaking of the communists:

> —are foreigners, and many of them have not been here long. The best thing to do would be to send them back where they came from, in every possible way.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: He continued:

> If we were rid of them, there would be no unemployment or unrest in Canada.

I do not hear the hon. gentlemen who said "hear, hear," earlier on, endorsing that statement. My point is that whilst it is perfectly competent and fitting for any member of parliament to express his views with regard to the communists, it is not fitting that the head of the mounted police should so express himself in public gatherings.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Why not?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will read an extract from an editorial in the Western Producer of April 21 last, commenting on this speech as reported:

> These remarks are strongly reminiscent of a certain brand of irresponsible politician, and in uttering them the commissioner did not distinguish himself as a public servant, nor contribute in any degree whatever to the solution of the difficult problems of the hour. On the contrary, if he really believes what he is reported to have said, he reveals himself as a very foolish and amazingly uninformed man. Of the many suggestions for curing unemployment, Commissioner MacBrien's should rank among the first for ineptitude and silliness. Apart from this aspect of the incident, however, it would seem to be much more fitting for the head of our police force, in his public actions and remarks, to direct his attention to the enforcement of the multitude of laws which are already on the statute books rather than to join the ranks of that huge army of busybodies who never weary of demanding new enactments so that their petty prejudices might be elevated to the rank of public nuisances by receiving the sanction of law.

I will quote one other paragraph which I think contains the core of the whole matter:

> It is of primary importance that the public should have implicit faith in the absolute impartiality of the police, and that anything which has a tendency to shake that faith should be avoided.

I heartily agree with that position. I believe it to be absolutely sound.

Mr. STANLEY: There is no doubt about that. But why is the hon. gentleman trying to shake public faith in the police?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am trying to shake faith in a commissioner who will get up and make such partisan statements as that.

Mr. STANLEY: Would the hon. gentleman do away with the police force?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I hope the hon. gentleman does not believe me to be as silly as the police commissioner is reported to have been.

Mr. QUINN: What does the hon. member mean by partisan? Partisan so far as the communists are concerned?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Perhaps instead of saying a partisan statement, I should have said an ex parte statement. Perhaps that would have been more correct and would appeal to my legal friends opposite. I say that undoubtedly it is advisable that in this country we should maintain law and order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My hon. friends agree, but I want to suggest that the maintenance of law and order may readily be interpreted to be the maintenance of the status quo, and that is another matter altogether.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: May I ask the hon. member a question? So far as his sympathy with labour is concerned I fully appreciate everything that he has said in that regard.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have the floor, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury): If the hon. gentleman does not permit a question—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I thought it was a statement that was coming, but if it is a question—

Mr. MACDOUGALL: It is a question. My hon. friend has spoken of law and order. Only a little while ago—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is not a question.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: All right. I will reply to you when you are through.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have no objection to that whatever. As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, the maintenance of law and order is something very different from the maintenance of the status quo, and it does seem to me that there is room and need for a very decided agitation to change the economic conditions that prevail at the present time. After all, a government that cannot arrange matters so that the people can be fed is not going to claim for very long the loyalty of the population. I think we have to recognize that. There is even something to be said with regard to those who are trying to bring in reforms by means of force.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): By means of force?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes. There is something to be said on their behalf. They have a certain weight of historical evidence in their favour.

Mr. STANLEY: The communists?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I said that those who are advocating the bringing in of reforms by means of force have a certain weight of historical evidence in their favour. Someone has expressed it thus:

> No nation ever became truly great save by successful sedition and revolution. The lamp and the torch and the tumult have overcome tyranny. The signature of King John was placed to the Magna Charta, wrenched from him by the nobles; revolution led King Charles to the block; the corn law riots—these were crimes against the law and sedition, but no one hangs his head in shame because of them. "Liberty, equality, fraternity," were no mere catchwords as in the French revolution, but the expression of the earnest striving for the substance that lies behind the words.

When I began reading I heard someone says, "communist." No; although this article is very much in harmony with communist teaching the remarks contained therein were reported to be uttered by Mr. R. B. Graham, K.C., police magistrate in my own city of Winnipeg. On that occasion he was proposing a toast to England, and Mr. Jackson Dodds of the Bankers' Association was presiding. I respectfully suggest that when men of outstanding ability and position back up the idea that we must bring about reforms by force it is not very much wonder that communists and others echo the words. I want to say I refuse to accept that point of view; I refuse to accept it. If I believed it I presume I would join the communists.

An hon. MEMBER: Why do you talk about it?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have refused to accept that point of view. I have the firm conviction that in international affairs war does not bring peace. I have held that view for some years, and still believe in it. I believe further that in these days when our delegation is at Geneva at the disarmament conference this country ought not to wait until somebody else takes the lead, but that we ought to be in the very forefront in urging disarmament, and ourselves setting the example by giving up armaments. I do not believe international affairs can be settled by war, that war brings peace or that armaments are in any way an assurance against war.

So in national affairs, I do not believe repressive measures develop respect for law. In England most of the constables are armed with bludgeons; they are not allowed to carry guns. In the United States they carry guns, and there is much less respect for law and order in that country than there is in old England. It seems to me we are in danger of following the lead of the United States, and I believe honestly—and that is the reason I am bringing this matter up—that if we adopt repressive measures we are bound to reap results in a saturnalia of lawlessness throughout the country. If people think they can bring about reforms only by riots, and if they are refused opportunities to parade or to hold public meetings, if they are hounded, and if they are spied upon the inevitable result will be that the movement will be driven underground, and we will see in Canada the same conditions that resulted in Russia when the Czar undertook to keep his people under.

I believe economic justice is the only basis of permanent stability in society. In my judgment we have not that justice. Before I sit down I should like to read an article I came across a few days ago which appeared in The Nation—I believe it is the Irish Nation—under date of May 2, 1931. I call this article particularly to the attention of some of my Roman Catholic friends who are inclined to be very much afraid of anything in the shape of communism, because they fear it will in some way interfere with private property.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: From what is the hon. member quoting?

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Nation of May 2, 1931. It is as follows:

> Recently Reverend Doctor P. Coffey of Maynooth writing in The Clergy Review stated a discovery he had made. It was that the present economic organization of humanity committed that moral wrong so long charged against communism, namely the denial of the right of private property. For that doctrine communism has been condemned as the enemy of the natural as well as the divine law. And capitalism has for centuries called the churches to its defence on the grounds that it not only admitted but was based on this right of private property. Doctor Coffey finds it to be based on the very opposite:
> "This grave discovery," he says, "has been made and demonstrated in recent years by scientific analysis of the policy which actually directs the financing of industry. . . . The proletariat (are) kept in propertyless dependence on a money wage that intermittently provides them with a bare subsistence. . . .
> The fact that the system prevails in Christian countries does not make it Christian. The fact that it automatically deprives the preponderating majority of the adult citizens of all real opportunity of ever becoming private owners of productive property proves it not to be a system of private capital ownership, but a system of enforced propertyless wage serfdom."

I commend those words of Father Coffey to the members of this house. What situation do we find in Canada? We are told that we have nearly 500,000 unemployed. I understand that before very long a measure is to be brought down giving authority to the government to deal with this matter. It is significant however that at the time we are bringing down relief measures we are also asking for increased police powers. I do not like it; I am afraid of it, because I say that in extending repressive measures the house would be adopting a method which sooner or later is bound to bring about serious reaction. Let us consider a few illustrations of the last few days. Only this morning I received a telegram from the west stating that certain men had been apprehended by the Royal Canadian Mounted police, and were being summarily deported. I am trying to get the details from the Department of Immigration. If however we are to adopt the method of simply picking up people and deporting them after merely departmental trial, what is going to be the effect upon hundreds of people who themselves are essentially in similar positions? A few weeks ago a representative of the returned men, a representative of the men employed by the Canadian National Railways in my own city, and a representative of the management, went through a list of employees of the road to pick out those who were not yet naturalized in order that they should be dismissed, and that Canadian born men should have preference. I have protested as vigorously as anybody against the influx of immigrants to Canada. I want to take the position however—and I believe my views are very much the same as those expressed by the minister a few nights ago—that if these people are encouraged to come to Canada or are permitted to come they should have the full rights of Canadian citizenship. I think that is in keeping with the conventions of the League of Nations.

Mr. GORDON: Provided they are prepared to conform to Canadian laws.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite right. But I say it is not fair for men who have been in this country five, ten, fifteen or twenty years, honest, upright workmen—it is not fair that at this time of stress they should be discriminated against and dismissed simply because they are foreigners, and when they become a public charge that they should be deported from the country. Remember, Mr. Chairman, that almost half of our population west of the great lakes is non-Anglo Saxon in origin. What kind of a country are we going to develop before very long if we allow racial discrimination of this kind to creep in? We are going to transform that part of Canada into a regular Balkan country. If we are to build up a unified people in Canada it must be done by giving every one a chance, whatever his origin, once he has been allowed to come into this country. When I think of the positive injustice of it; when I think of the way in which immigrants have been induced to come here, leaving their old homes in central Europe, selling their property, breaking up all the connections they held dear and migrating to this "land of plenty," I have a great sympathy for them. It is not their fault that the world depression has come about, and we should be men enough and big enough to recognize that they are a part of us; we should not force them to carry too great a part of the burden.

Take another section of our population, composed of men of all the different races, the casual labourers. They were brought to this country in very large numbers. They helped build our railroads and our great construction works; they dug our sewers and did the rough work in connection with the construction of our cities. They went into the lumber camps and worked there. Now the greater part of this sort of work is finished, and I think we must recognize that probably we will never have a period of construction comparable to the period we had during the building of the three great transcontinental systems and other great works. There you have tens of thousands of transient, unskilled labourers thrown upon the labour market. They form a great part of the people who today are in our bread lines and soup kitchens. I do not much wonder that these people are getting restless. They have been told again and again that prosperity is around the corner but now they have waited two or three years. They were told that when the spring opened up everything would be well, but last spring opened up and things were no better than they were during the previous winter. Now these men are beginning to say, "Well, what about us?" We say they should be put into camps, and in my opinion they will be better in camps, as I suggested the other day, than they will be hanging around the cities. But the tendency seems to be to put them in camps and pay them a mere pittance, on which they can never hope to become independent. I urge that if you take thousands of these men and force them to live in idleness and in celibacy week after week, month after month and year after year, their moral fibre will be sapped, and that sort of group of men will become a menace to the community.

I am taking this opportunity, Mr. Chairman, to say that in this parliament we ought frankly to face the serious situation that is before us. Instead of further increasing our police force and adopting other repressive measures of that kind we should bend all our energies to giving these men an opportunity. Once you have a contented citizenship you will not need police except in the case of the very rare man who is abnormal in his whole makeup. If we have justice in this country and if there is a chance for people to earn an honest livelihood we will not need the increases which are asked for in this measure.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: When my hon. friend was speaking I did not wish to interrupt, but as one who has actually done some work in his day and who has associated with labour I feel that my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre is not half as competent to speak for labour as is the average member of this house, whether he be Liberal or Conservative. I doubt very much if a drop of honest sweat, occasioned by labour, has fallen from the brow of my hon. friend for the last twenty-five years; if it had it would have been as priceless as a positive cure for cancer. These be the gentry, the men who never worked, who in the House of Commons represent labour.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think in all fairness, Mr. Chairman, statements that are absolutely untrue should not be made in that way.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: They have not been challenged yet.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I challenge them now.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Very well; then we find this, that my hon. friend stands as the representative of labour to-day and denies to anyone else the right to say anything in regard to labour.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Not at all; I quite agree that my hon. friend has a perfect right to speak for labour, because labour elected him.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Yes, and if they knew my hon. friend as well as they know me I have no doubt what their selection would be. But I say this: When my hon. friend discusses the aspirations and aims of organized labour throughout Canada he will get no support stronger than the support I will give him, but I do not think he should exclude anyone else who wishes to say a word on that subject. The hon. gentleman says he did not intend to do so; I made a note of his speech, and that was the inference I took from it.

Now I should like to say a word in regard to communism, of which the hon. member made a very poor defence a moment ago. I am not a communist; I do not believe in communism, and the church to which I belong does not believe in communism. That point was called into question by my hon. friend opposite. Now I want to ask my hon. friend if he believes in communism or if he is a communist. Will he be courageous enough to stand up in his place and answer that question? I will resume my seat and give him an opportunity to do so. I pause for an answer.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the hon. gentleman really want an answer?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Certainly.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will have to take a moment or two to answer that question, if I may be permitted to do so.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton South): May I point out to the committee that in my opinion this discussion is quite apart from the question under consideration?

[Mr. MacDougall.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am very willing to answer if I am given an opportunity.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: All I want is yes or no.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The whole question depends upon—

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Yes or no.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am reminded of the man who asked, "Have you left off beating your wife—yes or no? This is a question of that kind. I may say I do not belong to the communist party.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I did not ask whether you belonged to the communist party; are you a communist—yes or no? The hon. gentleman, who according to himself is the custodian of the rights of labour in this house, was the only man in this parliament who suggested that the unemployed should be conscripted and made to work for a dollar a day. Let any person in this country read the records of this house and it will be found that this statement is absolutely correct.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In order to keep the record straight I say that this statement is incorrect.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton South): My hon. friend will have an opportunity to reply later.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Let us get back to the question before the committee. My hon. friend takes very serious objection to certain increases in the personnel of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I ask him, or any other member of this house, this question: What do the Royal Canadian Mounted Police do but provide security for the homes of myself and my hon. friend who has just spoken? After all, the law is a danger only to the evildoer; no one need be afraid of the maintenance of law and order. The hon. member some weeks ago criticized the present Minister of Justice because at a certain meeting at Geneva, if I mistake not, he said that we maintained a police force to enforce law and order so that every man, irrespective of whether he was a Labour representative, or a Conservative or a Liberal, might have security in his own home. In regard to the single officers, I would ask the Minister of Justice whether it is fair that the salaries of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who are now doing the work of preventive officers should be reduced from $1,500 to $700 a year.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think there is any intention of such a reduction.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) evidently does not know anything of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I do not know where he gets his information. It is my privilege to have associated with this body of men for forty-five years, and during the time I have lived in their headquarters in Regina I have met every commissioner, and I can say that I have never come across finer men. The present commissioner's opinions and his citizenship are as satisfactory to me to-day as are the opinions of the Western Producer. I would not read that paper anyway. Let me remind the hon. gentleman that the majority governs in Canada, and not the minority whose opinions he voices. He does not seem to get that into his head.

During the time I have known the mounted police I have met dozens of superintendents and hundreds of constables, having been associated with them not only at headquarters but in detachment camps. I therefore know something about the men who enforce the law, and I can say that they administer it impartially, justly, wisely and well. Anyone who has had the experience my hon. friend has mentioned deserves what he gets.

There are two opinions with regard to the force: one opinion is that of ninety-five per cent of our people, and we respect and honour that majority; the other opinion is that of the five per cent who make up the thieves, scoundrels, skunks and villains, and they do not like the force. I would get into better company if I were the hon. gentleman; let him come across and sit with us. We recognize the fact that the majority of our people rule and make the laws that govern Canada.

Let me take you back to the year 1911. I happened to be the Conservative candidate in Regina against the Hon. Mr. Martin, and he licked me by one thousand. Since then we have been personal friends, and no better man than he could be found in Canada. Well, when the Conservatives came into power the patronage fell to me—and patronage was patronage in those days. It was not like the Civil Service Commission; we did business in a businesslike way. Shortly afterwards a delegation came to my office from the new village of Ceylon, and told me they wanted to get a detachment of mounted police in the town. It occurred to me that perhaps the delegation wanted extra business that would result from having a detachment there. I told them that, of course, the force was not maintained for commercial purposes, and I asked what they wanted a detachment for. They told me they had a nest of very bad men in the town, men who had come across from Montana and established themselves there. They were rustlers of every kind, and the people of the town did not like the look of them. They were the worst type of men and the delegation wanted a detachment to drive them out. The women were afraid to go out at night. I called in the commissioner, whom I knew every well, and repeated what the delegation had told me. He said he would look into the matter and do whatever he thought was necessary. When the commissioner made that statement I knew that whatever was necessary would be done, and so I forgot all about the matter. A month or so afterwards the leader of the delegation came back to my office and said that he wanted to thank me for the police protection I had been instrumental in providing. I asked him whether the detachment had gone down. He said in reply, "I don't know what you call a detachment, but they sent down one man and he cleaned up the place." I was astonished; I asked what he had done. What had happened? This man then told me: "Well, as soon as that bunch of thieves and skunks and scoundrels got sight of a redcoat they took to their heels and beat it back to Montana. They did not stop to gather up their belongings but just cleared out, and we have never heard of them since." I asked whether one man had done all that? Did he have any gun? No; he just walked into the place and these scoundrels from Montana simply cleared out. They knew that if they dared to interfere with that one man in the scarlet coat he would settle them singlehanded or, if the whole bunch got the best of him, then the full force of the British Empire would be there to vindicate British authority.

I say to my hon. friend that the majority of the people in this country are determined that authority and justice shall prevail. If the hon. gentleman does not like British justice and authority, then he had better continue to talk as he has been talking.

Mr. ILSLEY: Am I correct in understanding that out of about 600 members of the preventive force, 350 have been taken over by the mounted police?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Have or will be.

Mr. ILSLEY: Could the minister advise the committee as to the basis of selection?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The selection is made by the Department of National Revenue according to the record of service. The recommendations of the department are submitted to the commissioner, and I think in almost every case they have been accepted.

Mr. ILSLEY: My information is that political considerations have entered into the selection of these officers. Before I go any further, I should like to ask if that has been the basis of selection in the past?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It has had absolutely nothing to do with it since August 1, 1930.

Mr. ILSLEY: How does the force select its new recruits?

Mr. GUTHRIE: A man first makes an application; he is then examined by a competent board and if he meets with the educational, physical and mental requirements of the force and there is a vacancy on the force, he is accepted.

Mr. ILSLEY: I desire to bring to the attention of the minister a case in my constituency which I consider to be one of absolute injustice. I do not believe in taking up the time of the committee or the house in discussing individual cases, unless they strike me as being absolutely unjust. A few moments ago the minister said that the selection from the preventive service was based upon the records of the men. In one of the towns in my constituency there resides a young man who has been a member of the preventive force for the last three or four years. Perhaps before I go any further the minister could advise if access could be had to the records of this man?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will have no objection to giving the record to my hon. friend, but I do not think I would like to state it in the committee.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall call and look at the record but I am very sure that there is nothing against this man. He is a fine type of preventive officer and is well spoken of where he lives and does his work. He has a wife and five children and has attended to his duties carefully and well since his appointment. In the same town resides another man who was appointed to the preventive force very recently and who has had no service at all. I cannot tell the minister just how many days' service he has had, but it does not amount to anything. The first man finds himself let out while the second man has been taken into the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. In this case the selection could not have been made upon the service record. The first man belongs to the Liberal party while the second man belongs to the Conservative party and took an active part during the last elections. It is currently reported that this man has been appointed as a reward for the work he did during the elections. That is what the people in that town and I believe, and I am calling this instance to the attention of the minister because of the fact that the people in that part of Nova Scotia believe that for the first time in its history that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is recruiting its force on political consideration.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The case mentioned by my hon. friend has never been brought to my notice. If he will give me the name I will have the record placed before him. I might say that I have never been consulted by the commissioner in regard to a single appointment. The commissioner is now in the gallery and I suggest to my hon. friend that he go and discuss this case with him.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would point out that the commissioner would not have anything to do with these appointments, it would be the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The commissioner would be the man who would finally make the appointment. In response to a question asked the other day, I submitted a list of 49 names, but I have not been consulted about one name. My only information as to the method of selection is that it is made on the grounds of meritorious service in the department. The names were submitted to the commissioner by the department and if for any reason unknown to me he sees fit to reject any particular man he does so, but he does not refer to me.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is obvious from what I have said that no blame attaches to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) or to the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police; the blame attaches to the person or persons in the Department of National Revenue who made the selection.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know that there would be any blame as the record may disclose something.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will change that: the blame, if any, would attach to the Department of National Revenue. Of course, the commissioner is limited to the list placed before him, which list does not embrace all the officers in the preventive service. I am challenging the making up of that list. I have other instances in mind, but I have confined myself to this particular one. I have no objection to giving the name. The preventive officer who has the record of good service is Willard Wood, while the man who has only had a few days' service, and who could not have been taken in on the basis of service, is George Churchill. I am not saying that Churchill will not make a good officer, but so far there has been nothing to indicate whether or not he will. I have not had access to the files but I would be very much surprised if there is anything against the record of Wood. I think the same would be true of other preventive officers in the province of Nova Scotia who have been let out.

Mr. MOORE (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): I think the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) is absolutely wrong in his inferences, and I base that statement upon the experience I have had in my constituency. I understand that the ratings of the men are based upon the reports of the divisional chiefs. The general record of this man Wood may have been good, while his rating for efficiency may have been poor. I think the divisional chiefs base their idea of a man's efficiency upon the number of seizures he has been able to make.

Mr. VENIOT: Not at all.

Mr. MOORE (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): I have seen some of the records and I know the men in my constituency.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is a poor basis.

Mr. MOORE (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): There are eight preventive officers in my constituency, all Liberals with one exception. Although one man has a record of drunkenness, they are all being put on the force. I have seen some of these reports and I know that one of the men who has been the longest in my constituency has the best record for efficiency, but it does not follow that he would be at the top of the list sent in to the commissioner. The divisional chief, for some reason or other—I have not been able to find out what it was; but I know it is not a bona fide one—reported adversely. This man has been under my observation for some years and he has the worst rating of any. In my division there are a couple of men who have been bootlegging. They happen to be Liberals.

Mr. JACOBS: Not all Liberals are bootleggers.

Mr. MOORE (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): No, I hope not.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MOORE (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): I have spoken because I really believe the hon. member for Hants-Kings is wrong in his inferences and interpretation.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): How does my hon. friend know?

Mr. MOORE (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): I know from observation.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): It is a special case.

Mr. MOORE (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): Yes, but he mentioned several cases. I do not mean to say that things of this kind do not happen occasionally. I am sure they have happened quite frequently under the late government; we know they have, and of course they may happen under the present government. But to blame the service for sending in men with bad ratings because they happen to be Conservatives, is positively wrong. If they were placed in the service on that basis, some in my district would have been cleaned out, and they are all in the service.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not have brought the matter up had it not been for the fact that the man, Churchill, has had practically no service at all. Therefore I do not see how he can be kept on unless the other man is also, as the latter has a good record.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the money collected by the preventive service or the mounted police be directed to the Department of Finance or to the preventive service branch at Ottawa?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The money collected in fines or penalties or seizures goes into the general funds of the country, less a commission that is allowed under our Excise Act, and I think in customs cases too, to the informer. That commission used to be 50 per cent; it is now reduced to 25 per cent, and the balance goes into the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. YOUNG: Is it true that the mounted police will not engage a married man?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Generally speaking, that is true. A certain percentage of married men is allowed on the establishment, and that percentage is generally filled to the limit. The regulations provide that for recruiting purposes only men between twenty-two and twenty-eight years of age, unmarried, are accepted, but there is at Ottawa a division of the mounted police known as "A" Division where the men are used not so much for police work as for the guarding of buildings and the like. In that division married men are allowed. As a consequence, the applicants for it are very numerous; there is a long waiting list, but for ordinary recruiting purposes the age is from twenty-two to twenty-eight, unmarried.

Mr. BROWN: In the selection of men for the preventive force, will the fact of their being married or otherwise be taken into consideration?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think that has been omitted in the preventive force on account of the previous record of these men in the department.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): If men marry while on the force, will they be dismissed?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They cannot, without obtaining permission, get married and remain on the force and they are not entitled to obtain that permission until they have been in the service for a considerable time, I think twelve years.

Mr. YOUNG: I believe the object in making that regulation was to keep the force as mobile as possible. That was in the days of the purely mounted police when they were policing a vast, unsettled country, but now with the provincial police force taken over, most of the men will be permanently located in certain places. Will it not be possible now to alter that regulation to some extent?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The question of expense enters largely into the matter of a married establishment. A married man receives allowances for his wife and family and he has to have family quarters just as is the case in the army. It is more expensive to maintain a force where a large number of the men are married. There is, however, no permanent place of residence in connection with any of these forces; they may be moved around at the will of the commissioner, and when you come to move married men with their families, you have to pay the expense of moving which is very considerable.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Appointment of constables, trumpeters and buglers.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What is the purpose of appointing boys as trumpeters and buglers? I do not see the usefulness of trumpeters and buglers in a police force. I am afraid the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is right in saying that possibly the commissioner does not forget his former prominent activities as head of the Canadian militia. I quite understand the necessity of trumpeters and buglers in military camps, but in a police force—

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am afraid my hon. friend has forgotten his own record as Minister of Justice in charge of this force.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think I ever appointed buglers.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am sure the hon. member did.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not remember doing so.

Mr. GUTHRIE: He will find them in Regina.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend may be able to show where I have done this awful thing, but if I have, I am sorry for it, and I would advise my hon. friend not to follow my example because it is certainly wrong.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There have been buglers and trumpeters in the force for many years, but they have grown old. The idea is if you take on a trumpeter or a bugler, you ought to take on a young man, as is done in the army. We have had a number of applications from lads of fifteen, sixteen or seventeen and we cannot accept them because the minimum age is twenty-two. It is the young lads who make the best kind of buglers and trumpeters. There is no idea of increasing the force; possibly one or two only will be taken on. There is no power, under the act as it stands at present, to recruit young lads.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The words in the clause are new. Were the present buglers and trumpeters appointed without authority?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No. They were recruited in the ordinary way; men from twenty-two and older were made into trumpeters and buglers, but this is to meet the case of young lads who desire to join as trumpeters and buglers.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But to what use are they put?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They have always had them in the force. It must be remembered that the mounted police is trained on a military basis, more like a cavalry regiment and in such regiments trumpeters and buglers are looked upon as an absolute necessity.

Mr. JACOBS: Not for the preventive part of the service, I hope; they will be notifying the smugglers.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That might be a good thing. This is asking power to enlist only one or two boys.

Mr. LAPOINTE: All right. As regards subsection (4) I should like to know the reason for giving the commissioner authority for employing in emergency cooks, stenographers, tailors, interpreters and so forth? What kind of emergency would necessitate the appointment of cooks and tailors "for such periods as may be required"?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The object is to avoid swearing them in and making them permanent members of the force. In case of an emergency at some distant point we might have to equip an expedition to go almost up to the Arctic circle, and in such cases heretofore it has been the custom to take on special men. I think the note on page two explains the position. This provision is being inserted at the request of the commissioner to enable the police to take on such cooks and artisans as may be necessary for any particular work without enlisting them as members of the force, and it is provided that they shall not be entitled to anything in the way of pension unless they are recommended for special merit by the commissioner.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Subsection 6 of section 2, respecting the appointment of special constables without pay, seems to be an extraordinary provision. It provides that the commissioner may——appoint without pay special constables . . . for a period not exceeding twelve months at any one time for the purpose of maintaining law and order at the request of any department of the government.

Surely an emergency that would last for twelve months would not be far from becoming a permanent situation, a chronic emergency. Is there not some danger in authorizing the commissioner to appoint men without pay for a period of time as long as twelve months, men who will have the rights and the privileges of a constable or police officer, with power to arrest without warning people who are suspected, as constables can do under certain sections of the criminal code without being liable to damage action, and with power to interfere generally with other people's activities? I do not know that under the section it would not even be possible to appoint the friends of one party as special constables to go into political meetings and interfere with what the other party was doing. There is some danger there. It is important to have a good, strong regular police force, but we should surround that force with respect and consideration. We should not give to people appointed at large, merely at the will of the commissioner, supposedly on the recommendation of somebody, power to interfere with other people and clothe them with all the authority of a constable or police officer. My hon. friends should give good reasons for the enacting of this very special provision.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The object is in case of an emergency in what you might call a more remote part of the Dominion of Canada, where sometimes large bodies of men are employed at mining and the like; where for some reason or another there maye be an outbreak against law and order, and where the police force may be very limited. The place might be so remote that it would take considerable time to get a respectable force of men sent there to preserve law and order. This merely gives power to swear in special constables.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does that mean that the management of the company is to be sworn in and given positions as special constables?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It does not mean that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Who is likely to be sworn in?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is permitted only on request of a department of the government, and only under the administration of a very competent officer, the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. There is no idea or intention of abusing any power that may be given to this force. Of course, you may abuse almost any law, particularly any restrictive law, that you place on the statute books. But the object is not to abuse the law, but simply to see that it is fairly and generally administered. This is power to appoint constables for a limited time, at the request of a department of the government, if an emergency should arise. It is on the advice of the commissioner that this clause has been introduced. He thinks it may be useful. We are all aware that in British Columbia at the present moment a situation which may become serious has developed in the Doukhobor settlement, where some one or two hundred have already been apprehended in connection with nude parades, with respect to which we passed a special section of the criminal code last session. There are some fifteen hundred Doukhobors in the district, and a very limited police force available to maintain law and order. We do not maintain a police force in that province, but we cooperate with the local force. We have no power at the present time to take on any special constables in case an emergency might develop. I do not say that it is likely to develop at the present moment, but it might, and in that case it would be very useful if we were able to swear in a few special constables for the purpose of maintaining law and order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think we all recognize the danger of company police. I have seen company police in many industrial sections of the United States. I recall very well that when the former administration was in office the then Minister of the Interior wrote a document saying that he held the company in the particular area concerned responsible for the administration of law and order. It is a dangerous provision.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is to take it away from the company and put it in the hands of the police.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But under this section the police might nominate some company official and give him authority which would be arbitrarily used.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is a very remote contingency, I think.

Mr. HEENAN: I would ask this question for information. Suppose the commissioner wishes to increase the police force at some remote point by appointing special constables without pay, and he cannot get anyone to join the force; has he the right to compel them to be sworn in as special constables?

Mr. GUTHRIE: None whatever.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: One other point. The minister speaks of this provision being necessary for remote districts. May I ask him very definitely what the object is in having in Regina a group of men known as the Riot Squad, who were signed up for duty lasting one year, and whose services may be dispensed with on summary notice? I should like to quote a few paragraphs from an article which appeared in the Regina Daily Star of January 28, 1932, entitled, "Special Riot 'Squad' Training in Regina for 'Just in Case'." The article says:

> R.C.M.P. unit formed as aftermath of disturbances.
> Something new in Royal Canadian Mounted Police work and an outcome of disturbances throughout the country last fall, a "riot squad," composed of men enlisted for a special period of training lasting one year is in the making at Regina headquarters.
> One of the principal features of his special course of training is the attention given to drill with rifles and firearms. Particular stress is laid on bayonet drill, the members of the squad receiving two periods of such drill daily.
> When asked the reason for the creation of this squad, Assistant Commissioner, J. W. Spalding stated that it was "just in case . . . ," and admitted it was formed as the outcome of the riots which flared at different points in Canada attributed to communists.
>
> Bayonet drill, the assistant commissioner further stated, was now, and had been since August, a part of the regular drill of all recruits. There have been more than 250 recruits taken on "the force" since August. Of these, there are some 100 now in training at the barracks. Regina is still the training headquarters for all Canada though something in the nature of a sub-training depot has been opened at Vancouver recently.
>
> A group of 20 picked men, more advanced recruits, is now undergoing special training before being sent to Lethbridge where they will be stationed or sent out on detachments as replacements. Every one of these must be particularly efficient in bayonet drill.
>
> The Star learned unofficially that a number of the men in the Lethbridge bound unit are also members of the "riot squad."
> The usual terms of service in the mounted is from three to five years. Those men who have signed up for the "riot squad" however, are only signed up for duty lasting one year, and their services may be dispensed with on summary notice.

I should like to ask the minister to explain the existence of this peculiar class of men whose enlistment is for only one year. What contingencies are contemplated which would make this kind of control necessary?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think my hon. friend takes too seriously what he reads in the newspapers. The commissioner informs me there is no such thing as a riot squad.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have been trying for some weeks to obtain information in regard to this matter, and so far have failed; hence my bringing it up.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If my hon. friend had asked me any day I could have told him.

On section 12—Time on active service in great war included for pension purposes. Time in civil service and customs-excise preventive service.

Mr. MacLEAN: I should like to know if provision will be made for those men in the preventive service who have been let out. They have paid money into the superannuation fund; will it be returned to them?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I understand an arrangement is being made, but that is really a matter within the control of the Department of National Revenue. My understanding is that they will receive what stands to their credit in the fund.

Mr. MacLEAN: So far as the province of Prince Edward Island is concerned, quite a number of men in the preventive force will not be transferred to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The chief of the preventive service, Mr. George Barbour, is being let out with a number of others. They have contributed to the superannuation fund for a number of years, and it would be most unfair to them and to other men in similar positions throughout Canada if the money was not returned.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There will be no injustice done; that has been arranged.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES RESPECTING MEASURES TO RELIEVE DISTRESS

The house resumed from Thursday, April 28, consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Mr. Gordon—Mr. Quinn in the chair:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the governor in council to enter into agreements with all or any of the provinces respecting relief measures in such province or provinces; and to pay out of the consolidated revenue fund such sums as in his discretion may be required to meet the obligations created by such agreements; to provide for special requirements in the national parks and in the drought stricken areas of the province of Saskatchewan; to assist in defraying the cost of the sale and distribution of products of field, farm, sea, river and mine; to loan money to any province on such terms as may be agreed upon and to guarantee the repayment of moneys borrowed by such province and to assist any province in any way that may be deemed necessary or advisable to provide for the relief of distress and the support and maintenance of those requiring assistance, and to loan money to and guarantee the payment of money by any public corporation or undertaking.

Mr. HEENAN: Is it the intention of the government to discontinue work on the highways through northern Ontario? Is there any understanding with the Ontario government in that regard?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): The highways through northern Ontario are built under what is known as the northern development branch of the province of Ontario, and money has also been spent in the past and is still being spent on what is known as the trans-Canada highway. As regards the work on the provincial roads, I have no other information than that which is probably common to all of us. I have no doubt that the provincial works there will be carried on as formerly. With respect to the trans-Canada highway, I think that the work there will be carried on this summer, and it will be subject to the terms of the agreement that will be entered into with the province if this resolution and the bill to be founded upon it pass the house.

Mr. HEENAN: We started to connect up through northern Ontario various stretches of highway that had been constructed, and we established camps for that purpose. Very many of the existing pieces of highways we did not connect up. I have news from New Ontario to the effect that some of the camps have been carried on the basis of fifty-fifty between Ontario and the federal government. It is with regard to that part that I should like information. Is it the intention to carry on, or has it been definitely decided by the Ontario government to close them down in part this summer?

Mr. GORDON: Many of the camps that were continued throughout the winter have undoubtedly lost some of their population by reason of the men having obtained work elsewhere. So far as I know the work will be carried on this summer. The exact terms of the arrangement between this government and the province will be the subject matter of the agreement to which I have referred.

Mr. HEENAN: Newspaper items, the Minister of Justice told the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, should not be taken very seriously; but from reports we have, the Ontario government contemplates leaving it optional; that is to say, men who desire to go into these camps to be taken care of will obtain work at five dollars a month in addition to their board. I trust that the minister does not intend to be a party to any such arrangement. The Prime Minister said the other day, as he has frequently said, that the highways are an asset to the country. He said that they were one of the greatest factors in stabilizing what he termed the invisible balance of trade. Large numbers of tourists are coming into this country and therefore the highways are, as he says, an asset, so that this is not merely work that is gone on with for the purpose of providing employment for men. There are now many disjointed pieces of highway that could be linked up very profitably during the summer. For instance, in the riding I have the honour to represent, it would take only twenty-six more miles to connect up a point called Ignace with the town of Dyment to the west. This would give the people almost one hundred miles of highway, and it is only just to the inhabitants of that country that the work should be proceeded with. Then we have a stretch of highway that has been under construction for a number of years connecting the Canadian National on the north, that is, the old Grand Trunk Pacific, with the Canadian Pacific Railway at Dinorwic. This piece of highway is forty-five miles and a stretch of twenty-nine miles more is required. That is all that is needed to complete that highway. Surely the Ontario government and this government, now that it has undertaken the obligation of contributing to that type of work, especially when such work would be highly profitable, will not discontinue operations. Then there is the highway from Kenora to Rainy River which connects two districts, one on the north side of the lake of the Woods and the other on the south side. About sixty miles of highway would give connections to over 30,000 square miles, and this would be a worth while undertaking. The Minister of Lands and Forests of Ontario is reported in the press as having announced that he is willing to allow any of the unemployed who are desirous to go up to the camps to work eight hours a day and be paid $5 a month with board. Surely the minister must acknowledge that good work could not be expected from men working under those conditions. Is this linking up of the different provincial highways to constitute the trans-Canada highway which the Prime Minister announced that he would have completed if elected, or does he intend to build another highway separate and distinct from the provincial highways?

Mr. GORDON: Where is the road located to which my hon. friend refers?

Mr. HEENAN: The Prime Minister is reported in the London Free Press of June 25 as having made the following announcement at Cobourg on June 24:

> A national highway for Canadians. A highway in Canada not through some other country. A highway on which you can leave Cape Breton and arrive in Vancouver without going into a foreign land. Mr. Bennett declared the undertaking must be accomplished by the hands of the federal government.

Is this linking up of the provincial highways to constitute the trans-Canada highway announced at Cobourg by the Prime Minister, or does he intend to construct a national highway out of the federal exchequer?

Mr. GORDON: I have not gone into the matter with the Prime Minister. I consider that to make use of portions of standard highways already constructed is a very commendable course to follow. I do not think that the location of what will be called the trans-Canada highway has been declared in certain sections of northern Ontario, or if it has been, I have no knowledge of it. I understand that a portion of it has been declared by the province of Ontario, moneys have been expended and the work is proceeding to completion. There is no doubt in my mind that work on roads in northern Ontario will be continued as the exchequer of the province will permit. The resolution before the committee contemplates advances being made to the provinces for general relief. If any of the provinces present plans to which we are called upon to subscribe, then we will inquire to see, in so far as we are charged with that responsibility, that the money is expended in such a way as to give the greatest possible relief to the greatest number.

Mr. HEENAN: I agree that relief must be granted, but an opportunity is presented which, if taken advantage of, will prove to be an asset to the country. I do not think these highways can be built under the plans suggested by the Ontario Minister of Lands and Forests. It would have been better for the country and better for the unemployed had this work been commenced last summer and continued through last winter and the coming summer and fall. The men would have been able to work in greater comfort, and the country would have derived a greater benefit. The Minister of Justice has told us not to take press reports too seriously, and I shall not do so when considering the reported announcement of the provincial minister. The Minister of Labour, who has some knowledge of conditions in northern Ontario, must realize that it is not proper or profitable to commence building highways in the middle of winter and then shut down for the summer time. I hope he will take this matter into consideration, because the Prime Minister said he was looking for suggestions before framing the bill so that it could be framed in accordance with the expressed wish of hon. members. I hope the Prime Minister will see that these different pieces of highway now constructed will be linked up to provide continuous communication in northern Ontario.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I should like to support the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) in his plea for the continuance of work on highways already commenced. I do not intend to deal with any specific highway or discuss a route for the trans-Canada highway, or anything of that character. I know something of the work which has been started, and I know something of what has been accomplished. There are large sections of highway in northern Ontario which I take for granted will be incorporated into the trans-Canada highway when it is finally put through. Camps have been constructed, equipment has been purchased, large amounts have been expended, and this highway work could be continued to provide relief for the unemployed. However, I disagree with my hon. friend when he states that the country did not get a return for the money expended. I know that there was much accomplished during the winter months and without any suffering on the part of the men engaged in the work. It is not an uncommon thing for men in northern Ontario to be working out in the woods, on highways or elsewhere during the winter; they are accustomed to that kind of work. It is just like carrying on railroad construction work during the winter. The men had comfortable camps, good beds and food, and everything that was required. The camps are still there, and I urge as strongly as possible that the unemployed be allowed to carry on at least with the work already commenced. I cannot conceive of any other way by which greater relief would be provided. I agree with my hon. friend in his comments on the newspaper report about putting men in the camps at five dollars per month with board. It would be not only an absurd, but a dangerous thing to do. If you attempted to put a number of men into those camps at five dollars a month, you would receive no return in the way of work. It is amazing the spirit that the workingmen in that section of the country have displayed all through the recent trying period; they are ready to carry on under relief conditions, and wherever that situation exists we should give work instead of direct relief. It is work the men want, if it is possible to provide it and at the same time perform a useful service. I agree fully with what my hon. friend has said; I know of no contribution we can make to the development of this country that will give a greater return than the construction of highways that induce tourists to traverse all parts of Canada that can be opened up for them.

Mr. POULIOT: I agree with some parts of what the hon. member for East Algoma has said. It is better to give work to the unemployed than to give them direct relief. As to that we are in accord, and we are also in accord that it is a good thing to provide work for the unemployed in northern Ontario. I do not blame the minister for the child left on his doorstep by his predecessor, but the building of a trans-Canada highway was one of those silly promises made during the last election. It is absurd because that highway is competing with our railways. On the one hand the government say we have too many railways east to west, and on the other they are building a highway. It is the most absurd proposition of which I have ever heard. Perhaps the Prime Minister has read the Commentaries of Julius Caesar, that great Roman who built roads in the time of the Roman Empire, but he built roads in those sections of Roman colonies that could be colonized, not among rocks. This trans-Canada highway is to be built on the north shore of lake Superior amongst rocks for hundreds of miles, and that is absurd; but I have no objection to a highway being built in the settled district of my hon. friend.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I wonder whether my hon. friend knows anything about northern Ontario?

Mr. POULIOT: I do not judge northern Ontario by my hon. friend, and this is a great compliment to northern Ontario. By the way, my hon. friend who lives there cannot deny the fact that most of that $1,875,000 has been spent to mine rocks. The scenery may be fine; St. John was on the island of Patmos, which was a rock, but it does not attract many tourists. Many tourists are not attracted by rocks except when they cross the Canadian Rockies, and they do not stay long there. I do not want my words to be misconstrued; I do not want the unemployed of my hon. friend's constituency not to have work—that is not my view at all. But it is foolish to hear members on the government side, and especially the hon. member for Stanstead, say that we have too many railways, that we must cut down expenses, that certain economies are now being effected, while we are building a trans-Canada highway which will enable motor cars to compete with the railways. This is what I do not understand. I am ready to vote money for the relief of the unemployed in northern Ontario. Let them have work; let the government build roads where there are settlers, but I do not understand why roads should be built a distance of seven hundred miles where there are only rocks and no people except a few miners. Such a scheme cannot be accepted by any man with brains.

Which province enjoys the boon of the trans-Canada highway promised by a man who has great visions? The Prime Minister of Canada should build pyramids bigger than those of Egypt. Perhaps what he had in view was having the unemployed breaking the stone and doing other work of that sort. It would be just as well for the unemployed to break stone for buildings that might be constructed twenty years hence as to build a trans-Canada highway which will compete with our railways and give us no return. What did Prince Edward Island, which is a great province, get from this highway? Nothing. What did Nova Scotia, another great province, get from that scheme? Nothing. What did New Brunswick get? Not very much—$60,376.66. Grafters there made more money than that by the sale of potatoes during the war. What did the great province of Quebec receive from that highway scheme? Nothing. But Ontario got $1,875,000 out of a total of $2,547,169.32 for mining rocks.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Too much.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not say it is too much if a useful purpose is served.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Why did they not give as much to the other provinces?

Mr. POULIOT: Because there are not so many rocks in the other provinces as in the section north of lake Superior. Manitoba, that great province, got only $251,934.99. Saskatchewan, that great province which has representatives on both sides, some of them naturally very much better than others, got nothing. Alberta, another province which is very well represented in all parts of the house, got $102,429.75. British Columbia, that province of the Canadian Rockies where a highway has already been built, got $257,427.92. This is out of a total of $2,547,169.32. Ontario got by far the biggest proportion. I do not complain of the fact that Ontario received a great deal of money. Ontario, being a great taxpayer, as are all the other provinces, should get her share of public works that are decided upon by the government; each province should be treated according to its population and the income derived from it. I have no complaint that Ontario gets the largest share. I should not like the hon. member for East Algoma to say: Here is a French Canadian from Quebec saying that Ontario gets too much from the federal treasury. That is not what I am saying at all. Every province should be treated fairly. If that highway would serve a useful purpose, I would say: Give Ontario twice as much; it will mean something; it will not be simply a kind of smoke screen to cover up the unemployment question. But my view is this: I am sure the unemployed are not all masons who can cut stone; they are not all miners. There are in Ontario many unemployed who have been commercial travellers, railway employees, men in every walk of life. Those people should be helped. I have said what I think of that absurd scheme of the trans-Canada highway. It serves no useful purpose, and if it was not intended to compete with the railways and drag something out of their present small earnings, it must certainly have that effect.

The session is about to close, Mr. Chairman, and I think before we prorogue we should have some information as to the number of unemployed in this country. I would ask the government to make an inventory and classification of the unemployed. That is essential for my hon. friend from East Algoma as well as for members from Ontario, Quebec, the west and the maritime provinces, if we are to decide anything intelligently about the unemployment situation. The measure before us is a measure for the relief of the unemployment situation. Several times this session I have urged upon the government the importance of making an inventory or classification of the unemployed, giving the story of each. It requires courage to do that, but if it is done the government may rest assured that I for one, so far from criticizing them for doing that work, will congratulate every member of the government. This work should have been done in August, 1930. In August, 1930, there was a sub-committee studying the unemployment problem, and that committee made certain recommendations, some of which were followed and others not. I think it was an excellent idea to have the leaders of industry and of labour meeting together in that way, to try to ascertain the source of the trouble with a view to seeing if it could not be remedied. To-day we do not know the number of unemployed in this country. We do not know how many clerks are idle, how many labourers, how many tradesmen, how many commercial travellers, how many railway employees, how many farm workers, and so forth, and until the whole story is known in detail how can the government with a plaster of subsidies cure the situation. Without such information it is impossible for the government to do so, because it does not know what is the source of the trouble. I am not making these remarks, Mr. Chairman, in any petty, partisan spirit. I am afraid of the future if the government has not the courage to do now what it should have done two years ago; in fact, to continue the work which it stopped in August, 1930. The government should not be afraid to go down to the root of the social evil in order to ascertain the real causes of the problem of unemployment, and if possible find a cure. May I ask the minister if he will be kind enough to consider that suggestion and to continue the work which was being done in August or September, 1930, by the sub-committee which studied the unemployment situation? I would also ask if the government is ready and willing to make a thorough inventory or classification of the unemployed in this country, with the story of each, with a view to finding a remedy for the trouble.

Mr. GERSHAW: I notice that in the resolution special reference is made to the drought stricken areas of the province of Saskatchewan, and I was wondering if the minister for the sake of fairness, and certainly for the sake of uniformity, had any plan in mind by which adjacent districts similarly situated would be treated in somewhat the same way. The Saskatchewan relief commission has very special privileges, but its jurisdiction stops at the boundaries of the province. Now, just beyond the boundary, farmers are living who have lost three successive crops and who are just as badly off as those farmers in the drought-stricken districts of Saskatchewan which come under the administration of the commission. The situation is causing a good deal of comment, and there does seem to be some discrimination. In the area over which the Saskatchewan commission presides the farmers are given orders on merchants for the supply of certain goods. In other districts the method of getting relief is much more complicated, much slower, and more uncertain. In these other districts the farmers have to get in touch with the police force, and after considerable delay a police officer goes out and makes investigation, and in many cases he does not seem to be very sympathetic to the farmer. Application has also to be made to the Red Cross, and altogether the situation of the farmers beyond the boundaries of Saskatchewan is very much worse than that of their neighbours who happen to be in the drought-stricken area of Saskatchewan. I wished to bring these facts to the attention of the minister because they are certainly causing a lot of discussion in those districts.

Mr. GORDON: In Saskatchewan the commission to which my hon. friend has made reference was set up by the province. That is peculiarly the duty of the province. While there is bound to be some criticism, I believe from all the reports I have received that the commission in Saskatchewan has carried on its work in a highly commendable manner. While I am not casting any doubt on the accuracy of my hon. friend's information, I must say that no such representations were made by the premier of the province of Alberta, of which province I presume my hon. friend was speaking. Undoubtedly throughout Canada there are and will be isolated areas which have suffered and will continue to suffer by reason of climatic conditions and misadventures that affect the productiveness of the soil, but I do not think the hon. member will disagree with me when I say that the situation in that portion of Saskatchewan to which reference has been made was a tragedy in the history of that province and in the history of this country. Special attention was given to it for that reason. I can only repeat there has not been any submission made by the premier of Alberta, so far as I am aware, which would suggest the setting up of a commission. Of course if the province considered such an organization necessary it would be their duty to take the necessary steps. In discussing all these matters we must, and I am sure we do, try to keep before us the fact that there is a limit to the extent to which the provinces, municipalities or the dominion can go.

I do not wish to review the ground I covered a few days ago when this resolution was before the house. I should like to add however that in the various interviews I have had with representatives from the provinces, and particularly at the conference held on April 8 and 9, the burden that was being cast upon the municipalities, the provinces and this government was very freely and frankly discussed. I can assure hon. members that the people upon whom this great burden rests are those who are fortunate enough to have some means or some work to do, and who give spontaneously from their own funds, as many of them do. If there is need for a commission such as suggested by the hon. member I will communicate with the premier of the province of Alberta. I do not want to take it upon myself to suggest to him the method and manner of instituting proceedings to take care of matters within his own province. I do not think hon. members opposite would ask me to do that. If however a condition exists which causes the hon. member anxiety, a condition which is not being cared for, and if the hon. member will communicate with the Premier of Alberta, I have no doubt his suggestion will be given due consideration.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

RAILWAY COMMISSION AND RATE STRUCTURE—SPECIAL COMMODITY RATES

The house resumed from Friday, April 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Reid for the second reading of Bill No. 44, to amend the Railway Act.

Mr. J. A. FRASER (Cariboo): I should like to make a few observations in regard to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) in the bill now before the house. In the first place I wish it to be understood that I have a good deal of sympathy for the object the hon. member has in view, that is, the reduction of the differential between export rates and domestic rates as far as western grain and flour are concerned, but I submit that this bill will not achieve the purpose he has in mind. I believe it will make matters a good deal worse than they are at present; it will make confusion worse confounded, if I have correctly interpreted the sections of the act which it is proposed to amend.

This bill contains two sections only. It is proposed to amend section 320 of the Railway Act by striking out the words "in the interests of the public," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "national interest, both producing and consuming." I find that the words "in the interests of the public" have been in the Railway Act since 1919, when the act was first introduced in the house, and since then certain practices have grown up with reference to the interpretation of those words. I have before me a memorandum of the Board of Railway Commissioners defining the interpretation which has been placed on those words by the board, and before proceeding I should like to read that definition:

> The present wording, by judicial construction, has come to mean "the public of the locality or district affected, and that any considerable portion of the population in general as opposed to an individual, or association of individuals, will satisfy the description"; "the controlling power or effective competition on particular rates"; "the legitimate desire of the railway company to secure the traffic is not only to be considered, but also whether it is in the interests of the public that they should secure it, or abandon it, or not attempt to secure it. One class of cases intended to be covered is where traffic from a distance is charged low rates, because unless such low rates are charged it will not come into the market at all"; "the fact that a trader has access to a competing route for the carriage of his goods may be taken into consideration by the board in deciding whether lower tolls, or rates, charged to such trader constitutes an undue preference."

I must say that it is difficult for me to understand just what is meant by the proposed amendment. I submit that the change may have a more restricted application than the present wording. In addition I wish to point out that under section 320 the tolls referred to are not tolls prescribed by the Board of Railway Commissioners but tolls initiated by the railway companies under the provisions of sections 331 and 332 of the act, which my hon. friend might peruse if he is not familiar with them. Section 328 states:

The tariffs of tolls which the company shall be authoribed to issue under this act for the carriage of goods between points on the railway shall be divided into three classes,
(a) the standard freight tariff;
(b) special freight tariffs; and
(c) competitive tariffs.

Those are the tariffs which the railway companies may initiate in order to attract business to their systems; they are not tolls which have been prescribed by the raiway board. Where tolls are prescribed or directed by the board, full consideration is given to the avoidance of unjust discrimination or undue preference; that is a prerequisite to their direction. They must be fully considered from every angle, not only from the point of view of the railway companies themselves but also from that of the shippers, the consumers and the producing public.

The hon. gentleman also proposes to add subsection (2) to section 320, as follows:

The board may consider the question of what should be reasonable compensation under the circumstances, and may establish a rate structure in the interests of trade development and public policy, though such experimental rates may not at the time or of themselves give reasonable compensation to the railway companies.

I understand that the hon. member has two objectives in view; first, that the board may consider the question of what shall be reasonable compensation under the circumstances, and second, that the board may establish a rate structure in the interests of trade development and public policy, though such experimental rates may not at the time or of themselves give reasonable compensation to the railway companies. I submit that the meaning of the first part of this amendment is not very clear. It can hardly relate to subsection 1 of this section, because if the board found as a fact that a lower toll was necessary for the purpose of securing traffic, then obviously such lower toll would be reasonable compensation under the circumstances. Therefore I fail to see how it can refer to the first part of this section. Nor does it seem to relate to the latter part, because if the board established a rate structure in the interests of trade development and public policy, though such rates might not at the time or of themselves give reasonable compensation, what would be the object of the board at the same time giving consideration to what would be reasonable compensation? There would be no object in it at all, as far as I can see.

With regard to the second point, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) has already declared that at the present time the government cannot accept that suggestion. As I understand the declaration of the minister, parliament is the proper place to decide matters of that kind. Just here I might add that if hon. members will look up the freight rate discussion of 1925 they will find that on all sides of the house it was admitted that the proper tribunal to deal with such a complicated question as the freight rate structure of this country was the railway board, and not parliament. It is also difficult to determine how far a rate structure of the character described should be carried. If hon. gentlemen will recall the discussion which took place in this house a short time ago in connection with western freight rates they will remember that certain commodities were referred to as coming within this definition. To any of these commodities might be applied the amendment which my hon. friend offers for the improvement of the situation in British Columbia: gasoline; products of British Columbia moving into the prairies; cordwood, and domestic rates generally in Quebec; live stock; potatoes and hay. It is also conceivable that the rates on coal from Alberta and the maritimes moving to central Canada would come in for consideration under the proposed amendment. You can therefore see the far-reaching effect which the hon. gentleman's amendment would have.

The Board of Railway Commissioners, under the general supervision of the Railway Act, to which no amendment is proposed, must fix and determine rates which will be just and reasonable, and this means reasonable not only for the railways but as well to shippers, producers, consumers and all classes in the dominion. If the board established experimental rates which would, on the traffic concerned, give reasonable compensation to the railway companies, should the board then arbitrarily impose an increase in rates on some of the traffic of the railways to make up the loss of revenue to the railways in consequence of such experimental rates? Would this be practicable or reasonable? Would it be reasonable to shift the compensation of the railways from one commodity to another, and would it improve the situation in the long run, even supposing such changes were made? Moreover, I submit that it would subject the railways to serious losses of revenue.

With respect to the proposed amendment to subsection 5 of section 325 to provide statutory rates on grain and flour moving from the prairie provinces to Pacific points, the present rates are prescribed and approved by the board. This matter has been adjudicated. We have had it under discussion before and we know that the rates at present in force are those which have been submitted to the board, fully examined and carefully inquired into, and they are rates which the board have considered fair and reasonable to all parties. Should this amendment be carried, the differential between the export and domestic rates might be lessened but it might lead to an increase in the export rate, or it might make the domestic rate and the export rate the same. In addition to that, it would result in a reduction in the present export rates to Vancouver, published by the Canadian Pacific Railway, which in turn would necessarily reduce the rates of the Canadian National Railways. I would refer my hon. friend to the board's judgment in the general freight rates investigation, volume 17 of the board's judgments and orders, for full information in this regard. There the hon. gentleman will find the judgment of the board given with respect to the western freight rates question.

The proposed amendment, I submit, would result in heavy reductions in the earnings of both the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways. Rates therein provided from prairie points to Pacific coast points should apply on and after June 27, 1925. It is difficult to determine by just what amount the revenues of the two railways might be reduced if the amendment were to go into effect, but I am given to understand that so far as the Canadian National Railways are concerned, it might lead to a reduction in revenue of $500,000 per annum. As this amendment is supposed to be retroactive to the 27th of June, 1925, that would mean that the Canadian National Railways would have to refund some $3,500,000, and I am certainly of the opinion that the Canadian Pacific Railway would have to refund a much greater sum; so that in connection with these two railways it would amount to $8,000,000 or $10,000,000. I submit that at a time like this, when all railways are suffering from declining revenues, and when their revenues are still on the downgrade, this is a very inopportune moment for my hon. friend to offer an amendment such as this. There is some reason in the argument he advances that the differential between the export and import rates should be reduced, but I submit in all earnestness that this is neither the time nor the proper method of applying the remedy he seeks. I shall have to vote against the proposed bill.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member speaks he will close the debate.

Mr. REID: I do not wish to take up the time of the house going into details in answer to the remarks of the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser).

Mr. MANION: I rise to a point of order. I have no objection to my hon. friend speaking, but has he the right to speak a second time on the bill?

Mr. SPEAKER: It has been the practice in this house to allow the member moving the second reading of a bill the right to reply.

Mr. REID: Regarding the first two proposals in the bill, I may say briefly, in reply to my hon. friend from Cariboo, that these two were incorporated in it in view of the report of the Duncan commission. If I read from the report I think the point will be explained more fully and clearly than possibly I could state it myself:

> At present the work of the railway commission is circumscribed within the two considerations, viz:—
> (a) Reasonable compensation to the carrying company, and
> (b) No unfair preference or unjust discrimination as between traders.
>
> Section 320 of the Railway Act seems to give the wider powers that we have in mind to the railway commission, so far as the question of undue preference or unjust discrimination may be involved:—
>
> "320. In deciding whether a lower toll, or difference in treatment, does or does not amount to an undue preference or an unjust discrimination, the board may consider whether such lower toll, or difference in treatment is necessary for the purpose of securing, in the interests of the public the traffic in respect of which it is made, and whether such object cannot be attained without unduly reducing the higher toll."

That is how the act reads at present, and the Duncan commission, referring thereto, say:

(which might be interpreted as in the interests of the 'consuming' public), the words should clearly state that it is national interests (both 'producing' and 'consuming') that are in mind. If this was not the original intention of the section, we suggest it is the intention which should now be imported into it. We feel further that a similar extension of authority should be imparted to the railway board in regard to the question of reasonable compensation. It would then be competent for the railway board to make a survey of just the very character that the president of the Canadian National Railways testified as being part of his function (as the business head of a railway); and if from public policy they felt that an experimental rate should be conceded, they should be free to constitute the rate, even although it might not, at the time, or of itself, give reasonable compensation to the railway company.

It was with that end in view that I had the bill so drafted as to give to the Board of Railway Commissioners, as suggested here, these powers which I think it very desirable that they should have. I do not intend to go again into the various phases of the act; that is scarcely necessary because it has been explained many times.

Now, I am not making an appeal on sympathetic grounds. With the exception of a few years, the Crowsnest pass agreement had been in effect until 1925, when it was amended. This was brought about by a decision of the supreme court which ruled that the Crowsnest rate applied only to the points in existence when the agreement was made and only within the territory which was then within the scope of the agreement of 1897. It is just as well to remember that the Crowsnest rate was intended to give the prairies protection on freight, and especially grain, as there was no water competition as existed in eastern portions of Canada. The decision of the supreme court would have brought about a chaotic condition in railway rates which would have resulted in one station getting the Crowsnest rate while the next station would get some other rate, and in order to overcome this difficulty the government of the day in 1925, introduced the amendments which are now a part of the Railway Act. The amendments of 1925 gave to all towns on the prairies the benefit of the Crowsnest rates on grain and flour, but they took away the Crowsnest commodity rates which had been in effect from points included in the 1897 agreement. At the time the amendments were under discussion the information was given that the prairie provinces were gaining as well as losing something, but it must be remembered that the railways gained something through the wiping out of the Crowsnest rates on commodities.

British Columbia did not come under the provisions of the new amendments, as I contend it should have. Grain does not change to something else simply because it goes west instead of east. At that time it was thought that the Board of Railway Commissioners would have the power to adjust rates and prevent discrimination, but we have since learned to our sorrow and loss that such is not the case. The decision of the supreme court and decisions of the board itself have since demonstrated clearly that the board has not the power to do this.

The interest of the prairie provinces is identical with the interest of British Columbia. It is to their interest that grain should go west as cheaply as it does east, especially as British Columbia is providing a market for the cheaper grades of wheat. One of the chief reasons which prompted me to introduce this bill, the result of a long study of the whole matter, is the realization that British Columbia, in my opinion, will never obtain a reduction in the freight rates on grain and flour by an appeal to the Board of Railway Commissioners. The decision of the supreme court precludes the possibility of using the Crowsnest pass rates to Fort William as a basis for argument. It seems to me that we in British Columbia are simply wasting our time, energy and money by appealing to the board, and it is time this parliament recognized that fact. According to the ruling of the board, the Crowsnest rates on grain and flour going east to Fort William are no argument as to discrimination and cannot be used as an argument for discrimination because of the decision given by the supreme court. Canadian Pacific Railway officials have also sworn that no one can tell the exact cost of hauling any one commodity.

Another important fact to be remembered is that grain is just grain when going to Fort William, but when going west it becomes either domestic grain or export grain. The domestic rate to British Columbia is higher than the export rate—almost twice as high—and this is against all railway precedents. The cheaper and inferior article shipped to our province is paying a higher freight rate than the better quality of grain which is exported.

I am somewhat disappointed in the attitude taken by the house, and I am especially disappointed in the attitude taken by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber). The hon. member rose in his place the other evening and said he could not support this measure because in the first place the bill was not before him. As a matter of fact the bill was introduced on April 12; it was called for first reading on April 15 and had come up for second reading on April 22 when the hon. member spoke and said he had not the bill before him. What is in the bill that requires such a lot of interpretation? The second clause is so simple that any backwoods man could understand its meaning. It reads in part:

> —and to all such traffic moving westwardly from Fort William and from all points on all lines of railway west of Fort William, to Vancouver, British Columbia and to ports on the Pacific coast.

Surely it would not take a great deal of time to discover that all we are asking for is the same freight rates to British Columbia on domestic grain as are paid by the people in the east on grain from the prairie provinces to Fort William, Quebec, Montreal or Nova Scotia.

I repeat that I am disappointed in the attitude taken by hon. members, especially those from British Columbia. I can recall their advocating such a measure in the past, but it seems that when the test comes they do not feel like coming through. The hon. member for Fraser Valley comes from a poultry district, and he knows that the people in British Columbia have been clamouring for this relief for years. Perhaps he was too busy delving back to the year 1925 to find out what was said in those days, but I am more interested in the conditions applying to-day and which will apply in the future. I introduced this bill because I believed that this was the time to show that we really wanted what we were asking for. Because of the decision of the supreme court I do not believe that British Columbia will be able to get any satisfaction from the Board of Railway Commissioners. I commend the bill to the house.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES RESPECTING MEASURES TO RELIEVE DISTRESS

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Mr. Gordon—Mr. Stirling in the chair:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the governor in council to enter into agreements with all or any of the provinces respecting relief measures in such province or provinces; and to pay out of the consolidated revenue fund such sums as in his discretion may be required to meet the obligations created by such agreements; to provide for special requirements in the national parks and in the drought stricken areas of the province of Saskatchewan; to assist in defraying the cost of the sale and distribution of products of field, farm, sea, river and mine; to loan money to any province on such terms as may be agreed upon and to guarantee the repayment of moneys borrowed by such province and to assist any province in any way that may be deemed necessary or advisable to provide for the relief of distress and the support and maintenance of those requiring assistance, and to loan money to and guarantee the payment of money by any public corporation or undertaking.

Mr. POULIOT: On my way up to the house I saw a fairly large truck on which was a sign "Daily Service." It reminded me of what my good friend the Minister of Railways said in the house not long ago about the unfair competition of trucks with the railways. His speech on that occasion made a great impression on me. Let me sum up the whole matter in this way: if the trans-Canada highway brings returns, they will be due to unfair competition with the railways. On the other hand, if it produce no returns, the expenditure on it will be an utter waste. This is the dilemma that confronts us at present.

We must also consider the maintenance of the road after its completion. Several million dollars might be invested in the scheme and the expenditure on maintenance would be very heavy. Let us count the number of British Columbia automobiles that visit Nova Scotia and the number from Nova Scotia which one might see in British Columbia. They are very few. Some, however, are coming by way of the border states and they might be counted on the Detroit bridge, for instance, but many of the cars coming from the west or from the east and crossing that bridge do not go as far as the ocean.

I am strongly against any kind of hybrid legislation, such as is half federal and half provincial. The expenditure of money should be made by either the provinces or the federal government; if the provinces require additional sums to meet their expenditures, such sums should be given by the federal government, not earmarked for roads or schools or any particular purpose but by way of an increase in the provincial subsidy in order that every province should have full control of the money handed to it. According to the British North America Act each province has full jurisdiction within its borders, while the federal government has jurisdiction only when a matter affects two or more provinces. That principle of law is well known not only to every lawyer but to any man who has made some study of constitutional matters. If we have a trans-Canada highway in which the federal government is interested, it should be built by the federal government alone. But, on the other hand, if the federal government is not interested, then each province should build its own share of the highway. At the present time most of the provinces have their own road policy, and I believe that each province should have complete control of its roads. I do not see how the federal government can give money to the provinces for the building of roads. If the provinces require money for some purpose or other and the provincial subsidy is not enough, the federal government should come to the rescue of the province and increase the subsidy, and if the subsidy of one province is increased, the subsidy of all provinces should be increased in proportion. May I ask the minister to be kind enough to let me know if he will consider the suggestion that I made this afternoon with regard to a complete inventory of the unemployed?

Mr. NICHOLSON: The attacks made by my hon. friend from Temiscouata on the trans-Canada highway, and particularly that section in the district from which I come were of such a character that I feel they cannot be allowed to pass without some remarks from a representative of that part of the country.

In the first place I would say that no contribution could be made by the dominion and the provinces of Canada that would tend to so great an extent to knit all the provinces together and to develop the whole country as a contribution to the trans-Canada highway. It will be a means by which the citizens of Prince Edward Island in the east can motor across Canada on Canadian soil all the way to the west coast, and vice versa.

Frankly I was amazed at the parochialism of my hon. friend in his references not only to the trans-Canada highway but also to a part of this country about which he apparently knows nothing whatever. If his remarks had not been made in the House of Commons one would not have paid any attention to them, but going out to the people of this country and to the world outside of Canada as uttered by a member of the House of Commons, they are deserving of some consideration.

With reference to that section of the trans-Canada highway where a very considerable amount of construction work will be necessary to build the road, that is that section in northern Ontario, that part of Canada lying between the Ottawa river and the boundary line of Manitoba, the manifest lack of knowledge of that country that my hon. friend discloses is such that one can scarcely imagine a man in public life anywhere would go out of his way to the extent my hon. friend has done to belittle a part of Canada in which you could lose the settled portions of Ontario and of Quebec combined. Lying north of the height of land in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, in my hon. friend's province and in the province in which I happen to live, there is more arable land than is now under cultivation in the whole of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. There are today more farmers in the district of Nipissing, represented by my hon. friend from Sudbury (Mr. Hurtubise) than there are in the county of Temiscouata. There are more farmers in South Timiskaming, represented by the hon. Minister of Labour, than there are in the county of Temiscouata. There are more farmers in East Algoma or in West Algoma than there are in the county of Temiscouata, and these farmers, many of them, are of my hon. friend's own race, a happy, contented people, helping to develop this country. Ultimately the tens of thousands of farmers who will yet go into that country will make it a greater farming area than the settled portions of Quebec and Ontario combined.

It is true that there are rocks in northern Ontario; it is true that there are lakes in northern Ontario; it is true that there are mines in northern Ontario. But I would point out to my hon. friend that northern Ontario produced more new wealth in the past ten years than all the rest of the province of Ontario, to say nothing of the province of Quebec—new wealth in the form of minerals, agricultural produce, timber, pulp and paper, and the baser metals.

With regard to the work that has been done on the trans-Canada highway, my hon. friend referred to the fact that there had been blasting of rocks on the north shore of lake Superior. It might surprise my hon. friend to know that there has not been one dollar spent on the north shore of lake Superior. Where blasting was done was on the stretch of road between Nipigon, fifty or sixty miles east of Port Arthur, and the boundary line of Manitoba. I would suggest to my hon. friend that he consult his colleague, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, as to the character of the country through which that portion of the highway runs, and ascertain from him if it is a barren wilderness or desert such as he pictured to the house this afternoon. I have travelled across Canada from coast to coast. I have gone around the south shore of the St. Lawrence river by rail and by water. I have seen its little fishing villages nestling up against the rocky shores, and the patches of arable land sprinkled about. It is delightful country with great scenic attractions for the tourist, and simply because it is small in area as compared with that vast extent of fourteen hundred miles running almost from the city of Ottawa to the city of Winnipeg, one does not attempt to belittle it or suggest that it is a wilderness or a scene of utter desolation or a useless and worthless country. It is nothing of the kind. Everyone admires its beauty.

As to the influence of the trans-Canada highway on the traffic of the transcontinental railways, I would suggest that my hon. friend discuss this subject with someone who understands the principles of transportation, with Sir Henry Thornton, president of the Canadian National Railways, if you like; and he will tell you at once that it is not the traffic that goes on a highway of that character that is taking away revenue from the railways. The tourist traffic that is brought into the country and that will be brought into it by means of highways of the kind we are now discussing will furnish more traffic to the railways than any possible loss they can experience by reason of such a highway being built. It is the short hauls that are taking traffic from the railways, by means of buses and trucks. The wheat of the west will never be brought from the west in trucks. The live stock of the west will never be brought east in trucks, and merchandise will never be taken from the east to the west in trucks. The trans-Canada highway will be a tourist highway from beginning to end, except that it will serve to open up the finest part of Canada that is yet lying unopened for settlement.

I am not going to go any further, Mr. Chairman. I repeat that I was amazed at the hon. gentleman's lack of knowledge and amazed that he would make so vicious an attack on a part of the country about which, I say, he manifestly knows nothing whatever.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I realize that I do not speak very good English, but I have always felt that I could make myself understood by any hon. member in the house. I am very sorry to note, however, that the hon. member for East Algoma is either deaf or dumb, that there is something wrong with either his ear or his brain, and that he did not understand a word I said. I shall have to repeat my remarks to-night in very clear language, not in order to have the hon. gentleman understand—because I cannot expect it from him—but so that my words may not be misconstrued by him. I know the hon. member very well, and it is for that reason while making my speech earlier in the day I said I did not wish my words to be misconstrued. Hon. members who heard my speech will remember my statement in that connection, and it would seem that the only person in the house who did not understand what I said was the hon. member opposite who has just spoken. Undoubtedly he was dreaming of poetry, of those small villages along the St. Lawrence river where the fishermen dwell in white houses on the tops of the hills.

The hon. member did not gain anything by speaking to-night; he should have kept his mouth shut. The fact is that very often he forgets the necessity for that precaution. I have been in the province of Ontario; I know very well the good roads of that province, and I know further that my hon. friend represents a district worthy of a better representative in this house. I know that his district is better than he is. It is not necessary for him to say that he represents a rich district, that Algoma is a pleasant place in which to live, that there is vast wealth in northern Ontario. Why should he tell us all that? We know it. We know further that he is a poor member, a poor speaker and a poor thinker, and he misrepresents statements made by hon. members in this committee. Every hon. member is fully aware of the fact that I said I did not want to have my remarks misconstrued; I did not want the statement to be made that I objected to the building of highways in the constituency my hon. friend represents. At the evening recess I checked my remarks in Hansard, and I find that I so expressed myself.

The hon. gentleman has said that the hon. member for Témiscouata does not know that there is wealth in northern Ontario, that there are rich lands, a countryside more pleasant even than that of Témiscouata county. Mr. Chairman, I remind the hon. member that there is no popularity contest between the farming lands of Algoma and those in my constituency. I did not refer to Algoma, but to that part of northern Ontario north of lake Superior where there are rocky districts, and I said that the blasting of those rocks would be useless. I did not refer to the farming lands or the settlements in northern Ontario, and I did not speak about the highways leading to the mines. Those highways are not for passenger cars, but for heavy trucks so that ore may be carried from the mines. We know that highways through farming districts are essential; they are the arteries of trade. I know that. I know, too, that railways are other arteries of trade. I do not for one moment wish to prevent the development of northern Ontario; as a Canadian I believe I represent not only my constituency but Canada as a whole. By way of contrast, however, my hon. friend represents only himself, particularly when he misconstrues statements made by hon. members in this committee.

I shall say no more; that is my last word. Were I to speak longer in this connection I would honour too much the hon. member who has spoken. The time has now come to treat him with contempt and silence.

Mr. BROWN: Mr. Chairman, in the course of the discussion the question of putting men on the land has been considered. Hon. members are not yet very clear as to the attitude of the government. On a former occasion the minister seemed to indicate that the government did not intend to cooperate with the provinces or to enter upon any scheme themselves of putting men back upon the land. More recently it would seem that the government at least in some degree has changed its mind, and that there is a possibility of some such work being undertaken. If such a policy is in contemplation it ought to be undertaken with the greatest care. Any attempt to enter upon anything as elaborate as the soldier settlement scheme would from the beginning be doomed to failure.

Much has been said about putting men back on the land, by people who evidently know very little about conditions confronting those actually on the land. Many statements have been made which would not for one moment bear investigation, and indicate an entire lack of information. For instance, we heard the statement a few days ago that the farmer would at least have his butter and eggs. The hon. member was evidently under the impression that butter and eggs could be picked off trees. The minister has given the figure of $600 as a sum which might possibly be advanced to men desiring to take up farming. I would say that $600 would be only a flea bite when compared with what is necessary properly to establish a man on a farm in the west. True, there is a possibility that if a very careful selection were made of the men to go on the land something might be done in establishing some of them on bush farms in northern Ontario. If those men were willing to face many years of privation and hardship as did our forefathers in Ontario and Quebec seventy-five or one hundred years ago, there would be some possibility of their making a reasonable success. Unfortunately, however, to-day there are very few men possessed of the temperament and the willingness to face years of pioneering in the woods. In any policy which may be advocated to place men back upon the land, that fact must be taken into consideration. I do not say that something could not be done in that direction, but I wish to emphasize that any policy along that line must be undertaken with great care, and that any elaborate policy would from the outset be doomed to failure.

I noticed that the International Harvester Company of Chicago, using road tractors and ploughs, were ploughing up a large area of land around the city of Chicago, with a view to dividing it into quarter-acre lots to be cultivated by the unemployed. In war time some such scheme was undertaken in and around the city of Winnipeg; men were encouraged to cultivate garden lots. Unfortunately, however, the time is rapidly approaching when such a scheme would be impracticable for this year, because the seed would have to be in the ground within the next month. That policy might have met with a large degree of success. Men and women living in Winnipeg or in any of the cities of eastern Canada could have been given an opportunity to cultivate some of the adjoining vacant lots. But the time for such a program is almost if not completely passed.

It seems perfectly evident from all the information we can gather that we are rapidly approaching the time when to a very much greater extent than in the past we will be required to give direct relief. Certainly it is true that the provinces and the municipalities cannot longer cooperate with the federal government as they have done in carrying on relief works. The municipalities in particular are at the point where, not being able to collect their taxes, they will not be able to contribute further money to the carrying on of works not absolutely and immediately needed. But facing, as I think we are compelled to face, this question of giving direct relief, I want to bring to the notice of the house a matter that has been of interest to me for some months past.

Hon. members may be aware of the fact that, in the United States, of the 200,000,000 bushels of farm board wheat they have had in storage for some time past the government have contributed 40,000,000 bushels for the direct relief of the unemployed. I have had particular reasons for being interested in that proposition, and I may tell the house that the proposal which passed congress early in March is now being carried into effect in many United States cities. The movement began in this way: One of the professors of Oberlin college conceived the idea that through the use of wheat ground by the primitive methods which prevailed in pioneer days much might be done to feed the unemployed. In regard to the people of the United States I might say this: They do not seem to have done as much by way of federal governmental relief as we have done in Canada. The burden has been thrown more upon the state governments, the municipalities and private charity. The situation confronting them now is that they have reached the bottom of their community chests.

As I say, this scheme was inaugurated by one who had interested himself in the question, and he was able to show that by taking the available wheat and having it ground in this primitive way it would be possible to provide meals for the unemployed at a cost of three cents each. This demonstration was carried out in the city of Lorain, Ohio. I visited that section of the country during the Easter holidays, and in that city, which is an industrial centre with a large number of unemployed, by the use of two old fashioned pepper mills and a second hand farm feed mill, they were grinding flour and giving it out to the people. I saw the flour; I ate pancakes, waffles, muffins and even cookies made from that flour, and it was all that could be desired. The authorities were somewhat slow in adopting that proposition, but finally the Red Cross became interested in it, and all over the United States they are now making use of this farm board wheat ground in the primitive and simple way. While I was there at Easter the first carload of that wheat reached the town of Lorain, and since then I have received word to the effect that all that wheat has been used up, and they are asking for more. While I was there those who had originated the scheme visited the city of Cleveland, and the mayor of that city stated that by this plan they would be able to effect a saving to the community chest of $400,000 in the following three months.

I bring this to the attention of the house and the country because it does seem to me that if we are to be faced, as we will be faced, with the problem of giving more direct relief to those who are in need, through some such means as this we might do a very great deal to give the people food that will be perfectly wholesome and that will help them over the time of their unemployment. Seeing as I did what was being done by the means I have indicated, I have no hesitation in saying that if our churches, our philanthropic societies and our Red Cross, in cooperation with government institutions, would adopt such a scheme as this, we would be able to meet the need, which I am afraid will be facing us much more seriously than in the past, in a way that would afford great relief to the unemployed.

If any person cares to see it I have here a copy of an address given by the gentleman who originated the scheme, in which he outlines all the steps from the time they attempted to impress its merits on the people of the different communities, right up to the time it received the sanction of the United States government. I would not think it fitting to put this address on the records of the house, but if any hon. member or any charitably disposed people such as the Red Cross or any other philanthropic society would like further information with regard to what is being done in that direction I shall be very happy to give it.

Mr. SANDERSON: On April 22, Mr. Chairman, when the house was in committee, the Minister of Labour was speaking of his back to the land policy, and he promised to give me some information in regard to the number of men who had been put back on the farms in the province of Ontario, by counties. So far I have not received that information, and I should like to know if the minister has it ready to-night.

Mr. GORDON: No, I have not.

Mr. SANDERSON: When may I expect it?

Mr. GORDON: If it is possible to get it I will have it in the course of a day or two.

Mr. SANDERSON: But the minister promised to let me have it, and I consented to let the item pass on the distinct understanding that the minister would give that information. It is so recorded in Hansard for April 22; the minister said he would get the information and give it to me, but now he says he will do so if possible. I want that information, Mr.

Chairman, and in all fairness the minister must give it to me. The resolution would not have passed at that time if that promise had not been given. I want the minister to give me something definite in this regard.

Mr. GORDON: I am saying that if it is possible—

Mr. SANDERSON: Why say you will do it if it is possible, when you said you would give it to me?

Mr. GORDON: I have not Hansard before me.

Mr. SANDERSON: Well, I will read it. On April 22—

Mr. JACOBS: The hon. gentleman will probably find that information was given on April 1.

Mr. SANDERSON: It is at page 2284 of Hansard:

Mr. Sanderson: If I understood the figures correctly, a moment ago the minister, said that during last year 14,000 men had been placed on farms. I took the minister's statement to refer to single, hired men. Was that correct?
Mr. Gordon: Yes.
Mr. Sanderson: Could the minister tell me what proportion of those 14,000 men were put on farms in old Ontario?
Mr. Gordon: I could not say, but in the entire province of Ontario—
Mr. Sanderson: Has the minister the figures by counties?
Mr. Gordon: No, but up to April 2, 1932, there were 4,165 men placed in Ontario.
Mr. Stewart (Edmonton): Were those farm hands?
Mr. Gordon: Yes.
Mr. Sanderson: Could the minister give me some idea of where they were placed in Ontario? At the moment I am interested only in old Ontario.
Mr. Gordon: I have not that information before me, but I think I can get it and let the hon. member have it by counties.

There was further discussion, and again at page 2285 the following appears:

Mr. Sanderson: Where were they placed?

Referring to the men in Ontario.

Mr. Gordon: I have not that information at the moment but I will give it to the hon. gentleman before the estimates are through. That was the policy we pursued.

There was further discussion, reported at page 2290, and page 2291. At page 2290 there is the following:

Mr. Sanderson: How many deportations were there from Canada last year?
Mr. Gordon: Deportations for the calendar year ended December 31, 1931, were 6,582.
Mr. Sanderson: And what was the immigration for the same calendar year?
Mr. Gordon: It was 27,530.

[Mr. Sanderson.]

Then on the next page the minister says:

Mr. Gordon: Each case is investigated on its merits. . . .
Mr. Sanderson: As far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing that this item carry on the understanding that the minister give me the information that I asked for.
Mr. Gordon: Oh, quite.

Now the minister gets up to-night and says he will give the information "if possible." Did he not know whether he could get that information when he promised it on April 22? It was the distinct understanding of the committee, at least of hon. members on this side of the house, that the item was permitted to go through on condition that the minister would give this information.

Mr. ARTHURS: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. SANDERSON: Pardon me. I think that in all fairness to me, and with the usual courtesy which a minister should show a private member, the hon. gentleman should at least make some statement. Does he intend to get that information?

Mr. GORDON: I have nothing to apologize for.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am not asking you for an apology but for action.

Mr. GORDON: Let me finish my remarks and then probably you will be satisfied.

Mr. SANDERSON: Well, I am just assuming your attitude to me and I want to tell you that you cannot put that over me.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GORDON: I made it very plain, even from the references the hon. member has read from Hansard, that I believed I could get the information.

Mr. SANDERSON: You said you would get the information.

Mr. GORDON: I said I thought I could get it. I asked the officers in charge of this work to endeavour to go through the records, which is not an easy task, and see whether they could separate these various placements according to counties. At the moment I have not the information. If I get it—and I hope I shall—I will give it to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. SANDERSON: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. ARTHURS: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. SANDERSON: Have I the floor, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): If the hon. gentleman is replying to the minister, yes.

Mr. SANDERSON: All I want is fair treatment. Surely if, from April 22 until to-day, May 3, the minister found it was not possible for him to get that information, he might have had the courtesy at least to write me a letter informing me that he could not give it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SANDERSON: The butter man, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, had better keep quiet. I am addressing my remarks to the Minister of Labour.

An hon. MEMBER: Address them to the chair.

Mr. SANDERSON: Through the chair, yes, but not to my hon. friend the butter man from Dufferin-Simcoe. May I ask, Mr. Chairman, in all modesty, as a private member to an hon. minister, whether the hon. gentleman will endeavour to get that information for me? Yes, or no?

Mr. GORDON: I can add nothing to what I have already said. I know that the hon. member has an almost overpoweringly inquiring mind, and for that I commend him.

Mr. SANDERSON: And a little more courtesy than the minister has.

Mr. GORDON: The hon. gentleman arrogates to himself a superabundance of courtesy. I gave instructions that the work of the department should be analyzed in order that the request of the hon. gentleman might be complied with. I believe the officers have been at work endeavouring to satisfy that request, and if it is possible to give the information with any degree of accuracy it will be given. I can say nothing further with reference to the matter.

Mr. ARTHURS: The resolution before the chair reads in part:

> That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the governor in council to enter into agreements . . . to assist in defraying the cost of the sale and distribution of products of field, farm, sea, river and mine.

I suggest that the word "forest" should be included. I do not think there is any industry in Canada to-day that has been and is suffering more than the lumbering industry, and according to this resolution as it stands at present there is no relief in sight. I sincerely hope that when the bill comes before the house the word "forest" will be included. The lumbering industry has suffered for a number of years. It is in a peculiar situation; its product ordinarily does not go on the market until at least twenty-four months after operations have commenced. Many of the limits have been bought at very high prices, the ground rents are high, and those engaged in the industry from the Atlantic to the Pacific are in a very unenviable position. In this regard I would direct the attention of the government to the building trade of Canada, which is one of the greatest industries in this country. It distributes more money among the various trades and labour organizations than any other trade in Canada. In 1929 the building operations in the cities of Canada were valued at $234,944,549. This outlay was divided among the lumbermen from the forest to the planing mill, the stone quarries, the brick manufacturers, the cement manufacturers, the hardware manufacturers, the plumbers, the painters, the builders, the decorators and so on right through the whole field. In practically all these cases ninety per cent of the outlay is for labour. Ninety per cent of the cost of lumbering is labour, ninety per cent of the cost of producing brick is labour, and the same holds true through the various building industries.

For various reasons, this industry has fallen off tremendously. I hold in my hand a quotation from an American paper of recent date which states that the industry has dropped 60 per cent as compared with the same month of last year, and 85 per cent as compared with the same month in 1929.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Are those Canadian or American figures?

Mr. ARTHURS: Those are the American figures. I can give my hon. friend the Canadian figures as well. In 1929, the peak year, the building permits in cities alone totalled $234,944,549; in 1930 they had dropped to $166,379,325, and last year they dropped to $112,222,845, a decrease of over 50 per cent as compared with 1929. The figures for January of this year show permits as reported by 61 cities totalling $2,761,929 as compared with $8,401,456 for 1931.

Mr. MITCHELL: What were they for the year before?

Mr. ARTHURS: I have not the figures for the year before. The permits for February for this year were valued at $2,578,597 as compared with $6,395,659 for last year. Those for March were valued at $3,323,602, as against $9,948,979. The total for the three months of this year is $8,664,190 as compared with $24,746,094 for last year.

There are many reasons for this decrease in building operation, but there is one particular reason which has mitigated against building particularly in the province of Ontario. Most of the building is carried on by speculative builders who secure a first mortgage, generally from an insurance company, and continue their operations with the proceeds of such mortgage. The Supreme Court of Ontario has held that those who sell materials for building have the same lien rights as the builders, and the result has been that building has practically stopped in the province of Ontario. A second reason is the fact that the Ontario government, in its wisdom or lack of wisdom—so far as the building trade is concerned it was lack of wisdom—has declared a moratorium, with the result that insurance companies with money to lend will not lend it for building purposes. So there is an absolute stagnation of building operations.

In 1919 we were faced with a situation akin to that which faces us at the present time. In passing I may say that unless conditions improve the working man will be much worse off twelve months from now than he is at present. In 1919 this government voted a loan of $25,000,000 to be made to the various provinces for housing purposes, and I believe that every dollar of that loan has been returned; I know it has, in so far as Ontario is concerned. I believe it would be wise on the part of this government if it would vote a sum to be placed at the disposal of the builders of Canada. The responsibility for repayment could be placed upon the provinces and the municipalities. I would be willing to vote for any amount up to $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 for this purpose, and I do not think money could be better spent. Such a loan would affect every man concerned, from the labourer who digs the foundation to the man who puts on the roof, and ninety-five per cent of the money would be utilized in providing employment for the workers in the various provinces.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Without attempting to follow the very excellent discussion of the previous speaker, with much of which I absolutely agree, I am going to ask the committee to revert for a moment to the discussion which took place just before the dinner recess. The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw) raised a question which I myself raised on March 15 in another discussion; he asked the minister to give serious consideration to certain drought areas in Alberta and to grant similar treatment to those districts as is now being granted to the districts in Saskatchewan. The minister replied that no request had been received and that no statement had been made by the Alberta government to the effect that they had drought areas similar to the areas in Saskatchewan. As this is the second time that such a statement has been made by a minister, the first time by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) and the second time by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), I am sure that some misunderstanding must exist in connection with the matter. After the Minister of Agriculture had given a reply to me similar to that which was made this afternoon by the Minister of Labour to the hon. member for Medicine Hat, I wired the Premier of Alberta under date of March 16. My wire reads as follows:

> Yesterday Weir stated Alberta given exactly same opportunity as Saskatchewan. That your government had stated you had no problem similar to drought area Saskatchewan. That no request had been received from you to effect that federal government accept 100 per cent relief responsibility for area amounting to 14 municipalities. See Hansard March 15 and wire full reply. We are placed in humiliating position.

The next morning I received the following telegram from the Premier of Alberta:

> Very much amazed contents wire. Will wire you more fully later.

The premier, having had an opportunity of reading Hansard, sent me the following wire under date of March 21:

> Following wire sent Minister Agriculture reference your statement reported Hansard Tuesday 15 page 1241 to effect this government never sought for certain drought area same treatment as accorded in Saskatchewan. Must respectfully take exception this statement. Am sure you recall meeting Edmonton October 7 last when we submitted map prepared jointly by your Mr. Stewart and our Mr. Gray and urged that drought area thus disclosed should receive same consideration as similar Saskatchewan area. We also made same request to Senator Robertson and yourself in Calgary. On January 21 Public Works department wired Director Relief asking Dominion government to assume 100 per cent cost relief works in certain municipalities particularly in said area. This request refused 26th instant. More recently, have asked Dominion to assume portion cost seed grain relief same area which request refused excepting offer to provide funds against treasury bills. We now understand through Saskatchewan Relief Commission Dominion assuming entire cost of relief homestead areas northern part of province and as we have exactly similar problem consider this unfair discrimination against Alberta. May say further since January 30, 1931, have requested special consideration in areas presenting particular problem as shown my letter to Prime Minister dated February 9, 1931.

This telegram would indicate that not only had the former Minister of Labour, the present Minister of Agriculture and the Prime Minister himself been acquainted with the fact that there was a drought area and that special treatment had been requested for it, but that the minister's own department—I presume it is his—the director of relief received a communication on January 21 last asking for special consideration in connection with the cost of relief work in certain drought area municipalities. I submit this not to question the sincerity of the Minister of Labour, but simply to attempt to straighten out a delicate and rather difficult situation in which two ministers have stated that Alberta has made no special representations in regard to the drought area in that province. My own knowledge of the matter is that the provincial cabinet deliberately called a meeting of the federal members last January, placed the whole matter before them and asked them to make it part of their business here to see that the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Labour and others who were directly responsible and interested, take action in accordance with the previously made request of the Alberta government.

Mr. COOTE: I think employment for our people is the greatest problem facing Canada to-day, and I regret the resolution as brought down and the statement of the minister give us very little hope of any further employment being provided. Apparently the action of the government is to be practically limited to giving unemployment relief, in other words, to adopting the dole system, which I do not like. This problem of employment must be tackled vigorously. We must do something different from what has been done so far. I am sure anyone who will visit the different parks in Ottawa and other places where the unemployed men congregate will agree wth that old saying "Unemployment with money is leisure, but unemployment without money is hell." I have talked with quite a number of returned men who say that the life they are living to-day, unable to secure employment, is far worse than the life they led in the trenches. Years ago Sherman, the famous United States general said: "War is hell," and war is even worse to-day than it was then. When numbers of these Canadian returned men have travelled from one end of the country to the other and back looking for work, without being able to find enough to keep body and soul together, we cannot wonder that their position to-day is in their opinion much worse than it was when they were fighting in France.

I look upon unemployment as a disease which must result from one or two causes, either overproduction or underconsumption. If it results from overproduction, we should endeavour to divide up the work, shorten the hours of labour. But I do not think it results from overproduction; I think our troubles result from underconsumption. I would admit at once that we can produce more than enough in the way of foodstuffs. The size of the human stomach is limited, and when you fill a man with food, there is no use in placing more before him. But the capacity of our people to enjoy goods and services, so far as we can see to-day, is practically unlimited. Unemployment, whether due to underconsumption or overproduction, is a man-made problem and capable of solution. We should devote ourselves to a solution of it rather than adopt mere palliatives such as are suggested in the resolution under consideration. Unemployment as it now exists can and must be cured. If it cannot be cured under the present system where production is for private profit, then we must have a change of system. I do not say that it is impossible for it to be cured under the present system, and I should like to see the house and the government try to cure it. To-day we are not making any attempt to solve the problem of unemployment.

Before I leave the question of overproduction, may I say that even in Canada we have underconsumption in the matter of foodstuffs. I remember reading in the New Outlook, a paper published in Toronto by the United Church, I think in the issue of last January, that a doctor from Regina said there were hundreds, perhaps thousands of teen-age boys in Saskatchewan going to bed hungry every night. We know that fruit rots in the orchards every year although there are thousands who who never get a taste of fruit of any kind. I have under my hand a little quotation taken from the New Republic. It is true that this refers to conditions in the United States, but conditions in some parts of Canada may be similar. It says:

> In Detroit alone, it has been estimated by medical authorities, at least one person starves to death in every seven hours and fifteen minutes. A physician at the Receiving Hospital in this city reported recently that four people a day, on the average, are brought to the hospital too far gone from starvation for their lives to be saved. Many others die lonely deaths outside the hospitals. On one day in September, in Grand Circus park where the homeless gather, three workers were found dead.

It says :

> Thousands of children are under-nourished; that a great number of suicides are not reported in the press; that the psychopathic wards of the hospitals are crowded with people whose minds have become unstrung under the pressure of adversity.

I pause here to say that I think the government of Canada has done better in regard to unemployment relief than the United States government; I give our government credit for that. We have made a fair attempt to hand out unemployment relief, but too much of the burden has been placed upon the provinces and municipalities, and many of the municipalities are practically bankrupt so that a different system of financing must be adopted this year. I remember reading last year that thousands die of starvation in China every year and that millions of Chinese go to bed hungry every night. If we could work out a proper system of distribution in this world, I cannot help feeling we would find there was no over-production even of wheat. When it comes to a question of overproduction of other commodities, I should like to quote for the benefit of the committee from Mr. Harvey Firestone, one of the most prominent business men in the United States. He says positively that our trouble is due to underconsumption, not overproduction. He says that in the United States there are four million city homes with no bath tub, three million city homes with no plumbing, four million rural homes with no electricity, thirteen million homes, both rural and urban, with no telephones, five million homes lacking adequate clothing, food and shelter, seven million homes with no automobile, twenty million families with not even a good radio.

I think we must agree with Mr. Firestone that the difficulty is due to underconsumption. Why cannot the copper which is going begging on commodity markets to-day be used to provide these people with telephones, radios and electrical service? By the way, it is rather significant the way they do things in the United States, and I suppose we do the same in Canada. I am told that in that country there is one automobile to every five people and one bath tub to every twenty people. It is quite easy to imagine five people riding in one automobile, but imagine twenty people taking a bath in one bath tub! There is plenty of potential demand in Canada and the United States for these things which the unemployed to-day would like to be making. The trouble is that there seems to be a great gap between production and consumption. The cause of underconsumption to-day is lack of money in the hands of those who would purchase these goods if they could. The old law of supply and demand, which has been much overworked, cannot operate to-day. There is potential demand, but it cannot become effective demand because the people have not the money in their pockets. We need a new money system. I believe that the want of a proper standard of purchasing power is the chief cause of the survival of the monstrous fallacy that there can be too much produced of anything.

If we are going to solve the question of unemployment and put our people to work we must have a different financial system. President Hoover says:

> Credit is the bloodstream of our economic life. Restriction and destruction of credit cripples the revival and expansion of agriculture, industry, commerce and employment. . . . To-day business is bad because of lack of purchasing power among consumers.

R. S. Noble, of the Royal Bank of Canada, said last year that the depression was caused by a thoroughly stupid bank policy, and that France and the United States were the principal villains in the piece.

Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, now Senator Meighen, said last year in Toronto, and I am always glad to quote him in this house, because I think he is one of the ablest members that ever sat in this chamber:

> If those who have too much wheat can exchange that wheat with those who have too much of something else, oil, gasoline, clothing; if people are in a position to do that, the world can use all the wheat there is to-day and more, all the oil, all the clothing and more. If people were in a position to exchange what they have too much of for what somebody else has too much of, we would see that there is not too much of anything. The trouble is that they are not in a position so to exchange. Were the facilities of exchange adequate, were the world's monetary system adequate to demands for exchange, then the three per cent increase in the world's products from year to year would mean a three per cent elevation in the standard of living each year for the masses of mankind.

I think I have quoted enough authorities to show that the unemployment which exists to-day is due primarily to an inefficient financial system. In support of my contention that this depression is due to monetary causes I could quote Lord D'Abernon of England, Sir Basil Blackett, Sir Leo Chiozza Money, Sir Gustav Cassel, one of the most eminent economists in Europe, Dr. Hans Luther of the Reichsbank in Germany, and one of our own most prominent bankers, the late Mr. Neill. I would also like to quote to the house from a review of Maynard Keynes book—"A Treatise on Money." Trade and employment, as Mr. Keynes shows from forty different angles, depend on what men do to currency and credit. This review says:

> The volume of exchanges tthat can be made on a given price-level with a given volume of money, at a given turnover, is absolutely fixed.

More exchanges require more money. Unless the money is forthcoming business falls off, men are thrown out of work, and the vicious spiral of deflation gets under way. Yet money is the only item in a list of items a mile along with which business has to deal, over the supply of which man has absolute and unlimited control.

If we could only convince this committee and this house and the government that the amount of money we might have is absolutely under our own control, we could get a good start out of this depression inside of a year. The cause of this depression is the lack of money in the hands of purchasers; the only way to get out of it is to put money into circulation, and yet when we come to discuss unemployment, we spend very little time on the question of money. It is rather significant that in to-day's press there appears the following despatch from Washington, D.C. It is headed, "United States house recommends putting four billion dollars of new notes into the market," and reads as follows:

Washington, D.C., May 2.—The House of Representatives to-day passed a bill "for restoring and maintaining the purchasing power of the dollar," and to secure that end recommended that the Federal Reserve Board use its power and resources to put into the market $4,000,000,000 in federal reserve notes, if need be, to raise the price level of commodities.

The bill would add an amendment to the Federal Reserve account as follows:

"It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States that the average purchasing power of the dollar as ascertained by the department of labour in the wholesale commodity markets for the period 1921 to 1929 inclusive shall be restored and maintained by the control of the volume of credit and currency."

I would like to point out to you, Mr. Chairman, and to the committee that I think there is ample justification for the amendment to the budget which was moved from this corner of the house. It has now been declared by congress that it should be the policy of their central bank in the United States to issue enough money to raise commodity price levels to the average level between 1921 and 1929. I do not think that there is any other known way at present of raising commodity price levels. I do not like to think that Canada is going to lag behind the United States in this regard, and the policy I would like to urge upon the government at this time is that it should take steps to increase the amount of money in circulation in Canada to raise commodity price levels and make it possible to put our people to work and to put purchasing power into their hands. Do not let us wait until the United States has done it, and then drag along three months behind them. Let us begin it now and get some benefit from it while the United States is putting this new money to work in the market. May I remind the members of the house again that this bill which has passed the United States congress recommends that the federal reserve board should use its resources to put four billion dollars of federal reserve notes into the market.

I would remind the house of the debate which took place here some time ago in regard to state aid for national health. The statement was made by the hon. member for East Calgary that the greatest cause of sickness is poverty, and if we do not do something to check this depression in Canada and to put our people to work and restore their purchasing power, we are going to strike a blow at the health of the Canadian people from which it will take many years to recover.

While I am on this subject I want to protest against the policy of all governments in Canada, federal, provincial and municipal, of discharging their civil servants. I just happen to have handed to me lately a despatch from a western paper which states that in that city eight firemen have been laid off, to effect a yearly saving of $15,000. I expect it will not be very long before these same firemen will have to receive direct relief from the city. What is the sense of discharging men from a city payroll at a time like this? Surely our cities would be wise to maintain their fire departments at full strength.

I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Parry Sound upon the statement he made in the committee to-night concerning the need of some stimulus to the construction industry in Canada. I have before me the latest edition of The Commerce of the Nation. This is the May number, and I think arrived only yesterday or to-day. At page 38 there are indices of Canadian business conditions. The basis for the figures is the monthly average from 1929 to 1924 taken at 100. The information is as follows:

	March, 1932	March, 1931
Construction—
Contracts awarded. .	153.5	222.0
Building permits. . .	45.0	103.5
Cost of construction.	82.5	84.6
Trade—
Car loadings.	174.8	190.21
Exports.	89.7	102.4
Imports.	87.0	119.2
Employment in trade	128.9	134.0
Total agricultural marketings.	125.4	187.7
Production—
Iron.	19.3	85.2
Steel.	44.9	130.3
Lumber.	29.6	75.2

It will be noted that building permits awarded in the month of March this year were only about 43 per cent of what they were a year ago.

I should like again to suggest to the government the advisability of providing some housing scheme in Canada. I know of no better way to put money into circulation. Perhaps before considering this matter in detail I should say that thousands of people in Canada have already lost their homes owing to the unemployment which has existed for the last two years. Others have lost their farms, and still others their savings. Many citizens have lost their jobs, and with them their hope, their health and their self-respect. Many have committed suicide or died prematurely because of the worry of it all. I believe it is high time we really took some effective steps to put our people to work. It is useless to look for permanent alleviation of present conditions without important social and financial changes. There is no doubt that industry in Canada is capable of producing more goods than it did in 1928. Industry, however, has come to a standstill, and as a result men, women and children are suffering. Most of them suffer in hopeless silence, not because they do not want to work or do not know how to produce; not because materials are scarce or machinery lacking, but because of an inadequate, inefficient monetary system which demands from them a great sacrifice. The scarcity is purely artificial.

The situation to-day might very well be likened to that of a horse tethered to a tree standing in the midst of a luxurious pasture. The horse walks in one direction, thereby winding the tie rope around the tree. After a while he finds himself with his nose close to the tree, unable to reach the grass. In other words, he is starving. There is plenty of luxurious grass within a short distance, if he had sense enough to turn around and walk in the other direction. If he has not sense enough to do that he must starve. We in Canada are in the same position. We have not sense enough to make use of the machinery and raw materials in our country so that our people may be put to work to produce the goods they require. In my view our people have a moral right to demand from their representatives and their government an immediate examination of the fundamental weaknesses of the gold standard, to be followed by some permanent correction of that standard or the adoption of a new one. To my mind there is no doubt that we should adopt an entirely new financial policy. It seems to me at the present time we are carrying on a sort of hunger strike. Why should we not give those people employment? The Prime Minister is reported to have said in Montreal a year and a half ago that the first duty of the Canadian government would be to provide work for the Canadian people. With that I heartily agree, but we have neglected our duty. Of course we can do nothing until the government acts, and I hope it will not be long before it is persuaded to take action.

I should like to quote from the new book by Doctor Robert Eisler entitled This Money Maze. The preface is written by Sir Josiah Stamp, who recently delivered such a splendid address in this building and the foreword is written by Sir Thomas Barclay, one of the most prominent bankers in England. Doctor Eisler says:

> Nothing but the borrowing and spending power of the community can start the wheels of industry whirling again after such a prolonged lethargy and continual fall in prices.

Under present conditions the best way to put the spending power of the community to work is by government action. I know of no other way in which it can be done. I think we are quite justified in asking the government to take action. I should like to remind the committee of the many promises made by the Prime Minister during the election campaign. He said:

> I accept the challenge, and I say again I will call parliament together at the earliest possible moment to provide at once a remedy,—employment for all who can and will work.

There is no doubt we have several hundred thousand people in Canada to-day who would and could work if they had it to do. When Canada entered the war in 1914 we did not hesitate to use all the nation's credit. We financed our part of the war on our own credit, and by similar methods we could finance this war against poverty and unemployment if we would make use of our national credit. We have plenty of it.

I suggest first that we institute a housing scheme along the lines I suggested a few weeks ago. I will not go into the details of the plan to-night, but I should like to draw attention to an article which appeared recently in The Prairie Lumberman concerning a federal home building loan, and pointing out the work which would be given if such a scheme were adopted. The article is as follows:

> Work would immediately be provided for a great body of men now unemployed and additional employment would immediately be spread throughout many industries now cutting down on their staffs.

I was told to-day of a construction company in Canada which issued the statement that next month they would be forced to lay off two hundred men. The article continues:

> Carpenters, masons, plasterers, painters, plumbers, electricians—all the better paid trades who in turn would circulate their wages, thus providing additional employment—would become actively employed. Thousands of men now unemployed could be engaged in common labour—these men are now very largely an absolute charge upon their respective communities.
> Railroads would profit by greater freight movements, rail workers would benefit, lumber mills and other manufacturing plants would start to operate, every type of requirement for the inside of the house also would be benefitted. Demand for goods of every description would become rapidly widespread. Coal would be needed to heat these new homes, thus affecting favourably the Canadian mines and adding to the employment situation favourably in that direction. There is practically no end to the benefits which would accrue if such a necessary step were to be taken.

There was some talk of bolshevism and communism in this house this afternoon, so I would direct the attention of hon. members of the committee to this significant statement:

> Bolshevism is well fed only when we refuse to give good healthy "food" such as the opportunity to own their own homes to otherwise well-meaning citizens. If you want to stop the spread of bolshevism start creating a nation of home-owners. It makes a mighty big difference to a person's attitude when he owns something and that something is his own home.

Some of these homes might be built in the cities, and certainly there is need for a great many in the country as well. Then I would suggest to the government that they embark on a large program of public works. I think we should begin a program this year entailing an ultimate expenditure of $50,000,000 or $100,000,000. This year, when we most need the work, we have the smallest expenditure on public works that has been made since I have been a member of this house. I think government activity in connection with public works shall be speeded up whenever there is evidence of a slackening of employment in private industry. We should use our own national credit to finance these undertakings instead of borrowing from our financial houses at ruinous rates of interest, such as the provinces and the Dominion have been forced to pay recently. Our national wealth is estimated at some $30,000,000,000, so it is absurd for us to talk of this dominion going bankrupt or running short of credit. There is still plenty of real credit on which to draw, so let us use our own credit, put our people to work and restore the confidence of the people in our own institutions.

Mr. YOUNG: What is our credit?

Mr. COOTE: It is the ability of our people to produce goods and services which they can consume.

Mr. CASGRAIN: We can produce them but we cannot sell them.

Mr. COOTE: We cannot sell them because there is no money with which to buy them, and you will not get any improvement in business until you put money into the hands of the purchasers. The great body of purchasers in Canada to-day have lost their purchasing power. The farmers represent from 45 per cent to 47 per cent of our population, and their purchasing power has been more than cut in half. Thousands of people who have been working for wages have lost their jobs; their purchasing power has been cut by 80 per cent, and now I suppose the purchasing power of the civil servants has been cut by 10 per cent. Thousands of people have had their incomes reduced, and all these things tend to decrease purchasing power. When you decrease the purchasing power of these people our factories must lay off many workers, who in turn become unemployed and lose their purchasing power. It is the most vicious circle that can be imagined, and the only way to get out of that circle is to put money in circulation. This can be done only by putting people to work, because only when they work do they produce something which gives value to money.

I was told to-day by a man who for years has been a student of economics, and who I believe is a graduate in economics of one of our universities, that a thirty per cent rise in commodity price levels would reduce the burden of debt of the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion by $75,000,000. Surely that is worth while. You can add to that the increase in revenue from taxation, because the amount of taxes received depends upon the amount of trade carried on. You can also add the reduced expenditure by all our governments for unemployment relief, as well as the increase in trade which would be brought about by increasing the income of our farmers and by increasing the employment of our artisans and labourers. In addition there would be the increased spending power which they would have, and added to that there would be the very distinct benefit, at least so far as the Prime Minister is concerned, that an adverse trade balance, if any, would be corrected.

I have taken a little longer on this question than I had intended, but before I sit down I would like to make some reference to the proposal which I understood the minister to say had been made to the provinces, that the federal and provincial governments should cooperate to place some of the unemployed on farms in Canada. In that connection I would like to quote from a little book which recently came to my notice, entitled The Cause and Cure of Unemployment. The author is John S. Lennox, an engineer in the United States who graduated from Queen's university some years ago. It is rather significant that to-day so many of our engineers have taken to the study of economics, and some of them have put in writing their opinions as to the cause and cure of unemployment. I may say very frankly that if we would charge some of our eminent Canadian engineers with the study of the financial question, it would not take them very long to evolve a better financial system than we are trying to work under at the present time. In regard to the farm problem Mr. Lennox says:

> There has been no general recognition of the fact that farming is the only business in which a man can procure food and shelter when receiving no wages. Until the tax collector and the landlord can no longer be put off a farmer can stay in business. The lower selling prices go, the more produce he must market, even though he is selling at a loss. The hired man will work for his board and enough to keep him in boots and overalls. Truly, agriculture is the great unemployment sponge.

With reference to the remark that the hired man will work for his board and enough to keep him in boots and overalls, I might relate to this house a sentence or two from a letter which I received from an Alberta farmer last summer. I must remind the house that the letter was written last August when the weather was very hot. With reference to the statement by one of our leading statesmen that he was not afraid of the farmer starving, this man stated in his letter, "Of course the farmers will not starve; we still have milk and potatoes, but the clothes we bought in more prosperous years soon will be worn out, and we may have to resort to rhubarb leaves." There is much more in this booklet I should like to read to the committee, but I do not think I should take the time.

In conclusion I should like to say to the Minister of Labour that if the dominion and provincial governments are justified in cooperating to place unemployed people on farms, surely there is every justification for these two governments cooperating to keep the tax collector and the mortgage companies from putting farmers off the land. That is what is going to happen unless something is done to forestall that action. What is the sense of allowing these men to be forced off their farms? They will simply go to the cities to take the places of the unemployed whom the two governments are now endeavouring to take from the cities and place on the land. I do suggest to the minister that this is one of the most necessary things for agriculture to-day; otherwise some farmers are going to become charges upon the country. They will have to drift into the cities and receive direct unemployment relief.

Mr. YOUNG: I cannot understand the mentality of a man who will strenuously oppose a ten per cent reduction in salaries and wages, and in the same breath advocate a policy of monetary inflation the immediate effect of which would be to cut in half all salaries and all wages.

I can agree with my hon friend this far, that the present depression will not lift until we have discovered the fundamental causes and removed them. I agree with him there, but the immediate problem before the committee to-night is what to do with our unemployed who do not know where to sleep, who do not know where their next meal is coming from, and who do not know where they are going to get clothes with which to protect themselves and their children from the weather. These people cannot wait while our economists, our statesmen and our politicians debate as to what is the cause of the trouble, and try to agree on a remedy. They must have action and immediate action. I cannot support the policy of creating great public works at the present time out of the public treasury for the purpose of giving people employment. Take, for instance, the suggestion made to-night of a trans-Canada highway. The principal objection I see to it is this. If we were to construct such a highway and by that means give employment to so many thousands of people while it was in course of construction, once it was finished, after the depression had lifted, we should find ourselves saddled in perpetuity with the expense of maintaining it, which we know from experience would run into millions and millions every year. We cannot afford any such undertaking.

There is a plan being operated at the present time to a limited degree in the province of Saskatchewan which I would commend to the minister. I do not know who originated it, but whoever did deserves, I believe, some credit. The plan is simplicity itself. It proposes to put men who are free to go, mostly single men, on farms, the government paying each man five dollars a month and paying the farmer five dollars a month to keep him. He is supported then in food, shelter and clothing at a total cost to the government of ten dollars a month. I do not think it can be done cheaper in any other way. There must be in Canada hundreds of thousands of farmers who would like to make improvements on their farms, farmers who no doubt would have liked to do so years ago, but who could never afford it because they could not pay the necessary wages to hire men for the purpose. Now is an opportunity for these men to get cheap help with which to make these improvements. I believe that we could give employment to 100,000 men in this way, at a total cost to the government of not more than ten dollars per month per man, and when the work was done the government would not be saddled with enormous expense such as would be involved in any structure built up under a relief measure. As I say, I do not know who originated the scheme, and it is working only to a limited extent, but I believe it is capable of vast expansion and I commend it to the minister.

Mr. NEILL: The debate has got away from the actual resolution before the house. The resolution proposes steps to deal directly with the distress due to unemployment, but we seem to have got into a general academic discussion with regard to the original causes of the present situation, which is a matter that has been discussed at considerable length already in this house. The minister was courteous enough a few days ago to say that he would welcome any suggestions made by members, and while he would not, of course, guarantee to adopt them, he intimated that he would consider them before introducing the bill. That seems to me a very reasonable suggestion, and it is much more advisable than simply bringing in a bill and leaving us to criticize it without any hope of having any changes made in its provisions. I should like to take advantage for a very few minutes of that offer to mention one or two suggestions, which I hope will be found practical, dealing directly with the subject under discussion.

I am glad to see that the Minister of Public Works is here. I would call his attention to the statement made by the Prime Minister the other day, very plainly, that there was to be no federal relief work as such done this year. Now the Minister of Public Works will recall that last year his estimates were very badly smashed, so much so as to be almost unrecognizable so far as carrying out any necessary maintenance of public works was concerned. The situation was remedied when we came to unemployment relief by his doing the necessary maintenance works under the provisions of the relief fund. In some ways it was a good idea; at any rate it furnished some work for unemployed people, and it also provided the necessary maintenance, failure to provide which would have been very bad policy indeed on the part of the department. We find this year that the situation is very much the same, only worse. The minister has practically cut his estimates to the disappearing point, possibly with the same idea in view, that he will get the necessary expenditures made out of the unemployment relief fund. A glance at the estimates will show that he has made hardly any provision for the necessary work.

This is not the place or the time to point out to the minister what very bad policy, a policy of penny wise and pound foolish, it is to neglect the maintenance of wharves and floats which have only a short life anyhow; for if maintenance is not carried on year by year it means double expense in the future to make repairs. In the meantime these public conveniences are standing idle during a considerable period of their very short life, hampering industrial development and inconveniencing the public. As the minister has made the cut even worse this year than it was last year, I want to point out to him that he is now confronted with the situation that no relief will accrue to him from the unemployment relief fund. There is to be no federal relief work undertaken, so I suggest to him with all deference that it is very much up to him to take steps to see that in the supplementary estimates arrangements will be made to carry out the most necessary public works required.

As regards other suggestions, we understand now that we are committed to a policy of direct relief only. So far as British Columbia is concerned, I have no doubt that the government will make or has made representations, and judging from the press I gather that its wishes are opposite to that. In that province the government apparently wish public relief works continued on various grounds—that it will provide work, it will not destroy the morale of the men, and some return will be made for the money spent. So far as the cities are concerned, the same view is held. Certainly the smaller cities will be against the policy of direct relief only. Not only is it better for men to do some work for the relief they are given, but the small cities have plenty of work to do and naturally they want some return for their money. If we are going to go in for direct relief, however, and whether we do or not, I want to point out to the minister that we shall have to make greater provision to help the cities. They are almost at the end of their financial resources. They have strained every resource in the past and in many cases have reached the limit of their borrowing powers; and to a considerable extent they have reached the limit of their taxing powers as well. Not perhaps that municipal law will not allow them to tax the people further; but experience shows that you can tax the people just so much and then, as governments have found in the past, you do not get as much money as you did before. Many of the smaller cities have reached the limit where they can reasonably tax the people and expect to get more money. So that if we are to be confined to direct relief, then the government will have to be prepared to pay a larger share of relief money. This will be necessary for two reasons: first, as I have stated, the cities have little or no money, and in the second place, they will be worse off under a policy of direct relief than under the system of contributing to work. Under the system of contributing to work, the arrangement, in Brtish Columbia at any rate, was that the city paid twenty-five per cent, the province twenty-five per cent, and the dominion fifty per cent. So that if a municipality had $1,000 to spend on relief work, it resulted in a total expenditure of $4,000. That is obvious. Now, if they are to be confined to direct relief, which is on the basis of 33-33-33 and a fraction, then the city's $1,000 will result in an expenditure of only $3,000 and they will have nothing to show for it. They will still have to dig down into an exhausted treasury to do whatever necessary maintenance work might be required in the streets. So that they will be much worse off under the direct relief system than under the one that obtained last year, where each party to the agreement contributed to the work in the proportions I have mentioned. I suggest again, therefore, that if the system now proposed is to operate, the cities will have to have a larger grant.

My next suggestion is that the minister put a little more into the act and a little less into the regulations. He has had one or two years' experience and he knows what can and what cannot be done, and I think the work would be facilitated if he would put more into the law in order to let us know just where we stand. Above all, we want a real genuine system which will provide that when the cities have expended money and are entitled to a certain return from the Dominion government, they shall receive immediate payment. The experience in British Columbia during the last year shows this to be a highly desirable thing. Last year the cities in that province made a deal with the provincial government that they were to put up so much, the province so much and the dominion so much. They went ahead and spent money and incurred obligations. When the work was in progress the men had to be paid and the result was that the cities had to borrow money at a high rate of interest in order to meet payments which should have been met out of payments from the government. In many cases these cities reached the end of their borrowing powers and the unhappy storekeepers had to act as bankers for the province. There should be a definite system evolved so that this money will be paid when due.

I would suggest that the dominion relief officer, especially in the province of British Columbia, should be placed in a position to earmark the moneys coming from the dominion. These moneys should not pass through the provincial treasuries, where it has a habit of sticking; it should come directly from the dominion to the cities. Of course, provision could be made to see what vouchers are properly o.k'd and all that; let the provinces O.K. the vouchers, but do not let the money get into the provincial treasuries. Such a procedure would make the burden of relief, which will be heavy this year, much easier to bear.

I am not making any grand bold suggestions that the department change its policy, because I know they would not; I am only making these one or two plain suggestions. However, I think they are practical suggestions and if the minister will give them consideration I do not think he will be so likely to have a repetition of the nightmare which he must have had last year in connection with the situation in British Columbia.

Mr. HURTUBISE: Mr. Chairman, I have followed the trend of this discussion but I wonder to where it is leading us. I am beginning to realize that the government is trying to shirk the responsibility of relieving unemployment. During the last election the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) said that he was going to build the trans-Canada highway and would undertake other public works in order to give employment to everyone who wanted it, but, the farther we go the more we realize that the government is trying to shirk the responsibility. Last year when the unemployment relief bill was introduced the responsibility was divided between the municipalities, the provinces and the Dominion government. That plan seemed to work for a while, but it has proved to be a complete failure. The municipalities and the provinces are close to bankruptcy and the government now says that it has done enough. The resolution reads in part as follows:

—to loan money to any province on such terms as may be agreed upon and to guarantee the repayment of moneys borrowed by such province and to assist any province in any way that may be deemed necessary or advisable to provide for the relief of distress and the support and maintenance of those requiring assistance, and to loan money to and guarantee the payment of money by any public corporation or undertaking

According to this resolution the government is leaving the whole responsibility upon the provinces, so why all this discussion about the trans-Canada highway? The government has nothing to do with this, it is leaving the whole responsibility upon the provinces. Why should we bother about the administration of such works if the provinces are going to handle everything? I think the government feels that its honour is in danger because, as I said in a previous speech, it is scandalous the way things have been handled in connection with this highway. The government is leaving everything to the provinces and is going to let them sink or swim. During the discussion on his estimates on April 28, the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Gordon) is recorded on page 2452 of Hansard as saying:

On April 8 the provincial premiers came to Ottawa and on what remain of that day and throughout the following day the whole situation was considered with a view to checking up on the work accomplished and to formulate a course for the future. I think I am stating it fairly when I say the premiers and those representing the provinces were unanimous in the decision that the provinces and the municipalities within those provinces were financially unable for any length of time to carry on the program of public works projected, or to carry out the scheme formulated since the last session of parliament. Further, it was the opinion of provincial representatives and myself that there had been started public works, a portion of the cost of which would become a charge upon the municipalities and provinces, which probably should be discontinued, because the municipalities and provinces, and probably the Dominion, would not be able to continue them.

The Minister of Labour has permitted discussion to continue this afternoon in connection with the trans-Canada highway, but why does he not tell us definitely whether the government is going to accept responsibility in connection with this work, or whether it is to be carried on under the exclusive management of the provinces? It is about time we should know. If this work is to be undertaken by the provinces, there is no use in discussing it any further.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The resolution gives authority to the governor in council to enter into agreements with all or any of the provinces respecting relief measures, but it does not state what the relief measures are to be. We have been told by the Prime Minister, and I believe by the Minister of Labour, that the policy of having work undertaken by the government alone or in conjunction with the provinces is to be discarded. We have been told that relief may be granted in cases of necessity; but, on the other hand, the resolution reads:

—to loan money to any province of such terms as may be agreed upon and to guarantee the repayment of moneys borrowed by such province and to assist any province in any way that may be deemed necessary or advisable to provide for the relief of distress and the support and maintenance of those requiring assistance.

I was led to understand, from what the Prime Minister said the other day, that the policy would be to lend money to the provinces for the purpose of giving not work, but relief, assistance—the dole, if you like. Will the minister kindly tell us what the policy is going to be? Will it be merely the lending of money by the federal government to the provinces? If so, the government or parliament would be doing practically nothing; we would be merely lending the credit of the dominion to the provinces in order that they might help the unemployed by giving them money for food and other necessities. I do not think we have been given all the information, and I would ask the minister kindly to tell the committee what the government has in mind as to how this resolution and the bill to be based upon it will work out in practice.

Mr. GORDON: A few evenings ago I made some observations with reference to the discussions which had taken place over a period of many months with representatives of the various provinces with regard to taking care of destitute people, such as those to whom many references have been made in this debate as being in need of shelter, food and clothing. I am not at all in agreement with those who paint such gloomy pictures. It may be and probably is true that there are many people who refrain as long as they can from accepting direct relief even from their government or their municipality, but who ultimately have to do so. They have fallen on misadventure; they are out of work, and provision has been made, and very properly so, that people shall not suffer from lack of food, clothing and shelter.

I do not like to be reiterating what the situation was, because it is so well known to us; but in the past a program was outlined for the purpose of giving work to the unemployed. In almost every activity, by governments, railroad companies, commercial and industrial concerns and so forth, there were many expansions that probably, in the normal course would not have been undertaken for one, two or three years. But I am not lacking in frankness when I say that the stringency of the financial situation rendered that course an intolerable burden to those who were subscribing to the fund to keep up that sort of program of works. The municipalities, which are creations of the provinces in which they are located, found themselves in many, I think in the majority of instances, quite unable to participate in any large way in contributing to programs of that kind. Some of the provinces, as hon. members well know, were unable to bear their share of the burden which in exceptional circumstances is largely their own, that is, looking after the destitute within their own borders when the community in which such people live cannot take care of them. Some of the provinces, as I say, found themselves utterly unable to carry the burden.

I do not think the members of the committee would care to have me go over again the situation in which the four western provinces found themselves. Not only could they not take care of their own share of the works that were outlined, but they had to borrow from the Dominion government money to take care of their share. Moreover, they found themselves utterly unable to take care of their obligations, both internal and external, falling due. That money had to be advanced, and I think it was very properly advanced to them. If one applies the strict rule of solvency or insolvency, they might be said to be insolvent in the sense of the word that they were not able to meet their obligations as they fell due, but none of those provinces is in fact insolvent. No hon. member would for a moment suggest that they are insolvent. They are, comparatively speaking, young provinces. I think it is a great tribute to the older provinces of Canada that they have been willing to lend their assistance. At least the expressions of view, as I have many times read them, of the leaders of thought in those provinces have reflected satisfaction in regard to the contributions which they, of coure, as the biggest taxpayers, have to make towards helping out the newer provinces of confederation. The burden, as I say, was great, and that was why it became necessary, in the view of the government, not to be content with casual meetings, if I may call them that, of premiers and other representatives of the provinces, but to have them all come to this city in order to have a free and frank discussion of the whole situation. The provincial representatives were very frank in their opinion that the time had come when the major portion of their work, so far as assistance to their people was concerned, would of necessity have to take the form of direct relief. I do not think we need call it the dole, because in spite of the pictures that have been painted in this chamber, I am well enough acquainted with certain lines of business, at least in this country, to feel confident that we are going to get through this period of depression, and I do not think the end will be long delayed. I do not for a moment believe that in some magic way the situation as we had it in 1928 and the earlier part of 1929 will be restored. I doubt very seriously if I would like to see it restored, because it will be recalled that at that time almost everyone in Canada with the speculative instinct developed at all was engaged in some sort of speculation and extravagant expenditure which he could not afford. I think there are many members of this chamber who, if they cared to admit it, would say that they too were engaged in speculation without regard to the future. Therefore I do not expect to have restored in a month, or even a year, the condition of affairs that existed in 1928 and in the early part of 1929.

In further reply to the observations made by the hon. member for Quebec East, I would say that the program of works which were got under way and are not yet completed, and which it will take a considerable time to complete, will be continued where the work is of a kind that once having been started could not be stopped without great loss. That will run into considerable sums of money, although I have not under my hand the exact amount of money that will be expended in the completion of these works.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Just what type of work is the minister referring to?

Mr. GORDON: I did place on Hansard the telegram that was sent to all the provincial premiers after the conference that was held here so that there would be a clear definition of the arrangement that was arrived at. At the risk of repeating—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not want the minister to go to that trouble, but would he just give an illustration of the type of work he has in mind?

Mr. GORDON: For instance, buildings that have been started, undertakings on which the work already done would be lost if the work was not completed. Take, for instance, the building of a sewerage system, or something of the kind. Then again there is a type of work that cannot be stopped without creating undischarged contractual obligations. With a view to determining what works will fall within these categories and what can be discontinued, I have had communication with the various provinces in order that the schedules may be carefully reviewed and nothing lost by reason of discontinuing works of a different character.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does the national highway come in that class?

Mr. GORDON: No, I do not think it does. I presume the hon. member refers to what is commonly known as the trans-Canada highway. I scarcely think it falls within that category. On the other hand, the trans-Canada highway probably stands aside and apart from strictly relief work. Moneys may be devoted to work upon the trans-Canada highway as a measure of relief in conjunction with the provinces, but no agreement has been reached on that point. However, it will undoubtedly be the subject of discussion when the agreements with the provinces are entered into. I do not think I can enlarge on what the provinces have in mind with a view to the future.

I have been asked what is being done in the interim between the end of last month and to-day. We are advancing no money other than to complete contracts already entered into. The provinces, the municipalities, and many, many societies in this country, which are earnestly trying to help people to help themselves, are not relaxing their efforts in any respect. I am not one of those who suggest that there is an overflowing well of money where all you have to do is to go with your pail and get it filled as occasion demands, and then hope against hope that from some place at present undefined you can get more money out of the willing taxpayer. I am sure every member well understands that these steps can only be taken having regard to the capacity of our people to pay, and every man, whether unemployed or employed, has to bear that in mind. The unemployed men must always remember that it is the employed man who has to bear this burden, and he should be extremely astute himself to take advantage of every opportunity to improve his position. I cannot imagine anything that is easier, at least for a time, than for a man to lie back and say: Somebody has either got to find me work or take care of me. But I do not think the normal man is going to be content long in that frame of mind. His own desire to become rehabilitated will early reassert itself. That condition of mind will not become a fixture with him. The normal man will take advantage of every opportunity, great or small. Mapping out that course for a person, we will assist through the agency of the provinces, and will at least see that there is no starvation, such as has been described, or destitution, in an endeavour to help the people over this most difficult and trying time. I am sure every member of this chamber is conscious of the fact that the whole nation, as reflected in this dominion, the provinces, the municipalities, and an innumerable number of industries and societies of all kinds, is straining every effort to join in a concerted and sustained endeavour to get the country over this trying period, and I am just as confident as I am of standing here that we are going to do it.

I cannot outline categorically the exact steps that may have to be taken, because each week and each month the picture changes; but I think the picture is improving. The reports that I get from British Columbia, to which a great deal of attention has been directed, seem to indicate improvement, and that is very gratifying. I know that in northern Ontario in my part, and that is the greater part, things are improving very materially. I know as a matter of fact that many hundreds of workmen have been taken on in the last few months, and I know that conditions have also been improving in northwestern Quebec, because I am very well acquainted with the situation there. But unfortunately, as soon as it is advertised that hundreds of workmen are being taken on and there is plenty of work in a certain section, and of course the story is always embellished, we have men coming in—I say this without a feeling of petulance at all about the newcomers into Canada, but they seem to be able to move around faster than the people who are born in this country; they come into the camps up there and are a problem. But the people are meeting it with very great courage, as I am sure that the people throughout Canada generally are doing.

Mr. LAPOINTE: As far as direct relief is concerned, that is providing money for destitute people who need food or shelter, do I understand the minister to say that the dominion will contribute its share and will not simply confine itself to lending money to the provinces as we have been led to understand? Will the dominion contribute its share?

Mr. GORDON: We will lend the money to the provinces—

Mr. LAPOINTE: The dominion will only lend money?

Mr. GORDON: The dominion will contribute.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not simply by lending money?

Mr. GORDON: No, we will give to the provinces, and of course the provinces are the only ones who are in touch with their own people and have the machinery set up to distribute the relief that these funds will provide.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Could the minister state the percentage of relief costs to be borne by the Dominion government?

Mr. GORDON: The percentage of relief as between the provinces and the dominion has not been definitely settled. However all provinces will be fairly dealt wth, and I believe there will be little difficulty in arriving at a fair adjustment.

Mr. NEILL: The minister said conditions were improved in British Columbia. Did his information indicate what branch of industry had improved?

Mr. GORDON: Lumbering, for one—

Mr. NEILL: Lumber? Good Lord!

Mr. GORDON: Yes, and coal, for another.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understood the minister to indicate that the government would both lend and contribute to the provinces. If I understood him correctly, he said contributions would be for relief purposes, and not for purposes of work; is that correct?

Mr. GORDON: Answering the first question, I say the dominion will give a percentage to the provinces by way of contribution. It may happen, as it has in the past, that some province may not for the moment be able to put up its share. In such a circumstance I believe the Dominion government would be justified in lending, and would lend to the province the share it would have to put up, taking in security, I presume, treasury bills.

With respect to the last part of the question, following the unanimous view of all the provinces—and I think I am fair in that statement—an effort will be made first to give direct relief to all those destitute and worthy people. At the present time so far as I am aware there is no program outlined by any of the provinces for anything in the nature of forced expansion of works in connection with buildings or things of that kind.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Wednesday, May 4, 1932.

The house met at three o'clock.

AERONAUTICS ACT AMENDMENT

On the order:

Introduction of bills: The Minister of National Defence—an Act to amend the Aeronautics Act.

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill be dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: By leave of the house, the order will be dropped.

Order dropped.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): I desire to lay upon the table orders in council Nos. 1026, 1027, 1028, 1029, 1030, 1050 and 1051, passed pursuant to the provisions of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932, all the orders relating to the expenditure of moneys.

LIVE STOCK RECORDS

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 73, respecting the incorporation of live stock records associations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Explain.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The original act of 1900 permitted the formation of live stock record associations. The act of 1912 repealed the act of 1900 and enacted the present statute making provision for a national live stock records board. The present bill is the outcome of administrative difficulties over the past twenty years, and the other change in the bill deals more with formative changes than anything else, grouping together in the act matters pertaining to records, associations, and enforcement.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

CHURCHILL, ONT., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. VENIOT:

1. Who is postmaster at Churchill, Ontario?
2. When was the appointment made?
3. On whose recommendation was appointment made?
4. Who has the contract for carrying the mail over rural route from Churchill?
5. When was contract awarded? Were tenders called?
6. Was the contract awarded to lowest tenderer?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. E. H. Sloan.
2. March 1, 1895.
3. No information.
4. E. H. Sloan.
5. July 3, 1920. Yes.
6. Yes.

LEFROY, ONT., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. VENIOT:

1. Who is postmaster at Lefroy?
2. When was the appointment made?
3. On whose recommendation was appointment made?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. Miss Mary Victoria Sloan is in temporary charge.

2. July 26, 1927.

3. A temporary transfer became necessary and the district superintendent, Toronto, made arrangements with Miss Sloan who had post office experience.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

Mr. HOWDEN:

1. What was the entire cost of the Hudson Bay railway?
2. How much of the amount was absorbed by the railway, and how much by the terminal works?
3. Has the government taken any steps to obtain an insurance rate that would enable the grain growers of western Canada to avail themselves of the advantages of this railway?
4. If so, what steps have been taken?

Mr. CAHAN:

1. $49,772,506.11.

2. Railway, $31,904,802.76; Churchill terminals, $11,593,485.47; Port Nelson terminals, $6,274,217.88.

3. Yes, as regards marine insurance rates on ships navigating to and from Churchill.

4. In July, 1928, reports of meteorological observations and ice conditions as found during Hudson strait expedition of 1927, which was organized and conducted by the Department of Marine to obtain accurate information in regard to ice conditions and to study the requirements necessary to ensure safe navigation in Hudson strait, were forwarded through the High Commissioner, London, to the Imperial Shipping Committee, then discussing insurance rates for the route to Churchill. Each succeeding year to date additional information as obtained from hydrographic survey and patrol vessels maintained by the Department of Marine in Hudson strait has been forwarded to the Imperial Shipping Committee, as well as reports on aids to navigation established by the Department of Marine in Hudson strait and Hudson bay, namely, direction finding stations at Nottingham island, Cape Hope's Advance, Resolution island, and Churchill.

On the representations made by the Imperial Shipping Committee to the underwriters outlining the facilities afforded, and in view of the fact that a high-powered icebreaker with salvage equipment is kept by the Department of Marine in Hudson strait during the season of navigation, a reduction in the marine insurance rates, originally proposed, was obtained in 1931.

The Imperial Shipping Committee is continuing its negotiations with the underwriters with a view to still further reductions in the insurance rates. More recently information was furnished regarding the visual aids to navigation which the Department of Marine is preparing to establish in Hudson strait this coming season.

EAGLE, STAR AND BRITISH DOMINIONS INSURANCE CO., LTD.

Mr. DUFF:

1. Has the Eagle, Star & British Dominions Insurance Company, Limited, complied with Canadian laws with respect to taking out a licence to do business in Canada?
2. What amount has said company deposited with the authorities, either in cash or in bonds, to protect Canadian policyholders from loss?

Mr. RHODES:

1. Yes.
2. $389,784.

TOKIO MARINE AND FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. DUFF:

1. Has the Tokio Marine & Fire Insurance Company of Tokio, Japan, complied with Canadians laws with respect to taking out a licence to do business in Canada?
2. What amount has said company deposited with the authorities, either in cash or in bonds, to protect Canadian policyholders from loss?

Mr. RHODES:

1. Yes.
2. $92,000.

WESTERN ASSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED

Mr. DUFF:

1. Has the Western Assurance Company, Limited, complied with Canadian laws with respect to taking out a licence to do business in Canada?

Mr. RHODES:

1. Yes.
2. $237,841.

CURRENCY ADVANCES TO BANKS

Mr. REID:

1. What amount of currency was advanced to the banks under the Finance Act, for the months of October, November and December, 1931, and January, February and March, 1932, giving the respective amounts in each month?
2. What rate of interest was charged to the banks for the advances made to them during these months?
3. What security did the banks have to put up for the advances made?
4. Were those advances made by way of loan, and if so, for how long a period?
5. Did the rate of interest charged the banks vary throughout those months?

Mr. RHODES:

1.

October, 1931	$ 27,000,000
November, 1931	56,500,000
December, 1931	47,500,000
January, 1932	23,500,000
February, 1932	25,500,000
March, 1932	22,000,000

2. Until October 26, 1931, 4½ per cent on advances against all securities other than 4 per cent treasury notes in connection with which 3¾ per cent was the authorized rate. Effective October 26, 1931, the rate was reduced to 3 per cent on all advances.

3. Advances to the amount of $178,803,000 were made against Dominion of Canada securities and $23,197,000 against approved provincial and municipal securities as provided for by section 5 of the Finance Act.

4. Yes. Repayable at any time before May 1, 1932.

5. Yes. See answer to question 2.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

POLITICAL PARTISANSHIP

Mr. POULIOT:

In how many cases, since August, 1930, has a postmaster charged with active political partisanship been replaced temporarily or permanently by a person making the charge or giving evidence against him?

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. SAUVE:

In view of the fact that it will take some time to prepare the answer, it is recommended that this question stand as an order for return.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

Mr. RALSTON:

For a copy of all bills, accounts, cheques and correspondence, respecting logs purchased for or used on the North Sydney breakwater extension, done under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act of 1931.

Mr. BENNETT: That could refer only to such accounts, cheques and correspondence as are under the control of this government.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (for Mr. Pouliot):

For a copy of all orders in council in connection with aid to farmers, since August 1, 1930.

Mr. BENNETT: This is not a motion to which any adequate measure of response can be given. The returns have already been brought down, under the Unemployment Relief Act, in connection with various sums that were paid out under the provisions of the statute.

Mr. SPEAKER: In the absence of the hon. member, and in view of the large number of these orders in council that have already been produced, the motion had better stand.

Motion stands.

ST. ARSENE, QUE., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (for Mr. Pouliot):

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between all persons from Riviere du Loup and Mr. Tanner Green, post office administrator at Quebec, from July 1, 1926, to September 14, 1926, and from August, 1930, to date; also all reports or other documents signed by the said Mr. Green in connection with the appointment of a postmaster at St. Arsene, county of Témiscouata, during the same period.

IMPERIAL ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): The Prime Minister was kind enough to say that when the item respecting the Imperial conference, which is in the miscellaneous estimates, came up for discussion there would be an opportunity to discuss matters pertaining to the conference. May I ask the right hon. gentleman whether he could conveniently indicate a day on which that item might be taken up and also whether that date might be fixed in the near future instead of being left to very near the end of the session.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I will give consideration to the request of the right hon. gentleman and try to advise him on Friday.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT McKENZIE (Assiniboia): On March 23 last an order of the house was passed for the production of a telegram received by the Prime Minister from the province of Saskatchewan, to which he referred in his statement on the farm relief bill on July 29 last. May I ask when this return will be brought down?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I thought it had been brought down.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Not yet.

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): Yesterday I called the attention of the Prime Minister to an order which was passed by the house for a return I asked for about three weeks ago, and he said it was answered in a return asked for by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McKenzie).

Mr. BENNETT: A question.

Mr. VALLANCE: A question, yes. Looking up the answer I find that it is not complete. I would again direct the attention of the Prime Minister to the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I tried to explain to the hon. gentleman that the directions with respect to the acquisition of options for wheat were given verbally when Mr. McFarland was here and the options were turned over to the milling companies at a price of 53 cents. Subsequently the amount was cut down from some 300,000 odd barrels to 250,000 barrels, the quantity of wheat required being reduced and the options being reduced accordingly. The answer given to the hon. gentleman was obtained by making inquiries of the milling companies as to how the distribution of orders was made. The original order was given to the secretary and not to the individual millers.

41761—166½

UNEMPLOYED IN NORTHERN ONTARIO

On the orders of the day.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, may I direct the attention of the government to the possibility of there being a substantial trek of unemployed into northern Ontario this summer, and ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) to do his utmost to discourage any such pilgrimage.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 69, to amend the Companies Act.

Motion agreed to.

On the order for third reading of Bill No. 61.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the law officers of the crown have suggested that bills numbered 61 and 69, which are really slight amendments to the Companies Act, had better be consolidated into one bill by adding the first section of Bill No. 69 as the fourth section of Bill No. 61. Therefore, I move, seconded by Mr. Ryckman:

That Bill No. 61, to amend the Companies Act be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with Bill No. 69, to amend the Companies Act, with instructions that the committee have power to consolidate said bills into one bill, bearing No. 61.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, I move that section 1 of Bill No. 69 be added as section 4 to Bill No. 61, and that the words in the new section 4, "Companies Act, chapter twenty-seven of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927" be struck out and the words "principal act" be inserted in lieu thereof.

Motion agreed to.

Section 4 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES RESPECTING MEASURES TO RELIEVE DISTRESS

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 3, consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Mr. Gordon—Mr. LaVergne in the chair:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the governor in council to enter into agreements with all or any of the provinces respecting relief measures in such province or provinces; and to pay out of the consolidated revenue fund such sums as in his discretion may be required to meet the obligations created by such agreements; to provide for special requirements in the national parks and in the drought stricken areas of the province of Saskatchewan; to assist in defraying the cost of the sale and distribution of products of field, farm, sea, river and mine; to loan money to any province on such terms as may be agreed upon and to guarantee the repayment of moneys borrowed by such province and to assist any province in any way that may be deemed necessary or advisable to provide for the relief of distress and the support and maintenance of those requiring assistance, and to loan money to and guarantee the payment of money by any public corporation or undertaking.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct the attention of the minister to certain questions I put to him on April 28 when this resolution was before the house. I asked the minister if, under this legislation, farmers in the province of Quebec in need of seed grain would be able to obtain it by applying either to his department or to the Department of Agriculture. As I stated on that occasion, I have received a great number of requests from farmers in my constituency who are in need of seed grain. In the past certain privileges have been granted to the farmers of the west in connection with seed grain and I do not see any reason why the farmers of Quebec should not be granted similar privileges. At that time the minister stated that it was not within his knowledge that the provincial government, through its premier or minister of agriculture, had received requests from farmers who were in need of seed grain. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) then addressed himself to the minister as follows:

> My information is that the Minister of Agriculture of Quebec last year made application to the Department of Agriculture for seed grain and was told that there was nothing for him.

Since this debate took place last week, in view of numerous requests I had received from my people, I addressed to the Minister of Agriculture a letter of which I have a copy in my hand and to which I have not yet received a reply from him. This letter is as follows:

> Ottawa, April 29, 1932.
>
> Hon. Robert Weir, P.C., M.P.,
> Minister of Agriculture,
> Ottawa, Ont.
>
> Dear Sir:
>
> I have received within the last few weeks, several requests of certain electors of my county, asking me to obtain seed grains for them, for seeding this spring.
>
> They claim that on account of the bad financial situation in which they are at the present time, they cannot afford to buy said seed grains. I know that in the past, certain special privileges have been granted to western farmers in such a way as to enable them to obtain such seed grains to help them in their seeding operations.
>
> I shall be very much obliged to you if you could let me know what can be done for the farmers of my county to obtain said grains.
>
> Yours very truly,
> Pierre F. Casgrain.

Before this resolution passes, I think it is the duty of the minister to tell the house and the country at large what would be, under this legislation which we are called upon to adopt, the standing of the farming community, not only in Quebec but in the eastern provinces. Last year a bonus was given on wheat to help the western farmers, and people in our province requested the same treatment in connection with the dairy and, particularly, the butter industry. During the course of the provincial election last year some promises were made by members of the federal government who were helping the opposition in Quebec in their fight against the local government, but nothing material was enacted by this government to help the farmers of my province.

During the debate on the budget the hon. member for Dorchester delivered an admirable speech wherein he stated that it was time for the government to lay down a policy for assisting the farmers of eastern Canada as those of the west had been helped in years past when they were in need. Without saying too much about the people of Quebec being in dire necessity to-day, I think the farmers of my province—and I know I am safe in saying this as regards those in my county—are really suffering and in need of help from the federal government. What policy has the minister to enunciate along the lines I have just mentioned, in order to help the farmers of Quebec to buy seed grain for the present seeding season?

Mr. GORDON: The interrogation of the hon. member is very fair and proper. As is well known, advances for seed grain for farmers were made at the instance of a number of provinces and the federal government assisted with respect to funds to pay for the same. If there is in Quebec a condition that would seem to the local government to be beyond their capacity to take care of as a province, and a submission is made to the federal government, I have no doubt it will be taken under review and justly dealt with.

Mr. HEAPS: I wish to refer particularly to the question of lien notes which were submitted by the provincial governments and municipalities to persons who were recipients of relief. As I understand the matter, the federal government was not a party to the demand to sign notes, made upon those individuals who were so unfortunate as to require relief, but I believe this action was taken by provincial governments and certain municipalities. According to the arrangement made between the federal government, the provincial governments and the municipalities, one-third of the cost of direct relief is paid by the province, one-third by the municipality and one-third by the federal government. The federal authorities, so far as I understand the situation, have not requested that their share of the money be refunded to them. Therefore, it appears to me that the provinces and the municipalities who are demanding the return of the federal share of the relief obtained are asking for more than is coming to them; that is, they are attempting to collect funds which were a contribution of the federal government and to which they are not entitled. I should like to have a statement from the Minister of Labour as to whether it is legal for the provincial and municipal authorities to attempt to collect funds which they have not been asked to collect and which do not belong to them.

Mr. GORDON: I believe the taking of these notes from people who received assistance in western Canada sprang from a desire on the part of many people, particularly in the drought stricken areas of Saskatchewan, who through that great misadvanture, found themselves, through no fault of their own, in that situation, not to accept a gratuity even in their time of distress. Many of them insisted on giving a note, and in doing so I think, they exhibited a degree of courage that is highly commendable. I believe it was on account of that fact that the practice was invoked to take a note from everybody.

As regards the repayment of these notes, if they are repaid, this is a question merely of adjustment between the federal authorities and the province concerned. But I think I can frankly state to the committee that the federal government has no intention of taking advantage of the necessity of the situation in order to enforce payment of the notes which the parties give for relief accorded to them. I intend to inquire carefully into the matter that I may acquaint myself more thoroughly with the reason for taking these notes, although I think the one I have given is correct. Certainly the matter should not present any problem difficult of adjustment.

Mr. HEAPS: In certain parts of the country, the giving of relief is contingent upon the individual signing a note, and where he refuses to do so, I understand no relief is obtained. Has the federal government been a consenting party to demanding these signatures from recipients of relief? Further, does the minister think it is legal for the provinces and municipalities to demand the payment of money which does not belong to them?

Mr. GORDON: I am advised that the taking of these notes in Manitoba was as a result of a conference betwen the provincial authorities there and the municipal authorities of Winnipeg. I cannot state it was the suggestion of the provincial authorities, but it was with their approval and concurrence that the notes were taken. The local authorities may have been inspired to take the course they did because there are people who are inclined to take advantage of the situation. At any rate I am advised on good authority that the notes taken in Manitoba were taken at the suggestion or with the approval of the provincial government and the municipal authorities of Winnipeg. I can only reassert that I will inquire carefully into the situation to see that hardship and injustice do not follow.

Mr. HEAPS: Suppose a person was in receipt of $100 worth of relief. Out of that $100, one-third, or $33.33, is contributed by the federal government. It appears from my information that the local governments, provincial and municipal, are insisting upon the repayment of that part of the money given by the federal authority as its contribution towards relief. I would like to know what authority they have to collect federal funds.

Mr. GORDON: The taking of notes in the province of Manitoba was not done with the approval of the federal government.

Mr. HEAPS: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. GORDON: I can well understand that people might want to give notes or some other acknowledgment of advances made to them. That is not an unusual thing. I feel perfectly certain that if I got a gratuity or an advanec from anybody I would like to give some acknodwledgment of that assistance. That undoubtedly may have happened. I am not criticizing the provincial government or the municipality of the city of Winnipeg, but so far as this government was concerned it was not advised that that course was being taken. I can only repeat that I will inquire into the situation to see that hardship does not follow as a result of what has been done.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I would like to draw attention particularly to that part of the resolution which gives the government power to assist in defraying the cost of the sale and distribution of products of field, farm, sea, river and mine. Would the minister give us some idea of what is involved and what it is proposed to do in that regard?

Mr. GORDON: The language of this resolution, as the hon. member undoubtedly knows, was used in the bill of last session. I am not at present able to say whether or not an occasion arose where such action was taken or could have been taken. At any rate, the intention is to invest the government with power during the recess of parliament, should the occasion arise, to take any steps that are within the contemplation of the language of this section. I cannot forecast what the future may develop, and therefore I cannot give the hon. member any further information than that.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I want to make clear that I am not complaining of this provision; on the contrary, I am very glad it is there. I know that last year this particular feature of the legislation was used to assist the pools in a difficulty. I was wondering if any such thing as a bonus on wheat was contemplated under this provision this year.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. minister in reply to my hon. friend from Charlevoix-Saguenay said a few moments ago that if proper steps were taken to place before the government a request for help on the part of the farmers of the province of Quebec in the matter of securing seed grain, it would be fairly dealt with. I said the other day that I had been informed that such a request had been made last year, but was not entertained. I have now the correspondence, and I find that as a matter of fact the Department of Agriculture of the province communicated with the federal Department of Agriculture and after many letters had been exchanged, was informed that they could not get anything. Later on Mr. Guimont, deputy director of unemployment relief for the provincial government, also had communication with Mr. Hereford, the dominion director of unemployment relief, with regard to this question, and there again he was informed that no help would be given so far as seed grain was concerned. The minister says that if proper steps are taken the request will be dealt with fairly. I would like to know from the minister just what he requires. What does the government need in order to view favourably the granting of help to the Quebec farmers in the way that such help has been granted elsewhere?

[Mr. Campbell.]

Mr. GORDON: I think the process is not one that is very much involved. If representations are made to the government of the province of Quebec disclosing that a condition exists in that province under which some assistance is required which the province itself is unable to take care of, and if communication is made to this government disclosing those facts, certainly the province of Quebec or any other province will not be dealt with unfairly. The same consideration, I trust, will be given to every province in Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE: So the province has first to plead poverty or a state of destitution in order that the farmers within its borders may secure help from this government?

Mr. CASGRAIN: No answer.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I should like to make a few observations on this resolution, but before doing so I wish to convey to you, Mr. Chairman (Mr. LaVergne), my appreciation as one of the younger members of this house upon your return, sir, to sit again at the table and preside over the proceedings of the committee of the whole. In voicing my appreciation of your return to health and to your labours in this house, I believe I express the feelings of hon. members on both sides of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): It is a very great pleasure to see you back again, Mr. Chairman, and looking so fit.

On the question of unemployment relief I have not during this session taken up a great deal of the time of the house. It is not my intention to do so to-day, but if my remarks are a little more extended in committee than might seem usual I hope it will be appreciated that I am speaking to this resolution under a sense of duty to the city of Winnipeg from which I come.

The problem of unemployment in the city of Winnipeg is almost unbearable. As a representative from that city it was with very considerable concern that some time ago I saw it announced in the public press that on and after May 1 last all unemployment relief measures would be confined to direct relief. I took occasion some ten days ago to remark that if such were the policy to be followed it would in my opinion be deplorable and it is therefore a matter of great satisfaction to find that the resolution as introduced into this house is couched in language indicating that the measures to be taken will not be confined to direct relief, but rather that the government is taking authority under the bill which will follow the resolution to enter into such arrangements with the different provinces of Canada as may be deemed expedient. It is desirable in my opinion that the power granted to the government should be most elastic. True it is, as has been intimated, that as a result of the conference held between the federal government and the representatives of the various provinces on April 9 last, there was more or less general agreement that unemployment relief works should not be continued on the former scale. To my mind, the nature of the relief works to be carried on is primarily a matter for the decision of the provinces. Figures prove very little, but for what they are worth I offer a few so as to lay a background for the whole matter.

The only approximate survey or registration made as to the extent of unemployment in Canada was prepared in September of 1931. The records show that on September 1, 1931, the needy unemployed in Canada numbered about 379,000; in Manitoba, my native province, there were about 41,000.

Is the condition cured? From time to time hon. members opposite seem to take a great deal of pleasure in pointing out that it is not. Some say the condition is worse than it was before. That is a consideration which to my mind does not go to the root of the question. It comes down to this: We have a condition of unemployment in Canada; whether it be in a measure greater or less it is still a matter of national importance, and it is the privilege, yea the duty of this House of Commons to endeavour to deal with it.

What has been done? I am not going to enter into details. Hon. members are familiar with the steps which have been taken. Since September, 1930, there has been a frank recognition by this government of the fact that unemployment in Canada had reached a stage where it had become a matter of great national concern. There has been a large measure of cooperation between this government and the governments of the various provinces from the session of September, 1930, until this very day, and it is the hope of all that that measure of cooperation will continue.

I shall now say a few words concerning the resolution before us. As it is already on record, I shall not take occasion again to place it on Hansard. The agreements to be entered into with the various provinces are matters for negotiation. The means by which those agreements will be worked out in the various provinces in my opinion is primarily a matter for the consideration of the particular provinces involved. Relief is essentially a local matter, we must recognize that the municipalities, the lowest unit of government, know their problems better than any other body. The provinces, in turn, know best their particular problems. So I say that whatever agreements are entered into should be worked out in the light of the conditions prevailing in the particular provinces.

I refer to another matter to which attention has been brought in this house, namely the back to the land movement. This matter has received extensive consideration in the province of Manitoba. There has been an intimation that the settlement or reestablishment of unemployed men upon plots of land will be restricted to crown lands. I realize that is not a declared governmental policy, and that no definite agreements have yet been made. I think however the present is the opportune time to draw to the attention of the minister this fact: I realize the evil that is apprehended and which it is the desire of everybody to forestall, namely that in connection with any movement on the part of governments to acquire lands for the unemployed the avidity of certain members of the real estate fraternity will be such that there will be a tendency to exploit governmental purchasers. That was the experience in connection with the movement to settle ex-service men upon the lands after the war. The suggestion is that in order to forestall such an eventuality only crown lands be made available. To my mind such action would be like amputating a leg to cure a corn.

Some of the most suitable lands are not crown lands. Men cannot be taken out with no equipment and only a few hundred dollars and placed on bush lands. Behind it all there must be the probability that with the measure of support or assistance they may get they will stand a reasonable chance of taking their living from the soil. I suggest there should be chosen farms already under cultivation or partial cultivation, and with buildings thereon. In Manitoba, and I have no doubt in other parts of Canada, there are improved lands in various municipalities which for one reason or another have come back to those municipalities. Lands have come back under various farm loan boards; lands are a drug in the hands of mortgage companies. I suggest therefore that the back to the land movement, a possible relief measure, be not cabined and confined by restriction to crown lands, but that the difficulty be met by providing that in each province—and I speak particularly for my province of Manitoba—there shall be a board of public spirited men to work in cooperation with provincial and federal governments who will have charge of the matter. It is not my privilege to suggest names, but in the city of Winnipeg I know public men, hard headed business men, men experienced in farming, who would not only be willing but would consider it a privilege to serve upon a board such as I have in mind, and their services would be given free of cost to Canada. If in centres like Winnipeg we can have a board such as the one I have suggested, men who are willing to do something at this time of crisis, to do it willingly and patriotically, not only will it cost Canada nothing but we will receive the best possible measure of service.

What can be done? Sometimes when listening to the criticisms, taunts and jibes thrown across the floor by hon. members opposite, sometimes when I see the partisan articles in the party press of this country, I am almost driven to think there are people today who are happy in the thought that the question of unemployment has not been cleaned up, and that it is still a matter for party acrimony. Such an attitude, whether on the part of public men, private citizens or the press is in my view to be deplored. Are there any grounds for such an imputation on my part? I shall refer briefly first to the press.

Hon. members will recall that on April 22, when the Minister of Labour was dealing with the question of unemployment relief, he was pressed by an hon. member for a definite statement, a yes or no, as to whether or not the back to the land movement would receive the support of the government. I was present on that occasion as were other members. Next morning the Manitoba Free Press contained an article with this headline carried all across the front page in inch type:

Ottawa Rejects Back to Land Plan

Yet the very article itself contains this answer by the minister:

The government is not yet prepared to agree.

Is that a rejection? Those who have any familiarity with the conduct of government know that if a matter has not been definitely decided upon by the cabinet, a minister finds it necessary to consult his colleagues before making any announcement as to policy. When pressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) to say "yes" or "no," his answer was that "the government is not yet prepared to agree." We know perfectly well that very shortly afterwards it was announced in this house that the government was prepared to cooperate. Someone suggested the administration was driven to it by virtue of the questions put in the house. I do not think so. In the Ottawa Citizen of April 28, five days later, I find the following:

Government aid to Unemployed to Gain Their Living on Land

Hon. W. A. Gordon announces scheme to enable families to obtain subsistence. Federal assistance subject to equal contributions by provinces and municipalities concerned in each case.

"This is in no sense a government-aided land settlement scheme," said Mr. Gordon, "but an application of relief expenditure to enable families receiving relief to contribute to their own maintenance by labour on the land, where they may eventually establish themselves on a self-supporting basis."

Next I am going to refer to the attitude of public men on this question, and I am glad the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is in his seat, because it is my intention to refer to certain speeches delivered by him outside the house. What I am about to say is actuated by no spirit of recrimination or of party politics, but it is germane to the attitude of the party press and party men to this question. It will be recalled that objection was taken by hon. gentlemen opposite to what were described as unauthorized measures taken by this government under the "blank cheque" authority of the 1931 act. Some rather extravagant statements were made that under those powers the Royal Canadian Mounted Police force had been increased; it was also stated by one member that on a recent occasion an armoured car was careening about these buildings; another member referred to the purchase by the government of machine guns, tear bombs, and the like; the implication of all this being that so far as the public was concerned the government had acted illegally, and the phantom was conjured up that in some way or another these measures were directed against our unemployed in case of trouble of any sort. The house heard the definite explanation given by the Prime Minister very shortly afterwards, on March 23, when he said:

I have listened with the utmost amazement to some of the statements that have been made in this house as to why we should not be entrusted with this power. An hon. gentleman yesterday resumed his seat after I had heard him state that we should not be entrusted with this power because we had increased the mounted police. We did. We made a bargain with certain provinces by which we assumed responsibility for the policing of those provinces, and for which we are being paid. We increased the number of the police, and increased it for other reasons as well—the peace, order and good government of Canada—that there should be no possible chance of the breaking up of those institutions which this country has regarded so highly.

The hon. gentleman went on to say that we provided machine guns. Not a single machine gun is owned by the mounted police. The hon. gentleman said that we had bombs provided for the mounted police. So there were. They were tear bombs to escape the possible charge, if there be a riot or insurrection or difficulties, that the most humane methods were not used for the purpose of quelling it. The constables of Canada, having met, recommended that in such cases tear bombs would be highly desirable, and we supplied our police with numbers of them. Those are the bombs we had. . . .

No tanks are owned by the mounted police of the government. The only armoured car was the one belonging to the Department of Finance which conveys securities from the express office to the parliament buildings.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we must assume that the hon. members who referred to these specific things believed that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police force was increased for the express purpose of dealing with meetings of the unemployed, but this statement by the Prime Minister should have been sufficient to correct any misapprehension on their part. Yet the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, speaking in the city of Winnipeg on Easter Sunday, is reported in the Manitoba Free Press of March 28, under this heading:

Woodsworth sees danger in "blank cheque" proposal.

Already, he said, under the blank cheque voted by parliament at the last session, the sum of $250,000 was appropriated to increase the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and equip them with machine guns, tear bombs, and such riot quelling arms.

The report continues:

"It is a serious thing," Mr. Woodsworth repeated, "this province falling for the bait of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police."

He is referring to the federal government taking over the policing of the provinces.

It means that Ottawa has at command a highly centralized military police force scattered all over Canada. I never thought we would come to that. I am told the western provinces fell for the bait because of their financial condition.

The Winnipeg Tribune of the same date reports the hon. member in these words:

Alleging that the Bennett government had made improper use of the "blank cheque" powers accorded it a year ago, J. S. Woodsworth, M.P., for Winnipeg North Centre, speaking Sunday at the Agnes street labour hall, ascribed the blockade tactics of the opposition in the House of Commons to the fear of further improper use. . . . About $250,000 had been used to increase the mounted police force in the alleged interest of public security. Machine guns, tear bombs and other riot-fighting equipment had been purchased simultaneously with the increase in the force.

Now, I submit that after the matter had been discussed in this house and a definite statement made upon it by the Prime Minister, to appear before a meeting of the unemployed in a centre like Winnipeg, where there are many unemployed, and naturally there is much discontent, and again to recite in substance what he had stated in this house, although partially correct, was incorrect in that it did not fully state the case. I submit that the hon. member, in all fairness, should on that occasion, have explained to that audience that no doubt a very considerable portion of the increase in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police was due to agreements then in contemplation and since carried into effect, whereby the federal government has taken over the policing of the additional provinces of Manitoba, Alberta, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Then the people would have had the full picture. But withholding that explanation, I submit to this house, gives the people a wrong and unfair view of the whole situation, and whatever the intention may be it has the effect of stirring up additional discord, mistrust and discontent.

Now as to whether or not the province of Manitoba was "baited" by this government and induced to allow the federal government to take over its policing, I refer the house to a statement published in the press and prior to the time that this speech was delivered. I have reference to a statement by the Hon. W. J. Major, K.C., Attorney General of Manitoba, which was published in the Free Press of April 8, with regard to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The statement appears under the following headings:

Says Manitoba does not surrender rights in merger of police.

Attorney General Major tells legislature province will save $125,000 by amalgamation.

Declares union of forces first discussed in Saskatchewan and Alberta, not Ottawa.

That is from the Attorney General of Manitoba, not politically friendly to this government. Continuing, the article goes on:

There will be absolutely no surrender of provincial rights in the agreement with the dominion for the merger of the Manitoba provincial police force with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Hon. W. J. Major, K.C., told the legislature at the night session Thursday.

The attorney general said there would be a saving to Manitoba of at least $125,000 in police costs, and he pointed out, in reply to labour members, that the amalgamation was not initiated at Ottawa but was discussed first of all in Saskatchewan and Alberta, which were greatly concerned with reduction in expenditure.

Yet we have the charge that they fell for the "bait" of this government.

I am not going to read any more of these extracts, but in fairness I should refer to the statement which was alluded to yesterday by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth)—and in this he will give me credit for being fair. The hon. gentleman yesterday referred, I believe, to a reported speech of the chief commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, said to have been delivered in Toronto on Vimy night, April 9 last. I have before me a copy of the Mail and Empire of April 11, in which the chief commissioner is reported as having said:

> . . . that if the country were rid of communists there would be no unemployment in Canada.

I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that such a statement is ill-advised; I submit that a statement of that sort tends to create discord and discontent. It is rather an ill-considered and extravagant statement. As I have shown, we have nearly 400,000 unemployed. Applying this fact to such a statement, does anyone think that there is any number of "reds", so-called, in this country comparable to 400,000? And in passing, let me say that this term "reds" is used very inconsiderately and thoughtlessly and has a very bad effect upon the people of the country. I will give one illustration from Winnipeg. We sometimes hear that Winnipeg is "red"; it is not "red." On the first of May some 4,000 men marched in procession through that city. They were quite orderly and there was no trouble because of that procession, even with conditions as they are. This is a fact.

But within my own personal experience, I may say that during the Easter recess I had occasion to go to Winnipeg and in the west end of my constituency, in the municipality of St. James, there was held a meeting by, mark you, the unemployed association of that municipality. The meeting was held in the basement of Britannia school and was crowded; there were 400 or 500 people present. I want you to know that many of these were unemployed men, heads of families, who under the unemployment relief were getting probably only two days' work a week, so that they were living close to the bread line. I had occasion to address them and I explained what was being done. I will not go into details, but I may say that a good many of them were old countrymen. I recognized in that audience, too, a lot of men who, to my personal knowledge, served their country in those years from 1914 to 1918. They bore on their bodies the scars of that service, and yet they were hungry and unemployed; but to my utter amazement and, I must add, delight, when that meeting closed they rose and, at the suggestion of the chairman, sang, to a man, "God Save the King." Now, hungry men who are out of work and right up against it and who, in a meeting like that, called specially to deal with the question of unemployment, will respond in that way, are not "reds". There is nothing the matter with them; they are the best that this country can produce. They served their country well before and will serve it now. Let us, therefore, cut out a lot of this too-generous labelling of the unemployed as "reds".

One more remark and I am through. My appeal, not only to the members of this house on both sides but to the public, the press and the individual, is that at a time like this the keynote of our attitude towards this whole question should be real cooperation, not lip service but real service; less rocking of the boat and a little more pulling at the oars. If we do this, and if individuals and community service clubs and local organizations will approach the problem from that point of view, it will be far better for Canada.

Let us recognize that no government alone can solve a problem like this. A government can direct it to some degree; it can direct our efforts, but the final success of the scheme must depend upon individual effort and the stamina of our citizens.

Canada has gone through bad times before, God knows, and in those days it was that something that was in the people of this country that enabled them to pull through. Upon what did they draw in those days? Not upon themselves alone. Each individual drew upon tradition, if you like; he drew upon something which, through tradition, through the generations that had gone before, had been put into his blood. Whether it was iron, or courage, or steel, whatever you like to call it, it was something that had been put there by the generations from which we have sprung. We in Canada spring from the finest races this world has known. We spring from English, Scotch, Irish, Welsh and, I may say too, from the best of other lands. And in passing let me make this observation, that we should be careful in this country at this time, when we speak of discrimination against the foreign-born, to remember that they have been invited to Canada; and whether a nation be great or small, the fact that it persists as a distinct nationality is due, not to any inherent weakness, but to the fine gold of that race. If we have nationals from countries other than Anglo Saxon countries, let us take care to nurture what we have and give them a fair chance. In my opinion our greatest asset is that source of strength from which we draw, and drawing upon it, let us cooperate as Canadians and work together for the solution of this problem.

Mr. VENIOT: I direct the attention of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy) to the fact that in discussing the races which make up our population he left out one very important race.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I am indeed very happy to include that magnificent and gallant race, the French.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The French Canadians, the vanguard of Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I happen to live in the constituency of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, so in one sense he may be considered to be my representative in the house. He has undertaken to read me rather a mild lecture with respect to a speech I made in Winnipeg during Easter time. It is not my intention to take more than a few moments to discuss this matter. In commencing his speech, the hon. member called attention to some misrepresentations which the Free Press had made recently in connection with the attitude taken by the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon). Possibly he will realize that the newspapers might not fully represent my own position. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has stated that we ought not to take the press too seriously. I do not suggest that the press has misrepresented me, but when it undertakes to condense a full speech into a paragraph, one can readily understand that that paragraph may not contain all that was said during the course of an hour's address. As a matter of fact, a correspondent of the Tribune called attention to some of the statements which had been made, and some time ago I made public in the Tribune my own attitude on the subjects discussed. If I used the term "machine guns," to which exception has been taken, I admitted that I had made an error, although I am not sure whether or not I did use the term. I quoted from the order in council which provided for an appropriation of a very considerable sum to be made for extra police purposes. The Prime Minister himself has said that this extra police force was needed not only for the additional work involved in policing the provinces but for other purposes as well. However, yesterday afternoon I said all that I had in my mind with regard to the increase and centralization of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and I do not need to cover that ground again.

Coming back to the question of unemployment relief, I should like to make one last appeal to the government to reconsider its policy. I have no objection to the authority being sought by the government under the resolution now before us, but I do think that some other method than that apparently contemplated in the resolution should be adopted. The resolution provides for the relief of distress and the support and maintenance of those requiring assistance. It does seem to me that to-day we need not only to provide for those in distress but we need to provide employment. That is the great need of to-day. Apparently with the exception of the carrying on of works already commenced and with the possible exception of the placing of some people back on the land, the government seems to have abandoned the idea of creating more work. That policy seems to me to be fatal from an economic standpoint because the one thing needed more than anything else in this country is a greater purchasing power. The people must be given more work so that the extra wages will provide an additional purchasing power. I wonder if I may venture to call the attention of the government to a very interesting article which appeared in the Atlantic Monthly of this month. The article is entitled "The World's Economic Outlook," and is by John Maynard Keynes. I should like to quote a few selected sentences. The first one reads:

> This is not a crisis of poverty but a crisis of abundance.

I think we must recognize that as being essentially true. The next reads:

> Unluckily the traditional and ingrained beliefs of those who hold responsible positions throughout the world grew out of experience which contained no parallel to the present.

I take it that that is what is fundamentally wrong with nearly all of those who have to deal with administration at the present time. I am not denouncing bitterly the present administration, I think they are largely in line with other administrations, but I do want to point out that the leading economists of the world are telling them that they are on the wrong line, that instead of adopting a policy of rigid economy they should expand industry in some way and thus give more purchasing power to the people. I quote again:

> The only way is for us to discover some—

Mr. Keynes emphasizes the "some."

> —object which is admitted even by the deadheads to be a legitimate excuse for largely increasing the expenditure of someone on something.

It seems to me that that is the policy which the government ought to adopt, that it should devise some means to enable someone to spend money on something. If we could go through with the St. Lawrence waterway it would be a good thing because such an undertaking would release a considerable amount of money for construction work. However, there are other public works which could be undertaken at this time. I was very much struck with the suggestion of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) when he urged the adoption of a housing scheme. Many skilled mechanics in our city are receiving relief and under the contemplated legislation they will continue to receive relief for months or years to come. These mechanics might as well be building houses for houses are very much needed in most of our communities. The building of houses would stimulate trade activity all along the line. Such an undertaking should be commenced not only in the interests of the workman and in the interests of the country, but because of purely economic reasons. It would start the wheels of industry going again. I again quote Mr. Keynes:

> The voices which—in such a conjuncture—tell us that the path of escape is to be found in strict economy and in refraining, wherever possible, from utilizing the world's potential production are the voices of fools and madmen.

That is strong language, but it is not mine, it is that of Mr. John Maynard Keynes. I contend that the voice of an economist of his standing ought to be listened to by those who are responsible for the administration of this country. I urge the adoption of a program of further public works or some other projects which will give employment to the workmen of this country.

I understand the difficulties of the present government. They have all along claimed that unemployment was primarily a municipal or provincial responsibility. Possibly that may be true in theory; I am not very much concerned with the constitutional aspect of the case. In practice, however, we all know that the western municipalities are to-day almost bankrupt. We know the western provinces are so near the line they have had to come to this government for help in connection with the floating of their bonds. That is a serious situation and we can hardly expect those provinces to initiate public works. They have not the funds. Under these conditions I urge that if we are to have additional public works; if we are to have any greatly increased expenditure, the Dominion government will have to undertake the task.

Such a policy is essential from the standpoint of the men themselves. I think of the plight of the unemployed, the large number of single men to whom I referred yesterday and the almost equally large number of married men with families depending upon them. The ordinary mechanic or unskilled man to-day cannot himself initiate things. It must be remembered that we live under a system which for years and years past has given the initiative to the group that we call the employers. They have been responsible for providing work. The men have looked to them; the country has looked to them to organize our industries, our commerce, our finance. They have in some way or another failed in the job. The result of the general depression means a failure to those at the helm properly to size up the whole situation and organize in harmony with the recent developments. These men have failed and now in the stress—the almost panic of the time—we are expecting the poor individual workman to initiate something for himself. This cannot be done. Moreover, during the last two or three years he has been just on the edge of things and has used up what little capital he had, so he has nothing with which to start. Many a man cannot even buy a railway ticket to travel fifty miles to some place where he might get work. He has not anything with which to provide for his family while he is away; he has nothing with which to buy fuel. A great majority of mechanics have been working in factories where the tools are the large machines. They have no tools of their own; they could not buy supplies; they could not provide themselves with raw material; they could not go out on a piece of land because the land is already appropriated. I should like to impress upon hon. members the dreadful conditions under which most of the unemployed find themselves to-day. If any sort of employment is to be provided, we must not expect the poor unemployed individual to provide it; we must look upon someone in an authoritative position to undertake that work, and under conditions as they prevail to-day this must be the Dominion government.

Further, may I point to the demoralization of the men that is taking place at the present time? I do not think those who are not closely in contact with the poor or with the unemployed quite realize the extent of that demoralization. It is all very well to say: "We have a fine people." I agree with that. "We come of a good stock." I agree with that. It is all very well to say: "These people took their share in times past whether in peace or war." I agree with that. But they are losing heart to-day; you can hardly expect them to keep up their courage when they are half-nourished and, worst of all, when they have lost any immediate objective, any hope of getting out of their difficulties. I cannot go into a group of unemployed men without feeling sick at heart. Here are these men, without hope in the world, dragging out an existence through charity day after day, week after week and month after month. What prospect is there for them?

May I refer to one consideration that may not be considered very proper—to hundreds and thousands, and, in the aggregate, tens of thousands of these men being forced to live celibate lives. Any of us who are familiar with logging camps know something of the problem connected with that type of life, where great bodies of men are concerned. Those who have had anything to do with men who have been at the front know something of the problems arising out of that kind of life. Those were men living active lives, very often full of excitement, of interest. But take thousands of men who have nothing of the normal satisfactions and responsibilities of home life and can you imagine the effect of month after month and year after year of that type of existence? I do not think any hon. member who has any knowledge of the world or who has relatives who possibly are in a plight of this kind, can very well contemplate with equanimity the continuance of such a condition.

I wonder if I might mention an incident that occurred only to-day? I was in a little restaurant at noon and a man who had been an employee of this government came over to the table where I was sitting. He told me that he had been up against it for a long time, ever since he had lost his position with the government; that he had tramped the city; that he had done everything in his power to obtain work; that he had gone out as an agent and, as the depression went on, failed to make a sufficient commission to pay his expenses and that he had determined that the only thing for him to do was to leave Canada and seek, if possible, to enlist in the service of a foreign country. But he said: "The thing that worries me, that breaks my heart, is that I have four children whom I must leave behind. My wife is dead and I have four children depending upon me, I have a small pension that is about equal to keeping those children and two or three of them are in a school while one is with its grandmother." There were perhaps only two or three people in the restaurant, but it is a public place and yet the poor fellow broke down and cried at the thought of leaving his family and going to a foreign country. He would have to enlist for two or three years and leave them in Canada, but this was the only thing left for him to do. There is no one in this house but must be touched by a case of that kind. Every one of us would be willing to give a few dollars to help an individual, but such money would be of little real service in such a case. My acquaintance was not asking me for money. He was simply telling me of his struggle. His case is typical of that of thousands throughout the country.

In making this appeal I am not talking party politics, but I would urge that there rests upon the federal government, as representing the country a responsibility to see to it that a man of this kind is not forced to leave Canada or to live a life of crime or to abandon his children; rather, we should so arrange our affairs that in some way he can be found work. Nothing less is sufficient for us; that is our responsibility to-day. That is the reason I am making this last appeal, that the government adopt a broader, more constructive policy and not merely provide for handouts to the provinces and municipalities for actual cases of distress, but undertake to provide real employment so that these men may maintain their self-respect.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Even at the risk of seeming to delay the resolution at this stage, I should like to draw to the attention of the minister one or two matters so that he may give me the information, although not necessarily to-day. I am not going to ask him for that, but I should like him to be prepared to give it at the next stage of the bill, preferably on the second reading.

Before raising those questions, may I remark that this is the second time a bill of this kind has died by the efflux of time. The original measure died on March 1, and remained dead for a solid month, the government apparently operating without any authority during that period.

Mr. GORDON: During that month the government spent no money whatever.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: True, the new bill that came into force about the first of April was made retroactive and of the same force and effect as if the old measure had never died. We can excuse that once, but why have the same thing repeated with the new bill? This is the fourth of May by the calendar. Does the minister as a lawyer think it is good legislative practice to be constantly having retroactive legislation invalidating other legislation, any more than we can absolutely help? It looks as if the government was quite satisfied with slithering along with tail-end legislation. That is what brings ridicule on this government. I have been in government a long, long while, and I know that if I had done what my hon. friends opposite are doing I would never have heard the end of the ridicule that would have been poured on me not only in this house but in the provincial house. But my hon. friends opposite are inviting that very thing. Now we are dealing with a resolution preparatory to a new bill which may be called, and I say so without any irreverence at all, the second resurrection of this bill, the second coming of the unemployment and farm relief measure. Why leave us open to that kind of ridicule? My hon. friends act very strangely. If there is a wrong way under heaven of doing a thing they will cross the street in order to go about it the wrong way. They are quite irregular in their ways. But what is the use of complaining? There seems to be no capacity for improvement in them. I hope, however, that it may never occur again, and may I hope that if we require this legislation to be reenacted the third time, they will take time sufficiently by the forelock to introduce their new measure before the old one expires? I hope that we shall not require it again because some parts of the country that were up against it during the last two or three years have good prospects of a crop this year, and that may possibly help all along the line.

There are two or three questions which I wish to bring to the minister's attention, of which I would like him to make a mental note or a little memo if he likes. Some time in March the question was brought up as to the suggested bonus of one dollar per acre on the seeded acreage in Saskatchewan and other parts of the west where there was no crop It will be recalled that where there was a good crop a bonus was given by the government on the basis of five cents a bushel, and that was generosity itself compared with the way that those settlers fared who had no crop at all. I am not complaining at all of the bonus that was given to those who had a crop or that it was a bit too much; not at all. The total amount granted by way of the five cents a bushel bonus was around eight or ten million dollars. But why such a violent contrast between the treatment of those who had a crop and those who had no crop, in favour of the former? The Minister of Agriculture in a very nice and fairly well reasoned out speech some time in March pointed out that the government had been quite generous with the west in the matter of the five cents a bushel bonus, what is called the compensating adjustment bonus, and he argued that inasmuch as the government had been generous, the house and the country generally might very well trust the government to do the right thing with regard to the proposed dollar an acre on the seeded acreage in the south where there was no crop. So far as I know, that is the way it stands at the present. I was unavoidably absent yesterday, and possibly somebody else asked this question. If so, the minister does not need to answer it a second time. He can just refer me to the page of Hansard where I may find the answer. I submit, however, that the time has come when the minister, after consulting his colleagues, should give to the petitioners who presented that request a definite answer whether they may expect anything along that line or anything to correspond to it. That would only be fair.

The minister knows that this is the first time that I have spoken on this measure in committee. He knows that I have taken up a number of labour problems with him in personal interview and in writing, and I can testify that in each case he has dealt with them quite satisfactorily. Because of that I hope and expect that he will deal with these questions, if not satisfactorily, at all events to the extent of giving us the government's policy, preferably on the second reading of the bill. That is one question, the proposed bonus of one dollar an acre on the seeded acreage.

The other question is this. As the minister and the house know, Saskatchewan has been hit pretty hard in the matter of those needing relief and employment. We are sorry for ourselves and for the dominion as well because of that. Saskatchewan has always been looked upon as the outstanding wheat province of the dominion, for many, many years growing more wheat than all the rest of the dominion put together. I do not know whether that is something to be proud of or not, but it is a fact anyhow. Saskatchewan is handling her relief in cooperation with this government on a different basis from any other province. I am not criticizing that. Some have taken the ground that the whole business of relief should have been handed over to a commission. At all events, we have a commission handling relief in the province of Saskatchewan. I am not going to criticize that relief commission just now; I have in the past, but not to-day. Now I am in the humour to get information, which I hope the minister will give on the second reading of the bill after he has had an opportunity of discussing these questions with his colleagues.

I would like to know if the government hold themselves in any way responsible for the treatment that is being meted out to the Saskatchewan farmers through the medium of the Saskatchewan relief commission. Sometimes the Prime Minister will say: "We hold ourselves responsible for the administration of these moneys that we are giving to the provinces." At least we understand him to say that. But then when we put questions to him at close range or make complaints he will say: "That is a matter for the province. They are handling this through a commission." The house will recall that when this matter was up before the hon. member for Weyburn drew the attention of the Prime Minister for the first time to the fact that for every little mite of assistance that was given to the farmers they had to sign a promissory note in advance. I call that a loan policy, but it was called a relief, and the Prime Minister did not know anything about that until the hon. member brought it to his attention. Later on it was my duty to call his attention to the way in which seed grain relief was being given to the farmers, with a seed grain lien being taken on the coming crop to be realized on, if thought advisable, by the middle of August this year or at any time thereafter. I drew attention to the nature of that seed grain lien. I never saw such an exacting one. It tied the farmer up so tightly, as if with a logging chain, that he could not blink an eyelash or wiggle a toe. That may be necessary, but when everybody else apparently is getting his contribution free with no provision for the return, for instance, of the five cents a bushel bonus, why is there this provision for the return of every rag that is put on the backs of these people by the relief commission, or a promise to pay at all events? Is that to continue? The government has announced that it cannot afford any longer, and the provinces cannot afford any longer, to go on with relief works to provide employment. I am not going to criticize that to-day either. That was the inevitable result of the government's policies in connection with other matters to which I shall not now refer. If these conditions lasted long enough the government was bound to reach the point that they have now reached, that of giving direct relief. That can be done with less money. Nevertheless, it is the dole. I have no right to speak for the other two western provinces, but there are parts of Manitoba and Alberta that are in the same position that a very large portion of Saskatchewan was in, and I would ask this question: Is it the policy of the government, through the Saskatchewan government, and in turn through the relief commission, again to have everybody between now and the coming of the next crop sign a promissory note before he is given any more assistance? If they want to put in winter rye and require seed rye, will more seed grain liens be registered against their property?

I think my questions have been fair, and I hope hon. members opposite will not suggest that they have been asked in an improper spirit. I do not think the minister takes that view. I have asked my questions earnestly and when we reach the second reading of the bill, I will expect a reply as full as the minister is capable of giving. If we are to have a dole for all of Canada, why should these prairie areas which have been so distressed be exempted from the dole, and promissory notes imposed upon them? I believe that is a fair question. However I do not wish it to be thought that we are ungrateful for what has been done, because that is not so. I do not know what would have happened to thousands of people had they not had assistance. They have had assistance many times in the past, too, I am sorry to admit.

Mr. GORDON: When were seed grain loans first started?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh, it was before my time.

Mr. GORDON: Away back in 1876, I think.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I believe that is right.

Mr. GORDON: And I think they are not paid yet.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I know it was away back in the seventies before my time. We could go back to the Selkirk settlers who, I believe, received loans from the home government. The same thing happened in Ontario. Away back in the early days of the last century, shortly after the year 1800, they received all sorts of equipment from the home government and from friends in the old land to begin their settlements in the bush. I am very sorry the practice has had to be continued so long. The fact is, however, we are living in a country which forty or fifty years ago was not considered at all favourably, and there was a feeling that western Canada was nothing but a buffalo run. That country has been reclaimed through the efforts of hardy pioneers, and development has been accomplished only through great labour and risks taken by those early settlers. At intervals they have had to have assistance. When it comes to the disposition of the government's assistance, we do not want to be discriminated against, as we believe we have been discriminated against. We do not wish that condition to continue.

The last time relief measures were under consideration the government sought to hide behind the excuse that we were delaying the bill, and consequently delaying seeding. I remember the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) said, in a very pathetic manner, that we were gambling with the crop, and in fact, doing everything that was bad. On this occasion the seed has been provided, and there can be no further ballyhoo about interference or delay. The present measure has not been long before us, because discussion began only yesterday. This is the first time I have spoken on the measure, and although I did not see the clock when I began I think I have been talking only about twelve minutes, and have no intention of speaking longer at this time. I should like the minister to get some definite information as to seeded acreage bonus proposal and I should like to know if this government is going to hold itself responsible for the treatment meted out to Saskatchewan farmers by the relief commission of that province.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. members for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy) and Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). The last mentioned gentleman referred to the impossibility of boiling a half hour's speech into one of only a single paragraph. I would suggest that he give the benefit of the doubt to the chief commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to whom he referred the other evening. That gentleman happens to come from my constituency, and we know him as a very able and successful man. I doubt very much that he was accurately reported.

I do not intend to take much time of the committee, but I accept the invitation of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre to make a cooperative contribution. Hon. members have heard a great deal about unemployment and the distress arising from it. I assume the government, and no one more than the Minister of Labour, is fully informed concerning unemployment and distress. Further, I assume he is anxious to have the condition remedied. I have a suggestion to make, and I hope it is constructive. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to the necessity for public works. Public works, however, mean taxation, and sometimes very heavy maintenance charges. A year or so ago I had the honour to send a memorandum to the predecessor of the Minister of Labour in which I drew attention to the desirability of having the wires of the telegraph, power and telephone companies placed underground. Throughout our towns, and particularly in those towns on the main highways, poles and wires create disfigurement, and are dangerous. I assume further that they involve heavy maintenance expenses. The city of Oshawa is in my riding, and suffers from a particularly grave condition of unemployment; I regret to say there is very serious distress. I cite the condition in Oshawa, however, simply as an example because there are many other towns in the same position. I suggest to the minister that serious consideration be given to the suggestion of loaning to public corporations, such as power, telegraph or telephone companies sufficient sums of money at a low rate of interest to enable them to place their wires underground, and that this work be conducted in a way to give the maximum amount of employment.

Mr. REID: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words to the committee and the minister regarding the position of many municipalities of the province of British Columbia, and before taking my seat I shall direct two questions to the minister which I hope he will be in a position to answer.

A serious condition of unemployment has obtained since the year 1930, and municipalities have, I believe, been carrying loads even heavier than those borne by provincial or federal governments. Since 1930 they have been carrying this load of unemployment and expenditures for the unemployed. Municipalities are closer to the people; the unemployed can reach the reeves, the mayors, or the councillors; they can also form in bodies and walk to the municipal authorities. On the other hand federal or provincial governments cannot be reached so readily by those in distressed circumstances. In spite of the fact that information was given to the house yesterday that unemployment was decreasing, I state that in some of the districts of British Columbia it is increasing. In one municipality of that province over fifty per cent of the workers are unemployed, and have registered that they are destitute and have no means with which to keep themselves. That one particular municipality, namely, Burnaby, has about 25,000 or 26,000 inhabitants.

Mr. GORDON: When did that condition first exist?

Mr. REID: That condition started probably in December, 1930, but it was not so pronounced then as it is to-day. Up to January of this year they had 3,500 registered unemployed, which has since increased to 4,000.

Mr. GORDON: If I caught the hon. member correctly, he said the unemployed were destitute.

Mr. REID: No. They registered as being destitute, having no funds and no work. The municipalities in the first instance have had to bear the financial burden, they have had to go to the bank and borrow money for relief purposes, at from 6 to 6½ per cent; then they had to wait until the provincial and dominion governments reimbursed them. That was an extra load they were asked to carry. Last year the tax collections in the municipalities decreased very considerably, due in great measure to unemployment, and many properties have been and will be sold by the municipalities to pay for arrears of taxes. I am speaking particularly of British Columbia. Many people who a year ago were not asking for relief are to-day in this position. They have used their resources and are looking for work or assistance. The strain of the last few years has brought many municipalities to the verge of bankruptcy. They would not be in this distressful condition had it not been for the undue burden placed upon them by the unemployed seeking relief. But the serious point to which I wish to direct the attention of the minister is that in British Columbia the banks have now assumed a dictatorial attitude towards the municipalities notifying them that they must balance their budgets or not one cent will be advanced by the banks for relief purposes. One municipality whose ordinary program of unemployment relief work was $40,000 has been told by the bank to cut it down to $22,000. I think the government would be well-advised to note this attitude of the banks, because it is only going to increase the burden of the municipalities.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Was not this government told by the banks to balance its budget?

Mr. REID: I think the banks have taken even a stronger attitude with the municipalities than they have with this government. I do not think that even this government has balanced its budget if you take into account what is intended to be spent to relieve the destitute.

At a meeting recently of the executive of the Union of British Columbia Municipalities they passed a resolution dealing with the unemployment question. I will not quote the whole resolution, but I think these paragraphs should be brought to the attention of the minister:

> Federal intervention to check dictatorial methods of banks toward British Columbia municipalities was urged at a meeting of the executive of the Union of British Columbia municipalities in the city hall here to-day. . . . The executive went on record as opposed to the federal government's direct relief policy, but in event of its adoption urged that it be financed on a fifty-fifty basis by the federal and provincial governments. Municipalities, it was said, have no taxation powers to provide for unemployment relief this year.
> Banks instead of shouldering their portion of the national burden of unemployment are actually making more money to-day than ever before by soaking governments and municipalities higher rates of interest. . . . If it was not for unemployment and social service costs, all municipalities would be able to balance their budgets this year.

I might point out that the municipalities in British Columbia are carrying the highest bonded indebtedness per capita of any municipalities in the dominion. I do not say whether that is good or not, but the per capita is something like $252.

Mr. GORDON: What is the reason for that?

Mr. REID: In a young province like British Columbia roads had to be built and various improvements made for the settlers; all this has necessitated heavy expenditures, and of course there has been also a heavy outlay for improved motor highways and for educational purposes.

Mr. GORDON: British Columbia is an older province than Saskatchewan or Alberta, by many years.

Mr. REID: I am not going into the merits or demerits of the bonded indebtedness. I am merely stating that the per capita bonded indebtedness of the British Columbia municipalities is the highest in the dominion. For instance, in New Brunswick it is only $50.38, as against $251.98 in British Columbia. It is now being urged that the dominion and provincial governments assume 100 per cent of direct relief. Many municipalities are unable to take care of the unemployed who are already registered.

Mr. GORDON: Are we not doing that now?

Mr. REID: My information is "no." If you are doing it I shall receive the information with great pleasure.

Mr. GORDON: Well, if we have been doing it, it won't help you much apparently.

Mr. REID: I should like to know that you have, because my information is to the contrary. Some of the municipalities have been clamouring for cheques for direct relief.

Mr. GORDON: I have reference to the provincial direct relief.

Mr. REID: Not municipal. It was understood last year that transients who came into municipalities would be taken care of by the provincial and dominion governments. That burden has not been assumed by the provincial governments. The municipalities had, first of all, to pay out all the relief, and then they were told by the provincial government they would receive only one third. The municipalities to-day are asking if the policy in the future with respect to direct relief should not be that the provincial and dominion governments assume 100 per cent of it. I do not think under present circumstances that that is too much to ask.

I desire to ask the minister these questions: First: Are the municipalities who wish to carry on public works, and who are in a position to submit a program, to be encouraged in the same way as last year by the provincial and dominion governments assuming a share of the cost? Second: What financial assistance will be given to municipalities who find themselves unable to meet any share of the cost of direct relief? It was said last year that the dominion government has no direct contract with the municipalities, that they must appeal to the provincial government first, which in turn appeals to the dominion, but I think it important that that should be known. I think a definite statement should also be made in regard to the land policy particularly as to British Columbia, because I notice in the Daily Province of April 29, this statement with regard to placing men on the land:

> British Columbia to Place Men on Land Government had urged Ottawa to include settlement in relief plans.
> Aid for farmers.
> Greatly encouraged by the federal government's plan to put unemployed Canadians on the land, the provincial government hoped to-day to be able to go ahead with some of the land settlement schemes which it has been developing for some months.
> Announcement in parliament that the federal government would include land settlement under its new unemployed legislation followed strong pressure from British Columbia in favour of this important new departure. Hon. R. W. Bruhn, minister of public works, took the matter up personally with Premier Bennett in Ottawa recently, explaining that British Columbia feels that many unemployed could be far better placed on the land than on roads or idle in relief.

I think it is desirable that a definite statement should be made that the federal government are boosting this along. I have already received letters asking what assistance will be given the farmers. Is the minister in a position to give an answer.

[Mr. Gordon.]

Mr. GORDON: It must be obvious to the hon. member that assistance of the kind outlined must, of necessity, be the subject matter of an agreement between ourselves and the province, and until this legislation passes I do not propose to try to prophesy what the terms and conditions of such an agreement will be. I cannot say anything further. It seems to me to be obvious. With respect to the works which the municipalities in British Columbia may wish to carry on as in the past, I have this observation to make. If the municipalities in British Columbia have so conducted their business, as has been suggested by the hon. member, that they find themselves now the most highly taxed people, per capita, in Canada, then I should say that they ought to be very careful about embarking on any scheme of works that will add to the burden of their municipal taxation. Any scheme which the municipalities may have in contemplation, for which they seek help from the province and the dominion, must of necessity, again, be a term of any agreement that may be entered into. These are matters absolutely dependent upon the necessities of the provinces as reflected through their own governments and conveyed to this government for review. That must be obvious.

Mr. BUTCHER: I wish to ask one or two questions. I do not know whether the first one is in order or not, but I shall ask it. Will the relief commission be continued in Saskatchewan? If the minister is in a position to answer that question, I shall be glad.

Mr. GORDON: Just here I would offer this tribute to the relief commission in Saskatchewan. I have heard only great commendation for the work these men have been doing. I stand to be corrected, but I am told that they are public-spirited men representing all shades of political opinion, who have given their time without charge in the interests of their province.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The three sides of politics.

Mr. GORDON: I hope there are three sides. That commission is a creature of the provincial government; it was set up by the province. From what I have heard of its work, I trust that the commission will continue its efforts; and, I believe, acting as they have been acting, purely with a desire to serve their province and, by serving their province, serving their country, and having the experience of the past year behind them, if the members of that commission continue in the work, should their services be found necessary, they will be able to function even better in the future by reason of the lessons they will have learned from the mistakes of the past—because no one's activity, no matter what direction it takes, is quite free from error at times. Personally, I can say no more about the Saskatchewan relief commission, except that it was set up by the provincial government.

Mr. BUTCHER: With reference to Mr. Percy Gordon, who has been referred to two or three times during this session, can the minister tell me the nature of the office that Mr. Gordon holds and the remuneration he receives? I have a motive.

Mr. GORDON: I am advised, and I believe it is correct, that Mr. Gordon of Regina is giving his services without charge. I am so advised and, I believe, correctly. I will inquire to see whether he is being paid at all, and if he is I shall be glad to give the information to my hon. friend, although I do not believe he is getting any pay whatever.

Mr. BUTCHER: In what capacity does he serve?

Mr. GORDON: I am instructed that he is chairman of the commission.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh no.

Mr. GORDON: Then the hon. gentleman knows better than I.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Black is chairman.

Mr. GORDON: I do not know the setup of the commission; I do not know even the members or their names.

Mr. BUTCHER: I want to refer to this gentleman because he has already been referred to on two or three occasions during this session. He was first referred to by the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell), and with the remarks of that hon. member I certainly see no particular reason to find fault, because I am not in a position to say whether they were correct or not. Further reference was made to Mr. Gordon by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Beynon) and also by the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull). I want to make some reference to him myself from a different standpoint.

Mr. Gordon has been a personal friend of mine for the last eighteen years. I know him, perhaps, a little more intimately than, I might say, any other member in this house does, and I feel I owe it to him to say what I am going to say with regard to him at this time. I may say, in case there should be some misunderstanding, that there is no rift between the hon. member for Melville and myself in connection with this matter. What I say, I say with his approval. I am going to say it because I feel it is due Mr. Gordon. The hon. member for Moose Jaw, when referring to this gentleman, asked, "Who is this Percy Gordon"? I propose to ask the same question and to answer it from my own standpoint. He is a brilliant lawyer of the city of Regina, a most estimable man from every standpoint, a man of irreproachable character and of the utmost integrity. He is a king's counsel and was appointed king's counsel by the former Liberal administration in Saskatchewan. Certainly he is a Conservative; I am a Liberal. I did not know he was a Conservative until he had been my personal friend for eight or ten years, and he about the same time discovered that I was a strong Liberal. It made no difference to our personal friendship, and I rise to-day to pay my tribute to Mr. Gordon's character and to his reputation, and to say that I believe he is a man absolutely above reproach. I do this because I feel that friendship is worth but little if one cannot stand up and uphold the good name of a friend in his absence as one would in his presence. But I want it to be clearly understood in this house to-day that there is no rift between the hon. member for Melville and myself, because he heartily approves of this statement I make to-day as a personal statement, made because of my knowledge of Mr. Percy Gordon.

Having said so much, I want to say a few words with regard to the resolution. When speaking to the resolution that led to the revival of chapter 58 in March, I said I had three or four suggestions which I should like to make inasmuch as I thought they were constructive suggestions with regard to work that might be given the unemployed. For what they are worth, I make those suggestions now; I could not make them then because time did not permit. I want to support the suggestion made by two or three hon. members that assistance might be given the farmers not only of the west but of the east, farmers who have no means to employ necessary help. Assistance might be given by providing them with men who are out of work, paying the unemployed a small wage for their services. I also support the suggestion made by both sides of the committee that homes should be built for those at present living in wretched hovels. This would be a good service to perform and would provide work for the unemployed. The unemployed could be used in forestration and reforestration work. The men could be employed in useful occupations and good would accrue to the country not only for the time being but also in the future. This is all I propose to say at this time but I hope to make further remarks when the bill itself is under discussion.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Mr. Chairman, I cannot say that I am enthusiastic over the suggested policy of settling unemployed men on the land, but I agree with what was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy) with respect to the carrying out of any such policy. He suggested that privately owned lands or lands other than crown lands be secured rather than putting these men on bush lands, which is the only type of crown lands left in the prairie provinces. I cannot think of anything more disastrous or foolish than to take a lot of unemployed men from the cities and place them in remote districts where there are no roads or school house. A policy of that kind is foredoomed to failure. If anything is to be done in this regard, I say that these men should be placed in settled districts where some land has already been cleared and where there is a possible chance of their making good. It would be much better to place these men on rented lands and give them a little assistance rather than to send them out into the remote bush districts where they would have nothing to work with and where there is practically no land under cultivation. I realize that the placing of men on the land would be the responsibility of the provinces, but if the federal government proposes to back such a scheme with its money, I suggest that the minister should scrutinize very carefully the actions of the provincial governments to see that the money is put to proper use and that the men are placed where they will have some hope of making good.

In my constituency, and I assume the same applies to other constituencies throughout the prairie provinces, there are a large number of immigrants, mostly from Poland, who, for the most part, came to this country during 1927 and 1928. Many of these people are to-day in destitute circumstances. The local municipalities are utterly unable to look after them and they have no means of securing employment. They came in without any money and have no land, and as they were brought in entirely under the responsibility of the federal government, I think it should assume full responsibility for looking after them. The federal government has assumed 100 per cent of the responsibility for relief in the drought stricken areas of Saskatchewan, but it takes only a small measure of responsibility for other relief. It seems to me that the federal government should assume full responsibility in looking after these people. The government of Saskatchewan at the present time is unable to do more than it is doing, and I know the local municipal bodies, bankrupt as they are, are not able to do anything. The information I have is that many of these people in my constituency are to-day utterly unable to look after themselves. For the most part they are good workers, but there is no work which they can secure. I wish the minister would look into this particular phase of the matter and endeavour to see that a larger measure of relief is provided by the federal government.

While I am on my feet I desire to draw the minister's attention to a question which I asked some time ago. I asked the minister if there was any possibility of the marketing phase of this resolution being used to continue the bonus on wheat put into force last year. Perhaps the minister can give me a reply to that question.

Mr. GORDON: I regret that I am not in a position to answer the hon. member.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Mr. Chairman, I think I can agree with many of the suggestions made by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Butcher), but I feel it is my duty to draw to the attention of the minister and the government certain matters which I called to the attention of the government last year. Under the provisions of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act passed last year I received a communication from the former Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson) asking me to supply a list of public works and other undertakings which might be started in my county to help relieve the unemployed. I sent this list to the minister; I have it before me but I will not take up the time of the committee by reading it as it can be found in the orders of the day of 1931, part 2, at pages 13, 14, 15 and 16 of June 16, numbers 1 to 32 inclusive. This list covered works which had been requested by my constituents but which were not carried on by the late administration because of the necessity of carrying on other more urgent works. There is no doubt that if these works had been gone on with they would have helped greatly to relieve the unemployment situation on the north shore of the St. Lawrence where there are large settlements of fishermen who are destitute because of the poor fishing conditions which have obtained for the last three or four years. I had occasion during a previous debate to draw the attention of the house to this matter and I repeat that there are many works which are absolutely necessary from the Saguenay river up to Chateau Richer. The report tabled some time ago of the works carried on under the unemployment legislation shows that only two public undertakings, both small and of minor importance, have been carried out in my county. The one was at Harrington Harbour, where a sum of not quite $1,000 was spent for the Grenville mission, and the other was at Beaupre, where a few thousand dollars were spent. Other works have been carried out by the provincial government and the different municipalities, but they were not of such importance as some of those to which I am calling attention.

The minister has asked for suggestions from hon. members; he has asked for cooperation, but I do not think he could show a better spirit of cooperation than by carrying out some of these works which would provide relief for the unemployed. This would be much better than direct relief, because that is just going back to the dole. The government apparently is abandoning the policy adopted by the legislation passed at the special session of 1930 and the session of 1931. The proper way to relieve unemployment is to help the people to earn their own living, and not to give a dole. In the resolution that has been introduced there is no definite policy, nothing of a concrete or constructive nature from which we can find out what is really going to be done. This afternoon, when I asked the Minister of Labour as to the attitude of the government towards the farmers of Quebec and when the hon. member for Quebec East supported my request, the information we received was very vague and not of a nature to encourage the farmers of my province.

The resolution reads:

To assist in defraying the cost of the sale and distribution of products of field, farm, sea, river and mine.

Would the minister, before the resolution passes, give to the house some information as to how he proposes to help to defray the cost of the sale and distribution of products of the field, farm, sea, river and mine? Is there going to be in the legislation that will be introduced some provision whereby the government will help the pulp and paper companies, in the part of the country which I have the honour to represent in the house, to give more work to the people who are in need of it in those districts which were settled by these pulp and paper companies? Those little thriving towns were very busy during the last few years, but owing to surplus production and unemployment they are suffering. Will the minister tell us how he is going to help these pulp and paper companies to dispose of the surplus which they have on hand of pulpwood and paper and how he will help the fishermen on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, who may have a better catch this year, to dispose of their fish at a more remunerative price?

During this debate the trans-Canada highway has been discussed, and in my county at the last federal election in 1930 this question was brought up. I have not yet been furnished with sufficient information to discover where this highway will start and where it will end. During the last election it was said by my opponent that the trans-Canada highway would go from coast to coast; that developments were to be made in Ontario and other provinces. I saw from the remarks made by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) yesterday that the greatest amount was being spent in Ontario for the construction of that highway. But if it is going to go from coast to coast; if such promises have been made as were made in my county by my opponent in the last election, it should start at Blanc Sablon, at the eastern end of my constituency and link up with the highway at Bersimis and St. Simeon at the further end of the county. This promise was clearly made by my opponent who was asking for the support of the electorate, following the promise made by the then leader of the opposition now the leader of the government, that this highway would be built. I contend that this is one more of the broken promises of the present administration. When they were seeking the votes of the electorate in 1930, they were ready to make any kind of promise, but to-day, when they are in office, the promises are not so easily fulfilled and they do not know what to do or where to go to carry them out.

Before I sit down, I want to protest, as many members on this side of the house have done, regarding this legislation, because it is an admission on the part of the government that they have no direct policy to offer. They want once more to have the advantage of a blank cheque with which they may do as they please, and to give direct relief through corporations or associations or public bodies as they see fit. I submit this is not the proper way in which to administer the law in this regard.

Mr. POULIOT: I entirely concur in what my good friend the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) has just said. May I take this opportunity to say a word about the back to the land scheme. Theoretically it is perfect; there is no one who is not pleased to hear that men who were formerly farmers are coming back to the land, or that farmers' sons are leaving the cities to return to the rural districts. Theoretically this is splendid, but practically it does not always work. In fact, when miners or people who have a particular trade are out of work, even if they have been brought up on a farm, if they have left it for several years, they are quite at a loss when they return; they must be well taken care of and given special grants and help in order that they may be successful in their new manner of living. There are some people who believe that people can be taken from the cities and placed in the wilderness in order to form new parishes. This is a mistake, because farmers should be grouped; when they are close together, they are strong, they have their real family life. Where there are farms for sale, they should be bought by some government, either federal or provincial, in order that we may do for the unemployed something like what was done for the soldiers after the war. We must not forget that unemployment must be fought in the same way as the enemy had to be fought during the war and the fight must be well organized in order that success may result. If some government, federal or provincial, takes credit for bringing people back to the farm, that is all right, but what is more important is to keep people on the farm. We must see to it that the farmers do not leave the land in times of distress when farm products are being sold so cheaply. Very few farmers so far have become discouraged, but if conditions do not improve; if they do not get enough money out of the dairy business or the sale of cattle or their various farm products, they will become discouraged and will say: What is the use of staying on the land? People praise our virtues, our good qualities, but we are working like slaves and deriving no benefit. We have no money to bring up our children, to send them to school; we cannot enjoy any of the pleasures of life; we have to work from early in the morning until late at night, and if we consider the low prices that are paid for our products, we are not receiving reasonable wages for our work. That is the main problem.

We cannot expect unemployment to be solved by the Minister of Labour alone even if he gives all his time to his functions. The question will have to be settled by the co-operation of the best brains in the cabinet. The Minister of Labour will have to discuss the matter with his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, in order that tariffs may be adjusted to meet the needs of the farmers. I am not speaking of the sittings of the council where all the ministers meet. The Minister of Agriculture will also have a word to say on the subject. Indeed, they cannot solve the problem by themselves; they will have to get the assistance of the best brains of the heads of their departments in order that some scheme to improve conditions in this country may be evolved. The situation is most serious. At the present employment is being sought by those who are out of a job. Amongst those out of a job are many who formerly lived in the country; for instance, the farm hands who have no home of their own but worked for some farmer who had not enough sense to look after the maintenance of the old homestead. During the prosperous years a farmer who had a very large acreage would hire hands from different places to help him in his work, and particularly was that the case in the west until machinery replaced man power to a very large extent. Many men would go from Quebec and Ontario to Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta to help the farmers at harvest time, but to-day there are very few farmers in the west who are employing help from the older provinces because they use machinery, believing that it is quicker and more economical. The result is that these farm hands are unemployed.

There is another class, as my hon. friend from Charlevoix-Saguenay so wisely mentioned, the lumber jacks with their large families in the province of Quebec, and the situation must be the same in Ontario, particularly in the northern part of the province which had the honours of the evening yesterday. There are many lumberjacks who used to earn substantial wages by working in the shanties in the winter, and afterwards they would drive down the logs and cut wood. Coming down on the river drive there was great festivity, but they earned enough money to pay for the festivity and had enough left to live on for the rest of the year. But now the lumberjacks are getting only one dollar a cord for cutting wood, and they cannot live very long on that. Furthermore, the cut of timber has been very much reduced on account of the very low price paid for it, and these lumberjacks are not now earning enough money to buy good clothes. Their plight is very bad. They must be considered with the farm hands as amongst the unemployed.

In every rural community also there are artisans, carpenters, masons and so forth, who in ordinary times get work in the building trades. But at the present time, with stock market prices going down every day, as we see by the papers, and I am surprised that they are not at zero already because for a couple of years stock market prices have been going down, people are very cautious about spending money for building houses or barns, preferring to wait until better times come. In fact, Mr. Chairman, people in the country who had saved money for the purpose of enlarging their house or building a barn or making improvements of one kind or another, or building a house for the son who had just got married, say: We will spend that money for building when the crisis is over. In the meantime these carpenters, masons and other artisans are without a job. They are amongst the unemployed, and the trouble is that people in the country who have no work to do flock into the large cities in order to find work. They say: We will go to Montreal or Toronto or Winnipeg or Vancouver, where there is more work being done. In addition, the style in construction has changed. Lumber used to be used very much in the construction of buildings. But now buildings are largely made of cement and steel, or brick and stone, and we do not see wooden buildings being put up in the cities nowadays. They are constructed in the rural districts, and as I said, the people in the rural districts are very much afraid of starting to build at the present time. The consequence is that many men formerly employed in the building trades are now out of work in the large cities.

The Prime Minister mentioned one day that he trusted very much to private charity to help the unemployed. Private charity is a wonderful thing. Sometimes people with very small means are very, very generous in proportion to their means. They do like St. Martin, cut their coat in two in order to clothe a poor man with one-half of it. The unemployed who pass through the small towns and villages in the country are always sure of getting food and shelter at the hands of private charity. That is admirable, and these people, in addition to supporting their compatriots, have to support other people who have been brought into this country from central Europe by the two big railway systems, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National, and every member of the house will testify that that is being done in every constituency of this country from Halifax to Vancouver. But, Mr. Chairman, if we want private charity to continue to help the unemployed, the farmers must make a little more money, and that is why I ask the Minister of Labour, with his colleagues the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Finance, and the Minister of National Revenue, to see that the tariff is adjusted in order that the farmers may obtain better prices for their products.

To sum up, Mr. Chairman, I come back to where I started. May I say where I stand in regard to the back to the farm scheme. Theoretically I am in favour of it, but first of all the governments, federal and provincial, should stand together to protect the farmers, to encourage them and induce them to stay where they are now. Then in the case of those who are brought back to the land, see to it that they are not isolated but are put amongst a community, which is essential to the welfare of these settlers themselves and of the country at large.

I am not going to repeat what I suggested the other day when I asked the minister to be kind enough to have an inventory or classification made of the employed in this country, with the story of each one. I would ask him if he will do that. I believe that is a fair question, and I am sure that the minister will give me a fair answer.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I thought I had a few very valuable remarks to offer to the committee but in view of the fact that the front benchers have taken up most of the time I am not going to deliver the speech I originally intended. Instead I will devote a few minutes to some of the remarks that have been made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and the hon. member for Mackenzie.

It appears that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy) said something in reference to those immigrants who unfortunately were not born in the country whence most of the residents of Canada have sprung. I hate quoting, Mr. Chairman, but I have before me an article which is very relative to the matter brought up by the two hon. gentlemen. It reads as follows:

Foreign-Born Fraternity

Tragic figures in the streets of Ottawa, as in other Canadian cities, are the destitute men of foreign birth. They seem to get the least consideration in periods of unemployment. Man's inhumanity to man is to be seen particularly in the stirring up of racial animosities against the foreign-born when the fear of starvation is abroad in the land.

It would hardly be surprising to find communism spreading through this destitute army of unemployed, but actually the labourers from foreign lands are no more class-conscious than are the native sons. They have an extraordinary capacity to suffer in silence. They do so suffer privation with dumb patience.

Against the communist drift, there is an organization in the United States to promote a better fraternal spirit among the foreign-born. One aim is to eliminate the barriers of prejudice, first of all between settlers from the different European nations, so that along with this fraternal advance there may come consciousness of being American.

In the younger generations the barriers of race and creed are less pronounced. Language distinctions are modified. Some traditional prejudices may remain. There are home influences worth preserving; but the greatest gain would be to improve social conditions in Canada so that the homes of the workers can be maintained on a fair standard of comfort irrespective of where the breadwinner may have been born.

I assure the minister that although I have some few further remarks I shall not speak beyond five minutes to six o'clock. I should like to say a few words concerning foreigners. Most hon. members were born in the old country or have been descended from parents who came from the British Isles. Therefore it is possible that most of us cannot view this matter from the standpoint in which it is regarded by the foreigner.

People in this country look upon foreigners in two different ways; one view is rational and the other mystical. The rational view is that in which the Christmas spirit obtains, the spirit of that time of the year when we are disposed to forgive and give presents to our worst enemies; briefly, the reasonable, charitable spirit. The mystical view is the one we take towards foreigners in times like these. It smacks of discrimination and prejudice. I think that view is based more or less upon the so-called vulgarity, the crudity or oddity of the foreigner in question. Recently I received a communication from Edmonton in which was the statement that there was a movement afoot to deport a number of unemployed from Canada to the land from whence they came for no reason other than that they have become a charge upon the country, and are starving to death.

One of the hon. members for Winnipeg mentioned something about communism. In view of the circumstances under which most of these people live I wonder why we have not more communists. I believe the editorial in the Ottawa Citizen of May 3 places the facts very clearly. Because those people came here on the invitation of the government and as bona fide future citizens they should be given careful consideration, and we should keep them in mind when we are considering the resolution now before the house. In my view the only way to handle the foreign situation in Canada is by extending a helping hand to foreigners, by meeting them half way and giving them a square deal. There is no doubt in my mind that if we do that they will make as good citizens as we could wish.

The suggestion is made that a large proportion of foreigners are communists. I venture the prophecy that if one hundred Anglo Saxons—English, Scotch or Irish—were placed in any one of the old countries and had to live in the conditions obtaining in those countries there would before a great length of time be a revolution led by a group of communists composed of the aforementioned Scotch, English and Irish.

Mr. QUINN: Especially if the Irish were there.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I think we should take a charitable stand, so far as the foreign element of our population is concerned. I hope the government will re-consider the matter of deportations, and that as a result none of these men will be deported simply because they are hungry, through no fault of their own. They have descended from a virile type. They have come from countries about which Goldsmith has written:

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates, and men decay:
> Princes and lords may flourish, or may fade;
> A breath can make them, as a breath has made;
> But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
> When once destroyed, can never be supplied.

These people are of peasant stock and make the best farmers and citizens. We in this country do not take the proper attitude towards them; our text books are not written about the lives of people in Canada. I think we should adopt the suggestion set out in Upton Sinclair's book called "The Jungle" of writing our literature around the lives of our own people. If that were done we would do much toward dissipating the present prejudice existing towards the foreigner.

I have still a few remarks to make concerning the back to the land policy. I do not believe that policy can be successful until we put men at the head of the farms who have had wide experience. So far as the foreign races are concerned, given the least help there is no doubt they will be able to stand on their own feet. They spring from a virile, frugal and hard working class of people. The only way to make a success of the back to the land movement is to divide some of our western country into huge government farms, and to put experienced farmers at the head of them. To place on government farms men who have never had farming experience would be folly and suicide. If there is to be a back to the land policy let it be one such as I have suggested, namely with large farms controlled by the most experienced men in the country.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Gordon thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 72, respecting relief measures.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, May 6, 1932.

The house met at three o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the table order in council P.C. 1056, passed pursuant to the provisions of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932, and relating to the payment of money.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 74, to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Mr. Speaker, the object of this proposed legislation is to bring the Canadian law with regard to coastal shipping on the great lakes on a par with the American law. Under the American law it is illegal to carry grain in a British ship, say, from Chicago to Port Colborne, unload it and carry it to another American port in a British ship. Under the Canadian law as it now stands such a procedure is possible in connection with Canadian grain. It actually happens that a very considerable amount of Canadian grain is carried in American ships, from Fort William and Port Arthur to Buffalo unloaded there into other American ships of canal size and shipped to Montreal, Sorel and Quebec for export.

The proposed bill will also contain a provision that in the case of a British shipping corporation, seventy-five per cent of the stock must be owned by British subjects in order to entitle such a corporation to engage in the coastal trade. Some fear has been expressed that this legislation will increase the rates from the great lakes to Montreal, but I desire to say that the shipping companies have given assurance that no increase will be made. I can assure the house that this government will apply section 938 of the Canada Shipping Act, which gives the power to suspend the coasting laws, should the rates be raised unduly.

Mr. GARDINER: What does the minister mean by raised unduly?

Mr. DURANLEAU: If, because of this legislation, the rates are made too high, we will remedy them.

Mr. BROWN: Is any assurance being given to the farmers that they will receive the benefit of the competition which might be properly expected?

Mr. DURANLEAU: At the present time there are 575,000 tons of Canadian shipping, and we believe that will provide sufficient competition to protect all shippers.

Mr. BROWN: Will the assurance be any better than that given by the manufacturers that prices would not be raised?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The government intends to protect the shippers should there be any undue elevation of rates.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PREVENTIVE SERVICE

AMENDMENT OF REGULATIONS GOVERNING COASTAL SHIPPING TRADE ON GREAT LAKES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MAURICE BRASSET (Gaspe): Mr. Speaker, I have been informed that the sailors, firemen and other men employed on the ships of the Department of National Revenue located at Gaspe are not to be reemployed this summer. I should like to inquire of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) as to what provision is being made to take care of these men. After a workless winter, many of these men now find themselves at the point of starvation, and I should like to know if it is the intention of the department to provide them with work.

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am not acquainted with the particulars of the subject to which the hon. member refers, but if he has reference to the boats of the preventive service I must tell him that this matter is now under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. However, I can say that the greatest consideration is being given to the matter of taking care of those who have been in the service, and I have no doubt that it is the intention of the police to employ those men who can be employed. However, there may be cases where no work can be given and it may happen that many men who have given good service to the crown will have to pass out of the service.

Mr. BRASSET: Will any provision be made for those who are not working?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I am sure that every consideration will be given to each particular case.

DEPORTATION CASES

ARRESTS AND PROCEEDINGS UNDER PROVISIONS OF IMMIGRATION ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon) when he will make a statement with regard to the arrest and threatened deportation of Daniel Holmes, Konrad Cessinger and Orton Wade of Winnipeg? There seems to be something curious about this case; a good deal is being made of it by the Winnipeg papers. I should like to know under whose authority these men were arrested and on what charge and where they are to be tried.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization): Mr. Speaker, I assume that the persons to whom reference has been made are persons being investigated under the provisions of the Immigration Act. Under this act a duty devolves upon the minister and the officers of the department to see that people in Canada who have no right to be here are investigated by a board of inquiry and their right to be in Canada reviewed. If it is found that they are undesirable and have no right to be here, or if for other reasons contemplated by the statute it seems that they should be returned to their country of origin, the appropriate steps are taken. There has been no change in the practice or policy of the department since I have had the honour of administering it, and the same practice has been followed for years. The provisions of the statute have not been changed in many years.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If I may ask a supplementary question, the minister has really not answered my question. One of these men, I understand, has been some twenty years in Canada, and has a Canadian wife and children. The minister has not said by whose authority they were arrested or on what charges or where they are to be tried. In view of the circumstances I think he should give definite answers to these questions.

Mr. GORDON: These parties are being dealt with in just the same way as are any others whose cases might come under review within the scope of the legislation. They are not arrested in that sense of the word. They will come before a board of inquiry set up under the provisions of the act and be given full opportunity to make out their case before that board. If it is shown that the officers who investigated the cases are in error or the evidence upon which the proceedings were started cannot for some reason be relied upon, and if they make out their case, they will have no difficulty. On the other hand, if they are not conforming to Canadian laws, they will most certainly be dealt with as the act contemplates. My duty is to see that the statutes are fairly but justly enforced, and I propose to see that that duty is done in so far as I am able to do it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If I may press the matter—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister has not answered the question.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has put two questions to the minister and has received full and complete answers. The time of the house cannot be taken up in interrogations of the minister.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): May I ask a question of the minister and expect an answer? Where are these men to be tried? Are they to be tried at Halifax where they have been taken, or are they to be returned to Winnipeg where they will be given a chance of a fair trial?

Mr. BENNETT: That does not require an answer.

Mr. BROWN: I think I am entitled to an answer to that question. How can men be given a fair trial about two thousand miles away from where the alleged offence was committed and where they have no chance to arrange for a fair defence?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I understood the minister to say that the case was being reviewed. Would he indicate how it comes about that the case is being reviewed at Halifax rather than at Winnipeg?

Mr. GORDON: That is not an unusual course; it has been done many times before. The act contemplates that the board of inquiry may hear these cases at any point. With regard to some of the cases, it often happens that we are positive that a man is illegally in this country, and the nearest, most convenient, port where he can be returned to his country of origin is frequently chosen. I have not before me the immediate details of the case to which reference has been made. Perhaps I shall have an opportunity between now and Monday to inquire more closely into it and if further details can be given I shall be glad to give them.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Who comprise the board of inquiry in such cases?

Mr. GORDON: Under the provisions of the statute a board of inquiry is set up by a certificate from the minister. It is usual to have at every port of entry, that is ocean ports and ports on the boundary from coast to coast, some responsible officer or probably more than one who can constitute a board of inquiry. I cannot of course say, without reference to the departmental files, who the individual is.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): May I ask the minister if, under the act, a specific charge has to be laid against individuals before they are compelled to appear before the board?

Mr. GORDON: No charge as such is contemplated by the act. A complaint is made to an officer who as defined by the act, may include the municipal clerk of a village, town or city, an officer of the department or a peace officer. A complaint is made and then the inquiry is set on foot. After the case is heard pro and con, a report is made to the minister, and if in the minister's judgment the board of inquiry has come to a proper conclusion, and if the person whose case is being investigated, has rendered himself liable, under the provisions of the statute, to being returned to his country of origin, appropriate action is taken.

IMPERIAL ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The leader of the opposition asked me yesterday to fix a day for the discussion of the estimates with respect to the Imperial conference. I think the item is under the heading of miscellaneous in the main estimates. If Tuesday will be satisfactory, we shall take it up on that day. If some other day will better suit the convenience of hon. gentlemen opposite, we can arrange accordingly.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Tuesday will be wholly satisfactory. I thank my right hon. friend.

DEPARTMENT OF INSURANCE

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 66, respecting the Department of Insurance.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. RHODES: As the house is aware decisions, some three in number, of the privy council have made it abundantly clear that the business of insurance is within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. While that is so, at the same time the question of bankruptcy and insolvency and also the subject of dealing with aliens and alien companies are within the jurisdiction of this parliament. These circumstances make it necessary that we should have a new act or orientation of acts, if I may use that expression, which will be, as I believe will be the case, beyond question within our legislative jurisdiction. With respect to this bill and the two companion bills which follow, the one under discussion, as the title indicates, is respecting the Department of Insurance. It will be followed by two other bills, one respecting foreign companies and another respecting Canadian and British companies. All, I think, ought to be treated at the same time and I am going to suggest that they be dealt with together in committee of the whole.

These bills have been very carefully discussed in the Senate; there have been numerous public hearings; all parties interested have either been heard or have had full opportunity to be heard, and I may say that the companies themselves are in substantial agreement as to both the principle and the terms of the bills in question. So far as the provinces are concerned, six are quite content with the bills and in fact I think I am expressing their desire correctly when I say it is that the control of insurance, so far as it is within our legislative power, should rest with this parliament and be vested in us. Three of the provinces, while they did not appear before the Senate committee, contented themselves with lodging a formal protest which was of a character to leave it open to them at a subsequent stage, if they chose to do so, to take exception to the legislation. But the framing of the bills has been conducted in such an atmosphere that I hope the result will be substantial agreement with respect to not only the six provinces in question, but the three which have lodged the objection to which I have referred.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the minister mention the three provinces?

Mr. RHODES: Quebec, Ontario, British Columbia, I do not know that any good purpose can be served by discussion which ought to be confined to the principle of the bill, because I take it that there will be no exception on that score, and the very questions which have been addressed to me so far would indicate that we might make more satisfactory progress and proceed more in conformity with the rules if we could go into committee on the three bills where we could inquire into the matter more fully in detail. I therefore content myself at the moment with that statement, reserving the right to a full discussion when we are in committee of the whole.

Mr. EULER: The minister made the statement that conferences had been held with the provinces and insurance companies and that they had expressed themselves as in substantial agreement with what is proposed to be done under these bills. I was going to ask, and this touches the principle, whether those conferences included foreign insurance companies, and if so, whether they are as well satisfied with what is proposed to be done.

Mr. RHODES: When I say companies I mean reciprocals and mutuals, both foreign and domestic. They are in substantial agreement with the measure.

Mr. SPENCER: Does the government intend to send these bills to the banking and commerce committee?

Mr. RHODES: No. Inasmuch as there have been ample and complete hearings before the Senate committee, it was felt that we could with better advantage move the bills, after the second reading, into committee of the whole house. I may say that there will be no disposition to hurry them unduly, and if it is thought wise we can hold them in committee for a day or two for the purpose of canvassing them as fully as may be desired.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 67, respecting foreign insurance companies in Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 68, respecting Canadian and British insurance companies.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

INSURANCE BILLS—CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I beg to move that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider Bills Nos. 66, 67 and 68.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Tummon in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Tummon): Bill No. 66.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. POWER: Would the minister tell us to what sections of this bill objection has been taken by the provinces? As I understand it, the provinces have no objection to the creation of a department of insurance.

Mr. RHODES: I do not understand that the provinces take objection to any section of any of these three bills, but inasmuch as the privy council has decided that the business of insurance is a business exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provinces, until the provinces are satisfied that we are sufficiently within our own sphere and are not encroaching upon theirs, they have put in what is in effect a caveat. That is, they do not take the position that not having objected they are precluded from saying hereafter: We wish to take exception on the ground of your having invaded our sphere of jurisdiction.

Mr. POWER: Is not the point simply this? Whether the provinces take exception or not, if any of the powers conferred on the federal Department of Insurance by these acts is ultra vires, any citizen in any province may take exception and the attorney general of the province will become a party to a case which just as likely as not will have to go before the privy council in the near future. Is not that the case?

Mr. RHODES: The rights of no individual and no company would be barred. They would still have recourse to the courts if they called into question the constitutionality of this measure.

Mr. POWER: As I understand it, the legal advisers of certain of the provinces, Ontario and Quebec particularly, and the minister says British Columbia as well, have taken the position that the federal government has no jurisdiction whatsoever in matters of insurance. Am I stating it too broadly?

Mr. RHODES: I think that is putting it a little too broadly. They want to reserve to themselves such rights as accrued to them in virtue of the privy council decision. I think it is fair to say that they do not take exception, certainly not to the extent of pressing it, to the jurisdiction which we are now asserting in virtue of these bills.

Mr. POWER: The federal government takes the position that in virtue of the British North America Act it has jurisdiction to deal with bankruptcy and insolvency?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, and also with the question of aliens, and to a lesser degree with the question of trade and commerce. There is no question whatsoever—the provinces have never raised it—that our jurisdiction is ample with respect to bankruptcy and insolvency and dealing with alien companies.

Mr. POWER: The question of alien commerce was settled by one decision of the privy council some time ago, was it not? I do not recollect just what the decision was at the moment, but it was to the effect that insurance was a business that was peculiarly a civil contract and that therefore it came under the jurisdiction of the province. Am I not right?

Mr. RHODES: So far as the question of insurance business is concerned, I think the provinces have always been upheld by the privy council.

Mr. POWER: Did not the same thing apply with respect to aliens?

Mr. RHODES: No, just the reverse. I do not think our jurisdiction both with respect to aliens and in respect to bankruptcy and insolvency has ever been called into question.

Mr. POWER: As I understand it, there is no question as to the jurisdiction of the federal government with respect to aliens, but when the federal government asserted its right to control foreign insurance companies because it had jurisdiction over aliens, I was under the impression that the privy council had decided that that would be extending the right of the federal government too far, that once these aliens were in this country, whether they were foreign insurance companies or not, unquestionably they fell within the jurisdiction of the laws of the province in which they were. I think I am right in that.

Mr. RHODES: I think the real effect of the decision was this: While it is admitted that bankruptcy and insolvency are questions with respect to which we have full jurisdiction, nevertheless we could not, simply because we have jurisdiction over bankruptcy and insolvency, carry it to the point of trying to control the business of insurance as a business, that the latter was within the jurisdiction of the provinces.

Mr. POWER: To go one step farther: I do not wish to reopen any controversy concerning insurance companies, but I should like to know if there is anything in these bills authorizing the government to pass such orders in council as were passed on December 31 last, permitting insurance companies to value their securities at other than the values provided by the former Insurance Act. I must admit I have not read the bills now before us.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, respecting the matter of our jurisdiction as it concerns the question of aliens I have before me the last decision of the privy council. On the point in question Lord Dunedin has said the following:

> Their Lordships have no doubt that the Dominion parliament might pass an act forbidding aliens to enter Canada, or forbidding them so to enter to engage in any business without a licence and further they might furnish rules for their conduct while in Canada requiring them, e.g. to report at stated intervals.

And so on.

Mr. POWER: The minister has not answered the question with respect to bankruptcy and the order in council passed last December.

Mr. RHODES: May I suggest—and I think my hon. friend will agree with my suggestion—that we would be well advised to consider this bill paragraph by paragraph.

Mr. POWER: In which bill is that to be found? I understood the suggestion of the minister to be that all three bills should be placed before the committee.

Mr. RHODES: The bills are in committee, so we will take them up clause by clause, and seriatim.

Mr. POWER: I was under the impression the suggestion was that we would discuss the whole question.

Mr. RHODES: I thought we would make better progress by taking the bills section by section.

Mr. POWER: Will the minister tell me in which bill this provision is to be found?

Mr. RHODES: I beg my hon. friend's pardon; I had the wrong bill before me.

Mr. POWER: It is in bill No. 67.

Mr. MARCIL: I should like to know if mutual insurance companies, farmers' associations, and so on pass under the control of the dominion?

Mr. RHODES: They are entirely exempt, unless they come voluntarily and register with the dominion Department of Insurance.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions; "department"; "minister."

Mr. SPENCER: I should like to know if the provinces of Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia are objecting to this legislation, and if so if they have had the opportunity to express their views.

Mr. RHODES: They have had ample, full and complete opportunity. I would not go so far as to say that they have taken exception to this legislation. They have, however, placed themselves in a position at a later stage to call it in question if they so desire. My impression is that they will not call it in question, and I think in operation they will find that we are on common ground with respect to this legislation. That is my hope and belief.

Mr. SPENCER: It seems to me it is somewhat difficult to give these bills proper consideration in a large committee like this. I am surprised the minister has not sent them to a special committee of the house. I should like to ask if there has been any public expression against the passage of these bills through the house.

Mr. RHODES: Not so far as I am aware. In fact, as I said at the beginning, all parties are in substantial agreement. I am not aware any objections have been taken.

Mr. SPENCER: Have there been no objections from policyholders?

Mr. RHODES: I am advised there are none.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Constitution of department; minister.

Mr. GARDINER: Will this legislation repeal former legislation respecting the Department of Insurance, and if so is there any important change in the legislation formerly in force?

Mr. RHODES: There are changes in details, but not in substance.

Mr. GARDINER: Are they important?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, some of them are. The changes are made, however, with a view to conformity with the decision of the privy council.

Mr. SPENCER: Mr. Chairman, a few minutes ago the Minister of Finance said there had been no protests with regard to this legislation. I understand a protest has been made to the chairman of the banking and commerce committee, and also to the Speaker of the house by the chairman of the policyholders' association. I should like to know if, on second thought, he recalls any such protests.

Mr. RHODES: The superintendent of insurance has advised me that he has no knowledge of them. If my hon. friend has Mr. Harpell in mind my reply is that he had weeks, weeks and weeks of time and full and ample opportunity to appear before the Senate committee. I made inquiries from the chairman of that committee as to whether or not Mr. Harpell had sought to appear before them, and I am informed that he neither sought to appear nor appeared.

Mr. CAYLEY: Will the minister outline the duties of the office of the Department of Insurance. Roughly speaking, what will be their duties?

Mr. RHODES: There are no new duties. Under the terms of the legislation which we are now passing it will be the object of the superintendent of insurance to exercise as careful supervision and control as is within legislative competence.

Mr. CAYLEY: From now on will all the companies be registered under provincial departments? They will not have to be registered in the dominion department?

Mr. RHODES: For provincial companies that is a matter for the companies themselves to determine. If they do not choose to register in the dominion Department of Insurance they do not have to.

Mr. CAYLEY: But they have no choice, when it comes to doing business in the provinces; they have to register there?

Mr. RHODES: Quite so.

Mr. ILSLEY: Will the Minister of Finance please explain why there are three bills instead of one? Is it not a fact that by the legislation now being passed the present act is divided into three parts? I think the committee should know something about the reason for the steps that are being taken. Perhaps it has been explained, but I was not in at the time.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance succeeded to this department after these matters had been under consideration, I will with his permission explain to the hon. gentleman just what the situation is. As he knows, the privy council's first decision was that the business of insurance was within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial authorities and could not be supported alone as being a branch of trade and commerce. Subsequent decisions of the privy council with respect to the powers of provincially and federally incorporated companies outside of the business of insurance altogether induced some companies to believe that possibly the federal powers were more extensive than the first decision indicated. The final decision, upon the matter was given last October, Lord Dunedin speaking for the judicial committee. The effect of that decision interpreted into terms of legislation would be, first, that this parliament has exclusive jurisdiction over insurance companies incorporated by parliament. I think that is fairly obvious to all of us. That is, any company owing its origin to a statute of this parliament is under the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of this parliament, if parliament so desires to impose conditions—as we have—on the exercise of those powers. Secondly, that provincial companies incorporated by the legislature of a province and authorized to carry on the business of insurance, may do so within the province without regard at all to the federal authority either for licensing, or registration, or for any other purpose.

Mr. ILSLEY: And outside of the province, too, I suppose?

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so; because under the decision in the Bonanza Creek case it is perfectly clear that provincially incorporated companies, may, as the hon. gentleman has just observed, transact business in other provinces as well. Therefore, a provincially incorporated company may transact its business in other provinces without the act of this parliament or this insurance department. Thirdly, you have British companies. They are not foreign, inasmuch as they are not aliens within the definition of "aliens" as defined by the privy council commencing with the Cain case, in which the hon. gentleman will recall the Supreme Court of Canada decided in the same sense as the judicial committee did, that we have power to deal with aliens in the form in which we have enacted legislation by this parliament; in other words, the legislation was intra vires. Then there are foreign companies, over which we have complete jurisdiction on two grounds, one, that they are aliens and come directly within the language used by Lord Dunedin as just quoted by the Minister of Finance. The other ground on which we deal with them—is is merely subsidiary of that principle—is that they have no status in this country except such as may be acquired by registration, and inasmuch as the dominion has the power, they then receive from the dominion department a licence—if you care to use that word; I do not think perhaps it is the most desirable to use in view of the language of the courts —or authority to transact their business.

When the legislation came under review the difficulties were shortly put thus: that inasmuch as the act covers all these enterprises, both the domestic company incorporated by this parliament and the domestic company incorporated by a province, the British company and the foreign company, as well as the operations of the machinery of the Department of Insurance, it was believed by all parties—shall I say?—those who represented the companies and the law officers of the crown—that the interests of all would be best served by making a clear line of demarcation between (a) the department and its powers, (b) companies domestic in their character or British and (c) companies that are foreign. The new legislation will not be complicated by all these matters being in one bill. The first bill, for instance, that is now under consideration deals with the insurance department. The jurisdiction of that department obviously must be lessened by reason of the last decision of the privy council, inasmuch as the conduct of business, as such, does not lie within the competence of this parliament to control. But the necessity for the department arises because we have incorporated insurance companies, we have defined their powers, we have indicated the interest rate on which their reserves shall be calculated, and we have indicated the character of their investing powers. It therefore follows that the insurance department should be maintained. As the minister has just said, some of the provinces would very much prefer that provincial companies should attorn to this jurisdiction so as to relieve them of the burden and necessity of constant supervision and inspection. The history of the United States with respect to insurance should be of some assistance to us. Their forty-eight states have forty-eight laws with respect to insurance companies, their inspection and supervision, and this has imposed a very considerable burden of expense on the companies. I am not in any sense endeavouring to promote the federal power when I say it is generally conceded by those who have to do business with insurance companies, that a single unified control, properly directed, with such conditions imposed as this parliament thinks desirable, will promote efficiency and safeguard the interests of the insured. That is the general view at least; whether it is the accurate view or not I am not going to express an opinion.

Then if once we establish the department, its jurisdiction with respect to the companies we ourselves incorporate is complete. With respect to the provincially incorporated or created companies, the jurisdiction is conditional; if they do attorn to this jurisdiction and desire there should be that control, then the department has been in the habit heretofore—and I presume will be hereafter—of exercising those functions. But that does not divest the provinces of their control; it relieves them of the expense. I think the hon. gentleman will understand why some of the provinces would very much prefer that that should be done.

Then you pass into the realm that is more difficult from one standpoint, less difficult from another. The British companies have not the status of our domestic companies, owing their incorporation neither to a statute by this parliament nor by the provincial legislatures, but to a statute in some other part of the British Empire. They come in here with British nationality and they must be subject to different control from that governing the company created by foreign legislation, because you cannot invoke the clause with respect to aliens against British companies. Therefore this third bill endeavours to make a clear differentiation between British companies on the one hand and foreign companies on the other. That is the purpose of the legislation.

I need hardly say to the hon. gentleman who has followed these matters as a lawyer that each phase presents a distinct and clear cut issue. First, the creation of your department and the necessity for it. In other words, we cannot divest ourselves of our responsibilities, for no province would have as of right jurisdiction over some phases of the insurance business that we should have with respect to those companies that we ourselves have created. We leave out, as I say, provincial companies, except as they may see fit to attorn to our jurisdiction. The other matters I will not reiterate our position with respect to, but I think it is quite clear why it is desirable to separate these measures and not have an aggregation of sections that deal with different cases, but rather to try to separate them one from the other. I may say that in a committee in another house the fullest public discussion took place and the most eminent counsel representing the provinces and the companies made representations in connection with the legislation. The legislation as it now stands embodies the collective wisdom of the most eminent counsel we have in Canada, together with the suggestions that have been made by the law officers of the crown, on the federal side as well as on the side of the provinces.

In answer to my hon. friend from Battle River (Mr. Spencer), I may say that yesterday I received a telegram signed by Mr. Harpell, stating that he was representing certain of the policyholders' associations, but my inquiries, which thus far have been casual and which I have not followed up in detail, have brought the information that he did not ask to be heard before the Senate committee that afforded the greatest possible opportunity for representations to be made by any person who might desire to make them. In fact representations were made both by letter and verbally, by people interested.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to be permitted to congratulate the Prime Minister on his success in getting around some of the difficulties inherent in the British North America Act. This is almost the first time that I recall such a triumph on the part of the government in overcoming the jurisdictional problems so often connected with that act. As I understand the Prime Minister, he says this act does not deprive the provinces of their jurisdiction but relieves them of their responsibility. I hope that some day the Prime Minister will devote himself to an attempt to arrange some modus vivendi by which we can secure the enforcement of the eight hour day and also adopt in this dominion something in the nature of unemployment insurance. It seems to me that if we put our wills to work there should be no particular reason why the British North America Act could not be overcome in other spheres than that of commercial insurance.

Mr. EULER: Being merely a layman and not a lawyer I should like to have a point cleared up, if possible. I understood the Prime Minister to say that despite the decision of the privy council, companies incorporated by dominion statute, British companies and foreign companies, especially mutual companies, are still under the complete jurisdiction of the dominion. Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. BENNETT: No. Of course, with reference to companies incorporated by dominion statute, this parliament can impose such conditions as it pleases with respect to the granting of a charter, but the actual business is solely and exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provinces. The last decision makes that clear. For instance, being property and civil rights, the insurance contract between the company and the insured is regulated by the laws of the province in which the contract is made, but the status of the company is entirely determined by this parliament. Then you come to foreign companies. It is perfectly clear, as the legislation will indicate, that a foreign company may register in a province, but we and only we have the jurisdiction to deal with it, as we have the authority to deal with aliens under section 91 of the British North America Act. I believe the particular subsection is 23, though I am only speaking from memory. That power to deal with aliens gives to us, and to us only, the power to deal with foreign companies from that standpoint. Have I made myself clear?

Mr. EULER: Yes, thank you. I just wish to ask this further question: Take a foreign company, for instance, and I think the ones most discussed were the mutual companies of the New England states. I understand the Prime Minister to say that they may still register in any province, and therefore they can go on and do business. Then has the dominion any jurisdiction; can this parliament say "You shall not do business in this province?" Can we, for instance, over-rule the provinces in the matter of registration?

Mr. BENNETT: I am afraid my hon. friend did not follow my remarks, or I did not make myself sufficiently clear. With respect to foreign companies we assert that we have exclusive jurisdiction, and not the provinces. I see my hon. friend from Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) has looked up the British North America Act. Could he give me the subsection dealing with aliens?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is subsection 25 of section 91.

Mr. BENNETT: Thank you. If my hon. friend from North Waterloo will observe the provisions of section 91 he will see that it states that "the parliament of Canada shall have exclusive jurisdiction," just as section 92 confers exclusive jurisdiction upon the provincial legislatures. For the purposes of law a corporation is in the same position as an individual with regard to section 91, and such a company registers under our statutes.

Mr. EULER: Then as a matter of practical application, if a foreign company chooses to do business in any province of Canada must it first approach the dominion, or can it approach the provincial government?

Mr. BENNETT: Our submission is that, being an alien company, it must first deal with the dominion.

Mr. EULER: Then if the registration is accepted, or if the dominion agrees that it may do business, the registration is made in the province, and does the company then fall under the jurisdiction of the province in regard to the conduct of the business?

Mr. BENNETT: So far as business is concerned, interpreting the judgment as learned counsel have interpreted it, we have no power to regulate or control business, whether transacted by a foreign or by a domestic company. If the foreign company receives status here, as under our law with respect to aliens it must, then of course it is at liberty to deal with the question of the terms upon which it may transact business in the province, under the exercise of power by the province, as is the case with any other company, domestic or foreign. The question of the transaction of business is under the regulation of the provinces.

Mr. EULER: In all cases?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. CAYLEY: Just a question with regard to the matter of inspection, to which reference has been made. The minister spoke of the question of inspection as it had to do with the forty-eight states of the United States. I wanted to ask this question: Is it possible that we have nine different inspections of all companies doing business throughout Canada, or is it the fact that one inspection is made, and the other authorities accept the report of that inspection?

Mr. BENNETT: I desire to repeat what was said by the minister in bringing forward this bill: I think some six of our provinces, realizing the desirability of uniformity, have left the question of inspection entirely with the federal authority. The larger provinces, as well as British Columbia, feel that they may want to carry on this inspection themselves, but they have not finally made up their minds upon that point. I think what the hon. gentleman has in mind is this: The head offices of all the insurance companies make out their annual returns, which have to do with all those matters that are common to the forty-eight jurisdictions in the United States, and then the special requirements of each individual state are met by supplementary returns attached to the main return. It is a very complicated matter. For instance, a company domiciled in the state of New York makes its return to that state in conformity with the requirements of the superintendent of insurance there. The state of Arizona, for example, may have additional or not so many requirements. The company merely amends the same report for the purpose of meeting the requirements of the other states. I think the hon. gentleman suggested that a copy might be sent to each authority. That would not satisfy the requirements. In the United States each state imposes its own method upon the companies, and they make supplementary returns to satisfy the requirements of each state.

Mr. CAYLEY: I had reference to the periodical inspections and audits.

Mr. BENNETT: This is the way it works out in practice, I think: Inspection is made in the domicile of the company because they have control over the enterprise. They go and search securities and matters of that kind. Other states satisfy themselves in any way their legislation may require, either by having everything verified in form, by having some one attend and make a search, or by any other method which may be desirable. So far as business in the particular state is concerned, they usually make a computation of reserves and insist that there be deposited in the state sufficient security to take care of the reserves computed on the rate of interest provided for by the statutes.

Mr. CAYLEY: What is the arrangement in Canada among the various provincial superintendents of insurance?

Mr. BENNETT: Prior to the decision of October last, our superintendent of insurance and his officials inspected all companies registered in Ottawa but he exercised no jurisdiction over those companies having purely provincial incorporation. For instance, without going into names, there are several companies in Ontario which have provincial charters; our superintendent of insurance did not inspect them at all in any way but if they came here, then he and his officials had responsibility for their inspection. Have I made myself clear?

Mr. CAYLEY: No, you have not. Certain provincial companies have gone beyond the bounds of their own province and are doing business in several provinces, and I should like to know if there is some arrangement among the superintendents of the provinces as to this periodic audit and inspection.

Mr. BENNETT: My answer is that that is a matter over which unfortunately we have no control—they go and do as they please. In the case of a provincial company incorporated in Ontario and doing business in Manitoba, I cannot say what Manitoba does. That province may or may not accept a provincial audit, but there is no federal audit by our superintendent of insurance.

Mr. CAYLEY: I understood that the province in which the head office is located made this inspection and audit and the other provinces accepted their certificate.

Mr. BENNETT: That may be so, but we have nothing to say about it. I am bound to say that I believe that some provinces, in order to save expense, are doing just what the hon. gentleman has said, but in view of the decision last fall of the privy council we have no power or control because the company is provincial in origin and has got into other provinces according to the laws of those provinces. Therefore, the inspection started as provincial and it continues as provincial and we exercise no control. Personally, I think it is very undesirable that there should be any conflict of jurisdiction in these matters, I think a uniform inspection and audit of all insurance companies would be in the public interest. However, that is only my personal view. As the minister has indicated, several of the provinces desire that state of affairs to continue. I understand the hon. gentleman has had experience in these matters and he will realize that where you have a premium rate fixed upon, (a), the earning power of money over a long period of years and, (b), the expectation of death over a long period of years, it is undesirable that the rates of interest should be higher in one province than in another for the purpose of determining the premium rate and it is more undesirable that different tables should be used to determine the probable mortality. This matter has been settled and it is too late to argue along these lines; all that we can hope for is that the provinces will agree that it is desirable that there should be a unified inspection, audit and control.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps I am dull of comprehension—

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member certainly never has been.

Mr. EULER: —but I should like to know more definitely the mode of procedure with respect to these alien companies, the American companies, to be exact. We will suppose a United States company desires to do business in Canada, perhaps in only one province. I take it that its approach must first be made to the dominion Department of Insurance. Am I correct in that?

Mr. BENNETT: I will use the word "alien" in referring to the companies in order to make it clear. An alien company desires to transact business in Canada—I do not say in a province because that is not my purpose—so it must first of all come here and make good its status. Do I make that clear?

Mr. EULER: What does that mean?

Mr. BENNETT: That means that it registers, puts up its deposit and receives authority to carry on business.

Mr. EULER: Does it put up its deposit with the dominion department?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what we have provided for; this is done in order that it may have a local habitation and camp, in the words of the poet. What it shall do with respect to each province is determined by the province itself, we have nothing to say about that.

Mr. EULER: Supposing that at any time either the dominion or the province desires to cancel a licence; suppose, for example, that the dominion desires that a company should no longer do business in Canada, would the dominion have power to cancel a licence to do business issued by a province?

Mr. BENNETT: Undoubtedly, if the company in its returns indicated just cause and reason why there should be no continued recognition by the dominion of the status granted.

Mr. EULER: That would automatically cancel the licences given by the provincial inspectors?

Mr. BENNETT: That would be my opinion at the moment; I do not make a definite statement but that would be my gratuitous opinion to the hon. gentleman, it would have that effect. I shall try to make it a little clearer to the hon. gentleman because I do not wish to leave this matter in doubt if at all possible. Inasmuch as a non-Canadian and non-British company desires to come within the boundaries of Canada to do business, our view of the law is that it must register with the Dominion of Canada—I am using the word "register" in the broad sense—and it must meet our requirements by putting up a deposit. Having done that it receives authority, not to do business in a province but in recognition of its status having been created by its conforming with our law. After that, the making of returns merely continues the authority.

Mr. EULER: It cannot do any actual business without getting a licence from some province?

Mr. BENNETT: Some of the provinces may not require a licence, and that is a matter over which we have no control in view of the decision. In other words, Prince Edward Island may say: if the company has received a status from the dominion government, we are not concerned about a licence, all we are concerned about is to tax the company.

Mr. EULER: Who has the right of inspection, the dominion or the province?

Mr. BENNETT: I am not expressing an opinion, but in my judgment we have the right to know that there has been no alteration of the situation to impair the conditions which existed when we granted the status.

Mr. EULER: Would it not be desirable to have an understanding with the provinces in which this company might do business so that there would be no conflict of authority?

Mr. BENNETT: In that regard I can only repeat what I have said in this house so frequently, that I would regard it as desirable. I hope this and three or four other matters will be settled when the provinces and the dominion find time to get together for a discussion. Experience teaches that all constitutions are subject to change and that as the development of the construction of a written instrument proceeds it may be desirable to modify it by the considered and joint action of the parties affected, and I hope that end may be accomplished. That is my view, but others hold another view equally as strong. As perhaps is known, an effort was made in the subcommittee to do that, but it did not get very far. However, it may be that in the light of experience that condition may be brought about. I can only tell my hon. friend the conditions which we had to meet and how we have met them. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) and his department have given a tremendous amount of effort to this matter. The superintendent of insurance, having a very strong opinion with respect to the necessity of federal and uniform supervision and control, has done the same. The Minister of Finance came into the picture after it had been developed to a very large extent, and subject to the discharge of his other duties, he has had a limited time in which to deal with it. But we have dealt with it just as well as the accumulated wisdom and judgment of the most eminent counsel acting for various interests in conjunction with our own have been able to determine. This legislation represents not any—

Mr. EULER: Final?

Mr. BENNETT: —not a final determination of it, nor yet an iron-bound expression of an extreme view. But the leader of the Senate, himself an experienced lawyer, was able, with the aid of counsel and by making a compromise here and there, to secure this legislation in the form in which it now is. It has been a most difficult thing to accomplish.

Mr. CAYLEY: What arrangements have been made regarding the New England mutuals that were mentioned a little while ago? I understand heretofore they did not take out a dominion licence to do business in Canada, but rather preferred to register with the provinces. I should like to know what arrangement has been made as regards accepting deposits from those companies.

Mr. BENNETT: I am happy to inform the hon. gentleman that the arrangement is as follows: Companies such as those named and others of a similar character will make with the Dominion deposits equivalent to their Canadian liabilities and subject themselves to the inspection of the Canadian Department of Insurance. I believe they were advised by their own home lawyers as well as by their Canadian representatives that as aliens they were reasonably being asked to accept that position, and they agreed to do so. Therefore they make a deposit equivalent to their Canadian liabilities and subject themselves to Canadian inspection; when I say "Canadian" I mean central, the Department of Insurance of Canada inspection.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. EULER: I apprehend I am out of order—

Mr. BENNETT: No, the whole bill is under review.

Mr. EULER: This refers really to another matter in connection with these mutual companies. I understand in the budget a tax of some 15 per cent is being imposed on premiums of these mutual companies. Has anything been done with regard to that, or is it proposed to do anything or has any compromise or agreement been reached? It aroused a great deal of dissatisfaction with some of our Canadian insurers.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the Minister of Finance explained that in the transcription of the resolution the language used was not in accordance with the statement that he had made in the house. They are being taxed without discrimination, the same as other licensed companies that come in as foreign companies.

Mr. EULER: It was prohibitory really.

Mr. BENNETT: That provision was intended to meet the situation.

Mr. EULER: They are quite satisfied to register?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 and 6 agreed to.

On section 7.—Superintendent or officers not to be interested in any company.

Mr. RHODES: I have an amendment to suggest to this section for the purpose of strengthening it. It will be observed that the section reads:

> The superintendent or any officer or clerk under him shall not, directly or indirectly, be interested as a shareholder in any company doing business in Canada and registered or licensed under any of the acts respecting companies specified in the schedule to this act.

The amendment I propose will enlarge that prohibition to include an interest in a trust company or a loan company doing business in Canada or in any province of Canada. I would therefore ask my colleague the Minister of Justice to move this amendment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I beg to move the amendment that has just been announced to section 7 of the bill.

Mr. CAYLEY: Why was the phrase "any province of Canada" added?

Mr. RHODES: This is to enlarge the protection afforded by the act, that not only shall the superintendent of insurance or any officer or clerk under him not hold shares in any dominion company, but that they must not hold shares in a provincial company or a trust or loan company.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 8—Superintendent to ascertain expenditure under acts during last preceding year.

Mr. RHODES: I have an amendment to move to include subsection (3) of section 8. If hon. gentlemen will refer to the note on the reverse page, they will see that this is a subsection which properly has to be moved in this chamber and not in the Senate. I would therefore ask my colleague the Minister of Justice if he would be good enough to move this as well.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I beg to move that the following be added to the bill as subsection 3 of section 8:

[(3) Thereupon the superintendent shall ascertain the ratio or percentage which the total expenditure incurred in the administration of the said acts respecting insurance companies, of the Loan Companies Act, and of the Trust Companies Act, respectively, so found and certified is of the total net receipts of the said insurance companies, the total income of the said loan companies and the total income of the said trust companies, respectively, and he shall cause an assessment to be prepared against each of the aforesaid companies as follows, that is to say:—

(a) Against each of the said insurance companies of an amount equivalent to such percentage of the said net receipts of each company as the total expenditure incurred in the administration of the said acts respecting insurance companies is of the total net receipts of all such companies; and

(b) Against each of the said loan companies of an amount equivalent to such percentage of the said income of each company as the total expenditure incurred in the administration of the Loan Companies Act is of the total income of all such companies; and

(c) Against each of the said trust companies of an amount equivalent to such percentage of the said income of each company as the total expenditure incurred in the administration of the Trust Companies Act is of the total income of all such companies; and such assessment, when certified by the superintendent, shall be binding upon the said companies, and each of them, and shall be final and conclusive.]

Sections 9 and 10 agreed to.

On the schedule.

Mr. SPENCER: In the case of a foreign company, will there be any need for two inspections, one by the federal and one by the provincial government?

Mr. RHODES: The dominion authorities think not, but of course what the provinces may determine to do is another matter.

Mr. SPENCER: If only one is made, who will do the work of inspection?

Mr. RHODES: If the provincial companies attorn to the jurisdiction of the dominion, why, we must do it.

Mr. SPENCER: The provinces will have the right to duplicate it, if they like?

Mr. RHODES: Apparently so. That is a matter within the jurisdiction of the provinces.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton South): Bill 67, respecting foreign insurance companies in Canada.

Sections one and two agreed to.

On section 3—Register of companies.

Mr. COOTE: Before this bill goes through, as it is so voluminous and rather important, I should like again to urge that the minister have it sent to the banking and commerce committee. It is impossible to consider it properly in a committee of this size and nature. If it were before the banking and commerce committee, the superintendent of insurance would appear there and explain why the changes have been made and explain also any sections. I think we should not in this house depend upon the banking committee of the Senate. Certainly we should have this bill go before our own committee. I think that is what the standing committee on banking and commerce is for, that is its chief function, and I would again respectfully urge the minister to send the bill to the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. RHODES: The house in its wisdom decided that this bill would be referred to the committee of the whole, and it is here and we are now considering it. So far as the merits go, I may point out to my hon. friend that there was a very complete, very comprehensive, and I may say an exhaustive inquiry into this measure by the Senate committee, where there was ample opportunity for all parties interested and the public as well to be heard, and they not only were heard at length but were represented by very eminent counsel.

So I think that in the circumstances we are taking the right course, if I may say so, with equal deference to my hon. friend. I would again say to him that there is no disposition to ask this committee to act with undue haste with respect to this matter. If it is thought wise that the bill should be held in committee for a further sitting, I am quite content.

Mr. COOTE: It was not with the idea of hearing witnesses before the committee that I suggested that this bill should go to the banking and commerce committee, but I feel that it could be considered to much better advantage there than by the committee of the whole house. So far as the point which the minister makes, that this bill has been considered by a committee of the Senate, is concerned, I have known bills to receive very careful consideration by a committee of this house and then go to the Senate and there be referred to the Senate's own committee, and very properly so. I repeat, I think this bill could be considered to much better advantage by the banking and commerce committee than by the committee of the whole house. The bill is very lengthy and there is a far better chance for the banking and commerce committee finding out what it really means.

Mr. EULER: I have a certain sympathy with what my hon. friend from Macleod says. I do not like to delay the work of the committee, but this bill is very voluminous and it is pretty difficult to understand the significance of the various clauses. For myself I think I would be content, and perhaps other members would be, if the minister would give us a fairly full explanation of any vital changes in the bill as compared with former legislation. Does this bill pretty well follow the old enactment? Would the minister point out wherein it differs radically from the former legislation?

Mr. RHODES: I shall be very glad indeed to do that as we proceed. I have a number of amendments to move to the bill, and I will explain each paragraph as we go along.

Mr. CAYLEY: The minister spoke of the extensive work that was done by a committee of the Senate. But there is no record of that committee's meetings; at least I have not seen any. I understand that the Senate committee went into the matter very thoroughly and sifted every phase, but I am at a loss still to know who was present at that committee. Were all the superintendents of the departments of insurance present, especially Ontario, and were all those who were raising protests represented, the mutual companies, life insurance companies and so forth?

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. RHODES: As I said at the beginning, six provinces have always been quite content, I take it, to accept the jurisdiction of this parliament in the matter of insurance legislation. As a matter of fact, I may say for the province of Nova Scotia that for years there we have submitted ourselves gladly to the jurisdiction of the dominion in the matter of insurance because, first of all, as a province we divested ourselves of a tremendous responsibility which will be obvious to my hon. friend who has a wide knowledge of insurance matters, and in the second place we saved ourselves a great deal of expense and we were able to avail ourselves, to the benefit of the province, of the knowledge, wisdom, experience, and guidance of the dominion Department of Insurance. With respect to the three provinces which did not accept that position, they were all represented by eminent counsel before the Senate committee.

Mr. EULER: Which were the three?

Mr. RHODES: Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia. Mr. Bayly, the deputy attorney general of Ontario appeared for that province and also represented British Columbia. The province of Quebec was represented by Mr. Aime Geoffrion. All the insurance companies were fully represented.

Mr. EULER: Including the foreign companies?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. SPENCER: This is the first time in eleven years that I have known the Commons so ready to give such a blanket acceptance to the work of the Senate. Possibly it is because lately there has been much more activity than usual in the Senate. I think that the Senate should feel very much flattered at the minister's thinking their work so perfect that we should be able to pass these bills here without a great deal of consideration. Certainly the explanatory notes are not sufficient to enable one to understand the significance of the bills, but if the minister is going to speak on each clause, we can give them consideration but certainly not the consideration that they would receive in the banking and commerce committee, and we cannot give them proper consideration if you, Mr. Chairman, simply read the marginal notes. The bill is new and lengthy and important, and certainly we should have some explanation from the minister. I feel with the hon. member for Macleod and the hon. member for North Waterloo that it is asking a great deal of this committee to give consideration of this bill when it is so lengthy and contains so much new material.

Mr. RHODES: I should think my hon. friend from Battle River would be the last person to take exception to our following a new course because it is from that section of the house that we always expect new paths to be pursued, and my hon. friend must not expect us always to follow what he believes to be the Tory course. I think we are singularly fortunate in this instance, Mr. Chairman, because before the Senate committee all parties were represented and there were a number of eminent legal gentlemen appearing as counsel who had the time to devote to an intensive study of this measure. Without calling in question or reflecting in the slightest degree upon those who form the banking and commerce committee of this house, they have had a tremendous amount of work to perform this session, with numerous sittings of the committee dealing with very important matters, and were they of even greater intelligence than they are they could not have found the time to deal with this measure, along with all the other work they have had to do, in the complete way in which it was considered by the Senate committee. In the Senate committee it took some three or four weeks of exclusive time and attention, assisted as the committee was by eminent gentlemen learned in the law from the various provinces of Canada. I think that we are indeed fortunate that that was the situation. If this were a matter in respect to which there was contention or there was any danger of the public interest suffering, there might be something to be said for what my hon. friends have suggested, but as a matter of fact the very course that was taken was designed to give the public interest the fullest possible protection, and I think now we are in the very happy position of having a measure before us which has had so much time and attention given to it and which has proved so acceptable to all parties interested, and, I think, to the public at large.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I would ask the minister whether any objection was taken to this bill by any of the provinces when it was being considered by the Senate committee.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, this bill is the result of the pooled wisdom of all parties interested. While perhaps I cannot go to the point of saying that the provinces are in complete agreement, I can say that six of the provinces agree, and that three provinces leave themselves open, if they choose so to do, at a later stage to take exception to the measure. In the meantime at least they are not opposing the bill.

Mr. EULER: This legislation could have effect and force only if the provinces do not object?

Mr. RHODES: No, not at all; on the contrary it will have full force. As a matter of fact I do not assert my view is worth anything in this matter, because this is a subject which will require far more study than I can give it. However, eminent lawyers with whom I have conferred are of opinion that this bill is within the competence of the legislative jurisdiction of this parliament.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Away back in the year 1916 the province of Alberta took the matter of jurisdiction in insurance to the privy council, and if I remember correctly the verdict was in favour of handing over jurisdiction to the provinces. I was just wondering whether the province of Alberta had counsel before the Senate committee, and whether such counsel did not object.

Mr. RHODES: As I have said, Mr. Chairman, the privy council has held in all cases that the business of insurance, as a business, is within the sole jurisdiction of the provinces; there is no question about that; we do not assert anything to the contrary.

Mr. EULER: And this bill does not conflict with that?

Mr. RHODES: No, in no shape or form.

Mr. ILSLEY: The minister has said that six of the nine provinces are in agreement. Of course it is not necessary to point out that the agreement of the provinces does not confer jurisdiction upon the federal parliament.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so; that is a legal position which could be taken.

Mr. ILSLEY: It may be that the provinces would not take exception to the legislation, but that companies would take exception. In such case the position taken by the provinces would not preclude the action of the companies. Speaking particularly about the part of the bill now under discussion, I must say I do not see anything of a controversial nature. Speaking however as a member of the House of Commons who has not yet had the opportunity of reading any of these bills, I would expect the Minister of Finance at some stage or another to take up the question of jurisdiction, and make a simple explanation to the committee of how the proposed legislation gets around the very sweeping decisions of the privy council. Such an explanation should not be a very difficult matter. If the legislation is intra vires it should be a very simple matter to make an explanation to the house. With all due deference to the collective wisdom of able counsel and committee members who have dealt with this legislation it seems to me it is the function of the committee of the whole to secure the fullest explanation before such legislation is passed.

I have before me the last decision of the judicial committee of the privy council given on October 22, 1931, in which it is held that the dominion parliament has no authority to deny to British or foreign insurance companies the right to transact business in Canada, or to make it a condition of transacting business that they take out dominion licences. I think my statement sets out the effect of the decision. I understood the Prime Minister, in his explanation of the proposed legislation, to say that we do have the right to deny the right to licence or the right to be registered in Canada, and to stipulate that companies must be registered in order to do business. Perhaps I would not be occupying the time of the committee unduly if I were to read a short extract from this decision of the judicial committee of the privy council in which Viscount Dunedin expressed the matter very clearly:

> What has got to be considered is whether this is in a true sense of the word alien legislation, and that is what Lord Haldane meant by "properly framed legislation." Their lordships have no doubt that the Dominion parliament might pass an act forbidding aliens to enter Canada or forbidding them so to enter to engage in any business without a licence, and further they might furnish rules for their conduct while in Canada, requiring them, e.g., to report at stated intervals. But the sections here are not of that sort, they do not deal with the position of an alien as such; but under the guise of legislation as to aliens they seek to intermeddle with the conduct of insurance business, a business which by the first branch of the 1916 case has been declared to be exclusively subject to provincial law. Their lordships have, therefore, no hesitation in declaring that this is not "properly framed" alien legislation.

My submission is that the Minister of Finance ought to explain to this committee of the whole how and in what respects the legislation before the house is properly framed alien legislation, and in what respect it is different from the legislation which was declared ultra vires by the decision from which I have read—that is, so far as alien or foreign companies are concerned. When we come to British insurance companies about the same considerations apply, although they are not aliens. It was sought to control British insurance companies and subject them to the necessity of taking out dominion licences on the ground that they were immigrants.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: The hon. member has said that the legislation was declared ultra vires; I think it was the jurisdiction which was declared ultra vires by the privy council.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it is always legislation that is declared ultra vires; my hon. friend will see that in both instances it was legislation which was declared ultra vires. The decision goes on to say:

> As regards British subjects, who cannot be styled aliens, once the false definition is gone, the same remark applies as to alien immigrants. This is not properly framed law as to immigration, but an attempt to saddle British immigrants with a different code as to the conduct of insurance business from the code which has been settled to be the only valid code, that is, the provincial code.

I should like to have an adequate explanation as to how the proposed legislation gets over the effect of the privy council decision of 1931. That decision certainly held ultra vires a provision that alien companies must take out licences as a condition, under which business might be carried on. Looking over the present legislation, I cannot see that it is different from that which has been declared ultra vires.

Mr. RHODES: I would be the last person to attempt to give an explanation, which would be acceptable either to this committee, the House of Commons or the country, and which would make clear to all persons the position of legislation with respect to insurance. A very eminent lawyer, a friend of mine, said he knew of no instance where lawyers disagreed so widely or violently as they did with respect to the question of jurisdiction in insurance. I would not attempt either for my hon. friend or for the committee to enlarge upon the explanation which was offered with extreme clearness by the Prime Minister in response to a query by the hon. member for North Waterloo. I think he made it very clear. There has been no attempt in this legislation to get around any decisions of the privy council—none whatever. I submit we are seeking only to put in the form of legislation that which is within our absolute competence. We are not attempting to invade the field of the provinces with respect to insurance, or contracts of insurance. I think that has been made abundantly clear several times to-day. It is admitted we have absolute jurisdiction with respect to the question of aliens, alien companies and bankruptcy, and that is as far as we go in this legislation.

Mr. POWER: I do not think there is any indication of wrong doing on the part of the government, or any attempt to get around a decision of the privy council. I should like the minister to remember, however, that the decision of the privy council, as I understand it, was to the effect that the legislation as drafted was ultra vires.

Mr. RHODES: That is the old legislation.

Mr. POWER: I think perhaps the last one, too. The last decision was more or less to the effect that it was conceivable that the federal government could draft such legislation as would be intra vires. I may be wrong in that, but that was my conception.

Mr. RHODES: That is right, I think.

Mr. POWER: I think the question of my hon. friend from Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) is directed to the manner in which the government and its legal advisers have endeavoured to meet the decision of the privy council by drafting legislation somewhat different from that which has already been discarded as a result of that decision; that is, as to how they went about it, what particular phraseology was used in order to try to meet the decision. I think such information would be interesting.

Mr. RHODES: We have in these bills eliminated a number of sections which appeared in the old act.

Mr. POWER: The phraseology has been changed, I understand.

Mr. RHODES: And we have eliminated section after section. I shall be very happy to point these out as we proceed.

Mr. EULER: And you have inserted new sections. Those are the ones we should like to know about.

Mr. RHODES: Very few.

Mr. CAYLEY: While I think this matter has been thoroughly dealt with by the committee of the Senate, I regret the records of that committee are not available. If the federal authorities have jurisdiction over alien companies, how is it that alien companies have operated in this country heretofore without registering with the federal insurance department?

Mr. RHODES: The dominion has taken the position that they were operating illegally.

Mr. ILSLEY: The privy council said not.

Mr. RHODES: The provinces said so.

Mr. EULER: If in future an alien company proceeds to do business in Canada without getting status from the insurance department, would that department enforce its regulations?

Mr. RHODES: We contend such a company would be doing business illegally and we could preclude them from continuing.

Mr. POWER: But I doubt very much if once they are in this country you can keep them from carrying on ordinary business. It is just as if you tried to prevent an immigrant coming into the port of Halifax or the port of Quebec; if he passes all the tests and is properly in Canada, there is nothing to prevent him buying a piece of bread or a cup of coffee—of carrying on the ordinary business which an ordinary civilian can carry on. Insurance is a business that comes under the civil laws of the provinces. Once you have allowed a man in he is to all intents and purposes on exactly the same footing as a citizen of this country so far as carrying on the ordinary details of business is concerned.

Mr. RHODES: Not entirely. I think there is not any question that we can stop an alien from coming in. We agree up to that point.

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. RHODES: My friend says that an alien company having come in it can do just what it likes. That is not in conformity with the decision of the privy council by any means. I think I cited this decision once before:

> Their Lordships have no doubt that the Dominion parliament might pass an act forbidding aliens to enter Canada or forbidding them so to enter to engage in any business without a licence, and further they might furnish rules for their conduct while in Canada, requiring them, e.g. to report at stated intervals.

After the alien company is in here we would have absolute jurisdiction to deal with the question whether it was solvent or insolvent.

Mr. POWER: I am not prepared to go that far.

Mr. RHODES: That is the opinion of the law officers of the crown and of eminent counsel. I do not think exception has been taken to our contention that we have a very large measure of control over alien companies.

Mr. POWER: I am under the impression that the provinces did take exception. Mr. Tilley, represented Ontario and Mr. Geoffrion, represented Quebec; they are both eminent counsel.

Mr. BURY: An analogy has been made between the entry of an immigrant and a foreign company. How can a foreign company enter Canada except by registry? It has no existence of the same nature as a person. A person is a physical being who walks over a gangway into the country. Surely a company can only get its admission and establish itself in the country in the same way as an immigrant establishes himself—by some act which constitutes its legal entity inside the country. That seems to me to be the first object of the bill. After the foreign company has become a legal entity, which it can only do by fulfilling the requirements in the bill, it still remains for certain purposes under the jurisdiction of the Dominion parliament.

Mr. EULER: They might appoint a Canadian citizen as their agent.

Mr. BURY: But in the character of a company it would have to be registered inside the dominion.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: If the legislation that the member for Hants-Kings spoke of had been accepted by the provinces, would it in the eyes of the privy council have been intra vires instead of ultra vires?

Mr. RHODES: That is a matter of law, but I think the answer would be the same either from the member for Hants-Kings or myself. It would not be competent on the part of the province by mere acquiescence to change the interpretation which the privy council had given the statute.

Mr. EULER: It would not bind the individual.

Mr. RHODES: That question arose with respect to the Industrial Disputes and Investigation Act. There the privy council decided the jurisdiction to be in the provinces after the act had been in operation by the federal authorities for many years. To-day that act is still functioning by virtue of the provinces having implemented it by statutes of their own.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Suppose I have a policy in an alien company that is doing business to-day under a provincial licence, but doing it illegally by not having procured the status that the Prime Minister said it should procure from the federal government, would I be all right?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend in that case would be taking his chances.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Then if I insure my house with an alien fire insurance company, which is not registered and has not attained the status of which the Prime Minister spoke a little while ago, have I any protection at all as a policy holder in that alien company?

Mr. GUTHRIE: You have all the protection the company affords; but if a loss occurred and you put in a claim, you might have to prosecute your claim in the country where the head office of that company was established; you might find there was no deposit in this country to secure you. But you have a perfect right to insure.

Mr. RHODES: So long as the alien company does not solicit business.

Mr. CAYLEY: Two provinces have already licensed foreign companies. Would there be any protection for policy holders in cases of that kind?

Mr. RHODES: If the province has not required a deposit the individual insured will have to take his chances.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Suppose this legislation is passed and these alien companies come here and establish their status through the federal government and then go to the province and obtain a licence to carry on business, as they are compelled to do by provincial legislation. If I take out a policy in such a company doing business in Manitoba, what protection will I have as a policyholder? Do these companies make deposits with the federal government in order to obtain that status, or how am I protected more than I am protected to-day?

Mr. RHODES: After this legislation is passed an alien company will not be permitted to do business in this country unless and until it makes the necessary deposit with the Department of Insurance.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Does that deposit consist of a certain percentage of the business done every year in Canada, or how is it arrived at?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The deposit is based on the business done in Canada.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Would the deposit be sufficient to protect the policyholders?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes. That does not apply to the mutual companies, whose deposits—which are specially provided for in these bills—are not solely applicable to Canadian business but are part of the general business in other countries as well. That was a provision that was agreed upon; I believe the provinces and the dominion agreed that the mutual companies should make a deposit here, but in the event of the bankruptcy of that mutual company that deposit would form part of the general assets of the company in whatever country it was doing business; it would not be exclusively for the benefit of Canadian policyholders.

Mr. RHODES: The proviso just referred to will be found in section 14, at page 7 of the bill.

Mr. SPENCER: One of the reasons given by the minister why this bill should not go to the banking and commerce committee was that the committee is very busy at the present time. I may say that the work the committee had in hand is just about finished, and I do not know that there is anything on the agenda for us to proceed with, so we would be very willing indeed to take on this new work. I am never against the government if I think they are taking a forward step, but in this case I think they are taking a backward step. The minister has informed the committee that the Senate committee went through these bills very thoroughly, and he does not think it necessary to send them to the banking and commerce committee of the House of Commons. I find that in the first four pages of this bill several amendments have been submitted by the minister; if the same ratio applies throughout we will have no less than fifty-seven amendments, so I think the minister has shown in this way that the Senate has not done its work as efficiently as he has suggested.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Is it not a fact that if this bill were sent to the banking and commerce committee, under the general terms of the hearing that was held by the Senate committee, all those representatives of insurance companies, provinces and so on, who came here and spent so much time reaching a compromise, would have to be heard all over again? Are we not morally bound to accept the compromise which has been arrived at, unless we are prepared to have a rehearing of the whole case by a committee of this house? I was very much interested in the matter and consulted with the solicitors for the companies in which I am a policyholder, and I think I am fairly stating the fact when I say that the whole measure represents a compromise between the provinces, the companies and all concerned, in order that the situation may be met as adequately as possible. I feel that we should not refer this question to the banking and commerce committee unless we give these people an opportunity to return and state their case all over again.

Mr. CAMPBELL: To what exent, if any, is the principle of the power of the federal government to tax insurance premiums paid to outside companies involved in this bill?

Mr. RHODES: That is a matter for the budget; it is not affected by this bill in one way or the other.

Mr. CAYLEY: Reference was made to section 14 with regard to the securities guaranteeing the policyholders. I have been reading that section, and I find it very difficult to understand. Would the minister just tell me in plain language what securities these mutual or foreign companies are obliged to deposit?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton South): We are only on section 3 as yet.

Mr. RHODES: Section 14 was mentioned in response to a question from an hon. gentleman opposite. If my hon. friend will permit me to do so I would prefer to give that explanation when we come to that section.

Mr. SPENCER: In reply to my hon. friend from East Algoma I would like to point out that the two houses of parliament act quite independently and do not lean on each other at all. Recently the Senate conducted an inquiry into the Beauharnois matter, and I noticed that wherever they saw fit they went into the matters that were under investigation by a committee of this house only a short time ago. I think it would not be in the interests of parliament if one house decided not to take any particular step because of certain investigations made by the other house. It is only right that the two chambers should be entirely independent, and I do not think we should simply pass this bill because the matter has been discussed by the Senate.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I do not want to infer that we are bound to accept what the Senate has done; I merely point out the arrangement which I believe was arrived at between the provinces, through their very eminent counsel, the insurance companies and the federal government.

Mr. COOTE: I do not want to press this point too far, but I think the fact that there are so many amendments to be proposed to this bill, as mentioned by the hon. member for Battle River, certainly indicates the wisdom of allowing it to go to the banking and commerce committee of this house. I am a little afraid that the banking committee is losing caste, if I may use that term. Not long ago the Prime Minister said in effect that the banking and commerce committee was not competent to inquire into questions of banking, currency and credit in Canada, and to-day I think the Minister of Finance rather inferred that the committee was not as competent to deal with this act as the banking committee of the Senate. I do not think we should allow these aspersions, if I may call them that, to be cast upon our banking and commerce committee. It would expedite the business of the house and of the session if these three bills were sent to our select standing committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. RHODES: I will ask the Minister of Justice to move an amendment to section 2, the interpretation clause.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I beg to move that paragraph (n) of section 2 be amended by striking out the words "issued under the provisions of this act."

Mr. RHODES: This amendment has been suggested by the Department of Justice and I think it is to get away from the question of the business of insurance. As a matter of fact, policies are not issued under the provisions of this act, they are issued by the companies by virtue of their powers.

Mr. POWER: It means that the government admits it cannot control the business of the issuing of policies.

Mr. RHODES: That is within the jurisdiction of the provinces.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4—Registration required.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I was wondering why the words "save as hereinafter expressly provided" were included. The section would read all right without them.

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend will look at section 65 he will see that certain exemptions are provided for; this section has reference to that section.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Filing of document copy of charter.

Mr. COOTE: Paragraph (c) reads in part:

(c) a statement in such form as may be required by the minister of the condition and affairs of the company on the thirty-first day of December next preceding, or up to the usual balancing day of the company.

[Mr. Coote.]

Is it intended to supersede or override the order in council passed last year authorizing insurance companies to value their securities at a previous date rather than at the date of the issuing of the statement?

Mr. RHODES: That would come under section 25.

Section agreed to.

Sections 6 and 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Companies licensed under Insurance Act deemed registered.

Mr. SPENCER: I would suggest that the chairman read all the explanatory notes given for each section.

Mr. COOTE: Line 17 of this section reads, "such company shall have assets in Canada, for the purposes of this act." Does that mean that the assets must be held in Canada, and when a company is holding bonds, does it mean that a place will be designated where those bonds are to be kept in Canada, or does it mean that the company must have money invested in Canadian securities?

Mr. RHODES: The company must have securities lodged either with the minister or with a trustee approved by the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: A few minutes ago we were discussing a section which was held to be beyond the powers of parliament. It provided that it should be unlawful for any alien company within Canada to solicit or accept any risk unless under licence of the minister granted pursuant to the provisions of the act. Section 4 of the present bill reads:

No company shall transact the business of insurance in Canada (save as hereinafter expressly provided) unless it is registered and holds a certificate of registry from the minister.

Why does the minister say that this section is within the powers of parliament while the old section was not? What is the difference in principle between saying that an alien company shall not transact the business of insurance unless under a licence issued by the minister, as was the language of the old act, and saying that no company shall transact the business of insurance unless it is registered and holds a certificate of registry from the minister, as is the language of this bill? The old section was clearly beyond the powers of parliament because it attempted to dominate the business of insurance, to use the words of the decision of the privy council. Does not this section attempt to dominate the business of insurance carried on by foreign companies in almost the same way? What is the difference between the former alien company legislation and the present alien company legislation? I think the committee should have some explanation in this connection, as it is a question which suggests itself to anyone who studies the matter. The two provisions seem to be almost identical in principle; they both seek to prevent an alien company from doing insurance business in this country without a licence or without registration.

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend will look at the second paragraph of the preamble he will get an answer in part to this question. The powers referred to were enforced under the combined provisions of sections 11 and 91 and others of the old act. Section 91 and others have been dropped from the new bill, and there is no attempt being made to regulate the conduct of business.

Mr. ILSLEY: What did the old section 91 purport to do?

Mr. RHODES: It covered how policies were to be drafted, the payment of premiums, service in the militia, provisions with respect to lapsed policies and other matters which had to be put into the policy. That provision is dropped with respect to alien companies.

Section agreed to.

Sections 9 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

On section 14—Assets to be maintained in Canada by other companies.

Mr. CAYLEY: Would the minister explain this?

Mr. RHODES: This in effect represents a concession made, for the purpose of securing unanimity, to the New England mutual insurance companies, who stated that the very nature of their business, being mutual companies, precluded their segregating their assets and earmarking them as confined to Canadian business, because the cost of their business covering both sides of the line had to be spread evenly over the whole list of their risks. While I do not go so far as to say that the Department of Insurance take the position that they have made out a reasonable case, the effect is that this is the result of a decision reached by mutual agreement.

Mr. CAYLEY: Then they are granted certain additional favours, are they not? The section reads:

> Every company, other than a fraternal benefit society, registered under this act to transact any class of insurance business, other than life insurance, shall at all times maintain assets in Canada in respect of such class of business of an amount at least equal to the liabilities of the company in Canada.

Mr. RHODES: I do not quarrel with the statement made that this is the result of a compromise. Perhaps the position taken by the companies is not sound; they may be able to segregate their assets, but let me point this out to my hon. friend: if in time it is ascertained that the New England mutuals are not affording full and exclusive protection to their policyholders by depositing securities earmarked for Canadian business, they in the long run will suffer by reason of the fact that they will have their business diminished, and they may in time reach the point where they will have to have their assets in Canada earmarked for their Canadian business.

Mr. CAYLEY: The minister spoke of a compromise. Did it include other companies than the mutual ones referred to? Were they quite agreeable to this?

Mr. RHODES: Of course the mutuals and reciprocals would be the only ones that would be immediately concerned with this, but no doubt each of the companies would have to make some concession. It may be said that the provision as it now stands meets with the approval of all the companies.

Section agreed to.

On section 15—Securities permissible.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister explain just what deposits these companies are required to make? Is this simply an initial deposit to enable them to carry on business in Canada? If anything further than that is intended, at least a percentage of the deposits should be made out of Canadian securities. Some of the securities specified in the section are foreign.

Mr. RHODES: The answer to my hon. friend's question will be found by reading sections 12, 13 and 14, which have just been passed, providing the basis upon which the assets in Canada are maintained and allocated.

Mr. CAYLEY: The provision reads "maintain assets in Canada." Does that mean that they must have them on deposit with the department?

Mr. RHODES: Have them physically on deposit in Canada, either with the minister or with trustees approved by the minister.

Mr. EULER: The Minister of Justice a moment ago made, I think, a remark to the effect that the mutual companies did not make deposits in the same way as do the regular companies.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is the clause.

Mr. EULER: I was going to base my question on that statement. Are the foreign mutual companies placed in exactly the same category as the Canadian mutual companies with regard to the amount of deposits they have to make?

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend will look at subsection (2) of section 8, he will get the answer to his question.

Mr. EULER: They are on the same basis, are they?

Mr. RHODES: No. It reads:

—shall not be required to make the deposit required to be made under the provisions of the next preceding section in respect of a certificate of registry—

And so on.

Mr. EULER: The Canadian mutual companies, I take it, have to make a deposit. Do the foreign mutual companies have to make a similar deposit, or what distinction is there, if any?

Mr. RHODES: The Canadian mutual company has to make an initial deposit of $50,000 with the superintendent of insurance. The foreign mutual is not required to make that deposit unless it chooses voluntarily to do so. With that exception the securities that have to be deposited are precisely the same in both cases and cover the amount of business they write.

Mr. EULER: That leads to another question. Why has the Canadian company to make a deposit of $50,000 while the foreign company is excused?

Mr. RHODES: I cannot give any better answer to my hon. friend than to say—

Mr. EULER: It has always been done.

Mr. RHODES: It has been done, and apparently is part of that give-and-take arrangement which resulted in all parties agreeing to this bill.

Mr. EULER: It looks like discrimination.

Mr. RHODES: Yes; I quite agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. CAYLEY: I might just read this explanation that I find:

To have made a deposit with the dominion authorities would have been unfair to our other members located in the States because it would constitute a segregation of a part of our assets for a particular group of our policyholders, creating an obviously unmutual situation.

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. RHODES: That is their position, but I do not know whether it could not be attacked.

Mr. CAYLEY: It does not sound healthy. Coming back to section 14, I see there have to be certain words stamped on the policy in red ink. What is the object of that?

Mr. RHODES: That is designed for the full information of the policyholder, who shall know, when he gets his policy, by reading the lines in red ink—

Mr. CAYLEY: He knows his danger.

Mr. RHODES: The words are printed in red ink across the face of the policy. That indicates to him that although this mutual company has deposited securities, they are not earmarked exclusively for the Canadian business, but are to be pooled for the common advantage of the company as a whole.

Mr. CAYLEY: That is, he is accepting this policy at some risk?

Mr. RHODES: Yes. He certainly is not in as good a position as the man who insures in a Canadian company where the assets are earmarked in Canada for his protection.

Mr. CAYLEY: What is the difference between a company and an exchange?

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend will look at the interpretation clause on page three of the bill, he will see that exchange is defined as follows in paragraph (i):

"Exchange" means a group of persons formed in any foreign country for the purpose of exchanging reciprocal contracts of indemnity or inter-insurance with each other through the same attorney, where the principal office of the exchange is in a foreign country.

Mr. COOTE: I should like to ask the minister whether there is some provision elsewhere in the bill as to the class of securities which, under section 12, companies must maintain in Canada.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend will find the answer to his question in section 20, subsection 2, as follows:

The assets which may be so vested in trust for the purposes of this act shall be bonds, debentures, stocks and secured loans of the classes authorized in that behalf in schedule I to this act, having regard to the class or classes of insurance business in respect of which the assets are so vested in trust.

Then at page 29, under schedule 1, my hon. friend will find the assets which may be vested in trust for the purposes of this act, including:

(a) the debentures, bonds, stocks or other securities of or guaranteed by the government of the Dominion of Canada or of or guaranteed by the government of any province of Canada; or of or guaranteed by the government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, or of any dominion, colony or dependency thereof; or of or guaranteed by the government of any foreign country, or state forming a portion of such foreign country; or of any municipal or school corporation in Canada, or elsewhere where the company is carrying on business; or guaranteed by any municipal corporation in Canada;

And so forth. Then under (b) are included the bonds of any corporation secured by a mortgage; debentures; the preferred stocks of any corporation which has paid regular dividends upon such stocks for not less than five years preceding, with certain provisos; common stocks, with certain provisos; real estate mortgages.

Section 15 agreed to.

On section 16—Further deposit if value declines.

Mr. EULER: Who makes the valuation, and on what basis is it made? Can it be made arbitrarily by the government as was done in the case of the securities of insurance companies?

Mr. RHODES: No, the valuation is made by the superintendent of insurance.

Mr. EULER: On the basis of the market value?

Mr. RHODES: He follows the market values as published from day to day in the security lists, which are a matter of common knowledge.

Mr. EULER: I was hoping that the valuation would not be made on the same basis as the arbitrary valuation made by the government, by order in council, of the securities of insurance companies.

Mr. RHODES: We will discuss that point a little later on, perhaps.

Mr. COOTE: Are any steps taken to notify the public if the minister withdraws the certificate of registry under subsection 2?

Mr. RHODES: Certainly the public would be notified by the insertion of an advertisement in the Canada Gazette.

Section agreed to.

Sections 17 to 24 inclusive agreed to.

On section 25—Valuation of security.

Mr. COOTE: I asked the minister before whether the provisions of this act will override the order in council passed last year.

Mr. RHODES: I think it would be a correct answer to say to my hon. friend that the order in council had reference only to the transaction as it resulted last year. It would have no bearing on the valuation of securities for the purpose of another year. For the purpose of another year we would have to conform to the provisions of this act.

Mr. COOTE: The order in council applied only to the one annual statement?

Mr. RHODES: To that one annual statement, yes.

Mr. COOTE: Under subsection 2 it would look as if the government might authorize the same thing in any year.

Mr. RHODES: It would be quite competent for the government to authorize similar procedure to take effect another year if it were thought desirable.

Mr. GARDINER: Would the minister explain just why it was necessary to value those securities in that way at a time like this, giving a false impression to the public as to the value of the securities held?

Mr. RHODES: I am satisfied in my own mind as to the necessity of the procedure. I do not know whether I can make it clear to my hon. friend, but I will try.

Contracts of insurance carry on into the future, covering a period of years. We must assume that normalcy or something approaching it will prevail sooner or later, and that the absurdly low valuations which now obtain for securities heretofore known as impregnable, gilt-edged, will not continue. If a company had to meet all of its obligations to-morrow, such a procedure would not be justified, but inasmuch as it does not need to meet all of its obligations to-morrow, but has to meet them perhaps ten, fifteen or twenty years hence, it has been universally regarded as proper and fitting not to value the stocks at their market price under panic conditions, to meet obligations which will mature in what might be called fairly normal conditions. The action taken by the government last year was precisely similar to the action taken with respect to insurance companies in every state of the American union. Precisely the same thing was done during the war. If it had not been done at that time several insurance companies would have become insolvent, whereas after the war, and when things had come back to what we thought were normal conditions, the securities of these companies rose to a point which afforded not only security but an ample margin of safety for the policyholders. I do not believe I can add anything to the statement that I have just made, except to say I do not think it is in the interests of the company alone that such action should have been taken under the conditions prevailing; it is in the interests especially of the policyholders of the future.

Mr. POWER: The real reason for it is that a large number of persons are interested in the company and some of these companies are large corporations. That is about the only justification. If a private individual attempted to value his assets on a basis other than their real market value the bank would throw him out; but a large company which owes millions or hundreds of millions in obligations, the failure of which would involve difficulties for a very large number of persons, is allowed, by common consent, I suppose, to get away with it.

Mr. RHODES: I do not subscribe to the point of view expressed by my hon. friend from Quebec South. Many of these companies are purely mutual and are the property of the policyholders. The question of profit to individuals or corporations does not arise at all. I think I can illustrate in part what I have in my mind by referring to bonds of the Dominion of Canada. In Canada to-day there are bonds selling in the eighties, but we are perfectly certain that when those bonds mature the holders will receive one hundred cents on the dollar. That same statement is true with respect to assets of a similar character held by insurance companies. To-day they are worth, we will say, eighty cents; but when they mature they will be worth one hundred cents on the dollar.

Mr. EULER: Stocks never mature.

Mr. RHODES: So, when the assets of these companies are called upon in future years, at such time securities will be worth an amount sufficient to provide the necessary funds to meet the obligations of the company.

Mr. EULER: I find it very difficult to believe it is ever right to say a thing is worth what it is not. That holds true in connection with securities held by the insurance companies. There is force in the remarks of the Minister of Finance when he speaks of government bonds which we hope will be paid in full at maturity. That may apply also to bonds of some very good companies. I say to him, however—and I think every hon. member will appreciate this—that there are gilt edged bonds of first class companies in this country which have depreciated exceedingly in value, and it is doubtful whether they will ever again reach the values they had when they were purchased. I think my statement in that regard is correct. While I might make some exception with regard to bonds which come to maturity and are supposed to be paid at par, it is entirely different when we consider common stocks, which never come to maturity. I say, without fear of successful contradiction, that many of the common stocks of Canada which at one time were regarded as high class securities and good value will never again go to the prices at which they were purchased. That statement applies to preferred stocks as well. That being so, I cannot approve of a practice, well intended as it may have been, which says a thing is worth something more than its true value. Such a practice must result in destroying confidence, if the condition I speak of actually comes about.

While I am on my feet may I say that I have not had the opportunity of reading the bill, and I doubt whether hon. members have read it. The funds of insurance companies and especially those of life insurance companies, are trust funds. I do not think it should be possible, and it should be illegal, for them to invest in common stocks, which, after all, are highly speculative. A few years ago a peculiar anomaly existed in the Insurance Act. Fire insurance companies, which are not custodians of trust funds, were precluded from investing in anything but mortgages and bonds. Those were the only classes of securities in which fire insurance companies could invest, although the moneys in their possession were not trust funds. If a fire insurance company went to the wall the worst that could happen to the policyholders would be the loss of premiums; they could reinsure in other companies. In connection with life insurance companies, however, there is a different situation. In those companies there are the funds of widows and orphans, or prospective widows and orphans. If those funds are lost in common stock investments the result is serious. I do not know whether there is any provision in the bill bearing on the matter, but I suggest the government would do well to bring in a regulation making it impossible for life insurance companies to invest in common stock.

Mr. RHODES: The views of my hon. friend are entitled to, and so far as I am concerned always receive, the utmost consideration and respect. I do not, however, entirely agree with him in his assumption that the power of valuation is responsible for the placing of values which leave false impressions, in other words false valuations. If it were a question of valuation for the purpose of meeting an obligation at the moment, I would say he is correct; but such is not the case. Under panicky conditions one places valuations upon securities bearing in mind the fact, as I said before, that the obligations of the insurance companies are to be met in years to come. If we loaded down insurance companies with obligations which would require them to hold securities to such an extent as to be able to meet panic conditions, we would be placing a dead weight upon them which would prevent them from engaging in the insurance business at all, and thereby we would deprive tens of thousands of people of opportunities for protection. A long period of years would elapse before companies could pile up resources sufficient to meet such a strain.

I should like to direct a few remarks to the second point mentioned by my hon. friend, namely as to whether or not insurance companies ought to invest in common stocks. I am not disposed to quarrel with my hon. friend; the point he has raised is arguable. In my own mind I am disposed to agree with him. In this connection we are in a position to indicate how necessary it is that policyholders have the protection of a governmental department. When the old insurance bill was before parliament the superintendent of insurance suggested a limitation upon the amount of money insurance companies could invest in common stocks. Parliament, in its wisdom—and I am not finding fault—overrode his judgment, and opened up a situation under which insurance companies could invest largely in common stocks. To the extent that insurance companies have been prejudiced and their financial positions jeopardized by their having invested too largely in common stocks, parliament must take its full share of responsibility. Upon a later occasion the superintendent of insurance sought to protect the policyholders, and to prevent large investments by insurance companies in common stocks.

I might point out to my hon. friend that in this bill we have included a very drastic provision as regards the practice which has hitherto obtained. I do not think it would be possible—certainly not at this stage—for us to say that a company shall not have investments in common stocks. My hon. friend must recall that not long ago we were confronted with a condition which disclosed that some of the life insurance companies have extensive financial investments in common stocks. Were we under present conditions to force those companies to dispose of their holdings, we would not be doing either them or their policyholders a good service.

Mr. EULER: Yes, but it should not go on in the future.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so. If my hon. friend will look at page 32 of the bill he will find a limitation to be imposed upon insurance companies as to the amounts they may invest in common stocks.

Mr. POWER: I am not prepared to agree with my hon. friend from North Waterloo that there is anything detrimental in investments in common stocks, as such. Many common stocks are first charges upon the assets of companies, and offer as good and as safe a field for investments as do debentures, bonds or preferred stocks of other companies. I am not prepared to go as far as my hon. friend from North Waterloo and urge upon the minister the advisability of any limitation whatsoever upon investments in common stocks. I would urge upon him, however, at all times, or whenever statements have to be made by a company, to let the public know the true position of such company. No argument of the minister, much as I respect his views, will induce me to believe that for the government of Canada to issue a certificate that a company holds assets to the value of so many million dollars, when in fact it holds assets materially less, is good practice.

Mr. CAYLEY: Will the hon. member tell me how he would establish the value of an asset for which there is no market?

Mr. POWER: At least for the assets for which there are markets—common stocks, bonds, debentures and preferred stocks—we should force the companies to place values upon them which they have in the stock and bond markets of the world.

Mr. CAYLEY: I do not think my hon. friend understood me. This is a peculiar time when many stocks are not being traded, and I fail to understand how a value could be established.

Mr. POWER: Most of the stocks which these companies hold are stocks being traded on the markets of the world, and were purchased at very high values. The minister has referred to a return to normalcy. So far as the values of those stocks are concerned, we are closer to normalcy to-day than we were at the time of their purchase. I agree with the hon. member for North Waterloo that in many cases there is no possibility, during the lifetime of the present generation, of obtaining the values which were placed upon stocks when they were purchased.

Mr. RHODES: I do not wish to enter into a debate with my hon. friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power) whose opinions I respect very much, but when he says that stock prices to-day represent normal value, let us admit for the sake of argument that his contention in that respect is right. I say there are still bonds of the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion, and of other countries, including Great Britain itself, which are selling away below par. He would not say that that is normal?

Mr. POWER: No, I am not sure the hon. Minister of Finance is right. If some of my hon. friends in the corner were perchance to come into power they might cut the interest on these bonds. I have heard some of them say that the wages of capital are too high, and I am rather inclined to agree with them. I do not know but what we might perhaps support such a contention.

Mr. COOTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. ILSLEY: They certainly would inflate the currency.

Mr. POWER: Yes, and if so—

Mr. RHODES: If they inflated the currency we might not require this valuation.

Mr. EULER: In our sister dominion of Australia the interest on the national bonds has been arbitrarily reduced.

Mr. COOTE: By law.

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. RHODES: This is not in point, but I think my hon. friend's information is not quite correct. The Australian government called upon the holders to take a lower interest rate, but they only did that in regard to their nationals, not foreigners.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If I understand aright, for some time past the superintendent of insurance has had the power to value bonds and debentures, but this is quite a new departure that we should include power to evaluate stocks and other securities. It would seem to me that this proposal is in a class by itself. As I understand, one particular insurance company got into trouble by investing very large amounts in stocks, and under the special legislation secured by the government last year for the "peace, order and good government" of the country that particular company was able to make returns in such a way that it failed to show the real position of its investments. What was done last year under that special legislation is now to be made possible under this proposed legislation; and although it is general in character, I take it in reality it is to help out one particular company. I do not know how the superintendent of insurance, cautious though he may be, is going to be in a position to say where stocks will be a few years hence. It is all very well for the minister to take the ground that one of these days we shall return to something like normalcy. As he knows very well, some of the most eminent economists are of the opinion that there is going to be no such return. In that event there is misrepresentation of the real affairs of the company. I would urge that the minister be satisfied with the present legislation and eliminate the words "stocks and other securities", leaving the act in this regard as it was before.

Mr. RHODES: I cannot agree with my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that the provision arises because of the position of one insurance company. On the contrary, it was required in the general interests of all the companies, and I may say it was welcomed by all of them in precisely the same way as it was in the United States, where the same practice obtained. The practice obtained in Canada during the war. My hon. friend is labouring under the assumption that this authority rests with the superintendent of insurance. If he will examine the bill he will see that the authority rests in the minister. That may not afford any degree of additional protection so far as my hon. friend is concerned, and I do not present it for that purpose, but simply to emphasize ministerial responsibility and to remind him he should be accurate in his facts.

As, Mr. Chairman, it is not proposed to go on with these bills this evening, and as we have private bills between eight and nine o'clock, I move that the committee rise, that Bill No. 66 be reported, and that with respect to the other two bills the committee report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. COOTE: With regard to the discussion as to the market price of Dominion of Canada bonds, I think the policy of the present government is responsible for their low price on the market to-day. If we had a Progressive government in power we would restore the prices of those bonds. I should not like the committee to remain under any wrong impression as to the reason for the low price of our bonds at the present time.

Bill No. 66 reported.

Progress reported on Bill No. 67 and Bill No. 68.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Stirling in the chair.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police: pay of force (including salaries of two constables, Ellesmere Island district, at $2.25 per diem, to insure department against loss through death), $1,740,595.75.

Maintenance (including subsistence, billeting, travelling expenses, forage, fuel and light, clothing, repairs and renewals, horses, ammunition, stationery, etc., medical, hospital, etc., transportation and freight, building repairs and renewals, establishment of new detachments, contingencies and criminal investigations), $1,964,000.

To compensate members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for injuries received in the performance of duty, $10,000.

To assist in the enforcement of federal statutes (expenditure chargeable to this vote shall be in connection with such federal police duties as may be defined by the governor in council, upon recommendation of the Minister of Justice), $75,000.

To provide for special services in connection with the enforcement of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, $50,000.—Total, $3,839,595.75.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does this include the salaries of the commissioner and the assistant commissioner whose appointment was recently arranged for?

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): It includes the salary of the commissioner, but there will be a slight increase in respect of the deputy commissioner who is to be appointed under the bill recently passed.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What is the salary of the commissioner?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is $12,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the commissioner receive any pension?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, not while he is drawing a salary.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is another matter about which I should like to ask, which we had up in the house to-day, that is with regard to men who are threatened with deportation. I think the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are concerned in this matter as well as the Department of Immigration. I have the following wire dated May 2 from Abrahamson and Greenberg, Confederation Life Building, Winnipeg:

Daniel Holmes (Chomicki), aged thirty-four, in Canada with parents and brothers and sisters twenty years, with Canadian wife and child, no police record; and Konrad Cessinger, single, unnaturalized, in Canada five years, no police record; and Orton Wade, believed Canadian born, arrested by R.C.M.P. authorities within last twenty-four hours. Authorities refused to produce to us warrants and deliberately misled and delayed us in obtaining redress. Advised by assistant commissioner Field, R.C.M.P., that all three men left by train east to-night for deportation purposes. Immigration commissioner Smith denies all knowledge of the matter and says same not dealt with by his department. Neither Mrs. Holmes nor anyone else advised prior to departure of above mentioned persons. We would appreciate it if you would make inquiries regarding this as we consider it an outrage and a breach of the regulations laid down in the Immigration Act. Would urge that this be introduced on floor of house as this should not be allowed to remain as a precedent for the R.C.M.P.

I notice that in the last two Winnipeg papers to reach Ottawa quite considerable prominence is given to this case. From what I can learn it would seem that these men are suspected of being closely connected with the communist organization, but no charges were laid against them, and when their counsel instituted habeas corpus proceedings they were unable to carry them through because the men had already left. According to the press, legal opinion seemed in doubt as to whether habeas corpus proceedings could be carried on, because the men had left the province.

As I am advised by this wire, these men have been in the country for quite a long time —one for twenty years. According to one of the Winnipeg papers he had tried to secure naturalization but was unable to do so. This makes the case look peculiar. Further it seemed to me a strange proceeding, when I telephoned the Immigration department, that I should be told by the official immediately in charge that he could give me no information at all about the matter but that I would have to ask the minister. When I interviewed the minister over the telephone I was told that the matter had not yet come to his attention. The circumstances are rather curious, and as I am inclined to think the matter must rest very largely with the mounted police, I am bringing it up to-night. I take it from what the Minister of Immigration said this afternoon that this must be considered typical of other cases. This case concerns me, however, since it has to do with Winnipeg men.

I do not think we in this house are concerned with whether or not these men are communists. That is not the reason I am raising the question. If they are communists, and if the decision given by the court of appeal stands, I presume it is possible to bring them up for trial as communists and to deport them. But my contention is that there should be a trial. I do not think men should be deported from this country simply after an investigation by the Immigration department. As residents of this country for a considerable number of years certainly they ought not to be deported without a full, fair trial.

I should like to ask the minister several questions. First of all, were any specific charges laid against these men? Again, under whose authority were they transferred from Winnipeg to some eastern point? I should like to know where they are now and before whom they are to be tried. It seems to me that an important principle is at stake. If I understand anything at all about British legal practice, even the worst criminal has a chance to make his defence and is given a fair trial. I cannot understand this procedure at all. I hope the Minister of Justice, under whose direction the Royal Canadian Mounted Police seem to be acting, can throw some light upon the matter.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Under the act the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, among other things enforce federal laws, and they act under the instructions of any department that may seek their services. In the case just stated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the instructions to the police would come from the Department of Immigration. The police respond when they are informed by the department that their services are required. I have nothing to do with the instructions given; in fact I had not heard of these cases until to-day.

The immigration laws of this country are on the statute books, and have been unaltered for many years. I have never heard of their being abused, although they have been criticized. An action taken under the immigration laws is not like a trial of either a civil or a criminal action. When my hon. friend says that these men must have a trial, the trial which he speaks of is an investigation which will take place under the provisions of the law of this country which we are all supposed to know and to obey. The men were taken into custody at the request of the Department of Immigration in Winnipeg, and I understand that the board of investigation which is to consider their cases will meet in Halifax, when a number of cases are to be considered. When the board is constituted it hears the case and then makes its report to the department; the minister of the department reviews the finding of the board, and if he finds that the Immigration Act of Canada has been contravened he can, in certain cases, order deportation. I pass no opinion whatever upon these cases, because I know nothing about them save what I have heard yesterday and to-day. I think I can assure my hon. friend that the law has been carried out, at least by the police. They are very careful and exact in practically everything they do; there may at times be exceptions, but, generally speaking, they are a force upon which we can depend to the utmost, and we are always inclined to believe their proceedings to be very regular.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Minister of Justice will understand that I am not in any way blaming the mounted police for carrying out their instructions. I do not know sufficient about these cases to be able to say whether or not the men in question have violated the immigration laws, but it is rather unusual that I should be unable to obtain any information from the Immigration department.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the minister would give every detail sought by my hon. friend if he asked for it. I know he is not backward in furnishing information.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I appealed to the officer immediately in charge and he told me I could get the information only from the minister. When I apply to the minister he tells me he does not know anything about the case.

Mr. GUTHRIE: At that time he probably did not know very much about it, but I feel certain I can obtain the details from the minister, and I will help my hon. friend if he desires.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What I am particularly interested in to-night is not the guilt or otherwise of the men, but the procedure adopted in these cases. The minister is an able lawyer; I am only a layman, I should like to know from him if men can be arrested in Winnipeg, without any charge being preferred against them and transferred to Halifax to be tried.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If, in the opinion of the Immigration department, men liable to deportation are not desirable subjects of this country, they may be taken into custody pending an investigation of their case. There have been many such investigations, but it does not follow that in every case deportation has followed. I assume the investigation is fairly conducted under the provisions of the law; I have not heard of any cases of hardship, nor have I had complaints of maladministration of the act. I assume in these cases the law has been complied with. If the men to whom my hon. friend refers have committed acts which render them liable to deportation, I have no doubt the provisions of the law will be carried out. If they have not, I do not think they have much to fear, outside of perhaps being put to some inconvenience.

Mr. BROWN: I have received a wire from Winnipeg in connection with these cases, and the statement is made that the arrests were carried out under the warrant of W. J. Egan, who, of course, is the Deputy Minister of Immigration. It may be that the procedure adopted is in harmony with the immigration law, but it certainly is not in harmony with what we understand to be the principle of British justice. There men have been arrested in Winnipeg and spirited away to Halifax; sentence has virtually been pronounced upon them in that they have been taken from their homes in Winnipeg and sent down to Halifax for deportation. Surely the minister will agree that it would be infinitely more in harmony with justice to have had these men detained in Winnipeg until an investigation could be made. They will have no opportunity of bringing witnesses to their defence in Halifax; the only evidence offered at Halifax will be that submitted by their accusers. In the very nature of things these men will not be able to secure witnesses. I am not disposed to defend those who violate the laws of our land; people who come here from Great Britain or from European countries should come prepared to obey our laws. Holmes, one of the men in question, came to Canada twenty years ago, married a Canadian girl and has a child. Surely if he has not previously come under the cognizance of the police he should be entitled to that measure of fair play which would hold him in Winnipeg instead of his being sent to Halifax to have his case reviewed there.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There may be a good deal in what my hon. friend says, but he is one of the old and experienced members of this house and I have heard no complaints against this law since it was put upon the statute book.

Mr. BROWN: It is only when abuses occur that such matters are brought to our attention.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The act gives the department the right to hold boards of inquiry where they see fit, and I gather from what the Minister of Immigration has said that this board is being held in Halifax to suit the convenience—

Mr. YOUNG: Whose convenience?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The convenience of the department, I take it, and the shipping company. This board is to hear other cases besides the one under discussion. All these matters are taken into consideration when deportation proceedings are being conducted. In the past, boards have been held at Quebec and other points in Canada. Generally speaking, I agree that it is a good thing that a man should be heard in his own province, but that is not the law at the present time in regard to immigration. The minister is only carrying out the law as it appears on the statute books.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: There is nothing in the law that tells him to take a man direct to Halifax to be tried there.

Mr. GUTHRIE: He has the discretion to fix the place.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The minister has made the statement that the men would be given a fair trial before being deported. Does he really think that a man can get a fair trial when he has been arrested in Winnipeg and taken to Halifax away from all his friends?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am assuming that a man can get a fair trial in any part of Canada.

Mr. VENIOT: No, he can not.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If any serious reason is urged by these men to show that they cannot get their evidence, or that they have not money to obtain evidence, it is taken into account by the board. There is no railroading of cases; there will be a fair investigation and a fair finding.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Supposing a man wants to bring a witness from Winnipeg to justify his being in Canada.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Does my hon. friend say that he cannot do that?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I admit he can do it, but why should the officials of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police put the country to the expense of bringing witnesses such a distance when the trial might just as well be held where the man has resided for many years and has friends who can testify on his behalf?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It might be cheaper to gather them all in one place.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am speaking of the witnesses necessary to give the man a fair trial. Does the minister contend that the country is to be put to the expense of bringing witnesses from Winnipeg, where the man has resided for some time and where people know him best, to Halifax in order that he may have a fair trial? Surely the minister cannot justify that on the program of economy laid down by the government.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This discussion started on the ground of the man's having a fair trial. Now when that is disposed of, the question is raised as to the expense. I do not know what arrangement the Department of Immigration makes in regard to expenses, but I can guarantee the investigation will be fair and the man will not be under any expense.

Mr. NEILL: Is it not a fact, if a man is charged with a criminal offence under the ordinary criminal code and it is desirable for some reason to transfer the trial to another area, what is called a change of venue, that permission for the change must be granted by a supreme court judge? If I am right in saying that such is the practice, it would suggest that the accused's rights are safeguarded in that particular way. Would it not be a good thing if the same course obtained in such a matter as that now under discussion?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It might be. I am not justifying taking men out of their own provinces for the purposes of these investigations. Under the provincial law, a change of venue is usually subject to the judgment of some provincial court; they decide these matters, but there is nothing of that in the Immigration Act.

Mr. BROWN: I fully realize it is not the Minister of Justice who is involved in this case; it does not come under his department. It is the Department of Immigration that is at fault, if there be any; but this seems to me the only opportunity we have at the moment of bringing up the matter. I think the minister will agree that if this procedure is sanctioned by the immigration law, it is pretty nearly time that law was changed.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That may be.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As having a bearing on this, I might mention a similar case before the public at present. This is from the Ottawa Citizen of May 5:

> Mystery surrounds the whereabouts of Arvo Vaara, editor of the Finnish Daily Vapaus at Sudbury, and Martin Parker, translator. The two men were arrested when police raided the newspaper office yesterday, bundled into a large automobile with five plainclothesmen, and the car left immediately, heading south.
> To-day the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at Ottawa said the raid was carried out by the provincial police, while the Ontario provincial police headquarters here said that they "had no report."
>
> "Have you any idea where the men were taken?" Inspector Alfred Cuddy of the provincial police, was asked to-day.
> "Not the slightest. We have no report on them," he replied.

Apparently these men were spirited away from Sudbury. Somebody near me suggests they were kidnapped. I do not say that, but it is extraordinary if men can be taken in this way, seemingly without any charge being made. I am not defending this man Vaara, who is a communist and who may have got into trouble, as I understand he did several years ago, but I think he ought to have received a trial. The Minister of Justice may tell me not to take the newspapers too seriously, but apparently it is only through the press that we can get information concerning these matters. This is a Montreal despatch of May 6, which appears in this evening's Ottawa Citizen:

> Arvo Vaara, communist editor of the Finnish Daily Vapaus of Sudbury, who was arrested in a police raid on the newspaper, will be deported, Col. W. H. Price, Ontario attorney general, said here before sailing abroad the Canadian National liner Lady Somers for a vacation in the West Indies.
>
> He replied in the affirmative.
>
> "Will he be sent from Montreal by any of the liners leaving to-day?"
>
> Mr. Price said that he did not think so as it would likely take several days to have the deportation papers arranged.
>
> "This man was in trouble three times for statements derogatory to His Majesty," Mr. Price added. "Now he has been going too far again and we are certainly not going to put up with violence."
> Mr. Price added that it was essential to protect Canadians and that reds who incited to violence would be sent out of the country.

I have no objection to deporting any foreigner who incites to violence. I suppose that is the only course for the country to take. But what I should like to ask is this: Has the man had his trial? On whose authority does Mr. Price say that he is to be deported? Mr. Price, as an official, may have very good grounds for knowing something about this man, but the accused has not yet had a trial, or if he has had one, it was very short, because apparently he was arrested only yesterday. Now he is in Montreal and I presume he may be on his way to Halifax. Before we can learn anything about the matter, the attorney general says that the man is to be deported. I do not know what kind of attorney general they have in Ontario who sentences a man before he has a trial. I do not know if that is what the minister calls a fair trial, but when such things are happening we ought to have a fuller explanation of the situation than we have yet had from the Minister of Immigration or the Minister of Justice. Can the minister give us any information about this despatch?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I again tell my hon. friend that he takes too much for granted from the newspapers. If he asks what authority Colonel Price had for saying this, that or the other thing, I do not know what he did say. All I know about this is what I read in the Ottawa papers this morning. I understand what took place at Sudbury occurred under instructions of the Attorney General of Ontario and was carried out through the provincial police, although I have been informed that some of our police were called in to assist. We have not as yet any report on the matter.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What will be the procedure now?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would gather from the newspaper report that Colonel Price thinks this is a proper case for deportation. If it is, he will have to follow the provisions of the Immigration Act, which provides for an investigation and a report to the minister before a man can be deported.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): In the first remarks the minister made, he spoke about a board of inquiry at Halifax that was to inquire into this case. Will he give the committee more information about the board? Are its members permanent officials of the department? How and by whom are they appointed or selected?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Some of them are permanent officials. I think they are all selected by the minister. I have not the Immigration Act before me, and I am not familiar with it.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Do they go from place to place as they are required?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I fancy they go from place to place as they may be required, but there are at the various ports permanent officials who are asked to act in these cases.

Mr. GERSHAW: I notice this appropriation includes $50,000 for services in connection with the administration of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act. I am aware the officers have done splendid work during the past few years in controlling the sale of banned drugs in this country. I notice the appropriation has been reduced by $10,000. Is the department doing anything in the way of providing treatment or special hospitals for drug addicts?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No. The Justice department takes no part in the provision of hospitals or treatment. I would think that would be a matter rather for the provinces than for the federal government. It may be that the Health department gives some grant or does something in the matter, but if so it is not within my knowledge. This vote is merely to cover the expenses of the mounted police in running down traffickers in narcotic drugs. I am inclined to think from my experience in the Justice department, and also in the courts of the country before I came to the department, that the drug traffic is not on the decline in Canada. Case after case comes from all parts of Canada. There were three this afternoon, all from British Columbia. There are a great many cases, far too many, and the department and the police are using their best endeavours to check the traffic as far as possible. Whether or not it is possible absolutely to abolish it I do not know. It is very difficult to run down these drug traffickers, and it is an expensive part of our work. Evidently they are well financed and are able to obtain very good legal counsel when they come up for trial. I have no doubt that there is a strong financial ring behind the traffic as it exists in this country and also in other countries. The mounted police expend a great deal of effort under this particular item, but it was thought that we would try to get along with $10,000 less than was appropriated last year, not because the traffic has decreased, but because of the need for economy.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I for a moment revert to the subject under discussion a few moments ago, the question of the seizing of individuals by the police and their removal, with an expedition almost unequalled outside of Russia, I take it, down to some distant province or port in this country. I would ask the minister first of all whether action of that kind does not deprive the individual of the opportunity of having his counsel apply for and effect habeas corpus. Secondly I would ask the minister, if he can, to justify the action that has been taken. I do not think as a matter of fact that I have yet heard even an attempt to justify it. The minister did suggest that under the Immigration Act anyone who felt aggrieved might be able to take appropriate action to have investigation. I have at the moment no complaint to make of the administration of the act in the past. I have on several occasions had to deal with the Department of Immigration, both to have men deported at their own request and to have deportations stayed. Two years ago I succeeded in having four families deported, at their own request, from the mining areas in Alberta. Last year I succeeded in having some six deportations stayed, but in every one of the six cases the deportation proceedings were commenced while the persons were still in the place where they had resided in Canada. They had an opportunity to appeal to their local lawyer, and he in turn was able to get in touch with the local member. I went down to the town of Drumheller myself to look into some of these cases, and consequently was in a position to make recommendations to the department. But in the present case the men are said to have been spirited away to a distant province without any pretence of a trial, a proceeding which is absolutely unbecoming in a democracy. Frankly, by tradition and education, I am anti-communist. I believe in democracy. I like the conception of constitutional government. I think it is an ideal that we might well aspire to protect. But if this is the kind of thing that is going to be done in the name of democracy, you have no real democracy at all; you are vitiating it and destroying the very principle on which this house was established. I condemn with all the power I have the action of the department in this case, deporting men to a distant part of the country and depriving them of the privilege of having resort to their personal friends without expense to the country and trouble to the individual himself. I really think that the government should seriously reconsider the whole matter and have these people returned to the places where their crimes, if any, are alleged to have been committed. Who knows that they will get a decent investigation? I do not know, I have heard people condemn the Russian Ogpu, their secret service, for the way they secretly hurry people away to Siberia and give explanations afterwards. That was the way these men were dealt with—the action was first taken and the explanation given afterwards. To persist in a course of that kind is to destroy the democracy concerning which so many proud protestations have been made.

Mr. DUFF: I think I am correct in saying that a part of this vote is to take care of the provisions of the act that we passed in this house a few days ago under which the land preventive service all over Canada was transferred from the Department of National Revenue to the Department of Justice under the Canadian mounted police. I would ask the minister if these men who will now be mounted policemen looking after the preventive service will have to give their full time to the work in which they are engaged and for which they are paid.

Mr. GUTHRIE: To answer the last part of the question first, they will be full time men. They will have to give all their time to the work of the mounted police. But this vote does not include any provision for the preventive service. At the time the main estimates were prepared the proposal to take over the preventive service had not been consummated, but since then the arrangement has been completed, and we shall have to look for another vote in the supplementary estimates to take care of that work. For the information of the committee, the present vote under this item is $3,839,595, and it is proposed that a supplementary estimate of $200,000 be brought in, which will make the total vote $4,039,000 odd—not including the preventive service, because it is already provided for in the main estimates for the Department of National Revenue. That vote of $4,039,000 odd compares with a vote last year of $3,354,000, so there will be an increase in the mounted police vote of $685,000. That increase is more apparent than real, because against that we will receive the following amounts from the various provinces with which we have negotiated agreements: Alberta, $225,000; Saskatchewan, $260,000; Manitoba, $125,000; Nova Scotia, $150,000; New Brunswick, $100,000; Prince Edward Island, $15,000; making a total of $875,000 which will be returned to the federal treasury. Crediting that $876,000 against our total vote this year, including the supplementary vote, of $4,039,000 odd, the total expenditure this year will be $3,164,595 as estimated, or a reduction of $189,000 as compared with last year.

Mr. DUFF: I am very glad indeed to have the minister's explanation. Although the minister has truly stated that this vote does not include the cost of the preventive service, I do not think I am out of order in discussing a matter which I should now like to bring before him.

Either the Minister of Justice or the Minister of National Revenue made the statement when the bill to which I referred was before the house that some 350 men of the preventive land service were being taken from the Department of National Revenue and transferred to the Department of Justice, and that they were full time men. I would say to him, and to his deputy who is sitting in front of him and listening to my remarks, that they had better revise the list which the Minister of National Revenue passed over to the Department of Justice, because it is a well known fact that among the men who were transferred there are a number who during the past year have not given their full time to the work of the preventive service. I made several complaints to the Minister of National Revenue but received no satisfaction. In view of the fact that there has been a transfer of preventive service officers to the Department of Justice and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, I hope and trust that there will be a different state of affairs. I should like the minister and his deputy to go very carefully through the list, make inquiries from inspectors in the different provinces, and see that every man in that splendid service, for which everybody in Canada has great respect, namely the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, formerly the Northwest Mounted Police, is a full time man, a man who will be a credit to the service and the minister's department. Among the 350 who were transferred I know of several who in the past have not given full time to their duties; they have been engaged in other work, although drawing full time pay in respect of their regular employment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is my hon. friend referring to the period since April 1 of this year, since the men were taken under the control of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Mr. DUFF: No. If my memory serves me correctly—and I think it does—in taking over the land force of the preventive service either the minister or the Minister of National Revenue made the statement in the house that 350 men were being transferred from the preventive service of the Department of National Revenue to the minister's department to come under the control of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. My point is that of those 350 men there are some who did not give full time to the preventive service. I should like the minister or his deputy to communicate with their officials in the different provinces and ascertain the full circumstances. No matter what the religion or politics of the men may be, as long as they are a credit to the service I have no objection to the Minister of National Revenue arranging with the Minister of Justice to make transfers from one department to another. But I repeat, that in the past some of those men have not been giving full time to their work, and I think the Minister of Justice should see that every man who has been taken over from the Department of National Revenue and placed in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police should give full time to his work. I have no doubt the minister will give the matter his attention. Have I made myself clear?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. DUFF: I realize that the vote for the preventive service is not included in this item, but with the indulgence of the committee I should like to speak to another point.

Mr. GUTHRIE: About $1,500,000 of the preventive service vote will come under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. DUFF: Under the bill to which I made reference, the marine preventive service is being taken over by the minister's department and by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I do not know what arrangement the minister has made. There is no doubt that the gentleman who was sent to Halifax, Inspector La-Nauge, is a splendid official, and I feel sure the department made no mistake in its choice. He was there some years ago, did splendid work and is undoubtedly a good official. It seems to me, however, that if the department is taking over the marine end of the preventive service it should appoint somebody familiar with marine matters; in other words, a marine man should be appointed to look after marine affairs. I think the minister will agree that no government would appoint me Minister of Justice. I know no law, although I am sometimes referred to as a sea lawyer. In spite of the fact that the present minister and past ministers of national revenue have put forth every effort to prevent smuggling, there is still much being done. I am not casting any reflection upon anybody connected with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I do say, however, if the law is to be carried out effectively it is necessary that the minister appoint men on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts who have knowledge of marine matters and who will be qualified to take proper charge of the preventive service.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think I can assure my hon. friend that the men taken from the preventive service into the Royal Canadian Mounted Police must measure up to the mounted police standards. They will be full time men; in the meantime they are taken in on trial. Unless they measure up they will be let out. I assure the hon. member they will devote their whole time to their work. They must be energetic and measure up to the standards by which the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have made themselves a pattern for other forces. The other day in the house, I mentioned the matter of selections, and although I know nothing personally about them I have learned that in the province of Nova Scotia recommendations were made by the chief preventive officer, Mr. Logan. I think my hon. friend will have confidence in his selections.

Mr. DUFF: Whom did he select or recommend?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know the names of the men. The other night the hon. member for Hants-Kings asked me a question concerning two men. Although he is not in his place, I will say that if there was any discrimination it was at the instance of Mr. Logan who made the selections. I think my hon. friend will have confidence in Mr. Logan's choice.

Mr. DUFF: I do not know what Mr. Logan did in regard to his choice of men. Let me say to the minister, however, that if Mr. Logan is responsible for letting out a man named McLaughlin he has made a very grave error. Mr. McLaughlin came from Hants county, and has been in the preventive service for ten years. He was moved from Hants to Lunenburg county. If the minister would make inquiries he would find that everybody would say he is a suitable official. He took no part in politics, and so far as I know he did nothing that would make Mr. Logan recommend that he be not retained in the service. I cannot understand, if Mr. Logan was given a free hand to choose the men from Nova Scotia who should remain in the force, that he would recommend that McLaughlin be let out, because, as I said a moment ago, McLaughlin was one of the best men in the force in Nova Scotia, and it is a shame and a mistake that he has been let out. He is a family man, he gave up his business in his own county and was transferred to Lunenburg, where he rendered splendid service. There is not a single complaint against him. He is sober, he is industrious, and certainly he did not deserve the treatment he has received, whether from Mr. Logan or somebody else.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will certainly make inquiries in regard to officer McLaughlin and let my hon. friend know.

Mr. DUFF: Will the minister tell me about the marine end?

Mr. GUTHRIE: An arrangement has been made that Commander Oland be loaned from the naval department to take charge of the marine work until it is thoroughly organized.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If we may come back to the other case, which I do not think we have very satisfactorily settled: I find that according to the Winnipeg Free Press of Wednesday, May 4:

> Writs of habeas corpus were issued Tuesday, directing Assistant Commissioner Field, of the R.C.M.P., to produce the bodies of Holmes and Wade before the court of the King's Bench on Thursday, when he is also required to show the authority under which the men were deprived of their liberty.
> Mr. Justice Galt made the order in the case of Holmes, with Mr. Justice Donovan making a similar order for the production of Wade. Both cases will be argued Thursday, S. Greenberg, local barrister, is representing the men.
> Up to the present police have refused to disclose the whereabouts of the three men. All that is known is that they are on board an eastbound train, and apparently an effort is being made to deport them from Canada before any effective legal steps can be taken to prevent their departure.

Now, this is what I was trying to get at a little while ago—the action of the mounted police in preventing any information as to what was being done with the men, their refusing to produce any warrants, their hurrying them away secretly and rapidly, and so effectively preventing them enjoying the safeguards which most of us considered were available under such circumstances. Apparently the writ of habeas corpus can be served only within the province, and these men were spirited away outside the province, and thus the very purpose for which the law exists was defeated. There is my point. I do not think the Minister of Justice, who has undoubtedly been brought up in the spirit of the law and the spirit of British traditions, can condone anything of that kind. If we are to develop a police force here who are to be given a free hand to violate the very spirit of British traditions, to make it impossible for men to avail themselves of the safeguard which British law has thrown around British citizens, then we are in a very serious plight, indeed.

May I mention for a moment the effect that this action will have upon the hundreds of thousands of our non-English speaking people throughout the west? It is twenty-five years ago since in connection with some work I was engaged in I went to live among the foreign born. I tried my best to give them some knowledge of our Canadian "ideals," as we used to term them in those days; I tried to show what was involved in our British traditions and British history; I tried to tell them in those days—it was not so difficult for me then as it would be now—that we were living under a reign of liberty, and that every man was sure to be safeguarded in his freedom and if accused was sure to receive a fair trial.

Well, the communists came and told those people that there was no sort of fair play in this country, that there was no chance of their attaining any true liberty under this British flag, and so on. You condemn the communists for this, but let me warn you that actions of this kind are doing more than all the communists in this country can do to undermine faith in British institutions. How can we go back to those people and tell them that this is a land of liberty when the action that has been taken will remind them of the actions of the soviet government at the present time in regard to political offenders, or those which were taken under the old Czarist regime against such offenders? That is what they will tell you. What can we answer? I should like to think that no matter how black a man's character may be he is assured of a fair trial in this country. We have a right to insist on that. This parliament surely has something more important to do than merely to pass estimates. As the supreme court of the nation we have the right to consider whether this is a case that involves substantial injustice.

I think of the man's wife, a Canadian born woman, of his child, I believe some thirteen years of age, also born in Canada. What are they to think when in this fashion their husband and father is spirited away from them without their having been given any chance to go to his help? He may be pretty bad, but I know in some cases murderers are given more consideration than that and are treated in a more humane way. It seems to me we are simply becoming hysterical and panicky. Conditions may be bad enough, but these conditions are not being produced by the few members of the communist party who may be in this country, they are not being produced by the foreign born here who may not be satisfied and are agitating for a better state of society. These conditions are due to our economic system. The way to better them is not to get panicky and hysterical and deprive people of the rights we thought we all had under the British constitution. I ask the minister whether he thinks it is in keeping with justice that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police should be able to foil the counsel of these men and prevent habeas corpus writs being issued in time to save their clients from being whisked away to Halifax?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I can only say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not believe the mounted policemen perpetrated what is alleged in the newspaper read by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre. I believe they acted strictly in accordance with the law and with their instructions.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is much worse if they did that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I say "in accordance with the law." And if a man acts in accordance with the law why should you say "it is much worse?" That is the way he should act, that is the way we expect him to act, and that is the way, I submit, that these men acted. This newspaper statement that my hon. friend has read is written for the purpose of exciting popular feeling, or for the sale of the newspaper, or something of the kind.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I quoted from the Winnipeg Free Press.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not care what the paper is my hon. friend quoted, I will guarantee that when the facts come before me—they have not yet—they are not in accordance with the newspaper report.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): And I will guarantee they are.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know that in this matter I can assist my hon. friend in any way. His desire, he said, was for information. I shall be very glad to direct the attention of my colleague who is not here to-night to the views of my hon. friend as he has expressed them. But he started this evening's program by stating that of course this was a matter in the Immigration department. I can only tell him that that is correct. There is the law, and the Minister of Immigration stated to-day that he was acting in accordance with the provisions of the law of this country. I cannot go any further than that, and I won't, because the law should bind us all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Just on that point, do I understand the minister to say that there exists a law in this country which permits the Immigration department or any other department to deprive a man of the safeguards which he might have under habeas corpus proceedings?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will undertake to say that there is a law which enabled the mounted police and the Minister of Justice to do just what they did in this particular case.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Technically the minister may have an edge of correctness in his argument, but I should like to direct his attention to the very considerable alteration in the method of dealing with these cases that has taken place quite recently. Actions of this kind, to my knowledge, have never taken place until this year. Formerly, in every case in which deportation proceedings were instituted, either for the causes alleged in this case or for other causes, such as becoming charges on the municipality or on the public purse, deportation proceedings were commenced in the district in which the person resided. This is an entirely new procedure.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think not.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I want to know why this was done in this case and in the case of the Sudbury people, about which I only know what I have seen, and what I presume the minister has seen, in the newspapers. The two cases appear to be similar; there seems to have been a spiriting away from the locality in which the arrests were made, and I am informed that there was a similar case in Edmonton. It seems amazing that in this year 1932, either this ministry or the Department of Immigration should become so terribly obsessed with fear as to be driven to this hysterical method of trying to cope with what they appear to regard as a gigantic national danger. I do not see that they are getting anywhere by magnifying cases of this kind into major national problems. I tell you frankly, Mr. Chairman, words fail me; I cannot possibly find the proper language with which to describe these actions. But there is one thing I think the minister should tell us: Why, in these cases should the whole course of procedure be altered from the regular, constitutional, civilized methods of British justice which have been followed in the past? The minister says there is a law which permits the Immigration department to take this action. That law has never before been invoked to this degree, at least not to my knowledge. If the minister knows of any similar cases I should be glad to hear of them. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, the action taken has deprived men of the opportunity of securing a decent trial and obtaining justice in their own locality.

May I make a suggestion, because I think the minister is quite sincere and does not want to contravene the popular conception of British justice. Let the minister have these men returned to Winnipeg; let their counsel have an opportunity of invoking habeas corpus proceedings, if they can secure the writs. Let the men have a fair trial, and let the law take its proper course. That is the least we can ask the minister to do, especially in the case of this man who is married to a Canadian woman.

Mr. EULER: When I heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre recite the facts of this matter as given in the newspapers, with regard to the taking of these men from Winnipeg and from Sudbury to Halifax in order to be tried, it seemed to me a most amazing statement. I do not think anyone will accuse me of in any way encouraging sedition or violence, or of being a communist; but it is not even the appearance of justice to arrest a man at his place of residence and take him to a point two or three thousand miles distant in order that he may be tried, thus depriving him of the ordinary opportunity that should be given every man to defend himself. It may not be true that this was done; there may be an explanation which the minister cannot give to-day. But knowing the minister as I do I am sure he does not approve of what was done, if indeed it was done as it has been described in the newspapers and by the hon. members who have spoken. The minister says he is quite certain that the law has been observed and that any action taken is within the law. If this is true, and this is the law, I suggest to the minister and to the government that it is time the law was changed. I think it only fair—and this should be secured by law—that when a man is arrested for any reason whatever, whether it be on a charge of murder or any other heinous offence, he should, at least, have the right of trial in his own community, unless it is impossible for him to receive a fair trial there.

I should like to refer also to the subject mentioned by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough, that is, the preventive service. Perhaps this question would be better asked of the Minister of National Revenue; it is difficult to say where the question of the transfer of the preventive service should be discussed. I heard the minister say a moment ago that the land forces of the preventive service, formerly attached to the Department of National Revenue, were to be transferred to the mounted police. We knew that. I was not aware, however, that the sea forces were also to be transferred. I presume that explains a statement made the other day which seemed to me inaccurate. The minister stated that some 350 men of the former preventive service were being taken into the mounted police and that some 250 men were being let out. My recollection is that there were not 600 men in the preventive service when I was in the Department of National Revenue.

I should like to ask whether, with the taking over of these men of the preventive service, there now will be within the mounted police a special branch to which shall be assigned those special duties formerly carried out by the preventive service of the Department of National Revenue, or whether the officers of the preventive service are merely incorporated into the great general body of police, so that on one occasion a member of the force may act in a certain capacity and on another occasion in an entirely different capacity. Will there be a separate unit within the mounted police so that the men may become experts in particular lines and thus be able to carry out their duties to the very best advantage?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They will form part of the main body of the police, but a special investigation department will be maintained for the purpose of handling customs and excise cases.

Mr. EULER: Then I would like to ask the minister whether there is some basis of co-operation between that particular branch of the mounted police and the customs branch of the Department of National Revenue. It must be quite evident to all members of the committee that the customs branch of the Department of National Revenue will necessarily come in contact with instances of smuggling, of undervaluation and of all the other violations of the Customs Act, and that of necessity, in order to have the work properly carried out, there should be close cooperation between that branch of the mounted police and the customs branch of the Department of National Revenue.

Perhaps the minister will bear with me if I deal with another point before he answers that question. In incorporating these men of the preventive service into the mounted police —and I am in accord with that action, because for the information of the committee I might say that when I had the honour to be in charge of the department we were considering the very course that has now been followed— what disposition is being made of the assistant chiefs? Under the old system the country was divided into districts. There was the maritime district, the Quebec district, the Ontario district, the prairie provinces, each with a sub-chief at the head. What has become of the assistant chiefs of what was formerly known as the preventive service?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Some of those chiefs have been taken into the force and some have been let out. This has been done on the recommendation of the officers called divisional chiefs. They made the selections.

Mr. EULER: I am speaking of the divisional chiefs now.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Four of those chiefs have been taken into the force.

Mr EULER: May I ask in what capacity?

Mr. GUTHRIE: They will be chief preventive officers of their own divisions.

Mr. EULER: With greatly reduced salaries, I suppose?

Mr. GUTHRIE: With a reduction in salary of about one-third.

Mr. EULER: Would the minister tell me what connecting link, if any, remains between the Department of National Revenue and this particular branch of the mounted police?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is a very close connection between the mounted police and the Department of National Revenue. The department will still administer the Customs and Excise Act and will still maintain an investigation branch, which will be kept closely in touch with those members of the mounted police who are specially detailed to look after customs and excise cases. The commissioner himself has arranged that connection between the two departments. I can assure my hon. friend that the Department of National Revenue and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are to be kept in the closest touch at all times.

Mr. VENIOT: Do I understand that the sea forces of the preventive service are to come under the mounted police?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: Can the minister tell the committee why that was done? Was it because of any experience that the mounted police might have had with sea forces?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The main object was to take over the whole preventive service and to avoid what might be called divided responsibility. I think the mounted police are just as competent as the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not think they are for preventive service on the high seas.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We are to have the services of Commander Oland of the naval service in formulating a plan for the proper maintenance of this service and the proper carrying out of the duties which pertain to it.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not think any commander can give better service in the prevention of smuggling than that given already. To put a man at the head of these forces who knows nothing of the system employed by the smugglers will tend only to lessen the efficiency of the preventive service by sea. I know nothing of the Pacific coast, but I do know that the preventive service by sea in the maritime provinces has reached an efficiency which no commander of the naval forces can improve; he might make it worse. For these reasons I must voice my opposition to the mounted police or even the naval service having anything to do with the prevention of smuggling by sea. I understand it is intended to use aeroplanes in this service. I do not know upon whose recommendation this is being done, but I feel certain that the use of aeroplanes to prevent smuggling by sea will be one of the biggest fiascos ever seen in Canada. Smugglers are not in business to be caught; they do much of their work at night, and with their intimate knowledge of the bays, coves and isolated sections of the coast of the maritime provinces all the aeroplanes in the world would have no effect. In these days of economy I think the department should go slowly in adopting systems which cannot help but prove to be failures.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The department is looking very carefully into the question—

Mr. VENIOT: When it puts the mounted police in charge of the sea service?

Mr. GUTHRIE: If the hon. member will permit me to finish: we are looking very carefully into the question of having an air service to assist in the work down there. I may say to my hon. friend that I have not had painted to me that wonderful picture of law enforcement which he has painted. We hope to improve the present marine service of the customs department; we are retaining ninety per cent of the personnel, and we think we will have all the necessary experience at hand. In the meantime we are putting in charge a very experienced man in the person of Commander Oland. I may be wrong in my anticipation of improvement, but I hope I am not, and I believe that after this service has been in operation for a year or so my hon. friend will say we have brought about a wonderful improvement. I am sorry to see the dark picture he paints for us in connection with the bays and coves; I did not think it was as bad as all that, But I will guarantee that the service will be better.

Mr. VENIOT: It is just as bad at the border, because the smugglers there work at night. The efficiency of the preventive forces, either by land or by sea, should not be judged by the number of seizures made. It is the prevention of the violation of the law by smugglers which shows the true efficiency; with an efficient force, the smuggler is afraid to land and goes elsewhere. The result of the system carried out by the Customs department has been to drive these smugglers to the United States. When they discover that the force is efficient enough to prevent them from landing their goods in Canada, they go to the United States and do their smuggling into that country.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We will try to get the force efficient enough to prevent that.

Mr. YOUNG: Reverting to the case of the men who are being deported, the minister expressed doubt as to the accuracy of the newspaper reports, but I should like to ask him this question: Will he, as Minister of Justice, undertake to see that these men are not deported until the facts are laid before him, and if after he has examined the facts he finds that the newspaper reports are substantially correct, will he see that these men are taken back to Winnipeg for trial?

Mr. GUTHRIE: If my hon. friend had heard all the discussion on this matter I think he would realize that he is asking a rather foolish question. This whole matter comes under another department and under an act of this parliament with which I have nothing particularly to do. I have listened patiently to all the complaints, and I shall be glad to bring them to the attention of my colleagues. Perhaps this discussion should not have taken place on these estimates, but I am glad to have had the views of hon. members. If it is the opinion of hon. members that amendments should be made to the Immigration Act, I shall offer no opposition. But, as I said before, the act is as it has been for the last twelve years, and all this is taking place in accordance with the provisions of the act.

Mr. YOUNG: This being Friday night, the Minister of Immigration is not in the house; neither is the Prime Minister. It will be Monday before we shall be able to question either of them, and in the meantime these men may be deported.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is to be a complete and fair investigation. After the investigation takes place, the cases are submitted to the Department of Immigration, at which time parties can be heard before the minister. In many cases the minister hears similar representations. No railroading is being done except in the newspaper columns. Should my hon. friend want to make representations when these cases come back to the department, I can assure him that he will be heard. If these men desire to have their counsel appear for them, I assure my hon. friend that they will be heard.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If there was no railroading, why were they taken to Nova Scotia?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That was done to suit the convenience of the department and its officials. The board is not being held for an isolated case; probably half a dozen cases will be heard. One of the reasons for its being held in Halifax is because the ships sail from that port.

Mr. EULER: It is very hard on the men charged.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I grant you. A crime charged against a man is investigated in that man's province; that is, when we are speaking of criminal charges. These men may not be charged with any criminal offence; possibly they will not.

Mr. BROWN: All the worse.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But if they are here in breach of the provisions of our law, they may be deported. They may be thoroughly undesirable people, and as such they are liable to deportation. There may be no charge of a criminal nature in connection with them.

Mr. BROWN: That makes it all the worse.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But the law is there, and if it is there it should be enforced. The way to get rid of a bad law is to enforce it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If the law can be enforced to any such wild extremes as this, I have never before heard of anything of the kind being done. Will the minister give me some illustrations ? I have already cited to the committee cases in which I was personally interested and affected, and in which the investigation took place in the province concerned. I cannot understand the minister's point of view.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I quite realize that the Minister of Justice is not the responsible minister, and also that it is unsafe to become too much excited over newspaper reports. But at the moment, until we have other information, we can proceed only on the assumption that there is some foundation of fact in the statements that have appeared, coupled with the telegram which has been received. During the last ten years, while I have been a member, I have been endeavouring to instil into people from other lands who are in my province and in my riding, those principles which I consider to be sound, of the Canadian spirit, the British institutions which I have always felt were fine, noble, the best we have in this imperfect world. In particular I have been holding them up in comparison with the customs in other lands and the ideas of men who come from other countries, and have been doing my best to make of these men real Canadians. One of the things I have always held up has been just that which has been cited, that any man in this country, whether a citizen by birth or naturalization or simply a resident who has come within our borders, is assured, no matter who he is or what he has done, of fair treatment and a fair chance. I am not defending those men; I do not know them. If they have done anything wrong—and I assume they may have—I am the last man to condone the wrong, any more than I would condone a murder or approve any crime. But I would also be the last man to stand by and see even a murderer lynched or hurried to conviction without a fair trial. Where a man is charged with commission of a crime if the accused cannot provide counsel or has no funds, the court, in its meticulous care that British justice be upheld, will furnish counsel for him. If what has happened is as has been stated, the minister is right in saying that no law has been broken, but he is not right when he says that in doing that, they were simply obeying the law. There is a great difference between obeying the law—that is in doing something that the law commands—and simply staying within the limits of the law.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I referred to the actions of the mounted police.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Quite so. I make no criticism of the police themselves. They were acting under orders and had no option but to do as they were told; the better policemen they were, the more meticulously would they obey orders, whether they were right or wrong. I am speaking of the authority under which they acted. The minister did not refer to the police obeying the law; he referred to the Minister of Immigration obeying the law. The Minister of Immigration certainly acted within the law; he did not do anything against the law, but the law did not force him to do as he did. It gave him or his department discretion as to where the trials should take place and what action should be taken. The discretion has been within the law. The law itself my be all right, yet good law may be abused. Actions may be within the law but still be not fair or equitable.

I am chiefly interested from this one aspect, that of the effect which the report of such action, if true or if left uncontradicted, will have upon people from other countries among whom I, with others, have been working in an endeavour to clear from their minds soviet, bolshevist conceptions and make them good Canadians. I have assured them that no matter how poor they might be in this world's goods, no matter how ignorant they might be or to what extent they were unacquainted with our language or our customs, once they came into this country they would receive the same treatment and be accorded the same justice as the richest British-born that could come into the land. If action has been taken as has been stated, and if it goes without contradiction, what can I say to those men? They know, and everybody in this house knows, that no educated man of influential family, of position, of wealth, with influential friends, would be treated in such a way. We know that; they all know that. If other men are treated differently, then all that has been said by many of us, doing our best to stem the tide of faulty opinions and principles, is of no avail. The work we are doing has been hampered; our high ideals have been swept overboard. It is true the minister is not the one responsible, but in the eyes of the world what is he? He is the Minister of Justice; he and his department represent justice in this land. I would appeal to him, in his capacity as the dispenser of justice in Canada, to see that justice is done in this case.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I submit just one or two other considerations? As I understand the matter, the Immigration Act is designed to state what class of people shall come into this country, and to give the minister power to deal with any individuals belonging to prohibited classes that have got by and that should be deported because they are unfit to be immigrants. Clause 41 of the Immigration Act gives a list of certain persons to be deemed to belong to the prohibited or undesirable classes. It is intended to keep that class of people out of the country, but I submit that this law was never designed or should never be used to try people for crimes after they have been for a considerable period in Canada. One of these men, according to my information, has been twenty years in this country. He ought not to come under the jurisdiction of the immigration authorities. He has been here long enough to establish a certain domicile.

An hon. MEMBER: He should be naturalized.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: For my purpose it does not make any difference whether he is naturalized or not. He has been here long enough to establish a certain residence, and he ought not to come under the Immigration Act. If he has committed any offence against the criminal code, by all means let him be tried, convicted and deported if we can deport him. I am not arguing against deportation for cause; but let him have a trial; let us not use the Immigration Act, which is designed to keep certain people out of the country, as a means of putting them out. That is not a fair way of dealing with the situation. It is quite true that a man may get inside the gate in some surreptitious way, and it may be found after he has been here a year or two that he has made false representations, or was not what he represented himself to be. The Immigration Act is designed to take care of people of this class and provide for their being sent back if they have been here a month or two or a year or so, but when a man has been here for a number of years it seems to me that he ought to come under our regular procedure. The very next clause of the Immigration Act, clause 42, says that the minister—> —may order such person to be taken into custody and detained at an immigration station for examination and an investigation of the facts alleged in the said complaint to be made by a board of inquiry or by an officer acting as such.

That means that if he comes in by way of Halifax he will be detained at Halifax and examined there by a board, but it certainly does not mean that after a man has come to this country and has lived for twenty years in Winnipeg he is to be taken back and examined at an immigration station at Halifax. There is no authority in the act whatever for such a procedure as that, none whatsoever. If he has to be detained at an immigration station there is an immigration station at Winnipeg where he might have been detained.

Further than that, in the case of one of these men, he has a Canadian born wife and a Canadian born child in Canada. Now what does the act say with regard to them? Subsection 6 of section 42 says:

> In any case where deportation of the head of a family is ordered, all dependent members of the family may be deported at the same time; and in any case where deportation of a dependent member of a family is ordered on account of having become a public charge, and in the opinion of the minister such circumstance is due to wilful neglect or non-support by the head or other members of the family morally bound to support such dependent member, then all members of the family may be deported at the same time.

I presume that this section means that this Canadian born woman with her Canadian born child may be summarily deported to Poland or Russia or Germany, or from whatever country this man may have come. If he is not deported with his wife, it means that she and her child are to be left in Canada and her husband sent overseas—a family absolutely broken up. Those members of the house who a few years ago objected so strongly to divorce, might I think, very well have something to say about a forcible divorce of that kind, where the head of the family is taken away and the dependent wife and family are left in this country.

Further, the minister says that every opportunity will be given for appeal. Let me read the notice to be sent to the person ordered to be deported:

If you claim to be a Canadian citizen or to have acquired Canadian domicile, you have the right to consult counsel and appeal to the courts against deportation.

These people, I believe, are not naturalized, hence they do not come under the first paragraph of this section. I go on:

In all other cases you may appeal to the Minister of Immigration and Colonization against any decision of the board of inquiry or officer in charge whereby you are ordered to be deported unless such decision is based upon a certificate of the examining medical officer that you are affected with a loathsome disease or a disease which may become dangerous to the public health. The formal notice of appeal will be supplied to you by the immigration officer in charge upon request and upon deposit of the sum of twenty dollars for the cost of your maintenance and the sum of ten dollars for the maintenance of each person dependent upon you until the minister has decided upon your case.

It is that second part of the section which applies to these particular people, and unless they can produce the twenty dollars and the ten dollars for each dependent they have no chance even for an appeal. That is a very serious state of affairs. You take a man quickly away from where he lives without giving him any opportunity to obtain ready cash, and move him two thousand miles from where his friends are located, and it is almost impossible for him to make an appeal to the minister. The result is that he is clapped on board ship and is on his way across the Atlantic without even a chance for an appeal. I know that the Minister of Justice cannot think that that is a fair sort of trial. He must realize that an appeal of that kind is a mere sham. I would urge upon him, as Minister of Justice and as a member of the government, to see to it that these people, whatever their crimes may be, are given a fair trial in Canada.

Item agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—MR. MACKENZIE KING

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): While the Minister of Justice who is acting as leader of the house is dealing with complaints with respect to what appears in the press, I should like to make mention of another matter which affects vitally the privileges of this house.

I have before me a copy of the Ottawa Journal of this evening, and the headline across the page reads:

Roche, MacTavish, Tremblay to be retired. New Civil Service Commission, two or three members, is advice of committee. Report contains severe criticism of service governing body. Praise is given Charles H. Bland. Post offices under $3,000 class taken away from commission.

The news column itself sets forth what purports to be the findings of the special committee to which were referred certain matters pertaining to the Civil Service Act and its administration. I have just been asking one of the members of the committee as to whether or not the committee has made its report, and he advises me that it has not. How near this report which appears in to-night's paper may be to any draft which has been before the committee I am not in a position to say, but there is internal evidence, I submit, which will be apparent when the report is brought down, to suggest that in some way the Ottawa Journal has obtained either a draft of the report that has been before the committee or something very similar to it. Naturally I cannot say who is responsible at all for the representations respecting the committee's findings as they appear in this article, but I think a statement should come from the government immediately repudiating the report and repudiating any action on the part of any journal which purports to deal with matters which are before committees of this house or publishes reports of its committees before hon. members themselves have been given any information. It is a gross injustice to the persons whose names are mentioned in the report, and it is a breach of the privileges of this house that a report on a matter that is before a committee of the House of Commons should be presented in this form to the public before hon. members themselves have received the fullest information. I would like the hon. Minister of Justice who at the moment is leading the house to express his views with regard to this matter.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): If this is a proper time to bring this matter up, Mr. Chairman, and I do not think it is—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A matter affecting the privileges of either house of parliament can be raised at any time.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At any time.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not objecting on that ground. When I read the article it struck me that it was a very improper one to appear in any newspaper—it is not only in the Ottawa Journal; a very similar article appears in the Ottawa Citizen also. If it is only a newspaper reporter's forecast of what a committee is going to report, I do not imagine that anyone can take very serious objection to it, and if the newspaper reporter has made a correct guess I do not think anybody can take very serious objection. But if it is based on information handed out by a member of the committee, then I think serious objection can be taken, and I shall certainly draw the attention of the Prime Minister to the matter at the very earliest opportunity.

Mr. W. G. ERNST (Queens-Lunenburg): As a member of the committee I take the opportunity just to say a word. I do not think I shall be committing any breach of confidence when I say that the article in question was brought to the attention of the committee this afternoon and the committee were unanimous in stating that no member of the committee had given such information to the press. In the words of a former prime minister, it is at best an adventurous prognostication.

SUPPLY

The committee resuming:

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Before the item carries—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stirling): The item is carried.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will answer the question if I can, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I presume that most of the members of the preventive service in Manitoba were absorbed into the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Practically all of them.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I have in mind a man getting, say, from $1,700 to $1,800 a year. How would the change affect his salary?

Mr. GUTHRIE: A man with $1,700 a year would probably lose about $300 a year. He will be paid now according to the police rates.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I assume the staff has been cut generally. Suppose a man in the preventive service on that ground alone was not absorbed into the mounted police. That service has been cut to a certain extent, I suppose?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: What has been cut?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The preventive staff. They have not all been absorbed?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, but in Manitoba I believe practically all have been.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Suppose a man who was in the preventive service was not absorbed when the Royal Canadian Mounted Police took over the service—a man whose record is good but who has passed the age limit for appointment to—the civil service; is there any provision under which the age limit may be waived?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, there is no provision other than that they are entitled to draw out the gratuity that has accumulated during their service.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

To provide for expenses connected with the administration of Indian affairs, including salaries, supplies, relief, medical attendance, hospitalization, dwellings, agricultural activities, surveys, roads, bridges, irrigation, dyking, education, etc., and a grant of $100,000 approved by parliament in the session of 1926-27, $3,873,000.

Mr. DONNELLY: The last time this item was under discussion I asked the minister some questions in connection with the greater production farm at Regina. At that time he told me the farm had been handed over to some individual or individuals to be cared for. Can the minister tell us the size of the farm, the amount of land under cultivation, whether the farm has been rented, or on what terms it has been handed over?

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Superintendent General of Indian Affairs): Mr. Chairman, I have not the accurate information as to the number of acres, nor have I a copy of the agreement or arrangement made with the former manager of the farm. The farm was rather large, consisting of several hundred acres. The arrangement is that it will be taken over this year on a share of crop basis, but other than that I cannot give details of the arrangement.

Mr. DONNELLY: I have asked for production of papers, and I should have liked to have the information before the item passed. I think I should have had it before this item was called.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member asked a question the other night; I gave my answer, and he took no exception. Had he asked for details I should have been only too pleased to secure the information for him. I shall be quite ready, however, to obtain any information he may desire, and send it to him.

Mr. DONNELLY: I have asked for the production of papers, and I think production should have been made before this item came up for discussion.

Mr. MURPHY: How long has the request for information been on the order paper?

Mr. DONNELLY: A week or ten days.

Mr. MURPHY: Undoubtedly the information is being secured from the inspector who made the arrangement. The necessary time has not elapsed for the information to come from Regina.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): I should like to ask a question concerning a condition existing in one of the reserves in Manitoba. Perhaps the minister may be in a better position to answer if I state the circumstances. The merchants at certain Indian reserves in Manitoba have been doing business with the Indians, and to-day they find themselves holding several accounts for which Indians are responsible, and which the merchants are unable to collect. Is there any method by which the department becomes responsible for accounts incurred by Indians? I am referring particularly to the Swan Lake Indian reserve.

Mr. MURPHY: Any goods bought by the Indian department through properly appointed and qualified officials will be paid for by the department. But as to accounts incurred with a dealer by individual Indians the department does not hold itself responsible for payment. There was a practice, which to some extent has been discontinued, whereby an Indian agent would sign an order or agree that a merchant might charge to an Indian certain goods and he, the agent, out of the proceeds of the Indian's crop would endeavour to pay the merchant. I believe a difficulty has arisen in the particular case to which the hon. member for Macdonald has referred. I may say representations have been made to the department with regard to accounts owing to merchants and dealers by Indians in the Swan Lake area. Some of the accounts have been submitted to me to show that the goods were charged and in most instances the accounts bore the signature of the farm instructor. These goods, however, were charged not to the Indian department but to the individual Indian. In such cases the merchants must have understood, through general practice, that the goods would be paid for out of proceeds from the Indian's crop, and not by the department.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Does the minister mean the Indian's crop was not sufficient to pay for these goods?

Mr. MURPHY: Apparently so, yes. The agent would endeavour to pay the account, but I do not suppose he would take all the proceeds of the crop to pay an account, and leave the Indian with nothing. It is evident that during the last few years the Indians have found themselves in the same position as many white people who have been unable to pay their store accounts.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): The department assumes no responsibility for accounts in that position?

Mr. MURPHY: No, the department assumes no responsibility. The agent, however, acting as an official of the department, uses his best efforts to get enough money from the Indian to pay the account.

Mr. VALLANCE: Can the minister answer a query in the form of a telegram I sent to him yesterday regarding the supplying of flour to Indians in Battleford? The purchasing agent asked for tenders, and my information is that tenders were received, a local miller in the town of Battleford being lowest. For some unknown reason his tender was rejected. I should like to know if the minister has any information in the matter.

Mr. MURPHY: The telegram to which the hon. member has referred was placed before me either last evening or this morning. The hon. member has stated that the tender was rejected; the telegram however did not so state, but merely mentioned the circumstances. Is the hon. member correct when he states the offer was refused?

Mr. VALLANCE: All I am referring to is the telegram. Having a copy of the telegram, the minister has knowledge of what it contains. Is the statement in the telegram correct, that an effort was being made to transfer the filling of the order to someone other than the lowest tenderer? That is what I want to know.

Mr. MURPHY: That is a different statement.

Mr. VALLANCE: The same thing.

Mr. MURPHY: A moment ago the hon. member said the offer had been turned down, if I heard him correctly. My information, after taking the matter up with the officials of the department, is that in the spring of the year certain flour was bought by the department for the use of destitute Indians, and a contract was entered into. But in the case to which the hon. member refers, it is not departmental buying. In other words, a portion of the interest fund which is sent to the agent for distribution among the Indians apparently is being used to purchase flour for them. This flour is not being purchased with departmental funds. From the telegram the hon. gentleman sent me, the agent apparently has asked for tenders from different milling companies. I have no knowledge as to whether an order has yet been placed with the firm to which he refers, or with any other firm.

Mr. VALLANCE: The minister surely will not claim that his department is not responsible for what the agent does? The agent is an official of his department, and whether he is spending Indian money or departmental money, he is still acting as an officer of the department.

Mr. MURPHY: Quite so. Nor am I using the words which the hon. member is putting in my mouth.

Mr. VALLANCE: The minister said it was not a departmental matter.

Mr. MURPHY: I said the flour was not being purchased with departmental funds, and therefore it was not departmental buying.

Mr. VALLANCE: But the minister controls the funds of the Indians.

Mr. MURPHY: Possibly I can make it clearer in this way. A certain amount of money is held in the consolidated revenue fund which belongs to that particular band of Indians, and interest at five per cent is allowed upon it. That money is transmitted to the agent for distribution among the Indians.

Mr. VALLANCE: At whose request?

Mr. MURPHY: It is not a matter of request, it is a matter of right.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Every year?

Mr. MURPHY: Certainly. Or they might ask that it be left here to accumulate; but apparently the money has been sent to him for distribution. It may be that the Indians themselves requested the agent to purchase the flour for them out of this fund rather than have it all distributed to them in cash. Apparently—and I use the word because the department issued no instructions to the agent with regard to it—he asked for quotations from different firms to supply this flour. Whether he has placed an order with any firm, as I have told the hon. member, I have no information to give him.

Mr. GERSHAW: How is the grain or wheat from these Indian reserves sold? Some of the larger milling companies have stated that they are sometimes in a position to give a better price than the department obtain, and yet they are never given an opportunity of bidding.

Mr. MURPHY: The Indian agent, as the hon. member knows, does practically all the business for the Indians under his charge. One of his duties is to see that the Indians' grain is sold to the best advantage, and I presume he sells it to the elevator companies at the best price obtainable.

Mr. GERSHAW: It sometimes happens that the milling companies are able to give a better price for the wheat than are the regular grain dealers, but the larger companies have stated that they never get an opportunity to buy.

Mr. MURPHY: That business is not transacted departmentally, and I am informed that the agent does not report to the department as to whom he sells the wheat or what price he obtains for it, although, as I stated a few moments ago, his duty is to see that the wheat is sold to the best advantage in order that the individual Indian may receive the most for his crop.

Mr. DUFF: Is the minister able to give the name of the medical officer who looks after the needs of the Indians of the Chapel Island reserve in the county of Richmond, Nova Scotia?

Mr. MURPHY: I will endeavour to give the hon. member an answer in a moment. I observe that the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) is now in his seat. On May 2 he asked that certain information be brought before the committee in regard to the purchase of coal for certain agencies in Alberta. I am now in a position to inform the committee that in 1930-31, agent Gooderham secured quotations for the fuel requirements of Namaka, Gleichen and Cluny from William McConnell, of Gleichen, and the Midland Coal Company of Drumheller. In that year coal was purchased from Mr. McConnell, who submitted the lowest tender, at the following prices: $7.50 per ton, f.o.b. agency; $8.50 per ton, f.o.b. farm No. 3; $9.50 per ton, f.o.b. farm B. In 1930-31, coal was purchased again from William McConnell, he having submitted the lowest prices, at the following figure: $7.50 per ton, f.o.b. agency; $7.50 per ton, f.o.b. farm No. 2; $8.50 per ton, f.o.b. farm No. 3; $9.10 per ton, f.o.b. farm A; $9.50 per ton, f.o.b. farm B. Here I desire to draw to the attention of the hon. member and of the committee the fact that the answer given to a question asked by the hon. member for Bow River was incorrect, as the official of the department who compiled the figures gave the amounts of the highest tender for the year 1932-33 instead of the figures of the lowest tender, an error which I now correct.

Mr. GARDINER: Has the minister the names of the other persons who were asked to tender, with the amounts of their tenders?

Mr. MURPHY: I have given the hon. member the names of those who were asked to tender.

Mr. GARDINER: Was only Mr. McConnell asked to tender?

Mr. MURPHY: Possibly the hon. gentleman did not hear me. A few moments ago I said that the Midland collieries of Drumheller were also asked to tender.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Were they asked to tender in 1931-32 also?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): And who else?

Mr. MURPHY: That is all, just the two.

Mr. GARDINER: What was the tender of the Midland Coal Company of Drumheller?

Mr. MURPHY: For the year 1930-31 the figures were as follows:

	McConnell	Midland
Agency	$7 50	$7 65
Farm A	9 50	9 65
Farm No. 3	8 50	9 10
	1931-32
Agency	$7 50	$7 65
Farm No. 2	7 50	7 65
Farm A	9 10	9 25
Farm B	9 50	9 65
Farm No. 3	8 50	8 65

On May 2, when these estimates were being considered, the hon. member for Bow River asked the following question:

Mr. Garland (Bow River): Since the mine is producing 3,085 tons of coal, and, as the minister states, he hopes to produce a greater quantity next year, why is his department purchasing coal from outside at more than twice the amount? Is that economic? Is it common sense? If the Canadian National Railway system was run on that basis it would be broke long ago.

To which I made the following answer:

Mr. Murphy: As I stated, the mine has been open only a few months, and it may be that the department was not in a position at the time—I speak again subject to correction—to supply its needs. In other words, the tenders were called for for the season 1931-32, prior to the opening of the mine. But now that we are in a position to meet those requirements, there is no reason why the coal should not be supplied to the agency from the mine provided it is suitable coal for their requirements.

I asked my officials to wire the agent [illegible] why tenders had been asked for when we had a coal mine of our own, in order to see if I was generally correct in my statement, and the following telegram was sent:

Question raised in house as to why department did not use coal mined from reserve for agency purposes instead of purchasing by tender. Is Blackfoot coal not suitable for agency purposes? If it is, can it be used in the future? Explain fully. Rush reply.

To this the following answer was received:

A. S. Williams,
Acting Superintendent General Indian Affairs,
Ottawa.

Tenders for agency coal awarded last August. Blackfoot coal mine not open until October. Coal from Blackfoot suitable and could be used in future if mine under supervision. Without supervisor we cannot rely on supplies.

G. H. Gooder.

I think I was generally correct in the statement I made in the house on May 2, when I said this mine was not in active operation when the agent asked for tenders for this coal. It is true that in answer to a question by the hon. member for Bow River certain figures were given showing that a certain amount of money had been spent on that mine in the two previous years. I may explain that that money was spent in the purchase of tools for the operation of the mine, and that active mining operations as such had not been carried on, the Indians simply doing a certain amount of drift mining in that area.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): There is still something to be explained in connection with this matter. The quotations mentioned by the minister, running from $7.50 for the year 1931-32, are still $1.10 higher than the tenders received by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for only twelve tons of coal delivered at the barracks. Here is evidence that $1.10 more was paid than the coal could have been procured for if tenders had been called for by advertisement. That will require some explanation. With regard to the coal mine on the reserve, that mine has been open and in operation for some four years. In 1929 the mine produced 260 tons; in 1930 it produced 600 tons, or twice the requirements of the agency, and in 1931 it produced 3,085 tons. The minister explains the fact that the agency invited tenders—of course from certain selected individuals—in August last by the statement that coal was not being supplied by the mine on the reserve. The minister says that at that time the mine on the reserve was not open and operating, but may I submit to the minister that the Midland coal mine was not open at the time either? Most of the domestic coal mines in Alberta are closed during the summer months, and in all probability at the time tenders were called for most of the mines in the Drumheller valley were not operating. The department must have had knowledge that this mine in the reserve would be producing approximately 3,000 tons that year, and it would know about the time it would require the coal. The Indians were available for labour, and in my opinion they could have supplied themselves from their own mines. When the minister is answering this question, I wish he would state if it is the general custom of the Department of Indian Affairs not to invite tenders by advertising but simply to invite one or two selected individuals to make a tender.

Mr. MURPHY: I have now before me the answer given to the question asked by the hon. member for Bow River with regard to the production of this particular mine. As I stated a moment ago the production in 1929-30 was very limited, the Indians doing a certain amount of drift mining. As the department has no one in charge of that mine at all times, the figures given are only approximately correct. In 1929 there was mined 260 tons; in 1930, 600 tons and in 1931, 3,085 tons. The wire from the agent which I quoted a moment ago shows that this mine was not operating this year until about October. Prior to that time the agent had called for tenders to cover the requirements of the reserve, not for individual Indians particularly but for the agency buildings.

Mr. GARDINER: On whose authority?

Mr. MURPHY: I do not think any particular instructions were given this year. The agent would simply carry out the practice he had followed in other years and at a certain time of the year ask for tenders.

Mr. GARDINER: When was the coal delivered in 1931-32?

Mr. MURPHY: Some bills are dated January 5, 1931, for deliveries in December, 1930; some are dated February, 1931, for delivery in January; some are dated March, 1931, for February deliveries. I have no bills for 1931 or 1932 showing deliveries last winter.

Mr. GARDINER: When were the tenders called for the 1930-31 supply?

Mr. MURPHY: Tenders were called for on August 29, 1931, and on September 26, 1930.

Mr. GARDINER: In the year when the mine was likely to be operated by the agency, why were tenders asked for so much earlier than in the previous year?

Mr. MURPHY: As I said a moment ago, no special instructions are sent out to agents with regard to the purchasing of supplies; these matters are in their hands and they carry on as a matter of business. The agent selects the time to ask for tenders.

Mr. GARDINER: Can the minister give any information as to the business qualifications of this agent?

Mr. MURPHY: I am informed that he is considered to be one of the best agents we have. His father carried on the duties of Indian agent before him.

Mr. GARDINER: What kind of coal was delivered in 1931-32, and from what mine?

Mr. MURPHY: Double screened lump coal.

Mr. GARDINER: From what mine?

Mr. MURPHY: Neither the tender forms, the abstract or the accounts give that information.

Mr. POULIOT: Has an Indian agent been appointed recently at Cacouna?

Mr. MURPHY: I have not received any advice of an appointment at that place.

Mr. DUFF: Will the minister give me an answer to my question?

Mr. MURPHY: The position at Chapel island is vacant at present.

Mr. DUFF: How long has it been vacant?

Mr. MURPHY: I am not certain as to the exact length of time, but I believe a matter of a few weeks.

Mr. DUFF: The complaint which I received is that it has been vacant quite a while. I understand that this is because there is no Conservative doctor near the reserve If there is a Conservative doctor close to the reserve I have no objection to his being appointed at a time when the Conservative party is in power, but if this position is being left vacant because there is no Conservative doctor near the reserve, then in the interests of the Indians a Liberal doctor should be appointed. My understanding is that this vacancy has existed for some months, in fact ever since a certain gentleman was appointed to the Senate. Previous to that time Senator Macdonald was the medical man in charge of this reserve, and in my opinion he was the proper man to have the job under a Conservative government, he being a good Conservative. The only other doctor there was the man who held the position before 1930, and who, no doubt quite properly, was discharged after this government came into power. It seems to me, if there is no Conservative doctor near, in the interests of the Indians, this other man should be reappointed immediately. I should like the minister to tell me exactly what the position is in regard to the matter.

Mr. MURPHY: I anticipated that when I asked the hon. member to defer his question, I would have all the information that he desires. If he will kindly wait a little longer until I get another official here, I shall be able to give him fuller information. I have a certain general knowledge of the matter, but I desire to answer his question as accurately as possible, and I shall obtain the services of the other official as soon as I can.

Mr. DUFF: It is not necessary to do that. I am quite satisfied with the minister's explanation as far as it went, and I want him also to take what I say. I said it in good faith and I think I was fair enough to say that if there was a Conservative doctor there, he should be appointed immediately. I understand there is not a Conservative doctor within a good many miles; therefore the only doctor there being a Liberal, he should be appointed without delay. The cost will not be very much, and rather than have the Indians suffer from want of medical attention, I think my hon. friend will agree with me, if my statement is correct, that doctor should be appointed immediately.

Mr. MURPHY: I am informed that the services are being performed at the present time by a doctor who is being paid on accounts, so the Indians are not suffering from lack of medical attention.

Mr. DUFF: What doctor is that and where does he live?

Mr. MURPHY: Doctor Digout.

Mr. DUFF: That is the man I should like to have appointed; he is a Grit.

Mr. RALSTON: There is another case of an Indian doctor in Shelburne county. Doctor L. P. Churchill was the Indian doctor there for a number of years and he was replaced comparatively recently by the appointment of Doctor C. A. Herbin. I asked the minister, early in the session, on whose recommendation the change was made. When the answer came down it was, according to page 389 of Hansard, "on instructions issued by the superintendent general." As reported on page 434 of Hansard, I pointed out that this was not an answer to the question, and I do not think I have had any answer since. I want to ask my hon. friend on whose recommendation the change was made.

Mr. MURPHY: The question as put by the hon. member, I think he will agree, was one based upon an assumption. It was not a direct question.

Mr. RALSTON: Well, I am asking the minister the question: was it made on a recommendation?

Mr. MURPHY: If my memory serves me correctly, yes.

Mr. RALSTON: On whose recommendation?

Mr. MURPHY: I am sorry that at the present moment I cannot recall, but I am quite willing to answer the question; I have no objection to doing so.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sure of that. I only want to point out that it has not been answered. The question was, on whose recommendation the appointment was made, and the answer, "on instructions issued by the superintendent general," is not very informative nor, I think, is it a proper answer. I should like to indicate to the minister the situation with regard to this appointment. Doctor Churchill is an ex-service man, with, I think, three years' service overseas and the military cross. He was born in the county of Shelburne; he has lived there all his life. The gentleman who has replaced him, Doctor Herbin, has lived in the county some five years and has no overseas service. I want to ask the minister the reason for the dismissal of Doctor Churchill and the appointment of Doctor Herbin.

Mr. MURPHY: This position occupied formerly by Doctor Churchill and later by Doctor Herbin is not one which carries a salary. The accounts are paid on what is know as the "call system;" that is, the agent calls in any doctor to provide the medical services for the Indians in question. It is not a regular salaried position.

Mr. RALSTON: I have not the answer yet. My question was: Why was it that Doctor Churchill's services were dispensed with and Doctor Herbin was appointed? To say that the position does not happen to be a salaried one is not any answer.

Mr. MURPHY: I think, if I may say so with all deference to my hon. friend, it is a proper answer. May I illustrate it in this way: My hon. friend in the course of his own private life may call in the services of a certain physician for his family at a particular time, and at a later date he may call in the services of another physician. Would he say, simply because he called in another doctor, that he dismissed the first one?

Mr. RALSTON: I asked simply why the change was made.

Mr. MURPHY: That was not the original question. I think I answered that a few moment ago, when I said that the recommendation had been received by the minister.

Mr. RALSTON: What was the reason given for the recommendation? The minister does not act simply on a recommendation, without some reason being given for it.

Mr. MURPHY: I stated to the hon. gentleman that I was unable to recall who made the recommendation, but I fancy I carried out the practice which has been in vogue for many years, namely, that if a responsible minister receives a recommendation from a member of this house or from someone else in whom he has confidence, to do a certain thing, it is frequently done.

Mr. GARDINER: How frequently?

Mr. MURPHY: Most frequently, may I say, and I make no apologies for taking such action. If a colleague of mine in the government or a member in this house, whom I know personally and in whom I have confidence, makes a recommendation to me, then I am prepared to act upon his recommendation.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the minister make inquiries as to the increased expense to the country caused by accepting that recommendation, or will he accept it without such inquiry?

Mr. MURPHY: As possibly the hon. member is aware, the affairs of the Indian department will be administered this year for an amount some $1,800,000 less than two years ago.

Mr. VENIOT: That is no answer.

[Mr. Murphy.]

Mr. MURPHY: Will the hon. gentleman just contain himself for a moment? Not only in this case but in all similar cases throughout Canada instructions have been issued that those who are providing medical services for the Indians at various places must have their accounts kept to a minimum, and if I am not mistaken, a certain amount has been set which they must not exceed. I can assure the hon. member that those accounts, along with those for this particular doctor's services, will be very carefully examined and kept to a minimum.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister is not quite fair to himself or to the committee. Nobody asked for a long statement with regard to the general expenditures of the department. I asked a simple question. The minister stated that it was his practice, for which he made no apologies, to accept the recommendation of anyone in whom he had confidence with regard, generally speaking, to a change of office or the administration of his department. My simple question was whether he made any inquiry as to the relative expense which would result to the public from accepting that recommendation as compared with maintaining the position as it stood before the recommendation came in. I do not think there can be any misunderstanding about that question. It has nothing to do with the million dollars at all.

Mr. MURPHY: I am quite willing to accept the lecture of my hon. friend as to the length and kind of answer I should give although I have not taken exception to the length or type of question which he has asked, and if my answer does not please him I can only express my regret. I am answering to the best of my ability and giving him the information which I thought he desired. I have nothing to withhold.

Mr. RALSTON: I am waiting for the answer, after all that.

Mr. MURPHY: So far as I am aware, no particular inquiry was made in this instance as to whether the charge for the service would be increased or not. I gave the general answer which I thought would be more satisfactory to my hon. friend, that the expenses in this case as in all others would be kept to a minimum.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend presumed to give the general practice and was laying down a rule which I have not heard stated before in this house. I was interested to know how it was that that practice applied and whether in applying it the minister makes any inquiry at all into the relative cost of accepting the recommendation as compared with the cost before the recommendation was made. In this case no such inquiry was made, I understand. Is that correct?

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to point out, Mr. Chairman, in connection with this appointment, that assuming one call is made on each Indian in the district during the year from the residences of these two men, it would cost this country, with Dr. Churchill making the calls, in view of his place of residence, $478 a year, whereas with the gentleman now appointed on this recommendation, and as I said before, not an ex-service man, it will cost $957 a year. In other words, there is an increase of nearly $500 in expenses to the department assuming that one call on each Indian is made during the year. That amounts to the statutory increase for the year of nearly seven or eight civil servants, which we found it impossible to give because of the fact that this country was so short of funds. I point out to my hon. friend now that, take it on any basis you like, the increased cost of administering his department in this case is one hundred per cent, if only one visit is made to each Indian during the year. The minister cannot justify this appointment on any ground, and if he has made other appointments on the same basis, one million dollars will be needed.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member has stated that if such and such happens, the expenses of this particular service will be increased about one hundred per cent. I submit in all fairness that the hon member has no justification for making that statement. How he can inform the committee that the expenses of this particular service are going to be increased by some eight or nine hundred dollars this year passes my comprehension. I told him in my general answer a few moments ago that in a number of cases, if not in all—and if it has not been done in all cases it will be—instructions have been given by me that these services throughout Canada must not exceed a certain amount based upon the expenses that have been incurred in previous years. I thought in stating that I was giving the hon. member the information he desired. I was not seeking to evade his question at all.

Mr. VENIOT: The medical attendance must be so and so and no more, whether the Indian dies or not.

Mr. MURPHY: No, that is not what I said.

Mr. VENIOT: That is the only inference.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member may infer that but that is not what I said.

Mr. VENIOT: It is the only inference.

Mr. MURPHY: I submit differently. The service will be provided for these Indians as it has been in the past, but the expenses for the service must not exceed a certain amount per year.

Mr. VENIOT: How are you going to regulate it?

Mr. RALSTON: I will tell the minister how I arrived at the figure. It is quite simple. There are forty Indians in that county, and twenty-two of them live in the town of Shelburne, where Doctor Churchill lived. They would be called on at $3 a call, on the basis of my hon. friend's charge. Doctor Herbin lives at Lockeport, and a call from Lockeport on an Indian in Shelburne will cost $19, or at the rate of one dollar per mile. That is how the difference is made up. But my hon. friend is so keen to carry out this practice and accept recommendations, that he will displace an ex-service man who has given good service overseas and who has lived in the county all his life, in favour of a man who has lived there only five years and is not an ex-service man; and he will make that change without any inquiry as to the relative cost. In order to complete the comparison I will give my hon. friend a table of costs right straight through for visiting all the Indians living in Shelburne county who will be attended by this doctor.

Here is the return my hon. friend gave. I will give the number of Indians resident in each particular place, and the number of miles from Lockeport, and the number of miles from Shelburne. There are nine Indians at Barrington, thirty-six miles from Shelburne. One call on each Indian from Shelburne would be $324 a year. There are four Indians in Sable River, twenty-two miles from Shelburne. One call on each Indian would be $88 a year. There are twenty-two Indians in Shelburne town. At three dollars a call by Doctor Churchill, who lives in Shelburne, that would be $66 a year, or a total of $478 for Doctor Churchill to call on each Indian in the county once during the year. On the other hand, Doctor Herbin lives at Lockeport, away off from the largest number of Indians, who live at Shelburne. Lockeport is nineteen miles from Shelburne, where there are twenty-two Indians, and at a charge of one dollar per mile, for Doctor Herbin to call on these twenty-two Indians once during the year would cost $418. To call on the four Indians at Sable River, eleven miles from Lockeport, would cost $44 a year. To call on the nine Indians at Barrington, fifty-five miles from Lockeport, would cost $495 a year, or a total of $957 for Doctor Herbin making one call during the year on each Indian. So I point out to my hon. friend that it is a pretty expensive practice that he has adopted of accepting recommendations from his colleagues or from people whom he considers responsible. Apart from the increased cost of administration I protest most vigorously against the replacement of a man of Doctor Churchill's standing in the community, and an ex-service man, by Doctor Herbin, who has been there a comparatively short time, and for no reason whatever so far as the minister has given any. But we can well imagine what the reason is, and it is costing this country a lot of money to carry out this parctice.

Mr. MURPHY: Again may I point out to the hon. member that he is basing his statement on figures which he himself has set up.

Mr. RALSTON: I beg my hon. friend's pardon; I am basing my statement on figures in the minister's own return.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. gentleman will please not interrupt; I did not interrupt him.

Mr. RALSTON: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. It is that my hon. friend cannot make a misstatement of that kind. I am basing my statement on a return brought down by the minister himself.

Mr. MURPHY: I think the hon. member with his long parliamentary experience knows that he is not stating any point of order, but let that pass. I stated that he was basing his figures on an estimate of his own. While it is true that the department has a certain scale of fees for certain services rendered, nevertheless these doctors have all been advised, or if they have not all yet received the advice they will in the near future, that their accounts for the year must not exceed a certain amount. I may say for the information of the hon. member that a certain doctor was appointed by myself after this government took office, and as the accounts he sent in were too big his attention was drawn to it; still they came in too big, and his services were therefore dispensed with and another doctor was appointed in his place. When the hon. member makes the statement that this change is going to cost some $900 as compared with some $400 for the previous year, he is making a statement that can be substantiated only when the returns for the year are in, showing what the services actually cost. When the hon. member makes a definite statement that the costs will be so and so, and that it will cost the country so much more, he is making a statement which, I submit, is unfair. He is basing his statement upon figures before him and not upon accounts rendered.

Mr. RALSTON: I am basing my statement upon a return made by the minister. I am pointing out some glaring instances which my hon. friend cannot get over, and which returns this year or next year or any other year will not alter. To call a doctor in the town to treat an Indian in Shelburne, where Doctor Churchill resides, would cost only $3, but to call Doctor Herbin would cost $19. Any information the minister can bring down will not change the figures. The minister says there is some limit placed upon the fees charged by the doctors. What limit was placed upon Doctor Herbin when he took office with regard to his salary or emoluments?

Mr. MURPHY: If the hon. member had been listening carefully he would have heard my statement that instructions had been sent out to the different doctors throughout Canada—if they have not yet received them, they will—to the effect that their accounts must not exceed a certain amount for the year. I am not at the present time in a position to say whether or not instructions went out to the doctor mentioned by my hon. friend. The figure will be set at such and such an amount, and this country will not have to pay the sum mentioned by my hon. friend, or anything like it.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the minister be good enough to tell me, when his estimates are again under consideration, whether a sum has been set for Doctor Herbin's services, and if so when, and the amount?

Mr. MURPHY: I am informed that the figure has been set at $20 a month.

Mr. RALSTON: I wish to put on record a question I asked and the answer thereto as it appears in Hansard for the present session at page 389:

> Is the present incumbent on salary, if so, how much, and if paid on a fee basis what is the scale?

The answer is:

> The present incumbent is employed on the "call system" and is paid for services rendered on the basis of the department's schedule of fees quoted in part as follows: Visits—within 3 miles, $3 per call; outside 3 miles, $1 per mile one way, to cover transportation, professional attendance and supply of ordinary remedies to all patients attended on trip; office consultations, $2 to include supply of ordinary remedies; surgical operations, as detailed in the schedule, etc.

In that answer there is not one word about a limit of any kind or description.

Mr. DONNELLY: It seems utterly ridiculous to limit the amount paid to a doctor each month. Is the government going to prevent the Indians from being sick or if they are sick will the government let them die without calling in a doctor? I did some work for the Indians two years ago, and I had some experience in this practice of cutting down fees. The department did not wish to spend too much. I have been called out to see Indians suffering from pneumonia, and then the Indian agent would tell the person in charge of the patient when I could be called in again. The result was that probably I would never hear from them again, or would be called to write out a death certificate. If the Indians are going to be sick they have to send for a doctor; the government or nobody else can say when they are going to be sick, how often they are going to be sick or how often they may need a doctor.

Mr. VENIOT: Oh, this government can.

Mr. DONNELLY: Oh, can they? The whole thing seems ridiculous.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Can the minister tell me why the services of Doctor J. B. Cloutier of the Roseau River Indian reserve were dispensed with? Was it for the reason expressed by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough, namely that when a Conservative government takes office all the Grits are thrown out?

Mr. MURPHY: I did not hear the hon. member's question.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Why in the month of January 1931 were the services of Doctor J. B. Cloutier dispensed with?

Mr. MURPHY: I am informed Doctor Cloutier was paid on the call system.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I believe that is correct.

Mr. MURPHY: As I said a minute ago, when I received a recommendation from a colleague or from some one in whom I had confidence that the services should be performed by a certain doctor or individual, I acted on that recommendation. While I have not the particulars before me, I assume that was what was done in reference to Doctor Cloutier.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Will the minister tell me that one of his colleagues in the house from the province of Manitoba has told him that another doctor should replace Doctor Cloutier? Would he show me any correspondence to that effect from one of his colleagues in the government, or from one of the back benchers, in which class the Minister of Agriculture has qualified himself? Did such a man give him a letter, or ask him to dismiss Doctor Cloutier?

Mr. MURPHY: I have stated as clearly as my English would allow that I acted on the recommendation of a colleague, or one in whose judgment I had confidence. I have no letter from a colleague or a member of this house before me to-night in regard to that particular individual. I have confidence, however, in the judgment of a great many men who are not members of this house, and are not my colleagues.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I think the minister would have fewer questions to answer if he did not take the recommendations of his friends who are not in the house, who have no first hand knowledge, and who probably make accusations which cannot be proven. Is it correct that the Indian agent when buying supplies or necessities for the Indians asks different people to give figures, or written tenders?

Mr. MURPHY: Generally speaking that is correct, but in isolated sections there may be only one source of supply.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am not speaking of isolated sections. It seems that certain merchants in certain towns are on preferred lists. The Indian agents ask those people to tender or to give a figure on supplies needed by the Indians. Can the minister inform me, so I may pass the information on to the merchants in my district, what procedure a man has to take to be on the preferred list?

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I should like to have an answer.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes. The agent buys supplies for the Indians in isolated communities from those who can supply or are close at hand. Certain of the larger supplies, such as bacon, tea and so on, are bought in wholesale quantities. With regard to some particular friends of his who desired to supply goods to the Indians, possibly my hon. friend had better inform them that when he can make representations such as he desires no doubt they will be carried out.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I think the minister will admit that instructions are sent out to the Indian agents to ask certain people to give a price on certain commodities needed for the Indians. Do those instructions come from the minister, or from his deputy, or from a local political organization? I want to get into the ring myself; that is all I am looking for.

Mr. MURPHY: I think the hon. member has answered his own question, he seems so familiar with a procedure which possibly he has followed himself in the past ten years I fancy that the method that is being followed now is practically the same method as has been followed for the past ten years.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: For the minister's information, I may say that I have been a member of this house since December 26, 1921, and I have yet to ask for the dismissal of one person on political grounds. I hope he will remember that and let the officials in my district alone. No politician has the right to take the bread out of the mouth of any man, whether he be blue or green.

An hon. MEMBER: Or red.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Or red.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the minister be good enough to give me the papers in connection with the removal of the Indian doctor at Shelburne? I moved for them some time ago, but they have not yet been brought down.

Mr. MURPHY: I shall be pleased to have them laid on the table as soon as possible.

Mr. RALSTON: Including the letter which limits the amount of pay Doctor Herbin is to get.

Mr. MURPHY: I do not think I stated a letter had been sent to this particular person.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand so.

Mr. MURPHY: I stated I was informed that a sum had been set not to exceed $20 a month, or $240 per year.

Mr. RALSTON: The doctor does not know it yet?

Mr. MURPHY: He may.

Mr. RALSTON: He will get a rude awakening.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Will the minister also let me have the correspondence in regard to the dismissal of Doctor Cloutier of the Roseau River Indian reserve?

[Mr. Murphy.]

Mr. MURPHY: Any correspondence which can be properly brought down I will certainly have laid on the table.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): How does it happen that these individual Indians have accounts with the merchants of the various towns, if supplies are bought under tender by the agent?

Mr. MURPHY: Tenders are asked for by the department when the goods are purchased. If an individual Indian desires to purchase goods from a certain merchant, the agent simply takes upon himself the responsibility to pay the account, if he can obtain sufficient money for the purpose out of the proceeds of the crop.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): I have in mind an Indian purchasing something on his own account, apart from the agent altogether. In that case what portion of the money does he get under his personal control?

Mr. MURPHY: He may purchase his goods wherever he likes, the same as any other individual, provided he has the cash.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Does he get some from the reserve?

Mr. MURPHY: He gets it either out of the proceeds of his crop, his treaty money, or the interest on his band fund.

Mr. POULIOT: If an appointment is made by the Civil Service Commission of one of the four candidates for the Cacouna Indian agency, will the minister be ready to accept it at once, or will he postpone its acceptance?

Mr. MURPHY: It will be a matter for consideration.

Mr. VENIOT: On September 5, 1930, Howard Brothers, supplying Indians, were notified by the superintendent or Indian agent at Fredericton to discontinue doing so. Will the minister let me know at a later date on whose recommendation the Indian agent was so instructed; and if tenders were asked for?

Mr. MURPHY: I shall be pleased to give the hon. member any information I can obtain in regard to the matter.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In connection with the question of the purchase of coal on the Blackfoot reserve, I should be glad if the minister can explain to the committee why it is that in the case of fuel supplies for the agency tenders were invited from only two firms—one of them, Mr. William McConnell, not a coal dealer at all, while the other, the Midland Collieries, is a long distance from Gleichen and from the reserve itself—when there are actually in the town no less than three regular coal dealers.

Mr. MURPHY: I have no first hand knowledge as to whether Mr. McConnell is a coal dealer or not, and no doubt the hon. member has fuller information than I have, but I have before me some of his account forms, which are headed; "William McConnell, Coal and Grain, Oils, Greases and Gasoline". This would convey to my mind at least that he is a dealer in coal. The Midland Collieries, I am informed, is one of the largest operators of coal mines in Alberta.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Why are special persons only invited to tender? Is that a proper practice to follow?

Mr. MURPHY: It has been the practice in the department, I am informed, for many years.

Progress reported.

PRIVILEGE—MR. MACKENZIE KING

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) during the sittings of the committee raised some question as to a report that appeared in this evening's papers. I am bound to say that my attention was directed to this report, and probably about the time the right hon. gentleman was speaking in the committee I was speaking to the chairman. He told me that the committee has not completed its report, that it is still meeting, that no report has been agreed upon, and that no information was given to the press by the chairman or the secretary of the committee. Obviously I have not interviewed the various members of the committee, for reasons that are apparent. I should like to assure the house that the information was not given to the press by either the chairman or the secretary of the committee, and the report is not yet completed.

That is the information I have received since the house met at eight o'clock, and I immediately convey it to the house because I think this house is entitled to receive information with regard to the report of any committee before it is given to the press.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

Monday, May 9, 1932.

The house met at three o'clock.

RADIO BROADCASTING

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO STUDY PROBLEM OF INSTITUTING CANADIAN SYSTEM

Hon. RAYMOND MORAND (East Essex): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present the second and final report of the special committee on radio broadcasting also a copy of the proceedings and evidence. Further, I wish to give notice that on Wednesday I shall move for concurrence. The report is as follows:

Monday, May 9, 1932.

The special committee on radio broadcasting has the honour to present the following as its second and final report:

In accordance with the duties and responsibilities delegated to us, and the terms of reference submitted, your committee met on March 8, and, since that time, held twenty-seven meetings, heard evidence, received briefs and submissions from fifty-three sources, including governments, individuals, corporations, associations, leagues and clubs.

Your committee was seized, from the inception, of the national importance and international character of radio broadcasting, and the evidence submitted has served to further consolidate our opinion of the far-reaching scope and benefits of proper, well-regulated broadcasting services throughout Canada, as a medium of education, thought-provoking development, and fostering of Canadian ideals and culture, entertainment, news service and publicity of this country and its products, and as an auxiliary to religious and educational teaching, also as one of the most efficient mediums for developing a greater national and empire consciousness within the dominion and the British Commonwealth of nations.

Your committee desires to express at the outset, to the present radio broadcasting stations, this tribute: That they entered as pioneers in a field of service in the art of radio, and, under trying handicaps and sacrifices, worthily kept pace with a science fraught with ever-changing improvements and development, and rendered this service under handicaps, which is most praiseworthy.

Your committee is convinced, however, that the present system, excellent as it is in certain respects, does not meet the requirements in quality and scope of broadcasting to ensure its maximum benefits.

Reference No. 1

"To consider the report of the Royal Commission on Radio Broadcasting, dated the 11th day of September, 1929, commonly known as 'The Aird report.'"

Your committee was fortunate in having the three members of the Aird commission appear before us to amplify and explain their report, and much valuable information was thereby secured, and, if we are unable to completely accept their findings, it must be obvious that there has been a great change in the science of radio broadcasting, and in the financial condition of the country, in the last three years.

Reference No. 2

"To advise and recommend a complete technical scheme for radio broadcasting for Canada, so designed as to ensure from Canadian sources as complete and satisfactory a service as the present development of radio science will permit."

Your committee recommends a chain of high-power national stations, operating on clear channels, located at suitable intervals, the location to be determined by a careful technical survey of Canada.

Your committee recommends that consideration be given to the use of five 50 K.W. stations, one in each of the following provinces of Canada, viz., British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, and, in the maritimes, three 500 watt stations, one for each province, or one 50 K.W. station, as may be determined by the commission. In Saskatchewan and Alberta, we suggest two 5 KW. stations in each province, synchronized on a common channel. Further, a 10 K.W. station in northern Ontario and one in western Ontario, a 1 K.W. station at Port Arthur-Fort William, a 500 watt station in Toronto, and a 1 K.W. station at, or near, Ottawa, Montreal and Quebec.

Your committee further recommends a number of stations, of 100 watt power and under, operating on shared channels, located where required,—

(a) To serve areas not satisfactorily covered by the national stations.

(b) For secondary stations in areas where there is a demand for several channels to be in operation at the same time.

(c) For educational purposes.

(d) For legitimate experimental work.

(e) For local broadcasting of community interest.

Your committee further recommends that the cost of radio in Canada be self-sustaining and that only the money available from transmitters' and receivers' licence fees, and advertising income, be expended, and that the question of the amount of receivers' licence fees be left entirely in the hands of the governor in council.

Reference No. 3

"To investigate and report upon the most satisfactory agency for carrying out such a scheme."

Your committee recommends that a commission be appointed, consisting of three adequately-paid commissioners; a chairman to hold office for a period of ten years; a vice-chairman for a period of nine years, and the third commissioner, for a period of eight years.

That there be appointed an assistant commissioner in each province, who shall also act as chairman of such provincial or regional advisory program committees as may be formed; the assistant commissioners to be selected in consultation with the governments of their respective provinces.

Your committee further recommends that the commission be vested with the necessary powers to carry on the business of broadcasting in the Dominion of Canada, such powers to extend to the following matters,—

(a) To regulate and control all broadcasting in Canada, including programs and advertising.

(b) To own, build and operate transmitting or receiving stations in Canada.

(c) To acquire by lease, purchase, expropriation or otherwise, any or all existing broadcasting stations.

(d) To enter into operating agreements with privately-owned stations.

(e) To originate programs, and secure outside programs by purchase or exchange, and to make the arrangements necessary for their transmission.

(f) To determine the number, location and power of all broadcasting stations required in Canada.

(g) To control the issuing or cancellation of licences to broadcasting stations.

(h) To cancel the allotments of channels to any stations, or to make substitution of channels.

(i) To prohibit the establishment of privately-operated chains of stations in Canada.

(j) Subject to the approval of the parliament of Canada, to take over all broadcasting in Canada.

(k) To be vested with all other powers necessary or incidental for the fulfilment of the objects of the commission.

Your committee recommends,—

(a) That one of the first duties of the commission be the establishment of trans-Canada chain broadcasting through the securing of the necessary land-lines as soon as possible.

(b) That a nationally-owned system of radio broadcasting be instituted, and that all stations required for its proper organization be eventually acquired, same to be financed from the revenues accruing to the business of broadcasting, without expense to the taxpayers through the public treasury.

(c) That all stations, 100 watt and under, not required for the national system, remain under private ownership, but be regulated as to programs and advertising, by the rules of the commission.

(d) That all revenues obtained from licence fees, sale of advertisement, and other revenues accessory to the business of broadcasting, be used by the commission in the interest of radio.

(e) That advertising be limited to not more than 5 per cent of each program period.

(f) That the developing of Canadian art and artists, and the securing of outstanding programs from outside Canada, be encouraged.

(g) That the commission make available to the provinces, when possible, the facilities of national and chain broadcasting.

(h) That the commission make special effort to give such programs as will be acceptable to provincial and local requirements.

(i) That before making changes in Canadian radio broadcasting, the commission makes a complete survey of the present system, with particular reference to adequate coverage.

We desire to call attention to the extreme importance that the commission should not assume, or even be suspected of assuming, a political complexion. Your committee append hereto a copy of the proceedings, and evidence adduced before your committee, for the information of the house.

All which is respectfully submitted.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The report tabled contains a recommendation for a technical scheme of broadcasting—pursuant to the terms of reference—which involved the employment of an increased number of channels of prescribed power, located within certain areas.

One of the outstanding difficulties in the establishment of a national system of broadcasting is that of coordinating the channels to be used with those used by neighbouring countries. Because of Canada's proximity to the United States, where a highly developed system of broadcasting prevails, this question of coordination and adjustment becomes one of peculiar importance. Having regard to this situation, and with a view to determining whether this recommendation of the committee could, in fact, be implemented without involving interference which would make it ineffective in practice, the chairman asked me, as Minister of External Affairs, to ascertain from the United States government if it was prepared to make such adjustments of channels in the broadcast band as would ensure the effective operation of the scheme. Thereupon, I requested the Canadian minister to initiate negotiations to that end. The notes which I shall read disclose the agreements which have followed upon these negotiations. I have only to add that the note of the United States government manifests a friendly desire to facilitate the effective development of the national project recommended by the committee.

The note from the Canadian minister to Mr. W. R. Castle, the Acting Secretary of State, Washington, dated Canadian Legation, Washington, May 5, 1932, reads:

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Canadian House of Commons recently appointed a committee to enquire into the whole position of radio broadcasting in Canada. This committee has under consideration a technical scheme for broadcasting in Canada which it is considered will provide satisfactory coverage in the chief population areas throughout the dominion and at the same time make provision for the community service that may be desired. This scheme is divided into two distinct parts:

(a) A chain of high-power stations, operating on clear channels, and located at suitable intervals across Canada:

(b) A number of low-power stations of very limited range, operating on shared channels, and located as required for community service.

If this scheme receives the approval of parliament, it is proposed to use 50 K.W. stations, one in each of the provinces of British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, and eventually one in the maritime provinces. In Saskatchewan and Alberta it is proposed to use 5 K.W. stations at present, two being used in each province, synchronized on a common channel. In Ontario there will be, in addition, two 10 K.W. stations, one in western Ontario and one in northern Ontario. Four smaller stations of one K.W. capacity each are provided for the Port Arthur-Fort William area, and for Ottawa, Montreal, and Quebec. In the maritimes, three 500-watt stations are provided for the present, one in each province. The scheme also includes a 500-watt station on the shared channels for the city of Toronto for local service.

In adopting this plan, Canada would reserve the right to increase the power of the stations in Alberta, Saskatchewan, northern and western Ontario to 50 K.W. each, should such increase become necessary.

The committee, in addition to considering the power required, propose the following channels as suitable for the main stations:

	K.C.
Prince Edward Island	630
New Brunswick	1,030
Nova Scotia	1,050
Quebec	930
Montreal area (1 K.W.)	600
Montreal area (50 K.W.)	730
Ottawa	880
Toronto area (500 watt)	1,120
Toronto area (50 K.W.)	690
Western Ontario	840
Northern Ontario	960
Port Arthur-Fort William area	780
Manitoba	910
Saskatchewan	540
Alberta	1,030
British Columbia	1,100

In order to ensure satisfactory local broadcast service throughout Canada, it is proposed that stations, limited to a maximum power of 100 watts, be erected where necessary, and that they should be operated on shared channels. It is considered that one hundred or more such stations may eventually be required in Canada, and that twenty channels should be available for this type of service. In establishing such stations, it is proposed to maintain the same geographical separation between Canadian and United States stations as is maintained between United States stations of the same power.

Due notification would, of course, be given of the effective dates of any changes in the present operation to conform with the above plan.

In the event of the adoption of the above arrangement, it is understood that if, as the result of the Madrid conference, any additional channels are made available for broadcasting, a further allocation will be made, as between the United States and Canada, on an equitable basis.

I shall be obliged if you will inform me at your early convenience whether the United States authorities can make the necessary readjustments so that these channels will be available for effective use in Canada.

I have the honour to be,
with the highest consideration,
Sir,
Your most obedient,
humble servant,
(Sgd.) W. D. Herridge.

To which Mr. Castle, Acting Secretary of State, replied under date of May 5, 1932:

Sir,—

I am grateful for your courtesy in informing me by your note of May 5, 1932, of the technical plan which is being considered by the committee of the Canadian House of Commons as a means of providing Canada with satisfactory radio broadcasting coverage. You inquire whether the authorities of the United States can make the readjustment necessary to render certain channels available for effective use in Canada.

In reply, I am glad to inform you that as notice is given from time to time of the dates of changes to be made in the present operations of Canadian broadcasting stations to conform to the plan set out, this government will be glad to make the necessary readjustments.

It is understood that, if as the result of the Madrid conference, any additional channels are made available for broadcasting, a further allocation will be made, as between the United States and Canada, on an equitable basis.

Accept, sir, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

W. R. Castle,
Acting Secretary of State.

ARMS AND AMMUNITION

APPROVAL OF CONVENTION FOR SUPERVISION OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE IN MUNITIONS AND IMPLEMENTS OF WAR

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the international convention for the supervision of the international trade in arms and ammunition, Geneva, 17th June, 1925, signed on behalf of Canada by the Hon. Raoul Dandurand on the 22nd September, 1925, and that this house do approve of the same.

He said: The international convention for the supervision of the international trade in arms and munitions together with a declaration regarding the territory of Ifni, was drawn up at a conference held in Geneva on June 17, 1925, at which Canada was represented by W. A. Riddell, the Canadian government advisory officer, Geneva.

The convention will enter into force four months after fourteen ratifications have been deposited by the signatory governments with the government of the French republic. So far, thirty-seven countries have signed the convention and thirteen ratifications have been received, but the majority of these are contingent upon ratification by the producing powers. Of the latter, the following have not yet ratified the convention: Austria, Belgium, Czecho-Slovakia, Germany, Italy, Japan and the United States of America. His Majesty's governments in the United Kingdom and in Australia have made their ratification contingent upon ratification by all producing countries.

The convention was signed for Canada by the Hon. Raoul Dandurand, on September 22, 1925. At this point it might not be inappropriate to read the opening of the convention:

Germany, the United States of America, Austria, Belgium, Brazil, the British Empire, Canada, the Irish Free State and India, Bulgaria, Chile, China, Colombia, Denmark, Egypt, Spain, Esthonia, Abyssinia, Finland, France, Greece, Hungary, Italy, Japan, Latvia, Lithuania, Luxemburg, Nicaragua, Norway, Panama, the Netherlands, Persia, Poland, Portugal, Roumania, Salvador, Siam, Sweden, Switzerland, the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes, Czechoslovakia, Turkey, Uruguay Venezuela,

Whereas the international trade in arms and ammunition and in implements of war should be subjected to a general and effective system of supervision and publicity;

Whereas such a system is not provided by existing treaties and conventions;

Whereas in relation to certain areas of the world a special supervision of this trade is necessary in order to render more effective the measures adopted by the various governments as regards both the import of such arms and ammunition and implements of war into these areas and their export therefrom; and

Whereas the export or import of arms, ammunition or implements, the use of which in war is prohibited by international law, must not be permitted for such purpose;

Have decided to conclude a convention and have accordingly appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The various persons representing the countries I have named.

Who, having communicated their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed as follows:—

The first article deals with arms, ammunition and implements of war exclusively designed and intended for land, sea or aerial warfare. A description of what is included in that category is found at page 4 of the convention. It divides itself into twelve heads. Probably it would be inappropriate to take up the time of the house in reading them, but roughly they cover all forms of destructive implements and ammunitions, commencing with rifles, muskets and carbines and closing with tanks and armoured cars, and "arms and ammunition not specified in the above enumeration".

Then the convention deals with arms and ammunition capable of use both for military and other purposes. That is, it may be used for more than one purpose. Then it deals with vessels of war and their armament; then, with aircraft, assembled or dismantled, and aircraft engines. In category V we find gunpowder and explosives, except common black gunpowder, and arms and ammunition as specified. There is provision as to the supervision and publicity, the relative portions of chapter II reading as follows:

1. The export shall be for a direct supply to the government of the importing state or, with the consent of such government, to a public authority subordinate to it;

2. An order in writing, which shall be signed or endorsed by a representative of the importing government duly authorized so to act, shall have been presented to the competent authorities of the exporting country. This order shall state that the articles to be exported are required for delivery to the importing government or public authority as provided in paragraph 1.

Then there are further provisions looking towards the ultimate cessation of production of these weapons of war. I do not suppose however that the house desires me to read those provisions at length. Sufficient to say that having been carefully considered and signed by our representative in common with the representatives of the other countries I have mentioned, it only becomes effective if as and when the ratifications I have mentioned are made by the producing powers. As a matter of fact all the producing powers have not yet signified their approval, but at this time the matter becomes important by reason of the fact that the disarmament conference is sitting, and it was thought desirable that Canada should not longer await the action of other countries to take the steps I now suggest.

The real truth is that this convention has its origin in the covenant of the League of Nations. It will be recalled that article 23 of the covenant provides:

Subject to and in accordance with the provisions of international conventions existing or hereafter to be agreed upon, the members of the league . . . will entrust the league with the general supervision of the trade in arms and ammunitions with the countries in which the control of this traffic is necessary in the common interest.

On September 10, 1919, before the league had been able to take up the question, a convention for the control of the trade in arms and ammunitions was signed at St. Germain; the object of this convention was to ensure that the large stocks of war material accumulated by the various belligerents should not find their way into unsettled areas where they might give rise to trouble. These areas included, particularly, the greater part of Africa and certain regions in Asia, such as Arabia, and the shores of the Red sea and the Persian gulf. The provisions of the convention were stringent. No exports of arms to non-signatory powers was to be permitted and a measure of control under the league of nations was established. This convention, however, proved abortive, mainly because of its non-ratification by the United States who objected to control by a league of which she was not herself a member and to the prohibition of the sale of arms to non-contracting countries.

For several years the league endeavoured to secure the ratification of the convention by the United States and by other countries, but in September, 1923, the fourth assembly accepted the fact that no further progress in the matter was likely and it instructed the temporary mixed commission—a commission consisting of a number of individuals, and not representatives of states—to prepare a new convention in such a form as might be acceptable to the governments of all countries which produced armaments and they invited the United States to cooperate in this work. The temporary mixed commission prepared a draft which was accepted as a basis for discussion at an international conference which met in Geneva on the 4th of May, 1925. The convention that I have mentioned was the result, and was prepared for signature, on the 17th of June, 1925. As I have just indicated, it has forty-one articles and is divided into five chapters, the object being to establish a general system of supervision and publicity for the international trade in arms and munitions and implements of war, and a special system is set up for areas where measures of this kind are generally recognized to be particularly necessary.

I think I have sufficiently indicated the general purpose of the convention. The summing up of the result of the convention was made by the president of the conference, M. Carton de Wiart of Belgium, in these words:

> We are able to present the world with a solid structure not built in the clouds, but founded upon the rock of solid realities. The reduction of armaments is not yet achieved, but an important step has been made towards it. For the first time, to use the apt expression of M. Paul-Boncour, the trade in arms is removed from the domain of private law and enters that of public law.

As it now stands the convention has been signed for thirty-seven countries but, as I have already indicated, it has been ratified by but thirteen, and of the countries ratifying it six have made their ratification subject to as yet unfulfilled conditions. The confident hope expressed by the president of the conference seven years ago has not yet been fulfilled, but it should not be said that any part of the responsibility for its failure to enter into force rests upon the Dominion of Canada.

We have not hitherto ratified the convention because independent and isolated action in this field seems futile. Concerted and simultaneous action by the great armament manufacturing countries is not only desirable, but fundamental. If the convention were to enter into force individual governments could hardly be expected to bind themselves to abstain from profitable traffic unless their competitors accepted a similar self-denying ordinance. In these circumstances it seems desirable that Canada should ratify the convention subordinating its ratification to the same condition as that made by His Majesty's governments in the United Kingdom and Australia, that is, the instrument of ratification would include a statement on these lines:

> This ratification is subject to the reservation that it shall not take effect until ratifications of the convention shall have become effective, in accordance with article 41, in respect of Austria, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Germany, Italy, Japan, and the United States of America.

Being, in the language of the convention itself, the great munitions and ammunition producing countries.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what the Prime Minister has just given to the house except to say that, so far as the opposition are concerned, we are in accord with the government in thinking that this convention should be approved by parliament without further delay.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT moved:

> That a message be sent to the Senate informing their honours that this house has adopted a resolution approving the international convention for the supervision of the international trade in arms and ammunition, Geneva, 17th June, 1925, signed on behalf of Canada by the Honourable Raoul Dandurand on the 22nd September, 1925, and request that their honours will unite with this house in the approval of the above-mentioned convention; and that the Clerk of the house do carry the said message to the Senate.

Of course, as I made it apparent to the house, this is subject to the reservation I have just mentioned when the ratification is exchanged.

Motion agreed to.

THE LATE PRESIDENT DOUMER

EXPRESSION OF SYMPATHY WITH THE REPUBLIC OF FRANCE

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house will agree that it is altogether fitting that before we engage in the business of the day we should pause to express our very sincere and heartfelt sympathy with the Republic of France—a great and friendly power from whose shores the ancestors of so many Canadians sailed centuries ago—in the loss of a well-beloved president, Mr. Paul Doumer, who so tragically met his death by the bullet of an assassin.

President Doumer had celebrated his seventy-fifth birthday and was beloved and revered by all the citizens of the republic. It was, therefore, through no animosity to the man or to revenge a personal grievance that the assassin destroyed so precious a life; nor does it appear to have been the result of a plot planned by an organization to take the life of a great public servant. It was apparently the act of one who in brooding loneliness conceived the idea of assassinating the head of the state and thereby creating confusion and dstrust from which he hoped benefit would accrue to his own country. In view of the repercussions of the act of an assassin in Serbia in June, 1914, one can readily understand the reasons why such hopes might be entertained.

President Doumer had a varied and successful career. He was the architect of his own fortunes and had risen from humble beginnings to become the chief citizen of the republic by the sheer force of his ability and character. In the world of business as well as politics he achieved success without the aid of any of those adventitious circumstances to which public men in the older countries are so frequently indebted. His rise in public esteem was not meteoric. He served in the chamber of deputies, of which he ultimately became the president. He was Governor General of Indo-China for five years, and added to his reputation by the wisdom and prudence of his administration. He was twice Minister of Finance. During the war four of his sons gave their lives for their country. He was elected to the Senate, and it was while president of that body that he was chosen to be the chief executive of the French republic. Although but a short period president, his charm of manner, the benevolence of old age, the sorrow he had endured, and his simple, exact life and democratic conduct of the great office which he held secured for him the affectionate regard of the French people. A lover of peace, a devoted friend and benefactor of those who had survived the conflict of the Great war, as I have said, he was beloved as a man of the people who interpreted to them the genius of his race.

Canadians of all races and creeds, mindful of the ties of sentiment, both ancient and recent, that connect the national life of our dominion with that of the Republic of France, will sorrow with their citizens in the loss of the distinguished head of their nation, and extend to them the sincere sympathy that springs from long and devoted friendship.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the opposition I should like to join warmly with the Prime Minister in what he has just expressed of appreciation of the character and high attainments of the late President of the French republic, and of the great personal and family sacrifices made by him; and also in what the Prime Minister has said on behalf of the government and people of Canada to the government and people of France by way of sympathy in their great national bereavement. The crime to which reference has been made has shocked the entire world, but I think we can honestly say that in no portion of the globe has that crime served to bring forth a truer expression of sorrow or more genuine sympathy than in this country, which in addition to bonds of friendship is united so strongly by ties of race and language to the Republic of France.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): On behalf of the group in this corner of the house may I be permitted to join with the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition in expressing to the people of France, our sorrow in their great loss.

DEPORTATION CASES

ARRESTS AND PROCEEDINGS UNDER PROVISIONS OF IMMIGRATION ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) to two facts that have come to our notice since we discussed the question of these deportations the other day. The first is that it is stated that the warrants on which these men were arrested were signed on December 5. On the basis of that statement I should like to ask if it is the custom in the Department of Immigration to issue these warrants to the police in blank, to be used by them at their discretion. It does seem to us, who are not familiar with these matters, that this is not a very proper procedure. The other statement is that the instructions for the hurrying away of these men from Winnipeg to Halifax were issued by the commissioner of police in Ottawa. Certainly these two facts bring the matter under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Justice, though the other day we seemed to attach all the blame to the Minister of Immigration.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): When a request is made by the Department of Immigration for a warrant to take any person into custody, I do that as a ministerial act; I grant the request. That is the only knowledge I have of the matter.

Mr. BROWN: What about the instructions from the commissioner of police to hurry the men away?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is attended to entirely by the Department of Immigration. The act provides that these men shall be taken into custody on a warrant signed by the Minister of Justice, and when I receive such a request I grant a warrant purely as a ministerial act.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): On March 14 last an order of the house was passed for a copy of all correspondence in connection with expenditures made by the New Westminster harbour commissioners under a loan authorized by the house last year. I should like to ask the minister when I may expect that return.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): When the order of the house was issued the request was forwarded to the New Westminster harbour commission, and I am told that since then we have repeated that request two or three times. Recently a wire was sent asking for the information, which we expect to receive any day now.

Mr. REID: The reason I am asking is that this loan was made under the authority and supervision of the Department of Marine, and I should think a copy of those expenditures would be on file in Ottawa.

Mr. DURANLEAU: We did not receive any report with regard to the expenditures; the loan only was authorized by this house.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES RESPECTING MEASURES TO RELIEVE DISTRESS

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 72, respecting relief measures.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is the fourth measure to be introduced by the present administration, since coming into office, with respect to unemployment relief. The first was the Unemployment Relief Act of 1930; the second was the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act of 1931, the third was the measure passed a little earlier in this present session, known as the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act of 1931. The present measure is designated as the Relief Act of 1932.

These various measures have had one characteristic in common; each has departed more widely than the previous one from the observance of the rights and powers of parliament in the matter of legislation, and in turning over those powers to the governor in council. The first measure named the large sum of $20,000,000 for the purposes of unemployment relief, and that sum was appropriated in very general terms. The period for which that amount was appropriated extended beyond the period of the fiscal year. In those three particulars, in the failure to limit the time for which the amount was voted, the failure to designate specifically the particular purposes for which the money was voted, and the giving to the governor in council of a more or less free hand in the expenditure of public money, over which parliament had little or no control, the legislation was subversive of the rights of this house.

The next measure went a step further by according to His Excellency in council the power to legislate with respect to peace, order and good government. When the present resolution was introduced, I mentioned that fortunately, and, I believe, wholly, as a result of the strong representations that were made by the opposition against the government usurping the powers of this house in the matter of legislation, that particular provision had not found its way into the measure now before us. But there is a new feature in this measure which will come as a great surprise, especially to those who may not have studied the bill with care. It is that the powers which are given to the governor in council—and they are very extensive, going much beyond the mere relief of unemployment—may be exercised notwithstanding the existence of any statute or law. I must confess that I think this is going very far indeed, particularly, when by reading the provisions of the act itself, it is apparent, as I have said already, that the measure relates not merely to the relief of unemployment but also to matters affecting the credit of Canada, even going the length of giving the governor in council power to give financial assistance and guarantees to corporations. That power is a very large one, and who is there who can say to what lengths it may be exercised. The fact that the proposed legislation states that it may be exercised notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law makes one rather wonder whether all legislation that has been passed by parliament in the past for the protection of the people is not, as far as this provision goes, being wholly over-ridden by the powers we are now asked to confer upon the governor in council.

I have spoken so often of the subversive character of legislation of this kind, that I do not think it necessary to repeat at this time what has been previously said, but by way of emphasis I should like to draw attention to the language of the preamble, which demonstrates as clearly as words possibly could the difference in point of view between those of us who have been opposing certain provisions of the several relief measures that have been brought in, and the government which has sponsored them. There has been no difference between us as to the principle of voting unemployment relief. We on this side from the outset have held that we were prepared, subject to the government advising us that in their opinion certain sums of moneys were necessary for relief purposes, to vote those sums as speedily as could be reasonably expected. We have recognized the necessity of federal relief in an emergent situation, such as exists at present, and we have been prepared to accept the government's word, upon its responsibility, as to the amount which might be necessary to meet the situation. But we have insisted that the government should give some statement to parliament as to the amount necessary, and specifically to designate, as far as might be possible, the objects on which public moneys were to be expended under the act.

May I read the preamble which, while it has little or no value as part of the enactment, nevertheless helps to disclose in terms the intent of the government in regard to the legislation:

Whereas by reason of the prolonged world wide economic depression, recovery to a more normal economic condition has been retarded in the Dominion of Canada; and whereas the provinces require assistance in carrying out necessary relief measures and to meet financial conditions as the same may arise; and whereas it is in the national interest that parliament should support and supplement the relief measures of the provinces and grant them financial assistance in such manner and to such extent as the governor in council may deem expedient; and whereas it is necessary to make special provisions to deal with the situation in the national parks of Canada and in the drought stricken areas of the province of Saskatchewan; and whereas for these and similar purposes the powers necessary to insure the speedy and unhampered prosecution of such relief measures and the maintenance of the credit of the Dominion and the provinces thereof should be vested in the governor in council: Now, therefore, His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

The clause in the preamble to which I wish to direct attention particularly is the one which reads:

And whereas it is in the national interest that parliament should support and supplement the relief measures of the provinces and grant them financial assistance in such manner and to such extent as the governor in council may deem expedient.

I cannot more clearly bring out what we on this side have in mind than by saying that the government in that statement has mistaken the functions of the governor in council and of parliament respectively. A correct statement of the constitutional position would be that the governor in council, in a matter of this kind, should act in accordance with the wishes of parliament rather than that parliament should act in accordance with the wishes of the governor in council. May I re-read the paragraph as it is, and then as I think it ought to read:

It reads:

And whereas it is in the national interest that parliament should support and supplement the relief measures of the provinces and grant them financial assistance in such manner and to such extent as the governor in council may deem expedient.

The paragraph should read:

Whereas it is in the national interest that the governor in council should support and supplement the relief measures of the provinces and grant them financial assistance in such manner and to such extent as parliament may deem expedient.

Parliament is the body that must decide what is expedient and what should be done, and any power the governor in council may have must be derived from parliament. But here is a statement in the king's English to the effect that it is not parliament that shall decide what ought to be done, and which gives to the governor in council power to act with an authority with which parliament alone is vested. In other words, when this clause is read in conjunction with the main enactment of the measure, which gives the governor in council power at his discretion to take from the consolidated revenue fund whatever moneys may be necessary for the purposes of the act, parliament becomes simply the endorser of a note which the governor in council may make to any amount for the purposes named in the legislation.

If that is not subversive of the powers of parliament, I cannot imagine anything that is; and when we consider that it relates to vast expenditures of public moneys over which obviously parliament should have complete control, we see how entirely subversive of all the legislative rights and powers of parliament it is.

May I go a step further and direct the attention of the house to another clause of the preamble:

And whereas for these and similar purposes the powers necessary to insure the speedy and unhampered prosecution of such relief measures and the maintenance of the credit of the Dominion and the provinces thereof should be vested in the governor in council.

I submit that the powers that are necessary to ensure the maintenance of the credit of the Dominion and of the provinces are powers which are vested, under the constitution, in this parliament, and that they should not, and legally cannot by any enactment of this house, under our constitution as it stands, be transferred, in the words of any statute, to the governor in council, and vested in that body.

A great deal has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to the supremacy of parliament. They have argued, and I think quite sincerely from their point of view, that parliament is supreme and can make any enactment it pleases. In a broad sense, I admit that unequivocally. But I do submit that there is one difference between the supreme power of the parliament of Canada and the supreme power of the parliament of Great Britain, where the words relating to supremacy would apply without limitation, and that is that in so far as Canada is governed by a written constitution, whatever supreme powers this parliament may have are limited by the terms of that constitution. The constitution may be amended so as to alter or amplify existing powers but so long as they are set forth in specific terms as they are, we are bound by them. In Canada, we are governed, in the main, under the provisions of the British North America Act. Parliament has not the supreme power to go contrary to any provision that is set forth in that act. The British parliament, having no written constitution, might, if it so desired, enact any measure provided it could obtain approval from the majority, and in so doing it would be acting constitutionally. But that is not equally true of this parliament. This parliament has not the power constitutionally to go beyond the terms of the British North America Act with respect to anything in which its powers may be clearly defined therein. These powers, as I have said, it may alter by having the act amended, which it has power to have done, but it is bound meanwhile by the provisions of the act as they are. In the British North America Act there is a distinct division between the legislative powers, the executive powers and the judicial powers. There is also a clear distinction between the powers of the government with respect to federal matters and with respect to provincial matters. Is there a single member of this house who would suggest that because this parliament is supreme, it would have the right to legislate on any matter coming under the head of those which are exclusively assigned to the provinces? It would be immediately asserted that we have no such powers because those powers have been assigned to the provinces. In order to bring the matter immediately into relationship with the bill now under discussion let me ask; would any hon. member suggest that powers which, under the British North America Act, with respect to legislation are especially assigned to the House of Commons, the Senate and the King's representative could by any statute of this parliament under the act as it stands be vested in the judiciary of this country? I do not think anyone would suggest that. Well, I submit that there is no more power to vest in the executive the legislative powers given under the British North America Act to the House of Commons, the Senate and the King's representative in this country than there is to vest them in the judiciary. All that this parliament can do is, within the limits of its legislative powers, to give certain rights to the governor in council in the nature of administrative powers, but not powers to legislate in the sense in which that power is specifically assigned to parliament by the act. It is the fact that in this proposed enactment the government is taking to itself power not merely to administer laws passed by parliament but to legislate in the stead of parliament that causes us to take the exception we do.

What I have just said answers completely whatever hon. gentlemen opposite may say as to the rights of the majority. The majority certainly has rights that can be exercised so long as they are exercised within the terms of the constitution of a country, whether it be written or unwritten. But the majority, simply because it is a majority, has no right to go beyond the language and intent of the written constitution of the land. The same is true with respect to the application of closure in regard to enactments. Closure has a proper place with respect to measures which may be brought before parliament, namely, to see that a measure that is appropriately and properly before the house is not unduly obstructed. But the closure cannot properly be used to prevent a house of commons from seeing that the constitution itself is not being undermined by any measure that may be under consideration. It is because the most important of all the achievements under British government has been the final and complete control of the Commons over all grants that it may make, over taxation, and the right and power of the commons to follow to the last degree the control of public expenditure, that we on this side feel so strongly about not parting with so fundamental a right even, as an exception, in connection with a measure which may relate itself to so important a question as the relief of unemployment. It is not as though the relief of unemployment could not be effected by constitutional means quite as well as by unconstitutional methods; it would be all the more effective if it were carried out in a constitutional way.

There is a further reason why at this time, with the knowledge we have of the manner in which this power has been exercised in the last two years, we should be even more guarded in giving it anew to the administration. I shall not go into the different orders in council that have been passed; I shall refer to only one which has already received some discussion in the house and in the committee on railways and shipping. I refer to an order in council whereby a sum amounting to something like one and one-third million dollars was appropriated for the purchase of railway ties. We were told by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) that this was a relief measure carried out under the provisions of the Relief Act. Regarding it as a measure under the relief act, we asked for particulars as to the manner in which contracts for ties had been given, to whom the contracts were given, how much was paid and the like. We were denied by the government the right to obtain the information for which we asked. It was asked for in the form of a return; the government and its followers voted down the motion for the return, and in support of their action the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) said that this was a matter which came more or less under the control of the Canadian National Railways and that they would not wish the information we were requesting disclosed. Recently the subject came up in the committee of railways and shipping, and there the information which was refused here was asked for. The chairman of the committee, one of the government supporters, gave as his ruling that the information could not be supplied before the committee, but that it could be secured in the house. As his reason that it should not come before the committee, he stated that it could be supplied in the house, though he himself was one of the number who voted against giving the information to the house. I think I am right in saying that when the matter came before the committee the vote was very close, and it was the vote of the Minister of Railways himself which decided the matter in a way which made it impossible for it to be discussed in the committee.

Mr. MANION: May I interrupt my right hon. friend for a moment? I do not wish to interrupt him unduly, but I think he is unfairly stating the case as it came before the committee. The final vote in the committee was as to whether this information should be given. My recollection—and I am speaking from memory—is that the chairman took the attitude that the house had refused the information and the committee could not give it. The chairman gave the ruling. I did not vote at the beginning. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) called attention to the fact that I had not voted, and since I was asked to vote I voted to support the chairman's ruling.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member has just said that his impression is that the chairman gave the ruling that as the information had been refused by the house, it could not properly be given to the committee.

Mr. MANION: That is my recollection.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He further says that he voted in accordance with the chairman's ruling. Page 87 of the report of the special committee on railways and shipping indicates exactly what took place, and in a sentence or two these are the words showing what transpired:

> The Chairman: If they are under unemployment relief, I do not think we have a right to go into them. Do I understand, is it alleged that this is unemployment relief money?
> Mr. Munn: Yes.
> The Chairman: It is quite outside the jurisdiction of this committee You can get that information in the house.

What the chairman said was not that the house had refused it, but that it could be got in the house. He continued:

> I think the minister has so stated, and that the railway company was authorized out of unemployment relief funds to purchase 2,000,000 ties; and a certain sum was allocated for that purpose, but no matter under that has been referred to this committee, and it is not in this reference.

Mr. MANION: I do not think that is the opposite of what I said. I think it is what I said to this extent: that it was the ruling of the chairman that the matter was not for the committee. In his opinion it should come before the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend's remarks will appear on Hansard. His statement was that he understood that the chairman took the position the house had refused the information and it could not properly come before the committee.

Mr. MANION: That is my recollection.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As a matter of fact the chairman stated to the committee that the information could be got in the house. Surely, accepting the position as it is beyond all cavil that it has been impossible to get this information either in the house or in the committee, the only two bodies from which it is possible to obtain it, are we at this time, with that knowledge before us, to repeat what we were asked to do before this action was taken, namely, to give to the governor in council a completely free hand to make public expenditures in amounts totaling $1,000,000 at one time, when we know in advance this parliament may be deprived of all opportunity of tracing those expenditures as they should be traced to the last dollar? I may be incorrectly informed, but I believe, first of all, it is true that no tenders were called for with respect to the purchase of these ties. There is on the statutes an act which requires, with regard to the expenditure of public moneys on public works by the government, that where the expenditure runs beyond $5,000, tenders must be called for; that is a statute which has been enacted to assist in securing control over public moneys and to prevent political interference. But in this matter of the contracts, that statute has been set at nought by a subterfuge, if you like; nevertheless it is the expenditure of public money voted by this parliament for relief purposes and used as such. Moreover, it has been stated, and I imagine on fairly reliable grounds, that great pressure was put upon the Canadian National Railways to accept certain contractors. Not only was political pressure brought to the point of compelling the railway company to accept as contractors, persons who were designated and to give the contracts to them, but the contractors to whom the contracts were given were practically all immediate friends of the administration, and the railway company was simply told that those persons were to get the contracts and the contracts went to them. Not only were there no tenders, but as I say, the impression abroad is that the officers of the company had pressure put upon them to award these contracts to definite persons named by the minister himself.

Mr. MANION: I deny that there was pressure, but I will deal with the question after my right hon. friend is done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I want to make it clear that the impression that is abroad in this country at this time is that the minister himself brought pressure to bear on the officers of the Canadian National Railway Company to make them award some of these contracts to individuals whom he named and designated, and that the greater part of this one million dollars expended under unemployment relief went to pay contractors for these ties, to award them contracts which had not been the subject of tender at all. More than that, I understand that some of these contractors are men who have had nothing to do with the business of ties or lumber or timber in any form. I may be wrong in that, but I think where impressions of the kind are abroad some committee should at least have the opportunity of going into the matter very fully. That is all I will say on that at the moment, but I do say that with that example of how this one sum of over one million dollars has been dealt with by the governor in council we should hesitate, in fact, refuse altogether, if that were possible, to give to the governor in council any further discretionary powers to take out of the public treasury whatever sums it wishes for the purposes named in the act and to deal with them as it may think best.

May I mention another reason why I think at this time great caution should be taken in giving the government this power? The proposed enactment provides that its provisions shall not expire until March 31, 1933, and there is a provision that if parliament is not in session then, we shall have to wait till a subsequent parliament before we get any report upon how the expenditures have been made and as to what expenditures have been made under the act. Here again one can only surmise as to possibilities. One has heard the rumour at different times that before March, 1933, we may have a general election in this country, that after the Imperial economic conference certain bills may be brought into this house and placed before parliament for enactment, and subsequent to that session, if not before, an appeal may be made to the country. At any rate at the next session of parliament we have been promised that a measure dealing with redistribution will be brought in, and again, if I am not mistaken, there is the probability that parliament may assemble again this year in the month of October or November, that the next session of parliament will be one held partly before the Christmas recess and partly after. Now what does that mean in relation to the legislation that is before us? If by any chance, parliament should meet early or at any time in the fall and conclude its labours by the middle of March and the government should then decide to have a general election, the government will have in its possession under this legislation blank cheque authority to take from the consolidated revenue fund of Canada whatever funds it may desire for the purposes mentioned in this enactment. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite just how they would have felt if on the eve of a general election the government which was in office at the time of the last general election had got from parliament the authority of a blank cheque to expend whatever sums of money it might wish to expend during the period of a general election so long as it was possible to designate the amount so spent as having to do with unemployment relief? I do not wish to say that any such motive is in the mind of the administration, but I do say that as leader of the opposition it is part of my duty to point out all possibilities. As the Prime Minister himself has said repeatedly the lives of governments are uncertain. The lives of all of us are uncertain, and no one can say what change may come at any moment with respect to the administration of public affairs in any country. It is therefore part of the obligation of an opposition, where a possibility of the kind exists, to draw attention to it, and I am doing so for that reason and because I think it is unfortunate that a measure that has to do with a great question like unemployment relief should be so framed as even to afford the possibility of grounds for any suspicion of the kind.

But I will not go so far afield as the probability of a general election before any report is made upon this measure. We all know that within this very year a number of provincial elections are likely to take place. In all probability there will be elections in the two prairie provinces and British Columbia and possibly in one other province of this dominion. Now this legislation gives to the government power to enter into agreements with any of the provinces on this question of unemployment relief, power to make any agreement it pleases. It gives the government an absolutely free hand as respects the agreements to be made. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the proper course would be this, that the government should before this parliament prorogues, make its agreements with the different provinces and bring those agreements to this House of Commons for its approval before they become operative. That is the proper method in such cases of keeping control on the part of the commons over the expenditure of public moneys, and I say that that is done as a matter of principle in the case of most agreements that are made. We have had agreements here respecting the natural resources. No one ever thought of leaving to the governor in council the power to make whatever agreement it pleased with any province and with no obligation to submit the agreement in the first instance to parliament. But in this legislation the government is asking that we should give them power to make any agreement they please, and not submit the agreement to parliament for approval at any time. I again suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the government should reconsider this phase of the matter. There is still some little time before parliament will prorogue, and the government could and should make what agreements it deems advisable with the provinces and submit those agreements to this House of Commons for its approval before effect is given to them.

Those are only some of the objections. There are others that will be dealt with when the measure is in committee, but before concluding I want to draw attention to what seems to me, next to the fundamentally wrong and subversive method of proceeding, to be the worst feature of this measure.

The measure, in a word, is a confession on the part of the administration of complete failure to deal with the question of unemployment relief in any constructive way. It is more than that. Not only does the measure make clear that the government, although it has been in office now for nearly two years, and has been dealing continuously with unemployment relief in that time, has no policy whatever with respect to unemployment relief, but it makes plain that as a substitute for a policy the government has fallen into a condition of things which the right hon. leader of the government himself said would be deplorable and which should never exist in this country, when he was stating his views to the electorate of Canada at the time that he was appealing to the electorate for its support. This measure is clearly one which substitutes a policy of doles for any constructive policy of work. The administration appealed to the people of Canada, in so far as its appeal related to the question of unemployment, and that was its main appeal, on the ground that if returned to power work would be provided; and more than that, that there would be no dole. Nothing could be clearer than the words of the present Prime Minister in that regard. That this measure is one of doles in substitution for work cannot be denied after what the Minister of Labour himself has told us of the purposes of the government. I have asked on two occasions concretely as to whether the government was giving up entirely the providing of work out of relief moneys, and his reply each time has been that in so far as there is a program existing at the present time of works that have to be completed, naturally the government will continue to contribute towards the completion of that program, but that apart from that, the intention is that the money shall be used for relief only. He has said that the government may make loans to the provinces. He has said further that any money other than loans given to the provinces under this legislation, any money given in the form of direct contributions, will be for immediate and direct relief. In other words the contributions will be in the nature of doles. The fact that the provinces suggest that this course be taken does not justify the government in presenting such a policy to the house. The Prime Minister has said that all the provinces wanted was his government to have this blank unlimited authority to enter into any agreement he might like. Naturally they would like him to have at his disposal unlimited amounts of money to contribute to them from the public treasury. But, should the provinces be encouraged in a step which once engaged upon would be as fatal to them as it has been to this administration in the short time it has followed that course. Far from endorsing the argument that the provinces have wished a certain course to be pursued, this government should point out to the provinces how a blank cheque and unlimited authority is certain, in the long run, to be fatal to the public treasury.

As I have said, the minister has stated clearly that this government has no policy other than that of giving relief to the provinces in the form of contributions or doles. Such a policy or rather lack of policy, is in direct opposition to statements made by the Prime Minister as to what the government's policy would be in the event of his party being returned to power. I should like again to place on the record some very clear statements of policy made by the Prime Minister in the course of his appeal to the people.

At Victoria, according to the Colonist of June 17, the present leader of the government spoke as follows:

> You have my promise that if the Conservative party is returned to power that as soon after July 28, as possible parliament will be called together to deal with the problem of unemployment by providing, not doles, but work—

Then in brackets there is the word "applause". The present Prime Minister continues:

> —and that legislative action will be taken to bring about the future security of our country and the well being of its people . . . we cannot tolerate the dole. Men and women of this country want work, not charity . . . is there any excuse for Canada to have hard times if the government is discharging its duties as it should?

Then at Halifax on July 3, as reported in the Halifax Herald of July 4, he said:

> If the Conservative party comes into power on July 28, I propose at the earliest moment to call parliament together so that we may find a speedy remedy for the situation and decide on means to provide work for Canadians. Work, I said, not doles.

At Moncton, according to the Canadian Press report of July 10, the Prime Minister said:

> The Conservative party is going to find work for all who are willing to work, or perish in the attempt. It is going to call parliament at the earliest possible date after July 28 and take such steps as will end this tragic condition of unemployment and bring prosperity to the country as a whole . . . Mr. King promises consideration of the problem of unemployment. I promise to end unemployment.

Nothing could be more definite than those statements to the effect that the policy of the Conservative party would be one of finding work for everybody who needed it. Not only was that the policy, but there was a definite promise that work would be secured. In presenting this legislation to the house the government has deliberately thrown overboard any further attempt to provide work, and has gone back completely on the promises which helped to place it in office. Legislation of that kind is not worthy of the support of any hon. member in this house, and particularly of those who were returned to parliament by virtue of pledges given in the emphatic words I have just quoted.

In view of the position the government has taken, the obligation rests on the present administration to find means whereby the unemployment situation may be relieved, not by doles but by work. I submit up to the present time not only has the government failed to implement its promises in these particulars, but, what is worse, by its policies of trade restriction, trade prohibition, making trade in some commodities well nigh altogether impossible, it has made even more difficult than otherwise would have been the case the efforts of a great proportion of the people in Canada who are unemployed to find work.

If it were not for the fact that already we have stated our position so often and so emphatically I should feel that before permitting this measure to pass second reading the official opposition should continue to put forward the most strenuous efforts to bring the government to a consciousness of its limitations and its errors; to see if even yet some means of a constructive character might not be found to deal with the existing situation. Had we not expressed ourselves so often and been so often denied our requests we might try to find out whether or not even yet the government might not be willing to entrust to some commission of experts the problem of handling for the next year on behalf of the federal government the further millions which may be required for unemployment relief, especially when by its own confession the government has discovered it has not been able effectively to deal with this matter. We realize however that already the government has made it clear that even if the instrument of closure has again to be invoked every means will be taken to put through this legislation in the form now presented, for those reasons I cannot see that any useful purpose would be served by occasioning in regard to this measure a protracted debate at this stage of the session. I do say however as emphatically as words will permit, that we re-emphasize every objection we have made to this blank cheque and blanket authority method of procedure, and particularly do we express surprise and chagrin at the government's confession of incapacity and impotence in dealing with this all important question of unemployment relief as evidenced by this legislation.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of taking part in this debate. In fact, I had expected to meet people in my room, and would not have been in the house had not my right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) discussed the tie situation. However, there has been so much talk about that matter that perhaps a statement from myself, which I have given very briefly on other occasions, might well be placed before the house.

The right hon. gentleman has made a number of statements which are not correct. I do not say he has made them intentionally, but at the same time they are not according to the facts. At least some of them are inaccurate, and some carry implications which, owing to conclusions which could be drawn from them, might not only do serious damage to the Canadian National Railways but, if correct, would constitute a clear criticism of this government, not in my view, justified by the facts. For instance, he said no tenders for ties were called this year. That is quite correct but easily explained. Due to pressure from various parts of the country to the effect that the lumber men were very badly in need of work, at our request the Canadian National Railways purchased 2,000,000 ties. At first the railways took the attitude that they required no ties. In fact, if the truth is known they bought so many in the two years immediately preceding the election, at a time when my right hon. friend was leader of the government, that they were well supplied, did not require any more, and do not now require them.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It must have taken a lot of political pressure to make them buy the extra millions.

Mr. MANION: It took pressure in this way; we had representations from all over the country, with the exception of Prince Edward Island, that to relieve unemployment it would be helpful to order two million ties for which the unemployment and farm relief fund would pay. It is true that in past years tenders were called for, but no attention whatever was paid to the prices put in the tenders; for both the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific in all past purchases of ties fixed the prices themselves, as they did this year. I say now that the Canadian National fixed and are paying a lower price this year than they have in any year since 1923.

Mr. RALSTON: And for every other commodity.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps for every other commodity, but it is rather strange that although many other commodities were coming down in price until my hon. friends opposite went out of power, yet the prices of ties were holding pretty well. That is a fact. So the Canadian National Railways dealt largely with the people who had been handling tie contracts, and they let the contracts, as they have always let them in the past, without paying any attention to requests for higher prices; the Canadian National fixed the prices themselves and made the contracts themselves, and this government had nothing whatever to do with the letting of any contracts or the fixing of prices. In view of the fact, as I have said, that these ties have been secured at a price lower than any paid within the last ten years, I do not see what advantage there would have been in calling for tenders.

Mr. VENIOT: Did not the order in council fix the price?

Mr. MANION: No. The order in council stipulated a maximum price of sixty-five cents, because that was about the average price in the previous year; but the Canadian National management placed the price at fifty-two cents, which was thirteen cents lower. In fact the price this year is so low that this very day I have received from a big lumber man in Port Arthur, E. E. Johnston, a statement that he had no intention of carrying out his contract because nobody can do so this year without losing money. That is the condition brought about by the Canadian National management. I am not criticizing them for putting the price so low, but certainly neither the government nor the Canadian National Railways will lose any money at that price.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Why was it necessary to pass an order in council for purchasing ties?

Mr. MANION: I have already explained that, but perhaps my hon. friend was not listening. It was done because of requisitions from all over the country for business in the bush sections, and we asked the Canadian National Railways to buy two million ties for which the unemployment fund would pay. The order in council was simply passed to authorize us to give the Canadian National Railways out of the unemployment fund the money to pay for the ties.

Then the right hon. gentleman said that great pressure was put on the Canadian National Railways to make them take these ties from our friends. That is not correct, in fact it is absolutely untrue. No great pressure of any kind was put on the management. In a moment I will deal with the question of who got the contracts.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend say that he himself did not try to influence the management as to who were to receive those contracts?

Mr. MANION: If my right hon. friend will allow me to finish my statement. Recommendations were sent by me because people had applied to me, some of them Liberals—in fact right at this moment three Liberal members who sit behind my right hon. friend are interested in tie contracts, and not one member on this side is. I do not say that in any spirit of criticism. They are justified in being interested in tie contracts if they are in the lumber business, as at least two of them are, but we did not give—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the minister owes it to the house to bring down the names of all who received contracts, and what contracts they received.

Mr. MANION: I will bring them down for the past few years and show whether it was pressure from my right hon. friend who overruled the Minister of Railways so often.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a moment. The minister has stated that I overruled the Minister of Railways on frequent occasions. I say that statement is not correct, Mr. Speaker, and I ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. MANION: I will not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that when my hon. friend makes a statement which I say is not correct he is bound to withdraw it.

Mr. MANION: It is a question of fact.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The minister must accept the denial of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he says the statement is not correct.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that when a statement of fact is made it simply becomes a difference of opinion between us. However, if you rule that I must accept the statement I will accept it. I will bring down the evidence. The fact remains that when tie contracts were let by the late government practically none were let to Conservatives. I submit this is not a Conservative road, this is not a Liberal road; this is a national road. That is why when we got into power I did submit to Sir Henry Thornton that as of the tie contracts let in the past only about ten per cent were let to Conservatives, it was but fair that these contracts should be divided between different classes of people politically; and they were. For example, I was given a list of thirty-four contracts let in the province from which the Prime Minister comes. Of those thirty were let to Liberals and only four to Conservatives while my right hon. friend was in office.

Mr. RALSTON: You reversed that.

Mr. MANION: No. I was foolish enough in the heat of the moment to make a remark of that sort before the committee, but later I corrected it, showing that many Liberals have contracts at the present time. I gave some illustrations of this a few moments ago. Another illustration is that a Liberal organizer in St. Felix in Quebec has been given a contract. As showing the training that the purchasers of ties for the Canadian National Railways got under my right hon. friend and his government, they gave eighty-four of these contracts out of 325 or 330 this year without any consultation with me at all, and they were practically all given to Liberals.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When my hon. friend says the late government did not interfere with the Canadian National Railways he is stating what is correct.

Mr. MANION: I am afraid my right hon. friend is drawing too optimistic an inference from what I said.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Just a question.

Mr. MANION: I should like to proceed without too much interruption.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: It is just a short question.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, in the last two years since we came into power six million ties have been bought; two million this year under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, and four million last year in the ordinary way. When they called for tenders for the four million ties they got tenders for forty million, and it made it very difficult for the Canadian National management to deal with all those tenders. That is one reason why this year no tenders were called for the two million ties. While my right hon. friend and his government were in power the Canadian National Railways bought from twelve to fourteen million ties in each year.

Mr. RALSTON: More business.

Mr. MANION: Yes, for business.

Mr. RALSTON: I say "more business."

Mr. MANION: Yes. When we got into power there were twelve million ties on hand, and Mr. Vaughan before the committee said that they were using from six to seven million a year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then there was no justification for your buying an extra two million.

Mr. MANION: Absolutely correct—except to relieve unemployment; that is the only reason. The Canadian National management, I repeat, set the price this year as they set it in all years; they made the contracts, they did everything as they had done in the past—with this exception, they did not buy all their ties from Liberals, they bought from tie contractors of both parties. I do not believe it is fair under this government to buy entirely from Conservatives, any more than it was fair under the late government to buy entirely from Liberals. To the extent of at least 90 per cent the ties bought under the late government were obtained from Liberals. I will admit quite frankly that under this government half or a little more were bought from Conservatives; I say I admit that quite frankly, because I do not believe this national railway should be used, as I believe my right hon. friend used it in the last year or two before he went out of power, as a political club.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That may be very smart rhetoric, but it is no argument.

[Mr. Beaubien.]

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend may have uttered some very smart statements, but they are not facts. Another statement made by the right hon. gentleman was that he understood that many men secured tie contracts who were not tie contractors. Let me mention one or two people who secured tie contracts under my right hon. friend's government. One Boudreau, in Alberta, a bootlegger, secured a contract for 50,000 ties during the last year my right hon. friend was in power.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I say to my hon. friend, for his information, that when Mr. Boudreau obtained his tie contract he was in the tie business.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: The Minister of Railways has the floor, and unless he allows it he may not be interrupted.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it fair to make statements in this house reflecting on the character of gentlemen outside the house.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. It is not a question of privilege.

Mr. MANION: I state that according to my best information, and I believe it is correct, one Boudreau, who was a bootlegger and who was not in the tie business, secured a contract for 50,000 ties.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask my hon. friend—

Mr. MANION: No, I will not allow these interruptions. My hon. friend can make his statement later.

An hon. MEMBER: Is Boudreau a friend of yours?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, Mr. Boudreau is a friend of mine, and I am not ashamed to admit it.

Mr. MANION: I state also that an hon. member now sitting behind the right hon. gentleman, who was not then a member of the house but who was a very strong Liberal, secured contracts for 300,000 to 400,000 ties every year for five or six years when my right hon. friend was in power and I do not blame him for it in the least. He got a contract also this year. I state also that a man named Paradis, in the province of Quebec, who plays Liberal politics all the time, secured contracts for about half a million ties each year and has a contract this year.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Who is complaining about that?

Mr. MANION: My right hon. friend should not complain that some men who are not in the lumber business obtain contracts from this government when the same condition existed under his. I state also that during the time the right hon. gentleman was in office a section man obtained tie contracts, and there were various other similar cases. But I make this statement here and now, and I want it emphasized: Not one cent was lost by the Canadian National Railways, either this year or last year, through the purchase of ties. I say they set the prices; they signed the contracts and this year, so far as they are concerned, the whole amount will be paid out of the unemployment relief fund, so the Canadian National Railways will not lose one cent so far as contracts for ties are concerned. This year I believe between three hundred and four hundred contracts have been let, in every province from coast to coast with the exception of Prince Edward Island. As I have already said, some of these people were recommended to me in different ways, some by those in politics. Some were recommended by hon. gentlemen opposite, while others were recommended by clergymen who pointed out to me that their section of the country was in great need of some unemployment relief, and those people got contracts. For example, up in the north country one firm by the name of Poupore, a lumber firm, obtained a contract on my recommendation because a clergyman and some of the citizens, whose politics I do not know, came down here and laid the case before me, and I told Sir Henry Thornton that they were in need of help.

As I have already stated, eighty-four of these contracts, or in other words twenty-five per cent, were let by the Canadian National management without consultation with me in any shape or form. When I checked up the names later I found that the vast majority of them were Liberals and, as one provincial cabinet minister said, they were not only Liberals; they were fighting Liberals.

Now in regard to the prices paid for ties, I should like to give the average price each year from 1923:

	Cents
1923	74
1924	79
1925	80
1926	76
1927	72
1928	78
1929	76
1930	75
1931	64
1932	52

Apparently the Dominion of Canada is not paying an overly high price for ties, when they get them for 52 cents as compared with the previous low price of 64 cents, paid last year also under this government, while the lowest price paid under the late government was 72 cents. It would seem clear that the Dominion of Canada is not being robbed, and that no special favours are being shown Conservatives or even Liberals who secured contracts at this price. I may say frankly that no one is satisfied with regard to the tie business. Last year 40,000,000 ties were offered while only from 3,000,000 to 4,000,000 were asked for. This year all the people who wanted contracts, whether Liberals or Conservatives, protested when those contracts were not forthcoming. Seventy-two per cent of all the contracts let were for less than 5,000 ties; in other words a very large proportion of the contracts was given to settlers and small tie dealers in various parts of the country.

My right hon. friend implied in his remarks that the government at the present time has been using the Canadian National Railways in some manner, through these ties, for political purposes. Let me repeat that there has been nothing of the kind, except in this respect, that this is a national and not a Liberal road. Tie contracts should not be let only to those belonging to one particular party, and under this government they have not been let entirely to any one party; they have been divided between the two parties. I do not know that I would care to apportion the contracts or say how they were divided, but at any rate they were divided between the two parties, whereas under the late government the contracts were given to Liberals to the extent of about 90 per cent.

In regard to purchases in general, the right hon. gentleman referred to some of the evidence which has been given before the committee on railways and shipping. I do not intend to refer to more than one statement, and that is with regard to the purchases made each year, which I am going to put on Hansard. The total purchases of all materials, including materials purchased for United States lines, were as follows:

1923	$141,823,566
1924	103,175,658
1925	80,423,520
1926	88,482,180
1927	115,280,811
1928	107,185,818
1929	132,676,905
1930	103,746,949
1931	70,813,195

It will be seen that last year the purchases amounted to just more than half the total purchases for 1929. I will admit without question that part of that reduction was due to the fact that the business of the railway decreased, but some of the purchases made in 1929 look suspiciously like pre-election purchases. In that year the total purchases amounted to the greatest sum so spent in any year with the exception of 1923, when the roads were beginning to be coordinated by Sir Henry Thornton. There was not only the purchase of materials in general; there was also the purchase of dead, useless, non-paying lines in different parts of this country, practically all purchased in 1929, amounting to from $30,000,000 to $40,000,000. The late government introduced legislation in this house in 1927 providing for a $20,000,000 branch line program which was not to be completed, and which was not completed, until 1930 or 1931. That was a three year program, but in spite of that fact in 1929, with an election in sight, another branch line program was brought in amounting to another $30,000,000.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: And you voted for it.

Mr. MANION: We did not object to it, naturally, because in those days if any man dared open his mouth to criticize any measure brought in by the late government with regard to the Canadian National Railways, he was accused of attacking the national road. We had to get into power in order to find out how the Canadian National Railways were run under my right hon. friend and his followers, and to protest against the foolish and wildly extravagant expenditures on unnecessary hotels, on the Montreal terminal which was not needed at that time, on steamships that were not required and so on, amounting to tens and scores of millions of dollars, authorized in the dying years of the late government, headed by the right hon. gentleman who now leads the opposition, who in 1929 put upon the Canadian National Railways committals to the extent of $270,000,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I should like to know whether this discussion is pertinent to the matter now before the house. I am quite prepared to discuss with hon. gentlemen opposite matters pertaining to the Canadian National Railways when they are properly before us, but when my hon. friend undertakes to review the whole railway situation he might choose another time so to do.

Mr. MANION: The whole railway situation was brought up by my right hon. friend.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I was speaking of one matter only which came appropriately under unemployment relief.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MANION: My right hon. friend does not like these other matters to be discussed, because they affect him and his late government. I say that the right hon. gentleman and his party, when in power, used the Canadian National Railways as a political club and that they went far to wreck the national road by using it in such a way, by building useless hotels and making various other foolish expenditures totalling tens of millions of dollars, some of which, on the best information I can get, they forced the Canadian National management to carry through. That is the best information I can obtain. When we came into power, with all these hundreds of millions hanging around the neck of the Canadian National, we found it necessary to institute economies.

Mr. RALSTON: You started to wreck it; you are the one that started to wreck it.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend and his friends are the people who nearly wrecked it, just as they nearly wrecked the Canadian Pacific Railway in the early years of the century by permitting the construction of two transcontinental railways where one would have been ample. These conditions were brought about in the early years of the century by the Liberal party, and the position of the Canadian National Railways to-day has been made preeminently worse by the fact that my right hon. friend and his friends permitted, if they did not force, the Canadian National Railways to spend scores of millions which should never have been spent: If they had been living up to their trusteeship, not only on behalf of the people of Canada but on behalf of the Canadian National Railways, they would never have permitted some of the wildly extravagant schemes to go on that went on under their regime through the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Tell him about the two hotels in Halifax.

An hon. MEMBER: Tell him about the one in Vancouver.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth knows a good deal about the hotels in Halifax, and I should be glad to have him get up and explain how it is that the Canadian National Railways were permitted or forced, perhaps, to build a second hotel when one would have sufficed. That was done under the regime of the hon. gentleman's leader. The Canadian National was either permitted or forced to build useless hotels all over the country, such as the Saskatoon and Vancouver hotels. It was permitted or forced to build steamships which it does not require, to the extent of nearly $10,000,000 worth of shipping on the Pacific coast, which the railways are wondering now what to do with. In fact, these ships are lying at ease in the docks throughout the country and the Canadian National Railways are wondering what to do with them. That is the type of trusteeship which the right hon. gentleman and his friends displayed with respect to the Canadian National Railways during the years they were in power—a trusteeship which nearly wrecked the system and nearly ruined the country.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): It is not my intention to speak at any length on this question. I simply want to refer my hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Manion) to the fact that never until to-day in this house, when all these items were before the committee and were recommended by the committee, was there any criticism. And if I mistake not he was a member of the committee.

Mr. MANION: He was not; only part of the time.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Well, he never raised his voice in opposition. There was no opposition except on one occasion, and the honour of that belongs to the leader of the government. He was the one who raised his voice and raised it rather vehemently on one occasion.

Mr. BENNETT: Twice.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Twice, perhaps.

Mr. BENNETT: Make it three times.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): At any rate, the occasion which I have in mind was followed the next morning by criticism in the organ supporting the right hon. gentleman. It gave him a beautiful trimming for what he had said the day before.

Mr. BENNETT: And now they admit he was right.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am merely recounting history for the benefit of the Minister of Railways. Let me say that, so far as I am concerned, I deny having ever tried to influence the Canadian National Railways to do anything. I tried hard to sell them the Alberta railway on one occasion, and I had the railway sold to them over night; but the next morning they woke up and the Minister of Railways decided that it was not a profitable investment and did not make the purchase.

Mr. MANION: They have it now and they are losing millions.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They refused to buy it at that time. As a matter of fact, they could have bought it at a much lower rate than has been paid for it in recent years. My hon. friend will admit that if the railway were offered for sale to-day people would not be so keen about purchasing it.

Mr. MANION: I should say not.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Personally, I have had far more satisfaction from and more favour shown me by the Canadian Pacific Railway than I have ever received from the Canadian National Railways. Indeed, I have never asked them for any favours. What I rose for particularly, however, was to deal with the statement of my hon. friend in regard to an individual who has two or three contracts for supplying ties and who was in the lumber business—the hon. gentleman said he was not. He was manufacturing and selling lumber, and the statement that he was a bootlegger is totally unwarranted. The minister cannot point to any place in which this gentleman was ever designated as so despicable a character.

Mr. MANION: That is my information.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then I say that in all fairness the hon. gentleman should be careful about assertions of that kind. The gentleman about whom he speaks was a member of the Alberta legislature for a number of years. He was a druggist and a hotelkeeper, and he was also in the lumber business.

Mr. STANLEY: Whilst he was a member of the Alberta legislature and the keeper of a drug store during prohibition days, he was shown, before a special committee of the legislature, to be illegally handling liquor.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I remember the circumstances very well. He was filling permits on the advice of doctors, under their signature.

Mr. STANLEY: Absolutely illegally, in tremendous quantities.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not accusing my hon. friend of having granted more permits than he was entitled to; I do not know anything about it. I do know all about the investigation, however, and I know perfectly well that it was held for the purpose of trying to reflect upon the character of the gentleman in question. But I do say that no minister or member of this house has the right to rise in his place and reflect in that way upon any gentleman, no matter what may have happened, so long as he was not convicted of the offence of which my hon. friend has accused him.

So far as the railways are concerned, may I say to my hon. friend that I do not think very much will be gained by the statement that when the Liberals were in power all tie contracts went to Liberals. So far as I know, that was not the case in western Canada. It may have been the case in Saskatchewan; I do not know about that; or it may have been so in eastern Canada. But to say now that the government is handing out contracts under direct relief in the same manner is no answer to the charge that a good many people got contracts when the government was directly controlling the matter, as my hon. friend admits, except the sixty—

Mr. MANION: I did not control it at all; I deny that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am sorry; I retract that. That, however, was what I gathered from my hon. friend's remarks. Let me repeat before I resume my seat that it is unfair for any hon. member to make assertions of the kind which I have just dealt with.

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North): As a member of the committee, I wish to make one or two corrections. I am sorry I cannot effectively reply to the minister; I am not a politician. Listening to his address and the manner of its presentation, one would conclude that an election was on. The minister made the statement that in 1928 and 1929, prior to the last election, there were heavy purchases of ties and materials. That was explained by the purchasing agent quite fully in the committee, to the satisfaction I am sure of anyone who wanted to be fair. I cannot understand, therefore, why the minister should bring this up in the house and play politics when the matter was so satisfactorily explained before the committee by the purchasing agent. If hon. gentlemen will look up the records for themselves they will find that it was explained that during 1928 and 1929 demands were made for special equipment, ties and material, and that was fully explained. As regards prices, I may say that I am a lumberman myself, although I have no contract and never sold ties to Canadian National Railways. As everyone knows, prices have dropped not because there has been a change of government but the fact is that they have dropped very viciously. In the committee I asked for a list of all tie contractors. I have a partial list; I explained in the committee that I had a list of some of the contractors, and I could not understand why so many people who were in the tie business did not receive contracts while others who would not know the difference between a tie and a saw-log, were awarded contracts. Of course I did not get the information; we were voted down. The minister, both in the house and definitely in the committee, opposed the production of that information. Now in the house he plays politics. So far as I am concerned, I shall not play politics, but I like to see people stick to facts.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am going to make a very few observations in answer to the statements of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend has already spoken.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think he moved the second reading.

Mr. BENNETT: No; the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) did so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg the right hon. gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BENNETT: In the first instance, the right hon. gentleman was of the opinion that last year's relief measure did not provide for the measure itself being operative, notwithstanding the provisions of any other statute. If he will be good enough to look at chapter 58 of last year, assented to on August 3, he will find these words:

> Without restricting the generality of the terms in the next preceding section hereof, and notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law, the governor in council may—

Those are the exact words in the bill now before the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But they extend to many matters to which no reference was made in the previous enactment.

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to that. The language is exactly the same. The second point which the leader of the opposition has made is that the legislation deals with matters other than unemployment relief or relief. It is quite true it deals with questions affecting the national credit and that of the provinces.

It was thought desirable, for purposes of conciseness and availability of the statute in use that this should be done, and I see no reason why it should not. Certainly anything that has been said by the leader of the opposition does not induce one to change his opinion in that regard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Also loans to corporations.

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to that. The third point that the right hon. gentleman made was that it provides for loans to be made to corporations and certain undertakings. When I was speaking to the resolution, I explained that in the United States, on the conditions that obtained, it had been found desirable to create a corporation which was authorized to make advances to banks and other financial institutions and corporations and that corporation had a capital of $500,000,000, this amount of course being all subscribed by the United States. In fact it is provided that the money itself shall be taken out of the treasury of the United States out of any unappropriated balances, and notwithstanding that fact, it became essential, in order that the operations of the corporation might be continued, that the money should be borrowed. The bulletin of the Federal Reserve Board for April, 1932, contains a full statement of the operations of the finance corporation to date and a short summary that was published by the department gave a clear indication of just how it was proceeding with its work. I need only point out that the statute under which the corporation is incorporated provides, as I have said, for an immediate capital of $500,000,000 being available.

I have endeavoured and, I fear, not successfully, to point out to the house that there is an emergency in Canada as well as elsewhere in the world. I have tried to the best of my ability to indicate that we are living in the most abnormal conditions under which any people ever lived; that because of the failure of the first effort to rehabilitate the whole financial structure in the life of the world and consequent upon the failure of the Bank of England in September, 1931, to maintain its gold reserves, our position has become very much more difficult than it has been heretofore and that we are in the face of one of the most serious crises which the world has ever known; that Canada with its 10,000,000 people inhabiting half a continent, cannot possibly be free from the operations of the great currents that move round about us, currents that make for depression, destruction of values, almost every peril to which the financial structure of a country could be subjected. I think it is in the minds of most people that we are living in the most difficult days this country has ever experienced. I believe every thoughtful man who looks below the surface of things, realizes that never before has a greater crisis confronted the Canadian people.

In the face of those circumstances and of that crisis we have suggested that it is desirable that we should be in a position to do at least what we can to save the credit of Canada and of the provinces and of the whole life, financial and otherwise, of the dominion if the necessity arises. I trust hon. gentlemen realize that other countries some in one way and some in another, are taking the steps we propose to take. I suppose it is in the minds of most who read the papers the other day that the Chancellor of the Exchequer in England set aside a sum amounting to several hundred million dollars for the purpose of protecting exchange. Why? Because the life of Great Britain was threatened nationally and financially, and he desired to protect the structure. The United States is acting in another way. Some countries are repudiating their obligations entirely, and with respect to their external debts they say: We shall not pay. And they are not paying. For instance, on Saturday last the securities of a South American republic that sold its bonds at a high price during the last two years, stood at $4 for a $100 bond although the interest rate was six per cent. I give that as an illustration—and I can mention many—of the fact that on these two continents, the North and South American, we have a very acute situation, one which is accentuated so far as Canada is concerned, by reason of our juxtaposition, our geographical location to the greatest population inhabiting one area in the world, that population experiencing a condition which is certainly much more difficult, they say, than ours, and however much it may be that hon. gentlemen opposite deprecate the actions we have taken, belittle the efforts we have made, and scoff and scorn at what we have endeavoured to do, the fact remains that in the minds of others who are keen and shrewd observers, this country has done very well up to the present. In fact, there are those who think it has done as well as, if not better than, any other country in the world.

It may be that misery loves company; it may be desirable to say that all the world is in the same position as Canada, and Canada is in the same position as all the world; but to state this is just a common, ordinary everyday fact, and if the measures we suggest fall short of meeting the situation, then indeed we would be blamed. If the measures which we suggest have so far met the situation fairly—I do not say transcendentally—better than was to be hoped for, then I think we are at least warranted in asking parliament to enable the government to continue to discharge its functions to the best of its ability. What the leader of the opposition has said is that the government finds itself unable to grapple with this, that or the other problem. When I hear those statements made and I am reminded of the situation that confronted us in June and July, 1930, I wonder if this is the day of Rip Van Winkle, when men who have been asleep have suddenly wakened up and cannot realize the tremendous world changes that have transpired meanwhile. This government is always willing and ready to accept its responsibilities and to carry them out. But when conditions have changed, when such a crisis as the world has ever known is upon us, I say it is neither fair not does it appeal to the people of this country for a single minute to make comparisons of that kind. What is more, every day brings communications to one member or another of this government, barely a day goes by that I do not personally receive communications from people asking, when they knew this measure was before us, how otherwise could we proceed?

I am not going to labour the point. I have already dealt with it to the best of my ability. I have endeavoured to impress on my fellow-Canadians the gravity of the situation and the extent of the crisis that confronts this country. Hours and days have been taken up in discussing the resolution on which this bill is based. Now we have once more paraded in this house the long and dreary tale of our constitutional wrongs and of the evils that will follow from the application of the principle of this measure. We heard it last year. We have heard it this year three times already. I can almost recite what the right hon. gentleman will say as soon as he gets on his feet. I know that the word "subversive" will be used just as frequently as it is possible for him to use it, and that the word "constitution" will flow from his lips with as much ease as it is possible for words to flow, and you know how easy that is. The constitution is being wrecked, something entirely subversive of the interests of Canada is being proposed, and I cry aloud and none heeds my cry—that is the position of the right hon. leader of the opposition. The whole pillars of the state are being wrecked, and will not one hon. gentleman opposite come to the rescue, come and put down all this tyranny and avoid all the evils that will flow to the Canadian people from this measure that the government is proposing? That is the position of the right hon. gentleman. Is it any wonder that the people of this country are getting a little weary of that sort of thing and saying that the time has come when men should take action and not indulge in mere words, mere talk about something subversive of the constitution. Oh, the evils that have been wrought in the name of the constitution! The right hon. gentleman has never forgotten that a constitutional issue whereby a letter written by the representative of the crown was not made known to the people enabled him to receive power when he should not have had it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. My right hon. friend has restated something that he said a little earlier in the session. I intend to reply to him by quoting the communication in full a little later on. In the meantime I say to him that he is making a statement that is entirely unwarranted by any communication to which he has referred.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: And it is the third time he has done it.

Mr. BENNETT: And I say it the fourth time. I would not expect the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) would understand it, but what was done was this, and there the record is, and it stands for itself and can be read of all men. It is not what I say; it is what the record contains. It was a statement written by the right hon. gentleman himself, to which a reply was sent by a representative of the crown, and there are men in this house who went to and fro in Canada in 1926, and I look fairly now at one of them who gave an interview to the Manitoba Free Press in which he spoke of dictatorial powers being used for the purpose of enabling England to trample upon the rights of this country, and that Downing street had suddenly taken the place of Ottawa and dominated the situation in Canada, and that this parliament had not been free to exercise its rights. Read that correspondence. I make no comment; read it. But I do say this, that if the people of Canada had known of that correspondence as they should have, the constitutional issues that we have been hearing about ever since would not have been talked about so often.

Either the right hon. gentleman has become obsessed with this talk about the constitution or else he knows nothing about it—one or the other; for to-day, in dealing with the question of the relative rights of parliament and the executive he exactly reversed the decisions of the privy council in dealing with those problems. Parliament is all-powerful to deal with our constitutional position, but parliament must delegate its powers to commissions. The railway commission is one. Parliament has appointed that commission and has delegated its powers to it. It has provided how those powers shall be exercised and by whom. Parliament appoints other commissions from time to time and confers upon them the necessary authority for their action. All power must spring from parliamentary action, and when parliament has conferred the power it is determined by parliament who shall exercise that power. Shall it be by a railway commission or shall it be by the executive, and the executive is the governor in council? Parliament is being asked now to confer upon the governor in council, the executive of this country, the power to carry out its will; that is all. When parliament conferred upon the harbour board of Montreal the right to issue securities without limitation and determined that the governor in council might guarantee those securities, if the argument of the right hon. gentleman is right, then every one of those securities is invalid; but everyone knows that they are not invalid, that parliament conferred upon the executive the right to guarantee those bonds without limiting the amount. Parliament was not aware at that time that a few months before the election a couple of millions were to be issued to bring the total up to nineteen and a half million dollars altogether, whereas the representations were that the cost was going to be six million dollars. But parliament conferred the power, and having conferred the power, parliament must be bound by the exercise of it.

In this measure parliament is asked to confer on the executive these powers. I have said, and I repeat, that under conditions so abnormal, in a crisis so great, you will find no case in which there has been any suggestion of corruption or of wrongdoing within the proper meaning of those words in connection with the exercise of these powers by the governor in council during the last two years. It is true that there are cases in which there are differences of opinion. It is true that there are cases in which there is criticism. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) has dealt with the criticism of the leader of the opposition as to the exercise of the power in granting to the Canadian National a sum of money with which to buy ties for relief purposes. What happened was this: If the Canadian National without our passing an order in council or granting them a single dollar had gone out and spent money to buy ties, and had then put the cost in as part of its deficit, as it would have done, and parliament had then voted the money, as it would have done, you would have had exactly the same, identical result. But parliament clothed the executive with power, and the executive in the exercise of that power granted money to the Canadian National to the extent of over one million dollars for the purpose of buying ties, and the Canadian National bought the ties and paid for the ties. It may be that the price paid for the ties was less than it should have been. I have heard it suggested that the price was too low, that it was not a fair price, that a man could not make a living wage making ties at that price. I have heard that suggested by hon. gentlemen on this side and by my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) on the other side, and I know when he said it that he meant and believed that the price at which the Canadian National let its contracts for ties was a price not fair to the producer. The Minister of Railways has stated to-day that the price for the ties averaged 52 cents as against a higher price prevailing in days gone by. Mr. Speaker, the principle is that the executive, having been authorized by parliament to make grants for relief purposes, did make that grant to the Canadian National on condition that the money should be expended to buy ties, and the Canadian National bought ties with the money.

It is said that the Minister of Railways indicated that the contracts should all be let to contractors of one political faith, and that in the giving out of relief work it should be kept in mind that all the people of Canada did not belong to one political party. Now as to the extent to which his direction, if you call it that, putting it at the highest, was carried out, it is perfectly pertinent and proper to inquire, but the inquiry must be as to the administration of the railway and not as to the administration of relief. I think all will agree as to that.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: We cannot get the information either place.

Mr. BENNETT: I am quite certain that the information will be forthcoming if it is put upon the basis that it is now put upon. The railway company conducted this business. It is asserted by the leader of the opposition that pressure was put upon the railway company to let contracts to others than those it had been intended to let them to. I think the minister has given an explanation which most of us would regard as fairly reasonable. He has said, "I have not let contracts to all of those; I have asked the railways to let contracts both to Liberals and to Conservatives, and that their political colours should not determine the extent to which contracts were given." That is what he said; that is what the leader of the opposition has said. If there has been any undue pressure brought to bear upon the railways for the purpose of inducing contracts to be let to specific individuals, I am perfectly certain the Minister of Railways will bear any responsibility which attaches for it.

I am bound to say it has not been my good or evil fortune to ask anybody to grant a tie contract to anybody, because I do not recall that there happened to be any in the particular part of the country in which I live. Perhaps hon. members have been kind enough to realize that my mind has been otherwise engaged. I am not speaking with any degree of personal knowledge, but I am satisfied the Minister of Railways will gladly bear any responsibility which may attach, and give any explanation within reason to satisfy the house.

The matter is not without authority. When I heard the statements made by the leader of the opposition this afternoon I realized at once that this matter had been settled by the courts. With that in mind I sent to the library for the report, and I dare say lawyers in this house will remember the case of Powell vs. Apollo Candle Company before the privy council as long ago as 1885. In order that there may be no difficulty I shall read the headnote.

A colonial legislature is not a delegate of the imperial legislature. It is restricted in the area of its powers, but within that area it is unrestricted.

Held, that the Customs Regulation Act of 1879, section 133, was within the plenary powers of legislation conferred upon the New South Wales legislature by the Constitution Act.

Held, further, that duties levied by an order in council issued under section 143 are really levied by authority of the legislature and not of the executive. Also that under section 133 "the opinion of the collector," whether right or wrong, authorizes the action of the governor.

I am going to read the section, in order that this may be cleared up.

"Whenever any article of merchandise then unknown to the collector is imported, which, in the opinion of the collector or the commissioners, is apparently a substitute for any known dutiable article, or is apparently designed to evade duty, but possesses properties in the whole or in part which can be used or were intended to be applied for a similar purpose as such dutiable article, it shall be lawful for the governor to direct that a duty be levied on such article at a rate to be fixed in proportion to the degree in which such unknown article approximates in its qualities or uses to such dutiable article; and such rate thus fixed shall be published in a treasury order in the Gazette, and one other newspaper published in Sydney, and exhibited in the long room or other public place in the Custom house, and a copy of all such treasury orders shall, without unnecessary delay, be laid before both houses of parliament."

The manner in which this question came before the courts is this. In pursuance of this section an order in council was issued imposing a duty on the importation of stearine, the order following the words of the act; whereupon the collector of customs insisted on a certain duty of a penny per pound, amounting to £92 1s. 9d., being paid on the importation of some 1,500 barrels of stearine. The plaintiffs paid that sum under protest, and in pursuance of section 20 of the same act brought an action for the purpose of recovering it. The collector defended himself by a plea . . .

That he had a right to do it. The privy council sustained the view that when the discretion was granted or conferred upon a collector of customs by parliament, parliament had power to delegate its authority, and that the collector's discretion thus exercised was final and complete. That ends the argument addressed to this chamber this afternoon from the standpoint of the delegation of power. I have said so frequently that I will not repeat it, that in my professional life or otherwise I never have been an advocate of the delegation by parliament of unnecessary authority or power. However I am practical enough to realize that unless there is a delegation of power to executives, parliament itself cannot supervise or do every act that has to be done. It is impossible for parliament itself, or the 245 members in this house, to administer the customs or tariff acts. It delegates its powers with respect to numberless matters which I need not mention but which pertain to the conduct of government.

We have asked parliament to confer upon the executive the authority I mentioned for the purposes indicated by the measure. I will go further. The conference held a few weeks ago between the provinces and the dominion was for the purpose of ascertaining how the provinces thought they could best discharge their constitutional obligations and duties. When they thought it was undesirable to mention the sum which might be available for relief purposes—and I use the word broadly—they said that by such an act we would be instituting competition or rivalry, in that each province would be seeking to get what it conceived to be its due and proper share of the amount available. In fact, in the language of a distinguished western statesman, they wanted to determine to what extent they should "shake the tree." That is the way it was put by one of my friends, and I think that is not an unfair way of putting it. They consented in the interests of this dominion, and in the interests of economy—because we are not anxious to spend more money than is necessary for the purpose—to a continuity of the exercise of that discretion by the executive as being in the best interests of Canada.

I may say it is no great secret that at one time the question as to the indication of a maximum amount was seriously considered, but after listening to a statement of the conditions which confronted the provinces—and after all they are on the firing line; we are not directly on the firing line—they concluded that that was the best thing to do. It will be recalled that the premier of the province of Quebec, who is no political friend of ours, speaking in his province after he had been at Ottawa, said:

> I wish to pay this tribute to the Bennett government. They have done all in their power to relieve unemployment. I might add the provincial government has been equally active.

That was the opinion of Mr. Taschereau, an experienced administrator. When I heard the right hon. leader of the opposition deal with the question of prospective elections, and the possibility of the utilization of these moneys for that purpose, I wondered just what he had in mind. I wonder if he had in mind the movement of that vast army upon the roads in the province of Quebec during the recent provincial elections. I wonder if he had in mind the passing of legislation thereafter which would make it impossible to raise a question in the courts of the country. I can say only this, that so far as elections are concerned they have not entered into the consideration of this problem. We have troubles enough without thinking of elections. I have some reason to believe there are gentlemen opposite me in this house who are very thankful the question of elections is not under consideration or discussion. There are some, peradventure, who think that the wheel of fortune may give them added responsibility and power. There are some who would long for it, but who will never see it; there are some who would long for it only to be rid of it, and there are some who have no desire to have it because of the responsibility it involves.

I do not think for one moment it can be said that in the conduct of these measures in days gone by there has been any indication of a desire to play politics. The complaint, for instance, that has been voiced in this house—and I sometimes think unfairly—with respect to British Columbia, is a complaint made by a government Conservative in character. The complaints they have made are made by a provincial administration against a federal administration of the same political faith. No one has for one moment ever asserted that there are Conservative administrations in the prairie provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Certainly they are not Liberal administrations; neither are they Conservative. We have had to deal with problems of great magnitude and difficulty in all those provinces, and we have yet to hear anyone assert that political considerations have governed our conduct. I am not unmindful of difficulties in the province of Quebec and in the province of Ontario. You hear one hon. member charging political favouritism in Ontario, another in Quebec. As to the maritime provinces, we have heard serious discussion as to whether or not Captain Smith did really moor his boat at a wharf owned by a Liberal or by a Conservative and that if he did moor his boat at a wharf owned by a Conservative, he must realize that this is against all the principles of Liberalism and must not happen again or he will lose his position! All these things we have listened to with great interest. But I do say this. Compare our position with that of any other country in the world—and we are in a world picture—compare what has transpired in this country since the world crisis came, watch our action and compare it with that of any other government, and I do not think we have any cause to blush or feel any remorse as to the manner in which this country's business has been transacted. If a case was made out against this administration such as is suggested, then I certainly would take immediate steps to see that the wrong was remedied. For I cannot conceive of any government trying to administer relief measures in terms of the political faith of the recipients; I cannot think of it. Does anyone suggest that hon. members who sit behind me are more lacking in human kindness and sympathy than those who sit opposite? Is it meant that because they happen to wear a particular political badge they thereby lose all vestige of humanity? Is that suggested? I have read some speeches made outside this house that would cause one to believe that that is their thought. But considerate people are not so thinking. This measure before the house is a measure that undoubtedly seeks from parliament authority to the executive to meet the situation mentioned. There is no denial of it; it has never been suggested otherwise. And you could only say this, that seeking that power, if it is abused we must perish; if it is properly discharged, we have not disregarded our obligation and duty. But surely no purpose is served by the continuous reiteration, reiteration times without number, of the statements that have been made. Surely it is just as effective for men to rise in their places and state the position of their party concisely and powerfully and be done with it, as it is to keep on nagging, nagging, nagging, day after day, week after week, endeavouring to wear down the patience, and forming combinations and plans for the purpose of fraying the temper, of those who may be tried and tired; it is quite unworthy too of members of this house. That is not what we are here for. And if I say I am disappointed that world conditions have turned out as they have since 1930, who is there to say he is not in the same position? The most profound minds, the ablest men on this continent, the greatest thinkers in the world—look at what they said would happen, and look at what has happened. I sometimes pride myself that I was a little nearer right than they were—if you look at the pages of Hansard. But who could have said the situation would develop to the point it has now reached? It is true it was said here the other day that some economist had stated that unless the world changes its thinking, difficulties would follow which would be world wide and could not be easily overcome.

Then complaint is made that no policy is formulated in connection with unemployment. What policy has been suggested, except unemployment insurance? And what would unemployment insurance mean at this time with unemployment as it is? It would mean the state would pay the insurance, for no one would have the money to pay the premiums. That is all it means. And stripped of everything, that is the suggestion, that there should be substituted for what has been done through public effort and private enterprise and private charity, unemployment insurance, whereby the state would pay the premiums and at the same time pay the benefits. You would substitute for such measures as have been taken, measures whereby a given sum would be provided. The sum has varied, but if it met the maximum suggested by one hon. gentleman in days gone by, the printing press would work overtime and the inflation would be such that I do not think we would need to worry about the word "currency" being applied to it at all. Against that it has been suggested by the right hon. leader of the opposition that I, in 1930, expressed my disapproval of the dole. I not only expressed my disapproval then; I do now. I am opposed to a dole. But I wonder if he realizes the inconsistency of his arguments. He said: You must not disregard this ark of the covenant upon which these unholy hands are being laid, this ark of the covenant in which is contained our sacred constitution, you must pay attention to it. Well, if you do, whose responsibility is it for unemployment, the provinces' or the dominion's? There is not an hon. member within sound of my voice who does not know that under the British North America Act the responsibility rests with the provinces. This we have endeavoured to make clear in the bill, as I will once more point out:

> Whereas by reason of the prolonged world-wide economic depression, recovery to a more normal economic condition has been retarded in the Dominion of Canada; and whereas the provinces require assistance in carrying out necessary relief measures and to meet financial conditions as the same may arise; and whereas it is in the national interest that parliament should support and supplement the relief measures of the provinces and grant them financial assistance in such manner and to such extent as the governor in council may deem expedient; and whereas it is necessary to make special provisions to deal with the situation in the national parks of Canada and in the drought stricken areas of the province of Saskatchewan. . . .

And so on. Those are the recitals that determine why we are interesting ourselves in this matter at all. The duty is that of the provinces. A national difficulty has arisen because of world-wide conditions and we say we propose to help the provinces, but the provinces themselves are to determine how that help shall be given. Heretofore we have been able to construct public works and undertakings, federal, provincial and municipal, and combining our efforts we have been able to attain the end sought. But the provinces say: We have anticipated the future beyond our financial ability, and therefore we are not prepared to pledge our credit for further sums. The municipalities say the same. Therefore the provinces say to the dominion: You must continue as a national obligation to assist us. And if we grant sustenance and support to men we propose to make them do something for it. I have not heard a provincial premier or a representative of any provincial government say that they propose to resort to the dole in that sense. They are establishing camps in which they say men must work for their sustenance. Further than that the provinces are proposing that if the men get sufficient food to maintain them in health and strength, and clothing for their comfort, and are surrounded by decent conditions, they shall do some useful work and render some useful service for the relief granted them. We say we will help the provinces. Further, as the Minister of Labour said the other day, some of the provinces say that they want to put men out on the land. We say to the provinces: Make your arrangements, and if satisfactory to you we will assist you in that work too. Self-respect, self-support—those are the ends we are aiming at.

Now, sir,—and I have spoken longer than I intended, because after all this is reiteration of what I have already endeavoured to say to the house—I can only repeat that to the best of our ability, cooperating with the provinces—our only means of contact with the municipalities—we will eadeavour so to administer the resources of the country entrusted to our hands as trustees, as to bring that measure—shall I say?—of happiness that is possible under existing conditions to those that require assistance. As I say, the provinces are the determining factor in that matter.

There is just one word more that might be said in that regard. We have had constant reiteration of the desirability of appointing a commission to deal with provincial matters. Now, the fact is that the dominion cannot appoint such a commission. The very suggestion that the right hon. leader of the opposition made in that regard would mean interference by the dominion with the powers of the provinces; which we cannot do. At the conference I put before the representatives of all the provinces whether they thought it desirable to appoint a commission as was done in Saskatchewan, and I learned that some of the governments were obtaining information to guide them in the work they were doing. We told them we would assist them and do what we had done in the past with respect to supervision as to expenditures. Some expressed a fixed conviction that a commission was not satisfactory. There the matter ends. If any province desires to set up a commission it will be welcomed as far as we are concerned; that was explained as clearly as possible. So far as we are concerned, a federal commission could not assist the matter in any sense, because all it could endeavour to do would be to coordinate the efforts of the dominion and of the provinces. I think that is as fairly as the position can be put to this house at this time.

There is perhaps one other matter that did arise out of the observations that were made by the right hon. leader of the opposition, but inasmuch as it can be dealt with at another time I am not going to trespass upon the time of the house to deal with it now, though it does occur to me that if the members of this house were as fully seized of the difficulties of the position as are the members of the government, they would render us every possible assistance in trying to expedite the passing of a measure that has now engaged, in the discussion of its details, a very long time. The government is submitting this legislation to the house because, after having canvassed the situation as thoroughly as possible, we believe it is the only method by which we can meet the difficulties, some of which are not seen, some of which we cannot anticipate, and some of which we hope will be less serious than people would have us believe. We are certain that the language used by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) the other day, when dealing in committee with some of the problems that were presented to him, will be borne out. We are not anxious to see this nation become less self-reliant or its people a dependent people, but confronted with realities, with difficulties beyond the power of human mind entirely to estimate, we are offering this measure to this house and asking that it be given second reading, with any reservations that may be desired, mental or otherwise, in the confident hope and the earnest belief that by its means the executive may be able to continue to serve this country as faithfully as it knows how for the purpose of promoting the happiness and peace of the people of Canada.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. For the second time this session, the Prime Minister referred this afternoon to a communication which passed between a former Governor General, Lord Byng, and myself in the month of June, 1926. The Prime Minister stated that this communication bears out the contention which he made by inference this afternoon, and which he stated in a very direct way on February 8 in this house, that I was seeking to raise a constitutional issue between the governor general and the government of the day which would make it appear that Downing street was controlling matters in this Dominion, rather than that any action of mine in relation to the former governor general was taken wholly with the view of averting any such constitutional issue. At the time the Prime Minister referred to this matter earlier in the session he said that he had under his hand—

Mr. BENNETT: I think on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, that when a debate is concluded in this house it is finished. The rules so state. The right hon. gentleman is entirely within his rights in bringing up a question of privilege, but it must be confined at least to that question of privilege as it has arisen. The other day his colleague raised the point that unless the question was taken up immediately and dealt with it was not proper for the Minister of Finance to deal with a reflection upon the conduct of the members of the government. That was the view then taken. Now I only desire to point out, sir, that the question of privilege must be dealt with as it arose this afternoon; it must not be some question of privilege that arose some months ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am a little surprised that the Prime Minister, on a matter which affects a former governor general as well as a former Prime Minister of Canada, should not wish this house and this parliament to have an exact and full statement made. When the matter came up previously I asked the Prime Minister to read in full the document from which he quoted the last paragraph. He was unwilling to do so, and in fact refused to do so. I had not the document with me at the time, as he well knew, and therefore I was not in a position to read it then. But the Prime Minister referred to the matter again this afternoon in the light of what he said on a previous occasion, and I have under my hand the return which was made to this house with respect to the correspondence with the governor general in regard to the dissolution of parliament in 1926.

In his remarks my right hon. friend deliberately conveyed to the house and the country the impression that I was seeking to raise a constitutional issue which would have it appear that this country was being dominated from Downing street and that Downing street was responsible for the decision of His Excellency the Governor General refusing to accept my request for dissolution at the time I was Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what I said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What did you say?

Mr. BENNETT: Just read it, and then there will be no question about it. I will not have any talk of that kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend has asked me to read it, and I will do so. I refer to Hansard of February 8, 1932, where he is reported as follows:

When the right hon. gentleman saw fit to endeavour to criticize the position taken by myself with respect to the crown and the representatives of the crown, I think it would have come with better grace had some other person made that observation. For I recall—and I have in my hand a document that was kept without being made public in June, 1926—a great campaign in one of the provinces waged on the ground that Downing street was dominating Canada, and the only suggestion that Downing street should be consulted with respect to the matter then to be decided was made by the then Prime Minister, the present leader of the opposition, who asked Lord Byng to be pleased to have his resignation withheld pending the time it might be necessary for His Excellency to communicate with the Secretary of State for the Dominions.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. Mackenzie King: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Mackenzie King: All I ask is that any document from which my right hon. friend quotes shall be laid on the table of the house in the usual way.

Mr. Bennett: Mr. Speaker, the document is taken from the sessional papers of this house; I sent down and got it, anticipating that very objection. So the solicitude for the crown, in which the right hon. gentleman has been so considerate to-night, is one of the new-born faiths that come when one finds himself in opposition and not in power. My right hon. friend was willing to have the representative of the crown in this country attacked from platforms throughout Canada on the ground that Downing street was being permitted to govern Canada—

Mr. Mackenzie King: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is talking about something about which he knows nothing whatever, and is saying things that are absolutely incorrect.

Mr. Bennett: This is not the only instance to which I shall point, not only with regard to inconsistency but worse, before I conclude. I want the right hon. gentleman to understand, when he makes the observations he has made, that I am reading from sessional paper 91 of Monday, February 14, 1927, and the closing paragraph of that letter—

Mr. Mackenzie King: Read the whole letter—

Mr. Bennett: The closing paragraph of the letter, which is signed by W. L. Mackenzie King, reads as follows:

If there is anything which, having regard to my responsibilities as Prime Minister, I can even yet do to avert such a deplorable and, possibly, far-reaching crisis, I shall be glad so to do, and shall be pleased to have my resignation withheld at Your Excellency's request pending the time it may be necessary for Your Excellency to communicate with the Secretary of State for the Dominions.

I am, Your Excellency,

Yours very sincerely,

W. L. Mackenzie King.

And then a whole campaign was conducted; and within the sound of my voice there are members who declared time after time that this country was no longer a colony and could not be ruled from Downing street, while the right hon. gentleman sat mute from malice. Not a word did he ever say as to the truth; not a word did he ever communicate to the Canadian people as to the fact that he had asked Lord Byng to appeal to Downing street and that Lord Byng had declined. So the campaign was finished. That was the solicitude shown for the crown by my right hon. friend; there you have the position clearly defined.

Now, in the first instance, referring to the document that was under my right hon. friend's hand and which he said was concealed throughout the campaign, may I direct attention to the fact that the document was in the nature of correspondence which had passed—

Mr. SPEAKER: Is that necessary to the question of privilege which the right hon. gentleman is raising?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is necessary for me to explain the correspondence in order to discuss the question of privilege, which is whether or not I was trying to raise a constitutional issue in the correspondence I had with His Excellency the Governor General, or whether, as I contend, I was seeking to avert such an issue. I wish to make it clear that I was seeking to avert a constitutional issue, and I can do so only by reading in full the communication to which reference has been made by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has read only the last paragraph, and I wish to read the whole of the communication. First of all, I wish to make clear whether or not, as insinuated, the document was held back. As a matter of fact, the document itself was the last one that passed between myself and the then governor general when I was Prime Minister, and it could not have been brought out in public until this parliament authorized the production and publication of the correspondence between His Excellency the then Governor General and myself. That publication was asked for as soon as parliament met in the next session and was brought down in the form of a formal return which was made to this house, having been asked for from the government side of the house. Had there been a desire to conceal any communications, certainly the motion for the return would have been refused, had the government wished to adopt that course; but above all it would not have been asked for by the government itself if there was any desire other than to have the facts known.

Mr. SPEAKER: In view of all that, what is the question of privilege?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am afraid you were not in the chair, Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister spoke earlier this afternoon. I rose then and said that I would take immediate opportunity, upon the conclusion of his remarks, to deal with the matter. The question of privilege is this: I am being placed in the position, before the country, of one who during his incumbency of the office of Prime Minister sought to raise a constitutional issue by compelling or seeking to compel the then governor general to communicate with Downing street with a view to getting refusal from Downing street, which would have permitted a constitutional issue to be raised, as to the domination of Canada by Downing street.

Mr. BENNETT: That was not even suggested.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The correspondence bears out directly the opposite.

Mr. SPEAKER: After all, that is only a matter of political debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, Mr. Speaker. It is a most vital issue that has been raised, one which affects the office of Prime Minister of this country.

Mr. SPEAKER: One party says that an effort was made to raise a constitutional issue, and the other party denies that this was done. It does not seem to me that the right hon. the leader of the opposition has made out a question of privilege.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not yet read the communication, and I ask, as leader of the opposition and a former Prime Minister, the right to place the communication in full on record.

Mr. SPEAKER: Any hon. member on either side of the house might object to quotations from his speeches or remarks during the last campaign, and that would be just as much a question of privilege as that which the right hon. gentleman is now raising.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It affects my honour as one who has held the office of Prime Minister, and after recess—it is now six o'clock—I intend to continue, or at any rate to endeavour to have placed on Hansard the full communication, which I say will bear out my contention that instead of seeking to raise a constitutional issue, I was doing all in my power to avert one.

Mr. SPEAKER: The right hon. gentleman might have done so when addressing the house this afternoon, or on numerous preceding occasions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I could not at the time, Mr. Speaker; I rose at once—

Mr. SPEAKER: It does not seem to me that the right hon. gentleman has laid the foundation for a question of privilege. It being six o'clock I now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was speaking to a question of privilege. May I state more particularly the point that I should like to have in Your Honour's mind at the moment? In the course of my remarks this afternoon, I referred to some observations made by the Prime Minister, and the right hon. gentleman asked me to read exactly what he had said. I complied with his request in that particular, and in so doing, placed anew on Hansard a portion of a communication from which the Prime Minister had quoted in a previous debate, but which, read by itself, along with the words of the Prime Minister, leaves an entirely erroneous impression. The impression which my right hon. friend endeavoured to convey was to the effect that in my last communication to the then Governor General, prior to the dissolution of 1926, I had sought to raise a constitutional issue, which would have it appear that Canada was still to some extent under the control of Downing street.

Mr. BENNETT: Once more I am sorry to interrupt. That is not what I said or what I endeavoured to convey. I said that was what the right hon. gentleman's followers did in the country, and they canvassed throughout the dominion that we were dominated by Downing street.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If there were any such action on the part of my followers it was taken without my consent and without my knowledge.

Mr. BENNETT: The newspapers were full of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly it was without any justification as a consequence of anything that appeared in any communication from me to His Excellency, the then Governor General. May I read the entire communication? I hope it will clear up once for all the situation as it then existed.

Before doing so, I should like to make a correction with reference to a statement that I made just before recess. I said that the return which was brought down had been brought down at the instance of the government of the day. I have since had an opportunity to verify the facts as to how the return came to be brought down, and I believe it was on a motion by the then hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. That, however, does not affect the matter in any particular, as had there been a desire on the part of the government not to bring down the correspondence, the return might have been voted down as other motions for returns have been voted down in this house this session.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the right hon. gentleman will remember, if he will look at the same Hansard, he greatly deprecated the correspondence being asked for.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That may be. I do not know that any useful purpose was served by bringing it down, and I had no desire to continue any controversy on a matter which I thought had been finally disposed of.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I repeat what I said before six o'clock? I cannot agree with the leader of the opposition that he is in order in treating this as a question of privilege. Personal explanations are often allowed by the house, and if the house has no objection, the Speaker has none to a personal explanation being made by the right hon. gentleman, but as regards treating it as a matter of privilege, I am quite confident it is not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope the house will take a broad enough view of a matter of this kind, which affects the honour of the leader of one of the political parties in the house and one who has held the office of Prime Minister, with respect to an action of his as Prime Minister, to permit me to place on record the complete communication from which a portion has been selected by the leader of the government of the day.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to make an observation in that regard. The other day the ex-minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) said in this chamber that rules were what governed the conduct of the house, and in the face of that statement he called upon the Speaker to prevent any explanation being made as to charges that members inside the government had not converted their securities. He said: It is not a question of privilege; the rules are there to govern, and he said: I rely upon the rules. Your Honour is the custodian of the operation and administration of the rules of this house. Whatever Your Honour decides as Speaker of this chamber, we shall endeavour to obey. But when the colleague and deskmate of the leader of the opposition takes that view with respect to a matter which affected at this time the honour of members of this house who are sitting on the government benches, and invoked the rules in support of his position, if I venture to say to you, sir, that whatever your interpretation of the rules is should be obeyed equally by the government and the opposition, I would be stating the fact.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already ruled it is not a question of privilege on which as such the leader of the opposition may address the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think, sir, Your Honour also said that if the house were prepared to accept a personal explanation which would necessitate my reading the full communication, I might have the privilege of reading it. Of course, if the house denies me that privilege, it has a right so to do; but I really cannot understand why the Prime Minister, of all others, should wish to deny to one who has held the office of Prime Minister, the reading of any communication which is as important in its bearing as this one is, particularly when he himself has quoted only a part of it. If I may then read the communication, it is as follows:

Ottawa, June 28, 1926.

His Excellency
The Right Honourable
The Baron Byng of Vimy, G.C.B., K.C.M.G.,
Governor General of the Dominion of Canada,
Ottawa.

My Dear Governor General,—

Your Excellency having declined to accept my advice to place your signature to the order in council with reference to a dissolution of parliament, which I have placed before you to-day, I hereby tender to Your Excellency my resignation as Prime Minister of Canada.

Your Excellency will recall that in our recent conversations relative to dissolution I have on each occasion suggested to Your Excellency, as I have again urged this morning, that having regard to the possible very serious consequences of a refusal of the advice of your first minister to dissolve parliament, you should, before definitely deciding on this step, cable the Secretary of State for the Dominions asking the British government, from whom you have come to Canada under instructions, what, in the opinion of the Secretary of State for the Dominions, your course should be in the event of the Prime Minister presenting you with an order in council having reference to a dissolution.

As a refusal by a governor general to accept the advice of a prime minister is a serious step at any time, and most serious under existing conditions in all parts of the British Empire to-day, there will be raised, I fear, by the refusal on Your Excellency's part to accept the advice tendered a grave constitutional question without precedent in the history of Great Britain for a century and in the history of Canada since confederation.

If there is anything which, having regard to my responsibilities as Prime Minister, I can even yet do to avert such a deplorable and, possibly, far-reaching crisis, I shall be glad so to do, and shall be pleased to have my resignation withheld at Your Excellency's request pending the time it may be necessary for Your Excellency to communicate with the Secretary of State for the Dominions.

I am, Your Excellency,
Yours very sincerely,
W. L. Mackenzie King.

I submit that communication makes it quite clear that what I was seeking to do was to avoid the raising of a constitutional issue. I knew that only a short time before a dissolution had been granted to Mr. Ramsay MacDonald at the time he was Prime Minister of Great Britain, after he had been in office for only ten months, and I was sure that any advice which would come from the British government to the then governor general would be to suggest to him to accept the advice of his first minister. This was only one of different courses I suggested with a view of avoiding, if at all possible, the raising of a constitutional issue. It was not done in any attempt to have it appear that the British government were seeking to dominate affairs in Canada. On the contrary I expressly stated at the time that I did not wish even to be informed as to what opinion might come from the British government to the then governor general in answer to any questions in that regard he might submit to the British government.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): I listened this afternoon to the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) with a very great deal of interest. I was somewhat surprised at the manner in which the Minister of Railways concluded his remarks, by bringing in the question of expenditures by the Canadian National Railway in 1929, especially in view of the fact that the railway committee is still sitting and has not yet made its final report. But inasmuch as the minister criticized the late government for expenditure in connection with the Canadian National Railway and brought up the matter of the report, I might be pardoned, Mr. Speaker, if I read what happened in the railway committee on May 3, 1932.

Mr. MANION: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I did not bring up the question of the report of the railway committee, and I did not quote from that report in any way, although members opposite did. I think that the report should not be dealt with in the house until the special committee makes its final report.

Mr. RHODES: I must respectfully rise, Mr. Speaker, to another point of order, that it is not competent for the hon. gentleman to refer to proceedings in a committee which has not yet reported to this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think both points of order are well taken.

Mr. HEENAN: I have the matter in my mind anyway. I happened to be sitting in the railway committee room while that portion of the investigation was going on.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is just as much out of order to quote from memory as to read from the report of the proceedings of the committee before the report itself is brought in.

Mr. HEENAN: I can recall the Minister of Railways this afternoon dealing very exhaustively with expenditures by the Canadian National Railway in 1929 and blaming the then government for the expenditures of that year, and I was about to quote the explanation given by Sir Henry Thornton. But if I am not allowed to quote from the proceedings of that committee, to my mind the explanation of the Canadian National management would be that by reason of the railway equipment becoming obsolete there was a danger that it would be refused on other railways. For instance, they had wooden frames on some of their cars, and generally the equipment was becoming so dangerous to life and property that American railroads, and probably other railroads in Canada, might refuse to accept the Canadian National equipment. That is the explanation that will be given by the management and will be read in the report.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: Another reason will probably be given by the railway. In order to operate the railway economically, locomotives of greater power were necessary, and it had been decided by the directors of the road in the fall of 1928 that as soon as the finances of the road would permit, larger locomotives would be purchased in order to enable the Canadian National to compete with other roads. When railway conditions in 1928 and 1929 are compared with the conditions of 1931 it will readily be seen that the time to renew or purchase new equipment was in 1928 and 1929. For instance, in 1929 there were moved on our railroads in Canada 115,187,028 tons of freight, and in the same year 39,070,893 passengers. In 1931, there was a reduction, as compared with 1929, of 41,357,028 tons of freight moved, and of over twelve and a half million in the number of passengers carried. There were employed on our railroads in 1929, 187,846 employees, and in 1931, 154,000, or 33,846 less in 1931 than in 1929. The wages paid to railroad men in 1929 were $290,732,500, as compared with $228,260,000 in 1931, or a reduction in 1931 of approximately $61,500,000. So comparing the number of tons of freight and the number of passengers moved and the wages paid in 1929 and 1931, it will be realized that the proper time to make purchases, if the railroad wanted to renew its equipment, was in 1929.

The increased power on the railroads necessitated stronger equipment throughout the trains. The larger the train the greater the danger through weakness in any one part. For instance, in an emergency application of the brakes, a car with a wooden frame is likely to buckle up and cause not only damage to property but possible loss of life. Our railroad record in Canada is second to none in the world. The records show that our Canadian railroads move approximately twelve thousand tons of freight more per man than do the railroads in the United States. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I consider that whatever the management wanted to do in the way of keeping up the equipment they had a perfect right to do.

There seems to be a conflict of view between the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways. While the Minister of Railways did not say so specifically, I understood him to take the view that the railroad management and the government ought to have seen in 1929 that economically things were going wrong in the world and consequently they ought not to have entered upon large purchases, but should have saved the money. On the other hand, the Prime Minister said that no one in 1930 could foresee what the economic conditions of the world might be. However much they differ, I do not think we on this side ought to be compared with Rip van Winkle. No one should deny to the Canadian National Railway, our own railway, the right of keeping the road abreast of other systems on this American continent.

I regarded the Prime Minister's speech this afternoon as a frank confession of failure on the part of his government to meet conditions in this country. He gave as an excuse that no one could foresee in 1930 what the conditions of the world have turned out to be. But I recollect that very many Liberals, as I did myself in some of my speeches on the hustings, blamed conditions in Canada upon world economic conditions. I can recall the then premier of Ontario, the Hon. G. Howard Ferguson, now High Commissioner for Canada in London, making fun of that on platforms throughout northern Ontario. He said it was the Minister of Labour's duty to see that conditions in Canada were all right, and that he should not bother about other parts of the world. I can recall speeches made by the present Prime Minister wherein he stated that to refer to conditions existing in other parts of the world was no excuse, that if he were elected to office the government would do its duty, and there was no excuse for any man or woman willing and able to work to be out of employment. It may be that the right hon. gentleman expects the Canadian people to forget those statements, but I doubt very much whether they will.

The Prime Minister to-day tried to hide behind the constitution. Of course it is all very well for him to taunt the leader of the Liberal party for being a stickler on constitutional questions. I find, however, that the present government on every possible occasion hides behind the constitution. There was a constitution in Canada in 1930, which I do not think has been changed since.

Mr. ERNST: What about the statute of Westminster?

Mr. HEENAN: In that year the matter of unemployment was before the people. In no uncertain terms the Prime Minister said it was the duty of the federal government to provide work and that if that government fulfilled its duties there should be no unemployment in Canada. He said a government should find a job for every man and woman able to work, and he undertook to do it. At that time there was no suggestion that it was the duty of the provinces. There was no suggestion that the provinces should take any responsibility, or that the action of the federal government would be merely supplementary. On the contrary the Prime Minister made specific promises that if the Conservative party were elected to power they would end unemployment and treat it on a national basis; there was no question whatever of the provinces coming into the picture. Since that time however, after elected to power, the government headed by the Prime Minister brings in legislation involving provincial obligations. First come the municipalities, then the provinces, with the efforts of the smaller bodies to be supplemented by the federal government. Since the election, therefore, we have witnessed a turn-about-face.

A few days ago the Minister of Labour was answering questions on the national highways matter, and whether or not he endeavoured to evade questions the fact is he was not very frank in his explanations. There are some hon. members on this side of the house who would like to know whether or not the government intend to go on with the national highways they promised, or whether they intend only to contribute to the provinces when they are in need. We should like to know the stand now taken by the government. In 1930 no constitutional question was raised. The words of the Prime Minister at Cobourg on June 24 are reported in the London Free Press of June 25 as follows:

> A national highway for Canadians. A highway in Canada, not through some other country. A highway in which you can leave Cape Breton and arrive in Vancouver without going into a foreign land. Mr. Bennett declared the undertaking must be accomplished by the hands of the federal government.

At that time there was no question of constitutionality and no suggestion that the provinces would be expected to contribute. A direct promise was made that the national highway would be built, and that promise was one of the weapons used against your humble servant during the last election campaign. Federal Conservatives promised that the highway would be built; the provincial Minister of Lands and Forests and his colleague the then Premier of Ontario, the Hon. G. Howard Ferguson, promised from the hustings that the highway would be built. What are we going to do? The Prime Minister has asked for concrete suggestions from this side of the house. The bill now before us provides for only direct relief. If I understand correctly the bill before us, together with the statements made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour, we have nothing in view to-day but direct relief. True, the Ontario government through its Minister of Lands and Forests has stated that there are certain camps in northern Ontario to which anyone who is without a home may go. Those men will be given eight hours' work each day constructing highways, they will be fed and given five dollars a month to boot. That, however, is not a serious attempt to build highways. I am sure the government will not secure men who will be content to work eight hours each day out in the boiling sun constructing highways, and receive in return only five dollars a month.

I should like to know this: Is northern Ontario again to be treated to another period of highways political expediency? The highways in northern Ontario have for years been kept for political expediency. After the money which was spent last year on the highway are we this year simply going to close down those expensive camps? I have no complaint about them, because I do not think anything can be too good for the men in that part of the country. But in view of the expenditures which have been made in camps and equipment, are we going to allow the parts of highways already constructed to grow up in bush and weeds, or are the people in that part of the country to receive the justice which for years they have been seeking?

I am pleased that on many occasions the Prime Minister has acknowledged—that the highways in Canada would be an asset, not a liability. From time to time he has referred to the great value to Canada of the tourist traffic. In northern Ontario we have one of the finest tourist districts to be found anywhere on the North American continent. Lakes, rivers, streams and forests abound, with fish, game and all sorts of possibilities for sport. Only an expenditure of a few thousand dollars is necessary to connect that great portion of the country with western Canada and the United States. The history of the northern highways is one upon which we cannot look with any degree of pride. I can recall that in 1921 the government of the day in Ontario was persuaded to cooperate with the Manitoba government in connecting the provinces of Ontario and Manitoba. In 1921 contracts were let and the work proceeded fairly well until 1923. Then the government changed in Ontario and the work was practically closed down. In 1924 Mr. Lyons, Minister of Lands and Forests, made several speeches in that part of the country and emphatically put his government on record as being determined to complete the highway from the Manitoba boundary to Sault Ste. Marie. Nothing was done except scratching the surface. In the provincial election of 1926 the highway was again promised; in 1926 during the federal election the highway was again promised; but nothing much was done. The Conservative candidate had been elected in the 1926 elections, but at the next provincial election in 1929 the electors declined to accept any further promises, and he was defeated. In the meantime the Manitoba government had gone ahead with the construction of their portion of the highway. Owing to the urgent representations of the present local member in the Ontario legislature, backed by others, the Ontario government did go ahead, and during the federal election of 1930 the provincial Minister of Lands and Forests specifically promised that the highway to Manitoba would be open for traffic in 1931. We have been a little delayed, but now we are assured that it will be ready for traffic by the first of July this year. I gladly take the opportunity to invite every member of this house to be present on that occasion so that they may have the pleasure of visiting one of the finest tourist districts in the whole dominion.

I am hoping that the government will not be a party to the arrangement said to have been made with the provincial government, but that they will undertake to carry out at least one of their pledges to the people, even if it is only the connecting up of the provincial highways. Sixty-one miles of construction would complete the highway from Ignace to Winnipeg. There are a few miles of uncompleted road here and there; in addition another twenty-nine miles of construction work is needed to complete the highway between Sioux Lookout and the town of Dinorwic and Dryden; then we have a highway under construction to the south connecting up Kenora and the Rainy River districts. In other words, it will take sixty-one miles of road work to complete the main highway, another twenty-nine miles across to Sioux Lookout, and sixty miles across to Rainy River; these will connect up the whole of new Ontario with western Canada and the outside world. Figuring the cost at $8,000 per mile this work can be completed for $1,200,000. I am satisfied that if the Prime Minister and his government will proceed with this highway construction they will be doing something for that part of new Ontario and at the same time they will be creating a national asset and it would be much better to provide work in this manner than by direct relief. I am making the suggestion at this late hour in the hope that the Minister of Labour will see to it that this highway work is proceeded with. On the last occasion when I was speaking on this subject I pointed out to him that it was false economy to go ahead with road construction work in the winter season and then to suspend operations in the summer. Winter temperatures in that country run from 20 to 40 and even 50 degrees below zero. Hon. members will readily understand how hard it is to construct highways under such severe climatic conditions, but the work has been gone on with all winter; now the men are being laid off and put on direct relief, although the camps are fully equipped for continuing the work. The provincial Minister of Lands and Forests, speaking in Kenora in July, 1931, said, according to the Miner and News of July 15, 1931:

> Winter work in road building was only carried out to relieve distress. Winter work was a nuisance and a criminal waste for they did not get value for money expended. The men could not possibly give them value under winter conditions.

It will be observed that he bears out what I said on a previous occasion. I think this goverument will be lax in its duty if they do not undertake to complete that highway now that we have so many men out of work and when it could be proceeded with under conditions which would permit the men to work in comfort and render full value to the country.

A little while ago I said I did not think the Minister of Labour was altogether frank the other day when I asked him several times in respect to this highway. To say the least he did not give a direct answer. The provincial Minister of Lands and Forests, however, has made a statement in connection with the matter. It may be that he is wrong—if the Minister of Labour says he is I will not quarrel with his statement, for I have often found him wrong—but this is what the provincial minister said as reported in the Kenora Miner and News of April 27 last, the report being copied from the Mail and Empire:

Hon. William Finlayson, Minister of Lands and Forests, announced last night that the plan worked out by the dominion and provincial governments is purely a relief measure to afford shelter for men in the camps who have no other means, many of whom have expressed a desire to stay in the north after the official closing time, rather than coming into the cities. The men will be given board, lodging and five dollars a month spending money, and will work eight hours daily under the supervision of the permanent engineering staff of the Department of Northern Development. Notification of this arrangement was given to the camps yesterday.

If that be true, the Minister of Labour might have been frank enough the other night to say so. I think that when a member from this side asks a question he is entitled to an answer. But I hope it is not true, I hope the Minister of Labour—who belongs to the north country himself, and I know is just as solicitous for its development as I am—I hope he will not be a party to the closing down of the camps and so render more or less useless some portions of the work already done. It is ridiculous to ask workmen to go into that part of the country and labour for five dollars a month. The Hon. Mr. Finlayson wanted to do that over a year ago, at that time he suggested a remuneration of fifty cents a day. Apparently he was shamed out of that, but now he does not even offer fifty cents a day. Five dollars a month is not even twenty-five cents a day, and I hope the present federal government will not be a party to paying men a pittance of five dollars a month and board and lodging. Therefore I beseech the Minister of Labour, the members of the government, and in particular the Prime Minister, to go ahead and carry out what they obligated themselves to do in 1930, and construct the highway through new Ontario.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Agreements with provinces authorized.

Mr. NEILL: The other day in committee I suggested to the minister that he put a little more into the act and a little less into the regulations, but that has not been done. Now I hope the minister will at least give us some information to amplify what seems to be lacking in the bill. This section gives the government power to enter into agreements with any of the provinces with respect to relief measures, and it is extremely vague in its terms:

(a) Enter into agreements with any of the provinces respecting relief measures therein;

That might cover a lot of things or it might cover very little. One might take it to include the elaborate system of unemployment relief work carried on last year, but we have been told more or less casually that this is not intended, that we are to have only direct relief. At the present moment I am only anxious to find out exactly what is our position, and I submit that with the experience gained in years gone by it would have been quite appropriate for the minister to state more definitely in the act what his policy is going to be. We have been told that at the conference of provincial premiers it was unanimously agreed that only direct relief measures should be carried on. If that is the case the British Columbia representatives have changed their point of view very considerably and very rapidly. About a fortnight ago the legislature of British Columbia adopted the report of an unemployment committee containing a number of recommendations.

Mr. BENNETT: If I may interrupt, I tried to make clear this afternoon that the position was not quite as the hon. gentleman has said. I stated that some of the provinces wanted the men to do something for the sustenance and support they received, but they did not determine how much that should be. I tried to make that clear this afternoon; I spoke of sustenance and support and said the men would have to do something for it. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has mentioned that one province wanted to pay five dollars a month, but I did not mention any amount.

Mr. NEILL: Does the Prime Minister say I was mistaken when I said that British Columbia objected to direct relief?

Mr. BENNETT: No. British Columbia did object to doles, as my hon. friend is now using that term; they wanted to provide some work so that any man who received sustenance would have to do some work for it.

Mr. NEILL: Their recommendation was that direct relief, being wasteful and demoralizing, as far as possible should be discontinued in favour of work for which some remuneration could be given. It may be that the word "dole" would not be a good description, but certainly the resemblance is very close. I take it that British Columbia wanted to go on with a policy of providing work rather than a policy of direct relief. However, we will suppose that the policy to-day is to be one of direct relief, so the next thing we want to know is what share of that expenditure is to be borne by this government. I think that question was directed to the minister when the resolution was in committee, and we were told that it had not been decided. That is a very important point. I do not intend to quibble with the government with regard to the constitutional point of view, but here is the government announcing its policy, so surely it would be appropriate to tell us at least what proportion of this direct relief it contemplates paying. Section 2 gives the government power to enter into agreements, but it does not say what percentage shall be borne by the federal authority. We have only the experience of the past to guide us, and we know that last year the cost of direct relief was paid equally by the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion, each paying 33⅓ per cent. Is that plan to be followed again this year? We do not know, and I think it is highly important that we should know. For one thing it materially affects the interests of the province and of the municipality. Last year they each paid 33⅓ per cent of the cost of direct relief, but in connection with unemployment work the province only paid 25 per cent and the city paid the same. That would make a very substantial difference to the municipalities in my district, and I am free to say that they cannot pay that proportion this year. It is not fair to compel them to adopt a policy under which, instead of paying less, they will pay more than they paid in the past.

There is another point I should like to raise in that connection; I do not know that it particularly arose in British Columbia but a case did come under my observation in connection with a town in Ontario. They exhausted the money available for unemployment relief work; they could have fallen back on direct relief, but they did not want to do so and the men did not want to receive orders for groceries and give nothing for them. So the city allowed them to continue working and paid them by these relief orders, but they were told either by the province or by the dominion that they would have to discontinue this practice or they would not get the dominion government's share of the cost of direct relief, which was supposed to be limited to the giving of grocery orders to people who were not working. I should like to know if that contingency has been provided for; certainly it should be. The other day I saw that the city of Nanaimo had adopted what seemed to be a reasonable policy of what they called direct relief. Attached to it was a condition whereby the unemployed people who received these grocery orders worked them out on the basis of $31.50 a month for a married man. This amounted to eight days' work a month, but perhaps there would be the danger that the city, and in its turn the province, would not be eligible to receive the share of the Dominion government, because it might not be called direct relief inasmuch as the men did some work. The minister may tell us that this is not so, but that is what we want to know. We want to know, to put it in the vernacular, where we get off. We want to be able to go home to our municipalities and tell them just what are their rights in the matter.

While my next point is not exactly pertinent to this section I might just introduce it here. Under section 7 the regulations and orders in council made under the provisions of the act are not to be laid before parliament until the following April 15. These regulations especially, and the orders in council as well, should be made public at the earliest possible moment. By this time the cities of British Columbia have acquired a sort of aloof attitude towards the provincial government; the cities feel that they must be rather careful in their dealings, and they want to know what are their rights. Within a very few weeks the government must inevitably pass these regulations indicating what their policy is, and I submit that they should be in this bill. Suppose they state the policy in the regulations; then I say that the regulations should not be merely sent to the province to leak out by slow degrees to the people in the districts, but at the very earliest moment they should be published in the Gazette so that everyone would know just where he stood. If they cannot afford to do this, or if there is some constitutional objection—and there is none—then at least the minister should give us an assurance that he will circularize the members of parliament so that at least one man in each district will be cognizant of the regulations, apart from the provincial authorities. I hope he will give us that assurance. Before this section passes I should be glad if the minister would be kind enough to tell us whether it has yet been decided what percentage of relief moneys the government will pay to the different provinces, and through the provinces to the cities.

Mr. GORDON: There is no desire on the part of the government to withhold from the committee any information with respect to the tentative arrangements, if I may so describe them, that have at present been advanced by the provinces to the Dominion government with reference to the various localities in the different provinces. The Dominion government is considering with the provinces the question of food and clothing and shelter, and the subsistence allowance in the camps to which reference has been made, and the proposal is that the Dominion government will contribute fifty per cent with the provinces. Then there are other situations that arise in the various provinces. In at least three of the middle west provinces the municipalities affected have made submissions, together with their respective provincial representatives, that with respect to directing towards assisting people on lands the moneys that otherwise would be paid in direct relief, the moneys be devoted in a little different way; that is to say, the municipalities—the larger municipalities—are prepared to advance money, while the provincial governments and this government will do the same. At the moment, these agreements, of course, have not been reduced to writing, nor have we gone so far as to enter into a verbal agreement, because, as everyone will understand, we have no right to do so until the legislation passes.

Mr. NEILL: That is the land scheme.

Mr. GORDON: Yes; that would be if the present negotiations with these provinces become effective. I hope that it will be a three-way agreement, because the municipality affected is relieved of a certain responsibility, the province and the dominion contributing.

Mr. NEILL: Thirty-three per cent each.

Mr. GORDON: Yes; that is the present arrangement at any rate. I am sure the hon. member will readily understand that there are situations in certain parts of Canada that render it most difficult for the province to identify clearly the problem with which it is confronted. That must be apparent, because we have now quite a floating population. Indeed, we have always had one although we have not recognized it fully until this time of depression. So that those agreements that touch special cases will have to be deferred, I am afraid, until the province can make a submission to us with any degree of clarity, in order that we may get down to an understanding that will, on the one hand, enable the problem to be adequately handled, and, on the other hand, help the provinces where help is necessary. I do not know that I can say anything further on that phase of the subject.

Mr. NEILL: I thank the minister for his information, and in all courtesy perhaps he will allow me to say that it would have been better had this been stated in the act; it would have been more satisfactory. However, he has given me much of what I asked for. We now glean that as regards the camps, the Dominion government and the provinces will pay fifty per cent each; that as regards the land scheme, this is a matter for future negotiation, though at the present time the minister has in mind a contribution of thirty-three and a third per cent each; and that, as regards the floating element and unforeseen conditions generally, this question has not yet been decided on.

There is just one other matter in regard to which he might give me some information, and from what he has said I gather that he is in a position to do so. Take the ordinary small municipality—not the big city, but the small municipality where what I would call ordinary relief is given. I am not referring to those who will go to the camps, those who are, for the most part, single men; I have in mind just the ordinary relief that is afforded. Has it yet been decided, and if not, why not, what share the dominion will pay? Are they going to compel the cities, through the provinces, to pay thirty-three and a third per cent? If so, will not the minister admit that this will be a greater infliction on the city than under the old scheme of contributing to unemployment relief work, where they paid only twenty-five per cent? Under the direct relief it was thirty-three per cent. What is the policy in that regard?

Mr. GORDON: With respect to direct relief generally—and this covers all the instances to which the hon. member has referred—the present discussions have been on the basis of contributing fifty per cent. I do not know that any better arrangement can be made. That again, of course, may be subject to some review when the agreement with the provinces is concluded. At the moment, however, and I do not think it is likely to be changed, direct relief generally will likely be on the basis of a fifty per cent contribution.

Mr. NEILL: The municipality will pay twenty-five per cent.

Mr. GORDON: Whatever arrangement the province concerned makes with its municipalities, we cannot, of course, control; but I am sure that the provinces, in making an agreement with the municipalities, must, of necessity, review the situation and determine that question. Some municipalities are able to pay more than others.

Mr. NEILL: The minister says that the Dominion government cannot control the share paid by the municipality. Unless my memory is at fault, it seems to me that the regulations which he issued last year, or the agreement made with the province, stipulated that the province was to pay twenty-five per cent and the city twenty-five per cent. The Dominion government, in other words, did assume some control.

Mr. GORDON: That was a matter of agreement, though.

Mr. NEILL: Can the minister give me some assurance that if he cannot publish these orders in council and regulations in the Canada Gazette he will at least take steps to make the regulations generally public as soon as possible?

Mr. GORDON: It may be because of my lack of experience in these matters, but I was under the impression that all orders in council were published in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, they are not.

Mr. GORDON: Well, there is no reason in the world that I can see, apart from the expense, why they should not be published.

Mr. NEILL: And the regulations?

Mr. GORDON: The regulations also.

Mr. NEILL: Thank you.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Will the provinces be automatically empowered under the bill to work out the relief accounts? That is to say, a certain amount of relief is direct. The province then undertakes to have the recipients do some road work or other necessary public works in payment of these accounts. Will the federal government then demand the payment of that money back in the event of the province working it out?

[Mr. Gordon.]

Mr. GORDON: The money which the federal government will contribute by way of direct relief is non-recoverable. The province, of course, is closely in touch with the local situation and it would be utterly impossible for the Dominion government to take charge of the direct relief, or even of any other work, except, perhaps, in an advisory way; but the contribution made by the Dominion government with respect to relief is non-recoverable.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I am glad to have that explanation, because I may tell the minister that this is not understood by the government of Saskatchewan at the present time. The minister is aware that 25,000 or 30,000 people at least have moved from the dry districts into the north and have settled for the most part on bush lands that belong to the provincial government. In my district I have endeavoured for a long time to get the provincial government to work out the accounts for relief that is administered directly to those settlers. This is a very important problem. Thousands of those men have come into the bush areas where no roads, no facilities whatever were provided. The provincial government, as the minister knows, is not in possession of the necessary funds to build roads, and those men having received and still being on relief, and who further, I take it, will be obliged to be on relief for a considerable time, there is a means there of getting those roads built. But the Saskatchewan government at any rate understands that if it secures payment of those accounts by way of road work, the federal government may demand the return of the money. I should like to get that point clear, because it is very important. A large amount of money and the welfare of many people are involved, because the settlers cannot continue to remain in those districts unless they are provided with roads. As I have said, the provincial government is not in possession of funds to enable it to build roads. The money has already been spent. For the most part, the settlers to whom I refer are willing to work out their quota on the roads, to chop out bush roads, build grades and do the necessary work, but the provincial government understands it has no authority to have the accounts worked out in that way, because the federal government has an interest in the relief that is being handed out. I should like to have the minister make that clear so that there will be no misunderstanding.

Mr. GORDON: The only money that the federal government expects to have returned to it is that which is loaned to the province concerned—and this affects all three western provinces alike—to pay its share under the agreements that have heretofore been entered into. What the province is doing with respect to its share, I am not aware. I promise the hon member, however that when the new agreements are entered into, I shall go into that question with the officials of Saskatchewan in order that, if they will give me the information, a clear picture may be had. Then I shall be glad to let the hon. member know exactly what the situation is as between the provinces, municipalities and individuals as nearly as I can get the information.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I thank the minister for making the point clear.

Mr. VENIOT: I desire, for the sake of information, to call the attention of the minister to paragraph (a) of clause 2 which reads:

> Enter into agreements with any of the provinces respecting relief measures therein.

Under that will the federal government enter into an agreement with the provinces to pay any part of the cost of public works carried on for the relief of unemployment, or will they simply lend the money to the provinces that desire to carry out the work?

Mr. GORDON: It is not the intention of the government to contribute towards the construction of public works that are started as a measure of relief—

Mr. VENIOT: By the provinces?

Mr. GORDON: Yes. The question of loaning money for that purpose, when a province desires such work to be carried on, can, of course, be taken up with it at the time.

Mr. VENIOT: Having received that answer, I understand the minister said that as regards food, clothing, and so forth, in camps, or what would be called direct relief, the government would pay fifty per cent. Am I correct in that?

Mr. GORDON: That is under review now with some of the provinces. With other provinces we have not got that far.

Mr. VENIOT: That being direct relief, the people being housed in tents, is the federal government not contributing to public works if the people housed in those camps are engaged in the construction of roads and bridges for the provinces?

Mr. GORDON: To that extent we are, but where camps are available to which men can go and receive food and clothing and are willing to work, as has been pointed out, they will be on a subsistence basis. My view is that men who cannot be employed as they would be in normal times, will be very happy to take advantage of just such camps and to do a few days' work.

Mr. VENIOT: Then the Dominion government will pay fifty per cent of that?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Before I leave the question which I raised with the minister a few minutes ago, I should like to get this point clear. He has made it plain that in so far as the grant under this bill is concerned, the province will have the right, if it so desires, to work out those accounts. What I want to get clear is the right of Saskatchewan to work out the accounts that were given out last year. Does the same system apply? The farmers to whom I refer are those from the dry districts who moved up into the north and are under the direct jurisdiction of the relief commission as farmers from the drought area. I understand the federal government is paying one hundred per cent of the relief. Will the provincial government have authority to work out those accounts? The money has already been disbursed; notes have been taken. The notes of course will never be paid in cash; we quite realize that. The roads are necessary if the people are to be kept on the land, and it is most important that something like that be done. At the present time the provincial government feels it is not in possession of sufficient legal authority to work out those accounts. The ministers with whom I have discussed the matter—and I have discussed the matter—and I have discussed it with at least two of them—feel that if they work out those accounts, have the notes paid in that way, the federal government may claim part of that money from the province.

Mr. GORDON: It is obvious that this government in no case could claim it all, even if it were worked out hundred per cent, because a percentage of that money was contributed by the province itself.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I understand with regard to those farmers in the drought areas —and they are the men to whom I refer— hundred per cent of relief was paid by the federal government. Is that not so?

Mr. GORDON: Does the hon. member refer to the notes, to which reference was made, that were taken by the relief commission?

Mr. CAMPBELL: Yes.

Mr. GORDON: Since the debate upon the resolution, I have been endeavouring to get a complete statement from the province with respect, first, to the reason for taking notes—although I have been advised in a measure as to what it was, namely, that some people insisted on giving them—and, second, to the steps, if any, that have been taken or are in contemplation with regard to enforcing payment of those notes. I may say, just at this juncture, that the government feels, and I am sure the members of the committee will agree, that even if a particular advance were recoverable and it was so stated at the time, it would be a most unfortunate attitude for this or the provincial government to assume to press for payment of the account until the recipient of the money was well on his feet again. I can only say I shall have a more complete picture with respect to that particular phase of the Saskatchewan difficulties, and I shall be glad, even if it does not come until after this bill is through, to make a statement in the house before prorogation.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I am very glad to hear that, but I think the minister has missed one point. What the provincial government is concerned about is that they, not the farmer, will be asked for the money. As far as the settlers who have moved up into the bush areas are concerned we might as well recognize that they never will be able to pay off that money in cash. It will take them half a lifetime to get established in that bush country, and without roads they are going to be forced to move out unless something is done. It is a matter of urgent importance that something be done there immediately, and yet the ministers of the Saskatchewan government feel that they are not in possession of the authority to have these accounts worked out. It is not a question of collecting from the farmer, because they know that the farmer cannot pay. It is clear that the provincial government, having secured payment of these notes in road work, will not be asked to pay that money back to the federal government? If that point is cleared up we can have road gangs started out in that country in a few weeks and a lot of good work can be done.

Mr. GORDON: So far as my knowledge goes the government of Saskatchewan unfortunately, has not taken that particular phase of the matter up with this government, certainly not with me. I will get in touch with the officers of the provincial government and find out from them just what the situation is. It certainly cannot give rise to any great difficulty, because if the situation is as the hon. member has described it, it would appear that there must of necessity be some help given there. So far as experience has taught us, I seriously doubt if there is any use—I am quite in agreement with the hon. member—in taking notes from people who have suffered the reverses that the farmers in the dried out areas in Saskatchewan have suffered. I do not think the matter will give rise to any serious difficulty, but I shall have to get in touch with the representatives of the province of Saskatchewan, because I do not think a submission has ever been made to this government along the lines mentioned by my hon. friend.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I am not objecting to the taking of the notes. In fact these men are quite ready and willing to sign the notes and work them out, and I myself rather subscribe to the principle of taking notes and giving the people concerned an opportunity to work them out where work is available.

Mr. VALLANCE: In other provinces than Saskatchewan where direct relief was given, was any note taken from the recipient of relief?

Mr. GORDON: I am not in possession of any information with respect to that.

Mr. VALLANCE: Then am I to understand that the individuals in Saskatchewan who received direct relief from this government were the only ones who had to sign notes?

Mr. GORDON: Others may have, but I can only repeat that it was not done at the suggestion of or with the approval of the Dominion government nor was it done in Saskatchewan at the suggestion of or with the approval of the Dominion government.

Mr. VALLANCE: But the notes are payable to the Dominion government.

Mr. GORDON: I am told so, though I have never seen one of them.

Mr. VALLANCE: We have one here.

Mr. VENIOT: I referred a little while ago to men working in the camps. That is one system of direct relief. The other system of direct relief, I take it, would be that people who were unable to get work, or perhaps were even unable to work, would get direct relief in the shape of food, clothing and shelter from the provincial government and the municipal authorities. So far as that system is concerned, is the federal government prepared to do as it did last year, assume 33⅓ per cent of the cost?

Mr. NEILL: Fifty per cent this year.

Mr. VENIOT: The federal government assumed only 33⅓ per cent last year. If they assumed fifty per cent in other places, they did not in New Brunswick, at all events. I am not referring to that in criticism of the government at all. My point is that direct relief will have to be distributed in some systematic way, and as the federal government assumes 33⅓ per cent, or fifty per cent if you like, of the cost of direct relief, should they not indicate to the provinces how, in the opinion of the federal government, this relief should be distributed? The reason I ask the question is this: For the first time since 1930 the county of Gloucester, which I have the honour to represent, is receiving, and has received I believe since last September, direct relief, one-third of the cost being borne by the municipalities, one-third by the province and one-third by the federal government. It appears, in fact it is certain, that in certain sections of the province an organization that we call the Fathers of the Poor, which is appointed by the municipal council to see that people shall not suffer from hunger during the winter, has been completely ignored and the municipal councillors themselves are distributing this direct relief. Would it not be possible for the minister, in negotiating the agreements with the provinces, to have it understood or stipulated in the agreement that this direct relief shall not be given out to the poor by the municipal councils, but that those named under the Poor Law in each county shall be the ones to distribute this direct relief? I am laying this matter before the minister now in the hope that next year I shall not have to make the same complaints that I made this year as to the distribution of relief by way of public works. I followed very closely the administration of this relief in my county, and I say it is a crime to allow municipal councillors to say who shall and who shall not get relief. The element of politics immediately enters in. Though we take our politics very seriously in the maritime provinces, and especially in the province of New Brunswick, our county councillors take their municipal politics even more seriously than do the members of the local legislature or of the federal house. Having drawn the minister's attention to that situation I would ask him to be good enough to have the matter looked into with a view to having this direct relief distributed through other channels than, at any rate, the municipal councils.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): For the sake of information may I ask if the municipal councils are not responsible for the appointment of the poor authorities which my hon. friend has mentioned?

Mr. VENIOT: Certainly they are.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Then does my hon. friend think it would be advisable, after all, to take from the municipal councils, which have to contribute one-third of the cost, the right to have something to say as to how the relief shall be distributed?

Mr. VENIOT: I am not taking the right from them. I shall be perfectly satisfied if the officials named by the council, namely the Fathers of the Poor, will distribute that money. The distribution of the money in New Brunswick offers a different problem. In that province there are some parishes with almshouses and some without them. There is an almshouse in the parish of Bathurst in which the poor are placed, and if it overflows the remainder are left outside. In the parishes where there are no almshouses the three officials named by the councillors who administer the dole to the deserving poor in that parish are known as the Fathers of the Poor. I am in favour of a continuance of that practice, but I do not want municipal councillors to go about allotting the money voted by the federal government and passing through the provincial government for the relief of the poor.

Mr. VALLANCE: May I say to the hon. member for Gloucester that I wish the municipalities in Saskatchewan could distribute their relief moneys. Before allowing section 2 to pass I should like to ask the minister a question concerning subsection (d), which reads as follows:

> Loan or advance money to, or guarantee the payment of money by any public body, corporation or undertaking.

Who is the "corporation"? What would come under the term "undertaking"? Does the government purpose loaning money to private corporations?

Mr. GORDON: That clause has been explained by the Prime Minister, and I do not know that any useful purpose would be served by repetition.

Mr. VALLANCE: Very well.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to direct the attention of the minister and hon. members to the very extensive powers given the governor in council under section 2, and to draw particular attention in that connection to the significance of the words: "and notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law." This section gives the governor in council the power, on such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon, to:

(a) Enter into agreements with any of the provinces respecting relief measures therein;
(b) Grant financial assistance to any province by way of loan, advance, guarantee or otherwise;
(c) Take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to protect the credit and financial position of the dominion or any province thereof;
(d) Loan or advance money to, or guarantee the payment of money by any public body, corporation or undertaking.

The governor in council is given power to do all those things which, in themselves, are very wide. The clause as it reads, however, goes even farther, because it gives the governor in council power to do all those things "notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law." In other words, all the laws or statutes this parliament may have enacted which relate to any of the matters dealt with by this section may be set aside by the governor in council, if in entering into agreements, making loans or advances under this section or in dealing with other matters referred to he so decides. Subsection (d), to which reference has just been made, is as follows:

Loan or advance money to, or guarantee the payment of money by any public body, corporation or undertaking.

That includes loans, guarantees or advances to banks, trust companies, insurance companies, investment companies, transportation companies, construction companies. The section as it reads means that any of these bodies if large enough, may receive public moneys in the form of loans, guarantees or the like at the discretion of the governor in council, notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law which may have been enacted by this parliament to safeguard public interests in any dealings with corporations such as I have mentioned. I should like to hear from the minister his justification for those words. Instead of the words of "notwithstanding the provision of any statute or law" I think there should be substituted "subject to the provisions of any statute or law." Unless the minister can give some real or substantial reason why the powers here being conferred on the governor in council, and which are very great indeed, should not be made subject to existing statutes and laws, I would be inclined to move an amendment making them subject thereto.

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt that the powers sought in this section are wide. I do not think I should be serving any useful purpose if I were to dwell at length upon the comprehensiveness of those powers, because I am sure every possible angle of this legislation has been explored not only during the last two sessions but during this session. Of course the statute is comprehensive, and if my memory serves me correctly the same language was used in the enactment of 1931.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, but the present bill goes farther, has other clauses to which this language now applies.

Mr. GORDON: The same language was used with respect to investing the governor in council with the powers the enactment contemplated, notwithstanding any statute or law. If the suggestion of the right hon. gentleman were accepted, we would defeat the very object of the legislation. There might and probably would be laws on the statute books which would prohibit the carrying out of this proposed legislation, and that is the reason the powers are so comprehensive. On the sanity and care which is exercised in the administration of this legislation which would vest in the governor in council very wide powers, this government of course will have to be judged. We will have to accept that judgment, whether it be one of condemnation or otherwise.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the substitution of the words I have suggested for the words appearing in the bill would defeat the object of the legislation then I cannot comprehend the extent of the power the governor in council may wish to have. What is the present position? All legislation enacted by the government to-day is subject to existing statutes and laws except to the extent that existing statutes may be repealed. They are asking for additional powers for the governor in council; surely if they are given all the additional powers they seek they ought to be content to accept them subject to existing statutes or laws. If there are statutes or laws standing in the way of the powers they wish to take unto themselves, let them indicate what those laws may be, so that we may deal with them specifically, and if need be let us remove them. I do submit, however, that to grant this further power to the governor in council by legislating far and beyond anything parliament itself usually attempts is going altogether too far. I cannot see that there is any justification for going the length suggested in this section. Accordingly I move:

That section 2 be amended by striking out the word "notwithstanding" in line 24, and substituting therefor the words "subject to."

So that the section will read:

The governor in council may, on such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon, and subject to the provisions of any statute or law—

Then follows an enumeration of what the governor in council may do under the additional powers here vested in them.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Lost on division.

Mr. RALSTON: May I refer to subsection 2 (d). This gives sufficient power to the governor in council either to guarantee the bonds of the Beauharnois undertaking or to advance money to the corporation. Is it intended to act under this subsection in connection with the Beauharnois project?

Mr. GORDON: So far as I know the matter has never been the subject of discussion. But I believe the hon. member is quite correct in suggesting that the subsection is broad enough to permit such being done if in the judgment of the government, it were a desirable thing to do.

Mr. RALSTON: Is it intended by this subsection to ratify the guarantees which have been given to the extent of some six or seven million dollars?

Mr. GORDON: There has been no discussion so far as I am aware as to adopting the course suggested under this section.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The Prime Minister's words were fairly specific this afternoon with respect to this question. He said it was for the purpose of guaranteeing in any manner deemed advisable by the government a corporation that might be set up to carry out certain provisions of this bill. Surely this legislation takes on a different aspect altogether if the government are going to seek authority to deal with the Beauharnois project, and so ignore parliament entirely. Last session the government introduced a bill to deal with that project alone, stating that their predecessors in office had dealt with it by order in council, the legality of which they doubted. Now if this legislation is to be used for the purpose it is a real affront to parliament. Surely parliament is entitled to know if it is to be so used.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Some of us are rather curious to know just what the Prime Minister meant when last July he referred to receiving a great many telegrams from people in Saskatchewan requesting that they be allowed to give notes in return for relief granted to them. An order was passed on the 23rd of March for the production of those telegrams, and I think the minister should have them before him before the section passes. Has he on file the telegrams, or does he know anything about them?

Mr. GORDON: I have not the telegrams to which reference has been made; as a matter of fact I have not seen them.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Why is it that from March 23 up to the present time they have not been brought down? Four or five days ago I asked why they had not been tabled, and the Prime Minister said he was under the impression that they had been. There should be no difficulty in getting those telegrams. We are anxious to know who in Saskatchewan requested that the farmers alone should be required to give notes.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): They are honest people, why quibble about it?

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Certainly.

Mr. GERSHAW: The minister has told us something about the drought-stricken area in Saskatchewan, for the relief of which this government has provided one hundred per cent. If the people of Alberta applied for similar consideration would it be extended to them? The drought-stricken area does not stop at the boundary; there are men in Alberta adjoining Saskatchewan who have lost three crops and are in a very unfortunate position. Of course, they are getting some relief, and I am not so much interested in the source of the relief as in the method, because they find it much more difficult to get relief than do their neighbours across the boundary. It looks to them very much like unfair discrimination.

Mr. GORDON: I think the hon. member raised the question when the debate took place upon the resolution. I thought I made it clear at that time that if representations are made by the premier of Alberta, and it is apparent that there is a condition such as the hon. member describes, and the province is unable to take care of it, the same consideration will be given to Alberta as has been given to Saskatchewan.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Is not that applicable to every province?

Mr. GORDON: Quite.

Mr. NEILL: Under the subsection (d) there have been repeated reports in the western newspapers—and I think that is sufficient justification for me to ask the minister if there is any foundation for them —indicating the intention of the government of British Columbia to apply for the extension, either in whole or in part by the Dominion government, of the Pacific Great Eastern railway under this legislation. Has the minister had any formal or informal applications to this effect from the government of the province?

Mr. GORDON: I can state with a great deal of confidence that no such request has come to the Labour department. I am sure it would have been referred to me if it had come in. I know of no such request so far as the Labour department is concerned.

Mr. NEILL: You limit it to the Labour department?

Mr. GORDON: Yes. So far as the government is concerned I believe there have been some representations made.

Mr. NEILL: Thank you.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I understand that in some of the western provinces work on the trans-Canada highway is to be stopped at the present time. If a western province should apply to the federal government for a renewal grant for the national highway construction, would it be granted under this bill?

Mr. GORDON: What grant has the hon. member reference to?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I refer to the share of the cost of the trans-Canada highway that the federal government is supposed to have contributed in connection with the construction by the provinces last year.

Mr. GORDON: I believe that if a province makes representations to this government with respect to the trans-Canada highway and the continuance of work thereon, particularly in sections where work on that highway, through the agency of the camps to which reference has been made, is desirable in order to give relief and to provide a home and subsistence to those in need, this government would look favourably upon any such application.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): In connection with the drought-stricken area of Saskatchewan, where a relief commission has been established, in reviewing the correspondence that has passed, particularly between the Minister of Agriculture and the government of Manitoba, it is recognized that the drought area extends into both Manitoba and Alberta. I should like to know whether the governments of Alberta and Manitoba, in order to have direct relief provided in those areas, will be required to establish relief commissions similar to the commission established in Saskatchewan.

Mr. BENNETT: Since I made the arrangement with the province of Saskatchewan the Minister of Labour suggests that perhaps I might answer this question. The province of Saskatchewan was in a peculiar position. Last year it seemed to be the unanimous opinion of this house that where there has been three successive crop failures the event should be treated as a national calamity and the dominion should undertake the responsibility for all relief expenditures in that area. The commission has been administering relief in that area since that date, on that basis, except that with respect to seed grain the dominion has not incurred responsibility for distribution but has merely enabled the province to acquire the grain and make the distribution through its own officials. So far as the other provinces are concerned, namely Manitoba and Alberta, in neither province was there such a condition as that to which I have referred, that is, three successive crop failures. Where there had been one or two failures special provision was made to deal with the situation on an equitable basis under the terms of agreements made between the provinces and the dominion. The dominion has not insisted that commissions be established. If the provinces believe they can best discharge their duties without a commission we have not endeavoured to impose our will upon them. Thus far the other two provinces have functioned through their governments rather than through commissions.

Mr. RALSTON: While the Prime Minister was out I was asking the Minister of Labour with regard to subsection (d), the powers under it and the intentions of the government in connection with it. I asked whether or not by any possibility it was intended to use these powers in order to make advances or guarantees in connection with such a project as Beauharnois, and I thought the minister rather intimated that this might be possible. I think what he said was that the power was wide enough for that purpose. I understood the Prime Minister to say this afternoon that the corporation contemplated here was a corporation which the government might think it advisable to form for the purpose of administering relief measures and matters of that sort. If that is not so perhaps the Prime Minister could give us a little more detailed explanation as to what sort of corporation is contemplated here, because this provision was not in the old act at all.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. gentleman misunderstood what I said this afternoon; perhaps I was not speaking sufficiently loud to be heard. What I intended to say, and what I think I did say, was that this was intended to take the place of such a corporation. I stated that in the United States they had incorporated a finance corporation with a capital of $500,000,000, and when the resolution was before the house some time ago I pointed out what had been done in other countries. This afternoon I instanced the action of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in England in connection with exchange; I pointed out that some countries in South America had defaulted in the payment of interest on their external debt, and I stated that this was the case in other countries as well. This clause is intended to enable the government, instead of creating a corporation, all the capital stock of which it would hold, to make such advances to public enterprises or undertakings as may be necessary in the interests of the well-being of this country as a whole. Undoubtedly that is what is intended. There is no doubt that the provision is broad, but it is not so broad as what is now being done by the finance corporation in the United States, and I think it only fair to say to the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth that I was endeavouring to avoid what I think he will agree it is desirable we should avoid, namely the creation of an organization for the purpose of doing just what the finance corporation is doing in the United States, relieving institutions of their difficulties in connection with frozen assets. Perhaps the hon. gentleman knows better than I do what would happen if we had such a corporation in this country; it would be asked to accept all the wildcat securities there were in Canada, and that I desire to avoid.

Without going into any very great detail I think it is not unfair to say to this committee that I do not suppose there is one member who does not realize that a condition might arise—and some prophets of gloom say it will arise—in which it may be most desirable in the interests of this country as a whole that we should prevent attacks upon our credit such as would bring about the results we have seen in the United States, where in two years some four thousand banks failed and innumerable trust and deposit organizations were compelled to close their doors, with a reorganization possible only by regard being had to the provisions of the finance act. I was told what I believe to be the truth, that half a billion dollars will not be sufficient for the purpose but that much larger sums of money will be required. We have not inexhaustible sources of supply, and it is my conviction that this clause is preferable, in the interests of the country and the orderly conduct of its business, to the creation of a corporation with power to do what the finance corporation is doing in the United States.

I can see how the hon. gentleman misunderstood what I said this afternoon. I was comparing what has been done in the United States with what we were endeavouring to do, and I suggested that the method we are adopting is preferable to the method which has been adopted in that country. In every case the public weal must be the determining factor, and the effect upon the national credit must be the matter that will influence any government in taking whatever action it may desire to take in the premises.

Mr. RALSTON: I appreciate the Prime Minister going into the matter so thoroughly, but the point I had in mind has not been quite cleared up. That point is whether or not the Prime Minister intends that this shall constitute a power whereby the government may guarantee or loan money to what we know as a private corporation, even though it may not be a private company as defined by the Companies Act. That is to say, the Companies Act provides for private companies, as my right hon. friend knows. I am not referring to those; I am speaking of large industrial private corporations doing business in this dominion, which may not be financial institutions, or municipal institutions or public bodies. I am giving Beauharnois as an instance; does the Prime Minister intend that this act shall be sufficiently wide to enable him to assist an undertaking of that kind, or is it intended to apply only to undertakings such as financial institutions, which I take it he has in mind, whose credit he desires to preserve for the general benefit of the national credit?

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I confess to the hon. gentleman that I would find it difficult to answer his question antecedently to the event. If a situation arose in this country in which I believed it desirable from a national standpoint to assist any public enterprise, which is defined as meaning an enterprise with more than thirty-five shareholders, I would not hesitate to recommend that this should be done. I say that very frankly to my hon. friend. But the test must be the necessity of the case, and the necessity of the case must, in turn, be determined not only by the immediate effect upon the enterprise itself, which is not the primary consideration, but by the effect upon the country as a country. I need hardly say to the hon. gentleman that there are contingencies that might arise in this country, if the prophets of gloom are correct, that have no relation to the resources or the strength of the enterprises or institutions inherently; but because of, shall I say, panic conditions in other parts of the world, the immediate effect might be so great as to render it desirable to bolster them up for the moment with the public credit of this country. That is the purpose of it, and I put it to this committee whether it is more desirable to create an institution, just as was done in the United States, in which we should have to find the money to enable it to function and name two or three men as board of governors to do it. It might be done in that way, and it is not improbable that we should find ourselves in a position of very great difficulty by reason of the facts to which I have just alluded.

My best judgment is this—and I am not seeking to impose my judgment on the committee: I can only say frankly that I have given this phase of the matter much more thought and consideration than any other branch of the bill in consequence of what has been communicated to me by persons living outside of Canada who have endeavoured, with some degree of success, to impress upon me the fact that we may be faced with extremely difficult conditions on this continent during the next few months. International transactions of a large character have been carried on by this country in the past and we are not living solely to ourselves; and it might be desirable, in the judgment of those whose opinion I respect, that we should have some power such as this. Because I have myself a strong desire to be in a position to protect the credit and the safety of the financial structure of the dominion and of the provinces, this power is sought. I am only giving my private opinion when I say that unless I felt that the effect upon the country of any particular enterprise—using the word which I think my hon. friend used—being permitted to become insolvent or bankrupt —unless, I say, the effect of that upon the public, or upon the welfare of this country —perhaps that is a better word—were apparent, I should hesitate to recommend that the power should be used. If, on the other hand, the evidence of that result were there, I do not think any government could hesitate at a time like this to ask for its use and to use it.

I am afraid I cannot usefully give any more extended explanation except to say that in connection with Beauharnois I cannot recall that it has ever been suggested that the power should be invoked for that purpose. But if the necessity became sufficiently great the power would be employed for that purpose. I think it is only fair to answer the question that way, although that is not the purpose for which the power is put there. It is put there to meet a situation which I am bound to say one of my most valued colleagues strongly thinks could best be met by establishing a finance corporation. But my own judgment, my conviction is very strong that it would not serve the purposes we have in mind at this time to create any such institution. I am afraid I have gone as far as I reasonably could without putting myself in a position where I might find it difficult to reconcile my statement with the necessity that might arise; and if the necessity arises I do not desire to be limited either by any antecedent promise or by any restriction of interpretation upon the power here conferred.

Mr. POWER: I do not think anyone desires to embarrass the Prime Minister by asking for a more lengthy explanation. With respect to the clause itself, I suppose that those of us on this side of the house who think that the government has already taken sufficient power might oppose it; but I will agree with the Prime Minister that there is room for very wide divergence of opinion as to the method which he proposes to follow in loaning or advancing moneys. I suppose the Prime Minister has given—in fact he says he has—very careful thought to this matter, but it would appear to me and, I believe, to a great many of us, that the opinion of his valued colleague, to the effect that it would be better to have some kind of finance corporation or some kind of commission to deal with matters of this sort, would perhaps be worthy of more consideration than appears to have been given it.

The Prime Minister realizes better than anyone else does the amount of work which the members of his cabinet will have to do. They will be employed during a good part of the summer dealing with problems arising out of the imperial conference. It seems to me that it would be only the fair thing to relieve themselves of this burden, and they would be giving the best thought and consideration to matters of this kind if they set up some kind of commission—and I am not saying that because I personally approve of commissions, for I think we have too many already. But this is possibly the most important section of the bill. The Prime Minister must be aware that, by inserting a clause of this kind, he is substituting himself and his government, and the Minister of Finance, I have no doubt, for a commission. All sorts of applications will be made for the backing and guaranteeing of wildcat schemes such as he has referred to, and I have no doubt the government have the strength of character to refuse these applications. On the other hand, it seems to me that the Prime Minister and the members of his government, or the treasury board,—I assume that they will be dealing with these matters—are taking on themselves a most intolerable burden. There are institutions in this country, there are public corporations and companies which are in urgent need of financing, and after hearing or reading the Prime Minister's statement of to-night they will, I have no doubt, be camped on his doorstep to-morrow. Personally I would suggest that this power and authority be curtailed somewhat, even if the minister were to accept an amendment, that such advances or loans should not be made unless they were in the interests of unemployment relief. The credit of the country can already be sufficiently protected by steps taken under clause (c), which declares that the governor in council may:

> Take all such measures as in his discretion may be deemed necessary or advisable to protect the credit and financial position of the Dominion or any province thereof.

It seems to me that is going pretty far; it is going almost far enough. If we are going to protect the credit of private corporations, I very respectfully suggest that that is a power that should not be in the hands of a political body such as the ministry.

Mr. BENNETT: In last year's act paragraph (c) of section 3 read as follows:

> Assist provinces, cities, towns, municipalities, and other bodies or associations, by loaning moneys thereto or guaranteeing repayment of moneys thereby, or in such other manner as may be deemed necessary or advisable.

Under the provisions of that statute moneys were loaned to four of the provinces and in respect to another an undertaking was made which happily had not to be carried into effect. No loans were made to municipalities, because we took the ground that there was no contact between municipalities and the dominion. If the hon. gentleman reads the clause to which he has just referred, he will observe that it covers cases dealt with partly in paragraph (c) of section 3 of the statute of last year, and also special provisions with respect to the provinces themselves.

I do not fear any camping upon the doorstep of the government by any enterprises, because the government has no intention that this power shall be utilized except under the circumstances that I have indicated. This power under paragraph (c) has been referred to on more occasions than one, but we have not yielded to such requests, nor have we any intention of doing so. I may say, however, that unless conditions were emergent, we should not have this bill before the house at all, and it will be borne in mind that when this afternoon we were discussing the nice division of power between the provinces and the dominion, their lordships of the privy council, speaking in connection with the regulation of paper prices, were good enough to say that there may exist in this country an emergency under which the powers of the provinces must be subordinated to, must be overborne by that of the dominion, for the national good.

In this instance, subject to whatever limitations may be imposed upon an executive by reason of a sense of the gravity of a situation and the responsibility they owe to the people at large, I know of no other way in which, without creating an invitation for the government to undertake to liquefy vast volumes of securities that are now frozen—which action it has no desire or intention of taking—we can accomplish what we have in mind. And because we desire to utilize these powers only where the national good is affected, although it may be charged that this is a political body, I should like to remind the committee that it is a political body which every year determines just what advances shall be made under the Finance Act to the banks of this country. It may be political, but I am only saying that is so and has been for years, yet I have not heard anyone say that this power has been exercised for political consideration. Every year the Minister of Finance and the treasury board must consider to what amount advances under the Finance Act shall be made to the chartered banks of Canada. The banks make their applications; they are rarely granted in full. The government, that is the treasury board, determines what action it shall take and grants the credits accordingly. No greater power is involved in the exercise of what is provided for under this clause than is provided for under the provisions of the Finance Act and the Bank Act, and I have not heard it charged that this political body has for political considerations exercised that power.

Mr. POWER: I am sorry if the Prime Minister thinks I suggested that. I did not mean to do so.

Mr. BENNETT: It was suggested it was a political body—

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: —and if it was suggested, it was for the reason it might not properly discharge its functions. I am mentioning only by way of illustration that that power has been exercised for at least twenty-five years by the treasury board and there is no record of which I have any knowledge that it has been exercised except for the public weal. I might go on for a long time giving illustrations. If anyone for a moment suggests that this power is being sought merely to provide a little more work or a little more responsibility, he is entirely mistaken. It is an effort, if possible, to avoid some responsibility and to lessen the demands that may be made. I am practically certain that as regards any corporation that might be created of which the government would be the sole shareholder, the demand would be far greater for political influence than if it were regulated by the known considerations that affect governments in connection with matters under the Bank Act, the Finance Act and others to which I might refer.

Mr. RALSTON: My right hon. friend in this clause has, I think, bitten off, if I may use a slang phrase, for himself and his colleagues the greatest difficulty of any of those which have faced them since they have been in office, due to any cause one cares to name. At most, a power of this kind should be exercised in conjunction with and through the financial institutions of this country, and it will be a sorry day for the government—and I do not mean this in any political or partisan sense—and a bad day for Canada when the government finds it necessary to go into business in connection with any of the multifarious activities of our people. Take for instance the Beauharnois situation. The government, by undertaking to advance money directly, puts itself into the power business. Let us assume the paper situation gets worse. I happen to know a little about that and, as anybody knows, it is not good. It is an important national industry. Does my right hon. friend really think it a good thing even for this government to take authority to go into the paper business, and advance money directly to it? The same might be said for the textile business, the mining industry, manufacturing or agriculture or fishing. It would be far better if my right hon. friend limited this clause to guaranteeing or supplying money to the recognized financial institutions of this country and let them handle it as they are experts in that sort of thing. Some people think they are too expert; that they perhaps do not exercise the spirit of human kindness to the degree that borrowers would like, but we can be justly proud of our banking system and our banking institutions have stood up under a test which has been the admiration of those far beyond our own borders. My right hon. friend could do much worse than to limit this clause to a provision for advancing the money through our recognized financial institutions. Then let them use their discretion and the machinery and organization which they have, for the purpose of determining whether an industry is one which is worth while saving, whether its prospects are such as might justify an investment in or a loan to it, whether it is, in a national, not simply a commercial sense, one worth while assisting under this measure. I submit, with all due respect to him and his government and, in fact, to any government, this would be far better machinery for the purpose of exercising such power. My right hon. friend will say to me: Well, an emergency may arise. I say to him, with all deference, that before this government considers going into the power or the textile or the mining business or any other commercial activity, we had better have a special session of parliament in order to deal with the matter rather than have the government committing the country to the expenditure of large sums of money in commercial enterprises and creating precedents which we shall take a long time to live down. These are my views, and I hesitate even to express them in the light of my hon. friend's business experience.

May I say this further word, and I say it with all respect? I do feel that sometimes there is a tendency for men of large affairs when connected with government to feel, perhaps unconsciously, that they should have their finger on the commercial pulse. I submit that the business of government primarily is to take obstacles out of the way of industry and to assist general business as best they may by making conditions such that private enterprise can be allowed to be conducted and be prosperous under its own management. We can so easily get into the position where we have too much government in business. It may be good government; at least my right hon. friend and his supporters and a large part of the country may feel that it is, but nevertheless it is not a good principle, and I submit that business and government ought to be separated. There is plenty of room for the activities of my right hon. friend and all his cabinet and all his supporters in taking obstacles out of the way of industry and not interfering too much even though with benign intentions with the activities of men who know their own jobs and have been able to run them so far. I submit that my right hon. friend might well amend this section by confining it to assistance through financial institutions and recognized organizations which generally provide financial assistance to industries which are in need of capital and which are deserving.

Mr. BENNETT: I only desire to make this further observation. With the closing words of my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth I have no quarrel. It was Jefferson who said that government was best conducted that interfered the least with business, and it was a great American who coined the phrase: He governs best who governs least, with respect to business. Business is not the function of government. I have publicly and privately expressed that opinion so frequently that I suppose it is well known to everybody. I do not believe it is any duty of a government to conduct the business of this country, and were it not for an emergent condition in which the national interest is affected it would not be even considered or mentioned so far as I am concerned.

With respect to what the hon. gentleman has just now said as to the method by which it is proposed to give effect, if effect is given, to the authority thus conferred upon the executive, I think in the very nature of things it would be done through the institutions of the country. No one is expecting that John Smith's company is going to come up and ask for a loan and get it, and if that is what the hon. gentleman is worrying about I can assure him that no one is going to deal with the matter in that way. My hon. friend is now discussing another phase, namely the method by which it would be done. I fancy if some of my colleagues were to tell the hon. gentleman exactly what my views are as expressed he would have no difficulty in learning, as naturally anyone with any experience at all would realize, that it would not be a proper exercise of power except in the most exceptional circumstances to undertake to make a loan to an enterprise as such, but one would through the constituted channels of business give effect to the provisions of the statute. When I say constituted channels of business I mean what the hon. gentleman is referring to, the banks and various other financial institutions that have to deal with the question of finance and credits. I am not unmindful, in fact, I have too much knowledge of what the hon. gentleman says as to the undesirability of governments trying to conduct business. I am having it brought home to me almost every day by the demands that are being made to meet the obligations which we have guaranteed of various enterprises simply because we found ourselves in business. Last week, for instance, it was the Montreal harbour commission in connection with the bridge; or it is the Quebec harbour commission; the Three Rivers harbour commission; the Chicoutimi harbour commission; the Halifax harbour commission; the St. John harbour commission. All these do not have their securities maturing on the same day, and the obligations are being constantly thrust upon us. There are others that might be mentioned. No one would think for a minute, if that is what the hon. gentleman has in mind, that one would desire to add to his responsibilities, or that any member of the government desires to add to his responsibilities by endeavouring to conduct the business of other people whose special knowledge should enable them to conduct it better than anyone else could. But there are enterprises in this country that are as much a part of this country as the country itself. There are great enterprises in this country to which references have been made in this house during the last few months. No one could contemplate disaster overtaking some of them, as the hon. gentleman himself said some evenings ago, without using every possible effort to prevent it. One does not know what may happen. I am not endeavouring in any sense to alarm this house, but I do know that every day one hears further tales of a situation that is not blamable to Canadians nor yet to a Canadian situation, but which obtains by reason of our relation to world business and world enterprise. I can assure the hon. gentleman that so far as I am able to control it, I should not endeavour to utilize these powers by direct action between the enterprises themselves and the dominion except, for instance, in a case such as he has mentioned, in the case of the Beauharnois undertaking—I did not think of it until he mentioned it—where the canal is completed and provides for navigation facilities, and for the sake of continuing the enterprise we acquire the bonds or short term notes, whatever they might be, that represent the cost of the navigation undertaking. That would merely mean a temporary loan pending the financing of the organization in accordance with the terms of the order in council. That would not be in any sense an interference with business. That would mean the acquisition of securities that represented money spent for the building of a canal for navigation purposes, but being a much more comprehensive scheme than is necessary for merely power purposes. I mention that because the hon. gentleman has just brought it to my attention. But as to the methods to be employed to accomplish that end I have not given any thought to it. I do assure my hon. friend and this committee that no man who has had any experience in business in Canada under present conditions would think of endeavouring to have the government conduct business as such, but would look to the constituted organizations and institutions created by this parliament and otherwise for the purpose of dealing with these matters, feeling a sense of security in so doing and using entirely their own judgment in connection with the matter.

As an illustration I once more refer to a matter very painful to discuss, and that is the Manitoba savings office. It was just because we had no facilities to engage in the business of banking that we were not able to take over that enterprise. We had no facilities for that purpose, and all we could do was to utilize the existing facilities. One of two things had to be done. It was suggested that we take it over and say: Everything is safe, we will guarantee and take the business over. But we had nobody to put in the office. The office had to be continued or else closed, and I certainly gathered that it was intended to close it. It it were closed it would naturally be taken over by the only institutions that this country has to deal with that business, namely, the banks. The banks divided these deposits of about 40,000 people and became responsible for the payment to them of their deposits. All they had as security until we came into the picture were pieces of paper signed by the province of Manitoba, which had exhausted all its collateral securities, by sale or hypothecation, and which had left as security no money but only pieces of paper belonging to the province. They called them exchequer bills, and under those circumstances, just as the hon. member has pointed out, the banks said, "We will not add to our present securities of that kind; in fairness to our depositors and our business, we cannot. "But," they said, "if you will say that we are not going to be losers in this transaction, we will take over those deposits"—and we did. That is an illustration of the similarity of views between the hon. member and myself.

[Mr. Bennett.]

I do not think we are in a position to conduct that sort of business. If this country desires to nationalize its banking facilities, well and good. By a majority vote of parliament and by the government of the day introducing proper legislation it can easily do so. Until that time, however, I agree with the hon. member that the conduct of that business must rest with those who are specially trained and have had years of experience in the discharge of that kind of obligation and the transaction of that form of business. So far as possible I assure the hon. member that is exactly what lies in the minds of the government, if the powers under this section have to be invoked.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Following the question by the hon. member for Assiniboia I should like to ask a question respecting the proposed dollar an acre on a seeded acreage basis. I think the ministry knows all about it, and they will be able to answer without the petition or the correspondence before them. This is the third time I have asked the question, and I do not wish any hon. member opposite to accuse me of nagging if I persist in my efforts to obtain an answer. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture are both present, and are familiar with the circumstances. The Minister of Immigration is in the chamber, but because of his short term of office in the Department of Labour he may not be quite so familiar with the facts. I should like to know, Mr. Chairman, the definite attitude of the government with respect to the proposed dollar an acre on the seeded acreage basis. All hon. members know that the north country which had excellent crops was treated magnificently. In some cases bonuses to individuals ran up to $1,000. The man who had much was given much, and the man who had nothing was given nothing; he had not enough to feed or clothe a canary, but was given the opportunity merely to sign a promissory note. We do not wish to speak to this matter over and over again, but we do want to know if that is to be the policy of the government as to the relative treatment of those two classes of people. I do not want a long answer; yes or no would be satisfactory.

Mr. BENNETT: The anxiety of the ex-Minister of Agriculture should not long remain unsatisfied. Petitions were presented, and those who presented them, without having to wait for an answer, were told that it was not the intention to pay a dollar an acre.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It was not feasible?

Mr. BENNETT: They were told that at the time, and the government of Saskatchewan was told the same thing weeks and months ago. Therefore there could have been no difficulty in understanding that the government had declined to meet that request. It has declined as courteously as possible; it has declined as firmly as possible; there was opportunity for neither ambiguity nor misunderstanding. They simply said, "no" as politely as it could be said. I am sure it was said as politely as any observations made by the hon. member for Melville in this or any other session.

That being so, the hon. gentleman says that the north and south have been treated differently, and he makes the further statement that the bonus resulted in some receiving large sums of money; he mentions the sum of $1,000. The bonus was paid for one reason, and for one reason only, namely that the cost of production exceeded the cost obtainable for the grain, owing to the depressed conditions throughout the world. I do not know, but I am told by one of the prime ministers in the west that had it not been for the intervention of the federal government the price of wheat would have fallen to forty cents a bushel. Whether that statement is correct or not I cannot say.

So far as those in authority is concerned, I wish to go further and state that when we made provision for the bonus the crop reports were somewhat different from the actual returns, and the crops in the north were much more favourable than had been anticipated. In other words there was a larger crop harvested in the west than was expected at the time we took action, and I am very glad that was so. I do not think any of those who received the bonus find themselves so rich that they have had difficulty in disposing of their money. In the south, where the crop was a partial failure, the government was called upon to make very substantial contributions. The hon. member will no doubt recall that in cases fifty per cent and in one or two cases sixty per cent was paid either by way of direct assistance, or otherwise, to enable those who had gone two years without a crop, or with only half a crop, to find themselves in a better position. It does not follow that this seeming inequality resulted in as great hardship as would appear; in fact the hardships were not nearly as great as they appear when stated. I think I can say I have answered the hon. gentleman's question, and I am sorry he was not aware of the answer that was given some months ago.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is quite satisfactory. I do not say the solution is satisfactory, but at least we have had a statement, and that is the first time such a statement has been made in my hearing in this house. The last statement was made by the Minister of Agriculture, and was very plausible. He took the ground at that time —and I think he was justified—that inasmuch as there were certain adjustments to take place between the dominion and the province of Saskatchewan a definite answer could not be given until the end of the fiscal year. So far as the delegation is concerned, may I say they went back home and had nothing but good things to say about the way the Prime Minister had received them. He gave them everything but an assurance that they would receive the bonus. They were not turned down, however; there was still hope of some alternative, or something to come in the following year. They certainly did not consider they had been turned down flat. Now, however, when we know the situation, we will not persist any longer. I know the policy of the government, and I shall not discuss the relative merits of the two kinds of treatment. At a later time when I shall have something to say, I shall know my ground.

Perhaps now at this time we could get some information concerning the promissory notes. The hon. member for South Battleford asked one or two questions, but the Minister of Immigration seemed to shy a little bit from an exhaustive or definite answer. The people of Saskatchewan do not want to be beggars, but at the same time if there is going to be a dole policy in all other parts of the dominion and a promissory note policy in Saskatchewan, why the discrimination? Why should we be thrown into the hands of the Saskatchewan government subject to whatever action they wish? When we ask this government what it means they disclaim any responsibility in the matter. I should like to have a statement from the Prime Minister—that is good enough for me. If he tells us that the government will continue the promissory note plan with the Saskatchewan farmers and the same if there is any further seed to be obtained, and if he will say that they are not going to insist upon that policy in any other part of the dominion, we will know then what opinions to form of the disparity between policies—between the treatment Saskatchewan gets and that given to the balance of the dominion.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, the provision for the taking of seed grain liens for seed grain advances is a matter wholly determined by the provinces of Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan. I only know we were assured that they were by appropriate legislation making provision in that regard. As to the details of it, I am not in a position to speak because the government did not believe it had, for the reasons given this afternoon by the leader of the opposition, the right to ask the provinces how they did their business. Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and Alberta borrowed from the dominion government money to pay for seed grain, and that seed grain was sold to their citizens—that is my advice—and for that they took a statutory lien specially provided for by the respective legislatures. My memory is that having told us they proposed to do that we merely said: We assume you are taking the security that you mentioned—because part of it was verbally said—in this regard. I do recall that one province proposed that the seed should be paid for within one year, and some I think within two years. The details of that each province has to work out itself. I am bound to say I have not even seen the bill that was passed by any one of the three provinces to deal with this matter. They have all been treated on the same basis, and they are the only provinces thus far that have sought advances from the dominion to buy seed grain. It is not the obligation of this government to supply seed grain; when those provinces were part of the Northwest Territories it was, for then they were wards of the dominion. Every province stands in the same position, and none other than three western provinces has asked for money with which to buy seed grain. That is so far as my memory serves me at the moment. The advances that they desired were very substantial. For those advances they gave us treasury bills to the extent of one hundred cents on the dollar. As they are only permitted to give treasury bills for a year at a time, I think they were all payable one year from date, with interest at the same rate as that at which we borrow money.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The Prime Minister was not in the chamber the night when I first deal with this matter. I have since called up the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) and find that the Saskatchewan bill dealing with the incorporation of the relief commission and authorizing them to do so and so with respect to relief and seed grain has been received by him and forwarded to the Justice department. It is known as Bill No. 54, and anyone can find the bill there. Evidently this Saskatchewan relief commission is to be an incorporated body to act for some time and clothed with all kinds of power. But that is not answering the question with regard to the promissory notes. Are we up there to sign promissory notes while everybody else gets relief gratis? That is what I want to know.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): The Prime Minister was not in the house a short time ago when I asked a question of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) with regard to an order of the house that was passed on the 23rd of March for a return showing the telegrams that the Prime Minister had received and to which he referred in his speech of July 29th last. On that occasion he said that he had received several telegrams from the province of Saskatchewan suggesting that it was not desirable that direct relief, which might be regarded as charity, should be accorded to those in distress, and they were asking for permission to sign some documents. I think the Prime Minister told me a few days ago that he thought the return had been brought down. Can he give us any information now before this section passes as to why the return has not been tabled?

Mr. BENNETT: I gave instructions that any telegrams asked for be given to the Secretary of State and laid before the house. Beyond that I have not been able to pursue the matter myself. I thought any correspondence referred to had been brought down. Personally I was informed by the Saskatchewan government when I was in Regina in the fall of last year—as the hon. gentleman knows it was in the newspapers—that a number of people did not desire to be the recipients of charity and suggested they should give notes. But that is not the matter we are now talking about. The hon. ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) is asking about seed grain, and I am talking about the seed grain of this year in answer to his question. I have endeavoured to make it perfectly clear that the province of Saskatchewan has passed legislation that deals with this matter and has bought and paid for the seed wheat, or whatever seed it might be, although we took some preliminary steps to assist them in the first instance by ascertaining there was seed grain that might be available in the event of its being paid for. There were difficulties, as the hon. gentleman knows, by reason of delays in getting the money to pay for the seed grain. So far as giving notes is concerned, I had not known what the form of the note was until the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) was good enough to send me over a copy. He will recall my asking him to do so.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): This matter of the notes given in Saskatchewan has been discussed right along since this bill has been before the house. The Prime Minister was not in probably when we were talking more particularly of the notes. There are other members in this house as well as many people outside—there are some in my constituency—anxious to know who the individuals were who telegraphed the Prime Minister to be permitted to give notes. Will the minister bring down those telegrams?

Mr. BENNETT: I will ask my secretary to try to ascertain where the documents are. I do not think I fully understood what the hon. gentleman meant until this minute. He is talking of the form of notes of last year; I was talking of another form this year. It is true I was not in the chamber this evening, but on the other occasion I asked that the return be located and the papers produced. I do not keep a record of all these things in my head.

Mr. VALLANCE: It seems that the whole matter of relief is being dealt with on clause 2. So far I have refrained from discussing the subsidy for field, farm, forest, sea and river and mine products until we reach section 3. Are we privileged to discuss it now, or would the minister prefer to have it dealt with on section 3?

Mr. GORDON: I think it desirable that we dispose of section 2 before starting section 3.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Before we take up section 3 I want to get an answer to my question. Ever since last year until quite recently the commission in Regina has been extolled from the housetops as being the most wonderful institution of its kind. Now we find nobody around here wants to speak a word for it? What has happened? Can't we get something more about what it is doing and who is responsible for it? We know who appointed the commission; of course the Saskatchewan government appointed it, but there are three supervisors, and we would like to know more about them; we understand they were appointed by the Minister of Agriculture. Then we have a super-superviser in the person of Percy Gordon, and we would like to know more about his duties. We want to know first if this is to be a dole all over the dominion with the exception of Saskatchewan, and if Saskatchewan is to be expected to pay back everything it gets. Are they all to be treated alike or are they not? Is the government to hold itself responsible in any measure at all for the policy of the Saskatchewan relief commission, or are we to be thrown into the maw of this commission and just take what we can get? I do not want to be too insistent about this, Mr. Chairman, but please do not call this section carried until we get a more specific answer with regard to these promissory notes which the Saskatchewan farmers have to give for everything they get. The Minister of Immigration knows that I asked these questions last Friday. I did not request a reply; I asked him to discuss these questions with his colleagues over the week-end and try to give us a reply later. I said it as nicely as I could, but we are still without a reply.

Mr. BENNETT: I have endeavoured to answer categorically the questions asked by the hon. gentleman, and I will do so again. Seed grain is covered by a statutory lien which was created by the legislature of Saskatchewan. This government had nothing whatever to do with it beyond supplying the money, for which we obtained the treasury bills of the province, to enable them to purchase the grain sold to the farmers. My understanding of the bill, which I have not read, having seen only what was said to be in the bill, is that it provides for payment out of the proceeds of the crops of this year and next year of the moneys advanced for seed grain and other purposes. Is that a clear statement of the situation? The province borrowed the money and with it bought seed which it sold to the farmers of Saskatchewan, obtaining therefor statutory liens which were adopted at the last session of the legislature. That is the position.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My right hon. friend is about two laps behind everyone else. I put all that information on Hansard away back on March 31. I could read it, but the Minister of Justice would check me up.

Mr. BENNETT: Then why ask for that information again?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am not asking for it again; that has nothing to do with the promissory notes. I think these two hon. gentlemen had better get their heads a little closer together and see if they cannot answer the question I am asking. I supplied the answer myself with regard to the seed grain liens, and I had the bill here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You can smile about it; I suppose you think it is a great joke, but you are not appearing to very great advantage just now. On March 31 I put on Hansard all that information, and neither of the hon. gentlemen who are looking after this bill were in the house at the time. Now they go warbling around about where this bill is now. I have told them where it is; it is in the office of the deputy Minister of Justice. It is not scheduled yet by the number of the chapter; it is just Bill 54 as it came from Regina. I do not want any more information about that bill; I gave that information about a month ago, and I do not want hon. gentlemen opposite to retail that back to me to-night as news or information. I want to know about the promissory notes and the relief that is to be given between now and next harvest. Is the promissory note system to be continued by the Saskatchewan government on behalf of this government? That is what they are doing; they are taking promissory notes collectable by the relief commission on behalf of this government, and we hold this government rather than the Saskatchewan government responsible for the whole business.

Mr. BENNETT: By his observations my hon. friend has indicated that he was asking questions with regard to which he enlightened this house himself, and for which he takes great credit. We have now to deal with the other question, that of promissory notes for relief given last year by the commission, and continued. Some months ago I explained to the house as clearly as I could that these notes were taken by the commission. In consequence of statements which were made I inquired and found that the commission had taken notes from all persons who received relief, and that the notes were made payable to the crown in the right of the dominion. The hon. member for Weyburn showed me one of the notes, the first I had seen; he sent it to me across the floor of the house. I said further that those notes were taken, as I understood it, because many of the applicants for relief said they did not wish to be in the position of receiving charity, and as a consequence they gave notes. In practice it has been found very excellent in preventing abuses. In other words, by giving a note, whether or not they ever intended to pay it, at least they placed a limitation on what they were receiving, and I can only say further that in one or two cases in which there were abuses, to which I directed attention some weeks ago in this house, it will be remembered that relief had been obtained by some who were not entitled to it, and the very notes they had given formed the foundation upon which appropriate action could be taken.

I can only repeat to the hon. gentleman that notes have been given payable to the crown in the right of the dominion. These are printed forms which have not been departed from by the commission that took the notes. So far as I know, notes have been taken by the commission, whether or not in all cases I cannot say, but certainly in the cases to which reference was made when we were discussing this matter some weeks ago. We can neither add to nor detract from that fact; notes have been taken and given. They are payable to the crown in the right of the dominion. The commission asked for and received the notes; those who received benefits gave the notes as indicating the extent to which those benefits were received, whether in the way of provisions, clothing, or whatever it might be, in consequence of the orders given by the commission.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is all with reference to the past, and we know about the past. My hon. friend from Weyburn told the right hon. gentleman about these matters a couple of months ago, and he was the first to inform my right hon. friend about these notes. What I should like to know now is what will be done between now and next harvest. Are these notes to continue until then? Will this government hold itself at all responsible for anything the Saskatchewan government may choose to do? What will be the policy with regard to this matter for the next few months?

Mr. BENNETT: That is a matter entirely in the hands of the commission and the government of Saskatchewan. It is perfectly clear that this must be so.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then we want to know more about the commission. Who are these supervisors? We should have a pretty good commission there now; we have these three supervisors as well as the extra super-supervisor supervising them. I do not know who is supervising this super-supervisor, or whether we can go back indefinitely, but we would like to know all about them. I think the Minister of Agriculture should come to our assistance in this regard; I believe he was responsible for their appointment. I do not wish to drag him into this discussion at this late hour, but he took a lot of pride in the fact that when he was absent he would have two or three supervisors keeping this commission on the right track. I think perhaps there is something to be said for that idea, but I would like to know more about this super-supervisor,—Mr. Gordon, who is over these three supervisors. What is his salary? We should have a great sense of security now; we should not be alarmed about the policy that is to be adopted, and we would not be alarmed if we could be sure that all these gentlemen were one hundred per cent for the farmers and that they were entirely non-political as at one time it was claimed. If the Prime Minister has no further information to impart I will not ask any more questions just now.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Powers of governor in council.

Mr. VALLANCE: I notice that subsection (b) states that the government may:

—assist in defraying the cost of the sale and distribution of the products of field, farm, forest, sea, river and mine.

I should like to ask the minister this question: Is it the intention of the government to carry on the subsidy paid last year for wheat, or are they going to extend this to the products of farm, field, forest, sea, river and mine, as was suggested by the hon. member for Simcoe? I believe it was in the budget debate that he suggested that the subsidy that was given to wheat should be extended in some measure to the other products of the farm. I should like to know from the minister—I notice the Prime Minister is with him—just how far the government intends to go in subsidizing the various products of farm, field, forest, sea, river and mine.

Mr. GORDON: With respect to this clause, there has not been, up to date, one single thing decided as to what may be done with regard to any of these items. With respect to the five cents per bushel bonus, that has not been decided, nor has any decision been arrived at regarding any of the other items. The clause is there, so that if occasion arises and it becomes desirable and necessary the government will have the power to take such action as seems proper.

Mr. VALLANCE: May I assume that if the government, in July or August, say, decide that conditions in the wheat market, in view of the crop situation, warrant action, then they propose by this legislation to take to themselves power so that at any time they may say to the farmers or to the fishermen or to the miners just what they intend to do for them? Have the government no fixed policy in this regard? Is that what I am to understand from the minister?

Mr. GORDON: It would be most difficult for any government to fix a policy to-day to meet events that have not yet occurred.

Mr. VALLANCE: You did it last year.

Mr. GORDON: No. The same clause that appears in this bill appeared in last year's bill, and when the situation arose with respect to the bonus on wheat, which was long after the bill had been passed, then appropriate action, or what the government considered appropriate action, was taken. Surely the hon. gentleman realizes that until the necessity presents itself the policy of the government cannot be declared, even if it were desirable to anticipate what that policy might be or to disclose it before the event.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

CIVIL SERVICE

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON APPOINTMENTS, ADMINISTRATION AND OPERATION OF CIVIL SERVICE ACT

Mr. J. EARL LAWSON (West York): I beg to present the second report, which is a unanimous one, of the select special committee appointed to inquire into the appointments to, and the direction and control of, the civil service of Canada and, generally, the administration and operation of the Civil Service Act, with instructions to inquire into and report concerning the repeal or amendment of any of the provisions of the said act or the substitution therefor or addition thereto of other provisions, as the committee may deem advisable, as follows:

1. With a view to providing that a transfer may be made of a civil servant from one position to another without necessarily involving an increase in remuneration, your committee recommends that section 13 of the Civil Service Act be amended by striking out the word "either" in the sixth line thereof and the words "transfer or" in the sixth and seventh lines thereof.

2. In order to have the provisions of the Civil Service Act comply with the practice which has been established, and with a view to obviating unnecessary correspondence passing between the Civil Service Commission and the departments in respect of promotions, your committee recommends that subsections one and two of section 14 of the act be repealed and the following substituted therefor:

14. The rate of compensation of an employee who has not reached the maximum rate of compensation of the class in which he is serving, may, subject to the regulations of the commission, be increased by the deputy head if he is satisfied that the employee has rendered meritorious service and has increased his usefulness in the service. Such increase shall be to the next higher rate for the class. The new rate shall become effectual at the next quarterly date after the said increase is granted by the deputy head, that is to say, either the first day of January, April, July, or October, provided, however, that no employee whose rate of compensation exceeds six hundred dollars per annum shall receive an increase under the provisions of this section more than once in each year.

3. To correct an obvious error, your committee recommends that subsection two of section 15 of the Civil Service Act be amended by striking out the word "minimum" in the eighth line of the said subsection, and by substituting therefor the word "maximum."

4. To avoid uncertainty as to the interpretation of the words "bona fide residents" in subsection three of section 21 of the Civil Service Act, your committee recommends that the said section be amended by striking out the words "bona fide residents of such locality" at the end of the said subsection and by substituting therefor the words:

"persons who have resided in such locality for a period of at least one year immediately preceding the date last set for receiving applications for such local positions."

5. The Department of Justice having ruled that section 24 of the Civil Service Act permits the deputy head of a department to reject an appointee of the Civil Service Commission without reasons stated therefor, and without trial, your committee recommends that the deputy head of a department have power to reject only for cause, and that such cause be specifically stated.

6. That the provisions of the Civil Service Act as to length of residence in Canada required for eligibility for appointment may accord with the provisions of the Naturalization Act, your committee recommends that subsection one of section 33 of the Civil Service Act be amended by striking out the word "three" in the last line of the said subsection and by substituting therefor the word "five."

7. To enable those who have been in the civil service for less than one year to have limited holidays and to make reasonable provision for holidays for those in the service in tropical countries, your committee recommends that subsection one of section 46 of the Civil Service Act be amended by adding thereto the following words:

"and may grant to each officer, clerk, or other employee who has been less than one year in the service, leave of absence at the rate of one and one-half days for each completed month of continuous service prior to the commencement of the fiscal year; provided that trade commissioners or other officers in tropical countries may be granted a yearly leave of absence for a period not exceeding one calendar month in any one fiscal year, if they have had at least one year in the service."

8. To permit of suspension of an employee, for the purposes set out in section 51 of the Civil Service Act, by his superior officer at distances from Ottawa, your committee recommends that section 51 be amended by adding after the words "deputy head," in the second line of the said section, the words: "or any official of the department nominated by him."

9. Your committee recommends that section 60 of the Civil Service Act, as enacted by Chapter 38 of the Statutes 19-20 George V, be repealed.

10. In order that vacancies created by retirement may be promptly filled, thus promoting greater efficiency in the civil service, your committee recommends that, when financial conditions in Canada are sufficiently improved, the Civil Service Commission amend the regulations under the Civil Service Act so as to provide for the granting of a gratuity upon retirement equal to the sum now paid out and in lieu of absence with pay.

11. In order to reduce to a minimum overmanning and over-lapping in the service, and in an endeavour to assure permanency of employment to civil servants, your committee recommends that the Civil Service Commission carefully scrutinize all requests for appointments in an effort to absorb surplus personnel by transfer, or, by any other means in its power, to obviate the necessity of filling vacancies with new personnel and to accomplish by their abolition a reduction of existing positions which are not essential.

12. To promote economy and efficiency in engineering and mapping services, or in other services which can be centralized, your committee recommends to the Civil Service Commission that a careful study be made of such government services with a view to amalgamations thereof.

13. It appears from a cursory examination of "The Classification of the Civil Service of Canada" that anomalies therein exist.

Your committee recommends, therefore, to the Civil Service Commission that a more constant and efficient check on classification be made.

14. Your committee recommends to the Civil Service Commission that ways and means be sought to bring about greater cooperation between the organization branch of the Civil Service Commission and departmental officials with a view to obtaining necessary reorganization and equalized classification.

In the opinion of your committee very little has been accomplished by this branch of the commission which, if strengthened in personnel, would perform a very necessary and useful function in promoting efficiency and economy

15. Representations having been made on behalf of female civil servants, your committee is of opinion that there being no discrimination as to sex in the provisions of the Civil Service Act, no amendment thereto in this connection is necessary.

Your committee recommends, however, that the Department of Health, in conjunction with the organization branch of the Civil Service Commission, should make a survey for the purpose of recommending improvements, where necessary, in the sanitation and welfare facilities in government offices.

16. Your committee recommends that the Civil Service Commission amend its regulations so as to provide that as between those entitled to the disability preference under the act, and other things being equal, a veteran with dependents be given the preference over a veteran without dependents, and likewise a veteran with dependents over a veteran without dependents as between those entitled to the overseas active service preference.

17. It appears from the evidence adduced before the committee that certain positions on the staff of the House of Commons cannot be satisfactorily filled by open competition.

Your committee recommends that the Civil Service Commission exercise the powers conferred upon it under section 59 of the Civil Service Act, so that such positions on that staff as can best be filled from sessional employees shall be filled by competition limited to such employees.

18. Your committee is of opinion that there is a great deal of over-lapping in the performance of duties by the heads of different branches of the Civil Service Commission, owing to matters receiving the attention of the secretary of the commission which are in no way related to secretarial duties.

Your committee, therefore, recommends that the secretary of the Civil Service Commission be called upon to perform only those duties which are peculiarly those of a secretary and that the Civil Service Commission consider ways and means of eliminating duplication of correspondence and departmental memoranda which now pass through the secretary to the commissioners.

19. Your committee is of opinion that there are unnecessary delays in obtaining appointments and promotions by reason of the cumbersome routine now prevalent in the administration of the act and recommends that the Civil Service Commission exercise the powers now vested in it to simplify such procedure.

Your committee further recommends that all papers, documents, et cetera, placed on the files of the commission be consecutively numbered in each file, so that removals or deletions therefrom will be apparent.

20. With a view to promoting efficiency in the administration of the provisions of the Civil Service Act and in the direction and control of the civil service, your committee recommends that there be added to the committees of this house a select special committee on civil service matters, such committee to consist of seven members.

21. To facilitate the adjustment of complaints of a civil servant, where such complaints cannot otherwise be adjusted, your committee recommends that such complaints be adjudicated by a board consisting of a nominee of the civil servant organization of which the complainant is a member, a nominee of the deputy head of the department affected, and a nominee of the chairman of the Civil Service Commission.

22. Inasmuch as it is apparent from the evidence adduced before your committee that there are grave anomalies in respect of long term temporary and prevailing rate employees, your committee recommends that the claims of these employees be further investigated by the Civil Service Commission with a view to reporting and submitting the question to the proposed select special committee of the House of Commons on civil service matters.

23. Representations having been made to your committee concerning amendments to the Civil Service Superannuation Act, with respect to the extension of time for election and the return of contributions, and it being doubtful if the subject is within the scope of the present order of reference, your committee recommends that a committee be appointed at an early date to consider the matter and that, in the meantime, the advisory committee on the Civil Service Superannuation Act should consolidate its recommendations and present a report on the subject to such committee of the house.

24. Representations were made to your committee on behalf of the Professional Institute of the Civil Service of Canada. It would appear that the subject matter of some of these representations have been considered by the Beatty commission. They are sub judice. Your committee does not, therefore, see fit to make any recommendation relative thereto.

25. From the evidence adduced and in view of the submissions of officials of the Post Office Department, your committee recommends that order in council P.C. 1053, dated June 29, 1922, as amended by order in council P.C. 17/1751, dated September 12, 1929, be further amended so as to provide for the exemption from the operation of the Civil Service Act of postmasters in revenue post offices where the revenue does not exceed $3,000 per annum.

Your committee further recommends that such amendments be made to the Civil Service Act and/or the regulations thereunder of the Civil Service Commission so that postmasters hereafter appointed to revenue post offices having a revenue in excess of $3,000 per annum shall be within the full operation of the Civil Service Act.

26. Your committee, being of opinion that the position of commissioner of the Civil Service Commission of Canada calls for very special qualifications because of the wide powers conferred on such commissioner for the maintenance of the merit system in matters of appointments to and promotions in the Civil Service of Canada, recommends,—

I. That the present chairman of the Civil Service Commission, who has now passed the age of seventy years, be retired; that, because of his long and meritorious years of service in the public service of Canada and as chairman of the Civil Service Commission of Canada, he be granted a gratuity;

II. That Commissioner J. Emile Tremblay be retired; that, because of his twenty-two years of service in the public service of Canada, he be granted a gratuity;

III. That Commissioner Newton MacTavish be retired and, in lieu of notice, be granted a gratuity.

27. Your committee desires to record that it has been impressed with the ability and integrity of Mr. C. H. Bland, assistant secretary and chief examiner of the Civil Service Commission. He has shown a comprehensive grasp of the principles underlying the merit system and the Civil Service Act and of the details connected with the administration thereof.

28. Your committee held thirty-nine meetings and heard thirty-three witnesses, including deputy heads of departments, officials of the Civil Service Commission and representatives of civil servants' organizations. A copy of the minutes of proceedings and evidence is tabled herewith.

29. Your committee recommends that the orders of reference, reports, proceedings and evidence taken, together with a list of the exhibits filed, be printed both as an appendix to the journals of the house and in blue book form, 500 copies of the latter form to be printed in the English language and 200 copies in the French language; and that standing order 64 be suspended in relation thereto.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

J. Earl Lawson,
Chairman.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the table of the house orders in council Nos. 1076 and 1077 passed pursuant to the provisions of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932, both referring to the payment of money.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it the orders now laid on the table refer to the approval of payments that were undertaken prior to the expiration of the act. They are not in the nature of orders in council passed since the act expired?

Mr. GORDON: All the orders in council being laid upon the table are pursuant to the provisions of the statute.

SUPPLY—WHEAT BONUS

CONTINUATION OF PAYMENT OF FIVE CENTS A BUSHEL ON CROP 1932-33

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, before the house goes into committee of supply I desire to take a few minutes in a discussion of agriculture in western Canada. I realize that hon. members feel the time has come when we should try to clean up the business of the session and get away as soon as possible. It is not my desire therefore to speak at any great length on the matters I have to bring before the house, and I shall make my remarks as brief as possible.

Conditions under which we are operating at the present time are very difficult for all classes of producers, irrespective of whether they are primary or secondary. However there are certain industries in Canada which are of great importance, and they are usually classed as the primary industries, among which agriculture ranks as the most important. In so far as the production of agricultural commodities is concerned, wheat ranks first in importance. In discussing the question of wheat, its relation to the welfare of Canada and its importance in our export trade I desire to remind the house that the bulk of our wheat is produced in western Canada. Not only is there a great yield but the product is of an extraordinary quality and appreciated not only in Canada but in the markets of the world.

Those of us who went to western Canada twenty or thirty years ago realize that the prosperity of the west has been built up mainly on one commodity, namely wheat. In fact if we go back to the early part of the century we find that people were induced to come to western Canada primarily to produce wheat, and the immigration literature to be found in countries outside Canada called attention to the great opportunities western Canada afforded for its production. Under those circumstances therefore the west has been opened up and primarily developed on that one commodity. I do not say of course that other agricultural commodities of importance are not produced in western Canada, because they are. We find our live stock industry is very important, as is also our dairy industry. But I desire this afternoon to confine my remarks to the situation as it affects the wheat growers. Members in this corner of the house, in fact I believe members generally, have been waiting very patiently for some word from the government as to what its policy would be with regard to agriculture. Up to the present time we have had no intimation as to what the government policy might be. I am not unmindful of the fact that governments under present conditions have a tremendous responsibility upon their shoulders, and therefore in discussing these matters of importance we must extend a very large measure of sympathy to the men who to-day are carrying that responsible burden for the Canadian people. However, that does not relieve me of the responsibility, as the representative of a constituency in western Canada, of inquiring of the government what they are going to do with regard to present conditions as they affect agriculture.

Since the last election the government have taken certain steps, mainly by way of increased tariffs, which in their opinion were calculated to relieve some of our industries. Indeed, they went so far as to raise the tariff on agricultural products, but we still find that the prices of these products have been getting lower and lower all the time. Now, we recognize that the real problem facing agriculture to-day is the low price of its products. If we were in a position to secure remunerative prices, then we would probably be able to overcome the situation; but with prices far below the cost of production we must look to the government for some assistance in this extreme condition.

During recent months since the depression has become very acute the farmers of western Canada have received a good deal of gratuitous advice, and most frequently this takes the form of suggesting that in order to overcome their difficulties they should go into mixed farming. Those of us who know western Canada well know that there are great sections of country there that cannot be utilized for mixed farming. Take the southern part of the prairie provinces, much of it is not adapted to mixed farming. May I say from my observations that where mixed farming can be fairly well carried on it is in full operation in those districts. Therefore suggestions that our farmers should still further go into mixed farming do not carry very much weight with the person who actually knows the conditions now in existence in western Canada. But even if there were other areas of western Canada where mixed farming could be carried on satisfactorily, permit me to remind the house that the price levels of mixed farming products, such as beef, pork, mutton, eggs, butter and so on, are away below the cost of production. So it is unsound advice to tell the western farmer that if he engaged more in mixed farming he would probably get over the difficulties with which he is now faced.

Now, sir, I have recently received many communications from farmers in western Canada, and only a day or two ago I received some letters intimating that the prices they are receiving for their products are extremely low. For instance, one farmer told me he was receiving about four cents a dozen for his eggs, $2.50 a hundredweight for the best pork that could be produced in western Canada, eight cents a pound butter fat for special cream; and other products were at a similarly low price level. Under these conditions it is absolutely impossible to-day even for the mixed farmer to sell his products and make a profit.

The problem which I wish to deal with more particularly has to do with wheat. As far as western Canada is concerned, I have already intimated to the house that we produce the very best grade of wheat grown anywhere in the world. And we are proud of that fact. Not only is it a question of tillage, but also of climate and soil; with these three combined we are able to produce the very finest quality of wheat. I made some investigation last fall to find out if possible what was the cost of producing a bushel of wheat in Alberta. I received a lot of very valuable information from different sources. This I finally summed up to the effect that last year in Alberta it cost on an average 76 cents to produce a bushel of wheat. That was based on an average production of twenty bushels per acre. In some cases the cost of production was higher, in some lower, but in dealing with a matter of this description we can only take an average, and 76 cents a bushel is the average as near as I could arrive at it. The price level of wheat at the head of the lakes to-day runs about 59 cents a bushel. It is apparent that when the farmer has delivered his wheat to the head of the lakes and paid the freight, he is still about 17 cents below the cost of production—that is, provided he has No. 1 wheat; if he has a lower grade, then his loss in the cost of production is greater than 17 cents per bushel. Members will readily understand that the western farmer cannot very long continue to produce wheat under these conditions. From my observations last summer and last fall I believe the wheat produced in western Canada was produced at the lowest cost per bushel for many years, because of the fact that the farmers were not in a position to hire labour and consequently they had to do the work themselves with the help of their families. Therefore the actual cost last year was probably about as low as it can possibly be, unless the prices of the commodities which the farmer has to buy come down very materially. The prices of some of these commodities have come down fairly substantially, but as to the great bulk of the commodities he has to buy, whether for the purpose of producing more agricultural products or of taking care of his household needs, the prices have not dropped to anywhere near the same percentage as the prices of agricultural products. Under these circumstances the farmer is in the unhappy position of producing his products at a loss.

Under those circumstances we wish to inquire of the government what they propose to do about it. At the last general election the government asked the people of Canada to make them responsible for the conduct of the affairs of this country, and the people gave them that authority. Therefore the responsibility is upon the government. They may ask us what has been suggested from this corner of the house that might improve the condition of agriculture or general conditions throughout the country. I think any hon. gentleman who has attended this house regularly this session will know that we in this corner have suggested more than one important measure which might be of great benefit not only to agriculture but to all the Canadian people as well, but it is not my purpose this afternoon to take time to review the suggestions we have made.

A year ago the present government, recognizing the importance of wheat to Canada not only as an internal factor in economy but also as a factor in our export trade, were good enough to place a bonus of five cents a bushel on the production of wheat. That helped a great deal so far as the wheat producers were concerned. It gave them some hope and some assurance that at least the Canadian parliament was taking cognizance of the troubles with which they were faced. Financially it helped immeasurably; of that there is no question, though there were large sections of western Canada that did not receive any benefit from that provision because of drought conditions. When the Prime Minister introduced this bonus legislation last year he stated that other measures would be taken to provide for the areas where there were no crops. When I addressed this house at the beginning of this session I stated that I was well satisfied that the measures taken to look after the drought areas, so far as Alberta was concerned, were not adequate to meet the conditions prevailing. I do not blame anyone for that fact; I do not say any government is to blame for that situation, but nevertheless that condition still exists at the present time.

In introducing this bonus legislation last year the Prime Minister said there were four reasons why this bonus was necessary. The first reason was the low price of wheat. To-day the price of wheat is still below the cost of production. It is true that the price has risen a few cents a bushel in the past year, but notwithstanding that increase the price is not yet sufficient to pay the cost of production. Therefore, in relation to that first reason, the price is still too low. Another reason given by the Prime Minister at that time was that the price received did not bear the same relation to the cost of production that it had borne previously. That simply meant that the price received for wheat last year did not pay the cost of production, as it had previously, altogether apart from leaving the farmer any margin of profit. That condition still exists to-day; probably it has been alleviated to the extent of three or four cents a bushel, but that is about the only difference. The third reason given by the Prime Minister was that this bonus was a measure of necessary relief for the farmers of western Canada. I submit, sir, that under present conditions that necessity is just as apparent to-day as it was a year ago, and the argument put forth by the Prime Minister last year is just as potent to-day. I have ventured to bring this question to the attention of the government this afternoon in this way, and I hope they will be able to give the matter some consideration. As I have already said, our western farmers cannot continue to produce wheat at a loss; of that there is no question. Then, if I remember correctly, the fourth reason given by the Prime Minister last year was a psychological reason, and I think that was just as important as any of the other reasons given at that time. If the morale of the western farmer should be absolutely broken down I am afraid it would take more than a five cent bonus to restore it. However, those were the four reasons given by the Prime Minister at that time.

I am not going to take very much more of the time of the house on this question; I desire to make only one other statement, which I think is of importance. As one who has studied the economic problems with which we are faced to-day, I do not consider that bonuses will ever cure any economic ill. Of that there is no question. But bonuses sometimes become necessary because of the economic problems with which we are faced, merely as a temporary means of bridging a gap for the time being. I am under no illusion at all with regard to bonuses being factors in the final solution of these problems. It is not my purpose this afternoon to discuss what I think would be a proper solution of these difficulties; we have before us a problem which must be met in the near future, so I suggest to the government that they give very serious consideration to the possibility of renewing the five cent bonus on wheat which we had last year, as a temporary relief measure to assist the wheat producers in western Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Has my hon. friend given any consideration to the advisability of extending that bonus to include the producers of butter, potatoes, eggs and other commodities, who are also producing at a loss?

Mr. GARDINER: I have given a great deal of consideration to that question, and the only reason I did not include those other commodities in my remarks this afternoon is that we have not the great surpluses of those commodities that we have of wheat. At the present those commodities to which my hon. friend referred do not bulk so largely in our export business as does wheat, which is our most important export commodity and which is a big factor in helping this country balance its internal and external business. It is not that I do not realize the importance of these other commodities to Canadian farmers, but wheat is the greatest export commodity we have, and that is why I have devoted my attention to it rather than to the broader question of all agricultural products. I may say candidly that so far as I am concerned, if it could be arranged I see no reason why these other agricultural products should not be given the same consideration that is being asked for wheat. But I say that wheat, being the most important commodity which we produce agriculturally, the most important commodity which we export, is in a rather different position from our other agricultural products.

I am not going to take up the time of the house any longer, but I move, seconded by Mr. Campbell, an amendment to the motion in the following words:

That all the words after the word "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor: "in the opinion of this house the government should seriously consider continuing the five cent bonus on wheat as a measure of relief for the crop year 1932-33."

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): In seconding the motion moved by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner), I have no desire to take up the time of the house at considerable length. The case has been very well put by the hon. gentleman and it needs no amplification by me. I merely wish to put myself on record as supporting it.

The only reason, I presume, for the bonus last year, was the necessity of the grain grower of western Canada, and if that necessity was great then, I say it is even greater this year, because there is no question that the grain crop was produced at a considerable loss last year, resulting in accumulated taxes, interest and debts, so that even the farmer who had a crop is in a worse condition to-day than he was a year ago.

May I put on record a few figures which will indicate, better than, perhaps, I can, the position of the grain grower of western Canada. I wish to quote from the Economic Annalist, a publication issued by the Minister of Agriculture. It shows that the prices of field products are to-day only about twenty-five per cent of what they were in 1920. As shown by this bulletin, the index in 1920 of field crops, which would include grain, was 166·5, whereas in February, 1932, it had dropped to 43·7, just about 25 per cent of what it was at that time. The retail prices show an index of 124·2 in 1920, while in February, 1932, it was 84·6, or a drop of about 40 per cent. That will give some idea of what the grain grower has to contend with.

With respect to the question put by the former Minister of Justice, I quite appreciate the fact that farmers of all classes, farmers growing various farm products, are in a very unenviable position to-day; but I do submit that of all the various classes engaged in agriculture, the wheat grower has been hit harder than any, and I think these figures will again prove that contention. Coming back to the Economic Annalist, the figures show that for all farm products the index in 1920 was 161·6, and in February, 1932, 52·1; so that the drop in field products is very much greater than in all farm products taken together. I think the figures would show an even greater disparity if grain were considered separately from other field products. I contend, therefore, that the grain grower is in a different position from the others; he is in a more unenviable position than any other class of farmers in Canada to-day.

The farmers in my district, and for the most part in all the northern section of the prairie provinces, enjoyed a fairly good crop last year, but that did not solve their problems by any means. The average farmer in that part of the country sold his wheat at the elevator at a net price over the cost of threshing of from 22 to 28 cents per bushel. Now anyone knows that a price of from 22 to 28 cents per bushel will not pay the farmer for producing grain, so that it means that it was done at a very considerable loss, and the accumulated taxes, interest charges and so forth leave the farmer in a very much worse position to-day than he was in even a year ago.

Under the conditions that prevailed last year, the five cent bonus was nothing less than a godsend, and I say without fear of contradiction that it was appreciated by the great mass of the farmers who received it. The government, I believe, was somewhat discouraged by the expression of opinion that came from various parts of western Canada with respect to this bonus. I have expressed my opinion on that before in this house, and I may do so again. Agitations were started in different parts of the prairie provinces, asking for a different method of application, and in some cases there was a direct attack on the very principle of the bonus; but I do say that with respect to the great majority of the farmers there was no question whatsoever about their appreciation. I can assure the government that notwithstanding all that was said, the bonus was acceptable and welcome to the rank and file of the farmers of western Canada. Speaking for my own constituency of Mackenzie, I feel I can say that the satisfaction was universal, and this applies not only to the men on the soil growing the grain but to business men, professional men and all other classes in the community. I hope and trust, therefore, that the administration will see fit to continue that bonus for the coming year.

Mr. J. H. MYERS (Queens): I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it is the furthest thing from my thoughts or from my desire to prolong this debate or to prolong the session, which I consider should by now be pretty well over; but I feel I should be remiss in my duty to the farmers of eastern Canada, at least to the farmers of Prince Edward Island whom I have the honour to represent in this house, if I were to allow this amendment to pass unnoticed.

I have the greatest sympathy on earth for the wheat farmers of western Canada, and that remark, I believe, applies with equal force to those of us who are farmers and who represent the farmers not only in eastern but in central Canada as well. I think I am safe in saying that we have been wonderfully patient with and wonderfully kind to our western brothers in the difficulties which they have laid before this parliament during the last two sessions, in so forcible a manner. We certainly sympathize with them and we are willing at all times to extend to them the helping hand. But when it comes to singling out wheat growing or wheat growers in any one part of Canada more than another, I feel it my duty to draw the line at that. I wonder how the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) expects me to get along when I return to my constituency and after they read in Hansard and in the newspapers the stirring appeal that he has made to the house on behalf of his wheat growers in western Canada. What will they say to me? What will the man down there say who is selling the very best grade of potatoes that can be found anywhere at eight cents a bushel, while thousands and thousands of bushels of them will be carted out into the fields this spring, finding no market whatever? Let me draw to the attention of my hon. friend this fact: Wheat is a commodity that you can keep over for a number of months; potatoes automatically market themselves. Within the next two or three weeks they will be off the market; they will be rotting and will be carted out to the fields for manure. The hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) said that you must separate wheat from any other farm commodity; he thinks he has a right to do that. In doing that, you must separate the wheat grower from the grower of any other commodity and that I consider is most unfair and unjust.

Wth reference to the bonus system, my opinion is it is the most dangerous practice in which any government could ever engage. Wheat, they say, is very important to the wheat growers, largely so because they have a great quantity of it and it adds greatly to the wealth of the dominion. We admit all that; but the production of potatoes, or fruit, or hogs, or beef, or eggs, or butter, or cheese is just as important to those who are engaged in those industries as the growing of wheat is to the wheat farmers of western Canada. If you begin to extend this bonus system to wheat, why not extend it to every other commodity which the farmers are engaged in producing? But that is not the worst feature of the situation. We cannot stop there. While I am a farmer, I am quite free to admit that there are in the dominion other people engaged in other important occupations who have just as much right to consideration as have the farmers.

Miss MACPHAIL: They have all been well looked after. They have had their bonus.

An hon. MEMBER: Not in the hon. member's riding.

Mr. MYERS: The hon. member for Southeast Grey says they have all been looked after. Let me say that satement appears to me to be due to her lack of knowledge.

Miss MACPHAIL: The hon. member will learn as he remains here longer.

Mr. MYERS: Let me take my hon. friend —I am sure it would be a pleasure for me to do so—down to the shores of the maritime provinces where we have the best class of citizens to be found on earth, engaged in the very hardest occupation at which man can work, that of the fishing industry. What are we going to do for the fishermen who are selling the best codfish that can be found anywhere in the world for half a cent a pound landed on the stages? If that is prosperity; if that is fairplay for the fishermen of eastern Canada, I should like the hon. member for Southeast Grey to say so. What about the coal miners? Why not give them a bonus? Why not extend it to the whole population of Canada? What about the lumbermen? Wherever there is lumber, you will find men who have not been in the bush this winter. Why? Because the lumber they got out last year is still in their yards unsold. They cannot sell it at any price. If we are going to extend this bonus system to the wheat farmers of western Canada, why not extend it as well to the lumbermen all over Canada?

But if you want to help agriculture, this will never be done by a bonus; I think the hon. member for Acadia admits that himself. That is not the right way to tackle the problem. In my opinion the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) is attempting, as far as he is humanly able, to approach this problem from the right end. So far, my observation of the Department of Agriculture has been that 99 per cent of its effort has been directed along the line of teaching you and me how to grow more potatoes, more wheat to the acre, how to raise more hogs, how to make the hens lay more eggs, how to produce more beef and everything along that line.

Mr. YOUNG: A very good line too.

Mr. MYERS: That is not the most important line. Just show me how I can get some money out of anything I produce and I will look after the production. To my mind the efforts of the Department of Agriculture should at this time be directed rather along the line of securing wider and greater markets for the commodities of the farm. This our Minister of Agriculture has been attempting to do, and what he has done for the beef raiser of Canada during the last eighteen months has not passed without notice and has not been without great benefit to that industry. If we give him a little time, a little opportunity, his efforts along that line will be greatly extended to the benefit of agriculture.

I do not wish to prolong this debate, but I have in my hand some extracts from western newspapers. I find that the hon. member for Acadia, in connection with this very matter which he is at present advocating in the house, has within a very few months suffered a change of heart. I hold in my hand an extract from the Edmonton Bulletin of January 20, 1932, according to which I understand a meeting of the United Farmers of western Canada was held in that city. I want to read this and have it placed on Hansard so that my farmers in eastern Canada may know I am not remiss in my duties as their representative; that I am endeavouring on the one hand to look after their interests and on the other to keep the hon. member for Acadia in check. The extract reads:

With Robert Gardiner, M.P. for Acadia, and president of the United Farmers of Alberta taking a definite stand against the extension of a bonus to farm production, the annual U.F.A. convention meeting in the First Presbyterian church on Tuesday afternoon—

That will sound very peculiar to my Presbyterians in eastern Canada, remembering that at one time their great Master made a scourge of knotted cords and expelled from the temple everyone except those who were there for a certain purpose. My Presbyterian constituents will after a while begin to wonder that the hon. member has any wheat on which to ask for a bonus. The extract continues:

—threw the whole question of a bonus and production into the melting pot and discussed the question from almost every conceivable angle.

In the course of the discussion the delegates found themselves in some embarrassing situations. "To be or not to be" was the question. They were faced with the necessity of abrogating one of the accepted principles of the U.F.A. movement if they approved of the bonus, and yet they realized that in these troublous times, the bonus might be a way out.

In the first instance the convention found itself approving of a resolution favouring the bonus. Then on a motion to reopen the discussion on the resolution was rejected, following Mr. Gardiner's address.

The original resolution, No. 83 on the list, was submitted by the Grande Prairie, D.A., and read as follows:

"Whereas we appreciate the bonus on wheat by the Dominion government, being a step in the right direction, and

"Whereas there is no bonus for other agricultural products

"Therefore be it resolved that we demand that the Dominion government bonus agricultural production and that the amount of the bonus be in proportion to the benefits enjoyed by the manufacturers through the tariff."

That would be pretty hard to figure out, I imagine. I continue to quote:

After further discussion, centering round another resolution, a motion was moved to refer to this (previous resolution No. 83) for further consideration, and in speaking against adoption of the resolution in the reopened discussion Mr. Gardiner said:

"When we come to a matter such as this, tariffs and bonuses can never be equitable in any well-organized system. I recognize that these are unusual times and conditions are unusual and that the people are living under a heavy load, but in my final judgment a bonus such as this is small relief, let alone adequate relief. It is only too true that we have people benefiting from special privilege, but remember, special privilege is always at the expense of someone else. If the farmers get a special bonus, who would pay for it if not largely the farmers themselves. As the greatest producers of wealth they would have to bear the largest share of the resulting taxation. If we pass this resolution a greater burden will come back on our own shoulders and will stultify development."

Donald F. Kennedy, U.F.A. member of parliament for Peace River, was present and stated that it was not correct to say that we did not ask for a bonus or something like it." Continuing he said that several U.F.A. members asked for help for farmers during the exceptional happenings of 1931. The five cent bonus was the government's idea. He did, however, contend that financial assistance had been sought. If all bonuses were opposed then the same arguments must be advanced against the bonusing of coal and other products. In conclusion he said "I don't see why we shouldn't accept a bonus on wheat, even if we have to pay part of it ourselves in taxation."

Rice Sheppard agreed with another speaker that the farmers would do well to refuse the bonus and, if need be, tighten up their belts a little more and keep on smiling.

That is the chap I would like to have heard, Mr. Speaker. I should like now to quote from a Canadian Press despatch to the Manitoba Free Press. It says:

Alberta farmers want no bonus on farm products. They stick to the free trade principles and they are prepared to "draw their belts tighter" rather than ask the Dominion government for assistance comparable to what they believe the manufacturers receive from the tariff. So they decided at their annual convention Tuesday afternoon.

It was not a unanimous decision, however, for first of all the convention passed a resolution asking that the present bonus of five cents a bushel on wheat be extended to agricultural production generally and in proportion to the benefits enjoyed by manufacturers through the tariff.

There is a sudden about-face decision. On a word from one of their representatives in the federal parliament, E. J. Garland, member for Bow River, supported by the views of the leader of the United Farmer group and president of the association, Robert Gardiner, member for Acadia, they recalled the bonus resolution and threw it out by an overwhelming vote.

Another resolution along the same lines gave Mr. Garland a chance to get his word in. He merely opposed the resolution and said that he was sorry the former one had passed. The new resolution was defeated, and then a demand arose for reconsideration of the former one. At this point Mr. Macklin asked for the opinion of Robert Gardiner in that he would have the responsibility of advocating the policy adopted in the House of Commons.

And this is what our friend the member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) said:

"My view is that bonuses and tariffs can never be equitable," said Mr. Gardiner. "A bonus of this description would be no relief to agriculture." Those who produced the real wealth of the country were the ones who would have to pay, he said, and the farmers would have to pay for the bonus themselves.

The report continues:

The debate lasted two hours and at times was heated, but the change in sentiment was complete. When the final vote was taken the bonus resolution had few supporters and a demand arose for the elimination of the request for extension of the present wheat bonus to an acreage basis. The hour of adjournment prevented debate on this and it will likely arise again.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say this, and just one word will do me. It is true that agriculture in Canada, as in every other country, is in very bad shape now. We are sorry for that, but as Mr. Rice Sheppard whom I have just quoted said, we have simply got to tighten our belts and look pleasant. That is the only way I see at the present time. But remember, we are having a very important meeting in Ottawa this coming summer, the Imperial economic conference. It is the duty of this government to look after the interests of the Canadian farmer, the primary producer, for I believe, and with good reason, that the Canadian farmer is still the backbone of prosperity in the Dominion of Canada, and always has been and always will be, and in times past he has stood for a great deal, and I do hope that whoever is charged with bringing before the Imperial economic conference the needs and wants of agriculture in this dominion will have that work well prepared beforehand and well mapped out, and with the economic union between the different parts of the British Empire which I hope will take place as a result of that conference, I trust that there are better days ahead of the Canadian farmer.

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): I think that this request for a bonus on wheat on behalf of the wheat farmers shows us just how ridiculous has the whole position of bonusing become. We have in Canada neglected those industries which are the cornerstones of our national structure. The primary industries of agriculture, lumbering, fishing and mining have never been given the consideration of governments as have the secondary industries which are built upon the prosperity of the four primary industries that I have named. Now to-day we have the cornerstone of the whole national structure, agriculture, asking for a bonus on her products, a bonus which in the last analysis can only be paid by agriculture. I have since I came to this house thought that the petting and pampering and spoon-feeding that we have given secondary industries was as unsound as anything could be, and this request coming from this corner of the house but proves this. We have loaded upon the primary industries of agriculture and mining and fishing and lumbering a weight that they cannot bear, of taxes, of increased prices of the goods they buy, of blocking our exports by refusing imports. Instead of allowing our secondary industries to grow naturally, and they would have grown naturally, we have attempted the forced growth of secondary industries in this country, and every member of this house from the Prime Minister down to the most lowly knows that. Everyone knows that this country, a pioneer country that has to do with primary things, has ceased to take any care of the primary industries and devotes its whole time to granting special privileges to secondary industries. So we have tariffs, excise duties, special privileges to financial groups and extremely high salaries paid to executives of all secondary industries until the load has become more than can be borne. Every drop of Scotch blood in my veins resents it. We have farmers now going to the government, which should be their creature, asking for a bonus of five cents a bushel on wheat and—and being nice and polite about it. I would rather do without the five cents.

An hon. MEMBER: It would depend on how badly you needed it.

Miss MACPHAIL: No, it would not depend on how badly I needed it. I will tell the government how they could give a bonus on wheat. Let them depreciate Canadian currency to the level of the pound sterling, or even lower, and let us have a bonus on all exports. Cut out high tariffs, or export duties, allow import of things we need instead of building artificial industries. Let imports come in freely and our exports will go out freely. Do we suppose we can continue shutting out imports from all over the world, and then that we can sell these great quantities of exports of ours? We now admit we cannot do it, so we are going to pay for them ourselves. We are going to let the other fellow eat them, however, to get them out of the road.

So I say, and I say earnestly—knowing however that it will be no use and I might as well not say it—that the business of finance in Canada is at the root of our trouble. We will not solve our problem by a five cent bonus on wheat. I said earlier in the session that I wondered how a man who produced beef was going to pay a bonus on wool, or a bonus on this or that. I notice however that the sheep grower will not receive a bonus on his wool. In the New Zealand treaty there was no tariff for him.

Let us consider the community that does not grow wheat for export, that does not grow only one commodity but grows all farm commodities. By a five cent bonus we would simply be loading five cents more on the shoulders of the mixed communities—that is all. Five cents a bushel on wheat—nonsense. I will admit western Canada has taken too much guff from the east. I know and almost everybody else will admit that the government of this country have served secondary industries, and that practically means the eastern financial and industrial groups. The wheat farmer has suffered by it. That is true. The wheat farmer of western Canada has depended on wheat. He sold his product on the world's markets. He is an exporter, so all that tariffs can do for him is to increase the cost of everything he uses. Now the farmers come asking for five cents a bushel on wheat. Instead they ought to rise in their wrath and form a government which would begin to look after the primary industries of Canada. Until we do that we will just go on with this business of passing the buck,—five cents a bushel on wheat,—from one to the other until the fellow on the ground floor pays the whole thing.

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I rise to reply to some of the remarks made by an hon. member opposite (Mr. Myers). He said he was unalterably opposed to the principle of bonus, and although not in exactly the same words the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) has said she is opposed to the bonus because in her view it would not solve the present agricultural problem.

I rise particularly however to discuss a situation which has arisen in the west because of many farmers having been hailed out. In and contiguous to my constituency there are two strips of land ten miles wide and one hundred miles long. One is in the south and the other is in the north. Those people have been hailed out. Last year this government passed a bill respecting wheat, and providing a bonus of five cents per bushel to all farmers producing this commodity. I think hon. members opposite will agree wth me that this legislation was not applied equitably and justly to the farmers in the west. Some of those farmers had good crops yielding about forty bushels to the acre, for which they received five cents per bushel. Whether it was exported or sold in Canada they received the bonus. On the other hand however the man who was hailed out did not get a nickle, and I speak to-day on behalf of those men because I do not think they received a square deal. I do not care what all the lawyers in this house may say with respect to the bonus. Some may say it is nothing but a bonus to industry. I say however that the legislation passed last year was passed or purported to be passed in order to relieve the farmers. The fact is that it did relieve those farmers who had plenty of grain, but it certainly did not help the men who through no fault of their own, but through what the lawyers would term an act of God, had not a single bushel of grain. For the life of me I cannot see why a man who was hailed out should not receive the benefit of this five cent payment. Last February I asked a question of an hon. member opposite—I think it was the hon.

member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull)—as to what he thought about the five cent legislation. His reply was that it was not a relief measure, but was a five cent bonus given to an industry. I certainly believe it is a relief measure, and it could not have been anything else. It was passed last year because the wheat grower was in dire straits. The legislation was for his relief, and at least to that extent was a measure of relief. My reasoning is that if it was passed as a relief measure I can see no reason why the hailed out farmers should not receive help just the same as those who were more fortunate. I believe there has been a great injustice and the act has not been applied justly and equitably. Certainly something could be done for hailed-out farmers. For the information of hon. members I should like to read a resolution passed with respect to the hailed out areas in my district.

Whereas, all the hailed-out farmers are in the poorest financial position of any other Canadian farmer; and
