Whereas, we will ultimately have to pay to the dominion treasury our share of the bonus now paid per bushel of wheat; and

Whereas, the bonus does not relieve the farmer who was hailed out and went to nearly as much expense in growing a crop; and

Whereas, this bonus had incurred and added burden on such farmers in that they have to pay five cents extra for all feed and seed; and

Whereas, the purchasing power of said farmers has been reduced to worse than nothing by reason of said disaster; therefore be it

Resolved, that the federal government make arrangements to pay a bonus of one dollar per acre on the hailed-out acreage of wheat and that such acreage be determined from the 1931 census returns.

No doubt there are some hon. members who on principle are opposed to the bonus. I do not however see how they can argue against my statement with respect to hailed out farmers. Certainly I see no reason why, after the bill was passed and became law, it should not have been equitably and justly applied to all farmers concerned whether they had a crop or were hailed out.

Mr. B. F. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to offer one or two suggestions concerning the amendment before the house. I do not think hon. members can accuse me of having taken very much time in the discussions of this session, so far as bringing up matters pertaining to my own constituency is concerned. I do desire to inform the house however that the constituency I have the honour to represent for a distance of one hundred and twenty-five miles runs along the international boundary line. We are in close proximity to Aroostook county in the state of Maine. For many years that county has grown potatoes almost exclusively, and it is in close proximity to the markets of Boston, New York, Providence and other places. Those cities offer a very ready market for their products, and the result was that because of prices obtained the farmers had grown comparatively rich. The farmers in my constituency are following the example of their American neighbours, with the result that last year they grew practically nothing but potatoes. The farmer in my constituency during the present season has not received on an average more than enough to pay him for picking the potatoes up off the ground. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) said that the wheat producer of western Canada had been hit harder than the producer of any other agricultural product in this country. The hon. gentleman was totally incorrect because the wheat producer of western Canada is receiving at least more than half the cost of his production, while the potato grower of my constituency is not receiving one-tenth of the cost of production.

Once before during this session I have drawn attention to the fact that the Hawley-Smoot tariff which was enacted a few years ago had made it absolutely impossible for the farmers of the maritime provinces to find a market in the United States for their products. A year ago the Cuban market was closed to us by a high tariff wall. As I have already said, Mr. Speaker, the loyalty of no part of Canada has been tested more severely than has the loyalty of the farmers of the maritime provinces. Yet we have not complained so bitterly. While I have been a member of this house I have heard wailings come from every section of Canada as to conditions that pertain there. It is all very well to bring these conditions to the attention of the house, and let me repeat, we sympathize most deeply with the farmers not only of western Canada, but of central Canada and all other parts of the dominion, because we in the maritime provinces realize that it is absolutely impossible for one portion of this country to flourish without every other portion feeling the effects directly or indirectly. When our boys went overseas in 1914 it made no difference whether they came from British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario or Quebec, or down from the maritime provinces, they went into the trenches together and their blood mingled freely. Let me say that we in this house ought to try and emulate their example of sacrifice and patriotism, we too should stand together for all portions of Canada, realizing that one portion of the body politic cannot be separated from the others.

I am absolutely opposed to the principle of a bonus on wheat or anything else. I do not believe that this parliament ought to bonus any commodity. In my opinion the member for Acadia killed his own argument when he gave the present surplus of wheat in western Canada as a reason why we should still further bonus its production. In my judgment the bonusing of any article is bound to stimulate greater production, and if we have already a great surplus of wheat for which we cannot find a market, then I do contend it is only right that we should not further bonus it, but that every effort should be directed towards opening up new markets and extending our present markets so that the farmers of this country may be able to sell their products. We in the maritime provinces have no market to-day for our farm products. As I pointed out a moment ago, the United States market has been closed to us, as well as the Cuban market. Last year when we had a great surplus production of potatoes we found even a British embargo against us, which absolutely excluded that product from Great Britain. I hope that during the coming Imperial economic conference the government will spare no effort to place very strongly before the representatives of Great Britain the necessity of lifting that embargo and allowing our potatoes to enter the British market in competition with those from foreign countries. It is only fair that this should be one of the questions on the agenda, and it is a matter that should be taken up before the opening of the economic conference, so that at least some ray of sunshine may be given to the maritime provinces, in the hope that we may secure some opening for the products which our farmers have been taught to raise, and have marketed so successfully in years past, but which because of tariff barriers can no longer be exported. I desire to impress this as solemnly as possible upon the members of the government. As was suggested by the junior member for Queens (Mr. Myers) if anything can be done by the present Minister of Agriculture to open up wider markets it should be done, and I am sure not a single member on either side of the house will say a word against such a policy. We know that agriculture being the basic industry of this country it ought to be stimulated, and the only way in which it can be stimulated is to open up markets which will be attractive, and enable our farmers to sell their products where they will get satisfactory returns.

Mr. T. F. DONNELLY (Willow Bunch): I do not intend, Mr. Speaker, at this late hour of the session to trespass at any great length on the time of the house. I rise, however, to add a word or two to this discussion on wheat, which is all-important to the people in my constituency and throughout western Canada. We all admit that agriculture is one of the most important basic industries in the dominion to-day. The prosperity of Canada depends on the agriculturist; if he is prosperous all others are prosperous, and when he is having hard times all others are having hard times.

At the present time our agriculturists from one end of Canada to the other are suffering severely. Farm commodity prices are down low; there is no doubt about that. What we need more than anything else is a price for our commodities. During the last election we were promised that if the Conservative party came into power we were going to get better prices, they were going to "blast" a market for our products, and we were even told that wheat would fetch $1.50 a bushel within a week of the Conservatives getting into power. Well, instead of wheat going up to $1.50 a bushel it has been going down ever since. They told us the same thing about butter, and eggs, and beef; in fact all the commodities our farmers produced were going to go up in price. But what has happened? They have gone down, down in price until now they are below the cost of production.

Last session we asked the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture to tell us the policy of the government with respect to agriculture, but we received no reply. Last session in the agriculture committee we discussed farm problems of one kind and another, and the committee brought in a report, but they never asked for concurrence in it. It was simply all eye-wash, all window-dressing; there was nothing substantial in it, nothing of any benefit to the farmer at all.

Until our farmers get a price for their commodities this country will never get back to prosperity. The only way we can get a price for our commodities is by being able to sell them abroad. We cannot sell them abroad if we do not buy. If we do not buy we cannot sell. That is a motto that should be hung up in every household. The Minister of Trade and Commerce the other day said that the principle is all right in theory but hard to practise. I know it is hard to practise for this government. They said they were going to sell to everybody and buy from nobody. They are still doing it and shutting up all our markets; in fact we are going from bad to worse. But if you look at it you will find that our balance of trade keeps about the same; we sell only about as much as we buy. Instead of obtaining a favourable balance of trade by increasing the commodities we sell, we have secured a favourable balance by cutting off everything we buy and selling just what we can. Conditions are going from bad to worse, and they will not get better until we are able to sell our products in the markets of the world.

This question came up last year, when the Prime Minister said he recognized the serious condition of the wheat growers in western Canada. He stated that this measure was brought in as a compensating adjustment for the western farmers, to make up for the duties they had to pay; that was why this bonus of five cents a bushel was given on wheat. This year we have higher duties than ever before, but we are not to be given a bonus or any other help. We bonus the manufacturer by giving him high protection. I do not believe in a bonus of any kind; I do not believe that any industry, any manufacturing concern or any farmer should be bonused; I do not believe in the principle, but if it is the practice of the Conservative party to bonus manufacturers why should not the farmers be bonused in the same way? If you are going to do it in one case surely it is right to do it in the other. As the Prime Minister said, we need this compensating adjustment in western Canada because of the duties we have to pay. Let me repeat, however, that what we need is a market for our products, and in order to obtain that market we should be going to other countries and making trade treaties with them. We should have trade treaties with Germany, France, Italy and other countries in order to sell our products, and unless this is done in my opinion we will not come back to prosperity for some time.

In that regard I would say to the Prime Minister and those who will represent us at the Imperial conference that we must be careful, in seeking to obtain agreements for the purchase of a certain amount of our wheat each year, that we do not antagonize the rest of the world. We must remember that we produce some three hundred or four hundred million bushels of wheat for market each year, and we can only sell about one hundred million bushels within the British Empire. The rest of the wheat must be sold in the markets of the world, and if we antagonize other countries by making trade agreements with England and the other parts of the empire our western farmers will be worse off than they are to-day. So, as I say, we must be careful in making these trade agreements at the Imperial conference not to do anything that may antagonize the rest of the world and so harm our wheat growers.

I should like to say a word or two with regard to the working out of this bonus last year. I come from a section of the country that was dried out and had no wheat for sale, and consequently we received no bonus. We found that this arrangement was most unfair and inequitable. We were glad to see those people in the north get the five cent bonus and we were only sorry they did not get more; we did not envy them, but we were sorry we did not get something as well. It was most unfair and unjust as it worked out. We had to pay more for our flour and our seed because of the bonus which was given the wheat growers in northern Saskatchewan, and even those people in the north who did receive the bonus were not able to make wheat growing pay. They had crops of twenty-five and fifty bushels to the acre, but in spite of that it was necessary for the relief commission and the government to spend from $300,000 to $400,000 for relief work in that part of the country. What must be the condition in the southern part of the province, where we did not have a crop and did not receive any bonus? We say that if a bonus is to be given wheat growers it should be on an equitable basis whereby all who sow wheat would receive the bonus according to their acreage. If there is to be a bonus at all, whether a man sows wheat, barley or oats he should receive that bonus regardless of the result. If he is hailed out he should be entitled to the bonus; if he is dried out, eaten out by cutworms, hailed out or frozen out, he should get the same consideration. If there is to be a bonus let it apply equitably. As I said before, I do not believe in a bonus, but we have a government which believes in bonusing manufacturers; let it also bonus the farmers, who need help just as much as anyone needs it, and let that help be given on an acreage basis.

I do not intend to take up more of the time of the house, Mr. Speaker. I desire to move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McKenzie) that the amendment be amended by inserting the words "or a bonus based on the seeded acreage" after the word "wheat" and before the word "as" in the said amendment.

Amendment to the amendment lost on division.

Amendment lost on division.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

IMPERIAL ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

To provide for expenses in connection with the Imperial Economic Conference, $250,000.

Mr. BENNETT: May I say, Mr. Chairman, that this item is intended to assist in defraying the expenses incident to the holding of the economic conference in this city this summer. It has been the custom of the British government to defray the expenses, in their entirety, of all the delegates to previous conferences. I believe that the right hon. leader of the opposition, as well as myself, took the view that it would be better if each country paid its own expenses, but the British government was of the opinion that it should extend the hospitality, and it has done so. They, and as well those who come from other parts of the empire, are now to be our guests, and this item, which I believe will have to be supplemented by an additional provision in the supplementary estimates, is intended to meet these expenditures.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to corroborate what the Prime Minister has said in regard to the attitude which the British government has taken towards the expenses of delegates to previous Imperial conferences. At the last conference attended by ministers of the previous administration, which was in 1926, as the Prime Minister has said, the delegates from Canada did suggest to the British government that we should be allowed to pay our own expenses, and I believe that this would be the best method to follow with respect to all conferences in the future. The government of Great Britain, however, urged at the time that they had made arrangements for entertaining the delegates, and asked that they should be permitted to extend that hospitality. It is proper in every way that a like courtesy should be extended by Canada to the delegates who may be visiting our country at this time, and the government will, I have no doubt, meet with approval of its action in so arranging. But I would still suggest that the matter might be brought up again as regards future conferences; I think it would be better in every way that delegates from the different countries of the empire at these gatherings should enjoy the greater independence which comes with meeting their own expenses. That would be preferable if it can be arranged for the future.

May I ask the Prime Minister whether he has any statement either of a general or of a particular nature which he would care to make to the House of Commons and through the house to the country, with respect to the approaching Imperial economic conference, before we have any discussion on any phase of the conference.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know that I can usefully add much to what I have already said during the present session. This is the first Imperial conference that will have been held in this dominion, or in any dominion. A conference was held in Ottawa in 1894 which was largely engaged with the consideration of the Pacific cable, and while it was intended to discuss trade relations, the attitude taken by the United Kingdom with respect to preferential trade agreements prevented anything being accomplished. This, however, is to be a conference dealing wholly with economic matters; it does not deal with either political or constitutional issues, and it is meeting at a time of unparalleled world conditions.

I need not dwell upon the seriousness of the situation from any angle from which it may be considered. It is believed that a quarter of the world's population inhabiting one-fourth of its area, meeting through its representatives in the capital city of Ottawa, may be able to devise policies and plans that will be advantageous to every part of that population; and if they are advantageous to that population they will be of very, very great assistance to the world in its effort for economic recovery.

The two or three large questions that might be considered at the conference would be, of course, trade, communications and currencies, as has been already said. With respect to the question of currency, that has been discussed in this house very fully on more than one occasion during the present session. With respect to trade, so many observations have been made and so much advice has been given by hon. gentlemen opposite that there should be no difficulty in the government framing, in the light of that advice, a policy that would be entirely acceptable to nobody but hon. gentlemen themselves.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What is the policy of the government?

Mr. BENNETT: The policy of the government is to conduct its business in the best manner that is possible—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Everybody does that.

Mr. BENNETT: —in the discharge of the duties that will devolve upon it in connection with the conference; and if my hon. friend will take the trouble to read Hansard of days gone by—

Mr. LAPOINTE: I did.

Mr. BENNETT: —he will find that governments cannot declare what, for instance, an agenda is to be until after all the countries' representatives have been consulted. And they have not all declared what their intentions or purposes in that regard may be. I have, however, indicated broadly what matters will be considered, and if my right hon. friend thinks that I propose to depart from the well-established pratice in that regard and indicate something that will enable him to make brilliant addresses such as, for instance, he made in this capital city of Ottawa a few nights ago, he is entirely mistaken. I have no intention to do any such thing. But I will say this, that up to the moment we have been given an intimation of those who will attend from some of the dominions. I took the trouble to have the names written down so that I might be able to present them to the house if the house were interested at the moment. We have not been given the names of the delegates from either New Zealand or the Irish Free State. We have, however, the names of those who will attend from Great Britain, Australia, South Africa, India and Rhodesia. The delegates from the United Kingdom are:

The Right Hon. J. H. Thomas, M.P., Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs.
The Right Hon. Neville Chamberlain, M.P., Chancellor of the Exchequer.
The Right Hon. Lord Hailsham, K.C., Secretary of State for War.
The Right Hon. Walter Runciman, M.P., President of the Board of Trade.
The Right Hon. Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister, K.B.E., M.P., Secretary of State for the Colonies.

The attendance of some of the members of the United Kingdom delegation is contingent on developments from the Lausanne conference and other international engagements. From Australia the delegates are:

The Right Hon. Stanley Bruce, Assistant Treasurer.
The Hon. H. S. Gullett, Minister of Trade and Customs.

The delegates who will attend from South Africa are:

The Hon. N. C. Havenga, Minister of Finance.
The Hon. P. G. W. Grobler, Minister of Lands.
The Hon. A. P. J. Fourie, Minister of Mines and Industries.

The government of India have designated the following delegates:

Sir Atul Chandra Chatterjee, K.C.S.I., K.C.I.E.
R. K. Shanmukham Chetty.
Sir Padamji Pestonji Ginwala, Kt.
Sir George Rainy, K.C.S.I., K.C.I.E.
Haji Abdullah Haroon Sahibzada.
Abdus Samad Khan, C.I.E.

From Southern Rhodesia, which has the status of a self-governing community, the delegates taking part in the discussions will be:

The Hon. H. E. Moffat, C.M.G., M.L.A., Premier.
The Hon. P. D. L Fynn, C.M.G., M.L.A., Treasurer.
The Hon. J. W. Downey (Adviser), and four others.

The four others comprise advisers and staff. As I say, we have not been informed definitely as to who will attend from other communities.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They have all accepted.

Mr. BENNETT: I said some time ago that they had all accepted, and I communicated the last acceptance in the telegram which I read to the house from the government of the Irish Free State.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Have the Canadian delegates been appointed?

Mr. BENNETT: The Canadian delegates will be selected as from time to time may become advisable or necessary, as is the practice in England.

Mr. LAPOINTE: In England they appoint some of the leading ministers and then call others to help if necessary.

Mr. BENNETT: It depends upon what business is under consideration. At the Imperial conferences where only Prime Ministers have been accustomed to attend, and which have not been economic conferences, a committee is presided over by the Prime Minister and other committees are presided over sometimes not by ministers at all; but various ministers are in attendance when particular business is being transacted and discussed. For instance, the President of the Board of Trade, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the Secretary of the Admiralty, the Minister for War, all have attended from time to time, depending upon the subject matter under consideration. This however being, as I have said, a conference at which neither political nor constitutional matters will be considered or discussed, the government will expect that the first minister will be in attendance, and as occasion necessitates his colleagues will be changed from time to time, depending upon the matters that are being considered. This, we believe, is the correct practice in that regard.

The question of organization, as I have said, is in the hands of those who are designated by the government for that purpose. Broadly and finally, in addition to the matters that have to be considered, the government will have committees dealing with questions of administration and hospitality as distinguished from those which are responsible for the preparation of material in connection with purely economic problems. I indicated some time ago that these matters were, under the direction of the government, being considered as carefully as it is possible for men to study every phase of the situation that must arise as the discussions proceed.

I have no intention of giving any indication as to what the government will do when the time comes or how it will conduct its business. I shall be grateful for any suggestions that may be made by those who feel they are in a position to offer them and I am deeply sensible of and grateful for the assistance that has been rendered by one hon. member who is not in his seat to-day. I refer to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) who made a speech two days ago in Hamilton. If that was indicative of the desire of the Liberal party to assist in this important matter, I am grateful that such assistance has been forthcoming in the manner in which it has. The advice that has been so tenderly and solicitously offered by that hon. gentleman and others in a similar way, some of them not quite in the same class as regards mental equipment, will be gratefully received; it will be studiously and carefully sifted and if there is in it the genesis of an idea that will be helpful to the country, it will of course be adopted. That is all I think I can usefully say with respect to the matter, for I have no intention of indulging in any general discussion of it at this time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Without entering into a general discussion, I would ask my right hon. friend if he would go so far as to tell us whether he has in any way modified his views as expressed at the conference of 1930, or whether his proposals to the other nations of the commonwealth are still along the lines suggested—I am using a moderate word—or intimated to them at that conference.

Mr. BENNETT: I made many observations at that conference. The hon. gentleman's remarks are very general. If he will particularize I shall endeavour to oblige him for the general benefit of the committee.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If my right hon. friend asks me to particularize, I shall do so in a limited way. At that conference he used the following words, and this is the specific proposal:

> I offer to the mother country, and to all the other parts of empire, a preference in the Canadian market in exchange for a like preference in theirs, based upon the addition of a ten per centum increase in prevailing general tariffs, or upon tariffs yet to be created.

I should like to know whether this is still the view of my right hon. friend as to the proposal to be made to the other parts of the commonwealth.

Mr. BENNETT: I assume the hon. gentleman did me the credit of reading the whole of the observations—

Mr. LAPOINTE: I did.

Mr. BENNETT: —and if he did he will have observed that I said that by way of illustration and for the purpose of enabling a discussion to take place. He will find that clearly stated; the present Viscount Snowden asked a further question with respect to that and made it abundantly apparent in observations which he subsequently made.

Mr. LAPOINTE: So that ten per cent is not a hard and fixed percentage?

Mr. BENNETT: No; it is not intended to be such. It was a basis for discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just in order that the chronology of these historic events may be accurately recorded, my right hon. friend in opening his remarks this afternoon said that this was the first Imperial conference that had been held in Canada. I assume he meant the first Imperial economic conference.

Mr. BENNETT: I mentioned this afternoon that there was a colonial conference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend knows the first conference held in Canada was held many years ago.

Mr. BENNETT: There was a colonial conference held in 1894; it was not imperial at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Colonial conferences came later to be known, as Imperial conferences. This is the first imperial economic conference to be held in this Dominion. In speaking some days ago on the budget, my right hon. friend conveyed the impression that this conference had no connection with that of 1930; that it was not the postponed conference agreed to at the time. By his words as reported in Hansard, I think he rather left the impression that this conference was something which was due wholly to himself, and one that had been arranged for the first time as a result, in part, of the recent elections in Great Britain. In case I may be doing my right hon. friend an injustice in misstating his position, I should like to read exactly what he said. The words will be found in Hansard, page 2406 of April 26 of this year. My right hon. friend, referring to the Imperial economic conference to be held here this year made this statement:

It is said by him—

That was of myself.

—to be regarded as the adjournment of the former conference. I believe it is not so regarded; at least I am so informed. It may be that the conference of 1930 was a failure. The right hon. gentleman said it has been described by someone as a tragedy.

The point I wish to bring out at the present moment is that the statement I have just read would certainly lead us to believe that this conference was not the postponed conference of 1930.

Mr. BENNETT: Neither it is.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend says "neither it is." I confess I am at a loss to understand his view, and I do not know what members of delegations from other parts of the empire will feel when they see that statement, because my right hon. friend was very emphatic at the Imperial conference of 1930 in stating that he would like the economic conference to be postponed, to meet in Ottawa later on.

Mr. BENNETT: That is true.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Again may I read his exact words. In his opening address which appears under the heading "Statement by the Prime Minister of Canada," the Prime Minister put forward proposals which, as he has since told us, he thought would be rejected. He said he put them forward deliberately expecting that they would be rejected. That will come rather as a surprise to members of that conference. My right hon. friend went on to suggest the basis upon which a conference might be held, and he concluded with these words: I am reading from the report of the Imperial Conference of 1930, English edition, page 34:

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Consistent with the fullest inquiry into the application of the principle of an empire preference, our deliberations must be governed by the time factor. If this change in our economic relationship is to be made, it must be made without undue delay. I would therefore, propose that this conference, if it approve the principle should constitute such committee as may, with the greatest expedition and thoroughness, consider the various questions incident to its operation. As we have here neither the time, nor the machinery necessary, to reach a final conclusion upon all of them, it is apparent that we must employ the technicians of our respective countries to complete the inquiry. And for that purpose I would suggest that committees be set up in each of the countries concerned; and that these committees commence immediately an exhaustive examination of the effect upon their domestic situation of the proposals I have made.

Then, under the subheading "Suggested conference at Ottawa," the report continues:

I am satisfied that whatever modifications in the general plan Canada may have to suggest will be ready for submission within a period of six months. I assume that you are all capable of a like measure of expedition, and so I further propose that, when this economic conference has had an opportunity profitably to discuss the plan in its various aspects, it do adjourn to meet at Ottawa early next year, as the guests of the Canadian people, and that in the interval, through the instrumentalities I have suggested, full and final reports be prepared for submission to it.

In his concluding speech on November 14, as reported at page 225 my right hon. friend spoke as follows:

I would therefore move the adjournment of the economic section of this conference to Ottawa to meet upon a date within the next twelve months to be agreed upon, and I wish, on behalf of the Canadian people, to assure you of their most hearty welcome.

And concluding he said:

I therefore move, Mr. Chairman, that the economic section of the conference adjourn to Ottawa to meet within the next twelve months at a date to be mutually agreed upon.

I have always understood, and I am sure that all the delegates who were present at the Imperial conference understood, that that was the resolution that was adopted and the plan that was intended.

May I recall to my right hon. friend's mind the fact that we were told last year that unfortunately the postponed conference which was then to have met, had to be again postponed because of the inability of certain other parts of the empire to be represented, but it was always the postponed conference to which reference was made, and certainly until my right hon. friend made the statement two days ago, to which I have just drawn attention, everyone, in all parts of the empire, had the impression that the conference now about to be held was the postponed economic conference of 1930. I am a little at a loss to understand why my right hon. friend should not so regard it unless it is that another remark which he made in the course of his address helps to throw light upon it.

My right hon. friend told us that he himself had been the first to suggest an economic conference, that he had done so in 1928, that it had been the ambition of his life to see that such a conference was held if he ever came into power. I do not want to take away from my right hon. friend any honour to which he may be entitled, but I would remind him that there was an Imperial economic conference held in Great Britain in 1923 as well as an Imperial conference, and that the Imperial economic conference was attended by representatives of the government of Canada as well of the other dominions. The late Sir Lomer Gouin and the Right Hon. George P. Graham were two of Canada's representatives at the Imperial economic conference held in 1923. That was I believe the first Imperial economic conference. It is true that in speaking on the address in 1929 my right hon. friend did say that he thought we should have an economic conference in Canada, but in the course of his remarks what he stressed was not what he has been mentioning to us this afternoon as all-important for the purposes of the conference, the questions of currency and trade. He spoke then more particularly of development and settlement. That was the object of the conference my right hon. friend had in his mind. I have his remarks in that connection here. Speaking on February 11, 1929, the present Prime Minister, then leader of the opposition, said as reported at page 28 of Hansard of that date:

> There are two great problems that confront the people of the British Empire; they are the largest problems that have ever been offered for the solution of men and women in any age.

Then he goes on to speak of the size of the British Empire, and so forth, and after having noted its resources and their extent he continued:

> So I suggest to the government that since England can no longer take the lead with respect to this matter, this country should call a great economic conference to meet in Ottawa. Let the Dominion of Canada take the lead; let us call an economic conference of the British Empire to meet in this city to consider, after being properly informed, the two great problems of settlement and development.

That was the conference my right hon. friend had in mind, that was the ambition of his life at that time, and yet to-day he does not mention at all the words "settlement and development" in stating to the house the subjects that are to be those of first consideration at this conference. So clearly this conference cannot have any relation to the conference that my right hon. friend had in mind in 1929 if we are to judge by the remarks that he then made. My right hon. friend went on to say:

> I can only say that if we who sit to the left of the Speaker were entrusted with the responsibilities of power to-morrow one of our first actions would be to ask that representatives of this great empire meet in this capital city of Ottawa in a great economic conference to grapple and deal with the problems of settlement and development, for one-fourth of the world's people are not trustees for nothing. Where England may not take the lead, as she may not at the moment in a matter of this kind for reasons which are obvious, we may point the way, remembering that the first of the colonial conferences, which ultimately became imperial conferences, sat in this city.
> A great economic conference brought together through the initiative of the Canadian government would be able to work out a solution of these problems which would not be temporary in its character, which would not be subject to adverse and hostile legislation, but which would represent the agreed views of one-fourth of the world's people, occupying one-fourth of the world's area. That in itself would do much to secure for all time that outlawry of war, that perpetual peace, for which all democracies are striving.

That was the kind of conference my right hon. friend had in mind in 1929, and I think we still have vivid recollections of the elaborate scheme of settlement which was proposed by the present Senator McRae, at that time a member of this house, and which seemed at the time to bear a very close relationship to what my right hon. friend had in view when he was speaking of an economic conference.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It synchronized.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, as my colleague suggests, it seemed to synchronize with the statement of my right hon. friend's views. I hope that the Prime Minister will tell us whether this important question of settlement, which means, of course, migration from different parts of the empire to other parts, is to be one of the main subjects of consideration at the coming conference, and what the policy of the government of Canada will be with respect thereto; also, perhaps my right hon. friend will tell us what is meant by development in connection with the policy that he suggested in 1929. I might add that the Liberal administration of the day did extend in 1929, invitations to Great Britain and other self-governing parts of the empire for an economic conference to be held in Canada, if possible, during 1930. My right hon. friend said that we took the idea from him. Frankly I do not wish to say that we were not as indebted to him as he might be to us for an exchange of views now and then, but the kind of economic conference that we had in view was one which related to trade more particularly than to anything else, and it had not as one of its specific subjects for consideration the question of settlement, which was one of the two main questions in my right hon. friend's mind at the time he spoke in 1929. I might say to my right hon. friend that if he will speak with those who were at the Imperial conference in Great Britain in 1926, he will discover that the point of view which, as representing Canada, I myself, put forward with respect to conferences was that Imperial conferences dealing with political questions might be held from time to time in London, although I doubted the wisdom of too great frequency of conferences of that kind, and that subsidiary conferences dealing with economic questions might with advantage be held from time to time in different parts of the empire. For instance, that there might be a conference on communications within the empire, held, say, in Australia one year; that a conference with respect to some other economic phase might meet in another part of the empire; that a conference, for example, for increasing the facilities and opportunities for trade within the empire might be made the subject of a separate conference, and that was the conference we suggested in 1929 should be held in Ottawa, trade being considered by us the most important question. The elections came on in the summer of 1930. I think the economic conference was postponed, or rather fixed for London, in view of the decision of the British government after conference with other parts of the empire to hold an economic conference, as well as an Imperial political conference—if I may so describe it—simultaneously in London some time during the year 1930. Speaking on the budget in May, 1930, my right hon. friend made further reference to the conference to which he had previously referred. At page 1827, after quoting his remarks of the previous year, Hansard contains the following statement:

> I then concluded with the suggestion that representatives of this great empire should meet in Ottawa and deal with the problems of settlement and development, because one-fourth of the world's people are not trustees for nothing. I repeat that it is desirable and necessary that there should be a conference of representatives from every part of this empire, and that conference cannot be held successfully in Great Britain. That is the position which I would expect to be taken by a government having the interests of the empire at heart. But this government is following its old policy; there never has been a time when the Liberal party was not prepared to gamble with Canada and with the British Empire.

I think that makes quite clear my contention as to the nature of the conference my right hon. friend had in mind. There is a paragraph preceding the one I have read which might be read to reinforce my statement:

> Well, I have in my hand a return brought down the other day, and I observe that the Prime Minister of our country—
> Referring to me—
> —sent an invitation for an economic conference in Canada sometime after I had on the speech from the throne suggested that there were two great problems with which the British Empire was concerned, the one fiscal and the other the migration of peoples, and that the only method by which these matters could be satisfactorily dealt with was by having a great economic conference here in Ottawa.

It is just as well to have the record complete. The fact is that the first Imperial economic conference was held in London in 1923, and was attended by representatives from Canada and other parts of the empire. In 1929 my right hon. friend suggested an economic conference to be held in Ottawa to deal primarily with questions of settlement and development. In the same year, after my right hon. friend's speech—but not because of it, but rather in accordance with a suggestion which had been made at the conference in Great Britain in 1926—the Liberal government of the day did extend an invitation to other parts of the empire for an economic conference to be held at Ottawa in the following year to deal with trade questions. After that invitation had been sent, my right hon. friend repeated his desire for a conference which among other things would deal primarily with the fiscal question and that of migration. In the fall of 1930 the Imperial conference of 1930 was held in London, and so far as the economic side of it was concerned was a tragedy or a farce. It was postponed on the suggestion of the present Prime Minister for a period of about six months. When that time had expired it had again to be postponed to this year because other parts of the empire could not be represented. There is no gainsaying that the coming conference is simply a postponed edition of the conference of 1930. I do not wonder however that my right hon. friend wants to get as far away as possible from the conference of 1930. If he will boldly throw overboard the proposals he made at that conference, all of us would be glad to have the line of separation as marked as possible. At the moment I should like my right hon. friend to indicate whether the subject of migration or settlement is to be one of the questions at the coming conference, and if so what will be the view or policy of the administration as put forth at the conference in respect thereto.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, the right hon. leader of the opposition seems to be incapable of rendering a constructive suggestion about anything. His one purpose seems to be to destroy. If by any possible chance any credit could be derived by anyone other than himself from any act of state, he at once deprecates it and seizes the first opportunity to show that it has arisen from some suggestion or idea of his own. That may be the purpose of this discussion—it looks like it; to magnify himself and depreciate others. That seems to be his sole purpose in entering upon this discussion today. The item of $250,000 in the estimates we said yesterday might afford an opportunity for the right hon. gentleman and his friends to discuss the forthcoming economic conference. Let us see what he has done. First he has endeavoured to show that he was the author of it. Well, I am quite content.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all.

Mr. BENNETT: I am quite content. I am not at all concerned in whose brain cell the thought originated which subsequently blossomed into an act. I am not concerned with that; it is not a matter which gives me the least thought at the moment.

He then points out that this must be an adjourned conference. I ventured to suggest the other evening that I believed it was not so regarded, and I find that I am right. The reason was this: When the former conference was held in 1930 it was suggested by me, in the course of the few observations I made at the opening, that a period not exceeding six months should elapse during which an opportunity might be afforded for considering questions which were at the basis of any discussions which would result in concrete action. That was not accomplished, and at the end of the conference I moved it be adjourned, to be held within twelve months. Within twelve months it was not held, and when there was an election in Great Britain I sent invitations by cable asking if it were possible to have a new economic conference convened here. Whether or not it was to be regarded as an adjournment did not at that particular moment cross my mind. I had not thought about it in that sense, and I cannot say that the matter gave me any cause for thought until the right hon. gentleman raised the point the other evening. Most Canadians—with the exception of the right hon. leader of the opposition—will be glad enough to have the conference in Ottawa, postponed or otherwise. In this strange desire that manifests itself in such peculiar ways that nothing shall happen unless he "happens" it, that nothing shall transpire unless he is behind the movement—that obsession that seizes him and has been apparent all through his public life, and never more than this afternoon—he says this is an adjourned conference. What difference does it make?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: What difference does it make? Does any hon. member see any difference between an adjourned conference and any other kind? Lest it should be thought that the government, in sending out an invitation to a conference to be held here in July next, should derive in the minds of the Canadian electorate any credit for having conceived or suggested the conference, he must say: "This is an adjourned conference; there is nothing about it for which this government can get credit. I sent an invitation in 1929 which was not accepted." Mr Chairman, surely we have got beyond that. Surely we have got beyond a debating school. Surely we have got beyond the idea held by the college student who says, "I, with my little bow and arrow—I shot cock robin." Surely we are past that stage. But no; the right hon. leader of the opposition is intent upon that.

That is the explanation of the discussion with respect to the postponed conference. So far as I can recall, the word "postponed" with respect to the conference has not been used in any communication which has passed, and the governments of the various sections of the empire, if one may judge by the responses they have sent to the invitations forwarded, have treated it as a conference convened by the Dominion of Canada. I had not thought of it in the sense of claiming any merit. I merely treat this government as being an instrument to bring about a gathering of the representatives of the British empire for the purpose of discussing matters which I believe to be of the utmost interest not only to the empire but to the peace of the world.

Now, in 1929 I made the observations to which the hon. gentleman referred, and I also ventured to call attention to the resources of this country and of other countries that comprise the British empire—nickel, asbestos, timber, and the other great natural resources such as there are throughout every part of the world, in practically every zone, we have within the empire. I developed the idea that if we had thought more of that and less of other countries we might have had greater stability of trade, and I mentioned the two headings under which it seemed to me we might fairly consider our position—settlement and development. The problem of settlement I pointed out arose because in certain parts of this great empire there are areas in which you have congested population, while in others you have great open spaces in which you require population. I realize that the economic crisis through which the world is passing has made discussion of settlement a matter of extreme difficulty. When the right hon. gentleman asks whether it will be discussed or not, I can only say that individuals have suggested that the matter of migration might readily be discussed; not that there is any likelihood of migration of people from one part of the empire to the other at this moment, but that the whole subject might reasonably be discussed, not in detail, but looking to the future rather than to the present with improved conditions that must result if time is to bring about the changes which we believe it will. Under those circumstances doubtless the question of migration would be suggested for discussion. But it has not been placed upon any agenda or paper that has been circulated up to the moment beyond inquiries as to whether or not in the view of some, having regard to what has been suggested by others, the matter should be considered. Beyond that I cannot say. But any thoughtful man who looks into the future, who visualizes fifty years hence and considers what the position is in Great Britain with its population, must realize the one fact that is outstanding in this country, that if we are to survive in the end we must have more population. Every thoughtful man knows that at the moment economic conditions make it our business to see to it that we do what we can to prevent unemployment or lack of opportunity for employment becoming more acute by reason of bringing additional people into this country. We have pointed that out. There come crises in the history of all nations, and at the moment we have a crisis during which it is not desirable to add to our population. But you have great congested areas of the British empire. The people there should, it seems to me, if one looks to the future half a century hence, find opportunity for development in other parts of that empire that their ancestors, as well as those who now live within the immediate territory affected, won for them and for all who might come after. In those spheres of thinly settled communities there are opportunities for those who come from the congested areas to find and make for themselves homes. That is what I mentioned with respect to the question of settlement and development.

Now, I am willing to submit to any impartial tribunal of my fellow-citizens if they think it is worth considering as constructive criticism on the part of the leader of a great party who has been Prime Minister to try to imply that development does not mean trade. Would any thoughful man say that? Would any one who is not actuated by some motives that prevent him from seeing the real situation not realize that development and trade mean exactly the same thing? I had been pointing out in this instance as I did in others the fact—and I cited from Hansard that in this empire we had vast deposits of nickel, asbestos and other raw materials, and I said:

> I will not at this time endeavour to point out what the resources of this empire are, nor how great a part Canada plays in any development of these resources. In nickel, asbestos, lead, tin, gold, silver, metals, minerals, wood products—in all these there are abundant resources in Canada as well as in other parts of the empire: copper in Rhodesia, diamonds in South Africa and great cotton fields in India and Egypt. We have one-fourth of the people of the world, although it is true that part of them are backward races unsuited to our country. So I suggest to the government that since England can no longer take the lead with respect to this matter, this country should call a great economic conference to meet in Ottawa. Let the Dominion of Canada take the lead.

I was pointing out the basis of all trade. I had referred to our vast and fertile plains, to our great and varied resources, and I had pointed out they were not in one part of the empire, but in Rhodesia, India and other parts of the world. Surely if development means anything it means trade; and trade means development—the development of our resources. I believe this economic conference that is to meet here in July must sit down and consider the question of the development of the resources of the empire. I have pointed out so often that I will not repeat in this house that these great resources are held in trust by the crown for all the people who are within the empire, meaning not only the people of to-day but the people of to-morrow. I ventured then to point out that the toil and the sacrifice and the struggle of men and women in days long since gone by had won these for this population. I believe that still. As I have said, these resources scattered all over the world are held in trust by the crown —the common symbol of a common holding in trust for all the people of the commonwealth of nations that comprise the empire.

The problem is the development of those resources. That involves in the largest sense the trade of peoples, whether or not, for instance, the requirements with respect to nickel in one part of the empire might be met by the resources of Canada, and the requirements of Canada with respect to other raw materials might be well met by drawing upon the resources of some other part of the empire. In other words, reciprocity in empire products and in empire trade I believe would be very valuable and beneficial. I have ever endeavoured in this house and elsewhere to advocate reciprocity in empire trade, pointing out that I believe if we could serve the interests of one part by reciprocally improving its conditions we were doing a very great service to the whole. I will not dwell upon these matters. I shall leave it to the judgment of this committee as to whether or not the question of development in the sense in which it was used by me with the surrounding context did not involve in the largest and truest sense development of trade in every part of the empire. I am not unmindful of the fact that mistakes may always be made, and they always are made. I certainly am one of those who believe that the only crime you can attribute to a public man is that he remains ignorant despite the warnings of age and experience. Opportunity is afforded to all of us to add to the sum total of our knowledge, and I have never been one of those who are not prepared to admit error—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: —who are not prepared to admit error for the purpose of indicating that I have secured benefits by reason of age and experience. But there are certain principles which endure, and the principles to which in my youth I adhered, and which I still believe in, are that we have in this great commonwealth—not by accident—the greatest estate that Providence ever gave to a people; I believe we are accountable for the development of that estate, and the manner in which we have developed and are developing it will be the measure of our sense of obligation and realization of our own trusteeship. If the government, in its endeavour to bring about such a meeting in this city, has had in mind one object more than any other it has been that the men and women—because women on the outside will do much to influence the opinions of men within, as they always have—who meet here as representatives of this vast commonwealth, will endeavour to the best of their ability to devise policies whereby mutual benefits may come with advantage to the whole, that we may, in vigour and strength, maintain that commonwealth which, I am as convinced as I can be of anything in this world, means more for the preservation of the liberty and freedom of mankind than any other secular institution the world has erected. That is my position.

If you ask as to our policies with respect to the conference I can only say that other governments as well as this realize that this is not a mere meeting together of men for the purpose of dealing with the material things of life. There are other forces that must be reckoned with; there are other values that must be determined, and that very fact operates in men's minds, governs their actions, restrains their conduct and disciplines their observations. Any thoughtful suggestions that may come as to how these ends might be best accomplished will be welcomed, but carping criticism, cynicism and endeavours to make it appear that one's views in 1929 with regard to development and settlement do not agree with one's views in 1932 with regard to the advancement of trade and the improvement of economic conditions, are neither helpful nor constructive. This is merely elemental cynicism disguised as a form of what might be called elementary criticism.

That is the position, and if we seek assistance by suggestion it does not mean for a single moment that we do not realize that there is a body of public opinion that is not represented by observations such as those to which we have just listened. There are thoughtful men and women in this country belonging to the Liberal party who are every day making timely suggestions as to how we can best make a success of this gathering. They are not thinking in terms of party; they are not concerned with whether or not there is a Conservative government or a Liberal government in power at the moment. What they are concerned with is that there shall be the very greatest effort made, at this great moment in the history of the world, this time of its greatest crisis, on the part of representative men from every part of a quarter of its area, to evolve policies and formulate plans for the future that will ensure peace, happiness and prosperity to the peoples they represent and, by mutual concession and expressions of good will with respect to trade and the development of the resources of this estate of ours, that we may be able to attain that end. Despite all that may be said and all the unfair allusions that may be made by the Liberal party, its chiefs and its lieutenants, on the public platform or in this house, we will endeavour to the best of our ability to discharge the responsibility that the Canadian people have imposed upon us, and advance reciprocal benefits, if we can, to every part of this empire in order to ensure the harmonious development of the whole and the peace and prosperity of all its peoples.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall not endeavour to follow my right hon. friend in the vituperative strain he has thought it advisable to adopt, not only towards myself but towards the Liberal party as a whole. One would have thought that at a moment such as this he above all others would have endeavoured to disclose, by his words and his manner generally, a desire for cooperation in connection with a great imperial undertaking such as that which is about to take place. Fortunately my right hon. friend will be judged by his own words and acts, and I am quite prepared to leave any judgment respecting him to that record.

What I do think is important in a matter of this kind is that there should be historical accuracy in regard to all matters, and certainly those matters which affect other parts of the British Empire as well as Canada. My previous references were made wholly with the view of placing on Hansard an accurate historical statement of the developments which led to the present conference. I thought I did my right hon. friend a kindness by quoting his own words, but I see I have done him an unkindness; I see there is nothing that strikes him quite so hard as his own utterances when they are brought back to him. I spared him, in the first remarks I made, any quotation from that part of Hansard where he sought to claim the entire credit for this conference. I had no motive so petty as that of comparison between my right hon. friend and myself; I am sure he is welcome to any superior position he may wish to assume. I only desired to maintain an accurate historical record, particularly when my right hon. friend sought to take away from one who was a really great man in the leadership of affairs in this country some credit that attaches to him in matters of imperial affairs. I will read from page 2406 of Hansard for this year so that the house may see for itself whether I was claiming credit for all that was done; who, in fact, the "I" was who made the claim:

Mr. Bennett: Well, if they are interested in reading Hansard they will find that as long ago as 1928—

[Mr. Bennett.]

I think that should have been 1929.

—I had said that if we had power my first effort would be to endeavour to call an economic conference of the British empire in this city. I went to London with a very definite idea in my mind. I gave expression to it, and I believed it would be received exactly as it was received. But I said there was a principle that had to be settled first. Those who will do me the honour of reading what I said will find clearly stated the principle that must first be settled. The electors of Great Britain settled it. As soon as they had settled it I invited the representatives of every part of the British empire to come to this city to a conference, and the date has been fixed for the 21st day of July. They are coming, so they say. Therefore the purpose which I had in mind in 1928, which I never failed to keep before me, the one ambition that I entertained if we did come to power I hoped to see realized. In that regard may I say that I have under my hand the memorandum left by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1902, when he ceased to agree with his colleagues and took a definite stand with respect to Imperial preference. It is true it was not followed by action, it is true it was not followed by any considered effort to achieve it, but when I read it it will be realized that we at least have now seen accomplished that which he said should be accomplished but failed to accomplish, as did his successors in office.

I leave it to hon. members of the house whether my right hon. friend's own words do not speak more eloquently than it would be possible for any individual to do, as to who is claiming undue credit and seeking to take away from others credit which is their due.

Mr. LAPOINTE: At the risk of drawing upon myself another lecture from the right hon. gentleman, I desire to venture a few words. In the first place I am glad that the right hon. gentleman seems to consider this coming conference as a new venture, altogether free from any impediments which the conference of 1930 might have placed in the way. My right hon. friend seems to have modified his views to some extent, though he will not admit it. He spoke of Viscount Snowden's interpretation of his words in view of the context of the speech in which he made the proposal which I indicated a few moments ago. I happen to have the words of Viscount Snowden, uttered after that offer had been made by my right hon. friend, and he certainly interpreted the proposal exactly as it was made. Speaking at Manchester some time afterwards, Viscount Snowden made two definite pronouncements about his own and his government's views regarding tariffs. I quote from the Manchester Guardian:

It had been reported, he said, that the government was considering the imposition of an all-round 10 per cent import duty for revenue purposes. "No government in which I am in charge of the national finances will ever give serious consideration to a proposal like that."

Again, referring to the government as a whole: "We said we were anxious to do everything practicable to foster and encourage our imperial trade, but we would not support any proposal which involved the taxation of food, raw materials, or a general protectionist policy. That still remains the attitude of the government."

I quote that merely to show what Viscount Snowden thought of the proposal then made. Whether he was right or wrong, he obviously viewed the offer of my right hon. friend in the same way as I indicated it this afternoon.

Mr. HACKETT: He must have changed his mind since.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am not sure about that; I do not think he has changed his mind. My hon. friends are wrong altogether in their view of what has happened in England. They think that England has become protectionist for all time. That is not true. It is merely an expedient, as they know, so much so that the members of that so-called National government in England are speaking against protection at the present time. I read only a few days ago a violent and bitter indictment of protection by Sir Herbert Samuel, who is one of the leading ministers in that government.

Of course, this is a time when all things happen. We are living in an abnormal period in the history of the world and it seems rather strange that these things should happen. But it shows that protection as a permanent policy has not yet been accepted by England. They had a doctor's mandate, apparently, but they agreed to disagree on many things, and this is one of them. I could quote views of Sir Herbert Samuel with regard to an economic unit in the British Commonwealth of Nations, and those views certainly are in harmony with the views I hold personally.

So far as this coming conference is concerned—and I am not criticizing the policy of the government if I modestly suggest some things regarding it—my right hon. friend says that there is no policy. He is inviting suggestions, though the way he answers them is not very pleasant to those who offer the suggestions. May I suggest to my right hon. friend that perhaps he is wrong when he tries to imitate his High Commissioner in London by disparaging the mental equipment of those who do not agree with him.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that about anyone. I said that one gentleman had a somewhat superior mental equipment to another, both on the other side.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I must have misunderstood my right hon. friend, then; certainly we have enough of that sort of thing from the high commissioner, who thinks that all those who do not agree with him are of short vision or low calibre or something of that kind. However, this conference, to be at all successful, must proceed, I submit, along the lines of lowering the tariff. It would be impossible to come to any understanding and to any successful conclusion by adhering to the policies as expressed by my right hon. friend at the conference of 1930. There is emerging from the present depression something that justifies the saying that it is an ill wind—

Mr. BENNETT: An ill wind that blows nobody good.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, an ill wind that blows nobody good; because many people have begun to realize that this race of high tariffs which is being entered into everywhere is a mad race. The idea that the foreigner is a person who must buy but never sell has unfortunately spread from Bedlam to every capital of the world. People are realizing to-day that it is a mistake, in view of the results that are so apparent. The international trade of the world is at a standstill. We have been erecting barriers everywhere. My right hon. friend's proposal in 1930, that we should not lower our tariff at all but that we should raise it ten per cent higher, except for exempting Great Britain and the other dominions from that ten per cent, was certainly not a fair offer, if I may use a mild expression, to make the sister nations of the commonwealth. What benefit will England obtain if she cannot get through Canada's door? What benefit will she obtain because foreign countries are still ten per cent further from our door than she is? And that is exactly the proposal that was made. Indeed, what benefit could we derive ourselves?

I agree with my right hon. friend in what he said this afternoon, that this should be a negotiation based on mutual advantages. I prefer that to the word sacrifices. If you try to base the maintenance of the British Commonwealth of Nations on sacrifices, you are inviting something which at some time or other may be dangerous. What is better is mutual benefit, and no fixed bargaining, nothing that would be a fetter instead of a tie. The union of the British nations must rest upon perfect and absolute freedom. I do not like the term economic unit, which was used this afternoon by one of the speakers on the resolution of my hon. friend from Acadia. An economic union of the empire would mean an economic group against the rest of the world. Let us try to have larger and freer trade as between the nations of the empire. But we must remain free and autonomous in our economic policies as well as in our other policies, for that is the only way to remain friends and brothers. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing so dangerous, as you know, as business matters and business difficulties between members of a family; they are much more serious and much graver than friction between strangers in business affairs. Our understanding, if there is one—and I hope there will be—must be absolutely founded rather on a gentleman's agreement, a friendly entente as between ourselves, than on any strict rule and bargaining based merely on self interest. I, if I may use the first personal pronoun in a modest way, have always held those views. But I am pleased that I am not alone; I have been sharing them with others. They were those of Mr. Asquith, of Lord Grey. If I had time—and unfortunately I cannot be present to-night—I could quote expressions of opinion of many people, but even at the present time the leading economists and writers in the empire reviews are alluding to the very danger which I have been suggesting. I have in my hand the last edition of the Spectator, of April 30, 1932, and it indicates exactly what I have just been saying about the danger which is ahead. Let me quote only a sentence:

> If one of the delegates at Ottawa, thinking to do his duty by those who sent him, tries to get the better of another delegate, the rift in the family is opened. No doubt we should love our butcher and our baker as ourselves, but a still prior duty is to love the brotherhood or sisterhood, and we may be sure that those who do not first show love in the family do not show it in "business." And, if bargains must be, there is danger of forgetting that the best bargain is never the one by which you or I gain, but that by which we both gain.

My last word is that I think we must see to it that the empire does not stand or fall on or because of the tariff. Our idea of union between the British nations must not be based on tariffs, on duties, or even on preferences.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall be absent this evening, and if it be the desire of the committee that the item should stand, it may stand for further consideration; otherwise we shall go into Agriculture.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. ILSLEY: Some of us would like to speak on the item.

Mr. BENNETT: The item then will stand and we shall go on with Agriculture this evening. As I say, I shall not be present to-night. Therefore I have suggested, if the committee so desires, the item may stand and we shall proceed with the Agriculture items.

Item stands.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

The house in committee of supply, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Dairying, $231,300.

Temporary laboratory assistant at Montreal	470
Temporary laboratory assistant at Toronto	375
Temporary laboratory assistant at Winnipeg	280

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): May I ask who is the acting dairy commissioner in Doctor Ruddick's place?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Mr. Singleton.

Mr. BROWN: It seems to me that before we discuss these estimates in detail we ought to have some explanation as to the general policy that is behind the reduction. It will be observed that there is a total reduction in the estimates for agriculture of $3,297,471.74. It may very well be that in some departments of the government economy can be very properly practised. But in view of the importance of agriculture in the economic life of Canada,—which is recognized by every member of this house; for over and over again we have heard it stated that the farmers are the backbone of the country and that unless agriculture prospers there can be no prosperity in Canada—and that in this country we can only hope for a restoration of favourable economic conditions by the rehabilitation of agriculture, it does seem to me that it is false economy to make such drastic cuts in the agriculture estimates.

The CHAIRMAN: Unless it is with the unanimous consent of the committee, the members must confine themselves to the item under discussion.

Mr. BROWN: I think it has usually been the custom in this house, Mr. Chairman, to have a discussion of the estimates in general.

The CHAIRMAN: I know, but I am stating the rule.

Mr. BROWN: We have had a great many proposals for the help of agriculture. This afternoon we had a discussion on the five cents a bushel bonus on wheat, and it was quite evident from the discussion that the farmers are not very greatly enamoured of a bonus on wheat or on anything else. It is generally recognized that such a procedure is wrong, and while temporary relief might be afforded by a bonus it could not ultimately redound to the advantage of agriculture or of the country in general. Of course we know that these estimates are not sanctioned simply by the Minister of Agriculture himself, but represent the joint conclusion of the whole cabinet, and undoubtedly the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have set the seal of their approval on the reductions that have been made. But I repeat it does seem strange that at this time, when agriculture is at such a low ebb that everything that can possibly be done to assist it should be done,—these estimates should be cut so drastically. There may be some places where economies would be desirable. There may have been expenditures in the past in certain directions that were not fully justified. I think the hon. member for Weyburn and myself will heartily approve of the action of the minister and the government in cutting out the grant to the National Dairy Council. The council became simply a propagandist organization to promote the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite who are advocating protection. But in many of the estimates before us there should be no reduction at all. Indeed, the conditions that prevail in this country to-day would warrant an increase in many of these items. That is all I wish to say generally on these items, as we shall have the opportunity to discuss each one as it comes up and to point out the evil that is likely to result if these reductions are carried into effect.

Mr. HAY: May I ask the hon. gentleman if he is opposed to the bonus on wheat?

Mr. BROWN: There is no bonus on wheat.

Mr. HAY: The proposed bonus.

Mr. BROWN: I am not in favour of bonuses of any kind. I think that is a wrong way to help agriculture, and if hon. gentlemen oposite would give a little more consideration to the real difficulties in which the farmer is involved it would be better. It is a mystery to me why men should persist in advocating a bonus on wheat and yet stand for high tariffs on everything the farmer buys. Let us get straight in our thinking on these matters that affect agriculture.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The question raised by the hon. member for Lisgar was as to the policy behind these cuts in the estimates. I would suggest that the best way to answer his query would be to deal with each item as we come to it, when the explanation for the reduction can be given.

Mr. VALLANCE: Before that is done, may I point out that the estimates of the Department of Agriculture are being decreased by about thirty-three and one third per cent, a decrease greater than in the estimates of any other department of the government. I am absolutely in accord with the argument made by the hon. member for Lisgar that this is no time to cut the estimates for agriculture. I wonder if the hon. member who asked the hon. member for Lisgar just where he or we stood regarding wheat bonuses was in the house yesterday when I asked the Prime Minister the intention of the government in connection with bonusing not only wheat but all farm products. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour quite frankly pointed out that at the present time the government had no policy, but that if conditions arose which would warrant their doing so they were prepared to take the necessary steps. Up to the present time, however, the government have admitted that they have no policy in connection with the bonusing of agricultural products. Realizing that all the estimates which come before this house must be approved by the treasury board, I should like the Minister of Agriculture to tell me why all other ministers heading the various governmental departments were able to convince the treasury board that it was not necessary to make the cuts in their departments which were found necessary in the Department of Agriculture. As shown by the estimates, agriculture carries the greatest decrease of any governmental department. Why should that be so?

The CHAIRMAN: I should like to read again to the committee standing order 58, paragraph (2), which is as follows:

Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

Mr. BROWN: During the earlier part of this session we got along very well without a strict enforcement of that rule. I purpose to continue in the same way.

The CHAIRMAN: I am sorry, but the regulation is there.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): Do I understand that when Doctor Ruddick's leave of absence is finished Mr. Singleton will take his place?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The position will be filled by the Civil Service Commission. The six months' leave of absence will have expired in August.

Mr. VALLANCE: The present Deputy Speaker was not able to be with us during the earlier part of the session, and I should like to inform him that in his absence a wide discussion was allowed on all estimates. If he is going to confine us to the item under discussion I should like to ask the minister now regarding another appointment about to be made in his department, namely that of Deputy Minister of Agriculture. Is he in a position to tell the committee and the country who will be appointed? I know the position is not to be filled by the Civil Service Commission.

An hon. MEMBER: Would you like it?

Mr. VALLANCE: Offer it to me, and we will see.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We shall not be able to fill the position until August, when the six months' period will have expired. When the position is filled the hon. member will know who has been selected.

Mr. VALLANCE: In view of the answer the minister has given, I should like to know why the vacancy occurred. Was there a voluntary retirement of the Deputy Minister of Agriculture, or were the conditions such that he would no longer tolerate his position?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I should like to interject—

Mr. VALLANCE: Wait a minute—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Just a minute; I rise to a point of order.

An hon. MEMBER: One at a time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If the Deputy Speaker desires to exercise some authority, and wishes to show how much he knows about running the committee, why does he not draw attention to the fact that this discussion should come up under civil government? The question raised by my hon. friend from South Battleford is not properly debatable at this point. I draw attention to this merely because the Deputy Speaker is sometimes a little bit smart in pulling us up. I now draw his attention to a point he has missed.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is quite right. This is not the proper time to discuss the appointment of a deputy minister.

Mr. TOTZKE: It is quite proper to discuss the retirement of a deputy minister.

The CHAIRMAN: We are on a dairying item; the discussion which has arisen comes under civil government.

Mr. VALLANCE: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. VALLANCE: I rise to a point of order. I do not think you are fair.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. VALLANCE: Because I think you will agree with me that—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. VALLANCE: If he disagrees with me I will be ruled out of order. You will agree with me, Mr. Chairman, that all the items dealing with civil government have now been disposed of. Are we to be denied the right to ask the minister questions? If so, I purpose appealing from the ruling of the chair.

Mr. TOTZKE: We were given to understand when the civil government items were put through that we would be allowed fuller discussion later on.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Melville raised a point of order, and I ruled that according to standing order 58 his point is well taken.

Mr. TOTZKE: Mr. Chairman, I ask hon. members if I am not correct when I state that we were given to understand when the items for civil government were passed that general policies of each department might be discussed when other estimates were before the house.

The CHAIRMAN: I have no objection, but the hon. member for Melville has raised a point of order, which I must decide according to the rules.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The civil government items of the Department of Agriculture have not been passed.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, they have not been passed.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, dairying is a very important branch of the agricultural industry. In my remarks earlier in the day I pointed out that dairymen were selling their products at less than their cost of production. I ask the minister if the government has any policy dealing with price levels of dairy products.

Mr. YOUNG: What about the duty on butter?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): After taking office this government did take steps to assure the Canadian market to the Canadian farmer. We have no authority outside Canada to influence in any way the price of butter on the world market, where our surplus butter has to be sold.

Mr. GARDINER: I appreciate the answer the minister has given, but I am afraid it is totally inadequate to meet the situation. We must consider the price level of agricultural and dairy products in so far as they affect Canadian farmers. Hon. members opposite before taking office told the Canadian people that they had a cure for the marketing situation. The government has been in power about twenty-two months, and the house and country has waited patiently to see what policy they would pursue to back up their statements during the election campaign. They have not brought forward any policies. We have unemployment, a condition with which they were supposed to deal, but so far as the unemployed are concerned, the only thing is to give them unemployment relief. But let us come back to dairying again. How long does the minister expect the Canadian dairyman to produce dairy products at a loss? What is the government going to do about it? Have they any policy to deal with the situation?

Mr. ERNST: In the opinion of the hon. member for Acadia, is it not rather a problem of currency than a problem of policy for the Agriculture department as such?

Mr. REID: The Minister of Trade and Commerce did not say so.

Mr. GARDINER: If the government even had a policy with regard to currency, that might cure the situation we are now discussing.

Mr. ERNST: That is what I asked.

Mr. GARDINER: But so far as I know the government have not got a policy even with respect to currency. I ask the minister in all fairness whether his department has any policy to deal with the conditions under which the dairyman is producing his products to-day and selling them at a price below the cost of production.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. GARDINER: I have addressed a question to the minister, and I trust he will be able to give me some information.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Does the hon. member advocate the bonusing of farm products?

Mr. SPENCER: Now that we have heard from the two assistant ministers, I should be glad if the minister himself would reply to the question of the hon. member for Acadia.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My understanding is that this government so far as agricultural products are concerned did not promise to cure all ills, as has been suggested, but rather we promised that we would give the Canadian market to the Canadian farmer. If this discussion, instead of being confined to each item as we come to it, is to take on a general character, I would crave permission of the committee for a few minutes to discuss the question of agriculture as I see it, and to deal with some suggestions to which we have been giving serious consideration.

An hon. MEMBER: You will have to ask the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the item carried?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister has made a request to the committee, Mr. Chairman, that he be permitted to give information with respect to some suggestions dealing with the general agricultural situation to which the government and his department have been giving serious consideration. I think the committee would be very glad indeed to get that information, for that is what we are really waiting to hear.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes, give him a chance.

Mr. GARDINER: I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that you give the minister that opportunity.

Mr. BOURASSA: And everybody else.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Have I the consent of the committee?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Unanimous consent.

Mr. VENIOT: The same privilege to be accorded to the other side.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think, Mr. Chairman, all hon. members realize that perhaps from the standpoint of agriculture no country in the world has so many difficult problems. The fact that we have about six hundred thousand farmers scattered over an area so extensive from east to west and from north to south, operating under a wide range of climatic conditions and producing a variety of farm products, give rise to many difficult problems. For instance, due to climatic conditions alone it is necessary for us to give careful study to ascertain what breeds of cattle are best suited to the different sections of the country. We have also had to carry on extensive investigations, more extensive than those carried on in any other country, in order to develop grass, grain and other seeds best suited to our varying climatic conditions. Then again our fruit farmers labour under a great handicap because along four thousand miles of boundary line their competitors in the United States have a decided advantage over them with respect to climate, for fruit and vegetables can be produced earlier in the United States and they come on our market at a time when our fruit and vegetable growers feel the competition very injurious to their interests. That in itself has always been a very difficult problem for our agriculturists.

But difficult as it was, in 1929, due to the fact that the tariff barriers had been raised so high against the entry of our farm products into the United States, we found ourselves confronted with another problem that was almost more difficult to solve than those which we had already overcome; I refer to the problem of marketing. Much has been said about production, and for years the United States tariff was such that it was possible for our farmers to market their products to advantage along the boundary line. In fact, it was as though our farmers had an extended domestic market in the United States. One of the results of the proximity of the large cities to the south, where our farmers could market their products, was to give direction to the kind of products they produced. But with the raising of the tariff wall, shutting out our goods from the United States, we were confronted with an entirely new question, the question of marketing our farm products through our eastern and western gateways. No preparation had been made to meet that contingency by any previous government because it had not been necessary, due to the reasons that I have fairly set forth. Therefore we are now confronted with a problem even more difficult than that of diversified production—the problem of marketing. To this problem I have perhaps given more attention than to any other in connection with agriculture since I took this portfolio.

Irrespective of party affiliations, we must meet fairly this question: What can we, as agriculturists, produce to the best advantage to compete with similar products on the European market? Because that is practically the only market that is left to us, particularly the market of the United Kingdom. To decide that question we must take into consideration many different factors or elements. First, we have to consider the long freight haul, whether rail or steamship. Then due to our short summers and long winters the cost of certain types of farming is very much increased and seriously handicaps our farmers in competing on the world's market with the farmers of other nations who do not labour under such handicaps. We must also take into consideration the products that we can produce in sufficient quantities so that once we obtain a foothold on the world's market —the British market—we can ensure a uniform continuity of supply of such high quality as will enable us to compete with the products of other countries. Another very important question is the cost of production. Not the least question is the standard of living of the farmers who are putting their goods on the world market. Taking all these things into consideration I feel that we might agree to this extent, that we can produce one product which cannot be equalled by any other agricultural country; that is wheat. Whether or not we can produce wheat as cheaply as it can be produced in other countries, due to the difference in standards of living, is a question perhaps not yet decided. Personally I think we can, but even if that is so we still have a big handicap because of our freight rates, both on land and on sea. In butter I think it has been proven that we cannot compete with New Zealand or Australia as far as quality is concerned; for one thing we have not the natural advantages possessed by both these countries, which help them to produce butter so cheaply. However, there is another dairy product which we can produce and sell in the old country markets at a premium; I refer to cheese. So I think if we are to concentrate on dairy products we should concentrate on cheese, and since many think we cannot separate butter and cheese, what assists one is bound to assist the other as well.

As I stated at the outset, in thinking over these problems and discussing them with men especially interested in agriculture, on both sides of this house irrespective of politics, I was confronted with one great question. We have given the Canadian market to the Canadian farmers as far as tariffs have allowed us to do so, but the question is how we can extend the effective range of that tariff. This very small surplus of ten million pounds of butter depressed the price in this country from 28 cents to 17 cents a pound. Is there any way by which that small surplus can be lifted off our market and placed on the old country market? There we are struck with the Patterson scheme of Australia, which I think no one can deny has been a great success. That, however, is not a government measure; it is a matter of voluntary cooperation between certain creameries. In Australia the number of creameries is limited, and it was a comparatively simple matter to get them to cooperate in such a voluntary scheme by which they themselves put a levy of so much on every pound of butter they manufactured. Thus they set up a fund to be used by their export board to absorb a certain amount of the loss on each pound of butter exported. That scheme has worked very successfully in keeping the price of Australian butter higher than the world price.

The question with which we are faced is how to overcome that difficulty in connection with our agricultural products. With that in mind we did contemplate, and are still contemplating the introduction of a national farm products marketing act. We have fully discussed this matter with hon. members on both sides to see if it would not be possible in some way, by setting up such a board, to work out some scheme—which we thought we had fairly well worked out—to lift this surplus off our market and thus extend the effective range of the protection given by the tariff. However, although I was quite decided in my own mind, in discussing the question with impartial people whose opinions I value highly they pointed out that the Imperial conference, about which so much has been said, taking place in the near future, it might be better to appoint a number of men fully representative of the whole agricultural life of Canada to discuss fully the question I have briefly outlined. There is something to be said for that. Although there might be some benefit in having a board set up before the Imperial conference, on the other hand there would be an advantage in not setting up the board until we have had the benefit of the discussions which will take place here, and until we have seen the effect they may have on our relationships with the other parts of the British Empire.

So far as the dairy industry is concerned, then, we have done this: We have made every effort to improve the quality of the stock that is producing the cream from which our butter is made. We have done everything possible to send out information with regard to the lowering of the cost of production, through experiments in connection with feeding. We have also given to the Canadian farmer the Canadian market. It will be remembered that the dairy industry was discussed last year when my estimates were up, and it was stated then that an impartial and conservative estimate of the value of that lgeislation was about $12,000,000. I asked my own officers to make an estimate of the value of that legislation, and their figures were somewhat in excess of the amount I have just given. Those who are interested in the dairy industry will realize that during the past few months the very fact that we were able to keep out butter from other countries raised the price of butter in Canada within a very short period to 28 cents per pound, but with the advent of warm weather, production increased about 20 per cent; we accumulated a visible surplus, and the price dropped to the present level. It is hoped that through the formation of a marketing board some means may be worked out to extend the effective range of our tariff by lifting off the surplus of butter we have in Canada, which has been so detrimental to the price.

Mr. BROWN: I think the minister is giving us a number of very good reasons why these estimates should not be reduced.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am informed that any reduction in this estimate will not in any way lower the efficiency of the branch.

Mr. BROWN: I am speaking of the agriculture estimates as a whole.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We are dealing now with item 39.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): I should like to ask the minister if there is an agent in London, England, acting for the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There are trade commissioners in England to act for this and other departments.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): Is there more than one?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think there are five or six in all.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I heartily approve of the suggestion with regard to a marketing board. I should like to go even further and see our external trade handled entirely by import and export boards. That is coming; sooner or later we will have a condition that will compel us to adopt a policy of that kind. In connection with this marketing board for dairy products I wish to ask the minister if he can give us any idea when it will be set up and what its functions will be.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I thought I had made it clear that it is not decided yet whether it would be better to bring a marketing board into being at the present time or whether it would be better to wait, in view of the Imperial conference and the many difficulties with which we will be confronted in forming regulations and making this board effective. I am sure no person in the house appreciates better than the hon. member for Bow River the far-reaching results which will follow the setting up of a new board of this kind. Therefore it is felt, though not definitely decided, that it may be better to appoint men representative of agriculture throughout Canada to make a special study of this question and report before the next session of parliament.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Of course there can be no objection to the minister getting the best information on the subject that it is possible to get, but his last statement would clearly indicate that there is no intention on his part to appoint such a marketing board at least until the next session of parliament. Frankly I fail to follow his reasoning.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If hon. gentlemen would be quiet they could hear me. I suggest to the minister that his reasoning is not easily followed. I should imagine that because of the coming Imperial conference he would deem it exceedingly advisable to have our marketing, in connection with dairy and other agricultural products, thoroughly organized. He would then have an advantage. At least he would be on an equal basis with several of the other dominions and he would have an advantage over those whose marketing was not organized. I wonder if he would consider that for a moment. I submit that he could enter the Imperial conference in a much stronger position if he had a marketing board.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That has been and is being fully considered. One of the questions that doubtless will come up at the Imperial conference is the problem of the various countries putting their goods on the market of the United Kingdom with a bonus, or supported by an artificial levy, and that was one of the advantages which it was felt might come to us by refraining from making the appointment until after the Imperial conference.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): What is the name of the agricultural agent in London.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is no agricultural agent in London; I spoke of trade commissioners in the old country. There was an agricultural agent in London, but it was felt that the work would be better coordinated by having, rather than trade commissioners, agricultural agents, and the different organizations operating with them could all carry on better under one head.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): Have they their offices in London?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): London, Glasgow, Bristol, Cardiff, Liverpool.

Mr. ILSLEY: The minister says he has had in mind the forming of a marketing board. What will be the functions of the board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not think it would be fair for me to commit myself to a board when we are not yet in a position to decide whether or not such a board shall be appointed or what its powers will be.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have before me the annual report of the National Dairy Council of Canada, from which I quote the following:

> The final result of last season's operations in the butter market is well known. We exported 10,680,000 pounds, chiefly to England. The butter was on the whole well received, and more could have been sold if the offering price had been accepted. Finally we entered the winter season with too much butter on hand, or to put it more accurately, too much to inspire confidence in the market. An effort was made in October and November, to bring about a cooperative export of the assumed surplus. This effort failed, as it was not found possible to induce certain large holders to adhere to it, and the rest would not sacrifice in order to make profits for those who would not take their share of the loss. The market gradually weakened, and in February slipped away to unprecedentedly low levels. The fall at that time was greatly aggravated by banking pressure on certain weak holders who were forced to sell regardless of the market condition. It is questionable whether this policy was wise either from the bankers' standpoint or that of the industry, for it brought about a general lowering of the price level and caused widespread loss and unsettlement.

The question which the foregoing suggests is this: How will the marketing board be able to prevent a recurrence of that condition? Would the marketing board be able in some way to lift off the Canadian market the surplus spoken of in that report? If so, how could that be done? The minister must have given a great deal of thought to the subject, and while it is unfair to ask him to state in detail the powers of a body at present non-existent, still I am sure a good many members would like to know how the situation could be met.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): What the hon. member refers to occurred a little over a year ago. It had been realized that the surplus butter produced in Canada was produced chiefly in the west, and so long as it cannot be removed off the market it will flow into eastern Canada, depressing the price here, and then on to the world market. It was felt, after consideration, that even if the large creameries in the west would agree to make a levy among themselves of half a cent per pound on the butter they manufactured, and put that into a fund to purchase the butter that was regarded as a surplus in western Canada, if there were, say, 10,000,000 pounds to export and 225,000,000 pounds produced, one-tenth of a cent per pound on the 225,000,000 pounds produced, distributed over the 10,000,000 pounds, would raise the price of the 10,000,000 pounds in the neighbourhood of 2.25 cents per pound. That, roughly, was the scheme under consideration. The representatives of the different creameries in the west met with me and we went into the matter fully for one or two days, then the conference was adjourned, meeting later in Montreal. Some of the creameries represented had also their own distributing concern in the east, and they thought that they were being called upon to make a contribution that would not net themselves anything. In that they were fair. If, however, it could have been made compulsory, dealing with that incident alone, I have no doubt that the condition that did arise would not have arisen.

Mr. VALLANCE: We are now discussing the present condition of agriculture, and the minister has interjected something with regard to what he proposes to do at some future date, provided certain things happen. I am not concerned with what he proposes to do next year or the year after; I am interested in what he is going to do now. He says that next year, after the Imperial conference, we shall have a marketing board. He, himself, interjects the subject and then he refuses to discuss it because he does not think that it should be discussed prior to the Imperial conference. Well, if we are not going to discuss the marketing board, I should like to know from the minister and from the government what they propose to allow us to discuss in regard to what they have to offer as a means of assisting agriculture in the plight in which it finds itself at the present time. I was very much interested in the talk which the minister has given, if not here, then in some other place. He blames the tariff which has been raised by some other countries against our products going into their markets; he blames other tariffs for preventing us from getting in. But I would point out to the minister that if these countries did this, we retaliated by increasing our tariffs against the imports of other nations, making it that much more difficult for the surplus products of our farms throughout Canada to find markets in the world. Now the minister speaks about the Patterson scheme as it operated in Australia some time ago. I am not sure whether it is in operation now, but I know how Canada met it. We met it by applying the dumping duty, so that the butter came into Canada, not at the price at which it was proposed to bring it in, but at the price in the country of origin. If you create a marketing board that operates on the principle laid down in the Patterson scheme, you will find every country applying dumping duties to prevent you doing the very thing which you propose to do. If we are not to have a marketing board this year, let us forget all about it and discuss the problem that is facing us now. Instead of that, the minister says that some day, at some time in the future, we shall have a marketing board; but that is merely a smoke screen in order to enable him to get these estimates through to-night or to-morrow. I remember that in the dying days of last session—in fact it was the last day of the session—when the estimates of the Department of Agriculture came up, we had no opportunity to discuss matters with the minister, and I pointed out to his chief, the Prime Minister, that it was unfair to the minister himself, in the first place, unfair to this house and unfair to the farmers of Canada, that we should be deprived of an opportunity of discussing with the hon. gentleman any proposals he had for the assistance of agriculture. I think it is only fair to him that to-night he should be given an opportunity to say what he will do, not a year or two years from now, but right at this moment. Yesterday I asked the government what they intended to do in connection with the relief measure then under consideration. I was told quite frankly that the government had no policy. Again to-night we find they have no policy; at least none has been enunciated. If the minister has a policy, I should like to hear him enunciate it and tell us how he proposes to carry it out even with the reduction of thirty-three and a third per cent that is proposed under the estimates at present before the committee.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not think I have anything to add to what I have already said. Our policy is a very definite one. I outlined as clearly as I could what I thought one of our chief difficulties was. It is a matter of judgment whether it would be more advantageous to carry out now the plans that we had suggested, or to have people who are well fitted and representative of agriculture throughout the country to make a special study of the matter and, if it is thought advisable to do so, have the machinery ready to appoint this board during next session.

The hon. member has made quite a point of what I have said and what he has read that I have said on different occasions. In that connection I should like to refer to just one statement that the hon. member for South Battleford made earlier in the session, seeing that he has commented on observations that I have made. As reported on page 1363 of Hansard of March 22, 1932, he is reported as saying:

> The Minister of Agriculture before the election—he did the same thing after the election—went throughout his constituency and advised some of his followers to hold on to their surplus products because he said prices would soar if the Conservative government were returned to power.

I cannot imagine any statement more devoid of one particle of truth than that made by the hon. member for South Battleford on that particular occasion. When I visited my constituency in January, 1931, one of the times that I have visited it since the last election, I made it perfectly clear to a meeting of my constituents that with the conditions existing in agriculture throughout the world, they had to be prepared to produce bacon at from four to five cents a pound if they were to get a market for it outside of the dominion. In any meetings that I have addressed I have endeavoured to be absolutely fair in any statements I have made regarding agriculture.

Mr. VALLANCE: In view of what the minister has said, and of the fact that he has nothing further to offer as to how the government proposes to deal with agriculture, with the approval of the committee and in order to expedite matters, I now move that the item of $6,671,100 be passed as the agriculture vote for this year so that the Department of Agriculture may be permitted to carry on.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): No; we want to discuss this item by item. It is information we desire. We do not wish to put the minister in a hole. Any questions I have asked have been reasonable, as I think the minister will agree.

Mr. DONNELLY: I have listened to what the minister has said with regard to the situation in which agriculture finds itself. About a year ago, when he became Minister of Agriculture and before the house met, he had published in several newspapers twelve points that he brought up and what he was going to do for agriculture. I remember referring in the house to those twelve points and telling him what I thought about them.

This year I do not hear him saying anything about them; They have all gone by the board. He has now no policy, and I think my estimate of his policy at that time is just about right. Probably he remembers what my estimate was; I brought it up under point six; it was all answered by number six and that is just what it amounted to. The minister says that the one thing the government has done is to secure the Canadian market for the Canadian farmer. Let me ask the minister: When did the Canadian farmer not have the Canadian market? The trouble was that the Canadian farmer always had the Canadian market, but for many years under Liberal rule they were not able to supply the demands of the Canadian people and some commodities had to be imported. Our farmers at that time did not go in for butter making, chicken raising, egg producing; they went into the most profitable work, that is wheat raising. That was the case until the present government came into power, and then, when conditions went from bad to worse, they had to go into producing eggs and butter, not eating ice cream but making the cream into butter. They did this to try to make a living, and at the present time some of them are making a very poor one.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DONNELLY: Some hon. members may laugh, but if to-day they go into western Canada among the farmers and see them in need, they will not be laughing and considering it a joke. This is no laughing matter among the farmers either of western or of eastern Canada, yet when a farm problem is brought before the house, hon. members think they can sit back and laugh.

I understand the minister during the last election campaign told his constituents that they would have to be prepared to produce bacon for four or five cents a pound. Is that the statement he made?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not during the election. In January, 1931.

Mr. DONNELLY: My information is that the people who assisted the minister during the last election told his constituents they were going to get big prices for their bacon, eggs and butter. They did not tell the farmers they would have to produce bacon for four or five cents a pound or eggs for four cents a dozen. The other day I received a letter from a man in my constituency saying that the price of eggs in my town was four cents a dozen. He says that it takes a dozen eggs to buy an apple. This is a question in mathematics: How many dozen eggs would it take to buy a barrel of apples? That is the condition in which the farmers find themselves in western Canada, and yet our farmer friends opposite laugh and think it is a big joke. Even the hon. member for Long Lake thinks it is a laughing matter. I do not know what his constituents will think when he laughs over matters of this kind.

The situation at the present time is very serious and yet the minister has nothing to offer except that he allows the government at such a time as this to cut the estimates. I notice an item for the administration of the Destructive Insect and Pest Act. In to-day's newspapers we are informed the people in western Canada are threatened with an outbreak of pests in the form of cutworms, yet we are told that this estimate is to be cut down this year. We are troubled at this time with pests, and the greatest of them is the present government. That is what is worrying the farmer now, and he is anxious to get out and cast a vote against them. I implore the government to get the best people they possibly can to fight this pest that is threatening the west.

We are told that the Imperial conference is going to do something for us, and I hope it is. If it is not a success, it will be disastrous for the present government. It is their last sheet anchor, their last hope. We are hoping it will do something for the farmer. I believe the hon. member for South Battleford is quite right: if the government has nothing for agriculture, what is the use of our sitting here and discussing these estimates?

Mr. MALONEY: I agree entirely with my hon. friend from Willow Bunch when he says that the farmer should be given some chance. As I rode to town on the train this morning I saw on either side of the track farmers working strenuously in the fields, ploughing with the old horses, and they were not thinking of a five cents a bushel bonus on wheat, or whether they would receive a dollar or a dollar and a half or two dollars a bushel for their wheat; they were satisfied to go on with their work. I thought that showed the spirit of these men, and was a lesson to every citizen of this country. When I listened to the wailings of my hon. friend from Willow Bunch and my hon. friend from South Battleford, and that grand old patriarch the hon. member for Lisgar, and remembered what they did not do for the Canadian farmer when they were in a position to do something, it reminded me of an incident which occurred in the state of Minnesota a few years ago. The authorities of that state decided to put on a "save the forest" week. They sent out lecturers through the entire state, and many large meetings were held. At one of these meetings a distinguished forestry expert spoke, and he noticed in the audience a man who was applauding vociferously and vigorously. The lecturer made it a point to see him after the meeting was over, and said to him, "I am so glad that you appreciated my address." "I certainly did," the man replied. The lecturer said, "You must have been interested in forestry yourself and have done something along the line of preserving the forest." "Why, yes I did," replied the man. "Well, what did you do?" "Once," replied the man, "I shot a woodpecker." Our friends across the aisle, Mr. Chairman, when they had the opportunity of helping the farmer, did not simply not shoot a woodpecker they shot the farmer by allowing farm products to flood this country from all quarters of the globe. To-day we are endeavouring to prevent that. We are creating a market for the Canadian farmer.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Where is it?

Mr. MALONEY: I would say to my hon. friends and to the farmers of Canada: Give the present Minister of Agriculture a chance, and he will do something for the farmer, but not with the aid of hon. gentlemen opposite, because they were never known to do anything in the line of advancing the interests of the farmer. But the minister will do it, with the aid of the people of Canada, who I believe are absolutely behind him. He will evolve a policy which will be put into effect in this country before many months are over and it will be to the great advantage of the farmers of Canada.

Mr. BROWN: Will my hon. friend go out and tell the farmers in his constituency that they ought to be satisfied simply to work and not think anything about the prices they get for their products? That is the kind of farmer he holds up to us as an example, and that is just the kind of farmer we do not want to see in this country—farmers satisfied to keep their noses to the grindstone, taking no account of the conditions under which they live, and thinking nothing about the prices they receive for their products.

Mr. VENIOT: Not being able to find in the estimates any item covering the salaries of vegetable inspectors and supervisors, I wish to take advantage of the privilege that has been granted to us to discuss agriculture generally to draw the attention of the minister to what I consider to be a grave discrimination in the matter of the dismissal of inspectors and supervisors of vegetables.

[Mr. Maloney.]

I have before me the report on the dismissal of one Conrad Estabrooks, inspector of vegetables, residing at Upper Sackville, in the county of Westmorland, New Brunswick. Mr. Conrad Estabrooks was notified by the department that his services would no longer be required on account of certain charges that had been made against him, which charges were investigated without any notification to the accused of the investigation to be held. I have here a copy of a letter signed by R. Weir, dated Department of Agriculture, Ottawa, November 5, 1931, and addressed to R. E. Estabrooks, F. L. Estabrooks & Company, Sackville, N.B., reading as follows:

Dear Sir,—

I am in receipt of your letter of recent date complaining of our failure to reemploy Mr. D. C. Estabrooks this fall for potato inspection work.

I have had this matter gone into very carefully by our Mr. Marshall, acting district inspector for the maritime provinces, and our Mr. McIntosh has, I understand, written you several letters in this connection.

Mr. Marshall in submitting his report on this case stated, "I find there is a strong feeling in these sections that discrimination has been shown by this inspector. They feel that Inspector Estabrooks—

It does not say who feel, but simply "they feel":

—is too young a man to stand the strain of family influence, being closely connected with one of the largest shipping firms in that section."

Under these circumstances the department felt that there was no option but to decline to have Mr. Estabrooks reappointed this year. It was not a case of his ability as an inspector or otherwise, but rather one of dissatisfaction on the part of shippers coming under the inspection of this young man, and I feel that the department could not have acted differently in this matter.

Yours very truly,
R. Weir.

This young man asked for the usual investigation and that investigation was refused him. I claim, Mr. Chairman, that where an official is accused of discrimination in the performance of his duty he should if he so desires, be granted an open investigation, and no inspector and no official of the department, or of any department should be sent to hold an ex parte investigation.

Mr. COTNAM: The same as you dismissed postmasters.

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friend had better keep his tongue between his teeth, if he can possibly do so, or I may have a shot or two for him. I claim it was unjust and unfair, Mr. Chairman, to dismiss an official who asked for an investigation and wanted an opportunity to defend himself.

In rising I said I wished to point out unfair discrimination in matters of this kind as practised by the Department of Agriculture. I have before me a case where on the personal certificate of a member of this house a returned soldier was dismissed in 1931. He was a vegetable inspector at the head of his district. After he was dismissed by order in council based on the certificate of the hon. member representing the county—oh, the minister need not make inquiries about the name; I will give it to him before I am through. I shall give him more than a name.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I was not inquiring about the name, but I did think my hon. friend's remarks were somewhat remote from dairying. If the hon. member would wait until the proper time I will have the information he wishes.

Mr. VENIOT: There is no use in the minister trying to raise the point of order that we are dealing with dairying. There is no item in his estimates under which I can bring this matter to the attention of the committee.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Oh yes, there is. There is a special item for fruit and vegetables.

Mr. VENIOT: I claim the same privilege claimed by other members. The minister was granted an opportunity to talk, and I have as many rights in debate as he has.

The CHAIRMAN: A point of order was raised by the hon. member for Melville, and by unanimous consent of the committee it was decided to discuss the whole agricultural policy.

Mr. VENIOT: That is what I am doing. Under the personal certificate of the member representing the county, an order in council was passed dismissing the man to whom I refer. The order of dismissal was sent to his chief; his chief notified him; he claimed he was wrongly dismissed, and asked for an investigation under oath. The department notified him that having been dismissed by order in council he could not have an investigation. I agree that when an order in council is passed there is difficulty in recalling it. But what happened in this case? This man, a returned soldier, applied to the soldiers' organization in this city of Ottawa. On his behalf they took the matter up, and after considerable fighting, and pressure brought to bear, the minister notified this man that he would have an investigation, and accordingly an investigation was granted. My point is this: Why was an investigation granted to a man dismissed by order in council, and refused a man who was dismissed or laid off only by order of the minister? There was no order in council dismissing Estabrooks. I do not know whether we should use the common slang expression, but when the pressure was brought to bear I am wondering whether the minister got cold feet and allowed himself in one case to be influenced by the pressure, but in another case refused an investigation. I should like to go a little further with this latter case.

An hon. MEMBER: What was the name?

Mr. VENIOT: The name of the man who was dismissed is Charles D. Smith.

An hon. MEMBER: A brother of the member?

Mr. VENIOT: Not that I know of.

Mr. SPOTTON: Is he married or single?

Mr. VENIOT: An investigation took place, and I am going to place on Hansard some of the evidence taken. Mr. Ronald E. Smith was the first witness called, and under oath he testified as follows:

> I live at East Florenceville. I am a labourer. I attended a meeting called by the Liberal party at Andover in 1930. That meeting was called by the Liberal party asking Liberal supporters and friends of the Liberal party to attend. I attended the meeting at the request of the Hon. B. F. Smith. He requested me to see what the people at the meeting had to say. It was also for the purpose of seeing what prominent men were there. I saw Charles D. Smith, supervisor of potato inspectors there. I was quite near to him. There could be no mistake on my part about his identity. I came back to East Florenceville and reported to Mr. B. F. Smith. I don't know if he took any active part in the meeting.

Later this man was cross-examined by Mr. Money, the lawyer for the accused Charles D. Smith. Under cross-examination the witness said:

> I am a nephew of the Hon. B. F. Smith. I think it was the morning of the convention that Mr. Smith told me to go there. I live with Hon. B. F. Smith. I drove in George Smith's car there that day. He is my cousin and B. F. Smith's son.

Then, when cross-examined by Mr. B. F Smith, the member, he went on to reiterate that he saw this man there again. I may say Mr. George E. Smith also swore he saw Mr. Charles D. Smith at Andover on that date.

Now we have the evidence of Mr. Charles D. Smith, the accused:

> I live at the parish of Perth, Victoria county. I am the C. D. Smith about whose dismissal this investigation is being held. I was not present at the convention at Andover as claimed by Ronald E. Smith. Since 1919 I have taken no part in politics, other than going to the polls and casting my ballot. I have never engaged in any partisan work in any election, local or federal, since 1919. Since 1919, I have never contributed to any party funds, Liberal or Conservative. I have never received or in any way dealt with any money for any party funds. I have known Ronald E. Smith for a few years. I don't know of any person in Victoria or Carleton county who resembles me in appearance. June 30, 1930, I went from Perth to Hillsdale, Grand Falls and return to Perth. About seventy to seventy-five miles the round trip. I went by auto. July 1st, Perth to Plaster Rock and return, about fifty-five miles round trip. July 2nd, Perth to Aroostock Junction, Kilburn and return about twenty-seven or twenty-eight miles round trip. Usually left in the morning and went to Aroostock and came back for dinner. Made the other trip in the afternoon. July 3rd, I went from Perth to Centreville and Woodstock. Stayed in Woodstock all night.

I have never talked to any person advising them to vote one way or another. I have advised government employees to leave politics alone. Have advised men working under me that they belonged to the civil service and were not supposed to take any part in politics. The only political meeting I have attended since 1919 was the nomination day proceedings in the summer of 1930 for the provincial election at Andover.

When both parties were together.

I stood in the doorway and listened to Mr. White talk. I was there possibly fifteen minutes. Then I went over to the office. On the platform with Mr. White were Mr. Pirie, C. H. Elliott, Mr. Niles. I don't remember who the chairman was.

Then he is cross-examined by Mr. B. F. Smith on the method of recommending sub-inspectors for the inspection of potatoes and so on. He again claims he took no part in politics and denies having stated to Mr. Smith that he was in Andover at such and such a date.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Inasmuch as the hon. member read the cross-examination of another witness, will he be good enough to read the cross-examination of this witness with respect to his not being at Andover on that day?

Mr. VENIOT: I will do so, because I am always pleased to have my hon. friend's name put on Hansard.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): We all recognize your fairness.

Mr. VENIOT: Here is the cross-examination by Mr. B. F. Smith:

I was appointed potato inspector in the year 1922. I was appointed supervising inspector or senior about four years ago. I was not continually at this work until appointed supervisor. In the appointment of potato inspectors they were selected and then made application on printed forms. I don't know by whom they were selected. Those applications bearing the name of the applicant went before an examining board. I was a member of the examining board.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Oh, oh.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman laughs. What has that got to do with it?

The other members were Mr. Vroom, Gallagher (C.F.), Mr. Hicks. I don't know how many meetings that board held. They held some. I don't know that every application came before that board, but we dealt with what applications were sent us. Every application that went to the department was not necessarily signed by me. The department may have made appointments without my signature as a member of the board. There were somewhere about thirty when all were working. That would be in a rush season. There were about twenty in the two counties of Victoria and Carleton.

Q. Among the twenty inspectors who were working under you in Victoria and Carleton, did you approve of one who was recommended by a Conservative? And prior to the 1930 election? Or in 1930 up to the time of your dismissal?

A. I don't know who recommended these men. I know every applicant has to be recommended by somebody. I would not know who recommended these men unless it was on the application. I can point to one Conservative whose application was favourably considered, Coles Crouse of Upper Woodstock. I don't know who recommended him. I don't know whether it was Charles Clarke who recommended him. Usually three present at our meetings. Mr. Vroom, Mr. Gallagher and myself held our meetings at the most central place according to where the applications came from. I have no records of these meetings. I do not think we held any at Florenceville. I don't know about Hartland or Bath. We held some at Perth, I don't know how many. I don't think we held a board meeting at Perth. The district inspector kept all records. I can't remember that Mr. Hicks attended any meetings. Mr. Vroom attended them all. I cannot say that I attended them all. They never sent me an application to sign after a meeting. Qualifications: knowledge of the potato business; neatness in handwriting; ability to carry on as an inspector. I don't know the political belief of applicants.

Q. What member of the board defined the political status of an applicant?

A. No one that I know of. Politics did not enter into it with me.

Q. Don't you think it significant that out of twenty inspectors under you in this constituency not one was accepted that was recommended by a Conservative?

A. I can name one inspector who was recommended by a Conservative. Allie Shaw. I cannot remember whether the application of Kenneth Squires, a returned man from Upper Carleton county came before me. I don't know whether Squires was appointed or not. I favoured all returned men whose applications came before me. I don't know whether Squire's application is at Ottawa with my name on it as rejecting him. I did not tell you—

That is B. F. Smith.

I did not tell you that I attended the Andover Liberal convention referred to by Ronald E. Smith. I didn't tell you that I was at that Liberal convention for a short time. I didn't tell you I was at that convention between trains. I was in Perth on the day of that convention.

For the information of the committee I may say that Perth is right across the river from Andover.

If I was at Perth I could have attended that convention. The examining board classifies applicants as to their fitness and qualifications to perform their duties. The board rates the applicant and in order to be accepted he must rate 70 so far as I know. Men rated over 70 by us have been rejected by the department.

I have recommended men apart from rating them. I don't know how many. I have never written a recommendation on the back of an application nor have I ever written suggesting rejection.

I did tell Mr. B. F. Smith that I attended the local nomination day convention in 1930.

The applications came to our board from Ottawa.

That is the end of this.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. VENIOT: Where is the cheering? What is the cause of its absence? Is it that a returned soldier has been ruthlessly thrown down under such an examination? Here is further evidence:

William White, Sworn:

I was a potato inspector under C. D. Smith for four years.

Q. Did Mr. C. D. Smith ever talk politics with you?

A. No, I don't think he ever did. Before the last federal election he advised me to take no part in politics. We were not supposed to do so. The day of the federal Liberal convention at Andover, 1930, he told me this in his own office. I was present at that convention. After the convention he was in his office working at the desk. That would be about four o'clock. I didn't see him at the convention. I won't swear he was not there.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I think it is very unfair that the time of the committee should be taken up with a matter that is entirely out of order.

Mr. VENIOT: The hon. gentleman asked me to read this evidence, and I am simply complying with his request. Now he says it is out of order.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I rise to a point of order. The hon. member for Gloucester has taken occasion irregularly to read the direct evidence of William White without reading the cross-examination.

Mr. VALLANCE: There is no point of order there.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read the whole thing.

Mr. VENIOT: I have read everything that Mr. William White said on direct examination and cross-examination. In order to prove it to the house I will repeat it.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I again raise a point of order. The hon. gentleman has not read what Mr. White said under cross-examination.

Mr. VENIOT: I have here the evidence of Mr. White on these two sheets, and I have read every word of evidence under the name of White on these two sheets.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the whole question is out of order.

Mr. VENIOT: If the hon. gentleman himself was in order, Mr. Chairman, he would not have asked me to read the evidence. Now, having read it, he says it is out of order.

An hon. MEMBER: You are in order.

Mr. VENIOT: I am in perfect order. Now he finds the shoe pinches he wants the evidence expunged from the record on the ground that it is out of order.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I rise to a question of privilege. The hon. gentleman has made a statement that is not in accordance with the facts. He knows very well that the only reason I rose to a point of order was because he was not doing what I asked him to do; he did not read the cross-examination of Mr. White. He would not do that, and I regret that the chairman did not insist that he do it. He has not done it yet—

Mr. VENIOT: Is this a question of privilege? I rise to a point of order now.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Maloney): The hon. member for Gloucester, at the request of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, proceeded to read the evidence and the cross-examination.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. VENIOT: I read it. I do not intend to pay any more attention to the remarks or interruptions of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton. Hansard tomorrow will show whether or not I read all that I should have read. Now I intend to go a little further. I feel that the minister—

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. VENIOT: If my hon. friend will let the Minister of Agriculture—

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman; I was advised by you a moment ago that the hon. gentleman had proceeded to read the cross-examination of Mr. William White. I did not hear it; it has not been read.

Mr. VENIOT: As much as I should like to comply with the request of the hon. gentleman, I decline to take up the time of the committee in reading again what I have already read. The hon. member can read it in the morning, if his eyesight is good enough after he has spent the rest of the evening thinking over his actions in connection with this matter. The hon. gentleman, a member of this house, attended investigations held for the purpose of dismissing returned soldiers, and he conducted the investigation as a lawyer and a cross-examiner. I say, Mr. Chairman, that this seems pretty small potatoes.

In view of what I have stated to-night, especially with regard to Estabrooks and the discrimination shown, will the minister reopen the Estabrooks case? It is not that I want him restored to his position; I want his character cleared. He has a right to have an investigation to which he can bring his witnesses, where those accusing him will have to appear under oath and state their case face to face with the man they accuse. We are not living in Russia; we are in a free country, where the law says every man is innocent until he is proved guilty. The Minister of Agriculture has refused this man British justice and fair play. He asked for an investigation, but the minister would not grant his request; he was given an exparte investigation. I do not want Estabrooks restored; after such treatment he would not continue under this administration, but I do ask that he be given an opportunity to wipe from his character the blemish placed upon it by this exparte investigation. I think to-night, before these estimates go through, the minister should state to this committee that Estabrooks will have an open investigation.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I think in fairness to myself, while I regret to take up the time of the committee on a matter which is entirely irrelevant, I should say a word. The hon. member for Gloucester has made a number of statements which might leave a wrong impression with regard to the matter which he has been discussing. In the first place let me refer to Mr. Charles D. Smith, to whom my hon. friend referred. Mr. Smith lives in my own constituency, and he was appointed chief potato inspector for the province of New Brunswick, with headquarters at Madawaska. While he was a member of the examining board and had to pass upon the different applicants for positions, he never recommended one man who was not a Liberal for appointment as potato inspector. The men whose names were given by my hon. friend from Gloucester were recommended by Liberals and not by Conservatives; that is the reason they received the appointment. In my own constituency there was only one Conservative out of twenty.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: That is enough.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I must confess that during the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite that seemed to be their idea of what was enough. My hon. friend went further and tried to make it appear to this committee that Mr. Charles Smith was not a political partisan. The one fact I have stated is the most convincing argument that could be adduced to show that Mr. Smith was a political partisan, since he did not give a single Tory an appointment during the years he was chief inspector. In the second place Mr. Charles Smith, notwithstanding what he said on that examination, did tell me not once but on two different occasions that he attended the Liberal convention at Andover.

Mr. VENIOT: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Will the hon. gentleman take his seat?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Maloney): State your point of order.

Mr. VENIOT: Not while the hon. gentleman is standing. The point of order is this: I have read the oath taken by Mr. Smith before the commissioner, and I have read his replies to the questions of Mr. B. F. Smith, in which he denies—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Maloney): What is your point of order?

Mr. VENIOT: My point of order is that the hon. gentleman, after the investigation has taken place and the report has been acted upon, has no right to get up in this committee and attempt to contradict evidence which was given while the hon. member was present and did not take an oath.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I think I have a perfect right to state what was said to me personally.

Mr. VENIOT: Why did you not take the oath? You did not dare give evidence under oath.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I can say what was said to me personally. That statement, Mr. Chairman, and the evidence of the different witnesses who appeared before that investigator, were heard under oath. Now my hon. friend from Gloucester tries to contradict the evidence which was given before the commissioner, and seeks to suggest that the commissioner who held that investigation did something wrong. That investigator made his report to the department; the report was based upon the facts as he heard them and upon the evidence of the different witnesses who came before him. I submit that it is entirely out of order and absolutely unfair for the hon. member for Gloucester to come before this committee and try to make it appear that the investigator who heard the evidence under oath was guilty of sending to the department at Ottawa a wrong conclusion with regard to the evidence given before him.

So far as the appointment of potato inspectors is concerned, I am very much surprised that the hon. member for Gloucester should try to make it appear that he has been so fair in connection with certain appointments in the county of Carleton. He knows—and it is on record in the department at Ottawa to-day—that he himself came from that province while a minister and did his utmost to prevent certain men being appointed as potato inspectors, although they were perfectly qualified. He used his influence as a minister of the crown to stop the appointment of those men when he knew absolutely that they were fully qualified and were supported by the recommendation of men who ought to have known what their qualifications were. He was guilty of that, and he cannot deny it; yet he stands up here and tries to justify himself before this committee and before the country, endeavouring to make it appear that he was absolutely impartial in the matter of appointments and dismissals.

Mr. MULLINS: I wonder what the farmers of western Canada would think of this fiasco. The farmers of the west are struggling for existence, and yet hon. gentlemen will stand up opposite and make such speeches as we have been hearing. Western Canada is struggling under a very heavy burden at the present time, and we have to listen to such speeches in this house. No wonder agriculture finds itself in its present condition. Hon. gentlemen opposite have talked about agriculture being the basic industry of the west. Yes, it is; but when the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, the most important estimates which we have to consider, come before the house, why do they not permit us to go ahead and make some progress with them? I remember when the hon. member, my neighbour from Melville, was getting his estimates through there was no such obstruction as we are witnessing now. I have here a copy of the estimates for 1929 and I find that in the Department of Agriculture the hon. gentleman had 1,962 employees, hog graders and inspectors of all kinds. He had all sorts of graders grading the farmers of western Canada, and professors of one kind and another chasing beetles and flies all over the country. Why, in the Fort Garry hotel there were twelve of them at one time, trying to find how many whiskers were on barley, and this cost the country all sorts of money. In 1929 it cost $7,201,566 to run the Department of Agriculture, and in 1930 it had increased to $9,400,000. I wonder what benefit the farmers of western Canada derived from that expenditure. Certainly none of it was devoted to that basic industry known as the live stock business; we received no consideration at the hands of the then Minister of Agriculture. Indeed, he abolished the policy of pure bred sires and catered to southern Saskatchewan, putting those settlers on land which it was not possible to farm. It was not farming land. As a matter of fact, a few years ago they had watering carts trying to water the grain, and the hon. gentleman should have known that before he undertook to put settlers in there.

I have no objection to wheat, but I must say that I have listened to discussions about wheat before the committee on agriculture, day after day, when not a word was said in reference to the live stock industry, the most important part, of agriculture. That branch of agriculture has never had a friend; all down through the years, from 1921 to the present time, it has been friendless. Why, when the gentleman who was Minister of Railways was here he was at the head of a corporation in Winnipeg known as the United Grain Growers, and he said to the farmers of western Canada, "Bring on your cattle; ship them in to us; we are your friends and we will look after you". Mr. Chairman, I have stood in the stockyards and have seen the operations going on there. They built a ring at the weigh scales and they put the farmer on a pedestal which they had erected, where he could look down at what was going on but he did not know what was actually taking place. That is in evidence to-day. Any man who goes to the stockyards will see that pedestal which they put up there, on which the farmer stood, so that he could not hear what was going on when his cattle were going on the scales at less money then they would sell in the open market. I often wondered how long that condition would continue. I have a certificate here for a certain lot of cattle that went through in this way. They took the cattle from the farmers of the west at from one to two and three cents a pound less than their value. That was going on all the time under the ex-Minister of Agriculture; there is no doubt about it. In the stockyards they put up a sign on the wall, "The organized farmer in business". I wondered whether he was in business. After they had milked him dry, so to speak, he went out of business.

The late minister instituted a grading system in the west which was the worst system ever adopted against the farmers in that part of the country, for it allowed the packers the privilege of grading hogs and deriving the benefit therefrom. I say, let the farmer go with his pen of hogs, or with his live stock, and sell them. Don't take the initiative away from him. The farmer does not need any custodian; any time I ever came in contact with him he was able to sell his cattle right in his field. Now he has to send them in to some custodian, under the Live Stock Act which was passed by the late Minister of Agriculture. I am sorry to have to speak this way, but it is my duty to do all I can to assist the farmer. I travelled all the way to Winnipeg to try to obtain a lower rate for cattle, under the minister's Petersen commission, thinking that it was some good. But what happened? I ask, was there ever a fiasco perpetrated upon the people of this country comparable to that Petersen commission? I regret the necessity of naming a gentleman who is dead—he died opposite the parliament building—but I am bound to say that in my opinion it was never intended that there should be a lower rate for the farmers of the west.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask the hon. gentleman just one question, for information?

Mr. MULLINS: The hon. member will have all the time he wants after I am through. I have here a few newspaper clippings, showing how anxious the late Minister of Agriculture was to do something for the live stock men of the west. Here is one: "Expects cut in freight rates for cattle"; this is from an article that appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune. Another one declares that the government is "seeking means of reducing ocean rates on cattle". Every time the hon. gentleman went to the west these articles would appear in the paper under big headlines, but nothing was done. Another one reads, "Motherwell outlines way to force reduction in Atlantic freight rates". Now the hon. the Minister of Agriculture has secured a freight rate of $10.80 for young steers to the old country. The only market that Canada has is the British market. This circular which I hold in my hand has been travelling all over the west during his term of office in an endeavour to get our young steers into the United States where they are fattened and killed, the beef being shipped back into Canada. We are bringing into Canada in the form of canned meats millions of pounds, equal to 50,000 cattle yearly. We are bringing in pickled shoulders and hams from the United States and thus ruining our own hog and beef industry. If we do not stop this sort of thing, prices will be lowered. There is a way out of this situation and I hope the minister will take up the question when the Imperial conference is sitting here.

There are some good farmers on the other side of the house and I ask them: Why do they sit back and let the fiasco continue that we have had over there? I do not like it and I am sure they do not.

Agriculture is an important item before the house and we should get down to business. Let us give the minister a chance to do something. I know he is trying to do his best for the men of western Canada in regard to wheat, cattle, hogs and every other product of the farm. All I can say is that if the farmer is not successful God help Canada.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In reply to the question of the hon. member for Gloucester, I have not the detailed information before me because we are dealing with item 39, but from what the hon. member has said and as far as my memory serves me, this gentleman, Mr. Estabrooks, who was a temporary, seasonal employee, a vegetable inspector, was not re-engaged because it was felt by his superior officers—this is the reason given—that on account of his supposed partiality, it would not be in the interests of the potato industry to reappoint him. If I recollect aright, it was after that the matter was brought to my attention and I gave it very careful consideration. The information that I received forced me to the conclusion that there was no room for two opinions.

As regards the next man, Mr. Smith, from what has been read, this is a different case entirely. It is one of political partisanship, not of inefficiency. Mr. Smith was also a vegetable inspector, and on a letter from a member of the house saying that of his personal knowledge he knew this man was guilty of political partisanship, the course was taken by my officers that I believe has always been taken in the past on such a letter or on such information being forthcoming; that is, an order in council was passed dismissing him from his position. In spite of the fact that this has been customary in the past, when sufficient information was brought to my attention that I felt I might be warranted, in all fairness, especially as it was a case of political partisanship, in granting an investigation, I did so.

Mr. VENIOT: What about the personal certificate of the hon. member?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Just a minute. The procedure that was followed is that which has always been followed in connection with these cases.

Mr. VENIOT: I think I should be given an opportunity of saying a word or two in reply to the minister. In regard to the Estabrooks case, my complaint is that Estabrooks was charged with discrimination, and the report so shows. This is from Mr. McIntosh:

Regarding inquiries re complaint of discrimination—

There was a definite charge of discrimination.

—I might advise that the investigation was conducted.

How was the investigation conducted? This man was not notified. It was an ex parte investigation; he was given no chance to defend himself. It was a case of hanging the criminal and trying him afterwards. Yet the Minister of Agriculture last session and this says that he does not know of any partisanship.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Was that partisanship in that connection?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes. Partisanship must have directed the reports received from Sackville, not from potato shippers but from political wire pullers. That is the reason this investigation was held ex parte. What I ask is this: Give this man a chance to clear his character. He has been charged with lack of attention to duty, of discriminating in the inspection of potatoes, because his uncle and I think his father were themselves in the potato business and he was not inspecting their potatoes. I again appeal to the minister to grant this man an investigation—not to restore him to his position, but to give him an opportunity of clearing his character against the charge of discrimination in the performance of his duties. That is all I ask, and I should like to know from the minister to-night whether he will examine the record to-morrow or later on, and, if he finds what I state to be true: that a charge of discrimination was made; that it was investigated ex parte and that the man was given no opportunity to defend himself, whether the minister will reopen the investigation so as to give this man an opportunity of defending his character.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is that this was absolutely a case of inefficiency.

Mr. VENIOT: But this document in the minister's own file speaks of a charge of discrimination.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Discrimination in duty, which is inefficiency. I have given the matter every consideration that I feel it can be given, but so that there may be no possible doubt as to any unfairness in connection with it, I shall be only too glad to give it further consideration.

Mr. VALLANCE: The minister quoted from a speech which I made in the house on March 22 as follows:

The Minister of Agriculture before the election—he did the same thing after the election—went throughout his constituency and advised some of his followers to hold on to their surplus products because he said prices would soar if the Conservative government were returned to power.

The only thing I am sorry about is that the minister did not read the whole speech and take cognizance of what I said in it. What I was dealing with at that time was the very subject we are dealing with to-night, namely the marketing of the surplus products, not only of western Canada but of the whole dominion. What has the government done in regard to this subject? During the last election campaign they promised the farmers, not only of the west but of the whole country, that if they were elected they would do certain things; they would blast their way into new markets. The present Prime Minister went from one end of the country to the other making those promises to the farmers. What did the government do, not at the special, but at the first regular session of parliament? They sent to the committee on agriculture a certain order of reference asking them to investigate and to report to the house on the marketing problems of Canada. What report did that committee bring in? May I again remind the house that concurrence in that report has never been moved. The closing paragraph of it was as follows:

In view of the situation as it presented itself to the committee it is not considered advisable to make any recommendation. Your committee, however, submit that the evidence submitted to it might be usefully studied by members of the house.

That was the only contribution to a solution that was made by this government the first year they were in office. Now, in 1932, what is their suggestion for the relief of agriculture? The minister holds up what I designated before as a smoke screen of something he proposes to do at some future date, but he does not intend to discuss it now. This is what we are interested in; this is why we are trying to object to the thirty-three and a third per cent reduction in the estimates, because we realize it is utterly impossible for this, or, for that matter, any other government to bring about or to attempt to bring about the fulfilment of the promises they gave to the people of Canada during the last election. So I would advise the minister in his spare moments to read the speech that I delivered in this house on March 22 last. The criticism I made then was in the same spirit that actuates me now—I am acting in the very best of faith, hoping to help the minister. I went so far to-night to try to help him as to move that these estimates totalling six million dollars odd be voted now en bloc because of his lack of knowledge as to what he proposed to do with the money, but he would not accept the motion.

Mr. DONNELLY: I listened to what the hon. member for South Renfrew and the hon. member for Marquette said a few moments ago with regard to the Minister of Agriculture. They pleaded with us to give the minister a chance, trying to leave the impression that we were not giving him fair play. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that for the past two years we on this side of the house and the people of Canada have been giving the minister a chance to carry on and evolve his policy and tell us what he is going to do, but we are still waiting to learn what his policy is, and it is no wonder that we on this side and the people of the country are beginning to lose faith in anything that the minister and this government are going to do for the farmers.

Mr. GOTT: Not the country.

Mr. DONNELLY: Yes, the country.

Mr. GOTT: What about Athabaska?

Mr. DONNELLY: I want to say this to the hon. member and to the committee. We ask the minister, what is your policy with regard to dairying? Have you any policy? If the minister says that he has no policy with regard to dairying, is it any wonder that we and the public are losing confidence in him? All I have to do to show that the people are losing confidence in him is to quote from a farm paper that I have under my hand. The writer of this article, after the last election when my hon. friend was appointed Minister of Agriculture, was one of his greatest supporters. Here was a man, he said, who was a soldier, a university graduate, a scholar, a mathematician and farmer. He prophesied a great future for him as Minister of Agriculture, and thought that the country was lucky to have him.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DONNELLY: But what does this same man say to-day? Listen to this:

> Weir, of Saskatchewan, is one of the major disappointments.

I don't hear any cheers now.

> Scholar, mathematician, soldier, farmer, he came to the portfolio of agriculture with no political past, every prospect of great success. His prestige grew steadily until the session of 1931.

The CHAIRMAN: I have ruled many times that according to rule 306 it is not parliamentary to quote the opinions of outsiders in newspapers about the proceedings in the house. I will read the rule again:

> It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

Mr. DONNELLY: What has the article I am quoting to do with the proceedings of the house? In the first place, Mr. Chairman, this is not a newspaper nor is it written by a newspaper correspondent. This is a magazine. In the second place, it has nothing whatever to do with the proceedings of the house. To continue the quotation:

> His prestige grew steadily until the session of 1931, and never before in Canadian political history have Canning's wise words on reputations in parliament been more completely vindicated. Canning said that many a great reputation in the world of business, law, medicine, scholarship, had been snuffed out like a candle on the threshold of the House of Commons. And our commons has certainly written Weir down from a party asset to a liability.

That is the very same man who just after the election and the appointment of the minister to the portfolio of agriculture praised him to the skies.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is he?

Mr. DONNELLY: The writer of this article is Richard Churchill, and he is writing in the Country Guide of April, 1932.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Where is it printed?

Mr. DONNELLY: I do not know whether it is at Long Lake or where it is. I want to repeat that the country is looking for a policy from this government with respect to agriculture. They want to know what this government intends to do for the dairy industry, and again I ask the minister: Has he any policy with regard to the dairy industry, or has he not?

Mr. PORTEOUS: In view of the fact that much reference has been made to, and much time taken up in discussing, the lack of policy of the present administration, I would ask the present Minister of Agriculture or the former Minister of Agriculture or the hon. member for Willow Bunch, what part of the agriculture policy of the former administration has been abandoned since this government came into power?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Like many other members of the house—

Mr. PORTEOUS: I should like an answer to my question, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GOTT: It cannot be answered.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Like many other members of the house I have been listening in vain to receive a word of encouragement from the Minister of Agriculture. Some few days ago when we were debating in this house the measure for unemployment and farm relief, I put some questions to the hon. Minister of Labour regarding seed grain and asked him if under that measure farmers who needed it would be allowed to obtain seed grain. I have also written to the hon. Minister of Agriculture with respect to the matter, and I received a reply from him dated May 2, 1932, reading as follows:

> There is no appropriation or authority making provision for the purchase or distribution of seed grain to farmers in any province in Canada. This is entirely a provincial responsibility, and I would suggest that you advise your constituent to take this matter up with the municipal authorities or the provincial government, who, I feel sure, will see to it that they are sufficiently provided for.
> Yours very truly,
> R. Weir.

That answer is not satisfactory to me, Mr. Chairman, nor to the people I represent nor to the people of the province of Quebec. This government is simply passing the buck and saying to the province of Quebec: You do the best you can to help the farmers of your own province. Those members who have been in this house for a number of years know that time and again the farmers of western Canada have received advances and assistance from the federal government in purchasing seed grain when they were in dire necessity. I remember also that not so long ago, about the year 1924, when there was a lack of crop in the district that I represent in this house, the Minister of Agriculture in the government of that day (Mr. Motherwell) found ways and means whereby the people of my county and of the district that was stricken at that time were provided with seed grain in the spring, through the efforts of the federal Department of Agriculture in cooperation with the provincial government. It was due to the services of the seed branch under the direction of Mr. Clark that seed grains were provided for the people in my county The minister now states to me in a letter that there is no way in which the people of the province of Quebec can be helped, when they are in need of seed grain. There is no chance for the people of that province to get assistance from this government, despite the fact that in past years under other governments we were able to obtain help. This evening we were told that the government has no agricultural policy. I believe that statement is true, and with that in mind I shall keep the minister's letter and show it to the people of my constituency so that everybody may know that the government has no agricultural policy. They may have some thought for their friends in the west, but certainly they care not for the people in the east, and more especially those of the province of Quebec.

While I am on my feet there is another matter to which I should like to draw the attention of the minister. Although we have received promises from the present administration, and more especially from the minister whose estimates are under discussion, we find very often that instead of constructive work there is more often destructive work in governmental departments. For instance in the constituency I have the honour to represent within the last six years a gentleman named Paul Langlois had been appointed promoter of sheep and swine raising. This gentleman has done good work, and was retained in office until last year. For no good reason at all, except for reasons of political patronage and advantage, he was promoted to another district on the south shore of the river St. Lawrence. In his place Mr. Latulippe was appointed. Apparently the minister, or his official Mr. MacMillan, claimed that this gentleman had qualifications sufficient to entitle him to succeed Mr.

Langlois. What took place was this: For some years previously Mr. Latulippe had been employed by the government of the province of Quebec as promoter of agriculture in the constituency of Charlevoix-Saguenay. He was dismissed by the provincial legislature because of incompetency, and the fact that he was not able to show satisfactory results in his district. Since this government has taken office, Mr. Latulippe has been given the post of sheep and swine promoter in my constituency.

I have before me a letter from Mr. A. A. MacMillan, chief of the sheep and swine division, addressed to Mr. Edgar Rochette, a member of the Quebec legislature. In that letter Mr. MacMillan states that Mr. Latulippe was highly recommended by officials of the provincial Department of Agriculture, and by other men holding important positions in agricultural circles of the province of Quebec. I have in my hand other letters concerning the appointment of this man. It would appear that Mr. Narcisse Savoie, chief agriculturist in the Quebec Department of Agriculture, wrote Mr. A. A. MacMillan on February 4, 1932, as follows:

> As I said in our interview, his presence as sheep and swine promoter in Charlevoix and Montmorency counties is very embarrassing for our men, and we are very perplexed as to the attitude we should adopt towards him. Practically all the parish priests and the majority of the farmers look at him with rather bad dispositions, and we really don't know how good work could be done in such conditions, as a close cooperation between the provincial and the federal employees and the parish priests is necessary to get success.

I should like to know how this government, which is pledged to the promotion and development of agriculture in all parts of Canada, can help the people of Canada to get back on their feet by actions such as I have described. I have received many complaints from the people in my constituency, and they are unanimous in the view that the gentleman who has been appointed by the Civil Service Commission to replace Mr. Langlois will not and cannot make a success of his job because while in the employ of the provincial government he proved a failure.

After Mr. Latulippe left the employ of the provincial government he went into business for himself at Murray Bay. He made a failure of the business, made an assignment, and proceedings were taken against him. The appointment of the sheep and swine promoter in the constituency of Charlevoix-Saguenay was made from a political point of view. During the last election campaign Mr. Latulippe was nothing more than a big drummer, a chief political henchman, carrying all the big guns and working up public meetings in an election campaign which was notorious throughout the province. The people in Charlevoix-Saguenay cannot be expected to go to that gentleman, meet with him and discuss matters in a fair and legitimate manner when most of them know that during the last election campaign he was their opponent. I have written the minister in this connection and only to-day received a reply telling me that Mr. Langlois had been promoted. He was a worthy official, and I am glad his promotion has become effective. I cannot, however, see any reason for moving him, unless it was to find a job for Mr. Latulippe, who, for reasons I have mentioned should not have been appointed.

Miss MACPHAIL: Mr. Chairman, I feel that federal and provincial departments of agriculture and agriculture schools have been stressing production too much. If it has not been true in the past, the fact is to-day that production is not the problem with which agriculture is faced. There is no difficulty in producing sufficient quantities of agricultural products. If the Department of Agriculture is to serve the agricultural industry it must make a sharp swing away from the promotion of production as its chief activity to that of, the cooperative marketing and the processing of farm products. In short, we may say that the business of the Department of Agriculture is to do all it can to meet the economic conditions which the farmer is facing.

At the moment I feel a keen interest in the processing of agricultural products, and I know the minister has been sympathetic concerning the venture about which I am going to speak. In Barrie, Ontario, we have been trying to establish an abattoir for the processing of pork, but we are meeting with very great difficulties. Oddly enough the banks closed the Barrie abattoir when the overdraft was lower than it had been for some months. The minister well knows the details. I dare say the very close interlocking directorates between banks and abattoirs often makes it impossible for the minister, who himself is sympathetic towards the agriculturist, to do the thing that needs to be done. Is the federal Department of Agriculture considering assistance to experimental stations in processing? It does seem to me that that is exactly what the Barrie station is. The experiment is not being carried on by the government, but by farmers, and they are very hard hit by economic conditions this year. If this plant goes down each producer will sustain a heavy loss. There is no reason why it should go down. Yet I do think those farmers stand in great need of a long term loan at a low rate of interest. The minister may say to me that the government is hard pressed for money. In reply, may I say to him that it does seem to me altogether nonsensical to put people back on the land to produce more farm products, for the very fact that at the moment we have more products than can be marketed. I do feel if some of the energy that is being devoted by the government to this back to the land movement was directed to making successful great cooperative ventures and helping these experimental stations in processing, it would be a much sounder agricultural policy. I have no faith at all in the back to the land movement. There is no sense in placing people on the land—people who possibly have very little experience and very little money—while those who have experience and money are being driven off the land. May I again press the minister for some reply in regard not only to the situation of the processing plant in Barrie but to other processing plants which undoubtedly will come out of this present depression. What will be the attitude of the federal government in regard to them?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The matter has been given consideration, but no definite action has been taken yet. It is felt that it is really the work of the provinces rather than of the dominion. For some time we have been discussing with the provinces what assistance could best be given. Similar enterprises have been started, and, I believe, are working out successfully, in the west without any assistance.

Mr. GOBEIL: I am pleased that the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) brought up the question of seed grain, for I am very much interested in it myself. I have received several letters from municipalities in my county asking for seed grain. It is quite true, I believe, that the citizens of the province of Quebec are under the impression that they are not getting at the hands of the government the same treatment as the other provinces are getting.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Hear, hear.

Mr. GOBEIL: They are under that impression, rightly or wrongly. I have before me Le Canada of Friday the 6th of May, in which it is stated that last year the Department of Agriculture of Quebec wrote to the federal department asking for aid for their farmers, but without success. Undoubtedly several members of the provincial government are trying to give the citizens of Quebec the impression that the western provinces are receiving special treatment at the hands of this government. As I wanted to give the parties who wrote me correct information, I went to Mr. Clark, the commissioner of that particular branch, and asked of him if there was a law that applied to the western provinces only. He informed me there was none. He added there was a time before the natural resources were transferred to the western provinces when the federal government supplied seed grain to the settlers, but since the transfer the western provinces have received no special treatment. He also told me that Quebec and Ontario never took advantage of the law as the western provinces have done, but that the law is the same for all the provinces. He added, "I imagine if asked by Quebec or Ontario to loan money or to guarantee a loan to buy seed grain for the farmers of those two provinces the federal government no doubt would do the same as it is doing for the western provinces, if such action were found necessary." So I should like the Minister of Agriculture, or perhaps the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), to make a clear declaration to the committee so that there will be no more misunderstanding in the province of Quebec with respect to this matter.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In connection with seed grain, if any province communicates with the federal government stating that it is not in a position financially to carry on any of its governmental work, the matter is considered and if deemed advisable money is advanced to the province as a loan only, the province being responsible for repayment. The province is responsible for getting seed grain. With regard to the statement that the previous government did give seed grain to the province of Quebec in a very small area, my information is that the provincial government supplied the seed grain, and the federal government increased the subvention that year in connection with it.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The federal government paid for it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As to the criticism with reference to these appointments, one man—evidently he is championed to a certain extent by the hon. member who spoke in connection with sheep grading—the recognition of whose work so far as I know was not disputed as a result was promoted. So far as I am personally aware there were no representations made on behalf of any person. An examination was held to fill that position, and the information given me by my officers is that the man chosen at that examination stood well above any of his competitors. I can assure the hon. member that irrespective of any political leanings that he may have,—I am not aware that he has any—if his work is not satisfactory to the officers of the department he will not be retained in his position. This action has been taken with reference to other appointments since this government assumed office.

Miss MACPHAIL: The minister said there were some experiments in processing that were carrying on successfully in western Canada without loans from the government. Would he say where they are?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): One is in Saskatoon. It was started by the Canadian Live Stock Association, and some assistance was given by the government of Saskatchewan. I believe the one at Barrie, to which the hon. member refers, also received assistance from the provincial government of Ontario.

Mr. SANDERSON: This discussion seems to have gone rather far afield and to have covered a wide range of subjects. I presume we are still on item 39, and I should like to make one or two observations not only with regard to that item but touching some of the other items in the estimates as well. As the representative of a riding which is largely rural I have waited patiently for some statement of policy by the Minister of Agriculture. The chief concern of the farmers in the riding I have the honour to represent appears to be that they also have been waiting for some policy to be brought forward by this government, naturally through the Minister of Agriculture, that would raise their hopes and cheer them up, if nothing more, because the farmers of Ontario are in the same plight as the farmers of western Canada. A few weeks ago I stated in this house that the farmers of Ontario were never in the condition in which they find themselves at present. Not only do they not know how to make ends meet financially; in addition they have lost their morale. They are in the depths of despair, and for almost two years now they have been waiting for some ray of hope.

Mr. COTNAM: Twelve years.

Mr. SANDERSON: Is my hon. friend speaking? I have never seen him rise to his feet and speak in this house yet.

Mr. COTNAM: You have not been here yourself.

[Mr. Robert Weir.]

Mr. GOTT: He said twelve years, and that is right.

Mr. SANDERSON: I was remarking about the lack of policy of this government especially with reference to agriculture. Most of the letters I have had from my riding have been from farmers asking me when I expected some agricultural policy to be given out by this government. So far this session my reply has been that when the estimates of the Department of Agriculture were brought down I hoped the minister would outline some policy which the government might think would be of benefit to the farming communities of the country.

I want to say to the minister that I had a great deal of sympathy with him, and I do not want to be over critical. We realized that the minister came to parliament for the first time after the election of 1930. He was immediately made a minister of the crown, and great hopes were held by his friends that he would at once take hold of the department and endeavour to do something to assist the great basic industry of Canada. I had a great deal of sympathy for him in the special session of 1930 and again last year, because I thought he should be given an opportunity to get well in the saddle before too much criticism was directed at him. I must confess, however, that in this session of 1932, under the conditions existing throughout the country, the sympathy I once had for him has almost vanished. I expected that at least he would rise to-night and give us some sort of policy, but apparently he has no policy at all. The government of the day have no policies on anything; they go on in a hit and miss fashion, and they have not hit very much since they came into power. But it was expected that the Minister of Agriculture, who has been heralded by the Conservative press throughout the length and breadth of this country as one of the outstanding members of this government—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SANDERSON: My friends across the way applaud; my hon. friend from South Essex applauds also. I want to tell hon. gentlemen that about all we get from the opposite side is applause. We do not get any policies or any legislation; this government has been just a hit and miss affair ever since it came into power.

To get back to the Minister of Agriculture, I had a great deal of sympathy for him, but now he has been in office for two years; he has brought forward no policy, so he should not object if he is subjected to the most severe criticism. Let us consider his statements to-night in connection with item 39, which has to do with dairying. He rather prided himself and rather praised the government on the fact that butter was on an export basis and that a price of 28 cents a pound had been maintained for some time. I would remind the minister and hon. gentlemen opposite that in the campaign of 1930 they went up and down this country, when butter was selling at from 32 to 34 cents a pound, saying "Put in Mr. Bennett and within three weeks the farmers will be getting 70 cents a pound for butter."

Mr. ROWE: Who said that?

Mr. SANDERSON: I think my hon. friend from Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) said it first, and went up and down the country repeating it.

Mr. GOTT: No; we went up and the Liberals went down.

Mr. SANDERSON: The hon. member for South Essex and the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe cannot stampede me. So I say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not think the government deserve any credit at all in regard to butter. Instead they deserve condemnation, because we must not forget that, led by the right hon. Prime Minister, whose speeches were echoed and reechoed by his lieutenants, hon. gentlemen opposite went about the country saying, "Put us in power and we will get markets for the products of the farm. We will make tariffs fight for the farmer? We will get markets the world over for wheat, butter, bacon, live stock and every other product of the farm." The people of this country have long memories and they have not forgotten, but they have been very patient with the Minister of Agriculture and his department. Now, however, they have come to the point where they have given up all hope of getting anything from this department.

I want to refer for a moment to the debate which took place in this chamber yesterday with regard to Bill No. 72, which was sponsored by the Minister of Labour but which was practically taken out of his hands during the course of the debate.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I do not think the hon. gentleman can refer to a previous debate unless it is on the same question.

Mr. SANDERSON: It is on the same question, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. YOUNG: That debate is not yet concluded.

The CHAIRMAN: According to rule 293 the hon. member may not refer to a previous debate of the same session unless it is on the same question.

Mr. BROWN: Bill 72 proposes to give power to the government to aid in the marketing of farm products.

Mr. SANDERSON: That is what I was going to point out. That bill really is for farm relief and it covers the whole question.

The CHAIRMAN: But this is a different question. The committee is in supply.

Mr. SANDERSON: True, we have been all over the map to-night from one end of the country to the other. I would point out, with all due respect to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, that there is a clause in Bill No. 72 whereby the government seek the power—and by their majority in this house they will get that power—of practically a blank cheque once more to aid any industry in the country—any manufacturing industry, any bank, any insurance company, any trust company, any corporation, with unlimited credit. They can spend the people's money and are not limited to $1,000,000 but may spend $100,000,000 or $200,000,000. The point I want to make is this—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. What the hon. member has just said convinces me that it is not the same question, and he may not refer to that debate.

Mr. SANDERSON: I do not want to say much more about it. I have said about all I wanted to say. The government, under this Bill 72, which will pass in a day or two, will have unlimited power to aid all sorts of manufacturing concerns; yet they come into this house with estimates for the basic industry of Canada and show a reduction in those estimates of $3,300,000 odd, notwithstanding the fact that, if agriculture does not prosper, no one in Canada can be prosperous. They have money for everybody but the farmers. They have money for their friends the big interests; they have money for their friends the manufacturing interests; they have money for everybody except the farmer, and the estimates which should be intended to assist the farmer are reduced by 33⅓ per cent or, as I have pointed out, $3,300,000. As has been pointed out in this house time and again in connection with various matters that have been under discussion, the government seem to forget that the basic industry of this country, namely, agriculture, should receive the first consideration of any administration. But they are going to starve that industry and save millions for the big interests. They will get authority from this house—because they have the majority behind them to carry any measure they bring in—to starve the basic industry of this dominion. They do not appear to be at all concerned about markets for the farmers' products.

Coming back to the minister, he said to-night that he thought he would have a policy. He said, if I heard him rightly, "I discussed the matter with some of my friends and came to the conclusion that there should be a national marketing board. I was of that opinion myself and I still am, but in discussing it with some of my friends I have decided that we will not do anything until after the Imperial conference which is to be held in this city in July." Now, what are they waiting for? Why, three months after they came into power in 1930, if they had been alive to the interests of the country, if they had been alive to our basic industry, they would have formulated some policy for the agriculturists of Canada. But to-day at this late date they have no policy and the minister brings down his estimates to-night, reduced, not by ten per cent but by thirty-three and a third per cent—reduced $3,300,000—and he says, "We have no policy yet, but I have been discussing the question and perhaps after the conference we shall have a policy." Had they been alive to the interests of the farmers, the government would before now have formulated a policy which they could submit to the Imperial conference in an endeavour to obtain a market for the farm products of this country. But they are stifling the trade of the country. They talk about manufacturing in Canada, and hands are being laid off. One thing that the Conservative party has always forgotten is that prosperity in this country must come primarily from the products of the farm. If the farmers are not prosperous, no one will prosper: the manufacturers will have no business, the banks will have no business, the insurance companies will have no business. But hon. gentlemen opposite are neglecting the great basic industry because apparently they do not care. Apparently they do not care for the farmers, but I want to tell them that when the time comes for the farmers of Canada to register their votes, then independent of party feeling or party bias, ninety-five per cent of the Canadian farmers will mark their ballots against this government and turn them out, electing some government that will at least realize that the basic industry of Canada is farming.

[Mr. Sanderson.]

Mr. PICKEL: We have heard a long discussion this evening and great anxiety has been expressed by members of the opposition as to what our policy is. I would ask those hon. gentlemen what their agricultural policy was in regard to the dairy industry. They never had a policy; this country simply drifted in that regard. The only legislation which the Liberal government passed, presumably for the benefit of the eastern dairy farmers, was restrictive and it was very injurious to those farmers. We had a hog grading act, an egg grading act, and various inspections. At one time, in 1926, 1927 and 1928, we had four different inspections. We had a Montreal inspection, a provincial inspection, a federal inspection and a New York inspection, with different regulations governing each.

A good deal of anxiety has been expressed in regard to our agricultural policy. Let me say that to-day, for the first time in many years, we have a Minister of Agriculture who exhibits a little bit of sympathy towards mixed and dairy farming. That is something we have not had in this country for many years. I would advise hon. members opposite to have patience for a short time and they will see that distinct, guiding policies will be evolved.

They are complaining about the price of butter to-day. What was it in 1926, 1927 and 1928? We used to compare it with prices in the United States. At the present time we are getting better prices for butter and eggs than farmers in the United States are receiving. In the first fifteen days of September, 1926, the United States farmer got twenty-six cents a pound more for his butter than we did on this side of the line. We got twenty-nine cents while he received fifty-five cents per pound. For twenty years the United States farmers got from seven to twenty cents a pound more than we did. This is the first time in all these years that the price of butter has been higher in Canada than on the other side of the line.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Has my hon. friend seen the last report of the Department of Agriculture under date of May 7 giving comparisons in regard to the price of butter? In Canada it was sixteen and one-half cents while in New York it was twenty and one-half cents.

Mr. PICKEL: I do not deny that report may be correct, but I say, generally speaking for the past six months our egg and butter prices have been much better than they have been across the line.

As regards the reduction in the agriculture estimates and the references made by some hon. members opposite to different inspectors being laid off and so forth, I should like to cite what occurred in the port of Montreal from 1925 to 1930 while the Australian treaty was in force. During that period the then government maintained seventeen butter graders in that port. In 1928 one of them told me that they had hardly enough butter there to grade for their own use and yet seventeen graders were maintained during that time. The peculiar feature about that grading was this: When we did happen to have a box or two of butter to export, the Englishmen did not accept our grading; he graded it himself. My hon. friends opposite have been making loud noises just to impress their electors; that is all they are doing. I agree with many of them that agriculture is very important and I maintain that the dairy farmer of the east is entitled to some consideration. I have nothing to say against the wheat growers, but for the last fifteen or twenty years, what attention has been devoted to agriculture has been for the benefit of the grain growers of the west. They must not forget that for one grain grower west of the lakes there are two farmers in the east, and that seventy-five per cent of the taxes come from Ontario and Quebec. We want to do anything we can to help the grain growers, but I submit that the whole agricultural policy of the government should not be for the benefit of the west.

Mr. POULIOT: After such a speech, the farmers of the eastern townships will be prosperous and rich. I have never before heard a member representing a rural constituency uttering such nonsense as the hon. gentleman has done.

The CHAIRMAN: To say that an hon. member is talking nonsense is hardly parliamentary.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, I will say not common sense. My hon. friend spoke against inspectors. There are inspectors to classify dairy products, indeed, to classify all farm products, and it is only after such a classification that the farmers can get a fair price. This is something that is known to every man, even to a doctor who lives among farmers. I have for a long time advocated the appointment of inspectors for farm products, because such inspection is most essential. Formerly farm products and, in particular, potatoes, were not graded and the farmers got very little for their products. After inspectors were appointed, after farm products were graded, the farmers received much higher prices. The reason why inspectors should be appointed is that farm products may be graded one, two, three, or A, B, C, as the case may be, so that when the purchaser goes to the market he can get exactly what he wants, for instance, grade 1 or grade 2 potatoes and so on. In the old days that was not the case. When the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi was young, when a man went into a store and asked for something, he would be told by the merchant: I have not that, but you should take this and it will suit you just as well. Well, when a purchaser goes to a store and says he wants such and such, if he does not get it, he goes to the next store or to the next town in order to get it.

I must congratulate the hon. member for Missisquoi on rising to speak. We have all heard about the Tories from Quebec being dead. I might use in respect to them the term which was used during the war "debout les morts"—"Stand up, you dead." Since the election took place we have not heard from them in regard to butter. They have been as silent as rocks. I cannot compare them to trees, because sap comes out of trees. They are just as dumb as stones. Now they swallow what they vomited before the election. This is what all the Tories from the province of Quebec, especially those from the eastern townships, who were elected because of butter, have been doing. During the last election we heard all sorts of, not nonsense, but things that were not common sense. I make an exception to you, Mr. Chairman, because I have more consideration for you than for your colleagues in the party from Quebec.

Progress reported.

ARMS AND AMMUNITION

APPROVAL OF CONVENTION FOR SUPERVISION OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE IN MUNITIONS AND IMPLEMENTS OF WAR

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a message from the Senate that Their Honours do unite with the House of Commons in the approval of the international convention for the supervision of the international trade in arms and ammunition, Geneva, 17th June, 1925, signed on behalf of Canada by the Honourable Raoul Dandurand on the 22nd September, 1925.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, May 11, 1932.

The house met at three o'clock.

RADIO BROADCASTING

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO STUDY PROBLEM OF INSTITUTING CANADIAN SYSTEM

Hon. RAYMOND MORAND (East Essex) moved concurrence in the second and final report of the special committee on radio broadcasting.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving concurrence I should like to take a few moments to explain some of the features of the report. First of all, let me assure the house that it has been a real pleasure to work with this committee, largely due to the wholehearted cooperation and assistance given by the members of the committee to their chairman. In fact, they took practically all the work away from me and as a result I found my task easy.

The evidence, coming from all parts of Canada and from practically every walk of life was well prepared. Your committee weighed the evidence, bearing in mind both its source and its kind. In a very short time after we had begun our work it became evident that radio was a weapon which if used in a destructive way, could do a great deal of harm, or was an instrument which, if well used could help to build culture and civilization. The science of radio is but in its infancy. A decade ago it was only a toy, and gradually it has gone through the various stages from the time when we tuned in or dialed to find out how far in geographical space we could reach and what stations we could find, until to-day when it has become a real utility of entertainment and education. It has developed as an aid to education more in the past two or three years than previously. We speak of it as a help in education not only because it may be used to teach the youngsters, but because it is a projected arm of education which helps to finish and instruct adults in their homes. To-day radio finds its way to the homes of the most distant frontiersmen on the very edge of civilization. With those facts in mind your committee undoubtedly realized that their efforts would have to be of a serious character, and that they would have to keep the future definitely in mind.

To-day radio is an adjunct or auxiliary to religious teaching; it is being used by the various churches. Some of us may listen to what is going on in our neighbour's church, without being caught at it, and while things may be running smoothly in our own churches we find, through the radio, that our neighbour's church is prospering just as well. Radio is a great help to the teaching of disease prevention, and the promotion of health measures throughout the country. Through the broadcast of weather reports it is an aid to agriculture and is most useful in police work and many other types of education and utilities.

Your references were very definite. We were asked first to study the Aird report. In 1929 a commission was appointed by the then government. It travelled throughout Canada, the United States and Europe making a study of radio, its methods of application and control in those various countries. A report was made in 1929, which until this day had not been implemented. We were very fortunate in having the help of the three men who made the investigations and prepared the report. They gave us valuable information, which could not be put into the short space of a report. Their work, however, I am satisfied, helped the committee to arrive at the conclusions now before the house.

Your second instruction was to provide a technical scheme that would give to Canada the type of broadcasting to which it was entitled. In order to do that it was necessary for your committee to obtain the help of technical advisers, and in the help we secured we were most fortunate—and I speak both of the advisers who were definitely attached to the committee, and from the department. A scheme is presented in our report which we believe will quite definitely give to Canada that type of radio broadcasting to which she is entitled. I shall take a minute or two to read and to comment upon a few of the suggestions we have made.

First of all we believe a thorough survey of the entire field should be made before anything definite in respect to changes should be contemplated. Secondly, your committee recommends that consideration be given to the use of five 50 kilowatt stations, one in each of the following provinces, namely, British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, and in the maritime provinces three 500 watt stations, one for each province, or one large 50 kilowatt station, as the commission may later decide. In Saskatchewan and Alberta we suggest two 5 kilowatt stations, in each province, synchronized on a common channel. Further, a 10 kilowatt station in northern Ontario and one in western Ontario, a 1 kilowatt station at Port Arthur-Fort William, a 500 watt station in Toronto, and a 1 kilowatt station at or near Ottawa, Montreal and Quebec.

It might be of interest if in a short way I were to try to give, from a layman's standpoint, something of the business of broadcasting in its technical sense. Having had only six weeks' schooling in the matter I feel I am not very capable of going into the various technical points, but I shall explain it in the way it appeals to me. Dealing with the air, one would naturally believe that that is the one thing of which there is an unlimited amount. Hon. members may call it air, ether or space, whichever they wish. Strange however as it may seem, for purposes of radio broadcasting the air is of very limited quantity. The spectrum or the amount of space allocated or possible for broadcasting is, first of all, divided by international agreements or conventions into that used for commercial purposes, that used for ship-to-shore work and that allocated to broadcasting. On the North American continent there are ninety-six channels, or we might call them highways in the air, and over those channels the human voice or music may be transmitted to be picked up by your radio receivers. By that I mean that if ninety-six stations of, say, 50 kilowatts, were placed on the North American continent there would be no further room for more stations. They would completely cover the allotted space of air, or ether, so far as radio broadcasting is concerned.

As we know, that space must be divided among the United States, Mexico, Cuba and Canada. By definite electric waves set at definite rates they are able to super-impose music or the voice and carry them through those channels, in much the same way that one goes over a highway in the country. Because of the large geographical area and the resulting difference in time it is possible to put stations upon the air with lesser power, three or four on the same channel, providing that the power is not such that they interfere with one another. For instance, it is possible to put upon the same channel a station in California and another in the New England states, or one in the maritime provinces and another in Vancouver, provided the power is not so high that they interfere one with another. That accounts for the large number of stations now operating on the North American continent, most of which are on shared channels. Up to the present time we have been using for radio broadcasting a certain number of channels that were not in use in the United States. There was no definite written arrangement of any kind, but by a word of mouth agreement we were using certain channels. I propose to put on Hansard what channels we are using now and what channels it will be possible for us to use in the future. At the present time under the so-called "gentleman's agreement" Canada has available the following channels:

Clear channels, no power limitations	5
Shared channels, power limited to 4 K.W.	1

That was shared, I believe, with another station near Washington.

Shared channels, power limited to 500 watts	11
Total channels	17

On the five so-called clear channels, we are at present operating the following stations:

Stations of 5 K.W. (power)	3
Stations of 4 K.W. (power)	1
Stations of 1 K.W. (power)	1
Stations of 500 watts (power)	6
Stations of 100 watts (power)	4
Stations of 50 watts (power)	1
Total	16

In other words these channels are really shared and not clear channels in Canada. On the remaining shared channels we are operating a total of 40 stations ranging in power from 500 watts down to 25 watts. In addition there are ten stations operating on "split channels." That is, we found it was impossible to place all the stations we wished on the channels available, either clear or shared, and some stations were put in between two others. I understand we have no right to use these split channels by any international arrangement. The stations have been operating fairly satisfactorily to date, but undoubtedly they will have to be discontinued.

Under the new proposed agreement the following channels would become available:

Clear channels, no power limitations	9
Shared channels, power limited to 1 K.W.	4
Shared channels, power limited to 500 watts	3
Shared channels, power limited to 100 watts	20
Total channels	36

This means that under the new agreement we have increased by 80 per cent the number of clear channels, and have now sufficient high power channels to set up a thoroughly satisfactory trans-Canada chain. This would not have been possible under any arrangement of the clear channels previously available. The four shared channels with a power limitation of 1 K.W. constitute a new type of channel not previously available to Canada. The coverage possible with the remaining twenty-three shared channels will be several times as great as the coverage available from the twelve shared channels previously in use.

In addition, these channels are ideal for the type of community stations so necessary in many parts of Canada.

In the new agreement, the channels for all our high power stations have been chosen from the best part of the broadcast band, namely the low frequency end. In addition, care was taken to see that both geographically and in so far as their relative positions in the spectrum were concerned, these channels were as far removed as possible from powerful United States stations.

The proposed technical scheme does not contemplate using at the present time all of the power that may be employed on these nine channels. In fact the number of clear channels available will provide for a population twice as great as that possessed by Canada to-day.

This agreement does not mean that Canada cannot again approach the United States for a further allotment of channels, should such action ever become necessary. In fact it definitely established a basis for the division of channels between Canada and the United States, should future radio conferences increase the number of frequencies allotted for broadcast purposes. I think it is only fair to say that in view of our desire to establish such a chain of stations in Canada, the willingness of the United States to clear these channels is a friendly act that should be taken cognizance of by this house.

On the North American continent the following channels are now available:

Available for high power stations—
U.S.A.	21
Canada	9
Mexico	4
	36
Shared channels in use—
U.S.A.	87
Canada	27
Mexico	21
	151

The difference between the possible power that we shall be able to put on the air now with the new channels compared with that under the old is 312·7 K.W. as against 41·25 K.W.

In the scheme of broadcasting certain things have been taken into consideration. Ample coverage for each province has been provided for. Further, 100 watt stations which give a coverage in daylight of at least a twenty-five mile radius are provided for, and with the amount of available shared channels we are quite capable of establishing at least 175 of these.

After establishing the technical scheme the task which your committee was confronted with was to investigate and report upon the most satisfactory agency for carrying out such a scheme. A number of very definite problems presented themselves. First of all we did not have adequate coverage; secondly, there was no trans-Canada or interprovincial broadcasting; third, there was no body or machinery to plan or control programs or advertising; fourth, there was always the possibility of a monopoly being established. On this phase I would cite the words of Mr. E. W. Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, who was kind enough to appear before the committee. Mr. Garland asked him:

> The Witness: I do, yes. I do not mean to say by that, Mr. Garland, that it is the only way in which it could be effectively dealt with.

Further, the chairman asked Mr. Beatty:

> I think the committee are properly advised that you think that a Canadian national system of some kind is necessary in Canada?
> The Witness: Nationwide, yes.

A number of witnesses gave very similar advice to the committee. It is rather interesting to note that in the United States at present it is considered by those who are studying the subject that there is being established very rapidly a radio monopoly. Before the United States interstate commerce committee Senator Wheeler stated that fifty-three of the favoured stations were given more than fifty per cent of the picked channels, while the balance of more than six hundred stations were assigned to the remaining thirty-eight channels. Senator Dill indicated that twenty-five of the forty cleared channels carried the National Broadcasting Company's programs, and twelve were on the Columbia chain, leaving three cleared channels for independent stations.

These were some of the problems which confronted your committee. Another feature which had to be taken into consideration was advertising. As all who listen to United States programs know, advertising is one of the primary factors in radio broadcasts in that country. In England advertising is not permitted at all, and that condition exists in other European countries as well. But because of the fact that we are in such close apposition to the United States it was felt by your committee that advertising should be permitted to a limited extent, since if it were entirely prohibited in Canada those United States industries having branch factories in this country or selling goods in Canada would have an unfair advantage over Canadian industries. Consequently your committee has recommended that five per cent of the time be the maximum permitted for advertising. Nothing is said as to the quality of the advertising, that being left to the commission, because much was said as to direct and indirect advertising, though no two similar definitions were given to your committee in this regard by any of the witnesses appearing before it. Undoubtedly that is something that will have to be dealt with entirely by the commission.

There is another point which I think cannot entirely be lost sight of; it is that the air is as much a natural resource as our waterways, our water powers, our crown lands or any other part of the public domain. Perhaps it is more important to consider this as a natural resource, since the purpose for which it can be used is very limited. It is possible for us to give away some of our other natural resources and still have plenty left, but in this instance the use to which this natural resource can be put is circumscribed.

Another problem which faced this committee, with which I think most members were familiar in more ways than one, was the question of the finances available for this purpose. In considering all these points your committee deemed it their duty to devise as simple a machine as possible to deal with these problems, so that a commission of three is suggested, with definite powers. These include power to regulate and control all broadcasting in Canada, including programs and advertising; to own, build and operate transmitting or receiving stations in Canada; to acquire by lease, purchase, expropriation or otherwise, any or all existing broadcasting stations; to enter into operating agreements with privately owned stations; to originate programs, and to secure outside programs by purchase or exchange, and to make the arrangements necessary for their transmission. I should like to direct attention to this matter in particular, because telegrams which we are receiving as well as reports appearing in the newspapers indicate that the opinion is held that if this report is adopted it will mean the elimination of all programs coming from foreign countries. We also recommend that the commission be given power to determine the number, location and power of all broadcasting stations required in Canada; to control the issuing or cancellation of licences to broadcasting stations; to cancel the allotments of channels to any stations, or to make substitutions of channels; to prohibit the establishment of privately owned chains of stations in Canada.

Mr. NEILL: I have had a number of telegrams protesting against that provision. What was the reason for it?

Mr. MORAND: I think most hon. members have had telegrams in that regard. The fact that we have suggested that the commission be given power to prohibit these chains does not mean that the commission will not have the power to permit them also. They are simply given the power to prohibit in order that there may not be established, by the assembling of a number of small stations, a definite chain that would come in direct opposition with the larger stations established under the commission. We certainly do not intend to prohibit the possibility of such a chain being set up.

Mr. NEILL: Why not say the commission have power to regulate such chains?

Mr. MORAND: The wording may have been unfortunate, since it has been rather misconstrued, but we are simply asking that they be given power to prohibit if they think it necessary, and to regulate these various chains. We further recommend that the commission be given power, subject to the approval of the parliament of Canada, to take over all broadcasting in Canada and be vested with all other powers necessary or incidental to the fulfilment of the objects of the commission.

We have made some definite recommendations. The first is that it be the first duty of the commission to establish trans-Canada chain broadcasting, through the securing of the necessary land lines. It may be of interest to hon. members to learn that there are in Canada three distinct trans-Canada telephone lines that may be used for this purpose. Each railway has one, and by arrangement among the telephone companies there is a third direct telephone line from the Atlantic to the Pacific that may be used for this purpose. Your committee recommend also that a nationally owned system of radio broadcasting be instituted and that all stations required for its proper organization be eventually acquired, these to be financed from the revenues accruing through the business of broadcasting, without expense to the taxpayers through the public treasury.

I have noticed some comments in the press with regard to the revenues which may be expected to accrue from broadcasting. It is said that there are six hundred thousand people who have taken out radio licences throughout Canada, and it is estimated that there are at least one hundred thousand others who have been able to escape the payment of licence fees. With seven hundred thousand paid licences we would secure for this purpose a revenue of $1,400,000, and I understand that the total cost at present with regard to interference is only about $200,000. So there would be left for the development of broadcasting in Canada about $1,200,000, without taking into consideration any revenue that may accrue from advertising.

Your committee further recommend that all stations of 100 watts and under, not required for the national system, remain under private ownership, but that they be regulated as to programs and advertising, by the rules of the commission. It may be of interest to hon. members to learn that a station of 100 watts covers a radius of 25 miles in daylight, and of course a much larger radius at night. That is sufficient to cover almost any city, and in fact almost any county, especially in the older parts of Canada.

We further recommend:

(d) That all revenues obtained from licence fees, sale of advertisement, and other revenues accessory to the business of broadcasting, be used by the commission in the interest of radio.

(e) That advertising be limited to not more than 5 per cent of each program period.

(f) That the developing of Canadian art and artists, and the securing of outstanding programs from outside Canada, be encouraged.

(g) That the commission make available to the provinces, when possible, the facilities of national and chain broadcasting.

(h) That the commission make special effort to give such programs as will be acceptable to provincial and local requirements.

(i) That before making changes in Canadian radio broadcasting, the commission makes a complete survey of the present system, with particular reference to adequate coverage.

In order further to coordinate and make acceptable the various programs in the different parts of Canada, we have recommended that in addition to the three commissioners to be appointed, there be in each province an assistant commissioner who will act as chairman of whatever committees may be set up within the province for the purpose particularly of developing the type of program that they may wish to have in that province, or which they may wish to submit to the other provinces as something of some worth or use.

I hear some gentlemen on the other side suggesting that they want jazz. I have no doubt whatever that there can be plenty of jazz even over these stations as well as the others. I wish to make this clear now, that the proper development of a system of broadcasting such as this will not prevent arrangements being entered into with other countries either on this continent or across the sea for the best possible programs which can be secured from them. I wish further to make this statement because over long distance telephone this morning I was asked whether this report would prevent American broadcasting from reaching Canada. I can assure you that even those of us who believe most strongly that we should protect this country by tariffs realize that this is one thing which we cannot stop. Such broadcasting will still come over and people can tune in when they wish to do so.

It does seem to me that in this report we have made provision for an organization which will give to Canada that type of broadcasting to which, in my opinion, Canadians are entitled. I believe we have made provision whereby the natural talent of our country can be developed and be taken advantage of. I believe that we have made provision whereby a greater understanding and unity can be promoted by the proper use of this instrument; and I often think, in the reading that I have done in connection with this whole subject that had the fathers of confederation been able to add this means of communication to the two ribbons of steel by which they endeavoured to bind Canada in an economic whole, they would have accomplished a great deal more than they did, great even as their achievement was.

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): It was not my intention to make any remarks on the presentation of this report, but on second thought, as a member of the committee, perhaps I might offer one or two comments. They should be few, I think, because the report speaks for itself. Moreover, the chairman of the committee has made a very complete presentation of the objects and purposes of the report.

Before I proceed further, I should like to compliment the chairman of the committee upon the ability and courtesy with which he presided over the deliberations of that body. There was complete and constant good feeling; in fact, there was probably never at any time a real difference of opinion, which, perhaps, was due to the suave methods of the chairman. I want to compliment him also on the method of presentation of the report itself, for it relieves me of the necessity of making any technical explanations such as he has given.

Generally speaking, I think it may be said that we have followed fairly closely, although not too closely, the recommendations of what is known as the Aird report. The important principle which is recognized in the report, and was recognized unanimously by the committee and by almost all of the witnesses who were heard, was this: that radio is in itself a natural monopoly. One member of the house said to me, in the early stages of the meetings that we held, that radio was a use of the air and therefore should be as free as the air. Now that sounds quite plausible, but when you consider the facts, it is utterly impossible to suppose that radio can be as free as the air itself, because, as the chairman has explained, there are only so many channels that can be used, so that the number and the use of those channels are limited. Therefore, as he has said, since it is in every sense a great natural resource, there should be some sort of control over it. It having been established to the satisfaction of everyone that radio is a natural monopoly, then it was a question of deciding whether it should be a publicly owned and controlled monopoly or one privately-owned and controlled. It is perhaps unnecessary for me to say that I should be opposed to the establishment of a privately owned monopoly of radio. We were opposed to private monopoly. We also recognized this —and it is what we were trying to avoid in the presentation of the report—that present conditions might so develop that outsiders might acquire control of radio broadcasting in this country, which is something very much to be avoided.

Speaking briefly, the main objects we hope to attain if legislation is introduced based on the report, are these. First of all, we wish to give complete coverage so that every listener-in, practically every resident in Canada, will have an opportunity of listening in to the best kind of programs. We also hope to provide a reasonable control of programs. We hope to promote national sentiment, to encourage Canadian art and music, to promote education, to lead to an interchange of programs between various countries, because it is easily possible, I am informed, under the system we propose to establish, to obtain the very finest programs from other parts of the world: from Britain, France, Germany, Italy and other countries as well as from the United States.

I wish for a moment to remove some misconceptions and to answer some of the arguments advanced in support of the objections that have been taken to the nationalizing, if I may so describe it, of broadcasting. It is a fact that under this system it will be possible for any listener-in, any owner of a radio, to sit down and tune in just as he pleases on any United States or other program, whether it be a jazz program or one consisting entirely of classical music or anything else—Amos 'n' Andy or anything else he may wish to enjoy. He is not shut off from listening to the programs to which he has been listening in the past. In fact, I would say there is nothing in this report, if it is carried out that will prevent the listeners-in in Canada from enjoying absolutely all the privileges which they have to-day, unless they be modified by the fact that a necessary control of programs and advertising will be vested in the commission which is I hope to be established.

Another objection which was raised, and I think it was a very strong and a very fair one, was the fear that under this system of public ownership there would be some five or six or seven great broadcasting stations and that the smaller stations of 100 watts and under, operating in the smaller centres of population, would be abolished and could not be reestablished, so that the people in the smaller communities would be deprived of the privilege of listening to their own matters of local interest, whatever they might be, such as speeches, public addresses, report of hockey matches and things of that sort. There is provision made in this report that smaller stations may still be maintained, much as they are now, under private ownership, although their programs and the advertising remain under the control of the central commission.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would those smaller stations be permitted to go into a dominion-wide hook-up in the event of some national event being broadcast, or would they have to pay the transportation charges if they desired to come into such a hook-up?

Mr. EULER: That is a detail so far as the expenses are concerned on which I cannot inform my hon. friend, but there is no reason in the world, so far as I know, why the smaller stations cannot hook up with the big stations in the events of the kind my hon. friend speaks of.

The story went out all over Ontario in a circular letter that the nationalization of broadcasting would mean the expenditure of something in the neighbourhood of fifteen millions of dollars per annum, and the payment of a licence fee of $30 a year. The people of my province were sent a return post-card upon which to inscribe their names and thus enrol themselves, without any expense to themselves, as members of a certain radio league. There were some 50,000 enrolments under that particular little system, and I leave it to the judgment of the house whether it was not sufficient to make every person in Ontario who owns a radio set enrol when he contemplated that he would have to pay a licence fee of $30 a year under a government owned system.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Especially when there was no fee to enrol.

Mr. EULER: Especially when there was no enrolment fee. That impression which went abroad caused a great deal of harm and uneasiness, and it is for that reason alone that I mention the matter now. I think I am right in saying that it is not likely that under the proposed system the licence fee would be very materially increased above what it is now. I do not see that that would be necessary. I wanted to remove the misconception in the minds of the public as to the excessive cost that might accompany the introduction of the new system.

Then, under the new system we hope to have the control of advertising by the commission, and I think every member will agree that that is very necessary. I am not sure whether the chairman mentioned the percentage allotted to advertising, but it is fixed at five per cent of the time of any radio program.

Mr. MANION: What is the percentage in the United States?

Mr. EULER: I cannot answer that question.

Mr. MORAND: There are no restrictions at all there.

Mr. EULER: There are no restrictions there, but what the actual percentage consumed in advertising is I am not prepared to say.

Then there will be the control of programs. I am well aware that some people feel that this radio commission will have ideas which will lead them to give to the people programs which they think the people ought to have, rather than what the listeners-in desire. I hope that that is not true. I hope that the national commission will certainly do something, indeed a great deal, to promote the things that I spoke of—national unity, if you like—promote the purposes of education and other very desirable things; but as I said before, the listener-in who does not desire to hear that sort of thing is under no compulsion to do so and may tune his own radio to whatever kind of program from Canada or the United States he chooses to listen to.

Finally we recommend, of course, that the control of radio broadcasting be placed under a commission, and that all the fees derived from licences be placed in the hands of that commission.

Mr. DUPUIS: Will the commission be non-partisan?

Mr. EULER: I am not sure, but I hope so. Here was another objection. People were afraid that we would recommend a large capital investment in the establishment of these stations. That is not the case. Those who have read the report and have heard the chairman of the committee speak will know that we are recommending no capital expenditures to be made out of taxes, but that the whole of the expenses of the radio broadcasting commission be defrayed out of the receipts for licences, and perhaps from one or two other sources.

In passing I would say this, in the past, even with the old licence fee of one dollar the government saved out of the money thereby received over $1,000,000. I am not sure but that the old government had a hand in that as well as the present government; I do not know, but about $1,100,000 was saved out of those fees after paying for the work which the government did in connection with removing interference and giving services of that kind. Personally I think that that was not a fair thing to do. I think that the licence fees received from the listeners-in should have been expended in the interests of those listeners-in to give them a better service, eliminating interference and so forth.

My hon. friend from Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) asked whether this commission would be non-partisan. I said that I do not know whether it will be or not, but if the government are going to carry out all the other recommendations of this report, surely they will have no reasons for refusing to carry out what I think was the final one, that the commission should be of a non-partisan character.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, what the committee had in mind was something that will make, not for the detriment of the listeners-in of Canada, but for the benefit of all of them, in greater degree than they have ever enjoyed before.

Motion agreed to.

RADIO BROADCASTING

CONSTITUTION OF THE CANADIAN RADIO BROADCASTING COMMISSION

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the constitution of a commission to be known as The Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission, for the purpose of acquiring, operating, regulating and controlling radio broadcasting in Canada.

He said: Some question has arisen as to whether or not a measure of this kind should be preceded by a resolution, in view of the fact that it does not contemplate the expenditure of money other than that which may be collected by licence fees under the legislation. But I believe the better opinion is that the measure to be founded on the recommendation of the committee should be preceded by a resolution and we are following that course. His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—MR. LAWSON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. LAWSON (West York): I rise with respect to a matter affecting the privileges of the house. A member of the select special committee on appointments and administration and operation of the Civil Service Act this morning called to my attention an interview or reputed interview appearing in the Ottawa Journal of this date in which the Clerk of the House is alleged to have passed with reference to the report a remark that in so far as the report dealt with the staff of the House of Commons, it was a joke.

I think it is unnecessary for me to read the article in detail in view of the fact that the Clerk of the House quite voluntarily delivered to me shortly before three o'clock a letter, which, in justice to him, I think should be read to the house. The letter is as follows:

May 11, 1932.

Dear Mr. Lawson:

I see in this morning's "Journal" an interview in which I am made to say that the civil service committee report is a "joke." Needless to say, I never permitted anybody to publish such a statement. It would be highly improper for me, as Clerk of the House of Commons, to allow such an expression of opinion to appear in the newspapers in connection with recommendations submitted by members for the concurrence of the house. I am the members' humble servant and I always endeavour to be courteous and respectful in all my dealings with them.

Yours very truly,

Arthur Beauchesne,
Clerk of the House of Commons.

I think that letter is sufficient to meet the situation.

CIVIL SERVICE

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON APPOINTMENTS, ADMINISTRATION AND OPERATION OF CIVIL SERVICE ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): In view of the fact that this report has been referred to and will probably be before the house shortly, may I suggest that the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) be in a position to inform us as to the number of post offices where the revenue is less than, and the number where it is in excess of the $3,000 mentioned in the report, so that we may have this information before us when the matter comes up.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (West Middlesex): I want to address a question to the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) as to when I may expect a return for which an order was passed by the house April 25, and which was for copy of correspondence in connection with the post office vacancy at Ailsa Craig, Ontario.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The Postmaster General is out of the house at the minute; I shall see that the matter is brought to his attention.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): If certain members of the civil service are to receive their salary cheques on the fifteenth of this month and if certain of the public expenditures are to be met in due course during the month, it will be necessary that we have interim supply. I shall therefore ask for the unanimous consent of the house to grant one-twelfth in the case of the main estimates and one-sixth in the case of the Canadian National Steamships and Maritime Freight Rates Act. If I may have that consent, I move, Mr. Speaker, that you do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): So far as the official opposition is concerned, there is no objection whatever to the Minister of Finance having the supply for which he asks, on the usual understanding covering a partial vote in this way.

Mr. RHODES: It is distinctly understood that the usual reservations are made.

Mr. VENIOT: Before we go into supply—

Mr. RHODES: I can proceed only with unanimous consent, and it will have no reference to a subsequent motion for supply at a later period in the day.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Ross in the chair.

Mr. RHODES moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $16,554,359.42, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1933, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1933.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. RHODES moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $1,688,000, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted for Canadian National Steamships and Maritime Freight Rates Act, as set forth in the estimates for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1933, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1933.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Mr. RHODES moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Mr. RHODES moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account, of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1933, the sum of $18,242,359.42 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rhodes thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 82, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending March 31, 1933.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first and second times, considered in committee, read the third time and passed.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES RESPECTING MEASURES TO RELIEVE DISTRESS

The house resumed from Monday, May 9, consideration in committee of Bill No. 72, respecting relief measures—Mr. Gordon—Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

On section 3—Powers of governor in council.

Mr. HEENAN: In view of the difference of opinion that seems to exists between some of the ministers of the Ontario government and the Minister of Labour with respect to the trans-Canada highway, I should like to have some information so we may get the matter cleared up and let the people of new Ontario know what they may expect. Answering a question of mine on May 3 with regard to the trans-Canada highway the Minister of Labour said:

I understand that a portion of it has been declared by the province of Ontario, moneys have been expended and the work is proceeding to completion.

I think that was a very fair position to take. Answering my friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) on May 9, the minister again indicated that so far as this government was concerned, they were prepared to go on with the trans-Canada highway. Is it still the intention of the government definitely to go on with this work through northern Ontario on a fifty-fifty basis with the province?

Mr. GORDON: The basis upon which the trans-Canada highway will be constructed must of necessity be the subject matter of an agreement between ourselves and the provinces. I am confident there will be incorporated in the agreement with Ontario a provision that the building of the trans-Canada highway will be shared equally with respect to expense. The agreement is not in being, and I have not had the full benefit of the views of the provincial government on it, this proposed legislation not having been passed; but it is the desire of this government to proceed with the trans-Canada highway just as expeditiously as the stress and strain of these times, so far as finances are concerned, will permit. I do not think I can say anything further.

Mr. HEENAN: I bring this matter up because of the difference of opinion between this government and the government of Ontario. The minister has given a fair answer, but not a very definite one. At any rate it is quite evident that the federal government is willing to consider the contribution of money to the province of Ontario—I am speaking only of that province because I am more familiar with it—if the provincial authorities desire to go on with the work. I have brought this matter up several times already this session, and I am getting a little closer to the view of the minister, although, as I say, he has not expressed it definitely yet. On May 7 there appeared in the Kenora Miner and News, the official organ of the Conservative party in that section of new Ontario, a speech made by the Ontario Minister of Lands and Forests before the Kenora town council, the Keewatin town council, the Sioux Lookout town council and some of the representatives from unorganized districts. Very specifically he states his regrets that he is unable to go on with that work because of the fact that after a conference with the Prime Minister of Canada the federal government has refused to or cannot contribute any money towards it. That is why I am anxious for some frankness in the matter. I think the minister will admit that if he is willing to consider a contribution towards it by the federal government he ought not to have the Minister of Lands and Forests of Ontario misrepresent the position of this government. That gentleman said:

> Last winter work had been arranged on the trans-Canada highway on a fifty-fifty basis with the Dominion government.

I am giving extracts from his speech, because it is very lengthy. He proceeded:

> . . . but had since been discontinued and the dominion was not contributing any more.

That is a specific statement. The report continues:

> Stating that he felt bad about it, Mr. Finlayson went on to say that he had hoped to finish the trans-Canada to Fort William to give the big loop or at least to join up connections with the Dryden area, but unfortunately this could not be completed at this time, although he hoped to keep camps working on the roads under the new scheme.

That is, anyone without a home may go there and work for board and lodging and five dollars a month. Further, he said:

> Last winter it cost approximately $100 per man per month to keep them working in the bush. Under the new scheme it would cost about $50 a month to keep them at work in the same camps during the summer.

Again:

> But they would not be able to go on with the work of the trans-Canada highway on the same scale.

I point out to the Minister of Labour what the Minister of Lands and Forests proposes to do for the unemployed in northern Ontario:

> It was felt that the municipal councils should get to work and say "What cuts can be made?" Town councils, school boards and all municipal bodies should get busy and cut down on expenditures, and cut down on taxation. There would be little or no road construction, and they must plan to take care of their own needy. They can't load it on the governments. It is suggested that they go to the people with steady salaries and ask them to give so much to a central municipal employment fund. If the people of the town will raise this money the provincial and dominion governments would each add a like amount for immediate relief. "If you will do something of that kind, we will join with you in meeting the situation," stated Mr. Finlayson.

This is a new policy, Mr. Chairman. This bill provides what might be termed direct relief, or the "dole." We have been told by the minister that he is prepared to consider requests by any province for contributions from the federal government to carry on certain works. While this bill is before us we have the Minister of Lands and Forests going up into northern Ontario and telling the municipalities that they must take care of their own needy people, that they must not load them on the governments. He used the plural form. That is a strange situation after the way that some of us got pummelled around the political platforms less than a couple of years ago. But that is not the point. We have here a bill to provide relief by the dominion in cooperation with the provinces, and then we have the minister of one of the provincial governments telling the municipalities they must take care of their own needy. He said, "If you will get those men who have steady work to contribute to a fund to assist the needy, the federal and provincial governments will augment that fund also." That is why I think we really should have some definite announcement from the minister.

Again I want to offer a suggestion. As everyone knows, we have been constructing highways since 1921 through the portion of northern Ontario which I have the honour to represent. When the provincial government changed in 1923, however, politics began to be played with the highway. Work was closed down, and they promised to reopen it and do so and so provided certain candidates were elected. We have managed to get on fairly well because we have had quite a number of elections. The people in my part of the country welcome an election, because that is about the only time we can get any work done. The more elections the more roads, so I go to my people and say to them, "Well, are you not glad? There is an election on we will get some more roads built. Let us get this election over with so that we can soon have another and get more roads."

At any rate, we have completed the highway from the Manitoba boundary to Kenora and it is being officially opened on July 1. There we have about 127 miles of road connecting Kenora with the province of Manitoba. There is a distance of forty-five miles from Kenora east through to a great farming district, where the farmers are hemmed in without connection with the main road. If we could construct a highway over that forty-five mile stretch, from Kenora to Vermilion Bay, we would provide an outlet for that great farming district, and if we continued that highway another sixteen miles east of Dyment we would get to Ignace. This would connect up the whole of new Ontario, with the exception of Fort William and Port Arthur, with western Canada and also with the United States. Those sixteen miles of roadway could be constructed for about $35,000. I know something of that country; there is a little muskeg, but it is fairly level ground. The forty-five mile stretch from Kenora to Vermilion Bay would cost about $8,000 a mile, or a total of about $360,000. Would it not be better to spend that amount of about $395,000 in order to give that district connections with western Canada and with the United States, rather than to put men on direct relief? We are being asked to give the government the right to spend money at their discretion, and we have the minister standing in his place and saying that the government is willing to contribute towards the cost of the completion of that highway. On the other hand we have the provincial minister of lands and forests saying in Kenora that the municipality must be responsible for their needy, but that if those who have steady jobs will contribute to a fund for the unemployed, the provincial and federal governments will contribute to the same fund.

Under these circumstances I think the minister, for his own protection, should indicate to the house what he is prepared to do, rather than have the provincial minister of lands and forests misrepresent the attitude of this government throughout northern Ontario.

Mr. GORDON: I cannot subscribe to all the observations made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, who says that the idea that municipalities and private individuals should subscribe to a fund for the purpose of assisting those worthy people who are in need is a new policy. That is not correct. I know the hon. member would not make an incorrect statement knowingly, but in the city of Ottawa, for instance, there are organizations which subscribe money for this purpose, and the city also helps. In my own riding private individuals have done the same thing; in fact the workmen of one camp subscribe so much per month to augment the fund provided by the municipality, the province and the dominion in order to look after their fellow workmen who are in distress. This is no new policy; it is nothing new for the people who have something voluntarily to assist those who have nothing. I therefore have no complaint to make against the provincial minister of lands and forests when he urges voluntary subscriptions to augment the fund which is to care for the needy in any municipality; of course this is no new policy.

I do not know that I could make any observation with respect to the conduct of the business of the province of Ontario, either by way of commendation or criticism, but coming as I do from the eastern section of northern Ontario I must say that I have never heard of the things that have been described by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. I do not say this because the province of Ontario happens to have a Conservative administration, because the same thing obtained, so far as my part of northern Ontario was concerned, when the farmer government was in power; the work proceeded. I know personally officials in the northern development branch and other branches of the public service, who were officials away back in the days of the Ross government. They have never been disturbed, and to-day they are just as stout Liberals as they were then. I cannot let the observations of the hon. gentleman in that regard pass without taking exception to them.

Mr. HEENAN: What observations are you referring to now?

Mr. GORDON: The hon. gentleman said, if I heard him correctly, that no money was spent on roads unless there was an election, that the more elections there were the more money was spent. I may have misunderstood the hon. gentleman's words, but that has not been my experience. I hazard the opinion that no other representative of northern Ontario will make such sweeping statements in condemnation of the provincial government as have been made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. Of course I want to keep within the rules of debate in this house, but I am almost persuaded to use more forceful language in describing a statement of that character, because that situation certainly does not obtain in the part of northern Ontario which I know very well, and that includes the greater part of that area. I should be very much surprised indeed if it obtained in the hon. gentleman's riding.

With respect to the trans-Canada highway, the Minister of Lands and Forests, Mr. Finlayson, in his remarks as quoted in the journal to which the hon. gentleman has referred, stated—I gathered that this was the substance of it—that the work would not be discontinued but that the camps that are now built and re-equipped to take care of single men who otherwise would probably have nowhere to go, would be available to them and that they would be given food and clothing and some subsistence money and would be required to work. I do not think that policy should be condemned at a time like this. However, I do not want to continue the argument further than to say that this government has not yet entered into any agreement with the province of Ontario with respect to the work, for the very obvious reason that we have no authority; and while the subject has been discussed in an informal way with the representatives of that province, no agreement as to what can or cannot be done with regard to the highway has been entered into. I am just as anxious as any hon. member coming from that part of Canada to see that the gap between the eastern part of Ontario and the western part of Quebec on the one hand, and Manitoba on the other, is bridged by a highway, just so soon as it can be constructed. But again, representing as I do a very large riding in that part of northern Canada, I am not going to take the attitude of urging at a time like this that the road be built and that the province should contribute moneys which they, in their judgment, say they are unable at the present time to advance, sufficient to have the road built with any great expedition. In my view, the building of the road will continue, not, perhaps, as rapidly as the hon. member would like, but as rapidly as the conditions that confront us will allow. I do not think the hon. gentleman can ask me to go further than that, and I can assure him that so far as I am concerned every effort will be made to continue the work on some plan or another to be agreed upon which will ensure its continuance at the least possible expense and with as great a degree of expedition as possible under present conditions.

Mr. HEENAN: The last remarks of the minister were, I thought, rather favourable, but I notice that in the course of his address he had to stop a little while because he could not find words with which to express himself in relation to some of the things I have mentioned.

Mr. GORDON: I have not as great a facility of speech as the hon. gentleman.

Mr. HEENAN: Had I been in the chair I would have said to the minister, "Go to it," because I could not myself find words with which to condemn the practice of the provincial government in northern Ontario. I am glad that the Minister of Labour does not experience in his riding what I have been experiencing for the last twelve or fifteen years in my riding. However, we have lived through it.

I want to point out to the minister again that the government is contemplating spending money in northern Ontario in direct relief. Is it a fair statement that the government does intend to spend money in direct relief in northern Ontario? I have heard him say that over and over again.

Mr. GORDON: This government will not spend it directly, no; we have no contact with the municipalities. That is obvious. Undoubtedly, however, if a situation arises in northern Ontario necessitating the expenditure of money in direct relief, there is no doubt in my mind that a prompt submission will be made by the province to this government, and I am sure that this government will take the appropriate steps to relieve the situation.

Mr. HEENAN: Well, it is not a question of a situation that is going to arise; it has already arisen. They have laid off the men who have been working on these camps.

They have not been doing anything for two years and there is now an offer to re-hire them if they will undertake to work in the camps for board and lodging and five dollars a month. The provincial minister told them in Kenora that the banks would not lend the municipalities more money. I do not know where he got the authority for that statement, but that is what he said, and he suggests that those who are in steady employment should contribute to a fund to which the provincial and the federal governments would contribute a small sum to help it along.

Mr. GORDON: He did not say that that was a prerequisite to the provincial and dominion governments' subscribing—at any rate, not as reported in the press.

Mr. HEENAN: This newspaper, the Mines and News, would not misquote the Minister of Lands and Forests on a bet. This is what he said:

It was felt that municipal councils—

He did not say the council of Kenora.

—should get to work and say "What cuts can be made?" Town councils, school boards and all municipal bodies should get busy and cut down on expenditures, and cut down on taxation. There would be little or no road construction, and they must plan to take care of their own needy. They can't load it on the governments. It is suggested that they go to the people with steady salaries and ask them to give so much to a central municipal employment fund. If the people of the town will raise this money the provincial and dominion governments would each add a like amount for immediate relief. "If you will do something of that kind, we will join with you in meeting the situation," stated Mr. Finlayson.

He is speaking there not only for the provincial government but for the federal government as well. I would point out to the minister that that town is composed chiefly of workingmen—railroad men, pulp and paper men, sawmill men, and flourmill men. The railway men are doing very little, because since this government came into power they have restricted trade, both imports and exports, to such an extent that there is nothing doing on the railways, with the result that the railway men are out of work, and any of them who have steady jobs have been sharing their work with the younger men who are less fortunate. They have therefore very little to contribute to any fund. The Minister of Lands and Forests is solely responsible for the Act that the pulp and paper mill in the town of Kenora is closed down. The Ontario government have an agreement with Mr. E. W. Backus, his heirs and assigns, whereby they have obtained certain concessions from the province of Ontario. I know something about it because I helped to get it; and they got it under the condition that they would work the mill to full capacity ten months each year, employing one thousand men; otherwise the whole concern would revert to the crown. I am not unreasonable enough to say that we should force an industry to operate when it cannot sell its products, but that is the concern of the Ontario government, and if for some good reason the Ontario government released Mr. Backus from operating according to the agreement, then in all conscience the Ontario government is responsible for taking care of the thousand thus thrown out of work. But the way the Ontario government apparently intends to take care of them is by asking others who have steady jobs to contribute to a fund to which the Ontario government and the federal government will also contribute equally in order to keep these people happy and comfortable and prosperous up in northern Ontario.

Mr. GORDON: Will the hon. gentleman give me the date of the agreement with Mr. Backus?

Mr. HEENAN: I can give the hon. gentleman a copy of the agreement if he desires. There were two agreements, one dated September, 1920, and the other dated January, 1921, if I recollect aright—I will get the exact dates. These agreements provided for the operation of the plant for ten months in every year, during which time a thousand men were to be employed, and any evasion of the agreement rendered the whole contract null and void ipso facto. I repeat I am not unreasonable enough to suggest that there might not have been some good reason for the Ontario government releasing this concern from operating its plant, but I do say that when the Ontario government did that it should take care of the thousand men and see that they are employed in remunerative work.

Mr. GORDON: Are not the Backus interests in bankruptcy now?

Mr. HEENAN: That is not in the agreement at all.

Mr. GORDON: But is it not a fact?

Mr. HEENAN: They are in bankruptcy, but the receivers have to operate the plant according to agreement. That reminds me that the present Ontario government in 1923 told the people throughout the province that Backus had got millions of dollars' worth of materials for a song and that it was going to make him immensely wealthy. But today that gentleman, as the Minister of Labour has just said, is bankrupt; and instead of the Minister of Lands and Forests in the Ontario government insisting on the implementing of the agreement with the province, he has practically released him from doing so. If the Ontario government had not released him from his contract, all the water powers and the whole concern would have reverted to the province. However, that is another question which I shall be glad to discuss at any time that is appropriate, because I am very proud of the agreement. My point is that the provincial minister is not insistent upon this agreement being carried out, and he now tells the people of Kenora that the road work is not going to continue and that the people there must look out for their own needy and not shift the burden on to the provincial or the federal government. He says that the proper thing for them to do is to organize a committee and ask men who are steadily employed to contribute to a fund, to which the Dominion and provincial governments—the Minister of Lands and Forests is not willing to allow the federal government to speak for itself—will contribute to assist the needy in that part of the country. When the present federal government appealed to the electors, one of the planks of its platform was that a highway would be built through northern Ontario at the hands of the federal government. The federal government have never attempted to do that. Instead they started out to contribute on a fifty-fifty basis with the province. It is a federal obligation since the last election that a highway be built through that part of the country, if only to carry out in a measure some of the election promises of the present party in power.

Further, if the federal government are going to contribute direct relief for unemployment, they should see to it that this piece of highway, totalling sixty-one miles and connecting up the town of Ignace and the farming district of Kenora and Dryden with western Ontario and Manitoba, is built. The sixty-one miles could be built at an expenditure of less than half a million dollars. It would be far better to spend that money in providing work and at the same time providing this country with an asset which will attract tourists, than to spend money on direct relief.

Mr. SANDERSON: On April 22, when the estimates of the Minister of Labour were before the committee, I asked for some information concerning the number of men who had been placed on the farms in the province of Ontario during the last year, and the minister promised to give me the information by counties. Again, on May 3 last, when the resolution which preceded this bill was up for discussion, I asked the minister for that information, and he then thought that he could get it in a day or two. That was a week ago. I now ask the minister if he has that information for me, and if he has not, when may I expect it?

Mr. GORDON: After the interrogations were made I consulted the officials who had this work in hand, and they explained to me that the divisions of the land settlement branch were not outlined having regard to counties or districts, but that there was one in Toronto, one in Sherbrooke, one in Winnipeg, one in Saskatoon, one in Edmonton, one in Calgary, one in Vancouver, and I am not just sure about the maritime provinces. The questions which were asked at that time were submitted to the officials of the department and to the representatives of the railways. I am told that it would be utterly impossible to segregate these placements by counties or districts, that it could be done by provinces only. I regret very much that the information is not available in the form in which my hon. friend desires it.

Mr. SANDERSON: I take it from the remarks of the minister that he admits it is absolutely impossible to give that information to me in the form in which I asked for it, and in which he said he would give it to me. I am not concerned only as to the province of Ontario, and I am not concerned at the moment only with the older part of Ontario. The minister stated on April 22 that 4,165 men had been put on the land in Ontario under the land policy of this government, and surely therefore he can tell me where they have gone. They have not disappeared. Is it impossible for the minister to tell me where those men have gone?

Mr. GORDON: It is not impossible to give the hon. member any information. We have an index of our placements, and when I say our placements I mean those who were induced to take up land on their own account without any help or gratuity from the government. We have their names in alphabetical order, and there is no reason in the world, so far as I can see, why the hon. member should not have access to that list, although it is peculiarly the business of these individuals themselves because they were under little or no obligation to this government. Probably they were prompted in a measure to take the course they did by whatever efforts the railways and we could put forth. Whether it is desirable to have laid on the table of the house the names of those who have gone there is exceedingly doubtful, but I have no objection to showing the list of names to the hon. member or to any other hon. member desiring to see it.

Mr. SANDERSON: That is fairly, but not entirely satisfactory. I take it from the remarks of the minister that I can go to his department and his officials will permit me to make a list of those names.

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. SANDERSON: And where the men are located?

Mr. GORDON: If the information is availalbe, as I think it is.

Mr. SANDERSON: Would it not be possible for the minister's officials to compile the list and send it to me? I really do not want to go down to his department and spend three or four hours copying a list of names. Surely he has staff enough there to get that information tabulated and sent to me. This is a request which is entitled to consideration. I am persistent because three or four weeks ago the minister said that he had the information and he would give it to me. He did not do so. Again, a week ago yesterday, May 3, I made the same request and he at that time replied that he had not the information but expected to get or would have it and give it to me in a day or two. I do not want to go down to the department of the minister and do that work myself. I do not like to say to the minister that he is acting on a dog-in-the-manger policy; that he does not want to give me the information. It is information to which any hon. member is entitled. Surely if one of the responsible ministers of the government of the day says that he has a back-to-the-land policy and that he has put 4,165 men back on the land in Ontario, and then if he says that he does not know where they are; that he is afraid he cannot get the information, there is something sadly lacking in his policy. May I in all seriousness ask the minister: Will he give me whatever information he has in connection with placing these 4,165 men back on the land in Ontario? If it is not all the information I require or asked for in the first place, I shall not bother him any more. Surely he can get it or instruct his officials to compile it and give it to me.

Mr. GORDON: By counties?

Mr. SANDERSON: I think the minister said that he could not give it to me by counties. Is that correct?

Mr. GORDON: I cannot.

Mr. SANDERSON: Then I shall waive the point of counties, although for the life of me I cannot see why he is not able to do that. I do not want to hold up this debate, but this is simple information and it is surprising to me the minister has haggled the way he has over giving it to me.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does the minister say that he does not know where these people are going to go? That is the point.

Mr. GORDON: To what people does the hon. member refer?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The people who have been placed under this land scheme that is being discussed.

Mr. GORDON: The hon. member is discussing placements of people on the land in the past. Where they are to go from there, I do not know.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The experience of the past, I am afraid, tells us that, but I feel the question of the hon. member for South Perth is one that could be answered, because surely the minister or officials of his department must know precisely the present location of these people. While he may not be willing to go to the trouble of dividing the list by counties, I presume he can give the township or range or give the information by whatever method there is of determining the location in Ontario.

Mr. GORDON: Whatever information there is in the department along that line, I can have prepared for the hon. member, but I do not think he is entitled to the names of the parties; that is the private business of each individual. I trust, if, on a review of the information, the hon. member finds that what I have said with respect to the numbers of those who have been placed on farms is true, he will not be disappointed.

Mr. SANDERSON: I think we are on fairly common ground. The minister is not giving me all the information for which I asked in the first place, but when may I expect that which he says he will give me?

Mr. GORDON: I cannot tell to a day, but I presume within a week or sooner, if it can be prepared.

Mr. SANDERSON: The minister says that he cannot tell to a day, but it may be within a week. Perhaps next week we may be told it will be furnished next month, and then parliament may have prorogued. Will he give me the information before the end of the session?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. SANDERSON: I can accept in good faith the word of the minister that I shall get the information before the session ends?

Mr. GORDON: I presume the hon. member will accept my word only with reservations.

Mr. HEAPS: It appears from what the minister and the Prime Minister have said in the house that the policy of the government this year is to be what is commonly termed direct relief. Therefore the question of giving direct relief to the many thousands of people who unfortunately will be compelled to accept the same, is very important. In giving this relief to the individual, is the Department of Labour or the government laying down any policy, or is this entirely a question for the municipalities or the provinces to settle?

Mr. GORDON: I can only repeat what I said some weeks ago when the resolution upon which this legislation is founded was before the house. The policy that was agreed upon at the Dominion-provincial conference which was held in Ottawa on April 9, and which was in session something over a day, was this: it was agreed that the provinces and the municipalities could not longer afford to project works as had been the case during the past year and that this was also creating a heavy burden upon the dominion treasury. Every province was in agreement that the difference between direct relief on a subsistence basis and the cost of works was very large; I do not think I need go into that in detail. The provinces and the municipalities, of course, are the only ones that are in touch with local situations, and how the direct relief will be applied must of necessity remain in almost complete measure with the municipalities and provinces concerned. Whether or not there will be anyone in an advisory capacity representing the federal government, has not yet been determined for the very reason that the agreements themselves have not so far been drawn up, and of course the situation differs in the different provinces. While we are not consensus ad idem on all features of the situation, yet just as soon as this legislation passes, I hope agreements will be entered into, satisfactory to the provinces and to the federal government, with a view to ensuring that during this period of depression, which I hope will not last too long, we shall not have it said that people are starving and cold or have no home, no place to go. That is an unthinkable situation. To that end governmental forces in this dominion are going to direct their attention. I do not wish to be misunderstood, and ought to say that it is not the suggestion or the intention of this or, so far as I am aware, any other government to imperil the standards of living, wage scales or wage agreements in any shape or form. We must draw a distinct line between subsistent direct relief and wage rates and standards of living. I do not wish to suggest that we should hurry along with the bill, because I want to give all the information hon. members desire, but it is very desirable that this bill be passed, because the provinces are pressing. I can assure the committee that we are having a most difficult time, but can do nothing until the legislation goes through. I do not know what arrangements the other chamber may have made, but I believe there may be a short adjournment there, and it is very desirable that this legislation pass as soon as possible.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I should like to know if in the arrangements for unemployment relief in the coming year the government will follow the policy adopted last year of putting certain things which are really public works under the head of unemployment and farm relief?

Mr. GORDON: The question of projecting works on tripartite agreements, namely among municipalities, provinces and the dominion, or on bilateral agreements between the provinces and the dominion, was discussed at great length with provincial representatves. There was unanimity of opinion that works of that character should not be projected, unless in very exceptional circumstances, the reason being, as frankly admitted by provincial representatives and recognized by this government, that it is extremely difficult for those interested in such works to raise the necessary money. There may be, likely are, places in Canada where money may be readily raised, but in such localities there is very little unemployment. For that reason alone, therefore, the projection of such works is not desirable. I assure the hon. member the decision is not to carry on works as heretofore but to direct the main efforts of all concerned towards direct relief.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Evidently I did not make myself clear. I take it from his answer there are to be no works carried on by joint agreement of municipalities, provinces and the dominion.

Mr. GORDON: No new works.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I take it, further, that it is settled that no new works are to be carried on the cost of which will be borne partly by the provinces and partly by the dominion.

Mr. GORDON: I do not wish to be misunderstood. The camps to which reference has been made will provide work to which, through the agency of the provinces, this government will contribute. The works to which I have made reference however are those such as public buildings, and the like.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Those are the undertakings about which I have been speaking. I am referring to works such as those appearing at page 66 of the report of the Dominion Director of Unemployment Relief, namely harbour and river improvements. These are purely dominion public works, and last year payments were made for them out of dominion funds. The objection I made to the minister some time ago was that they constitute works which should go in the regular way through the Department of Public Works, and for which estimates should be placed before the house in the regular way. I asked the minister a couple of weeks ago if it was the intention during the coming year to depart from the practice followed last year, namely that unemployment relief works paid for by the dominion would not come under estimates for the Department of Public Works. What is the policy of the government for the coming year?

Mr. GORDON: I do not know that a policy has been set. I must say, however, I am in agreement with the hon. member that it is highly desirable that the public works estimates, in so far as it is humanly possible, should reflect the expenditures in that department. Why the work set out in the report of the director was done through the agency of the Department of Public Works, I am not well enough acquainted with that department to answer definitely. If my recollection serves me aright, when this matter was under discussion before the Minister of Public Works gave an answer. Occasion might arise where public works, for which provision was not made in the estimates, might be desirable in a locality in which unemployment existed, and where men could be employed on useful public works for purposes of subsistence. I cannot say, however, that such an occasion will arise, and so far as I am aware the government has not considered the matter.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I should like to point out to the minister his remarks on April 28 of this year, as they appear in Hansard. I shall read my question and the minister's answer on that occasion:

> Mr. Elliott: Perhaps I can make it simpler for the minister. He no doubt has before him the report of the director of unemployment relief. At page 66 he will see there are a number of items which are clearly public works. They appeared last year under the heading of unemployment and farm relief. Is it the intention to follow a similar policy this year, or has the minister reached the point where he is able to say what will be done?
> Mr. Gordon: I am sorry I cannot give any direct answer to the question, but certainly before the legislation comes down I shall be in a position to do so.

The legislation is now down, and apparently the minister has no more light on the subject than he had previously. On that occasion he agreed with me it was not desirable to follow the practice I have indicated. I think he certainly had decided at that time that before the legislation came down a decision must be arrived at. The house is entitled to know, now that the bill is before it, what is in the mind of the minister and of the government in regard to the manner of operating under this act during the coming year. He agreed with me before that it would be decided before the bill was brought down. He is quite frank now in saying it is not decided, and he does not know. Again I protest against the system adopted last year by which the Minister of Labour, who is charged with the administration of unemployment relief, puts in his report these items, then when the report comes into the house and somebody asks about an item the answer is given by the Minister of Public Works. I refer particularly to the Haileybury breakwater. The answer is given: I cannot tell where the demand came from or what are the needs for that particular work, because it came in under unemployment relief.

Mr. GORDON: That is in my riding.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is not the only one I object to, but I pick that out as an example of the folly of pursuing a course of this kind. A large item is dealt with without this committee having an opportunity to pass upon it at all. Then when the matter comes up in the house and my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough asks a question the Minister of Public Works says: I cannot tell about that because it came in under unemployment relief and was in another department. That was the implication. Then when I asked the Minister of Labour for an explanation on the 28th of April, the Minister of Public Works gave an explanation as to how these items came in. It is quite apparent that they got into that list without having been passed upon in the ordinary way that public works should be dealt with. I hope the minister will be able to assure the house before the bill passes that this policy will not be followed during the coming year. I think he agrees with me that it is an unwise policy. I should like to have that assurance.

Mr. GORDON: I can only give the hon. member what my view is. I do not entirely disagree with him. I think it is highly desirable that in ordinary, normal times any proposed public work should be submitted in the way contemplated by the statutes and the rules of this house. If a work is carried on as an unemployment relief work, or in the way of providing work on a basis of direct relief and subsistence, it would be better to have it reported, when the report is made to parliament, as coming under this statute rather than coming under the Public Works department. When it is a purely public work—of course I speak subject to correction because I have not had the experience in the adminstration of governmental departments that other members of this committee have—while the money might be provided under this legislation, yet I assume that those in charge would likely be officers of the Public Works department. Whether that would give rise to any accounting difficulties I do not know, but my view is if the Dominion government initiate and carry out any work under the provisions of this legislation, then that work should be described in the report of the director of unemployment relief as coming under this statute and not under the Public Works department. I do not know that I can go further than that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If that is the proper course, then the wrong course was adopted last year, because a work of that kind was done by the Public Works department, I am advised.

Mr. GORDON: I think so.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps my hon. friend can tell me why the matter has not received the consideration which he assured me two weeks ago it would receive before the bill was brought down. At that time he said:

> Certainly before the legislation comes down I shall be in a position to do so.

Is there any reason why he is not able to implement that promise?

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. GORDON: I can only answer the hon. member by saying that if any dominion public work is initiated under this legislation and carried out, then it will be so styled in any report; it will not appear as a public work as such, but as a work carried out under this legislation. I do not know that we are arguing a very important point, at least it does not strike me as being so important, because whether a useful desirable work is done through the agency of the Public Works department or is earmarked as being done under this legislation is not so important to my mind—I may be missing the point—it is merely a matter of financing. If done under this act I assume it would not be charged up in the current year's expenditures. But what substantial difference does it make, if the work is useful and desirable and in a locality where there are people who need employment? Are we not rather arguing on formalities and not striking at the root of things?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am glad the minister puts it that way, because evidently he does not get the point which I have been trying to make. As one department of this government we have the Public Works department—a very efficient department. That department has the experienced staff and the equipment for carrying out in a reasonable expeditious way public works that may be deemed desirable. I submit that department is in a much better position to do those works than any other department of government. At any rate that is the department that did them last year, according to the statement made by the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. GORDON: That is correct so far as I know.

Mr. ELLIOTT: But here is where the difference arises. When you come to ask, why did you do this, the answer is: That was started under unemployment relief. No responsibility apparently is taken for initiating the work, no reason for its being undertaken can be given by the minister, because he does not know who asked for the work to be undertaken or whether it was desirable to undertake it; simply the work came in under the Public Works department. My hon. friend will readily see this division leaves the responsibility really nowhere. But he has not answered the question with which I am concerned. About two weeks ago when we were discussing this he gave me a promise, as I understood, that he would have a definite answer on this subject before the legislation came down. He said certainly he would have an answer ready. I would like to know why we are not able to get that answer to-day.

Mr. NEILL: May I make a suggestion in order to end this matter and let us get on. If the hon. member will refer to page 2449 of Hansard he will find the following words:

Mr. Power: I do not see anywhere, in the authority which it is proposed to confer upon the governor in council, the right taken by the government to carry on with purely federal public works.

Mr. Bennett: It is not there.

Mr. Power: Am I to understand that that is done because it is not the policy of the government to carry on with purely federal public works other than those which have been voted in the estimates?

Mr. Bennett: That is right.

I think that settles the matter. I do not see why the minister should not be aware of that very definite statement by the Prime Minister which certainly answers the question asked by the hon. member for West Middlesex.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I should think the minister in charge of the department should know if that is the decision of the government. That is the point I should like to have explained.

Mr. GORDON: I can give no answer beyond what I have already said.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I want to ask just one question and then make a very brief statement in regard to conditions in that section of the country which I have the honour to represent, and in regard to which I have some knowledge.

The question relates to a statement previously made by the minister with regard to highway work. Will this department be prepared to meet any province half way, where the province may find that it can employ married men with families in highway work, giving them a remuneration equal to what they would receive under direct relief, in order to provide them with food and the actual necessities of life?

That is the question, and the statement I wish to make is based on what the minister said in regard to the advisability of getting this legislation through. I believe there is no part of Canada where the effects of prevailing conditions are felt more intensely than in that part of Canada along the transcontinental line in northern Ontario, where there are numerous small pulp mill and lumber towns which have been virtually abandoned. There are no municipal organizations; the people are without churches and in many cases without schools, and there are no individuals better off than the others. They are virtually in a state of pauperism. In a very considerable section of that country we arranged last year for voluntary relief committees to administer general relief, and we secured assistance in the usual way from the provincial government. That assistance ended, however, on the last day of April. It was administered on a mere subsistence basis. There are many large families in that district at the present time who are absolutely in want, simply because for weeks past we have been discussing this and other legislation with regard to the question of relief.

I want to read one or two paragraphs from letters I have received in the past two or three days with regard to the conditions prevailing. I have this letter from the chairman of one of the committees:

There are people in this district who are actually starving. I am receiving pathetic appeals on every mail from parents, stating that their children are actually in want and without food. . . . I got in touch with Mr. Morse early last week by telephone.

Mr. Morse is one of the members of the committee in one of the smaller localities.

I asked Mr. Morse to keep a close watch and advise me if any families were really starving. On Saturday Mr. Morse called me up and informed me that . . . one young girl had collapsed that day for want of nourishment and that others were on the verge of the same condition.

At the same time Mr. Morse also wrote me, because I asked these people to keep me informed as to conditions. Mr. Morse said:

I may say that I went to Toronto last week in an effort to get a small interim grant to keep these people going, but was informed by Mr. Ellis that they could do nothing until the legislation was through in Ottawa.

Mr. Morse continues:

The two Tremblay families are starving. . . . There are many young children and a tragedy may occur there at any time. Nothing is being done and . . . they cannot hold out very long.

I have received many such representations. The situation is extremely acute, and while we take weeks to discuss the details, the methods and all sorts of questions, constitutional and otherwise, these people are actually starving to death because they cannot obtain relief.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): There is one matter I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. I have received a communication from the unemployed association of West Kildonan, which is a suburb of Winnipeg, and which is in my constituency. The secretary advises me that the standard of living has been cut down, and that the rations provided are not adequate for the proper subsistence of the children. I understand also that the school teachers in that section have been supplying some milk in order to properly nourish the children.

What I want to ask the minister is this: In making relief arrangements with the provinces in the future is there to be any standard of living specified? With this tri partite agreement between the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion, if we insist on too large a contribution from the municipalities the standard of living may not be adequate for the preservation of the health of the unemployed, and this is rather a serious matter. I do not know just where the responsibility lies, but it seems the government might insist, if they are to pay part of the cost of relief, that at least a uniform standard be set up. I should like to ask the minister if this question has been contemplated in connection with any agreement which might be made with the provinces. The first question is this: Is there a standard of living that should be insisted upon, and in the second place, where does the responsibility rest?

There is one other matter that arises out of this situation. I have received a communication from the clerk of the municipality to the effect that 108 homes of unemployed people will be offered for tax sale this spring. It seems to me if we are to loan money to the municipalities for direct relief the unemployed ought to be protected to this extent: First, that the relief granted be sufficient, and second, that the unemployed should not lose their homes or their little market gardens because of their inability to pay taxes. I bring this matter to the attention of the minister through you, Mr. Chairman, and I would like to know if the government has any policy in this regard.

Mr. GORDON: It is obvious that the matters to which the hon. member has referred come directly under the jurisdiction of the municipalities on the one hand and of the provinces on the other. It is utterly impossible for this government, without having contact with these details—and I do not use the word in the sense that they are not important—to have anything to do with these matters. I cannot conceive that the province of Manitoba, with the funds available for direct relief, would supply relief on which people cannot subsist.

Mr. REID: I should like to ask a question of the minister in connection with the municipalities. On page 56 of the report of the director of unemployment relief there are schedules of work approved in connection with many municipalities in British Columbia. I should like to ask the minister whether the municipalities will be allowed to complete the public works, such as roads and so on, that have been approved under these schedules. Many of these agreements were not given approval until December or January of this year, and I should like to know if these municipalities will be allowed to carry out those programs of work which have been approved.

Mr. GORDON: This debate has gone on so long now that I assume hon. members have forgotten what was said when we began. I made it plain then, as will be seen in Hansard, what works would be proceeded with and what works would not. Under three headings a telegram was sent to each province, setting out the works that would be gone on with, or discontinued as the case might be. That was done by agreement with the provincial authorities, and I cannot add more to what I have already said on the matter.

Mr. REID: This is very serious and a definite statement should be forthcoming. I have to-day received a telegram from one of the municipalities, indicating the seriousness of the situation there. In that municipality there is still unexpended the sum of $43,000.

Mr. GORDON: Is that Burnaby?

Mr. REID: Yes. I had an interview with the minister's secretary and was informed that if these projects, to the extent of $43,000, had been contracted for and there might be a lawsuit if they were not gone on with, they would be proceeded with. But, I was told, if it were simply a matter of carrying on road work under the agreement, it would be stopped. I took the trouble to telegraph to that municipality, inquiring regarding this matter so that I might have definite information, and a few minutes ago I received a telegram to the effect that timber and other material for the necessary trench work had been contracted for and that the situation would be quite serious if the work were not gone on with. They have also contracted for the macadam for the road. For that reason I should like to have a definite statement regarding the project.

Mr. GORDON: I will try, from recollection, to state the terms of the telegram that was sent to British Columbia and all the other provinces. It covered three phases of the situation and was accepted by all the provinces of Canada as a correct reflection of the conclusion arrived at on April 9 at the conference to which I have already alluded.

Works that had been commenced, whereby loss would be occasioned if they were not completed, such as buildings, sewers and so forth, would be completed. Secondly, where undischarged contractual obligations existed—I used the term in its legal sense—that is to say, entire contracts, where the contractual obligation was apparent, it was obvious that the undertakings, no matter of what kind, would be completed. The message went on to say further that the provinces, the dominion contributing under arrangements to be made, would endeavour to take care of the situation in its entirety if possible by direct relief. Perhaps, in fact it is likely, I have not exactly quoted the telegram which was placed on Hansard when the resolution was introduced some weeks ago, but in substance I have given it correctly. If the situation in the municipality to which the hon. member refers is as he has stated it, the work will certainly have to be completed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I noticed what the minister said about the desirability of the legislation being passed with as little delay as possible, and what the hon. member for Algoma said with respect to people suffering at the present time, and the inability to have their needs supplied until this federal legislation was passed. I think it is only proper in the circumstances to point out that the government must take the responsibility for leaving until the end of the session a measure that should have been brought in at the beginning. This is the most important legislation that has been before us, and it is rather unfortunate that it should have been left until the concluding weeks of the session before being introduced. I do not think the discussion has been unduly protracted, considering the importance of the legislation; certainly on this measure, it has not been.

The purpose I had in view before the minister spoke was not, however, to direct his attention to that phase of the question but rather—it may surprise him to learn this—to approve of one feature of the legislation and to make a suggestion in reference to it. This section provides for special relief works and undertakings in the national parks of Canada. I think that is a very desirable form of relief where relief has to be given. The government has property in the nature of great national parks, and if in these difficult times the unemployed could be put to work in those parks I can think of no particular form of relief which could be more acceptable to them and which at the same time would serve the interests of the government and of the country so well. Where there can be work rather than simply relief or doles, I am sure it is better for the recipient of such assistance, and also for the state, which has to foot the bill.

May I, in that connection, ask the minister whether, when the government is considering its program under this provision, it might not extend the conception of "national parks' to government properties in this capital city of Canada: in other words, whether some of the relief moneys might not be used by the Federal District Commission for the improving of some of the government properties in the Canadian capital. I know that already some steps have been taken in that direction. I am sorry the Minister of Public Works is not in the house, because I should have liked to express appreciation of what I know he has started to do in that respect. There is, for example, the property on Wellington street, part of which was burned down a fortnight or so ago. The part that remains constitutes a fire trap. It is government property, having been in the possession of the Dominion for some twenty years, and this would be a good time to take these properties down and make a park area there until later on, when something in the nature of additional public buildings may be warranted by the circumstances of the time.

What I have in mind is this. The walk which we have around Parliament hill, the walk that runs around the hill from Elgin street to Bank street, is, I believe, the result of work which was provided one year for the unemployed by the Mackenzie administration during the hard times from 1874 to 1878, and it has been of service to the country ever since. During the present hard times, where the unemployed are put to work with public money, if we can at the same time improve the appearance of the capital, particularly in so far as the government's own properties are concerned, the money will be well spent and will serve other purposes than merely providing unemployment relief.

In that connection may I say that if the government would continue to set an example to the city, the city might, with the aid of the Federal District Commission, clean up a good many of its properties. Some of them, as they stand at the present time, are eyesores in the capital; and this year, when everyone is making an effort to have the capital of the Dominion appear as presentable as possible, I should think that, whatever numbers of unemployed there are here who may be entitled to relief, might and would be glad to be put to work under the direction of the improvement commission, along with the city, in accordance with some plan of improving government and civic properties. I believe the minister is sympathetic to the idea and I hope he will do what he can in furtherance of it.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not wish to delay the passage of the bill, but I desire to point out something that has been directed to my attention within the last two or three weeks. It is in relation to the housing act. Under that act the dominion granted $20,000,000 for housing purposes. The scheme was instituted, I believe, in 1920 or 1921, and money was loaned in the different provinces, the various governments becoming responsible. They loaned the money in the municipalities to working men and others who wished to build homes for themselves. The provincial governments collected so much a month by way of rental, made up in such a way as to pay in twenty years the interest and sinking fund. In these hard times I know of several cases of people who cannot pay that interest and sinking fund, having been out of work for quite a number of months. They are willing to try to pay the taxes to the municipality, but if the interest and sinking fund are not paid monthly the municipality has the right under the agreement to foreclose. What I would ask the minister is this: Under this section would it not be possible for some arrangement to be made with the government of each province that it would not press for the monthly payments of interest and sinking fund, which run from $25 to $30 and $35 just according to how the agreement is made up, for a period of at least one year, and then at the end of that period these people could begin to pay, and instead of the thing being completed in twenty years, it would take twenty-one years to complete. I would ask the minister to take a note of that and see if some relief in that way cannot be given.

Mr. GORDON: I will look into it.

Mr. GORDON: The right hon. leader of the opposition has suggested an amendment to this section which I think would probably be a proper and a helpful one, and I will have one of my colleagues move accordingly.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I move, Mr. Chairman, that section 7 be amended by striking out the words "within the first fifteen days of the next ensuing session" in lines 40 and 41 at the end of the section and substituting therefor the following: "said orders in council or regulations or an abstract thereof disclosing their essential provisions shall be published in the next following issue of the Canada Gazette."

CIVIL SERVICE

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON APPOINTMENTS, ADMINISTRATION AND OPERATION OF CIVIL SERVICE ACT

Mr. J. EARL LAWSON (West York): Mr. Speaker, on rising to move concurrence of the house in the report of the select special committee on civil service matters, I desire at the very outset to express my personal gratitude to the members of the committee for the effort which each of them made to present every aspect of the situation without evidence of partisanship. In the deliberations of the committee subsequent to its open sittings they demonstrated a very high sense of public duty.

Although the report presented to the house is unanimous, it is not to be expected that men from different vocations in life who have been subject to different environment should reach those conclusions by the same processes of reasoning, and hence I wish to make it clear that in what I have to say in moving concurrence of the report I am expressing my own views which led me to those conclusions.

Civil service legislation was first introduced in Canada in 1868. That legislation set up a civil service board consisting of fourteen deputy heads of departments, five of whom should be a quorum to exercise all the functions of the board. A chairman and a secretary were to be chosen annually from among the fourteen. The duties of the board were, inter alia:

(a) To examine candidates; (b) keep a record of the candidates for examination; (c) grant certificates of qualification to candidates whose fitness and capacity, and whose testimonials as to moral character have been found satisfactory; (d) to investigate and report upon claims for promotion; and (e) to perform such duties as the governor in council thought fit; and to investigate such matters as might be referred to them connected with the administration of the civil service as to promotion, appointment, salary or the efficiency and welfare of the service; and to summon and examine witnesses and to call for persons and obtain papers.

From the résumé of the legislation it is apparent that the board had to some extent the functions of both our present civil service commission and a parliamentary committee. Some amendments to that legislation were made in 1872. In 1882 the two previous enactments were repealed and the Canada Civil Service Act of that year was enacted. This legislation provided for a board of examiners of three members——who from time to time shall be appointed by the governor in council, to examine all candidates for admission to the civil service of Canada, and to give certificates of qualification to such persons as are found qualified according to such regulations as shall be framed for the guidance of the board.

There were two examinations prescribed: (a) a preliminary examination to decide if the applicant could read, write and add; (b) a qualifying examination to decide his fitness to fulfil any position for which he might be a candidate. The board had first to satisfy itself as to the man's age, health and character. The examinations were open to all and might be held in either language. By chapter 46 of the statutes of 1885 a consolidation of the acts of 1882, 1883 and 1884 was made, and the board of examiners was placed under the supervision of the Secretary of State. Provision was made for a secretary and a clerk to assist the board.

No change of any moment was made in the legislation I have just outlined until the Civil Service Amendment Act of 1908, which for the first time provided for a civil service commission consisting of two members appointed by the governor in council. Each commissioner was to hold office during good behaviour and could be removed by the Governor General on address of the Senate and House of Commons. The then existing civil service examiners were to continue during pleasure, but under direction of the commission.

It will be observed that up to this legislation of 1908 we had in Canada in respect of civil service matters a merit system, namely, a system by which only those holding the certificate of qualification from the examiner could be appointed to a position in the civil service. By this act of 1908 there was introduced what is now commonly called the merit system, but which in reality is something more; that is, this act with its amendments established a competitive merit system, whereby the person ranking highest in qualifications shall at all times be appointed to the vacancy which is to be filled. By this act appointment was to be made as a result of competitive examinations, and promotion was to be made for merit by the governor in council upon the recommendation of the department, based upon the report in writing of the deputy head, accompanied by a certificate of qualification by the commission, to be given with or without examination as determined by the regulations of the commission.

By the amending act of 1918 the commission was to consist of not more than three members, and the tenure of office of future commissioners was to be for ten years during good behaviour. It also provided for the retirement of a commissioner at the age of sixty-five. That act, subject to some minor amendments, is the Civil Service Act of today which is found in the revised statutes of 1927, and in respect of which a reference was made to your committee.

It might be well at this time to outline the nature of the organization of the Civil Service Commission. It can be divided into four main classifications, namely the examination branch, the organization branch, the assignment branch and the administration branch, and the last branch in turn may be subdivided into three, namely the secretarial, the personal services and the central register. Under the control of the Civil Service Commission there are approximately 35,000 civil servants. There are in Canada a total of 45,581 civil servants, as of March, 1931. Briefly, these are divided as follows: Permanent employees at Ottawa, 8,009; permanent employees outside Ottawa, 24,706, or a total number of permanent em-employees of 32,715. There are in Ottawa temporary employees numbering 3,757, and outside of Ottawa 9,109, or a total of 12,866 temporary employees. If you add together those two subtotals you get a grand total of 45,581 employees for the month of March, 1931, who that month received in salaries the sum of $5,905,303.97. In those figures there are not included the non-enumerated classes of employees, rural postmasters, casual labour, fee office positions and so on, who received in March, 1931, in compensation for their services, a further sum of $1,990,287.51, making a total payment by this government for the civil service, for the month of March, 1931, of $7,895,591.48.

For the purpose of determining who shall be appointed to the civil service of Canada there is prescribed an examination system, and in their nature these examinations are threefold. They may be written, they may be oral, they may be a rating for education and experience, or any combination of any two or three of the methods I have outlined. Oral examinations are held throughout Canada by a local representative of the Civil Service Commission, in conjunction with one or more representatives of the department, and now usually a representative of the Canadian Legion. Rating boards consist of a representative of the commission and one representative or more of the department. According to the theory of the examination system, these rating boards should always have upon them a representative of the commission, and it must be borne in mind that these boards make their ratings on a man's education and experience from an application form which has been submitted by him, in respect of which there has been little if any check as to the accuracy of the statements therein contained, and these ratings are made without the boards seeing the candidates who are applying for the positions in question.

I said the theory was that there should be on each rating board a representative of the commission, but from the data and material filed with the committee it appeared, in selecting at random some of the rating boards for different years, that on many such boards there was no representative of the commission. For example, in the Department of Agriculture in 1925 there were fifty-five competitions, but there were representatives of the commission on only twenty-six of those boards, while in connection with the fifty-five competitions there were eighty-one departmental representatives on the boards. In the Department of External Affairs during the years 1925, 1926, 1928 and 1930 there were four competitions. On only one of those boards was there a representative of the commission, while on the four boards there were six representatives of the department. In the Insurance department, in the years from 1925 to 1931, there were seven boards, on not one of which was there any examiner other than those appointed to represent the department.

Then there is brought into this examination system what are known as weights. It will be apparent that where the appointment to a position is determined by a percentage based on the combination of an oral examination and the rating given by a rating board, if a man is rated sufficiently high by the board and that rating is given sufficient weight as against the oral examination, while he may have qualified highest in the oral examination he may not get the position as a result of the recommendation of this rating board. For example, in the case of one appointment, of which we had the details before the committee, an appointment was to be made to a position by an oral examination and by a rating for education and experience. The weight given to the oral examination was only three, while the weight given to this rating for education and experience was seven.

May I point out to the house the effect of that weighting. As an illustration let me assume that candidate A is given 80 marks on his oral examination. If you multiply that by the weight of three you get a total of 240. Then let me assume that the rating board gives him a mark of only 60, and bear in mind that this rating board acts upon the application only, with no personal knowledge or observation of the man. If you multiply that mark by the weight of seven you get 420, and adding the two totals together gives a grand total of 660. Dividing that by 10 gives candidate A an average of 66 per cent.

Then take candidate B. On the oral examination he receives only 60 marks as against the man who received 80. You multiply that 60 by three and you get a total of 180. We will say that on the rating board he is given a rating of 80; multiply that by seven and you get a total of 560. If you add the 560 to the 180 you get a total of 740. In other words, he receives 74 per cent, but in the result the man who receives the highest mark on the oral examination is by no means declared the successful candidate, because by the operation of this weighting system, he may have a rating for education and experience which will not give him the highest percentage of qualification.

Time is not sufficient to permit me to outline to the house an instance which occurs in the evidence and which illustrates clearly the point I want to make. A man gets a temporary appointment in a department on the recommendation of a departmental official: consider the fact that two of these departmental officials sit on the rating board as against one representative of the Civil Service Commission, together with the fact that a much higher weight may be given to the mark fixed by the rating board than the mark given by the oral examiners and you at once appreciate the opportunities there are in this system for what I will call, for want of a better word, abuses of the competitive merit system. In the case of written examinations there is little room for abuses. Before leaving the matter I wish to point out to the house the opportunities there are for creating those conditions of which we members of this House of Commons so frequently receive complaint. It is not possible for me, in the short time at my disposal, to deal with all the clauses of the committee's report; therefore I will confine the remainder of my remarks to three or four which, in my opinion, recommend the most marked changes in the present statute or regulations. But just in passing may I refer to one clause of the report which recommends an amendment, because on re-reading it, it occurred to me that it might not express with sufficient clearness the recommendation of the committee. Clause 9 of the report states:

> Your committee recommends that section 60 of the Civil Service Act, as enacted by chapter 38 of the statutes 19-20 George V, be repealed.

The intention of the committee was that the amendment which made possible the putting into the service of the private secretaries of ministers at a minimum salary of $3,120 per annum, should be repealed, but we do not suggest the repeal of that section as it stood prior to the 1929 amendment. The effect of the amendment which the committee recommend will be that in future private secretaries of ministers will not be entitled to preference in appointments to the service, and can obtain admission thereto only through the usual channel of competitive examination.

I should like to refer to clause 18 of the report, in which your committee recommend that the secretary of the Civil Service Commission be called upon to perform only those duties which are peculiarly those of the secretary. The present secretary of the Civil Service Commission is one of the oldest employees in the civil service, in point of years of service, and during the years that he has been in his present position a practice has grown up of loading upon the secretary an enormous number of duties which are in no way related to the position. For example, all correspondence passes through his hands. Your committee can understand that it would be necessary for incoming correspondence to pass through the secretary's hands, but for the life of us we are unable to see why a query with respect to marks which some candidate made on examination should not be referred to the examination branch and replied to direct by the chief examiner. Again, recommendations of the organization branch with respect to matters of reorganization in departments or with respect to classification pass through the secretary's hands, apparently for his approval or disapproval—matters which surely are entirely within the judgment of the Civil Service Commission. Therefore, in order to relieve this very worthy official of onerous duties which it is unnecessary for him to perform, we recommend to the commission the consideration of the change as suggested in the report.

Clause 20 of the report recommends that there be added to the committees of this house a select special committee on civil service matters. Time was not available to the members of your committee to introduce in evidence before the committee many files which some of us had read and from which it would appear that there were departmental abuses of the competitive merit system, as well as any which may have occurred in the administration of the civil service.

Temporary appointments are obtained on the requisition of a department in cases where, in my opinion, there was not in the beginning a bona fide intention that the employment should be temporary. By requisitions of departments and by statements made accompanying each of these requisitions, the Civil Service Commission has been induced from time to time to extend and extend temporary certificates. At the moment I have in mind a case in one department where a young lady had been occupying the position of clerk, grade 3, for upwards of a year. Finally, when the commission insisted that there must be an open competition, the department said, "Very well, hold it." They held a competition, but the young lady who had been in that temporary position ranked second. So then, after much correspondence and delay, the department had this position reclassified and the young lady who had originally held one classified position for upwards of a year was immediately re-appointed temporarily to the new classification, though really doing the same work in the same department for the same pay and under exactly the same conditions.

Your committee did not have time to deal with many of these phases of the matter, but we believe that if there were each year a select special committee of this house sitting in review upon matters such as I have outlined, we should then have taken a great step in curtailing any abuses which may exist in the present competitive merit system.

I come next to clause 25, in which your committee recommend that the orders in council therein specified be amended so as to exempt from the operation of the Civil Service Act the appointment of postmasters in revenue post offices where the revenue does not exceed $3,000 per annum. I know of no better way in which I can illustrate to this house things which have occurred with respect to the appointment of postmasters than to cite three of the many illustrations which hon. members may find in this evidence, if they care to peruse it. In 1926, for example, there was a vacancy for a postmaster at St. Arsene in the constituency of Témiscouata, province of Quebec. Under the system then in existence—it has since been changed slightly—the district superintendent or inspector of the Post Office Department was temporarily absorbed as an official of the Civil Service Commission. This poor, unfortunate man who may be totally unfamiliar with any particular locality or the residents thereof is called upon to go out and interview a number of persons who may be applicants for a position, then to come back and make a recommendation not to the Civil Service Commission, bear in mind, although he is their official, but to the Post Office Department, as to how he rates those individuals in order of merit, from a post office standpoint.

Recently the system has been slightly changed. In the old days he used to say, "I rate them as follows: John Jones, Bill Smith and William Brown." Now they have imposed upon the poor man a much more onerous duty in which he must rate them by marks. He is called upon to go out and interview six, eight or ten men he has never seen before; he may have to conduct his interviews in the space of two hours, and must give marks. Hon. members may observe that the marks are 90, 87, 85, 83 and so on all down the line.

The inspector had to make a report with respect to the appointment of St. Arsene, and he did so. When he made his report he recommended as first in order of merit Mrs. Roy, the widow of the former postmaster, secondly Mr. Laforest and thirdly Mr. Rioux. He also pointed out that in the case of Mr. Laforest's appointment there would be a decrease in the cost of postal service to the government of $91.42 per annum, but that in the event of Mr. Rioux' appointment there would be an increase in the cost amounting to $60.95 per annum, a difference of approximately $150. The post office inspector further reported that the location offered by the second man in order of merit, Mr. Laforest, was a more central and a better location than that offered by Mr. Rioux. Mrs. Roy—or probably the better French pronunciation would be "Roi"—was disqualified for good and sufficient reasons, as appeared from the evidence. However instead of Mr. Laforest, who was rated second in order of merit, getting the appointment, the appointment of Rioux was made by Commissioners Tremblay and MacTavish by a majority decision from which the chairman of the commission dissented.

I think it might be well if I read to the house the decision of the chairman of the commission in dealing with that particular case. He said:

> As Laforest has been placed second in order of merit and his site reported more central than Rioux,' the former costing the department less at present and the latter costing more, his education and experience being, to say the least, equally good with Rioux, I am in favour of Laforest's appointment.

Naturally your committee sought if possible to find a reason for this appointment. I do not know whether or not we have succeeded, but from a letter on the file I found that the then Postmaster General, long before the Civil Service Commission had received the report of the post office inspector upon which their judgment should be based, in writing to the Civil Service Commission said:

> As the other two applicants appear to have equal ratings, may I suggest that E. Rioux would seem to meet the wishes of the people there, according to recommendations received.

Then we find on the file another letter written by a reverend gentleman apparently to the Postmaster General, but finding its way to the files of the Civil Service Commission. In it is the following paragraph:

With my excellent friend, Mr. Jean Francois Pouliot, member of parliament for this county, I have recommended to yourself and to Mr. J. Emile Tremblay, a member of the Civil Service Commission, the immediate nomination of Mr. Ed. Rioux as acting postmaster.

In endeavouring to justify his judgment in that case before your committee Commissioner MacTavish told us he favoured the appointment of the second man over the first in order of merit because of the age of Mr. Laforest. However if hon. members would turn to the file of the Civil Service Commission with respect to the appointment of a postmaster at Belwood they would find that in that case Commissioners MacTavish and Tremblay appointed a man 71 years of age, although Laforest's age was only 60 years.

I must hasten on, and shall not take time to deal with the details of those appointments. Commissioner MacTavish attempted to justify that appointment on the ground that there had been a petition on the file in favour of Mr. White at Belwood signed by patrons of the post office. On examination of that petition we found it was signed by 19 persons. Then if hon. members would turn in the evidence to a record of the appointment of a postmaster at East Broughton Station they would find that Commissioners MacTavish and Tremblay recommended in that case the appointment of a man, whereas the other one whom Dr. Roche favoured had a petition filed in his favour signed by 500 patrons of that particular post office.

In view of comments which have been made with respect to this recommendation I think it would be well for me to read the dissenting judgment of the gentleman who was chairman of the commission. He says:

It does not require varied experience for the postmastership of East Broughton Station.

The reference there was to the fact that the man Dr. Roche favoured had had three years' experience. He continues:

Post office experience has always been emphasized by the department as entitling an applicant to preferential consideration. This is one of a number of instances where the order of merit appears difficult to explain except by the fact that the M.P. for the constituency has recommended the applicant who has been placed first. Mr. Vachon who has been assistant postmaster of this office for the last three years and who apparently is "persona grata" with the patrons of the office as evidenced by the petition of 500 in his favour, is in my opinion, entitled to the position.

If hon. members would like further illustrations the record of evidence filed with the committee's report is replete with them.

The next thing I should like to call to the attention of the house in connection with the appointment of postmasters is the recommendation of officials of the Post Office Department to your committee. We had the advantage of having before us Mr. Coolican, Assistant Deputy Postmaster General, and E. J. Underwood, superintendent of post offices for Canada. I cannot take time to read to the house in detail excerpts from the evidence, but if I may paraphrase and at the same time attempt to make a synopsis of it, it is as follows:

Revenue postmasters are not properly described as civil servants. A revenue postmaster has no superannuation, and does not necessarily do the work for which he is paid. He gets an assistant to do it, and he is not paid from parliamentary appropriations. I do not think it was ever intended that revenue postmasters should be under the civil service. . . . The above principle was recognized by past civil service commissions in that they recommended that revenue postmasters in offices with a revenue of less than $400 be exempt. . . . I say the postmaster up to that point ($3,000 or $3,500) should be removed from the Civil Service Commission. In the matter of appointments they are civil servants, in all other respects they are not. It is impracticable to appoint all these postmasters by present methods.

I still read from the views of those officials:

It is not economical to appoint revenue postmasters under the present system and it involves a large expenditure of money.

Then there came before your committee representatives of the Canadian Postmasters' Association of Canada.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member may continue by consent.

Mr. POULIOT: We have no objection to his continuing.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

Mr. LAWSON: If I may have the unanimous consent of the house, I shall endeavour to be very brief, because I have only one or two other matters to which I desire to refer. The representatives of the Canadian Postmasters' Association came before your committee. Of course, let me make it quite clear that they were not asking that revenue postmasters be taken, so far as appointment is concerned, from under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission, but they pointed out to us that their status had been ill defined; that their position was an anomalous one, and in an attempt to rectify it, they asked us to make them full-fledged civil servants where they were appointees to revenue offices in excess of $3,000. For the reasons I have above outlined, your committee recommended that the appointment of postmasters to revenue offices, having a revenue of less than $3,000, be made by the Postmaster General. Some will say that this is a return to patronage. I say: Better far a return to patronage, if that be patronage, than a continuation of rank hyprocrisy in respect to the way in which these postmasters have been appointed. One section of the press says that if this house approves this clause of the report, it will mean entering the thin edge of the wedge which will ultimately open wide the flood-gates for the tide of political patronage. I say that in my opinion if you adopt this clause of the report, you are plucking from the thigh of the merit system an infected thorn, which infection has already to some extent undermined public confidence in this country and which ultimately, if not removed, will destroy the merit system.

I should like to quote just for a moment from a book written by Robert Moses who, I think, is recognized as an authority on the British civil service. In 1914 he published a book entitled the history of the civil service of Great Britain. I read just one short paragraph because I think it is most applicable to the subject under discussion:

> No one in England dreams of reverting to patronage now. Competition is the general rule; but time has shown that open competition is not feasible in some departments, for example, for lower situations where merely physical qualifications are necessary or for higher positions where proved technical skill or business experience are requisites.

In that statement I heartily concur.

Mr. MARCIL: Why was not the same principle recommended in connection with the outside service in the various other departments as was recommended in the case of the Post Office Department? Why did the committee not bring up that phase of the question? Why should the employees in the other outside service not be treated in the same way as those in the Post Office Department?

Mr. LAWSON: I am prepared to answer that question. I thought I had taken some pains to point out, briefly, it is true, that postmasters were in no sense civil servants, nor have they had any of the benefits of the Civil Service Act or the Superannuation Act and so on. Postmasters have never been considered as civil servants. Had this committee brought in a recommendation in favour of the exemption of lower positions that require merely physical exertion, I am sure all hon. members can well imagine the protests there would have been to high heaven about the introduction of the evils of the patronage system.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. gentleman has stated that rural postmasters in offices with a revenue under $3,000 have not had the benefits of the Civil Service Act. Have they not had the benefits of the section 29 of the act providing that returned soldiers shall have preference in connection with those appointments?

Mr. LAWSON: Rural postmasters have had no benefits whatever under the Civil Service Act except the doubtful benefit of appointment by the commission. It is true that section 29 of the Civil Service Act provides a preference for returned soldiers, but if the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) will read the order in council passed in 1922, P.C. 1053, and the amending order in council passed in 1929, P.C. 1751, he will find that they make provision for the preservation of the returned soldier preference, and the change in these orders in council as recommended by the committee would in no way interfere with the returned soldier preference.

With the permission of the house I should like for a few moments to deal with section 26 of the report wherein your committee recommended the retirement of the present commission. The Hon. Doctor Roche, chairman of the commission, is an honourable gentleman who has long served the public of this country as their representative in the House of Commons. Subsequently thereto he has given, so far as your committee have been able to observe, faithful, efficient and diligent service for fifteen years as a civil service commissioner of Canada. He has brought to that position a high sense of responsibility; but whether we like it or not, increasing years are bound to bring about a degree of physical disability which gradually saps one of that dynamic force and mental alertness which are necessary to guide the destiny of this great machine of civil service which has something over 45,000 employees. Because of the age which that honourable gentleman has reached, because of the fact that the statute now provides that all appointees to the commission, other than himself because his appointment preceded the statute, be retired at the age of sixty-five years, your committee made a recommendation for his retirement. Coupled with that is a recommendation that there should be given to him as an expression of appreciation of the service he has rendered to this country an honorarium or gratuity.

With respect to the other two commissioners, the three instances I have brought to the attention of this house I think will justify this house in coming to the conclusion that neither of those two gentlemen possesses the qualities of judicial determination which are necessary for the high office of a civil service commissioner. Suffice it to say that because of the evidence adduced before us, because of opportunity we had of observing the character and demeanour of these two gentlemen, we deemed it advisable in the interests of the reorganization of this commission that they too should be retired. One of these gentlemen, Commissioner Tremblay, served faithfully and well for a number of years in the civil service of Canada prior to his appointment as commissioner. Both may be able, probably are able, in some other field of activity, and both have family responsibilities. In view of the facts that I have just outlined we recommend that with their dismissal there be paid to each of these gentlemen a gratuity.

It was not to be hoped, even though the report of the committee was unanimous, that it might meet with the unanimous approval of this house. We have endeavoured as a committee conscientiously to perform the duty and task which the house assigned to us and in the hope that our recommendations may meet with the approval of a substantial majority in this house I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Plunkett), that the second report of the special committee on the civil service and the Civil Service Act be concurred in.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I have but few remarks to make in connection with this report, but I feel that I owe it to myself and to my adherence to the Civil Service Act for many years to make them.

Taken as a whole it is my belief that this report has not strengthened the Civil Service Act nor has it added support to the merit principle, but on the contrary has in a large measure weakened both. It has not, for example, recommended the inclusion under the operation of the act of those branches of departments that are now excluded, such as the income tax branch, customs appraisers, and so on, and to that extent it is in my opinion a weak report.

Many of the recommendations are worthy ones, but most of them deal with mere technical or routine procedure. The principal changes recommended are, of course, the retirement of the civil service commissioners and the adjustments with regard to postmasters. With respect to the first I have nothing but the strongest approval of the recommendation of the committee. I have long felt from information at my disposal that action of this kind should have been taken, and I am in hearty agreement with the recommendation in that respect. I do wish, however, that the report had embodied the recommendation to replace the three-men commission with a one-man commission. I seriously believe that in the operation of an act of this character, if one has a good, strong capable man who retains public confidence, it is more likely that the act will be administered with the least possible friction and the least danger of encroachment.

In the matter of the postmasters, however, I find myself in serious disagreement with the recommendation of the committee in the main. The chairman (Mr. Lawson), who has just concluded an eloquent and excellent speech based on his report, offered as an explanation for the action of the committee several reasons. He cited three cases of appointments to post office positions which were of a questionable character. With his criticism of the method of those appointments I take no issue, but may I submit to him with all deference that the fault in those cases did not lie in the merit principle nor in the Civil Service Act, but in the venal character of the commissioners who administered the act; that is all, and the chairman proved nothing else but that the two commissioners to whom he referred, Tremblay and MacTavish, were actually guilty of violating the merit principle in making the appointments in the three cases he cited. He proved nothing beyond that by the citation of those particular cases. He then proceeded to say that the recommendations of the officials were to the effect that after all the revenue post office positions were not in the same class or category with the positions of the civil servants proper, and they therefore suggested that postmasters up to three thousand dollars should be exempt from the Civil Service Act. May I submit that if their contention is correct, if the principle enunciated is sound, it should apply to all postmasters, and not merely up to the three thousand class. On the other hand, if the principle is unsound, and I presume it is unsound or the committee would not recommend that the occupants of the higher positions should be made permanent civil servants with all the privileges and attributes of what the chairman himself described as a fully fledged civil servant, they would hardly have made that recommendation in the case of the higher salaried postmasters. If the principle be sound in the case of the higher salaried postmasters, is it not equally sound in the case of the lower salaried postmasters?

Mr. LAWSON: May I interrupt my hon. friend for a moment? I know him so well I know that he would not want to base his argument on incomplete information. The officials of the Post Office Department, as is disclosed by the record, indicated that with respect to postmasters in offices where the revenue is in excess of three thousand dollars, it was their intention to have them made civil servants on straight salary and no longer the incumbents of revenue offices.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I cannot see any reason why we should deviate from the merit principle. If it be sound in the case of the higher salaried post offices, it is equally tenable in the case of the lower revenue post offices. I cannot for the life of me differentiate at this moment as between the two classes, and frankly, in my opinion, the report of the committee is distinctly weak in that regard. I am personally opposed to any further extension of the system of patronage, and I feel that most of the hon. members in this corner of the house and many others on both sides of the house share my views in this matter. Those who have the obligation, the questionable pleasure, of administering patronage, will now have some additional seven thousand jobs to distribute. It will be to their everlasting discomfort that they have that privilege, and since the government has the majority of the members on that committee the government must take the larger share of the responsibility for this violation of the merit principle, and unquestionably for the possibility of endangering the whole principle of the act by commencing this retrograde movement. I objected some years ago to the orders in council passed by the late government excluding certain minor positions, day workers and so on, from the operation of the act. My objections are even more strenuous against positions of this kind being excluded. I am in complete accord with the suggestion of the postmasters' association that all postmasters should be completely subject to the merit system and completely enrolled within the ranks of civil servants, and that they should by virtue of their positions carry with them all the privileges of civil servants.

Therefore with regard to the second part of recommendation No. 25 I am in accord, but with regard to the first part to which I have referred, the exclusion from the operation of the act of postmasters in revenue post offices where the revenue does not exceed $3,000 per annum, I am in disagreement. So I move:

That this report be not now concurred in, but that it be referred back to the committee with power to amend by striking out the first six lines of recommendation No. 25 of the said report.

Mr. MITCHELL: I second the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: As written this motion is entirely unintelligible.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: It is customary for members to address the house alternately from each side.

Mr. POULIOT: But no Liberal members have yet addressed the house.

Mr. J. L. BOWMAN (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, rising to speak briefly in support of the motion for adoption of the report, I wish first to express my very great pleasure on having been chosen a member of this somewhat important committee. That pleasure became greater as the work of the committee proceeded and it became apparent that the members intended to treat the evidence from a strictly impartial and non-partisan viewpoint. I think the very cordial feeling which existed throughout all our proceedings and which resulted in the presentation of this unanimous report is to be attributed in very large measure to the tact, good judgment and diligence of the chairman of the committee.

Throughout the proceedings I was particularly impressed by the very high type of civil servants and the able representatives of the various civil service organizations and the war veterans' association who appeared before the committee. The lucid and logical manner in which they presented their evidence created a most favourable impression.

My purpose this afternoon is to deal briefly with the major finding of the committee, that is, that the commissioners be retired. The retirement of those gentlemen will give the government of the day an opportunity to wipe the slate clean and start over again. The chairman has given to the house a full history of what led up to the Civil Service Act of 1918, which was subsequently amended by the act of 1927. It is with respect to the period from 1918 down to the present time that I propose to address my remarks. It is quite true that perhaps the findings of the committee as a whole do not meet with approval of everyone. That was to be expected. Nevertheless I think it speaks well for the manner in which the committee approached their work that, although composed of four Conservatives, two Liberals and a Labour member, they were unanimous in coming to the conclusion that the heads of the Civil Service Commission should be retired. Up to the time of the Civil Service Act of 1918 we did have a period when political patronage governed appointments to the civil service, and from that year down to the present time it may be said that we have been going through a transition period. The chairman has pointed out the immense power of those having, wholly or partially, jurisdiction over some 45,000 civil servants drawing in salaries every month in the neighbourhood of $7,895,000. I find that in 1919 when the present Civil Service Commission was appointed the salaries of the commissioners were fixed at $7,000 for the chairman, and $6,000 each for his two associates. It does seem to me that then and there a mistake was made, and that that mistake has not been rectified down to the present time. I contend that the salaries paid at that time were entirely inadequate to get the type of men needed to administer the affairs of this commission, which as I have said, has partial or total control over the whole civil service. At that time it must be borne in mind, too, that the more important positions on the staff were filled at very low salaries. We find the chief examiner with an initial salary of $2,050, that the initial salaries of other examiners were from $1,800 to $1,850, and that the salaries for investigators in the organization branch were as low as $1,320. These were the salaries of the staff of a commission having jurisdiction over the civil service wherein the salaries of deputy ministers ran from $9,000 up to $12,000 a year, and in one case as high as $15,000, and the salaries in the higher branches of the various government departments ranged from $4,000 up to $6,000 a year. Yet at the inception of the commission it was attempted to appoint men at the salaries to which I have referred—men who were to have authority over the civil service. Bearing in mind that this commission and its staff have charge of appointments, promotions, classifications, organizations and reorganizations throughout the whole of the civil service, one would at least expect that the qualifications of the heads of that commission, and those occupying the higher positions in the staff, would be at least as great as if not greater than those required of the people over whom they exercise control. This is one of the reasons to which I attribute the fact that, to some measure at least, the merit system was not given full force and effect from 1918 or 1919 to the present time. I am quite willing to admit that while many of these positions were filled at low salaries, with the experience subsequently gained they have given many valuable men to the commission, but these men have been educated and developed to fill the positions they now occupy, to some extent at least, at the expense of the public service.

Now we come to 1926, when two of the commissioners, Mr. Jameson and Mr. Larochelle, were retired for reasons which are familiar to every hon. member. Later two new commissioners were appointed, Mr. Tremblay and Mr. MacTavish. Shortly after the appointment of these gentlemen an investigation was held into the staff of the commission by two subordinate officials of the commission itself, and from that investigation resulted what was known as the Kemmis and Simmons report. In connection with that investigation I want to point out that Mr. MacTavish and Mr. Tremblay, the two new commissioners appointed, had so little experience that they determined that the proper way to have an investigation into their own staff was not to have it undertaken by the heads of the departments but by two subordinate members of the staff, and the very fact that this investigation was held at that time indicated to me that from the very beginning these gentlemen were not the type or calibre of men that should have been appointed to the positions of junior commissioners. We had many instances brought before us where the commissioners differed, and where there were adverse findings. Then we come down to about a year or so ago, when we had the Bouchard trial and disclosures, and coming to the investigations of this committee, we have now recommended the retirement of these gentlemen.

In that connection I do not wish to do more than quote from an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen under date of April 9, 1932. Speaking of the commission, the editorial states:

> The machinery is devised to give Canada an efficient civil service free from patronage interference. The present weakness is in the controlling hands on the machinery.
> The chairman of the Civil Service Commission, Hon. W. J. Roche, is generally trusted throughout the country. As a cabinet minister in Sir Robert Borden's administration, he had the respect of members on both sides of parliament.

I should say that this respect has continued throughout his entire career. I think all hon. members will agree that Doctor Roche is a gentleman of the highest character. The editorial proceeds:

It is absurd, however, to pretend that the other commissioners, Messrs. Newton MacTavish and J. E. Tremblay, have any such standing in public esteem or any such claim to the confidence of the country in the administration of the merit system. They were appointed without any record of service in public life or of outstanding administrative experience.

It is hardly surprising that members of parliament, cabinet ministers and deputy ministers are dissatisfied with such an exercise of authority by commissioners of very limited experience. Until this weakness at the head is corrected, general dissatisfaction will very likely tend to grow in volume.

With those sentiments I am in entire accord. In another editorial appearing in the Ottawa Citizen of April 15, 1932, we have the following remarks with regard to the Civil Service Commission:

The merit system is evidently being abused. The obvious weakness is in the absence of merit in some of the very positions where it is most needed, namely, on the board responsible for the administration of the Civil Service Act.

No matter how the law may be amended, it is liable to fail in the hands of incompetent commissioners. The present act has, on the whole, stood up well under a severe test for twelve years or more. It has been commended by authorities on civil service administration in other countries as one of the most advanced.

Hon. members of the house will note that while we have made a number of recommendations they are really minor in character and do not affect the merit principle or the main features of the act itself.

Undoubtedly it meant a real step forward for the merit system in Canada. Where it has appeared to fall short has been invariably due to faulty administration.

It is hardly surprising to find members of parliament restless when they know of undoubted instances of patronage of another form, even more demoralizing than political patronage, in the civil service. When members exercise patronage, at least they have to take the responsibility for it in the eyes of constituents. They can be held accountable in the next election.

When patronage is allowed by the Civil Service Commission, under an outside influence, fraud is being perpetrated on the public. The people of Canada are led to believe that positions are filled entirely on merit after an impartial examination of applicants, when it is notorious that methods of evading the law are countenanced.

Further on the editorial states:

It may be found that the Civil Service Act can be improved by some minor amendments, but improvement is most needed in the administration of the act. There has been a marked decline in public confidence in the Civil Service Commission, particularly in recent years. The remedy is to appoint commissioners whose standing in the country is calculated to restore public confidence as well as to gain the confidence of the civil service.

Again I say I am in complete accord with the views expressed in that editorial.

It must be borne in mind by all hon. members of the house that if the Civil Service Commission and its staff are to accomplish the work for which the commission was set up, there must be mutual respect and confidence as between the commission and its staff and the various departments of the public service. That mutual respect and confidence can be obtained only when the commissioners are men of high character, undoubted integrity and some administrative and executive ability. It does seem to me that during this transition period, if there has been any fault to be found with the commission and its work it has been due to weakness at the head and, because of that, perhaps weakness through the staff.

My principal object in saying anything at all at this time is to impress this view upon the government and respectfully to suggest that in appointing commissioners to take the places of those being retired they bear in mind the great importance of this commission and its staff, and see to it that men of character, of integrity and of the highest possible administrative and executive ability are appointed to these positions.

Consider these facts: that two years ago there was appointed a grain commission in western Canada, the chairman of which was paid a salary of $12,000; that two junior commissioners were paid $10,000 each; that each of the commissioners in the four western provinces receives either $7,000 or $7,500, I forget which; and that in Ontario there was paid to the chairman of the Liquor Control Commission a salary of $20,000 per annum, which I understand is to be reduced now to $10,000 to the present chairman, and then consider that we have been expecting during the last ten years to obtain from a commission receiving the salaries I have mentioned, of $7,000 and $6,000, men to control vastly more important offices and to discharge more important duties than either of these other commissions, though, of course, one must admit that the grain commission is of great importance.

I do not intend to say more than this in conclusion. I do respectfully submit to the government of the day, and I do so in confidence, knowing the great business ability of the present Prime Minister, that in the first place the new commissioners should be given salaries commensurate with the positions they are to occupy, and secondly, that in the choice of commissioners men of outstanding character and integrity, men of marked administrative and executive ability should be sought. I submit that if this were done many of the troubles respecting the administration of the Civil Service Act and the civil service would eliminate themselves or be eliminated in a brief period of time.

During the proceedings of the committee evidence was given to the effect that often the procedure was quite circuitous and that there was a good deal of red tape. Well, that is all a matter of administration. With a strong man at the head of the commission and one or two capable junior commissioners, as the case might be, that would soon be overcome. It was established before the committee that there was much overlapping and overmanning in the service. Again, I am of the opinion that with a strong commission and an efficient staff that could be obviated. And may I point out that it would not necessarily result in throwing out of employment any number of the civil servants of Canada. I was surprised to learn that approximately ten per cent of the service retired annually from natural causes such as death, marriage, resignation, and so forth. The holding-up of appointments for a couple of years would mean that there would be nine or ten thousand vacancies to fill, which surely should afford considerable scope for cutting down any overlapping or overmanning that might exist. The same with respect to the amalgamation or merging of different sub-departments of the public service. With a strong commission and an efficient staff having the confidence of and working in close cooperation with the deputy heads of the service—for this is most important—there would soon be remedied any duplication of services such as we find at the present time. So in the matter of reorganization. The head of the organization branch stated that there had been no reclassification to any substantial extent in the service since 1921, that the work should be undertaken at the present time and in this connection the statement was made that with the staff he had it would take him about a year and a half or two years to do this work, which was now overdue. That practically concludes what I have to say.

I do not intend to refer particularly to the matter of postmasters but I would call attention to page 454 of the evidence where Mr. Coolican makes the following statement in answer to a question by myself:

> Q. You think, Mr. Coolican, that that would lessen a lot of the difficulties?—A. Yes, I think it would, and the result would be just as good.

And at page 455, he makes this statement:

> I think the same good results could be obtained in these cases over $400.

Similar remarks were made by Mr. Underwood at page 463. It must, of course, be borne in mind, indeed it must be perfectly clear to hon. members, that there was some give and take in order to enable us to arrive at a unanimous report. Perhaps the report itself is not perfect and does not meet with the approval of all hon. members; nevertheless I do say that in arriving at a unanimous decision to retire the present commissioners, and to submit to the house a recommendation that men of the right calibre and standing in the community be appointed to succeed them, the committee have accomplished at least some small measure of good.

Mr. SPEAKER: When the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) was speaking to the motion for the adoption of the report, he proposed an amendment, but inasmuch as it was not in writing at the time, I was unable to submit it to the house. The amendment having been since reduced to writing, I will read it. It is moved by Mr. Garland (Bow River) and seconded by Mr. Mitchell:

> That the report be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the committee with instructions to delete the first six lines of recommendation No. 25 from the word "from" to the word "annum."

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): I had not in the least intended to take part in the discussion this afternoon, particularly in view of the fact that the report submitted by the chairman to the house was unanimous, and also in view of the fact, as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Bowman) pointed out, that there had been considerable give and take in order to arrive at that unanimity. If there is one thing that has somewhat disturbed my feelings it is the fact that the hon. gentleman who presided with distinction over the meetings of the committee should have seen fit to depart somewhat from the line of conduct which I had thought he would adopt on this occasion. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, you can appreciate my rising at the present time.

I do not think there is a member of this hon. house who will doubt my sincerity in relation to the merit system in the civil service of Canada. It was my privilege away back in 1923 to sit as a member of the committee of that day which, during three months, investigated the affairs of the civil service, and if I take away from this House of Commons nothing else, after the years I sat here, I shall have the satisfaction I derive from my own original draft of the report of that day. I read from my draft the following:

Your committee is of the opinion that the two fundamental principles of the Civil Service Act are the merit system and the system of appointment by competitive examination, and that both these principles must be preserved.

Turning to the Malcolm report, I find at page XIV these words:

Your committee is of the opinion that the two fundamental principles of the Civil Service Act are the merit system and the system of appointment by competitive examination, and that both these principles must be preserved.

If anybody wishes to compare my own draft with the report submitted in those days I do not think he will find very much difference between the two. The hon. member who was chairman of the present committee, I am sorry to say has referred to the evidence, although I think such reference was not necessary. Probably he has turned to the evidence with a view to justifying certain things done by the committee. Special reference was made by him to the St. Arsene case. I do not wish to go fully into the evidence, but if hon. members were at all interested they would find that the chairman of the commission decided one way, and that the two remaining commissioners, Messrs. Tremblay and MacTavish, decided another way. Wide indeed as they were, I doubt very much the powers of the committee to investigate the use of discretionary powers, vested in these officials. If there is a case where the commissioners had a right to exercise these discretionary and statutory powers, certainly it was in this case. I challenge anyone to say that in the exercise of these wide powers these two men did not exercise their powers in a way befitting their positions. Throughout the whole of the evidence it was revealed that whatever they did was amply justified. That is borne out in this case by a letter from Mr. Coolican, assistant deputy postmaster general, which I had placed on record, and which sums up the proceedings in the year 1927 as to who between Laforest and Rioux should have been appointed. The letter is to this effect:

The Secretary,
Civil Service Commission,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Re: St. Arsene

Dear Sir,—

Referring to previous correspondence regarding the vacant postmastership at St. Arsene, Que., your file 37614, permit me to inform you that the matter has again been brought to the attention of the department.

It is noted that the office has been in the temporary charge of Mr. Edmond Rioux for a long time, or more exactly since the 11th November last, and that no complaints have since been received against his management.

It is also noted that there is very little to choose between the different candidates and, under the circumstances, considering the satisfactory management of the acting postmaster, it seems that the interest of the service would be well served if he were confirmed in his position.

The department would be pleased to have a certificate in this case as soon as possible.

That letter was filed simply to show that one man of a certain age rather than of another age had been appointed. Great stress was laid upon the fact, and the commissioners were blamed for appointing one man younger by some years than another. I hesitate to bring out these facts, because I thought it would not be necessary to do so. I do not like to refer to the Belwood post office, but I find it necessary to do so. The chairman of the committee produced the file, not upon the demand of the committee but upon the suggestion of some person. It showed that a Mr. White, 71 years of age had been appointed upon the recommendations of Messrs. Tremblay and MacTavish, Dr. Roche dissenting. What were the facts? The superintendent of post offices had recommended the appointment of this gentleman because of his very special qualifications, and the superintendent had made no recommendation with respect to Mr. Bellamy who was No. 2 in order of merit. Dr. Roche, in the exercise of his discretionary powers—and with those powers I have no quarrel—recommended the appointment of Mr. Bellamy. The other two commissioners upon the recommendation of the superintendent of post offices, with whose discretionary powers again I have no quarrel, decided that a gentleman, seventy-one years of age, in good health and well able to carry on should have the position. It seems to me we are simply quibbling with facts. I was about to say that it was not within the high office or dignity of such a committee to delve into matters of such futile importance. For that reason probably this discussion should not have taken place.

I come now to the matter of exempting rural post offices. It was with great diffidence that some members of the committee allowed the exemption. I am not here to say who the members were, but I think my opening remarks might give hon. members some indication. If an exemption was made, it was because of two reasons, and two only. One of the reasons was that two very high officials of the Post Office Department, Mr. Underwood and Mr. Coolican, of their own volition, so far as I am aware, came before the committee and made the recommendation that these positions should hereafter be filled by the Post Office Department itself. The evidence in this connection is very lengthy, but I should like to refer hon. members to page 454, where the following is found:

By Mr. Chevrier:

Q. Are you prepared to say what that would equal in salary?—A. No. That would require some thought; but if you put the salary of a postmaster at, say, the maximum of a postal clerk, plus that of an assistant, or some other grade in the Civil Service, you would arrive at a near figure.

Q. The maximum of a postal clerk, $1,740?—A. Yes.

By Mr. Bowman:

Q. I suppose a fair salary to these people might run around $90 or $100 a month?—A. Yes, we could make a definite allowance to the postmaster and from that he would pay his assistant.

Q. You think, Mr. Coolican, that that would lessen a lot of the difficulties?—A. Yes, I think it would, and the result would be just as good.

By Mr. Chevrier:

Q. These men would be named under the recommendation of the departmental officers?—A. Yes. We could arrange a procedure of inquiry the same as is done now.

"The same as is done now" is under order in council P.C. 1053 providing that the soldier preference must be respected. I continue:

From a business point of view—

This is a question I asked.

—it might be all right, but how would that come in with the merit system?—A. In these appointments of postmasters you are not observing the merit system. The very returned soldier preference is a legal violation of the merit system. You have many things to consider with regard to public service.

Mr. VENIOT: What class of postmasters was under consideration there?

Mr. CHEVRIER: These were postmasters in the class up to $400 revenue who heretofore were not under the operation of the Civil Service Act. The question arose as to how they could best be appointed. It was shown conclusively in evidence that the representatives of the Post Office Department went down and interviewed the applicants.

Mr. VENIOT: Not under $400; above $400.

Mr. CHEVRIER: For the time being these departmental officials were considered to be officers of the Civil Service Commission. They made an investigation in their own way; they then reported to the department, and it is in evidence that ninety-nine times out of 100 their recommendations were accepted by the commission, as I say, for the time being the inspector being considered as one of their own men; the commission simply accepted the recommendation of the departmental official.

Mr. VENIOT: The question that was under discussion at the time was about salaries from $90 to $100 a month. That is what the evidence shows.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That was not the gist of the matter, as nobody knows better than my hon. friend.

Mr. VENIOT: We want to know what took place.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am reading at page 459 where Mr. Underwood is giving evidence:

As Mr. Coolican explained we hardly think that it was the original intention to bring the rural postmaster under the Civil Service Act, and the reason is this: Take the first reason, the question of appointments. Now, the commission themselves have made certain exceptions. They passed an order in council making certain exceptions. Take an office of $150 revenue; I think it pays 75 per cent compensation. It is hardly worth while to put a man in there for a revenue of $75 a year. In the second place, had there been any intention of putting the revenue postmasters under the Civil Service Act surely some provision in the Civil Service Act would be there to take care of them. You will not find any provision in the Civil Service Act regarding revenue postmasters. Certain benefits are given them, the benefit of the annual leave, sick leave, superannuation and so on. The Civil Service Act states that the salary range of the civil servant shall be a minimum and maximum but you cannot give a revenue postmaster minimum and maximum range. I do not think it was the intention to place the whole of the rural or revenue postmasters under the Civil Service Act.

Q. Now, would you endorse what Mr. Coolican said about the amount of salaries?—A. I think he was a little high.

This was probably on what the whole discussion was founded.

Q. What is your personal opinion?—A. My personal opinion—

And it must be remembered that the men giving evidence were some of the highest officials in the Post Office Department.

—would be somewhere around $3,000 or $3,500.

Mr. Coolican said $4,000.

We always express our own individual views. The reason is this,—

This is where the hon. gentleman will get his information:

If you take $3,000 on the scale I have given you, you will find on the first $1,000 there is about $700 compensation. That is 70 per cent.

Then you have $2,000 at 30 per cent, which is $600. That makes $1,300 total without the other allowances. Generally speaking, I think you might take it as a general rule that the total amount of that office would be $1,500 or thereabouts, $1,500 compensation. In an office of that size we would have to have one assistant. I do not say he would be full time. I figure that would allow $500 for his assistant and possibly for incidental expenses, so that he will have $1,000 for commission. The minimum salary of a postal helper is $1,020 a year, therefore I assume it is logical to pay a postmaster who is just coming into the office the same salary as you would that employee who is just commencing his career. There must be an arbitrary line somewhere and that is the reason I say $3,000. I may be a little low.

Mr. Coolican says that it should be a little higher. Then Mr. MacInnis asked a question:

Q. Do you think it would be any advantage to have a revenue postmaster, paid that amount of revenue, excluded from the Civil Service Act?—A. I say the postmaster up to that point should be removed from the Civil Service Commission. In the matter of appointments they are civil servants. It is the impracticability of appointing all these postmasters.

In other words, it is not practicable to appoint them. That was why some of us with great diffidence took the advice of the executive officers of the Post Office Department and decided to make the recommendation which is now found in the report. But those who were diffident in making that recommendation would have been much more so, and probably would not have made that recommendation, had it not been the intention of the committee at that time to insert in the report a recommendation that postmasters above the $3,000 revenue class should become full-fledged civil servants. I refer to recommendation No. 25, the last clause of which reads:

Your committee further recommends that such amendments be made to the Civil Service Act and/or the regulations thereunder of the Civil Service Commission so that postmasters hereafter appointed to revenue post offices having a revenue in excess of $3,000 per annum shall be within the full operation of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. RALSTON: Would my hon. friend permit a question for the sake of information? Would he suggest in what respect revenue postmasters above $400 are not under the Civil Service Act to-day?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Just as I think Mr. Underwood said, at no time were they.

Mr. RALSTON: Would my hon. friend look at the statute which defines the civil services and tell me where anybody gets that idea?

Mr. CHEVRIER: A civil servant is one who receives a certain salary and enjoys certain benefits. They were never taken in, for what reason I do not know. They never came within the definition of civil servant.

Mr. RALSTON: Not only were they always in and are under the statute to-day, but they had to be expressly excluded by the order in council P.C. 1053 referred to by the hon. member who moved the adoption of the report. They are under the Civil Service Act, but not under the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. CHEVRIER: They may be civil servants in one sense, but when my hon. friend says that they are civil servants, they are not civil servants in the full-fledged meaning of the term in that they do not enjoy superannuation.

Mr. RALSTON: That is another act altogether.

Mr. CHEVRIER: My hon. friend can explain it as he likes. I do not see to what he is leading. For the present we will take it that these people up to $400 are not within the operation of the act, that they were exempted. They are not under the operation of the act as the ordinary civil servant is.

Mr. LAVERGNE: They are doing civil service work but are not civil servants.

Mr. CHEVRIER: They are like a lot of others who caused the committee a lot of difficulty and as to whom the committee made recommendations, such as long-term temporaries.

The committee made this further recommendation that all those postmasters hereafter to be appointed where the revenue was above three thousand dollars should become fully fledged civil servants with full power to pay into the superannuation fund and to claim all other benefits accruing to regular civil servants. There was another reason why some members of the committee felt less diffident about making the recommendation to which I have just alluded, and that was that it was understood that the committee would make a recommendation for the appointment of a parliamentary committee to look into matters connected with the civil service every year. It was felt by those whom I have just mentioned, having in mind the very strong recommendation made by the departmental officers, that such a step would simplify the procedure, speed up appointments, and make for a better administration of the act, that it was probably well worth while taking the chance. It was not a radical departure in any sense from the merit system. It was based upon the recommendations of the departmental officials, which the commission accepted just as they were made, ninety-nine times out of a hundred.

The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Bowman) who preceded me quoted certain editorials. That was his privilege and was done in the exercise of his own discretion, but not a tittle, not a suspicion of anything that was mentioned in those editorials found its way into the record. There was nothing of the kind. There was nothing in the way of a want of mutual confidence, and there was nothing in the evidence submitted before the committee as to a lack of integrity or a lack of confidence on the part of the chairman or any of the other commissioners. True, it was a unanimous report, and the chairman well expressed it when he said that there was give and take in the committee. I for one would have much preferred if the opening remarks of the chairman had not led to this discussion.

Mr. LAWSON: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I feel that the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) is out of order. If I read correctly the effect of his amendment, which I have now before me, it amounts to a mandatory order to a committee of this house to change its report. I submit to you, sir, that such a mandatory order might be in order with respect to a bill which had been referred to a committee, some section of which might be referred back to the committee with a mandatory order of the house. But in the case of a special select committee to which a reference was made, the intention of which reference was clearly to vest in that committee discretion, I submit that the committee having exercised its discretion and its report being now before the house, the report cannot now be referred back to the committee with a mandatory order to the committee. I therefore submit that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. VENIOT: Speaking on the point of order, was not that done in the case of the customs investigation? The report was referred back to the committee with a mandatory order. The amendment was not ruled out of order in that case.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): On the point of order, my intention was very clear to those of us who are concerned in the amendment. We do not desire in any way to make it mandatory. We wish to have the amendment in the correct form if at all possible. The intention is simply to refer the report back to the committee with power to amend the report in a certain fashion. I suggest to the hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson) that in courtesy to the members of the house he do not persist in his point of order, if it be well taken.

Mr. LAWSON: I submit that it is not a matter of courtesy at all. It is a matter of the proceedings being correct or not, or in order or out of order, according to the rules of the house. I have no desire to be discourteous, but as chairman of the committee which was asked by the house to exercise a discretionary function I resent being sent back to the committee with a mandatory order.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Might not the end sought by the hon. member for Bow River be achieved if he were to amend his amendment and merely ask to strike out that clause? Certainly the house would have power to do that if it saw fit, and that would get over the difficulty of sending back the report at this late stage of the session.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): With ready willingness I accept the suggestion. It was only because of the fear that the house might not be willing to accept an amendment without referring back that I put the amendment in the form in which it is. With the consent of my seconder I am quite willing to accept the suggestion of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. SPEAKER: While the debate proceeds I will consider the point of order raised, and in the meantime the hon. member for Bow River can consider amending his amendment if he desires to.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The Minister of Justice has suggested, Mr. Speaker, that the form of the motion be simply a motion to amend by striking out from the report the first six lines of section twenty-five of the said report.

Mr. BENNETT: Being that part not concurred in.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am quite ready to accept that suggestion.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member for Bow River has a further amendment to suggest and will submit it, it can be considered. The action of the house might be to amend the report as it is or to send it back to the committee.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I do not intend to speak at any great length upon this matter, but I have a few observations to make in answer to what has been said by the chairman of the committee (Mr. Lawson). One day someone was making a noise while eating his soup and on attention being called to it a friend said, "Oh, well, he means well." No doubt that the chairman meant well when he spoke on the St. Arsène case. I was very much surprised that he referred to it at all. It would have been much better for him to ignore it, but as the matter has been brought up I wish to refer to it. I regret very much to have to mention what happened in the committee, and I wonder if the chairman and the vice-chairman of the committee got their inspiration from the hon. member for Long Lake (Mr. Cowan) when they were asking questions of the witnesses who appeared before them.

First a word as to the merit system. I wish to congratulate my good friend the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) upon his very excellent speech. In fact, he is the one amongst us who knows most about the merit system, and he told his colleagues on the committee who did not know anything about the merit system, with the exception of my hon. friend from South Battleford (Mr. Vallance), and a couple of others, what it was all about.

What happened about that case? It is very simple. Was there anything wrong about the 1926 appointment? No. Was there a report made? Yes. Who made it? Mr. S. Tanner Green, of Quebec, the man whom the former Postmaster General denounced in this house some time before his party took office. A man can do anything when he is asked to do that. That is the man who made the report. At whose instigation? At the request of Mr. Dubé, the defeated Tory candidate in Témiscouata county—although I do not blame him for having done it. Now let me refer to page 126 of reference No. 110:

December 29, 1930.

In 1926, when the old postmaster, Mr. J. W. Roy died, I recommended that the post office should be placed at Mr. Laforest's place.

Mr. Green made a report which was sent to the Postmaster General. That report is dated September 14, 1926. Because the man put one name under the other the chairman of the committee thought it was a rating; in fact no rating was given. The date of this report, September 14, 1926, is the very day of the general election, and the inspection had been made in the preceding month of August while the shadow government was in power.

[Mr. Speaker.]

In fact the gentleman whom I have named before—I will not name him again lest I give him too much advertising—went to see Mr. Green and asked him to give a chance to that man. On the record is the letter which was sent to the Postmaster General this year. The report was made by Mr. Green in favour of that man at the request of the defeated Conservative candidate for Témiscouata county. There was no question of merit, both men were about equal. The only difference was that Rioux was much younger. Mr. Laforest is nearer seventy than sixty and is too old to be appointed postmaster. The Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) wrote me that during the several years Rioux had been postmaster he had given good service, and he, the Postmaster General, had no objection to his application to the Civil Service Commission for the new appointment, if he provided a better place for the post office.

A great deal of fuss has been made over the recommendation by the parish priest on behalf of one of his parishioners. In the eyes of certain persons it was a great scandal. But the parish priest did not cause any harm to the other fellow. What happens in Catholic parishes is that when a suitable candidate goes to the parish priest for a recommendation he gets it, and the recommendation simply means that the man is an honest and respectable citizen and fit for the job. We never see a parish priest fighting for one man as against another. In fact, his recommendation is just a certificate of good character, the same as is given probably by Protestant clergymen to the people who live in their community. As my hon. friend from Dauphin (Mr. Bowman) quoted the Citizen, I desire to quote its contemporary, the Journal. In its issue of April 18 last appeared this very excellent editorial:

A Very Grave Matter

When Mr. J. Emile Tremblay, member of the Civil Service Commission, giving evidence on Thursday before the special committee of parliament investigating the Civil Service Act and its operation, told that he considered a certain candidate was "entitled" to the position of postmaster at St. Arsène "on the facts submitted to me, and on representations made to me by the parish priest to the effect that he was the choice of the whole population and his appointment was the most satisfactory," Mr. Tremblay was told by the vice-chairman of the parliamentary committee, Mr. J. L. Bowman, of Dauphin, Man., "this is a very grave matter, in my opinion." It would be interesting to know why.

The facts submitted were that the first name on the list reported on by the postal inspector was not acceptable by reason of difficulties experienced with that candidate in former association with that same office. The inspector had rated the candidate in his judgment "from a postal service point of view." The "second" and "third" candidates rated were about equal in education and experience, neither having had any post office experience.

But it was claimed by the inspector that the "second" candidate's accommodation for the post office would cost the postal department about $150 a year less than would that offered by the "third" choice.

In fact it was not proved to the committee that the mail carrier's pay was increased or decreased because he went here or there.

Commissioner Tremblay said the question of site was one for the post office to consider, not the Civil Service Commissioners, and he produced a ruling from the Department of Justice. He therefore "approved" the appointment of the "third" candidate on the ground of better personal qualifications.

It was when he mentioned that representations had been made to him by the priest of the parish in favour of the "third" candidate that the matter became "very grave" to one member of the committee apparently.

At the afternoon sitting of the committee that same day, Mr. Tremblay amplified his statement as to the representations made by the priest. He said:

"He told me his standing in the community was better than the other man. I think he said he had been mayor of the village, if I am not mistaken, and stood in better with the residents than the other man, and his appointment would be more acceptable to the patrons of the office. I am only speaking from recollection."

The appointment was six years ago, it should be stated.

What is there "grave" about all this? Dr. W. J. Roche, chairman of the Civil Service Commission, had told the committee that there had been "honest difference of opinion" among the three members of the commission, and that he had voted for the "second" candidate on the ground of saving to the postal department. He said he remembered nothing of any representations of the priest. When that same appointment came up for consideration again a year or so ago, all three commissioners voted for re-appointment of the man in dispute.

But the so-called "grave matter" turned into something of a comedy when Dr. Newton MacTavish, the remaining member of the Civil Service Commission, took the witness stand. Dr. MacTavish's evidence was that like Commissioner Tremblay, he considered the question of site was a concern of the post office, not of the Civil Service Commission, as the post office had the authority to refuse the appointee of the commission on that ground, if the officials liked.

And what was the determining factor in Dr. MacTavish's choice of the "third" candidate? Not representations of the priest. Doctor MacTavish said he could not recall that any such considerations had come before him. The factor which weighed with him was simply that the "second" candidate was 62 years old, "and getting near the retirement age," while the "third" candidate, whose choice he approved, was 47 years old.

The fact that a "priest" had made representations to a member of the commission was discussed at some length by the parliamentary committee. Mr. Tremblay said he did not consider such representations were likely to be "political" and he took them into account in view of their nature. He had never seen the priest before then, he said.

It is interesting to recall that when the question of members of parliament having a voice in post office appointments cropped up in the committee, the chairman, Mr. J. Earl Lawson, remarked that members of parliament might be considered "reputable persons." Might not the same consideration be accorded to a "parish priest"? Roman Catholic or Protestant?

And what is the real situation in the matter of post office appointments? Take this extract from the evidence of Mr. E. J. Underwood, chief superintendent post office service:

Mr. MacInnis: You do not hear so much about the appointment as about the dismissal?

Witness: There, you put your finger on the sore spot. If you could do something to assist in that matter you would be our everlasting friend.

Mr. MacInnis: Could you not give us a suggestion as to how to remedy that?

Witness: I am afraid that is not in the scope of post office affairs.

A return tabled in the House of Commons showed that 596 postmasters had been dismissed since August, 1930. Now if the parliamentary committee are really looking for a "grave matter" to deal with, here's their chance. And according to Mr. Underwood, who ought to know, they can thus make themselves "everlasting friends" of the postal department. Of course, that has nothing to do with the Civil Service Commission.

On April 25 of this year the Ottawa Journal published another editorial, which is very much to the point, and from which I should like to quote a paragraph:

Last week we had a great hullabaloo over the fact that a priest, exercising his rights as a reputable citizen, recommended that a certain person be appointed as a rural postmaster. Why a clergyman, no matter of what faith, should not have the right to suggest that a certain person would make a competent public official, is beyond The Journal. Yet simply because the advice of this priest was admitted to have been a factor—one among others—in the making of this particular appointment, we had a member of the committee broadcasting to the country that the revelation was a "grave" one, that it all but constituted a crisis.

Those extracts are absolutely to the point, and I am very sorry that some members of the committee were so narrow minded as to make such a fuss about a recommendation given by a priest who was acting as a private citizen, as he had a perfect right to do. The recommendation of a priest is like that of a mayor, a municipal councillor, or any other man in good standing.

Mr. DUGUAY: Were they both of the same party?

Mr. POULIOT: Priests have no party politics, as my hon. friend, who is a French Canadian, knows very well.

Mr. DUGUAY: It is because I know very well that I asked the question.

Mr. POULIOT: If my hon. friend knows it very well he should tell the members of the committee. My hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) was the first to protest in this matter. I hope my hon. friend will tell his friends; it will be a good thing for the country at large, in the interests of peace, order and good government.

Mr. BOWMAN: Is the hon. gentleman aware that the recommendation to which he refers was sent to one of the commissioners personally and that it was not brought to the attention of the other commissioners or placed on file?

Mr. POULIOT: Is that what my hon. friends find grave?

Mr. BOWMAN: I am asking the hon. gentleman that question in all sincerity.

Mr. POULIOT: I ask my hon. friend if he finds that grave; if he does not I will not answer his question.

Mr. BOWMAN: If the hon. gentleman will permit me, in answer to the question he asks may I say that what I considered grave about the matter was not that the representation was made by a priest; it might just as well have been made by a United Church clergyman or by any other minister of the gospel. The fact that it was made to the commissioner and not brought to the attention of the whole commission, and not placed on file so that all might have the advantage of the recommendation that had been made, was the point that was considered grave.

Mr. POULIOT: I will answer that in a very simple way. Here are three commissioners. Are we forbidden to speak to one of them unless the other two are there also? When they meet together they sit behind closed doors and no one can approach them. If I have something to say to one of the commissioners must I call in the other two at the same time?

Mr. LAVERGNE: If my hon. friend will allow me, does he not think that commissioner should have informed his confreres as to the recommendation?

Mr. POULIOT: First of all, the letter was on file, but either the letter was right or it was wrong.

Mr. BOWMAN: Pardon me; the letter was not on file, and Mr. Tremblay stated that he did not communicate to the other commissioners the fact that the recommendation had been made. More than that, he said the letter formed the basis of the decision at which he arrived.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman will not deny that there was a copy of that letter on file before the committee.

Mr. BOWMAN: Yes, subsequently it might have been placed on file.

Mr. POULIOT: The letter was addressed either to the Postmaster General or to the commissioner; at any rate it was a private letter, but a copy was left on file for the information of anyone who wanted to see it. Was the letter good or was it wrong? If it was good it was all right to leave it there, and even if it was wrong you cannot prevent a man from writing a letter. It was not communicated by Commissioner Tremblay to anyone else; it was left on file so that anyone interested could read it.

Mr. LAVERGNE: It was not the priest who was wrong; it was the commissioner, who should have communicated that information to the other commissioners.

Mr. POULIOT: I am glad my hon. friend interjected that statement, because he admits that when a recommendation is made by a parish priest it is not a matter of grave concern but is something that should be communicated to others.

Now I will continue with my argument, and what has been said does not lessen my admiration for the editorial writer of the Journal. I pity the Postmaster General very much; the Tories of the province of Quebec must give him a great deal of worry. We have proof of that in the statistics given out by the Postmaster General. I pity rather than blame him; when we see the long file of Tories who come to ask help in order to get jobs we realize that he is in rather an awkward position. It is not those who are elected that give the more trouble. Those who have been defeated are the worst, and I am sure they cause the Postmaster General more trouble than his colleagues in this house do. But how do they proceed? If we are to place more postmasters under the jurisdiction of the minister we must inquire what procedure is followed in connection with their appointments and dismissals. I asked the following question and the answer I received is given:

1. To how many postmasters, in each province, since August, 1930, the letters and forms shown at pages 6 and 11 inclusive, of the file 244, S.P. No. 257, of April 1, 1932, have been forwarded.

2. Number of postmasters, in each province, who forwarded their resignation, after having received these letters and forms.

3. Number of postmasters who were dismissed, in each province, after having duly filled in and readdressed the said letters or forms to the Post Office Department.

Some letters were drafted, from September 27, 1930, to April 9, 1931, threatening them with dismissal if they did not resign or did not take affidavits to the effect that they had not taken part in politics. These forms have been tabled in a return. They were sent to 358 postmasters in Quebec. Sixteen postmasters resigned when they received them and 206 were dismissed after they had duly filled in and readdressed the forms.

An hon. MEMBER: They were trying to catch up with the former Postmaster General.

Mr. VENIOT: That was done in eighteen months as against five years.

Mr. POULIOT: The province of Quebec, according to these statistics, is the banner province. I asked a question as to how many postmasters in each province since 1930 these letters and forms had been sent. This is the information:

Province	Letters sent
Nova Scotia	85
Prince Edward Island	7
New Brunswick	90
Quebec	358
Ontario	19
Manitoba	17
Saskatchewan	35
Alberta	11
British Columbia	1

The numbers of postmasters who resigned were:

Nova Scotia	4
Prince Edward Island	..
New Brunswick	8
Quebec	16
Ontario	2
Manitoba	1
Saskatchewan	1
Alberta	1
British Columbia	..

The postmasters dismissed were:

Nova Scotia	38
Prince Edward Island	5
New Brunswick	46
Quebec	206
Ontario	5
Manitoba	5
Saskatchewan	9
Alberta	..
British Columbia	..

Again, Quebec is the banner province. I asked the following question and the answer I received appears after it:

1. How many postmasters had to undergo inquiries for political partisanship since August, 1930: (a) each month, and (b) in each province?

2. In how many cases: (a) each month since August 1, 1930, and (b) in each province, did the Postmaster General require a written complaint accompanied by an affidavit before granting an inquiry for political partisanship?

The answer was:

In view of the fact that it will take some time to prepare the answer, it is recommended that this question stand as an order for return.

The information, when brought down, was:

Prince Edward Island	7
Nova Scotia	60
New Brunswick	56
Quebec	309
Ontario	6
Manitoba	11
Saskatchewan	19
Alberta	4
British Columbia	..
Total	472

The next question I asked had reference to the cost of investigation in each of the departments. In the Department of Agriculture there were ten inquiries at a cost of $759.99; in the Department of Immigration and Colonization three inquiries at a cost of $90.66; in the Department of Indian Affairs, three inquiries at a total cost of $312.51; in the Department of Marine, there were 131 inquiries at a total cost of $8,090.74; in the Department of National Defence, three inquiries at a cost of $248.84; in the Department of Customs, thirty-three inquiries at a total cost of $3,536.60; in the Department of Pensions and National Health, eleven inquiries at a total cost of $1,191.99; in the Department of the Postmaster General, 474 inquiries at a total cost of $33,103.64; in the Department of Public Works, nine inquiries at a total cost of $976; and in the Department of Railways and Canals, the total cost was $677.48, no information being given as to the number of investigations held. Again, Quebec was the banner province.

Now, the question is, who held these investigations? I had a question on the order paper in reference to a man named Garon, a commissioner appointed to carry out investigations in the province of Quebec. This man was sworn in October last, but the fact is that he had held many inquiries before being sworn at all. Indeed, all the investigations of which I have complained had been conducted by him before he was sworn. A justice of the peace must take an oath before he can discharge his functions, and yet we find that this gentleman held investigations without being sworn. In view of this fact, I would urge upon the Postmaster General that the moneys paid out to this man in fees and so forth before he was sworn be refunded to the department. I do not blame the Postmaster General but those who brought pressure to bear upon him, those who wanted to disturb the social order regardless of the fact that most of the men whom they were throwing out of employment were not guilty of political partisanship. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that any postmaster, whether he be Liberal or Conservative, who is attending satisfactorily to his work in an effort to support his family, and who keeps quiet during elections, deserves to be left alone.

Mr. LAVERGNE: That is hard on the hon. member for Gloucester.

Mr. POULIOT: He is not Postmaster General now.

Mr. LAVERGNE: He was.

Mr. POULIOT: As a matter of fact, he has been victimized and that is why he understands and sympathizes with the miseries of others. The Postmaster General informed me that all dismissals in my county were made after certain investigations but not always after inquiries. But more than that, the postmasters in the country were affected not only by direct dismissal but by the closing of post offices, and in this regard Quebec is once again the banner province. In Nova Scotia 85 post offices were abolished; in Prince Edward Island 2; in New Brunswick 54; in Quebec 91; in Ontario 49; in Manitoba 19; in Saskatchewan 57; in Alberta 49; and in British Columbia 30; total, 436. I asked the following question:

How many postmasters, in each province, since August, 1930, lost their position owing to change of site of the post office, ordered by the Postmaster General?

The answer was:

Ontario	3
Quebec	23
Nova Scotia	23
New Brunswick	12
Prince Edward Island	Nil
Manitoba	2
Saskatchewan	4
Alberta	5
British Columbia	3
Total	75

Then the following question:

How many new post offices were established in each province, since August, 1930?

The answer was:

Nova Scotia	4
Prince Edward Island	Nil
New Brunswick	4
Quebec	44
Ontario	41
Manitoba	11
Saskatchewan	33
Alberta	57
British Columbia	16

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Has the hon. member a list of the postmasters dismissed from 1921 to 1926?

Mr. POULIOT: Translation): I shall furnish it immediately after the house rises.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): Why wait until the house rises.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): I would prefer that the hon. member read it now to the house.

Mr. POULIOT: As my hon. friend from Richmond-Wolfe has so much information in regard to everything, including former speakers, he should have that information himself, and it is only because he wants to be funny, only for a joke, that he asks that question. He has only to look at his own file to get the information. I asked this question:

In how many cases since August, 1930, has a postmaster charged with active political partisanship been replaced temporarily or permanently by a person making the charge or giving evidence against him?

The following was the answer:

In view of the fact that it will take some time to prepare the answer, it is recommended that this question stand as an order for return.

In complaining about a man in office and in an effort to get the job, people can swear anything. Matters are worse when oaths are apparently taken before those who have no authority to take them. Under these circumstances it is possible to lie. I know of a very unworthy gentleman who made a complaint against a lawabiding citizen. Nothing was proven against the officeholder. A charge was laid which was not founded on facts and was contradicted, but the minister acted on the recommendation for dismissal. That sort of thing I cannot understand.

I do not complain because investigations are held to find out a man holding a government position has been guilty of political partisanship. I do complain, however, that judgments are rendered before witnesses are heard. In 99 out of 100 cases which I have read the members complain that—

Mr. LAVERGNE: That is a very serious statement.

Mr. POULIOT: What is?

Mr. LAVERGNE: The statement the hon. member has just made.

Mr. POULIOT: I have not said anything yet.

Mr. LAVERGNE: My hon. friend said judgments are rendered before evidence is taken.

Mr. POULIOT: There are cases where commissioners have said, after investigation, "There is nothing against that man." Then they have sent reports to the Postmaster General accusing those postmasters of political partisanship. I could give names to my hon. friend, and when I have finished I shall give them to him.

Mr. LAVERGNE: That was a very serious statement.

Mr. POULIOT: Surely it is serious and true. Very fortunately for him my hon. friend was not here at the beginning of the session; otherwise he would not be surprised at my statement. More serious things happened at the beginning of the session than have been happening lately. He would have seen things that would have astounded him, particularly as he was here in the days of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Robert Borden. He would have been very much surprised at the very serious things that happened this session.

I am not opposing investigations. When I was interrupted by my genial friend from Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne), I was about to say that I was very much surprised the members of the committee have counted the decisions of dissident commissioners. They forgot that Mr. Justice Holmes, of the Supreme Court of United States, was a most distinguished judge, that his dissident judgments have been published in book form, and are admired by many people. The civil service commissioners may have different opinions, and of that we cannot complain. I do complain, however, about a commissioner who, after an investigation for political partisanship, makes a statement that there is nothing against a man, and then makes a report against him. I am very pleased to note my hon. friend from Montmagny catches the point, and I hope the Postmaster General will do the same. It is a most unfortunate thing when a man who has been appointed by the Postmaster General takes a very active part in a provincial election. I made a charge in the house, and the Postmaster General said there would be an investigation. When it will be conducted I do not know, but I want it. This man, a postmaster, during the last provincial election campaign, went in his automobile and bought some liquor for canvassing. On his return he transferred the liquor to other vehicles. I want an investigation before a sworn commissioner, not one of those chaps who is good only to sign accounts and to give most unfair reports about the poor people with whom he comes in contact. They are worse than the Indians, because they have pity for nobody. I ask the Postmaster General to do something in this connection, or he may depend upon it that what I am now saying is only to give him a good taste, or in French, "lui donner bonne bouche," as compared with what I will have to say when his estimates are under discussion.

The people in my constituency have been treated most unfairly. I am strongly against the proposal to place all post offices with less than $3,000 revenue under the control of the Post Office Department. My opposition is not because I have no faith in the minister; the fact is that I think he is a most able man, and I have great respect for him. My criticism is that he listens too much to the complaints of those people who should be beside the wailing wall in Jerusalem and not here in Canada lamenting and complaining about some of their fellow-citizens who are doing their best work for the country as postmasters and public servants.

We are asked to adopt a report putting more postmasterships under the sole control of the Post Office Department. For the sake of the minister it would be much better if they were left under the control of the Civil Service Commission. That commission can and does deal fairly. When the Liberal party was in power we did not receive all we wanted from the commission. At times I wrote to them, exercising only the right held by anybody in the country. For instance, they appointed as assistant customs collector in my constituency a man who in 1926 when Mr. Meighen visited Riviere du Loup had gone from house to house asking people to put flags in their windows and to do some special decorating. I did not complain about his appointment, because it was supposed to have been made under the merit system, and that man was judged as well qualified. If the Civil Service Commission is to be given a fair deal, first of all we must see to it that the merit system is really a merit system. A decision should not be made by a man who is not familiar with the applicant but by a man who is capable of giving a fair judgment.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, I wish to deal only with one phase of this report. First may I congratulate the chairman and the committee upon having achieved unanimity, but I cannot congratulate them on certain features of the report, particularly the features to which the hon. member for Bow River (Mr.

Garland) referred, and to which I am now going to direct my remarks. I refer to section 25 of the report, which is as follows:

25. From the evidence adduced and in view of the submissions of officials of the Post Office Department, your committee recommends that order in council P.C. 1053, dated June 29, 1922, as amended by order in council P.C. 17/1751, dated September 12, 1929, be further amended so as to provide for the exemption from the operation of the Civil Service Act of postmasters in revenue post offices where the revenue does not exceed $3,000 per annum.

That recommendation means that in all post offices where revenues are from $400 to $3,000, the incumbents of those offices who now hold their positions by virtue of the Civil Service Act will be subject to summary dismissal, and new appointments may be made without any of the formalities prescribed by the Civil Service Act. I propose to take the strongest exception to that procedure.

I do not agree with what has been said with regard to the present position of these men. The chairman of the committee, when I questioned him, intimated that they were not under the Civil Service Act. I have respectfully to take exception to that statement. The senior hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) also suggested that they were not under the Civil Service Act. In order to refresh my memory I have looked at the act again and I want to put on record the provisions and the classifications therein and to submit to the house that those men are under the Civil Service Act in every sense of the word and entitled just as fully to whatever privileges and benefits are intended by the act to men in salaried positions. The difference is that they are not under the Civil Service Superannuation Act, which is a different act altogether. I want to make that clear because I presume the chairman of the committee, having made the statement he did, has some authority for it and will wish my reasons for differing from him. My reasons are these: in the Civil Service Act, which is chapter 22 of the revised statutes of Canada, section 2 (a) defines "civil service" as follows:

"Civil Service" means the civil positions and employees in and under the several departments of the government of Canada, and in the offices of the Auditor General, the Clerk of the Privy Council, the Governor General's Secretary, the Public Archives, the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, the Civil Service Commission, and all other civil positions under and persons in the civil employ of His Majesty, but not including the members of any commission or board appointed by the governor in council.

Paragraph (d) of section 2 defines "employee" as follows:

[Mr. Ralston.]

"Employee" means and includes officers, clerks, and employees in the civil service, but does not include deputy heads.

Let me point out to the house that the words "civil servants" never appear in that act; "civil servants" are not defined in it. "Civil servants" are defined in the Civil Service Superannuation Act for another purpose entirely. If hon. members read the Civil Service Act through, they will find the people referred to there are not referred to as civil servants, but the "service" is referred to and the people for whom positions are provided are referred to as "employees." Let me instance one or two sections. Section 13 reads:

The rate of compensation of an employee . . . shall be—so and so. Section 14 also refers to the rate of compensation of an "employee," and in subsection 3 of this section the word "employee" is again used. Section 15 uses the term "temporary employee." When we look at the crux of the act which takes the jurisdiction away from the governor in council to make these appointments, it is not the term "civil servants" that is used, but in section 19 the words are:

Save as otherwise provided in this act or in any regulation made hereunder, neither the governor in council nor any minister, officer of the crown, board or commission, shall have power to appoint or promote any "employee" to a position in the civil service.

I submit on the face of the section itself, that is so.

Mr. LAWSON: The section which the hon. member has just read proves that they are not civil servants.

Mr. RALSTON: I never said that they were civil servants; I said that they were under the Civil Service Act. My hon. friend does not seem to appreciate the distinction. Civil servants are not mentioned in the act; they are mentioned in the Civil Service Superannuation Act, which applies only to a part of those in the civil service, but the whole service is included in the other act—the Civil Service Act—and they are there referred to by the comprehensive term "employees," and they are all entitled to the benefits of that act.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Under the Civil Service Superannuation Act there would be a definition.

Mr. RALSTON: Under that act there is a definition of "civil servants"; that is for the purpose of superannuation and has nothing to do with what we are talking about, namely, the right of appointment and dismissal which is dealt with under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Does my hon. friend not think the Civil Service Superannuation Act would establish what is a civil servant?

Mr. RALSTON: That act does define a "civil servant," but I am not discussing the Civil Service Superannuation Act. I am admitting at the start that revenue postmasters are not entitled to superannuation, but superannuation is provided for in the Civil Service Superannuation Act and not in the Civil Service Act. What I am discussing is taking away the right to appointment or promotion, the preference in the case of returned soldiers and the procedure with regard to dismissal which, under the Civil Service Act, is well established; but if these men are taken out of the Civil Service Act, they are absolutely at the mercy of any friend of the government.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Unless they are only employees.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry I cannot make the situation any plainer. People who are defined in the Civil Service Act are employees in the service; they are the ones for whom I am now pleading; they are the rural postmasters whom it is now proposed not to consider as employees in the service but to take out of the operation of the Civil Service Act. Let me point out what took place at the time the Civil Service Commission was appointed. If Mr. Underwood and Mr. Coolican are right that it was never intended the revenue postmasters should be under the Civil Service Act, then they would not be included in the classification which was made under that act, because surely parliament would never ratify a classification which included revenue postmasters under the Civil Service Act when it did not intend that they should be there at all.

Mr. LAWSON: They did many more remarkable things than that in that classification of the civil service of Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend be patient for a moment? I am talking about what parliament did.

Mr. LAWSON: I am talking about what parliament did too.

Mr. RALSTON: With all due respect to Mr. Coolican and Mr. Underwood, I say that parliament was the body to decide what was the status of those employees. In 1919 parliament passed an act, chapter 10, in which by section 42 they confirmed the classes of positions and the rates of compensation "in the classification of the civil service of Canada, signed by the commission and dated the first day of October, 1919, and submitted to parliament." The words are that this classification and rates of compensation——are hereby ratified and confirmed, and the civil service shall, as far as practicable, be classified in accordance therewith.

I have under my hand a copy of the classification which was made in 1919 and confirmed by that act and although Mr. Underwood and Mr. Coolican say that parliament never intended that these rural postmasters should be under this act, I find on page 549 of the classification a provision for "Postmaster (grade 1 office)." Under that heading I find:

Compensation: annual: 50 per cent of the first $1,000 of revenue, 25 per cent of all revenue over $1,000 and up to $10,000; minimum salary $60 a year.

Those are revenue postmasters; they are in the classification which was approved by parliament. In the face of that, I am not concerned about what Mr. Coolican or Mr. Underwood have to say as to their opinion of what was intended by parliament. I take the intention of parliament from what appears in black and white in the act.

Mr. VENIOT: And the minimum compensation was increased to $65 a year.

Mr. RALSTON: There have been from time to time changes in the percentage of revenue which is to be received by the postmasters, but those officials remain in the Civil Service Act classification to-day. They are not people quite outside the Civil Service Act to whom no consideration is to be given, as would be the case were Mr. Coolican and Mr. Underwood correct in their assumption regarding parliament's intention. Therefore there can be no question at all that these rural postmasters in post offices with revenue between $400 and $3,000 come under the Civil Service Act.

Then there is a provision that certain classes may be excluded from the Civil Service Act. It is in section 59 of the act as it stands to-day. Section 59 reads:

In any case where the commission decides that it is not practicable nor in the public interest to apply this act to any position or positions, the commission may—

Note this:

—the commission may with the approval of the governor in council, exclude such position or positions in whole or in part from the operation of the act, and make such regulations as are deemed advisable, prescribing how such position or positions are to be dealt with.

I submit that that is the only way the committee can accomplish the removal of these postmasters from the Civil Service Act; not by saying they were not intended to be under the act but by admitting that they are at present under the act and by having the commission invoke the section I have just read and exclude them, but only if the circumstances are shown which the section mentions. Away back in 1922 an order in council, P.C. 1053, was passed in which the Civil Service Commission did recommend exempting from the Civil Service Act appointments to positions where the salary was not in excess of $200 per annum. Note this, that the commission itself recommended that provision and the governor in council approved it. Other positions were recommended to be exempted at the same time; for instance, positions for which the compensation provided consists of fees pertaining to the office, and positions of an honorary character to which no compensation is attached; the position of orderly in the office of the governor general's secretary; the position of Indian interpreter, Department of Indian Affairs, which it can be readily understood was not a position that could be advantageously dealt with under the Civil Service Act; the position of physician performing the duties of port physician under the Department of Health at various ports, which are specified in a long list in the order in council; positions in the following classes of skilled and unskilled labour and domestic service, such as blacksmith; and that is followed by two pages of other positions ending with culler, running all the way from sawmill foreman to laundress, upholsterer, electrician foreman, sign painter, and so one. That order in council exempted all these special classes of employees from the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

May I say in passing that that exemption of positions up to $200 salary did not begin in 1922. It was contained in an order in council, P.C. 1694, passed in 1919, very soon after the Civil Service Act was passed. This was embodied in order in council 1053 of 1922, to which I have referred, and that continued to be the rule until in 1929 a slight amendment was passed and postmasters in offices where the revenue did not exceed $400 were excluded. That was really the same office as the one to which the $200 salary applied because the postmasters had been getting fifty per cent of the revenue and two hundred dollars' salary represented fifty per cent of a revenue of $400. The postmaster's percentage was raised to 70 per cent and the order in council passed in 1929 simply changed the provision so that the text was a $400 revenue instead of a $200 salary. In other words they continued exactly the same maximum revenue as before.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Speaker, before recess I had, I hope, convinced the house that rural postmasters in offices where the revenue is between $400 and $3,000 are members of the Civil Service of Canada and come under the Civil Service Act. I had made the distinction between employees of the civil service under the Civil Service Act and those who are designated by a different term, namely, civil servants, under the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

It may be asked, what advantage or benefit is there in being an appointee under the Civil Service Act, as these men are. I am not going into the matter in detail, but I would remind the committee that there are certain statutory provisions with regard to promotion contained in the Civil Service Act which apply to these men whom it is now proposed to exclude from the benefit of that act. Provision for their compensation is made under the Civil Service Act, and any increases in compensation are dealt with by the Civil Service Commission. The duties which these men are performing, and the value of their services to the public, are all subject to appraisement by the machinery of the Civil Service Commission. Provision is made in the Civil Service Act for holidays—an express statutory provision of which these men also have the benefit. A very important provision is there, namely, that appointees to this service must be British subjects; that is contained in section 33. If these positions are taken out of the act these provisions do not apply. Further than that what are the provisions of the Civil Service Act, and what are the rules and regulations, which govern the tenure of office of these men who are in the service? As we know, the provision has not only been recognized by this house as stated long ago by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, but it has been embodied in an order in council, and it has been restated by the right hon. Prime Minister when on this side of the house and again since the present government took office, namely, that these postmasters hold their office and cannot be dismissed for partisanship unless there has been a certificate by a member of parliament that of his own knowledge they are guilty of partisanship, or there has been an investigation and an adverse decision given by the investigator. That is very important. That is the tenure under which these men hold office, and it has been acknowledged and recognized both by practice and by order in council. The proposal now is that these men shall be taken out of the Civil Service Act, that this practice and this order in council shall not apply, but simply by the action of the minister or the action of the governor in council, whether on recommendation or not—and from some things that have transpired in this house in the last week or two I do not know whether the government would even require a recommendation—but in any case without a reason being given these men might be summarily dismissed from office without any charge, without any investigation, without any responsibility being taken by any one except by the minister concerned. I submit that that is not in the interests of the public service, and that men who are in those positions at this time—appointed thereto under the Civil Service Act which provides that their tenure of office should be much more permanent than that—have a right to complain if now this house approves of a scheme whereby their positions will be simply at the whim of the government.

That is as far as dismissals are concerned. Now, what about appointments? Supposing that all these men, or a large proportion of them, are dismissed. Under the Civil Service Act when one of these positions became vacant the Civil Service Commission would be requested by the department to advertise for applications, to examine and rate the applicants, and to certify to the minister that such and such a person is entitled to the position. In connection with that there is an express statutory provision that the commission in making the recommendation shall establish a special list on which shall be put the names of those applicants who were on active service, have suffered disability and have not been reestablished. These overseas men thus have a superpreference. It is further required that a list shall be made of applicants who were on active service with His Majesty's land or naval forces or with the forces of the allies, and also that in the same list shall be included the widows of those who died on active service. Those men and women are put on the special list and are entitled to the next preference after the applicants with a disability. What is the effect of these preferences? That if those men get the minimum number of marks required for qualification they shall have the position in preference to a non ex-soldier who may have very much higher marks. There is another provision that the age limit which applies to civilian applicants does not apply to ex-servicemen, and that so long as the commission certify the ex-soldier applicant is in physical condition to perform the duties of the office he shall have that office notwithstanding the fact that there is a prescribed age limit.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if these positions were to be filled, and the present law were in force, that would mean ex-servicemen and widows would have that statutory preference, a preference that has been in force since 1919. There have been one or two occasions in this house when attempts have been made to reduce the preference. Only a year ago it was suggested that soldiers of the allies should not be given that preference. I appreciated that the preference was pretty wide in that respect, but I felt it was the entering wedge if any attempt were made to whittle away the preference which the Civil Service Act laid down and I opposed it.

What I have said so far is what would happen if any of these positions were vacant under present conditions where they are under the Civil Service Act. But the committee report proposes to exclude them from that act and to wipe out these advantages, and again to-night I protest against the proposal which is now being made that these preferences and other advantages under the Civil Service Act shall be done away with. I realize quite fully that under order in council 1053, which is referred to in the report of the committee, there is a provision that section 39—which was the old section of the Civil Service Act providing for the ex-soldier preference—shall apply; but having an order in council administered by a government is a very different thing from having an express statutory provision administered by an independent commission. Within the past three or four months I have had the experience of seeing how far one department of this government is prepared to go in disregarding the claims of ex-servicemen. I gave the details of the case the other night, and I will just outline it now. An ex-serviceman who had earned the military cross on the field, had been a resident of the county all his life and had given faithful service in his position, was summarily dismissed without any reason being given or any complaint being made, and a man appointed in his place who had been a resident in the county only five years and had no overseas service whatever. He was the doctor appointed to look after the Indians in a portion of my consituency. The expense of appointing the new man to attend the Indians would be double the expense of the ex-service man if he made only one call each year on each person entrusted to his care, the reason being the travelling fees of the new man who was not centrally located. As a matter of fact, we have not yet found out on whose instigation that change was made. The minister rose in his place and announced that he proposed to accept the recommendations of his colleagues or of those in whom he had confidence in making dismissals, even though they concerned ex-service men, without any reasons being given.

Under those circumstances I think I have a right, on behalf of the ex-service men, to look pretty critically on a proposal which places in the hands of the government the jobs of about 3,500 public servants, many of whom are ex-service men who, if this recommendation is accepted, might be dismissed summarily without regard for their preference and have their places filled by civilians, nominees of party friends. The old order in council applied to only a limited class of officials, that is, those in offices where the revenue was $400 or less, as well as certain artisans and labourers expressly mentioned in the order. This provision, however, will apply to about 3,500 office holders all over this dominion, in rural municipalities and villages where the remuneration may be from $200 to $1,300 per year. I submit that, with the pressure I know is exerted on my hon. friends opposite, it will be pretty difficult for them to resist the demands which will be made that they exercise their powers under this proposal.

I say therefore, Mr. Speaker, that because it gives the government the chance to make summary dismissals and to disregard the returned soldiers' preference altogether, if they so desire, this recommendation should not be adopted. Even leaving out the ex-service men, and on the broader basis that officials should have assurance that they will be continued in office while they give good service, this great body of officials in these positions should not be subject to the will or the whim of any government or any minister, particularly in view of the fact that ever since 1919 we have adopted exactly the opposite principle. While I desire in every way possible to associate myself with the desire for economy, I do look askance at the suggestions now made that it is going to be more economical to appoint these men in the way suggested by this report. As I have said, for the last thirteen years we have had the present provision, under which we seem to have done very well, and I have not heard any complaint about the expense. Ex-service men have been appointed to these jobs under the statutes of Canada, and it seems to me that this economy, which at most may mean doing away with the sending out of advertisements to those parts of the country where there are vacancies and relieving the staff of the Civil Service Commission of the necessity of looking over these papers and deciding who should be appointed, will amount to very little in comparison with the damage which will be done to the public service. I believe that the adoption of this recommendation will give a very serious setback to the merit system and all that it means in connection wth appointments to the public service.

There are other matters also in respect of which I am very loath to give my support, but I am not going to deal with them. I submit that this is an outstanding example of where the committee, with all due respect, have gone wrong and made a recommendation which this house should not accept. On behalf of the great body of public servants who will be affected, and particularly on behalf of the ex-service men, I protest against this recommendation.

Mr. SPEAKER: If hon. members will allow me, the motion is that the house concur in the report of the select committee on civil service matters. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) moved in amendment that the report be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the committee with instructions to delete the first six lines of recommendation No. 25, from the word "from" to the word "annum." The hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson), who moved the original motion, has taken objection to the amendment, contending that it is not in order in that it is mandatory and instructs the committee to delete a portion of its report.

Without deciding the question of order, the difficulty can be quickly solved if the house will permit the hon. member for Bow River to withdraw the amendment now before the house and substitute the following:

That the motion be amended by the addition of the following words: "With the exception of the first paragraph of section 25."

The hon. member for Bow River asks leave to substitute this amendment. If this amendment is adopted the original motion will read:

That the second report of the special committee on the civil service and the Civil Service Act be concurred in, with the exception of the first paragraph of section 25.

Shall leave be granted the hon. member to substitute the proposed amendment for the one now before the house?

And leave having been granted:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): In rising to say a few words in connection with the report of this committee, of which I had the honour to be a member, I wish first to express to the chairman of the committee my appreciation of his courtesy and fairness to myself particularly, as the one Labour member on the committee. I do this because the chairman and myself are perhaps quite far apart with regard to politics, economics and social questions and we might differ on other occasions in the house, so I wish to express my appreciation now.

In my opinion this is a very good report. As the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Bowman) has pointed out, in order to get a unanimous report of this kind there must be a great deal of give and take between the members of the committee, so it is not strange that when the report comes to the house there should be some parts of it to which hon. members may object. But I submit that this report, presented by a committee representative of the three distinct groups in the house, is a much better report than could have been brought forward by any one of the three groups. In other words, I think it is a better report than could have been brought in by the four Conservative members of the committee; I think it is a better report than could have been brought in by the two Liberal members of the committee, and I am almost convinced that it is as good a report as could have been brought in by the Labour member.

The principal objection appears to be to section 25, which excludes from the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission postmasters where the revenue is under $3,000. It might be well to note that at one time all revenue postmasters came under the Civil Service Act, but the Civil Service Commission asked that those receiving under $400 should be excluded from the operations of the act. The recommendation of the committee on this occasion is brought forward largely because of the evidence given by officials of the Post Office Department. In my opinion the Post Office Department made these recommendations not because they had any great fault to find with the appointments made by the Civil Service Commission, but because of the delay and expense contingent upon appointments so made. Let me quote from the evidence of Mr. Underwood. From his evidence I take it that there is no great objection to the Civil Service Commission making these appointments, but it is felt that in view of the number of dismissals leading to a great many appointments, more expedition is desirable. If something were done to curtail dismissals there would be very little objection to the appointment of postmasters by the commission. Answering a question by myself, he gave the following information. I asked him:

Q. You do not hear so much about the appointment as about the dismissals?—A. There, you put your finger on the sore spot. If you could do something to assist in that matter you would be our everlasting friend.

Further on, I asked him this question:

Q. How are those appointments made now? —A. By the Postmaster General, whichever way he determines.

This refers to post offices under $400. He went on to say:

He may get information from whichever source he deems advisable. He may use the district superintendent, or he may not.

Q. And is that appointment quite satisfactory?—A. Perfectly satisfactory. We have never had any trouble in regard to that. We have less trouble in regard to those than any others. You touched the point this morning when you touched on dismissals. There is where the trouble comes, not in the appointments. We have no trouble with regard to appointments.

Further on, I asked him the following question:

Have you any suggestion to offer as to any improvement in that? Supposing that we assume that the appointment can be made better by the Postmaster General or by the department?

His answer was:

Just as well, not better, just as well, but more economically.

As regards these appointments, it seems to me that the whole point is this, that they can be made more expeditiously and more economically by the department than by the commission. But in saying that I must add that in my opinion the department is largely to blame for the delays with the commission in making the appointment.

I do not wish to go into every part of the report, and I will only say this, that most of the shortcomings of the present Civil Service Commission are due to the way in which the commissioners themselves are appointed. You cannot have a politically-appointed commission without its being somewhat under the influence of those who appointed it, and if the present government, in appointing the new commission, wishes to have one that will function in the best manner possible, it will have to take due care that no taint of political partisanship shall attach to the appointment. How that can be accomplished I do not know, but I am sure that if the government desires to have it done it can find a way. As I said before, the report is not perfect, but generally speaking I regard it as a very good report, although looking from this perspective at the amendment offered by the hon. member for Bow River, I will not say that it would not be an improvement on the committee's report.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): It is not my intention to delay the house discussing the report generally, because I shall have little or nothing to say except with regard to section 25. My remarks will be confined to that section, which is the subject of an amendment proposed by the hon. member for Bow River. It is to me a matter of regret that that recommendation has been embodied in the report. I cannot help feeling that were that recommendation to be adopted it would be a retrograde step.

Unquestionably there have been some things about the Civil Service Commission and about the way in which they have carried out their duties that are open to criticism and that have been the subject of common knowledge for years past. At the same time it does not seem to me to be the proper way of remedying that difficulty to take such action as is suggested in the report. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) has already pointed out, very completely and comprehensively, I think, the objections to that report, both as regards the men who already occupy positions which are involved and as regards the procedure that would be followed when those positions came to be filled again. While undoubtedly the method pursued in the past has occasioned some labour and extra work to some of the officials whose names have been mentioned in connection with the report, it does not seem to me that this is any good reason why that should be taken into consideration. Nor do I think that the distinction is well founded which the hon. member for West York (Mr. Lawson), who has moved the adoption of the report, has tried to draw. That distinction does not appeal to me at all. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth has discussed it from the legal aspect, but as a layman I look at it from the point of view of ordinary common sense, the way in which the average man in the country will look at it. I do not think that the average man will be disposed for a moment to draw that very fine distinction which the chairman of the committee has drawn in the matter.

I took occasion yesterday to ask the government, whom I thank for their courtesy, to bring down, in order that we might have it at this discussion, a statement of the number of postmasters in cases where the revenue would be less than $3,000 and those where it would be in excess of that sum. The figures given me are these: number of post offices with revenue under $3,000, 11,021; number of post offices with revenue over $3,000, 1,404. That makes a total of 12,425. I am quite well aware that of the 11,000 mentioned as having revenue less than $3,000 a very large number are in the class of $400 and less. I regret I did not ask the Postmaster General to furnish the figures to show exactly the number of men who would be affected by this change.

Mr. ERNST: Upwards of 7,000 are under $400.

Mr. BROWN: I understand that only about 7,000 or 8,000 are under the $400 mark, so we have left between 3,000 and 4,000 who will be affected by the change. That is by no means an inconsiderable number. If in the future practices are followed which have been followed in the past by both political parties—and I am making no distinction at this moment—those 3,000 or 4,000 appointments will be within the gift of the defeated member in the constituency. Speaking personally, I cannot understand why members of parliament or defeated members of parliament wish to assume that responsibility. It seems to me they are taking upon themselves something which can be nothing but an increased burden. I think there are perhaps very good grounds for exempting from the operations of the act post offices with revenues under $400. On many occasions my experience has been that I have had to try to find men to take the offices. On two or three occasions I put myself to a great deal of inconvenience and expense in order to advise the department concerning people who would accept.

I do not wish to continue the discussion at any great length, but I hope when the vote is taken on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) that this house will state in no uncertain terms that it does not purpose taking a retrograde step. I know there are hon. members on both sides of the house who conscientiously believe that the proposed change would be for the benefit of the service and the country. There are some of us, however, who just as strongly hold the view that the proposed change would be a retrograde step, and for my part I shall vote—and I wish I could vote many times—in favour of the amendment of the hon. member for Bow River.

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): Mr. Speaker, as one of the members of the civil service committee may I join with the other members of the committee who have preceded me in expressing my appreciation of the harmonious manner in which its deliberations were conducted.

After listening to the discussion this afternoon it might seem that had it not been for clause 25, the report would have been accepted by the house without comment. My experience teaches me, however, that if clause 25 had not appeared in the report, hon. members would want to pick holes in some other part of it. The report having been unanimous, hon. members must realize that there was a certain amount of compromise amongst members of the committee. As my Liberal colleague has pointed out, undoubtedly had the report been drafted by the two Grits one might have expected a better report. Had we left it entirely to the member from British Columbia I do not think it would have been accepted at all. It was useless, therefore, even to anticipate a report coming either from my friend from Ottawa and myself or from the Labour member. However, we did agree on the report now before the house, and agreed because there was a give and take attitude. In view of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Bow River I think members of the committee should be left free to give expression to their views regarding it. This afternoon I entered the house prepared to give my solid support to the report. If in its wisdom the house sees fit to amend it, I am prepared to submit to its better judgment.

Undoubtedly the outstanding features of the whole investigation centred around the personnel of the Civil Service Commission itself. I agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier), and I think if hon. members were to scan the evidence submitted before the committee they would find that probably there is only one ground upon which we might arrive at the conclusions that we did regarding the three commissioners. Probably Commissioners Tremblay and MacTavish in the exercise of their duties could be accused—at least the evidence proves to me—only of not exercising the discretionary and statutory powers vested in them. There is no other part of the whole evidence which would suggest to me any reason why the treatment meted out to them should have been suggested.

Apparently, as I have said, the whole objection to the report centres around section 25. I was expecting that the government would be in a position to accept the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Bow River. May I point out to the house, however, that no matter what is contained in the report, whether hon. members decide to do away with the present personnel of the commission or decide to have one, two or three commissioners, the act distinctly states that there shall be no more than three; otherwise the responsibility as to the number is left with the government.

Another feature of the report which has not been discussed is the recommendation that a select special committee of the house be appointed from year to year to make a yearly survey of the operations of the Civil Service Act and the Civil Service Commission. Suppose we allowed clause 25 to go through, and in time it were found that it did not work as some members of the committee and some hon. members of the house believe it will, with the safeguard suggested in the report the condition could be remedied.

After a careful examination of the evidence submitted to the committee I think any person who views the matter with an unbiased mind will admit that it had grounds on which to make its recommendation—and I am not excepting clause 25. I have been a member of this house since 1925, and as such have sat on many committees. In my experience I have met a good many commissioners, but at no time did I have any personal knowledge of or acquaintance with any of the three civil service commissioners. I met Commissioner Tremblay on one occasion before he became a member of the Civil Service Commission. Therefore I went into that committee unbiased against either the commission or the service. I can assure the house it was an eye-opener to me to sit in on that committee and to investigate the matters which came before us. It gave me an insight into the operation of the Civil Service Act that I do not think I could have acquired in any other way. I am still of opinion that, without the amendment, we could have tried out the recommendation contained in clause 25, because it was based on evidence of those who are unbiased and unprejudiced, officials of the department who are looking just as much as you or I to the efficiency of that department. One thing revealed to our committee was that probably only once in a thousand times was the deputy head of a department not satisfied with an appointment. This proves conclusively that the deputy head of each department of government is always considered and consulted before an appointment is made. If you go a little further into the evidence you will find that one deputy head, appearing before the committee, pointed out definitely that on more than one occasion, when the eligible list was handed to him, he discarded the whole list and suggested to the commission that they compile another. On one occasion he discovered two eligible lists, and then sought to have the appointment made directly by the commission.

Mr. BROWN: Were these postmasters?

Mr. VALLANCE: No, other departments of government.

Mr. BROWN: That is not the question involved.

Mr. VALLANCE: What I am trying to show is that only once in a thousand times is an appointment made to any department of government that does not meet with the approval of the deputy head. The same thing will apply regarding the appointment of postmasters in offices having a revenue of $3,000 or under. While some people might be a little alarmed about the preference that is extended to returned men, I question if there is one member of parliament who, if the responsibility were given to him to appoint those postmasters, would not give the same consideration and preference to the returned man as we do at present in the case of those little positions that we are asked to fill, because there is no better way to fill them than through the member. There are 245 members of parliament, so that, assuming there is an equal number of positions in each constituency, we would each be responsible for about twelve such postmasterships. I say quite frankly that I am not looking for the responsibility of nominating my share. We are basing clause 25 merely on the evidence submitted before the committee. When I became a member of it, I stated that I would not support anything which was not borne out by the evidence adduced before it. We can find ample support even of clause 25 in the evidence submitted by those who, I think, are looking for greater efficiency within the Post Office Department.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance), who has just taken his seat, was good enough to suggest that the government might accept the amendment. Because of that observation I think it is desirable that I should state what I conceive the position to be.

[Mr. Vallance.]

In the month of March a committee of this house, consisting of seven members, was selected to deal with the matters with which we are now all familiar. A unanimous report was made by that committee. I for one feel that the house is to be congratulated upon the fact that seven of its members, professing political allegiance to three, or perhaps four parties, should have been able to arrive at a unanimous conclusion with respect to the matters submitted to them. If this were an ordinary matter in which a jury, having seen the witnesses and heard their testimony, had come back with a unanimous verdict, we would have accepted it without question, assuming there had been no misapprehension as to what the law was as expressed to them by the judge who charged them.

In this case I have followed the proceedings only casually; I know what transpired from day to day and I am fairly familiar with the evidence. That unanimous report induced me to believe that the House of Commons was a unit with respect to the matter, and the conclusions at which the committee had arrived were the deliberate conclusions which it was believed the evidence warranted the committee in finding. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat confirms that view, as also did the chairman of the committee (Mr. Lawson), who moved concurrence this afternoon. There is therefore a measure of non-partisanship about the proceedings of the committee. I was much struck by the statement of the hon. member who has just taken his seat that when he went into the committee room he was not even acquainted with some of the members of the commission. The whole approach seems to have been non-partisan. There do not appear to have been those manifestations of party feeling that characterize some committees, and there seems to have been a measure of high regard for established rules, procedure and practice in the conduct of the business of the committee. When I heard the report read, I was pleased, as, I fancy, were other members, to see that in these days of stress and strain seven members of our number had unanimously arrived at conclusions which were rather drastic in some respects. When I heard them I confess I was surprised that with regard to some of them the members of the committee were unanimous.

Under these circumstances, so far as the government are concerned, we assumed that the unanimous judgment of the committee would be unanimously adopted by the house. Such appears not to be the case. In view of that fact I rise merely to say it is my earnest wish that those who support the government, will exercise their own personal judgment, regardless of their political affiliations, in voting on this matter. It would be wholly unfair to a committee that has laboured as hard as has this committee, if the government were to apply, in the words of English parliamentary practice, the whip with respect to the matter. After listening to the speeches that I have heard and to the expressions of tender solicitude for others that so characterized the language of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), I made up my mind that what I have suggested was only fair to those who had given so much time to this question, who have earnestly and, I believe, honestly laboured to bring about a unanimous report, and who, having succeeded in securing that unanimous report and having presented it to the house in that sense, now because of circumstances over which neither the government nor they have any control, find themselves thrust into a debate which was not expected and which has no doubt embarrassed some of them. I am sure, had I been a member of the committee and been confronted with the situation which has arisen this afternoon, I should likewise have been embarrassed. Therefore I desire to suggest as strongly as I can that each member who sits to the right of the Speaker should exercise his own unfettered and untrammelled judgment in voting either for concurrence in the report or for the amendment now before the house.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, like the Prime Minister I felt this afternoon that the house was to be congratulated upon having for the second time this session received from a special committee a unanimous report. I confess that on coming into the house this afternoon I expected the proceedings would be similar to those witnessed yesterday, when the adoption of the report of another special committee was moved by its chairman, who made a statement which I am sure appealed to all who heard it as broad, tolerant, and devoid of a partisan spirit. He was replied to in a similar vein by an hon. member on this side, who also was a member of the special committee. This afternoon, however, listening to the chairman of the committee whose report we are now considering, I confess that I became more and more surprised as he delved into pages of evidence with a view to extracting here and there what might appear to be a reflection upon some individual who was other than a member of his particular party. I hope I am not going too far when I say that such was the impression pretty generally conveyed, at least to those of us who sit on this side of the house; and such debate as has arisen has taken place in consequence of that circumstance. It would be amazing if in reviewing a field as wide as that which has been reviewed by the special committee dealing with the administration of the whole civil service there were not found here and there evidences of limitation of discretion, judgment, and the like. I venture to say that if all of us were obliged to review our own acts of the past year there are many things that we should be pleased to eliminate and regard as more or less in the nature of shortcomings. Sometimes we become very critical when we are reviewing the acts of others, and perhaps we are not sufficiently critical in regard to matters that come a little nearer home. Certainly that attitude did affect the temper of the house this afternoon and led, I believe, to the discussion which has taken place.

I believe the report would have been accepted without question had the debate not been provoked in the fashion indicated. I think hon. members generally would have been prepared to allow at least a year to experiment, if I may use that word, with this clause which has provoked so much in the way of discussion, particularly as its operation was being safeguarded, as has been pointed out by members of the committee, by the proposed appointment of a select committee of the house with full power to make hereafter such recommendations as it might think best with respect to the operation of the clause. But now that the debate has taken place it is evident that there are definite reasons for questioning the wisdom of inserting that clause at the moment. I agree with the Prime Minister—I am always happy for a chance to agree with him, and perhaps happier still when he agrees with me, although that is very seldom—that in the circumstances it is only right that notwithstanding the report is unanimous, hon. members should exercise their own individual discretion and judgment in voting upon this amendment.

I have already said in speaking of civil service matters that what I saw of the operation of the Civil Service Act during the time I had to do with the administration of public affairs led me to believe that with regard to many of the minor positions it would be quite as much in the public interest that the member of the house, who is responsible to his own constituency, should have the nomination and the responsibility for appointment, with a body such as the Civil Service Commission always determining, before any appointment, that the individual nominated has the necessary qualifications. I thought there was nothing particularly to be gained, from the point of view of merit, in giving to a body of gentlemen who had no knowledge whatever of the persons they were selecting, the power to choose individuals for positions in the outside service of very small remuneration. The remuneration limit which has been recommended in this case for purposes of exemption goes higher than I would have been prepared to go, but with regard to eliminating a number of the minor positions from the requirement of examinations I have long felt that it was in the public interest that the responsibility should be exercised rather by the member for the constituency than by a group of gentlemen who could not possibly know anything about the qualifications of the individuals, and who could not, in the very nature of things, through an examination, find out who was likely to be the most acceptable person to the community he was to serve. I say that just to indicate the sympathy I have with those who are prepared to support a motion to eliminate a certain number of positions from the operation of the Civil Service Act.

With regard to the broad principle of merit as a basis of entrance into the civil service and of qualification for remaining there, there is no doubt of any kind in my mind; I am wholeheartedly behind the merit system. On account of the limit that has been set in the particular recommendation with regard to postmasters, I shall support the amendment before the house, but I should like every member on this side of the house to feel wholly free to exercise his own judgment with regard to the vote which he may cast.

Mr. J. EARL LAWSON (West York): May I crave the indulgence of the house for just two or three minutes in view of the observations of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King)?

Mr. VENIOT: Is the hon. member closing the debate, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: He has the right to speak to the amendment.

Mr. LAWSON: I am speaking to the amendment. Believe me, it was not with a desire on my part to engender any partisan spirit in the consideration of this committee's report that I mentioned to the house this afternoon one or two instances in connection with the evidence. My information was contrary to that of the right hon. leader of the opposition, as I was informed that an amendment would be moved with respect to clause 25 of the report, and I knew of no better way than I took in which to bring forcibly to the attention of the hon. members of this house the impossibility, as I saw it, of appointing revenue postmasters on a merit system with the limited means which were at hand to perform that task. It was with that object in view that I made those references. I extracted them in speaking to clause 25 of the report, and the result has proven that my information was correct and the impression of the right hon. leader of the opposition in error, because no sooner had I taken my seat than the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) was upon his feet moving the amendment.

Might I be permitted to mention just one other thing, because I feel it would be improper for the hon. members of this house to be called on to vote with a mass of what I consider misinformation before them. I have great respect for the legal ability of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) but I am entirely at a loss to understand the basis on which he propounds the argument that revenue postmasters were civil servants in the ordinary sense.

Mr. RALSTON: I have not said that, so my hon. friend need not set up that straw man to knock it down.

Mr. LAWSON: If I gathered correctly the argument of my hon. friend, he was endeavouring to demonstrate to the members of this house that certain protections which revenue postmasters now have under the Civil Service Act were being removed from them by the adoption of this clause. Therefore, sir, I feel it incumbent upon me to point out to the house, first, that every civil servant is required to give his full time to the service under the statute. That is not so with respect to revenue postmasters.

Mr. RALSTON: Might I interrupt just to call attention to the fact that I particularly differentiated between civil servants and those who have the protection of the Civil Service Act?

Mr. LAWSON: All right. Then with respect to those who have the protection of the Civil Service Act I invite the attention of the house to the fact that no civil servant having the protection of the Civil Service Act can be dismissed except by order in council, but revenue postmasters are dismissed by the Postmaster General under the provisions of section 7, paragraph (b) of the Post Office Act, which is contained in the revised statutes of Canada, 1927.

Mr. VENIOT: Read it.

Mr. LAWSON: I need not read paragraph (a), but section 7 (b) reads:

The Postmaster General may, subject to the provisions of this act,

(b) remove or suspend any postmaster or other officer or servant of the post office.

I think that is amply clear.

Mr. VENIOT: Read a little more.

Mr. LAWSON: That is all it says.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend knows that the practice has not only grown up but has been approved by order in council whereby that power is not exercised without investigation or without a certificate of a member of parliament to the effect that to his personal knowledge an officer has been guilty of partisanship.

Mr. LAWSON: That is what makes the difference between a revenue postmaster and any civil servant entitled to the protection of the Civil Service Act. It was because revenue postmasters and certain others could be dismissed by the Postmaster General under that provision that the government of which my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth was a member passed order in council No. 1467 on the 22nd of July, 1922, whereby they provided the ways and means of the investigation which must be had before the Postmaster General exercises his right under that act.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Does the section quoted extend only to revenue postmasters, or does it include other officers and servants in the post office service?

Mr. LAWSON: No. In my opinion no full-fledged civil servant within the terms of the Civil Service Act can be dismissed except by order in council.

Mr. RALSTON: There is no such animal under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Perhaps the hon. gentleman did not catch the full import of my question. In the section is there a difference made between revenue postmasters and other servants and officials who are mentioned as being subject to dismissal under those terms?

Mr. LAWSON: If my hon. friend is referring to the statute which I read, there is not.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. LAWSON: If my hon. friend is referring to the order in council which I mentioned, there is not.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am referring to the section of the act.

Mr. LAWSON: So far as the section of the act is concerned, I do not find therein any specific distinction between revenue postmasters and others therein named who are in the postal department.

Mr. RALSTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: They are all under the same conditions, then, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. LAWSON: Those who come within the provisions of the Post Office Act. But I would call to the attention of the hon. member for Red Deer that under a section of the Civil Service Act—the number of which I do not recall at the moment—certain employees of the Post Office Department are included under the act, and once they are so included they cannot be dismissed except by order in council.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I have no desire to enter into a discussion on points of law with my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth. So far as your committee are concerned, we had come before us the Postmasters' Association, who asked that they be taken under the Civil Service Act so that they might have its benefit and might not be dismissed by the Postmaster General.

An hon. MEMBER: Did you have any members of parliament come before you?

Mr. LAWSON: We should have been very glad to hear from any hon. members.

An hon. MEMBER: You did not ask anybody.

Mr. VENIOT: May I ask the hon. chairman of the committee—I know he would like to give the information—if the representatives of the Postmasters' Association suggested to the committee that those receiving $3,000 a year and upwards be placed under the Civil Service Commission to the extent that they would be classified as to salaries?

Mr. LAWSON: My recollection is that they did not, but that they asked to be included for all other purposes. May I say that the Postmasters' Association alleged that they did not have the protection of the Civil Service Act; officials of the Post Office Department who are charged with its administration alleged that those revenue postmasters were not under the provisions of the Civil Service Act; and those members of your committee who are lawyers came to the conclusion that such revenue postmasters were not under the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Garland, Bow River) which was negatived on the following division:

Miss MACPHAIL: I was paired with the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Porteous). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question now is on the main motion.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): I should like to say one word on the motion, because I want clear on the record the contention which I have endeavoured to make and which I am afraid I did not get across to my hon. friend the chairman of the committee. I point out—and I think I am correct—that all these postmasters with whom we are dealing, whom we propose to take from under the Civil Service Act, are under the Civil Service Act at this moment. I point out that the section of the Post Office Act, which gives the Postmaster General the right of removal, makes no distinction between revenue postmasters and any other kind of postmasters, and is no argument whatever in support of the contention that revenue postmasters are to be dealt with on a different basis and are not under the Civil Service Act.

I also pointed out that the Civil Service Act classification, authorized by parliament, contains a classification for revenue postmasters. I doubt very much if the postmasters have thought they were not under the Civil Service Act. They were appointed by the procedure laid down under the act, and they are under the act, according to the classification which was approved by parliament and which is in effect to-day. I think that the act they wanted to be brought under was another act altogether—the Civil Service Superannuation Act. I point out also that the present practice in connection with dismissals from these positions applies both to those who may be dealt with under the Post Office Act and to those who may be dealt with by order in council under the Civil Service Act, and, as I stated a few moments ago, that practice is that there must be an investigation and an adverse finding by a commissioner or a certificate by a member of parliament to the effect that to his personal knowledge there has been partisan work, which I think is the exact wording of the act. I point out also that if these positions are under the Civil Service Act—and there is no doubt about that under the classification—they are entitled to returned soldier preference and that the passing of this resolution takes away from returned soldiers the statutory preference they have hitherto enjoyed with regard to these 3,500 positions throughout this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: How?

Mr. RALSTON: Because it no longer applies; they will be excluded from the Civil Service Act by order in council, that is all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Why not?

Mr. RALSTON: Because they are taken out from under the Civil Service Act; the very words of the recommendation are to that effect. Let me point out this further to my hon. friend; in a moment we will vote on the main motion, the first part of which is that these positions be taken out from under the Civil Service Act; that is to say, they are to be put under order in council P.C. 1053, which expressly excepts them from the Civil Service Act. The second part of the committee's recommendation is that postmasters in offices which have a revenue of more than $3,000 shall be "within the full operation of the Civil Service Act." I point out to my hon. friend that the postmasters who came down here asking for a concession in connection with offices having a revenue of $3,000 and over will not get very much if this is all they are to get, because already they are under the Civil Service Act. What they really want is to be under the Civil Service Superannuation Act, and that matter is not dealt with in this report at all. My hon. friend does not seem to be able to make that distinction. Revenue postmasters to-day have every right under the Civil Service Act, but they have no rights under the Civil Service Superannuation Act. The one thing denied them is superannuation, and that is the one thing these postmasters in offices where the revenue is over $3,000 want, and this committee report only leaves them where they were, namely under the Civil Service Act.

May I point out to my hon. friend that the difficulty between us has arisen entirely because he has failed to apprehend that there is a Civil Service Act which applies to each of these postmasters in offices with a revenue of $400 and up and there is a Civil Service Superannuation Act which applies to none of them but under which the postmasters in offices having a revenue of more than $3,000 would like to get.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): Before we vote on this motion I should like to get some further information from the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I point out to the hon. member that we are not in committee and that no hon. member has the right to interrogate another simply because he happened to be chairman of a committee.

Mr. VENIOT: Very well; I can lay my question before the house. Surely there is nothing to prevent my doing that.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has the full right to address the house.

Mr. VENIOT: Then I will lay this question before the house, and perhaps somebody will be able to explain it. I should like to know the meaning of this recommendation:

Your committee further recommends that such amendments be made to the Civil Service Act and/or the regulations thereunder of the Civil Service Commission so that postmasters hereafter appointed to revenue post offices having a revenue in excess of $3,000 per annum shall be within the full operation of the Civil Service Act.

I am at a loss to know what that means. Does it mean that postmasters in offices having a revenue of more than $3,000 will come under the superannuation act?

Mr. ERNST: It means that they will get a salary and will come under the act.

Mr. RALSTON: The act does not provide for that.

Mr. VENIOT: It means that they will get a straight salary, not based on revenue?

Mr. ERNST: That is right; a class B office.

Mr. VENIOT: Then they will be in a better position than postmasters are in at present, until they come under class 2B of the Post Office Department classification. The postmasters referred to in this section are now under the Civil Service Act. Positions from $400 per annum, revenue and up to a salary figure which brings the position automatically under the straight salary system, come under post office classification 2B. Under 2B post offices can be placed under the straight salary only when they reach a certain revenue based upon population, etc.; that is the practice. And when they attain that revenue, based on population, they automatically come under the straight salary system. Once they come under classification 2B they at once become entitled, though they were still under the act before they reached that point, to all the benefits under the Civil Service Pension Act, which is an entirely different statute. The Civil Service Commission therefore fixes the salaries, and for the first year under class 2B the postmaster gets $2,040 a year, his salary being gradually increased year by year, as provided for under the civil service salary classification. No postmaster in the past, in offices with revenue from $400 and upwards, could be appointed to an office if there was a vacancy, unless the commission advertised it. The commission had to advertise it, and not the Post Office department. When the vacancy was advertised and applications were received, they were forwarded to the Civil Service Commission. The commission notified the Post Office Department that such and such applications had been received and would then request the department to send an inspector or superintendent or other qualified official to interview the applicant and report back to the commission. The report came to the Post Office Department first, was reviewed there and then sent on to the Civil Service Commission. So that every appointment made to a post office with an annual revenue of $400 a year came directly under the Civil Service Act, with the exception that they did not come under it for the purpose of pension and other privileges. Therefore anyone who says that revenue postmasters are not under the act is mistaken. If they are not, why should this committee recommend that they be removed from the operation of the act? Yet that is what is recommended. They recommend that these postmasters be taken from under the operation of the act. They admit themselves, by the report, that such postmasters are under the act, and the reference made by the chairman of the committee to that section of the Post Office Act which gives power to the Postmaster General to remove or to suspend any postmaster or other officer or servant of the post office does not apply in the way the chairman has explained it to the house, because by an order in council which will be found here and which, under the Post Office Act, has equal force with and becomes part of the statute, it is declared how these postmasters, under the Civil Service Act, shall be governed. That order in council was passed in 1922. The Civil Service Act provides that any civil servant who participates in partisan politics shall be dismissed, and the interpretation placed on that was that all postmasters, notwithstanding what the revenue might be, were under the civil service. In 1922 or 1923, however, the Civil Service Commission recommended to the government that postmasters in rural offices with a revenue under $400 a year should be removed from the operation of the act.

Mr. LAVERGNE: How?

Mr. VENIOT: By order in council.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Could an order in council amend the law of the country, if the facts were as the hon. gentleman has stated?

Mr. VENIOT: No order in council can amend any law, but the statute provides that when the Civil Service Commission shall recommend to the governor general in council that such and such a classification shall be removed from the jurisdiction of the commission, then the order in council becomes effective. It is provided for under the statute.

Now, as to the reasons for dismissals, there seems to be a wrong impression among hon. members. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) gave some of the reasons, but he did not give them all. There is reason for dismissal upon inspection or examination by post office officials into the administration of the office by a postmaster. The Postmaster General has power to order an investigation on complaint made, and that investigation, under the regulations applying thereto, must be made by an official of the Post Office Department and not by an outside investigator.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. VENIOT: That voice is a little rough to-night; you had better grease it a little. The Postmaster General then has power to suspend or to dismiss, even in the highest salaried offices in the country. If this section of the report, to which I have referred, means that revenue postmasters in offices of over $3,000 are going to be placed under the straight salary system—and I understood that the officials of the department indicated that it was the intention of the Post Office department so to proceed—they will have to proceed by a change in the act. I wonder whether the commission has considered what that would mean. It makes this difference. If these men are placed under straight salary, on the basis of $3,000 revenue, then the government will have to employ whatever help or assistance they require. Where a revenue postmaster to-day is paid on a salary and commission basis, his salary being $100 and his commission being on receipts and so forth, he employs his own help; and because that help is not permanent, so far as he is concerned, he can get it more cheaply than the department can. On the straight salary he is placed in classification 2B, and the Civil Service Commission will have to fix the salary of the postmaster, who is on a salary and commission basis, and fix the salary of his assistant. The chairman of the committee stated that postmasters in rural districts or in low revenue offices were not obliged to be on permanent duty. In that my hon. friend is wrong; when they make that statement the whole committee is wrong. The hours of those postmasters are from 7 or 8 o'clock in the morning until 8 o'clock at night.

Mr. LAWSON: The hours of the office.

Mr. VENIOT: The office must be kept open, and someone must be there.

Mr. LAWSON: Not necessarily the postmaster.

Mr. VENIOT: He is the responsible person. I wonder if the janitor would be left in attendance. The postmaster must be there, or have a paid assistant in attendance. The impression left with the public that because these men are not permanently in attendance they should be thrown to the political wolves is quite wrong.

The committee was appointed to investigate the operation of the Civil Service Act, not only as it affected the Post Office Department, but its connection with every department of the government. Why has the committee singled out the Post Office Department for a change? If I believed that hon. members opposite were honest in their attempts in 1929 to show that I was so embittered that I was prepared to upset the whole Civil Service Commission, I might very well ask them to-day this question: How is it that because at that time I discussed and criticized the system of the Civil Service Commission—not the work of the men, but the system—that I was accused by hon. members opposite of wishing to destroy the commission? I recall my criticism in 1929 was based on some of the very reasons contained in the report now before us. At the time I said the system of classification was bad, that the Civil Service Commission did not have the qualifications to classify for promotions within departments, and that that duty should rest on the officials of the department, or those in charge of the branches in which the promotions were to be made. Hon. members of the committee now agree with my contention. Yet at that time I was declared to be one of the worst enemies of the Civil Service Commission and the merit system that Canada had known for a good many years. To-day I see before me the justification for the stand I took at that time, to-day I have sweet revenge.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, it is sweet revenge to see hon. members opposite swallowing everything they threw out against me a few years ago.

I am going to vote, Mr. Speaker, against the report, although I believe the members of the committee were honest, and that they did all they could with the material placed before them. I suggest, however, that they did not go far enough in getting material. They should have explained in their report and should explain to the house why they singled out the Post Office Department and let other departments go by the board. The power is given the Civil Service Commission—

Mr. PRICE: When did you observe them?

Mr. YOUNG: When he was postmaster general.

Mr. VENIOT: One thing is sure, if I did not observe what the hon. member refers to, there is one thing I did observe, namely a little decency in my conduct in the house.

Mr. PRICE: Oh.

Mr. VENIOT: Now, sir—

Mr. PRICE: Do you observe your own record?

Mr. VENIOT: I would not like to observe yours.

Mr. PRICE: You had better observe your expenditures and political activities in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. VENIOT: Oh, sit down.

Mr. PRICE: You had better observe yours. Oh, you are good.

Mr. VENIOT: I beg the pardon of the house for listening to the interruption of the hon. member. Under the powers given the Civil Service Commission to recommend to the governor in council what positions shall be taken out of or placed under the jurisdiction of the commission, they recommended at the time they sent in their recommendations touching the Post Office Department that a certain number of positions in other departments be taken out. Why did the committee not consider those other departments? They may give the excuse that they could not do so on a revenue basis. Probably not, but it could have been done on a salary basis. Formerly postmasters were put on salaries of $200. On the basis of the revenue they brought in they were placed either beyond or within the control of the civil service commission. In 1926 parliament reduced the postage rate on letters from three to two cents. In view of the reduction in revenue and the hardships caused thereby, an order in council was passed whereby postmasters' commissions were lessened, and their rentals based on revenue lessened. In order to do justice to them the government passed an order in council by which the commission of rural postmasters would be based upon the revenue of the office prior to the introduction of the reduction in postage from three to two cents. That has stood ever since, and it is on that basis that they were paid their commissions until December last when that order in council was rescinded. Now the postmasters are paid simply and only upon the actual revenue received from year to year.

If the committee had gone into other departments and made similar recommendations in regard to them I might see some justification in their action. If I am to believe the report, and if I judge properly from the speeches made this afternoon, I would conclude they have made the change in the Post Office department because they were informed by the chief officials thereof that the work of the department would be lessened. Knowing these officials as I do, I can hardly credit that they would give that as a sufficient reason for placing those men outside the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission, because it must be recognized that their work in the department will be far greater under this recommendation, if it is carried out, than it could have been with those men under the commission. I have faith in the Civil Service Act; I have faith in the merit system, and if in their investigation the committee found anything wrong, why did they not indicate what it was? Why did they not give the real reason that actuated them in making that report? The fact that some of the officials of the Civil Service Commission or of the Post Office Department may have gone astray, may have made mistakes in classification, may have allowed themselves to be influenced by political pull, is no reason why the civil service commissioners should be thrown out of office without the committee giving the public the real reason for which they were put out. During my term of office as Postmaster General, a period of four years—

An hon. MEMBER: How many did the hon. member dismiss?

Mr. VENIOT: In four years and a half I dismissed, for just cause, as I could under the law, 602 postmasters, only 162 of whom were dismissed for political reasons, while in the last eighteen months the present Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) dismissed 597, of whom 474 were dismissed for political reasons. Now the hon. gentleman has the answer.

Mr. COTNAM: That is the hon. member's answer.

Mr. VENIOT: These figures are correct. No hon. member can deny them. They are on the table of the house. If they are not correct, then the Postmaster General has made a false report to parliament.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Order.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not out of order. Although the hon. gentleman is Deputy Speaker of the house, I want him to understand there are other members who know the rules as well as he does. I did not say that the Postmaster General made a false report; I said that if those figures were not correct, he made a false report, and under the rules of the house I am justified in using that term. The hon. gentleman should remember that he is not the only pebble on the beach.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I can see nothing solid in front of me.

Mr. VENIOT: But the hon. member has not anything solid behind him. Every seat behind him is empty just because I believe hon. members opposite do not want the report submitted to the house.

An hon. MEMBER: No wonder the seats are empty!

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, hon members opposite are afraid to vote as they feel they should.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. VENIOT: I should like to hear some of the whispering that will go on after the house adjourns to-night. Then we would know the real situation. Now, I am through with my remarks.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. VENIOT: Then I am not through with my remarks. I hear a voice saying "It is time you were." Well, if in the house I had denounced the patronage system as the hon. gentleman did in the years when I was Postmaster General, I would think twice before I would have voted for this recommendation.

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, had it not been for the remarks made by the former Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) a little while ago, I would not have considered it necessary to give the house a few of my opinions concerning the report that is now before us. Before I deal with the observations made by the former Postmaster General, may I be permitted to explain the situation that existed in Mundare, a little village in my constituency. In 1926 I came to Ottawa a young man, full of hope, faith and everything else that goes with youth, but I was very much disillusioned after my arrival. A young man, George Woytkiw, approached me in regard to the position of postmaster in Mundare, and for the information of hon. members present may I say that this young man received the largest petition in that district, getting 345 names as against 115 for the other applicant, Mr. Stewart, who was supported by the defeated candidate. I think possibly the three greatest pests are mosquitos, grasshoppers and, to a member of parliament, defeated candidates—I am adding the latter because nothing gives a member of parliament so much trouble as does a defeated candidate. Mr. Stewart was appointed, there is no doubt in my mind, because of political influence that was exerted in his behalf. The former Postmaster General says that he is in favour of the merit system. As I have already stated, this young man, Woytkiw, received the largest petition; he was also the choice of the district superintendent, and in addition he was very highly recommended over all the other applicants by the chief examiner. In spite of all this merit the Post Office Department recommended the other candidate, namely, the one who received the fewest marks and who was not recommended as first choice by either the district superintendent or the chief examiner or the chairman of the commission.

Mr. VENIOT: What was the revenue?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I forget the revenue, but the village is fairly large and the revenue would run into thousands of dollars. The following letter, which was sent to the Secretary of the Civil Service Commission under date of February 10, 1927, discloses the manner in which political pressure was brought to bear:

Dear Sir:

I am enclosing the report of the district superintendent at Edmonton on the vacancy in the postmastership at Mundare, Alberta. The usual application forms, etc., are enclosed.

In connection with this appointment, I may say that the Postmaster General has himself made a study of the case and has stated that Mr. W. A. Stewart is conversant with the Ukranian and the English language. The Postmaster General further states that "the former postmaster was a Mr. Woytkiw, who having taken over the vendorship under the liquor law of Alberta, was informed that he could not hold this vendorship and remain postmaster. He then resigned as postmaster and his son George Woytkiw was appointed acting postmaster. Now it does not seem fair that this man should be given preference over W. A. Stewart, merely because the district superintendent thinks that he is better qualified on account of his longer experience in the office. There is nothing to show that W. A. Stewart would not be an efficient officer. It is for these reasons that I am taking the matter up with you and asking you to take it up with the commission."

Will you be good enough therefore to give favourable consideration to Mr. Stewart's claims.

This matter has been brought to the immediate attention of the Postmaster General.

Yours sincerely,

P. T. Coolican,
Acting Deputy Postmaster General.

Mr. Stewart, according to this letter, was given the job of postmaster at Mundare because of the recommendation of the then Postmaster General. It is said that the father of this young man Woytkiw was at that time the liquor vendor. This young man is a son of the present liquor vendor of that village, not by birth but by adoption, and at the present time he is living on his own resources and not on those of his foster father.

I should like to ask a question of the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for West York, who presented this report. I understand that there is a clause in this report recommending that a committee of this house be appointed to keep a check on the new civil service commission. Until recently I did not know that there was any such clause in the report, and so I was very solicitous for the three future members of the commission. It seemed to me that if there was no efficient way of controlling these men or checking the adverse influences brought to bear on them it would indeed be very hard and disagreeable for them in the future. I was sorry to hear that we were going to appoint three exemplary and efficient and God-fearing men to that commission; I should be very much averse to spoiling three honest-to-goodness Canadian citizens by making them civil service commissioners. I know no other place, under the circumstances, where three good men could be as quickly spoiled. I would therefore like to ask the hon. member for West York, who presented this report to the house, what effect, if any, will the committee that is to be appointed have upon the actions of the new commissioners? Will it be a sufficient check upon the commission? Will it improve or impair the merit system? Will it or will it not allow patronage to seep into the Civil Service Commission as it has done hitherto?

Mr. BROWN: I would like to ask the hon. member for West York to make it very clear just how the returned soldiers' preference will be protected now that it is proposed to take from three to four thousand positions from under the operation of the Civil Service Act. What other act than the Civil Service Act is there making it obligatory to give returned soldiers any preference?

Mr. GOTT: A proper sentiment upon the part of the sitting member.

Mr. BROWN: It is true that circulars sometimes go forward to members inviting them to remember that that clause is in the act, but I would like the hon. member for West York to point out very clearly what protection the law gives to the returned soldier in the matter of a preference now that it is proposed to take these three or four thousand positions from the operation of the act.

Mr. LAWSON: In reply—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member for West York speaks he will close the debate.

Mr. LAWSON: I was just going to reply, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member—

Mr. SPEAKER: He had no right to ask questions at this stage. If the hon. member for West York speaks he will close the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. LAWSON: In answer to the hon. member for Vegreville, I hope that the select committee of this house to sit each year will operate for the promotion of the merit system. In answer to the hon. member for Lisgar, I quoted this afternoon the provision of the order in council which preserves the returned soldiers' preference with respect to revenue post offices exempted where the revenue does not exceed $400 a year.

Main motion (Mr. Lawson) agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES RESPECTING MEASURES TO RELIEVE DISTRESS

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour) moved the third reading of Bill No. 72, respecting relief measures.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned on the second reading, this is the fourth measure which the present administration has introduced with respect to unemployment relief. The house having heard so frequently and emphatically the views of the official opposition on the features of the previous bills, which gave to the administration a blank cheque and also the power to legislate by order in council with respect to matters which in our opinion should be reserved to the House of Commons and the Senate, it would hardly be expected that we would acquiesce in this particular measure and readily give to it our support. However, those who were in the house yesterday must have been impressed with the statement made by the Minister of Labour that it was then the eleventh of the month, and that since the first day of May there had not been in existence any legislation which would permit of the government entering into any agreements with the provinces in regard to this all-important matter of unemployment relief, and that that power would not be possessed by the administration until the legislation here proposed had passed this house and the Senate and had received royal assent. Other hon. members made reference to the extent to which there is actual suffering in the country at the moment on the part of large numbers through the absence of the means to satisfy their wants. Were the circumstances other than as described, certainly we of the opposition would move in amendment to this motion for the third reading, to refer the bill back to the committee of the whole house to reconsider certain of its aspects.

What we particularly deplore about the measure is the absence of evidence of any policy on the part of the government with respect to unemployment relief. Up to the present time there has been at least a profession on the part of the administration that it would endeavour to carry out its promises to provide work—not only to provide work, but to end unemployment through work that would be provided. But so far as this bill is concerned, having regard to what has been stated by the minister himself and to the provisions of the bill, it is perfectly clear that the government has thrown overboard completely whatever intention in the way of policy it may have had to provide work as a means of ending unemployment. The present measure substitutes, so far as the federal government is concerned, contributions to the provinces for the purpose of administering doles where such may be necessary to meet the demand of immediate relief.

[Mr. Gordon.]

Coming at the end of almost two years of office and being all that the administration can offer, especially after its members have had a free hand and the experience which comes with office in dealing with important questions, it is a lamentable confession of complete failure to cope with this all-important question and to offer to the country anything in the nature of a constructive policy. However, I suppose for those who are suffering, anything in the shape of assistance is better than nothing, and for that reason, having regard also to the lateness of the session, we do not propose in any way to delay the giving of such relief as the government may still intend to give through the provinces in accordance with what apparently is their only method, namely the method provided here. While, for the reasons mentioned, we are prepared to allow the bill to pass third reading without amendment, we desire, at the same time, to register as strongly as we can our protest against the measure in the form in which it is, renewing as it does the objectionable feature of the blank cheque, which deprives this House of Commons of the control which it should have over expenditures and consequent taxation, and the equally, if not more, objectionable feature of giving to the governor in council power to legislate, notwithstanding the existence of any law or statute, with respect to matters which we believe should be legislated upon only by the Commons and the Senate. With this protest, Mr. Speaker, and at the same time with the hope that by expediting the enactment to the extent which may thus be possible, we shall be serving a helpful end, we do not at this time propose to offer further opposition.

I have just this one further word to add. It is most regrettable that this measure, which deals with the most important subject which has come up this session, should have been left for the purposes of discussion, as has been the case with similar measures in previous years, until the closing weeks of the session. I said at the time the Unemployment Relief Continuance Act was introduced that the government should at that time, instead of introducing a temporary measure, have then brought down its legislation with respect to relief measures in order that there might be ample time for discussion. The fact that as matters now stand we are half a month beyond the period during which any relief for the new fiscal year can be given under legislation relative thereto is something for which the government itself is wholly responsible.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

IMPERIAL ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

To provide for expenses in connection with the Imperial economic conference, $250,000.

Mr. BENNETT: I may say there will be an additional item in the supplementary estimates, so that another opportunity will be afforded for discussion.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, as I intimated the other day, I am particularly anxious to offer a few suggestions to the Prime Minister —if I may put it that way—as the Imperial economic conference is perhaps of greater interest and importance to the people of the part of Nova Scotia from which I come than any other matter that has came before the house this session. While what I shall put forward will be general in its nature and national in its application, I may, perhaps take as a starting point the interests of the apple growers and apple exporters of Nova Scotia.

The apple exporting industry of Canada is in many respects a typical exporting industry, depending to a very large extent upon the market of the United Kingdom. I have the figures here, but I will not weary the committee with details; I propose to state the main features of the situation. The dominion exports about one third of its total apple production to the United Kingdom market. During the last five years our production has averaged about 3,500,000 barrels, of which from 1,100,000 to 1,200,000 barrels have found a market in Great Britain.

Our competitors in the United Kingdom market are the British themselves, who raise quite a large quantity of fruit, and more particularly the apple growers of the United States. The situation in the United States differs from the situation in Canada in this respect, that they have an enormous production in that country. It is very difficult to get figures showing the exact production, but it is from 125,000,000 to 250,000,000 bushels per annum. This production is largely marketed in the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry, but I cannot hear the hon. gentleman.

Mr. ILSLEY: I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that while we in Canada export about one-third of our total production of apples to the United Kingdom—and the greater part of our exports go to the United Kingdom—the same is not true of the United States, our chief competitor in that market. They export twice as large a quantity of apples to the United Kingdom as we do, but that is an insignificant proportion of their total production. I should like to make this feature of the apple exporting situation perfectly clear; while their production is huge, it varies greatly. The surplus they export varies greatly also, but that surplus is only a very small proportion of their total production, amounting to not more than seven per cent or eight per cent at the most. The result is that in a year of heavy production in the United States at times we find the British market almost ruined by these large American surpluses.

For these reasons it is important that the present preference, with which I shall deal in a moment, should be preserved if possible. The tariff preference in the British market at present, under the Import Duties Act which came into effect on March 1, 1932, is ten per cent. Before I go into that, in order to put the matter clearly perhaps I should read a summary of an extract from the report of the Imperial economic committee of 1926. Your attention is called specifically to the following points:

(1) That in the United States there is the home market offered by the population of 115,000,000 consuming more fruit per head than the population of the United Kingdom. The exported surplus averages some 7 per cent of the total crop.

(2) That Canada on the other hand, with a population of only 9,000,000 must export at least 30 per cent of the total crop or more than four times as high a proportion as the United States. The export trade is vital to the Canadian apple grower and merely incidental to the American grower.

(3) That the American apple market is protected by a customs tariff and that it has been particular to avoid glutted market conditions on the home market by throwing the bolk of the increase into the export trade. The arrival of these dumped surpluses and indeed the mere knowledge that they would be forthcoming from the other side of the Atlantic tends to wreck the markets. The effect is to wreck the prospects of the home and Canadian growers.

Along the same line I should like to quote from a book called Imperial Economic Unity, written by the late Sir Alfred Mond, Lord Melchett. At page 149 he says:

Both Australian and Canadian official reports state that in recent years the apple industry has declined and the acreage under cultivation has become slightly less, owing to difficulties experienced in disposing of their production. The principal contributory factor to this is the varying surplus production of the United States of America.

At page 150 he states:

The export trade of the American fruit grower is merely a matter of the disposal of surplus production, whereas in Canada and Australia a steady and assured export market is vital to the very existence of the industry.

The Canadian Horticultural Council has been studying the problem, and the figures they give to the public indicate that the United Kingdom imports about 5,000,000 barrels of apples each year and that at present Canada is supplying not nearly half those requirements, but that there is capacity for development of production in Canada and in Australasia to the extent necessary to take care of the entire import requirements of the United Kingdom.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it not also true that you must have regard to climatic conditions and seasonal demands in order that other countries may also serve those seasonal demands having regard to the climatic conditions under which apples are produced?

Mr. ILSLEY: I speak subject to correction, but my answer would be that between Canada, Australasia and South Africa the entire import requirements of the United Kingdom could be met.

Mr. BENNETT: That is right.

Mr. ILSLEY: The United States does not serve a complementary purpose at all, their apples go in during the same season that apples are imported from Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly what I endeavoured to show, that other portions of the empire in addition to Canada are producing apples that could supply the English market at other seasons.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right. I think the material factors in the situation are, first, a large and immensely valuable market for apples in the United Kingdom; second, the capacity of the British dominions to acquire and supply a large part of that market; third, the menace of the competition of huge and varying surpluses of United States apples in that market; fourth, the special importance of that market to the province of Nova Scotia, which is particularly adapted to the export of apples to Great Britain and from which come the great bulk of apples exported from Canada; fifth, the value of a preference on apples in that market, and sixth, the great and paramount importance of free entry into that market.

That brings me, Mr. Chairman, to some general considerations with regard to the preferences that now exist. I may say that preferences in Great Britain have been built up over a long period of years. I do not want to go too far back into history, but of course there were the preferences under the Navigation Acts, which ceased when the Navigation Acts were repealed in 1847, when free trade came in. Those preferences were not suited to present conditions, although the Canadian lumber trade between 1807 and 1847 was built up on the colonial preferences which existed for about two centuries before the advent of free trade in 1846. Between 1847 and 1897 there were no preferences between Great Britain and the dominion, but in 1897 Canada introduced a voluntary British preference. This country was followed by the other British dominions; in 1903 New Zealand extended voluntary preferences to Great Britain. In 1904 South Africa followed, in 1907 Australia followed, and then a great many other parts of the British Empire followed with these voluntary preferences. Perhaps the members of the committee will be surprised to know the ramifications of the voluntary preferential system throughout the British Empire. These are some of the parts of the empire which extend preferences to Great Britain: the Irish Free State, whose preference came into effect in 1923; Northern Rhodesia; Southern Rhodesia; India, which gives a small preference on certain classes of iron and steel goods; Fiji; the Bahamas; Jamaica; St. Lucia; St. Vincent; Barbados; the Virgin Islands; Grenada; St. Christopher; Nevis; Antigua; Montserrat; Trinidad; Tobago; Dominica; British Honduras; British Guiana; Cyprus; Mauritius; Brunei; Gibraltar; British North Borneo; Bermuda; and Samoa. That widespread and farreaching system of voluntary preferences has grown up, not upon the basis of bargaining of quid pro quo at all; they are voluntary preferences. The first protective element introduced by Great Britain into her fiscal system after the abolition of protection, between 1846 and 1860, was introduced in 1915 with the McKenna duties. The only duties before that, in all that interval—that is, anything that could be called protective—were the wheat duties between 1902 and 1903, which were very small and soon repealed, and the tobacco duty in 1904.

Mr. BENNETT: A shilling a quarter.

Mr. ILSLEY: The tobacco duties were reduced a year or two afterwards. In 1915, however, as a war measure, the McKenna duties came into effect. Those duties applied to musical instruments, clocks and watches, and cinematograph films, if I remember rightly. They were introduced, as I say, more as a war measure than a trade measure, first, to save space in ships taking raw materials to Britain, and secondly, to relieve the exchange situation as between Great Britain and the United States. No preferences were provided when the McKenna duties were first imposed, but in 1919 preferences were granted to the dominions and colonies by the Finance Act of that year, and then followed a rapid and very notable extension of preferential treatment to the dominions and colonies. As I have said, the preferences began in 1919. In 1920 the Importation of Dyestuffs Act provided for the prohibition of the importation of dyestuffs into Britain, but not from parts of the British Empire. In 1921 the Safeguarding of Industries Act was introduced, providing for the imposition of duties on key industry goods and on other goods after inquiry, but under that act no duties were imposed against British Empire goods. In 1923 the Irish Free State, which had come into existence, obtained the benefit of the preferences that were given to the other parts of the empire, and in that year also was held the Imperial economic conference to which my right hon. leader referred the other day, and preferences were arranged for at that conference on a large number of articles. Mr. Baldwin was, I think, Prime Minister of Great Britain at that time; at any rate, the Conservative party was in power there. Before these duties could be brought into effect Mr. Baldwin went to the people on a platform of protection and was defeated, and consequently when the new parliament met in 1924 its membership was opposed to protection and therefore the preferences arranged for at the Imperial economic conference of 1923 did not come into effect. I may mention, in reference to apples, that it was agreed at the conference of 1923 that there should be a preference on raw apples. It was proposed to levy a duty of five shillings a hundredweight on raw apples of foreign origin, and to continue to admit raw apples from the empire free of duty. Then in 1925, 1926, 1927 and 1928 there were extensions every year of preferences to the dominions and other parts of the British Empire as new duties were imposed; and then, of course, this year, came the Import Duties Act which placed a duty of ten per cent upon nearly all goods entering the United Kingdom, the chief exceptions being wheat, in grain, meat, including bacon, raw cotton, raw wool, fish of British catch, newspapers and newsprint in rolls containing not less than seventy per cent mechanical wood pulp, wood pulp itself, raw rubber, iron ore, tin ore and shipbuilding materials consigned direct to shipbuilding yards. The extent of these preferences that have gradually been granted by the United Kingdom to the dominions is shown by a book I have in my hand, and to which I have referred, by Lord Melchett, in which he gives the percentages of imported dutiable goods upon which preference is given. These goods, from empire countries, are: tea, 84·8 per cent; cocoa, raw, 93·4 per cent; coffee, 50·9 per cent; sugar, raw and refined, 38 per cent; raisins, 27·7 per cent; motor cars, 20·9 per cent, and many others. This shows that quite a large proportion of the imports in important lines that went into the United Kingdom came from the British dominions and colonies under preferential tariffs.

The Import Duties Act provides that these preferences shall lapse on the 15th day of November as against the dominions but not as against the colonies. That, I think, is a significant fact. It is only against the dominions which have imposed, practically all of them, protective tariffs, and in some cases very high protective tariffs against the mother country; it is only as against these that the preferences shall lapse on November 15. It is of great importance to the part of Canada from which I come, and needless to say it is of great importance to Canada as a whole, that this government, at the forthcoming Imperial economic conference, should so conduct negotiations that there be an extension of these preferences past the 15th day of November.

The conclusions which I would draw from the facts I have put forward are, first, that without the introduction of bargaining at all as between the units of the empire, there has come into existence a gradually evolving system of preferences, which would probably have accomplished all and perhaps more than all that the Imperial economic conference will accomplish; secondly, that had it not been for the hostile tariffs of the dominions, imposed by legislation or by orders in council, the preferences under the Import Duties Act would probably have been unlimited as to duration, as they were in the case of the colonies, instead of being limited to a period expiring on November 15 next.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman knows that the period expiring on November 15 was fixed with the Imperial conference in view. That was declared by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. ILSLEY: It does not necessarily follow—

Mr. BENNETT: That is what he says he did it for.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but the point is this. My right hon. friend, at the Imperial conference of 1930, indicated that it was desirable, in his opinion, that we simply give preference for preference, that we grant preferences upon a bargaining basis. He took the view that this was the only businesslike way in which to do it. Great Britain has on every occasion on which she had imposed protective duties extended substantial preferences to the dominions. But very sensibly she took the view that if trade was to be upon a bargaining basis she would give the dominions bargaining. That is to say she would make her preferences lapse on November 15 so that she would have something to bargain with. That policy would never have been adopted had it not been for the interjection by the Prime Minister at the Imperial economic conference in 1930 of that new element in trade relations between the different parts of the British Empire.

In my constituency we knew that just as soon as Great Britain got to the place where she deemed it advisable in her interests to impose protective tariffs on apples we would go in on a preferred basis, and retain freedom of entrance into that market. However, the introduction by our Prime Minister of this new principle at the Imperial economic conference of 1930 upset the development of the whole system, so that when they brought in their duties on March 1, 1932, they put a time limit on, and now we are faced with the necessity of negotiation as to whether our apples and other goods will continue to enter that market free.

I should say it is of far more importance that we continue to get into the market than that we receive a preference, but with duties that debar us. Freedom of entrance may be more important than protection in the market. Freedom of entrance into that market on preferential terms would have come with the coming into effect of a protective system in Great Britain without bargaining at all, in the natural course of events as indicated by the facts I have given to the committee.

My submission is that the present government's policy in Imperial trade relations has been unfortunate, and that if we are to continue the progress that has been made a reversal of that policy is essential. Now, what are the principles that should guide the government at the conference? It seems to me at the forthcoming Imperial economic conference we should not, if we can help it, tie our hands so far as negotiations with foreign countries are concerned. We may depend upon it that the United Kingdom will not tie its hands in those relations. Great Britain has close trade relations with the Argentine republic, the Scandinavian countries and other countries which treat them better in their markets than we treat them in ours.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Not long ago Mr. Runciman made a speech in which he said:

> We are bound and determined to make arrangements for our own dominions during this summer and autumn which will add to our volume of trade between us and them, but that does not preclude us from making friendly arrangements with foreign countries, friendly arrangements to which I look forward with great hope.
> You can be sure we are sufficiently open-minded to prevent any policies standing in the way of the development of world trade.

The Dominion of Canada also is so constituted that it can deal advantageously with countries outside the British Empire. During recent years there has grown up what might be termed a state of tariff war between Canada and the United States. I do not think, however, many of us believe that condition will continue indefinitely. These two countries are so situated that a very large and profitable trade must be done between them. I submit it would be unwise at the Imperial conference for Canada so to tie her hands that she could not negotiate with countries such as the United States, a country with which she can do business under such peculiarly favourable conditions.

The same is true of Germany. Since I have sat in this house I have had representations year after year from people in my constituency asking that I do something or get the government to do something to improve trade relations with Germany. There we have very hostile tariffs against us. In some cases their tariffs against us are twice as high as they are against the United States. If it could be avoided it would be unwise for the Dominion of Canada at the coming conference to tie its hands as to negotiations with countries with which she can trade profitably. It must be remembered that the trend during the last twenty years has been in the direction of a greater percentage of trade with foreign countries. I have before me figures for the years 1911 and 1932. In 1911, 54.3 per cent of our exports were to other parts of the British Empire; in 1932, the figure was only 38 per cent. In 1911, 28.7 per cent of our imports were from other parts of the British Empire, whereas in 1932, the figure was only 25.5 per cent. In that connection there is a substantial reduction in both cases, but especially as to the percentage of exports. As to the United States, the percentage of our total trade has remained about the same. In 1911, 38 per cent of our exports were to the United States, and in 1932 there was an increased figure of 40.8 per cent. In 1911, 60.8 per cent of our imports were from the United States, and in 1932, the figure was exactly the same. In other words our trade with our neighbouring country, in percentage of total trade during the last twenty-one years has remained practically the same. When we come to other foreign countries, however, we see during that period a great increase in the percentage of trade. In 1911, 7.7 per cent of our exports were to other foreign countries; in 1932 the figure was 21.2 per cent. In 1911, 10.5 per cent of our imports were from other foreign countries, whereas in 1932 there has been an increase to 13.7 per cent. That is to say, the percentage of our exports to other foreign countries, countries other than the United States and parts of the British Empire, during the past twenty-one years has been multiplied by three. We would be unwise to fly in the face of that trend, especially when it it considered that in all probability a great many foreign countries will be negotiating with one another and with us for the reduction of tariffs during the next few years.

Another guiding principle that should prevail at the Imperial economic conference is that we should attempt to increase and expand, not merely deflect trade. I believe that is the most fundamental and the soundest criticism of the enormous duties which during the last year and a half we have placed against British products. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth placed on Hansard during his speech on the budget some rates to which I should like to make reference. When dumping duties and tariff rates were added together some of them went as high as 99 per cent ad valorem. Some of the rates were 94 per cent, 43 per cent, 99 per cent, 75 per cent, 46¼ per cent, 41 per cent, and so on. The erection of these very high tariffs against Great Britain has reduced the volume of trade. If the effects of such tariffs were merely to deflect trade, if it meant merely that buyers bought from Canadian instead of British sources, it would not be so unfortunate, but it means that not only do they change their sources of supply but they do not buy as much. The total volume of trade is cut down. If there is one thing upon which leading economists in the world of to-day agree—and I refer to men such as John Maynard Keynes—it is the importance of getting people to buy and sell in a larger way. If the world is to recover from the depression there must be an expansion of the volume of trade. Consequently any development at the Imperial economic conference which simply deflects without increasing trade will not be in the best interests either of this country or of the world as a whole. A policy which means merely that the empire will erect around its borders a high tariff, leaving the high tariffs still existing between the various parts of the empire, will reduce rather than increase the total volume of trade and will not be in the best interests of Canada. I urge that consideration with the greatest confidence and earnestness upon the Prime Minister. The idea put forward at the Imperial conference of 1930 that every industry we can get going in this country we must protect by high tariffs against the other parts of the empire and then put around the empire itself another high tariff against the rest of the world, is not in line with what economists or, for that matter, business men or statesmen, are now urging. The advice that is being given in increasing volume is to adopt policies that will stimulate and increase the total volume of trade.

Finally I would say this: We should avoid the establishment of an Imperial economic unit or zollverein which will isolate us from the rest of the world and provoke other nations to form themselves into similar exclusive trading confederacies. I do not think it is necessary to elaborate that thought. Anyone who has been reading the articles in the magazines and the speeches that are being made will see the great danger of making of the British Empire a zollverein such as the German states constituted in the last century. In the Round Table of March, 1932, there was a very thoughtful article on Imperial preference, and the conclusion to which the writer of that article came, I adopt, because it seems to me very sensible. It reads:

> Let us now sum up what seem to be the fundamentals of any system of Imperial trade regulation, including preference, which is to be of lasting value. It must take into account the fundamental economic policies of the participants, including the balance between their industry and agriculture, and their commercial relations with the rest of the world. Once those essentials have been determined, it should imply a progress towards a lowering of tariffs and the breakdown of economic nationalism generally; it must expand rather than diminish the volume of world trade. While for the time being it may injure third parties it must not be directed against them, and must leave them an opportunity of participating in preferential advantages in exchange of equivalent undertakings. It must not be of such complication or duration as to tie the hands of any party unduly in its trading relations either within or outside the commonwealth. Above all, it must be based on the principle of mutual advantage and free consent.

It is fashionable at present to say that we should make suggestions as to what we should give at this conference rather than what we should seek to get. I can think of many things, but those possibilities, no doubt, are being explored by the government. Their task at this conference is not going to be an easy one, but if they keep in mind certain principles, those that are embodied in the conclusion of the article from the Round Table which I have read, I do not see any reason why they cannot make a success of the coming Imperial economic conference.

Mr. GOTT: I should like for a few moments to draw to the attention of the government the importance of having the subject of tobacco on the agenda of the Imperial economic conference. I should like the opportunity of discussing the tobacco situation from grower to consumer, because I have in relation to this problem very definite ideas which, if carried into effect, would, I believe, put the industry on its feet.

First, I would raise the tariff on imported raw leaf and keep out 16,000,000 pounds of raw leaf tobacco which comes in from the United States each year. Second, I would lower the excise duty on cigarettes and thus double not only the consumption but the output of Canadian cigarettes in Canada. Third, I would appoint a commission to exterminate the tobacco combine and establish a fair price for the growers. Fourth, I would endeavour to increase the British preference. I want to indicate the opportunities which the Canadian representatives at the Imperial conference will have of impressing upon the people of the United Kingdom the possibility of increasing our exportation of tobacco. Great Britain imports every year approximately 220,000,000 pounds of tobacco. I have under my hand figures which I should like to place on record, but the Speaker has ruled that in order to have this done, they must be read, hence they are as follows:

We in Canada produced last year, 1931, 51,000,000 pounds of tobacco. All colonial tobacco, including that of this country, has in the British market a preference of forty-nine cents per pound. The figures I have given can be reversed; instead of the United Kingdom importing 200,000,000 pounds of tobacco from the United States, we, the tobacco producers in Canada, can supply the British market with all the tobacco it needs and of just as good a grade as is grown in any part of the British Empire, in fact, of the world. How can we do this? In this way: if our representatives can induce those of the United Kingdom to permit our tobacco to enter the mother country free of duty and to impose the regular duty against imports from foreign countries, we can supplant the 200,000,000 pounds of tobacco that is imported each year into the United Kingdom from the United States. I am sorry it is eleven o'clock. I should like to have gone a little further.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, May 13, 1932.

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

First and final report of select standing committee on privileges and elections.—Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury).

Second, third and final reports of special committee appointed to consider Bill No. 41, to amend the Bankruptcy Act.—Mr. Hackett.

BUDGET RESOLUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) if he can give the house any idea when we will proceed with the budget resolutions.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I rather anticipate that they will come up the first of next week.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

APPEAL FOR CONTINUANCE OF RELIEF MEASURES IN GLACE BAY, N.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): I would like to ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) a question through you, Mr. Speaker, dealing with the matter of relief. To-day I received the following telegram from the district surrounding Glace Bay, Nova Scotia.

Whereas the relief program as it affects the citizens of the town of Glace Bay has ceased to exist, owing to the town having gone beyond their financial means, and whereas the citizens of the town had not had an opportunity to increase their earnings so that relief should not be necessary, therefore be it resolved that we petition the provincial and federal governments to meet the relief situation as it affects the citizens of this town. This resolution has been drawn up by representatives of local unions in sub-district one, United Mine Workers of America, in the town of Glace Bay.

The numbers of the unions represented are given, together with the towns in which they are located. The towns represented were New Aberdeen, Passchendaele, Glace Bay and Caledonia. The telegram proceeds.

We request a reply immediately as we must report your decision to a mass demonstration before the end of the following week.

This telegram is signed on behalf of the committee by Peter McNeil, Kenny McDonald, Melvin Daye, John Quann, Silby Barrett and Dan J. McDonald. I should like to know the attitude of the federal government in this regard.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): I assume that representations along the line of the information contained in this telegram have been transmitted by the municipality affected to the government of Nova Scotia. I have not received any communication from that government. When I do, the matter will be immediately taken into consideration and appropriate steps will be taken in conjunction with the provincial authorities.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Dairying, $231,300.

Mr. COOTE: The discussion on these estimates so far has been of a general character, and before we proceed to deal with dairying in particular I should like to make a few remarks with regard to agriculture in general.

The problem of the farmer to-day is not one of production; it is purely an economic problem. For years he has been told that if he would produce quality products he would not need to bother about economics, that the price he would receive would give him a sufficient return. To-day no matter what may be the quality of the product he produces in any of the basic lines, that is, grain, cattle, hogs or dairy products, his product is selling at less than the cost of production.

To-day the farmers sell as unorganized individuals to a highly organized world, and they buy as unorganized individuals from a highly organized world. The aim of the Department of Agriculture should be to organize our farmers so that they may combine their buying and selling powers. One of the purposes for which our economics branch was established was to assist in organizing the farmers for cooperative effort, and in the estimates this year I find that the economics branch receives a grant of only $8,600 out of a total agricultural grant of $6,600,000, though the main problem of the farmer is essentially economic. The work of this branch, instead of being curtailed by a cut of $3,400, should be greatly increased. If there are any experts in Canada who can assist the farmers in organizing themselves in order to get a better price for their products or to buy to better advantage, certainly we should spend enough money under this vote to secure the services of those experts for the benfit of the farmers of Canada. No greater service could be rendered at this time.

The farmers are in the very difficult position to-day of paying higher interest rates and carrying higher per capita overhead charges, comparing the net value of their product, than any other class in Canada. The farmer suffers from high taxation and a low valuation of his products, and he is under the handicap of producing crops which are dependent upon the weather. There is no limit to the competition the farmer must meet. The immigration policy of all governments in the past has been the bringing into Canada of more farmers to compete with those already here. In many cases to-day the farmer remains on his land through the grace of the mortgagee, the tax collector or the landlord. So long as he is allowed to stay on the land he can probably provide food for himself and his family, but in many cases he is not able to provide clothing, and we all know that it is not safe to travel around Canada to-day without some clothes. The farmer sells at wholesale prices and buys at retail. There has always been too much disparity between wholesale and retail price levels. But during the depression of the last three years this disparity has been greatly increased until to-day he finds himself in an impossible position. The price index figure of field crops, according to information which I have secured from the Bureau of Statistics, has dropped 64 points since 1928, and as compared with this, retail prices, not including rents and services, have dropped 14 points; and this drop has been mostly in foodstuffs. I should like to point out, particularly to the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young), who always says that if we increase commodity price levels we shall increase the cost of living in proportion, that the drop in farm commodity prices has been 64 per cent, while the drop in retail prices, that is to say, prices over the retail counter, when the farmer buys goods to support himself and his family, has been 14 per cent. Conversely, it would be possible to raise commodity prices by 40 per cent without increasing retail prices even 10 per cent.

The farmer's debts and his interest charges are fixed in terms of dollars, and he can pay only by means of the production and sale of commodities, so that at the present price levels the burden of his debt has been doubled or trebled. There is only one solution for the farmer's problem to-day, and that is to raise price levels. If this is not done, then his debts must be wiped out either in whole or in part. There is no use quibbling about that.

The farmer labours under another difficulty in that he sells at world prices or free trade prices, while he buys at protected prices. The price of everything that the farmer produces to-day is on an export basis; that is to say, the price which the farmer receives is fixed by the price which our commodities will bring in England, less cost of transportation, less commission charges, less handling charges and less advertising costs. The net return which the farmer gets after all these are paid fixes his selling price. If he wishes to bring back some goods from England in exchange for his products, he must pay high tariff charges, excise tax, sales tax and dumping duty, owing to the fact that the Department of Customs at the present time values the English pound for duty purposes at $4.40. The farmer is labouring under this distinct handicap, that the prices of all his products whether consumed here or abroad are fixed by what they will bring in England. To-day we can get for the British pound, for which our products are sold, only $4.10. Whatever other measures may be necessary to relieve the farmer of his present difficulties, the first remedy should be to bring the Canadian dollar to par with the British pound. Make the British pound worth $4.87 in Canada. Surely the old British pound is good enough for Canada to tie her currency to. Indeed, that is not a high enough rate to enable us to meet the competition of the Argentine and Australia in a fair manner, but it would enhance by 18 per cent the prices which our farmers receive to-day. This would result in an increase in the price of grain, cattle, hogs and all dairy products.

In support of my contention, I wish to quote a man who should be regarded as an authority so far as dairy products are concerned; I refer to the president of the National Dairy Council, Mr. Robinson. In his annual address, Mr. Robinson said:

I wish to make it very clear that the whole question of future prices in our industry is bound up in the question of sterling exchange and its relation to our currency and to that of the United States. We cannot meddle in these high matters, but I must point out that an active inflationary policy in the United States resulting in a depreciation of the value of their money might necessitate similar action in this country for we could hardly maintain ourselves if our currency were to be at a premium over both London and New York.

I have also a clipping taken from the Ottawa Citizen of yesterday. It is a despatch from Montreal by Mr. Paul Reading, special correspondent to the Southam Publishing Company. The article appears under the following heading:

Farmers gaining no benefit from reduced stocks.

Then he goes on to deal with the price which butter brings in Canada at the present time. He shows that because of the low value of the pound in Canada it is almost impossible for us to export butter to England. I will quote only the last paragraph, which I think shows the significance of this exchange question to the Canadian farmer:

Our three chief competitors in the British butter market are Denmark, Australia and New Zealand. Following England off the gold standard, Denmark has kept her money around par with the pound ever since. The Australian and New Zealand currencies are at a discount with that of England. Consequently these three countries are on level trading terms with the United Kingdom. The Canadian dollar, on the other hand, is at a premium of 18 per cent over sterling, so that Canada can only compete in the British butter market when butter prices here have fallen low enough to absorb that 18 per cent handicap.

That is, if butter were a shilling a pound laid down in England, that price would still be the cash equivalent of 24 cents to the Danish or Australian exporter, but only 20½ cents in Canadian money. Carriage charges would have to be deducted in each case of course. To compete in the present British market, Canadian butter would have to sell at 16 cents or less in Canada.

Without going the length of reading a quotation from the monthly letter put out by the Packers' Association of Canada, I may state that in one of their recent letters they point out that one of the causes of the present low price of hogs in Canada is the fact that hogs are on an export basis, and the price received for bacon shipped to England is paid in pounds sterling, for which the packers now receive $4.15 instead of the old rate of $4.87. There is no question about it, it is only a mathematical proposition that if our currency were at par with the pound we should raise the price of bacon in Canada by 18 per cent, and consequently the price of hogs. The same thing applies to cattle. If our currency were at par with the British pound, the average steer which we ship to England would bring us an extra $10. In meats, we try to compete with Ireland and Denmark, but these farmers have a distinct advantage over us. If we attempt to ship chilled beef, we compete with the Argentine and Australia, and a steer which would sell at £10 in Liverpool would bring the Canadian producer $41 while it would yield to the producer in the Argentine or in Australia the equivalent of $60.

How can the Canadian compete with farmers of these countries in the British market with exchange at the present level? Take wheat, which is the most important item in the whole of our economic life. Wheat to-day produces and has for years produced more new wealth for Canada than any other commodity. It furnishes more employment to our people than any other product. It furnishes more revenue to the railways and its effect on general business is more important than any other product in our economic life.

May I point out to the committee that the value of field crops in Canada in the year 1931 was only $425,000,000 as compared with $1,125,000,000 in 1928, or a drop of $700,000,000 in the value of our field crops in these three years. Is it any wonder that there is business depression in Canada, with the value of field crops reduced to that extent? Part of that drop may be explained by the drop in production, but in the year 1930 the value of field crops was only $662,000,000. In 1931 our field crops represented only 37 per cent of the value which they had in 1928. I think that illustrates pretty well the position the Canadian farmer finds himself in to-day.

One of the great concerns of the Prime Minister at the present time is to correct our balance of trade. For many years wheat has been the greatest item of our export trade. In 1928 our exports of wheat amounted to $433,000,000, and of flour $63,000,000—a total approximately of $500,000,000. In 1931 our exports of wheat and flour totalled $137,000,000—less than one-third of what they amounted to in 1928. I think, Mr. Chairman, that shows the need of some concern by our government for the wheat producers of Canada. When you compare the position of the Canadian wheat producer with that of the wheat producer in Australia or the Argentine, surely it is no wonder that we have not been able to sell the usual quantity of this commodity. To-day the Canadian wheat producer is selling his wheat principally to England. He is paid in British sterling. He can exchange the pound sterling for approximately four dollars ten cents. On the other hand, the Argentinian and Australian farmers shipping their wheat to the same market are paid in the very same currency and can exchange the pound sterling for the equivalent of $6. Competition under these conditions is made almost impossible. May I quote very briefly from the Ottawa Citizen of July 10, 1931, containing a report of a meeting of the agricultural committee of this house. Mr. James Richardson, a witness before the committee, was questioned as to the effect of the depreciation of Australia's currency on the position of their farmers as compared with the farmers of Canada. He said:

> Australia's position in the Orient had been secured through the commonwealth's depreciated currency, he told the committee, and agreed that if Canada depreciated the currency of this dominion it would enable the farmer to sell more, to get more of that currency for his produce and enable him, at least, to pay his debts.

The indebtedness of our farmers to-day is one of the greatest problems confronting not only the farmers themselves but the whole country. Our financial institutions have loaned to the farmers of Canada a good many hundreds of millions of dollars, and to-day at present prices it is impossible for those farmers to pay interest on the mortgage. Many of our rural and small urban municipalities that depend upon the paying power of the farmer are not going to be able to meet the interest on their debentures, and some of the mortgage companies have at last become concerned about the situation. And it is time that this house became concerned too. The only way to put paying power into the hands of our farmers, the only way to enable them to pay their taxes to the municipalities, is to allow our dollar to depreciate in the United States until at least we get it on a parity with the pound sterling. There is no other way out, and we might as well quit "kidding" ourselves.

There is just one other question that I should like to mention before I sit down. The position of our agricultural people is of concern to everyone in Canada. I am going to quote very briefly Mr. Alexander Legge, president of the International Harvester Company on the results that would follow from improving the buying power of the farm population. He said:

> In such a vicious circle as now exists, one group cannot buy the products of another for lack of means. But agriculture which supplies the basic needs of food and clothing for all groups seems the logical place to break the circle. An improvement in the buying power of the farm population would quickly start the wheels of industry turning and benefits would spread to all.

There is no quicker way of starting Canada on the way out of the present depression than by increasing the purchasing power of the farmer. The only way to do that is to increase the price of his products. Allow me to repeat, that practically all our products to-day are on an export basis. The only way to increase the price of those products is to increase the price of foreign exchange in Canada. Our dollar to-day is at an artificially high level. I think there is no doubt that certain artificial action has been taken to keep our dollar at a high level for the ostensible purpose of making it easier for us to pay our debts in the United States. But as the Prime Minister himself very well said a month or two ago:

> We cannot pay our debts in the United States with Canadian dollar bills.

We pay our bills in the United States by exporting goods to foreign countries, selling those goods, and then selling that foreign exchange to the United States. It will not make the problem of meeting our foreign obligations one bit more difficult to have our dollar at a discount of 30 per cent, instead of at 10 per cent as at present. As a matter of fact, it will make the task much easier. Our production of exports to-day and in the future depends upon increasing the price which we can get for those exports; if the prices increase we will produce more products and export more, and they will bring more in foreign currency, and there will be more foreign exchange available. Foreign exchange has been artificially held down, and our dollar has been artificially held up, for the benefit principally of our provincial governments, our municipalities and our industrial corporations that have bonds to meet in the United States. When artificial action is taken to hold down the price of exchange, and hold up our dollar in the United States, that is equivalent to taking a forced contribution from the exporters of Canada. It is keeping down the price of our products so that provincial governments, municipalities and corporations may find it easier to meet their obligations in foreign countries. The farmer has borne this burden long enough. It is time that provincial governments and municipalities and corporations should pay the price for exchange which it would naturally fetch in a free market.

The financial stability of Canada is bound up with the financial stability of the farmer—his solvency. To-day our farmers as a class are insolvent. Solvency can be restored by increasing the price of farm products, and that is the only way. I think there is no question of where Canada's interest lies in this matter. I desire to say again that we can have a 40 per cent increase—perhaps I had better not urge 40 per cent; it may scare some hon. members—we can have a 30 per cent increase in the price of agricultural products without increasing the cost of living of the people of Canada by more than 5 per cent. I noticed in a magazine last night that Mr. J. M. Keynes, the prominent economist in England, stated there has been a reduction in the cost of living in England since September, although the British pound is about 30 per cent below par. We can have a depreciation of another 20 per cent, I believe, without increasing the cost of living one per cent in Canada. If living costs did increase 5 per cent in Canada no one would be hurt. The drop in the cost of living which has occurred here has been almost altogether in food, and the farmer has been left in the impossible position, to use a slang expression, of "holding the bag" for everybody else. And the result has become apparent in other walks of life. Not only are our financial institutions beginning to feel the situation very keenly, but we have one-fifth of our population unemployed and the other four-fifths have to keep them in idleness. The best way to start ourselves out of this depression is to allow our dollar to depreciate to the same extent as the British pound. We cannot carry on with any higher level.

Mr. LOUCKS: What effect does the hon. member think it would have on our gold mines if we went off the gold standard?

Mr. COOTE: This would stimulate the gold mining business because it would raise the price of gold. There is no question about that. Gold mining stocks perhaps might go up—I am not concerned about that. We might very well send 10,000 of our unemployed into the north country to hunt for gold so long as we have to pay the United States in gold. But I am not concerned with the gold mining business. I am concerned with the position of the agricultural community. I think Canada's very existence depends on taking care of her agricultural population, and I can see no other way out for Canada, nor for her agricultural population, than by allowing our dollar to come down to a proper level. To-day our money needs to be diluted a little. The cream screw in the separator has been turned in too far; the cream that is going to the capitalists who are drawing interest on bonds, is too thick. The screw must be turned out a little so as to leave the cream the same thickness as it was in 1928 when we got into debt to the class who secured the bonds on which we are so concerned about paying the interest. We cannot go on long paying interest on those bonds unless we can increase price levels; that is fundamentally sound. If the government could only make up their minds, they could get our currency down to par with the pound inside a month. This would be to the advantage of the government. It is true it would increase their expenditure for foreign exchange, but it would increase price levels in Canada and the amount of taxes which the government collect depends on price levels. The sales tax is a percentage on the volume of trade carried on; the income tax depends on the amount of our incomes, and rising prices will increase the receipts of the government through taxation sufficiently to take care of the increased amount they will have to pay for foreign exchange. I do not think there is the least doubt about that. Then, as I said on another occasion, we shall have this positive advantage that the unemployment relief for which the federal government, every provincial government and municipality have to pay, will be lessened. Quite a number of those at present unemployed will be put to work. If the price of farm commodities is increased, the farmers themselves will take a lot of this surplus labour off the market.

I respectfully suggest to the government that the time is long past due when we should take this action. The leader of the opposition, speaking on the budget debate a few weeks ago, in regard to this question, suggested we should wait and see. And the Prime Minister agreed with everything he said in regard to the matter. But the people are repeating what the Good Book says: "How long, oh Lord, how long?" How long must we wait and see? We are almost the last nation now to take this action. New Zealand has depreciated her currency or it has depreciated in spite of her.

An hon. MEMBER: How much better off is she?

Mr. COOTE: The farmer in New Zealand is 25 to 30 per cent better off than is the farmer in Canada; the farmer in Australia is 30 per cent better off, and the farmer in Argentina 30 per cent better off than is the Canadian farmer. If I might again quote Mr. Maynard Keynes, in a recent article he said that in his opinion Australia was definitely around the corner and headed for prosperity. He said the same thing about Argentina. The people have waited long enough; Canada has waited long enough, indeed, much too long. We should have taken this action a year ago, and I respectfully urge the government to see to it that before long our currency is allowed to come down to a more natural level, at least on a par with the British pound.

Mr. DONNELLY: If we increased our exports until we had a very large unfavourable balance of trade, would this not have a tendency also to depreciate our dollar?

Mr. COOTE: If I caught the hon. member aright, he said that if we had what is called an adverse balance of trade, it would depreciate our dollar. That would be the case if we were not attempting to hold it up. If we increase our exports, of course that will tend to bring our dollar back to par. When the United States and other countries take the proper measures to restore price levels, somewhere near where they were in 1928, naturally our dollar would come back to par. Our dollar is down to-day because of the low price our exports are getting in foreign markets. It must be remembered that it takes to-day three bushels of wheat in order to get the same amount of foreign exchange one bushel produced in 1928. That is the main reason why we are met with an unfavourable balance of trade at this time, and the quickest way to restore a proper balance is to allow our dollar to come down to where the trade balance will take it.

Mr. SPOTTON: If I were to choose a text for my few remarks just on one matter alone, it would be the observations made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) on Tuesday last when he said:

> I thought I had made it clear that it is not decided yet whether it would be better to bring a marketing board into being at the present time or whether it would be better to wait, in view of the Imperial conference and the many difficulties with which we will be confronted in forming regulations and making this board effective. I am sure no person in the house appreciates better than the hon. member for Bow River the far-reaching results which will follow the setting up of a new board of this kind. Therefore it is felt, though not definitely decided, that it may be better to appoint men representative of agriculture throughout Canada to make a special study of this question and report before the next session of parliament.

Inasmuch as the Minister of Agriculture is divided between two opinions, I feel it my duty on behalf of the farmers of North Huron to place on record their views on this matter. What I am saying is in no way a criticism of the Minister of Agriculture who comes from my own county. I was born a few miles across country from him; that was no fault of his. I appreciate his work very much; his native county is proud of him and I wish to commend most heartily his having reached the conclusion that a marketing board should be established in Canada. But I respectfully urge that there be no delay in creating that board. If this government has a lifeline to throw out to the farmers in my riding, I beseech that it be thrown out now. I see no reason why a committee or commission should be set up to inquire into a matter for the next few months, then disappear into thin air and a new committee come out and start to grapple anew with this question. During the last few days we have had committees of four, five or six members report to the house. The committee on the civil service, after they had gathered in all the information they could, brought in a report, and whether we agreed with them entirely or not, we adopted it. We took their word for it that they had made a study of the question and knew more about it than we did. The same thing happened in regard to the radio problem—and, for the moment I am not endorsing the finding. We had a radio committee that studied this question long and earnestly. They brought a report to this house and it was adopted unanimously.

It is an open secret that perhaps forty or more members representing agricultural constituencies have given intensive study to this question of a marketing board and they and all farm organizations from coast to coast, after ten, fifteen and twenty years intensive study, are a unit in asking that a marketing board be established without delay. When we present our views in the matter, why should there be all this hesitation in the House of Commons as to whether the course suggested should be adopted?. I have been wont to condemn the Drury administration for government by commission; I have been accustomed to condemn the King administration for government by commission and I am not going to condone such a policy when we are in office. I just wish to say that every farm organization that I know of from coast to coast, having given this subject more intensive study than I am fitted to do, has stated that it is entirely in favour of a marketing board. I know J. J. Morrison, whom I look upon as the father almost of agriculture in my province, a man whom I have known for over thirty years, and who when I was trying to be a principal of a school was farming just outside of that little town. I have known him ever since and I may say that he is the one man in Canada that I know who has been big enough to refuse the premiership of the banner province of Canada. When a man is big enough to do that he is big enough to give sitting premiers some advice on agriculture. I speak after many consultations with him. I do not wish to delay the house so I will simply say that the United Farmers, J. J. Morrison, W. A. Amos and Robert J. Scott from my county, who is the president of the United Farmers, and all the farmers' organizations I know of are heartily in favour of a marketing board. I do not like reading newspaper extracts but I shall detain the house by reading this one. The Hon. Manning Doherty, who was Minister of Agriculture for the province of Ontario, and before that professor of agriculture in the college at Guelph, is reported as follows:

> Creation of a national farm marketing board, announced by Hon. Robert Weir, federal Minister of Agriculture, has the "enthusiastic" support of Manning Doherty, former Ontario Minister of Agriculture in the Drury government. In a statement to-day Mr. Doherty says:

And he knows as much about agriculture as any corporation lawyer in this house. He says:

> This is one of the most important steps that has been taken towards the progress of Canadian agriculture in many years. For at least thirty years it has been my conviction that inefficient marketing methods have handicapped the development of agriculture in Canada. We must adopt a national policy governing the grading of products by the government or some impartial body insisting on standardization and uniformity of quality and regulating shipping to preserve continuity of supply in foreign markets. In addition, there must be a continuous study of the requirements of any market—domestic or foreign—being sought for Canadian products. The government is both justified and has a duty to do something of that sort.

I take it that Mr. Doherty, like the apostle Paul, can speak with assurance, knowing whereof he speaks. I am not going to labour this question. I commend the Minister of Agriculture for being perhaps the first Minister of Agriculture who has looked at the end that is clogged up and is striving to open it and provide a channel through which there can be a flow of good, rich, red blood from Canada across the main. I have farmers in my county to-day who have fine, fat steers fit for export and there is not a drover in all those counties coming around to purchase them. They must be shipped down to the Toronto stockyards. Here, sir, I must be fair. The second year I was in this house I said this about the then government:

> The farmer used to be able to take down a carload of hogs to Toronto and to have five packing houses competing for his stock. But under this government the accumulation of capital in the hands of the big interests has resulted in four of these packing houses amalgamating. Now there is practically no competition on the live stock market and the farmer has to sell his hogs and cattle to this combine at their own price.

That is just what has obtained in Toronto. We had the Canadian Packers, Gunns Limited, the Harris Abattoir Company and the William Davies Company amalgamate, four into one, and they are called now the Canada Packers. The farmers throughout the province of Ontario, and I believe justly, feel that if ever there was an octopus, a devil fish with elongated arms squeezing the life out of the farmer in the province of Ontario, it is the Canada Packers of Toronto, and you can write around the head of that devil fish the name of Maclean, if you wish. I am not taking my information from Maclean of Ontario or from Pat Murphy or anybody else in the west; I am taking my information from the people whom I represent, the farmers of North Huron who have confidence enough in me to send me here to present their views on various matters to this chamber. I ask the Minister of Agriculture in all kindness to-day to bring forth this marketing board now. It is as easy to appoint a marketing board to-day as a commission. The men that are good enough to sit on the commission and go around and stay at the best hotels and smoke long cigars and eat three-dollar meals are good enough to work on a marketing board right now, to study the problem and stay around here while the Imperial conference is on, breathing the atmosphere of imperial markets and whatever else is floating in the atmosphere, and then go to work. It will take a month to select these men if they are men acquainted with farming operations, and I hope that at least one of them will be an honest-to-God farmer, living and toiling on his farm and possessing the farm viewpoint. You know, Mr. Chairman, the other day I heard a member of this house using an argument like this: Smith on this side of the road has twenty fat steers. Jones over there has thirty fat steers. Jones happens to have ten steers that are fit for the export market, and somebody comes along and buys those ten steers from Jones. And then the question was asked, what is he going to do with the other twenty? Shoot them, I suppose. He will just do the same with the other twenty as the man on the other side of the road does with his twenty, butcher cattle that are not fit for export, and the fact that these ten export steers have been taken off Jones' hands and sent across the sea gives him just so much better a market and better a price for those that remain at home, and it shows the Canada Packers, and this is a great point with me, that there can be a little competition in this country by way of a little flow across the pond. The Canada Packers in this province have the farmer of Ontario at their mercy, and they have crushed him most unmercifully. He simply takes whatever they give him. Imagine putting hogs into Toronto at 3½ cents a pound! I say that the farmer has waited patiently, wearily watching for the morning, and I believe that this marketing board will be a lamp unto his feet and a light unto his path, and I want to commend the Minister of Agriculture for his intention to establish such a board. I do not know whether he is receiving the support he should or not. I do not know what might be holding him back. I know not who or what they are, but I say to them on behalf of North Huron: Lay off, and let us have this marketing board, and let the farmers of the province of Ontario know that there is not going to be any dilly-dallying or fiddling while Rome burns.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I rise to follow the remarks of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), rather than those of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. Before proceeding, however, may I congratulate the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton) on the character of his address and the courage he has shown in making such a speech from a seat behind the Minister of Agriculture. I am in complete accord with him as to his idea concerning the establishment of a marketing board. When that matter was under consideration a few nights ago I expressed similar views. One of the reasons I am so completely in accord with the immediate appointment of such a marketing board is that amongst other things unquestionably it would be a very useful factor in arranging and determining the rate of exchange.

Taking into consideration world conditions of to-day there appears to be no simple and expeditious way out of the present agricultural depression other than the one proposed by the hon. member for Macleod. It has been advanced not only in this session but also in preceding sessions by the U.F.A. members. If I needed any excuse for rising at this point—and I am glad to say I do not, especially in a house so eloquently sympathetic towards agriculture and one which appears to understand its problems so well—it would be that in my riding there is a class of farmers second to none in so far as energy, courage, and pioneering capacity are concerned. Unfortunately that same class of farmers, due entirely to conditions outside their control, are to-day in a state of destitution, not second even to the unemployed. There are many farm homes in my riding as well as in many other ridings in the southern and southeastern sections of the prairies in which a pail of jam would be almost an unheard of luxury. I could quote letters from farm women and men that would wring sympathy from every hon. member in this house, even from those hon. members who have just returned from very substantial lunches which cost an amount sufficient to keep a farmer's family for a week.

As all hon. members agree, agriculture was and is a primary industry. Normally about two-thirds of Canada's total income arises from the export of raw materials. In normal years agricultural products alone provide about one-quarter of Canada's total income. That fact demonstrates the preponderant importance of the welfare of that industry to the whole of the nation. I have no hesitation in going farther and saying that until agriculture becomes prosperous there is little hope for the rest of the country attaining that condition.

Let us examine this important industry—the most important in Canada—and ascertain its position. For years it has supplied about 11,000,000 people with essentials. It feeds the world's flour mills, woollen mills, textile mills and other secondary industries enormous quantities of export materials. It is the largest single contributor to our financial, commercial and industrial prosperity. Yet we have what condition? Our rural population in relation to the urban population is steadily declining. Farming to-day is regarded by bankers and others as the most hazardous or one of the most hazardous occupations. Banks have lost all faith in agriculture, as signified by their reluctance to advance loans in cases in which under normal circumstances loans would be thoroughly justified. They have signified their views by the withdrawal from the western prairies of branch banks during the past year. The value of farm lands is steeply and steadily declining. I wonder if hon. members realize that in the last four years the value of farm lands for all Canada declined to an extent of $10 an acre. In the last three years it declined $9 an acre. Under those circumstances one cannot altogether blame the banks for looking upon farming as a hazardous occupation. The mortgage company indebtedness of farms has increased by twenty per cent. Speaking of conditions in the United States during the last ten years one authority said that every time the kitchen clock ticked off an hour farm lands were worth $200,000 less than they were the hour before. A similar condition exists in Canada. I quote now from the February issue of the Ontario Milk Producer:

> At no time can he recall a period when the farmer's position was so serious as at present. Prices for farm products are at the lowest point they have been for a generation—

May I interpolate that some of them are at a point lower than they have been for two generations.

> —while the mere necessities the farmer must purchase to keep things running show little or no decrease in prices from those of the "boom" days of a few years ago. Coupled with this, taxes have trebled, and other cash outlays have to be met that were not thought of twenty-five or thirty years ago when values for what the farmer had to sell were on a par with what they are to-day. Truly the position of agriculture to-day furnishes the most serious problem confronting governments and legislative bodies, both dominion and provincial. Expenditures for the advancement of agriculture that have proven effective and helpful should not be curtailed one iota. In fact the exigencies of the farmer's position just now may call for increased expenditure along helpful lines to meet the present situation.

The hon. member for Macleod quoted to the house some figures on index prices. Following the line of argument I have commenced I should like to amplify his remarks. The dollar value of the wheat crop in 1931 as compared with the wheat crop in 1928 shows a loss to the farmer in purchasing power from that one source alone of $202,000,000. The loss in the oat crop for the same period is $91,000,000; for barley $40,000,000; for fall rye $7,000,000; for spring rye $2,600,000; for all rye $9,000,000; for peas $3,000,000, and for beans—that product which was taken into the protected fold a couple of years ago and made one of the highly privileged commodities under the fiscal policy of the administration shows a loss in two years of $4,140,000. Probably those figures alone do not tell the full story. Allow me to give the exact figures. In 1929 the total value of the bean crop was $4,920,000; in 1931 the total value of the bean crop was $873,000. It is clear from those and other figures that agriculture cannot be helped by protection, so long as it is on an export basis.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Still further amplifying the grain figures I point out to the committee that in the year 1929 Canada produced 304,000,000 bushels of wheat; in 1931 exactly the same amount, 304,000,000 bushels, was produced. In 1929 we received, in round figures, $319,000,000; in 1931, we received only $117,000,000, indicating a loss of $202,635,000. The comparison between the price received by the farmer for the 1931 crop with that received for the 1928 crop shows a loss of $333,000,000. In order to be fair I must take all agriculture. The estimated gross agricultural revenue of Canada for 1927 was $1,825,000,000, and for 1931, the last year for which the figures are available, it was only $1,240,000,000, a loss to agriculture of approximately $600,000,000 in purchasing power. The loss for 1931 will mean a very large addition to that sum. You cannot take purchasing power totalling $600,000,000 out of an industry without endangering its very existence, and you cannot take that purchasing power out of the income of Canada without affecting every industry in the country.

My hon. friend from Macleod quoted some index figures, which I should like to be permitted to bring perhaps a little more to date. I have the figures for March, as published in the April Economic Annalist, and let me here congratulate the Department of Agriculture on the formation of this branch. To me, as to others, the economic branch is as important a feature of agricultural development as anything of which I can conceive. It bears the same relation to agriculture, and is just as important, as research institutions are to industry and as the statistical aspect of the trade commission branch is to manufacturing industries throughout the country. I hope this branch will be fostered and encouraged, and more than that I urge that those who edit the Economic Annalist, those who have the duty to determine what shall go into it, will be given an absolutely free hand to tell the truth, irrespective of what radical conclusions may be drawn from their statements. If it is to be useful that must be done.

In March the index figure, taking 1926 as the standard of 100, shows a decline in wholesale prices to 69, in all commodities. The figure for farm products is 51, as compared with 100 in March of 1926; for field products, 43·7 and for animal products 65. On the other hand, the figure for retail prices and cost of services, is 84. Retail prices have not come down in anything like the same degree wholesale prices or the prices of farm products have dropped. As a matter of fact in the March issue of the Economic Annalist, the editor points out:

In spite of a more rapid decline in the last year, the retail price index shows only about half the recession that the wholesale index exhibits. Furthermore, it has taken about two and one-half years to register a decline equal to that disclosed by the wholesale index during the first year of depression.

One may now inquire into the factors keeping up the retail price level in the face of a general decline. That will come later. While I am quoting the Economic Annalist, my statement would be incomplete if I did not give to the committee its report regarding farm debts. I quote from page 41 of the April issue:

Summaries of data collected from Turtleford, Kindersley and Davidson, indicate that from 497 farms providing adequate financial information, 89 per cent were operated by owners or part owners and 11 per cent by tenants.

I may say that this figure is steadily increasing:

Of the 441 owners or part owners, 8 per cent were reported free from debt, the remaining 92 per cent having debts averaging $4,782 per farm.

Mr. YOUNG: How big is the average farm?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have no information. I presume they would be the average, a half section.

Debts against real estate secured by mortgages plus unpaid amounts on agreements of sale were reported by 81 per cent of all the 441 owners, and amounted to $4,341 per farm for each farmer having this class of debt.

It is not surprising that this condition should have arisen, because for the last three years we have been selling practically everything we produce at a heavy loss, and we have only been able to carry on either by avoiding the payment of debts that have matured or by incurring new debts wherever they could be incurred. A few weeks ago I gave to the house a statement which had just come to me through the mail showing what had happened to a shipment of 21 pullets made by a farmer in Three Hills, a town with which I am well acquainted, located in a mixed farming area. These 21 fine pullets were shipped to the city of Calgary. Eight of them weighed thirty pounds and graded No. 2. They brought the farmer the munificent sum of $1.50, at the rate of 5 cents a pound. The remainder of the shipment weighed 33 pounds and were marked of no value. The freight charge on the whole shipment was $1.50 while other charges amounted to 25 cents, so the adventurous shipper was out exactly 25 cents as well as his 21 pullets; in other words, the shipping charges cost him 25 cents more than his total receipts. That is just one of those pleasant little things that illustrate the trend of affairs.

Another fact that should be placed on record at this stage is that the number of farms in Canada, according to the census returns, increased in the last ten years by 17,154. In other words, during that prosperous period of ten years the number of our farms in all Canada increased by only 17,154. It is clear that a great many more farmers would have gone on the land if it were worth while for them to do so. Let us turn now to the other side of the picture and find out the number of vacant, abandoned lands, according to the same publication of the Bureau of Statistics. We find that the increase in these abandoned lands was almost twice as great as the number of new farms established during the same period. There were 32,767 abandoned farms, as compared with 17,154 new farms. Letter after letter comes to me saying. "Conditions here may be quoted in two words, 'exceedingly desperate.' There is no feed in the country. Straw stacks are fed up and horses are dying by the score." This was in the late fall. I will not burden the house with these letters; hon. members must know the conditions that exist. Prices of cheese and butter dropped, in 1931, to the lowest level they have found in twenty-five years. That was the year in which we were protected against the outside world. Any farmer who pins his faith on protection as a means of advancing or improving his position is like the man who tries to hang on to a jelly.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): How did prices decrease in the United States in the same period?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am interested at the moment, as my hon. friend's party is interested, in Canada's agricultural condition. Thousands of acres in this country have gone to governments for taxes, and under mortgage foreclosure.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): That is not answering my question.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Five hundred thousand men are walking the streets to-day, out of work and unable to buy many of those things we are anxious to produce and sell to them, such as fine vegetables, better beef and more of it, clothing and all those other things that go to make life happy. Thousands, nay tens of thousands, cannot pay interest or the principal of mortgages as they accrue.

Taxes on lands are steadily climbing in this splendid young agricultural nation. Why do poverty and bankruptcy exist in agriculture to-day; why is agriculture in Canada virtually bankrupt at this moment? Is it bankrupt? I will just give one illustration. The municipal district of Blackfoot, No. 218, advertised in the Alberta Gazette, of Edmonton, of January 30, 1932, a list of lands amounting to a total of 162 quarter sections, that were to be sold for taxes. That is in one municipality, and if that is not an indication of bankruptcy, I do not know what would be. Most of us are holding on to our farms only because the mortgage companies cannot collect and do not want the land.

I will give the committee some of the reasons why, in my opinion, agriculture is in its present condition—just some of the reasons, not all of them: world conditions, certainly; lack of purchasing power; general financial breakdown; complete collapse of the monetary systems throughout the world. Undoubtedly all these are great factors. But another factor is high protection. Here is agriculture selling everything in an open market, in the lowest price market on earth.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): In that connection may I ask the hon. gentleman a question. What about free trade England?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In the first place, free trade England is not primarily an agricultural country, nor does free trade England export agricultural products; she consumes at home almost everything she produces in that direction. So that the hon. gentleman's point is not clear. I say, we are selling in a free, open, low-price market, but everything we buy, every blessed thing we buy, we buy in a protected market, in which, so far as possible, a monopoly is given home producers and from which competition is eliminated so far as it possibly can be. The inevitable result is that we are paying prices that are far too high for what we need in order to produce agricultural commodities; we are paying far more than we should pay otherwise.

Mr. MULLINS: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would rather not; I have only forty minutes. The hon. member is very eloquent himself. Another point is high taxation. This may be inevitable under the existing system, but we believe that we have put forward from this corner suggestions that would lead to a steady contraction of debt and tax obligations. Another reason is the enormous interest rates that agriculture has to pay in Canada. Why should agriculture, the basic industry, the great producer of our wealth, a contributor of one-fourth of the national income, be paying eight per cent or more? Surely this is an utterly and hopelessly illegal rate under the Bank Act itself. Under normal conditions industry gets its money at five and a half or six per cent. It is an unfortunate and quite an unfair handicap. Not only that, but if you compare conditions in Canada with the conditions in other countries in that regard you find that the farmers in the United States, Germany, England and France all have credit systems which secure for them money, both long and short terms, at rates very much below ours. We are handicapped, and very seriously handicapped in this country, in the matter of money rates. Another point is this, that we pay such extortionate prices for farm implements. In that regard, if hon. members wish to be convinced of the truth of what I am saying, I will quote a Mr. Asher Howard—I believe that is his name—who is an authority on agriculture. I presume, at any rate, that he is, because he left Winnipeg last year to visit Houston, Texas, to address the thirty-fifth annual convention of the grain and feed dealers' national association, and in his address he said:

> We are told the farmers of the United States, according to the 1930 census, have $3,300,000,000 invested in farm machinery.

He is speaking of United States farmers.

> The machinery on these farms cost $1,300,000,000 more in 1930 than it would have cost at 1914 prices. The farmer has to pay $165 for the same farm machinery which cost him $100 in 1914.

If that be true of the United States, it certainly is equally true of Canada. As a matter of fact, we probably pay a good deal more. Another reason why agriculture is in this condition is that our geographical situation is what it is. We, of all the chief exporting agricultural countries, are farthest removed from the seaboard, and this is a terrific handicap. Take Russia: the Black sea penetrates almost to the very fringe of her wealth-exporting districts. Take Australia: again, her agricultural lands are all on the seaboard; and the same with the Argentine. The only other country which is in a situation similar to ours is the United States. We are handicapped also in the matter of freight rates. We have a comparatively reasonable rate on grain and grain products. But that is not all. You see, everything we buy, because of the centralization of finance and industry in the east, flowing from east over long tracts of lands, we have to buy at high prices, and we pay high freight rates on everything entering into our production. We are, therefore, at a serious handicap in that regard.

At this stage I have no hesitation in saying that, under the tariff system which was introduced more for the purpose of building up infant industries, we have allowed the infants to grow up to giants, at whose door can be justly placed the pauperization of the farms to-day. It is utterly unfair that one class of the community or one industry should have to carry the major part of the load of the privileged industries of the country; yet that is inevitable so long as the class which is taxed cannot pass the tax back to somebody else. We farmers have no power to fix prices; you, as industrialists, do fix prices. You can fix them by gentleman's agreements and by combines, by adjustments—oh, well, you know how it is done without my telling you, and we know how we pay. We pay a part of the taxation of others in every package of groceries, every suit of clothing, every box of household goods and every implement we purchase for the farm. We pay a part of the taxes of others in that way, and yet we have no equity in the great industrial plants of Canada. These are facts which hon. gentlemen might well be apprised of in a consideration of the dire condition in which we find ourselves to-day.

The general policy of this government, wise as it may be in its own conception, inevitably hampers the Minister of Agriculture. What can he do? Why should I berate him? Why should hon. members criticize him? He cannot find wider markets for our products, which is the essential thing, so long as we are surplus producers and so long as the government's fiscal policy is to contract those markets and make them narrower and narrower. I have personally the deepest sympathy with him, because I am convinced that after he has been some time here he will realize, as he must realize to some extent already, from his previous studies, that undoubtedly the thing that agriculture needs at this moment is some outlet for its products at prices that will at least pay the cost of production. These are the two major necessities.

One suggestion occurs to me at this stage. If the Imperial conference, or if any governmental policy separate therefrom, is to be a factor in the future prosperity of agriculture, it will and must entail a definite organization and planning of agricultural production. It cannot be left any longer to the haphazard fortune of individual initiative alone. There must be organization and direction. A fantastic thought? Maybe; and hon. gentlemen smile. Well, I say to them that, possibly in their lifetime, but at any rate sooner or later, they will find that all industry will have to be rationalized. The planning of national production is essential to the restoration of prosperity and to the continuance of it, certainly to the stabilization of prosperity in the future. And there is no field in which this necessity is more apparent than it is in the field of agriculture.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I should like to ask the hon. gentleman a question, and I ask it for information because I am interested in his remarks. Will he tell me how the government could go to work to regulate the production of any single agricultural commodity in this country?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Thank you. I am not suggesting for a moment that the government should go to work and organize it. I am suggesting that organization is essential and that we should have national direction and cooperation of the government. I am not asking the government to take control of agriculture—although some day we may have to. It has already been proposed in the west. It may be necessary that we have national control—I would not be a bit surprised. But that is in the future. But I do say that intelligent direction is a necessity. Indeed I go further—it is the duty of this or any government that may succeed it. National planning of agricultural production of wheat, live stock and all the others, especially those in the export field, is necessary. What is the result if you do not have such national planning? The result is the chaotic condition you have at the present time, a condition almost approaching anarchy, in industry generally as well as in agriculture.

If, Mr. Chairman, this government will centralize upon the advance of agriculture rather than upon the advance of industry alone, prosperity may be dug out of its corner. But may I revert for a moment to the question of control. Control of marketing processes is one of the developments that agriculture must undertake—has already commenced to undertake. But to establish that control requires finances, it requires organization. Individual farmers, or groups of farmers, are unable to advance the initial stages of it due to lack of funds. This government can very greatly assist any schemes of that kind. If they do not—well, I do not know that the individualist farmer can help himself. It is regrettable, but so long as most of our farmers have that strange philosophy of isolation, it just means a continuation of subjection, and, through an impoverished agriculture, a lack of prosperity for the whole country.

Hon. gentlemen sometimes burst into paeans of optimism over the rise of a cent or two in the price of wheat. I should like to see it advance substantially in price. But let us look at the export conditions in regard to wheat and then we may get some conception of the utter need of planning. I will take an extract from the reports of the Imperial economic committee on the wheat situation for 1931, showing the approximate wheat stocks in important areas on August 1, 1921, up to August 1, 1931. I will not weary the committee nor burden the record with all these figures but merely give the totals. The grand totals of wheat stocks in important areas on the first of August were as follows:

Year	Bushels
1921	476,000,000
1922	507,000,000
1923	461,000,000
1924	578,000,000
1925	419,000,000
1926	482,000,000
1927	521,000,000
1928	590,000,000
1929	858,000,000
1930	809,000,000
1931	904,000,000

Well, what are we to do, keep on producing? Mr. E. W. Beatty the other day forecast that the coming crop as a result of moisture conditions in the west may run as high as 400,000,000 bushels. What will happen? Is the government making any preparation in regard thereto? The British quota system as proposed at this time may increase slightly the wheat acreage in England, but it can be of no permanent or definite advantage to the Canadian farmer who raises more grain for export than the entire British market can absorb, and in addition the only result may be the antagonizing of other markets.

May I quote the Prime Minister of Great Britain, who in a speech just prior to July 30, 1930, confirmed earlier announcements that the government's agricultural policy, which was then taking final shape, would contain important provisions concerned with better marketing through cooperative organizations. That is, the government of Great Britain was making it part of its business. He said:

> There is no suggestion that this constitutes a complete remedy for the farmer's troubles. On the contrary, the need for a variety of measures is fully realized, and this will be seen when the government's proposals are made known. The view is taken, however, that whatever else may be done to improve the conditions in agriculture there can be no lasting prosperity until farmers in combination, with the aid of capable officials of cooperative organizations, control the marketing process in a manner which is now impossible.
> They are entitled to, and must have, a reasonable share of the wide margin which now exists between the prices they receive and the prices consumers pay, for their products. Moreover, cooperation opens the way to more fruitful labour and to important economies in various directions, apart from prices.

If one needed any further indication of the necessity for something of this kind, it is found in the present cattle situation. Up to a few months ago the live stock surplus in Canada was passing to Great Britain through the Canadian Live Stock Pool, whose contract with the Cooperative Wholesale Society made this possible. The pool planned to handle throughout the year the surplus in this way. It would mean losses during bad months and just about the cost of production or a little better in good months. It was proposed out of good months' sales to lay by a reserve to take care of the losses, in order to ensure the possibility of disposing of the surplus. Unfortunately so far as the Canadian Cooperative Live Stock Pool was concerned this plan commenced in the middle of a good season, and shortly afterwards Great Britain went off the gold standard. The result was that on all our shipments we were losing about ten dollars a head. This loss rapidly swallowed up all cash reserves. The Canadian Live Stock Pool could not carry on any longer, and so shipments to the markets at once fell off. Now, Mr. Chairman, I know the Minister of Agriculture has been approached before in this matter. I simply wish at this stage to urge upon him not consideration alone, but immediate action if possible. The cooperative after all is the only body sufficiently widely organized at the present moment to be capable of handling this plan, unless the government itself steps in, and that apparently is not acceptable at this stage. Moreover, until there is some form of control over the entire surplus there will be danger, and so legislation will be necessary to empower the Live Stock Cooperative to secure on the sales of all export cattle during good years—or preferably on all cattle so that the home as well as the export will pay a share of the cost—a certain percentage, to be devoted to the expense of carrying the surplus live stock constantly and steadily to the market. I am convinced that if we can move that surplus the price of cattle will at once begin to move up.

Mr. BOWMAN: Does the hon. gentleman suggest a levy?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am in agreement as to that. In this we ask the government's initial help. Personally I am not asking any more than that at present and legislation in order that we may be able to assess all producers to move the surplus off the market. This would react not only to the benefit of our live stock producers but of the whole of Canada. Many men who have studied this subject during the last six or eight months have expressed themselves as favourable to the proposal. The significence of this suggestion lies in the fact that the removal from the home market of five to six hundred cattle and two or three thousand hogs a week by placing them on the export market would at once stabilize prices in Canada and cause an inclination upwards.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if that is not done the inevitable result will be that the portion of the country producing the greatest live stock surplus per capita—and that means western Canada—will continue to do all it can to move its stock on to the available markets, principally in Ontario, and so inevitably and continually smash the market of the Ontario farmer.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): It is smashed now.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. member for Peace River suggests that it is smashed now. Of course it is smashed, because that surplus backed up; we were not able to get rid of it and prices sagged. But as long as western Canada is producing, as she is doing to-day, more eggs, butter, sheep, live stock of all kinds, wheat, and all other grains per capita than any other portion of Canada, so long will you find the surplus produced that cannot be sent abroad, flowing into the other markets in Canada and destroying the possibility of prosperity of agriculture therein. I dislike taking so long on the subject, but it is one of vast importance to me. At this stage, just on this very question of cattle, let me read a statement from the publication What's What in Western Canada, an excellent series of pamphlets being issued by the Country Guide:

During the first part of the season—

That is last season:

—it was profitable business—

That is the shipment of cattle.

—but with the abandonment of the gold standard by Britain a new and entirely unforeseeable situation arose. The paying power of the pound was reduced 20 per cent in terms of Canadian currency.

I wonder if hon. members now realize why we who are exporters are anxious to have our dollar on a parity at least with the pound. I continue to read:

This had the same effect as doubling the ocean freight rate. Heavy losses were sustained by exporters on cattle in hand. This spring the export business has been resumed on a modest scale with cattle going forward from western feed lots. The exchange situation has improved somewhat but the greatest necessity at the moment is the restoration of parity of exchange between the Canadian dollar and the pound sterling.

If the dollar had declined in ratio with the pound the export of cattle could have continued unchecked. My forty minutes are exhausted.

Mr. BENNETT: In order that a message from the Governor General's secretary may be read to the house, I beg leave to move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Motion agreed to.

Progress reported.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that the Speaker has received the following letter:

Ottawa, May 13, 1932.

Sir,—

I have the honour to inform you that Right Hon. F. A. Anglin, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber to-day at 5.30 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

James F. Crowdy,
Assistant Secretary.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton South) in the chair.

Dairying, $231,300.

Mr. MARTIAL RHEAUME (St. Johns-Iberville) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I deem it my duty, as representative of one of the finest farming counties of this country, to strongly protest against the reduction in the agricultural estimates for the fiscal year, 1932-33. If these appropriations are compared with those of 1931-32, we find that there is a cut of 33 per cent. The time is ill chosen to effect such an economy because agriculture suffers the most in the present crisis. I note in the agricultural appropriations the following decreases: dairy industry, $63,700; live stock, $150,000; experimental farms, $83,000; exhibitions, $30,000; health of animals, $896,000; publications, $30,500; Destructive Insect and Pest Act, $376,700. Instead of cutting down the budget of Agriculture, we should have increased it, and reduced that of National Defence.

With reference to experimental farms, last year's budget has been decreased by $833,000. Yet experimental farms are far more useful than military institutions such as for instance, the Kingston college. These model farms render great services to the farming community and all agree that farmers require the information supplied by them in order to improve their farming methods and lower the cost of production.

It was quite a mistake to reduce by $300,000 the grants to exhibitions. Farmers gather in large numbers at these exhibitions in order to witness for themselves the progress made by scientific methods. They are a living example of the progress achieved. The committee on agriculture were certainly wrong in accepting such a cut, when rather large outlays have already been made at Sherbrooke, Quebec, Three Rivers, Ottawa and in other cities throughout the country. It certainly does not help farming.

The appropriations to safeguard the health of animals are reduced this year by $896,000. The main endeavour of a government is to watch over the health of its people; this decrease, however, in the estimates will impede the testing of cattle for T.B., which has been going on throughout the country, especially in Quebec. In my own county and in a number of the surrounding counties, large outlays have been made to get rid of cattle infected with tuberculosis. After expending millions of dollars, this practice is discontinued when it has become indispensable, since the dairy industry is the most affected in this crisis. It behooves the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) to increase rather than decrease the outlays of his department, especially in connection with the health of animals, because, by protecting cattle against disease, the health of the people is safeguarded.

The government is also wrong in reducing by $30,500 the amount appropriated to publications. By means of this appropriation very useful pamphlets were distributed to farmers in order to acquaint them with the results of experiments carried out on model farms.

With reference to the encouragement given to farmers and their sons, through information supplied by experimental farms, I have here an article published by La Presse in its issue of April 21, 1932, which reads as follows:

The young Jean Boudriau, son of Joseph Boudriau, 18 years old and a member of the club of Young Holstein Breeders, of St. Sebastien, county of Iberville, has just established one of the most remarkable dairy records in the history of the Holstein breed.

The record of his milch cow "Rose Pooch Alcarta Boeta" 195235 was officially controlled by the Dominion Department of Agriculture, Record of Merit control service. This milch cow began milking on January 18, 1931, at the age of 2 and 316 days and, in the course of 365 days, gave 23,253 pounds of milk and 776 pounds of fat. In order to qualify, it had to produce but 9,865 pounds of milk and 335 pounds of fat; it more than doubled the yield required to obtain the certificate.

This young man, 18 years old, son of an excellent farmer, has just established a world record. This branch of farming should certainly be encouraged in preference to industrial establishments. The government levies customs duties to protect manufacturers, yet neglects the farming community.

In this connection, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton) who had the courage to rise in the house and ask the Minister of Agriculture to create a sales board for farm products. The hon. member also referred to the slaughter-house trust. I am well acquainted with their dealings. If Toronto has reasons to complain, we also have in Montreal, in fact, throughout Quebec. The hide trust is also a matter of great complaint. I wish to acquaint the committee with a list of prices I have here. Calf hides sell at 2 cents per pound; steer hides 1 to 1½ cents per pound; sheep skins 50 to 55 cents each, those sheared are worth nothing. The price of select hogs, live, is 4¾ to 5 cents per pound, slaughtered, 6½ to 7 cents per pound; steers on the hoof are worth 2 cents per pound, in carcass, generally from 4 to 7 cents, with the exception of young steers; select calves, live, 3½ cents per pound, in carcass 4½ to 5 cents; ordinary calves, 2 cents per pound.

With such low prices how can farmers subsist? These prices are ridiculous. Hides sell to-day at what they sold thirty-five years ago. I listened the other day to the hon. Postmaster General referring to the prices of 1905. If the prices of 1905 are to be compared with those of to-day, the increase on farm implements must also be taken into account. In the first instance, mowing machines sold for $25 to $30, while to-day they sell for $95 to $100.

I stated that it is more than time that the government should help agriculture. The greatest reduction in the estimates is to be found in the budget of this department. This year, the budget of national defence was cut 16 per cent, while that of agriculture was cut 33 per cent; if we compare this year's estimates for agriculture with those of 1930-31, the cut amounts to 38 per cent. Yet it is contended that the government is doing everything possible for the farming community! I entirely disagree with those who express such views. No government, for a great number of years past, has expended so little on agriculture.

The following is a statement by the Postmaster General, in the course of an interview granted to a delegation of farmers, on April 25, 1932:

> The hon. Arthur Sauvé received on Saturday a delegation of farmers, he stated to them that he could not possibly outline the government's policy on agriculture as this rested entirely in the hands of the Minister of Agriculture.
> "As I stated in the house, the other day," he said "I still look upon a rebate on butter as a great advantage, especially for the farmers of Ontario and those of the eastern part of this country. However, I always held the view that this kind of bonus was rather within the jurisdiction of provincial governments owing to local conditions and the various kind of farming which differs greatly."

I wish to inquire from the Postmaster General whether the government consulted the western provinces when it decided, last year, to grant the farmers a rebate of 5 cents per bushel of wheat.

I regret in not seeing in his seat the hon, Minister of Marine, the member for Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Duranleau), whose county is adjacent to mine. Let him recall—I suppose he will deny having made such a statement, as all members of the government have done until now—that during the 1930 elections, he travelled over his county with his organizers stating: "If I am elected, if the Conservative party assumes power, you will sell your butter 50 cents per pound, your milk, $2.50 per cwt., the Montreal bridge will be free of tolls and you will be able to cross at St. Laurent without paying a cent, you will obtain everything you ask for." The other day the hon. Minister of Marine—who contends that he is swayed by political considerations—criticized me for having protested against the outlay of $135,000 in his county for work pursuant to the Unemployment Act. He stated that I had no complaint to register as I had obtained $110,000 for the same purpose. I must add that had this work been under the control of the Minister of Marine, the county of St. Johns-Iberville would not have obtained $110,000 for said work. Out of this total amount of $110,000, authorized by the Quebec government, the Dominion government's quota was but $27,500.

The hon. minister seems to think that this was a gift made to the county of St. Johns-Iberville, which has a right to its share just as much as the county of Chambly-Verchères. The Minister of Marine criticized me for having no consideration for the working people of his county; my reply is that he has much less for mine. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) having granted the sum of $14,500 for the purpose of building a retaining wall along the Chambly canal, in my county, the Minister of Marine dispatched to us about thirty good Tories from his own riding to carry out the work, this to the detriment of the unemployed of the city of St. Johns.

I regret that the hon. minister is not in his seat, as I had a few other things to disclose to him, however, I trust that in the near future we will be given an opportunity to settle our accounts.

I read the statement of the Minister of Marine as regards butter; he stated that he was against importing butter. It was not exactly the policy he followed, for, according to the reply given to the question I put in May, 1931, I find that butter imports from February 1 to April 30, 1931, were 2,147,494 pounds, namely, about 700,000 pounds per month. The imports from New Zealand were 286,440 pounds, while those from Australia were 1,683,416 pounds.

Our genial friends opposite promised the farmers that should their party assume power the butter imports would immediately stop. Fortunately, the situation has somewhat improved. I also find, however, according to replies given in answers to questions, which I recently put, that we still import butter from New Zealand. Moreover, a new treaty with the latter country has just been concluded. I am not opposed to it, because my views are that we should trade with other nations. That is the Liberal policy and I endorse it. I trust that the right hon. Prime Minister will negotiate other treaties either with France or other countries, in order that we may be given markets in which to sell our products and that our factories may not remain closed.

In the city of St. Johns there are almost 1,000 unemployed; factories are practically at a standstill, workmen have not the money to purchase anything. A number of good Tories tell them: "it is true that you are not earning much, but, on the other hand, living is cheap." The working classes of my county, as those of other parts of Canada, are not in the habit of begging. The workman likes to work and earn his bread. During the war potatoes sold at $7 per bag, and meat retailed at 55 and even 60 cents per pound. Our workmen never refused to pay those prices, because they earned good wages.

To-day the situation is different, prices have come down considerably, and I agree that they can, with some truth be told "You are not earning much but it costs very little to live." However, I repeat it, the workman dislikes to depend on charity, he prefers to work and pay for his food. It is work he claims. When Conservative candidates visited my constituency, they proclaimed, as they did everywhere "Canada First" and added, if we are elected, there will be work for all those who wish to work.

There is much discussion taking place about the price of butter, cheese and eggs, and a short while ago a member opposite interjected: "tell us about the prices in the United States." I think, sir, that we are not concerned with the prices in the United States, but we should be looking after the interests of the Canadian farmer. I would suggest that the government give greater relief to the farming class than what they are now doing; I contend that the government have no right to reduce the agricultural appropriation by 33 per cent when they are given a blank signature under pretence of assisting agriculture and maintaining order.

The farmer dislikes to depend on charity; what he seeks are markets to sell his products, so as to enable him to meet his personal liabilities. He wants the government to fulfil its 1930 pledges. I trust that the suggestions made by the hon. member for North Huron will be fully considered. As he stated a short while ago, it is urgent that the government should get down to business. Various and numerous commissions were promised except for agriculture. I note that the budget of agriculture is the most neglected; it is the department where the smallest outlays are made when the largest disbursements should be made. If we need markets to sell young steers from Toronto, we also require them to dispose of butter, cheese and other Quebec farm products, in order that our farmers may earn a livelihood. We are reduced to sell calf hides at two cents per pound. Just two weeks ago, to-morrow, I sold seven skins for $1.22. I have been in the business for thirty-five years, and never before, have I ever sold them 15 or 16 cents each. Steer hides are selling to-day 1 to 1½ cent per pound. I consider that, under such circumstances the government should hold an inquiry in order to remedy such conditions. A saddler informed me recently that harness leather sold at 42 cents per pound. If one must pay 42 cents per pound for leather while steer hides are sold 1 to 1½ cent per pound, I state that there is something absolutely wrong and that it is urgent for the government to espouse the cause of the farming class.

Mr. BERTRAND: I want to take a very few minutes of the time of this committee to speak on the subject before us of agriculture in general. It has been pointed out by different members who have addressed the committee that the farmers at the present time find themselves in a very bad situation.

May I say at the outset that I do not want to be in the least critical of the Minister of Agriculture. I do not want to blame him in any way whatsoever for the present situation. It has reached the stage where it is no use blaming each other for what is happening at the present time. Something must be done to relieve the situation of the farmers of this country at this time. It does not matter if the situation in the west is better or worse than the situation in the east or in the central provinces. The one thing sure is that if things keep on the way they are going the farmer will not be able to stay on the land. In the eastern part of Ontario we have farmers leaving their farms week after week, and the number is constantly growing. If this keeps up we do not know what will happen to this class of our citizens. I happen to represent an agricultural county and I know that our people are really in a very distressful situation. They cannot meet their obligations; they cannot even pay their taxes. Although there has been a moratorium declared in the province of Ontario the farmers cannot even meet their interest charges or, I repeat, their taxes. On the other hand, as the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton) has so very well said, there are many octopuses which are squeezing the farmers throughout Canada. My hon. friend mentioned one to which I shall probably refer a little later on. But there are others. I refer to the dairy industry. In this part of eastern Ontario our farmers are supplying lots of milk to be consumed in the cities of Ottawa and Montreal. The dairies are paying to the farmers $1.10 for 100 pounds of milk, or 11 cents per gallon. They claim that each and every week there is a certain surplus sent in to the dairies, and for this surplus milk the farmer is paid 55 cents for 100 pounds. On the other hand, when the milk is sold by the dairies the consumer pays 9 cents a quart if he buys it from a grocery store, 10 cents a quart if sold in certain districts, and in other places the consumer pays 11 cents a quart. But take the average price as 9 cents a quart, the price at which it is sold through the groceries without delivery charges. That means that the consumer pays 36 cents a gallon or $3.60 for 100 pounds. So the spread between the price which the consumer pays and the price received by the producer is very high, for $1.10 is received by the producer and $3.60 is paid by the consumer, or a difference of $2.50 per 100 pounds goes to the middleman. When our farmers meet their friends and relatives living in the neighbouring cities and learn that they are paying $3.60 per 100 pounds for milk for which the farmer receives $1.10 per 100 pounds, they feel most dissatisfied and they blame the government for that situation whether the government is to blame or not. That is one matter which I think should be taken into very serious consideration by the Minister of Agriculture.

I would also mention leather, which the hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville has just mentioned. Raw hides are selling for two cents a pound and calf skins are selling in our district at fifteen cents a skin, which is not quite two cents a pound. After the farmer has sold his hides for two cents a pound he turns around and finds that he has to pay 42 cents a pound for the leather he buys. The spread there again is too wide. Surely there is something there that is absolutely unfair. The farmer cannot understand why there should be such a wide spread, and he feels very dissatisfied. He feels that he has not only to bear the stress of the depression through which we are passing, but that there are other interests and other industries in this country which are too heavily protected. I bring this matter to the attention of the minister, and I would urge upon him that this is surely a case where something should be done very soon. I claim, Mr. Chairman, that in the two cases I have mentioned the farmers are up against real octopuses whose long-stretching arms are squeezing the life out of the farmer. If the meat-packing industry is doing the very same thing, as the hon. member for North Huron has pointed out, the farmers are truly in a deplorable position, and something should be done to protect them. When the farmer reads in his paper that the mining industry, for example, is helped by bounties and subsidies on transportation costs at so much per mile, and that manufacturing industries are kept functioning by means of government assistance through the tariff, dumping duties and the like, he really feels that the farmer not only in his own district but throughout Canada is not receiving the attention at the hands of the government which he deserves. Hon. gentlemen of all parties represented in this house have expressed themselves as absolutely in sympathy with the farmer, and I know that the Minister of Agriculture is willing to help them all he possibly can. On the one hand we hear the suggestion that the stabilization of currency would be beneficial. Other hon. members suggest that the establishment of a marketing board would be a great help. To my mind however various studies should be made so that one, and not all, of these suggestions might be adopted, and something accomplished to promote agricultural prosperity. The minister has in his department men upon whom he can rely, men of experience who are familiar with the situation in Canada. I think he should ask them, or at least some of them, to make a thorough investigation of the agricultural situation in Canada, and devote their attention particularly to financial organizations, capitalization directorships, and the profits the octopuses are taking from farm revenues.

Mr. F. E. M. Robinson, president of the National Dairy Council, has declared that the excessive profits of city milk distributors are chiefly responsible for producers not getting a fair share of consumers' dollars. As Mr. Robinson is one of the directors of a leading dairy farm in the dominion he ought to know what he is speaking about. I ask the Minister of Agriculture to establish some kind of committee so that a fair investigation may be made to ascertain why there is such a spread between the prices paid by the consumers and those received by the producers.

I have many articles before me which I should like to read, all indicating the spread I have mentioned, but I shall be content to close my remarks by urging upon the minister that he authorize a thorough inquiry so that the farmers may receive more protection from the government. Such action ought to be taken immediately because Canadian farmers are in a most unfortunate situation, and if they are to be kept operating they must be given immediate attention.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, when this estimate was considered previously there was such a demand for the floor that I found myself lacking an opportunity to say a few words. This afternoon I find myself in much the same position, so I hasten to take some of the remaining time that I may show which side I am on with regard to the marketing board proposal. In my view the minister is to be commended for introducing the subject at this time, and for creating so much interest in a problem which has been probably more than any other before the country during the last twelve months. I am afraid however that with such a multitude of advisers too many cooks may help to spoil the broth. As I listened to the number who wanted to get into the minister's band wagon I thought that he would have to have a very commodious vehicle to hold them all. However that is a good omen, and it would seem that he is moving in the right direction.

Whatever may come out of the project I want him to understand that I am sympathetic and friendly towards the step he is advocating, the promotion of an export marketing board. When taking that stand I hope I will not shoo away any hon. members now supporting the suggestion. I know that sometimes there is that danger. The other day as I listened to my friend the minister explain the various pros and cons, and as I heard his statement that the government had not yet decided whether or not they would bring a bill down this year or defer it until later and have the matter placed before the Imperial economic conference, I thought of the difficulties he must have had in bringing the project even to its present stage of development.

It seems to me that at this stage the minister is going through his parliamentary labour pains prior to giving birth to his first export marketing baby. This is always an interesting occasion, and a time when there are usually plenty of medical advisers and nurses around. My fear at this time is that I may add one too many. In spite of that fear however I have no intention of posing as the foster parent, or of showing a desire to adopt the baby. If anything should happen, however, I should like to be at hand to promote its cause and success in any way within my power. I believe the project will give a certain amount of encouragement to agriculture and that it is capable of development, but at the same time it is bristling with difficulties of which few people are aware. I will have no complaint if the minister takes lots of time to look before he leaps, so that he may not run into any unnecessary snags. I believe I would be well advised however to leave to him the decision as to whether or not he will bring in a bill this or next session, or go first to the Imperial economic conference and bring in his bill at a later time.

I can see without very much trouble that there is a difference of opinion on his own side of the house as to the better course to follow.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Possibly I would be causing difficulty rather than helping if I were to take a stand on that point. The minister knows my views, and I do not think it is advisable further to proclaim them. After all, whether a bill is brought down this session or after the Imperial economic conference is only a matter of important detail. I would suggest however, no matter what course he pursues, that he lose no time in getting the very best man he can find to send overseas to get in touch with delegates who are likely to come here, a man who will get in touch with the various farm organizations in Scotland, England and Ulster so that they may know what we in Canada are proposing, and so that they may not come here and find themselves confronted with a proposal of which they do not approve. Let us not forget how we looked upon a similar board when Australia took action. That was under the "Patterson" plan. The dairymen of Canada immediately rose up on their hind legs and asked the government of the day to impose the dumping clause against butter from Australia, and their request was granted. I advise the minister to be very careful, and without any desire to give him too much advice may I say I think the best course to pursue would be to send his best man to sell the idea of a marketing board to our kinsmen across the sea. I would advise that that man return on the same vessel as the delegates coming to Canada. In that way he would have an excellent opportunity to contact with the delegates, and to iron out difficulties before landing on Canadian shores.

I should like to direct a few remarks to a matter with which the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) dealt. There is a very important prerequsite to the marketing board, namely, a commercial channel extending across Canada through which marketing may be carried on. I do not think it is contemplated that the board itself will engage in general merchandizing, though occasionally it may have to do so. If we do not have it now, we should establish a general commercial channel through which our exportable products can be disposed of. We have only one organization of that kind now; that is the cooperative live stock pool which extends from one end of Canada to the other.

May I, without offence, suggest to the minister that he do everything in his power to get the Beef Producers Association of Calgary and the cooperative live stock pool together. Try to get them pulling on the one rope. I do not think the pool could be an entire success without the ranch cattle, which give a peculiar quality to the whole product. I mentioned this last year in a different spirit probably, as the minister will remember, but I hope it did no harm. I hope the minister himself has become aware of the danger of having two farm bodies competing for the same cattle, the same ocean space and in the same market. I know some of the men connected with the beef producers and others connected with the pool; they are good men, but we want them all to concentrate on one organization without which, in my opinion, the export board cannot operate successfully, but with which there is no reason why the board should not be a magnificent success.

I think I will just leave it at that. I believe the minister knows what I mean when I say it is very important to get started off on the right foot. Have a good cause; start right and, as the old saying goes, well begun is half done. Whether the minister proposes to bring in the bill now or later, my support will be equally hearty for the good of the cause. I think the minister himself, and his colleagues will have to be the judges.

I have great hopes for the minister's improvement, notwithstanding his inexperience; he is developing every day. Of all the ministers of agriculture I think no man started with less experience than the late Sir John Carling, but no man did more for agriculture than was done by that same gentleman. He was responsible for establishing the agricultural college at Guelph when he was provincial minister of agriculture, and he was also responsible for the chain of experimental farms across Canada that has no equal, I believe, in any other part of the world. So I say there is hope for the minister, who started with very little experience and who has been given very little assistance by his colleagues, who know very little about agriculture. The minister has a great responsibility; he is the only one of the sixteen or seventeen ministers who knows anything about agriculture, and I compliment him for having sought assistance elsewhere. Last year he called to his aid three excellent gentlemen, Professor Barton, Doctor Archibald and Mr. Robertson, president of the National Dairy Council, to advise him in connection with dairying matters. If he had searched all over Canada he could not have found three better men for that purpose, but there was a hitch somewhere. He got the advice, but as I know and as the minister knows there are other things necessary as well. He must be able to put across his proposals in council and to so excite the interest of his colleagues that they will support his recommendations. I do not know what happened, but I do know that the minister received good advice from the National Dairy Council, and I regret very much that he found it necessary in return to cut off their grant. But we will not open up that somewhat controversial question.

The minister was given certain recommendations last year by the dairy council, and I hope he will not turn them down even yet. I do not think he did turn them down; probably he could not convince his colleagues of the advisability of adopting them. The other ministers did not know whether or not it was good advice, and no one man in a cabinet can put over a big enterprise of this nature without the support of his colleagues. That is some job with this government; I have no doubt about that. That is why the hon. gentleman sought support elsewhere, and that is why he is getting it. I think we have reached a time in our history when agriculture is simply staggering to its fall, and we can afford to ease up a little in our extreme political alignments and work on behalf of agriculture even if we have to work through a Tory government, which is the only avenue available at this time. That is pretty straight talk, but that is the way I feel. I am in opposition now; there are not enough of us here to perform the functions of government. The electors, in their wisdom, elected another government and we have a new minister of agriculture. I have not very long to assist agriculture now, perhaps ten or fifteen years more, and I am prepared to work through this government until the electors provide us with a better avenue. Things are so bad in connection with agriculture that I believe I would work through Beelzebub himself if necessary, and therefore much more through the minister. Conditions are so distressing on many farms that we cannot afford to quibble as to where the good things may come from at this time.

I would like the minister to consider the advisability of looking on this proposed marketing board as merely an emergency provision. If this alleyway between us were a stream and I wanted to cross to the other side—I do not want to, of course—I would use any old plank at all so long as it permitted me to reach my objective. The same principle applies now. This is the plank by means of which we can reach something better by using our present commercial live stock pool facilities to place our exportable surplus on the markets of the world. That involves a great many things about which few, I fear, have thought much as yet, and I think it well that we should consider some of the difficulties. For instance, let us suppose we want to place bacon on the export market through a marketing board, and we adopt the usual practice of making a levy on the farmers for the purpose of creating a fund. Imagine going to a farmer who gets 2½ or 3 cents for his hogs and asking him for say $\frac{1}{16}$ of a cent per pound on the hog he sells. Naturally he will ask what is to be done with the money, and when you tell him it is to go to the packers, because we must work through them if the live stock pool is not available and functioning he will see red at once. Therefore I say it is absolutely necessary to develop the cooperative live stock body that already has a fairly good start, but if it is to be competed with by the beef producers of Calgary—and further friction is developing there—the commercial channel is in danger. So I would invoke my hon. friend to use his good offices to avert this possible danger. I think the minister now has come to the point where he believes it is necessary to try to get these two bodies together at the earliest possible moment, because it depends largely upon them whether we have a marketing board that will function in the way I have mentioned so far as cattle are concerned.

I was going to refer to some of the recommendations of the National Dairy Council. They state that at present large numbers of small, often poorly equipped and unsanitary butter factories cannot help but bring about less effective butter manufacture. Last year I tried to impress that point upon my hon. friend. We have in Canada the most obsolete dairy equipment of any country pretending to be in dairying. Every country with which we compete, Denmark, Ireland, Sweden, the Antipodes and so on, is supplied with manufacturing facilities superior to ours as a whole. They serve sometimes the dual purpose of both butter and cheese, and sometimes practically all the purposes of processing milk into various commercial commodities that may be put on the market. It is over sixty years since the foundation of the cheese industry in Canada was laid.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bury in the chair.

Dairying, $231,300.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Before recess and before the little interlude of going to the Senate, I was at the point of drawing attention to some of the evidences that the Minister of Agriculture was prepared to work with others as well as those on his own side to develop agriculture. As soon as that evidence was forthcoming, a number of us—I am speaking not for anybody but myself—felt impelled to meet his advances. I am now proceeding to show how difficult it is for the minister, without the necessary appropriation to carry out his proposals. Nobody expects him to perform miracles and, indeed, this is not the day of miracles. I was reading from the summarized report of the proceedings of the twelfth annual meeting of the National Dairy Council of Canada, held at the Royal Alexandra Hotel, Winnipeg, some of the counsel that was given to the minister by that body, and also by the committee of experts to whom he had access for a considerable length of time, amongst whom were included Professor Barton, Doctor Archibald and Mr. Robertson, all first class, capable men. The minister is putting himself in touch with good advice, but there is something lacking. Advice is good, but you must have the wherewithal to give visibility to it.

These are some of the policies recommended by the National Dairy Council, and I hope the minister's colleagues will give him the necessary encouragement in the way of money to carry out those policies. I believe he is ready to do so, but he cannot unless the money is forthcoming. The report states:

> At present large numbers of small, often antiquated and unsanitary butter factories cannot but be responsible for less effective and economic butter manufacturing.

I could quote at greater length, but it is not necessary. Much the same condition was reported in regard to cheese. Yet in spite of antiquated facilities the quality of these goods is increasing. How much more would it increase if our dairymen were supplied with as good equipment and facilities as those possessed by their competitors in other countries?

Then, as to production, the report reads:

> It is probable that the average dairy farm in Canada is not operating at more than twenty to fifty per cent optimum capacity.

That is to say, you can increase the volume and by that means decrease the cost of production. As regards pure-bred cattle, the report states:

> We recommend that the plan of the dairy cattle committee in 1927 for the extension of advanced registry be adopted in full force within three years.

That was introduced by the previous government, and the National Dairy Council recommends that this government go forward along the same line in order to have it accomplished within three years. What is the reply? The reply given by the Minister of Finance is that the live stock appropriation is cut down very substantially, $150,000. Go forward on a policy of live stock reform; go backward on a policy of finance. That is what the Hon. Jim Thomas would call "humbug." We want the government to be careful; we do not want them to be talking with two tongues on this question. The Minister of Finance is present, but he was not minister at the time these estimates were prepared, and I do not hold him in any way responsible. The Prime Minister was responsible. At that time he occupied the positions of President of the Council, Prime Minister, Minister of Finance and Chairman of the Treasury Board, and you could not get by with very much without consulting him. That was the situation prior to the time the present Minister of Finance assumed office. Therefore I shall urge the rest of the ministry not to send their Minister of Agriculture forth on a constructive program of marketing and at the same time withhold from him the wherewithal to carry it out. You might as well send a woodsman into a forest with a jack-knife or a bill-hook to fell the forest with. The money must be forthcoming. The Minister of Finance of course will say that he does not have it; that if he has to supply it, he will have to take another shave off the civil service. The money can be secured. They do all sorts of things with the farm relief money; why cannot they do something for the marketing program of the Minister of Agriculture? So much for that.

The next recommendation by the National Dairy Council was this: "Push on the good work in creating tuberculosis free areas rather than herd testing, for this disease is a great scourge," and so forth. What is the answer of the government in cash to that push-on policy of the National Dairy Council?—an organization which the minister has said he would like to work with. The reply of the government in these estimates to this policy of pushing on the good work in creating T.B.

free areas, is to cut the vote for that work down by $896,000. What would Hon. Jim Thomas call that? The quintessence of humbug. I am talking quite candidly, but I hope not offensively. The minister cannot go two ways at once at the same time—progressive in regard to policy and retrogressive in regard to expenditures. The two must go hand in hand or you get nowhere. I would suggest to the Minister of Finance, now that I see him looking pleasant, why can't he do something in the supplementary estimates to restore these votes to their former amounts?

Mr. RHODES: I might suggest to my hon. friend that he wait until he sees the supplementaries.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is delightful to know that there is some hope, and now I am encouraged to say a little more.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend does not need any encouragement.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Put the agriculture votes back to where they were last year, because everybody knows that it is through the medium of agriculture that we must come back if we are ever going to get properly on our feet again. So I plead with the government, for pity's sake and for your own sakes, do not put yourselves in that niggardly position towards agriculture; because if you do, I am afraid this armistice that we are voluntarily setting up between the minister and myself will be of short duration. So far as the rest of the ministry is concerned the political armistice does not apply to them at all, but I am prepared to deal generously even with them if they come along with the dough. If they can get it out of the farm relief bill, all right, but do not put out this kind of stuff and pretend you are travelling in the right direction when you do not provide the wherewithal with which to travel. When the ministry went to the Imperial conference in London they did not go empty-pocketed, or they could not have got there or got back, and the same way with the Minister of Agriculture and his proposed marketing board.

I am awfully glad to hear from the Minister of Finance that he is going to come across, to some extent, at all events, in the supplementaries. In order to stimulate him in that direction may I give him a few figures? I asked for a return to be brought down showing the amount of money voted for agriculture by this parliament during the last ten years. Back in 1923 the amount expended on agriculture was $6,000,000 in round figures, and last year it was $11,000,000—$6,000,000 in 1923 and $11,000,000 last year, or the expenditure nearly doubled in that period. Do you think that was got by accident? Do you think I got that without first of all winning the sympathy of my hon. friend from West Edmonton and of my other colleagues, and particularly the sympathy of the then Prime Minister? The present Prime Minister is the man to go after, but what does he do in the agriculture estimates this year He turns the wheels of progress back to 1924 and he is not providing for even as much money as we had in 1924 for agriculture. If my hon. friend the Minister of Finance could see his way to bringing the agriculture estimates up to what they were last year, through his supplementaries, it would look a whole lot better, instead of reversing our progress and going back to 1924, especially in a country that is so preeminently agricultural as Canada and with agriculture staggering almost to its fall. And do not think it is only in the west this condition prevails although it applies peculiarly there; the conditions in this old Ontario in which I was born, and which I shall always love, are such that for the first time in my recollection a gilt-edged farm cannot get a mortgage company to put a loan thereon. It was never dreamt that such a day would come, but that is the condition to-day, and that is one of the reasons why I am ready to cooperate with the Minister of Agriculture in anything that looks even half good in order that we may peradventure improve conditions. The Minister of Finance is preparing for his first supplementary estimates; he can now make a real killing if he wishes. I am sure his immediate predecessor will not object, because he made a lamentable failure of it and he is doubtless only too anxious now to set things right. That is my premonition of the situation.

Two hon. gentlemen over in the far government corner spoke on these agriculture estimates the last time they were up, the hon. member for North Grey and the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi. One of them talked a lot of nonsense about the inspection of dairy products. I do not think he was intentionally prevaricating. I think it was the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, although I am not sure. But he was at the meetings of the agriculture committee last year, and we always have a certain number of the new members raising objection to the farm products grading system. But there were enough of us on the committee, Conservatives as well as Liberals, to remain steady and maintain the grading system in its entirety as it was established by the minister's predecessor. I do not believe there has been a particle of change in the whole of it. If the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi really wishes to inform himself on the question, we have the record of the various activities of the department during the last ten years, and we shall be very glad to supply him with an historical record so that he will not be making mistakes of that nature in the future.

The other hon. member—I may have these two gentlemen mixed, but it does not make much difference, because their remarks were along the same lines—took the ground that we the Liberals had not done anything for the live stock industry. Some hon. gentlemen opposite repeat that so often that finally they come to believe it, and after a little while the press begins to believe it, and then the people of this country begin to believe it, and then finally they find that they have been deluded and they turn and tear the author of these yarns to pieces. The hon. member for Willow Bunch cited a case the other night of a writer lauding the Minister of Agriculture up to the skies, and then when he found the minister was not turning out just the way he thought he should he went to the other extreme and poured abuse on him. Well, I want to set these two hon. members right with respect to the record as regards live stock. I recall as well as if it were yesterday that the first time I rose in this house was to speak against the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine. In 1921, when the King government came into power, it was my privilege to take the stand against oleomargarine on behalf of the dairy interests and the children of Canada. We were defeated the first round but we stayed in the fight and kept on bringing the matter up, and finally, largely due to the efforts of the National Dairy Council, we won out. To-day we are the only dairy country in the wide world, so far as I know, that has prohibited the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine in the interests of dairying and the children of Canada. Butter fat is much better than oleomargarine to grow healthy children on, as was amply demonstrated during the war. My hon. friends from North Grey and Brome-Missisquoi have no knowledge of that. They were not here at the time and could not be expected to know it.

The next move which the then Department of Agriculture took in the same year—that is 1923—was to consider the advisability of starting what we call restricted areas to clean up T.B. amongst cattle. The conditions in that respect were very, very bad in some districts, and what with the number of reactors in our packing plants and the amount that went into the tank, it meant a tremendous loss for the farmer and was a danger to the children and indeed the health of the whole family. We found that the people of Manitoba and the Department of Agriculture there, were ready to try the first restricted T.B. free area in the British Commonwealth and the federal Department of Agriculture established it at Carman. That was surely a forward move on behalf of the live stock industry of Canada. This work has grown and developed until every province but one in Canada has taken up the work. We have something like 1,500,000 cattle under free areas. Right adjacent to this city of Ottawa is an area bounded by the St. Lawrence river, the Ottawa river and the Rideau canal, almost T.B. free. All but about fifty or sixty herds, with which we will deal later on another vote, are in that desirable condition. The establishment of these areas shows that we have a desire not only to make Ottawa more beautiful but to make it a healthy city in which we visitors and our families may live when the house is in session or at any other time. Surely that is something worth while.

When the former government came to Ottawa there was no system of grading for any farm products except cereals, and there was only a voluntary system in connection with wool. These facts may be a joke to my ponderous looking friend, the Minister of Immigration, but I am citing some facts about which he knows very little, and for that reason he thinks they are funny. After considerable difficulty the grading of farm products system was introduced, a system with which all western men are familiar. All our grain is graded; we never think of anything else. I took the position that the grading system should be applied to as many products as possible. Some of the first to come under the system were cheese and butter; eggs came later, hogs still later and beef still later, until at the present time practically every exportable surplus product can be sold under a grade name. To-day cheese can be sold by certificate on any market in Great Britain. You may receive a certificate for a carload of No. 1 wheat. The purchasers do not want to see the wheat, because they know the certificate guarantees what will be in the cargo. Consignments of Canadian cheese may be sold, but the purchaser does not insist upon seeing the cheese; he does not need to even smell it or to open the box, because he has the certificate. That is the end towards which we have worked, and the policy we introduced by the Liberal government. There were thus three great reforms in one year. I can think of no hon. member who lodges more adverse criticism against the grading system than the hon. member for Marquette, my neighbouring constituency in Manitoba; I do not think however that he knows any better: He does not know, and he does not know that he does not know. I do not accuse any hon. members opposite of falsifying; they simply get into the habit of repeating silly nonsense until they begin to believe it themselves. Then the less offensive hon. members opposite take up the cry, and go on repeating it. God only knows what they say when they are on the hustings.

If we are to work with the Minister of Agriculture in an effort to get out of the hole, I ask him and his supporters —and I shall adopt the most pleasant manner possible—to try to be reasonable towards us. If they do not know the facts I have a number of copies, signed by myself, compiled by my former staff from year to year and available on application. I have a full record of the Department of Agriculture during the term of office of the Mackenzie King government, and I think if hon. members opposite would read the information I have before me they would not be guilty of making the extraordinary statements of which they are guilty.

I think I have almost completed my remarks—I have no desire to take advantage of the tranquillity which usually prevails in the house on Friday evenings. Before taking my seat, however, I should like to point out that there are two or three key positions with regard to this export marketing board proposal. To attain the greatest measure of success the house should be fairly well behind the government and the minister. Anybody can get up and harpoon anything new. Many a time I have sat on the government benches and sweated, sometimes four hours at a time; sometimes we have sat into the morning while hon. members opposite were throwing every kind of missile at me. Well, as you see, Mr. Chairman, I survived it. To-day, however, conditions are different, and we cannot afford to take that attitude. Speaking agriculturally, many are on the point of bankruptcy, and as agriculture is our paramount industry, no matter where the good comes from, for the next few months or years we must give it a show. Please, Mr. Chairman, do not look at me as though you thought I was going to become a Tory, because I have not the least idea of doing so. A year ago when the Australian treaty came down, for decency's sake and to set a good example to hon. members opposite as to how a treaty should be received, I took the ground that we should give it a chance to live, and said that for a year I would say nothing against it. We took the same stand in regard to the New Zealand treaty. At this time I receive the Minister of Agriculture's proposal in the same way. Undoubtedly this marketing board proposal is a controversial question, but after giving it considerable thought I have come to the conclusion that there is an element, an embryo, a nucleus of good in it, and we cannot afford to pass it by. Surely the Finance Minister will now come across with some money, when I have gone that far, in the direction of our working together.

I would invoke the minister not to be too much moved by the appeals from the hon. member for North Huron. He is very impressive and ponderous and there is always a possibility that he may convince one against his will. When you have a large proportioned man like the hon. member for North Huron with a free vocabulary and a punch behind it, there is a possibility of making black look white. I say to the minister that he should not be in too big a hurry. Know your ground; start right; stay right. If that is followed I think the minister's marketing proposition before very long will bear fruit, provided sound business methods prevail throughout.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words of a more or less general character concerning the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. I do not in any sense wish to be considered critical of that department or the minister in charge, but wish merely to point out what seem to me to be discrepancies between the estimates of the other departments and those of the Department of Agriculture.

Reviewing the general estimates brought down for the various governmental departments, it might be of interest to hon. members to know that this year the interest on the public debt of Canada, including sinking fund, is increased by ten per cent. The estimates for the Department of Agriculture are decreased by thirty-three per cent; for the Department of National Defence by only 19.2 per cent; for the Department of Fisheries by thirteen per cent; for the Department of Mines and Geological Survey by twenty-seven per cent; for the Department of Public Printing and Stationery by twenty per cent. The estimates for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are increased by over twelve per cent; the estimates for the Dominion Lands and Parks branch are decreased by twenty-three per cent, and miscellaneous items are decreased by twelve per cent. The combined estimates show a decrease of twelve per cent. In other words the combined estimates for all governmental activities as shown by the statement I have before me show a decrease of ten per cent, yet we find agriculture obliged to accept a reduction of thirty-three per cent. On the surface that looks like too great a discrepancy. I think all hon. members appreciate the efforts made by the minister to effect economies provided he does not sacrifice efficiency. It seems to me that the other ministers have taken advantage of the Department of Agriculture, when it appears that that department has had to take the reduction I have mentioned. If the Minister of Agriculture is able to effect a reduction of thirty-three per cent in his estimates I think he should use his influence in the most effective manner possible to see that the other departments accept a similar reduction. I am afraid that under the circumstances it will be pretty hard for the government and its supporters to justify the statement made by the Prime Minister during the election campaign, when he said that the collective weight and power of the Dominion of Canada would be used in the interests of agriculture. A review of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture certainly does not indicate that that promise has been carried out.

There are two or three items in these estimates I should like to review in the light of present circumstances. I refer particularly to the estimate for the entomological branch, which shows a reduction of twenty-eight per cent, to the amount devoted to the Destructive Insect and Pest Act, which shows a reduction of fifty-three per cent, and the estimate for agricultural fairs, where there is a reduction of forty-six per cent. In connection with the agricultural fairs I notice that a very substantial reduction has been made. I do not know what the minister has in mind with regard to these fairs, but I hope if the grants are to be reduced that the fairs were notified well in advance, so that they would make provision accordingly. The other item in which I am particularly interested is the farm economics and cooperative marketing branch, which shows a reduction of twenty-eight per cent.

I should like to pause for a moment to deal with the entomological branch and the Destructive Insect and Pest Act. I hold in my hand a statement prepared by one of the officers of the department in regard to a very serious condition in the province of Manitoba, namely the possibility during the coming year of heavy damage by grasshoppers. I have in my hand a map of Manitoba, on which is indicated an area starting at the United States boundary line east of Emerson, running up the east side of the Red river to the west side of lake Winnipeg, across west from there almost over to Neepawa, then back down south through Austin and passing through Somerset to the American boundary again. There is another area at Dauphin, another at McCreary, another at Souris and another at Clearwater, where there are indications that heavy damage will be caused by grasshoppers this year. I should like to read part of the statement prepared by this officer:

> An idea of the probable severity may be realized when it is known that in one instance a square foot of sod contained more than 15,000 eggs.
> It is intended, as soon as the roads are passable, to make collections of eggs from the infested areas and to test these in the laboratory for fertility. In this way the condition of the eggs will be known in advance of the time when they are expected to hatch in the field, and those in charge of control campaigns will then be in a position to advise as to what to expect in various localities and how to combat the threatened menace. In the meantime the situation is exceedingly threatening, and there seems little doubt that the whole-hearted cooperation of the community may be necessary in order to successfully cope with the impending grasshopper situation.

It will be readily realized that the grasshopper menace in Manitoba may be almost a calamity in the areas I have mentioned. With all due respect to the minister and the efforts he may be making to economize I fail to comprehend what reasoning can be advanced for the reduction in this estimate. If ever there was a time when the entomological branch and the Destructive Insect and Pest Act should be maintained at full strength, it is this year. This situation presents an opportunity for observation and study, and in addition efforts will have to be made with respect to control. Last fall, in the area where I happen to be located, along with other people I seeded fall rye, but we hardly saw a single spear of it come up; the grasshoppers kept it cut down to the ground, and the whole crop was ruined. Many people, as is customary in the spring, have been bringing in soil from the fields in which to plant garden seeds. After that soil has been in the window for a day or so these people have invariably found their windows practically covered with young grasshoppers.

As I have said, I do not want to be looked upon as being critical of the minister in regard to the estimates of his department, but here is a situation which must be faced, and every possible assistance should be given to control this menace. To-night I merely bring these matters to the attention of the minister in the hope that his mind will not be closed to this situation when his supplementary estimates are introduced. I was very glad to hear the Minister of Finance say he was willing to do something for the Department of Agriculture when the supplementary estimates are brought down, and I certainly hope the Minister of Agriculture will not be left in the position he is in to-day as compared with the estimates of the other departments.

I have listened on various occasions to hon. members, speaking of agriculture particularly in western Canada, take the position that the farmers of the west should turn more to mixed farming as a cure-all. I think those who speak in that way hardly realize how badly mixed we are in our farming in western Canada. I have taken the trouble to look up a few facts in connection with our so-called mixed farming, and I should like to deal with them for a moment. I find that the first creamery was established in Manitoba in 1886, and in 1887 the province exhibited butter at the Toronto and Ottawa fairs, winning first and second prizes. In 1910 western Canada produced about 5,750,000 pounds of creamery butter; by 1915 the production had increased to 17,000,000 pounds; by 1920 it was 26,000,000 pounds; in 1925 it was nearly 50,000,000 pounds; in 1926 it was 52,000,000 pounds, and in 1931 it was 62,000,000 pounds or 28 per cent of the total production of creamery butter in Canada. Farm butter is estimated at about 50 per cent of the creamery butter production, so in western Canada in 1931 we produced practically 100,000,000 pounds of butter.

It may be of interest to analyse what has become of that butter. This should be of particular interest to the farmers of eastern Canada, because it may explain, to some extent, why they find it difficult to secure reasonable prices for their farm products. In 1931, Manitoba produced 21,000,000 pounds of creamery butter, consumed 12,000,000 pounds and shipped out of the province 9,000,000 pounds. Saskatchewan produced 19,000,000 pounds, consumed 6,000,000 pounds and shipped out 13,000,000 pounds, while Alberta produced 22,500,000 pounds, consumed 11,000,000 pounds and shipped out 11,500,000 pounds. Thus, after providing for their own requirements, the three western provinces had for shipment outside their own boundaries 33,500,000 pounds of creamery butter. It is recognized, I believe, by most people who pay attention to the matter at all that the quality of butter in western Canada is of a very high standard. I might pause to state that within the last eight years at eleven of the leading exhibitions throughout Canada the three western provinces have won 84·3 per cent of all the prizes for creamery butter and 79 per cent of all first prizes; and in 1931 they won 86·9 per cent of all prizes and 81·6 per cent of all first prizes. This is an achievement on which we can congratulate ourselves, and one of far-reaching effects. It means dependable carlot shipments of a high standard of quality, which is essential if we are to establish any permanency in trade. I often wonder, when listening to the hon. member for Marquette, what his attitude is towards the success of our cream grading system. Does he think it would have been possible for us to establish the reputation which we have for our dairy produce if we had not had a system of cream grading?

[Mr. W. G. Weir.]

With reference to the production and movement of cattle in the three prairie provinces in 1931 I find that we handled, through the stock yards, in western Canada and British Columbia, 233,000 head of cattle and 98,000 calves. Sixty-three thousand head of cattle were shipped back to the farms which would return again to market. We shipped 113,600 head of cattle and 5,305 calves from western to eastern Canada, and 25,000 head of cattle and 900 calves to British Columbia, making in all a total shipment out of the three prairie provinces of 139,000 head of cattle and 6,197 calves, in the year 1931.

With respect to the hog industry, I think it is pretty generally known what the possibilities of hog production are in the west. The figures in connection with inspected slaughterings in the three western provinces totalled, in 1931, 983,857 hogs. Live hogs shipped to eastern Canada numbered 319,839 and live hogs shipped to British Columbia 118,016, making a total of 438,000. Perhaps a more complete picture can be put in this way. Looking over the gradings of hogs in all of Canada, I find that there were graded in 1931, 2,655,135 hogs. Of these, 1,324,655 or about one-half were graded in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta yards or plants. Here we have one-half of the hogs of Canada born and raised in three western provinces. After supplying the needs of one-fourth of the population of Canada, and after shipping large numbers to British Columbia, the three western provinces also shipped one-third of a million hogs to eastern Canada.

With respect to pork products, the figures for 1929 are the last obtainable, and they show that over 16,000,000 pounds was shipped out of the western provinces.

With the introduction of central hatcheries, the poultry industry has made progress by leaps and bounds. After taking care of the requirements of 2,350,000 people, the three western provinces had one million dozen eggs for outside shipment. In 1931 Manitoba shipped outside the province 200 carloads;

Saskatchewan shipped 400 carloads, and Alberta 180 carloads, making a total of 780 carloads of eggs shipped out of those three western provinces. Add to that the shipments of dressed poultry and you have over 1,000 carloads of poultry products for outside shipment.

The sheep population in the three western provinces has increased from 779,388 head to 1,282,310, or an increase of 502,927 head, or 65 per cent, in the last five years. In 1931 slaughterings in the three western provinces and British Columbia totalled 300,000, an increase of 55,800 over the previous year. There were shipped to British Columbia 43,000 head, and to eastern Canada 36,000; and, in addition, 1,559,956 pounds of mutton and lamb entered into interprovincial shipments, the bulk of it going to eastern Canada.

Honey production is another important feature of western agriculture. In 1931 Manitoba produced 7,367,375 pounds, valued at $516,000; Saskatchewan, 609,480 pounds, valued at $73,000, and Alberta, 915,000 pounds, valued at $92,000, a total of 8,891,855 pounds valued at $681,000.

As regards fur, Manitoba produced $200,000 worth; Saskatchewan, $125,000, and Alberta, $275,000 in 1931.

Alberta's beet sugar production in 1930 is estimated at 32,000,000 pounds. The figures are not available for 1931.

Thus, after supplying the requirements of one-quarter of Canada's population, the three western provinces, in 1931, were able to ship outside of their own boundaries half a million head of live stock; from thirty-five to forty million pounds of beef, mutton and pork; one thousand carloads of poultry products, and fourteen hundred carloads of creamery butter, besides honey and fur. This clearly indicates that we have overtaken our immediate requirements and are generally pretty well mixed in our farming in the west.

This is being done, Mr. Chairman, in spite of the fact that it would take a merchant and his family fifty years to eat the potatoes that would be traded for one washing machine; in spite of the fact that it would take a hen one hundred years to lay enough eggs to pay for a tonsil operation; in spite of the fact that it would take a sheep eighty-four years to produce enough wool to buy herself a suit of clothes; in spite of the fact that if a cow wore shoes she would have to be skinned twenty times to pay for two pairs; in spite of the fact that puffed wheat is worth 67 cents per pound and wheat, not puffed, is worth 68 cents per bushel—a cent for the wheat and sixty-seven cents for the puff; in spite of the fact that if a farmer paid for a railway ticket with live poultry, the railway would have to carry six extra coaches behind to move the poultry; in spite of the fact that a hen would have to lay an egg a day for a month to pay for one breakfast cereal; in spite of the fact that the farmer would have to give fifty eggs for one shampoo, on which the barber would make fifty cents per egg, or $25; in spite of the fact—this is for the special benefit of the hon. member for South Battleford—that a golf player could smash into seventy-five eggs and not be out of pocket as much as if he lost one golf ball.

Farming is characterized as a fundamental industry but some of us are wishing that it were more fun and not so de-mental. It is all very well for people to talk of having the farmers of western Canada go more extensively into mixed farming. People who talk that way do not realize just how far western Canada has gone in that direction. I wonder what would happen to farmers of eastern Canada if mixed farming operations were further increased in the west. I hesitate to suggest just what I think of the mental attitude of people who are so enthusiastic about western agriculture turning over completely to a mixed farming program.

Now, continuing from a different point of view, I think we have made certain mistakes in the past in agriculture. Some of our actions have been ill-considered and some of our productive schemes not properly regulated. I do not blame it all on departments of agriculture or on governments. At one time we have urged the production of hogs; at another time we have urged the production of sheep or cattle, and so on, without paying adequate attention to the effects of this kind of policy. This is the age of specialization and more attention should be given to the special requirements of agriculture. Certain areas are suited for the production of certain kinds of grain and live stock. I think we should more carefully plan our production campaign. A soil survey of the country should be made in order to determine the lands best suited for raising certain kinds of grain. This has already been done, I believe, in Manitoba, and is something that should be followed up.

In my opinion it is a mistake for farmers to engage in too many side lines; that is to say, a grain grower, I think, should limit his production to only one other branch of agriculture. I do not mean that he should not produce all that he requires for home use, but that he should limit himself to one major side line. This would lead to greater efficiency and a higher standard of quality.

We have heard a good deal regarding marketing. To-day we find ourselves in a very difficult position. Tariffs, exchange rates, and low commodity prices have upset our marketing business to such an extent that we hardly know where we stand. We talk of establishing marketing boards and bonuses, and we are immediately faced with something of our own making. If we develop some form of export bonus, I imagine we shall be immediately confronted with the same thing that importers run up against in this country, namely, some kind of dumping duty placed against our produce by the foreigner. May I, however, urge upon the minister that if he continues to promote the idea of a marketing board, he should give our producer cooperatives an opportunity to play a large part in any scheme that he may develop. If our cooperatives were linked more closely into a scheme of processing it would be much easier to carry out the program which I think the minister has in mind. Without that closer cooperation I think he is going to have a great deal of difficulty in carrying out any marketing board scheme.

There is, however, something which in my judgment the Department of Agriculture can do. Agriculture to-day has not got a continuous service of marketing information such as is supplied by the Department of Trade and Commerce to our manufacturing exporters. I think we should have an army of agricultural experts in foreign countries to develop trade for our agricultural products. This might be brought about by an extension of our present bureau of agricultural economics, and instead of a decrease of twenty-eight per cent there should be an increase. We should endeavour to secure the best men possible to guide the affairs of agriculture, to give advice, and generally to work out an agricultural program best suited to this country as a whole, both marketing and production.

There is only one further observation I wish to make. From what the minister said the other night I inferred that he had in mind suggesting a change from butter production to cheese production. I do not know whether I understood him correctly in that connection or not. I would urge that he go very slowly before recommending a change of that kind. We have, particularly in Manitoba—and I presume throughout western Canada—a large number of small creameries and it would be a hardship for them to be subjected to cheese factory competition.

May I again entreat the minister to use his influence to have his departmental estimates brought up to a fair comparison with those of the other departments in the supplementary estimates. I particularly urge that upon him with respect to the entomological branch, the Dominion rust research laboratory, and the bureau of agricultural economics. There is a very wide discrepancy between the estimates of the Department of Agriculture and those of the other departments. I am making these observations at this time so that the minister will have them in mind before he brings down his supplementaries, and I hope he will do his level best for the particular branches I have mentioned. I repeat that in my judgment it is going to be pretty difficult for the minister and his colleagues to explain a reduction of thirty-three per cent in the agricultural estimates as compared with a general reduction of only ten per cent in the grand total of all the estimates, and with a reduction of only nineteen per cent in the Department of National Defence estimates. If some equality of reduction in these estimates is not made when the supplementaries are brought down, I am afraid the agriculturists of this country will not feel that the right hon. Prime Minister was very sincere when during the election campaign he said, speaking of the Conservative party:

> We shall see to it that the strength and power of the nation stands behind the effort of the people of these plains, and every part of Canada, to market their products to the best possible advantage. That is my duty. That is my business. How otherwise can we succeed?

I hope the minister will remind his leader of those remarks when he comes to consider his supplementary estimates.

Mr. LUCAS: May I be permitted, Mr. Chairman, to congratulate the ex-Minister of Agriculture on his cooperation this evening when dealing with these estimates? I think his support means a great deal at the present time. We all recognize that besides being a practical farmer he has had a great deal of executive experience, and therefore his support of the minister in his efforts to develop a marketing board is of great significance. I think hon. members will agree that if we want to get anything through this house we must have pretty general support from all sides to ensure success. I feel certain that every member to-day recognizes the critical condition of agriculture, and that if we are to get back prosperity we must start with that basic industry. I know the present minister is sympathetic and is doing everything in his power to assist our farmers. But one can do very little without the cooperative assistance of all.

Now, a great deal has already been said with regard to the condition of agriculture, and I do not propose to go into further details. However, I desire to give the committee this quotation from the Economic Annalist. Dealing with the declining prices, this review of agricultural business gives the following paragraph from the January commercial letter published by the Canadian Bank of Commerce:

> We are thus faced with an economic situation in which probably about one-third of our population find that for every dollar of income which they received in 1929 from produce sold they are now getting only 58 cents, and that when they in turn enter the market as purchasers, the goods for which they paid $1 in 1929, far from being offered them at a price commensurate with their 58 per cent ability to pay, are selling at 90 cents. The result is that the farmer purchaser either declines to buy at all or buys less than two-thirds of his requirements. The retarding effect of this lowered purchasing power on general business is already too familiar to require further amplification.

When we realize that our farm population represents practically fifty per cent of our people, and that their purchasing power has been depleted to the extent stated, we can readily account for business being at such a low ebb at the present time. I find another table in the March copy of the same paper, comparing prices of various commodities from 1913 down to the present time, and taking the year 1926 as the index basis of 100. The figures are as follows:

Wholesale Prices

	1913	January 1932
All commodities..	64	69
Farm products..	62·6	52
Field products..	56·4	42
Animal products..	77	68·8
Retail prices..	65·4	85·6

Hon. members will see that while prices of practically all farm commodities are much lower to-day than they were in 1913, the retail prices of the commodities which the farmer has to buy are twenty per cent higher than they were then.

One of the great difficulties we find to-day in this organized world in which we live is the fact that the farmer is unorganized and he finds himself as an individual trying to compete against organized forces. We know how easy it is for big business to organize and the success it has made. We are all aware of the progress from the little shop in the local community to the large factory in the town and then to the big corporation which we have to-day, while the farmer is attempting to carry on practically as he has done from the beginning. It is my belief that the farmer cannot organize in the same way as industry has, and the only answer to big business is through the cooperative organization of the farmer. The very fact that for, I might say, thousands of years, the farmer has lived in an environment as an individualist carrying on his own particular business, separated from his neighbour, makes it very difficult for him to organize. if we are to have prosperity for our industries, it is necessary to bring back prosperity to agriculture; therefore, it is in the interest, not only of the farmer himself but of every business in the country, to assist in trying to reestablish agriculture and put it on a proper basis. This is where the government can help a great deal by encouraging our cooperative organizations and aiding them to get on their feet.

When we look back to the various efforts of our Department of Agriculture, the first was chiefly in regard to production. For a period of years the effort of the department was along the line of showing the farmer how to produce two blades of grass where one formerly grew. Wonderful progress has been made in that direction, and I am not going to suggest that we should put a stop to that effort. But I do not believe it is the main point to which our effort should be directed at this time. Another stage of development was grading, and we know that for a number of years new grading regulations have been introduced until some of the farmers are complaining that we are going too far. But in this highly competitive world in which we are living at the present time, if we are to compete, we must have our produce graded in such a way that it will be able to compete with that of other countries whose production is similar to ours.

Everyone agrees now that we are able to produce, and I am of opinion that if you can show the farmer where he can get a fair price for his output, he will make a determined effort to have the production. Therefore, the effort to-day should be to find a better system of marketing and in that regard, I think the present Minister of Agriculture, since he has taken office has put his finger on the mainspring, as it were. I wish him every success and I consider it very important, now that we realize what effort we should make, that a marketing board of some description be appointed to guide and direct this highly necessary movement.

It is not going to be enough only to appoint a marketing board. We have all across Canada, in every province, the farmers themselves struggling to develop cooperative marketing agencies. These have been successful to a point, but they have almost reached the stage of discouragement, because, after getting together and meeting with a certain degree of success, when they came to get rid of their commodities, they were faced with difficulty. This is where the marketing board can render wonderful assistance, not by starting to create new organizations, but by encouraging the cooperative ones already established and finding an outlet for the goods which they have to offer.

A few years ago there was established in the Department of Agriculture a new branch known as the bureau of economics, and for the development of cooperative marketing. I believe the appropriation for this branch to be one of the most important in the whole of the agriculture estimates. Just as in the past perhaps, we looked upon production as the most important phase, now I am of opinion that the appropriation for this branch should take a leading place among those estimates, and the amount to be voted should be materially increased. This bureau is very much like a research department for agriculture. As the hon. member for Macdonald pointed out a short time ago in his very interesting remarks in regard to having trade agents, this is the branch which, I think, should properly look after that matter. We have at the head of that department at the present time a very capable and efficient officer, but I know that he and his officials are handicapped by the lack of money at their disposal. Any hon. member who receives this monthly pamphlet, the Economic Annalist, and reads the articles by Doctor Booth, I think will agree that he has a fairly good grasp of the whole situation. He has expressed my views so well that I should like to quote what he says in the bulletin for July, 1931. At page 2 he says:

> The farmer who would succeed under present conditions must adopt businesslike methods, and one of these which promises worthwhile results is the preparation annually of a carefully considered budget of anticipated receipts and expenses.

He goes on:

> A few years ago it was estimated that farmers of the United States received about 35 cents on the average out of the dollar paid by the consumer for farm products. In the case of certain products this ran as low as 15 to 20 per cent; in a few as high as 75 or 80 per cent. If this estimate applies to Canadian conditions, and there is reason to believe it might, the desirability of an examination of the reasons for this spread is at once apparent. Research in the costs of marketing is a comparatively undeveloped field and one which invites increased attention.

[Mr. Lucas.]

I think that everyone will agree that one of the great difficulties the farmer is up against to-day is the tremendous spread between the price he receives for his products and the price the consumer pays, and it is in this department, as Doctor Booth points out, that there is a tremendous field for research. Further on he says:

> A program of research in marketing should also include the study of cooperation. We have in this country more than 1,000 farmer-owned and controlled organizations conducting a business running into several hundred million dollars in normal years. For more than half of our farmers these associations play the role of marketing or purchasing agents. Producers have been encouraged to form such associations but relatively little has been done to study the real possibilities and limitations of the movement. We have had plenty of propaganda but little research which would give to producers the answer to such questions as—what volume of business is necessary to success under given conditions? What amount of capital is required to successfully operate a cooperative association? What form of capitalization and structure of organization is best suited to local conditions? What are the advantages and disadvantages of contracts? What does it cost per unit to handle a business of the type contemplated? What membership problems will be met? What legal questions? What management problems, and so forth?

All these are questions which the farmer has neither the time nor the money to answer for himself. But here is a branch of the department set up in which research work along this line could be done that would be of great benefit to the farmer. Further on Doctor Booth says:

> It is in the field of research and education that governmental departments, educational institutions and research agencies can be of most service to farmers and the cooperative movement generally.
> The cooperative movement in this country is already one of immense proportions and of immense possibilities, but like other democratic institutions its progress is dependent upon an informed membership and upon leadership equipped with the necessary information to reach intelligent conclusions. There is much for economists and sociologists to do in this connection but our own lack of information on many of the problems involved suggests the need of practical research.

There is another question, that of credit. On that Doctor Booth says:

> Farmers as a class are debtors, and this is particularly true in all newly settled areas. If the development of agriculture had had to wait upon the net receipts from farms the progress we have made would have been much slower. Whether this would have been more desirable is not open to discussion now. Our farmers operate on credit—we are heirs to both the policy and the practice and it is our task to make the load as light as possible. Can we assist? Certainly there are opportunities for while we have a national and certain provincial farm loan policies we still have credit problems. What, for example, are farmers paying for credit because of the generally adopted practice of making credit institutions out of retail merchants, implement dealers and others. We need first a series of detailed studies followed by constructive suggestions and much education. Perhaps it may be found that in the interest of both farmers and credit institutions that some supplementary form of credit is needed. The possibilities for research and education in this field are abundant in spite of the very splendid work that has already been done.

I think hon. members who understand the farmers' problems in western Canada know that credit and interest rates are one of the biggest loads which the farmer has to carry, and here is where this department might lend very valuable assistance. Finally Doctor Booth says:

In conclusion it is respectfully suggested that the economic problems of agriculture which are of direct interest to about forty-five per cent of our people and indirectly of interest to all of us should receive much greater consideration from universities, colleges, governmental departments and private institutions engaged in research and education.

I would commend that to the minister and ask him to see if it is not possible to find some way of increasing this vote so as to make this branch of much greater service to the department, and through the department to the farmer.

There is another question that I wish to bring to the attention of the minister and of the house. I am not going to say that I am advocating this plan myself because I have not given sufficient study to the question. Out in my constituency, in the town of Viking, there are a couple of gentlemen of high standing in the community who have been there since 1915, and who have spent a great deal of their own money in trying to develop that district. At the present time they are very much interested in trying to promote what they call something along the line of collectivized farming. I want to lay the scheme before the minister, and what I am going to ask him is this: These gentlemen have asked me if they could get a little assistance from the Department of Agriculture by having the agronomical engineers not take responsibility, but assist them in an advisory capacity. I am bound to say, Mr. Chairman, that in view of the developments that are taking place throughout the world to-day no one at the present time can say whether or not this scheme may not have a germ that may develop in the future. We all know that a few years ago it was the generally conceded opinion that we would never see dollar wheat again; in fact, we were of the opinion that we could not produce wheat at a profit except at a price of around one dollar. We have all been disillusioned during the last year or two so far as dollar wheat is concerned and in view of the changes that are taking place throughout the world we may find ourselves confronted with a new situation that may necessitate changing many of our preconceived ideas and facing the future accordingly. This gentleman has written in detail, and I am going to quote part of his own description, because he has given the matter a great deal of thought and study, and his own words describe it much better than I could. He says:

Of all the farmers in the three prairie provinces who are actually living on and working farms a large majority of them have very little equity left in their farms. Since the war the ownership of the land has been gradually passing from the farmers to absentee owners, in many cases back to the Canadian Pacific Railway or Hudson's Bay Company or over to banks or mortgage companies. The drop in wheat prices last year accelerated this passing of ownership and it will surely continue under our present system of small farms until very little of the land is owned by dirt farmers.

I speak from first hand knowledge and experience. My brother and I came to the Viking district in 1915 from Ontario. We owned some 6,000 acres of raw land here and we brought considerable cash capital with us to develop it. From 1915 to 1923 we developed many semi-ready farms which we sold to farmers who we secured by advertising as the enclosed booklet and map show. We brought many farmers from the northern states, from the old country and from the dry belt of southern Alberta to this district. We sold our own farms and others for which we acted as agents mostly on half-crop terms.

At one time we had fifteen farmers on our own farms each with an agreement to purchase. They were all good farmers with a full line of equipment each and most of them had families. Not one of the fifteen has been able to pay for his farm. I shall cite a typical case. In 1920, we sold Mr. X the south half of sec.— at $18 per acre on half-crop terms, 7 per cent interest. We had this farm fenced and forty acres broken on it when he purchased it. He has since then brushed and broken 200 acres more, put up good buildings and made many other improvements until he has now what is considered a splendid half-section farm. This man is considered by all his neighbours as a good farmer and a hard worker. Yet he owes us some $6,000 on his farm which is a little more than the original purchase price. He has told us that he has given up all hopes of paying for the farm, but will remain on and work it as long as we let him and we are only too glad to have him do so.

I can cite many similar cases; farmers who purchased land ten to twenty years ago from the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Hudson's Bay Company or from other owners on terms and each has spent years of labour and thousands of dollars in improvements yet has very little equity now in his farm.

After investigating the financial condition of many farmers of this district I am fully convinced that taking all who reside on and are working farms within the sixteen townships surrounding Viking together they have not remaining a fifteen per cent equity in the lands therein. And the Viking district is one of the best in Alberta both as to the quality of the land and the class of farmers in it. To continue our present system of individual ownership of small farms is economic suicide both for the farmers and for the country.

Permit me to outline this plan or scheme. The first step would be to have plans and specifications drawn up by the best agronomical engineers of the Agriculture department in cooperation with a local committee of this district for the formation of a joint stock company under the federal companies Act with a broad charter giving us all the privileges of a producing, manufacturing and transportation company; the plans to cover how the company is to be organized, administered, managed and operated. Besides the usual by-laws of a company I would suggest special by-laws providing that a majority of the board of directors should be persons living within the district and employed by the company in some branch of its operation.

It must be understood from the start that the government agronomical engineers are acting only as experts and in an advisory capacity and that the board of directors must assume all responsibilities for acts of the company.

The object of the company would be to own and operate unit farms each from 5,000 to 8,000 acres lying within these sixteen townships. The plans would cover the organization of the unit farms on a uniform basis as to administration and management but would allow for differences in operation as that would depend on the nature of the land in each farm. Some parts of the district are naturally good wheat lands while other parts are more suitable for grazing. Some of the unit farms would be used mostly for growing cereals while other farms would specialize in stock raising. Each farm, however, would have its dairy herd of pure-bred cattle.

Let us say that the company has been formed and is called Viking Farmers Limited and has a board of directors of twelve capable men-farmers, business men and financiers—the same class of men as is found guiding our large industrial establishments. It has started its first unit farm of about 6,000 acres. The land in this unit farm has been carefully surveyed and the quality and adaptability of each piece determined. Detail plans are prepared for the location of buildings and for the necessary equipment. The required farmers to operate it are assigned to it and a foreman put in charge and given definite instructions what he is to do and accomplish and how he is to do it. In buying a farm or piece of land the company would pay for it either in cash or stock of the company. The registered owner, the mortgagee and the lien-holders would receive their respective equities. There would be no mortgages left on any lands owned by the company.

At this stage may I state a point which is worthy of consideration. I am of opinion that debts against many farms have become so great that to-day we are not only faced with the matter of wiping out war reparations and war debts, but the time is not far distant when there may have to be some adjustment in regard to our private debts, and especially those against our farmers. This might provide a means of making some adjustment along that line. The letter continues:

[Mr. Lucas.]

Viking Farmers Limited would encourage every farmer to own his own home although he may be working with the company. Where a farmer sells his land to the company let him keep his home and a few acres surrounding it for a garden. This puts a farmer in the same position with the company as the city dweller with the industry with which he works.

The capital of Viking Farmers Limited would be secured by the sale of its capital stock. With a strong board of directors and with a prospectus fully telling what the company plans to do in the way of owning and operating large unit farms and how this latter is to be done under expert agronomical advice and in co-operation with the government research laboratories and experimental work and estimating the profits that may be reasonably expected there is no doubt but the company can secure the necessary capital to carry through the enterprise. Now is the time to do it when land is cheap.

I firmly believe and wish to emphasize that the above is the only way we can secure sufficient capital to prevent complete bankruptcy of most of the farmers of this district within the next three years and to place farming on a sound business basis. The banks will not loan money to the farmers and neither will the mortgage companies. Beatty's five million dollars revolving fund is but a flea-bite to the needs of the west and will not do any one district any appreciable benefit. Members of credit societies are heavily in debt for loans of the past so they can expect no help from that source.

Where, therefore, can the six hundred or more farmers of this district get capital to go into mixed farming each by himself? Where can even five per cent of them do so? What they cannot do individually they can do by cooperation as a company.

Let us consider the direct advantages to this district by most of the farmers in it cooperating, pooling their farmlands, as it were, and working together as Viking Farmers Limited. Take one unit farm of around 6,400 acres, or ten full sections. At present there are about twelve farmers to ten sections of land, each with separate buildings, implements and equipment. About four of them have tractors and two have threshing outfits. They have on an average five grade cows and a few other animals and poultry. They have an average of $5,000 invested in buildings, implements and live stock or a total of about $60,000 for the twelve.

Let these twelve put their lands in Viking Farmers Limited and work with the company under expert advice and direction:

1. They would have but one set of good buildings on their unit farm thoroughly equipped for dairying.

2. They would have a herd of forty to fifty pure-bred dairy cows.

3. They would have several times the number of other animals and poultry and but one-half the implements that they now have.

4. The company would use only the best of seed thoroughly cleaned.

5. Crops would be rotated according to the needs of the land.

6. The land would be kept free from weeds and prepared well in advance for the crop that would follow.

7. The company's buildings, pure-bred herd and farm implements would cost much less than the $60,000 that the twelve farmers have now invested.

8. The company would have a plan or policy of production extending over years so as to get the average prices for all products and not rush into one line at the same time that farmers all over the country are doing the same thing.

9. The company would take into account the average risks of drought, frost and hail and be prepared to cope with such conditions.

10. The company would keep in close touch with the best practices and methods developed by experimental farms and laboratories.

11. It would have a head office at Viking from where all activities would be directed and where all records would be kept.

12. The company would finish its products to the highest state possible so as to make the greatest profits.

13. The company would have its own seed cleaning plant, poultry dressing station, abattoir and creamery, all profitable enterprises closely connected with farming.

14. It would be able to ship some of the animal products in car lots when prices would warrant.

15. Each branch of farming would be in charge of a farmer who would make that branch his specialty.

As the dairy herd is the centre of mixed farming I would like to point especially to the advantages of a company over the single farmer building up and maintaining a pure-bred dairy herd. The great majority of farmers do not care enough for live stock to build up a good dairy herd. It takes years for a good farmer who loves cattle to do so. He must like to be with them and care for them. If he has not special education and training to start with before he can build up a good herd he is old. At his death the herd is dispersed. That is the history of many a herd in Ontario.

With a company it is different. The best man available with special education and training is selected to look after the herd, to see that every animal is properly cared for, kept in good health and doing its share of production. By careful breeding, feeding and culling he can in a few years build up a herd that will be a source of great pride to himself and a big dividend payer to the company. If anything happens to him another good man is put in his place and the same careful work goes on.

The production of sheep, hogs, beef cattle and poultry and their products would be as systematically organized as the dairy herd. Each unit farm would become a manufacturing plant and with thirty-two of them in this district under one company farming would be industrialized.

Is there any question that such a company would be of great benefit to this district and to the country? Would it not be immensely easier and cheaper to put our policy across to one such company in this district than to six hundred individual farmers?

If this scheme can be worked out in detail and successfully applied to the Viking district, what is to prevent its being applied to five hundred similar districts throughout the western provinces?

That is the scheme, in brief, that these men have in view, and all they are asking from the government is advice. They are not asking the department to put up any money; they have spent a great deal of time and effort in working out this plan, and they are of the opinion that they can make a success of it. The minister need not assume any responsibility for the success of this undertaking, but I would ask that he place the economics branch at the disposal of these men to see if they cannot be given some encouragement in carrying out this proposal.

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Representing a portion of the province of Saskatchewan that is particularly adapted to agriculture, I think it well that I should make a few observations in a general way. In looking over the estimates of the Department of Agriculture I notice that material reductions are made in connection with almost every item, but I hope that the items which assist in the marketing of agricultural products will not suffer to the same extent. Already there has been a good deal of discussion with regard to these estimates, and I think it quite plain from what has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite that the late government had no constructive agricultural policy. Now hon. gentlemen opposite expect the present ministry in one year to do more to put agriculture on a firm basis than they did during the nine years they were in power. In my opinion the experiences through which the farmers have passed during the last three years will be the means of encouraging them to go into diversified farming. For a number of years we have been endeavouring to encourage them to do so, and if they do go in for mixed farming I believe that as far as quantity and quality go there are unlimited possibilities.

This evening the hon. member for Macdonald made a very interesting statement with regard to the quality and quantity of the products of western farmers. I had intended to give some figures, but I think the figures given by the hon. member will serve the purpose. If the farmers of the southern half of Saskatchewan—and I speak particularly with respect to that province—would go into mixed farming there is practically no limit to the quantity they could produce. With regard to quality, I think we have sufficient evidence to prove that when the farmers of western Canada pay particular attention to any product, certainly they can produce a good quality. I need only refer to the fact that when those who have stock farms in western Canada exhibit their products at the royal winter fair in Toronto, they generally take a number of prizes.

The hon. member for Bow River gave a number of figures showing a comparison of the prices and values of farm products. He put on record the receipts from field crops in Canada during the years 1928 to 1931. To compare the amount received for the crop of 1928, when we had the largest cereal crop we have ever had in Canada, and when the average price for the whole year was almost the highest we have known, with the amount received for the crop of 1930, when there was a crop failure in a large part of the western provinces and the price was considerably reduced, does not assist in arriving at any real conclusion. The hon. member also spoke of the cost of production. Without going into details I only wish to say that from practical experience I know the cost of production will be a great deal less this year. If we have a fair crop in western Canada, with the present cost of labour and of many articles which the farmer has to buy, I believe the farmer will make more with wheat at 70 cents a bushel than he made in 1929, when the cost of labour and of everything else was considerably higher.

There has been a good deal of discussion with regard to the proposed marketing board. This afternoon I was delighted to hear the ex-Minister of Agriculture commend the creation of this board, and I think the hon. gentleman paid a very great compliment to the present Minister of Agriculture. The hon. member for Melville seems to have changed in the last few days. When a member of parliament comes to a mature age I have noticed that he either becomes a very ardent partisan or takes the broader view and listens more readily to the opinions of others, and I was very pleased to note that the ex-Minister of Agriculture is following the latter course. I think a marketing board should be formed. We need it at the present time. There is no use going into details, quoting figures to show the position of agriculture today, I think it is recognized by everyone that something must be done and done in the near future. We are faced with a grave crisis, with realities that must be met at once. A marketing board could do very much by way of making investigation and making a real survey, studying the whole question of marketing agricultural products. I do not think it would be wise to form a board unless we gave them teeth, so to speak, to some extent; that is to say, after they have made a certain investigation and think that they could facilitate the marketing of our products and assist in bringing about an increase in the prices of those products, they might be able to act in some way or other. How they could obtain funds is another question. It might be through a levy or a bonus, although I think the farmers throughout Canada realize that the bonusing of products is not the real solution of our problem in agriculture. I believe, however, that this board, after careful investigation, should report back to the department and that action should then be taken.

I am sure that the present minister is quite anxious that something should be done. We in Saskatchewan are extremely proud of the Hon. Mr. Weir; we feel that Saskatchewan is well represented by him in the government. He is a man of energy and ability and a man of great capacity for study, and I believe he has realized since he has held this office for nearly two years that there is a real problem facing him. I know he intends to do the right thing. I can assure hon. members that my association with him has proven that he is absolutely anxious to carry on in a non-partisan spirit. So far as Saskatchewan is concerned, I know for a fact many of the appointments he has made have been without any regard whatever to partisanship; he has endeavoured to get the right man for the job. I am sure, therefore, that when he comes, if he does in the near future, to establish an export board, he will get the proper men, irrespective of their political leanings.

I do not think it is necessary to prolong the discussion just now. We are going to take the estimates up item by item, and it does not serve any real purpose putting a lot of useless figures on record. Certain comparisons have been made which in my opinion are ridiculous; they serve no purpose. The hon. member for Macdonald to-night compared the price of a pound of puffed wheat to the price of a bushel of wheat. Well, that serves no useful purpose, and it would have been equally ridiculous had he made the comparison with wheat at any price from $2 up to $4 a bushel with puffed wheat at 67 cents a pound. Such comparisons, I repeat, are useless. We have had a good deal of discussion in general and I would advise that we get down to detail and pass the estimates.

Mr. GERSHAW: The minister is aware of the condition of the ranchers in the district I represent; he knows the difficulties with which the sheep and cattle men have been faced in recent years. First, we had an embargo and then a duty which prevented their getting their products into the United States, and when the British market became available the departure of Great Britain from the gold standard seemed to bring fresh difficulties. Farm products are all being sold at prices much less than cost of production and never has the farming industry been at such a low ebb. I know that the minister will meet with many difficulties, but still I cannot help thinking he has a great opportunity, in view of these very difficulties, of working out a policy which would do something to bring happiness and contentment to the homes on the farms throughout this country. He knows that some of these large ranchers had cattle on the ocean when the British people went off the gold standard, and he knows that they received a price of something like $26 per head for their steers when they could have obtained as much as $54 in Canada. It seems unfortunate that we cannot take Professor Sandwell's advice to join the sterling group of nations, because it would bring the price for Canadians up to the price their competitors receive.

Someone spoke recently of putting a girdle round the whole British Empire. If they do, let us hope that this wall will not be too high, because we must realize that only thirty-eight per cent of our exports are taken by British countries, so that we must extend our markets beyond British countries to the markets of the world if we are to meet with success.

It seems to me that this is no ordinary depression; rather a multitude of adversities has struck us at once and we find that there is a crisis in almost every system of our modern civilization. In the political system we have fears of war and revolution. The agriculturist has met with a great crisis which perhaps was coming anyway owing to the fact that so much new ground has been brought under cultivation while less agricultural products are being used. In addition to that, we have high tariffs against us, shutting out our products from their natural markets and particularly from the European markets. In the financial and economic realm we find that the delicate mechanism which has worked so well has ceased to function smoothly. We find that the automatic regulation of this system has broken down, and we hope that there will be some deliberate management which in the future will help to maintain a more equal price level so that people may count at least on getting their costs of production. We find that this system which allowed a free flow of trade from country to country has been seriously interfered with by some long term agreements and cartels, and particularly by high tariffs the world over, and as a result we find gold hoarded in the vaults of the United States and France and great quantities of sugar and rubber and coffee and wheat are in storage containers. It would seem that the different systems of the world have been carried on by men of keen but limited vision, each working in his own particular sphere, no Olympians, as it were, in the mountains keeping general control over the whole system. I believe that something along the lines of general control must be worked out, because if we correctly size up the cause of the situation, some such control must inevitably be brought into operation in order to solve the problem. We know that the prosperity of Canada depends on the prosperity of agriculture. We know that at the approaching Imperial economic conference an opportunity will be afforded for planning trade within the empire. As trade looks to world markets, may we not hope that in addition to planning inter-imperial trade our statesmen will reach out and do some planning for trade in the larger markets of the world, and thus do something to bring about a better condition of affairs.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Before dealing with the question of a marketing board, Mr. Chairman, I desire to correct some figures given by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir), I think unintentionally, but nevertheless of a character to create uneasiness, particularly in farming communities, with regard to the percentage reductions in estimates of the various departments, particularly the Department of Agriculture, in relation to the whole estimates. If I understood my hon. friend aright, he stated that the general average reduction had been about ten per cent, as against thirty-three per cent in the agricultural estimates. May I remind him that in the total estimates there is an amount fixed by statute of two hundred and seventeen million dollars odd, from which the government can make no reduction whatsoever, comprised principally in three items—interest on public debt, pensions, subsidies to the provinces. In addition, this year there is an increase of thirteen million dollars odd in the interest on public debt. So the controllable expenditure is approximately $139,000,000. The reduction made in that expenditure, instead of being ten per cent is actually 40 per cent, as against a reduction of thirty-three per cent in the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

With regard to the marketing board, I certainly am convinced that some scheme of organized marketing must be brought into being if we are successfully to compete with the world in exports not only of agricultural commodities—although at the moment I think those are the most important—but of many other commodities. I would commend to the Minister of Agriculture this idea, that without attempting a specific plan at this moment, he bring into being a body that can be used as a marketing board, or developed into an organization that will plan out the methods by which marketing can be controlled, because that is virtually what it means. I may say in passing that I have been working for the past four months with a fairly large committee in connection with the marketing of a product but second in importance to any agricultural product. We have been working in association with the purchaser of that product in England. I have become convinced that notwithstanding the fact that the number of persons engaged in the production of this commodity is very much less than the number engaged in agricultural production, we must find some channel or clearing house through which that commodity can be marketed if it is ever to be put on the British market in a large way. We must be in a position to control the class or grade of the product and the different types of that product for exportation, we must be in a position to say where it can be procured and in what volume, and further, we must be in a position to say that there will be a continuous supply. I think the first thing the British importer will say to you will be this: If we divert our importations of this particular commodity to Canada or some other overseas dominion, can we depend on getting our supplies three, four or five years hence? He will point to many cases in which we have exported goods to Great Britain and then suddenly diverted our business to some other country or closed down altogether. We shall never establish a sound business connection with the United Kingdom or any other part of the British Empire unless those who require our goods can depend on getting reasonably regular supplies to meet their demands—and supplies suited to their requirements, not what we happen to have to sell at the moment. We spent a couple of hours with that gentleman on the question of exporting a certain line of commodities now required in England, but because of the fact that we have not been looking ahead and consequently have not any plans, we cannot furnish the business.

I commend the whole scheme of a marketing board—a body that will control markets and take the surplus products off the home market. After all, the surplus product in agriculture is not very great with the exception of wheat in the west and potatoes in the maritimes. We are consuming the greater portion of our agricultural products. It does not require very much exportation from time to time to relieve the home market of a surplus of perishable commodities, such as meat, butter, cheese, and so on—I need not go into that; every member interested in agriculture knows the facts. But lumber, for example, is in a vastly different position. We have various lumber commodities in very large quantities for export, and that will always be the case if the industry is to be on a stable basis. Let me say again, we must make up our minds to provide channels through which the British importer will know when he may get what he requires. Personally, I do not see how this can be accomplished except through some agency in the shape of a marketing board in the case of agricultural products, and in the case of other commodities perhaps a clearing house or corporation. Something of the kind must be set up. I do not suggest that all the details can be worked out in a day or even a month, but I do feel that the minister should take authority to enable him to bring into being such an organization just as quickly as it can be made to function.

Mr. CAYLEY: Mr. Chairman, I come from the county of Oxford, which you might say is the home of the dairy business of Canada. The dairy breeding and selecting has been perfected to such a degree there that Oxford stock has been sought after in all parts of the world as foundation stock for dairy herds. Oxford county is also the home of the first cooperative cheese factory. Further, it is the birthplace of our first dairy commissioner, Doctor J. A. Ruddick. I see he is about to retire from his position after a long and valuable life given to that department of our national work. In the opening paragraph of his recent report he says:

> As this will in all probability be the last time I shall have the privilege of addressing the Dairymen's Associations of western Canada as Dominion dairy commissioner, it would seem to be an appropriate occasion on which to review the development of the dairy branch and to put on record some of its more important activities. The further fact that I am the only person who has been connected with the branch from its inception, 42 years ago, to the present day, may possibly be considered as an additional reason for giving some publicity to the matter at this time.

The document I hold in my hand is a short review of the advancement that has been made in the dairy industry since his appointment as dairy commissioner forty-two years ago, showing how this great industry has prospered and developed through its different stages under his skilful management. We who represent the dairy farmers of the Dominion of Canada cannot pay too much tribute to the splendid work done by Doctor Ruddick in this regard. He says this in regard to conditions back in 1891 and 1892:

During the winter of 1891-92, the dairy branch demonstrated the practicability of operating creameries during that period of the year. Two cheese factories in Oxford county, one near Woodstock (East and West Oxford) and the other at Mount Elgin, were fitted up and equipped for winter butter making, and were operated by the branch for three winters along with others started the following year. As this was the first attempt to operate creameries during the winter months in Canada, it was an important step in the development of the modern creamery business.

Further on he refers to this historical and interesting fact of 1892, one which some hon. members will recall:

In September, 1892, we made the mammoth cheese for the World's Fair that was held the following year in Chicago. It was made at the Perth, Ontario, dairy station.

That was one of the things that was not made in Oxford.

The weight was eleven tons, and it was by far the largest cheese that had ever been made. It was sold and cut up in London, England, in May, 1894, and was first-class quality.

Without going through all the details of this interesting record, I would refer just to this long and useful life of Doctor Ruddick and the contribution he has made to this valuable industry. He says in this connection:

I cannot contemplate my dissociation with a work in which I have been actively engaged for fifty-two years, forty-two of which have been spent in public service, without some emotion.

Further on he says, giving one some idea of his splendid character:

On the whole, I do not regret that I have spent the best part of my working life in connection with this service. I probably could have made more money in the commercial side of the business—

We who know him all agree with him in that regard.

—but, after all, money is not everything. There has been a good deal of satisfaction in knowing that one has had some share in the development of the dairying industry of this country during the past forty-one years.

I take very much pleasure in paying this tribute to Doctor Ruddick.

The dairy business, along with others of the country, is in a very sad plight. When I think of the last election—and I do not want to refer to this in a political way, but I cannot help doing so—I think of how the Conservative party rode into power on the back of the dairy cow. Now that they have got into power, it looks from the decrease they have made in the estimates that they have deserted the cow; they have got off her back; they have set the dogs on her and she can shift for herself. While I say that, yet I have faith and confidence, perhaps more than has been suggested by some others on this side of the house, in the Minister of Agriculture; for in days gone by I played football with him and he played a good game. I believe the same energy which he put into the game of football in days gone by, he is putting into the game of administering his department in the government of Canada in these trying days.

I notice a report that in the Senate they are thinking of erecting monuments to some of the great leaders of the day. It would be a good thing, in view of what the dairy cow did for the Conservatives at the last election, if they erected, either in the Hall of Fame or somewhere on parliament hill, a monument to her, because, as many of us know to our regret, she won that great election for them. It seems to me that some tribute to the dairy cow should come from the Conservative party.

Let me say this regarding the dairyman's plight: It is rather sad that in a time when so much benefit was to have been conferred upon the Canadian dairy industry by the shutting off of New Zealand butter, prices of dairy products in Canada should have fallen to a new level, the lowest in a generation. Apparently the high tariff medicine on butter succeeded only in making the patient sick. The fact is that the banning of New Zealand butter from Canada led the producers in this country to expect a much better return than formerly. And they had reason to expect that. I can imagine the campaigners of the last election, who visited the cow-stables of the farmers in my community, while they were looking at the cows and talking over the serious situation as they made it out to the farmers, saying: Let us see your last milk cheque; have you it with you? Do you want that milk cheque to be greater? If so, vote Tory. The farmers believed this. I canvassed man after man who said to me: "No. I would like to vote for you, but we are promised more money." There was no "if" about the matter; they were surely promised that they would get more money. Now they are wondering where it is; they are looking at their milk cheques and at their egg cheques too. The last time I was home, one poor fellow said to me: "I came in with my eggs to-day, expecting with the proceeds to buy the little one a pair of shoes, but I did not get enough money, so the poor kid had to do without." I am not blaming the Conservative party for the condition of affairs, but I am blaming them for holding out those false hopes. I really believe they misrepresented things; they represented future conditions in too rosy a fashion. The result of the banning of New Zealand butter was that the production of Canadian butter increased until presently we found ourselves on an export market—and that was to be the saviour of the butter industry—facing New Zealand competition in Europe, and the Canadian price of butter was governed by the export price. Besides all of this—and this is the sad part of it—New Zealand retaliated against Canada, resulting in untold damages to the domestic market which had proven so valuable.

The February issue of the Ontario Milk Producer has a few interesting things to say on this subject. It says that dairy farming must be safeguarded. I quote:

> Help the dairy industry and more individual farmers in Ontario will benefit than in any other way. In saying this we have no desire to belittle the claims of other branches of agriculture. We are merely trying to emphasize the importance of dairying in Ontario's agriculture.

There has been talk about the back to the farm movement. There is a decided back to the farm movement. In some communities every family is getting someone back to the farm. Sons and daughters, with their families are coming back as never was the case before. The farmers are bearing a very heavy burden, not only of taxation, but because of those who are returning home. One young man told me just the other day that in his community there was only one family which had not already added to its burden someone, a relative, son or daughter, who had come home to live with the family because they could not get work in the cities and towns. Furthermore they are coming back from the United States. Just before the last election the great cry was, "Our sons and daughters are going to the United States." Well, I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that they are coming back now, and as they said about little Peter, "they are coming back as they never came before."

[Mr. Cayley.]

George H. Barr, speaking at the London convention, said:

> In 1900 the dairy business occupied a very minor position, the total annual value of its products being approximately $34,766,330 as compared with a value of $104,858,000 in 1930. As a matter of fact, dairying to-day constitutes the major item in agricultural revenue. The value for 1931 will be somewhat lower than that of 1930, but the production of milk has established a new record.

And further:

> I wonder if we always remember that the foundation of this great industry which has helped pay off more mortgages on Ontario farms than any other branch of agriculture is that quiet, inoffensive animal, the mother cow which you see strolling around the pasture fields or lying contentedly in the shade of our Ontario maple trees as you drive along your splendid country roads and our wonderful highways, and do we not often forget that these old mother cows are probably doing more to help pay for these splendid roads and highways than any other living thing in the whole province.

If the hon. member for Marquette or the poet member for Selkirk were here I would like to read for their benefit this little poem that I picked up, entitled The Cow. If I were the author of it I would dedicate it to these hon. gentlemen, but I cannot do that. This poem is very significant; probably the Minister of Agriculture will enoy it:

The Cow

By E. Merrill Root

That four-legged fountain called a cow
Is stranger than the Sphinx;
What Oedipus has told us how
Green grass within a copper cow
Turns the white milk he drinks?

The Roc from the Arabian tale
Was not so strange as she;
Jonah's apartment in the whale
Beside her alchemy's a pale
And gentle verity.

God's jolly cafeteria
With four legs and a tail,
As mystic as the Cabala,
An elf in rufous taffeta,
She pours us ivory ale.

The Tavern of the Crumpled Horn,
She pours a cosmic flood
That antedates John Barleycorn;
'Twill feed the Superman unborn;
It nourished Adam's blood.

That might help the hon. member to win his next election. We have heard so much about garnet wheat during the present session that one might think that we produced nothing else in Canada—and by the way I think another session we should have some other line of agriculture stressed a little more in the committee work. Mr. Barr says:

> In Ontario there are about a million and a half cows going quietly about the business of producing the material that kept in operation in 1931, 290 creameries, 719 cheese factories, 29 milk condenseries and milk powder plants, 525 milk and cream distributing plants, and dozens of ice cream plants. The old mother cow is also doing her share in providing the milk and cream used in scores of bakeries, confectionery and chocolate factories.

May I pause here to interject that in view of the hardships the dairymen are up against these days, and the heavy taxation the farmer finds imposed upon him municipally, provincially and otherwise, I would urge that he be exempted from any further burden by way of the sales tax. Mr. Barr goes on to say:

Ontario produces about one-third of all the creamery butter, and about two-thirds of all the cheese manufactured in Canada. Three-quarters of the milk condenseries and milk powder plants in Canada are located in the province of Ontario. Slightly over ninety-five per cent of the cheese made in Ontario in 1931 was first-grade quality.

You may talk about Manitoba, Quebec and the other provinces, but surely it cannot be denied that Ontario is leading in respect of dairy production. Mr. Barr says further:

We estimate that about seventy per cent of Ontario creamery butter is first-grade also, and it is practically all made from pasteurized cream, which gives it that nice, mild flavour which we all like so much on our toast and breads.

Since agriculture is the basic industry, the basic foundation upon which all other industry rests, I think we should treat it as a basic industry, and not treat the secondary industries as basic industries. Do not let us get them misplaced. If agriculture is made to flourish, if prices of agricultural products can be raised, all will enjoy the prosperity that will follow. So I say, treat agriculture as a basic industry. Feed it and nourish it and dig around it and see the roots are well kept, because it is our root industry. In speaking of it the Prime Minister said: We are ready to put all the resources of this dominion behind the dairy industry. Yet we see this government reducing the estimates of this department more than any other department of the government. Thirty-three and one-third per cent is chopped off, and that is the way the government is putting all the resources of this dominion behind the hard working farmers of this country. It seems to me to be beginning at the wrong place, and I would throw out this suggestion: To this so-called invisible government which is behind the government and has been dictating its policies, and which with the dairy cow helped the government into power, I hope the Prime Minister will say: "I listened to you once before and raised the tariffs because we had an idea that your theory was right. But you were wrong. You have ruined us, you have brought our country to the verge of bankruptcy, and now we are going to begin with the basic industry and build it up, and on that firm basis our other industries, manufactures and everything else, will flourish."

I think all will agree with me that the National Dairy Council have studied this question exhaustively. Let us see what they have to say about the condition of affairs and what they have to offer by way of suggestions. This is from the president F. E. M. Robinson. He says:

I wish to make it very clear that the whole question of future prices in our industry is bound up in the question of sterling exchange and its relation to our currency and to that of the United States. We cannot meddle in these high matters—

I do not know why.

—but I must point out that an active inflationary policy in the United States resulting in a depreciation of the value of their money might necessitate similar action in this country for we could hardly maintain ourselves if our currency were to be at a premium over both London and New York.

He says further:

This is of course conjectural, but I wish to make it clear that existing debts cannot be validated at existing prices, and hence we may conclude that means either natural or artificial will be found to depress the value of money and raise the prices of commodities. This is the long term view, but in the meantime we can and must use this period of hard times for a drastic cutting of costs.

When the New Zealand treaty was under discussion before a committee of the house I asked the minister if the National Dairy Council had been called in to advise respecting some of the terms of the legislation, and he answered that it had not. I was sorry to receive that information, because I think they should not have been overlooked. I wonder if their wishes and suggestions will not be considered during the coming Imperial economic conference. I should like to read the following to the minister from the National Dairy Council:

It is expected that the Imperial economic conference will be held in Ottawa probably in July. The date is now only a little over three months distant and very little has been done to prepare a case for agriculture comparable to the carefully prepared arguments which will be advanced by the industrial interests.

It looks as though the conference may be onesided and that the farmers will be left out, only to find that the industrial interests have had their way. I continue reading:

We may take it, I think, that the British delegation will have two thoughts in mind—namely, an outlet for British manufactured goods and reasonably cheap food for the British consumer. From this it is clear that the case for Canadian agriculture as a whole must be made so strong that it may be accepted as part of our national program. I am not satisfied that any adequate appreciation of this need exists as yet in this country, and in the short time at our disposal we must make every effort to work with the other agricultural interest to this end.

I do not think any useful purpose would be served by continuing the discussion longer. I have tried to point out to the minister the very great importance of this line of agricultural activity in the province of Ontario, and what it means to the people in my county. I must say they are beginning to lose faith in governments and politicians. I can best illustrate my point by relating the following incident. I do not know how it came about, but a young chap from the city of Ottawa drifted into the county of Oxford, and the other night he called at my home asking for something to eat. Having given him his meal and finding out that he had come from Ottawa, they asked him how conditions were in this city. His reply was, "Ottawa is nothing but tourists and politicians; there is no place for a poor man like me." That seems to be the feeling growing prevalent throughout Canada, namely that Ottawa is no place for a poor labouring man out of work, but a place for only politicians and tourists.

I assure the minister I shall join with him; I hope other hon. members will take a similar attitude and that we may be successful, in these days of adversity, in broadcasting the feeling that Ottawa is doing something worth while and making an effort to help out. The matter of currency is something I cannot settle in my own mind, but no doubt presents a difficulty which should be met. When I read that great economists and other men of outstanding ability say our currency is weak or that it is at fault, then I say, let us try something. There is no doubt that the farmers of Canada cannot long continue in their state of bankruptcy. I fear for them, and I do not think I could better illustrate their condition than by quoting from a speech made by the Hon. Louis Ludlow of Indiana. Speaking at Washington not long ago he said:

> Every time I receive a letter from home I utter a Methodist prayer before I open it, because I know it is going to bring some new tale of tough luck.

Further on he states:

> Every dirt farmer in Indiana has got the shimmy shaking blues—

Whatever that is. I suppose it is a condition which would keep one awake at night. The fact is, however, that the farmers do not know what to do. Speaking about the price of hogs he says this:

When I have completed a hog for the market and bid him farewell as he leaves for the slaughter pen, I admire him for his architectural beauty, but I weep softly when I think that everything I put into him is a dead loss, except perhaps the squeal. I find no balm in Gilead.

Speaking about the price of eggs he has the same tale of woe:

> Every time one of my hens cackles after conferring an egg on me, she seems to boast brazenly over adding one more link to my deficit.

Then he goes on further in this interesting speech, and tells about a little creek flowing back of the barn, and about the old swimming hole in which he used to go swimming. He tells of having listened to the song of the frogs, but states further that in these days there is no joy in their song. He says:

> The bullfrogs broadcast the dolorous slogan, "tough luck, tough luck."

Let me assure hon. members of this: tough as it is, these farmers of Canada, of Ontario, of Oxford county, are of the very best calibre; they are the very best stuff. In a real sense they are the true pioneer stock. May I close my remarks by again referring to Mr. Ludlow's speech. In my view the piece of verse I am about to quote describes very well the present conditions of the farmer, and his hope and faith for the future:

> Work all summer till winter's nigh,
> Then figure up the book, and heave a big sigh.
> Work all year; don't make a thing;
> Got less cash than I had last spring.
> Now, some people tell us there ain't no hell,
> But they never farmed, so they can't tell.
> When spring rolls round I take another chance,
> While the fringe grows longer on my old gray pants.
> Give my s'penders a hitch, my belt another jerk
> And, by heck, I'm ready for a full year's work.

Mr. REID: Mr. Chairman, I rise to say a few words in regard to the export marketing board, and shall direct my remarks to one particular line of agricultural endeavour which up to the present time has not been mentioned in this discussion, namely the poultry industry. I shall speak not entirely with reguard to Canada as a whole but with particular reference to the province of British Columbia.

Due to the mild climate and the freedom from extremes of heat in summer or cold in winter the lower mainland of British Columbia, Vancouver island and adjacent islands are very suitable for egg and poultry production. As the soil in many parts is inclined to be gravelly and well drained, it is well adapted to poultry raising. The flocks of laying birds in British Columbia are among the finest in the world, and are specially bred and selected for heavy egg production. The average production per bird is 144 eggs per year.

Prior to 1920 the province of British Columbia did not produce enough eggs to supply its own requirements, and it was necessary to import eggs to meet the demand. Development of the industry was very rapid from 1920 until 1929, when production reached its highest point. In that year production was sufficient to supply domestic needs, and 177,754 cases or 389 carloads of eggs were shipped out of the province to eastern Canada. Carload shipments out of British Columbia, according to figures supplied by the Dominion live stock branch were: 1926, 55 cars; 1927, 155 cars; 1928, 362 cars; 1929, 389 cars; 1930, 310 cars. In addition to carload shipments at various times considerable quantities were exported by water to other countries.

The poultry population in 1929 was estimated at two and one-half million birds, and there were from 3,500 to 4,000 commercial poultrymen engaged in the business. The average price to producers that year was about 30 cents per dozen, or a gross earning of $3.60 per bird. In 1930 there was a decline in production of about 15 per cent due to lower prices, high feed costs, and consequent reduced profits.

During 1931 there was a further very serious decline in production estimated at about 25 per cent under last year, large numbers of producers having been forced to sell their entire flocks. I had a letter the other day from a neighbour of mine who, when I came to Ottawa at the opening of the session, had a flock of one thousand birds. He has been compelled to sell them at the rate of about 100 a month in order to pay his feed costs. For three pound birds which cost him 85 cents to bring to maturity he has been receiving only a total price of 25 cents. Unless better prices are obtained the industry will largely disappear in British Columbia. The production of eggs and poultry in that province is a highly specialized business. The poultry plants are operated on small acreages, the average being about five acres. That may sound strange to farmers who are accustomed to 100 or 160 acres, but many of those five acre plants represent investments from $20,000 to $75,000. I know one man who has an incubator capacity of 120,000 eggs, producing baby chicks for sale. Feeds consist of approximately ninety-five per cent low grade grain and grain products, most of which is shipped from the prairie provinces and if this market is closed to the prairie farmers it will mean a considerable loss in revenue to them. The farmer is no longer an individualist; in the old days he could barter by himself, but that has all been changed. In the past wholesalers were rather pleased when there was a surplus of products, because that meant lower prices to the producers with consequent larger profits to themselves. Today Canada is the largest consumer of eggs in the world, the average being 365 eggs per capita per annum. This has been brought about by our high grading and the high quality of our products.

It cannot be expected that the various provinces should go into the import countries of the world seeking markets for their products. I believe this is a field which the export marketing board could cover very well, and I should like to see that plan at least tried out. I do not know that it would solve all our difficulties, but at least it would be a step in the right direction and would assure to the importing countries uniformity and quality. They could also deal with the question of continuity of supply, which is one of the important things to be considered when you sell products in a foreign market.

I just desired to bring this matter to the attention of the minister, because I have not heard this branch of agriculture discussed, except in a cursory way. I hope if a board is appointed some real poultryman will be included among its members.

Mr. IRVINE: At this late hour, Mr. Chairman, I will not attempt to cover the field of discussion with regard to agricultural conditions with which I otherwise would have dealt. If the government required to be impressed by the conditions existing in the agricultural industry I am sure this prolonged discussion will have impressed them. From all sections of the house, wherever there are members representing agricultural people, we have heard the story of the economic plight of the farmers. The hon. member for Bow River presented a picture which, while sad, is only too true. In his usual graphic and impressive style the hon. member gave the actual economic condition of the country so far as agriculture is concerned, and he presented authentic figures to show the comparative prices of agricultural and other products. These show that for a number of years the prices of agricultural products have been gradually dropping until now they have reached the point where it is practically impossible for the farmers to keep going.

The Minister of Agriculture is a practical farmer himself; he has first hand information, and it is not necessary for me to attempt to instruct him with regard to these conditions. He knows them perhaps a great deal better than I do, so I need not reiterate what he already knows and what has been said so well by other hon. members. The question for us to consider now is what the government can do to assist agriculture at the present time. Perhaps it cannot do very much. I have noticed that the governments of the past have all lacked an agricultural policy. We have been told by some that the proper policy for a country in which agriculture is the basic industry should be low tariff or free trade, but Canada has never had an opportunity to experiment along that line, though many times and for many years we have had governments in power which believed in low tariffs and preached that policy as the salvation of the agricultural industry. I say despite that fact Canada has never known a low tariff policy, and we have never been able to find out whether or not it would work.

To-day we have a government in power which believes in high tariffs, and we must look to them for some compensating policy in connection with agriculture. The plight of the farmers, of course, is due to an economic situation not confined to Canada but universal in its scope. That fact has been well emphasized in this debate. I doubt very much whether agriculture can be restored to a prosperous condition by any act of this parliament which does not make fundamental changes in our economic system. I believe that the present impoverished condition of agriculture is due primarily to defects in the economic system itself. The greatest defect of that system is to be found in its objective; the next greatest defect is in its technique, and I do not know to what extent a parliamentary enactment can make much impression on conditions of the sort. Nor do I think the present government is disposed to take that great step which would be necessary to make the experiment. However, I believe the day is coming when it will have to take that step whether it wishes to or not, and of course that is the only time when any government does take such a step—when economic circumstances kick it into position. And we are not very far from that now.

The chief task of the Minister of Agriculture in Canada has been for some years past to assist in every way possible the development of the industry, to increase output. I want to point out—I do not think it is necessary to do so, because the Minister of Agriculture, I am sure, knows it—that the task of the minister to-day is a very different one from what it was twenty years ago. In addition to the necessity of maintaining the educational effort of the department in respect to agriculture, there has developed an entirely new problem which until the present time has scarcely ever been recognized. The work of the department now is not so much to help to produce more wheat or to produce more vegetables or more of anything else, although education in regard to these matters must be maintained. The great question is: how are we going to get rid of the surplus of products which are practically worthless in Canada? Now that is the problem, the chief problem of the Minister of Agriculture at the present time, and I will say also in that connection that the expenditure in that department should be very largely in connection with schemes of some sort which would enable us to get rid of that surplus in some way. I would go so far as to say that it might be better for the farmers of Canada if the entire seven million dollars expended in this department were expended in buying wheat which was dumped in the middle of the Atlantic; if we could not find a better use for it, that would be better than stimulating further production without making any attempt whatever to get rid of our surplus products.

Two suggestions have been made in the course of this discussion. One was put forward by the hon. member for Macleod and the other was put forward and emphasized, I believe, since then by other speakers, but first introduced to-day by the hon. member for North Huron. The suggestion made by the hon. member for Macleod I will not labour at this time because for many years I have advocated similar policies and pointed out that if they were followed they would result in great benefit to agriculture. As hon. members will recall, however, the hon. member for Macleod advocated that the Canadian dollar should be on a parity with the pound sterling, and he argued that this would be equivalent to increasing the prices of our exports by the amount of the exchange now against us. And, of course, to the extent that prices would then rise, debts would be reduced; for debts must always be regarded in their relation to the prices of the commodities which must pay them, and while our commodity prices go down, our debts correspondingly rise, plus interest charges that have not been paid—and compound interest. So that our debts are growing enormously and increasing in proportion to the rate at which our prices go down. I believe that if the government find it possible to follow the suggestion of the hon. member for Macleod, it would be at least in this regard advantageous. Presumably there are other reasons, more potent, why this cannot be done, but so far they have not been disclosed to the house.

I turn next to the suggestion made by the hon. member for North Huron, and, I believe, adumbrated by the minister himself, with regard to the marketing board. I am glad to know that the minister has at least given some thought to this. He indicated in his remarks the other day that while it had not been fully decided upon, the government had entertained the idea with some favour, and that is hopeful. But it is disappointing if that is all that is going to be done; it is very disappointing. We do not feel satisfied with the mere appointment of a commission, as was suggested by the minister, to investigate agricultural conditions and find out how this marketing board has worked in other countries, and so forth and so on. I do not believe that would be money well spent. Besides, by the time the commission was ready to report, the marketing board, if immediately set up, could have done a good stroke of business for the farmers of Canada. The minister and the government would be well advised to give this matter further consideration, and I wish to advance some reasons why, in my opinion, it would be wise for them to do so.

Certainly a marketing board, apart from any advantage which might come to the basic industries of Canada, is necessary if there is to be any intelligent handling of the export trade. It is necessary for the maintenance of standards which must be kept up if the export trade is to be sustained. Tom, Dick and Harry selling how, when and where they please cannot build up a stable foreign market, and so from the point of view of our national interests, such a board will ultimately become indispensable. It is necessary now. It will be of assistance also if intelligently handled, as I have no doubt it would be if it were set up, in assisting us in matters of exchange. As it is nearly eleven o'clock, I do not wish to go into that phase of the argument but rather to discuss some points with respect to agricultural conditions at the moment which would indicate the advisability of such a board. Everyone knows that Canada consumes a very large percentage of all her farm products in the live stock and dairy lines. I do not recall the exact figure, but I think it is somewhere around five per cent of our live stock that is exported; and I do not know whether the percentage of dairy products, eggs and so forth, is any greater than that. Everyone knows also that that five per cent fixes the price of the other ninety-five per cent in Canada. In other words, the market into which the five per cent goes is equivalent to a dump market, and the entire price of the Canadian product in Canada is fixed by that dump market in some other country. Now the government, very properly, I think, since tariffs are the order of the day, attempted to assist agriculture two years ago by increasing the tariff slightly on eggs, butter and other farm products. But this condition defeats the object of the government in that respect. If the government wishes to make that tariff effective I do not know of any other way under the sun by which it can be done but by the establishment of a marketing board. I do not wish to go into the details of its workings. Those hon. members who have studied the Patterson scheme in Australia know the technique of the thing without any elaboration from me. But the point is that a small levy be made on the farmers who are selling their products, this levy to be only to the extent necessary to make the export price equal the price at home. But it requires legislation and the setting up of a board to give the farmers an opportunity to try out the scheme. That is practically all we are urging the government to do in this respect. I should like to go further and ask the government to provide an amount of money, similar to that which was given to the wheat growers last year, to operate this marketing board for one year, at least until the thing got a fair trial and was thoroughly established. That is only my idea. The farmers of the west who are asking for this board have not gone that far. All they ask is that legislation be provided to make this marketing board possible.

That, I think, is not too much to ask the government to do, especially since I presume the wheat bonus has been discontinued. I do not know whether I may be going too far in that presumption, but at any rate so far as I know no provision has been made for it. I hope provision will be made if the price of wheat does not rise. Since, despite all the advice that comes to this house and to the government from all sources on matters of national policy, no other policy has so far been evolved that would be calculated to assist agriculture, I hope the minister and the government will give the farmers a chance to try out this marketing scheme. We do not expect it will bring the millennium, we do not expect that it will make farming prosperous, nor do we think it will pay the national debt; but we do entertain hopes that it will give at least some slight assistance to that very oppressed section of the community.

May I say in conclusion that so far as I heard the minister while he was speaking about such a board, he did not disclose the real reasons—if there are any—why it has not been decided to establish such a board at once. There may be some good reasons for delay, but so far they have not been disclosed. I question whether the reasons are sufficient to warrant delay, and I urge once more that the minister listen to the views of the representatives of agriculture all over the house—hon. gentlemen on his own side, all those in this corner, and numbers of hon. gentlemen to my right—all of whom have spoken favourably about this board. I hope he will give the matter another thought and decide to act at once. We have done enough talking. The time has come to act, and the Minister of Agriculture is the only one in a position to act.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): Shall the item carry?

Mr. NEILL: No.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think in order to make progress, Mr. Chairman, we might let the first two votes pass, if the minister will undertake that anybody who wants further to discuss dairying may do so another day under the heading of live stock. Can the minister give that undertaking?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, May 16, 1932.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of all orders in council in connection with aid to farmers, since August 1, 1930.

Mr. SPEAKER: In the absence of the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), this motion will stand.

Motion stands.

ALVENA, SASK., POST OFFICE

Mr. TOTZKE:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports, evidence, petitions, and other documents in connection with the dismissal of George Slusar, postmaster at Alvena, Saskatchewan, and the appointment of his successor.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. VENIOT (for Mr. Ralston):

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, and other documents since August 8, 1930, to date, passing between the Department of Labour, and any cabinet minister or any official, and the government of Nova Scotia, and any minister or official of that government, or any person or persons, regarding all or any matters affecting or touching upon unemployment relief or other matters in connection with Elmsdale Lantz highway diversion or old Halifax road.

CHARLEVOIX FERRY BOAT SERVICE

Mr. VENIOT (for Mr. Casgrain):

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, petitions and other documents in connection with the contract to be awarded by the Trade and Commerce department, for the ferry-boat service between Ile-aux-Coudres and Les Eboulements, in the county of Charlevoix, since the 1st of January, 1932, together with the evidence taken in writing of all the witnesses heard at the hearing held by Mr. F. E. Bawden, of the Trade and Commerce department, at Baie St-Paul, in the month of May, 1932, and his report upon such matter to the minister, and the decision arrived at by the minister.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. BENNETT: I think the universal practice has been not to bring papers down with respect to matters that are pending and about which decisions must be arrived at by the minister. This is with respect to contracts to be awarded by the Department of Trade and Commerce and involves the consideration of evidence and decision to be arrived at by the minister. The motion might stand until such time as action has been taken, after which the papers can be brought down.

Mr. SPEAKER: The objection is well taken and the question will be dropped.

Mr. BENNETT: It can stand; that will save printing.

Mr. SPEAKER: Motion stands.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

SHIPMENT OF GRAIN THROUGH PORT CHURCHILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. D. COWAN (Long Lake): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Railways. It is based on an article which appeared in the Journal on Saturday under the following heading:

2,000,000 bushel wheat shipment for north route.
Saskatchewan pool announces Churchill will get big business during the summer.

Did the Minister of Railways receive any official notice of such shipment? If so, did he receive it in time to enable him to make the necessary arrangements? Has he any idea how many cargoes such a shipment would make?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): Due to the item in the press regarding Churchill, I expected that someone would ask as to details and, therefore, I may state that the item mentioned is based on fact.

As I advised the house some weeks ago, the Department of Railways and Canals has been doing everything possible to encourage a proper test during the coming season of the Churchill route, and about ten days ago a representative of a responsible grain company called upon me and made a verbal proposal to send 2,000,000 bushels of grain to the Churchill elevator on condition that the government would not make any charge for elevation or storage. I requested that he put his proposal in writing, which he did, and the matter was then discussed with the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Board of Grain Commissioners and the officers of my own department. As a result of these discussions a satisfactory agreement has been drawn up between the Department of Railways and Canals and the grain company mentioned permitting the grain company to ship 2,000,000 bushels of grain forthwith to the Churchill elevator, the understanding being that they ship out from that port at least 1,000,000 bushels during the coming season. The grain company undertake also that in the event of other exporters shipping through Churchill they will lend such exporters any reasonable shortage to fill their boats and not charge a premium in excess of one-half cent per bushel for such loan. The borrower, however, must show evidence satisfactory to the Board of Grain Commissioners that he has provided for the full shipment that he is making.

The grain elevator has a 2,000,000 bushel storage capacity and a 500,000 bushel work house capacity. Therefore, even with the elevator storage space completely filled, grain can still be moved through the elevator directly from cars to ships. The permission, therefore, to the grain company mentioned for the use of 2,000,000 bushels storage space does not in any way prevent other shippers from using the port.

In order to prevent congestion of grain at Churchill and at the suggestion of the Board of Grain Commissioners, a permit system, similar to that in effect at Vancouver, will be put on, and grain will be allowed into Churchill only under these permits, as and when vessel tonnage has been provided or storage space available. The railways and the exporters are all familiar with the operation of this permit system, which has now been used for six or seven years in connection with the port of Vancouver.

I am informed that 1,250,000 bushels has been already purchased by the grain company, and a movement to the Churchill elevator will probably begin within the next fortnight. The operation of the Churchill elevator within the next ten days has been arranged for, and I see no reason why this whole movement cannot be made without any trouble whatsoever.

The government has been making every effort to have the insurance rates out of Churchill lowered, and I think that I may safely say that there is likely to be a slight lowering of the insurance rates out of Churchill this season; at least we are very hopeful of this because of certain information which we have received. The fact that the charges for elevation and storage are eliminated, as they were last year, naturally cancels a good deal of the excess insurance, though, of course, it will be understood that the port of Churchill ultimately will have to operate on the same basis as other ports of the dominion.

May I add in conclusion that every effort is being made by my department, and such efforts have been going on continuously, to have the Churchill route given a fairly complete test in every way during the season of 1932.

The hon. member asked about the number of cargoes. I should judge that 2,000,000 bushels would be in the neighbourhood of eight cargoes.

WHEAT POOL

GUARANTEES GIVEN TO BANKS ON BORROWINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): I wish to ask a question of the government, based on the remarks of the Prime Minister some days ago, with respect to the guarantees given to the banks on the borrowings of the Canadian wheat pool. The Prime Minister, on March 8, Hansard, page 906, in referring to the assistance given to the western provinces to purchase seed grain, said:

> It may interest this house to know that we took steps last year to acquire, through the aid of Mr. McFarland . . . . sufficient quantities of wheat to take care of that situation at a price which I should say is at least ten cents lower than the rate to-day prevailing.

On March 10, Hansard, page 978, with reference to the order in council passed, agreeing to guarantee the wheat pool accounts to the banks, the Prime Minister interjected:

> I think there is no liability at the moment.

The Prime Minister will also recall that a delegation waited on him a year ago in this regard and submitted a memorandum. The question I wish to ask is this: First, has the government in this connection taken into consideration the money, approximately $500,000, that is due to the growers of durum wheat delivered to the pool during the crop year 1930-31? Secondly, is the government in a position to state whether or not it will recommend that this money be paid out to the growers?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was good enough to furnish me with copies of his questions, which are not usual questions to be asked on the orders of the day. The two questions asked can be readily answered. First, the government has nothing whatever to do with the matter, and, second, the government cannot make recommendations about a matter which is none of its business.

WHEAT SHIPMENTS TO RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, could the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) give the house any information with regard to the shipments of wheat from Vancouver to Vladivostock? I should like to know if this wheat is being paid for in goods or in gold.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge as to how this wheat is to be paid for. I simply know that certain grain traders have sold wheat for export to Vladivostock, presumably to replace wheat in the northern section of Russia which had been marketed in excess of what they were warranted in doing. It is my information that this wheat is to be used partly for seed purposes and partly for food. The whole matter is a trade arrangement between private traders and Russian authorities.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT AMENDMENT

SPECIAL TAX ON INCOMES OF JUDGES AND MEMBERS OF MILITARY, NAVAL, AIR AND POLICE FORCES

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Income War Tax Act to provide that the members of the judiciary, and the members of the military, naval and air forces of Canada and of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, other than enlisted men, shall be liable to pay a special income tax of ten per cent upon their salaries received during the fiscal year 1932-33, in addition to any other tax payable under the act.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I explained to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) would proceed with this resolution in order to get it into committee and through first reading, but that full opportunity would be given to the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to discuss the matter at some future date.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I take it that this resolution is to be read in conjunction with Bill No. 19. Am I right in assuming that the object of the resolution is to provide for some contribution to be made by those who are mentioned to help defray the expenses of government in a manner similar to that being done by members of the public service from whose salaries a ten per cent deduction is being made.

Mr. RHODES: My right hon. friend is quite correct. A grave question existed as to whether or not we had the right to deduct from the salaries of the classes mentioned, but, as I understand it, there is no question of our having the right to tax. By this method we are accomplishing that which is being done by Bill No. 19 with respect to other members of the public service.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Are we to take it that the government has changed its point of view as to the desirability of a contribution being made by those who come within the categories here set forth. As I understood the former discussion the question was not so much one of the legal authority to ask for a contribution from those here enumerated but rather that it was thought that persons belonging to these particular classes should not be called upon to make a contribution.

Mr. RHODES: There was a question in the case of the judges as to whether or not this ought to be done. As was intimated on a previous occasion by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), we have received evidence that members of the service and, in certain instances, members of the judiciary wish to make a contribution similar to that being made by other members of the public service.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister advise the committee just what is meant by the words "in addition to any other tax payable under the act"? I should like to understand the position of those officials who are already contributing to the Income War Tax Act.

Mr. RHODES: As will be made clear when the bill is introduced, this resolution provides for a reduction equivalent to the deduction of ten per cent being made in the case of other members of the public service. This tax will be in addition to any amounts paid as income tax, as provided for by the statute already existing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Some of these individuals already pay a tax and some do not, that is the point.

Mr. RHODES: If they do not pay a tax they will not be affected by this provision.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Chairman, I think the committee already knows my views with regard to this whole matter. I am opposed to any reduction in the salaries of judges or any other officials but I do think that if a reduction is to be made it should be made under the provisions of Bill No. 19. The government in its wisdom has seen fit to introduce a special resolution to amend the Income War Tax Act which covers members of the judiciary, the military, naval and air forces, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, but, in my opinion, there are other classes which should come under the provisions of this resolution or of Bill No. 19. The first class to which I refer is the lieutenant-governors, which should contribute just the same as the lightkeepers, the judges and members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. To use a Scotch expression, there should be no stepbairns in our family. In my opinion, this class should suffer in the interests of the dominion just the same as the judges, the charwomen, the lighthouse keepers or other members of the public service.

If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) does not see fit to amend Bill No. 19, I submit that this resolution should also cover those judges who have been retired and who are now receiving pensions. Many of these judges are receiving large pensions and they should suffer a ten per cent reduction during 1932. I tried to look up the figures but was unable to locate them and consequently my information may not be accurate, but I understand one judge is receiving a pension of $12,000 per year, and is still doing business with the law firm with which he is connected. If I remember correctly, other judges are receiving pensions of $9,000 per year and are able to carry on in their legal practices. Other judges are receiving other amounts. Whether the Minister of Finance, in his judgment, thinks this action should be taken under this resolution or under Bill No. 19, every man or woman in this country who is receiving any money from the public treasury should be treated in the same manner; no distinction should be made. I am opposed to the whole principle of the proposal; in my view it is a mistake to make any deductions from salaries of judges, members of parliament, charwomen, lighthouse keepers, or anyone else receiving money from the government, but if the reduction must be made, everyone should be treated alike, and judges who are receiving large pensions should come under this resolution or under Bill No. 19.

Mr. RHODES: The hon member for Antigonish-Guysborough has made his position very clear to-day as he has done on previous occasions; he has left no doubt in our minds as to what is in his with respect to this matter. I must repeat: This is not a salary reduction; I must insist respectfully on using the word "deduction." We are asking for a contribution for one year. My hon. friend should not treat this as if we were reducing salaries. While I have no doubt, as always happens in a measure of general application, there will be individual cases of great hardship, on the whole I believe that those who are affected by this resolution, as well as those who come under the provisions of Bill No. 19, are prepared in these very difficult times to join with other elements in the country in making reasonable contributions to the federal treasury.

I must respectfully take issue with my hon. friend when he attempts to place the nine representatives in Canada of His Majesty the King upon the same basis as other civil servants; I think they stand in a class altogether different. While the question may be arguable, I do not think it is a subject upon which we should enlarge, especially under these circumstances and at this time.

With respect to the question which was raised by my hon. friend, let me say this: We have touched no pension and if we attempted to make a deduction from the pensions of judges, we would be discriminating against them rather than discriminating in their favour, as he apparently has in mind we are doing because we have not attempted to make deductions in the case of judges. My hon. friend has instanced the case of one judge who is in receipt of a pension of $12,000 a year, and states that that judge is in addition engaged in private practice. My hon. friend must not attempt to prove a general rule by a single instance. That judge, under the terms upon which he went to the bench, is entitled to that pension; he has a right to it in virtue of the statute provided in that behalf. But I must point out to my hon. friend that that judge who is in receipt of his pension of $12,000 a year makes his contribution as an income tax payer. Unless and until we came to the time in Canada when we were prepared to reduce pensions, it would be manifestly unjust to single out the judges for adverse treatment in that respect.

Mr. DUFF: Just upon that point, not only in the present debate but also in previous ones, the Minister of Finance stated that this was not a reduction in salary; that it was a contribution by the civil servants of this country to get over a situation for which perhaps none of us is to blame. I was always of opinion that a contribution was voluntary; a contribution was never something which was forced from one. If you, sir, want to give $500 to build a new church in your constituency, you give it voluntarily; but if somebody, for instance the legislature of Quebec or the federal parliament, passes a law compelling you to do that, then I cannot understand how the Minister of Finance can call that a contribution. Surely he does not mean to say that the poor women who come here at five o'clock in the morning and whom I meet returning home every day when I come here at seven o'clock in the morning, are willing contributors to this reduction of ten per cent. In view of the fact that the government has been compelled to introduce this legislation with regard to judges, the Minister of Finance cannot say that the judges are willing to contribute ten per cent of their salaries. Moreover, the Prime Minister has told us—and I hope I am not misquoting him; perhaps I shall say we inferred from his statement—and he cannot take objection to what I am saying—that he was communicating with the judges in an endeavour to get them to agree to this reduction. Surely, when the Minister of Finance now says that this is a contribution he is at least stretching the resolution a little; I shall not say that he is stretching the truth, because my hon. friend would not do that. But I say that it is not a contribution from judges, lighthouse keepers or anyone else.

Mr. COTNAM: A donation.

Mr. DUFF: It was not a contribution so far as the hon. member for North Renfrew was concerned; he was not consulted.

Mr. COTNAM: A donation.

Mr. DUFF: If my hon. friend gives a donation for a church or school or anything else in his constituency, he does that of his own free will. But his leader did not ask him, until after the bill was introduced, whether he was willing to agree to give $400 out of his indemnity.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Oh, yes.

Mr. DUFF: If we are going to have in this country government by caucus, and if, as my hon. friend says, the Prime Minister consulted his followers, then the least he might have done before introducing the resolution was to have sent word to the Liberal caucus. In spite of the exclamation by the hon. member for Long Lake, I am doubtful whether the Prime Minister, before deciding to reduce indemnities, ever consulted him or any other hon. member on that side of the house.

The Minister of Finance has said that the ex-judges have a right to their pensions. I agree with him, and I agree that pensions should not be reduced. Have I made that clear enough? I am opposed to a reduction in these pensions; I am opposed to the judges having a reduction in their salaries; I am opposed to my good friend the Minister of National Health getting a reduction of ten per cent in his indemnity or salary. I am also opposed to any man or woman, or even the page boys in the house, having a reduction made in salary without their consent.

The Minister of Finance said that the nine gentlemen who have the honour and distinction of being lieutenant-governors of the provinces are in a class altogether different; they are in a class different from that of the senior member for Halifax, who should have been the lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia. Why should the lieutenant governor of that province—and I have the greatest respect for him—be in a different position from that of the senior hon. member for Halifax? My hon. friend has to suffer the reduction of $400 in his indemnity in order to assist the country. Why should the lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia not be in exactly the same position? There is no argument against it. Let us treat all alike, and I again say in the old Scotch words: "Let there be no stepbairns in our family," if we are going to carry out this foolish principle of reducing by ten per cent the salaries of those in this country who are drawing money from the federal treasury.

Mr. LUCAS: With reference to some of the remarks which the Minister of Finance made a few minutes ago—and I wish to take them at their face value—with regard to this being, not a reduction in salary, but merely a contribution, there is another class of people who might make a substantial contribution at this time and that is those who hold tax free bonds. I realize that they bought them under what they consider a solemn contract, but as the country is at present going through a period of distress, surely it would not be asking too much that those people might also make a contribution of ten per cent at this time. I would ask the Minister of Finance whether he would not consider, not breaking those contracts with those people, but simply asking them for a contribution in order that they may be given the privilege of doing their share in helping to bear the present heavy load.

Mr. RHODES: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, that my hon. friend takes the view at this time of all times, if it were ever justified, that we in Canada should become responsible for a policy of repudiation, for that is what it would mean.

Mr. LUCAS: I did not suggest repudiation in any way.

Mr. RHODES: I say that as a matter of ethics and as a matter of right we ought not to begin to discuss a matter of that kind. But if we put it on the lowest possible basis, that of self-interest, I know of no one thing which, if we attempted to do it, would recoil on our heads to greater disadvantage than that very thing. We might gain for a moment but we would lose in the long run by a very substantial sum. We must do all we can to maintain the credit and the financial integrity of this country, and if we emerge from present conditions with the financial credit and integrity of this country unimpaired we shall have done something wonderful for Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did not intend to say anything at this stage, but I cannot allow that point of view to go unchallenged—the point of view that there is something absolutely sacrosanct about finance, that we cannot touch it in any way at all, that wealth must be safeguarded and the government must stand behind it. Yet, Mr. Chairman, the lives and welfare of the people of this country are immensely more valuable. I was at a little meeting the other day when one poor woman who was getting relief said that she was allowed only fifty cents a week for the upkeep of a child. She was absolutely without any resources but what came through relief and, as I said, she received only fifty cents a week on which to maintain her child. I cannot face facts like that and then have the Minister of Finance tell us that we must maintain our credit at whatever cost. I tell you that it is too great a cost at which to maintain it when the lives of our children and the welfare of our homes are in the balance. I have said again and again, as far as these bonds are concerned, that during the present times they are worth practically twice what their face value indicates owing to the deflation that has taken place, and yet notwithstanding that, we are told that we must not tax them even ten per cent. I think the people of this country are beginning to realize the rank injustice of this kind of thing and feel that wealth should be willing to suffer as well as the ordinary people of this country.

Mr. DUFF: With regard to the salaries of the lieutenant-governors and the pensions of the ex-judges, may I draw the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that there is one million dollars which these ex-judges all over the country are receiving in pensions. There is a place where the minister and the government could save $100,000 by applying the ten per cent cut. My hon. friend was very anxious to try to impress upon the committee that the lieutenant-governors were in a different position from anyone else. Does he know that there is a lieutenant-governor whom he intends at the moment to allow to draw his full salary this year and also to draw his pension as an ex-judge? Does my hon. friend think that that is fair in view of the fact that every other civil servant practically has received a reduction of ten per cent in salary? Surely my hon. friend will agree that that is not fair or right. As I say, I am opposed to the whole reduction. I am opposed to you, Mr. Chairman (Mr. LaVergne) being treated as you have been in this reduction. You are losing about twenty per cent altogether. If the Minister of Finance has such a high regard for these lieutenant-governors, and I have too, surely they should be the men to set the rest of us a good example. If poor little me is willing to lose my four hundred dollars, surely the lieutenant-governor and ex-judge to whom I am referring should not accept both his full salary as lieutenant-governor and his full pension as an ex-judge.

Mr. BENNETT: You are wrong on that. The minute he takes office as lieutenant-governor he does not get his pension. You should be sure of what you say.

Mr. DUFF: I wish my right hon. friend would be a little more courteous in his interjections.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a fair interjection.

Mr. DUFF: Why is my right hon. friend so much worried about the lieutenant-governors and the ex-judges? The information I am giving to the committee I have taken from the estimates themselves. They show that a certain judge is getting his full pension. Why is his name in the estimates if he is not getting his pension? I did not put it in the estimates, and surely my right hon. friend the Prime Minister cannot blame me because this item is in the estimates. He had better blame somebody else instead of interjecting as he did. I will not stand for such treatment, and I tell him so right now.

Mr. RHODES: I had not the case in point brought to my attention heretofore, but I have been advised that in the case in question the pension is not being received, but that the pension is placed in the estimates in the event of the possible resignation of the lieutenant-governor. But let us assume that my hon. friend's statement is correct and that this lieutenant-governor is in receipt of his pension as a retired judge. Under the statute he is entitled to that pension. I must submit that again my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough is attempting to argue from the particular to the general. He cannot have the general policy as to whether we shall or shall not attempt to interfere with the salaries of lieutenant-governors determined by the question whether one particular lieutenant-governor is in a peculiar class. I submit that that is not a proper method of approach.

Mr. SANDERSON: Perhaps the government are to be commended to a certain extent for making a right-about face on this matter of exemptions from the ten per cent cut. During the debates that took place in committee on this ten per cent cut, it was pointed out by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice, and to some extent but not quite so forcibly, by the Minister of National Revenue, that it was impossible to include the judges in the ten per cent cut. I will be fair to the Minister of Justice and say that when he spoke in this house on March 6 last, as reported on page 831 of Hansard, he argued at length that the judiciary should be exempted from any cut in regard to salary, but before he sat down he said that perhaps a tax could be imposed. Apparently, Mr. Chairman, the government led by the right hon. the Prime Minister, were bound and determined a month ago that the judges should be exempt from the ten per cent cut as well as the army and navy officers and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. But now they make a right-about turn, and they do not do it very gracefully. I see no reason why these positions should not have been included in the bill in the first place, but now the government is bringing them in, not by the front door, not even by the side door, but in a camouflaged way by the back door, by an additional ten per cent income tax. I do not altogether object to that. I stated before in this house, and I state again, that I have always been of the opinion that there should be no exemptions from this ten per cent cut —judges, army officers, naval officers and Royal Canadian Mounted Police—and I am still of that opinion. The government should never have attempted to make these exemptions. I should like to quote the remarks of the Prime Minister concerning the exemption of officers of the permanent force. Hansard contains his argument as to why those officers should not receive the ten per cent cut in their pay. At this point may I say I am not particular as to whether it is called a deduction or a tax. Hansard for April 6 of this year, at page 1776, contains the following statement by the right hon. gentleman:

> We come to the third of the three classes, the crown, the judiciaries and the forces of the crown. The men who come within this third class are under discipline—they cannot resign even if they so desire. They are not under an ordinary contract, they are enlisted men, and the government contracts that during the term of their enlistment they shall receive a given compensation. It is not a contract in the ordinary sense because the word "enlistment" is used rather than the word "contract." They cannot leave the service without being guilty of desertion and prosecution, and they cannot resign.

Those were the words of the Prime Minister, and with all due respect to him I say he was wrong in his facts in regard to contracts made with officers of the permanent force. I am about to quote from the attestation paper which every officer and man who enlists in the permanent force must sign. Questions appear on this paper to which answers must be given, and an affidavit has to be taken before a justice of the peace or a magistrate. Question No. 17 on this document is as follows:

> Are you willing to enlist or reengage under such conditions as to pay and service as may be authorized and laid down from time to time by the governor in council?

The answer to that question must be "Yes," or the applicant would not be taken on the force. I say that in the first place there was no reason why the officers of the permanent force should not have been included in the ten per cent cut. However the Prime Minister and the members of the government are at all times very loath to admit that they have erred in judgment. There is no doubt, however, that they did err in connection with the exemptions they allowed from the cut. Now, in a roundabout way they are introducing legislation to provide an additional ten per cent income tax. I am not familiar with enforcement of the law in connection with this imposed tax, and although I cannot make a definite statement, I think I can see where a good deal of litigation may arise from the imposition of the additional ten per cent income tax on salaries of judges, army officers and members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

I do not know whether the Minister of Justice and his law officers have seen daylight enough to know that the proposed cut is legal. There is no doubt however that the proposed legislation is by no means direct, and may turn out to be a great expense to the government and the country. There was never any satisfactory argument advanced by the government in regard to the exemption. Not one government follower, with the exception of three or four members of the cabinet, got up and defended the ten per cent cut, so far as exemptions were concerned. Hon. members across the floor say they were consulted in regard to the ten per cent reduction in indemnities. I do not agree with the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough in regard to the ten per cent cut in the salaries of civil servants, or the indemnities of members of the House of Commons and the Senate. I think, perhaps, owing to conditions throughout the country the cut was necessary. I do say however that once this government attempted class legislation and the exemption of certain classes such as judges, army officers and Royal Canadian Mounted Police they were playing a very dangerous game. This is no time for class legislation; there should have been no exemptions in the first place. Now, with no grace and not admitting that they erred in judgment, the government brings in the legislation which is before us.

To the Minister of Finance I pay the tribute that I never heard him defend the exemptions. He listened carefully to the remarks made by hon. members on this side of the house, and did not attempt to defend the government's attitude. On the other hand, the Minister of Justice attempted a defence, and at all times the Prime Minister on a high and mighty plane said that we must leave these gentlemen alone, and that their salaries must not be cut. Now, however, we find that legislation is brought in for an extra ten per cent income tax. The legislation we had before us earlier in the session was hasty, and discriminated in favour of certain classes. That is a bad thing for any government and any country.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, as I have been invited to make a statement in regard to one aspect of the measure, perhaps I should do it now. The hon. member for South Perth need not be at all alarmed as to any situation which may arise from the passage of the measure before us. On behalf of the officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and I think also the officers of the militia and the navy, I am glad to say they have agreed to this measure. On their part there has been no inclination to escape their share of the burden to be borne under the proposed reduction of salaries. I am free to say there is not that uniformity of opinion among the judges, but a great many of them have expressed the view that judges should not be exempted, and that they should bear their portion of the burden.

There is a great distinction between a measure to reduce salaries and the present proposal to increase taxation by ten per cent in an effort to equalize the situation. On a former occasion I stated that in my view to reduce the salaries of judges would not be a proper procedure. I still hold that view. On the other hand I believe this parliament has the power to tax the salaries of judges, if it determines so to do. The measure now before us is merely to impose upon the salaries of army officers, naval officers, mounted police officers and judges a tax—not a reduction—but a tax which will equalize the situation as between them and other servants and officials of the government of Canada. I anticipate no difficulty whatever in working out the proposal as outlined in this resolution. So far as I can see the measure will produce no hardships, beyond those which would be felt in the ordinary course of events by the ten per cent reduction. I think the committee may be assured that the equalization sought will result satisfactorily.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister who are specifically excluded by the words, "other than enlisted men"?

Mr. RHODES: The tax applies to all the officers who hold commissions.

Mr. BROWN: I do not propose to offer any opposition to this resolution or to the bill to be based upon it, but a principle has been introduced that I think would be a far more interesting subject of discussion for the keen-minded lawyers of this house—the principle involved when a special group of people are singled out for a special tax. I think the government might as well have accepted the situation in the first bill and brought these classes under the ten per cent deduction, as now to single them out for a special tax. I should like to hear this principle defended by our legal friends.

Mr. NEILL: I endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) as to lieutenant-governors, but with that exception I do not agree with him. I think the suggestion put forward by the minister in charge of this bill that the lieutenant-governors should not be asked to pay this ten per cent tax because they are direct representatives of the king is inappropriate. Were they paid out of the imperial treasury that argument might obtain, but as it is we in Canada who pay the salaries, I do not see why it would not be in order for us to make this deduction. It would be in keeping with their own wishes, I should think, as they are nearly all wealthy men, and as there are very few of them their wishes might have been ascertained. They are almost the only people in Canada who enjoy the privilege of being exempted from income tax.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. NEILL: In British Columbia they are exempt.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a provincial tax.

Mr. NEILL: We will limit it only to the provinces then. It is admitted that only men of wealth can take those positions, and consequently exemption from income tax is a very substantial addition to their salaries. Having received that discrimination in their favour, I do not see why they should object to being put on the same plane as others. I think they should like to be treated the same as anyone else—I will go that far.

To come to this particular resolution, I think the minister did not quite catch the remark of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis). I think he wanted to know what was involved by the words "enlisted men"; who were exempted. Of course, those of us who have been in the army know that these words cover not only privates but all non-commissioned officers. Before I proceed, will the minister tell me why he exempted these enlisted men from this provision?

Mr. RHODES: The enlisted men are in a different position from the officers. They sign up for a specific time at a stated rate of pay, which is small, and they are not competent to resign.

Mr. NEILL: As the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) has stated, the claim that the men enlisted for a specific rate of pay during the currency of their enlistment—which I would certainly agree to being good law—is no longer tenable, because, as he stated, there is a question on the attestation paper, number 17, by which they specifically agree to enlist for such pay and allowance as may be authorized and allowed from time to time. I am advised that that was put in some six or seven years ago to meet just such a case as we have before us; and as enlistments are for only a three-year period, all enlisted men now in the service must have subscribed to that question number 17. Therefore by the terms of their enlistment they agreed to take such pay as was then current or might afterwards be arranged. They cannot resign, it is true, but at the end of every three years they have the opportunity of not reenlisting, and at any time they can buy themselves out for a moderate sum. I know that, because I did it myself. I am not objecting to these enlisted men being exempted because of the amount of their pay, which, as the minister says is not large. I am objecting to their being exempted because they are soldiers or enlisted men. It is an unsound principle. If he said, as he should say, in Bill No. 19, that all below a certain salary shall be exempt, I would be heartily with him. Let me compare two classes of men. I am not going into details unless they are asked for, but I have them here. I have worked it out that ordinary married soldiers get by way of pay and allowances well over $100 a month—as a matter of fact $111, but I may have overstated some of the allowances. In addition, they have the chance of promotion, which is very considerable, for the first step up means an increase in pay of something like 25 per cent and then it goes rapidly on from there. They also have the prospect of a pension to which they are not asked to contribute. That is a substantial increment. Compare the position of those men with that of a class that come more home to myself, the men who are working on government lighthouse tenders, government patrol boats, and lifeboats. They get $90 a month, from which is deducted ten per cent, leaving $81. Let me take a married man in this case also. A man working on one of these boats has to keep his wife and family on shore, so that he has to maintain a house and pay rent, and of course provide food and medical attendance for his wife. He gets no pension, and the prospect of promotion is so very small that it is negligible. He is taxed ten per cent, while any of these enlisted men, with these considerable advantages over this man, get well over $100 a month and are not taxed.

To illustrate my argument. Under section 5 of the bill the government have realized that it is not quite fair to tax the lowest paid employees ten per cent, and they have provided that as to those getting less than $1,200 a year, their contribution of five per cent under the superannuation act shall be paid by the government out of the consolidated revenue fund. So the government recognize that there is something that calls for help when men get less than $1,200 a year—a salary that one might describe as being wholly needful to provide necessities rather than luxuries. This paying of their superannuation fees for them, works out just the same as if those getting $1,200 and under were not subject to more than a five per cent deduction in their salaries. Why, instead of putting in that complicated machinery the government has not said that those people getting $1,200 and less would be taxed only five per cent, I do not know, but that would be only fair and just. As a matter of fact, I would make the lower salaries totally exempt. But it is unjust, it is unfair, it is illogical that men on the boats, who are not eligible to pay to the superannuation fund and who get this miserable $90 a month, $25 of which goes to their mess, leaving them only $65 to maintain their families, should be subject to a deduction of ten per cent, while those men getting not more than $1,200 a year who happen to pay superannuation get off with a deduction of five per cent. If the soldiers come under the $1,200 category, and as they do not pay to the superannuation fund, then by all means exempt them only five per cent. Or better still, put them all on the same basis, and simply say: If a civil servant is getting less than $1,200 he will be subject to a deduction of only five per cent. Then there could be no complaint. As it is, I do not think it is right that these enlisted men who are secure in their positions, which are well paid as such positions go, and who have the prospect of promotion and the certainty of pension, should be exempt while men who are receiving less money and less in the way of privileges should have to pay ten per cent, as in the cases I have mentioned. Of course, this particular clause in Bill No. 19 has not yet come before us, and I can only hope that the government will see its way to amend it as I have indicated. Hon. ministers opposite, however, heard all the arguments that were made when the resolution was in committee and they have brought in the bill as it stands, so that it does not look as if they intend to change it. I submit that it is not fair; it is not just nor equitable as between these two classes I have mentioned, the soldier and the other man on the boats—men who have greater responsibilities and less privilege and who are taxed ten per cent.

Mr. RHODES: I do not propose to enter into a discussion with my hon. friend as to whether we should or should not change our point of view with respect to enlisted men. I would point out to him, however, that this particular provision of Bill No. 19 is not properly before us, and I do not wish him to think me discourteous in not referring to it. The hon. gentleman has a wrong conception of what we are attempting to do. He has the idea that we are using a roundabout and circuitous method of making the reduction of ten per cent and then paying five per cent towards superannuation.

Mr. NEILL: To a few.

Mr. RHODES: He says that we should have made a five per cent reduction in those cases. I will give him a practical illustration of how that would work out as between the man who gets superannuation and the man who does not. Take the man with a salary of $1,000; he has no superannuation. If we made a deduction of ten per cent he would get $900, and then if he had to pay five per cent superannuation that would mean that he would pay $50 more, so that he would be receiving $850 for this year; whereas the man not in receipt of superannuation who had a reduction of ten per cent would receive $900, and not having to pay five per cent he would be actually in receipt of $50 more than the other.

Mr. NEILL: But the other man gets value for it.

Mr. RHODES: Oh yes; I expected the hon. gentleman to reply at once, "Yes, but the other man has superannuation." That is quite true; but that will not buy him bread and butter this year. That is the point.

Mr. YOUNG: I support the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I have letters from country postmasters who are receiving salaries of $10, $20, $30 and $40 a month, and they are subject to the ten per cent cut, while the man who receives $1,200 is subject to five per cent. But there is another matter to which I wish to call attention. This morning I received a letter from a postmaster who tells me that he gets a salary and allowance for rent, the two together amounting to $28 a month, and he has the ten per cent cut on both salary and rent. Is it the intention to apply the act in that way, or is this a clerical error?

Mr. RHODES: I respectfully suggest to my hon. friend that it might be better to ask that question when we are considering Bill No. 19.

Mr. YOUNG: All right.

Mr. RHODES: There is, in the bill which we have not yet reached, provision covering the point raised by the hon. gentleman. I should appreciate it and it would be far better if the committee would consider the two separately.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am glad to hear that because I have received letters too—

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Ottawa has the floor.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not intend to discuss this point at present, because I think the attitude of the minister is right—that the question of superannuation and retirement should stand until we reach Bill No. 19. But since the minister has answered or endeavoured to answer the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, may I put it this way. What is the difference between an employee who pays to the superannuation fund and whose salary is $1,200 and the employee who pays to the retirement fund and whose salary is $1,200? In the one case he is exempted to the extent of five per cent and in the other he is not.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. gentleman has himself suggested that the proper time to deal with that question is when we are considering Bill No. 19. I shall be happy to discuss the point then.

Mr. NEILL: The minister has not told me why he is exempting the enlisted men.

Mr. RHODES: I have nothing to add to what I said on the previous occasion.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rhodes thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 92, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. RHODES: If it would suit the purposes of the house I would move that the bill be read the second time and that we go into committee, so that we might advance it that stage. I would then move immediately that we report progress. It can be done only by unanimous consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Progress reported.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

DEDUCTION OF TEN PER CENT FROM INDEMNITIES AND SALARIES

The house resumed from Wednesday, April 6, consideration in committee of Bill No. 19, to provide for the deduction of compensation in the public service—Mr. Rhodes—Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, what is the necessity of dealing with this bill? As I understand it, the government has made a deduction from the salaries of the members of the public service for the last two months; the government seems to have had authority to do that, so what is the necessity for putting through a bill? If the government could make the desired deductions for two months, it could surely do so for twelve.

Mr. RHODES: My right hon. friend submitted a question on a previous occasion which involved the same objection.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Only one month was affected at that time.

Mr. RHODES: I can only repeat the reply which I made on that occasion, that inasmuch as the house by adopting the second reading of the bill had given effect to the principle, we felt that rather than cause inconvenience to members of the civil service by not giving cognizance to the provisions of this bill, it would be better to anticipate the power conferred by final passing of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. GARDINER: Upon the last occasion when this bill was before the committee, I moved an amendment to this section, and with the consent of the committee I should like to withdraw that amendment.

Mr. VALLANCE: I think the committee should know just what this amendment was.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment read:

That clause (b), section 2, be amended by striking out the words "other than" in the 18th line and also by striking out the words "and includes" in the 23rd line and by inserting the words "and includes" after the word "Canada" in the 18th line.

Amendment withdrawn.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Ten per cent deduction.

Mr. BROWN: I should like to revert to the question asked by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) when we were discussing the other bill. I have a particular case in mind of an employee receiving $1,920 salary as well as being provided with a house in which to live. Another employee, doing the same work, receives $1,920 in salary and $300 as a living allowance. Will the ten per cent reduction apply to the $300 living allowance?

Mr. RHODES: The question would have to be determined as to whether or not that allowance is regarded as part of the salary paid. If it was decided that it was, then the allowance would be taxed. There are other cases where the allowances have not been so regarded, and those would not be taxable. There are also cases which might be termed borderline cases, and if the hon. gentleman will look at section 6 he will see that provision is made for the treasury board to deal with just such cases. As a member of that board, I can assure my hon. friend that it will be our endeavour to deal sympathetically with these cases and to avoid as many cases of injustice as is possible.

Mr. BROWN: I am giving the details of a particular case.

Mr. RHODES: The only answer which I can give to my hon. friend is the answer which I have given, namely, the decision must be made as to whether the allowance is or is not regarded as a portion of the salary.

Mr. YOUNG: In the case which I outlined a moment ago, will it be necessary to make an application to the treasury board for a decision?

Mr. RHODES: If that particular case comes within the classification where rents have been regarded as a portion of the compensation paid to the postmasters, then the amounts allowed for rent would be subject to deduction. The treasury board will act on those borderline cases where it is not clear as to whether or not the additional compensation is a portion of the salary.

Mr. YOUNG: The treasury board will act only when an application is made for a decision.

Mr. RHODES: The treasury board would act in individual cases where it was apparent hardships would accrue.

Mr. VENIOT: When attention had been drawn to the particular case.

Mr. BROWN: The case I have in mind is in the Department of Agriculture, so I assume the man involved would report to the minister?

Mr. RHODES: Quite so. I think the committee will appreciate that there will be a general principle applicable to a considerable number of cases, and that being so those cases will be brought within that principle. There will be individual cases which will not come within any one group or class, and those will be dealt with on their merits.

Mr. NEILL: Surely the minister can give a decision now to such an obvious question as that asked by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young)? The hon. member states that individual postmasters are being asked to pay ten per cent on the amounts paid for rentals of buildings.

Mr. RHODES: I do not think I can change my answer. The whole question will be as to whether or not such rentals have hitherto been regarded by the department as forming a portion of the salaries paid to the individuals in question. I would have to have the individual cases before me to find out what treatment had been meted out in that regard.

Mr. YOUNG: If it is salary, why is it called rent?

Mr. RHODES: There are numerous cases where allowances are made, which allowances are regarded as a portion of the compensation paid.

Mr. VENIOT: All applications for the position of caretaker of a public building state that free housing and free light are provided as well as the salary.

Mr. RHODES: In numerous cases the allowances paid are regarded as a portion of the compensation.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: During the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) read a letter which he had received from a lady civil servant stating how willing she was to accept this deduction. I should like to read a letter which I received from a postmistress of a small post office,—I will not give the lady's name—and ask the minister to give consideration to such classes. The letter reads:

My salary is only $16.58 per month and now the ten per cent taken will leave it at $14.92.

In these small communities, postmasters are really getting very little revenue while they are rendering a great service to the public, because, after all, a post office in a small district renders valuable service, and these postmasters or postmistresses are accustomed, in order to accommodate the public, to give out mail at all hours. In many cases they are women who have no other means of support; I know of several of that class in my constituency. Surely the government does not think it fair and is not going to take the ten per cent from that class. I do not want to delay the measure, but I would ask the Minister of Finance, before this bill goes through, to give further consideration to those people. I know there are difficulties in connection with the deduction in the rent allowance, but I think the whole question should be considered and those people who are drawing very small remuneration for the service they are rendering should be exempt from any reduction.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I want, just for a moment, to refer to the question of rental allowances. My reason for doing so is that so many hundreds come under this provision and the department should make a definite ruling covering all those people and not leave the question to one of individual cases. I have received many communications, not only from individual postmasters, but from officials of the provincial bodies, and their complaint is a very real one, because they already have had the deduction made in their remuneration, which falls under three different classes: the salaries which they receive; the rental allowance which is paid to them, and certain allowances out of which they pay for heating, lighting and assistance, all of which are subject to the ten per cent reduction. Some of them own their own quarters for which they receive rental allowances, but many of them are renting buildings for post office purposes, paying the rent and then being in receipt of a rental allowance to cover the amount in lieu of the government providing the necessary accommodation. They have already had the deduction made in the rental allowance, while they have not been able to obtain a reduction in the rent they have to pay; they are paying the same rent as before which in some cases equals and in many cases exceeds the amount they formerly received in the way of rental allowances. They are unable to reduce the cost of maintenance and upkeep, heating, lighting and the paying for assistance, but the ten per cent reduction has taken place in the allowance given to them for those purposes. I have examined into the matter with some care in some twenty or twenty-five cases and I have found the actual reduction amounts to over 20 per cent upon their salaries, because the reduction applies to the rental allowance, where they still had to pay the same rent, furnishing the other ten per cent out of their own pocket, out of their salary, and it applies to the heating, lighting, assistance and other things, the cost of which was not reduced in any way and where again they had to make up the difference out of their salary. The actual result, which I am sure was not the intention of the government, was, as I say, that the reduction in their salary amounted on the average to over 20 per cent.

As hundreds come under that class it is obvious that they should not be dealt with as individual cases, and after individual application on the part of those postmasters, but that the whole situation should be examined into and a definite rule laid down in respect of rental allowance, allowances made for maintenance and upkeep of building and for the provision of the assistance which is necessary. At the same time I may point out that they have already had those deductions made; they have already received their cheques minus that amount and they are complaining with, I think, some justice. A great deal of discrimination is involved. Let us take the case of the men who are working in a government-owned building. They receive no rent allowance; they pay no rent and of course they suffer no ten per cent reduction in that regard. Therefore there is a discrimination in their favour as against those who are renting a building owned by someone else or those who own their own building. There are these three classes, and the government might lay down a general rule in respect of each of them.

Mr. NEILL: Now.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Yes. As the reduction has been made, where it has been made improperly, it should be reimbursed. If a definite ruling is made covering those three general classes, the minister will find that the number of individual cases to be dealt with as such will be very materially reduced, as there are many hundreds who would come under that ruling. It is obvious that so far there has been a great degree of unfairness.

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend will look at clause 6, as I have no doubt he has done, he will see by paragraph (b) the following provision that the treasury board may make regulations:

(b) determining in any case of doubt the amount to be treated as the amount of compensation of any member of the public service of Canada for the purposes of this act.

While I cannot speak for the treasury board, I would have no hesitancy in announcing now that in the cases of those postmasters who are given a rental allowance which involves their renting premises, that rental allowance would not be subject to deduction.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: It has been so far.

Mr. RHODES: If it has been, I am prepared to give an undertaking now that when the regulations are laid down by the treasury board, there will be a rebate in those cases. Furthermore, in devising these regulations, we shall do so to the best of our ability in an endeavour to see that no injustice arises and even where the rent allowance has been made in the case of premises which are owned and occupied by the postmasters themselves, we shall try to have a just regard for the equities of the situation. In the absence of regulations, because of course they cannot be laid down until the bill is passed, I cannot go further than that, but I hope I have made myself sufficiently clear.

Mr. NEILL: Hear! hear!

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am well pleased with the minister's statement and I have no doubt the people concerned will be equally so. I brought the matter up now in reference to paragraph (b) of clause 6 simply from this point of view; it would seem under clause 6 it was the intention to consider individual cases and I was merely suggesting that that was not necessary. There are many of these cases that can be covered by definite regulations which would deal with a whole class, thus rendering it unnecessary to treat them individually. I am glad to receive the minister's assurance.

Mr. VALLANCE: When I rose at the same time as the hon. member for Red Deer, I desired to ask the same question of the minister. I also have received very extended communications from the Postmasters' Association, I suppose because of the fact that they appeared before the civil service committee. I have had interviews with their representatives and considerable correspondence since on this very question, and I can assure the minister that they will read his statement with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. VENIOT: May I take a few moments of the time of the committee to deal with this question of rentals? So far as the post office is concerned, judging from the experience that I have had as the head of that department for a number of years, considerable complications arise in the matter of the rental allowed. For instance, there is the rental allowance paid to the postmaster, and based on revenue, where the post office is stationed in his own residence. Then there is the more important post office in the rural districts where the postmaster is allowed a certain allowance for a building outside when his own building is not a suitable place for the post office and where the allowance does not come up to the amount asked by the owner of the building. In such a case his allowance is supplemented by a vote from the Department of Public Works. What are you going to do in a case of that kind? Here you have an allowance to the postmaster based on the revenue from his office, and under the law and the regulations the Post Office Department cannot increase that allowance because it is based on revenue, but the Department of Public Works supplements that allowance with, say $50 annually. What are you going to do in such a case? My suggestion to the minister would be not to have the ten per cent deduction apply to any rental allowance except where, under the Civil Service Act, it is stated in the advertisement when vacancies are advertised that the allowance is to be taken as part of the salary. If that principle was adopted of not touching these rental allowances at all, I think that the minister would find that the deduction would be applied in a more equitable manner.

While I am on my feet, might I draw the attention of the minister to this other matter? In the Post Office Department there is what is called a forwarding allowance. That is to say, in a certain number of districts the mail from outside comes to a central office, and there it is re-sorted and distributed to the outlying small post offices, and the postmaster is allowed what is known as a forwarding allowance, which, of course, adds to his remuneration. I would suggest that the minister when dealing with the rental allowance might also deal with the forwarding allowance, and not have the ten per cent deduction apply to the forwarding allowance. These matters I think could be covered by the regulations. If the minister would make a note of this matter, it might be dealt with by the treasury board as they deem best.

The last time this bill was up I mentioned the case of those who are receiving their maximum salary for the class in which they are working, and who would be receiving a bonus of five per cent, if I might use that term, because the government is absorbing five per cent of the amount they contribute to the superannuation fund. But there is also the case of those who have not reached their maximum, and who are reduced ten per cent and are also deprived of their statutory allowance for the year 1932-33. I think it would be unjust if they were not given something corresponding to the bonus received by those who have reached their maximum allowance. I would like the minister to take that into consideration. It applies, of course, to the whole service throughout the country, especially the inside service.

There is another question. I brought it up when the bill was up before and perhaps the minister would tell me something about it or it if will be taken into consideration. I refer to those who are contributing to the retirement fund, comprising about 550 or 575, instead of to the superannuation fund. They do not get the benefit of this bonus which those who are contributing to the superannuation fund get. As I understand it, and I think I am right, those who contribute to the retirement fund pay in five per cent of their salary and the government contributes nothing, whereas those contributing to the superannuation fund pay in five per cent of their salary and the government adds whatever is necessary to maintain the superannuation fund. The minister will see the discrimination between the two classes, that a bonus of five per cent is granted in the case of those contributing to the superannuation fund and nothing in the case of those contributing to the retirement fund. I leave those suggestions with the minister because I do not wish to delay the passage of the bill.

Mr. RHODES: I am grateful to my hon. friend from Gloucester not only for what he has said but for the reasonable manner in which he has said it. To answer his last suggestion first, there would appear to be an injustice between those who pay into the retirement as compared with those who pay into the superannuation fund, although it is perhaps not qnite so great as would appear at first blush, because in the case of the man who pays into the retirement fund he gets back that money as a matter of right, plus interest, whereas in the case of the man who pays into the superannuation fund, for the first ten years he pays in and does not get it back as a matter of right, and when he does get it back, he does not get it plus interest. Nevertheless, I have given very serious consideration to this matter and rather than have it appear that there is any injustice I may say to my hon. friend that I have already prepared and have under my hand an amendment which I propose to move at a later stage, when we come to the section in question, which will bring to those who pay into the retirement fund the same benefits as are provided in the bill for those who pay into the superannuation fund.

With respect to the other point raised by my hon. friend, as to the salary being paid by the Post Office Department and the rental allowance by the Public Works department—

Mr. VENIOT: Supplemented by the Public Works department.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so. I do not anticipate any difficulty because of the fact that there are two different departments contributing, as it were, to the remuneration of one individual because the regulations will be applicable to all departments of government, and will be so arranged I think as to take care of the case raised by my hon. friend.

Mr. VENIOT: What I am afraid of is that the ten per cent deduction might also be applied to the fifty dollars, or whatever it may be, which the Department of Public Works pays as a supplementary allowance, and I want to avoid that.

Mr. RHODES: I understand my hon. friend's point, and I think it might well be considered when the regulations are laid down.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Mr. Chairman, I presume when regulations are laid down almost any case in doubt can be dealt with. Clause (2) of section 3 of the bill is as follows:

> The deduction at the rate aforesaid shall be made from the instalments of compensation as the same become payable.

The first subsection states that the deductions are to be made during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1933. I was not opposed to the ten per cent deduction; I favoured it, and was opposed to any exemptions. The question arises in my mind, however, that if we operate strictly within the interpretation of the language in the section the deductions can be made only within the prescribed time of one year on such amounts as are paid out during that year. Members of the House of Commons received for the months of February, March and April the sum of $1,740, without any deduction. The amount received for two of those months namely $1,140 would not be subject to a deduction, because the payments fall previous to the time specified in this bill. I realize that the objection can be overcome by regulations, and that a lump sum of $400 could be deducted at the end of the session. I doubt very much however if that is complying strictly with the language of the bill.

However that is not my chief point. It is quite likely that the 1933 session will commence and some payments will be made within the prescribed time of the one year's reduction. There has been some talk, in fact, that there may be a fall session. If such be the case and there should be payments made in October, November or December, and then again in January, February and March would such payments coming under the 1933 sessional indemnity be subject to the ten per cent deduction as outlined in this bill?

Mr. RHODES: I am pleased the hon. member for Kindersley has raised the question which I believe was considered previously in committee. The indemnities to the members of the House of Commons and the Senate are in an entirely different position from salaries to other persons. It is true that we can draw at the rate of $20 per day during the session, but if the session extends a period of fifty days, under statute the indemnity for that session is $4,000. It was our intention that the deduction should be made upon the indemnity for this session and this session only. That is to say, we intend that the members of the House of Commons and the Senate shall receive the sums of $3,600 by way of indemnity for this one session, and no more. I have before me an amendment which I will ask the Minister of National Revenue to move, and I believe it will clear the point beyond question. The amendment is as follows:

That section 3 be amended by adding the following as subsection (3): Notwithstanding the provisions of subsections (1) and (2) of this section the said deduction from the indemnity of members of the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada shall apply to such indemnity only for the session of parliament which commenced on the fourth day of February, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-two.

That would seem to answer the question of my hon. friend as to what might happen in the event of a fall session.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I move accordingly.

Mr. NEILL: I have an amendment to section 2, and I do not know whether it should come before the one moved by the minister.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Ryckman moves:

That section 3 of Bill No. 19 intituled "An act to provide for the reduction of compensation in the public service" be amended by adding the following as subsection (3):

(3) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsections (1) and (2) of this section the said deduction from the indemnity of members of the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada shall apply to such indemnity only for the session of parliament which commenced on the fourth day of February, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-two.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is not the duration of the legislation fixed in the bill? I understand it is to expire on March 31, 1933?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Until the minister proposed the amendment it never occurred to me but that the legislation would apply to senators and members of the House of Commons as well as to civil servants. Would the fact that the session might be convened before the date of the expiry of the act have any effect upon sessional indemnity?

Mr. RHODES: No; if this amendment carries it would mean that unless there was fresh legislation there could be no deduction from the indemnities of members of the Senate and the House of Commons at subsequent sessions.

Mr. DUFF: If I read the amendment correctly it means that $400 will be deducted for the present session from the sessional indemnity of members of parliament. I contend that that is not right. In view of the fact that the session began on February 4 and about half of it took place during the months of February and March before this legislation came into effect, I submit that $400 cannot be deducted from the sessional indemnities of members of the House of Commons and the Senate. The legislation before us is for the fiscal year 1932-33. If parliament had assembled on April 1, then the minister would be quite right in deducting $400 from sessional indemnities. In view of the fact however that this house assembled on February 4, two months before the fiscal year 1932-33 commenced, I submit that this government cannot deduct the sum of $400 from the indemnity of members of the House of Commons or the Senate.

Let me carry my argument a little farther. During twenty-six days in the month of February members of the House of Commons attended their duties. There were thirty-one days in March and thirty days in April. For the sake of argument let us go to the end of May—and I hope we will not, because I hope prorogation may take place at the end of this week—

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Make your speech short then.

Mr. DUFF: I am trying to save money for my hon. friends from Toronto, and I think if they will allow me to continue I will save it.

In view of the fact that half of this session took place in the fiscal year 1931-32 the only amount that the government can deduct from the sessional indemnities of members of the House of Commons and the Senate is that proportion based on the number of days in February and March as compared with the number of days in April and May. I say neither the Minister of Finance nor the government can deduct the whole $400 from the indemnity for the session. I say to my hon. friends on this side—because probably they are holding up prorogation more than hon. members opposite—that every day we stay here we are losing $1.

Mr. RHODES: Is that all?

Mr. DUFF: Yes, $1 more; because I contend that under this legislation all the government can subtract from our indemnities is that proportion of the number of days in February and March as they relate to the number of days we spend in parliament after that time. In other words to make it a little clearer, and without getting down to exact amounts, we will suppose that we spend the months of February and March in the year 1931-32, and we spend two months of this session in the year 1932-33. Under those circumstances all that the members of the House of Commons and the Senate can lose is the sum of $200, not $400.

An hon. MEMBER: Right.

Mr. DUFF: I am glad some one agrees with me. This difference of $200, or whatever portion it may be, must be deducted if we assemble here either in the fall or next January or February. But all the government can deduct from members of parliament under this bill is that portion of the $400 as it relates to the number of days from February 4 to March 31 and from March 31 until we prorogue.

Mr. RHODES: In reply to my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough, the government do not propose to do anything in this matter other than carry out the will of parliament. Now, if the House of Commons and the Senate in their wisdom see fit to pass this amendment, it will be perfectly competent during the present session for the deduction to be made to the extent of $400. With all deference to my hon. friend, I do not follow him in his argument; I do not think it makes the slightest difference because the session happens to run into two fiscal years. It is not a question of allocating payment of members of the House of Commons or of the Senate on a monthly basis. It is a question of indemnity for the session, and this amendment is very clear in its terms that the deduction is made for the session. So far as the legal point of view of my hon. friend goes, I would not attempt to argue any matters of law with him—

Mr. DUFF: Hear, hear.

Mr. RHODES: —because in many respects he is as good a lawyer as he is an admiral.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. RHODES: I say that in a complimentary way.

Mr. DUFF: I take it as such.

Mr. RHODES: We know that there are what are called sea lawyers. My hon. friend is very much better than any sea lawyer. But I say to him in all seriousness that the law officers of the crown have no doubt as to the legality of the method under which we are proceeding, and if I may submit my own humble judgment, it is that there need be no difficulties nor worries along the lines indicated by my hon. friend.

Mr. DUFF: The Minister of Finance says this $400 is to be deducted for this session. If that is true, part of it should have been deducted before the fiscal year started on April 1. I can understand that that is why the minister has found it necessary to introduce this amendment. My argument is quite sound. Of course, as the minister says, parliament is supreme, and if it wants to enact legislation which is entirely contrary—let me see if I can get the proper legal terms—if parliament wishes to enact legislation which is retroactive, of course it can legalize the deduction of $400 from the small balance of our indemnity that is coming to us at the end of the session. But I do say that the government should not do this. If we are to pay $400, that amount should not be deducted from that portion of our indemnity in respect of that part of the session that came within the last fiscal year. There is no question that parliament will assemble before March 31, 1933, whether in special session next fall, or in regular session next January or February. I submit that legally and morally all that should be deducted should be from the balance which is due us after the first of April. For instance, we drew $560 in February and $620 in March—$1,180. That would leave a balance of $2,820. I contend—and my good friend the Minister of Finance is one of the best constitutional lawyers in the British Empire, and on the other side there is another legal gentleman, the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Smith), one of the greatest lawyers in the maritime provinces, indeed, his fame has spread even to British Columbia, they must agree with me that from the legal standpoint I am correct. It is not fair, it is not right that we should be put on a different basis entirely from anybody else who is contributing or suffering this deduction; for that is what it amounts to when we are asked to pay $400 this fiscal year when fifty per cent of our work was done during the fiscal year 1931-32.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: It is a good point.

Mr. DUFF: It is a good point, and I am right. I submit that my hon. friend should not introduce this legislation just for the purpose of hitting at the poor members of the Senate and the House of Commons. Let us be put on the same basis as everybody else, let us take our proportional reduction this session, and next year—if we meet before the 31st of March—by all means deduct ten per cent from what is due us at that time. Of course, as the minister says, parliament can do this if it wants to, but for heaven's sake let my hon. friend from Digby-Annapolis (Mr. Short) and other Nova Scotians in the house stand up for what is right and proper. Don't let them sit there and accept any amendment the government brings in just to get a few hundred dollars from members of parliament.

Mr. SHORT: We want to help the government.

Mr. DUFF: It does not make any difference whether it is $400 or $4,000, if my hon. friend wants to help this government let him do it as the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) did a few years ago, let him decline any indemnity.

Mr. SHORT: I might do that.

Mr. DUFF: I repeat, from both the legal and the moral standpoint all we should pay is a proportional part of the $400 on the indemnity that is due us from February 4 to March 31, plus the time we have served since then.

Mr. SHORT: Why not pay in a lump sum and be through with it.

Mr. RHODES: I know my hon. friend is speaking in all seriousness,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. RHODES: —but he is entirely mistaken in confusing yearly pay or monthly pay with the indemnity of a member of parliament. The indemnity is for the session. This amendment is submitted, not with any view to making it retroactive at all, but solely for the purpose of making clear the original intent, which was that the contribution for this one session should be $400. I cannot resist bringing to my hon. friend's attention what I am sure he has had brought to his notice on previous occasions, that if the painful necessity arises of taking two inches off a dog's tail, the operation will be much less painful if it is done by taking one cut rather than two.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. NEILL: I desire to move the following amendment:

To insert after line 4 the words "receiving $1,200 or more per annum," and after the word "thereof" in line 5 the words "and if under $1,200 per annum, five per cent of the amount thereof."

The object is simply to put into one issue, so to speak, the question of reduction of salaries of $1,200 and under. The effect would be that all those in receipt of a salary of $1,200 and under would be subject to a deduction of five per cent only. It would clarify the situation and save disputes, some of which have already begun as between the superannuation fund and the various retirement funds. The minister has indicated that he has already had to propose an amendment to meet objection by one of the members sitting to my right. There are several of these retirement funds and in some cases they differ considerably as between one and another. There will be endless disputes as to the rights of individuals. I would also say, in answer to the minister, that these deductions for superannuation are not penalties exacted from the civil servant; he gets value in return. In every case the government pays a sum equivalent to what he has contributed, and the man on retirement, or his dependents on his death, will get the benefit. So that if a man out of his $1,000 spends $50 in contributions to the superannuation fund, it cannot be argued that he is being penalized because, as I have said, he is getting value. As the act reads to-day, with that later clause, No. 5, it discriminates against a class of persons drawing small salaries, who do not happen to be privileged to contribute to the fund. The minister cited the case of two men, both getting $1,000, one paying to the superannuation fund—and having a similar amount contributed by the government—the other not paying into the fund at all, and he said that the effect would be that the man who did not have to contribute the $50 to the fund would have that much more to buy groceries with. That is a very subtle argument—

Mr. RHODES: It is the fact.

Mr. NEILL: —but the minister cannot possibly defend it. The answer is that the man who pays into the fund knows that the future of his wife and his family is provided for to that extent, while the man who is not allowed to contribute to the fund is conscious of that lack of protection against future events. There is always that Nemesis he must bear in mind. Out of his meagre salary he has to pay $80 or $100 for insurance, whereas the other man makes a deal with the government, who contributes fifty per cent of what he has to pay into the superannuation fund for similar protection. So that they are on a par. It does not matter what the man does with his $50, whether he contributes to a fund or buys insurance. The man who is not contributing to the fund is just as sensitive about the needs of his wife and family after his death and, as I say, unassisted insurance costs more so he has to take $80 or $100 and buy insurance. It cannot be argued that this is at all fair. I see the minister consulting the Minister of Justice, and he will no doubt rise to a point of order and say that I am affecting the revenues of the crown and therefore out of order. I put it to him, however, whether it is not fair that all should be treated alike. He has in the act admitted that some of those under $1,200 should pay only five per cent, and I submit that it should be made universal. If he thinks $1,200 too high, then he might make it $1,000; but let him treat all alike. Give them their money, deduct five per cent, and let them do as they please. The minister can rest assured that people who are receiving $85 and $90 a month are not going to spend that money on luxuries, but on necessities, and they should not be deducted ten per cent under any circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN: It has been moved by Mr. Neill that the section be amended by inserting after line 4 the words "receiving $1,200 or more per annum," and after the word "thereof" in line 5 the words "and under $1,200 per annum, five per cent of the amount thereof." I think the amendment is out of order under rule 552, inasmuch as it affects the revenue.

Mr. RHODES: I was going to raise that point of order. As a matter of procedure, the amendment is out of order because it affects the revenue. On its merits, while I do not mean to suggest that there is nothing in the contention of my hon. friend, I submit that the case which I cited has a very real point. It may not be a complete answer to the hon. gentleman's contention; nevertheless I do not think that the injustice is so great as he seems to think.

Mr. NEILL: Will the minister consider what I have said when he comes to section 5? I am not arguing the point of order, for he is probably correct. But the principle is there, and principles are bigger than points of order. The minister has half admitted the justice of my contention, and in his own soul he knows that it is not fair to deduct the ten per cent from the salary of these low paid men.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Basis of superannuation benefits not reduced.

Mr. RHODES: I move that this section be amended by inserting after the word act in the fourth line of subsection 1 the following words:

"or from the compensation of any officer, clerk or employee employed in a penitentiary who may be eligible on retirement to receive a gratuity or retiring allowance under the provisions of the Penitentiary Act."

And (2): By substituting the word "any" for the word "either" in the last line of the said subsection.

And (3): By inserting after the word "act" in the second line of subsection 2 of the said section the words: "or under the provisions of part II of the Civil Service Superannuation and Retirement Act."

His Excellency the Governor General has been informed of the subject matter of this amendment, has given his approval, and recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Will the minister explain the provisions of the amendment?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The Penitentiary Act provides that certain officials, guards and the like, on retirement from the service, are entitled to a gratuity based on the number of years' service and on their record in the penitentiary service. It is thought that this should not affect any possible amount that is paid them after years of service when they have earned that sum.

Mr. RHODES: This meets the point raised by the hon. member for Gloucester, and subsequently by the hon. member for Ottawa, with respect to the five per cent in the case of those who are under the retirement fund. The minister has already explained the effect in regard to penitentiaries.

Mr. CHEVRIER: On March 4, at page 824 of Hansard, the minister stated that there were 16,408 employees who received $1,200 a year or less. I asked him how many contributed to the superannuation fund and he replied:

Under the new Superannuation Act, 5,550; under the old Superannuation Act, 3,000; under the retirement fund, 550.

There must be some error in that, because as I understand it there is the present Superannuation Act, then there is the Retirement Act, and then there is the old superannuation fund, to which I suppose there are now about 550 contributors. I am delighted that the minister has seen fit to amend the bill to bring in those who pay under the retirement act. There was no reason why those classes should not enjoy the benefits of the five per cent being granted to those receiving less than $1,200 per year. There does not seem to be any reason why those who are still paying under the old fund and who by this time must be nearing retirement age should not also have the benefit of the five per cent when their salaries are less than $1,200. I submit that once the minister has opened the door in the case of the retirement act, it should be done in the case of those who are paying under the old system.

Mr. RHODES: I am rather surprised that my hon. friend, who is usually so well informed on civil service matters, is so seriously mistaken in his facts. As a matter of fact, instead of there being three thousand under the old superannuation act, there are but three, and those three have paid up their superannuation in full. Any amendment made to this act would not affect them in the slightest degree.

Mr. CHEVRIER: My understanding was that under the old fund there could not be that many because most of them would have spent more than thirty-five years in the service and would be now entitled to their seven-tenths. The mistake has occurred in the figures.

Mr. RHODES: I think the mistake did occur in the original issue of Hansard, but I corrected it the next day on the orders of the day. Perhaps my hon. friend did not see that correction.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am quite satisfied that the amendments now proposed cover those coming under the retirement fund.

Mr. NEILL: On April 6 when this matter was under discussion, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) raised the question to which I referred a few moments ago in connection with one man receiving under $1,200 per year paying ten per cent, while another man paid only five per cent. As is reported on page 1771 of Hansard, the hon. member said:

Would the Prime Minister take into consideration the fairness of reducing the rate charged against those who are receiving less than $1,200.

The Prime Minister replied as follows:

As the statute reads, that would not be possible. As I have said, however, under section 6 it would be competent for the treasury board to determine what should be the true compensation against which the reduction should be made. That is the only answer I can give.

The Prime Minister was referring to the specific case raised by the hon. member for Kenora of some civil servants receiving under $1,200 per year having a ten per cent deduction while others had only a five per cent deduction. I think we are justified in assuming that he was referring to that particular case when he said that under section 6 it would be competent for the treasury board to determine what should be the true compensation against which the reduction should be levied. Are we entitled to infer that the treasury board could find that the true compensation would be such a sum which made allowance for payment into the superannuation fund or into something else, such as insurance, which might he held to be equivalent? It may not seem to be a strong case, but I should like to know if the minister shares the view expressed by the Prime Minister in connection with section 6?

Mr. RHODES: I have not the passage before me to which my hon. friend referred, but I do not think it would be competent for the treasury board to determine what was the compensation.

Mr. NEILL: Read the language.

Mr. RHODES: I do not think that that could be done under section 6. I remember the hon. member for Kenora raising the point of double deductions, but I do not think the treasury board would have power to act.

Mr. NEILL: If the minister will look at Hansard he will see it is a definite case of five per cent versus ten per cent.

Mr. RHODES: I saw the language used by the Prime Minister and I can only say that if the word "compensation" is taken from its context and used literally, then the Prime Minister was in error.

Mr. NEILL: He is never in error.

Mr. RHODES: I have no doubt that what he had in mind was that the treasury board could not fix the amount of compensation.

Mr. NEILL: Is there any gleam of hope for these men of whom I am talking?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, and there is a gleam of hope so far as any member of the public service is concerned. The treasury board will deal fairly with these matters, they will temper the wind to the shorn lamb.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 6—Regulations by treasury board.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am rather glad to see that the treasury board is taking responsibility for the regulations, but I desire to mention a matter which affects the board very much. Last year the government saw fit in the interests of economy to grant an allowance of $2,000 per year to the speakers of both houses and ministers and others affected in lieu of private automobiles. While I may have some doubt as to the economy to be effected, I must say it is very helpful to see the ministers walking instead of riding in private automobiles. I am sure it will be good for their health and in these days the saving of $400 which will accrue will be very handy. But the speakers have suffered a deduction of $1,000 on their living allowances in addition to the general ten per cent reduction, and to this extent they are being discriminated against. Will the treasury board have authority under section 6 to deal with matters of this kind? I think it would be worth while looking into.

Mr. RHODES: When the item in the main estimates is up for discussion I shall be very pleased to discuss the saving which has accrued to the public treasury by the granting of an allowance to ministers rather than the employing of private cars. I think I will be able to demonstrate that the country is saving a very substantial sum of money as it is costing less than one-third of what it cost under the old system. However, although a minister may walk, members of his family do not and the bills for taxi hire are very substantial. I shall not go into this matter in detail as it has nothing to do with the present bill. The treasury board would have no discretion in such a matter. But it may be that there has been an improper proportion maintained as between the speaker of the house and the ministers. I shall not enter into that discussion here, but I may say to my hon. friend that these items are dealt with by a specific vote in the main estimates and that is where they ought to be discussed. Clause 6 of the bill would give the treasury board no discretion to deal with the matter in question.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am merely pointing out to my hon. friend that there is a discrimination as between the speakers and the ministers—

Mr. RHODES: That may be so.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): —and it applies under this bill. I am not going to enter into a discussion to-day about whether it is wise to have our ministers walking and taking the $2,000. I am simply drawing the attention of the minister to the fact that in the deduction there appears to be discrimination as between the ministers and the speakers.

Mr. VENIOT: I think there is also a discrimination against the deputy speaker on the same ground as that suggested by my hon. friend. The Minister of Finance and the hon. member for West Edmonton referred to the allowance of $2,000 in lieu of private automobiles, and the minister said that he would be glad to discuss it at a future date. If the session had not been so near an end, I would have been rather willing myself to accept the challenge.

Mr. RHODES: I did not wish to raise the point of order; that was not in my mind. It would open up a subject which should not be opened up.

Mr. SPENCER: I take this opportunity under clause 6 to draw to the attention of the Minister of Finance how unfair I consider this ten per cent cut must be to postmasters in country districts. I have had sent to me several complaints from country postmasters who are receiving small salaries and who will come under this ten per cent cut. Without unduly taking up the time of the committee, I should like to put the matter shortly before the minister. I have before me an instance where the postmaster is receiving the princely sum of $116.24 a month. After deducting a small amount for life insurance, another for an assistant whom he has to have because the trains come and go in the middle of the night, various amounts for rent, interest, heat and lighting, fire insurance and even a small sum for taxes, he has left $36.67 a month. He says that this sum will not meet living expenses, much less allow him to put by for his old age, and as he says.

You are aware we are not civil servants when it comes to a question of superannuation.

He reminds me that it is impossible to dispense with an assistant because the trains come and go in the middle of the night. Another postmaster from the same part of the country writes me as follows:

I am getting $91.32 salary now after being cut down 15 per cent in 1930 and a further cut of ten per cent in 1931 and if I get another ten per cent now it is going to be impossible to carry on.

I am paying $20 per month rent and about $15 for fuel, $4.80 for light and $51.52 hardly pays for food and clothes for our family of five.

I just wish to put before the minister cases which are typical of postmasters in small country towns, in order to show the heavy burden it will be with their small salaries to bear this ten per cent deduction.

Mr. RHODES: I have no doubt there are individual cases such as the ones brought to the attention of the committee by the hon. member for Battle River. The difficulty is, in applying a rule in general, to avoid some cases of hardship. I do not see any way in which it can be done.

On the title.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I draw the minister's attention to the title of the bill as it appears. It is called:

An act to provide for the reduction of compensation in the public service.

The word "deduction" is used throughout the bill and I think that word is intended.

Mr. RHODES: I quite agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. CAHAN: I think the leader of the opposition will agree that the mere substitution of "deduction" for "reduction" does not read very well. I think it should be "deduction from."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. In the minds of some there appears a danger of this becoming a reduction in salary rather than just an amount deducted for this year.

Mr. RHODES: The word "deduction" is used in clause 5 and of course in the short title.

Mr. CAHAN: I move that the words "reduction of" be struck out and the words "deduction from" be substituted therefor.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. RHODES: I would in the ordinary course like to proceed with order No. 16, that is the two insurance bills, but some hon. gentlemen, whom I do not now see in the chamber, would wish to be here and furthermore I should like the superintendent of insurance to be present when these bills are under discussion. That being so, I do not desire, until this evening, to proceed with these bills.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister spoke of proceeding with No. 20 in regard to radio broadcasting.

Mr. RHODES: I shall send for him.

Mr. SPENCER: The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) and some other hon. members, wanted to discuss the insurance bills. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin will not be in the house until nine o'clock. Will it be convenient for the minister to delay consideration of the bills until that time?

Mr. RHODES: I am quite content not to proceed with them until he returns. He was one of those whom I had in mind. I did not know he would not be in the house until nine o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 93, to incorporate the W. S. Newton Company.—Mr. Kennedy (Winnipeg South Centre).

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the next order?

Mr. RHODES: We could go on with supply.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought the resolution with regard to the radio commission was to come up to-day.

Mr. RHODES: The Prime Minister is not in at the moment.

An hon. MEMBER: He is coming now.

Mr. BENNETT: I am hardly ready to go on with the resolution with respect to the radio commission, as I am waiting for a certain piece of information. We will take it to-night.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Radio services—for the maintenance and operation of the Northwest Territories radio system, $167,000.

Mr. COOTE: I would like the minister to explain the reduction in this vote.

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): In this service the changes in personnel are costly. None will be made this year. In other years there has generally been a considerable amount spent for new buildings, but there will be no expenditures of that kind this year.

Mr. COOTE: So far as the actual radio service is concerned there will be no reduction?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: All the stations that we have had heretofore will be operated.

Item agreed to.

Adjustment of War Claims — National Defence—militia services, $82,000; naval services, $500.

Mr. VENIOT: This has nothing to do with the adjustment of claims of individuals for reparations, I presume.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, this item has to deal with deferred separation allowances and gratuities of members of the forces.

Item agreed to.

Naval service—to provide for the maintenance of the ships and establishments of the naval service, including the Royal Canadian Navy, the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve and the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve, $2,462,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think we should have some explanation of the operations of our navy in the last few months. What do these ships do from month to month? Even since parliament assembled we had our navy interfering with activities in several foreign ports. What instructions are given to the navy? I should like the minister to explain this item.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has a particular incident in mind. As to the general operations, training goes on both on the east coast and on the west coast, and in the winter months it is customary for the boats to proceed to warmer waters and carry on the training there. That is general with all navies. In the summer, of course, our ships are in our northern waters, on the west coast up around the island, and on the east coast they spend part of their time in the St. Lawrence.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is the purpose of these ships simply to afford some sort of training? I had the idea that they were really patrol boats of a sort. That was the impression given to us several years ago when the original expenditure was under review. Now it seems these boats have been transformed into training ships, that they carry on training in the warmer waters as well as around our own coasts. Are these training ships or patrol boats?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Certainly they are training ships, and there was never anything else intended. There are four destroyers, and the destroyer is essentially a combatant boat, for offensive or defensive purposes as required. The training cannot be done in our northern waters in winter, and it is customary in all nations for the boats in winter time to go to warmer waters. Some of the British boats, for instance, go to the Mediterranean in winter, and the Atlantic squadron is around the West Indies. It costs no more to have our ships move into warmer waters than to have them stay here and train.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What guns do these destroyers carry?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: They vary. The two new destroyers, the Skeena and the Saguenay, are armed with 4·5 guns, if my memory serves me. I can say that they are armed as strongly as any destroyers in the world. As the hon. member may know, the Saguenay and the Skeena are the last word in destroyers. They came into commission last year, having been under process of construction a couple of years before. The other two, namely the Vancouver and the Champlain, are older boats, dating from the war period. The armament on them is not as heavy as on the other two. However, we have four very capable boats.

Item agreed to.

Topographic survey, $20,000.

Mr. COOTE: I should like to ask a question concerning this item. Were any of the royal air force men engaged last year on the topographic survey work?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I cannot be absolutely sure about that. The air force work in connection with that vote would possibly consist in the taking and development of pictures. The actual pay for the air men would not come under this vote.

Mr. COOTE: Will the minister be able to make use of any of the air force men, particularly the married men, who were to be laid off on May 1? I do not know whether they were all discharged at that time or not. I think on one occasion he made the statement that there might be a possibility of using or making provision for some of them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That does not come under this vote, and I should prefer to take it up when we are discussing the item for aviation.

Mr. SPENCER: How has it been possible to cut $25,000 from this item? Other years we have been told that a reduction could not be considered. What surveys are being dispensed with?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: A certain number of professors at the Royal Military College and some civilian professors have been affected by the ten per cent cut. Then, there is a reduction in incidental and contingent expenses. The reduced amount however will not affect the efficiency of the school.

Mr. NEILL: Are we not over-voting these sums? Have we not already passed a portion of these votes?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No. Up until to-day only item No. 87 had been passed.

Mr. NEILL: But from time to time we have voted interim supply?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I think two-twelfths have been voted.

Mr. NEILL: We are now voting the full sum. The minister will find himself in the tower if he is not careful.

Mr. BENNETT: The resolution provides for it.

Mr. NEILL: We had better go back to the other votes.

Mr. BENNETT: The others are the same; they are covered by the resolution.

Item agreed to.

Permanent force, $4,844,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to make a few remarks with regard to this item, especially in view of the Disarmament conference now being held at Geneva. I am well aware of the fact that Canada has no very large armaments, and for that we ought to be thankful. At the same time, we do maintain a certain force, and at least once a year I think we ought to stop to consider whether or not we are in line with the developments which some day may possibly carry the world away from armaments.

I think once before this year I drew attention to a statement made by the Minister of Justice at a session of the Assembly of the League of Nations held at Geneva on September 9 of last year. He said:

> The armaments of Canada are practically negligible. We maintain only such military, naval and air forces as are necessary for the maintenance of law and order within our own border. Canada has no need for greater armaments.

For some years past some of us have been maintaining that it was not necessary to have an armed force to repel invasion. We have been inclined to say that the armed force in Canada existed for the sake of keeping down any disorder which might arise within our own borders. When we made that statement it was hotly challenged, and the reply was made that our armed force did not exist for that purpose, but that we had armaments as an insurance against war. Now we find that in the course of a very admirable speech at Geneva, to which I had the privilege of listening, and which created a very good impression, so far as the attitude of Canada toward militarism was concerned, the Minister of Justice, who led the delegation, said very definitely that our naval, military and air forces are no larger than are necessary to keep order within our own borders. I think it is most serious if we have to spend these millions of dollars simply to keep our own Canadians in order. It is most unfortunate if the definite statement has to be made that we have such unrest in Canada that it is necessary to have the warships—which, we have been told by the minister are very efficient—to keep our own people in order.

A few days ago I read in a Vancouver paper that one of our cruisers came from Victoria to the docks at Vancouver in order to be present on May day in case of emergency. To my mind that is a serious reflection upon our country and our administration. The same applies to the army. Some of us have protested against the extension of our mounted police force, because in reality I understand it is a military unit. I think it was the Prime Minister who stated the other day that there was no military drill, no bayonet drill or riot squad drill such as had been described by Regina papers. I am absolutely at a loss to know why such an item should appear in the newspapers, and why there should be put into the mouth of the officer in charge the statement which appeared in the press.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not discuss the Regina situation at all; it was the Ottawa situation I dealt with.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Oh, I understood—

Mr. BENNETT: It must have been some other member; it was not I.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I thought the Prime Minister was dealing with the Regina situation.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I dealt with the one in Ottawa.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then I am mistaken in the matter. Someone else made the statement—possibly it was the Minister of Justice—that there was no riot squad or riot drill. I am very glad to learn that the Royal Canadian Mounted police are not engaged in bayonet drill. Undoubtedly however we have other forces engaged in bayonet drill, which are ready at any time to repress disorders in Canada. I know it is necessary to maintain peace, order and good government in this country; otherwise civilized life would become impossible. I protest however that this is not the way to bring about peace, order and good government. We have what might be termed a law-abiding people. I cannot very well conceive of an exhibition of greater patience than has been shown by our people during this last year or two in the face of very great hardships. I think it is an insult to them to have it said at Geneva—although it was said perhaps with the very good purpose of trying to show how small our armament was and how much we were in favour of general world peace—I submit it is no less than an insult to say that we spend millions of dollars a year in order to keep up a force to maintain order in this country. I would urge that instead of these large amounts being spent in this way on military equipment and the maintenance of a military force, we spend a little bit more in helping our people in this time of stress. It is not merely the labour people whom I have been trying to represent specially in this house, but tens of thousands of other citizens who cannot understand why this government should go on adopting these repressive measures and failing to introduce constructive measures to relieve the prevailing distress. I think I am fair in asking the minister responsible: Was the Minister of Justice correct in stating—perhaps that is an awkward question to put, and I do not intend it in any nasty way—

The CHAIRMAN: It is six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Salaries, including appointment of Miss M. Guthrie, B.A., as a secretary to executive, at $1,980, $412,542; contingencies, $38,000 inspector general of banks—salaries and contingencies, $23,340.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Even a number of our banks are now feeling the necessity of having trained economists on their staff. Is there any thought at all that the Dominion government will some time have a man regularly equipped for the purpose as adviser to the Finance department?

Mr. RHODES: I can only say that from the knowledge and experience I have acquired in the limited time I have been in the department I think the country is extremely well served in the character and ability of the permanent officials of the Department of Finance with whom I have come in contact. They are men singularly well informed and unusually devoted to their duties. They are there on all occasions, putting in long hours without reference to either clock or calendar. They are always on service, and I must say that I take delight in this opportunity of paying tribute to the quality of their service and the spirit in which they serve.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What I had in mind was a little different from what the minister seems to have in his mind. I am not in any way suggesting that the employees of the Finance department are not faithful and capable men. What I do suggest is that we are faced with a very difficult situation to-day. Everyone recognizes that a great many of the older methods of conducting public finance are not altogether suitable to the present needs. Anyone who has kept at all in touch with the discussions which have been going on in England in the last few years, or with those that have been going on between bankers on the continent or at Geneva, must recognize that a great many governmental people are alive to the need for very close study of the entire economic situation. I take it that the very fact that the men in the department are working long hours and are quite efficient in dealing with the ordinary routine business explains why they are precluded from giving that study which somebody ought to give to the larger economic affairs of the country. My thought was that if even a bank finds it necessary, or at any rate advisable, to have at least one economist on its staff, it might be well that the Finance department of this country should undertake to engage at least one trained economist on its staff who could devote himself to a study of the general economic situation as it exists to-day, and to a study also of some of the proposals which are put forward from time to time for the improvement of conditions. In this house we have taken up the question of inflation as a possible method of correcting some of the evils with which we are faced at the present time, and from time to time there has been a suggestion that we ought to stabilize our currency. I do not know that we have anyone in the department who is able to devote himself to a study of this kind of thing. If we are to develop into the position where at some time we shall have a central bank, and if we are not only going to carry out a system of rediscounting but going into open market transactions, it seems to me it would be very essential to have somebody who would be able to advise as to possible extensions for modifications of the Finance Act with respect to the best means by which we could possibly adopt a system of central banking. It is only a year from now until the Bank Act comes up in due course for revision, and I have no doubt a great many proposals will be made then. It seems to me, therefore, that instead of waiting for pressure from outside, it would be a good thing for the department to engage its own experts. If we cannot obtain them in Canada, let us go elsewhere; but I suggest that the department should have experts who would be able to devote special attention to the new needs which are arising at the present time.

Mr. RHODES: If we got into the realm of banking, finance, currency and that sort of thing, it would be difficult for one to place one's finger on any particular individual who would be regarded as expert, to the exclusion of others. As a matter of fact, there are as many different points of view as there are individuals who make a study of the subject. Without minimizing the suggestion offered by my hon. friend, may I say to him that if it transpires, in the judgment of the government, that the staff of the Department of Finance, as it at present exists, requires enlargement, so far as I am concerned, I shall be one of the first to give heed to what he has said.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister will understand, I think, that if there is some difficulty in obtaining from the realm of experts men who would be able to advise, it is much more difficult, surely, for the minister, however capable he may be, to bring to the task that specialized knowledge which I suggest is necessary.

Mr. RHODES: There is no one more ready than the minister himself to admit very freely his limitation in all the spheres to which the hon. gentleman refers.

Mr. SANDERSON: I take it we are dealing with item 7 on page 8 of the estimates, which covers salaries and contingencies of the department of the inspector general of banks. I notice that there is a decrease of $6,600 in this item, and I should like to know how this decrease is made up and just what the duties are of the inspector general of banks and his officials.

Mr. RHODES: I would refer my hon. friend to section 56 of the Bank Act, which outlines fully the duties of the inspector general of banks.

Mr. SANDERSON: That does not give me very much information. Surely the minister can tell me in a few words just what are the duties of this official.

Mr. RHODES: Subsection 8 of section 56 reads as follows:—

> The inspector, from time to time, but not less frequently than once in each calendar year, shall make or cause to be made, such examination and inquiry into the affairs or business of each bank as he may deem to be necessary or expedient, and for such purposes take charge of the premises of the assets of the bank or any portion thereof, if the need should arise, for the purpose of satisfying himself that the provisions of this act having reference to the safety of the creditors and shareholders of each bank are being duly observed and that the bank is in a sound financial condition, and at the conclusion of each such examination and inquiry shall report thereon to the minister.

Mr. SANDERSON: How often are the head offices of the banks visited?

Mr. RHODES: Visits are made as provided for by the act, not less than once a year, but the inspector general keeps in close contact with the banks; the frequency of his visits would be dependent upon the condition prevailing in any particular bank. Some banks might require more careful consideration than others. The frequency of inspection is governed entirely by the circumstances.

Mr. SANDERSON: During the last calendar year has the inspector general visited the head offices of all the banks in Canada?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. SANDERSON: And he has made a report to the Minister of Finance?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, he has complied with the act in every particular.

Mr. SANDERSON: Has the inspector general visited the head offices of the banks of Canada more than once during the last year?

Mr. RHODES: That is a question which I cannot answer offhand with any accuracy. I think I can safely say that the inspector general has visited the head offices of the banks in his inspectorial capacity to the fullest extent as required by the act. I know he is keeping in very close touch with the situation with respect to every one of the chartered banks of Canada.

Mr. SANDERSON: I take it that the Minister of Finance during the short time he has been in office is satisfied with the inspection made by this official and his staff?

Mr. RHODES: My answer would be in the affirmative, with the reservation that it is based upon the knowledge I have been able to glean during the limited time I have been at the head of the department. I do not wish my latter statement to minimize in the slightest my fullest confidence in the character of the inspection and of the inspector general himself.

Mr. SANDERSON: I may say I am entirely satisfied with the answer of the minister, but he has not answered my question as to how the reduction in the item is made up.

Mr. RHODES: The major portion of the reduction is due to salary deduction, and partly to the fact that an over-estimation had been made of the expenses normally required.

Mr. SANDERSON: Is the major portion due to the ten per cent cut?

Mr. RHODES: In round figures, the amount of the salary deduction is $1,600, and the balance is made up by an over-estimation of the expenses required for the office.

Mr. SANDERSON: The difference between $6,600, the amount of the reduction, and $1,600, the amount of the ten per cent cut, is $5,000. My only object in drawing this matter to the attention of the committee is to point out that in this time of stress and strain the morale of the people would not be helped by a reduction in the staff of this department. I am quite sure the committee would be willing that this staff should be maintained, or increased if necessary.

Mr. RHODES: I am quite in accord with the views expressed by the hon. member for South Perth. I think this department should be the last place in which to practise economy, if to do so would mean an impairment of its efficiency. However, I may say to my hon. friend that we have been governed entirely by the judgment of the inspector general, and I am satisfied that there will be no impairment of efficiency.

Mr. REID: Why has the interest rate on currency issued to banks been reduced from four and a half per cent to three per cent?

Mr. RHODES: It was reduced for a time, but it has since been increased. The reduction was made for several reasons, one being to conform to the discount rate in force in London and New York. The reduction had a more particular reference to the fact that at the time of the launching of the national service loan we wanted to make it as easy as possible for the banks to accommodate customers who were subscribers to the loan.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—grant to the Montreal Association for the Blind, $4,500.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not want to object to the grant in this case, but I should like to urge upon the minister that the government take some definite action with regard to providing more adequately for the blind. This is for one group. I am thinking of the larger problem which we have in Canada. The blind have petitioned again and again that they be given some sort of pension; that their special disability be recognized and that they be put on a basis where they can depend upon drawing a regular amount. I believe Manitoba has agreed to assume its share if pensions for the blind are put upon the same basis as old age pensions, and it would seem reasonable there should be an extension along this line. We have recognized in the case of the burnt-out men that they had special claims and I think, on the whole, there is no other class of people who receive greater sympathy from the public generally than the blind who are so helpless.

Mr. RHODES: I am sure we all feel sympathetic towards the blind, and I know there is not a single hon. member who would not wish to lean backward in his endeavour to make their lot easier in this life, if that were possible. So far we have been dealing with old age pensions in agreement with the provinces. I hope the time is not far removed when we shall be able to take on the burden entirely as a federal matter, and at that time, or before if the opportunity should present itself, I may say I shall be glad to give sympathetic consideration to the suggestion made by my hon. friend.

Item agreed to.

To provide for expenses of the comptroller of the treasury's office; also, when approved by treasury board, on the recommendation of the comptroller of the treasury, for unforeseen expenses and emergency expenditures in connection with the public service, a detailed list of such treasury board approvals to be laid before parliament within fifteen days of the next session, $300,000.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister explain the amount that is asked for under this appropriation?

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member will recall that we have introduced a new practice and that now we have a comptroller of the treasury. The new Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act provides, amongst other things, a system of centralized expenditure and commitment control under the jurisdiction of the comptroller of the treasury. This act came into force on April 1 last, and now all expenses in accounting offices are accountable to the comptroller of the treasury.

Mr. BROWN: Does this mean an increase in the accounting work, or is it offset by a saving?

Mr. RHODES: I cannot give my hon. friend the exact figures, but I am satisfied that the work of the comptroller of the treasury will, in the course of a year, save two or three times over the total cost of the vote for his office, not only in efficiency and more accurate control, but in various other ways. This new system will be very much to the advantage of the public treasury.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is it the intention to move all the accounting officials from the various departments?

Mr. RHODES: They have all been transferred and are under the control of the Department of Finance.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Have they actually been taken out of the various departments and placed under the comptroller of the treasury?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is the intention to have that done?

Mr. RHODES: As the circumstances require. They are all under the comptroller of the treasury, although many of them are, for the time being, remaining in their several departments; but the organization itself is now centralized directly under the comptroller of the treasury.

Mr. POULIOT: I suppose the fact that all the accounting is centralized will facilitate answers to questions?

Mr. RHODES: I think, on the whole, we have shown remarkable efficiency in answering questions and responding to returns this year.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, especially this year.

Mr. RHODES: In the history of parliament, there has been nothing comparable in number and volume with the answers and returns which have been required in the last two years, and I may say that the hon. member for Témiscouata has not been over-modest in this regard.

Mr. COOTE: Are we to understand that this appropriation is largely to pay salaries under the comptroller of the treasury?

Mr. RHODES: Largely for salaries. For example, last year we had in the main estimates an item amounting to $80,000 for unforeseen expenses; in the supplementary estimates, an item of $25,000 for administration of the Consolidated Revenue Act, and another item of $25,000, unforeseen expenses, further amount required. Then there were numerous items taken out of unforeseen expenses and emergency expenditures in different years. Those will all be lumped together in this one item for the comptroller of the treasury.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am heartily in sympathy with the move, but is it not a fact that there is still a number of accountancy officers in various departments and paid out of the civil government votes for those departments?

Mr. RHODES: As I informed my hon. friend a moment ago, many of these officers are physically in the several departments, although they are now under the control of the comptroller of the treasury. Many of them will be paid from the civil government votes for the several departments this year, but at the end of this fiscal year all these civil votes will appear under the vote for the comptroller of the treasury.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is just the information I was seeking. I was under the impression that a large number of these officers were still paid out of the civil government votes of the several departments in which they are stationed. But after this year all these officers will be paid out of this vote?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. COOTE: I should like to put two or three questions to the minister with reference to the national service loan. Was it sold to investment houses, and if so, at what price? What commission was given to them for handling it?

Mr. RHODES: The national service loan was handled by a voluntary committee located in Montreal, under the chairmanship of Sir Charles Gordon, president of the Bank of Montreal. Their services were entirely voluntary and no salaries were paid, not even expenses for that matter. The loan was sold only to the individual subscribers. There was no sale other than to those who purchased the bonds.

Mr. COOTE: I should like to know whether the government got the same price as the public paid. There is usually commission paid to somebody for floating these loans, and I was anxious to know at what price the loan was sold to the public and what rate the government got.

Mr. RHODES: The banks and recognized dealers received a commission of three-quarters of one per cent. That covered the whole cost of their services.

Mr. SANDERSON: What did the total cost of that commission amount to, computed at three-quarters of one per cent?

Mr. RHODES: I will give my hon. friend the exact figures:

Commission to the banks, $979,638.21; commission to the dealers, $819,468.50; cost of the bonds, $72,964.08; express, $24,962.73; interim certificates, $12,594.40; insurance, $75.74; office contingencies, $25; plates, $13,378.64; postage, $1,716.24; printing and stationery, $13,012.85; publicity, $80,077.96; salaries, $14,204.66; sundries, $36.85; telephone, $211.14; travelling expenses, $807.17.—Total, $2,033,174.17.

Mr. SANDERSON: The commission paid to the banks was $900,000 odd, and to the dealers $800,000 odd. Is that right?

Mr. RHODES: Yes. The commission was in proportion to the amount they respectively sold.

Mr. SANDERSON: And the commission totalled $1,700,000 odd?

Mr. RHODES: It totalled $1,799,000 odd.

Mr. COOTE: What was the total of the bonds sold and the net amount which the government received?

Mr. RHODES: $221,198,200.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is $80,000 all that was spent on advertising by the government and by the committee?

Mr. RHODES: That is all we paid for. The banks and the bond dealers bore their expenses out of their commission.

Mr. SPENCER: I take it that the small committee were the only people who gave their services—nobody else?

Mr. RHODES: Quite so.

Mr. COOTE: Will the minister be good enough to tell me the amount of the bonds actually sold, that is the face value of the bonds, and the net amount received by the government? The minister stated that the total of the national service loan was $221,000,000 odd. Was that the face value of the bonds or the net amount received by the government?

Mr. RHODES: I am sorry I have not the computation before me, but if my hon. friend will subtract $2,033,174.17 from $221,198,200 he will have the amount of money that came to the treasury.

Mr. COOTE: $221,000,000 odd is the amount of the bonds sold?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, less the commissions I have mentioned.

Mr. SPENCER: Did the bond dealers and banks have exactly the same opportunities for selling these bonds?

Mr. RHODES: So far as I know, yes.

Mr. SPENCER: And the same commission?

Mr. RHODES: Precisely.

Mr. SPENCER: No special list for either the bond dealers or the banks?

Mr. RHODES: No, they had equal opportunity.

Mr. COOTE: Would it not be possible to get from the department a statement of the bond dealers that received this commission of $819,000 odd?

Mr. RHODES: Yes. I shall be very glad to get that information for my hon. friend as soon as I possibly can.

Mr. SANDERSON: Would the minister also get the commissions paid to the different banks?

Mr. RHODES: Quite so. My recollection is that those figures have been published, but that does not make any difference. I will see that my hon. friend from Macleod and my hon. friend from South Perth get the information they desire.

Mr. COOTE: I appreciate the action of the Finance minister in giving us this information. I did not know that his estimates were coming up at eight o'clock and I was a few minutes late in coming in. Would he be willing to give us a little information in regard to the gold withdrawals which took place last year between September 21 and October 19, when the order in council was issued prohibiting the export of gold, and also state what measures were taken to preserve our gold supply during that time?

Mr. RHODES: Certainly. If my hon. friend will be good enough to send me a note I shall endeavour to give him that information to-morrow.

Mr. COOTE: This is information which the public has expressed a desire to have. If the minister would give us that information to-night, I would appreciate it.

Mr. RHODES: I cannot possibly do that.

Mr. COOTE: If the minister is not in a position to do it—

Mr. RHODES: I cannot possibly do it to-night, but as soon as I reach my office to-morrow I shall try to get it.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the administration of the Royal Canadian Mint, including salaries, contingencies, retiring and other allowances, and general expenses, $182,400.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister please explain the increase?

Mr. VENIOT: Would the minister agree to let item 247 stand?

Mr. RHODES: Certainly.

Mr. VENIOT: There is a resolution on the order paper under which this subject might be discussed.

Mr. RHODES: Certainly.

Item stands.

To provide for salaries and expenses of the tariff board. Payments may be made notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act or regulations thereunder, $120,000.

Mr. YOUNG: Is this a revote?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is that board?

Mr. RHODES: I hope ere long my right hon. friend will see the board in operation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Can the minister tell us exactly why the board has not been appointed up to the present time?

Mr. RHODES: That is a very difficult question to answer in specific terms. I am exceedingly anxious, however, that the board be set up at an early date.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is nothing left for it to do now.

Mr. RHODES: Oh yes, there is.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I can see no need for the board, especially in view of the system of the present government in regard to tariffs. They make tariffs overnight, and no tariff board is necessary.

Mr. RHODES: I should think my hon. friends would be most anxious to have the board set up, so that it may help them to steady the government, and prevent it from doing any more mischief.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I should be only too glad to have it, if that end could be accomplished.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand the board has power to deal with only such matters as the government may refer to it. That is my recollection of the legislation.

Mr. RHODES: I cannot say, offhand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe the minister will find that to be correct.

Mr. COOTE: Will the government make use of the tariff board before bringing down any further increases in the tariff?

Mr. RHODES: I should not like to commit the government categorically to an undertaking of that character. I am sure the government will utilize the services of the board to the fullest possible extent, compatible with public service.

Mr. BROWN: I am wondering if the ten per cent reduction will apply to the salaries of the tariff board appointees?

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, we have not any salaries with which to deal, so far. I do not wish to argue upon hypothetical questions, because I find it difficult enough to answer the real ones.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is there any possibility of this board being appointed bebore the Imperial economic conference?

Mr. RHODES: I would say, yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A possibility?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A probability?

Mr. RHODES: I think so—but that is as far as I can say.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A certainty?

Mr. RHODES: I would not say that. I would not say definitely that there is a probability.

Item agreed to.

Loan to harbour commissioners of Montreal with interest at a rate to be fixed by the governor in council, for such period and upon such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine, and to be applied in payment of deficits resulting from the operations of the Montreal harbour bridge, $528,500.

Mr. VENIOT: I should like to ask a question which may come under the Department of Marine. Has the harbour commission for the port of Saint John made application this year for authority to go on with further work? Perhaps I had better leave the question until a later time.

Mr. RHODES: I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend an accurate answer.

Mr. VENIOT: All right.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend knows that the vote which was provided by parliament last year, following the disastrous fire, was very substantial. Speaking from memory my impression is that a great part of that vote is still unused. At the moment I know of no application from the harbour board which has not been dealt with. I believe my hon. friend would do well to ask that question of the Minister of Marine.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There are deficits resulting from the operation of the Montreal harbour bridge. We have known of the enormous amounts that the bridge has cost, over and above the original estimate. I think it is common knowledge that things are in a very unsatisfactory condition generally. I should like to ask the minister if the government has considered the desirability of having some sort of commission or committee investigate this whole affair before continuing to loan large sums of money to the Montreal harbour commissioners. I do not wish more boards of inquiry travelling around the country than are necessary, but this is a matter which ought to be straightened out, and it might very well have been done at this session. I would urge that the minister take into consideration the necessity of cleaning up the whole matter and letting the public know at least something about where their money has gone in the last few years.

Mr. RHODES: The question whether or not there ought to be a royal commission of investigation into the affairs of the Montreal harbour bridge is one entirely apart from the question whether or not we should meet our statutory obligations. In conjunction with the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal in proportion to their share of commitments, we must comply with the act of parliament providing for any deficiences which may arise between receipts and expenditures, as a result of the guarantee of securities in respect of that undertaking. As my hon. friend knows, we have already been called upon, by reason of our guarantee, to make good the deficit, as have also the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal. The direct question whether there will or will not be a commission of inquiry is one which at the moment I am not in a position to answer.

Mr. GARDINER: Would the minister be good enough to give the information as to the various items which go to make up this item?

Mr. RHODES: Certainly. This appropriation is for the amount which it is estimated the revenue of the Montreal harbour bridge will fall short of the interest payable up to and including November 1, 1932. As my hon. friend knows that is on an issue of some $19,000,000 of harbour commissioners' bonds guaranteed by the dominion, and issued for the capital cost of the bridge. The estimate is made up as follows: The annual interest on $19,000,000 dominion guaranteed five per cent bonds is $950,000, less current cash, $18,600. Surplus, operating revenues over operating expenses, $245,400; contributions from province and city under agreement, $300,000, making a total of $564,000, which deducted from the sum first mentioned leaves $386,000. Then we must add the estimated cost of exchange on the $950,000 interest payable in New York. This estimate has been made up on a fifteen per cent basis. This of course can be only a computation. We cannot tell from day to day or week to week what the premium may be upon funds in New York.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): How much will it amount to?

Mr. RHODES: It will be $142,500, but to the extent that is enlarged or diminished, to that extent will it be greater or smaller.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): So if exchange were at par you would actually have a deduction of about $145,000?

Mr. RHODES: Yes; at par the figure would be $386,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does that mean the bridge at the moment falls short of earning operating expenses and interest to the extent of nearly $900,000?

Mr. RHODES: No. The operating revenue over operating expenses is $245,400. If the hon. gentleman will subtract that figure he will get the deficit, because, as he has recalled, $300,000 of this is made up of contributions by the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal by virtue of their guarantees.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then the deficit is between $600,000 and $700,000, with the city and the province contributing?

Mr. RHODES: In round figures.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): So far as the actual deficit after applying the surplus over operation and maintenance is concerned, you say it is $900,000?

Mr. RHODES: I have just told my hon. friend that the fixed charges amount to $950,000. That is not taking into consideration the question of premium upon American funds. The actual operating revenue in excess of operating expenses at the moment is $245,400. If he will just subtract one from the other he will find the answer to his question.

Mr. GARDINER: How much of this $300,000 are the province and the city contributing; and what is the amount of their respective guarantees?

Mr. RHODES: The province of Quebec and the city of Montreal are each obligated to the extent of payment of interest amounting to $150,000 a year. The guarantee of the dominion is for the excess.

Mr. COOTE: Is all the amount asked for here?

Mr. RHODES: As the Prime Minister points out, we cannot escape our guarantee. In other words, if the province and the city fail to implement their respective guarantees, we would be obligated for the whole; but inasmuch as the province and the city are meeting their obligations, we pay the excess.

Mr. COOTE: Is it expected to take $528,000 to pay our share of the guarantee?

Mr. RHODES: Our share of the guarantee at the moment, according to our estimate, is $386,000, but the excess making the figure $528,000 arises out of the premium on New York funds. That is all over and above the amount of the guarantees provided by the province and the city.

Mr. GARDINER: What are the respective contributions by the province, the city and the dominion? And what will be the percentage of any losses to be borne by them respectively?

Mr. RHODES: Under the agreement entered into by the commissioners with the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal, the province and the city have each agreed to pay one-third of the annual deficit up to $450,000 for forty years; that is a maximum of $300,000 a year.

Mr. SPENCER: If the deficit was greater than $300,000 they would not pay more than one-third of their maximum commitment?

Mr. RHODES: Quite so.

Mr. COOTE: What was the estimated cost in the first place, and what the actual capital cost?

Mr. RHODES: The capital cost of the bridge to December 31st, 1931, was $18,639,263. I do not know what figure was stated as being the estimated cost so far as this parliament is concerned, because I was not here and have not refreshed my mind on the point. However, I find that in the preamble of the legislation passed by the Quebec legislature in 1926, in virtue of which the province gave its guarantee, the estimated cost of construction was given as $10,000,000.

Mr. COOTE: What is the exact amount of the bonds outstanding on account of this bridge; is it the same as the capital cost?

Mr. RHODES: It is $19,000,000.

Mr. COOTE: And the rate of interest?

Mr. RHODES: Five per cent, payable half yearly.

Mr. COOTE: Were the bonds sold at par?

Mr. RHODES: I have not that information before me, but I am advised that not only did they sell at par; a portion of the last issue sold at a small premium.

Mr. GARDINER: What was the total contribution by the dominion to the cost of the bridge?

Mr. RHODES: There is no contribution at all towards the cost of the bridge, only the guarantee. Has my hon. friend in mind how much money we have paid in virtue of our guarantee?

Mr. GARDINER: What is the total amount that we will be obligated for by virtue of our guarantee?

Mr. RHODES: We are obligated upon the whole issue of $19,000,000.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the total for the guarantees by the province and the city?

Mr. RHODES: The city of Montreal and the province of Quebec have agreed to guarantee the interest so far as there may be a deficit in earnings to the maximum amount of $300,000 per year.

Mr. GARDINER: Some weeks ago I put certain questions on the order paper, and these were passed as orders for returns. I do not wish to ask the minister to hold this item up until such time as that information is tabled, but I should like to get it at the earliest possible date. I would support the suggestion of the member for Winnipeg North Centre that a very thorough investigation be made into the whole question of this excess expenditure. I think this information is due to the house and to the country.

Mr. RHODES: The delay in responding to the orders for returns is due entirely to the circumstance that we are dependent upon the harbour commissioners of Montreal, from whom we must expect the information to be able to give a satisfactory response to the motion made by my hon. friend. I am sure the Minister of Marine will only be too happy to endeavour to have the harbour commission expedite the forwarding of the information. I do not desire to press this item; if my hon. friend wishes it to stand I am quite content, but I understand that the information I am giving him now is correct as to why the return has not been tabled.

Mr. GARDINER: Who audits the accounts of the harbour commission?

Mr. RHODES: The books of the Montreal harbour commission are audited by their own auditors. Of course, we have a right to send in our auditors to check up the accounts of the commission.

Mr. GARDINER: When the legislation dealing with the Montreal and other harbour commissioners was being put through the former Minister of Finance informed the house that the audit board had jurisdiction to audit their accounts. Has the board made any investigation into the accounts of the Montreal harbour commission?

Mr. RHODES: I am informed that the board, some two years ago, made an audit of the accounts of the Montreal harbour commission at the instance of the then Minister of Finance. So far as I know, there has been no government audit since that time. I may add that an audit has since been made by Price, Waterhouse & Company.

Mr. GARDINER: Is any information available to the house regarding the results of any audit, either by the audit board or by Price, Waterhouse & Company?

Mr. RHODES: I am not personally familiar with the matter to the extent of being able to give my hon. friend information of my own knowledge, but as I understand it, the audit of Price, Waterhouse & Company disclosed that the accounts were in order. There are audits and audits, but so far as the accounts themselves were concerned, the audit in question disclosed that they were in order. I have no doubt that a copy of the report could be obtained for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. GARDINER: Is that all the information the minister can give—that the accounts were in order?

Mr. RHODES: That is all I can give at the moment, because I have not seen either the accounts or the report itself.

Mr. GARDINER: Has it ever been determined why there was such a tremendous increase in the cost of the bridge in comparison with the estimates?

Mr. RHODES: I have no knowledge of the matter, either officially or personally. It has been intimated to me that the bridge was made considerably heavier and the amount of metal that went into it was greater than contemplated when the original estimates were prepared. I only pass on that limited amount of information for what it is worth.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the attitude of the government towards this question? Has the government made a real effort to discover why the bridge cost so much more than was originally expected?

Mr. BENNETT: I was Minister of Finance during the period to which the hon. gentleman refers. Price, Waterhouse & Company were asked to make a report, which they did, and it indicates that from the books of the commission it was apparent that the vouchers were there for the expenditures that had been made, not in detail, but for the purpose of enabling them to certify that sums had been expended as received. That is as far as it went. As to why the structure cost the additional sum beyond the original estimate, there is no definite information before this house, and, frankly, I can see great difficulties in obtaining it in detail. It is not difficult to obtain this information, for instance, that the inspection cost several hundred thousand dollars. One of the inspectors was a gentleman who resided in Chicago and who visited the property twice; the voucher was there for the money he received. That is what I mean when I say that the report was vindicated.

Mr. GARDINER: I have this last question. Will the government make an effort to inquire into this matter?—because it is really a question that should be looked into, and the reasons should be made known if reasons can be found.

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to that, two gentlemen who could contribute largely to information in that regard are dead, if not a third. That fact has been apparent for some time. There is, however, shall I say, a possibility of information being obtained as to why, in one branch of the work, so much more money was spent than anticipated. But even in that regard I cannot speak with any degree of certainty. I received the report—I was in the Finance department—and it is in the hands of the Marine department, to which it is addressed, the Minister of Marine being the minister responsible for the commission. But nothing short of an inquiry that goes far beyond the question of the mere production of vouchers for debits and credits would in any sense answer the question asked by the hon. gentleman, and certainly it is not a matter that could be easily answered affirmatively or negatively at the present time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not like to press the question I asked a little while ago, before the Prime Minister came in, but I do urge that in view of the tremendous amounts involved and the heavy burden on the people of Canada, we have some right to have a further inquiry into this matter. I cannot quite think that in a matter of this kind our knowledge must be entirely dependent upon one or two men who may be dead. It seems to me that if a proper inquiry were instituted, information could be obtained. Rather than the Dominion government and the people of Canada having to carry this enormous burden, which apparently we shall have to shoulder from now on, it seems to me that we have a right to have the situation cleared up. I would point out to the Prime Minister that there is a good deal of feeling throughout the country with regard to this matter, and since there have been a large number of other investigations, it is considered very generally that this matter ought to be investigated. The present government is in a good position to carry out the investigation.

Mr. BENNETT: Possibly the hon. gentleman would say that I would not be loath to conduct an investigation. But one does not desire to conduct investigations merely for the purpose of mud-slinging if it serves no useful public purpose. Now this is the fact. The Dominion has guaranteed interest on $19,000,000 worth of bonds and payment of their principal, and these securities are held largely in the United States of America. The coupons are presented in New York every six months for payment. Practically the whole of them come in, as the hon. gentleman can readily understand, through New York offices, the principal and interest being both payable in United States funds. Whether we like it or not, that interest must be met every six months, because a default in that regard is a default of this country whose guarantee is endorsed upon the coupons of the bonds. The operating revenue of the bridge should increase with the increasing growth of Montreal, and it is also not improbable that by reason of the provision for a tramway to cross the bridge there will be some added revenue. At the present moment a bus service operates on the bridge and it is intended to extend the tramway. As I understand it, that is the position at the moment.

The explanation given for the increased cost is twofold. First, the acquisition of large blocks of real estate for the approaches to the structure was made at a greater cost than was anticipated and, second, it was necessary to use heavier steel than was anticipated. I understand that the weight of metal absorbed in the construction of this bridge was several hundred tons more than was originally estimated.

An hon. MEMBER: Hundreds of thousands.

Mr. BENNETT: I understood it was hundreds of thousands of pounds or thousands of tons. The costs of fabrication, of inspection and legal expenses were much greater than was at first expected.

If my memory serves me correctly, the last bonds were not sold until 1930, and the price obtained was over par; they had been deposited as security and then they were sold with the guarantee of this country at a time when bonds were commanding very excellent prices. I say frankly to the hon. gentleman that if, as and when there is any likelihood of the exact causes of the greatly increased price becoming known by any reasonable investigation, that investigation will be made. However, it must be realized that this is a most difficult thing to do, especially when there are produced vouchers for weights of metal and explanations are forthcoming as to why the cost per pound was greater than anticipated. A special make of steel was needed in the construction of the heavy members of the bridge. All this information is contained in the report made by Price, Waterhouse & Company, who stated that beyond that they, as auditors, could not go.

Mr. COOTE: Has the minister an auditor's statement to show that this is the correct amount of the deficit on the operation of the bridge and, if so, who were the auditors?

Mr. RHODES: I am sorry I have not that information at hand, but I shall be glad to obtain it for my hon. friend.

Mr. COOTE: Does not the minister think that he should have an auditor's statement before he advances this money? We should be sure that we are not paying any more than we are called upon to pay by the terms of the guarantee.

Mr. RHODES: I agree that it is incumbent upon the Department of Finance to make sure that the accounts are correct before payment is made.

Mr. BENNETT: I may say to the hon. member for Macleod that when payments are made the coupons are actually taken over by the government to form part of the assets which we hold for some future occasion, they constitute a charge against the undertaking.

Mr. COOTE: The point I was presenting to the minister was that we should ascertain the actual deficit on the bridge.

Mr. BENNETT: That is done by the harbour commission.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If I remember correctly, an estimate was made of the expected traffic across the bridge, and it strikes me that $245,000 is not much below what should be expected at this stage in the history of the structure. If I remember correctly the estimate for 1932 was $500,000, and that was why the city of Montreal and the province of Quebec came forward with their guarantees.

Mr. RHODES: The estimate made before construction was that the annual revenue from the bridge would be $250,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That was for the first year, but it should increase.

Mr. RHODES: That called for a contribution from the city of Montreal of $116,666, and a like contribution from the province of Quebec and from the commission itself. As my hon. friend knows, the commission has not been able to implement its guarantee.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is only natural that there should be a considerable diminution in the traffic, as there has been in all projects of this character.

Mr. CAHAN: The approaches to the bridge on the other side of the river from Montreal are a provincial work. Their construction has been delayed in such a manner that the traffic which ordinarily would be expected to use the bridge has not found it convenient to do so.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That was my information.

Mr. RHODES: I have no information before me which would answer the question asked by the hon. member for West Edmonton.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If I remember correctly, it was expected that in 1932 the bridge would earn something like $500,000 in tolls. Last year it earned $245,000 but, as my hon. friend has pointed out, more traffic would have used the bridge had it been in position to receive it.

Mr. SPENCER: I do not think the figures given by the minister are quite satisfactory to the committee. When the Prime Minister was leader of the opposition I remember his drawing the attention of the house to the vast amount of money spent on this bridge. I understand the first estimate was that it would cost some $6,000,000, and the amount eventually rose to $19,000,000. When the Prime Minister first took over his present office he again drew the attention of the house to this extraordinary expenditure, and I was in hopes that an investigation of some sort would be made into this matter. It seems to me that the reasons given for not holding an investigation are not as satisfactory as they should be. It has been said that three men who might have given some information with regard to this bridge have died, but that does not seem to me to be a good reason why we should not be able to find out where this great expenditure has gone. The Department of Finance has the right to send in auditors to check up, and this information should be available for the benefit of the committee. The Prime Minister has said that a special steel was needed for this bridge, but surely any engineer capable of being put in charge of a huge undertaking like this should have known the kind of steel that would be required, before the first estimates were made. Such an engineer might have been forgiven for being out a million or two, but there is no excuse for an increase from $6,000,000 to $19,000,000. Even if everything is above board, surely those who have made such huge mistakes and have cost the country so much should be penalized for their bad judgment.

Mr. BENNETT: I omitted to mention that a considerable sum was absorbed in interest during construction. Shortly after this government came into power we asked Price, Waterhouse & Company to make a report. I think it is in the office of the Minister of Marine. I believe we can get it and lay it on the table. It will show anyway how the sum of $19,000,000 was reached.

Mr. SPENCER: No doubt the Prime Minister has looked over that report. I should like to ask him if, in the light of his own great ability, he is satisfied, from reading the report, with the way in which the money was spent.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not satisfied that $19,000,000 should have been spent for a structure that was estimated to cost $6,000,000, and I have endeavoured in years past to secure what I conceived to be an adequate explanation. I have no adequate explanation. I answer the hon. gentleman's question just as he asked it, and as frankly as he asked it.

Mr. SPENCER: Is the Prime Minister satisfied to let the matter rest there, or does he intend to try to find out more?

Mr. BENNETT: He has already said what he is trying to do.

Mr. MITCHELL: In the $19,000,000, what was the relative amount spent on real estate and that spent on the bridge itself? Was the contract let on the cost plus basis of the construction?

Mr. BENNETT: As to the first question. I would not trust my memory to give the answer. The document which I shall endeavour to have brought down will give that.

Mr. MITCHELL: Can the right hon. gentleman give the approximate cost?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not care to trust my memory. The auditors' report will show exactly what was spent for real estate and the cost of the bridge. On the second point, the commissioners themselves acquired the real estate, but they let a contract for the construction of the metal.

Mr. RHODES: I have the details covering some thirty or more items which go to make up the cost of $18,639,000. I do not know whether the committee desires that I should read them or not, but if necessary I shall do so.

Mr. MITCHELL: What we are entitled to is an idea of the original estimate, the cost of the real estate and of the building of the bridge. Then we would be able to compare that with the amount expended on real estate and on the bridge in the $19,000,000.

Mr. RHODES: As I have already stated, I have no record of the original estimate. The figure named in the preamble to the Quebec act was $10,000,000. What the figure was which was stated in the house, I cannot say.

Mr. BENNETT: Hansard says $6,000,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The sum of $6,000,000 was not the estimated cost of the bridge, but the amount which the government was committed to originally in the guarantee.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Meighen asked how much the bridge would cost, and the hon. member for Richelieu said "six million."

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not know how he could have mentioned that amount. There is no need to send for Hansard. There is no doubt that the bridge was to cost $10,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Quebec put it at $10,000,000.

Mr. CAHAN: I know something about the bridge. As a representative of a Montreal constituency, I have taken considerable interest in the matter. The bridge as constructed is entirely different, so far as its proportions, supports and expenditures are concerned, from the one originally contemplated. The pillars upon which the bridge rests are very much larger and more expensive, and the steel in it runs to hundreds, even thousands of tons more than originally planned. I have been told that the cost of the steel alone was between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000 beyond what was first contemplated. I took the trouble to ask the auditors—I suppose I had no right to do so—with regard to the audit and they said that there was not a single expenditure for which the voucher was missing in the audit. Every voucher was there, showing in the aggregate the cost of the bridge as reported. If you wish an investigation, it is not one by auditors, because everything is in order to satisfy the most careful audit possible. The question is whether some of those expenditures in connection with real estate and otherwise, were simulated or not, if I may use that term, but I have made personal inquiry, not as a member of government, and I have not so far found the slightest fact which would indicate that such is the case.

Mr. GARDINER: The statement of the Secretary of State opens up a new question altogether in so far as this bridge is concerned. His statement is to the effect that the present bridge is not to be compared with what was estimated when the legislation passed this house. He states that the piers upon which the bridge is built are much heavier and more expensive than was contemplated when the legislation passed the House of Commons and the agreement was entered into. He also states that the steel in the bridge is much greater in tonnage than the estimate. It appears to me that somebody must have been responsible for increasing the cost of the bridge. Has the government any information as to who was responsible for changing the whole structure of the bridge so that it cost $19,000,000 when, according to the hon. member for Battle River and the Prime Minister, it was estimated to cost $6,000,000?

Mr. CAHAN: It is perfectly obvious that the harbour commissioners of Montreal were responsible, subject to the oversight, such as it was, of the then Minister of Marine.

Mr. SPENCER: Did they get the consent of the then Minister of Marine?

Mr. CAHAN: I do not know the secrets of the former government, but in any case, I have no access now to the approvals given by the former Minister of Marine. But the cost of that bridge is fully vouched for. I am giving the best information I can obtain, although it is not official. I am speaking as a member of this house; as Secretary of State I have nothing to do with the bridge or the expenditures on it; but as a representative of a Montreal division, I am interested in the matter. I have made inquiries and I have no doubt that the entire expenditure is properly vouched for. Further, it is undoubted that more stable and expensive abutments than originally contemplated were put into the bridge. I am also quite satisfied every bit of that expenditure was approved by the harbour commissioners of Montreal. I would infer that the larger expenditures, when contemplated, were approved in due course by the then Minister of Marine having oversight and supervision of that.

Mr. GARDINER: Has the Secretary of State looked up the legislation which gave the harbour commission permission to build this bridge, to find out whether the then Minister of Marine had the right to increase the expenditure over the estimate to the extent done without coming to parliament? Has the Secretary of State any information in that regard?

Mr. CAHAN: At one time I was familiar with that legislation, but I have not looked into it recently and I will not trust to memory for the purpose of discussing it to-night.

Mr. BENNETT: Chapter 58 of the statutes of 1924 cover the point which the hon. gentleman is raising. Section 1 reads:

Subsection 2 of section 22 of the Montreal Harbour Commissioners Act, 1894, as amended by section 5 of chapter 24 of the statutes of 1909, is further amended by adding the following paragraph thereto:—

[Mr. Gardiner.]

"(6) (a) Build, own, maintain, manage, operate and use a bridge for general traffic including tramways across the river St. Lawrence from a point in the city of Montreal to a point on the south shore of the said river to be determined by the corporation, with all necessary or useful appurtenances or accessories."

Paragraph (b) covers the right of entry. Paragraph (c) covers the right of expropriation. Paragraph (d) refers to the right of crossings. Paragraph (e) deals with streets, highways, etc., in the absence of an agreement, the matter to be settled by the Board of Railway Commissioners. Paragraphs (f) and (g) read:

(f) The plans of such bridge shall be submitted to and approved by the governor in council before beginning the construction thereof.

(g) The corporation may, subject to the approval of the governor in council, charge and recover tolls for the use of or passage on such bridge.

Then paragraph (h) permits the corporation to receive grants and donations or grants in aid. Then paragraph (i) reads:

The corporation may, for the above purposes, and from time to time, borrow money or issue and sell or pledge bonds for such amounts, at such rate of interest and on such terms and conditions as it may determine, and it may secure such bonds or loans by a mortgage or hypothec on the said bridge and by a charge on the tolls and revenues thereof.

Section 2 reads as follows:

Any such loans or bonds shall as to form, terms and amount be subject to the approval of the governor in council, and the said securities or bonds may in whole or in part as to principal, interest or both be guaranteed by His Majesty. Any such gurantee may be in such form and on such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine, and may be signed by the Minister or Acting Minister of Finance on behalf of His Majesty.

I think that answers the questions the hon. gentleman asked.

Mr. VENIOT: Under the first estimate it was not contemplated that a tramway would cross the bridge.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh yes. I will get the Hansard.

Mr. MITCHELL: Who were the Montreal harbour commissioners in 1924?

Mr. RHODES: I have no record before me indicating who the commissioners were at that time.

Mr. MITCHELL: Perhaps the deputy minister may have a record of it.

Mr. RHODES: No, my hon. friend will appreciate that as Minister of Finance my duty is prescribed by the statute, and I am conforming to it. I did not contemplate that I would be called upon as Minister of Finance to furnish all the information which has been sought to-night—not that I am complaining that it has been sought.

Mr. SPENCER: Might we direct the question to the Minister of Marine?

Mr. MITCHELL: I should like to get some details about the land that was purchased by the Montreal harbour commission.

Mr. RHODES: I started a while ago to give the items making up the total cost of the bridge, but the current of the discussion was deflected. The details I have before me are as follows:

This is the statement as verified by the auditors Clarkson, McDonald, Currie and Company.

Mr. SPENCER: I appreciate the fact that the minister has not been in office many months and cannot be expected to know the names of all the Montreal harbour commissioners. I should like to know, however, if he will be kind enough to get those names, covering the period from the time the matter was first discussed in the House of Commons until the present.

Mr. RHODES: That is to say, the hon. member wishes the names of the commissioners from the time the bill was first introduced in the house?

Mr. SPENCER: Yes.

Mr. RHODES: I shall be very glad to get them.

Mr. MITCHELL: May we also have information as to how the land was procured, and the names of the parties involved in the transaction.

Mr. RHODES: I cannot do that.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know something about municipal politics, and about buying land. The minister said something about the enormous price paid, and I would like to know why the amount climbed so rapidly from $6,000,000 to $18,000,000.

Mr. RHODES: There would be nothing on record in my department which would enable me to answer the question, I am sorry to say.

Mr. SPENCER: Is there any item in the estimates of the Minister of Marine in connection with which some of these questions might be answered?

Mr. BENNETT: My memory is that there is an item in the supplementaries which will afford an opportunity for discussion.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I think the point raised by the hon. member for Acadia should not be disregarded. There is a responsbility on the commissioners, or some body, for changing the plans of the bridge after the legislation passed this house. If there is to be an item in the estimates under which a discussion can take place I would suggest that the minister get the information and let us have it at that time. If the discussion arises under the estimates of the Minister of Marine, the information should be available to hon. members. When we pass legislation empowering a commission to go ahead on a public work, and afterwards the commission alters the plans, we are dealing with a serious condition. The Secretary of State has pointed out that this is no case to be investigated by auditors; I think it should be investigated by engineers.

Mr. BENNETT: I am told I am in error as to there being a further item in the supplementaries. I think however that I can answer the question of the hon. member for East Hamilton. The real estate was taken in the name of a clerk in the office of the solicitors for the corporation. My memory is that when we came into power it was still standing in the name of that clerk. The consideration was expressed to be one dollar, and other valuable considerations. It was impossible to ascertain the exact sum paid. I believe that is the information the hon. member wanted, although his question was not very clear.

Item agreed to.

To provide, subject to the approval of the treasury board, for salaries, reclassifications and increases, $500,000.

Mr. COOTE: What salaries are being provided for under this vote?

Mr. RHODES: This is a continuation of a similar vote which has appeared in the estimates in all previous years. It is to provide for salaries and increases for which provision has not been made elsewhere in the estimates. This year the item is larger than it has been in previous years, due to the fact that departments have been cut down to the limit.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the expenses of work in the interests of fire prevention to be carried on by the Department of Insurance, $9,300.

Mr. CAYLEY: I notice this item has been reduced by several hundred dollars. In my view this is a very important work, and I should like to know whether the minister is going to curtail it.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. RHODES: There is no staff reduction. This item has held fairly steadily throughout the years. There is some reduction this year because of salary cuts, but that is the only difference.

Mr. CAYLEY: This is the department in charge of the reduction of fire waste in the dominion, which has reached a tremendous proportion. There is one source of fire waste, especially in the farming communities, which is causing considerable anxiety. I think through the medium of this department and the Dominion Fire Prevention Association, which I believe is in close touch with the department, that something might be done with the cooperation of the national research laboratories. I shall take a few moments of the time of the committee to give some figures concerning spontaneous combustion on farms.

Fires reported to have occurred from spontaneous combustion appear to be increasing in number. Their annual distribution was as follows:

Year	Fires reported
1921	302
1922	364
1923	283
1924	326
1925	218
1926	286
1927	394
1928	253
1929	475
1931 (nine months)	387

Fires from spontaneous combustion represented twelve per cent of the total number of barn fires and occasioned a property loss of $9,080,642, or fourteen per cent of the total loss in farm barns. What proportion of the fires arising from unascertained causes might properly be charged to spontaneous combustion is problematical. That many fires of unknown origin do arise from this cause is indicated by analysis of the fires occurring from month to month during the entire period. The months during which hay and other produce is newly stored in farm barns are the months when the most frequent outbreaks occur, as these figures demonstrate:

Month—	Percentage of total number of barn fires
January	2.3
February	2.2
March	2.4
April	4.1
May	5.4
June	7.0
July	13.5
August	16.8
September	23.1
October	10.8
November	8.4
December	4.0

From this record it is clear that more than one-half of all barn fires occur in July, August and September. In October of the present year the number of barn fires has been unprecedented and should be made the subject of special inquiry. If the conditions under which the produce was stored eliminates spontaneous combustion as a probable cause, a reasonable deduction is that market conditions may have contributed to the destruction.

I desire to bring to the attention of the minister the splendid work which is being done by the Dominion Fire Protection Association, of the executive of which I have the honour to be a member. I know that in the present financial stringency we cannot expect any increased grants, but I should like him to keep in mind that this association is doing very effective work in reduction of farm fires. Naturally this is a live question among the farmers, and I know they will be greatly pleased if the National Research Council would undertake some research work along this particular line.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend will observe that there is no curtailment in this item.

Mr. CAYLEY: Seven hundred dollars.

Mr. RHODES: It represents only salary reduction. But, with respect to his observations on fire prevention, I am in entire accord. We are losing millions of dollars every year, faulty flues and jack-knife electric wiring being responsible for many fires in farm houses and farm buildings. I speak from experience, because when I undertook the responsibility of becoming associated with the government of Nova Scotia, I had an idea that I might be of very material assistance to the rural population of that province by introducing a system of wiring inspection, but I may say I stuck my head into a hornet's nest, the very men whom I desired to assist objecting most strenuously to my proposal. I feel that a tremendous amount of work along this line can be done for the benefit of the farming community by the saving of property and in some instances of life. This item may not be large enough, but it is designed to accomplish the very object my hon. friend has in mind.

Item agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Permanent force, $4,844,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, just before the committee took recess I was making a few remarks upon this item. It seems unfortunate that the only place in which we can discuss a great many of the more important policies of the government is in connection with some one item of this character. Now that the disarmament conference is at work in Geneva and we have subscribed to the Kellogg pact for the renunciation of war as an instrument of policy, it is high time we should reconsider the whole military policy of this country. It is unfortunate that from year to year we take it for granted that we are to go on in the same old way. I know that on various occasions there have been expressions of opinion that we desire the world should disarm, that all the other nations should disarm, and yet we ourselves are taking no steps along this line.

An hon. MEMBER: There are no steps to take.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: One hon. gentleman suggests there are no steps to take. So long as we have items of this character there are certain steps we can take. We in Canada are in a peculiarly favourable position to carry forward a further measure of disarmament. We have confessedly no foes immediately at our gates. As far as we can see we stand in no danger of invasion. We have been told again and again that we have nothing to fear from the east or west, from the south or north. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), whom I quoted this afternoon, took that attitude at Geneva, where he went so far as to say that the only force we have to-day is that made necessary to maintain law and order in this country. I suggested this afternoon that we were in a very desperate situation if we had to spend somewhere between $10,000,000 and $20,000,000 to maintain law and order in this country. Some time this evening I should like to find out whether the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sutherland) agrees with the Minister of Justice in this regard, whether he thinks in reality our whole military force exists solely for the purpose of maintaining law and order. I do not think he will agree with that. Then we fall back on the other plea, that we need this military force as insurance against war. It is that point which I wish to discuss for a few minutes.

While we complain of other countries being rather hypocritical in this regard, we should remember that we have certain responsibilities ourselves. Some time ago I came across in the New Leader of April 18, 1930, a fable, a sort of satire dealing with the naval conference. I will read it because I think it applies equally to the disarmament conference which is in session at the present time:

The Lion, the Eagle, the Tiger, the Crocodile and the Shark, met in conference to consider the advisability of holding preliminary conversations with a view to preparing the way for a meeting to consider the possibility of holding a conference to discuss the project of an eventual attempt to effect some limitation of teeth and claws.

The audience consisted of a Bear (who appeared to be amused) and, at some distance, a Deer and two Rabbits.

The Lion, who presided, was looking even more saintly than usual, for he had constructed a tin halo for himself which would have been still more impressive if the Tiger had not unfortunately licked off most of the gilt. On the halo were written the words, "My Glorious Mission."

The president opened the proceedings by saying that as there had been a great demand among the weaker animals for teeth control and the limitation of claws, it had been thought well to hold a conference to talk about these things.

The main thing was to talk, and for his own part he loved to hear his own voice, but he did not intend to have his own teeth taken out because he had always used his teeth and claws for the benefit of others, and never for his own advantage. Teeth and claws were essential to the existence of lions, they were not superfluities, in fact, he said, "Teeth is us." He realized also that in some degree this was true of all present. At this point the Crocodile shed several large tears.

The Lion, continuing, said that he thought they might all agree to the abolition of fins and propellers which served no good purpose. To this the Tiger and the Eagle signified assent, but the Shark and the Crocodile showed their teeth, the Shark observing that the prohibition of claws and wings would be more to the general good.

The Eagle said he was all for prohibition, but of teeth rather than claws. He had been accused of devouring hares (the Rabbits disappeared at this juncture), but he could truly say that his action had always been for the uplift of these earth-bound creatures.

The Tiger observed that some people were rather too uplifted for his taste, and he agreed with the Shark that wings should be forbidden. He was tired of flap-doodle.

At this moment the Lion uttered a low growl, because the Eagle was twisting his tail, while the Tiger took opportunity to pull out some of the Eagle's feathers, and received in return such a peck on the ear as caused him to retreat hastily. Meanwhile the Shark bit off the end of the Crocodile's tail, and was rewarded with a scratch that turned the water red.

The meeting then broke up, and the following official statement was handed to the Press:—

"Our conference has been a striking success, complete agreement has been reached on all points, and the utmost cordiality has prevailed throughout."

That satire is only too true of past disarmament conferences, and from all that we can judge at this distance that depicts what is going on at the present time at Geneva. It does not seem fair that we should blame everyone else for the delay in disarmament. I can very well understand how France might fear to disarm; I can understand her fear of a war of revenge. I can understand her sense of a lack of security and all that kind of thing. I can understand how Germany feels at the present time, disarmed as she has been, yet with the other nations not having carried out their part of the contract. I can understand how through central Europe each nation is afraid to take the lead in disarmament. But in this country it does seem to me, although we are a very small nation, small in population and perhaps in influence, that it might be possible for us at least to make a gesture that would have considerable effect in Europe. Instead of simply going along year after year in the same direction we pursued before the war, and which the war proved did not provide anything like real security, we in Canada, in view of the whole world situation, might very well take some lead in a forward movement.

May I be permitted to refer to-night to a very excellent article that appeared in MacLean's Magazine of August 1, 1931. It is headed "Salesmen of Death. The Truth about War Makers" by Lieutenant-Colonel George A. Drew. I wish to quote from this article because, though there may be nothing particularly new in it, it is provocative of thought and should be widely read. In fact, in many respects the general public outside, with regard to matters of this kind, is in advance of the opinion, if we have any, which exists in this house; at least it is less apathetic than parliament regarding such matters. Colonel Drew sums up in one or two paragraphs his views:

> One serious obstacle that must be overcome in convincing the people of the world that disarmament is everybody's business is the cynical attitude which is all too common that war is an inevitable evil and that the most we can do is to postpone it as long as possible and, when the time does come, hope to be just a little better armed than our enemy. Hand in hand with this attitude is the belief that we maintain peace by being better armed than our neighbour and thus preventing attack. An excellent example of this point of view is furnished in the following extract from an editorial in the Canadian Defence Quarterly of April 1931:
> "The world to-day has prohibited aggressive warfare but defensive wars are permitted; therefore, the nations still regard the use of armaments as the ultimate instrument of national security. So long as this condition remains, human nature decrees that each nation will strive to be armed with armament superior in quality, and if possible quantity, to that of other nations. It is doubtful, therefore, if nations would forego the abundant benefits which result from private enterprise in the armament field."
> Words like these have been repeated so often that they have acquired general acceptance without any appreciation of their full import. No one, yet, has been able to demonstrate the "abundant benefits" resulting from private enterprise in the armament field, unless they be the enormous increase in the casualties to all combatants, or the huge profits acquired by men like Zaharoff, Krupp, Schneider and Grace. . . . That these words appeared in so responsible a journal as the Canadian Defence Quarterly such a comparatively short time before the World Disarmament Conference emphasizes the fact that much remains to be done if the Canadian delegates are to have behind them a well-informed Canadian public opinion. . . . There is ample reason for demanding, as a first step, the elimination of "Propagandists of Hate" by a mutual agreement, effective throughout the world, dissolving the vicious alliance between armament production and profit-sharing corporate enterprise.

It seems to me that instead of going through these estimates as a matter of form, instead of following the old policy of keeping up a skeleton organization which may be expanded at any time for either defensive or aggressive purposes, we should devote ourselves definitely to eliminating the causes of war. Perhaps the Minister of National Defence will say that that is not his job; I can quite understand his taking that attitude, yet his predecessor said on one occasion that he considered himself not as a minister of war but as a minister of peace. If peace is our ideal, if we have renounced war as an instrument of national policy, the responsibility would seem to rest upon someone to do something to promote peace. I have referred to this article by Colonel Drew in which he mentions the enormous fortunes which have been made out of armaments. I do not know whether there are in Canada any armament firms shipping out armaments, but I do not think there are. The Prime Minister nods his head, and I am delighted that we are in that position.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman knows that we have small arms factories.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not know whether there are—

Mr. BENNETT: These are not private companies, but are the plants located at Lindsay and Quebec.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am delighted that Canada is in this position. It is unfortunately true that considerable quantities of munitions have been sent from Great Britain to the Orient within the last few months. I understand that these shipments are being made under permit issued by the British Board of Trade after consultation with the Foreign Office. I do not know that Great Britain is any worse in this respect than any other of the large nations, but I do say that we can hardly hold up our heads as Britishers, that we can hardly be sincere in our condemnation of the trouble which has been going on in the orient for some months, while we know that British firms are guilty of shipping armaments to nations supposed to be at peace yet in reality at war. As many hon. members are not aware of the extent to which this traffic has been carried on, I should like to give a summary of a few facts recently supplied by the London New Statesman and Nation.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think this is relevant to the item under discussion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It may not be directly relevant, as this item has to do with the permanent forces. My contention is that if we are to be confined to passing estimates providing for the maintenance of military forces and for the supply of munitions, then we are not doing our part in the larger effort which should be made to promote peace. These are war estimates, and we are surely in order in considering the factors which are to-day tending to promote war. If the chairman insists that I may not give these facts, then I must submit to his ruling.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not want to insist, but there is a standing order to the effect that discussion shall be relevant to the item under discussion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should think that this is very relevant.

The CHAIRMAN: Not to the item before the committee.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, to the item before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN: Standing order 58 reads:

Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Do I understand that under this item it is impossible to discuss the various factors which might tend to promote war?

The CHAIRMAN: I should think so. The hon. member has had many chances to express his views in the house by bringing forward a motion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, there are possible ways in which such a matter could be introduced.

The CHAIRMAN: As long as the standing order is there I am bound to observe its provisions.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think I am in order in asking a few questions of the minister. I should like to know whether the Minister of Justice was correctly interpreting the attitude of the department when he made the following statement:

> The armaments of Canada are practically negligible. We maintain only such military, naval and air forces as are necessary for the maintenance of law and order within our own border. Canada has no need for greater armaments.

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): Of course I have every confidence in any statement made by the Minister of Justice, but it seems to me that what he meant was that the forces as we have them in Canada to-day are not more than might be necessary. However, that is not essentially the object or aim of the permanent forces in Canada; their main function is to act as an instructor to the militia and, incidentally, as an aid to the civil powers.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is very interesting to hear the minister repudiate the statement of the Minister of Justice, but it is unfortunate that the Minister of Justice should have made this statement in such a magnificent assembly as the League of Nations. It is unfortunate, too, that it should have been given as the position of Canada, when, after all, it was only a general remark called forth doubtless by the peaceful atmosphere which prevailed in that assembly. I should like to ask the minister: where lies the necessity to-day for the maintenance of a standing army?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The essential and paramount duty of every government is to provide peace and tranquility in the country, and our permanent militia is the background of our Royal Canadian Mounted Police. That, along with the instructing role which I mentioned, is the sole object of the permanent forces.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Instruction is the primary one, and that contemplates a state of war. Against what nation are we preparing our forces?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: We are preparing against no nation in particular. If the hon. gentleman will look at the estimates he will see that they have been reduced by several millions of dollars. That shows that we have no particular bellicose attitude.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am glad to note that there has been some reduction, but I assume that is because of the general policy of economy rather than any desire on the part of the minister to have his military estimates reduced. As we are not preparing against any one particular enemy, do I understand that the minister is still going on the assumption that armaments are more or less an insurance against war?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, absolutely; I think they are an insurance against war.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am glad to have that statement; it is at least frank. I would point out that the last war did not indicate in any way that the very fullest armaments would prevent a country from being involved. I would point out also that this idea that armaments are insurance against war is out of keeping with the whole conception of the League of Nations. I should like, if I might, to ask the minister whether he thinks, now that we have declared we are renouncing war as an instrument of national policy, there should be any modification in our military policy?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The hon. gentleman seems to lose sight of the fact that we are a small nation of ten million people and that we cannot control world policies. We are part of the world, and as long as practically every other nation maintains an army and is not satisfied that conditions are such as to warrant their doing away with it, we cannot do away with ours. It would be just as logical, say, for the city of Toronto to do away entirely with its police force while Detroit, Montreal, Buffalo and all the other large cities were maintaining theirs. There would simply be chaos; all the trouble would be concentrated in Toronto. As long as all other nations have armies, we must continue to have at least the nucleus of one.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister would not contend that an army is simply a police force. I take it that in the past armies were maintained in order that a nation might by means of force settle accounts with other nations.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: They are to maintain order, the same as a police force. A police force has its prescribed scope of activity in maintaining order. Armies are to maintain international order.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: What was the largest amount that was spent on national defence? I understand about five or six years ago it was $20,000,000, was it not?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: To that extent I would congratulate the Minister of Defence on having made the reduction. We have a very valuable member in the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and on many occasions he has rendered this country useful service, but it seems to me, in view of the fact that these estimates have been so substantially reduced, that in making the argument he has presented this evening he is much like the man who drives a tack with a sledge hammer. It is not so long since I came back from Europe and I heard the hon. gentleman say something about promoting peace. The best way, so far as we are concerned, to promote peace, is to send delegates from this dominion to all the conferences held overseas and to tell the other delegates what a wonderful country we have. On one occasion I had an opportunity of speaking about the 4,000 miles boundary between Canada and the United States and of informing them that we had hardly a single soldier defending it. I am not averse to spending a certain amount of money on an army; we must maintain some sort of army commensurate with the importance of this country, and as I have already said, the minister is to be congratulated upon progressively making so many reductions in his estimates.

Not long ago we had a conference at Bucharest, at which we took up the question of disarmament. The question of an international force for the League of Nations was raised and as the Canadian delegate there I voted against this armed force for the League of Nations, because I thought it was a contradiction of the Kellogg peace pact which practically all the nations in the world had signed. I think we can do the cause of peace a great service if we send our quota of Canadian delegates to all the conferences overseas in order to point out the folly of increasing their armaments. There is no doubt in my mind that on the European continent they are substantially increasing their armaments. We in Canada, on the other hand, are decreasing ours, and that is a fact which the people on the other side of the ocean should take into consideration when such an important question as a policy of peace is being discussed.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not want to prolong this discussion. I have already said that I am glad our armament is small and that there are decreases this year, but I still think that we ought to assume our share of responsibility in regard to general disarmament. As long as we, in the happy position in which we are, practically free from enemies, find it necessary to maintain even a small army, and as long as we uphold the doctrine that armaments are an insurance against war, I do not think we are doing what we might in promoting world peace.

Mr. YOUNG: In reference to the skit which the hon. member read at the beginning of his speech, where the animals could not agree to disarm, what would have happened if, let us say, at that conference the eagle had consented to part with his beak, wings and claws and the others had not?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not think that point can be pressed. But of one thing we are sure: as long as we are at the present game we are getting no further ahead. I am inclined to think we are gradually climbing out of the slime. There is no doubt the human race came up through a very bloody pathway, but I am glad to think we are gradually attaining some slight degree of reason in our dealings with one another, and one of these days we shall manage to get along without the teeth and claws.

Mr. CAYLEY: Is the hon. member suggesting that he is willing that we should completely disarm?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am.

Mr. CAYLEY: Forthwith?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, forthwith, so far as I am concerned, for two reasons. This small army, if you like to call it such, that we are keeping up, is a mere irritant; it is provoking rather than helping to avoid war. More than that, our army is anything but efficient. I should like, if I might, to quote in this connection just one paragraph from a recent address by Sir Arthur Currie. I am not suggesting that he takes the position that I do, but I quote this paragraph from a recent speech of his. He refers to the ghastly toll of past wars. He says:

> Some 11,000,000 dead; 9,000,000 war orphans; 5,000,000 war widows; 20,000,000 helpless, wounded, broken men; and 50,000,000 starving unemployed. In the background of this picture were ruins of churches, buildings and humane institutions which had been constructed by the toil and sacrifice of centuries.

Then he declares:

> In a war of the future, there would be no use whatever to say that "We must not use poison gas; we must not spread disease germs; we must not kill civilians; we must not have submarine warfare; we must not destroy hospital ships; we must not bomb hospitals; we must not drop bombs on undefended towns.
> All thes things will be done."

Well, if all these forms of warfare will be resorted to, if we were thoroughly consistent and were going to be prepared for the next war, instead of pottering away with a few soldiers and officers as we are doing to-day, we would be arming along those lines and preparing definitely to carry on a warfare of that description. Of course experts tell us that we cannot defend ourselves against attacks of this kind. I agree, we cannot, because there can be released enough germs, poison gas and so on to wipe out our cities in a very short time. If that be the case, why not let us frankly face the situation and attempt to discover some substitute for armament and prevent these disasters that will inevitably result from a war in the future.

RADIO BROADCASTING

CONSTITUTION OF COMMISSION FOR ACQUISITION, OPERATION, REGULATION AND CONTROL

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the constitution of a commission to be known as The Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission, for the purpose of acquiring, operating, regulating and controlling radio broadcasting in Canada.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not propose at this stage, Mr. Chairman, to do more than say that the measure to be based on this resolution endeavours to embody the recommendations of the committee which unanimously reported to the house the other day, and which report was unanimously adopted by the house. If the committee is disposed to pass the resolution this evening I was proposing to submit the measure for its first reading and then leave it for its second reading to-morrow so that hon. members might have an opportunity of looking it through. There is one section in which a slight change will be made, as I mentioned this afternoon. There is nothing in the bill to be founded on the resolution except provisions to enable the country through the commission to acquire, operate, regulate and control radio broadcasting in Canada, the details being set out in the measure.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Bennett thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 94, respecting radio broadcasting.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would it be possible to have copies of the bill in both English and French to-morrow?

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. BENNETT: It is printed for revision. There are two or three words in one of the sections that I think will have to be amended, but the bill in its present form will be distributed either to-night or first thing in the morning. I think it is ready to-night in both English and French. There are no figures in the space for the salaries for the commissioners in the measure as submitted to the house.

As this matter has taken a very short time, perhaps the opposition would allow the Minister of National Defence to proceed with his estimates. I thought this matter would have taken a little longer or I would not have asked the committee of supply to rise until a quarter to eleven, but I thought it best to take a little longer in view of the possibility of discussion.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Non-permanent active militia, $1,837,400.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the minister tell us what are the items making up the reduction from last year?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I think there will be a small item in the supplementary estimates of $50,000. In a general way the reduction is due to the reallotment of the days of training. There will probably not be as many days' training this year, perhaps only ten days where there were twelve before. The artillery did not get a chance last year to go to camp at all and use the mechanized equipment.

Mr. RALSTON: How many days in camp and for how many men does the minister propose for this year?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: For the artillery, twelve men to a battery. There will be no camps whatever for the infantry.

Mr. RALSTON: How many men will go to Petawawa?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Just about twelve men to a battery from eastern Canada. In western Canada they will go to Camp Hughes.

Mr. RALSTON: If I understand correctly, there was no camp at Petawawa last year.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Except for the permanent force.

Mr. RALSTON: Do I understand that there is to be a camp at Petawawa this year, and still the vote is less than last year?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There is a reduction of $12,000 for maintenance charges in connection with the general upkeep of armouries, drill hall and rifle ranges. That, together with the smaller allotment for training makes up the reduction in this vote.

Mr. RALSTON: But there is a reduction of $163,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There will probably be a supplementary vote of $50,000.

Mr. RALSTON: I am afraid that I still have not got the items making up the reduction of $163,000. Assuming that there will be a supplementary vote of $50,000, that will leave the reduction of $163,000 at $113,000. Would the minister just indicate generally—I do not want details—what is the cause of this reduction of, roughly, $100,000? Is it less days in training?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Less days in training, yes.

Mr. RALSTON: That is headquarters training, and not camp training.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Headquarters training, yes.

Item agreed to.

General stores, $663,500.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the minister give us the items making up this reduction of $600,000, approximately? The total redution of $600,000, approximately? The total reduction is $1,700,000 odd, and nearly half of that is in this one item for general stores.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The reduction is made up as follows:

Clothing and necessaries, $8,500; miscellaneous stores, $141,500; artillery stores, $179,500; telephone signal and wireless stores, $12,500; inspection of stores, $6.500; army service corps, mechanical and water transports, $15,000; Dominion arsenal at Quebec, $199,000; Dominion arsenal at Lindsay, $500; inspection of ammunition, $6.500.

Mr. RALSTON: How is the saving brought about for the dominion arsenal at Quebec? Will there be less ammunition manufactured this year?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, there will be less ammunition manufactured, and consequently the wages item will be lower.

Mr. RALSTON: Probably so, but not to the extent of $200,000. The decrease in the manufacture of ammunition would not amount to anything like $200,000. How much less ammunition is being manufactured?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The details of the estimate for the dominion arsenal show a total of $298,000 made up as follows: Salaries and wages, $221,000; maintenance, $30,000; removal of snow, $700; cordite contracted for, $20,000; bandoliers, $1,000; material for manufacturing, $106,000. From the total of these figures there has to be allowed $81,000 for materials on hand. The decrease is due to the ten per cent reduction in salaries, and the decision to close down the arsenal for a period of ten weeks in the summer.

Mr. SPENCER: Are any munitions manufactured by private firms in Canada?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, not to my knowledge.

Item agreed to.

Cadet services, $100,000.

Mr. SPENCER: Could the minister tell the number of cadets in the different provinces?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In Nova Scotia, there are 4,500; in Prince Edward Island, 900; New Brunswick, 3,400; Quebec, 67,500; Ontario, 44,700; Manitoba, 3,000; Saskatchewan, 3,900; Alberta, 7,400 and British Columbia, 6,000.

Mr. SPENCER: How is the reduction made out?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I must say there will have to be a supplementary estimate brought in. This sum is not enough to carry on the work. There have been very strong representations made, and a supplementary estimate will have to be brought down.

Mr. CAYLEY: Since last year has there been any reduction in the number of cadets?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There is an increase of about 4,000 cadets.

Mr. GERSHAW: What is supplied to the cadets?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There is no clothing given to them. They are given an issue of small 22 calibre rifles. The principal item, however, is instruction.

Mr. SPENCER: Are the cadets looked upon as part of the reserve army?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, not by the Department of National Defence. I am bound to say that every now and again we hear of some regiment with which there is a cadet corps affiliated. I do not, however, consider them in any way a part of the militia force.

Item agreed to.

Administration, $320,000.

Mr. COOTE: I understand there has been some correspondence between the Canadian Legion, the British Empire Service League and the minister concerning the publication of the Canadian official history of the great war. Can the minister tell what progress is being made by the department in this connection?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: This subject has created a great deal of interest, and rightly so. Practically ever since the war a sub-department has been gathering information and data. To be useful, any history must be exact. If the hon. member is particularly interested and will come to my department I shall be very happy to show him how exact that information is. From the information at hand, the officials know all the details of a battle on a certain date at a certain hour, and they have the detailed information concerning the companies, squadrons and batteries. At a time six hours later there are further details to show the changes which have been made. That preliminary work has now reached the stage where it is possible to begin writing the history. Probably it will consist of eight or nine general volumes, and two or three in addition dealing with particular services. Work will be started on the first volume immediately. It must be remembered that there are two kinds of histories of the war. One is official, giving days and dates, and quoting orders; another deals with certain incidents and embellishes them in an effort to make the subject matter readable. Some writer may comment on whether or not he approved of a certain general, or the practice of protecting the infantry by artillery fire. That may be a readable history, but it is not official. On the other hand, the official history may be used as a ground work for writers who may direct their thoughts along general lines. I hope that before parliament meets next year one volume will be ready.

Mr. SPENCER: Is it not a fact that Great Britain, Australia and other parts of the British empire are ahead of Canada, so far as the histories of their respective parts in the war are concerned?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: In some cases they have written the second type of history I have described, namely that prepared in sketchy and newsy form. Such histories, however, are not official. Great Britain is now writing her official history of the war, and it has been the practice of her officials to send to us anything concerning the Canadian troops, the information being checked by the officers in our department. Great Britain has begun work on the official history, but I would not admit that she is ahead of us in that particular work.

Mr. COOTE: Apparently the officials in charge of this work have been thirteen years gathering data. I notice in a return which was brought down on April 24, 1929, that at that time they had sorted 135 tons of material; indexed and made available documents occupying 3,138 feet of shelving; selected and copied documents covering 20,000 pages with maps; supplied information to inquirers on a wide variety of subjects necessitating writing approximately 8,000 letters; and compiled historical information comprising approximately 6,432 pages, 150 maps, 4,288 charts and 12,000 cards. To any ordinary layman who is interested in the subject this would appear to be sufficient data on which to base the history. I suppose I could go over to the department and see how the data is gathered, but the men most interested in this history are the veterans themselves, and many of them feel they will be dead before the history appears. I think it would be not unfair to say that the men in charge of this work have been dilatory, to say the least. I was very glad indeed to hear the minister suggest that we might perhaps expect one volume this year. Who is to be given the task of writing this history, the man who is in the department now and has been engaged on the work for the last fifteen years?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Colonel Duguid will write the history. He has been head of the sub-department for a number of years. I must correct the hon. gentleman when he suggests that Colonel Duguid or anyone else in that particular branch has been dilatory. He certainly has not been dilatory. He may not have been given the help he needed, but his is a very small branch. No one has worked harder, or put greater effort into the preparation of this history than has Colonel Duguid.

Mr. COOTE: How many men are engaged in this work, and how much has been spent on it already? Has not sufficient work been done and money expended to justify our expectations that some of these volumes might have been published before this?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I do not think the hon. gentleman will find there is a great deal of dissatisfaction, for it must be remembered that it takes a long time to get exact information for the preparation of such a history. Several histories have been written in the older countries by some general or staff officer giving his views on the strategy employed by the various generals. But that is not an official history in the sense in which we regard the history that is to be written for this country. Our history must be based on authentic information.

Mr. RALSTON: I desire to second what the minister has said with regard to Colonel Duguid's work. It may be, as the minister suggests, that Colonel Duguid himself may not have had sufficient help. I think it would be rather difficult for him to use very much help in view of the technical nature of the work he is doing. I know that for several years while I was in the department he was still opening boxes and packages and collecting data which was coming in from all sources, and at the same time he was busy answering inquiries from those in several parts of the country who were writing battalion histories. Wonderful work was done by the historical section in connection with the memorial chamber in this building. If I remember correctly, with respect to the Canadian war memorial which is now being prepared, a great many ideas, if not suggested, were at least forwarded by Colonel Duguid's work. Dilatory is the last word my hon. friend ought to apply to Colonel Duguid; I do not know one whose heart is more in his work or who is more industrious.

Mr. COOTE: I do not know the gentleman at all, and it may be that he has done all he could do. Perhaps I should have said the department has been dilatory. At least that is the opinion of a great many returned men who are still looking for the official history of the war. As I have said, they are the men who are interested and many of them fear they will be dead before the history appears.

Item agreed to.

AVIATION

Training—all expenses in connection with the general maintenance of the air force including training personnel for civil air operations and provision of the necessary facilities therefor;

Civil air operations—flying operations for civil government departments in connection with aerial photographic surveys, forestry patrols, forestry and grain pests, transportation, etc., control of civil aviation; establishing aerodromes and airship bases; aeronautical engineering, etc.;

Air mail routes—to provide for expenses in connection with establishing and maintaining air mail routes; preparation and lighting of intermediate landing fields, etc., $1,750,000.

Mr. COOTE: Will the minister explain how he arrives at the decrease of $3,602,000 in this item? How many air force men have been laid off?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: One hundred and eighty-eight men have been laid off, and the civil air operations they were engaged in have been very largely restricted.

Mr. COOTE: Is this decrease all due to the discharging of these men from the force?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Oh, no. It is due mainly to the operations themselves having been cut down. This year we will probably be doing only five or six thousand hours flying, whereas last year we did about thirty thousand hours. Then there will be very few, if any, aircraft purchased. To the best of my knowledge now, there will be none.

Progress reported.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Fourth report of special committee appointed to consider Bill No. 36, to amend the Bankruptcy Act.—Mr. Hackett.

Fourth report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Stinson.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

REPORT OF FINDINGS OF COMMITTEE ON INQUIRY INTO PRICE OF GASOLINE

Mr. R. C. MATTHEWS (Toronto East Centre): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present the fourth report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce dealing with the price of gasoline. The report is as follows:

The select standing committee on banking and commerce begs leave to submit its fourth report as follows:

Your committee has had under consideration an order of reference, dated February 11, 1932,—

"That, in the opinion of this house, the price of gasoline to the Canadian consumer has for some time past been too high, and that this matter should be referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce to investigate and report."

Your committee has held 22 meetings, and has taken viva voce evidence on oath of 20 witnesses. Numerous exhibits were filed by witnesses.

The aforementioned witnesses represented the following companies:

Imperial Oil, Limited,
McColl-Frontenac Oil Company, Limited,
British American Oil Company, Limited,
Shell Oil of Canada, Limited,
Eastcrest Oil Company, Limited, and also included individual importers and distributors, in some cases importing direct from the United States, and in other cases purchasing gasoline from Canadian refiners.

An officer of the White Star Refinery Company, of Detroit, Michigan, also gave evidence concerning the condition of the petroleum industry in the United States.

An official of the customs branch of the National Revenue department gave evidence respecting the appraisal of petroleum imports for duty purposes.

The Clarkson commission report of 1926 to the Ontario government, being a report of an inquiry into the prices of gasoline and oils sold in the province, is incorporated in the evidence taken by your committee.

A committee of the legislature of Saskatchewan was concurrently conducting a similar inquiry to that of your committee, but within the limitations of provincial jurisdiction, and presented a report of its findings and recommendations to the legislature.

The said Saskatchewan committee report is not within the order of reference from the house to your committee and therefore has not been considered by your committee but in view of the recommendations therein contained has been incorporated in the printed proceedings of evidence in order that the house may be informed of its contents.

Pursuant to authorization given by the house, your committee engaged the firm of George A. Touche & Company, chartered accountants. This firm was instructed as follows, namely:—

1. That the accounts of the Imperial Oil, Limited, be taken for the purpose of establishing the fundamental facts required by the committee.

2. That a basis of establishing the ascertainment of costs be mutually agreed upon between the auditors and the officers of Imperial Oil, Limited.

3. That for the purposes of the two preceding paragraphs, the investigation be specifically applied against

(a) The Sarnia and Halifax refineries as regards the elements entering into production costs as a whole and as applicable to proportionate distribution of these total costs against gasoline and other commodities refined from crude.

(b) The relative wholesale prices of gasoline and other commodities refined from crude in relation to costs of production at the Sarnia and Halifax refineries.

(c) The elements embodied in the selling, distribution and administration expenses, added to the costs of production, in relation to selling prices for Imperial Oil, Limited, as a whole and as specifically applied in the following marketing divisions—

(d) That such marketing divisions may be designated by your sub-committee.

4. That synonymous with this investigation by the auditors into the aforementioned cost and selling factors of the Imperial Oil, Limited, they secure from British American Oil Co., Limited, and from McColl-Frontenac Oil Co., Limited, statements in such form as will render practicable a comparison of the relative costs and selling prices of the three corporations, thus offering means of disclosing any major variations without entailing the additional expense of investigating the smaller oil companies operating in Canada.

[Mr. Matthews.]

The auditors were also directed to make an examination and audit of the books of the McColl-Frontenac Oil Company with respect to certain operations of that company.

The auditors' report was duly presented to your committee by Mr. O. A. Matthews, a member of the firm of George A. Touche and Company, who explained in detail the clauses of the report as the same was read at presentation. Mr. Matthews was subsequently recalled, sworn and examined in respect to matters connected with the audit and report. Statements of figures abstracted from the books of the audited companies, and extended in the report, were duly filed.

A summary of the conclusions as set out in the auditors' report is as follows:

(a) That the company's records relating to 1930 operating costs charged to gasoline showed no evidence of "cost loading" by reason of affiliations in the United States and South America, or because of unfavourable accounting practices, but rather, that the gasoline costs, if anything, were understated because of the company's conservative policies in not loading into costs such matters as fire insurance premiums, depreciation rates, contingency reserve charges and inventory pricing.

(b) That the total costs for 1930 were free of charges for interest on capital invested, or such as might be related against funded debt or as a charge imposed by a parent company in the form of rental for use and operation of the refineries and marketing stations and equipment. In other words, the financing of Imperial Oil, Limited, has been effected through the sale of capital stock and the investment of a proportion of surplus earnings in extensions of plant and equipment facilities, without any issue of bonds or debentures upon which interest might be charged.

(c) That the 1930 marketing costs charged to gasoline whilst as a whole legitimate from an accounting point of view, were high in relation to total costs. The high cost of marketing is attributed to territorial and climatic conditions, and extreme competition obtaining in the distribution and marketing of gasoline in Canada. In view of the fact that the territorial and climatic conditions in Canada are not subject to human manipulation and change, a partial solution of the problem would seem to lie in a concerted action on the part of all distributing companies to eliminate as far as possible the present costly system of marketing.

(d) That variations in gasoline prices in 1929, 1930 and 1931 to consumers were not based directly upon ascertained refinery costs, but largely upon the variations in the market cost of crude oil with fluctuating additional charges for excise tax, sales tax, freight surcharge and exchange. It has not been demonstrated that any grounds exist for any allegations that the company has taken unfair advantage of either the specific or dumping duties in its gasoline prices to consumers during the period under investigation.

(e) That the reason for the unfavourable comparison at some points between United States competitive prices and those of the Imperial Oil, Limited, is due to the demoralized condition of the gasoline industry in the United States, caused by the over-production of gasoline and various tax evasion "rackets," which, in turn, result in the price of United States gasoline falling far below the relative movements in crude oil prices and other costs of production and distribution.

(f) That the zoning basis of establishing gasoline prices results in the spreading of transportation differentials to the comparative disadvantage of gasoline consumers at centres of trade in proximity to some refineries, whereas the zoning price basis frequently operated to the advantage of gasoline consumers in the territories outlying from the refineries. It was also found that tank wagon gasoline prices are given to farmers and coastal fishermen both east and west.

(g) That in such outlying districts as have no dealer competition or where any dealer association arrangements exist, the spread between Imperial Oil, Limited, tank wagon prices and the prices to the consumer is entirely in the hands of the independent dealers.

(h) That apart altogether from the basis used in the establishing of gasoline prices, the spread between such selling prices and the combined costs of refining and marketing showed an average net profit of not exceeding 1·01 cents per imperial gallon of all gasoline sold by Imperial Oil, Limited, in the year 1930.

(i) That in view of the fact that the investigation of Imperial Oil, Limited, disclosed no improper accounting practices in the matter of costs or unstated profits, and because Imperial Oil, Limited, occupy the leading position in the gasoline industry in Canada, the auditors gave it as their opinion that the expense which would be involved in extending their investigation into the records of the British American Oil Company, Limited, the McColl-Frontenac Oil Company, Limited, and other oil companies in Canada, would not be justified in view of their findings on the average net profit per gallon of gasoline sold by Imperial Oil, Limited, in 1930.

From a consideration of the evidence and the auditors' report, it is the opinion of your committee that the price of gasoline to the Canadian consumer is not unreasonably high, and that the public interest would not be further served by a continuation of this inquiry.

Tabled herewith is a copy of the printed proceedings and evidence.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the table of the house orders in council numbers 1121 to 1125, inclusive, and numbers 1128 to 1131, inclusive, passed pursuant to the provisions of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932, all referring to the payment of money.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I rise to a question of privilege and a point of order. On to-day's order paper I do not see certain questions that I put and I find them on page 2935 of Hansard of yesterday. These are nine questions concerning people who have made complaints or given evidence against postmasters, and as the questions can be answered by yes or no, I wonder why they have been changed to orders for returns at the request of the hon. Secretary of State.

Mr. SPEAKER: They were changed to orders for returns at the instance of the minister (Mr. Cahan), as is his privilege so to do, and that is where they will remain.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask the Postmaster General if he has any objection to answering them?

Hon. ARTHUR SAUVE (Postmaster General): I never had and have no objection. My answers were and are ready.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE RESPECTING BILL TO AMEND INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): We shall take up order No. 18, Bill No. 92, to amend the Income War Tax Act. If the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), in order that he may more adequately discuss the principle of the measure, so desires, a motion will be made to rescind the second reading and we shall proceed with that. If, on the other hand, the hon. gentleman thinks it is possible to discuss the principle of the measure while the house is in committee, we shall proceed in that way. I think the bill was advanced a stage, perhaps through a misunderstanding for which I must assume responsibility, because I said distinctly that my hon. friend would be given the fullest opportunity, regardless of the advance made on the order paper, to discuss the measure.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It will be quite satisfactory to me to discuss the bill in committee, provided that I am at liberty to express my views on the principle.

MORNING SITTINGS TO BEGIN ON THURSDAY, MAY 19

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): If there is a general disposition to expedite the business of the house, I would give notice for morning sittings beginning Thursday.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: As that appears to be the general view, I will, with the consent of the house, make the motion now that the house meet on Thursday at eleven o'clock, a.m.

Mr. DUFF: What about Wednesday night?

Mr. BENNETT: It was not intended to sit on Wednesday night.

An hon. MEMBER: What about Saturday?

Mr. BENNETT: I shall consult the convenience of the house as to Saturday. It is probable it may be desirable to sit on Saturday, but at present, with the consent of the house, I shall make the motion only that we sit on Thursday morning at eleven o'clock, if that is satisfactory, and also on Friday morning. Then we shall consider as to whether or not we should sit on Saturday. The Senate does not convene again until Monday evening at eight o'clock. Therefore it might not be desirable to sit on Saturday, but I shall look into the matter and consult the convenience of the leaders of the parties as to what action should be taken in that regard.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Bennett moves:

That on and after Thursday the 19th inst. until the end of the present session the house shall meet at 11 o'clock in the morning of each sitting day and that, in addition to the usual intermission at six o'clock p.m. there shall also be an intermission every day from one to three o'clock.

PENDING LEGISLATION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister if we may assume we have on the order paper practically all the business that is likely to come before us this session?

Mr. BENNETT: That was the other matter about which I intended to speak. A bill has been prepared to give effect to the recommendations of the committee dealing with the civil service. That bill is now being finally revised by the Minister of Justice. There is also a bill that has been drafted and that, it is urged in some very responsible quarters, we should pass in order to cope with a possible financial crisis if such should arise on this continent. This bill, which would not come into force except by proclamation, is a very short one, with I think, a single section. Whether or not it should be introduced we have not finally decided. Outside that, I know of nothing more. There was a bill prepared some weeks ago in connection with a farm marketing board, a subject about which some discussion took place the other day. There are certain technical difficulties that may not be regarded as of such a character as to warrant our not proceeding with the legislation. That has not been finally decided. Outside that, there is nothing I know of at the moment.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Duff.]

POST OFFICE ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Laprairie-Napierville) (Translation): May I inquire from the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) when he intends to submit again to the house the estimates of his department?

Hon. ARTHUR SAUVE (Postmaster General) (Translation): I have no objection to discuss immediately the estimates of my department, providing the rules permit it. I shall again submit them to the house when the rules allow me and when I am called upon to do so.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): May I request the hon. Postmaster General, on behalf of the house, to give a more definite answer. I would like to know when the estimates of the Post Office Department will be discussed, if the Postmaster General is in a position to supply the information.

DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I ask my right hon. friend whether the report in the newspapers is correct that both the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) and Miss Kydd, two of the Canadian delegates at the Disarmament conference, are sailing for Canada? If this is true, must we assume that Canada will be represented at that momentous conference only by our worthy Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré)?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): As perhaps the hon. gentleman knows, if he has been following the proceedings, the work of committees is proceeding. The committee of which the Solicitor General is the vice-chairman is continuing its sittings, and we were advised by Sir George Perley this morning that it was the view of all those who are interested in the conference that he might return to Canada at the moment, and Miss Kydd, I believe, is coming on the same ship. I shall have a few observations to make in that regard when one of the items dealing with the League of Nations which was reserved is being considered, especially in view of what was said last evening by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). I shall not anticipate the discussion at this stage beyond saying that the interests of Canada are entirely safeguarded in every sense in view of the present state of that conference by the presence of the Solicitor General.

POST OFFICE ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Laprairie-Napierville): A few minutes ago I asked the hon. Postmaster General when he expected to proceed with his estimates. As he seems to be unable to answer I would ask the right hon. the Prime Minister if he is able to tell the house when the Postmaster General will proceed with his estimates.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that any good purpose is served by gratuitous, insulting observations addressed to any member of the house. I can only say that the Postmaster General will proceed with his estimates when it is agreeable to him and acceptable to the opposition, as we said the other evening.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT AMENDMENT

SPECIAL TAX ON INCOMES OF JUDGES AND MEMBERS OF MILITARY, NAVAL, AIR AND POLICE FORCES

The house resumed from Monday, May 16, consideration in committee of Bill No. 92, to amend the Income War Tax Act—Mr. Rhodes. —Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

On section 1—Special income tax on certain salaries.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, that I was not here yesterday, owing to an engagement in my own city, and therefore could not register my opposition to the principle of this measure. I am grateful to the Prime Minister for giving me the opportunity of doing so to-day.

This measure is one of taxation, and according to my views it violates two great principles of British constitutional law with regard to taxation. First, the principle of equality. It is a well-known principle that in matters of taxation there should not be any discrimination. Everybody must be treated in the same way. In this bill there is a discrimination against a class. The judges of Canada, apart from being required to pay the income taxes every citizen of Canada has to do, are singled out for the purpose of levying upon their salaries a special additional tax of ten per cent. This is class legislation; there is no doubt about it. There is no more reason for it and no more justification for an additional income tax on judges than there would be for one on butchers or bakers or on people who happen to have red hair—

Miss MACPHAIL: Or who are baldheaded.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Or who are baldheaded, as my hon. friend from Southeast Grey says, or anybody else in a special category or class. There is no doubt whatever that this measure is certainly opposed to one of the fundamental principles of taxation, that of equality of taxation, and it becomes an arbitrary levy upon a certain class of men. More than that, even in that class there is a discrimination because the bill applies only to the judges who are paid by the Dominion of Canada. The recorders, the provincial judges, the judges of police courts, although some of them have salaries almost as high as the salaries of the members of the high courts, are not taxed. I am sure that everybody upon second thought will agree with me that this is an absolutely vicious principle. Our income tax statutes are based on the theory that the taxes are levied in a certain proportion on the annual gain or annual means of every citizen of Canada. This is a deviation from that principle. Furthermore, Lord Phillimore, in the case of Caron versus the King, which was based on our federal income tax laws, recognized that principle. He said:

> They—

Meaning the income tax acts of this dominion:

> —are statutes for imposing on all citizens contributions according to their annual means, regardless of, or it may be said, not having regard to, the source from which their annual means are derived.

The tax is levied on the annual gain or means of every citizen; the law does not say where it comes from, and it is not fair, it is against the principle of the legislation that a certain class or a certain profession in the community should have imposed upon it special taxation different from that imposed on any other class. That is one principle that is violated by this bill. But there is another one.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would not the reverse also be true with regard to any exemptions from the tax?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Quite right, but the judges are not exempted. They are paying the same tax in proportion as any other citizen of Canada. This is the change. There was no change before this bill.

The other principle which is violated is the great British principle of no taxation without representation. The judges are not represented in this house. They have no vote here; they have no—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Oh, oh.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend says, "oh, oh." The best evidence that they are not represented here is that yesterday there was nobody to say: "Well, you had better wait and at least have the bill printed and distributed before the second reading is proceeded with." There was nobody here to say that yesterday. If there is any legislation concerning the farmers or the fishermen or the civil servants, or anybody else in Canada there is always a voice or there are a few voices raised in this house on their behalf, but when it comes to the judges they have no representation.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): They have an excellent advocate in the hon. gentleman, in my opinion.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They have an ex-Minister of Justice who wants to put himself on record in this house against this principle and against this legislation, but they are not represented in this house by anybody, and that is why things like that happen.

Mr. SPENCER: We were informed by the Prime Minister that most judges were willing to pay the ten per cent.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have no concern about that; it is possible they are willing to pay. If so, let them pay voluntarily. My point is that this parliament has no right to impose a special tax on the judges of Canada through the operation of a special bill such as the one now before us. Nobody speaks for them. We have taken away from them not only the right to vote but the right to speak. They cannot defend themselves. They have no right to say anything on public matters, and may I say that the present legislation is not very generous or courageous; it is not sportsmanlike to attack people who have not the right to defend themselves. They can say nothing in their defence. More than that, we have passed legislation prohibiting them entering other gainful occupations. We have prohibited them from deriving any other income or revenue from any sources whatever, as do other people in times of prosperity. Now we are asking them—we are forcing them, in a period of depression, despite the fact that when times were better they had no opportunity to benefit—to pay a special tax.

There is no doubt that the legislation now before us is makeshift, because the government found it could not place them under the bill to reduce salaries. They are doing indirectly what they could not do directly. Judges are not servants of the crown. Since the Act of Settlement that fact has been well established and accepted. They sit in judgment on differences and difficulties arising between the crown and the subjects. They cannot be removed by the crown as can other civil servants. After the Act of Settlement another law was passed affecting only the judges and enacting that they are not related, as are other civil servants, to the sovereign; they are not servants of the crown. I quite realize that the government could not have included them in the bill which has now become law. The present legislation, however, is only a subterfuge, and is opposed to the principles of British law. I know the Minister of Justice does not like it; he could not like it. I can remember very well a time when he blamed me for not taking the means to increase judges salaries. I can remember his eloquent words to the effect that judges are not paid adequately, and that in fact they were underpaid. Well, he is doing worse than I did; at least I did not reduce their salaries.

I know that in certain quarters it is stylish to attack judges. As I have already said they cannot defend themselves. The statement has been made that it is easy to find people prepared to accept a position on the bench. That may be so, but the present Minister of Justice knows as well as I do that it is difficult to find the men we would like to appoint to the higher courts of the land. Certainly it is possible to find some men, but let me tell hon. members that there is no doubt a poor servant is always overpaid. Let us suppose that we should apply the same principle to the House of Commons. When I came to parliament the indemnity was only $1,000. It was increased to $1,500, then to $2,500, and now it is $4,000. May I suggest that if it were again $1,000 quite possibly there would be people who would be willing to accept office. That, however, is not a fair basis upon which to decide the amount which should be paid to judges, to members of parliament or to any other servants of the people. I do not desire to say more in this connection except that it is of supreme importance to Canada that we should have an impartial and independent judiciary. I do not think it is right to subject judges to the necessity of looking to parliament to learn whether their salaries or taxes are going to be increased or decreased from year to year. Judges must be altogether independent of parliament; they must be fearless. They have a tremendous responsibility. We exact from them high standards of living, and as I said we exclude them from all other gainful occupations. We are proud of our Canadian bench, and I think we should make it so that our judiciary would be in a position to maintain the prestige with which it has always been surrounded.

Last night when I entered the chamber the estimates of the Minister of National Defence were under review. There was discussion on an item of almost $2,000,000 for the training of the non-permanent militia. Let me tell hon. members that the country might more easily dispense with the training of the non-permanent militia than impose a special tax on our judges. To please the hon. member for Southeast Grey may I say I would also be quite willing to cut off the amount set aside for cadet training, rather than make a levy on the salaries of judges.

There is another point upon which I should like to say a few words. The government was blamed for not having put a tax, similar to the one now under discussion, on the salaries of lieutenant-governors. Well, this one is bad, but the other one would also be bad. I have heard the suggestion in this house that we could very well dispense with the office of lieutenant-governor in the provinces. Well, my reply to that is that under the British North America Act the lieutenant-governor is part of the constitution; it is part of the legislature of a province. The act says that the legislature of the province of Quebec shall be composed of a lieutenant-governor, a legislative assembly and a legislative council. It states further that the legislature of Ontario shall be composed of a lieutenant-governor and a legislative assembly. Lieutenant-governors form part of legislative bodies. So long as we have autonomous provinces the lieutenant-governors represent the king in those provinces, and no hon. members in this parliament have the right to do away with that office in the provinces.

I am not sure either that the people of the provinces favour this change, and I know in Quebec they would not. In Quebec the office of lieutenant-governor is part of our national life. The home of the lieutenant-governor is the national home of the province. The lieutenant-governor represents the king; he represents law; he represents order; he represents authority. I do not think there would be even a very small minority in the province which would favour doing away with the lieutenant-governorship. Let me say also that the salaries of the lieutenant-governors are perhaps the only ones that have never been increased since confederation. All the other salaries have been increased; the lieutenant-governors are being paid to-day what they were paid in 1867. Is it to be suggested that we should have only wealthy people as representing the crown in the provinces? I am opposed to that suggestion. We have in my own province at the present time a lieutenant-governor whom I would not change for any millionaire, no matter whence he came in this country; far from it; and he has the esteem, the good will and the affection of every citizen of the province. The salary which is being paid to the representatives of the crown, instead of being too large, in my opinion is much too small.

Those are the considerations I wanted to express to-day, and I am thankful to the Prime Minister for having given me the opportunity of doing so.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, with a great deal of the speech of my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) I am in hearty accord, but with some of the opinions which he has offered to the house I cannot agree. We all realize that it is not a pleasant nor an agreeable thing either on the one hand to impose taxation or on the other to reduce salaries. Measures of this kind are not brought forward unless there is some urgent necessity for them, and it was felt that at the present time there was an urgent necessity in Canada of decreasing expenditures in every direction. It is for that reason that the reduction of salaries in the civil service and extra taxation in regard to the judiciary are proposed. And the proposal is only for a single year.

My hon. friend has based his objections upon two grounds. First, that it is illegal or unconstitutional to impose taxation upon the judges; secondly, that we are violating a principle in this measure by imposing taxation without representation. Viewed in regard to our strict legal rights, I think the matter is one upon which there cannot be very much division of opinion. We have in this parliament under the British North America Act authority to tax anything we see fit to tax. The powers of this parliament are practically unlimited in that respect; they are to be found in section 91. We are empowered to raise money by any mode or system of taxation. My hon. friend says that in this measure we do not propose a fair or general tax, but that we discriminate. In my humble opinion, we are entitled, if we see fit, to discriminate. That is our legal right.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I did not say otherwise.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is not a question of the right of parliament; but there is a question as to the propriety of our doing certain things.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In this case we propose not to discriminate, but to impose taxation upon all the members of a class, and that class consists of those who receive money by way of salary from the treasury of the dominion. My hon. friend points out that in his good province of Quebec there are a number of individuals who are not, strictly speaking, judges, but who are appointed by the province to administer law as in other provinces magistrates do. They are provincial officers, and we have not sought in any way to interfere with the salaries or emoluments which they receive. But all members of the judiciary who receive money from the federal treasury are under this proposal taxed in respect only of the salary which they receive from that treasury. That is the special tax that is imposed.

Now, on the legality of the proposal I submit there cannot be two opinions. As to the propriety of our doing so there may be a very great difference of opinion. Personally, I do not favour a reduction in judges' salaries, and under other circumstances I would not feel justified in imposing this taxation upon them. I remember the incident which my hon. friend referred to when I did urge in this house an increase in judges' salaries. It was at a time when there was affluence in the country, when our treasury was overflowing—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: —a time when an increase might have been granted. And why was it not granted? Simply because the temper of the House of Commons was opposed to it; that was the reason. I have not any doubt that my hon. friend himself was in favour of an increase—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: —but the temper of the House of Commons was opposed to it. I think I am not going too far when I say that from anything we have learned during the present session of parliament, the temper of this present House of Commons is not in favour of excluding judges from any contribution to the finances of the dominion for the present year.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the operating thought in my mind at all events; because in the main I agree with the position which my hon. friend has taken with regard to the judiciary of this country.

On the other branch of his case he submits we are not justified in taking this step because we should not impose taxation where there is no representation. Well, I submit that the judiciary of this country are represented in the House of Commons, not by themselves but by the representatives of the people of the country. If my hon. friend's argument is correct, we could not impose taxation upon the civil servants, because the civil servants are not represented here except through the members of this house. Many bodies are not represented here; none of the officers of the government practically have a right to sit here or to be heard here. Now, I submit there is no foundation in fact for that objection; that this House of Commons represents the whole dominion, all classes of citizens of this country.

For these reasons I submit we are strictly on legal ground in bringing down this bill. I hope it will be only for a single year. The measure itself is so expressed; it will expire after the present year.

There is not unanimity among the judiciary themselves with regard to the measure. I have received letters supporting the proposal from a number of judges who desire to have this tax imposed upon them, or to make their contribution as others do; on the other hand, I have received communications from other judges objecting to the proposal. As I say, there is no unanimity among the judiciary in that respect. But judging the matter as a whole, reviewing the circumstances as we know them in this house since the bill was introduced, and particularly having regard to the desire on the part of everyone in Canada to reduce expenditure to the minimum, I believe the present bill is justified at this juncture and ought to be adopted.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Would the minister state why the judges should not have been brought under the general act?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think there is a very sound objection on constitutional grounds. I agree with my hon. friend who just spoke that the judges are in a class by themselves. They are not civil servants; they are not the servants of the crown, and the time may come when they will be the buffer between the crown and the people. I do not believe there should be any interference with a contract made with a man when he ascends the bench. We surround him with limitations. He cannot engage in trade; as my hon. friend pointed out, he cannot accept any public office and he cannot sit in the parliament of this country. To a very large extent he is removed from the ordinary people of his locality. He cannot practise the profession for which he has been trained, and to my mind it would be an unfair thing, after he has accepted office and continued therein for a number of years, by force of an act of parliament to say that although we made a bargain with him, now his salary is to be reduced without his consent. To my mind that would be an unconstitutional act.

We know that an effort was made last autumn to reduce the salaries of judges in Great Britain, and we know that when the matter was discussed and fully inquired into the better opinion, both of lawyers and laymen, was that it would not be proper to reduce the salaries of the judges. Many very able legal opinions were expressed to the effect that it would be unconstitutional to do so. That is my own view, and that is why I would not feel free to support a statutory reduction in the salaries of members of the judiciary.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not wish to enter into a controversy with my hon. friend, but it seems strange to me that since parliament from time to time has increased the salaries of judges after their appointment, it should not have the authority to reduce them.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is to the advantage of the judge. I submit that we are not permitted to do anything to his disadvantage.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Being only a layman I am not prepared to argue that point with my hon. friend, but it seems to me that parliament has complete authority, and if parliament has the power to increase the salary of a man who my hon. friend argues is under contract, and who accepted the position on the terms of that contract, surely he is also subject to a decrease if one becomes necessary.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, he is only obeying the will of parliament in that case.

Mr. POWER: I do not want to delay the house in connection with this item, but when the Minister of Finance was discussing the bill providing for the reduction in the salaries of civil servants he told us that this reduction was a contribution on the part of those civil servants. If that is the case I fail to see any distinction at all between the contribution made by way of reduction and the contribution made by a special income tax. The argument of the Minister of Justice that these men should not have their salaries reduced because they are precluded, by reason of their position, from taking part in public life or from carrying on the practice of law, to my mind applies equally well to this act which we are now discussing.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I submit that we have no power to reduce the salaries although, according to the decision of the privy council, we have power to impose a tax.

Mr. POWER: But the minister argued on the propriety of the matter, saying that we had no moral right to reduce the salaries of judges because of their peculiar position. Now he goes ahead and moves that we tax them an additional ten per cent. I confess that, having a mind not capable of drawing fine philosophical distinctions, I cannot see the difference. If I may state the point of view which I hold in this matter, I believe that the salaries of judges should have been subject to the reduction imposed on every other member of the service. I am sorry to disagree in this matter with my colleague from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). I believe the same thing should apply to the members of the naval and military forces; I cannot find anywhere in the act any special contract with the members of those forces which would prevent us from reducing their salaries.

I do believe that this legislation is perhaps the most vicious that has ever been introduced into this house, in that it discriminates between different classes of citizens and proposes to penalize certain people because they belong to a certain class. In other legislatures they take that action in connection with people who have become nuisances, such as hucksters, peddlers and people of that sort. We impose a special tax on them. We are now degrading those who should be the leaders in our social structure, the judges, members of the militia, members of the police force and others, to the level of common nuisances, and I protest against that action being taken.

Mr. DUFF: Just before the motion is agreed to, in section 1 of the bill I find the following words:

> 9a. (1) Notwithstanding anything contained in this act or in any other statute or law, the members of the judiciary and the members of the military, naval and air forces of Canada and of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, other than enlisted men, shall be liable to pay a special income tax of ten per centum upon the salaries paid to them by the Dominion of Canada.

Yesterday when the resolution upon which this bill is based was under consideration I tried to argue that, in my opinion, if this tax was to be imposed on civil servants and judges it should apply also to ex-judges and others who are receiving pensions. At that time I made the statement that one of the lieutenant-governors was also getting a pension. I find that while a pension was paid to that distinguished gentleman in 1931 it is not being paid this year, so in that statement I was slightly mistaken. However, I am still of the opinion that ex-judges drawing pensions should be liable to this tax just as much as anyone else should be. If I understood the argument of the Minister of Justice it was that the judges should not have a reduction of ten per cent under the general act which we passed yesterday because they were in a particular class, and were under contract. I think the same thing applies to members of parliament; I believe we are equally under contract, and if we could be brought in under Bill No. 19 I believe the judges should have been included under that measure as well.

I do believe that the ex-judges, who receive pensions totalling about $1,000,000, should come under this act. Looking at the estimates for 1932-33, in the list of those receiving pensions authorized by statute, appearing on page 23 I notice the name of J. D. Hyndman, who receives a pension of $6,000 as an ex-judge. I should like to know if this is the same gentleman who is chairman of the pension appeal tribunal and who, in that capacity, receives a salary of some $8,000 or $9,000.

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend will permit me, he does not draw his pension.

Mr. DUFF: Does my hon. friend say Mr. Hyndman does not draw his pension?

Mr. RHODES: I understand that the arrangement when he accepted the position was that this pension was to become a portion of his compensation, under his contract.

Mr. DUFF: My understanding is that his salary is $9,000 and that salary has been drawn since his appointment. As I said a moment ago, I hold in my hand the estimates for 1932-33, and in the first column under the heading of "1932-33" appears this gentleman's name with a pension of $6,000 opposite. I cannot understand why a gentleman who takes another position under the government should have his pension taken away. He has earned that pension for performing a certain public duty, just as the lieutenant-governor has earned his, and although it may be legal I cannot understand why the pension should not be paid this year when it was paid up until last year. I contend that these gentlemen who are receiving pensions as ex-judges should be treated in the same way as everyone else and although I will not move an amendment—I will leave it to the good judgment of the minister—I feel that after the word "judiciary" in the third line of section 9A there should be added the words "and ex-members of the judiciary to whom pensions are paid."

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that I entirely agree with the views expressed a short while ago by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). Judges have been placed in a special class, they have been deprived of numerous privileges that the humblest citizen of this country enjoys. To-day the government wish to levy a special tax on them. It is absolutely unjust and I think that the comments of the hon. member for Quebec East are quite to the point.

May I add a few words to the remarks made by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) to justify this measure. He stated that the need for additional revenue had necessitated this action. I wonder whether he is levying this special tax on the judges to enable him to meet the $2,000 increase which he granted to himself and his colleagues last year. To think that, in a crisis, when the revenues of Canada are not adequate to meeting the expenditures for administration, members of the government thought fit to vote themselves a salary increase of $2,000, and that, to-day, they state in the house that further revenue is required and a special tax of 10 per cent must be levied on judges to meet expenditure. If the government are sincere I would suggest to them to add to clause 9A of Bill 92, the names of the ministers of the crown, on whom an additional tax of 10 per cent would thus be levied on their salaries, as on that of the judges.

Mr. BOURASSA (Translation): Hear, hear. I entirely agree with the last remark of my hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Raymond). As a matter of fact, when, last summer, at the end of the session, the ministers voted themselves a salary increase, I was the only one to protest. Not one Liberal rose to protest.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): I was not in the house.

Mr. BOURASSA (Translation): Was it because they had only shortly dropped out of power, or because they expected soon to be in power again; however, the fact is that my weak voice was the only one to protest against this increase.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): The government chose a moment when no Liberal member was in the house.

Mr. BOURASSA (Translation): Pardon me, there were quite a number of them. The hon. member was absent, but others were here.

As to the tax levied on judges, let us be fair. One may calmly comment on judges' salaries, however, for the same reason which the hon. member for Beauharnois has just pointed out, under present circumstances, I contend that it is neither fair to the judges, nor to the army and navy officers, nor to any class whatsoever of the community, to state that, in the present crisis, they should be exempt from shouldering their share of the public burden. If we wish to guard against the feelings of public hatred and distrust spreading against the leading classes, it behooves us not to advertise in our legislation and budget that we exempted certain classes on account of the position they occupy.

One hears: Judges are deprived of the right to exercise their franchise. Is it to penalize them that they are so deprived? Quite the contrary, it is to more clearly bring out the importance of the duties they discharge and shield them from the criticism of public opinion, it is to place them, so to speak, on a higher plane than the masses. It is not a punishment but an acknowledgment of the importance of their duties and the impartiality they are expected to show towards everybody.

Judges, at times, are called upon to decide on political cases. Take for instance the Controverted Elections Act, by which parliament desists from its inherent and constitutional right to decide upon legislative functions. It has transferred to the courts the exclusive right of passing judgment on all controverted election matters or the obtaining of a parliamentary mandate by corrupt or other underhand means. Why was this done? So as to make it clear that the intention was to defer to an absolutely unbiased mind, the duty of carrying out a legislative mandate.

And in order to enable judges to discharge impartially this all important duty, which, to some extent, is linked with the parliamentary mandate, they were removed from the seat of political strife. That is why they do not exercise their right to the franchise. I think it would be a mistake to look upon this loss, by which judges are disfranchised, as belittling their office. Quite the contrary it is an acknowledgment—how shall I express it—it is a recognition of the importance of their office, it is a mark of respect extended to them. However, to conclude from this that, in a country—whether one likes it or not—in a democratic country a particular class of public servants—I use the word in its broadest sense—a particular class of public servants—whether they be lieutenant-governors, who are after all officials appointed by the Dominion government, or judges designated to their post by the Dominion government to carry out duties which are assigned to them by parliament, or again whether they are army or navy officers, who are so delegated by parliament to maintain peace or defend their country, why, I wonder, under the present circumstances, should we exempt them from contributing their quota to the public exchequer? Again do I say that the hon. member for Beauharnois was perfectly justified in stating that it was highly improper on the part of the ministers of the crown to grant themselves a salary increase, and it was a very improper thing for parliament to unanimously endorse this increase. But the fact of having blundered last year in this connection, is not a reason to blunder to-day and proclaim to the country, when thousands of needy people are unable to find food for their everyday subsistence, that a certain class of people who happen to be wearing a three-cornered hat, or sit on the bench will be exempted or that another class of people who parade the streets with decorations on their breast, or again others who are travelling on ships either on the Atlantic or the Pacific, paid by the government to idle away the time, must be exempted from carrying their share of the burden. No, the time has come when all classes must shoulder their share of the burden.

As to the aim of this measure, I entirely approve what the government has stated or rather what it is doing to-day. It is possible that they are doing so to cover their retreat, that they are presenting it under the guise of income tax, instead of doing what would have been the right thing, namely: reduce the salaries of judges and officers like those of other civil servants. However, there is an old English proverb which applies to all public administrations: "Let them down easy." The moment they perform a worthy act I have no fault to find whether they slip out by the side door instead of coming through the front door. The fact that the result attained is the same, that all classes of the community contribute to the public fund, to the liabilities of the state, gives us sufficient ground to approve them and, for my part, I do it heartily.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I do not deem it necessary to repeat the arguments put forth by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) in support of the bill under consideration. Moreover, we have just had the approval of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) who stated that he would support this measure.

I think it only fair to reply to the statements of the hon. members for Beauharnois and Labelle, when they say: It was very improper, when, last year, the ministers of the crown voted themselves a salary increase.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): The ministers' salary increase cannot be discussed, because the question has no reference to the present debate. I might allow the hon. Minister of Marine to reply to the remarks of the hon. members for Beauharnois and Labelle, however, I do not wish to allow a discussion contrary to the rules.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): Mr. Chairman, the question came up because it was contended that the ministers of the crown should be taxed to-day on this $2,000. I think that the hon. members did not actually understand the measure adopted last year. If the two hon. members who preceded me in this debate had taken the trouble to examine the public accounts in order to ascertain the expenditure in connection with ministers' motor cars, under the Liberal régime, they would have found that instead of a sum of $2,000 per year, each minister had expended, up to the time the Conservative party assumed power, $3,000, $4,000 and even $5,000 per year for salaries of chauffeurs, gasoline, repairs, purchase of motor cars, etc., etc.

Mr. BOURASSA (Translation): That depended on the ministers.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): This measure was adopted, last year, with the view of economizing, and nothing else. Instead of making an outlay between $80,000 and $100,000 per year for motor cars in the service of ministers of the crown, we fixed an amount of about $40,000 per year, or to be more exact of $38,000 which means a saving of about 75 to 100 per cent. That is all that was done. I think that hon. members should allow their leader, the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) to do the criticizing, for when the measure was adopted—

Mr. BOURASSA (Translation): He is not my leader.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): —if my memory serves me right, the hon. leader of the opposition was present in the house, and no opposition was registered, because everybody seemed to understand that the government was cutting down expenditure by introducing this measure.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I closely followed the remarks made by the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau). I am rather amazed that he did not reply to certain comments made by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), with reference to people who slip on a gown and sit on the bench. It is perhaps somewhat a disrespectful way of speaking of the judges of Quebec and Canada. I can well understand that the hon. member for Labelle was somewhat carried away by his own eloquence, however, I think, if we wish the people to treat with due respect our judges, they must not be treated disrespectfully by the Canadian parliament. That is why I am astonished that the hon. Minister of Marine did not in this respect reply to the comments made by the hon. member for Labelle, since he rose to speak immediately after him.

In my humble opinion it was wrong to exclude in the first place the judges from the act as regards salary deduction. In a previous debate, I expressed the view that judges themselves would suggest to the government this reduction in order to help the budget during the present crisis, and we feel quite certain that no judge protested either to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) or to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), in that connection.

A number of civil servants draw a pension while receiving a salary or fees for work performed in another position; I have no comments to make as to that. On the other hand, how does it happen that the pension to which a lieutenant-governor is entitled is not paid to him? This is what one might call "discrimination." It is not likely that under the circumstances, the lieutenant-governor in question, for whom I have the greatest regard, would take any step whatsoever to have his pension paid to him, however a pension is simply a continuation of one's salary. If the judges do not receive a higher salary, it is, no doubt, because when they retire from the bench, they are entitled. to a pension which permits them to end their days in peace and tranquility. This pension forms a sequel to their salary and the country owes it to them. It seems to me that if there has been shown some discrimination between civil servants and certain judges the right hon. Prime Minister and his cabinet will not let pass the first opportunity to rectify this misunderstanding, the wrong or injustice which may have been done.

The hon. Minister of Marine stated that we had not understood the real aim of the indemnity intituled "Allowance in lieu of automobiles." This is not very flattering for his colleagues of the house who have not, according to him, sufficient brain development to comprehend the legislation which is submitted to them. My learned colleague, I admit, is my senior at the bar, he has a great deal of experience as I stated—perhaps I have not clearly expressed myself. I stated that the two hon members who had found fault with the measure did not seem to grasp the object the government had in view. I did not state that the house had not understood the measure since they had adopted it.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I beg the hon. member's pardon. I think that he has not quite followed my argument;

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I wish to thank the hon. minister for his explanation. He first stated that the hon. members for Labelle and Beauharnois had not grasped the purport of the measure and further that I had not followed his argument. Then, we are all in the same class. He stated that it was legislation aiming at cutting down expenditure, I rather think that it is a measure of petty savings. That is not a distinction so very subtle that it may not be understood except by superior minds; it will appeal even to the uneducated. And this is why: Last year, at a time when the crisis was being felt and when the then Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson) had stated that there were 540,000 unemployed in the country, and at a time when the revenues of the country were decreasing owing to our imports having materially decreased, at a time also when our trade was threatened, the government advocated economy, we shall practise it ourselves and the first step we shall take to carry out this program will be to have a yearly amount of $2,000 voted to each minister of the crown to replace the cost of an automobile.

You are, sir, no doubt aware that each minister is entitled to a certain amount which is known as contingencies—

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): I drew the attention of the hon. Minister of Marine, a short while ago to the fact that ministers' salary increases should not be made the subject of a debate; one may perhaps discuss this question by making comparisons but not from the viewpoint of the measure itself.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I am not, sir, discussing the merit of the $2,000 question, but I think we can surely determine what are the exact salaries of the ministers, to-day, so as to compare them with what they were previous to the enactment of this legislation; that is why we are obliged to judge of such questions on their merits. When this additional amount of $2,000 per year was voted to each minister, it was then held that it was not an increase in salary, but a compensation. Nevertheless the salary or indemnity of ministers was increased by $2,000, which means that ministers are drawing from the treasury, since last year, the sum of $14,400, while previously they only drew $14,000. They therefore receive $400 more.

Note well, sir, that it is contended everywhere that the salary and the indemnity of ministers added together amount to a large sum. That is not my view. In Canada, as in other countries, but especially in England, cabinet ministers should receive £5,000 sterling or about $25,000 per year, in normal times; but let us bear in mind that we are undergoing a crisis. It is not the time to increase the salaries of ministers when those of civil servants are reduced. Here, in the house, must this reduction only bear upon the members who are receiving $400 less without affecting the ministers who receive $400 more? Who is the member whose indemnity reduced by $400 increases that of the minister by the same amount? If my indemnity is reduced to-day, $400, what minister will benefit by it? Is it the hon. Minister of Marine? Why should the minister benefit more than I, a poor man. I am obliged to sacrifice $400 to further enrich the hon. Minister of Marine.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): I am also a poor man.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Will my hon. friend, the distinguished member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger), who is also a poor man, have to sacrifice $400 for the benefit of the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé)? I do not contend that the hon. Postmaster General or the hon. Minister of Marine are too wealthy, quite the contrary; I simply wish to bring out the facts. Where is the member who is going to contribute $400 as an additional grant to our international traveller the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré)? Where is the member who wishes to sacrifice $400 of his indemnity to make a gift to the Solicitor General or any other minister? Perhaps, also, the government will withhold $400 from the indemnity of my hon. friend, the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), of my hon. friend, the member for L'Islet (Mr. Fafard), of my hon. friend, the member for Kamouraska (Mr. Bouchard), or again of my hon. friend, the member for Hull (Mr. Fournier), or of my hon. friend the member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Fontaine), and hand it over to these ministers?

There are among our fellow citizens well known business men. To whom will my hon. friend the member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) have to hand over his $400 or rather for whom will he be despoiled of his $400? For what minister? Most likely for the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) who represents a county where there are numerous Israelites. Then my hon. friend from the county of Cartier will have to pay $400 to a gentleman who represents a county where many of his compatriots reside. I spy my hon. friend from British Columbia, the member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) whose wealth is on a par with ours, to whom will go his $400. Probably to the hon. minister without a portfolio (Sir George Perley) who is also one of our international travellers.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): Order! I think the hon. member for Témiscouata should confine his remarks to the question.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The enumeration would be endless; so many things could be said. This measure is absurd and of a nature to bring discredit on the government. I am sufficiently well acquainted with the right hon. Prime Minister and his colleagues to know that they have no intention—to use a popular term—to fatten up at the government's expense. I do not deny that there may have been some abuse in connection with automobiles. I am not discussing this point at present; however, in a crisis the ministers who are responsible for the legislation in this house should first practise on themselves what an illustrious Japanese admiral, Admiral Nogi called "Hari-Kari". Should not the members of the government follow this example?

If the cut in the indemnity is necessary, I think the ministers should be the first to set the example.

It is not that the indemnity they receive for the duties they discharge is out of proportion; however, in a crisis ministers should not simply be satisfied with sacrificing the members and the civil servants of this country.

The right hon. Prime Minister, on his return from England, last year, made a statement, which was published by the Canadian press, and in which he appealed to private charity. Private charity responded most readily. People put into practice this admirable saying of Christ: "Love your neighbour as yourself and love one another." People helped one another. Numerous charitable societies did marvellous deeds and private individuals made sacrifices to help their fellow citizens who were in poverty How was this charity carried out? By practising the most rigid economy. The 10 per cent taken, to-day, from the civil servants went to charity. One may think that 10 per cent is not much yet, throughout all the cities of Canada, in all the parishes and most remote villages, people set aside the poor man's share, expended a certain sum of money, part of their salary or income to feed those who were hungry, to quench the thirst of those who were thirsty and shelter those who had no home.

To-day with a cut of 10 per cent in their salaries, will private charity be able to do as much, in cooperation with the government, as it did previously? Future will tell; however, we are inclined to believe that this salary reduction is untimely, that it has set a poor example to the country's capitalists whose eyes are always riveted on the tower of parliament, at Ottawa, and who eagerly read the newspapers so as to take their cue from higher up, from here, on Parliament Hill. I shall not add anything further in this respect; however, previous to closing my remarks, I wish to make a humble suggestion to the government, as regards economy. Salaries have been cut down, a number of civil servants have been dismissed—

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): Order!

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I earnestly think, sir—

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Translation): The hon. member for Témiscouata should confine his remarks to the subject under discussion.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): May I, sir, make a suggestion as regards economy? The bill under discussion is one which, it is said, is inspired by motives of economy. The suggestion which I want to make will, perhaps, prevent the salary reduction of a certain number of civil servants, and, perhaps, will also spare the judges the annoyance which some of them might feel in having their salary reduced, notwithstanding that most of them are ready to sacrifice themselves on the country's altar. The following is a suggestion, one of a practical order. It is short but constructive although being of destructive nature. It is of a constructive nature in the sense that it will enable the government to realize an appreciable saving. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the fifth wheel of the coach be done away with.

You are aware, sir, that a vehicle rolls very easily on four wheels and the fifth wheel which is known as the "spare" is not indispensable.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): What is the fifth wheel?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The fifth wheel is the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré).

We have had, sir, since August, 1930, as Solicitor General, a gentleman who was silent during the whole of last session.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): Order! order!

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I beg of you, sir, to allow me to continue my remarks. You will note that my argument is truly to the point.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): But it does not appear to me to refer to the bill under discussion.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): By accepting, sir, the suggestion which I am going to make there will be no further need of reducing the salaries of lieutenant-governors or judges. That is where my remarks refer to the question under discussion.

The hon. Solicitor General, since August 1930, has been the minister of the defeated candidates in Quebec. His part has been absolutely useless in the house. Last year, he was silent, and, this year, the government dispensed with his services, and according to the press, his leader did not forbid him to talk through his hat, but warned him not to talk through his large beaver hat. He played a useless part in Canada and also in Europe. That is why I request that the office of Solicitor General be done away with. His predecessor, the Hon. Lucien Cannon, pleaded a number of important cases before the Supreme Court, the Exchequer Court and the Privy Council. The present Solicitor General has not been called upon to plead any. He costs the country $40,000 per year. He has numerous secretaries. There is one to listen to what people are saying, another to interview those who come to his office, and another to reply to them. He is surrounded with a body guard, and reminds me of the former Czar Ferdinand of Bulgaria who never travelled without an armed guard. I do not wish to comment on the intellectual gifts of the Solicitor General, however, I think that the government would gain by dispensing with his services or, if the government are desirous of keeping him in their midst or circle, I would suggest that he be appointed Minister of Fisheries. That would be quite appropriate, because at least in Quebec, the fisheries would not fall under his control and he could therefore do no harm.

To sum up, sir, my suggestion is this: I think that, under the circumstances, the position of Solicitor General could be advantageously abolished, and the income could be distributed among charitable societies, such as the Red Cross, the Salvation Army, the St. Vincent de Paul and all the charitable societies which are doing so much good in this country. I have no personal ill-feeling against the Solicitor General. Personally, he seems to be a charming man, but here in the house we are obliged to consider things on their merits, and as, in my opinion, he has not done anything praiseworthy or wrong since he occupies his high office, I think the country would be better off if his services were dispensed with, within the shortest delay possible.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure, with other members of the committee, I am under a great obligation to the hon. member for Témiscouata for his voluminous exposition of the principles and the law that govern in a case of this kind. The classic defence of the position of a judge in this house was made by the late Judge Doherty. He was appointed to the bench when he was a young man of thirty-five or thereabouts. He served his fifteen years and was entitled to two-thirds of his salary as a pension which gave him $3,333.33 per annum. He was subsequently elected to parliament and later he became a minister of the crown. He was attacked in the old House of Commons for having received his pension while he was in receipt of pay as a member of parliament and as a minister of the crown. If hon. gentlemen are interested, they will find his defence recorded upon the pages of Hansard of that time. Shortly put—and I do not think it can be improved upon—it was this: that having entered into a contract with the crown to assume the obligations of judge, one of the terms of the contract being that after a certain number of years had elapsed he should receive a pension, he was entitled to that, having discharged his duties to the satisfaction of those to whom he was responsible and that no question could thereafter be raised because he was receiving the compensation provided for by the contract. The position with regard to judges is just that. They are not the servants of the crown; they are not the servants of the government. Under the Act of Settlement they occupy a very peculiar position. They are the administrators of the law; they constitute that branch of our government which we speak of as the judicial branch; they interpret our statutes and they administer the laws.

When my colleague the Minister of Justice said that it was not regarded as sound to decrease the compensation which judges receive by way of salary, he but stated a truism which might be indicated in another way. The contract is that they shall receive not less than (blank) dollars. However much more they may receive is for parliament to determine, but the contract of service is that they shall not receive less. In but two instances, I think, in all the history of the judicial branch of government in Great Britain has there been a reduction in salary and we recall in the early days the Master of the Rolls occupied a somewhat peculiar position. For many years he occupied a seat in the House of Commons and he was also Master of the Rolls. The Lord Chancellor to-day, of course occupying the highest position in the judicial branch of government in Great Britain, is also a political officer, being a member of the cabinet. The considerations that prevail here and in other overseas dominions with respect to the payment of salaries have no application in Great Britain, but the contract of every judge of every superior court in this country is that he shall receive not less than the stipulated sum provided for at the time he assumes office. In other words, if he gives up his practice at the bar and becomes a judge, there are two considerations that he must weigh before he takes the step. One is the salary, which will not be less than the sum provided by statute, and secondly, he has a retiring allowance which will not be less than the sum provided by statute. That completes the contract, and the reason the steps suggested were not taken when this measure with respect to the public service generally was submitted to this house was just what I have indicated. In Great Britain where, under the statute to which I made reference on that occasion, action was taken reducing the salaries of the judges by ten per cent, it was at once realized that a mistake had been made and in a very learned article that appeared in the Law Quarterly Review the reasons why that action should not have been taken were very clearly stated. Notwithstanding the observations made by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) it will be found at page 562 of Hansard for February 26 of this year that I made this observation:

> The judges are not included in this measure. It has been contended by legal authority, and an article in the last issue of the Law Quarterly Review goes into the matter rather fully, that it would be a breach of the statutory rights of judges to undertake to make a curtailment in their salaries in this way. There are, however, other methods by which the matter may be dealt with, and the government has not finally determined what action it may take in that regard.

In other words, as long ago as the twenty-sixth of February when the resolution upon which the bill is founded was being introduced into this house, I had indicated that there were other methods by which the end might be accomplished. We were not prepared to break a contract. We were not prepared to determine by act of this parliament that the conditions under which the judges had undertaken to serve the state in their capacity as judicial officers should be set at naught, but I indicated that there were other methods by which, if thought desirable, the judges could be placed on an equality with other public servants, using the words public servants in the largest sense, in equality of sacrifice. Immediately after the resolution was introduced and while it was still pending in this house, some of the judges wrote to my colleague, the Minister of Justice, others wrote to myself, and others to other members of the administration, saying that they desired at this time of stress and strain to make a contribution to the revenues of this country equivalent to ten per cent of their salaries. I may say for the information of this committee, Mr. Chairman, that the first letter I received was from a county court judge who had appeared before a special committee appointed by this house and given evidence as to the inadequacy of existing judicial salaries, pointing out that he could not with his family live on the salary he was receiving. Yet the first letter that I received from any judge suggesting that he would like to make a contribution of ten per cent of his salary to the state at this time came from that same judge. I thought that was a manifestation of a rather fine spirit. A chief justice was next, and there were other judges in all parts of the country. I will not say that the majority of them, because that would not be fair, and it would also be untrue, but several judges indicated their desire to make a contribution at this time of ten per cent of their salaries for the year. After it became apparent that numbers of them desired to make a contribution in that sense, the government in view of the expressions of opinion from all parts of this house—for instance, if the ex-Minister of Justice and those associated with him had seen fit to make as strong observations with respect to interference in any way with judges' salaries as we have heard this afternoon, it is not probable that so strong an inference might have been drawn—

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I interject and say that I am sorry I was not present when the discussion took place. I intended to differ and disagree in the house with many of the things that had been said, but the question did not come up again.

Mr. BENNETT: I accept at once my hon. friend's statement that he was not in the house when the matter came up, but certainly there were no expressions of opinion such as we have listened to to-day as to the undesirability of judges making a contribution this year to the public revenues. That is all that might fairly be said about the matter.

I would like to say that I am one of those who in this house and outside of it, and I speak with some measure of diffidence because of the positions I have occupied in my profession—it is somewhat difficult to speak as one really feels because it looks like special pleading—have often said that the judges of this country are not adequately paid. The result has been a judicial body which does not as a whole reflect the genius of the legal profession in this country. I say that with very great frankness. I say that we should be able to improve the standard of judicial excellence in Canada. We have large numbers of judges by reason of the fact that we have a dual system. We, the federal power, appoint, and the provincial power determines the numbers. The result is that in almost every province of Canada there are more judges than there should be, and instead of a few highly trained minds upon the bench you have large numbers of indifferent minds upon the bench administering justice. In the very nature of things that would be so.

The other day we had a striking illustration of the attitude of the British mind towards a position on the bench. One of the most eminent judges of our time, one who is a hereditary peer and occupied a great judicial position, a man who came to this country some years ago, had said years ago that if the time ever came when any criticism was urged as to his age he would retire. When a resolution came before the House of Commons in England to increase the number of judges because it was found that for the moment judicial business was somewhat congested, the resolution passed after a speech had been delivered by the Solicitor General which invoked from one of the members a eulogy upon the subject which he said had induced him to change his mind. He went on and made certain criticisms with respect to the age of this learned law lord, and the result was that within a few days, as you may have seen in the press, that distinguished jurist retired from his position. That is the effect of public opinion at once reflected upon the mind of a high-minded man who occupied as great a place in the judiciary as has fallen to the lot of any man to occupy in recent years. He retired at once under those circumstances.

In Canada there has grown up in recent years a tendency to criticize the judiciary unfairly. I attribute that to two things. First, the inadequacy of the salary makes it impossible to attract to the bench the best legal minds we have. Secondly, and I am saying this in no over-critical sense or as indicating one party more than another, there has been too much political patronage concerned in appointments to the bench. The result has been that the test whether a man is entitled to a seat on the bench has seemed to be whether he has run an election and lost it. Very often that has been so. If he has run an election and won it, peradventure he should not look for a seat on the bench because he can better serve his country in some other capacity. I know of cases in which eminent members of the bar have indicated that men who were wholly unfitted for judicial positions, as appeared within a very short time after their appointment, have been appointed to the bench. That happened because of a variety of circumstances and very often from the sense of obligation that men feel to those who have served their party with great faithfulness. In England on one occasion in the last fifty years there was a slight departure from the rule which governs, and the chancellor of that time was severely criticized for the action he had taken. It is also true that in this country there has been a very great deal of criticism with respect to judicial appointments because it has been felt in few cases has the test been the merit of the appointee. To get away from that in a new democracy is not an easy thing. No one knows the difficulty better than I. Under those circumstances I think we must continue to try to secure the best available material because I still hold that of the three branches of government the judicial is the most important. This legislative branch can undo to-morrow what it has done to-day, and it frequently does—although it does not do it so quickly as to-day and to-morrow. The executive charged with its responsibility also may change and undo what has been done. The judicial branch, if it follows the common law system by which precedents, that is the decisions of the courts, are binding upon inferior courts, cannot readily undo to-morrow what has been done to-day. One of the great poets of the Victorian era, the poet laureate, made some observations touching these myriads of precedents which have so great an apparent effect upon the minds of men, and so govern the administration of justice, these precedents, these decisions, these judicial interpretations, these determine what the language of a statute really means.

For instance, to-day we pass a statute which may seem very clear to some hon. members. They may have no difficulty in understanding what it means, but in the end the judges of this country must be able, without the aid of Hansard—because the courts have ruled that Hansard cannot be referred to in the courts to ascertain the intention of the legislature. The intention of a legislature as expressed in words in debate has no effect, but the intention as manifested by the language employed and interpreted in the light of preceding decisions must determine what the legislature meant.

Let us for example consider the two words "trade" and "commerce" which appear in subsection 2 of section 91 of the British North America Act. When the case of Parsons versus the Queen went to the privy council the interpretation of the words trade and commerce had to be considered. It was found that the meaning of the words trade and commerce had been determined in a statute passed in the reign of Queen Anne. There hon. members have a precedent indicating the power and strength of a judicial decision applied to an act passed in 1867, where words similar to those used in that act had been used in the days of Queen Anne and had been given a particular meaning which governed the interpretation of an act passed in 1867. Thus in our courts we find that where similar words are employed in statutes and they have already been judicially interpreted, that interpretation continues.

So under those circumstances, in this highly developed civilization, the demand for highly trained minds becomes greater. The compensation which men of our profession receive for the services they render to-day are, some people think, out of all proportion to the actual value of the services. I think possibly the complaint is not wholly unfounded. I think it may not be untruly said that perhaps some members of our profession are more highly paid than they should be; that may well be said. It must also be realized, however, that in the hands of the members of our profession there rests a tremendous responsibility, and that no consideration of fear, favour or affection must govern them in the discharge of their duty. From that body, from the legal profession, must be recruited the bench. That is why I take it the ex-Minister of Justice has very properly said we are so desirous of maintaining the standards in the legal profession, because those standards are reflected in those obtaining on the bench.

The salaries paid to members of the bench are wholly inadequate—wholly inadequate. They do not attract to the bench the best minds. However, as the ex-minister has said there is never a dearth of candidates for judicial office. It is remarkable that while salaries are poor, the remuneration small compared with what they might have received from practising their profession, the sense of security and dignity, and the certainty of a retiring allowance will attract men to the bench.

Having in mind the great traditions of the legal profession, the fine traditions of the bench, the services it had rendered to mankind, the services it had rendered in Canada in the interpretation of our constitution and the determination of justice between contending parties, as well as the administration of our criminal laws, it is not unfair, is it, to think that with that security, that dignity and that retiring allowance they should make for this year a contribution in keeping with that made by their fellows of the state? I certainly feel, probably more strongly than hon. members opposite, that their salaries must not be touched. In my judgment their salaries could not be decreased but they could be increased. However when it came to a question of making a contribution when others had done so and were doing so, when others had offered to do so and were doing so, in order that there might be no invidious distinctions or that we might not create differences or, shall I say, unfair criticism, making it difficult for two members of the same bench to discuss questions with one another without one thinking that the other was endeavouring to enhance his own position at the expense of the other, we, by the exercise of power conferred upon us by statute, to raise money by taxation, are imposing that tax upon the judicial class, the bench, upon army, navy and police officers, the last three having offered voluntarily to have the deduction made from their salaries. How can it be said that that is discriminatory legislation any more than it could be said if I imposed a tax upon any man who went into a theatre to-night; certainly, he who goes into the theatre pays it. He who does not, does not. You discriminate, certainly, against the man who attends the theatre, and you collect from him a tax. You collect none from the man who does not go to the theatre. So far as that is concerned, the man who occupies a position on the bench contributes ten per cent, and he who does not does not.

I was rather surprised to hear the ex-Minister of Justice suggest that the principle of taxation without representation had any application here. Taxation without representation never applied to individuals or their avocations. If so the form of government that has been commended so strongly at times in the province of Alberta would have its justification, for then indeed you would have to have a class government in which every class would be represented. The House of Commons would not be complete, in such case, if every class, every occupation and profession did not have here a representative. That is not taxation without representation. Taxation without representation means that the great body of the people cannot be taxed until that same great body of people has the right and opportunity to express themselves through their representative.

This House of Commons reflects the whole opinion of the nation not any part of it. It reflects every vocation and every profession, and not any one of them; it reflects them all. The minute this parliament passes any taxing law, that minute it exercises the power reposed in it by the whole body of the nation. The old philosophic principle as to how the rule of majorities came into being finds expression there, and once the majority has acted then the statute is a statute of the Canadian people, and not of one party or of a majority in the house. So all the people find representation through that tradition which goes back at least six hundred or seven hundred years as to the rule of majorities and which has been discussed in so scholarly a manner by one of the members of our profession who investigated the foundations of our institutions.

Now, I think on sober reflection it will be found that most of the members of the judiciary, ill-paid though they are, will realize, and gladly realize, that this affords to them an opportunity, not to render to Caesar what is due to Caesar, but by the application of a law to every member of the judiciary, and alike to every member of the military, to make that contribution which is made by members of the public service. That is what is aimed at, that is what is secured. I have no doubt as to the validity of the power, I have no doubt as to the completeness of the authority, that rests upon this parliament to do it.

As to the propriety of it, as I have said, there seems to be no doubt when all in three classes, and substantial numbers in the other, have expressed not only willingness but an earnest desire that they might be able to participate in the work of rehabilitation in this period of depression by making their contribution to the revenues of Canada. It is in that sense and for that purpose that this legislation is submitted. Had it not been felt as strongly as we can feel any matter that could be established by reason of our conviction as to its soundness, that to reduce salaries would be a wholly improper exercise of power and an invasion of the independence of the judiciary, we would have dealt with them as the other members have been dealt with.

One word more as to the office of lieutenant-governor. I will not traverse the ground I dealt with the other evening, but I have received at least one communication from a lieutenant-governor saying he would have to leave his position even if this ten per cent reduction were made, for the reason, as the ex-Minister of Justice has said, that the salaries provided for lieutenant-governors are the salaries provided in 1867, or later in the case of the newer provinces; none of them bear any relation to the cost and expense of maintaining the office. I know of no lieutenant-governor with whom I have had any conversation or discussion who at the end of his term of office has not found himself indebted to his own private means for some sum, sometimes small, sometimes large, depending upon his sense of obligation with respect to the hospitality he dispenses.

With regard to pensions, these are not reduced by this legislation. Pensions are a matter of contract. To reduce a pension would violate the condition which I referred to a moment ago. There is the case to which the member for Antigonish-Guysborough referred, and which is within the memory of some members of this house, where we were unable to secure a chairman for the pensions appeal court. There are members in this house who might have filled that position if they so desired, but the salary was so inadequate that they would not leave their professional activities for the purpose. Some suggested that a salary of less than $1,000 a month would be wholly inadequate. We had to find a judge, not sixty years of age, who had served fifteen years so as not to sacrifice his retiring allowance, and who would be willing to serve in that difficult position. If I say we went over the entire list from one end of the country to the other and ultimately secured the gentleman of whom the member for Antigonish-Guysborough has spoken, I state the fact was known to most of us. I know that when the hon. gentleman said that a retired judge who had accepted a lieutenant-governship received his pension last year, he must have realized that that retired judge received his pension up to the time he was appointed lieutenant-governor. For my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Justice will realize that in the case of the lieutenant-governor of Saskatchewan it was determined that on a true construction of the statute he was not entitled to receive a retiring allowance while acting as lieutenant-governor; and the successors of the former lieutenant-governor of Alberta as well as of Quebec, who occupied seats on the bench, at once ceased to draw any retiring allowance by virtue of having accepted those positions under the crown. Therefore so far as they are concerned they have received no retiring allowance since they were appointed lieutenant-governors. There are members of the house receiving substantial pensions, for services rendered to the state. No one suggests for a moment that there should be any deduction from those pensions. They had a right under the statute, if for ill-health or otherwise, on a proper compliance with the terms of the law to receive a pension of maybe $3,000, $4,000, $5,000 or $6,000 per annum. They pay income tax upon their pensions. Their pension is part of their income together with their sessional indemnity. But to reduce that pension thus earned is to interfere with an executed contract; for the contract was executed when the term of service called for by the statute had been ended and the right to the emolument completed.

That is all I have to observe with respect to this matter. I think my record with regard to the judiciary is perhaps so well known that my friends opposite to the immediate right have sometimes thought that because of my professional associations and relations I felt that the salaries should be placed far beyond what was reasonable. I still hold strongly to the view, and I desire to express my conviction as strongly as I possibly can, that the judges of this country are underpaid, and that we can never hope to make up the court of final resort which the ex-Minister of Justice has spoken of in times gone by until we are able to attract by suitable salaries during their period of active service and by adequate retiring allowances thereafter men of outstanding position in the profession, men who are leaders of the bar in the provinces whence they come. That is my profound conviction. Even in this period of depression I think no money is better spent than in placing upon the bench those who are best able to interpret the law. It is always an advantage too, for the litigant, because of the fewer appeals necessary to set right wrongs that ill practised and badly informed men execute.

Resolved, that any enactment founded upon the foregoing resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the seventh day of April, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-two, and to have applied to all goods mentioned in the foregoing resolution imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that date and to have applied to goods previously imported for consumption for which no entry for consumption was made before that date.

[Mr. Bennett]

Mr. RHODES: There is one amendment which I will ask my hon. friend the Minister of National Revenue to move.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I move that subsection (v) of tariff item 409q, as introduced in resolution No. 1, of April 6, 1932, be amended to read as follows:

(v) For the implements or machinery enumerated in tariff item 409k, British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 17½ per cent.

Mr. RHODES: That merely eliminates 409i, which has no reference to parts and therefore has no reference to this section.

Amendment agreed to.

Tariff Item		British Preferential Tariff	Intermediate Tariff	General Tariff
549	Wool, the hair of the camel, alpaca, goat or other like animal, not further prepared than combed.. .. .. ..per pound Provided, that importations under this item, wholly the product of any British country, when imported direct from the United Kingdom into a sea, lake or river port of Canada, shall be entitled to the benefits of the British preferential tariff.	Free	10 cts.	15 cts.
599	Hides and skins, raw whether dry, salted or pickled; and raw pelts.. .. .. Provided, the importations under this item, wholly the product of any British country, when imported direct from the United Kingdom into a sea, lake or river port of Canada, shall be entitled to the benefits of the British preferential tariff.	Free	10 p.c.	15 p.c.

Mr. RALSTON: I note two changes from the item as it was last year. In the first place the date is extended to March, 1933.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend is dealing with the wrong item. The one to which he refers has been passed, but I have no objection to his discussing it.

Mr. RALSTON: The date is extended to March, 1933, and the words "under regulations prescribed by the minister" have been inserted. Those were not in the old item.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so. That was necessary to make sure that the intent of the original item was carried out.

Mr. RALSTON: Has the minister in mind what sort of regulations may be necessary?

Mr. RHODES: For example, that section was intended to permit the importation of parts for machines which had been purchased in the United States. Under it, however, parts of all kinds, for all kinds of machines, could be imported. The regulation was intended to make it clear that the intent of the original resolution should be carried out.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried.

Mr. YOUNG: We want to know the reason for this duty on raw wool.

Mr. RHODES: This is to implement the undertakings which arise out of the New Zealand treaty.

Resolution as amended agreed to.

Resolved, that Schedule A to the Customs Tariff, as amended by Resolution No. 1 of the sixth day of April, 1932, being a resolution to amend the Customs Tariff, be further amended by striking thereout tariff items 549 and 599, and by inserting in said Schedule A the following items, enumerations and rates of duty:—

Mr. YOUNG: Have the woollen men been consulted?

Mr. RHODES: As much as they can be in the circumstances which surround the negotiating and signing of the treaty.

Mr. YOUNG: What I have in mind is this: I believe this duty will be collected on wool coming from any country but New Zealand, but we import certain kinds of wool from China for the making of carpets. Wool of that kind is not produced in New Zealand, but from now on we are to have a duty of 15 per cent against the raw materials entering into the manufacture of carpets.

Mr. RHODES: The question of wool for carpets, mentioned by my hon. friend is under consideration at the present time. If the circumstances are as related by the hon. gentleman, as I think they are, it is quite competent for us to deal with the matter by order in council.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried.

Mr. YOUNG: No, we are still considering item 599.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 599 has been adopted. Items 409, 549 and 599 have been all adopted.

Mr. VENIOT: I think we have been proceeding too rapidly. If item 599 has been adopted it has not been so understood on this side of the house.

Mr. RHODES: I have no objection to a further discussion, if my hon. friend desires it.

Mr. YOUNG: This item has not been adopted at all.

The CHAIRMAN: These resolutions have been adopted. I have no objection to a discussion on them, if the committee consents to it, but I must say they have been adopted.

Mr. YOUNG: There has been a misunderstanding in the matter. We commenced to discuss these items, and at the request of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth the minister went back to the former item. When that discussion was concluded you called "carried" and we thought you were dealing with the former item. I believe that is the situation.

Mr. RHODES: I think that is how it came about, but I can assure the committee that I have no desire to shut off any discussion on these matters.

Mr. YOUNG: Item 599 puts a duty on hides and skins which formerly came in free. Will the minister explain that change?

Mr. RHODES: The answer I gave a moment ago applies in this case also. This is part of the agreement under the New Zealand treaty.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the minister explain how we are going to get our hides for certain specific purposes, which are not produced in New Zealand?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend will see that all hides are free under the British preference.

Mr. YOUNG: But all hides do not come under the British preference. We get hides from Argentine and from Texas which are required by our tanners for certain kinds of leather. These are going to be shut out and we will be required to buy perhaps kangaroo skins from New Zealand from which to make harness. Will the minister explain how this is to be done?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend is hardly accurate when he says that these are going to be shut out. It is true that they will be subject to the rates of duty provided for in the intermediate and general tariffs, but I think it is going a little too far to say that importations will be shut out.

Mr. YOUNG: Have any representations been made in regard to this matter?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, representations have been made.

Mr. YOUNG: By whom?

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. RHODES: Certain of the tanners have objected to this duty. They have alleged that there are certain classes of leather which they will not be able to obtain under either the New Zealand treaty or the British preferential tariff except by payment of a duty which may be a handicap to their industry. It remains to be seen how that will work out in the length of time provided for by the treaty, which my hon. friend knows is one year.

Mr. YOUNG: If this results in an increase in the price of harness leather there will be an increase in the price of harness.

Mr. RHODES: If certain things happen, certain results will ensue. However, I do not want to follow my hon. friend in an argument of this kind.

Mr. VALLANCE: Why do the tanners object, if it is not because of the fact that they will have to increase the cost of leather? Some time ago, when dealing with a wheat grower in western Canada, the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) said that the only way the farmer could hope to meet the competition of Russia, the Argentine and other countries with which he has to compete on the open market would be by a reduction in the cost of production. If the cost of leather which goes into harness is to be increased, there will be an automatic increase in the cost of production of wheat.

Mr. RHODES: If the cost of leather is increased as a result of this duty it seems to me there will be an increased opportunity for our farmers to supply the leather which hitherto has been imported.

Mr. BROWN: Is this duty on hides the result of negotiations in connection with the New Zealand treaty?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. BROWN: Then I have a few remarks to make on the subject. For a number of years past an agitation in this house for the imposition of a duty on hides has been carried on by those who presume to speak for the farmer, vigorously opposed by others who perhaps have the right to speak for the farmers. I have given some consideration to this subject, and on more than one occasion I have urged that the imposition of a duty on hides would mean nothing to the farmer but would impose a burden upon the tanners who are compelled to buy large quantities of hides of a quality not produced in Canada. Since the matter has been brought before us in this form I think the time has come when we should be prepared to give more attention to the arguments advanced in the past, and I shall take up a little time in referring to some of the objections urged to the imposition of a duty on hides.

I have taken the position that such a duty would mean nothing to the farmer, while it would mean a great deal to the tanners; and the next step would be an additional burden upon the farmer because of the increased price of leather. There seems to be a misapprehension in the minds of many who consider that all hides are alike. There is as much difference between hides as there is between textiles. The hides produced in Canada are not the kind wanted by some of the large tanners. I do not think I can do better than to quote from Hansard and repeat the arguments which I have used at different times in the past. I shall not quote in full my remarks in 1926, but in part I said:

Mr. Cahan: And you suggest that we cannot grow the heavier hides in this country?

Mr. Brown: Yes. In proof of my statement, there are tanneries that do not use a single pound of Canadian hides because they do not serve their purpose.

Some hon. members plead for the industries of Canada, and the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) some little time ago spoke of tanneries that were closed up. Yet these hon. gentlemen, appealing to the prejudices of the farmers on this question of imported hides, are advocating a policy which would mean that these tanneries could not get the raw material that they want. The result would be the tanneries would be closed, the men would be out of employment, and we would lose a tremendously profitable business. That it is a profitable business I am going to show the house by further figures. In dealing with hides we must take into account leather. An hon. gentleman a little while ago asked about unmanufactured leather. I will give the figures. They refer to leather that we export, which business would in large measure be shut off if we did not purchase these other hides:

Harness leather	$ 385,568
Sole leather	2,324,961
Upper leather (probably very largely made out of our own local hides)	4,580,892
All other leather	92,467
Total exported	$ 7,383,888

Those were the figures for the fiscal year 1925. My remarks continue:

Now, bear in mind that the following figures are for our imports of unmanufactured leather, namely, $3,954,482 worth. In other words, our excess of exports is well over $3,000,000. I want to remind the house that of those exports there went to the United States—the country that we cannot compete with—out of the total of over $7,000,000 worth the very large proportion of $5,311,184 worth. This is the kind of trade that these gentlemen want to stop. At least, they would stop it if we carried out the policy they are advocating, for that would necessarily be the result of putting it into effect.

I took the matter up again in the session of 1929, at which time I dealt with it somewhat along the same lines. I said on that occasion:

Let me refer to the question of hides and skins. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) quoted figures to show that we were importing $14,000,000 worth of hides, $10,000,000 being from the United States, while we were exporting about a similar amount; and he indicated something to the effect that these were simply cross entries and that we might wipe the whole thing off the slate and use our own hides instead of importing from the United States.

Mr. COTNAM: Was the hon. gentleman then speaking as a Progressive or was he speaking then, as he is to-day, as a Liberal?

Mr. BROWN: I was expressing the same sentiments I have always expressed since I have been in the house. I have never varied in my stand on this matter, so it does not matter what you call me. My remarks continue:

If the hon. member had taken more than a superficial view of the question he would not have assumed that position. It is true that we import hides to the value of $14,000,000 odd, from the United States $11,164,668, while we export to the United States $11,266,660 worth of this product.

But there is this point to which I would call the attention of the house: that class of hides which forms the great bulk of our imports and exports consists of raw cattle skins, that is, the heavier hides. Now, on the hides we imported we paid a little more than twenty-three cents, and for the hides we exported we received nineteen cents. Someone may say, "That is bad business; why export hides at nineteen cents and import at twenty-three cents?" But a little close thought will surely convince anyone that there is a reason for this. The Canadian tanner is surely a business man who can be trusted to buy what suits him, and therefore he pays that twenty-three cents for the class of hides he wants because he cannot get them in Canada. When I made a similar statement three years ago it was absolutely endorsed by Colonel Mullins, of Marquette, who has had a large experience in the cattle business and is familiar with the tanning industry. He absolutely endorsed the statement that the class of hides—or at least a large proportion of the hides—which the Canadian tanner requires cannot be obtained in Canada, so that he is obliged to go elsewhere for them. But we cannot consider this question of hides by itself; we must take into account the whole business of buying and selling hides and tanning them into leather, and also the selling of the leather. I notice that we sell to the United States such grades of leather as harness, sole leather, upper leather, with a very small quantity of other leathers, the total being $7,682,521. That is the country with which we cannot compete in these matters. So that the total figures would indicate a situation something like this: our excess of exports of hides and unmanufactured leather, so far as the United States are concerned, gives a favourable balance—to use the term which is commonly employed—of something over $3,000,000; and taking our total exports into account we have a favourable balance of about $1,500,000. Now, if by one stroke of the pen a duty is imposed on hides, what do we do? We simply make it so much more difficult for the manufacturer, the tanner, to obtain his raw product, and we strike at this very profitable business which he is carrying on with the United States and other countries, securing no benefit for ourselves. The probability is that if we insisted on handicapping the manufacturer of leather in that way we should put him in the position where he would not be able to pay as good a price for that proportion of our own hides which he now uses.

Mr. SPROULE: Would the hon. member tell us what hides are worth now?

Mr. BROWN: As a matter of fact that has nothing to do with the question. The price certainly has not improved since the present government came into power, if that is of any interest to the hon. member.

Mr. SPROULE: If the hon. member knows what hides are worth now, let him tell us. Apparently he does not want any tariff on them, yet he cannot sell them.

Mr. YOUNG: They cannot be sold under this legislation.

Mr. BROWN: If the matter had ended there, perhaps I might have said little more, but last year the Prime Minister, then acting as Minister of Finance, increased the duty on leather. We had taken the position that we wanted to secure to the tanner his raw product at a price at which he would be able to compete with other countries. The thanks we got was an increase in the duty on leather. I went into the matter fully last year, and I thought of bringing it before the house, but the session was rather advanced and I did not give what I had intended, so I contented myself with asking a few questions.

Mr. COTNAM: Can the hon. gentleman tell us at what price the tanner would like to get his raw product? I understand you cannot get fifty cents a hundred for it to-day.

Mr. BROWN: I said that I contented myself with asking a few questions. When the Prime Minister, then Minister of Finance, brought the matter before the house, I asked:

> Mr. Brown: How is sole leather affected by these changes?
> Mr. Bennett: Sole leather is dealt with by item 604, which has just passed. However if the hon. gentleman desires information I shall be pleased to give it.

[Mr. Brown.]

Mr. Brown: In view of the fact that the exports of sole leather are enormously larger than the imports, an increase of that kind would seem to be altogether unnecessary. The imports are trifling as compared with the exports.

I understand that the tanners have been greatly exercised over this duty that is to be imposed on hides coming from outside the empire. If they were the only ones who were to be affected, in view of the little thanks we got for trying to help them in their business, I would be willing to let them stew in their own juice. But they are not the only ones concerned. This means simply that when a farmer goes to buy a set of harness, he will have to pay the increased price for it, because, let me emphasize again, the best harness, sole and belting leathers are made from hides that have been imported from the Argentine, Uruguay, the southern states, and not from hides produced in Canada. Therefore the argument that this will benefit the Canadian producer of hides in any way, is not well founded. It means simply that our tanners will have to pay an increased price for the high-class hides they see fit to buy and the farmer, in the sale of his hides, will benefit nothing.

I telephoned to the Bureau of Statistics to-day to get the statistics for the fiscal year 1932. They have not come to hand yet, so the latest figures I can give are those for the fiscal year 1931. I find I have neglected to bring with me the figures concerning imports and exports of hides, but I have those with regard to leather. The imports of leather are as follows:

Belting leather	$ 91,643
Harness leather	1,673
Sole leather	116,219

That is, we imported of these heavy leathers only about $209,537 worth. It is true that we imported other leathers to the amount of $4,311,261, but the great bulk of those was leathers of fine classes that are evidently made in very limited quantities in Canada. On the other hand, these are our exports of leather:

Harness leather	$ 374,034
Sole leather	1,100,933
Upper leather	2,550,751

That is, of the classes of leather that are made out of these high class hides, we exported over $4,000,000 worth, and of all other leathers which, I said, are made in small quantities in Canada, we exported only $46,946 worth. Unquestionably the result of this verbal understanding that the minister had with New Zealand, that on his return to Canada he should have a tariff put upon hides, has landed us in this position: we do not benefit the farmer who sells hides, because the price of the class of hides that he produces will not be affected a particle, and we compel the tanner to pay a higher price for the hides he uses. He will recoup himself by charging the local consumer a higher price for harness leather. He also will be handicapped in the export market. That is a very striking illustration, Mr. Chairman, of the effect of interfering unduly with the course of trade. In this case it is of no benefit to ourselves; it is an injury to the tanner and an injury to the country to have this very valuable trade interfered with.

There is another point I should like to emphasize at this moment, and perhaps it has a bearing on the principles that will be followed at the coming Imperial conference. Evidently our Minister of Trade and Commerce came to a verbal understanding with the representatives of New Zealand that he would come back home and have a duty imposed on hides. It is a very serious thing if in our trade agreements we allow a country with which we are dealing to insist that we shall alter our own tariff. Let us give them whatever advantages of our tariffs we have to offer, but I say it is pretty serious if we are to accept dictation from outside as to what we shall do with our own tariff. That was just the mistake which the Prime Minister made when he went over to England last year. We on this side have always taken the position that we were content to take whatever preferences the British people offered us in their markets, but we absolutely refused to interfere with the business of the United Kingdom and to say what they should do with regard to their tariff. It is true, I know, that the Liberal government in making the agreement with Australia did adopt that principle with reference to raisins, but it must be remembered that the duty on raisins was not in any sense a protective tariff, but entirely a revenue tariff. I want to insist that if there is any disposition to allow other nations to say what our tariff shall be, we are heading straight for disaster. We can never hope to build up a united empire that way. We can only hope to build up a united empire by each country within the empire retaining complete freedom in the making of its own tariffs. I think I have shown quite conclusively, Mr. Chairman, that the result of this verbal agreement which the Minister of Trade and Commerce made with New Zealand and which the government now seeks to put into effect—I suppose it will have to be done in order to keep faith with New Zealand—cannot be anything else but bad both for the tanners and for the Canadian producer of hides.

Mr. SPROULE: I think the hon. member for Lisgar is entirely off the track in talking like that. There is practically no market for hides in this country. The hon. member says it will not benefit the farmer. What is he going to do with his hides? Is he going to bury them? What is the reason for hides being the price they are to-day? The hon. member is talking about prices of hides three or four years ago. Does he not know that hides are not worth anything to-day? He is off the track entirely.

Mr. BROWN: The arguments which I combated in 1926 and 1929 were the same arguments which hon. gentlemen are using to-day when hides are worth almost nothing as compared with twenty cents a pound a few years ago.

Mr. SPROULE: They are not using hides at all of the type my hon. friend was speaking about.

Mr. BROWN: Is it not a fact that some of the large tanneries in Canada do not use a pound of Canadian hides? But, generally speaking, the tanneries are using a certain proportion of our own hides and will continue to do so under any circumstances. I think, Mr. Chairman, that when the argument I have used is given consideration it will be found that it is perfectly valid.

Mr. MULLINS: This is one time I find myself in agreement with the hon. member for Lisgar. I do not want to do anything to raise the price of harness leather or of harness to the farmer in western Canada, because the farmer in western Canada is going back to horses; he is tired of the tractor. The hon. member for Lisgar is quite right in his statement with reference to hides. I put some money into a tannery in Winnipeg and tried to tan hides. I do not forget it and I shall not forget it for some time. The hides in Canada are not suitable for harness leather. My hon. friend is quite correct in that statement. If they were, why does the Lang Tanning Company in Kitchener go to South America and the United States for their raw hides for making harness leather? The hides we have in Canada, unfortunately, are covered with barbed wire scratches. Any man who puts his money into a tannery in Canada—and there have been two of us in Winnipeg—will soon learn from experience. I am totally in agreement with what the hon. member for Lisgar has said with regard to hides, and I do trust that something will be done so that the price of harness leather and the tariff on hides entering Canada will not be raised because, as I said, Mr. Chairman, the farmers are going back to horses. I am sorry that a good many of my friends on this side will not agree with me, but I felt it necessary to support the statement of the hon. member for Lisgar. I listened very closely to what he said, and he was quite correct in his statement.

Mr. EULER: As one who comes from the city which is the home of perhaps the largest tannery in the British Empire and of still another tannery of very considerable size, I might say a word with regard to this matter.

In the first place I will admit that in any treaty, and this provision is the result of a treaty with New Zealand, there must be give and take. If the New Zealand producer of hides would benefit by the imposition of this fifteen per cent duty it would be an argument for it, but I am told, and I think correctly, that New Zealand hides are not suited for the making of harness leather or of sole leather either. If this provision helped the Canadian producer of hides it would be an argument for it, but the same thing applies to Canadian hides as applies to New Zealand hides. They are not suitable for making the kind of leather of which we are speaking.

Something has been said as to the export trade in leather. My hon. friend from Lisgar stated that if it is true that the duty of fifteen per cent must be paid on these hides that are imported from the Argentine—the Lang Tanning Company at Kitchener and I believe all the Canadian tanneries import their hides from the Argentine—it must necessarily increase the cost of producing leather, and thus make it more difficult to compete with other countries in the export market for leather.

Mr. RHODES: How does it interfere with their export business when they are entitled to a drawback?

Mr. EULER: I was going to make this comment, and perhaps it will answer the minister. It is unfortunately true that whereas two or three years ago one large tannery in the city from which I come exported more than half its product to the United States, where it had free entry, at the present time, since the United States has increased its tariff, its export business to the United States, in fact practically its whole export business, has been discontinued. It can no longer get into that market. That perhaps will answer the minister. The question of export business to my mind does not arise at this time.

Mr. RHODES: Except that my hon. friend is proceeding to deal with the handicap to their business.

Mr. EULER: No, I was not; I was merely attempting to answer a remark made, I think, in error, by an hon. member on this side of the house. I understand the export business in leather has been practically cut off because of tariffs in other countries being increased, and it is no longer possible to send leather to other countries.

The only point I wish to make is this: The imposition of the duty will no doubt increase the production costs of leather. The tanner will reimburse himself by increasing the price of the leather to the consumer in Canada. If you were going to get some benefit out of it by helping the New Zealand producer of hides, or if you would help the Canadian producer of hides, then I would say there is an argument for the duty. As I see it, however, the only possible benefit that can come to Canadians is by way of added revenue on hides imported from the Argentine—because they will still be imported from that country. The only benefit which will come to Canadians will be through the increased revenue brought about by the imposition of a duty of fifteen per cent. Against that we must set this: It increases the cost of leather to the Canadian consumer.

In that connection I should like to say a few words in regard to the contention of the hon. member for Marquette. It is perfectly true there has been an increase in the production of harness leather. The Lang Tanning Company of Kitchener was mentioned, and may I say that they are producers of sole and harness leather. At one time they produced only harness leather, and then owing to the fact that the horse has almost disappeared they became tanners of sole leather. I am told that within the last few months they have had great increases in the sale of harness leather to western Canada. The farmers of western Canada, for reasons of their own,—perhaps because they cannot afford to use tractors, or because of the high price of gasoline,—have gone back to the use of horses, involving the use of harness leather. As a result the business of tanning harness leather in the city of Kitchener has been stimulated. What will come out of this legislation would be an increased price of harness leather to the farmers in western Canada. I do not see any corresponding value, except through added revenue. If this is a measure for the production of revenue, I can see no other arguments.

Mr. BAKER: Is it not possible the Argentine will reduce its prices to meet competition? That is invariably the case.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Customs tariff—599. Hides and skins, raw whether dry, salted or pickled; and raw pelts: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Provided, that importations under this item, wholly the product of any British country, when imported direct from the United Kingdom into a sea, lake or river port of Canada, shall be entitled to the benefits of the British preferential tariff.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the resolution carried?

Mr. YOUNG: No, Mr. Chairman. Before dinner, replying to the member for North Waterloo, the minister said there would be a drawback on the exported leather. Where is provision made for that?

Mr. RHODES: I am waiting for the commissioner of taxation, who has the documents with him. Perhaps in the meantime we could proceed with some other point.

Mr. YOUNG: Then this is the next point. I take it that the promise was made to the government of New Zealand to impose this duty of 15 per cent on hides coming from other countries with the idea of supplying our present market from New Zealand rather than from South America or wherever we are getting hides at the present time. What steps did the government take to assure themselves that the New Zealand hides would be satisfactory for the purpose for which the hides they are hoping to replace are used?

Mr. STEVENS: I think, Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member has asked me a question on this matter, I might as well at this time say a few words upon the subject dealing with one or two different observations made this afternoon by other hon. members. The apprehension expressed by hon. members on the other side of the house and by one or two on this side regarding this matter is, I think, unduly stressed. The situation with respect to the import of hides is one to which personally I have given a good deal of thought. Like a number of other items of imports of raw materials, as I indicated in some remarks I made to the house a few weeks ago, hides are not moving as normally we would expect them to move. It is quite true that hides, together with a number of other articles of raw materials, have been on the free list for a good many years, and normally one would expect they would come to Canada from the country of origin; but this has not been the case, and this article is perhaps a very excellent illustration of the situation. I have before me now the trade returns for the fiscal year 1931, and they show that importations of hides from the Argentine averaged 70,000 pounds weight for the five-year period from 1927 to 1931, inclusive, and from the United States 275,000 pounds weight.

Mr. MALCOLM: Has the minister any knowledge of how many Argentine hides are included in the American imports?

Mr. STEVENS: That is precisely the point I am going to make. A very large proportion —my investigations have not disclosed exactly how many, the reason for which I will explain in a moment—a very large proportion of these hides that we buy in the United States are Argentine hides that enter New York free. New York acts as a sort of free port zone for merchandise destined for Canada. As I indicated the other day, this very important item of trade accrues to the credit of the United States so far as the Argentine is concerned, and Canada gets no credit for it at all. My own opinion is that it is highly desirable to ensure the movement of trade directly from the country of origin to Canada, if it is possible to do so, because it will give to us in that market an enhanced credit, which will enable us in turn to sell our goods there. I am now dealing with the broad general principle, which I think ought not to be lost sight of.

Now, it has been alleged that we do not produce hides which are required by the tanneries for certain purposes, such as harness leather, sole leather, and so forth. I think undue weight is given to that statement. In part it is quite accurate, but to say we can get no hides in Canada suitable for those purposes is not a fair statement. It is, however, a fact that the producers of raw hides in Canada have not developed as good a system of sorting and marketing as characterizes, for instance, the New York or the Argentine market; and there can be no doubt that so far as the Argentine producers are concerned they have a more uniform production of hides of a certain type and class.

I have received quite a number of criticisms from producers of hides in this country that in the negotiation of the New Zealand treaty we were not looking after their interests sufficiently in leaving hides on the free list. It has been argued that by leaving hides from New Zealand free, and by having the British preference free also, we are doing something to affect prejudicially the producers of hides in Canada. It is true that the tanneries, though I cannot say I have received representations other than one or two very moderate letters, may think they have cause for complaint in the fact that we are imposing duties of 10 per cent and 15 per cent under the intermediate and general tariffs. In the first place I submit to the house that there is a general system of dumping going on the world over. Many countries are practising dumping in a manner that has never been witnessed before, I suppose, in the history of external trade; they are exceedingly anxious to develop their exports, to correct adverse balances of trade and also to bolster up their own exchange by increasing exports. The result is that with the low prices of commodities there is a tendency to disregard almost entirely home values and to export goods at almost any figure procurable. I have not under my hand the present day prices of hides, but I know they are exceedingly low. A few days ago, if my memory serves me aright, I saw quotations as low as two cents a pound, and I understand that Canadian producers—I will not say farmers, because probably they would get even less—are being paid from one cent to one and one-half cents per pound by the dealers. Obviously a duty of 10 per cent or 15 per cent on hides, with the present condition of the market, is not going to affect the leather situation to any extent at all. The effect would be so small upon the finished product that it would not be noticeable.

Mr. McGIBBON: What authority has the minister for that statement?

Mr. STEVENS: My authority is the figure to which I have referred, the very low price of the commodity, which is unquestionably below anything that might be considered the cost price of this article.

Mr. YOUNG: If the duty is so small that it will not make any difference, will it not be futile and useless?

Mr. STEVENS: The duty is imposed as one of the conditions of the negotiation of the treaty. My point is that the treaty is for a year. The New Zealanders will be here in July and August, I suppose, at the Imperial conference, and during that period we intend to discuss with them the terms of the treaty and the possibility of its extension beyond the period of a year. As a result of the conference we hope that such matters as are outstanding, which may present some difficulties at the present time, may be finally determined.

[Mr. Stevens.]

My submission to the committee is that under existing conditions, with the present low price of the commodity, the duty imposed is not going to seriously affect the business. In the second place, it must be borne in mind that there is a very substantial duty on leather goods. I have the rate under my hand but had not time to look it up before I rose to speak. At any rate there is a very substantial protection with regard to the finished article, and the added value that goes into the finishing of these hides in the form in which they are marketed so greatly exceeds the cost of the raw material that the ad valorem rate of duty will not affect the finished article to any great extent. Unquestionably it will affect it to a degree, but one must keep in mind the relative values of these different commodities.

I should like now to say a word to the hon. member for Lisgar, who referred to this as a case of another country dictating our tariff. That is not so. In any negotiations looking to a treaty there are bound to arise conditions which call for changes, amendments or adjustments in existing tariff rates. This is one of the items which called for an adjustment, just as on the other hand I think there were one or two items in connection with which New Zealand would have to amend its tariff to meet the conditions of the treaty.

My hon. friend across the way asked if I had given the matter any thought. I can assure him that I have given the matter a great deal of thought. It would not serve any purpose to now go through all the processes of thinking—

Mr. YOUNG: I do not think my hon. friend caught my question. I did not suggest that he had not been thinking; I wanted to know if he had taken any steps to assure himself that the New Zealand or Canadian hides would fill the place of the Argentine hides which it is now intended to replace.

Mr. STEVENS: My own opinion, if it is worth anything, is that to a certain degree Canadian hides may meet the requirements of the tanneries.

Mr. YOUNG: They may?

Mr. STEVENS: Let me make that point quite clear. I do not say for a moment that they will fully meet those requirements, but I want to point out to the committee that it has always been the practice of any industry which has established certain contacts for its materials to emphasize the difficulties imposed far beyond the actual burden, when anything is done to interfere with the normal routine of their business. That is almost axiomatic; you find it in every case, and I have never seen it fail. The moment you interfere with the ordinary practice of private industries an extreme interpretation is placed upon the difficulty which is thus imposed. I do not think the interference with the business of the tanneries will be a matter of very great significance, and I think in part they will be able to secure, from the existing supplies of hides in Canada, materials that will serve their purposes, but not as conveniently, not so well assorted, not marketed in such large quantities as is the case in New York, where they are well graded and readily available. To a degree, however, I think hides from other countries can be replaced by Canadian hides, and to a degree also by Australian and New Zealand hides. This should give Great Britain a chance to market some green hides here—not that I think Great Britain is a producer of hides, but she certainly is just as good an assembler of hides as New York is, and I see no reason why she should not get a share of the business. Perhaps I ought not to say this, but I will take a chance—I think an opportunity is being afforded of opening up negotiations with the Argentine which may bring about distinctly advantageous results. Trade relations between Canada and the Argentine certainly have to be improved. There is an excellent market in that country for a wide range of manufactured articles from Canada, and we can buy but little in return, but one product which we can buy is hides. I see no reason why there should not be some arrangement entered into with that country. As far as certain classes of hides are concerned, New Zealand will have a distinct advantage, and that is what we expect and desire.

Mr. VALLANCE: In the event of Great Britain becoming an assembler of hides, would that automatically do away with the tariff now prevailing against those hides which may be gathered together in Great Britain and then shipped to Canada?

Mr. STEVENS: I think it is open for us to deal with that matter should it arise.

Mr. McGIBBON: Coming as I do from a riding in which is located the largest tannery of sole leather in the British Empire, I think I should say something in this regard. There are two lines of thought in this matter, one academic and the other practical. The minister has a laudable object in view when he desires to transfer to New Zealand the business in hides, but he may not be aware of the fact that this is practically impossible. New Zealand hides are useless for the manufacture of sole leather. They are largely cow hides; they are thin and will not make good sole leather. The market for hides is not in New York, as the minister says, but in Chicago and the Argentine. I refer now to that market outside of the local domestic market. Under this treaty duties of ten and fifteen per cent are being placed upon the raw material for the manufacture of sole leather. How can this country go out into the markets of the world and compete with England and every other country, with the exception of the United States, where hides are allowed to enter free? A handicap of fifteen per cent is being placed upon the tanneries of this country. I am credibly informed that if things stay as they are, every sole leather tannery in this country will be put out of business. The minister speaks lightly about this matter, but my information is that a duty of seven and a half per cent will be required on manufactured leather to equal this duty of fifteen per cent on the raw material. The manufacturers of sole leather in this country are taking all the hides that are available in Canada, and would take hides from New Zealand if good sole leather could be made from them, but that cannot be done. Something is being done in connection with this industry which has never been done with any other—a duty is being placed on its raw material.

I think I have a right to protest against the putting out of business of any industry, especially one located in my own riding. That is what this treaty is going to do should it go through in its present form. England allows hides to enter free and she is our main competitor in the world market. How are we to compete with England when a duty of fifteen per cent is being placed upon the raw material? There are only two courses open; either more protection must be given to the finished article, or an additional cost must be placed upon the consumers of this country. I contend that both these methods would be wrong. I tell the minister quite frankly that he is absolutely on the wrong track. If good sole leather could be made out of New Zealand hides, they could have been used in the past. The tanneries are scouring the earth for hides; they are bringing them from China and Japan, but the principal market is in Chicago and the Argentine. The hides obtained from those markets are the only ones that will make first class sole leather. New Zealand hides will not do it. I object to the way this treaty was born and the way it was put through the house. Men have spent their time and money during the past fifty or seventy-five years in building up this industry, and for a number of years they have been operating at an actual monetary loss in order to keep going; then the government comes along and puts duties of ten and fifteen per cent on their raw material. I protest against the whole thing; it was wrong in its conception and it is wrong in its application.

Mr. LOUCKS: What about the Canadian producer?

Mr. McGIBBON: The tanneries have taken every Canadian hide available. The only people to be affected by this treaty will be the packers. They have been withdrawing their hides from the market ever since the treaty was announced. They are the ones who will benefit, not the farmers who are producing hides.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member for Weyburn put a question, and at the moment I had not the record before me. If he will look at section 286 of the Customs Act, chapter 42 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, he will find the drawback.

Mr. POWER: Has the minister answered the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario?

Mr. BROWN: In view of the speech that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario has made, I should like to say a word. I am delighted to hear him speak as he has done; it gives us some reason to believe the gospel we have been trying to preach for the last six or seven years is beginning to be accepted. If I remember aright, the hon. member was one of those who in 1926 made a speech which moved me to speak as I did in the address that I quoted this afternoon.

Mr. McGIBBON: Never in my life did I advocate a duty on raw material.

Mr. BROWN: I am well aware that on the general question of duties the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario spoke of the tanneries that were going out of business. I am sorry for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, because he certainly laboured hard when he was endeavouring to show why this proposal should be endorsed. He did not speak with his usual fluency and authority. He spoke of the possibility of Great Britain becoming an assembling place for hides. I presume the thought in his mind was that those hides would go there from the Argentine. I wonder how New Zealand would accept that way of getting around the agreement we have made—that is, to have the hides shipped to Great Britain and thence to Canada. That would seem to be a method of getting around the agreement with New Zealand, but I cannot imagine how she would view it.

Mr. McGIBBON: Great Britain imports about seventy-five per cent of her hides.

Mr. BROWN: I do not think we can emphasize too strongly the fact that our hides are suitable for certain purposes, and I believe they are used to the fullest extent possible for those purposes. In the figures I quoted this afternoon I mentioned that large quantities of upper leathers were imported. I imagine the greater portion of the upper leather in our ordinary shoes can be made from Canadian hides. But I want to point out that in constantly increasing ratio the cattle which are being slaughtered in Canada are the smaller ones. Even when Great Britain was taking a smaller steer than she is willing to take now, the large animals were going across the seas, and the reason our Canadian cattle are not suitable for the making of hides lies in the fact that the great bulk of our cattle slaughtered here are small ones that do not produce heavy hides, so that what they produce is not suitable for our tanners who have been buying from the Argentine. There is reason to believe that New Zealand hides are of the same quality. New Zealand is not a beef country, as the Argentine is; she is a dairy country, and there is no reason to suppose the qualities of New Zealand hides are in any degree different from our own. The probability is that they are in the same class, and they will not replace the hides which we have been getting from other countries.

Mr. YOUNG: The Minister of Trade and Commerce, in answering my question as to what assurance he had that our hides or New Zealand hides would be satisfactory in place of those from South America, told us that the tanners or manufacturers were prone to exaggerate or over-emphasize the difficulty that any change such as this would make in their operations. He thinks the Canadian hides may be satisfactory and may not interfere very seriously with the business of the tanners. Because he holds the opinion they may not make very much difference, he feels justified in playing with the tanners, as it were, throwing difficulties in their way and telling them they had better overcome them. As regards the question of insisting on direct shipment from the Argentine to Canada instead of the Argentine hides being bought on the Chicago market, if our manufacturers buy hides in Chicago there must be a reason for their doing so. If it would pay them to import the hides directly from Argentina, that is what they would surely do. It must be more profitable for them to buy their hides in Chicago.

Mr. McGIBBON: They buy them both ways.

Mr. YOUNG: I have no doubt the reason is that, Chicago being an assembling place for hides of all kinds, the buyers have a greater opportunity there to select what they want. If you impose customs duties which make that impossible, you put upon the Canadian tanner the necessity of sending somebody to Argentina to pick up the hides, thus rendering his business more expensive. In regard to the duty being only 15 per cent and the hides only one-half cent per pound, it is said that this will not amount to very much. I suppose 15 per cent of nothing is nothing, but hides are not going to remain at that price. What will happen when the price advances?

Mr. STEVENS: Ten per cent from Argentina.

Mr. McGIBBON: I might inform the hon. member that the duty to-day is equal to seven and a half per cent on the cost of the finished product.

Mr. YOUNG: As the price of the raw hide advances, it will be still more. To my mind the most amazing statement which the minister made was that by this treaty he hoped to divert to New Zealand the trade which we have now with Argentina. Then he hopes to enter into another treaty with Argentina to switch the trade back again. Surely this ought to be a lesson to us or our government as to what they should or should not do at the Imperial conference. In this we see the direct result of an attempt to divert trade. It is much easier to kill than to divert trade. We are putting obstacles in the way of our trade with Argentina in the hope that that trade will switch to New Zealand. The result will be that we shall lose the trade entirely. This should be a warning to the government to do nothing at the Imperial conference to try to build up empire trade by putting obstacles in the way of trade outside the empire. You can very seldom divert trade, but you can always kill it.

Mr. MALCOLM: I do not wish in any way to embarrass the minister by opposing this resolution. A few days ago, speaking on the New Zealand treaty, I was able to compliment the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the treaty which he had made with New Zealand, but on that occasion, due to the fact that I had not had time to study the New Zealand treaty, I had no knowledge that it was the intention of the minister to introduce a budget resolution making a duty applicable to hides from Argentina and other countries. I think some remarks which were made this afternoon and this evening with regard to the injury which would be done to the Canadian hide business were made because there was not a complete understanding of the difference between Argentine and Canadian hides. If hon. members will just realize that there is no other country in the world producing beef cattle as large or as uniform in size as the Argentine; that in that country barbed wire is not permitted for fencing; that there are no warble-flies or insects which destroy a hide, and that probably the hides of Argentine steers are taken off by as expert abattoir workers as there are in the world, they will appreciate why for size and freedom from defect, for weight and quality, the Argentine hide has become the accepted hide in the world's sole and harness leather business. Our Canadian tanneries have developed from very small industries using domestic hides. The Lang Tanning Company in the city of Kitchener, to which the hon. member for North Waterloo referred, is the last of thirty-seven tanneries formerly operating in that county. This industry has developed into the largest tannery in the British Empire, under free trade with the various countries of the world on leather and hides. Therefore, given free trade, our Canadian tanners have held their own in producing harness and sole leather with the tanners of other countries. True, Canada imports certain fine leather for shoes and upholstering, but speaking broadly Canada has gained very much by the tanning here of foreign hides. Before anything is done which will interfere with the price of raw material required for the foreign or domestic leather trade, a great deal of consideration should be given to the subject. I quite realize that the minister in making his treaty with New Zealand encountered a lot of difficulties, and I quite sympathize with him in those difficulties. But what has been said by my hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario with regard to the suitability of New Zealand hides for making sole leather is absolutely correct, and I am assured by those engaged in tanning harness and sole leather that it is utterly impossible to make the type of sole leather, from the hide of a dairy cow that would be suitable for the markets of the world.

There are two phases of this situation. One the member for North Waterloo in a very few words ably pointed out to the minister, namely that he had to choose between one of these two things: He would derive a certain revenue by applying this duty on hides, but he had inevitably to face higher prices on harness and sole leather to the consumers in Canada. That phase is of interest. My hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario is interested in an entirely different phase. He is interested in whether the producers of sole leather in Canada are going to be able to hold the Canadian market. They will now have to pay duty on hides from the Argentine, the very type of hide that is wanted, and the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario is interested to know whether the Argentine hide tanned in Great Britain into sole leather is to be permitted to enter Canada free. If that is to be the case, and sole leather is to enter Canada free of duty, then of course the whole market will be lost to the Canadian tanner. If, on the other hand, the minister is prepared to give the Canadian tanner what he considers an adequate tariff on sole leather from Great Britain, that adequate tariff must be added to the cost of sole leather to the consumer in Canada, and we revert once more to the position put by the hon. member for North Waterloo, that the ultimate cost of this duty is going to be on the consumer of sole leather in Canada.

The hon. member for Marquette raised a point of very great interest this afternoon. It is impossible to make from Canadian hides the type of harness leather required. You cannot get the lengths of cut required, and Canadian hides are of poor quality, with too many scratches, too many tears and too many cuts. They are not the type of hide that tans easily. The tanner has certain operations through which he must go, and a vat full of poor hides takes just as much time to handle and uses just as much liquid in the tanning as a vat full of good hides, so it is only natural that the tanner desirous of making a profit on his industry wants to start with raw material of the highest quality and that will give him the smallest percentage of waste. So even if Canadian hides are used to as great an extent as they can be used, there are certain types of leather which cannot well be made from them, and the whole market, domestic and foreign, for certain types of leather will be lost to the Canadian producer unless the proper type of hide is used.

There is another feature which I believe is of just as great importance as anything else, and that is the question to which the minister has referred. There are not many commodities that we can buy from the Argentine republic. The Argentine republic has been one of Canada's very good customers, and if the spirit of this treaty is to destroy our market in the Argentine the reflex loss through the treaty will be more disastrous to us than any advantages that may otherwise accrue from it. Like my hon. friend from Weyburn I simply cannot understand the minister's remark that having negotiated this treaty with New Zealand he proposes to use it as a club over the Argentine to make a more satisfactory treaty with that country. We have already a trade with the Argentine which is tremendously favourable to this dominion, and I would be very loath indeed to disturb this trade, particularly when the balance is very much in our favour, and particularly when the Argentine supplies us with a commodity which our manufacturers require. I quite realize the desire of New Zealand to market a lot of hides, but I am going to say to the minister that I am told by those who know whereof they speak that New Zealand is simply not able to supply Canada with enough hides to replace the hides now coming in from the Argentine republic. I am told that the tanners are willing to do everything they possibly can to increase the use of New Zealand and Australian hides, but they do not want to be deprived of securing the class of hides which they really require in their business.

I know that in dealing with the New Zealand government the minister unquestionably had so many items to consider that it would be physically impossible, without an unusual amount of advice on every subject, to know all that should be known in negotiations of this kind. I am not blaming the minister if on some small points of the treaty he was not able to present the viewpoint of those affected as fully as he might be expected to do. I believe he has not given this question of hides his usual careful thought, otherwise this part of the treaty would not be under discussion in the parliament of Canada to-night. None of us on this side of the house wants to oppose a treaty within the empire, a treaty which is replacing an old treaty. Some items in the new treaty I do not think are as desirable as what the old treaty contained; other items may be more desirable, but here is an item in which the very boast of my hon. friend's party is being neglected entirely. My hon. friend's party has always said: We are going to better conditions in Canada by helping industry and creating employment. If this item does what the tanners of Canada think it is going to do, it will eventually cause serious unemployment. There can be no question about that. My hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario, who is noted for his loyalty to his party, and a man whom his party should be proud to number in its ranks, is certainly not standing in this house and warning the minister against the terms of this treaty without first having given the matter very serious consideration. My hon. friend from Marquette, who has had practical experience in starting a tannery and losing money trying to run it, is not warning the minister without very serious consideration. I would strongly advise the Minister of Finance to pass on to some other resolution and hold this item up until a little more thought is given to it and he has considered further whether he really wants it to pass.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It gives one considerable satisfaction to hear the expressions of opinion of the two hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house who have spoken in defence of the principle of allowing raw products to enter Canada free. I always had the idea that although the Conservative party was strong for protection on finished products it had a leaning towards the free entry of raw products. But apparently they have gone back on their principles on this occasion, and we have the spectacle to-night of the Conservative party, by putting a duty on raw materials, doing an injury to industry, which they have avowedly set out to protect by way of high tariffs. What I wish to protest against, and protest vigorously, is that tariffs inevitably force the consumer in the country by which they are imposed to pay a higher price for the commodities that are manufactured therein. Without going at length into the argument presented by hon. gentlemen on this side and by the two hon. gentlemen opposite, I want to express my very strong disapproval of any attempt to impose tariffs on raw materials, above all things. That I think is a principle which no party in Canada should uphold for a minute. While I say that, I am just as strongly opposed to excessive tariffs upon finished products, because they are bringing the inevitable result. We see distress not only among our rural population but among our manufacturers, and that condition has been brought about by the policy of this government. As long as the Conservative party continues to follow that policy, just so long will we in Canada be in our present condition.

Mr. MULLINS: Mr. Chairman, when on the advice of some westerners I attempted to operate a tannery in western Canada, I found it necessary to go to Mr. Lang, ask him to go over my plant, and tell me where my difficulties arose. When he came into the plant and looked at the hides I was attempting to tan he said. "There is where you are wrong; you cannot make harness leather out of that type of hides. You have to get your hides from warm countries where they are thin, where they do not carry too much hair, and where they are not harmed by barbed wire scratches or branding." I made harness leather, and before I put it on the market I tested it. I wanted to know that I was putting out a good product, and with that in mind I took a pair of traces, or tugs as some people call them, down to the lumber yard and hitched them to a load of lumber. I am speaking of John Arbuthnot's yard on Princess street; no doubt the hon. member for Lisgar knows where it is. I want to say to hon. members that after the first pull the horses gave the load of lumber the pole fell down. You cannot get the stretch out of small hides. That is practical information, and I want the committee to know it. I paid for that experience. You cannot get the stretch out of the smaller hides that you can get out of those big spready hides from the warm countries. If the government does anything to increase the price of harness it is making a mistake. I do not want the price of harness raised, and from this seat I shall voice my opposition to any measure which will affect detrimentally the farmers in western Canada. I came here with the distinct understanding that any tariffs we imposed or any action we took would not raise the price of commodities to the consumer. I am not going to sit in this committee and support any measure which will raise those prices. If this measure passes I fear that the price of harness may increase. As I said before, the farmers in western Canada are coming back to the use of horses and for those horses they need harness.

For years the Lang people have told me that there is only one place to get these large eighty pound spready hides, and that is in warm climates. They have several stacks of hides in their packing plants, and if an hon. member visited them to-day he would find that Canada, in producing what is known as baby beef, is producing a small hide which is not suitable for harness leather, and is hardly suitable for sole leather. What would hon. members do with a hide covered with brands? What would they make out of it? What could any hon. member manufacture out of such hides? It is absolutely impracticable to make harness leather from the hides of our Canadian cattle, especially when we are raising small cattle and producing small hides. Before placing any duty upon hides which would affect the farmers of western Canada, I should like the minister to reconsider the matter.

Mr. LOUCKS: What does the hon. member mean when he speaks of small cattle?

Mr. MULLINS: I am referring to hides weighing from forty to sixty pounds. Sole leather cannot be manufactured from forty or sixty pound hides. If I were to go further into the matter I might state that leather cannot be made from inferior hides, and if my hon. friend thinks it can he ought to try it. When I began operations in the tannery I hung out a sign—the hon. member for St. Boniface knows all about it—that I was in the market to buy hides. They fired them at me from all parts of the west. Those hides were frozen, and when I thawed them out I found inside of the bundles feet cut off at the joints, and horns, and I can tell any hon. member in this committee that he cannot manufacture leather out of that type of raw material.

Mr. LOUCKS: Mr. Chairman, I have had no extensive experience as has my hon. friend from Marquette. He has been blaming the type of hides from which he had to manufacture, but probably he should have blamed the feet and horns that he found inside the bundle.

A moment ago I asked him as to what he termed a fair sized animal. I think my hon. friend will agree that the general run of cattle raised in Canada, outside of the baby beef referred to, average up pretty well. The steers shipped to the old country market last year received high praise. I cannot think that hides deteriorate to the extent described by hon. members. My father was a lumberman, and I can remember that the harness he used thirty or forty years ago was tanned and produced in Canada, made from the hides of Canadian cattle. In recent years I have not seen tugs which would stand the strain that harness stood, and it is still in use. I can see no reason for discrediting Canadian hides, and I am convinced we are discriminating a little too much, and are showing a lack of confidence. May I say to my hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario that to-day the farmers cannot sell their hides at any price. There has been a very strong suggestion that the tariff should be raised against foreign hides. Probably the tanners are not dealing as fairly as they might with the Canadian producer—and I may say there are no tanners in my constituency, or probably I would not talk so freely. In western Canada we cannot sell our hides; hon. members opposite know that to be a fact. There is a suggestion that our product is so inferior that it cannot be used for sole or harness leather, but I cannot believe that the majority of cattle produced in western Canada are inferior. They are first class cattle, and compare favourably with those from the Argentine or any other country.

Some reference has been made to climatic conditions. It seems to me that our climate should be conducive to the production of the best hides, despite the fact my hon. friend insists that the best can be produced only in warm climates. I can see no reason why, in the production of harness or sole leather, there should not be some protection so that we may use more hides produced in Canada.

Mr. EULER: Within the last hour I have received a letter from a manufacturer of rubber goods in Kitchener who formerly exported a very large quantity of his products to New Zealand. The business was cut off at the time the difficulty with New Zealand arose. Now he is very anxious to have the treaty go through because it will again stimulate the export of rubber goods. My correspondent encloses a letter from his agents in New Zealand, which reads as follows:

We have been informed by our minister—

That is the New Zealand minister.

—that they are prepared to bring the treaty before parliament at any time. The delay is with your government.

That is the Canadian government.

We understand there is one item only in dispute. So we have again approached our government to agree to ratify exclusive of that item, if practicable.

I am curious to know if the minister is permitted to tell me whether that item might conceivably be hides; and, if so, whether there is not a possibility that it might be dropped from the tariff list.

Mr. STEVENS: Is the question directed to me?

Mr. EULER: Either to the Minister of Trade and Commerce or to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. STEVENS: I have no knowledge, of course, of what the correspondent refers to, but certainly he does not refer to hides.

Mr. MULLINS: Mr. Chairman, at the time the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Loucks) went to western Canada that country was full of steers weighing from 1,400 to 1,600 pounds apiece; to-day it is next to impossible to get that type of cattle. Their hides weighed eighty pounds apiece and would make harness leather; but to-day with the small cattle the hides are absolutely unsuitable for any tanner.

Mr. YOUNG: I move that item 599 be deleted.

Mr. RHODES: I may point out to the committee that the New Zealand treaty has passed this parliament and the parliament of New Zealand, and if we are to implement our undertaking in that regard it is essential that the item should pass.

Item agreed to.

Mr. CASGRAIN: On division.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT AMENDMENT

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Income War Tax Act and to provide:—

1. That the reduction of twenty per centum from the rates of tax under the first schedule of the act be repealed;

2. That the rate of tax applicable to corporations be increased from ten per centum to eleven per centum on the income in excess of $2,000;

3. That all taxpayers in receipt of net income in excess of $5,000, excluding incomes exempt under section 4 of the said act, shall pay an additional tax of five per centum of the amount of taxes otherwise payable under the provisions of the said act;

4. That the personal exemption heretofore afforded to the extent of $3,000 be reduced to $2,400 and where heretofore afforded to the extent of $1,500 be reduced to $1,200;

5. That income arising by way of annuity contracts within the meaning of paragraph (k) of section 3 of chapter 24 of the statutes of 1930 be exempt to the extent of $1,200 in lieu of the exemption heretofore provided of $5,000, but the said exemption of annuity income heretofore provided and arising out of annuity contracts entered into prior to the passing of an act based on this resolution shall continue in full force and effect;

6. That the provisions relating to family corporations be repealed, such repeal to come into force at the end of the 1932 calendar year or fiscal periods ending therein;

7. That in respect of fiscal periods not coincident with the calendar year the return of income and payment of the tax, by persons other than individuals, in lieu of being made and paid on or before the 30th day of April in each year as in the said act provided, must be made and paid within four months from the close of the fiscal period and if not so made and paid all provisions of the said act shall mutatis mutandis apply;

8. That income by way of dividends, rentals, interest, royalties and other like income not disclosed by the taxpayer in his return of income may be added to the other income of the taxpayer in double the amount and the whole taxed under the provisions of the act.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Special War Revenue Act, chapter 179 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, as amended by chapter 50 of the statutes of 1928, chapter 57 of the statutes of 1929, chapter 43 of the statutes of 1930, and chapter 54 of the statutes of 1931, and to provide:—

1. (i) That every company authorized to transact the business of insurance in Canada or in any province of Canada, other than life and marine insurance companies, fraternal benefit societies and purely mutual fire insurance companies insuring principally farm risks, shall pay for consolidated revenue fund tax of one per centum upon the net premiums received by the company in Canada on and after the first day of January, 1932.

(ii) That every insurance company not so authorized to transact the business of insurance in Canada or in any province thereof but which maintains a deposit with the Minister of Finance as security for the claims of all Canadian policyholders exclusively of such company to the amount of at least the amount of the liabilities of the company to policyholders in Canada, shall pay for consolidated revenue fund a tax of one per centum upon the net premiums received by it in respect of insurance on property in Canada, other than marine insurance, effected or renewed in the portion of the calendar year 1932, and of each calendar year thereafter for which it maintains such deposit.

(iii) That every person resident in Canada who insures or has insured his property situate in Canada, or any property situate in Canada in which he has an insurable interest other than that of an insurer of such property, with any British or foreign company or British or foreign underwriter or underwriters, or any association of persons,

(a) which, on the twenty-second day of October, 1931, had not a deposit with the Minister of Finance for the purpose and to the amount aforesaid, shall pay for consolidated revenue fund a tax of fifteen per centum of the gross premiums paid or payable by such person for such insurance during the year 1931; and a tax of five per centum of the total net cost to such person of such insurance effected or renewed in each of the calendar years 1921 to 1930, both inclusive, during which such company, underwriter or association did not maintain a deposit with the minister for the purpose and to the amount aforesaid, the amount of such tax payable in respect of any calendar year to be reduced by the amount of any tax heretofore paid to the minister in respect of such insurance for such calendar year; or

(b) which does not on or before the first day of May, 1932, or at the time such insurance is effected or renewed, if after the said date, maintain a deposit for the purpose and to the amount aforesaid, shall each year pay a tax of fifteen per centum of the gross premiums paid or payable for such insurance during the next preceding calendar year.

Mr. VENIOT: Has the minister the suggested amendment to be made to paragraph 1?

Mr. RHODES: Paragraph 1 of the resolution will be amended by striking out the said paragraph and substituting the following:

1. (i) That every company authorized under the laws of the Dominion of Canada or of any province thereof to transact the business of insurance other than life and marine insurance companies, fraternal benefit societies, purely mutual fire insurance companies insuring principally farm risks, reciprocal insurance exchanges and mutual companies carrying on business on the premium deposit plan, shall pay for consolidated revenue fund a tax of one per centum upon the net premiums received by the company in Canada on and after the first day of January, 1932.

(ii) That every mutual company authorized under the laws of the Dominion of Canada or of any province thereof to transact the business of insurance and which carries on business on the premium deposit plan and every reciprocal insurance exchange so authorized shall pay for consolidated revenue fund a tax of two per centum upon the net premiums received by it in Canada during the calendar year 1932 and each calendar year thereafter.

(iii) That every person resident in Canada who insures or has insured his property situate in Canada, or any property situate in Canada in which he has an insurable interest other than that of an insurer of such property against risks other than marine risks, with any British or foreign company or any reciprocal insurance exchange which, on or before the first day of July, 1932, or at the time such insurance is effected or renewed if after the said date, is not authorized under the laws of the Dominion of Canada or of any province thereof to transact the business of insurance, shall pay for consolidated revenue fund a tax of fifteen per centum of the net premiums paid or payable for such insurance during the calendar year 1932 and each calendar year thereafter.

Mr. VENIOT: This is a complete change.

Mr. RHODES: This amendment is in substance what was intended originally. The original resolution was prepared shortly before I delivered the budget speech and was not in conformity with the intention I had in mind at the time. This in effect means that if outside mutual companies attempt to do business in Canada without taking out registration or making a deposit either with the dominion or with the provinces, then in the event of an individual insisting upon effecting insurance with them he will pay a tax of 15 per cent upon the premiums; but if those mutual companies take out registration or make a deposit, the tax is only two per cent. I would ask that the Minister of National Revenue move the amendment.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Mr. Chairman, I move the amendment as read by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. EULER: Do the mutuals pay twice as high a tax as the standard companies?

Mr. RHODES: No. As a matter of fact I think there is no exception taken to the two per cent tax, because, as my hon. friend knows, their premiums are based upon a different computation altogether. Furthermore, they have a class of risk on which there is an extremely low premium, and as a matter of fact the yield from this two per cent tax is relatively small. I may say that representations have been made to me that probably the tax ought to be considerably greater, but I understand that no exception has been taken even on the part of the mutual companies themselves.

Mr. EULER: There is no discrimination?

Mr. RHODES: No, that question does not arise.

Mr. RALSTON: Is the retroactive feature still in the amendment which the minister proposes?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. RALSTON: Has the minister any estimate of the revenue which will be produced by these three provisions?

Mr. RHODES: It is estimated that the one per cent tax will yield about $1,000,000, while the total revenue from the two per cent tax will be very small, probably between $10,000 and $25,000. Any estimate of the revenue from the 15 per cent tax must be largely a glorified guess; it depends upon the extent to which those companies fail to avail themselves of the opportunity of registering either with the province or with the dominion. It will be only a fraction of the yield which will come from the one per cent tax.

Mr. RALSTON: I can be sure there is no retroactive feature at all in the section now?

Mr. RHODES: No, there is not.

Mr. CAYLEY: I just want to make sure whether or not I understood the minister with regard to these foreign mutuals. They are taxed two per cent of the net premiums, and the insured pays two per cent of his premium as well?

Mr. RHODES: No, there is not a double tax; there is only one.

Mr. CAYLEY: What is meant by the words "net premium" in this case?

Mr. RHODES: In the case of mutual companies transacting business on the premium deposit plan, and reciprocal exchanges, the net premium is the net cost of insurance to the insured, together with the interest on the excess of the premium deposit, if any, over the said net cost. My hon. friend knows what that means.

Mr. CAYLEY: I believe that is an exceedingly low rate in some cases. I understand that in some of these mutuals the net premium would be only about four per cent.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend sees that we are taxing about all we can tax. We are taxing the net difference as well as the interest upon the fund which remains in the hands of the company and is placed there on deposit by the insured.

Mr. CAYLEY: I am wondering if that is fair to the Canadian companies. You are taxing them on their net premiums, which is a far greater amount.

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Are we taking up this resolution section by section, or are we dealing with the entire resolution?

Mr. RHODES: We are taking up the insurance subsection now, and the next one will deal with the tax on telephone and telegraph messages and so on.

2. That on every cable and telegraph or radio message originating in Canada for which a charge of more than fifteen cents is made, except press despatches, and on every long distance telephone call originating in Canada for which a charge of more than fifteen cents is made the sending company shall pay to the consolidated revenue fund a tax of five cents and may charge the same to the person paying the regular charges for such message.

Mr. VENIOT: I wish to direct the attention of the minister to a particular case.

Mr. RHODES: Perhaps before my hon. friend proceeds I should tell him that there is an amendment to be proposed, so his discussion might be more in point if the amendment is moved now.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I move:

That paragraph 2 of the resolution of April 6, 1932, proposing amendments to the Special War Revenue Act be amended by striking out the said paragraph 2 and substituting the following:

2. That on every cable and telegraph or radio message originating in Canada the sending company shall pay to the consolidated revenue fund a tax of 5 cents and that on every long distance telephone call originating in Canada the telephone company shall pay to the consolidated revenue fund a tax of 6 per centum of the amount charged, provided that in the case of a call from a public pay station, whether attended or operated by means of automatic slot machines, the tax in lieu of 6 per centum, shall be 5 cents for each call for which a charge of more than 25 cents but not exceeding 80 cents is made and 5 cents for each additional 80 cents or fraction thereof, and the company may charge the tax to the person paying the regular charges for such message or call.

Mr. RHODES: This means that in the case of charge accounts for long distance service, the monthly account will be taxed 6 per cent. In the case of pay stations, of which the Bell Telephone Company have some 19,000, whether or not there are attendants present the charge will be 5 cents for each call for which the charge is in excess of 25 cents and up to and including 80 cents, and an additional 5 cents for each additional 80 cents.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Does this tax apply to provincially owned lines as well as privately owned lines?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: Has the minister taken into consideration this instance: In New Brunswick we have farmers' telephone systems linked up with the New Brunswick Telephone Company under some special arrangement. When the farmer is connected up with the New Brunswick Telephone Company line it is charged as a long distance message. Under this measure the farmer will be compelled to pay a certain percentage of the cost of such telephone messages, while if he were using his own lines these calls would not be considered as long distance messages. If that is not looked into carefully I would say an injustice was being done the farmer who uses his own telephone system.

Mr. RHODES: There will be only one tax on one telephone call.

Mr. VENIOT: The minister does not get my point; it is really not a long distance call at all.

Mr. RHODES: If it is not a long distance call there will be no tax.

Mr. VENIOT: Let me explain it again. It really is not a long distance call in the true sense of the word, but because of the separation of control between this company and the main line of the New Brunswick Telephone Company with which it connects, it becomes a long distance call, because the farmer has to have permission to send his message over the line of that company. The New Brunswick Telephone Company has practically a monopoly in that province, and they need not hook up with our farm lines unless they wish to do so. But as it is, even though the call is made over a distance of only two or three miles, it is regarded as a long distance call, and according to this legislation the farmer will be charged for a long distance message.

Mr. RHODES: I must say that I do not see the difficulty suggested by my hon. friend. The telephone companies have raised no such question.

Mr. VENIOT: No; they would not raise it by any means, but if the farmers' telephone systems knew of it they would raise the point.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I want to ask a second question based upon my first, which was whether or not this tax would apply to provincially owned lines. The minister knows that a number of these telephone systems belong to and are operated by the provinces; in other words, they are crown properties in the right of the province. Has the dominion the right to tax crown property held in the right of the provinces, property controlled and operated by the government of a province and not by a private company?

Mr. RHODES: We are not taxing property held in the right of the province, we are taxing messages. The law is very clearly established that where a province engages in an undertaking of this character it shall not be exempt from taxation.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: That was my question.

Mr. RHODES: That was settled in the case of Attorney General of British Columbia vs. Attorney General of Canada, reported in 1924 Appeal Cases. The liquor commission of British Columbia attempted to evade the payment of excise and customs taxes and it was found that wherever a province engages in business it is subject to taxation. I might point out to my hon. friend that the tax is being placed upon the message, and is paid by the individual and not by the company. I do not think there is any shadow of doubt on the question of the legality of the transaction.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The term "property" was used, and that is why I asked the question. I wanted to know whether or not that term included provincial governments.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. RHODES: I should like to come back to the question asked by the hon. member for Gloucester and request that he give his illustration in terms of locality.

Mr. VENIOT: The New Brunswick Telephone Company has a central office at Caraquet, and a message to Lower Caraquet, a distance of seven miles, is not considered a long distance message. The company has a line running from Bathurst to Caraquet, and at certain points the farmers' telephones hook up with the other system. The minute the farmers' line reaches the line of the New Brunswick telephone system a message going only a mile is considered to be a long distance message.

Mr. RHODES: What is the cost of such a message?

Mr. VENIOT: About fifteen or twenty-five cents.

Mr. RHODES: Does my hon. friend say that the minimum charge would be fifteen cents under those conditions?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. RHODES: In that case the tax would be less than six cents on six messages.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not care how small the tax would be, there should be no discrimination because of a peculiar situation. This condition will be found not only in Gloucester county, but in Kent and Northumberland counties and in other sections of the province.

Mr. RHODES: I do not know that the discrimination arises out of the tax; it apparently arises out of the attitude taken by the telephone company. Even if it were to arise out of the tax, it happens inevitably in connection with any law of general application that there are points where greater hardship will fall on one individual than on another. That is inescapable, but I may say that such a case had not hitherto been brought to my attention. If there is any way to remedy any injustice by means of regulation, that will be done.

Mr. MALCOLM: The minister will realize that my hon. friend is referring to switching charges of five, ten or fifteen cents each, and a regulation exempting such charges up to a certain amount from the application of the tax would cover the point.

Mr. RHODES: This is a matter which had not hitherto been brought to my attention and is entirely new to me, but I have no doubt it could be met by regulation.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the minister give his attention to it?

Mr. RHODES: Certainly.

Mr. RALSTON: According to the amendment, a copy of which the chairman has been good enough to furnish me, it would seem that a direct discrimination is being made against those who have private telephones, especially rural lines, as against those who use pay stations. A man using a pay station pays five cents if the cost of the message is over twenty-five cents; he pays nothing when the cost of the message is under that amount. A subscriber using a private rural telephone between two places where, for instance, there is a twenty cent toll, must pay six per cent on that twenty cents. I submit that such a condition is undesirable. In the first place it will mean a lot of accounting to cover a small sum and, in the second place, it is not fair that a man should be able to go to a public telephone and put through a message costing up to twenty-five cents and not have to pay, whereas a man calling on his own telephone has to pay six per cent. A message by cable, telegraph or radio originating in Canada, no matter how much it costs, pays a tax of only five cents; no ad valorem charge is made. I am not advocating that a larger tax should be imposed on cables, telegrams and radio messages; I am pointing out that the man using a private telephone—the telephone is pretty commonly used in rural communities —is penalized, while the man using a public telephone goes scot free; and the man using the cable, telegraph or radio pays only a five cent tax.

Mr. RHODES: I am advised that upwards of ninety per cent—I cannot give the exact figures—of what are known as shorter haul messages are from subscribers, and that an almost equal proportion of the messages from toll stations are what are known as longer hauls. The inequality about which my hon. friend is concerned does not seem to exist. The man sending a pay station message costing from thirty cents up to eighty cents pays five cents. If he sends three thirty cent messages he pays fifteen cents, whereas a subscriber who does ninety cents' worth of calling would pay a little less than six cents.

Mr. RALSTON: Take them at twenty cents.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend says: take them at twenty cents. I am told that only a fraction of the messages is of the smaller amount. If we put the toll at twenty cents, a five cent tax would be a substantial one. That is the minimum you could charge in a toll station. Coming to the telegraph charges, I am advised that the average cost of all the telegrams sent is a little under seventy cents, so that a five cent charge, taking it on the average, is fair.

Mr. RALSTON: But that is not the case with cables.

Mr. EULER: What does the minister expect to get by way of revenue from his tax?

Mr. RHODES: Three-quarters of a million dollars from the telephone and half a million dollars from the telegraph.

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to ask the minister seriously to consider a minimum below which no tax will be charged. In a public pay station, you can have a twenty-cent call and you do not pay a tax; a subscriber should be put on the same basis. My hon. friend is aware that in the province from which he and I come, there are many rural services where the tolls are from fifteen to twenty cents; I can think of a great number in my constituency. My hon. friend, possibly quite unconsciously, is penalizing those subscribers who connect up with those telephone systems. They form a little telephone company; they hitch up with the Maritime Telephone and Telegraph Company and the through rate is fifteen cents. Take for instance, from Port la Tour to Barrington, the rate is, I think, less than twenty-five cents; from Barrington Passage to Clark's Harbour, there is, I think, a ten cent toll. If a man has a telephone, there is no reason why he should have to pay a six per cent tax on those small messages, while I can go into the hotel at Barrington Passage and use the public telephone and not pay any tax to the government. The same benefit should be given to the subscriber. Just as in the case of cheques, there is a minimum of $5 below which no stamp is required, there should, in the case of telephone messages, be some minimum below which no tax is collected. I think this will be an expensive tax to collect; there will not be a great deal of revenue from it and as drafted in the amendment it is discriminatory.

Mr. RHODES: As to the revenue, I have given my hon. friend the figures. In more prosperous times the revenue would be about a million dollars.

Mr. RALSTON: I am speaking of the telephone message tax.

Mr. RHODES: I am told by the telephone companies that the administrative cost will be comparatively small and the method of collection will not be difficult. My hon. friend spoke of the ten cent message. They could take ten of those messages before they would have to pay a six cent tax, which is not an excessive one. Admittedly this is a revenue producing measure; that is all. It has no other excuse in the world. There is no doubt it is to a large extent a nuisance tax, but it seems to me the burden in the case I have indicated is not heavy. I have in mind conditions in the province from which my hon. friend comes. Many of the local telephone companies there which cover substantial areas will not pay any tax at all. It is only when they go into the long distance telephone through the exchange of the Nova Scotia Telephone Company, that there will be any tax, and I consider, in a case of that kind, they should pay a tax.

Mr. BROWN: I presume, from answers which the minister made the hon. member for Red Deer, he is thoroughly satisfied of the right of the government to tax provincial companies?

Mr. RHODES: I do not submit my own view as being worth anything. I have consulted eminent lawyers and the Justice department have also advised me that in their judgment there is no question as to that.

Mr. BROWN: In Manitoba the service is being carried on at cost, and it is well administered. Unfortunately in these troublous times many farmers and others are taking out their telephones and I am afraid this tax will further emphasize the movement in that direction. This is something I am not worrying over, but I am afraid this tax will not help my hon. friend's friends in Manitoba in carrying out their pledge to have cheap telephones in all the farmers' houses.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister, I submit, has not answered the criticism I am making. I do not want to take up the time of the committee, but it is no use for him to tell us you can put through ten messages at ten cents apiece and pay only six cents on them. A man who steps into a public telephone station can put through at least two messages and pay nothing.

Mr. RHODES: I may tell my hon. friend that those messages to which he refers constitute just four per cent of all telephone messages in Canada, so that they are a negligible quantity.

Mr. RALSTON: That just points the argument I am trying to make. My hon. friend is simply imposing an irritating tax which will not help the revenue and which is discriminatory because it is directly opposed to the principle of applying the tax to the public generally. A subscriber should not have to pay a six per cent tax on those small messages. I am again pointing out to the minister that it is useless for him to argue that it takes a lot of them to make a little money in taxes. That is just my point, and that is why I think he might just as well drop the idea and have a minimum below which he will make no charge on subscriber messages as well as on public toll station business, just as I instanced a minute ago the case of cheques, where we do not impose a stamp tax on cheques of $5 or less.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend is advocating that in the case of a percentage tax there is a minimum below which we should not go.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. RHODES: As I originally prepared this amendment it provided that the tax would not apply to a thirty cent message.

Mr. RALSTON: Fifteen cents.

Mr. RHODES: That is as it appears in the present amendment, but I am speaking of the amendment as I devised it originally. What would the effect of that be? It would mean that three thirty cent messages would cost fifteen cents.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. RHODES: I am referring to the amendment as I originally proposed it. My hon. friend must get the idea into his head that there are other views than his, even if they are wrong ones. It was the telephone companies themselves who suggested this. I do not say that they are a unit throughout Canada, but I took the judgment of the great bulk of the telephone companies, and at a meeting which they held in Winnipeg representative of the telephone interests of all Canada, they were the ones who suggested to me that it would be a more equitable tax to apply the principle of the sales tax to the telephones rather than start by a five cent tax, a ten cent tax, and so on. Where you come to the dividing point between five cents and ten cents, you are going to have hardship. One man who has only one cent more to pay for a message than another, has to pay a tax of 100 per cent more. They said that it was much fairer to apply the principle of the sales tax, which would mean that you would have a percentage covering the whole amount of the tax. That is why the amendment appears in its present form, and although it apparently does not convince the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, the justice of it appealed to me and that is why I am submitting it to the committee.

Mr. RALSTON: I have never advocated a five cent charge. What I have been suggesting is that the ad valorem six per cent tax, if it is to be imposed, be applicable only to a message above a certain amount, and I have suggested twenty-five cents just as he has made the tax in public pay stations on twenty-five cent messages. I am not talking about a flat five cent charge and have never talked about it. My hon. friend made some remarks suggesting that I was unable to see any other views than my own.

Mr. RHODES: I did not say that.

Mr. RALSTON: I am endeavouring to combine my hon. friend's suggested tax of six per cent with a minimum charge just as there is in the case of stamps and cheques. If you make a six per cent charge, with a minimum, and put a rider on the resolution to the effect that no tax shall be charged on any message for which the toll is less than 25 cents, that would carry out my idea.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend, who is an old friend, I may say, is too shrewd not to realize that I never made the statement that he attributes to me. What I said was that my hon. friend must get the idea that there are other views than his own, even if they are wrong, which is something entirely different from what he says I said. I have got the point that my hon. friend makes as to the tax, but let me point out to him that he is pleading for a man who pays a tax of one cent. We will say that the tax should take hold at twenty cents. My hon. friend is pleading for the fifteen cent man, and he would pay a tax of less than one cent. Six fifteen-cent messages would amount to less than one dollar, so from that angle it is not worth while wasting very many words about it. I discussed the question of the cost of administration with the companies, and they told me that by simply taking the monthly accounts, without reference to amounts, other than to total them, and then charging the six per cent, it is simply a matter of bookkeeping and collection; but to go through every individual item of every account every day of the year and delete the fifteen cents on each message would involve clerical costs running into many thousands of dollars. That is why the companies made the suggestion in its present form.

Mr. YOUNG: There are a great many people in the country who use the long distance telephone very seldom, once or twice a month, perhaps less. Some have telephones and some not. Those with telephones would be able to get the call through for a cent and a fraction, but the neighbour without a telephone would have to go to the central operator and pay five cents. It is irritating for a man to pay five cents for what his neighbour gets for one cent and a fraction, and for all the difference it would make to the revenue the minister might as well drop it.

Mr. RHODES: I know there must be good neighbours out in the hospitable west, and I would suggest in such a case as my hon. friend mentions that the man without a telephone call at his neighbour's house with a telephone and have the call charged up to his neighbour, and then he will get the call at the same cost as his neighbour.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the minister allow a discount of so much per mile for the distance he has to travel to his neighbour's house?

Mr. RALSTON: All the telephone companies would need to have would be two columns in the account, one for messages under 25 cents and the other for messages above 25 cents. Then there would be no trouble at all and no question of spending thousands of dollars as the minister suggests.

Mr. RHODES: I am only giving the committee the information as it was given to me by those with experience in the telephone business.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think my hon. friend would say it himself.

Mr. TAYLOR: There are four small telephone companies in the constituency I represent, and the maximum charge for calls between stations would be possibly fifteen cents. Am I to understand from the amendment that six per cent will be added to the monthly bill of tolls?

Mr. RHODES: If they are long distance telephone calls they would be subject to a tax of six per cent. If the account of an individual at the end of a month is $2, for instance, he will pay a tax of 12 cents.

Mr. TAYLOR: Where a company is giving only a local service to the county, would that be called a long distance call? For instance, to get into the market town in this county costs fifteen cents, through two centrals. Would that be considered a long distance or a local call?

Mr. RHODES: I do not know that I can answer my hon. friend with absolute assurance. It is pretty hard to draw the line. But as I understand it, in the telephone business what is known as a long distance call is pretty well defined. If you telephone from here to Aylmer I do not understand that that is a long distance call, although I may be wrong; or if you telephone to Hintonburg that is not a long distance call. A long distance call is when you have to pay an extra toll, and I do not think it is the distance alone which governs, because, as I pointed out to my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth, there are farmers' mutuals lines in Nova Scotia, some of which extend for a great many miles, where there would be no tax at all.

Miss MACPHAIL: In the country districts there are independent telephone companies which connect up with the Bell Telephone Company. Would such a connecting call be a long distance call and subject to the tax? That would be a great hardship in the country districts because these independent companies have some arrangement with the Bell Company whereby the farmers can telephone over a certain distance for five or ten cents. Would such a call come under this tax?

Mr. RHODES: I find it rather difficult to give my hon. friend from Southeast Grey an answer with accuracy. The determining factor, it would seem to me, would not be whether there were two telephone companies in the transaction. If there were a connecting charge I do not think that that would have any bearing. I do not think the tax would be imposed on that charge. But if there is a charge for what is known as a long distance call, then the tax would apply. I will have careful inquiry made, but that is how it strikes me at the moment. There will be dividing lines and points where there may be some little difficulty and perhaps inequalities, but I have every hope that such cases can be met by reasonable regulations.

Mr. GARDINER: What does the minister understand by a long distance telephone call?

Mr. RHODES: From here to Montreal, for example.

Mr. GARDINER: If the minister would give us a definition I think it would help relieve the situation.

Mr. RHODES: There has been no attempt at definitions so far as the department is concerned. Our idea is that we would put a tax on long distance calls as they have hitherto been known in the custom and usage of the telephone companies.

[Mr. Taylor.]

Miss MACPHAIL: The interpretation of a long distance call may make a tremendous difference, because there are a great many districts in Ontario where the local company has to make a connection with the Bell Telephone Company to enable the farmer to reach the town in which he does business. Would the connecting charge be considered a long distance call?

Mr. RHODES: I do not think the connecting charge would have any bearing. It would depend on the correct interpretation of a long distance call.

Mr. SANDERSON: Is not a long distance call a call from one exchange to another, whether they are two or five or ten or one hundred or five hundred miles apart?

Mr. RHODES: I hope the committee does not expect me to give a technical definition, because as I have pointed out, we have attempted no definition. We propose to apply the definition recognized in the custom of telephone companies. My hon. friend should not attempt to say that a two mile call would be regarded as a long distance telephone call—not at all. My hon. friend can talk a distance of five, six or eight miles right here in the city of Ottawa.

Mr. SANDERSON: That is a different proposition.

Mr. DUFF: It is designated by zones, is it not?

Mr. MALCOLM: I think I can explain the matter in a way to satisfy the hon. member for South Perth. A long distance call may be of any distance, provided the subscriber in his contract has the guarantee that he may telephone in a given district without a long distance charge. The long distance charge, as popularly interpreted by telephone companies, is a charge for phone services beyond the terms of contracts.

Mr. DUFF: Beyond certain zones.

Mr. MALCOLM: The hon. member for Southeast Grey was referring to rural telephone companies in Ontario. To illustrate, the Bruce telephone system allows its subscribers to talk from Kincardine to Paisley and Port Elgin without any extra charge. Calls even of that distance are not treated as long distance calls. But when we cross into the county of Huron or switch on to the Bell Telephone Company lines there is a switching charge of five cents. The hon. member for Southeast Grey wishes to know whether the switching charge from the rural telephone system to the Bell, which gives the privilege of telephoning within a town, could be treated as a long distance charge. If the minister would repeat what he said to me I believe he would satisfy the hon. member for Southeast Grey. The minister told me that so far as he was concerned the switching charge was not to be treated as a long distance charge, and that no tax would be imposed thereon.

Mr. RHODES: That is as I understand it.

Mr. TAYLOR: In the county in which I live the local telephone company have some three or four centrals. There is a rental for the use of the telephone. To call from one central to another costs five cents, or to call the county town would cost fifteen cents. Would that be considered as a long distance call over a local line?

Mr. RHODES: I am inclined to think so.

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraphs 3 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

6. (i) That the rate of consumption or sales tax as imposed by section eighty-six of the said act, as amended by section eleven of chapter 54 of the statutes of 1931, be increased to six per cent.

(ii) That the following words be removed from the list of articles exempt from the consumption or sales tax set out in schedule III to the said act, as enacted by chapter 54 of the statutes of 1931, that is to say;

"Bakers' cake and pies, not to include biscuits;" "and substitutes therefor" in line seven of the said schedule; "lard compound and similar substances, made from animal or vegetable stearine or oils;" "materials for use solely in the manufacture of any substitute for butter or lard;" "extract of rennet;" "ice cream;" "usual coverings to be used exclusively for covering goods not subject to the consumption or sales tax;" "materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture of usual coverings to be used for covering goods not subject to the consumption or sales tax."

Also under the heading "Goods Enumerated in Customs Tariff Items;" the following figures and words, namely:—

"45. Milk foods, n.o.p.; prepared cereal foods, in packages not exceeding twenty-five pounds weight each;"

"46. Prepared cereal foods, n.o.p;"

And that the word "lard" where it first appears in line eight of the said schedule be struck out and the words "lard, when produced in Canada" be substituted.

(iii) That the following words be inserted in the said schedule:

"All articles manufactured or produced by the labour of the blind in institutions established for their care or under the control or direction of such institutions."

(iv) That the following words be removed from the list of articles exempt to the extent of fifty per cent of the consumption or sales tax set out in schedule IV to the said act, as enacted by chapter 54 of the statutes of 1931, that is to say:—

"Biscuits of all kinds."

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Chairman, I should like to discuss in committee one or two matters contained in paragraph 6 of this resolution. This particular paragraph refers to the sales tax, and I notice that it has been increased from four per cent to six per cent. Two years ago the sales tax was only one per cent, and I can remember our Conservative friends in the session of 1930 objected very strongly to the fact that the Liberal government and the Minister of Finance of that day had not done away with the sales tax altogether. They called it a poor man's tax. In spite of their arguments in 1930, the first year they were in power they increased the sales tax to four per cent. That did not satisfy them, and this year they make a further increase of fifty per cent, bringing the tax up to six per cent.

While I object very strongly to this tax in its entirety, there are one or two matters to which I take particular exception. Previous to last year an item of common consumption was on the exempted list. I refer to salt, which is used in the maritime provinces, Quebec, probably in the provinces adjoining the great lakes, and also British Columbia, for the cure of all kinds of fish. A particular brand of salt imported from foreign countries is used in this connection. As I said a minute ago, up until last year that salt was on the free list, but for some reason—and I think I am correct when I say that the then Minister of Finance merely slipped up, because I cannot understand why he would want to impose a sales tax on salt used in Canadian fisheries —the tax was put on. This salt is a raw material, and is used to cure a commodity of which 99.99 per cent is afterwards exported.

On page 25 of the Special War Revenue Act for 1931, which I now hold in my hand, the following words appear among the exemptions: "Salt, when manufactured or produced in Canada." The words, "when manufactured or produced in Canada" were added last year, and I cannot understand why the addition was made, especially in view of the fact that there is no salt produced in Canada which could be used to properly cure herring, mackerel and a great many other fish.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): What about Malagash salt?

Mr. DUFF: Malagash salt is all right for certain purposes. I am not saying a word against it, but the fact is that Malagash salt comes out of the earth, and there are certain strata in it, and when the salt is used in the curing of salt fish it leaves a scum, due to the fact that there must be earth mixed with the salt. Moreover, when the fish is cured and dried, the face of the article shows a dark colour. I think the people who produce the salt to which my hon. friend refers know as well as I do that my statements are correct. I have discussed the matter with Mr. Chambers, who is connected with the production of that commodity; my hon. friend is acquainted with him. I have made certain tests in the hope of using the Malagash salt, but have always found that this earthy scum would appear on the fish, and that consequently it was not possible to produce a white article. In the markets to which we ship, the fish must be white and clean, and therefore our salt must be purchased in Turks island, the West Indies, Torrevieja on the Mediterranean, or Cadiz, one of the Spanish ports.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): I understand that due to processing this salt is now free from the objection mentioned by my hon. friend.

Mr. DUFF: Only a year ago a scientist named Doctor Barry of Halifax, Mr. Chambers, who is president of the Malagash Salt Products Limited, and myself made a number of tests. Doctor Barry, with whom I was associated, thought he could do something to take the strata out of the salt. Mr. Chambers brought some samples down to my own town, and a number of tests were made. We found, however, that it was impossible to get this foreign substance out of the salt. Although a good deal of the Malagash product is used, we find that it does not leave a white surface, and consequently is not satisfactory for our purposes. But even if the salt were as good as the salt which we import from other countries, I would still contend that this clause should not have been put in, because salt is one of the basic articles which the fisherman must use in his industry. Our fishermen should not be compelled to pay a six per cent sales tax when any company producing salt in Canada does not have to pay it. I do not think it is fair, I do not think it is right, and I am trying to be charitable in saying that some way or other these words "when manufactured or produced in Canada" were slipped into this exemption clause last year. I respectfully submit to the minister that it is not in the interests of the fishermen that they should be so taxed on their salt. I need not explain to the Minister of Finance the deplorable condition of that great industry of the maritime provinces at the present time. I should not be here asking the minister to take off this impost, I should be at home trying to do something for the fishermen of my province. If my hon. friend does not do something to encourage the fishing industry of the maritime provinces, I do not know what is going to happen. I cannot understand why the minister did not give consideration not only to the idea of not having any sales tax on salt but of not increasing the tax to six per cent this year. Instead of not taking salt out of the exempted list, by this clause he deliberately increases the sales tax from four to six per cent.

Let me say something else to my hon. friend in regard to this sales tax on salt. Under a treaty with the island of Newfoundland fish produced there comes into Canada free of duty. I am in favour of that, because all the fish which comes in from Newfoundland is handled by the exporters of fish in Halifax and Lunenburg—I handle some myself—and it does not interfere in the slightest with the producers of fish in Canada; we are able to steady the market by handling a certain portion of Newfoundland fish. But I would bring this to the attention of my hon. friend as another reason why salt should go on the exempted list altogether, both as regards excise and sales tax. Our fishermen have to compete with the fishermen of Newfoundland, and if our fishermen have to pay a three per cent excise tax and a six per cent sales tax, the fishermen of Newfoundland can land their fish in Halifax, Lunenburg or any other Canadian port cheaper than can the Canadian fishermen. For that and other reasons I say to my hon. friend he should amend this clause and exempt salt from the sales and excise tax. It is bad enough for our fishermen to have to pay the excise tax on salt. Of course, if every other article imported is subject to the excise tax I am not going to object very strongly to the three per cent on salt, but I do urge my hon. friend that if it were possible to take both the sales tax and the excise tax off salt it should be done, because our fishermen need every little bit of help to encourage them in their industry. Our fishermen have not only to pay these taxes on their salt, but also on everything else they buy either for their families or to prosecute their industry. My hon. friend should take that into consideration and do something to hold up the hands of these people, and endeavour to encourage an industry that is practically at its last gasp.

Under this clause there is another hardship to our fishermen. Up to this year, as I said a moment ago, there were certain exemptions under schedule 3. If my hon. friend will look at page 4 he will notice the following:

"usual coverings to be used exclusively for covering goods not subject to the consumption or sales tax;" "materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture of usual coverings to be used for covering goods not subject to the consumption or sales tax."

Now, I would direct the minister's attention to the fact that this means a twelve per cent tax on every package which is used in the fish business, whether cask, butt, drum, herring barrel, mackerel barrel or box, because there is a six per cent tax on the finished article, the package itself, and there is also a six per cent tax on the value of the materials. Take herring and mackerel barrels. Men go into the woods and cut staves, which they sell to the coopers. There is a six per cent tax on the staves. There is also a six per cent tax on the lumber which goes into the casks, barrels and boxes. When the barrels or boxes are manufactured there is an additional six per cent. Surely the government never intended that the supplies of the fish industry, the apple industry, and the hundred other industries where boxes are used, should be taxed in this way. But I am pleading especially for the fishing industry—there are others better qualified to look after the interests of the other industries—and I say it is ruinous that the fishermen of this country should have to pay a twelve per cent tax on these packages. I plead with the minister now, if he has not an amendment in his mind —I have written to him and called his attention to it—in regard to the sales tax on salt and the sales tax on the materials which go into the manufacture of fish containers, that he should let section 6 stand and look into the matter with a view to relieving the fishermen of this great burden.

Mr. ERNST: Mr. Chairman, for once I find myself in complete accord with the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough.

Mr. YOUNG: Free trade doctrine.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend voted for the budget, I did not; there is the difference.

Mr. ERNST: I have no doubt, no matter what was in the budget, my hon. friend would have voted against it. But I am confident of this, that we can combine our efforts for the benefit of the fishing industry and rise above politics, because I am going to protest against this provision by the Minister of Finance. Last year I was under the impression that salt was exempt, together with other commodities used by the fishermen, from the operation of the sales tax, and when I went home I was amazed, as I have no doubt my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough was, to find that the rider was added that the sales tax was taken off only when the salt was manufactured in Canada. As a matter of fact practically all the salt used by the fishermen in the province of Quebec and along the maritime coast comes from outside of Canada, and those channels of trade cannot be changed in a moment. The result is that this amounts to a six per cent tariff in favour of Canadian salt and a six per cent tax on Canadian fishermen. I have no hesitation in making that statement, and in view of the present condition of the industry such a tax upon the fishermen is unfair. This is an export product, and every product which is exported should be encouraged in every possible way. In addition we have the three per cent excise tax, making a total tax of nine per cent on the salt used by the fishermen.

I should like to see salt exempt from the application of the excise tax as well. I know the minister will say that the exporter can make a return showing the amount of salt which has gone into the product and recover ninety-nine per cent of the tax by way of drawback. Theoretically that sounds all right, but from a practical standpoint it is impossible. Salt is used by so many individual fishermen, who purchase it and pay the tax but do not export the fish, that there is no way under heaven of getting that tax back to them. The same argument applies to the fish containers. Casks containing fish which are exported cannot be used more than once, because it is not economical to bring them back. In many cases individual fishermen will buy these casks, or the barrels used for pickled fish; they will pay the tax, but they do not export the product so they cannot obtain the drawback. I contend that this is unfair, with the industry in its present condition. The same argument applies to apple barrels, which are used in Canada to a very limited extent only, and are almost entirely exported. They are used by the people in the Annapolis valley and are manufactured to a considerable extent in my own county. They too will be subject to the tax. The barrel will go to the exporting firm filled with apples, and the exporting firm may get a drawback but it will not go back to the individual who paid the tax.

There is one other difficulty in this connection. Many of these containers are made by small concerns or by individuals who hitherto have had no system of bookkeeping and would find it impossible to install such a system. Personally I do not see how the minister is going to collect the tax. He may say that is a matter for the Department of National Revenue. I tell the Minister of National Revenue that he will find it impossible to collect the tax. The small firms and individuals who cut their own material in the winter and manufacture these articles during the summer and autumn will be in a constant state of turmoil and unrest. I cannot protest too strongly against this measure. The containers and the salt should be exempt from the sales tax, and that salt in particular should be exempt from the excise tax as well.

Mr. RHODES: While my hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg agrees with my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough, I submit that both hon. gentlemen are in error to a very substantial degree. In the first place, my hon. friend raised strong objection to the amendment with respect to the exemption provisions under the sales tax. As far as we are concerned this was not done this year; it was done last year, and I do not know why my hon. friend did not object then.

Mr. DUFF: I was in Nova Scotia looking after the fish business when the budget resolutions were discussed.

Mr. RHODES: Let me point out to my hon. friend that this provision simply means that if Canadian salt is used no sales tax is paid.

Mr. ERNST: You cannot do it.

Mr. RHODES: Just one at a time, please. If you use Canadian salt you pay no sales tax and no excise tax. My hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg says you cannot do it. He may be right, but I submit that this is not the entire story. We are capable of producing in Canada salt equal in quality to that produced in any other country in the world. My hon. friend, of course, is free to talk for the fishermen, and let me say that I do not yield to him or to anyone else in my desire to do everything possible to help the fishermen. But we have other people in this country who are just as worthy as the fishermen; we have many men who could be engaged, and some who are engaged, in the salt industry. My hon. friend says Canadian salt cannot be used. In that I do not agree with him, and I do not need technical knowledge to hold that opinion, though I am prepared to subsitute for my own judgment the opinion of those who are experienced in chemistry. But let me say to my hon. friend that if imported salt is used and the bulk of the product is exported, they can get a drawback of almost the full amount of the sales tax paid on the salt.

Mr. DUFF: No.

[Mr. Ernst.]

Mr. RHODES: They can get a drawback of ninety-nine per cent.

Mr. DUFF: How?

Mr. RHODES: Surely my hon. friend is aware of the section of the act containing that provision.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, the section is there, but how are you to operate it?

Mr. DUFF: I have asked already, and had my friends in the county of Lunenburg ask, for a refund or rebate on salt which was used last year. The customs collector refused to allow that drawback, because, as my hon. friend from Queens-Lunenburg said, this salt was bought by individual fishermen from the very people who buy the fish when it is cured and who export that product. They sell the salt to one hundred or one thousand fishermen, and the collector of customs says that the exporter of the fish, the man who sold the salt to the fishermen, cannot make the necessary affidavit for a refund.

Mr. RHODES: That may be quite true in the case to which my hon. friend refers, but I could mention a case to which that argument would not apply, and I think my hon. friend from Gloucester could do so as well.

Mr. DUFF: Can my hon. friend give me one case in which it can be done?

Mr. RHODES: Yes; in any curing process in this country using imported salt. My hon. friend is referring to imported salt which is distributed among perhaps one hundred people.

Mr. DUFF: How many people import salt and use it themselves? Certainly I should know what I am talking about in this case.

Mr. RHODES: I am prepared to admit at once that my hon. friend has forgotten more about the fishing business than I know, and I bow to his superior judgment in that connection. But when it comes to a question of the application of a law I refuse to accept his judgment, and I think I have every right to take that attitude.

Mr. DUFF: I just stated that the collector would not allow the drawback.

Mr. RHODES: The Department of Finance does not administer the sales tax, and in that respect I have to get a good deal of my information left hand. I can give my hon. friend only such information as comes to me from the experts in the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. DUFF: I have my information right hand.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg mentioned that a great bulk of the casks are used in the export business, but if that is so a drawback could be obtained.

Mr. ERNST: What about the individual?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend now comes back to the individual. A moment ago he was saying that it would be difficult to administer this regulation, that we would not be able to collect the tax from the individual; if that is so, then he need not worry. If my hon. friend has any specific instances where he believes the drawback is unworkable or where no method can be devised to obtain a drawback, I should like to know of them. If he can show me definite instances, then I will agree that he has made out a case. I should like him to give me the chapter and verse and then I can submit the case to the experts in the Department of National Revenue and at the next sitting of this committee I shall be able to give their opinions.

Mr. DUFF: The officers of the department have told us that we cannot apply for a rebate on this salt. As I said, 99·99 per cent of the salt used for curing fish is exported; only ·001 of the salt is used for fish for local consumption. I have no desire to be personal in this matter, but I want to give the minister all the information I possess. I am interested in the importation of salt. My hon. friend has said that domestic salt was as good as foreign salt to cure fish, but I contend that that is not correct.

Mr. RHODES: Does my hon. friend mean to say that we cannot produce in Canada salt as good for the curing of fish as salt produced elsewhere in the world?

Mr. VENIOT: You cannot do it.

Mr. DUFF: The salt produced in Ontario is all right for table use, and there is some fishery salt manufactured in that province, but it is too far away from Quebec, the maritimes and British Columbia. Some of the fine salt used in the fish business is called Liverpool salt; it gives what is known as a quick strike. Real fishery salt is crushed to about the size of a pea. I am not trying to detract from the virtues of the Malagash salt because I have done everything I could to help Mr. Chambers. I helped him to make investigations; I put a scientist on the job and he, Mr. Chambers and myself made tests for three months. That scientist did everything possible to remove the foreign matter, but he was not successful. That salt is not suitable for our purposes. When our fish is packed in it they will not bring the same price as when they are packed in salt taken from the ocean. Malagash salt is taken from the earth while the salt we use comes from the ocean. This salt is evaporated in the Mediterranean, in Trapani, Spain, or in the West Indies in Turks island. Anyone who has been in the West Indies will know the strength of the salt water there and will appreciate my argument. The water is put in ponds and allowed to evaporate, the salt taken out and the ponds again filled with water.

There is another matter to which I should like the Minister of Trade and Commerce to give attention. In the old days much of the business from the maritime provinces was carried on in sailing vessels. To-day the use of these vessels is not as great but considerable business is still done in this manner. If I ship a cargo of fish in a sailing vessel to Porto Rico or Trinidad or some other point—in doing this I come into competition with the Canadian government merchant marine—the only return cargo available is salt. If my vessel goes to Newfoundland and loads a cargo of fish for Oporto or some port in Greece or Italy, the only return cargo available is salt. Canadian salt is not suitable for our purposes and we should not be penalized in the purchase of a suitable commodity. The ships return with the foreign salt which is put in storage. That salt is sold, as the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg has said, not to one man who cures say two thousand quintals of fish but to one hundred men who cure twenty quintals each, or even to five hundred men. Those men do not come back to sell their fish to me because I sold them their salt; they may sell their fish to anyone of the firms who signed a telegram sent recently to the Minister of Finance. This telegram reads as follows:

> We the undersigned dried and pickled fish exporters protest against the imposition of sales tax on fish packages thus adding to the cost of articles not used in Canada at a time when exporters cannot sell to cover the purchase price this notwithstanding the fish in most cases were bought from the fishermen below cost of production. If this unreasonable tax is insisted upon it will simply penalize the larger cooperage producers this owing to the impossibility of collecting from the many individuals producing packages in a small way.

That is what the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg said. The telegram continues:

> Further we cannot understand the government's action in continuing to increase the sales tax and excise tax on salt for the fishermen. The production of salt fish being almost entirely for export this burden put upon our fishermen is not consistent with the bonusing of five cents a bushel on wheat. We implore your compliance with our request to eliminate said tax from the tariff.

This telegram is signed not by fishermen but by exporters of fish. They are as follows:

A. M. Smith and Company,
H. L. Montague, Limited,
W. and C. H. Mitchell,
Farquhar and Company,
Halifax Fisheries, Limited,
Mitchell and McNeil,
Robin, Jones and Whitman, Limited.

I have proved that it is impossible to obtain this refund or rebate or whatever you call it. As soon as I saw this new schedule I got in touch with the commissioner of excise, Mr. Taylor, who referred me to section 94, to which the minister referred a few moments ago. I sent a copy of Mr. Taylor's letter to six different importers of salt in Nova Scotia, as well as a copy of the schedule, and advised them that they could obtain a refund of ninety-nine per cent of the duty paid on salt sold last year. Each importer went to the customs and was turned down. He was told: You cannot take an affidavit that the salt which you sold to the fishermen went outside of Canada. Of course the importer or the seller of the salt could not take the affidavit, with the result that they could not get the drawback, although it is a well known fact, as I said a moment ago, that ninety-nine per cent of the salt goes out on export. As I say, the importer or the business man could not take that affidavit; the customs collector knew he could not do so and did not help him in any way to get over the difficulty by saying: All right; we know this is all for export and you can send in your claim. Thus section 94 is of no use at all and for that reason we cannot act on it. I submit to the minister that in the interests of the fisheries, the four per cent sales tax should never have been imposed; in my opinion it was a mistake. I am afraid the Minister of Finance and my good friend the hon. member for Cumberland, where this concern is producing salt, purposely allowed this to be slipped in to help that concern, but it will not help the Malagash salt business one iota. If the government puts a 20 per cent sales tax and a 10 per cent excise tax on salt, I want to tell the minister seriously—and I am telling him sincerely—we could not or would not use the Malagash salt in our fisheries.

Mr. VENIOT: Although the hon. member to my right, who has just spoken, has discussed this question very fully, and although I agree with everything he has said in connection with the injustice of the imposition of a sales tax and an excise tax on salt, having lived nearly all my life among fishermen, especially those engaged in the codfish business, I know from experience it is impossible for our cod fishermen to use Malagash or, indeed, any Canadian salt and put their product on the market in such a way as to command the proper prices. Therefore our fishermen are compelled to import the salt they use. As the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough has said, in importing this salt they are met by a double tax, the six per cent sales tax and the three per cent excise tax. If that were the only thing that militated against our fishermen, it might be overcome or they might put up with it for a while; but when you consider the package licence, the covering licence or fee that is charged, the situation is aggravated. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough gave one example; let me give a more striking one of how that covering charge affects our fishermen. For instance, it is a six per cent charge on the value of the can which contains the packed lobster. Once the lobster is placed in those tin cans, they, to the extent of a dozen or two or four dozen, go into a wooden box for transportation. I am talking now of lobster not for shipment to foreign countries but for transportation throughout Canada. That wooden box is also struck with a tax of six per cent on the value of the box which covers the containers in which the lobster is placed. Therefore you have a double tax: you have a tax against the tin can in which the lobster is placed and another against the wooden container which carries the tin can in its transportation to the market. It may be said that this was not intended, and it is because I believe it was not intended I am bringing the matter up in order that the attention of the minister and his officials may be directed to it; that they will give it the study it requires and define what is a container, what is a covering. At present there is nothing to define it; that covering tax can be applied to anything. It can be applied to the can in which the milkman brings his milk or cream to market. When that can returns from its outbound destination and goes out again the next time, under this very act another six per cent is charged on the value of that container.

Let us consider how this applies to the fishing industry and the cheap sea food that is being put up in the maritime provinces. The sardine is a cheap sea food; it sells at retail for five cents a can. The can in which it is contained, including the patent opener that must be used, costs more than the fish that is in the can, and the government are taxing that can six per cent. They are taxing not only the tin can six per cent, but the wooden box in which a hundred cans are placed for transportation. To that extent they are discriminating against the fishing industry.

Mr. RHODES: Did I understand my hon. friend to say that a milkman would pay a sales tax on his milk can every time he sent it to market?

Mr. VENIOT: There is nothing to say he will not.

Mr. RHODES: As a matter of fact my hon. friend is quite wrong.

Mr. VENIOT: I hope I am, but can the minister show me where?

Mr. RHODES: There would be a tax on the tin can once.

Mr. VENIOT: That is not stated.

Mr. RHODES: Well, that is the fact.

Mr. VENIOT: I have a right to know that. I am glad I brought the matter up.

Mr. RHODES: There is only the one sale. When the manufacturer who makes the can sells it, he pays the sales tax and that is the end.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not talking about the sales tax; I am talking about the covering tax.

Mr. RHODES: So am I.

Mr. VENIOT: I understand when the can is manufactured and sold to the farmer, he pays a sales tax. I am not discussing that. I am discussing that can from the time the farmer puts the milk into it. He takes it to the station, say at Sussex, and sends it to Saint John. He has to pay a covering tax on that can.

Mr. RHODES: No; my hon. friend is quite wrong.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the minister show me in the act which is before the house where that is not the case? That is what I want to know.

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend will look at section 86 of the Special War Revenue Act, he will find it.

Mr. VENIOT: I have the act in front of me. Where is it?

Mr. RHODES: Section 86 reads:

In addition to any duty or tax that may be payable under this act or any other statute or law, there shall be imposed, levied and collected a consumption or sales tax of four per cent—

It is six per cent now.

—on the sale price of all goods,—

(a) produced or manufactured in Canada, payable by the producer or manufacturer at the time of the delivery of such goods to the purchaser thereof.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not talking about that at all.

Mr. RHODES: I am talking about what my hon. friend is talking about.

Mr. VENIOT: Not at all.

Mr. RHODES: When it was sold by the manufacturer to the purchaser there was a sales tax on it, and that was the end of it. My hon. friend would make it appear that there was a covering tax upon it every time the can was sent to market.

Mr. VENIOT: Does the minister mean that there was no covering tax?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, and I have told my hon. friend so three or four times.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not agree with the minister. You are taking the following words from the list of articles exempt from the consumption or sales tax, "materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture of usual coverings." Those were formerly exempted from the sales tax.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend is confusing two entirely different things. There is no question that last year the milk can was exempt from the sales tax, and if this provision goes through, it will be subject to the sales tax. But what my hon. friend was saying, and what I took exception to, was that there was a tax on that milk can every time it went to market, which is not so.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not say sales tax.

Mr. RHODES: There is no tax of any kind upon it except the tax upon the milk can when it is sold by the manufacturer to the purchaser. The can might last a year or two years, or as long as it does last, there would be no further tax upon it.

Mr. VENIOT: What about the cans for the preserving of fish?

Mr. RHODES: Stick to the milk can for the time being.

Mr. VENIOT: No, because you apply the same thing to the other coverings. Take the sardine can. There is a covering tax on that.

Mr. RHODES: I was not discussing for the moment the sardine can. I want to get the milk can straightened out first.

Mr. VENIOT: The minister will get the milk can straightened out if he straightens out the sardine can.

Mr. RHODES: I am prepared to discuss the sardine can tax in spite of the fact that my hon. friend has refused to accept the statement of the minister when he makes it on his ministerial responsibility.

Mr. VENIOT: When the statement made on the minister's responsibility does not bear out what is before us, I have a right to differ from the minister.

Mr. HANSON: You are all wet about the milk can anyway.

Mr. VENIOT: If there was a little more of the milk of human kindness in the discussion we might get along better. Take the condensed milk can. There is a milk can for you. Surely you can deal with that. Do you mean to tell me that the condensed milk can pays the sales tax only when it is sold? I say that it also pays the covering tax when it is used as an instrument of transportation. When it is used as a covering for transportation it pays the extra tax under this act, and the minister cannot get away from that, I do not care what he says. I have dealt with the covering tax, mentioning the milk can, and if the minister is going to deal with the milk can after I am through, I would like him to deal with every covering used. Take, for instance, coverings for strawberries. There you apply the tax on two different coverings. You apply it first of all to the little box in which the strawberries are placed, and then you apply it to the crate in which these small boxes are packed. You charge six per cent of the value of each. I could give numerous other cases where the tax will be similarly applied twice over.

I also want to bring to the minister's attention what I feel is a discrimination against the fishermen of the maritime provinces. The excise tax does not apply to any fish coming into Canada from Newfoundland. Why? It is giving an advantage to the fishermen of Newfoundland in competition with the fishermen of the maritime provinces not only in the markets of the world but also in the markets of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. Why that discrimination? I may be told that there is a treaty which governs in this case, but if there is a treaty, it is no more binding in a case of this kind than is a tax on goods imported free from any other part of the British Empire. I would ask the minister to look into that matter and let us know why fish coming from Newfoundland to the maritime provinces and to Canada generally is exempt from the three per cent excise tax.

[Mr. Veniot.]

There are many other things to which I desire to draw the attention of the minister, but to-night I wish to deal more especially with the fish business. If I mistake not, the minister has received a protest from certain fish packers in Canada against this covering tax. I understand that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association has taken up the matter to a certain extent and endeavoured to show how this covering tax will bring hardships on different industries.

In conclusion, I should like to say a few words as to the drawback. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough and the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg have pointed out how difficult it would be to obtain this drawback. It is a matter of impossibility to operate successfully under the drawback provisions. Let me give a concrete case or two. In the county of Gloucester we have some 350 sailing vessels that go to the cod-fishing banks every Monday morning and return on Saturday night. They buy salt from the wholesale importer, who does not export fish, and during the period they are on the fishing banks they salt their fish and attempt to cure it. The fish are taken home and landed on Saturday; they are then further cured by the sun drying process and are not placed on the market until somewhere around the fifteenth of August. About 150 or 200 of these men own their own vessels and have bought their salt from the wholesale importer, and paid the full amount for it. There is no notion of a drawback for them. The merchant cannot sell it for any less, because under section 94 he may get a drawback, and he cannot take any chances, and so he charges the full price. He is a wholesale dealer in salt and handles no fish for export, and it is impossible for him to go to the collector of customs and make an affidavit that the salt he sold this man was used for fish exported out of the country. It can work in respect of some raw materials that are imported. For instance, raw rubber is imported directly by the manufacturer, who knows exactly what raw material goes into the product which he exports. His operation is concentrated, because the work is done right in his factory. But when thousands of people are involved, how in the name of conscience can anyone be convinced that section 94 can be applied to the importation or exportation of salt so far as drawback is concerned? It cannot be done.

Mr. RHODES: I cannot possibly finish to-night, and for that reason I was going to ask the committee to rise,—unless my hon. friend opposite is particularly anxious to speak. It is nearly eleven o'clock and I should like to introduce some bills.

Mr. RALSTON: I am in the hands of the committee.

Mr. RHODES: I move that the committee rise and that the chairman report the resolutions on the Customs Tariff and the Income War Tax Act, and that with respect to the other resolution he report progress and ask leave to sit again. I want to introduce bills founded upon the first two I have named.

Income War Tax Act and Customs Tariff —resolutions reported.

Special War Revenue Act—progress reported.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 95, to amend the customs tariff.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 96, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, May 18, 1932.

The house met at three o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): On behalf of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), I desire to lay on the table orders in council numbers 1154, 1155, 1156, 1158, 1159, 1160, 1161, 1162, 1163 and 1164, all dated May 17, 1932, passed under the authority of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act, 1932, and all relating to the payment of money.

WATERTON GLACIER INTERNATIONAL PEACE PARK

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 97, respecting the Waterton Glacier International Peace Park.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. MURPHY: Waterton Lakes national park in Canada and Glacier national park in the United States adjoin each other along the international boundary between Alberta and Montana; they have long been recognized by the public in both countries as constituting virtually one park unit and, therefore, in some respects, are international in character. Indeed, some of the principal features of the United States park are more readily accessible from the Canadian than the United States side, notably the upper Waterton lake which lies partly in the United States and partly in Canada, and the Kintla icefields in Glacier park which are usually visited by way of Canadian trails.

Some months ago the government of the United States approached the government of this country for the purpose of ascertaining the views of this government in regard to giving these two park areas, namely Waterton Lakes national park in Canada and Glacier national park in the United States, one name which would be Waterton Glacier International Peace Park. The Canadian government, being desirous at all times of promoting that peace and goodwill which exist between the two countries, agreed on the understanding that similar legislation would be passed by both governments. A bill known as the Waterton Glacier International Peace Park bill has been passed by the United States and is now law, and the purpose of introducing this bill is that similar action may be taken by Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. What is the total value of the spare parts kept in store for the repair of the mechanized apparatus used by the artillery units of the permanent force of Canada as at the commencement of each of the years from 1928 to 1931, inclusive?

4. Are public tenders called in the purchase and replacement of these stores and, if not, what method of purchase is employed?

Mr. BENNETT: I think, by common consent, it will be agreed that the question should not be answered. It is not in the public interest, as that term has been defined in British countries, that questions Nos. 1, 2 and 3 should be answered. Question No. 4 will be answered. I may say, as parliament votes the money and provides in the first instance the uses to which it may be put, it is certainly not in the interest of the public nor in that of the administration of the department that answers should be given to the first three questions.

Mr. SPEAKER: Paragraphs Nos. 1, 2 and 3 of question No. 6 dropped, and paragraph No. 4 will stand.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

ILE-AUX-COUDRES-LES EBOULEMENTS FERRY SERVICE

Mr. CASGRAIN:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, petitions and other documents in connection with the contract to be awarded by the Trade and Commerce department, for the ferry-boat service between Ile-aux-Coudres and Les Eboulements, in the county of Charlevoix, since the 1st of January, 1932, together with the evidence taken in writing of all the witnesses heard at the hearing held by Mr. F. E. Bawden, of the Trade and Commerce department, at Baie St-Paul, in the month of May, 1932, and his report upon such matter to the minister, and the decision arrived at by the minister.

Mr. SPEAKER: When this motion was first introduced, objection was taken that it was premature in that it asked for particulars in connection with a contract that had not yet been awarded. The request was made that the motion should be allowed to stand until it became appropriate. Therefore it stands.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a question of policy.

Motion stands.

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS

Mr. MARCIL:

For a copy of the report made by the commissioner appointed to inquire into the Fauvel post office, county of Bonaventure, together with copy of the evidence taken at that investigation.

RADIO BROADCASTING

CONSTITUTION OF COMMISSION FOR ACQUISITION, OPERATION, REGULATION AND CONTROL

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 94, respecting radio broadcasting.

He said: In moving the second reading of the bill which stands in my name, I desire to intimate to the house that in a general way it follows the committee's report which was unanimously adopted a few days ago and it is based upon principles which the government believes should be adopted, because they fulfil two essential requirements without which radio broadcasting in Canada must fail in service to the Canadian people.

First of all, this country must be assured of complete Canadian control of broadcasting from Canadian sources, free from foreign interference or influence. Without such control radio broadcasting can never become a great agency for the communication of matters of national concern and for the diffusion of national thought and ideals, and without such control it can never be the agency by which national consciousness may be fostered and sustained and national unity still further strengthened. Other and alternative systems may meet the requirements of other countries, and in any case it is not my purpose to comment unfavourably upon those systems. But it seems to me clear that in Canada the system we can most profitably employ is one which, in operation and control, responds most directly to the popular will and the national need. In this stage of our national development we have problems peculiar to ourselves and we must reach a solution of them through the employment of all available means. The radio has a place in the solution of all those problems. It becomes, then, the duty of parliament to safeguard it in such a way that its fullest benefits may be assured to the people as a whole.

Furthermore, radio broadcasting, controlled and operated in this way, can serve as a dependable link in a chain of empire communication by which we may be more closely united one with the other in that enduring fellowship which is founded on the clear and sympathetic understanding which grows out of closer mutual knowledge.

No other system of radio broadcasting can meet these national requirements and empire obligations. Therefore, the parliament of Canada is asked to support the principle embodied in this measure.

Secondly, no other scheme than that of public ownership can ensure to the people of this country, without regard to class or place, equal enjoyment of the benefits and pleasures of radio broadcasting. Private ownership must necessarily discriminate between densely and sparsely populated areas. This is not a correctable fault in private ownership; it is an inescapable and inherent demerit of that system. It does not seem right that in Canada the towns should be preferred to the countryside or the prosperous communities to those less fortunate. In fact, if no other course were possible, it might be fair to suggest that it should be the other way about. Happily, however, under this system, there is no need for discrimination; all may be served alike. Equality of service is assured by the plan which calls for a chain of high power stations throughout Canada. And furthermore, the particular requirements of any community may be met by the installation of low power stations by means of which local broadcasting service may be obtained.

Operation under the technical plan covered by the bill has been made possible by an arrangement between this country and the government of the United States, by which the necessary channels when required will be made available for effective domestic use.

I desire to acknowledge the friendly spirit which is manifest in this arrangement. I believe that the plan now suggested when in operation will permit Canada to enjoy a scheme of radio broadcasting unexcelled in any other country in the world.

Then there is a third reason to which I might refer, and one which I believe must commend itself to every hon. member in this chamber. The use of the air, or the air itself, whatever you may please to call it, that lies over the soil or land of Canada is a natural resource over which we have complete jurisdiction under the recent decision of the privy council. I believe that there is no government in Canada that does not regret to-day that it has parted with some of these natural resources for considerations wholly inadequate and on terms that do not reflect the principle under which the crown holds the natural resources in trust for all the people. In view of these circumstances and of the further fact that broadcasting is a science that is only yet in its infancy and about which we know little yet, I cannot think that any government would be warranted in leaving the air to private exploitation and not reserving it for development for the use of the people. It well may be that at some future time, when science has made greater achievements than we have yet a record of, it may be desirable to make other or different arrangements in whole or in part, but no one at this moment in the infancy of this great science would, I think, be warranted in suggesting that we should part with the control of this natural resource. I think, Mr. Speaker, that that is a third and adequate reason why we should proceed with the bill.

The bill divides itself roughly into three parts. First, that part which provides for the appointment of a commission. We have been very careful to suggest no salaries for the members of the commission. Inasmuch as the report that came from the committee was a unanimous report, the government thought that it would be the proper thing for the house to consider the qualifications of the commissioners and what would be a fair compensation for them to receive for the services rendered. The commission is clothed with wide powers and with large discretions, as in the very nature of things must be so. There are assistant commissioners in each of the provinces, nine in all, and provision is made for local advisory committees so that from the small unit up to the dominion there is effective democratic control of broadcasting.

In the second place, we have provided that no large expenditures shall be made, so that in the early stages of the development of this great enterprise the Canadian people might not be led into capital commitments the interest upon which would be too great a burden upon them. We therefore in this measure for the present have provided that capital expenditures and all expenditures shall be within the income derived from the licence fees. That is, if there are five hundred thousand licences at two dollars per licence, the commission would have an income of one million dollars, which sum would not be more than expended by the commission in any one year. It is also provided that if the sum thus collected is not expended in any one year it shall be cumulative and the balance shall inure to the benefit of the commission during the next and succeeding years.

Then there follows, of course, the provision for the commission expropriating stations when it is in a position financially so to do, with the limitations to which I have referred, and those expropriations will be made at such time and under such circumstances as will enable the commission to discharge its duties without incurring large financial obligations.

It will be observed that there are sections in the bill other than those dealing with the salaries to be paid to the commission which have been left blank, in order that the committee of the house when we are in committee on the bill may by appropriate discussion indicate what is thought to be, not in the interests of one party nor of any party but of the people as a whole, the best method with which to deal with these particular matters.

I think that I can say in no boasting spirit that the measure at least endeavours to meet the recommendations of the committee without regard to political considerations of any kind, and we leave to the house at large the determination of the type and kind of service the country shall receive having regard to the compensation it is prepared to pay to those who will be responsible for the administration of the act.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I just wish to endorse the views expressed by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and to say that I am in full accord with the principle embodied in this bill. I have been supporting this principle from the first, more particularly after the work of the Aird commission, but I knew the difficulties in the way and the strength of the propaganda carried on to prevent the work of that commission from having the results which we witness to-day.

I am pleased with the work which was done by the committee which has been studying this question, and I congratulate the members of that committee on the excellent work which they did. I congratulate the house upon having this bill introduced at the present session, and I congratulate the people of Canada on the principle which is represented in the bill.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I should just like to associate myself with the last speaker (Mr. Lapointe) in congratulating the Prime Minister on his promptness in bringing down this bill to implement the report which has been unanimously adopted. May I further express my own very great appreciation of the admirable statement which the Prime Minister has made?

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): I just wish to correct a statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and repeated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) namely, that the report was adopted unanimously. I voted against it.

Mr. MANION: That makes it unanimous.

Mr. BENNETT: May I say that I think the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) is more vocal to-day than then.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Canadian radio broadcasting commission.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like the opinion of the committee on this section, and perhaps we might proceed with the next and succeeding sections and come back to this later.

Section stands.

Sections 4 and 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Assistant commissioners.

Mr. CARDIN: Would it not be possible to strengthen the language of clause 6? It says that the governor in council "may" appoint, and so on. I should like to make it the duty of the governor in council to appoint the necessary commissioners for each province.

Mr. BENNETT: I think with his wide knowledge of the interpretation section of the dominion statutes my learned and hon. friend will realize that this is the proper language for a statute. I can assure him action will be taken in accordance with the provisions of the section. I think if he will look at it he will find that the word "may" is the proper word.

Mr. CARDIN: I want to have it clear that so far as the programs are concerned the provinces will have something to say.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. EULER: There was a clause in the report which recommended that in the appointment of commissioners no political preference should be exercised. Is it possible to incorporate that into the bill, or what is the intention of the government in that regard?

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. member realizes it is difficult to incorporate language such as that in a bill, having regard to the general rules which govern in the preparation of statutes. I assure him, however, that every regard shall be had to the principle indicated, and if he has any suggestions to make which will enable the government to have a more comprehensive list from which to make a choice, and if he will forward those suggestions to the government, they will receive every consideration.

Mr. EULER: May I assume the government adopts the principle that was suggested in the report?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, we have adopted the report.

Section agreed to.

Section 7 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

On section 14—Expenditure of moneys.

Mr. BENNETT: If hon. members will look at section 14 they will find the language is as follows:

> Parliament shall not appropriate for such purposes any sum in excess of the estimated revenue from receiving licences,—

And so on. My hon. friend the Secretary of State has directed my attention to the fact that that is not good language to employ, because this parliament cannot forbid what another parliament or the same parliament may do. I am going to change the language of this section so that it will be more appropriate. I ask therefore that for the moment this section be allowed to stand.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): When the Prime Minister made his explanation of this bill he suggested that the revenue of the commission should be derived from receiving licences. This clause provides for not only receiving licences, but private commercial broadcasting licences, amateur broadcasting licences, and receipts arising out of the business of the commission under this act. That refers to advertising.

Mr. BENNETT: Under this act.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I wish to have the Prime Minister make it clear that the revenues of the commission are not necessarily confined to those from receiving licences, but include also such things as advertising.

Mr. BENNETT: Any sums of money that may be derived from any service rendered by the commission will be paid into the consolidated revenue fund as part of the revenue of the commission. It will be observed that in this bill we have endeavoured to establish the principle that the commission itself shall not handle this money—if I may use that word—but that it will pay it into the consolidated revenue fund, and parliament will vote, on the basis of what our revenues have been, the sums of money that the commission may have available. We do not want to meet an accumulated deficit, thereby injuring the value of the commission before it gets properly under way.

Mr. EULER: May I make an observation that comes to my mind after listening to what the Prime Minister has said with regard to possible deficits. Supposing there are surpluses, which might be set aside by the commission as a reserve for future expenditures; what would happen in such a case? I notice that the second paragraph of part (2), clause 14 provides:

> Provided that if at the end of any fiscal year there is a balance of appropriated moneys unexpended or if the revenue from sources mentioned in the preceding subsection exceeds the amount appropriated, parliament may appropriate any such balance or excess in addition to any appropriation permitted hereunder.

I suppose that means that the excess would come into the consolidated revenue fund, and could be used for other purposes. If the commission has in mind the idea of having that reserve for its own purposes, I do not think that should be done.

Mr. BENNETT: It will be observed that this statute does not contemplate the possibility of the commission dealing with money, other than to receive it and pay it into the consolidated revenue fund. As this work proceeds in accordance with the appropriation made by parliament from year to year, the drafts or cheques are drawn not by the commission itself but by the appropriate minister, or the appropriate authority, to meet the indebtedness incurred by the commission within the appropriation made by parliament. The money will always be in the consolidated revenue fund. When parliament makes its appropriation for one year, it is bound then by the expected revenues of that year. If however the revenues are larger and there is a surplus of $200,000 or $300,000 and parliament comes to make appropriations in the next year, the appropriation is not limited to the expected revenue of that year but also to the revenue that accrues from the accumulated surplus of the year before.

Mr. EULER: If there is a surplus taken from the owners of the receiving sets, and that money is used for other purposes, for purposes other than—

Mr. BENNETT: It cannot be.

Mr. EULER: If it cannot be I will be quite satisfied.

Mr. BENNETT: It cannot be. If my hon. friend will examine the language carefully he will observe that it is to meet the very suggestion he makes that that language is used. In the very nature of things it would have to be so deposited as to be available for the action of parliament. Since appropriations come from parliament, and as any surplus will be in the consolidated revenue fund, it will thus be available to meet the necessities of the commission during the succeeding year.

Mr. EULER: I may appear dull, but may I put it this way: If there is a surplus in the account, will parliament or the government have any power to use it for general purposes?

Mr. BENNETT: It would not have the power to expend it. But need I say to my hon. friend, who has been a minister of the crown, that in the consolidated revenue fund to-day there are accumulated payments of superannuation fund which are being used all the time. This money is not being spent, but it might be in use. It belongs to the radio commission, and to that commission only, subject to the direction of parliament.

Mr. EULER: I do not wish it to be used for other purposes, that is all.

Mr. YOUNG: The Prime Minister says there cannot be a deficit. He also said parliament would vote a sum for the purposes of the commission equal to the estimated revenue for the year. If we provide that sum and the revenue falls short of the estimate, will there not be a deficit?

Mr. BENNETT: The money will not be expended. I am not perhaps less mindful than the hon. member for Weyburn of the necessity of meeting that situation. I hope he will not misunderstand me when I say that I do not think he will find on the statute books any provision as drastic as this to prevent that situation arising.

Mr. MacLEAN: Are there any stated licence fees, or will the commission have power to impose any fees they wish?

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman will look at section 9 he will observe what the powers of the commission are with respect to broadcasting, and section 8 provides for the general determination of questions of that character. The minister's power under the Radiotelegraph Act still continues, as will be observed; but the commission has power to make recommendations to the minister in connection with all these matters, and I would take it the power conferred by the Radiotelegraph Act as to the governor in council fixing the licence fees still continues.

Section 14 stands.

Sections 15 to 19 inclusive agreed to.

On section 20—Oath of office.

Mr. POWER: This section seems to be somewhat peculiar. It is not found in any other statutes.

Mr. BENNETT: That is right.

Mr. POWER: I do not want to criticize it, but would the Prime Minister tell us what he has in mind?

Mr. BENNETT: Section 20 contains the form of oath which the commissioners will take. It must be within the experience of some members of this house that the ordinary form of oath, "I will discharge my duties according to law," has left some persons who have taken that oath in doubt as to just what their obligations were. To remove any doubt of that kind it was thought desirable in this instance that the obligations of the oath should be indicated clearly, that is:

> I do solemnly swear that I will faithfully, truly and impartially, to the best of my judgment, skill and ability, execute and perform the office of chief commissioner (or as the case may be) of the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission, and that, while I continue to hold such office, I will not accept or hold any other office or employment or be interested, either directly or indirectly, in my personal capacity or as a shareholder in any company or partner in any firm or otherwise, in any commercial dealing in relation to radio broadcasting or in the manufacture or distribution of sending or receiving sets or other radio equipment.

I think most members will agree it is desirable that whoever accepts these positions with the provisions of the statute as they are, should have those provisions brought directly to his attention as he executes the oath of office.

Section agreed to.

On section 21—Offences and penalties.

Mr. BENNETT: This section contains two blanks. I would ask the house to look at the section:

> Every person who commits a breach of any provision of this act or of any regulation made thereunder shall be guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction by a fine not exceeding ..... dollars or by imprisonment for a period not exceeding ..... or by both fine and imprisonment.

I am wholly in the hands of the committee with respect to the matter. I should say not exceeding a reasonable fine, because matters of very considerable importance are involved. Would "not exceeding one hundred dollars" be sufficient? My friend the Minister of Justice says that under some of our statutes it is somewhat higher, not exceeding two hundred dollars. This is the maximum discretion which might be exercised.

Mr. BROWN: It does not occur to me what offences might be committed against this act.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. member for Lisgar will look at section 8 and at section 9 he will realize the possibilities of offences in connection with over-running of time, blocking of channels, unauthorized programs, or interference with the work of the commission itself in connection with local or provincial undertakings. For instance, during the war the hon. gentleman will recall a station was found in South America that nobody knew anything about. Then there is the offence of operating stations without authority, and matters of that kind.

Mr. POWER: Say two hundred dollars.

Mr. BENNETT: Not exceeding two hundred dollars?

Mr. BRADETTE: What is the exact meaning of "summary conviction"?

Mr. BENNETT: The words "summary conviction" as defined by the criminal code mean a conviction before a justice of the peace, a stipendiary magistrate, two justices of the peace exercising the powers of such, or a police magistrate. The words indicate the process under which convictions are obtained. namely, the offender is brought directly before the magistrate and charged, and his case heard and disposed of summarily, that is, without delay and without recourse to other than the magistrate himself.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the blanks in clause 21 be filled in by adding the words "two hundred dollars" and—

Mr. BENNETT: "Six months."

Mr. LAPOINTE: "Not exceeding."

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly, "not exceeding two hundred dollars," and "not exceeding six months."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission.

Mr. BENNETT: As the committee will remember, section 3 is standing. I do not propose to take the bill out of committee at this sitting; there is the language of one section that I want to scrutinize a little more closely. I am sure the government would be glad to have an expression of opinion as to what the chief commissioner should be paid. Shall I say what in my judgment should be the qualifications of a commissioner?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: There should be one technical commissioner in my judgment, that is, one well informed radio engineer whose knowledge of the science would be such as to prevent him being imposed upon and enable him to appreciate to the full any technical advice he might receive. My experience with commissions is that it is highly desirable when you are dealing with technical matters that there should be one member who is at least capable of appreciating the advice he may receive or the assistance he may seek from technical sources. The commissioners should be men with an excellent appreciation and understanding of the value of broadcasting to the nation, and should have some understanding of what is pleasing to the major part of the people of this country in the form of programs. The assistant commissioners—one in each province, I take it—would have effective control over what someone in the newspapers described the other day as "a too highbrow performance," whatever that may mean; but there seemed to be a great fear that something of that sort might emanate from this parliament.

Mr. EULER: No danger.

Mr. BENNETT: I take it they were listening to the debates in this house.

Mr. EULER: Then they were very generous.

Mr. BENNETT: But at any rate they should be good average Canadians with a knowledge of their country and an understanding—shall I say?—of music, art and literature from the standpoint of being able to offer to their fellow citizens programs that would be in keeping with the general hopes and aspirations and ideals of the average Canadian family.

Mr. POWER: Would the salaries be subject to such modifications as may be made by act of parliament, or to any additional income tax as may be imposed by parliament?

Mr. BENNETT: I think in view of existing legislation, that might be fairly understood, for we have a statute providing that if they fail to pay their income tax we may deduct it from their salaries. With the aid of that statute I do not think it would be necessary to add this provision.

Mr. DUFF: If the appointee is drawing a pension will the amount be reduced?

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): The Prime Minister has suggested that one of the members of the commission should be a radio engineer. Are there many radio engineers available in Canada?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I think there are at least ten or twelve of whom I have knowledge.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Owing to the fact that there is a provision in the bill which will preclude a commissioner from holding any other office or occupation or engaging in any trade, the salary of necessity must be sufficient to attract men who are well qualified. I would suggest that the salaries of the railway commissioners be taken as a basis for the salaries of the members of this commission.

Mr. POWER: May I point out to the Prime Minister that I am afraid the ex-Minister of Justice misunderstands section 20, which recites the oath which is to be taken by these commissioners. The oath only covers employment in business directly or indirectly connected with radio or broadcasting, and there is nothing in this act as I read it—though I may have read it too rapidly—which prohibits the members of the commission from carrying on business in some line other than radio. I would suggest to the Prime Minister that perhaps some provision of that kind might be included, and I would suggest also that we make provision for the retirement on pension of these commissioners at the end of ten years. I think the Prime Minister knows, as every member of the house knows, the difficulty of obtaining the services of suitable men when they must retire from participation in ordinary business affairs to accept a position which will guarantee them employment for only ten years. If they have devoted their whole time to their work, at the end of the ten year period they probably will not be fitted to take part in any other business, and their future will be by no means secure. So I would suggest first that they be not permitted to carry on any other business, and in the second place that some provision be made for a retiring allowance or pension.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say that the suggestion of the hon. member for Quebec South was in my mind, but in the beginning of this venture I hesitated to provide for retiring allowance. If it is the sense of the committee that such should be done, however, I shall be very glad to amend this section accordingly and make provision for payment by these commissioners into the superannuation fund, if it is thought desirable, as I think it is, to provide for the acquisition of an annuity in that way, and the salary might be based upon that assumption. I think it is unwise in a case of this kind to provide for a retiring allowance unless payments are made by way of contributions to the superannuation fund. I merely suggest that for the moment, and if the section stands, as it will, I will move that the committee rise, but I shall be very glad to hear further expressions of opinion on the matter. I might add that I thought it was clearly stated that the commissioners should not engage in any other business or occupation. That is not so, and that will be amended. My own view is that a salary of less than $12,000 for the chairman of the commission would not be adequate.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is the salary paid the chief of the railway board, is it not?

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot say with certainty, but that amount was in my mind.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is the salary of the chairman of the grain commission.

Mr. BENNETT: In order not to delay the business of the house, hon. members might be good enough to give some little attention to that question between now and the time when the bill is again considered in committee. As I say, I had in mind the sum of $12,000 for the chairman and perhaps $10,000 for the other members of the commission, with provision for a retiring allowance which they would purchase by payments into the superannuation fund. It was also my opinion that they should not engage in any other business or occupation, but in these matters I am entirely in the hands of the committee. The government has no policy in this regard, but we felt that the unanimous report of a select committee should be treated in the sense in which it was made, and we leave these matters entirely to this committee. Therefore I will ask that this section stand, and in order that these questions may be considered I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. DUFF: If the commissioners are appointed during the fiscal year 1932-33 will they, in the words of the Minister of Finance, be expected to make a contribution of ten per cent of their salaries to the consolidated revenue fund?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: I must congratulate the committee on the splendid work they have done, and I am glad that such general agreement with this measure has been expressed from every side of the house. There has been one question put to me, and I am bringing up the matter to enable the Prime Minister to make a declaration on this point. We have a large French population outside of Quebec in the eastern part of Ontario, in New Brunswick, in Nova Scotia and even in Prince Edward Island. Radio broadcasting in French is carried on during certain hours of certain days of the week in these different localities, and I would like the Prime Minister to state whether this broadcasting would be continued under the new arrangement.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that is covered, Mr. Chairman, by sections 6 and 9 of the bill. I think an adequate safeguard is provided to ensure the continuance of the programs to which the hon. gentleman has referred, and which at times I have heard.

Mr. CAYLEY: In our hurry to put through this bill I omitted to ask what was meant by subsection (g) of section 8. What has the Prime Minister in mind there?

Mr. BENNETT: It will be remembered that in small local communities where it is desired that there be local broadcasting stations, there might be some difficulty in the way of providing for the construction and operation of such stations, and this provision will enable the commission, if it is thought desirable, to assist and encourage the construction of such stations, since otherwise such communites be deprived of the value of any national broadcasting efforts.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: From the point of view of the avoidance of political partisanship, may I mention to the Prime Minister that possibly the appointment of the commissioners might be made by a method similar to that adopted some years ago, in the appointment of a chief electoral officer, at which time there was a conference between the two sides of the house. I do not urge that suggestion, but I place it before the Prime Minister for his consideration. He may recall that when Colonel Biggar was chosen chief electoral officer the appointment was made as the result of a conference between both sides of the house, and as long as Colonel Biggar occupied that position he held the confidence of all parties. Whether or not that method would be advisable in this instance I leave it entirely to the Prime Minister to say. We must recognize that in radio broadcasting political partisanship, should it be indulged in at all, might become a very serious affair. I do not for a moment suggest or insinuate that such would be the case, but we must recognize that if this were to be done the dangers might be very considerable and the resultant discontent very grave. Anything that will help remove the possibility of the slightest suspicion of political partisanship will be most helpful. In that regard might there not be an advantage in adopting, in connection with this measure, what was suggested and in fact is intended with respect to the modifications that are being made in relation to the Civil Service Commission. If I recollect rightly, it is intended that a standing committee of this house shall have an opportunity of reviewing from year to year, matters that come under the provisions of the Civil Service Act. It might be advisable to extend that provision to take in matters coming within the scope of the radio broadcasting commission's work. I suggest this for the consideration of the government.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the last point raised by the right hon. gentleman is covered by section 4:

> The commission may employ such technical, professional and other officers, and clerks and employees, as may be necessary. Such officers, clerks and employees shall be appointed pursuant to the Civil Service Act.

Therefore the operations of these employees and servants would, in my judgment, come within the purview of the powers of the committee. I do not think there can be any doubt about that; it is fairly clear. I fancy that in passing the section the committee did not observe that these appointments are all to be made by the Civil Service Commission. As to the first point raised by the right hon. gentleman, I certainly will give it serious consideration.

Mr. MALCOLM: I would direct the Prime Minister's attention to section 5. Subsection 1 provides:

> The commission shall be a body corporate having capacity to contract and to sue and to be sued in the name of the commission.

As I understood the right hon. gentleman's remarks, the commission are to handle no money whatever. Cheques are to be issued by the minister of the department in charge of this commission. We must remember that everything which is done in connection with operating radio stations is done subject to patent, and should patent litigation arise as a result of some action of the commission and should the holder of the patent be sued, what provision would be made for satisfying any judgment that might be given against the commission.

Mr. BENNETT: Obviously, I suppose, the same situation would arise as arises in any case in which judgment is recovered against any defendant. The defendant in this case would have to secure from parliament such funds as might be necessary for the purpose of discharging the judgment. Possibly I did not, I gather from what my hon. friend has said, make the situation as clear as I should have done. While the commission certainly will have a bank account and moneys, the moneys it receives must be paid into the consolidated revenue fund. The treasury department will provide the commission with money with which to carry on business. It does not mean that the payment of men who may do work around the commission's properties will be made through cheques from the treasury. The treasury will give them such funds as may be necessary to enable them to discharge debts under the act. It would be rather too difficult for the commission to carry on as my hon. friend apparently understood me to indicate. Perhaps I was speaking hurriedly if he so understood me.

Mr. MALCOLM: The possibility of patent litigation is what occurs to me. Undoubtedly the commission will be empowered to issue cheques for current expenses, wages and so forth. But should a large patent suit arise, which the commission would have to defend —and this is quite within the realm of possibility in relation to so highly technical a business—would the judgment be satisfied by the commission taking out of current revenue a sufficient sum for the purpose, or would the plaintiff have to secure an act of parliament before his judgment could be met?

Mr. BENNETT: In my opinion, the plaintiff obtaining such a judgment would, as this statute now stands, have to wait until an appropriation was made by parliament to enable the judgment to be discharged; and my view of the matter, having regard to my experience with the courts, is that the court would grant a stay until such time as parliament could make an appropriation to meet the judgment.

Mr. HOWARD: I agree with the provisions of this bill, but there is one suggestion which I should like to offer to the Prime Minister. In view of the preponderance of French Canadians in my province—and indeed there are many French Canadians throughout the rest of Canada—I submit that one commissioner should be French-speaking.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought that was understood in the committee. The chairman tells me it is so.

Mr. MALCOLM: There is one other point in connection with section 20 which I want to bring to the Prime Minister's attention. Under this bill the oath of office seems to me to be too broad:

> . . . in my personal capacity or as a shareholder in any company or partner in any firm or otherwise, in any commercial dealing in relation to radio broadcasting or in the manufacture or distribution of sending or receiving sets or other radio equipment.

With the last clause I see no difficulty; but can anyone imagine any line of business in Canada that will not be affected by radio broadcasting? Almost every line of business will use the radio at some time or other for advertising purposes, and this requirement is so broad that it almost prohibits the commissioner from investing his money in any business or stock, because, almost every business uses the radio for advertising.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman will look at it closely he will see that it refers to the dealings of the individual himself.

Mr. MALCOLM: Of the commissioner.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. Two things you have in mind; one is that he shall not be in a position where he would benefit by reason of being a shareholder or partner in any business that has any relationship with radio. The other clause to which the hon. gentleman refers must be read in the sense of the commissioner individually having dealings with such enterprises.

Mr. MALCOLM: But may I point out that two competitive firms might be demanding the same hour, one of them having a considerable number of shareholders among the employees of the company. Employees would not be shareholders in any company broadcasting, without showing preference to their own company.

Mr. BENNETT: It would not be construed so broadly.

Mr. MALCOLM: That is the way it is worded.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think so.

Mr. MALCOLM: I submit that it could be interpreted in that way.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Section 14 provides that the commission:

> may expend for the purposes of this act the moneys appropriated by parliament for such purposes.

Is it intended that the licence fees and other revenues must pay the salaries and everything else connected with the act?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I have received a good many letters from people in my constituency, and there seems to be a misunderstanding with regard to this bill. These people intimate to me that they are satisfied with the present arrangement in connection with radio broadcasting in Canada. They appear to be rather apprehensive of this departure and one reason is that they are afraid that this new system will make the radio too expensive. The radio licence heretofore has been $1, and now it has been increased to $2, and some people are afraid that if we set up a commission and all the money necessary for its operations has to come out of licence fees, then instead of $2 the fee may be increased to $10 within a year. This is something of considerable importance to the people of Saskatchewan, and I should like to have some assurance from the government that, should the cost of radio licences become excessive, some means will be devised of meeting that situation. The radio is one advantage which the people in the rural districts have enjoyed at a very reasonable cost, and I, for one, should not like to see the radio licence raised to an excessive point, because it would be a great hardship on the poorer people in the rural districts in my province at any rate.

Mr. MALCOLM: Before this bill leaves the committee, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, in his opinion, this legislation will cover television which is probably the most important feature on the horizon in connection with general broadcasting.

Mr. BENNETT: Undoubtedly the legislation is so framed as to cover any changes that may be made for the use of any new scientific knowledge applied to broadcasting. It would of course cover television as a feature of broadcasting. The definition clause is, I think, sufficiently broad to cover those matters. Paragraph (a) reads:

"Broadcasting" means the dissemination of radioelectric communications intended to be received by the public, either directly or through the medium of relay stations.

Paragraph (h), which defines "radio" reads:

"Radio" means and includes radiotelegraph, radiotelephone and any other form of radioelectric communication including the wireless transmission of writing, signs, signals, pictures, and sounds of all kinds by means of Hertzian waves.

I think that is sufficiently broad.

As regards the question raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia, he must realize that as parliament will determine the question of expenditures, the question of licence fees charged must also be reviewed every year by parliament.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I had it in mind to ask a question similar to that asked by the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm). Another development that is now, I think, well within sight, is transmission of power by the use of wireless energy. There is no question that this is now a scientific possibility and I have no doubt in the next few years it will become commercially possible. I trust, under this legislation or subsequent amendments, we shall still retain our control over the air for that purpose also.

Mr. BENNETT: This legislation does not contemplate the control of the transmission of electric energy, which, so far as we now know, is transmitted by wires and not otherwise. If the time comes when wireless transmission of electric energy is a commercial possibility, no doubt this parliament having control of the air, as representing the people of the dominion, would be able to deal with the matter.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: That is what I had in mind. Our control over the air is now well established.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): Has the Prime Minister any idea as to what amount will have to be expended in expropriating the stations already in existence?

Mr. BENNETT: That would be a matter of gradual determination and it would be very difficult to say what the value of the stations now in existence would be, having regard to the fact of allowance for obsolescence.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): How many stations are there?

Mr. BENNETT: Sixty-six altogether, the chairman of the committee informs me.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Agriculture—fruit, $390,200.

Mr. MacLEAN: Has the minister any information regarding the dismissal of the fruit and vegetable inspector at Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, and the appointment of his successor?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): What is his name?

Mr. MacLEAN: Chester E. Shaw.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is that he was discharged for political partisanship and the position has not yet been filled.

Mr. MacLEAN: Has he asked for a public investigation or hearing of his case?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My understanding is that he has not.

Mr. MacLEAN: The file that has been brought down shows that he has asked for a public hearing and that one has been refused; would the minister consider granting his request?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I shall be glad to look into the matter and at the next sitting of the committee give any further information I can.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Has my hon. friend any explanation or justification to give for dropping the grant, formerly $8,000, to the Canadian Horticultural Council? If this subject is going to cause any discussion, I shall not press the matter, but I presume my hon. friend has some reason for dropping this grant.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The matter may be taken up in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: All right.

Item agreed to.

Seed, feed and fertilizer control, including grants to seed fairs, etc., also grant of $18,900 to the Canadian Seed Growers' Association, $413,200.

Mr. VENIOT: What is meant by fertilizer control?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The administration of the Fertilizer Act and the testing of the strength of fertilizers.

Mr. SANDERSON: What is the Canadian Seed Growers' Association to which there is a grant of $18,900? Just how does it function?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This is in the nature of assistance to an organization known as the Canadian Registered Seed Growers' Association, not a government organization. It is to assist them in investigational work to keep up the standard of our registered seed and to help in the production of registered seed, and to help defray the expenses of meetings of the executive in this connection.

Mr. SANDERSON: Is this organization dominion wide in scope, taking in all the provinces?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: There is quite a reduction in this item, amounting to $159,000. How does the minister account for the decrease?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is accounted for as follows:

Publications and stationery	$ 1,000
Subventions and seed competitions, etc.	73,800
Market reporting	2,000
Inspection and sale account administration	3,000
Agricultural pests control act administration	5,000
Laboratory inspection services	60,900
Chemical analyses of feeding stuffs, etc.	8,000
Grant to Canadian Seed Growers' Association	2,100
Development of seed cleaning centres	4,000
	$ 159,800

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What was the total grant to the seed growers' association last year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): $21,000.

Mr. DONNELLY: Did I understand the minister to say that there was a reduction of $5,000 in the expenditure on the control of pests?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is that this reduction was made because the full amount was not necessary, as the work is being handled through the general laboratory vote. This has nothing to do with the administration of the Destructive Insect and Pest Act.

Mr. DONNELLY: I was wondering why the pests came in here.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Where is the headquarters of the Canadian Seed Growers Association, and what suboffices, if any, have they?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The headquarters are at Ottawa. They have no suboffices.

Mr. MacLEAN: With reference to fertilizer, we were led to believe when our friends came into power that they were going to do a great deal to help the farmer. The farmer was going to get his fertilizer cheaper and be assisted in a great many other ways. We were led to believe that all the ingredients for mixing fertilizer would be allowed to enter this country free of duty, and that generally our farmers would be in a haven of rest so far as the cost of fertilizer was concerned. But according to the returns of the statistical branch last year, I find that there was a large amount paid out in duty on the fertilizer that was brought in. Last year the ten per cent duty on fertilizer, not including the one per cent excise tax, netted the government a revenue of $144,185. This year, in addition to paying that ten per cent duty, our farmers will be faced with a three per cent excise tax on all fertilizer imported. The statistical returns of last year show that over $5,000,000 worth of fertilizer was imported, and an excise tax alone of three per cent on that would amount to $162,955. So I cannot see where this government is helping the agriculturist very much.

We were also told that the imposition of a duty on fertilizer would not increase the price. Some, indeed, claim that the price has not increased, but when we look at the decrease in the price of the raw materials entering into fertilizer, we find that the farmer during the last two years has been paying more than he should pay, because the spread between the price of the raw materials and the finished product, the mixed fertilizer, has been too great. This is a matter which the minister should look into very carefully in connection with the imposition of the three per cent excise tax. I do not know whether the Minister of Finance has in mind putting fertilizer on the exempted list. At the present time I understand that the three per cent excise tax applies to everything that comes in, even to articles that were on the free list before. If that is the case, it will hit our potato growers in the maritime provinces very hard, and as we all know, they are having a difficult enough time carrying on under present conditions. They are almost in bankruptcy so far as their potato growing operations are concerned.

I would not stress this so much, Mr. Chairman, if it were not for the fact that our friends opposite promised so much during the election. They certainly promised to put our agriculturists in the maritime provinces on easy street if only they would return the Conservative party to power. They even stated in their compaign literature that was scattered throughout my county that they would compel the Americans to take off their duty against our potatoes so that our potato growers could ship their potatoes into the United States free. I am glad to say that our farmers were too intelligent to fall for that, but it just shows the extremes to which our friends opposite went in order to gain power. I am not blaming the minister for that, but I should like to draw his attention to a cartoon that I hold in my hand showing the Prime Minister kneeling at the bedside of a farmer sick in bed. The Prime Minister is saying to one of his colleagues that the farmer is certainly very sick, and he asks, "What can we do for him now? One thing is sure. We cannot bleed him any more." I agree with the Prime Minister that he cannot bleed the farmer very much more, but here is one place where this government is going to bleed him more by putting upon the farmer a three per cent excise tax, unless fertilizer is included in the list of exemptions and allowed to come in free. I do not think that the ten per cent duty should ever have been put on fertilizer, because it does not help the industry here and is a hardship to all our farmers.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): On what ingredients was that ten per cent duty placed last year?

Mr. MacLEAN: It was imposed on different ingredients. The duty was on fertilizer compounded or manufactured. My friend perhaps will take the position that the farmers need not have bought ready-mixed fertilizer, but he knows that in many sections throughout this whole dominion where there is not an organization that purchases the farmer's fertilizer requirements in a large way the farmer is only too glad to go to the dealer in his own town and buy the ready-mixed fertilizer, on which there is a ten per cent duty. In our own province the potato growers' association provide the fertilizer ingredients in a large way. They buy the chemicals and we do the mixing ourselves to a very large extent. But as I have said, there is still a large amount of ready-mixed fertilizer imported, as is proved conclusively by the fact that last year's importation netted a revenue to the government of over $144,000.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I think the hon. member has left a wrong impression on the minds of the committee so far as the mixing of fertilizer in the maritime provinces is concerned. There was no mixed fertilizer brought into the maritime provinces from the United States last year. There may have been in some other portions of Canada where the farmers do not use fertilizer so extensively as it is used in the maritime provinces. I think the government is to be commended for placing a duty on mixed fertilizer. It must be apparent to every hon. member that when fertilizer is required in Canada we ought to engage the services of Canadians to mix it, rather than pay Americans to do it. To my mind there is no doubt about that. No duty was placed upon ingredients coming into Canada last year.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, if those ingredients were to be mixed.

Mr. MacLEAN: Does my hon. friend say that the three per cent excise tax will not apply?

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): I think the three per cent excise tax is unfair to the farmers of Canada. Representations have already been made to the government and as a result they have the matter under consideration. Before the bill is passed I believe something may be done to relieve the situation.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What are the plans with regard to a seed laboratory for the seed commissioner's office? A few years ago some arrangements were made, which did not materialize, to have a central seed laboratory in Ottawa for the benefit of the whole dominion. I understand there is some suggestion of establishing a laboratory in the National Research Council laboratory on Sussex street. Before yielding to anything the minister would do well to examine the location and find out if there is sufficient ground to conduct varietal tests of grain. The laboratory would require some ground for that purpose. There are three or four acres in connection with the Sackville laboratory. Has the minister looked into that phase of the matter?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I agree that the National Research Council laboratory, because of lack of space for experiments, would not be satisfactory. There is no intention this year of proceeding with the laboratory the hon. member has mentioned.

Mr. GARDINER: What progress has been made in providing the province of Alberta with seed cleaning apparatus at Lethbridge or Edmonton?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No steps are being taken this year towards the establishment of a seed cleaning plant at Lethbridge or Edmonton.

Mr. GARDINER: This matter has been under consideration for some time. The former minister made provision for a seed cleaning plant at Moose Jaw, and when the estimate for that plant was going through he stated that the matter of providing Alberta with a similar or smaller plant was also under consideration. When hard times came we realized it would not be advisable to spend a large sum of money for a seed cleaning plant in Alberta. However there was a suggestion of and a good deal of discussion concerning the possibility of attaching a seed cleaning plant to the government terminal elevators at Edmonton or Lethbridge, or both. I understood the minister promised last year to consider this matter, and we had hoped he would have some proposal which would afford accommodation up until such time as conditions improve.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is a difference of opinion among the Alberta registered seed growers as to whether the plant should be at Edmonton or Lethbridge, and if at Edmonton whether it would be advisable to have it attached to the commercial elevator in that place. I am sorry I have not further detailed information. If I had I should be glad to give it to the hon. member for Acadia.

Mr. GARDINER: I trust the minister will give the matter some consideration, because it is of great importance. I understand, however, that if the registered seed growers in the province cannot agree, he is faced with some difficulty.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Is it not true that there is a difference of opinion among the different growers as to the method of establishing seed plants? I recall that in Manitoba there are more localized plants. In that province I believe they receive some sort of subvention from the Dominion government, and they have established smaller municipal units. The Graysville Pure Bred Brome Grass Growers' Association at Graysville, have a first class cleaning plant, and I believe they received some assistance from the federal government. That applies also to the Seed Barley Growers' Association at Miami. I think there is a difference of opinion as to the advisability of establishing large or small units. I was wondering what the policy of the government would be with regard to extending the development of seed cleaning plants.

Item agreed to.

For experiments in dehydration of fruits and vegetables, $10,000.

Mr. SPENCER: What progress has been made in connection with this work ?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The work has been along these lines: We have had experts in the old land studying the procedure they follow in their efforts to use fruit that is otherwise not salable. We supply the apparatus and the expert, and the goods manufactured in the plants where the experiments take place are disposed of by those plants. They receive whatever profits there may be. On the whole I think we may report that very satisfactory results have been obtained in connection with deciding what specimens of fruit are most satisfactory for this work.

Mr. GARDINER: Are the manufacturers taking advantage of this expert advice?

Item agreed to.

Live stock, $1,380,000.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Under this item I feel in duty bound to make a few remarks. As will be noted, there is a reduction of $150,000 in the estimates, and in my view that is not in proportion to reductions made in some other departments. I join with those who have expressed their regret that at a time like this, when agriculture is so down at the heels, it is found necessary to curtail the expenditures for agricultural purposes. As the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir) said a few days ago, agriculture is suffering to an extent far greater than any other department of the government. The estimates of that department have been cut about 33 per cent, while other departments have suffered to a much lesser extent.

In 1929 the estimated value of all classes of live stock in my province of Saskatchewan was $856,000,000. This has been very materially reduced, for as is shown by the monthly bulletin of agricultural statistics in 1931 the value had dropped to $687,000,000 and at the present time I think it has been reduced by another $200,000,000. So it is practically only half what it was three years ago. We notice, too, in the monthly bulletin that for all Canada the average values per head of live stock fell very considerably between 1930 and 1931. In 1930 the average value of all horses was $61, in 1931, $50; milch cows, $59 in 1930, $43 in 1931; other cattle, $35 in 1930, $25 in 1931; sheep, $7 in 1930, $5 in 1931; swine, $15 in 1930, $7 in 1931. Under these conditions it is indeed regrettable that the minister has allowed the cabinet, or whoever was responsible for compiling these estimates, to cut down his estimates so severely. As has been said a good many times during this session, present conditions are driving our farmers more and more from the use of tractors and other power machinery back to the use of horses. They are more inclined to go in for breeding horses and cattle than they have been for a good many years, but they find they are not in a position to buy their foundation stock. Naturally our farmers and stock men are very much alarmed over the drastic cut that has been made in these estimates. We wonder how, without the money, the agricultural department is going to carry on the activities that are mentioned in the report of the minister for 1931. The stallion club, the breeding stations, the special grants to fairs and exhibitions to encourage the breeding of live stock, the bull-loaning policy, the free transportation policy, the cattle club policy, the boys' breeding club policy, the boys and girls calf club policy—these are all very popular amongst our farmers, but they are wondering how these activities can be carried on with the estimates reduced to such a serious extent. These things are more necessary to-day than they have ever been in the past. Our people must be encouraged. They are looking forward to breeding horses because they can see the necessity for them.

There are very many difficulties confronting our farmers, and one of the most serious is the excessive interest charges. Our farmers cannot stand the excessive interest charges that are being exacted, and apparently there is no relief since even this government and the provincial governments are paying as high as almost seven per cent interest in many cases. Had the minister the welfare of our farmers at heart at the time the national service loan was floated, he would have objected to the excessive rate of interest then provided for. A one per cent lower rate of interest at that time would have gone a long way towards paying the bonus on wheat acreage which we have advocated a good many times in this house. One per cent on $220,000,000 would amount to $2,200,000 a year, which would go a considerable way towards paying the acreage bonus that our farmers so much desire.

The present government made some very extravagant promises to the farmers during the election campaign of 1930, and in this connection I am reminded of one of the pledges made by the Prime Minister in his speech in Winnipeg early in June of that year—a pledge that no doubt procured a good many votes for his supporters, simply because the honest, industrious people of the west believed that a pledge amounts to something. This is pledge number 2 of the program he laid down in Winnipeg:

> We pledge ourselves to foster and develop agriculture through the live stock and dairy industries, now so sadly neglected.

Our people, I say, took the right hon. gentleman at his word and many supported him because of this and the other pledges he then made,—they thought these pledges would be redeemed. Let us see whether in truth agriculture was "so sadly neglected" at that time. I have here the live stock market reports which are issued from week to week. In the report for the week ending May 1, 1930, I find this summary on the first page:

> Cattle markets showed surprising keenness, despite increases in volume at a number of our major markets. The activity in the buying end, following last week's rather sharp price advances, offset the slight recessions of values in the Winnipeg market.

Turning to the Winnipeg market report for the same week I find that steers, good to choice, were selling at an average price of $10.30, top price $11, top price the previous week, $11.25; calves were selling at an average price of $10.57, top price $13, top price the previous week, $13; hogs were selling at an average price of $11.69; top price, $12.25, top price the previous week, $13.25; lambs were selling at an average price of $10, top price, $10, top price the previous week, $9.75; sheep were selling at an average price of $6. That was the condition in the Winnipeg market at the time the present Prime Minister said our agriculture was being "so sadly neglected." A year later, for the week ending April 23, 1931, we have this report:

The outlet for cattle during the past week was again of rather narrow width, and where supplies were at all liberal the week-end found clearances rather hard to effect.

Turning to the prices on the Winnipeg market for that week I find that good and choice steers were sold at an average price of $5.19, top price $5.75, and top price the previous week, $5.50; calves sold at an average price of $6.74, top price, $8, top price the previous week, $9; hogs sold at an average price of $7.60, top price, $7.75, top price the previous week, $7.50; lambs sold at an average price of $8.27, top price, $8.50, top price the previous week, $8.50; sheep were selling at $3.50. Then I come to the dominion live stock report for the month of April, 1932. In the summary appearing on the first page I find this statement:

Another shipment of export cattle went forward to Great Britain this week, the heaviest load so far this year, totalling 619 head.

The present government appear to be taking a great deal of credit for the shipment of cattle to the old country; I hear reports of hon. members opposite going around the country saying what wonderful things the department is doing. Let me remind the committee that last year we had before the agriculture committee an English cattle dealer named Mr. Brown. He told the committee then that we had not been shipping cattle to Great Britain during the two or three previous years because the prices here were about as good as the prices in the old country. So this government should not take credit because that movement has started again; the only reason we are shipping cattle to Great Britain to-day is that the prices there are better than the prices here. Our prices are so very low that we can ship cattle to Great Britain or anywhere else. The statement continues:

A cable from Great Britain reports the sale of some of the Canadian cattle shipped two weeks ago on the steamship Manchester Commerce. They were good quality steers and made 8½d. to 8¾d. dressed weight including offal. . . . Domestic cattle markets showed an improved condition this week, and not wholly because of a sharp reduction in receipts at some yards.

Turning to the prices during April of this year, about two years after the Prime Minister made the pledge that he would help live stock, dairying and those other branches of agriculture that had been so badly neglected, we find that during the week of April 14 the average price for choice and good steers on the Winnipeg market was $4.96, while the top price was $5.50 as compared with the top price of $5.25 during the previous week. The average price for calves was $4.91, the top price $5.50, and the top price of the previous week $5. It will be noticed that prices were even better during the week of April 14 than during the previous week. The price of hogs, bacon type, was $3.94, with a premium of $1 per hog on selects. The top price was $4, and the top price in the previous week was the same. The average price for lambs was $6.74, and the top price $6.50, while the price of sheep was $2.

When the Prime Minister made his pledges with regard to agriculture and said what he was going to do, we were told not only by the right hon. gentleman but by many others, that the tariff was the remedy. I think it is well known that tariffs have never been as high in Canada as they are at the present time, but the agricultural industry has never been so badly depressed as it is now. I hope I may be excused if I am a little out of order in what I am about to say; these agriculture estimates have been discussed in a more or less general way, and with the permission of the chairman I am going to say all that I have to say on this one item.

A few days ago the Minister of Agriculture referred to a proposed marketing board, and I think the idea of this board is fairly popular throughout the country. I believe the reason for its popularity is that people do not understand what may be the consequences. I do not hesitate to say that I have not very much faith in the establishment of a marketing board, for the reason that I fear that it will be just one more clog in the machinery that is already over-clogged with regard to the marketing of our farm products. In my view this board would either have the effect of increasing the prices of farm products, or it would not. Let us suppose that for the time being it increases the prices of farm products. We know that one of our greatest problems to-day is a lack of markets, and a consequent over-production because our marketing facilities are not adequate. If we do increase the value of these farm products will we not stimulate production, and then will we not have over-production and a decrease in the value of our farm products? On the other hand, if the board will not increase the value of our products what is the use of spending our time and thought on it?

A few weeks ago I sent a letter to the press in various parts of the country, largely to the weeklies but to some of the daily papers as well, drawing attention to a very live question in my part of the country. I refer to the excessive spread between the price of the raw material and the price of the finished article. In my letter I dealt with the subject of wool and woollen products, particularly woollen underwear, and I pointed out that wool sold at from 5 to 7 cents a pound, though as a matter of fact some wool is selling for only 4 cents. When we come to buy it back in manufactured form, however, we pay possibly $2 a pound. I directed attention to the fact that a certain brand of combination underwear weighing 29 ounces cost from $2.50 to $2.75 at retail, and there are other examples even more outstanding. Since writing that letter I have heard from a great many people in various parts of the country, many of whom drew attention to the fact that in dealing with wool and woollen products I was laying stress on a comparatively minor matter. At the time I wrote the letter I realized that this was so, but I dealt with wool because some of my people have been selling their raw wool for only 4 cents a pound, and in a cold climate such as we have, woollen underclothing is necessary. I regret to say that a great many of our people are not able to buy it at the prices they are asked to pay at the present time.

The question of hides and finished leather is just as important. I have here a clipping from a weekly newspaper, setting out a letter received from a clerk in a store, who wrote:

> A short time ago a farmer came into the store where I am employed, bringing a calf hide. After looking up the market on hides I found the best I could offer him was four cents per pound. The hide weighed 12¾ pounds, which equals 51 cents, and in exchange he took one pair of shoe laces at 20 cents, one package of puffed wheat at 16 cents, and one package of health bran at 15 cents.
> After the man left the store I began to compare the values of these articles. The laces were the sort used for lacing long boots, and were cut from common everyday calfskin. On weighing these I found there were 24 to the pound at 20 cents per pair, making the cost of $4.80 per pound. As leather gains five per cent in tanning, the hide would weigh about 16 pounds when finished and would be worth about $73.60 when cut into laces. So if the farmer wished to buy his same calf hide tanned and cut into laces, he would need to bring in 80 calf hides at 50 cents, plus 60 sheep skins at 40 cents, plus 20 lamb skins at 25 cents, plus 80 pounds of wool at 8 cents, and to make up the balance could hand over $1.40 cash.

This spread between raw products and finished products is a matter of more than passing importance, and I want to say to the minister that instead of establishing a marketing board, which, to say the least, will be of doubtful success, it would be wise for him to appoint a board to inquire into the spread in prices. I am sure he could make a name for himself, and I may say, without any offence to the minister, that he needs something to make a name for himself throughout the farming areas of the country—I say, he could make a name for himself if he took advantage of something of this sort and established a board to inquire into the spread in prices. I can assure him that I should be willing to give him all the assistance I could in gathering information.

There is another thing in connection with this spread in prices, and from the letters I have received I may tell the minister that what I am going to say is something the farmers in my part of the country are thinking about. Woollen manufacturers, tanners and other manufacturers throughout Canada are going to suffer very materially unless something is done along this line. Our people in the rural areas are seriously considering going back to the custom of fifty or sixty years ago, because some of them still know something about the spinning of yarns, and they are going to take the wool and make it into clothing themselves. This will be done, not because the people are particularly anxious to do it, but because it is becoming imperative. There are men, women and children in the province from which I come who have not been able to obtain woollen underwear, which is so necessary in that climate. It is very fortunate indeed that we have had mild winters the last two years; otherwise a great many of the people there would have suffered more severely than they have done, because they have not been able to buy woollen underwear. They were given a good deal of cotton stuff last winter through the relief commission, but that is not what they need in that country. In conclusion, I would urge again on the minister that he do something to find out the reasons for this spread in prices. Once more I assure him of my willingness to give him all the assistance in my power in that regard.

Mr. NEILL: I wish to take just a few minutes to suggest to the minister that he put some restraint on his officials in issuing optimistic, not to say flamboyant, highly-coloured descriptions of the profits to be made in the poultry industry. I have in my hand an editorial from a British Columbia poultry paper from which I will read a paragraph or two:

> Another statement from the Dominion Department of Agriculture recently issued, says a flock of a hundred birds carefully managed are returning to many a farmer a profit, over feed costs, of from $200 to $500 a year, "which is not to be disdained by even the most successful farmers."

And eggs are ten cents a dozen! Ask any farmer how much profit he has made in the past two years. And we venture to say not one can lay claim to such a privilege. Then ask him if he thinks he can make up to $5 per bird raising chickens, and he will look at you in a sad, wistful way suggestive of doubt as to your mental balance.

In conclusion it seems to us that as our governments appear unable to help the poultry industry they should at least desist from making it worse.

You will note that it says "over feed costs," so that the $5 is net profit. Now, the average cost of feeding a chicken is $2 a year, which makes $7 gross per year, and there should be added another dollar for replacement, because you have to pay as much for the day-old chick as you get for it afterwards. And feeding a chicken for six or seven months is expensive. However, let us put it at $7 gross income. At 10 cents a dozen, that would be 70 dozen, or 840 eggs, which would be the equivalent of 2⅓ eggs per day, and even in British Columbia our hens do not lay 2⅓ eggs per day, or 16 per week. A much more accurate figure would be one-half an egg per day, or perhaps a little more—say 4 per week instead of 16. Of course, I am taking an extreme figure when I suggest an average of 10 cents a dozen, and we hope that eggs will not long average that. Still, they are selling at that figure out there to-day. But, taking the reasonable average number of eggs that a hen would be likely to lay in a year to bring the gross profit to $7, you would have to have an average of 37 cents a dozen; and as they vary, being sometimes 20 cents below that, it means that for a considerable time you would have to sell the eggs at 64 cents a dozen—that is, wholesale to the farmer—which, of course, is absolutely ridiculous.

It would seem unnecessary to waste time discussing such an idle statement, which requires, if it is to justify itself, that one hen shall lay 2⅓ eggs per day. But this statement has government sanction, and there are many people who, perhaps being less familiar with governments than we are, have a great respect for anything put out under the auspices of any government, and so they think that such statements must be accurate and worthy of attention. Statements of this sort published in the old country and in this country induce people to come here and go into the poultry business. I have heard it said that there cannot be much wrong with the poultry business because there are always so many people engaged in it. Yes, but they are not the same people; they vary. There are always a number coming in at the top, but there are just as many going out at the bottom, so that, as I say, they are not the same people. This is doubly bad because not only do these men ruin themselves but they help to ruin others who are trying to make a living and who under ordinary conditions might make at least half a living. It is especially bad in this respect.

Suppose the government made some appeal to bring in tire manufacturers, let us say. They would immediately run up against practical men skilled in that business, who would at once ask a few pertinent questions in regard to opportunities, markets, cost of manufacture, and so on. This invitation on the part of the government to people interested in poultry is extended not to practical people but, unfortunately, to those who are wholly uninformed in regard to conditions in the poultry business. The appeal is made perhaps to small clerks who have been told by the doctor to get into the open air if possible; to small storekeepers tired of competition with the chain stores; sometimes even to farmers from the prairies, because a man can be quite well informed in regard to wheat and yet know practically nothing of the requisites of a sucessful poultry farm. These people read about 100 birds making a profit of $500; they multiply this by two and say: Two hundred birds would give us a net profit of $1,000 a year. A man says to his wife: "Why, Mary, look at this: if the government says that we can make that profit, there is nothing to hinder us from keeping 1,000 birds"—and 3,000 birds is quite a common poultry farm in British Columbia. The man says to his wife: "Supposing we cannot live up to the expectation of this claim; if we do even half as well; if we keep 2,000 birds, we shall make $5,000 net," and that looks like a lot of money to people in those circumstances. So they go into the business. They take money that has been set aside for the education of their children; they sell out their little home, or business, if they have one, or their farm—I have known them to mortgage their life insurance—and they put the whole amount into what they think is going to give them a stable, comfortable, not too irksome living for the rest of their lives.

What is the result? The struggle lasts for a given length of time; you can almost estimate the time a man will stay in the business, judging by what reserves of capital he brings into it. Sometimes they last only a year; sometimes they struggle along, by infinite labour and hardship and by using up every resource they have, for two or three years, but the result is that within a comparatively short time they are cleaned out; they lose everything. I could take the minister or anyone else along the back roads of the agricultural sections of British Columbia and show him farm after farm, giving the history of each. So-and-so started chicken raising on that farm. He had to abandon it. He owed a big feed bill; he could not pay his taxes, and he had to leave it, absolutely ruined, without any hope in life or any ability to start anew. I have known such a case to end in suicide, because there was nothing but black despair facing them.

I do not blame all of this on the government; that would be foolish, but it certainly has a considerable inducement when the government, believed to be accurate, to know what they are saying, put out a statement like this, because the inducement is unfortunately always to people who are entirely ignorant of the business. The government, as this editorial says, have not done much for the poultry business. They neglected to hear the appeal of the British Columbia people from the decision of the Board of Railway Commissioners against their claim for an adjustment of freight rates, so that they would not be handicapped by seeing wheat and other grain shipped to China for less than they could buy it for themselves in British Columbia. In this regard the present government is no worse than the former one; this is not an attack on the government of any party. Further, we were advised that even if the government did hear the appeal, the most we could hope for would be that the matter would be referred back to the Board of Railway Commissioners.

This government dealt a severe blow to the poultry raisers of British Columbia when, a few weeks ago, they rejected a bill which was introduced by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) and which sought to give to the railway board the power for lack of which the board said that they were prevented from giving us the justice we sought, the power which the Duncan report said in practically so many words should be granted to them. All the forces of the government under the party whip, with the exception of the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Loucks), voted solidly against that bill. The result is that all prospect of justice to us in British Columbia is eliminated, at least until the situation is changed. As I say and as this editorial says, if they refuse to help us, at least they might not hurt us by disseminating statements that are so elementarily and obviously unsound. Of course this is obvious only to the man who knows; to the man on the street it is not so.

Supposing the government were to circulate throughout the high schools propaganda to the effect that it would be a grand thing for the pupils to become doctors or lawyers, pointing out the salaries paid to the judges of the supreme or the exchequer court of Canada, or some of the big fees paid to some of the higher specialists in the medical profession, and suggesting that such positions are open and waiting and that anyone and everyone can share in them. What would the doctors and lawyers in the house and the various professional bodies think of the government issuing such propaganda or inviting doctors and lawyers to come from other countries and concealing the fact that there are four lawyers where there is work only enough for one, and so on? The matter would very soon come to a head and objection would be raised to such a policy. Yet the one is just as fair as the other. I would ask the minister to instruct his officials to be more careful in these times in regard to issuing documents of that character.

Just before I sit down, might I say a word in connection with the marketing board which I hope the minister will inaugurate? If it will be as successful here as it is in the old country, it will be well worth while. If he follows the example of the old country, the board will be a large one with different sections relating to agriculture, industry and commerce. When he is forming the agricultural section, I hope he will realize that agriculture comprises something more than wheat raising or stock breeding. A man may be a very successful grower of wheat or raiser of pure bred stock, and yet be totally unfit to deal with problems confronting the dairy industry and particularly poultry raising. I am not talking of the raising of 100 hens which sit around on farm machinery; I am speaking about keeping a flock of two or three thousand birds on an area in British Columbia. I hope, when the agricultural section is formed, one of its members will be a dairyman and one a poultryman from British Columbia. In 1930 the British Columbia poultry industry shipped out 310, not dozens, not cases, but car-loads of eggs. That is a very big record. Considering the importance of that industry, I think we would be justified in asking that a representative of that poultry industry be on any agricultural board which might be formed.

Mr. YOUNG: I do not wish unduly to delay the committee at this late date in the session, but I feel that somebody should warn the minister against this crowning folly of establishing a marketing board such as he outlined in his speech the other night. There appears to be no limit to the ingenuity that protectionists display in dressing up their pernicious doctrines in such guise as to make them attractive to the people. There appears to be no limit to the ingenuity with which they will dress up the wolf in sheep's clothing, or with which they will try to persuade the people that they can be enriched by taxing themselves; that they can lift themselves by their bootstraps if only they do it in a roundabout way.

What is the plan which was proposed by the minister the other night? He said: We will take, for example, butter. We produce, he said, say 225,000,000 pounds of butter in Canada annually, of which we consume about 215,000,000 pounds, leaving 10,000,000 of exportable surplus. That 10,000,000 pounds, he says, we are unable to sell, and because it is hanging over the market, it depresses the domestic price. He proposes to set up this marketing board which will levy on all the butter made in Canada one-tenth of a cent a pound.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not think I made that statement.

Mr. YOUNG: I think the minister did.

Mr. NEILL: That had nothing to do with the marketing board.

Mr. YOUNG: This is what the minister said as recorded in Hansard:

> It was felt, after consideration, that even if the large creameries in the west would agree to make a levy among themselves of half a cent per pound on the butter they manufactured, and put that into a fund to purchase the butter that was regarded as a surplus in western Canada, if there were, say, 10,000,000 pounds to export and 225,000,000 pounds produced, one-tenth of a cent per pound on the 225,000,000 pounds produced, distributed over the 10,000,000 pounds, would raise the price of the 10,000,000 pounds in the neighbourhood of 2·25 cents per pound. That, roughly, was the scheme under consideration.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): All the butter made in Canada is not made in these creameries —a long way from it. I had reference only to butter made in creameries.

Mr. YOUNG: All right, we will accept that. The butter he had under consideration was the butter made in creameries. Now you have a production of 225 million pounds of butter, of which 215 million pounds are consumed in Canada, leaving 10 million pounds for export. The minister proposes to put a levy of one-tenth of a cent per pound on this 225 million pounds, which will create a fund of $225,000. That $225,000 will enable him to pay a bonus of 2¼ cents a pound on the 10 million pounds surplus, which will enable us to export that amount. What is his purpose in that? It is to lift that surplus off the market in order to enable him to raise the domestic price of butter. All right. We have 215 million pounds of our butter consumed in this country which the minister proposes by this scheme to raise in price—how much? Two and one-quarter cents a pound. If the scheme is to work he will have to raise the domestic price at least as much as he adds to the export price. He is going to raise the domestic price of butter by 2¼ cents a pound. That 2¼ cents a pound on the 215 million pounds consumed in Canada will take from the pockets of the people of this country $4,837,000. That much is to be taken from the consumers of this country and $225,000 of it presented to the British workmen in the form of cheap butter. The minister proposes to take out of the pockets of the people of this country nearly $5,000,000 and present to the British workmen $225,000 in the form of cheap butter.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Where does the $5,000,000 go?

Mr. YOUNG: We will consider that. That is to go, you say, to the producers of butter in Canada.

Mr. MALCOLM: Who export.

Mr. YOUNG: No. The exporter would get a share of it. The question my hon. friend from Red Deer asks is, would the farmer get this $5,000,000 or would somebody else get it? I doubt very much if the farmer would get it. This much is certain, the farmer will pay it. That is to say, the levy that is made of one-tenth of a cent a pound will be paid by the farmer. That will be deducted from his cream cheque. But when the added price which the creamery receives for that butter comes into the hands of the creamery, will the creamery pass it on back to the farmer?

Mr. SPOTTON: Why not?

An hon. MEMBER: They will have to.

Mr. YOUNG: Why will they have to? We have in this country a great many creameries which are not paying because they are not large enough or are not efficiently managed, and they will say to the farmer: We cannot give you this extra price, for we must keep it ourselves in order to keep going.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. YOUNG: You laugh at that? Read the history of your creameries and you will find out.

If this plan succeeds it will have two effects. First it will encourage the production of butter. That is the effect desired by the minister in raising the price 2¼ cents a pound. It is to encourage the producer to produce more butter, and the other effect will be that the consumer will consume less because the price will be higher to the consumer. Then what will happen? Our figures of 225 million pounds of production and 10 million pounds for export will no longer apply. We shall then be producing inside of a year or two approximately 300 million pounds of butter instead of 225 million pounds, and consuming 200 million pounds instead of 215 million pounds, leaving 100 million pounds for export.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): On what does the hon. member base that statement?

Mr. YOUNG: That is not a very great reduction in consumption, from 215 million pounds to 200 million pounds, because the price has been increased 2¼ cents a pound. That is not putting it extremely, to say that the consumption of butter because of the increased price will decrease by some 15 million pounds; and when you add 2¼ cents to the price that the farmer receives for his butter he will increase the production I should think by at least 75 million pounds. That is a very moderate estimate.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Does the hon. member make this statement, that if butter were two cents a pound higher than now it would be a sufficient encouragement for our farmers in increase their production by 75 million pounds, and then in addition we would consume 15 million pounds less?

Mr. YOUNG: I make this statement, that if you add 2¼ cents a pound to the price of butter, you will increase the production, and that if you add that same amount to the price the consumer pays, you will decrease consumption. The spread between production and consumption will therefore widen, and I venture to say that it will not be more than a year or two before we have 100 million pounds for export, and then one-tenth of a cent a pound will not be a sufficient levy. You will have to have a levy then of at least one cent a pound on production. One cent a pound on a production of 300 million pounds would yield $3,000,000, and that would enable you to pay a bonus of three cents a pound on the exportable surplus. Three cents a pound on the 200 million pounds consumed in Canada would be $6,000,000. This means you would charge the people an additional $6,000,000, and of that $6,000,000 you would have given half to the producers of butter in this country, and the other half to the British workmen in the form of cheap butter. You would be taxing our people $3,000,000 in order to provide cheap butter for the people of another country. What will you say to the unemployed in our cities when they come to the government and say: We have no butter for our bread? Many of them, Mr. Chairman, have not even bread. Will the government say to them: We can do nothing for you, and if you cannot get butter for your bread it is just too bad, but we are taxing you $3,000,000 to provide cheap butter for the people of some other country.

This legislation will encourage dumping, which this government has held up as the greatest crime in all the calendar. This government has invented all kinds of devices and passed all sorts of laws and regulations to prevent other countries dumping their surplus products here. The Minister of National Revenue stood in his place in this house last session and said that no self-respecting country would allow another country to dump its surplus products on it. Now his colleague comes before us with a proposal not only to encourage dumping but to make dumping compulsory

Mr. MALCOLM: Bonus it.

Mr. YOUNG: The Minister of Agriculture used the word "compulsory" in his speech. He said, "If, however, it could have been made compulsory, dealing with that incident alone, I have no doubt that the condition that did arise would not have arisen."

What happened in Australia? This is merely a repetition of the Patterson scheme in Australia. They levied two or three cents a pound on the butter produced in order to bonus export butter, and what happened? The very day that came into effect Australian butter was shut out of this country. Well, other countries can do the same thing. We are not the only people who are crazy.

Mr. SPOTTON: Let us all have a good time together.

Mr. YOUNG: Other nations are just as foolish as we are in this regard. The government of this country says: No, you shall not dump your cheap butter into this country. But I think the British government would be quite willing to accept our cheap butter, willing to let us work and provide cheap butter for their unemployed while our own unemployed go without it. But suppose the world's market improves and there was no difficulty in selling this surplus, what would happen? We would be in the position of paying two or three cents a pound for a market that we could have for nothing. But suppose the market did not improve, suppose it got worse; what would happen? Then other countries would see us bonusing our exports to the British market and by so doing reducing the price of butter on that market. What would they do? They would underbid us and a price war would be started with each country trying to undersell the other. You would demoralize the market, and the last condition would be worse than the first. Somebody has said, "Who will get the benefit of it; who will get this money?" I will tell hon. members this, that the farmer who makes his own butter and sells it himself would not have to contribute to the fund, but would receive the benefit of it. On the other hand the farmer who sends his cream to the creamery would have to contribute to the fund, because his contribution would be taken out of his cream cheque. When the butter was sold for the added price the creamery would say, "The cost of operating a creamery is more than it was; our overhead is more than it was, and we will have to charge a higher price for manufacturing and selling." The creamery would absorb the bulk of the increase.

It would be interesting to know who asked for this legislation—not who asked the minister, but whose fertile brain originated the scheme so that somebody else might ask the minister. We know where the agitation came from against New Zealand butter, or butter coming from the Antipodes. It originated not among the farmers, but among selfish creamery interests who had imported large quantities of New Zealand butter and wanted to shut out further importations. They wanted to corner the market and to make a killing, if I may use the term, on the rising price of butter. It would be interesting to know if some such ingenious body was not behind this scheme in the hope once more of getting a corner on the market.

If we do this in connection with butter, where are we going to stop? Already the member for Bow River is asking that we do the same for cattle, and the hon. member for New Westminster is asking for the same thing in connection with eggs. Then there will be apples, potatoes, fish—

Mr. SPOTTON: Bananas.

Mr. YOUNG: —lumber—is there anything we produce which would not demand similar treatment? And what would be the result? If this takes effect you would increase the cost of living in Canada by at least five or ten per cent. I ask this question: What nation is going to be the first to recover from the depression? The nation that can so reduce its production costs that it can undersell its competitors in world markets. Here we have a scheme which can have no other result than to increase costs of living and costs of production. Not only that, but the increase that is added to the cost of production in this country will be subtracted from the cost of production in the country to which we are going to send cheap food and cheap supplies. How can we hope to compete with other countries in the world markets when we tax ourselves in order to pay the board of the working men in those countries? We will not have a ghost of a chance. This step, if taken, will tend to put Canada in the background and put us in a position where we cannot compete with other countries. I have used a quotation in this house before, which I should like to use again; I believe it should be repeated on every possible occasion. Bastiat has said "Study all economic questions from the standpoint of the consumer, for the consumers' interests are the interests of the human race." If the consumer can be satisfied he will keep the producer busy. If goods can be placed on the market at the price the consumer can afford to pay, he will buy the goods, and the producer will have the work of producing them. The legislation passed these days however, not only in this country but—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): How long does the hon. member for Weyburn think the farmers would continue to produce butter at its present price? If they could not continue to produce it, and ceased production, what would be the effect on the price?

Mr. YOUNG: The minister assumes that this scheme presents the only way of increasing the price of butter. My argument is that it will not increase the price of butter. If he wishes to increase the price of butter he and the government with which he is connected must devote all their energies towards breaking down the barriers which are making it impossible to ship goods back and forth across the world. The tariff barriers which the government opposite and other governments are constructing are making it impossible to sell butter or anything else.

The government cannot in this roundabout way raise the price of butter. As I have said by erecting tariff barriers they make it impossible for us to buy or sell anything. If the consumer can be kept satisfied, and if he can be put in a position to buy, there will be a market for goods. Because of legislation passed in this house within the last two years, and legislation passed in other countries, the consumer cannot buy goods. That is the reason there is so little trade in the world, and the only way to remedy the condition is to find means of reducing, not increasing, production costs.

Mr. MALCOLM: I wish to say a few words to the minister by way of assistance, rather than criticism. I believe that the remarks of the hon. member for Weyburn to which we have just listened appeal to the common sense of most men in this house who are interested in agriculture. One board exists in Canada for the assistance of agriculture, and I believe it stands out as probably the greatest assistance to any branch of agriculture in any country in the world; I speak of the Board of Grain Commissioners. Canada is producing the finest grade of wheat in the world, and is marketing it under the very best system obtaining in any country. This parliament votes money yearly for the services rendered by the Canada Wheat Board in weighing, grading and inspecting Canadian grain. Our grain is accepted on the markets of the world on the certificates issued by the inspectors of the Board of Grain Commissioners. The wheat growers of the Dominion of Canada pay all the costs of this service; the people of Canada are not taxed. Payment for this service comes out of the money received for the grain. Therefore we may point to the Board of Grain Commissioners and say that it renders to one branch of agriculture a distinct service without any direct cost to the rest of the dominion. Under this system Canada's grain moves freely, in fact more freely than the grain of any other country.

In dealing with a commodity such as butter, the minister has to consider not only one, but all the products of milk. Milk may be consumed in its fresh state; in the form of butter; in the form of cheese or in the form of condensed milk, the preparation of which has become a very extensive industry. I want to warn the minister that the Patterson scheme in Australia has not done for the butter producers of that country all that it was expected to do. Particularly, it has not done for the farmers of Australia what was expected of it. I warn the minister against the representations of those hiding behind farmer's interests. I warn him against the representations of the dairy people, because I have grave doubts that if a tax were put on all domestic butter in order to bonus export, that the bonus would not pass into the hands of the dairy industry and not back into the hands of the farmers.

[Mr. Young.]

Just a word to the minister with regard to butter. He knows perfectly well that Canada's production of butter in all its forms runs about 300,000,000 pounds annually. He knows, further, that a few years ago we were short of butter and were on an import basis. At that time butter prices in Canada were very much higher than they were in Great Britain. We were compelled to import butter or to use more of our milk for the manufacture of butter. A very considerable quantity of milk was consumed in its fresh form, a large quantity was used in the production of cheese, and much in the production of condensed milk. The fact is that during the period of prosperity Canada's consumption of butter went as high as 35 pounds per capita, five pounds more than per capita production. To-day, due to the lack of consuming power, it is down to 21 pounds per capita. My hon. friend from Weyburn is quite right when he says the interests of the consumer are naturally the interests of the producer, because when consumption is high, production is high. Now with regard to the Patterson scheme in Australia—which I have no doubt someone is pressing the minister to inaugurate—this country does not permit dumping and ruled against Australian butter. Did Australia benefit in the British market with her butter, did the Patterson scheme help her? No. New Zealand and Denmark met the very low price at which Australia was exporting her butter resulting from the bonus payment. I doubt very much if the price was not driven down two or three cents on the British market by virtue of the Patterson scheme. If the minister goes into the business of bonusing the export of butter he will certainly have to consider bonusing the export of cheese and condensed milk, even though he does not extend the scheme to other branches of industry. Any plan he can work out comparable to the Canada Grain Act which will help to educate our farmers to produce the class of commodities for sale on the foreign market and to market our products under a brand or a certificate, every hon. gentleman in this house should support; but when the minister considers actually taxing the people of Canada for the benefit of export, he is entering a field to which there is no end not only in Canada, but among the other nations of the world. In other words, Mr. Chairman, it is a game we all can play at, and I doubt very much whether the minister will not get himself into a whirlpool from which he will never be able to withdraw.

Unquestionably we have unusual world conditions. But how will any of these schemes break the law of supply and demand? The law of supply and demand has undoubtedly governed in all individualistic and capitalistic countries since world trade began.

Mr. YOUNG: They are going to repeal that law!

Mr. MALCOLM: The very best cure for low prices always has been low prices. Overproduction is always caused by high prices. I have said time and again that the minute a business becomes too highly protected the result inevitably is that too many men go into that business and over-production results. We have had it evidenced in the United States to a degree never before known. That country has too many factories; take shoes as an example. The United States can produce enough in six months, if they run their factories three shifts of eight hours, to supply the world for a year. That, of course, has been brought about by the unusual conditions during the war. If the minister raises the price of butter beyond the normal price, which is caused by the law of supply and demand, he will admit with me that he is going to increase the production of butter to a point that will inevitably cause a worse overproduction and a lower price level than exists to-day. I say to him in all kindness, based on opinions I have had expressed to me by some of the best marketers in the world: Do not depart from the functions of government; which functions are to give all service possible to the producers. Do not ignore what his own Minister of Trade and Commerce will tell him, and what I have said to my former colleague the ex-Minister of Agriculture; our chances in the markets of England are dependent entirely upon the service we render to the buyers there plus the quality of our commodities. We have established that in grain. We can establish it in other commodities. But it would be just as absurd for us to try to tax the consumers of wheat in Canada in order to undersell the Argentine, India, Russia, Manchuria or any other country producing grain as it would be to do what he suggests doing with milk products. The government can, I believe, assist the farmers in every branch of agriculture by compelling packers and exporters to put up Canadian products in a way that will be suitable to the export market. By so doing they can assist in selling those products in the British market. This has been pointed out by the present high commissioner in Great Britain; it has been pointed out by our trade commissioners under several governments. The present Minister of Trade and Commerce has on many occasions mentioned it in this house and in public speeches. I advise the minister to create marketing boards for grading products; to give all the assistance the government service can to the producers of agricultural commodities, but not falsely to stimulate any branch of agriculture by any export bonus system. I am quite satisfied that by so doing he would be entering a field that would be destructive in the end, both to the people he is trying to help and to the trade of this country.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Mr. Chairman, I am not one of those who think that a farm marketing board would cure all the ills of agriculture, but I am certainly not able to follow the illogical arguments that have come from some of our friends to the right with respect to such a plan. My hon. friends from Weyburn (Mr. Young) and Assiniboia (Mr. McKenzie) seem to be afraid that a marketing board would raise the price of butter—both of them expressed that quite clearly—and so increase production. I am not afraid of the government doing anything that will raise the price of butter; that is certainly the object of a marketing board. If it does not increase the price of butter, but on the contrary lowers the price, then all the ills that my hon. friend from Weyburn mentioned will not follow. So we do not necessarily need to worry about that part of his argument. The argument is advanced that it would increase the cost of production by increasing the cost of living. Well, if the increased cost of living consequent on raising the price of butter is distributed throughout this country in increased purchasing power in the hands of the farmers and other workmen, who are themselves consumers, then I cannot see any great evil is going to ensue from such a policy. Certainly the buying power of the farmers would be increased to the extent to which the price of their butter is increased.

Mr. YOUNG: Would you make a present of $3,000,000 to the British workmen?

Mr. CAMPBELL: My hon. friend is all wrong there. That might be a fine argument to use on the hustings, but it cannot convince members of this house that any such plan will work out in that way at all. It is a most illogical argument. Now, the former Minister of Trade and Commerce quoted some figures that seemed to deny his own arguments. He stated that some years ago when the prices of butter were high Canadians were consuming 35 pounds per capita.

Mr. MALCOLM: My hon. friend will admit that during that period there was great prosperity and forty per cent more industrial employment than exists to-day.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Certainly. At the same time his argument is destroyed in part at least by the figures he quotes when he points out that now when prices are low we are consuming only 21 pounds per capita.

Mr. MALCOLM: It is because we are not consuming butter that prices are low. My hon. friend has the cart before the horse.

Mr. CAMPBELL: That may be so.

Mr. MALCOLM: That is it.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Supposing we get prosperous times within a few months, the first thing that will happen will be an increase in the cost of living. Will we be complaining at prices going up? For certainly that is one of the first things that will happen. Prices are low to-day because there is depression. If we can increase the buying power of the farmers there is no doubt in the world that that buying power will immediately be reflected in increased purchases on their part. My hon. friend will be able to sell more furniture, and all the factories of Canada will be able to sell more goods. I think every dollar of that money will find its way back to the industries, and I cannot for the life of me see that it will adversely affect the country as a whole. The figures contained in the bulletin of the Economic Annalist show that the farmer has suffered to a very much greater extent than has the industrialist. It shows that the prices of farm products have dropped much more than the prices of manufactured goods. This policy has not been brought forward as yet; the minister has only suggested it, but I am in favour of trying it or anything else that may assist the farmer in his difficulties. I am not going to sit on the fence, as some hon. members seems to be doing, and say we must do nothing and make no effort at all to control conditions. I think the troubles we are facing to-day are partly due to the fact that the government has not done enough to try to meet those conditions. Certainly I say it is no bonus to the buyer of butter in Great Britain to have a small tax put on the butter at the point of production and used to take the surplus off the market in order to raise the price level at home. I think no one can reasonably use an argument of the kind. It seems to me this is at least worth attempting, and the very argument brought forward by my hon. friend with respect to the wheat board and the marketing of grain applies here. What we want is some centralized body that can direct and control the products of the country at a time such as this. After all, that is the main object of a marketing board, and I hope the minister will not allow himself to be influenced by the arguments which have been brought forward by members of the opposition.

Mr. VALLANCE: Might I point out to my hon. friend that there was no tax levied on all the wheat produced in Canada in order to market the exportable surplus. I might point out also that the moment you start to subsidize anything, whether it is butter, grain, live stock or something else, immediately you increase the production and your problem becomes more acute.

As I remember it, the other night the minister merely threw out the suggestion that some time a marketing board might be considered. I speak now to those members who come from the province of Saskatchewan; I know they have had communications from various cooperative bodies in that province suggesting a marketing board, but I think they will agree that the wool growers, the live stock pools and the various cooperative associations that have seen fit to write asking for their cooperation and assistance, represented only those who were vitally interested in the production of those commodities. If you attempt to set up a marketing board to-day, with officials who have not their own money invested in the industry, I think you will find a considerable difference in the marketing of surplus products by subsidies. As I pointed out the other night, when Australia adopted the Patterson scheme for the export of their surplus butter, Canada met that surplus with the dumping duty, and if we adopt this plan we will only aggravate the people in those countries where we propose to dump our surplus goods. So before any legislation along this line is brought in I would advise the minister to get in touch not with those who are promoting this idea but with those who are producing the commodities that to-day find their prices governed by the small surpluses which are exported.

In talking with some of these individuals the point has been brought up that if you set up a marketing board you then compel those producing that commodity to supply their goods to some group of individuals who have no investment in that industry. Take the live stock industry as an example. I question whether the minister can mention any responsible group of live stock men who to-day are suggesting to him the taxing of the entire production of live stock in Canada in order to bonus the small exportable surplus. So I would suggest to the minister that if it is the intention of the government at this late hour to set up a marketing board, the wisdom of which I doubt, some consideration should be given hon. members, who should have an opportunity to express the views of those vitally interested in this scheme.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I should like to take just a few moments to reply to some points in connection with this item which is supposed to be under discussion. The hon. member for Assiniboia referred to the reduction in this vote, but that decrease of $175,000 is due to the ten per cent reduction in salaries and to a change in the method of dealing with travelling expenses. Apart from those two points, this item has been increased by $25,000.

The hon. member for Assiniboia suggested that the farmers were worried because of the reduction in this vote; he suggested that they were wondering if they would get the money for their clubs and so on, and he particularly mentioned the stallion clubs. Some time ago we decided, because of the difficulties experienced in the formation of clubs this year, to make a special grant in addition to the other assistance ordinarily given. The hon. member also made the statement that at present many farmers were unable to buy better live stock and improve their herds. We realized that fact also, and if the hon. member had consulted the department he would have found that the matters he brought forward have been and are being well looked after.

In connection with the purchase of live stock may I say that we have filled all the applications received, to the extent that we have been able to do so with the stock we have been able to secure which is up to the standards set by the department. With regard to the decrease in grants to fairs and the effect that it may have on breeders, I believe the average constructive breeder does not breed live stock for the purpose of showing it at fairs; he breeds live stock in order to sell it.

Reference has been made to prices. We all know that prices the world over have come down, but this country has not suffered in that regard as much as some other countries. I am credibly informed, for instance, that in the memory of the oldest farmer the price of bacon in Denmark has never been so low as it is at the present time. The point was also brought up that tariffs never were as high and prices never as low for farm products as is the case at present. One commodity on which we have never placed a tariff is wool, but the price of wool has dropped more than the price of almost any other farm commodity. We cannot fairly discuss this question as it affects one country alone, because no country can stand alone in this connection.

Mr. SPENCER: The minister said, presumably in reference to the bull policy, that all applications had been filled where stock could be obtained. Could he tell the committee what percentage of calls could not be filled because of the lack of stock?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There were five hundred applications, and we estimate that we can fill four hundred of them.

Mr. VALLANCE: What report has the minister received with regard to the success of the bull policy and the boar policy? Have these policies been successful, according to the information received by the minister from the various individuals or clubs who have taken advantage of them?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The best answer to that would be that last year we put out over 800 bulls under the bull loaning policy, and we have had in the neighbourhood of 650 to 700 letters, commending us on the policy and stating how valuable it has been to the farmers. Some of the letters praising us most highly came from farmers whose birthplace is the same as the hon. member's, and who appreciate good live stock better than the average farmer. They express their appreciation in this way, that after having been able to have good sires for a number of years they were unfortunately forced to go out of the business, and they declared that no words of theirs could convey what this policy meant to them. Regarding the brood sow policy, there was made in the house the other day a statement which misrepresents the situation. I made it clear at the time that policy was announced that I was not advocating farmers going into increased production in pigs, but owing to the fact that coarse grains were so cheap, and the price of pigs being so high at that time, nothing that we could do could prevent the farmers from going into the increased production of pigs. Realizing that, we made it possible for them, at no extra cost to themselves, to get seed stock which we thought they should have. We did not in any way encourage it either on the public platform or in press notices, but we felt that inasmuch as they were going into increased production we might, without encouraging it, make it easier for them to get the seed stock which we thought they should have.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, May 19, 1932

The house met at eleven o'clock.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1932-33

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1933, was presented by Hon. E. N. Rhodes, Minister of Finance, read by Mr. Speaker to the house and referred to the committee of supply.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee tomorrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Civil Service Act and to provide for the payment of gratuities to members of the Civil Service Commission on retirement and to officers, clerks and employees in lieu of retiring leave.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—STE. ANNE'S WHARF

Mr. BOUCHARD:

1. Were tenders called for in the repair work at Ste. Anne's wharf, under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, in 1931?
2. If so, who recommended the contractor?
3. How much was paid per cubic yard of stone?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1 and 2. Work done by day labour.

3. $2.

[Mr. Weir.]

PERMANENT FORCE—MECHANIZED EQUIPMENT

Mr. MacINNIS:

Are public tenders called in the purchase and replacement of the spare parts kept in store for the repair of the mechanized apparatus used by the artillery units of the permanent force of Canada, if not, what method of purchase is employed?

Mr. SUTHERLAND:

Public tenders are not called for the purchase and replacement of the spare parts for the repair of the mechanized apparatus used by the artillery units of the permanent force of Canada. These spare parts when required are purchased from the manufacturers of the mechanized apparatus or from their authorized agents in Canada.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SATURDAY SITTING

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if it were the wish of the house that we should meet on Saturday morning at eleven o'clock, I would be very glad to accommodate the members.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I can only speak for the official opposition, but we are entirely agreeable to sitting on Saturday.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): After the Prime Minister mentioned this matter the other morning I took the opportunity of consulting with my colleagues, and as most of them have made arrangements to go away on Saturday, we would not care to sit on that day.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe that the practice in a matter of this kind has been not to sit unless there is unanimous agreement. I would not like to make a motion to be carried by a majority under those circumstances. I thought that we would rise at six o'clock on Saturday in any event if we sit on that day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Might I suggest that a conference might result in some agreement as to the matters that might be taken up on Saturday, which would enable us to get through at least a little sooner than if we did not sit on that day.

Mr. BENNETT: If my hon. friend from Acadia will allow the matter to stand until three o'clock and indicate if there is any legislation in which his colleagues would not be particularly interested, we might proceed with such business on Saturday from eleven o'clock to one and from three to six, a matter of five hours, in which we might dispose of a good deal of business. I thank the right hon. gentleman for his suggestion and will act accordingly.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is sometimes urged that the members from the province of Quebec go home on Saturday. I rise to say that the Quebec members will be pleased to stay here this Saturday and sit.

Mr. BENNETT: I apprehend my hon. friend speaks for the opposition.

Mr. GARDINER: I shall be very pleased to consult with my colleagues with regard to the suggestion of the Prime Minister and will see him later.

SITTING ON VICTORIA DAY

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): May I ask the Prime Minister whether it is proposed that the house should sit on Tuesday, the anniversary of the Queen's birthday?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I ask the right hon. the Prime Minister whether the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) will be home before the end of the session and give us a report on the proceedings at the Disarmament conference?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): He sails on Saturday. Whether or not this house is then in session will depend upon the conduct of public business.

CONVERSION LOAN

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT BY THE HON. MEMBER FOR SHERBROOKE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Some time ago I directed the attention of the house to an observation made by my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) in the course of his remarks upon the budget. Since then my hon. friend has been absent and I trust that he has enjoyed a delightful holiday in one of the most beautiful spots on earth. Now that he has returned from Bermuda I trust that he will take a more charitable view of political opponents than is indicated by the language he used on that occasion. In case his memory requires to be refreshed I would refer him to page 1994 of Hansard where he made the assertion that members of the government had failed to convert their bonds while calling upon the public to do so.

Mr. HOWARD: I did not say that.

Mr. RHODES: The exact words used by my hon. friend were:

Insiders of this government did not convert their bonds.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am afraid I have to raise the same point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: What is the point of order?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The point of order is that no objection was taken to these words at the time and my hon. friend has no right to bring the matter up now.

Mr. SPEAKER: I ruled on that point of order some days ago to the effect that the hon. member for Sherbrooke had a right to make an explanation if he chose. It is not a case of objecting to words because they are unparliamentary in form, in which case objection would have to be taken at the time. But this is a different set of circumstances altogether.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, but the minister cannot take exception to them now.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is entirely up to the hon. member for Sherbrooke.

Mr. BENNETT: The matter which has been spoken to by the Minister of Finance is one that has given some concern to some of my colleagues and if it is impossible for the hon. member for Sherbrooke to make any statement with respect to the matter I will give formal notice that it be referred to the committee on privileges and elections. Some of my colleagues feel very keenly about it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You have no right to do that either.

Mr. BENNETT: I have, and I have exercised it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Oh, of course—dictatorship.

Mr. BENNETT: No, common decency.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The rules of the house are there.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The Speaker gave his ruling.

Mr. RHODES: Are we to understand that the hon. member for Sherbrooke desires his language to stand?

Mr. CASGRAIN: The point of order is there.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not a point of order at all.

Mr. RHODES: I rose for the purpose of asking permission to discuss the point of order, but Mr. Speaker has ruled that the point of order does not obtain.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 91, to amend the Judges Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

BANKRUPTCY ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 41, to amend the Bankruptcy Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Sections 1 to 17 inclusive agreed to.

On section 18—Superintendent of bankruptcy.

Mr. CARDIN: I regret that I am not in a position to agree with the recommendations of the committee appointed to consider this bill. I fail to see the advantage in the appointment of a superintendent to administer, or to look after the administration of, the Bankruptcy Act. As was stated before the special committee and outside the committee there are many defects in the law, but I do not think the appointment of a superintendent is going to better the condition, or to make a better bankruptcy law in Canada.

In the first place the Bankruptcy Act was a mistake. That has been established since the law came into force, and was shown very clearly before the special committee. Complaints from all sections of Canada have been made against the law.

Mr. HACKETT: No.

Mr. CARDIN: From practically all sections. The eastern section of Canada, that part mostly concerned, has been complaining bitterly against the application of the bankruptcy legislation. When we try to go away from recognized and established legal institutions we make a mistake. When we try to get away from judicial organizations and create special bodies we make further mistakes. We have endeavoured to create a system which would apply to all Canada. In our attempt to generalize the application of the bankruptcy law—although we have power to do it—we have made a mistake. In the province of Quebec particularly, we have been suffering severely from the application of that legislation. The truth is that very few people are satisfied with the application of the Bankruptcy Act. In my humble judgment the appointment of a superintendent will not cure the evils that have been brought about by the Bankruptcy Act. The present bill will create a new bureaucracy, and from now on the affairs of insolvent debtors are going to be governed, not by law, but by regulations which will be issued by this new department. I think already we have too many regulations taking the place of law and governing our activities in all walks of life, and, speaking more particularly of the province of Quebec, I feel that this would impair the application of our civil laws. Really I do not see what advantage is to be gained by the appointment of a superintendent. We are creating a new organization at Ottawa which will be in a position to dictate to all the provinces. It would be much better to repeal the Bankruptcy Act and revert to the practice followed previously in all the provinces. I may say that when insolvent debtors' estates were administered according to the laws of the province of Quebec the costs were much less than they are to-day under the Bankruptcy Act; further, the creditors are not as well protected to-day as they were before the act came into force.

I am anxious to raise my voice in protest against this bill, and to submit that in my humble view the Bankruptcy Act is no good. The result of its application has proved not at all advantageous either to debtors or creditors in my province; on the contrary it has been a source of embarrassment to them. The licensing of trustees is not going to better the position. Many weaknesses of the Bankruptcy Act which could have been improved have not been touched, more particularly the high cost of bankruptcy proceedings which has been the subject of complaint in Quebec. We are not going to diminish bankruptcy costs by the appointment of a superintendent, for he and his staff will have to be paid, and, I repeat, the licensing of trustees is not going to better the position in any way, shape or form. It would have been easy for the committee—it is easy even yet—to amend the clause regarding costs and to provide that these costs should be taxed by the judge and not be determined by the registrar, as is the practice at present.

I see it has been decided to exclude a certain class of farmers in the provinces, except in Quebec, where they are to be exempt from the operations of the Bankruptcy Act if their indebtedness is under $500.

Mr. HACKETT: Everywhere.

Mr. CARDIN: I agree with that. So far as the province of Quebec is concerned, the bankruptcy law has proved no good to the farmers; in fact it has tended to ruin their credit. Farmers are not traders or merchants in the right sense of those terms, and it is certainly a good thing that they have been exempted from the application of the Bankruptcy Act.

I observe that the committee has refused to adopt the principle which was embodied in the bill presented to this house by the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Brasset). The principle has been approved twice in another chamber, unanimously on the second occasion. That principle has to do with the place in which the bankruptcy proceedings shall be carried on. Last session I made a few observations on the point. I think it is most unfair that the whole province of Quebec should be considered as one district—

Mr. HACKETT: No, no.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, it is; and that an insolvent debtor even in the county of Gaspe may be forced to go to Montreal, where his assets will be dealt with. Undoubtedly the debtor's assets should be dealt with in the district in which he resided or carried on business when he became bankrupt. This is objected to on the ground that most creditors live in the big centres and that it would not be advantageous for the larger number of creditors to have the bankruptcy proceedings carried on in the debtor's own district. That is not entirely true. From the point of view of the amount involved, I admit you will find creditors with the largest claims living in the big cities, but in the rural communities and the small towns where a merchant is conducting his affairs you will find the greater number of his creditors, small creditors it is true; but I contend that the local creditor with a claim of $100 should be considered just as much as the creditor living in a great city and having a claim of $1,000. Undoubtedly it is a greater deterrent against any inclination on the part of an insolvent debtor to avail himself of the Bankruptcy Act if all the proceedings are carried on in the locality where he lives than if they are to be dealt with in Montreal. It may be objected that this would mean greater expenditure on the part of wholesale merchants or manufacturers in the big cities. Not at all. When the affairs of an insolvent debtor are dealt with in the district in which he conducted his affairs the costs are lower than when the proceedings are transferred to Montreal or Quebec. In fact it does not cost a cent more to have the bankruptcy proceedings conducted in the local district of the insolvent debtor. Why? Because the wholesaler or the manufacturer in Montreal never goes to the court where the trustee is appointed; he is represented by the man who is after the job of trustee. In a word, everything is done by proxy. For example, if we have to deal with an insolvent debtor residing in the town of Sorel, wholesalers and manufacturers cannot complain that it would cost more to deal with his affairs there than in Montreal. They remain in Montreal and have their claims put forward in the court by a representative with a proxy. Even in Montreal the same procedure is followed. In the practice court of Montreal you never see the representatives of the wholesalers, the big companies, the big industries, the big manufacturers or the big stores; they are never there. Even their employees, their accountants or their clerks, are not there. The only persons who appear before the practice court or the registrar in Montreal when the trustee is appointed are those anxious to get the appointment as trustee, who present themselves with all the proxies they have been able to obtain from the big creditors located in Montreal. So if these affairs were to be dealt with in the rural sections of the province it would not mean any additional expense.

Everyone in this house seems to advocate the back to the land movement, but we are only talking; no one has shown any real desire to support that movement in a proper way. In the last few years everything has become centralized in the big cities of the province. Business is there; finance is there, railway affairs are there and everything is there. The rural sections of Quebec and the other provinces have been deprived of the natural activities which should be carried on within their boundaries. If we are sincere let us give a little more importance to the rural sections of Quebec and the other provinces of this country. It is absolutely useless to talk about going back to the land because the cities are crowded with people who have come from the farms; I contend that these people have been driven to the cities by the centralizing movement which has been carried on in Canada for a number of years, and more particularly in the province of Quebec. Everything in that province has become centralized in Montreal and Quebec City and the people of the rural sections are suffering as a result.

Here we have an opportunity to decentralize, not by some pious expression of opinion but by some definite action. Give to the small towns and rural districts of Quebec and the other provinces the opportunity of dealing with their own affairs, which concern the people residing in that vicinity. I repeat that this would be a very good opportunity to say that when a bankruptcy occurs in a rural section of Quebec where a judicial district has been established, everything in connection with that bankruptcy should be dealt with by the court of that district, instead of having the whole thing transferred to the city of Montreal or the city of Quebec. Let us give the small centres some say in the administration of their own affairs, and we will make them more attractive to live in. Let us keep in those small centres the activities that should be kept there.

Let me say a word with regard to our lawyers. At the present time the life of a lawyer in a small community in the province of Quebec is impossible. He cannot make a living because everything has been transferred to the cities of Montreal or Quebec. Before long the lawyers practising in the small centres of my province will have to move to Montreal, which will mean that the population of the large cities will be increased and the rural sections of the province will be deprived of what is their due. We can get nothing in the rural sections of Quebec. Railway rates are against us; financial organizations are against us; under our banking system everything is being centralized in the big centres and the rural sections are losing their importance to a very large extent.

I think this practice is contrary to the speeches we have heard here and there in support of the back to the land movement. There is nothing to induce people who live in large cities to go on the farms. They would have to go empty handed; everything in which they are concerned and all their interests are located in the big cities. They can live in the country, but if they want something done they must go to Montreal or Quebec, or if they live in Ontario they must go to Toronto, and I believe the same thing applies in the other provinces. It is about time we made a serious effort to revive the rural sections of the country, more particularly in the province of Quebec.

I hope I may be pardoned by you, Mr. Chairman, and by the committee for speaking at such length. I have had this matter in mind for a long time, and this is not the first time I have expressed these sentiments. I think we should do something more practical than make speeches advocating the back to the land movement; we should do something to induce the people to go back on the land, and we should also try to keep on the farms those who are already there. What I said in regard to lawyers applies also to all the other professions and trades. Let me say just here that the lawyers in the rural sections are much better than their reputations would lead people to believe. In the small communities of our province they enjoy a very great deal of respect; in fact a large number of our rural constituencies are represented, both in legislatures and in this parliament, by lawyers and professional men. These are gentlemen of some importance in their localities, and they should not be driven away from their homes and the districts in which they have practised. They should be left to deal with the business arising in the locality in which they live; they deserve some consideration.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Richelieu with regard to the bill now under consideration, which proposes the amendment of certain sections of the Bankruptcy Act. To some extent I am in agreement with the views expressed by my hon. friend, yet on the whole I cannot say that I am in accord with his opinions.

I agree with the hon. gentleman that the question of bankruptcy and the administration of bankruptcy laws in the Dominion of Canada presents very great difficulties. Some of us will remember that as far back as 1876 the first act of the kind was passed by this parliament, known at that time as the Insolvency Act. After that act had been in operation for some six or seven years it was repealed, and the question of bankruptcy, as it came under the jurisdiction of this parliament, was altogether removed from our statute books. We had at that time seven provinces in Canada and each of them attempted in its own way to pass some law to meet the situation. We had no dominion bankruptcy or insolvency law and, as I say, each province attempted to enact laws of its own to meet the situation. There was a great deal of variation in the provincial laws. Afterwards, when we admitted two new provinces, they, of course, deemed it proper to attempt likewise to occupy what was federal jurisdiction by passing insolvency laws of their own. So that eventually we found ourselves in the position of having nine separate insolvency laws in the nine provinces of Canada, and these were upheld in principle only because it was recognized that as the dominion field had not been occupied by dominion legislation in regard to bankruptcy or insolvency, the provinces should be permitted to pass laws of their own until such time as the Dominion parliament might assume jurisdiction.

The present act has been on the statute books since the year 1921. I believe that the moving cause which operated in regard to the introduction of the bill in the year 1920 or 1921 was the fact that so many protests had been received from foreign countries that had commercial dealings with Canada. Boards of trade and chambers of commerce in the United Kingdom, in the United States and in several European countries had from time to time protested to similar bodies in this country that there was too great a variation and too great uncertainty in the insolvency laws operating in the Dominion of Canada. Foreign dealers who sold goods to Canada felt great uncertainty as to their rights with respect to the question of insolvency. Representations were made from time to time to the government of this country that a uniform act should again be attempted. It will be remembered that under section 91 of the British North America Act bankruptcy and insolvency are questions which are placed specially under the jurisdiction of the Dominion of Canada and not at all under provincial authority. It was thought in 1921 that we should make an effort to produce a uniform bankruptcy act which would apply throughout the whole Dominion, because by so doing we should wipe out the operation of the various provincial measures which dealt with the subject.

Now, we have had eleven years of experience under the Bankruptcy Act of Canada, and I agree with my hon. friend from Richelieu that that experience has not in every case been satisfactory. Many complaints have been received by the Department of Justice in regard to various sections of the act, and many suggestions have been made for an amendment by way of improvement therein. Many complaints have been received from various parts of Canada as to the ill effects produced by the operation of the Bankruptcy Act as it now stands on the statute books. There was a great accumulation of proposed amendments and suggestions from all sorts of commercial bodies and individuals throughout the length and breadth of Canada, but on the whole I am bound to say that there was far more general approval than disapprobation of the act. It was thought that the time had come when there should be something in the nature of a general revision. Having regard to the protests and suggestions which had been made, the Canadian Bar Association, recently, within a year or two, took the matter up and appointed a special committee of expert lawyers to consider the whole act and to suggest amendments. A very able special committee was set up by the Canadian Bar Association and they made an exhaustive study of the act and sent a report of their findings to the Department of Justice. Many of their suggestions were exceedingly valuable and they did not come to a conclusion or make a report until they had made a very exhaustive study of the whole subject in its application to every part of the dominion. Boards of trade representing commercial interests in the great cities of Canada also made their representations, and an act was finally drafted in the department, including all such suggestions as were deemed advisable and practicable, and which have been incorporated in the bill introduced at the present session of parliament.

The house will realize—I think we all realize—that the whole subject is a difficult and to a large extent a technical one, and it was deemed advisable that a select committee of the house should be appointed to consider the bill as introduced, with a view to having a general discussion and giving an opportunity to persons throughout Canada or to corporations or other bodies in any part of the country to appear before that committee and make representations. I must say that the committee has been quite diligent in the consideration of the bill. It has not reached any conclusions without the very fullest consideration, and my information is that the bill which is now presented to parliament represents a practically unanimous report from that committee. Indeed, my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) now informs me that it is a unanimous report. May I just here state that the hon. member for Stanstead was chairman of that special committee and he is eminently qualified at this juncture to give the house the fullest information and to explain the reasons which actuated the committee in regard to the amendments which they have proposed in the report they have submitted to the house. In some parts of Canada it may be, as pointed out by my hon. friend from Richelieu, that the bill does not exactly meet the situation; as he says, it does not exactly meet the situation in the province of Quebec in the points which he has just discussed before this committee. But let me tell my hon. friend that his complaint with respect to the centralization of legal business in the province of Quebec has very slight application indeed to this parliament. My hon. friend knows that. The judicial system of the province of Quebec and the manner in which it operates are entirely under the control of the legislature of the province of Quebec. We are dealing with the particular question of jurisdiction in regard to bankruptcy and insolvency, but his remarks were of a general character, pointing to the centralization of legal business in the cities of Montreal and Quebec, which was having the effect of practically denuding the rest of the province of lawyers, compelling them to take up their residence in those cities if they intended to continue in their profession. Bankruptcy law is only one item to be considered in relation to the legal work of the province of Quebec, and the judicial system, the conduct of their courts, the arrangements of their districts, are all within the jurisdiction of the province of Quebec itself. I think an opportunity should be taken to forward to the attorney general of the province of Quebec the speech delivered today by my hon. friend from Richelieu, because there seems to be a good deal of force in it, and I think it should be brought directly to the attention of the authorities in that province. But in so far as this particular branch of legal business is concerned, it is under the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada.

I do not propose to discuss this matter further at this stage, but there are present in the house at this moment a good many hon. gentlemen who were members of the special committee. They are more familiar than I or non-members of the committee can be with the various clauses of this bill. I should like to hear the fullest and freest discussion on every clause and I am sure the hon. member for Stanstead, who is chairman of that committee and who is fully familiar with every section and every proposal, will give this committee the fullest information in order that we may pass an unbiased judgment on these proposals. However, when we find that a special committee has made an exhaustive study of any question and has come to an unanimous conclusion, I think it is a pretty safe rule to follow to take its report as guidance for those who have not attended the committee or heard the discussion. Following that view, I am inclined to think that the bill as reported should be accepted by the house, possibly with very slight amendments.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Chairman, there appears to be some misapprehension in the mind of the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin) which I should like to dispel. It is regrettable that the rural population of the country is pouring into the cities but that is a trend which is not peculiar to our country or to the province of Quebec. If we put to the test of the statute the suggestion made by the hon. member for Richelieu, that a debtor who could not meet his obligations in Gaspe might be haled a thousand miles to Montreal, I fear it will fail. A debtor who is unable to meet his payments as they come due may make an abandonment of his estate to the official receiver of the bankruptcy division in which he lives, or a petition in bankruptcy may be made against him. The jurisdiction of the court before which he may be summoned is fixed by the act.

An hon. MEMBER: What section?

Mr. HACKETT: Subsection 5 of section 4. This subsection reads:

> The petition shall be presented to the court having jurisdiction in the locality of the debtor.

The petition should not be presented elsewhere. The locality of the debtor is defined by subsection (y) as follows:

> "locality of a debtor," whether a bankrupt or assignor, means
> (i) the principal place where the debtor has carried on business during the year immediately preceding the date of the presentation against him of a bankruptcy petition or the making by him of an authorized assignment;
> (ii) the place where the debtor has resided during the year immediately preceding the date of the presentation against him of a bankruptcy petition or the making by him of an authorized assignment; or
> (iii) in cases not coming within (i) or (ii), the place where the greater portion of the property of such debtor is situate;

Let us consider the case submitted by the hon. member for Richelieu. We will suppose that the debtor is a merchant residing in Gaspe, and that his property is there. If the bankruptcy district has been subdivided into divisions he cannot be summoned before any court other than the court having jurisdiction in the bankruptcy division in which Gaspe is located.

Mr. CARDIN: What is that division according to the recent decision of the court of appeal and the Supreme Court? It is the whole province of Quebec.

Mr. HACKETT: No.

Mr. FERLAND: Supposing a man who could not be summoned other than in the judicial district of Gaspe goes to Montreal and makes a voluntary assignment; that could not be prevented and he would be entitled to have the assignment heard before the courts of Montreal.

Mr. HACKETT: Jurisdiction must be considered from two points of view. There is jurisdiction ratione materiae which deals with substance. The circuit court in Montreal, the jurisdiction of which is limited to $100, would not be competent, even with the consent of all parties to adjudicate upon a case in which more than $100 was involved. Secondly, there is jurisdiction ratione personae, which has to do with parties to litigation. The court may be competent to deal with the subject matter of litigation but have no jurisdiction over the parties to it because of an accident of residence, but that can be overcome by consent. I may be able to bring an action in Montreal against a person domiciled in Gaspe and it is perfectly competent for the man in Gaspe to submit himself to the jurisdiction of the Montreal courts.

Mr. DUPUIS: Even against the will of the creditors?

Mr. HACKETT: I am talking about consent.

Mr. DUPUIS: Consent means the consent of both parties.

Mr. HACKETT: The consent of both parties.

Mr. DUPUIS: The interested parties. The hon. member for Joliet (Mr. Ferland) did not submit that case; he submitted the case of an assignee who wanted to assign in Montreal against the will of his creditors.

Mr. HACKETT: I was endeavouring to make clear to the committee that the jurisdiction of the courts depends both upon the substance of the litigation and the parties to it. In this latter instance, the lack of jurisdiction may be overcome by consent. A gentleman from Gaspe may see fit to come to Montreal and make an abandonment of his property in Montreal, and if no person was prejudiced thereby or did not take exception to it, the courts undoubtedly could deal with the case.

Let me come back to the question as propounded by the hon. member for Richelieu. From the point of view of the superior court the province of Quebec is divided into about twenty-one judicial districts. From the point of view of the Bankruptcy Act, the province of Quebec is one district, divided into twelve divisions. In each division there is a court, an official receiver, a registrar and all the agencies and machinery necessary to carry out the act. If the hon. gentleman will turn to section 160 of the Bankruptcy Act, I think he will find that even though it be desirable to do what the hon. member for Gaspe suggests in his bill should be done, it would not be wise or necessary to do it by legislation because under that section of the act bankruptcy divisions may be created by order in council. The section is in the following terms:

> Each province of Canada shall constitute for the purposes of this act, one bankruptcy district, but the governor in council may divide any such bankruptcy district into two or more bankruptcy divisions, and name or number them.

If it is expedient to re-subdivide the province into twenty odd bankruptcy divisions to coincide with the judicial districts, all that need be done is to pass another order in council. An amendment to the Bankruptcy Act is not necessary.

Mr. DUPUIS: Has the committee done anything in this bill to overcome the judgment of the supreme court which decides that a man may assign anywhere in the whole province of Quebec?

Mr. HACKETT: I fear my hon. friend is under some misapprehension. I have endeavoured to point out that the jurisdiction of the courts may be in some instances a matter of agreement; if a bankrupt from a remote part of the province wishes to go to make an abandonment in Montreal and nobody takes exception, I fail to see the objection as the Montreal court has jurisdiction in matters of that nature.

Mr. BRASSET: The effect of my bill was to force the creditor to take bankruptcy proceedings in the district where the debtor resides, but under the judgment of the supreme court the creditor may take proceedings in any division of the province, which is what my bill sought to avoid.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is there any clause in this bill which allows a creditor, in the case of a debtor assigning in another district, to bring him back to his own district? Suppose a man assigned in Montreal and resided in Gaspe, is there any clause in the bill which allows the creditor to bring him back to his own district, not necessarily the majority of the creditors but a few creditors or one?

Mr. HACKETT: I do not know of any clause in the bill which would permit a bankrupt whose locality was Gaspe to make an assignment in Montreal in the absence of unanimous consent.

Mr. BRASSET: We do not want it to be by unanimous consent. We can do anything by unanimous consent. We want the creditor to be forced to take proceedings in the district where the debtor resides. That was the object of my bill. At present a debtor may reside in Gaspe and the creditor take proceedings in Montreal or Hull, or any other place in the province of Quebec. I think it is only fair that the creditor should be forced to take proceedings in the district where the debtor resides because, otherwise, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the creditor will take proceedings in Montreal or the city of Quebec, and a debtor residing in Gaspe, for instance, will have to come to Montreal or Quebec. That is an injustice which we want to avoid.

Mr. HACKETT: What was the name of the case in which that judgment was given?

Mr. BRASSET: I do not remember the name of the case, but there was a judgment to that effect. Perhaps the hon. member for Richelieu may remember the name.

Mr. CARDIN: I do not remember the name of the case, but it was that of a man residing in Roberval, and he was forced to go to Montreal.

Mr. HACKETT: Is it the Lauzon case?

Mr. CARDIN: The case came before the court of appeal. Both the supreme court and the court of appeal decided that "division" and "district" in the bankruptcy law meant the whole province and that a man from the district of Gaspe, for instance, could be brought to Hull and have his assets dealt with there.

Mr. HACKETT: I think it would be well to see just exactly what this judgment does say.

Mr. CARDIN: I am surprised that it escaped the attention of my hon. friend.

Mr. HACKETT: I was waiting for the hon. member for Richelieu to give me the name of the case.

Mr. DUPUIS: Was not that case discussed in the committee?

Mr. HACKETT: There is another point which was made by the hon. member for Richelieu with regard to the farmers. The committee heard many witnesses. One of them was Mr. Lalonde, the president of L'Union Catholique des Cultivateurs de la province de Quebec. Another was the Minister of Agriculture for the province of Quebec. They were supported by many other witnesses and there was absolute unanimity in their request that the law do no longer apply to farmers. There again there was a misapprehension. The law even now does not apply to farmers, in the sense that nobdy can put a farmer into bankruptcy. That has always been the law. However, it was competent to any insolvent farmer whose liabilities under the act exceeded five hundred dollars to go into bankruptcy. The Minister of Agriculture for the province, as well as Mr. Lalonde and a host of other witnesses testified that the fact that many farmers had gone into bankruptcy had been prejudicial to the credit of the farmers of the province of Quebec. As a result of this unanimous testimony we are amending section nine of the act, and if this amendment becomes law it will no longer be competent for a farmer in the province of Quebec to become a bankrupt. The farming class in the province of Quebec now enjoy the right of going into bankruptcy. At the present time they cannot be put into bankruptcy, but they have the right to go into bankruptcy and they have explained that that right has been abused and used to their disadvantage. For those reasons they wished to yield it up. The bill as it stands at present meets their requests.

Mr. GIROUARD: Do I understand the chairman of the special committee to say that under the amendment brought in by this bill a creditor may force a farmer into bankruptcy?

Mr. HACKETT: No; he never could.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): What is the amendment?

Mr. GUTHRIE: To exclude the farmers of Quebec from the operation of the act.

Mr. HACKETT: I refer the hon. member to section 6 of the bill.

Mr. GIROUARD: So that no creditor can force a farmer into bankruptcy, and a farmer cannot go into bankruptcy himself.

Mr. HACKETT: No creditor could ever force a farmer into bankruptcy in any part of Canada. If the hon. member would refer to section 7 of the Bankruptcy Act he would find the following:

The provisions of this part shall not apply to wage earners or to persons engaged solely in farming or the tillage of the soil.

That is the law as it stands to-day, and as it has always stood. No one could force a farmer into bankruptcy, but a farmer could make an abandonment of his property for the advantage of his creditors. If this bill becomes law the farmer of the province of Quebec will have yielded up that right and will no longer be able to go into bankruptcy. If unable to pay his debts his property will be seized and sold, he cannot make an abandonment of his property, under article 853 of the code of civil procedure.

Mr. CASGRAIN: As in the old days.

Mr. FACTOR: Would the hon. member explain to the committee the need of a superintendent of bankruptcy, as provided in this section?

Mr. HACKETT: Bankruptcy is a law which seems to rest more on expediency than on morality.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Hear, hear.

Mr. HACKETT: It is a law which is imposed by discipline, it is a means of excising from the business life of the country the debtors who cannot pay their debts as they become due. Not only does it take from a man all his property, but it frees him from his liabilities.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member referred to the code of civil procedure of the province of Quebec under which a farmer could make an abandonment of his property. Does that article not apply to traders?

Mr. CASGRAIN: To traders only.

Mr. HACKETT: That is correct.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I make the interruption merely to have it clear.

Mr. HACKETT: Bankruptcy is a departure from the ordinary rules which apply to business, and to that extent it is open to very serious abuses. In some countries a bankrupt—in France, for instance—loses his political and civil rights, he cannot vote or hold public office. In England he is disqualified from sitting in parliament, and is placed in a category of discredit. In this country however it has been said that bankruptcy is sometimes a short road to affluence. In any event there have been abuses of bankruptcy legislation. Those abuses have been traced by investigating committees to improper alliances and understandings between trustees in bankruptcy and dishonest debtors and dishonest creditors. It has been suggested, by several bodies which have investigated these abuses, that if the trustee could be selected with greater care—care as to integrity, character, experience and business ability—and if he were licensed and came under the supervision and discipline of a superintendent, many abuses would disappear.

I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Richelieu that it is extremely difficult by legislation to make a man honest and honourable. It is not impossible however to exclude dishonest men from positions of trust. Under the bill no individual or corporation will be permitted to act as a trustee until he or it has been licensed by the Department of Finance. It will behoove the individual or the corporation to satisfy competent authorities that he or it is competent and reliable, and in every way suited for the work undertaken.

Mr. TURNBULL: I was one of the members of the special committee appointed to consider this bill, and as such I am one who is supposed to be a party to the unanimous report. For good and sufficient reasons, however, I was not present at the time the report was made, and I should like to say that there is one subsection in section 18 of the bill which worries me.

I could see the necessity for the appointment of a superintendent of bankruptcy if licensed trustees were to be required—and licensed trustees apparently were required by the people of the province of Quebec to remedy abuses which according to the evidence existed largely in that province—but I would be very sorry to see the growth of any large amount of departmental assistance to the superintendent, and would be very sorry to see any great extent of financial responsibility incurred. Hon. members will notice that subsection (3) (e) of section 18 in the bill states that the superintendent shall:

> (e) From time to time make or cause to be made such inspection of the administration of estates as he deems expedient.

Subsection (3) (g) of the same section provides that the superintendent must make an inspection or an examination when any complaints are made to him. It follows that subsection (e) must intend to go farther than merely inspecting or examining complaints. It must mean that the duty is cast upon the superintendent of his own initiative to keep some close and constant supervision over the administration of the estates. The keeping of a close and constant supervision over the administration of estates, even if qualified by the words "as he deems expedient" remembering that these estates are scattered all over Canada and are numerous, will mean the necessity of keeping a fairly substantial staff for the purpose of taking care of that supervision and inspection. For it is not merely supervision, it is inspection as well. This will impose upon estates the burden of paying the expenses of maintaining that staff. More than that, I fear that if in the very unusual event of anything going wrong with an estate whereby money might be lost to the creditors or to the debtor, the existence of this section may lead to demands being made upon the government for reimbursement to the estate of any loss incurred through alleged failure to inspect the estate as often as it should have been inspected. We had an experience of that on a very large scale when the Home Bank failed. The claim was immediately made that because of failure to inspect the property and keep close track of the records of the bank, the government was under an obligation to reimburse those who had lost money by the failure; and a moral liability having been found a little later on, it cost the government a considerable amount of money. I fear that subsection (e) will cause the building up of a large establishment of civil servants—and hon. members who have had experience of the civil service know how easily and how quickly those staffs become increased—with a consequent additional burden on all estates in the country, and in addition a possible liability on the part of the government itself if some person should be of the view that a loss occurring to the estate was occasioned through failure on the part of the superintendent of bankruptcy to make such inspection as was reasonably necessary.

For that reason I should like the minister to consider the deletion of the subsection. I think what is required is sufficiently covered by subsection (g), that is the investigation of any complaint or anything that might be disclosed to the superintendent of bankruptcy as the result of reports filed in his office. If it should be found that that inspection is not sufficient, at a later date it would be very much easier to add to his powers than to give them to him now and so build up a staff that it will be difficult to reduce later. I very earnestly request the minister to make the powers of the superintendent as limited as possible at the present time, and add to them later on as occasion requires.

Mr. HACKETT: The hon. gentleman, as he admits, was absent from the committee when this aspect of the bill was discussed. It is estimated that there will not be more than one hundred trustees throughout Canada, and they will be pretty well localized in a few centres. Moreover, the necessity of a staff to carry out this work was gone into and an outside estimate of its cost was made. The committee came to the conclusion that the great weakness of the act was that nobody seemed to be responsible for its administration. The act contained a provision that its administration came under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Justice, and this seemed to be taken by the attorneys general in the different provinces as a sufficient reason for holding aloof from assisting in its enforcement.

My friend from Regina (Mr. Turnbull) has made some reference to a bank failure. The bank was not bonded. The trustee is not only bonded once, he is bonded twice. I doubt if the hazard he refers to exists; the provision making it the duty of the superintendent to investigate of his own initiative without notice and at all times will greatly fortify the administration of the act and make it much more effective. Another weakness of the act, as was pointed out in the evidence, was that so much—too much—was left to the initiative of the individual creditor, who is rather a helpless person; if one must wait until the horse has been stolen before locking the stable, it is too late, the reason for making the investigation will have disappeared.

Mr. TURNBULL: I think the remarks of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) have, at least in my view, strengthened my argument. If trustees are licensed, and if the superintendent of bankruptcy assumes his proper responsibility in seeing that only properly qualified trustees are appointed, and if those licensed trustees are twice bonded, and if they are compelled to make reports from time to time to the superintendent of bankruptcy in his office here in Ottawa, surely that should be sufficient to enable him to supervise his licensed trustees without the necessity of appointing a staff to go around from time to time and inspect, not the licensed trustees, but the administration of individual estates. It is not a question of inspecting one hundred licensed trustees it is a question of inspecting the administration of hundreds and thousands of estates, with all that imposes on the superintendent of bankruptcy. I would suggest that we try out the act on the basis of the minor authority first, in view of the fact that our licensed trustees are properly appointed, and that they are bonded with respect to their appointment and again with respect to the estate itself. Let us confine ourselves to investigating complaints, which after all involve the removal of any licensed trustee. Surely the investigation made by the superintendent of bankruptcy should be very largely confined to complaints against the officials whom he has licensed, so he can exercise his discretion as to whether the licences shall be continued or withdrawn. Any other course of inspection beyond a doubt is going to result in the building up of a very large and expensive staff at Ottawa under the superintendent of bankruptcy.

Mr. CARDIN: I think the fears of the hon. member for Regina are perfectly well justified, and he may rest assured that before long this is going to establish a very important bureau in Ottawa to deal with the Bankruptcy Act. He may also be assured of this, that the moment one creditor is dissatisfied with anything happening during the disposition of the assets of an insolvent debtor, he is going to make complaint at Ottawa and ask for a special investigation to be made by the superintendent. So the superintendent will be travelling all the time covering the whole of Canada, and to answer the requests coming every day to his department it will be necessary that he have an assistant, as well as accountants, stenographers and other officials. In the end it may very well be that in the event of loss to the creditors the government will be charged with responsibility because the supervising by the superintendent had not been efficient, and it will be urged that there is a moral responsibility on the government.

Now, may I be permitted to refer to the case I mentioned with regard to the fact that the province of Quebec is being considered as one district under this bill, and that a man residing in the county of Gaspe may be forced to come to Hull or to Bryson to answer the petition in bankruptcy. The case was decided in the court of appeal of Quebec and the decision was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Canada in 1927. I refer to the case of Boilly v. McNulty. The debtor was residing in Roberval, in the extreme east end of Quebec, and he was brought to Montreal. This is the decision of the supreme court:

> Held, that the superior court sitting in bankruptcy at Montreal had jurisdiction. According to section 63, subsection 1 (d) of the Bankruptcy Act, the court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy matters in the province of Quebec is the superior court of the province, and according to section 64, subsection 5 of the act, each province of Canada shall constitute for the purpose of this act one bankruptcy district, so that the superior court, sitting in any provincial judicial district, has jurisdiction to hear a petition in bankruptcy served upon a debtor residing and doing business in any part of the province.

I think that is quite clear, and this interpretation absolutely confirms my contention. I think it time this situation was remedied and justice rendered to those living in the rural sections of Canada, more particularly in the province of Quebec. My hon. friend from Stanstead said that boards of trade, chambers of commerce and so on were in favour of these amendments. I have every respect for these organizations, but they are located in the big cities and it is only natural that they should look after their own interests. But they forget the interests of those living in the rural sections of the country. I do not blame these organizations for making these recommendations in order that these matters may be dealt with at their convenience. They are defending their own interests and protecting their own rights, but I think one of the duties of parliament is to look after the interests of all Canada and not to legislate only according to the will or the whim of these big organizations located in the large centres. The rural sections of Canada must be recognized and considered; they should not be deprived of their advantages and their rights.

It is not my intention to move any amendment, but I would ask the Minister of Justice and the government if they would not consider an amendment to provide that in the districts of Quebec, other than the cities of Montreal and Quebec, the clerk of the court should be appointed as trustee to administer the affairs of insolvent debtors. That would save a large amount of money to the creditors. This official of the court could deal with the matter much better than it could be dealt with by any other trustee who might be appointed. The clerk has legal knowledge as well as a knowledge of conditions in the district in which he lives, so he would be in a very good position to dispose of the assets of an insolvent debtor. This would ensure the application of the Bankruptcy Act in a very proper way. That man would be an official of the court; he would know how to deal with legal matters, and he would be dealing with them in his official capacity. This would not greatly increase his duties, because after all there is not very much to do when a trustee or liquidator wants to dispose of an insolvent business quickly; that can be done in a very short time. The delay in the past has been caused by the trustees themselves, who have had many matters accumulate in their offices, and who must adjust everything else in order to leave themselves free to look after one particular matter. So I think if the clerk of the court could be appointed as trustee it would be a very great improvement and a relief to the creditors, because they would be sure that no creditor would have an advantage over the others. At the present time the trustees are appointed by the creditors, and when a trustee is appointed because of the support he receives from a certain number of creditors it is only natural that he should be inclined to be nice to the creditors who supported him as against those who opposed his appointment.

Another point is that if the clerk of the court were appointed you would keep in these bankruptcy affairs the judicial character that should be preserved. After all, it is purely and simply a judicial matter; it is not a business proposition. It concerns the division of the assets of a debtor among his creditors according to their claims, and this must be done in fairness and in justice to all. It is a judicial proceeding in its very character. That being so, why not place the whole business in the hands of an officer of the court of the district in which the debtor carried on his affairs? I repeat that it would cost much less than it will cost under the system which has been evolved up to this time and which is being perpetuated by the amendments with which we are dealing; so I earnestly plead with the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister to consider that aspect of the case, to see if it would not be possible, without delaying the passing of the measure too long, to permit the appointment of the clerk of the superior court as trustee. We have been speaking of boards of trade and chambers of commerce. I feel sure that these organizations will not object to this change. They should feel much more secure if the whole business is placed in the hands of an officer of the court, so I respectfully but earnestly submit this suggestion to the government.

Mr. HACKETT: It is unfortunate that the hon. member did not attend some of the meetings of this special committee, where it was made clear by the evidence that the functions of the trustee are not judicial. They are commercial and financial. It is necessary that the trustee be acquainted with business and business methods to realize the largest amount possible on the assets. A person who acts as trustee must have business connections and business experience. Furthermore, it was established that in the United States, where for some years they have caused bankrupt estates to be administered in the manner suggested by the hon. member for Richelieu, they have been forced within the last two years to abandon that method. They have found that the court officials are incapable of dealing with large commercial and financial matters in which they have no training.

Mr. CARDIN: The trustees that are going to be appointed are not experienced men.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then they should not be appointed.

Mr. HACKETT: That is why we are going to license them.

Mr. CARDIN: But if you appoint as trustee a man who is expert in one line of business he will not be expert in some other line; he may be quite competent in one line and know nothing whatever about another line of business. He may be competent to deal with the class of goods left by one insolvent debtor and he may be utterly incompetent to deal with some other class left by some other debtor. What is the use of experience of this sort? To a certain extent they will have to deal with distressed goods. Now what is the duty of the trustee? It is to take possession of the goods which are left and to make a valuation of them. Well, is he going to carry out that duty himself? Are the trustees going to do this work themselves? No. They will hire the services of some other person to take an inventory of the goods and make a valuation of them. They will not do this themselves. So that they do not need to have special qualifications in the line of business in which the insolvent debtor was engaged. The valuation of the goods is made by some hired man or firm, and the goods are afterwards sold by auction or privately. You do not need great experience in business to dispose of distressed goods which have been left by an insolvent creditor and which have to be sold either by auction or privately. Under the circumstances, therefore, I do not see why it should be necessary to have so highly qualified a business man appointed as trustee. As a matter of fact, he will not use his experience and his knowledge because he cannot personally go and make the inventory or the valuation; as I say, he has to hire someone. The court can do that just as well. The court can hire the services of some man in the locality, and that would be a good deal less costly than having the valuation made by some man coming up from Montreal. The man in the locality would be perfectly familiar with the conditions there; he would understand quite well the conditions of the trade in which the insolvent debtor was engaged, and therefore these duties could be carried out as properly and efficiently by an officer of the court.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am always ready to give the greatest consideration to any suggestion that emanates from my hon. friend from Richelieu.

Mr. CARDIN: I appreciate that and I thank the minister for the compliment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I must say, however, that my own view is that the proposal to appoint clerks and registrars of the courts is not as sound as it might appear to be. My experience in my own province of the registrars and clerks of the various courts would lead me to the conclusion that they are about the least proper officials to appoint as trustees in bankruptcy. I do not know of any class of persons who, I would say, were less adapted for this purpose than the clerks and registrars of the various courts of Ontario. Then there is this other point to be considered. These clerks and registrars are appointed for specific purposes, and their time is supposed to be fully occupied in their present positions in the courts. The object of this amendment has been to secure as far as possible men best adapted to act as trustees, and the positions have been surrounded with every reasonable safeguard. They have to be licensed, and only men who are deemed proper for the purpose will obtain licences. Not until then will they be appointed.

Mr. CARDIN: We had that system a few years ago and it was abandoned.

Mr. CASGRAIN: We had it up to 1923.

Mr. CARDIN: Up to 1923, as the hon. member says, we had the system of licensed trustees and it was abandoned.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We have the system pretty well safeguarded in the amendment which is now before the committee, and if this amendment carries the result will be that we shall obtain as trustees in this important field men who will be far ahead of those whom we have had under any former system. They will be men better adapted to wind up estates. Personally I think we should try out the proposal reported by the committee. It may be that it will have to be changed at some time in the future, but I very much prefer this system, speaking for myself, to the proposal now made by my hon. friend from Richelieu, and I am basing that statement simply on my own experience of court officials whom I know. I do not think they would be well adapted to act as trustees in these cases, nor do I think that they should be asked to do so for the reason that they have already certain duties to perform in the positions they now occupy. However, I am willing to give the matter further consideration. I understand from the hon. member for Stanstead that the committee viewed the proposal from every angle and there was practically no division on this question. Their endeavour was to secure the very best kind of trustee at the least possible expense, to safeguard the interests of both creditor and debtor, and to see that every dollar could be obtained for those who were entitled to receive money. After considering the question very carefully and hearing the evidence submitted both pro and con, I regard this clause as the considered opinion of the committee, and I should hesitate very much to depart from their report unless very good cause were shown.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is there any reason why bankruptcy proceedings should not be taken in the judicial district in which the debtor lives?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Giving my own opinion, I would say at the moment that I see no particular reason why they should not. But in the case that has been discussed this morning, so far as I heard the brief synopsis given by my hon. friend, the supreme court merely decided that each province constituted a bankruptcy district and that the superior court of the province had jurisdiction in bankruptcy and could entertain a petition in bankruptcy. I assume that this is correct, that the superior court could entertain a petition in bankruptcy. I do not know whether it has been called to the attention of my hon. friend or not, but we have a new subsection, subsection 8 of section 17 of the bill, intended to meet difficulties which may arise through inconvenience and so on. That provision reads:

> (8) Notwithstanding the provisions of this act, when the debtor resides or carries on business at a distance far removed from the nearest licensed trustee, the court or the official receiver may, having regard as far as the court or official receiver deems just to the wishes of the creditors, appoint a responsible person residing in the locality of the debtor as custodian, and such person shall be eligible to be appointed by the creditors as trustee and shall, for the purposes of the administration of the estate of such debtor, have all the powers of a licensed trustee under this act and thereupon the provisions of this act shall apply to such person as if he had been duly licensed hereunder.

It was to meet inconvenience and difficulty that that clause was inserted. The court has power to meet the situation by employing a local person to take charge of the estate, to act as trustee and to perform all duties provided the creditors are not prejudiced. I think that that goes a long way to meet the objections.

Mr. CARDIN: I think it is only fair and reasonable, in view of the judgment of the supreme court and other judgments which have been given in the province of Quebec, that it should be made plain that the affairs of the insolvent will be dealt with in the judicial district in which he resides. I can see the force of the argument of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) in connection with subsection 8 of section 17, but anyone reading that subsection in the light of past experience, or anyone reading between the lines, must realize that a man outside of the large districts will be appointed only if the creditors living within the large districts are satisfied with him. That is what will occur. I refer again to my first observation, that the creditors in the large cities may be important from the point of view of the amounts involved, but from the point of view of the number of creditors, they are generally to be found in the rural sections, especially when the bankrupt was carrying on business there. I should like to refer to the case of Dubuc versus Bergeron, reported at page 217, volume 37 of La Revue Legale. In this instance two petitions were filed on the same day, one at Chicoutimi and the other at Montreal. The insolvent debtor was living in Chicoutimi but the court decided that proceedings should be carried on in Montreal. Such proceedings should not be possible; it is about time that a condition of this kind was corrected.

I should like to refer to the abuses which have existed in the past and which will exist in the future even with the proposed amendments in connection with trustees. I should like to translate a letter written by a man who desired to be appointed a trustee. This letter is dated in 1931 and the translation is as follows:

> Seeing by the reports that one of your creditors is about to sue you, we take this opportunity of offering our services without any obligation on your part or without any payment. If you desire an extension of time, a compromise or an arrangement with your creditors, we are at your service and we can stop immediately all proceedings and unjustified costs. Please fill out and return to us the blank which is enclosed.

That is an example of the action taken by certain people desiring to be appointed as trustees. They endeavour to induce people to take advantage of the bankruptcy law. Even if trustees are licensed I contend that they will continue to act as they have in the past and try to induce people to go into bankruptcy in order that they may be appointed as trustees.

Mr. HACKETT: That would be an offence now.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I agree that a man who would write such a letter would be disqualified from being appointed trustee.

Progress reported.

At one o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: By consent the house will revert to presenting reports by select standing committees.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Fifth report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Matthews.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand) presented the fifth report of the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization, as follows:

> The select standing committee on agriculture and colonization, beg leave to present the following as its fifth report:
>
> Your committee has had under consideration the following order of reference, dated Tuesday, March 15, 1932.
>
> Tuesday, March 15, 1932.
> Ordered,—That the report of the committee on grain standards for the crop year 1931-32, in so far as it relates to garnet wheat be referred to the said committee, with instructions that the whole subject be inquired into carefully and that the said committee shall have power to call for witnesses, papers and documents and to report to the house its findings.
>
> Attest. Arthur Beauchesne,
> Clerk of the House.
>
> Your committee, in view of the evidence presented before them, a printed copy of which is herewith presented to the house, present the following recommendations:
> Your committee recommend that the Canada Grain Act be amended to make, operative for the crop year 1933-34, the recommendation of the western grain standards board, in so far as it relates to the grading of garnet wheat as contained in the annual report of the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada for the year 1931. Provided that the said amendment shall have force and effect for the crop year 1933-34, unless the said board shall, after giving due consideration to the evidence given before your committee and conditions then existing, establish standards for the grading of garnet wheat for the said crop year, different from the standards recommended by the said report of 1931.

Your committee further recommend that one thousand copies of this report and the evidence on which it is based be printed in blue book form for distribution to the growers of garnet wheat so that they may be more fully advised of the intended change in the Canada Grain Act.

CONVERSION LOAN

STATEMENT BY THE HON. MEMBER FOR SHERBROOKE

Mr. CHARLES B. HOWARD (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, in connection with my remarks as reported at page 1994 of Hansard to which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) referred this morning, I have re-read the remarks and I do not see anything wrong with the statement I made, but in view of the fact that some hon. members of this house might attach to my remarks a meaning different from that intended I wish to state that I did not in any way impute wrong-doing to any member of the cabinet or to any member of the house.

DISTRIBUTION OF SEED GRAIN

Mr. LAFLECHE (Richmond-Wolfe) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), in doing so, I must read a letter on which the question is based.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Louder!

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): May I, sir, read to the house the correspondence exchanged between the hon. Adélard Godbout, Minister of Agriculture for the province of Quebec, and myself. This correspondence refers to the distribution of seed grain in Quebec. On May 10, last, I wrote the following letter to the hon. Mr. Godbout:

Hon. Adélard Godbout,
Minister of Agriculture,
Quebec.
Dear Mr. Godbout: . . .

Mr. LAPOINTE: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I ask under what rule or authority the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe (Mr. Laflèche) is communicating to the house correspondence between himself and the Minister of Agriculture for the province of Quebec?

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe is not in order in making his statement at this time. The house has reverted to motions by consent for the purpose of allowing a certain procedure to take place. I would therefore ask the hon. member to defer his statement until the orders of the day are called at a future sitting, when it might be in order for him to proceed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION OF ELEVEN O'CLOCK RULE

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I should like to intimate to the house that I have communicated with the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) and he informs me that members of his group have made arrangements that would preclude them from being in attendance on Saturday. I suggested that possibly we might sit beyond eleven o'clock until eleven thirty or twelve to-night and to-morrow night if that were acceptable to the other members of the house, and he said he thought that might be managed. If it is acceptable to the house I would make a motion accordingly.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): As far as we are concerned, it is most acceptable. I am only sorry that we do not sit on Saturday.

Mr. BENNETT: Then with the consent of the house I move, Mr. Speaker, that the eleven o'clock rule do not apply to-day or to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

BANKRUPTCY ACT AMENDMENT

The house again in committee on Bill No. 41, to amend the Bankruptcy Act—Mr. Guthrie—Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Mr. CARDIN: To sum up the observations which were made this morning I beg to move that the present bill be amended by adding the following to paragraph (y) in section 2 of the Bankruptcy Act, chapter 11 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, as subparagraph (iiii):

in the province of Quebec the judicial district wherein the debtor carries on his business as defined by the statutes of the province of Quebec.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that according to the information before me section 2 has already passed.

Mr. CARDIN: In order to expedite business, Mr. Chairman, we have been discussing the whole bill on section 2. The object of the amendment I have moved is to define the word "locality" in the bankruptcy act, and so far as the province of Quebec is concerned, if this amendment is agreed to, "locality" will mean the judicial district, as established by the statutes of the province of Quebec, in which the debtor was carrying on his business.

Mr. GAGNON: What section of the bill is my hon. friend proposing to amend?

Mr. CARDIN: I am moving my amendment as section 2 (a) of the present bill to make it clear that the locality of a debtor is the territory comprising the judicial district in which he is carrying on his business.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How many judicial districts are there in the province of Quebec?

Mr. CARDIN: Twenty, I think.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Although I am inclined to agree on general principles with my hon. friend from Richelieu, I would like to ask him if he has considered all the circumstances that may arise. As the law is now, the judges of the superior court in the province of Quebec, which is the court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy, reside, with the exception of Three Rivers and Sherbrooke, where they have resident judges, in two districts only, Montreal and Quebec city, and they are assigned by the Chief Justice in Montreal and by the Chief Justice in Quebec city alternately, according to the needs of the various districts. It may very well happen that at the moment the petition for bankruptcy should be presented there is no judge in the district. Celerity in cases of this kind is necessary. Procedure has to be swift, because if it is necessary to wait weeks there will be no assets left for the creditors. I am afraid that if a strict amendment or provision such as the one proposed by my hon. friend is enacted the parties will suffer because it will be impossible to act quickly in bankruptcy proceedings.

Mr. SULLIVAN: Unless the same rights and privileges might be given to the clerk or registrar of the court.

Mr. CARDIN: In most cases, already, according to our code of civil procedure, the registrar or the clerk has all the powers of a judge in chambers. The important factor is not the hearings of the petition, but the service. We do not need a judge in the town of Sorel to have a petition in bankruptcy served on a debtor. The petition may be served without the judge in attendance; it comes before the judge only when there is contestation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: While the estate is in the hands of the trustees all sorts of procedures arise and have to be dealt with quickly.

Mr. CARDIN: If in the province of Quebec judicial districts, trustees, or persons authorized to act as such, are appointed, I think the difficulties will be overcome. It is always easy to have a judge in any locality the judges visit at certain periods named by the chief justice. When there is a special matter which must be attended to quickly it is very easy to get in touch with the chief justice and have a judge sent to the district in question. That, therefore, would not be a serious objection.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): A judge of the superior court is always assigned to one judicial district for a fixed period, sometimes as long as a year. For example a petition in bankruptcy can be granted in the city of Montreal against a debtor residing in Chicoutimi. To-day the law in the province of Quebec enables a judge in Montreal to grant a petition for the district to which he is assigned, and his judgment has the same effect as if it had been rendered at the court house in Chicoutimi.

Mr. CARDIN: I thank the hon. member for St. Henri for directing my attention to that point. Any urgent matter which arises in the county of Richelieu can be attended to in the city of Montreal by a judge assigned to the county of Richelieu. There can be no difficulty therefore so far as that is concerned. The petition can be served in the absence of the judge, and if any procedure is to be taken to prevent the disposition of the assets of the insolvent, it can be attended to in the city of Montreal by the judge assigned to the district. Therefore all interests are protected.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If I understand correctly, I am afraid the suggestion will rather complicate the operation of the Bankruptcy Act. This act has been drawn in pursuance of the idea that there were in the province of Quebec twelve bankruptcy divisions. The whole province of Quebec is divided into twelve divisions, whereas the judicial districts number some twenty or twenty-one. If proceedings can be taken in any one of the twenty-one judicial districts where a debtor may reside it is going to upset the whole machinery in regard to the twelve divisions already established. I am afraid it would alter a great deal of the framework of the act. The other point I wish to mention to the committee is that I am aware of the force of what has been said by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) with regard to the present judicial districts. I am officially aware of the fact that in many of these districts for considerable periods of time there was no judge in attendance. Consequently complaints came to the Department of Justice in regard to that matter. I forwarded these complaints to the attorney general of the province of Quebec who now has the matter under consideration to see if the present system cannot be improved. I can imagine however that great difficulty could arise by reason of the fact that there is no judge in the particular district at the time he is required. My own view of the whole matter is that while we want to convenience the public in every way possible, the first consideration should be the convenience of creditors. They are the ones most interested, and in the majority of cases the whole of the estates belong to them. The next interest certainly is that of the debtor. Under certain conditions, if he has made an honest assignment and conducted his affairs honestly he may obtain a discharge from future liability. Certainly the convenience of those two parties should be consulted.

I am asking the committee however to let us try out this proposal. This scheme has not come forward without consideration or thought. It has been fully considered, and we believe we have now before us a scheme which will improve the administration of the law, particularly in the province of Quebec where the chief difficulty seems to have arisen. Why not try out this scheme for one or two years and see what, if any, defects may develop in that time. If there is any hardship or any very serious inconvenience in the operation of the act as now proposed, there will be an opportunity to amend it. I should not like however to mix up the twelve bankruptcy divisions as they now exist in the province of Quebec with the twenty-one judicial districts, because I think it will lead to untold difficulties.

Mr. CARDIN: May I say to the minister that there is no such thing as twelve bankruptcy divisions in the province of Quebec. They do not exist.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Do they not?

Mr. CARDIN: They have not been established, so there would be no interference created. With reference to the respective arguments advanced by hon. members attacking and supporting this measure, I may say I am not speaking particularly for the debtors. I, as well as the minister speak for the creditors. I speak particularly however, for those creditors in the smaller centres who most of the time are incapable of having their claims satisfied or properly considered. Most of them have not the means to travel long distances. They cannot go from Rimouski to the city of Montreal to dispose of a little claim involving $50 or $100. For that reason most of the small claims in the rural districts are lost; they are abandoned because the people interested are not in a position to fight in the city of Montreal or other distant centres. This amendment would not upset in any way the operation of the act or the amendments which are being considered. It simply means that an insolvent debtor doing business in Chicoutimi cannot be taken to Bryson to answer a petition in bankruptcy. When a creditor brings an action against a debtor he is bound to take proceedings in the district in which the debtor resides. That principle is just and fair; but when it comes to bankruptcy the principle is ignored and the insolvent debtor may be put to the expense of meeting his creditors at the other end of the province. The same system applies in Ontario: an insolvent debtor here can be forced to go to Windsor to answer a petition in bankruptcy, for the Supreme Court of Canada has decided that a province means a division, and that the locality of the insolvent debtor means the province in which he resides. I say that is ridiculous and should be changed.

Mr. GOBEIL: Can the insolvent debtor go of his own free will and make an assignment?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, he can do the same thing.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. GOBEIL: Some lawyers say "yes" and some say "no." I should like to have the situation cleared up.

Mr. CARDIN: If an insolvent debtor desires to do that it is very easy for him to have one of his creditors present a petition against him at any place where he wants to go.

An hon. MEMBER: That is different.

Mr. CARDIN: That can be done very easily, in fact a man can assign anywhere; he has only to scheme with a friend to present the necessary petition. I think this should not be permitted when we are attempting to prevent corrupt practices on the part of insolvent debtors, and we should see to it that the bankruptcy proceedings are conducted among the people with whom the debtor has been transacting his business. He will be much more embarrassed there where all his actions will be under review than in Montreal where no one will know what has been going on. I think it is only fair that the territorial jurisdiction should be preserved. It may be objected that the province of Quebec has much to say. I do not care what the province did on other occasions in the field of its activities, but here we have the power, without consulting the province of saying that in so far as bankruptcy is concerned the locality of the debtor means the judicial district in which he has been living and carrying on his business.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Does not my hon. friend think that subsection (8) of section 17—a new section—will avoid all the inconvenience and difficulty which he has now expressed?

Mr. CARDIN: No, that would not cover the point raised by my hon. friend from Compton (Mr. Gobeil); it would not prevent a debtor making an assignment anywhere he wanted to.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Suppose he did, that is not the trouble. The trouble is the administration after the assignment—the meeting of creditors and, the winding up of the estate; the court can direct all that to be done in the local district or at any point it deems fit under subsection (8). The making of the assignment is a preliminary act before a judge, it matters not whether in Montreal, or Quebec. or anywhere else if he has the necessary authority; then takes place the meeting of creditors, the appointing of a trustee and the winding up of the estate, and under the new paragraph which has been introduced into this bill all that can be done in the immediate home of the debtor.

Mr. CARDIN: That is not the case covered by subsection (8); not at all. That case applies to localities far distant from the place where there is a trustee.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No. The court may "appoint a responsible person residing in the locality."

Mr. CARDIN: No. "Notwithstanding the provisions of this act, when the debtor resides or carries on business at a distance far removed from the nearest licensed trustee—"

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. CARDIN: Well, that is not the case we have in mind.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I thought that was the difficulty you were picturing.

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. CARDIN: No. Under the present law we may have a licensed trustee in Sorel, and an insolvent debtor in Sorel can be brought to Montreal by his creditors, notwithstanding subsection (8).

Mr. GUTHRIE: If a majority of the creditors so decide should they not have the right to say where the meeting of creditors shall be held?

Mr. CARDIN: If you say majority in number, that may be true to a certain extent; but if you say the majority so far as the amount of claims is concerned, you might as well admit that the meetings will always be in Montreal or Quebec. The largest creditors are always in those cities, but the greatest number of creditors are usually to be found in the locality in which the debtor resides. So it is no great protection to say "if the creditors wish." We all know by experience what that means. It is by the creditors' wish that the people of Chicoutimi and Gaspe have been taken to Montreal. It is by the creditors' wish that a debtor or small creditor can be taken from one end of the province to the other. We all know the strength and influence of our financial organizations in the big cities. If you place the debtor and his small creditors in the rural sections in the hands of the board of trade and the chamber of commerce in Montreal or Quebec, you need not fear that any of the bankruptcy proceedings are going to be conducted in the other sections of the province. It is to prevent that practice and to protect the small creditors that we ask that the bankruptcy proceedings be transacted in the rural section where the debtor and most of his creditors reside. Why be afraid of going to the county of Gaspe and settling the affairs of the bankrupt? The judges are the same.

Mr. GUTHRIE: All that will be done if the court thinks it is proper to do so.

Mr. CARDIN: It cannot be done. It will not be done.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend must be reasonable.

Mr. CARDIN: I submit the power is not there.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): If my client has a claim of over $500 against an insolvent debtor living in Chicoutimi, I draw a petition and the assignment is made right away. I do not need to have a meeting of creditors, I simply serve him with a petition to appear in Montreal. How could you apply subsection (8) to that?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Subsection (8) relates to the winding up and administration of the estate, not to the presentation of the petition. That is within the jurisdiction of the superior court of the hon. member's province and I can understand a judge sitting in Montreal or in Hull having the same jurisdiction. But that is only a formal application. We will assume it is granted. Then the machinery is put in motion to wind up the estate, the meeting of creditors and the like takes place, and under subsection (8), as now proposed, all that can be done in the immediate locality of the debtor, if the judge of the court so directs.

Mr. CARDIN: If my hon. friend is correct, if all that we ask is practically covered by subsection (8) of section 17—

Mr. GUTHRIE: All except the formal presentation of the petition.

Mr. CARDIN: If that is the case, why not make it clear and definite by the amendment which I proposed.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This gives the judge the power to say so; that is the only thing.

Mr. CARDIN: But he will never say.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think that of the judges.

Mr. GAGNON: I should like to say that I think the hon. member for Richelieu is right; although I live in the city of Quebec I think it in the public interest that justice should be decentralized. I only regret that members of the rural bar, to which my hon. friend from Richelieu belongs, did not express their views before the committee; I feel confident that if this had been done the amendment now suggested by my hon. friend would have been accepted. Now we are taken by surprise, and possibly the views of my hon. friend will not be accepted. Nevertheless, I respectfully contend that the hon. gentleman is right, that it is absolutely against the interest of creditors in general for a debtor to be permitted to go sometimes two hundred or three hundred miles to make an assignment of his assets. On the other hand it is contended that in the large cities, such as Montreal and Quebec, there are more competent accountants who are experienced in the ways of winding up insolvent estates, but there is nothing to prevent such officers from going to the rural districts and establishing themselves in that business. On the whole, Mr. Chairman, I gladly support the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Richelieu.

Mr. JACOBS: What are the twelve bankruptcy divisions to which reference has been made?

Mr. HACKETT: May I preface my answer to that question by stating that the judgment of the supreme court, to which reference was made this morning, rests upon the finding that the power conferred by section 160 upon the governor in council to subdivide the province, which is called a bankruptcy district, into bankruptcy divisions was never exercised. The judgment in the case of Boilly versus McNulty, rendered by Mr. Justice Rinfret, is in the following words:

"Parliament authorized the Governor in Council to subdivide each province in two or more bankruptcy divisions, to give them a name and number, however this has not yet been done, except for the administration of the act by the official trustees."

I believe all trouble could be avoided, as well as the possibility of other judgments similar to that in the Boilly case, if the governor in council were to pass an order in council dividing the province of Quebec into twelve bankruptcy divisions.

Mr. JACOBS: That would get over the difficulty mentioned by the hon. member for Richelieu.

Mr. HACKETT: Yes. The order in council to which reference has been made was passed on August 25, 1923, and is in the following terms:

The minister, therefore, recommends that the bankruptcy districts of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia be divided, pursuant to the authority conferred by subsection 5 of section 64—

That was before the act was revised.

—of the Bankruptcy Act, for the purposes only of the administration therein of the said act by the official receivers. . . .

If another order in council were passed dividing the district into divisions for all purposes of the act I think everyone would be satisfied.

Mr. FACTOR: Is Ontario divided in that way?

Mr. HACKETT: In the same way.

Mr. JACOBS: How do you mean, in the same way; it has not been done in Quebec.

Mr. HACKETT: They are administering it in Ontario as though it had been subdivided only for the purposes of administration.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is it centralized in Ontario, as it is in Quebec?

Mr. HACKETT: Yes. Now, answering the question of the hon. member for Cartier, we find that there are twelve divisions in the province of Quebec. The first is Montreal, which includes the judicial districts of Montreal, Iberville, Richelieu, St. Hyacinthe, Terrebonne and Beauharnois. The second is Quebec, which includes the judicial districts of Quebec, Arthabaska, Montmagny and Beauce, including Anticosti. The third is the division of Rimouski, which is restricted to the judicial district of Rimouski. The fourth is Sherbrooke, which includes the districts of St. Francis and Bedford. The fifth is Three Rivers, which includes Three Rivers and Nicolet. The division of Hull includes Hull and Pontiac; Chicoutimi includes Chicoutimi and Saguenay; Joliette includes Joliette and Montcalm; Roberval includes only Roberval; Fraserville includes Kamouraska; New Carlisle includes Gaspe, and Amos includes Abitibi. So it will be seen that with the exception of the judicial districts which are in the immediate vicinity of Montreal and Quebec, almost every judicial district is a bankruptcy division. The locality of a debtor being in any such division, the debtor could not, once the suggested order in council had passed, be haled before the court of any other division.

Mr. JACOBS: Why should we not, by this legislation, restrict a debtor making an assignment in bankruptcy to the division in which his judicial district is located?

Mr. HACKETT: There are twenty-five judicial districts, I think, and it would mean that we would set up thirteen more courts, which would be a considerable expense. There would have to be thirteen more official receivers, thirteen more registrars and so on, involving a certain expense.

Mr. JACOBS: But the prothonotaries and court officials could act as registrars and other officers, as they do largely in Montreal. You would not have to set up any new machinery; the court house officials could function as bankruptcy officials.

Mr. GAGNON: I should like to add to the few remarks I made a moment ago. I have before me the judgment of the supreme court to which my hon. friend from Stanstead referred, and I think it would be well to ponder for a moment the facts of this case. A man from Roberval named Boilly received service of a petition in bankruptcy at Roberval, which is a superior court district and where a judge comes every month. Although that petition in bankruptcy was served on Boilly at Roberval, where the superior court sits as the bankruptcy court, the debtor was ordered to appear in Montreal, which is some five hundred miles from the district of Roberval. I observe from the few remarks referred to in that judgment that the majority of the creditors had their domicile or their place of business in the district of Roberval, although there were some large creditors living in Montreal. But the defendant, through his attorney, took exception and asked that the record from Montreal be sent back to Roberval where the debtor was living and where his assets were; and of course the superior court, the court of king's bench, and finally the supreme court, held that there was only one court of bankruptcy in the whole province of Quebec. In this regard Mr. Justice Rinfret says:

"Parliament authorized the Governor in Council to subdivide each province in two or more bankruptcy divisions, to give them a name and number, however this has not yet been done, except for the administration of the act by the official trustees."

This judgment was rendered in 1927, and the practice may have been altered since; but if it has not been altered then the judgment means that from 1927, although the order in council provides that there might be established more divisions of the court of bankruptcy throughout the province, there has been only one division. Therefore I think it is in the interests of the creditors themselves that the expenses in connection with the winding-up of estates be limited to the utmost. I contend that if a debtor were compelled to make assignment of his assets before the tribunal of his domicile, the cost of the assignment would be less exorbitant and therefore it would be in the interests of the creditors.

Mr. JACOBS: The cost of the assignment will be the same but the cost of travelling expenses will be very much higher. It is a question of the expenses incidental to travelling all these distances.

Mr. CARDIN: Travelling of whom?

Mr. JACOBS: The debtor.

Mr. GUTHRIE: He has his lawyer, and the mails are at his disposal. Then there is this safeguard, that the administration of the estate, if the judge thinks proper, will go back to his own locality.

Mr. GAGNON: In my view, the attorney general of the province of Quebec ought to present a demand to the Minister of Justice for the establishment of as many divisions in bankruptcy as there are divisions of the superior court, and I am sure the Minister of Justice will have no objection to deferring to the wishes of the attorney general of the province.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But there is another way. We do not need to ask the attorney general to intervene in that respect because we have power now to do it by order in council. The order in council, which was passed in 1923, provided for twelve divisions, though as passed it was limited. That is what Mr. Justice Rinfret points out in his judgment; it is limited for the purposes only of the administration therein of the act by the official receiver. Now, if we amended that order in council or repealed it, and passed a new one, we have power to create just as many districts by order in council as we see fit, and if it is the sense of the committee that there should be a number of districts equal to the number of judicial districts in the province of Quebec, that can be done by order in council. There is, however, extra expense in that. We have now twelve districts and if it is proposed to increase the number to twenty-five, that, as I say, is a matter that can be done at any moment by order in council.

Mr. JACOBS: The registrar or whoever gets fees out of the estate—

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not discussing the question of registrars, because I think the question of trustees is more important. If we have twelve districts properly established by order in council, we probably have enough; but if it is the sense of the house that the government should create more districts, it can be done by order in council. That order in council, however, is too limited according to the view of the supreme court, and for that reason they have held that practically there is only one district in the whole province.

Mr. DUPUIS: Will the effect of that order in council be to preclude the making af assignment in any other district? Will that be the result, since it is not amended by the act? In other words, will the order in council oblige the bankrupt to stay in the judicial district established thereunder?

Mr. CARDIN: No; that would create concurrent jurisdiction, that is all. In the district of Richelieu, for instance, it would give power to deal with the affairs of the insolvent debtor there, but that would not prevent a creditor in Montreal from forcing the debtor to go to that city. The jurisdiction will be there, but no one will take advantage of it if the matter rests in the hands of the creditors in Montreal and Quebec unless the law is amended to provide that all the affairs must be dealt with in the judicial district. There will be concurrent jurisdiction, but that will not prevent a man in one end of the province from compelling his debtor and the other creditors to go to the other end of the province. As I see it, that would offer no remedy.

Mr. HACKETT: It is not my desire to reiterate the argument I made this morning, but I would suggest to my hon. friend that he read the section of the law which provides that the petition must be presented to a court having jurisdiction in the locality of the debtor.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, but the supreme court has declared that the locality is the whole province.

Mr. HACKETT: That is because of the defect, or, if we do not like that word, the restriction in the order in council. The moment a new order in council is passed, dividing the district into subdivisions, then the only court which will have jurisdiction is the court in the locality of the debtor.

Mr. JACOBS: That is the logical theory: the debtor should assign in the locality where he resides. That is the theory of the law.

Mr. HACKETT: Certainly; that is a rough statement of the law. Locality of the debtor is the place where he resides; where he carries on business, or where he has his property.

Mr. CARDIN: If it is the opinion of the chairman of the committee and also the sense of the hon. the Minister of Justice that it is so, why not make it clear? Instead of passing an order in council, which is always uncertain and can be changed every month or almost every day, why not declare in the law that this shall be the practice? Why not make that clear?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not like making exceptions for one particular province unless I have to do so.

Mr. CARDIN: One has been made already in regard to farmers.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not approve of making more exceptions than are absolutely necessary. I can assure my hon. friend that the limitation or deficiency in the order in council of 1923 will be corrected and that bankruptcy divisions will be set up in accordance with the real meaning of the act. Section 2 (y) will be made to apply in such a way that the locality of the debtor shall be construed to be that particular bankruptcy section wherein he resides or carries on his business, as is stated in the subsection.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Has any person or any associations or chamber of commerce raised any objection to what my hon. friend from Richelieu is asking? If no one objects to it, I do not see why it should not be done.

Mr. DUPUIS: I concur fully with the opinion expressed by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) when he states that he does not like to make an exception in the case of one particular province. Although this matter is brought up on behalf of the province of my origin, I do not like it myself but still if it is good for the citizens of Quebec I do not see why it would not be equally good for the citizens of the other provinces.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Perhaps we had better take the opinion of the committee on this matter. I have no particular wish one way or the other on the subject but I think we should accept the report of the committee.

On section 29—Remuneration of trustee.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): In my opinion, the fees in these matters are too high. The cost of stamps and everything is too great and nothing remains in the estate. A lawyer may be representing three hundred creditors and when the proceedings have been completed, nothing is left for the creditors.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Experience has proven that the cost of the administration of these estates is far too high, and I am inclined to think that that applies to the province of Quebec more than it does to any other province, although complaints have been received from all over Canada. That is one of the objects we have in view in the appointment of a superintendent. The question of law stamps has been raised in many quarters but I think this matter depends upon the laws of the various provinces. One of the main objects of this revision is to see if it is not possible to reduce the cost of the administration of estates, and with that end in view limitations have been placed upon trustees and inspectors who will be subject to the supervision of the superintendent when he is appointed. I hope that this bill will work a saving for many of the estates.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): The tariff is to be arranged by the department?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The tariff is to be framed by the department.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Will consideration be given to the views of merchants and manufacturers?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The department is to frame the tariff of costs and fees.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): In order to obtain permission to sell goods or to move them from one warehouse to another, a fee of $5 must be paid.

Mr. HACKETT: If my hon. friend has the patience to read the evidence he will discover why this is so.

Mr. DUPUIS: Was the act amended for the better?

Mr. HACKETT: The trouble has arisen from the way the act has been interpreted.

Mr. DUPUIS: Restrict the interpretation.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The officials are taking advantage of the law.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): The department will have a tariff and it will control them.

On section 38—Restricted creditors.

Mr. HEENAN: I should like to make a few remarks in connection with the preferential treatment of wages and salaries. While this matter may not come under this particular section, perhaps I may be permitted to discuss it at this time. As I read the bill, wages and salaries come fourth in preference and I understood the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) to say last year when this matter was under discussion that when the bill was amended he would give a more preferential position to wages and salaries.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The wages are in a fairly good position now unless the estate is hopelessly bankrupt. The first claim is for the costs and expenses of winding up. The second is the costs of the first execution creditor; in other words, paying the amount to get the sheriff out of possession. Then comes the third preference:

All wages, salaries, commissions or compensation of any clerk, servant, travelling salesman, labourer or workman in respect of services rendered to the bankrupt or assignor during three months before the date of the receiving order or assignment.

So the wage-earner practically comes first, after payment of costs, but only for three months' salary or wages. That is the extent of the preference.

Sections 39 to 42 inclusive agreed to.

On section 43—Levy to be paid to the receiver general.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I propose to re-word this section, and to insert the following instead of the proposed 126A:

"126a. Notwithstanding anything contained in sections one hundred and twenty-one to one hundred and twenty-six both inclusive, there shall be payable to the receiver general, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the supervision by the superintendent, a levy on all payments made by the trustee, excepting the costs and expenses of the custodian, or interim receiver, and the fees and expenses of the trustee, and the costs of the garnishing, attaching, execution or judgment creditor mentioned in section one hundred and twenty-one, and excepting payments made on account of liabilities incurred after the receiving order or assignment. The payments subject to the said levy shall include all payments made by way of dividend or otherwise on account of the claims of creditors, whether ordinary, preferred or secured creditors, and including His Majesty in the right of the Dominion or of any province, claiming in respect of taxes or otherwise. Such levy shall be at a rate to be fixed by the governor in council from time to time and shall be charged proportionately against all such payments and deducted therefrom by the trustee before payment is made."

This levy is to be paid to the receiver general to take care of the cost of the administration of the act.

Mr. HACKETT: I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Do I understand the minister to mean by the amendment which he has just read that a certain percentage of the assets realized upon shall after the payment of disbursements be paid to defray the cost of the administration of the act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I understand that the minister has in contemplation a rearrangement of the fees. Is that correct?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I just want to add a word to what has already been said with regard to the costs in recent years being altogether out of proportion to the amount that has reached the creditors. The way it seems to have worked out has been this: There would be a meeting of creditors, inspectors would be appointed, and frequently the creditors would hear nothing more about the estate. I think the chairman of the committee will bear me out that specific cases were instanced before the committee where the costs approximated pretty nearly the whole estate. I do suggest to the minister, what I see he clearly has in mind already, that if the superintendent is going to serve the purpose which the committee hoped he would, there must be a strict supervision over the costs of administration of these particular estates.

Mr. HACKETT: They must all now be taxed. It is impossible as in the past to waive taxation.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It will mean, as I understand it, that there will be brought before the superintendent a statement of all the assets of the various estates after deducting the cost of administration. It will be interesting to see just what percentage of the assets that have been actually realized upon reach the creditors. I would suggest to the minister that that check-up should be kept from year to year so that we may be in a position to know just what percentage goes to the creditors. Last year it was suggested that the claims throughout the dominion amounted to something like $58,000,000, and that about $13,000,000—I cannot vouch for the accuracy of these figures—was the amount realized out of the assets of the various estates, and that approximately two-thirds of the assets went into costs. That is something that can be very materially improved, and I believe a close supervision over the percentage of assets it takes to pay the cost of administration will be of very great benefit in the administration of the act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I can assure my hon. friend that he has put his finger upon the weak spot of the act as it has existed hitherto. The cost of administration was out of all proportion to the work done, and the results showed in only too many cases that the creditors got practically nothing through the mismanagement and the waste of the estates as well as by reason of the excessive costs that were charged. Now that the scale of costs is to be laid down by the department—not necessarily the Department of Justice because the superintendent is to be under the jurisdiction of the Finance department just as is the superintendent of insurance—the department, having fixed the scale of costs will have a man there in the position of superintendent to see that that scale is not exceeded and that every cent of the estate is properly accounted for. I anticipate a vast improvement in the working out of this act in the future. If there is not I shall be very greatly disappointed.

Mr. JACOBS: We may succeed in abolishing bankruptcy altogether.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, you started it. I wish to correct an error I made in speaking earlier. I said, the amount of fee to be charged to the estate after the payment of preferred claims; it is before the payment of preferred claims.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 44—When bankrupt or assignor is a corporation.

Mr. GAGNON: As the chairman is allowing a general discussion, perhaps I might say a word at this point. If we are to limit the cost of trustees, why should we not make provision to see that the costs of legal stamps to be paid to the crown are reduced? I am informed that in some districts, more particularly in the big cities, the registrar who is appointed by the government and sometimes by the chief justice receives in some cases a salary of more than ten thousand dollars. I see that subsection 6 of the old section 162 provides:

> The fees payable to the officers of the court shall belong to the crown in the right of the province, but the lieutenant governor in council may allow the same in whole or in part to such officers.

I do not know what conditions obtain in other provinces and other districts than the district of Quebec, but in the city of Quebec I think my hon. friend from Quebec East will agree with me that we have been a long time without knowing what was the proportion of the fees paid to the crown in Quebec or paid to the registrar of the bankruptcy courts. I used to go to the courts as solicitor for trustees, and at times was asked to pay $25 for legal stamps. No accounting was kept either by the registrar of the court in bankruptcy or the prothonotary of the court who sometimes assumed both positions, and when we asked for information from the department of the attorney general we could not get satisfaction. It is all very well to reflect upon the fees of lawyers and trustees, but I think the creditors when they give, say, $10 to their lawyers, have a right to know what proportion of the amount goes to the crown and what proportion remains in the hands of the lawyers. In the province of Quebec I have known creditors to criticize lawyers, and they would have been surprised to learn that out of the $25 they had paid, in some instances, $15 had gone to the crown. The Minister of Justice has intimated that very soon there will be a revision of the tariffs, and I think he or the superintendent of bankruptcy, who will be appointed to control the operation of the act, might see fit to take the necessary steps to limit the fees levied by the crown.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Quite true.

Section agreed to.

Sections 45 and 46 agreed to.

On section 47—Court may grant or refuse discharge.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Subsection 1 of section 142 of the act is hereby repealed. Sometimes a debtor is granted an absolute discharge, and nobody knows it. Sometimes we learn a man has been discharged, all cleared up, and is in a position to start again in business under no debt whatever. The proposed subsection reads in part as follows:

> (1) On the hearing of the application, the court shall take into consideration the report of the trustee, and the resolution of the inspectors, and may either grant or refuse an absolute order of discharge or suspend the operation of the order for a specified time.

Does this subsection mean that only the court and not the registrar can grant a discharge?

Mr. HACKETT: If my hon. friend will turn to section 25 of the bill he will find that the new section 57 provides that:

> The trustee of a bankrupt or assignor shall promptly after their receipt or preparation mail to the superintendent and to the Dominion statistician, Department of Trade and Commerce, Ottawa, a true copy of . . .

And among the documents which have to be forwarded are the following:

> (d) every order made by the court upon the application for discharge of any bankrupt or authorized assignor.

The term "court" has been interpreted by the courts to mean the judge or the registrar. Section 159 states specifically that a petition for a discharge, if it is not opposed, may be adjudicated upon by the registrar.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): If it is not opposed, yes. Sometimes there is very little delay, the debtor gets his discharge and nobody knows about it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There has to be fourteen days' notice.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): I contend only the court should discharge, and it should not be left in the hands of the registrar. The discharge is the most important part of the Bankruptcy Act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: At the present time only the court can grant a discharge, the court being the judge. That obtains, of course, unless the matter is done by unanimous consent, a proceeding which is sometimes followed in this house. Where there is total agreement the registrar can perform the formal act of signing a discharge, but if there is any objection it can be done only by a judge. We have amended the section so that it can be done only on notice to the superintendent, too, so that he may have notice of the proceedings. If everything is not all right he may interfere.

Section agreed to.

On section 48—Single judges to be assigned to bankruptcy work by Chief Justice.

Mr. GIROUARD: I should like to ask the minister why jurisdiction cannot be exercised by all the judges of the superior court of the province of Quebec, instead of confining the powers of assignment to the Chief Justice of the Court of Appeal?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That was the original scheme. It seems in the province of Quebec as well as in the province of Ontario by arrangement between the judiciary and the local legislatures the heads of the courts are given authority to arrange court business, and to nominate such judges as they see fit to act in bankruptcy, in criminal matters or such other matters as come before the courts. The consequence is that the chief justice in the city of Montreal and the chief justice in the city of Quebec nominate a special judge to suit the convenience of the courts and the people, and the result is a uniformity of decisions in bankruptcy matters. That has been the custom ever since the act was first introduced.

Section agreed to.

Sections 49, to 51 inclusive agreed to.

On section 52—Order by court for prosecution on report of superintendent.

Mr. FACTOR: I am not here to condone the act of a debtor, but it seems to me strange that a representation can be made by a creditor or another interested person to a court, and that a court may commit for trial on that representation. That would seem to be a rabid departure from the ordinary procedure in a court of justice.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If a complaint is made to the superintendent and he comes to the conclusion that the complaint is well founded, then a prosecution can be instituted. It has always been open to anybody to launch a prosecution, if such person thinks the law has been broken. This provision however makes it a duty of the superintendent.

Mr. FACTOR: Quite so, but the Minister of Justice will find, if he reads the section, that any creditor may make a representation to a court to the effect that there is ground to believe that a person has been guilty of an offence under the act, and the court may commit for trial, without any necessity of the accused appearing before the court before committal. This section reads:

> Whenever the court is satisfied, upon the representation of the superintendent or any one on his behalf, or of the trustee, or of any creditor, inspector, or other interested person, that there is ground to believe that any person has been guilty of an offence under this act or under any statute, whether dominion or provincial, in connection with the estate of the debtor, his dealings or property, the court may order that such person be prosecuted for such offence or be committed for trial.

That seems to be a very rabid departure. It says here that a creditor may make representation to a court that he believes an offence has been committed, and that then the court may commit for trial without further formalities. I think the minister should look into that.

Mr. SULLIVAN: I think the words "or be committed for trial" should be stricken out.

Mr. FACTOR: I have no objection to a prosecution, if the court orders, but the addition of the words "or be committed for trial" in my opinion is unfair.

Mr. SULLIVAN: I submit they should be deleted.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is a recommendation of a special committee of the Canadian Bar Association that the words "or be committed for trial" be included in the section. The reason is that in various parts of Canada it has been found that unless they can get the matter before the bankruptcy judge they cannot get anywhere; that all kinds of abuses have crept in and all kinds of offences have been overlooked, and that unless we clothe the judge with some power in the matter we are not going to serve the purpose which they have in view. Personally I am not wedded to the words at all, but that is the reason why they are included there; that is, "the court may order that such person be prosecuted for such offence."

Mr. FACTOR: There is no objection to that. Surely that should be sufficient protection itself, but you add that the bankrupt, without being accused at that time, can be committed for trial. I submit that is going beyond what is necessary.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We know that under the criminal code there are a number of offences in which the attorney general can order committal for trial without going before a magistrate. But I have no objection to these five words being struck out. I think they are improperly put there.

Mr. JACOBS: The matter was under discussion before the committee, and I think the law as it now reads is to the effect that the bankruptcy judge tries the case; he sits as a judge.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That may be, but I do not think the person ought to be committed for trial without some preliminary investigation.

Mr. JACOBS: No. Then what happens if the party is committed for trial by a person having proper jurisdiction, a magistrate? The offender comes back before the bankruptcy court for trial.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Not necessarily; he comes before the ordinary courts of the country.

Mr. JACOBS: No. As I understand the bankruptcy judge must sit on the case.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, if it is the wish of the committee I think that the words in the last line of the subsection "or be committed for trial" should be deleted.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Where will that leave us, Mr. Chairman?—"the court may order that such person be prosecuted for such offence."

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is just as it was in the former act—"order that the debtor be prosecuted for such offence."

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does that mean more than that a preliminary hearing be held, and if in the opinion of whatever tribunal holds the preliminary hearing the offender should be committed, that he then be prosecuted? Or does it simply mean that he be prosecuted? I am afraid that the amendment is going to get the accused into a worse position than he was before. In the one case he may be prosecuted; if the suggested change is made he must be prosecuted, that is, he must be tried.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That does not imply merely a preliminary hearing?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It implies that he would be prosecuted in the ordinary way provided by our law. But the objection I have to the other words is that you allow the bankruptcy court, without any investigation before any magistrate, merely on the representation of the superintendent to commit the man for trial. I think that is going pretty far.

Section 53 agreed to.

On section 54—Administration.

Mr. GOBEIL: Before the bill is disposed of, Mr. Chairman, I desire to give to the farming communities of the province of Quebec a clear understanding of subsection (9) of section 6. I was called out of the house for a few minutes and while absent it was disposed of by the committee. Before this bill was submitted to the committee I had a motion on the order paper—as had also the member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Girouard)—that all persons engaged in tillage of the soil be exempt from the bankruptcy law. I put that motion on the order paper—and I have no doubt the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska did so for the same reason—because I had received several resolutions in its favour from farmers' clubs and other farmers' organizations. I think I can speak for every member of the committee when I say all political ideas were forgotten for the time being when this section came before the committee and only the welfare of the farming class was considered. Not one representation was made before the committee against the change made in the bankruptcy law by subsection (9) of section 6. Since then unfortunately more or less division seems to have arisen, even among farmers, with regard to this change, and I hold in my hand a couple of newspapers containing articles claiming that the remedy will be worse than the disease. Therefore I desire to make it plain that the committee inserted subsection (9) in response to what we considered was a unanimous demand made in the interests of the farming class of the province of Quebec.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Chairman, I wish to endorse what my hon. friend has said, and, as a member of the committee, to speak in defence of this bill, which to-day has met some rather strong criticism. The bankruptcy law has never been very popular. From its inception the act has been criticized, especially in the province from which I come, but I think the criticism was not limited to Quebec. In 1923 when Sir Lomer Gouin was Minister of Justice he was instrumental in amending the act by inserting some special provisions to make it more in harmony with the civil law of the province of Quebec. Those amendments have to some extent alleviated the objections that existed against the law, but not completely. More particularly was there strong criticism of the farming community being subjected to the bankruptcy law. Of course, it has always been claimed that it was a privilege for the farmers, and even during this session when our committee was sitting members from the other provinces could not very well understand why the farmers of Quebec should ask to be removed from the operation of the act. They thought it was a privilege for the farmers to be able to get a discharge from their debts and start anew. But of course conditions among the farming communities in Quebec are not similar to those among the farmers in the other provinces, and it has been clearly demonstrated to the satisfaction even of my colleagues from the other provinces that the act instead of helping the farmers of Quebec has worked an injury to their credit. The farmers of Quebec do not borrow money from the banks or trust companies; they usually borrow from other farmers in their own village or their own parish. These loans are based on mutual confidence, and unfortunately the fact that many farmers were induced to make assignments has taken away some of the confidence that formerly prevailed in the farming communities, which has been rather prejudicial to the farmers in the course of their business operations. The Minister of Agriculture, the presidents of agricultural associations and many other persons have represented that it was better for the farmers of Quebec that they should be removed from the operation of the act, and in that respect the committee has been unanimous. If it were for that provision only, I think hon. members from the province of Quebec should welcome this bill, which is certainly a great improvement and which has been requested for many years.

The other part of the bill, which I have always favoured, is that establishing control. It could not be done otherwise than by having a superintendent of bankruptcy able to supervise the operations of the act. There is no doubt that there have been grave abuses; what has been said to-day by various hon. members shows the need for some control, which could not be maintained except by having a special officer of the government appointed for that purpose and by having the trustees who may be appointed to wind up estates licensed, so that there may be some control in that respect also. We have had many instances of abuses; people have employed agents to canvass the creditors in order to secure their proxies for the purpose of making some money out of the estate, which should go to the creditors. We must not forget, too, that after all assignments, whether voluntary or compulsory, are made on the principle, which is recognized by the law, that they are for the benefit of the creditors, and the creditors should be considered in providing proper machinery for the administration of the estate.

On the whole I agree with the Minister of Justice that this improved act should be given a trial. If there is the need for further amendment or revision this parliament will be able to deal with it.

Mr. GOBEIL: May I be allowed to add just a few words. My motion a few weeks ago called for salaried men as well as farmers to be exempted from the operations of the Bankruptcy Act. Personally I should like to have seen that provision included, but the committee felt that since no representation had been made by the salaried class it was inadvisable to take that step. I do believe, however, that there is no more reason why the salaried man should be permitted to make an assignment than there is for the farmer to be allowed to do so. I think it would have been more in the interests of the salaried men if they had been exempted from the privilege of making an assignment. Certainly when a merchant makes an advance to a salaried man he must consider the fact that the next day this man may go to some city and make an assignment of all his assets, if he has any.

I should like to see the exemption extended to all non-traders, which in my opinion would make the law much broader. I do not think it is proper that professional men, for instance, should have the right to make an assignment of their property. I do not think it is in accord with the dignity of the legal profession that lawyers should be allowed to assign all their assets. But, as I said a moment ago, the committee considered that since no representations had been made along these lines, no action should be taken. As the ex-Minister of Justice has just said, if the law proves to be satisfactory so much the better, while if in the near future the necessity for these changes becomes apparent, perhaps these other classes of people might be exempted as well as the farmers.

Mr. BOULANGER: May I ask the government if they have considered the advisability of enlarging the principle established in section 6 by doing away entirely with voluntary assignments?

Mr. HACKETT: They have been done away with.

Mr. BOULANGER: I mean not only for the farmers but for everyone restricting the act only to petitions in bankruptcy.

Mr. HACKETT: That question did not come before the committee; no one was desirous of being denied the right to go into bankruptcy in a cheaper, more effective and more expeditious way.

Mr. BOULANGER: Then I wish to urge upon the government the study of this angle of the question. It means to me that the principle of voluntary assignments is wrong. The desirability of going into bankruptcy should not be left with the debtor; it should rest with his creditors. After all, at the moment of bankruptcy the creditors are the people most concerned in the estate of the debtor, and if you allow the debtor to make a voluntary assignment very often he takes advantage of that privilege in order to defraud his creditors and save what he can from the wreck. This has been done very often; it has come to the notice of lawyers in many cases. If the privilege of voluntary assignment was taken away you would do away with the bankruptcy canvassing racket which has been mentioned during this debate. It seems to me that the initiative should rest with the creditors, who are the people most concerned. At the moment of bankruptcy everything that belongs to the debtor is the common pledge of his creditors, and it should be left to them to say whether or not a particular trader should go into bankruptcy. The trader himself should not have the privilege of going alone, on his own initiative, and making an assignment to the trustee. Therefore I urge the study of this aspect of the question.

On the title:

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): When will these amendments come into force?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Within a reasonable time, but in the meantime we propose to establish our tariffs of costs, and I will also look up the question of the districts in the various provinces. It may be that we will have to amend the order in council.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton South) in the chair.

Experimental farms, $1,492,000.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Is it intended to provide experimental farms in northern and central British Columbia? The former Minister of Agriculture on two occasions went through that part of the country and said it was absolutely necessary, in order to assist the farmers there, to establish not one but two farms, and the Hon. Mr. Tolmie, who was Minister of Agriculture in the Conservative government, also said that provision in this regard was highly necessary. The Grand Trunk Pacific, now part of the Canadian National Railways, was responsible for the settlement in that district of a large number of farmers, and both before and after the completion of that railway farmers took up land there. They have no experimental farm in either northern or central British Columbia. The farms are in the south, where the soil and climate are totally different from what they are in the portion traversed by the Canadian National from Yellowhead pass to Prince Rupert. I should like to know whether the minister, if he has not yet made arrangements in this regard, intends to look into the matter. I can assure him that it is not a political issue, the necessity having been admitted by both the ex-Minister of Agriculture and his predecessor, the Hon. Mr. Tolmie.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): I shall be glad to give the matter consideration.

Mr. LAPOINTE: On my last trip to Quebec city I came across some farmers from the adjacent district, and there is a rumour to the effect that the operations of the experimental farm at Cap Rouge are to be considerably curtailed. There is much anxiety over this and I should like to know whether there is any truth in the report. Is the minister considering at all a reduction in the activities of that experimental farm?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member is correct. We have cut the appropriation for the experimental farm at Cap Rouge considerably this year, and as a result have curtailed activities there to quite a large extent.

Mr. VALLANCE: I wish to ask two questions, the first of which I should probably have raised in connection with the last item under discussion. This morning I received information that prompts me to ask that question now. I have reference to the discontinuance of the testing of dairy cows in Manitoba—not the tuberculosis test but the milk test as it is known there. Does the department intend to cut out that testing?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No; there is no intention of cutting it out.

Mr. VALLANCE: In connection with the present item, No. 45, I notice that there is a reduction of $833,000. Last year the minister was kind enough to bring under this item forestry farms that would otherwise have been discontinued. My question is this. In view of this reduction of $833,000, is it still the intention of the department to carry on these forestry farms?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The experimental farm at Cap Rouge is the large farm in the province of Quebec, and I am anxious to know to what exent its activities are to be curtailed.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The chief work that has been done at that farm has been carried on, I believe, in connection with the development of French Canadian cattle. That will be continued. The poultry work will also be continued, and that was one of the outstanding pieces of work done on the farm. In conjunction with the farm at Cap Rouge there is a horse farm at St. Joachim, and that is being continued.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What is the amount of the reduction in Cap Rouge?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The reduction is from $50,000 to $11,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Is there any reduction in the activities of the remount depot at St. Joachim?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No reduction.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It is going on as before?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. VALLANCE: In view of this large reduction of $833,000 in this one vote alone, I suggest that this might be an opportune time for the minister to give a brief outline showing where he proposes to make economies, under this item, in the administration of experimental farms.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The reductions are distributed as follows:

Central farm, $106,402.
Illustration stations, $17,555.
Branch farms and stations, $312,247.
Importation of live stock, $35,000.
Buildings, Central farm, $51,471.
Buildings, branch farms, $68,525.
Buildings, pathological laboratories, $8,750.
Soil surveys, $30,000.
New farms, $138,950.
Printing, $64,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am surprised at the step taken by the government in reducing the activities at the farm at Cap Rouge, which is the principal farm in the district of Quebec. I am not satisfied with the explanation offered by the minister as to why this vote should be reduced and the activities of the farm curtailed. This is a very important experimental farm, all the farmers on the north shore from Three Rivers down to even my county receiving the benefit of its activities. The farmers in the counties of Quebec, Montmorency, Saguenay and many other districts are interested in this farm. I am surprised that the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion), in whose constituency the farm is located, is not present in the committee. I should like to know if his consent was asked in connection with the curtailment of the activities of this farm. We are being told that everything must be done to help our farming communities and develop agriculture, but this cannot be done by curtailing the activities of our experimental farms. Unless a more satisfactory explanation is given by the minister, I must protest most strongly against the reduction in this vote. I think I am safe in saying that all members from the adjoining districts will join me in this protest, because this is a very important matter to the districts concerned. I ask the minister for a detailed explanation of the curtailment of the activities at this farm and why such a step is considered necessary when agriculture is so much in need of assistance and when the past activities of this particular farm have proven to be so beneficial to the farmers.

Mr. GOBEIL: Mr. Chairman, before the minister makes his reply I should like to say that I disagree absolutely with the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay. I have been at the experimental farm at Cap Rouge several times and it is my opinion that this farm is not correctly located. The soil on the farm does not represent the average soil of the outlying districts. This farm has a particular soil and the experiments carried on do not give the proper information to the farmers of the surrounding districts.

Mr. BOUCHARD: I wonder if the hon. member for Compton could tell the committee the average of the soil in the district surrounding this farm. It is a most unfortunate thing that the activities of this farm have been reduced so greatly. If these farms are to carry on experiments, perhaps one of the first they should undertake is to find out how many hon. members of this committee owe their seats to agriculture. After making other surveys, perhaps they could endeavour to find out how many hon. members on the Conservative side owe their seats to the promises made to agriculture. To hear the hon. member for Compton state that we have too many experimental farms and pretending—

Mr. GOBEIL: I did not state that.

Mr. BOUCHARD: I would rather hear the minister give an explanation in order that we might discuss this question at greater length.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The purpose of experimental farms is to attack and attempt a solution of agricultural problems. When such solution or information in connection therewith has been obtained, the endeavour has been to put that information before the farmers of the district by means of either publications or illustration stations. We are endeavouring to eliminate what wastage we can without doing injury to agriculture in any province. We are cooperating with the provincial departments of agriculture in attacking the problems which are retarding agriculture. Any of the activities eliminated at the experimental farm at Cap Rouge will be conducted either at Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere, Lennoxville or other experimental farms in Quebec. Before any further experimental farms are established we intend to have a definite agreement with the provincial departments of agriculture as to what their policy is in the particular locality where it is contended a farm should be established. At Cap Rouge a certain amount of field husbandry will be eliminated but this work will be dealt with just as well at Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere. When I stated that there was some $11,000 for Cap Rouge I omitted to mention that there is an additional six or seven thousand dollars in the supplementary estimates.

[Mr. Gobeil.]

Mr. CASGRAIN: What are the activities to be curtailed at that farm?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Cereals, forage crops, some field husbandry and horticulture.

Mr. CASGRAIN: When was the farm established?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I believe in 1909.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It has been in continuous operation up to the present time?

Mr. LUCAS: After the transfer of the natural resources to the three western provinces there was a reorganization in the Department of the Interior. I understand that that department formerly carried on the tree nurseries at Indian Head and Sutherland. It is my understanding that after the reorganization these nurseries were transferred to the Department of Agriculture. I should like to know if this vote will cover the maintenance of these nurseries.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. LUCAS: Is sufficient money being provided this year to carry on the work, or is there a reduction?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is a reduction, but sufficient money is being provided, we believe, to carry on the work satisfactorily.

Mr. LUCAS: Is it the intention of the department to extend this work to the other provinces? Some time ago a survey was made and it was stated that the government intended to extend this work and establish another farm in the province of Alberta. I believe that this is very important work. I noticed in the press a short time ago that Mr. T. C. Mann, consulting engineer for the Saskatchewan drought commission, speaking at Winnipeg, is reported as saying that in order to conserve moisture and end crop failures he would recommend planting at least one mile of good hedge on every quarter section of land and set out areas to young trees. He would also stop the draining of lakes and sloughs. I think everyone recognizes that it is very important to encourage tree planting as much as possible, to prevent in every possible way the drifting of the soil which has been taking place in the west for a number of years, and I trust that the minister will see that this branch is not neglected.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The minister in his remarks mentioned that some of the activities that were being carried on at Cap Rouge are being transferred to Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere, and other activities are being transferred to Lennoxville.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not transferred. They are being carried on now at Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere and also at Lennoxville.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I have not so very much objection to some of the activities being carried on at Cap Rouge and some that are being carried on at Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere, but on the other hand I would point out that Cap Rouge is easier of access, and this change is taking away from the farmers of the district nearest to the city of Quebec the advantages which they enjoyed in the past. I also protest vigorously against part of these activities being transferred to the experimental farm at Lennoxville in the district of Sherbrooke. I would not object so much if this change was being made to serve a new district, but it is going to serve the whole of the eastern townships. We know that the eastern townships at the last election returned mostly supporters of the government of the day, and I suppose that this is one of the plums which the administration is handing over to the eastern townships for the support then given them. But I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that it is to the great disadvantage of the people of the district of Quebec and the people I have the honour to represent in this house. For these reasons I emphatically and strongly protest against the transfer of the activities that were being carried on at that farm to a farm in another district which is much more difficult of access to all the villages in the district of Quebec and on the north shore of the St. Lawrence. While I do not object to this change inuring to the benefit of the people of the eastern townships, I say it is not fair that the activities of this farm, which has been maintained in operation from 1909 until today, under two or three different administrations should be curtailed. My hon. friend from Compton has mentioned the fact that the soil was not suitable. If that is so, the officials of the department who year after year have been advising the minister of agriculture in different governments ought to be criticized because it took them such a long time to find out that the soil was not suitable for experiments. As I say, these activities have been carried on there since 1909 and there was no question at all of changing to any other district. Therefore I think I must be right in saying that this change is a reward which the government is giving to the eastern townships for the support which it gave the administration in the last election. The government is taking away from the district which I have the honour to represent the advantages which the farmers there received from the activities of this farm and is handing them over to friends of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In reply to what the hon. gentleman has stated, there are no activities being transferred. The work is now being done and has been done at the two experimental farms at Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere and Lennoxville. So far as the political significance which the hon. gentleman tried to hitch on to this matter is concerned, that is pretty well answered by the fact that the farm where the cut has been made is situated in the constituency of the Solicitor General, so we cannot very well be accused of any political activity in making this cut. The criticism that was made was not so much with reference to the unsuitability of the soil, as that the soil was not typical of any great area. In addition there is a provincial farm just about twenty-five miles away from this farm at Cap Rouge, and the results of any experiments carried out at Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere or at Lennoxville can be demonstrated at Cap Rouge, where there is still remaining the superintendent and the technical adviser to explain any experiments for the benefit of farmers who visit the farm.

Mr. GAGNON: In view of the fact that the experimental farm at Cap Rouge is situated in the constituency of my friend the Solicitor General I should like to say a few words. I am rather surprised that the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay is protesting on account of the fact that there will be greater activity at the experimental farm at Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere. I understand that the county of Charlevoix is exactly opposite the county of Kamouraska, and it is easier for the people around St. Irenee or Murray Bay to go to Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere, some nine miles away, than to go to Cap Rouge.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes, if you would put on a ferry boat.

Mr. GAGNON: I know that my hon. friend, who is an excellent lawyer, is pleading the case which the former Minister of Justice handed over to him just before he left the chamber. I wish to say on behalf of the electors of Quebec West, who are represented in this house by my friend the Solicitor General, that I have seen the Minister of Agriculture and begged him not to curtail too much the activities of that farm, but the Minister of Agriculture pointed out to me, and with justice, that the province of Quebec has always been fairly treated in the matter of experimental farms, that there are five in the province now, and that no other province has been more generously treated. The minister has also been good enough to assure me that the number of experimental farms in the province of Quebec will not be curtailed. I am not an expert in agriculture, but I can quite understand that it might be advisable to transfer activities from one district to another that was more suitable for the purpose. At all events, I do not think we ought to raise any party prejudice in connection with this matter, and we should not try to make the people of the province of Quebec feel that they are being discriminated against. Personally, although I am not an expert, I think that the soil in the county of Kamouraska and in the district of Lac St. John and Chicoutimi is much more suitable than the soil at Cap Rouge. For these reasons I believe that the Minister of Agriculture is doing no injustice to the province of Quebec.

Mr. CASGRAIN: My hon. friend would be right in his contention that it is easier for the people of my county to get access to the farm at Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere if there were in existence to-day the same communications that were maintained in years past by the Canada Steamship Lines and also by the ferry from Riviere Ouelle to Murray Bay. But those two services have been discontinued, and the farmer in that district who wishes to go from Murray Bay to Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere will now have to go a long way around. He will have to go down as far as Tadoussac and take the ferry boat, a distance of over twenty miles, cross the river St. Lawrence or else take the train on the Quebec and Saguenay railway, go up to Quebec and then cross over the river and go the whole way round on the south shore of the St. Lawrence before he reaches Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere—or as an hon. gentleman suggests, swim across, because there is no ferry boat service. With the farm at Cap Rouge, and the activities all being carried on there as they were in the past, it would be much more convenient and easier of access and to the greatest advantage of the people of that district of Quebec.

Mr. VALLANCE: When I asked the minister how the $833,000 was made up he gave his answer rather hurriedly, and I was not able to take down the figures. I noticed however there was a considerable cut for illustration stations. I should like to ask the Prime Minister, in view of a press report I saw some time ago to the effect that the government had bought and taken over the Seager Wheeler farm at Rosthern, what price was paid, and also whether it is going to be operated by the same help as is operating the experimental farm at Rosthern to-day. Will the same superintendent be in charge?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): With reference to the Seager Wheeler farm, I would say that we have not paid anything for it, we have not bought it or we have not rented it. We have however established the position of experimental substation superintendent for Doctor Seager Wheeler. He will operate the farm as he has done in the past, continuing to carry out the experiments in which he has engaged so successfully. He has experimented not only in connection with grains and grasses, but also with fruits. At great sacrifice of his own time he has been an inspiration to many farmers and has been most unselfish in his advice to them. We felt no better investment could be made than to pay Seager Wheeler $2,220 per year as superintendent of a sub-experimental station to assist him, now when he is getting up in years, to hire the necessary labour, so that he may have more time at his disposal to advise and assist the farmers in their experiments.

Mr. VALLANCE: Outside of the gratuity given to Seager Wheeler by the government, he bears all the expense of the operation of the farm? He pays the taxes, and other expenses?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. HOWARD: As the experimental farm at Lennoxville is in my county, I should like to know the curtailment of the grant in connection with it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The total reduction on the Lennoxville farm is $9,335, or 18 per cent.

Mr. HOWARD: What branches of work are to be curtailed?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The salary reduction takes care of part of the decrease. So far as actual experimental activities are concerned, there will be no curtailment. We have decided it is not advisable in connection with the Lennoxville and various other experimental farms to try to carry on special breeding or genetical work with more than one breed of cows or other animals. In that way we are saving considerable money by moving animals from one farm to another, and eliminating duplication.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I should like to ask if the same staff which was in charge 1930, at St. Joachim is still the same, or has there been any change since that time?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The same staff is there. It is under the supervision of the superintendent at Cap Rouge.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I should like to ask the minister a question with respect to the farm at Lacombe, Alberta. How much was spent last year and what will be spent this year? Although the farm is not in my riding, being in the constituency of Wetaskiwin, it is near my home, and I have made many pilgrimages to the place and have taken a good deal of interest in it. I have always felt they were doing all they possibly could with the money at their disposal. In what way could expenditures be curtailed on that farm without reducing the service they are giving?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the year 1931-32 there was expended $50,984; the estimate for this year is $42,500, or a reduction of $8,484. Some of this reduction is because of the reduced salaries, and a further reduction is made by a change of policy in regard to live stock on the farm. That is, we are reducing our stock to certain breeds of one type. Prior to this year a farm was rented in conjunction with the work at Lacombe. The farm has been sold and for that reason we have found it necessary to a certain extent to curtail the work.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: If the farm is sold there is no possibility of its being purchased by the government to form part of the experimental station?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Can the minister tell us the locations of the five farms mentioned by the hon. member for Dorchester? I know of the ones at Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere, Lennoxville, and Cap Rouge, I do not know where the others are situated.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Farnham and L'Assomption.

Mr. CASGRAIN: When were those farms established?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Farnham in 1922 and L'Assomption in 1927.

Mr. CASGRAIN: When were the other farms established?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere in 1911, La Ferme in 1916 and Lennoxville in 1912.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What activities are carried on at Farnham and L'Assomption?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Tobacco growing.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The other farms are used for general mixed farming?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Were there any other farms established under the new administration?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, not in the province of Quebec.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Is it the intention of the government to establish any new farms, other than those at present in existence?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The intention of the government will be made known when any new farms are established.

Mr. MARCIL: Have demonstration plots in the province of Quebec been reduced?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is a reduction of seven.

Mr. MARCIL: Throughout the whole province?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Is it true that the sixth farm mentioned by the hon. member for Dorchester, namely that at La Ferme, was closed?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Activities have been curtailed to a certain extent because the department did not feel the farm was well situated. It was in a low lying place, and the soil was not typical of the surrounding country.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Does the minister realize that in new districts, such as La Ferme, farms are very necessary? It would be most unfortunate if this farm was closed. These days we are hearing a great deal of talk about a back to the farm movement, and most of the talking is done, of course, by those who know nothing about farming. The first back to the land movement was initiated during the last election campaign. But since the members who were elected with this flag have resumed their ordinary urban occupations, they do not care any more about the back to the land movement. There is no minister for whom I have greater sympathy than the Minister of Agriculture, because he entered on the administration of his department burdened by the many great promises made by his chief, and in his endeavour to redeem those promises I fully realize he may well be called the busy bee of the ministry, for I know he is overworking himself. But not only has he many great promises to redeem, he is further handicapped by his estimates being reduced one-third. I am sure he will agree with me that what is most needed to-day is not a back to the land movement, but a colonization movement. Colonization presents many difficult problems that the ordinary farmer is unable to solve, and I hope the minister will take into consideration the establishment of a new farm to be devoted especially to the solution of colonization problems, especially in the province of Quebec.

Mr. HOWARD: Mr. Chairman, before this item is passed I thank the minister for not having curtailed his appropriation for the Lennoxville experimental farm. I also want to thank him and the officers of his department for the cooperation they have given, through the farm at Lennoxville—the finest experimental farm in all Canada—to the whole farming section of the eastern townships. But I do offer this criticism. If there is one thing that can help us back to prosperity it is to increase the purchasing power of the agricultural classes. When I consider the curtailment of the minister's estimates I realize he has had a very hard job in retaining them even at their present figure, but I think he should put up a still harder fight. There is no excuse whatever for cutting the agricultural estimates by over $3,200,000 odd. I do not criticize the curtailment of the appropriations for certain branches in connection with the different experimental farms, but we should at least maintain the estimates for agriculture at their last year's figure, without of course undertaking new buildings and similar expenditures. I follow very closely the work at the Lennoxville experimental farm, and no doubt the committee will be interested to learn that last year, on Farmers' day, 1,500 farmers from all over the eastern townships attended a picnic at the farm. That is the largest meeting of agriculturists that has ever been held in any section of the eastern townships. It was not a political gathering; the farmers present were trying to better, if not increase, agricultural production. I repeat, the only criticism I have to offer is that the minister should not have reduced his estimates at all, but should have maintained them at least up to the standard of last year.

[Mr. Bouchard.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Mr. Chairman, as I am responsible for the estimates in my department, I was confronted with this question: Could we in view of present conditions, or even if these conditions did not exist, make any cut in the agriculture estimates without affecting detrimentally our agricultural interests? Personally I think that this cut will have practically no effect at all so far as efficiency in the department goes.

Mr. VALLANCE: Has the minister an itemized account showing the reductions that he proposes to make in the expenditures on the various experimental farms? I notice my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) thanked the minister for the kind manner in which he had treated the Lennoxville experimental farm. Naturally I am interested in our experimental farms, because I have one right in the middle of my own constituency. I should like to know to what extent the minister proposes to cut down that appropriation.

Mr. BOYES: While we are not discussing the item of dairying at the moment, Mr. Chairman, yet we are dealing with the agriculture estimates. Therefore I wish to pay tribute to a gentleman who has been in the service of the government for a period of over forty years, and as he comes from the vicinity of my home I thought possibly it would be fitting on my part to give the committee a short account of his career. I refer to Doctor J. A. Ruddick, Dominion dairy commissioner.

He was born near Dorchester in Oxford county, Ontario, in 1862. As a young man he learned to make cheese and was engaged as a cheesemaker by the late D. M. MacPherson of Lancaster, Ontario, who owned and operated some sixty cheese factories located in eastern Ontario and Quebec. After one year in charge of a factory Mr. Ruddick was engaged as superintendent of the combination.

Following the appointment in 1890 of the late James W. Robertson as Dominion dairy commissioner, Mr. Ruddick was in the spring of 1891 appointed to the dairy commissioner's staff and this was the first appointment to the staff. Mr. Ruddick as a member of the staff of the dairy commissioner carried on experimental work in the use of the Babcock milk test as a basis of division of factory proceeds, operated winter creameries in eastern and western Ontario for demonstration purposes, and in 1892 supervised the manufacture of the mammoth cheese for the world's fair, which cheese weighed eleven tons. He assisted in the organization and management of creameries in the Northwest Territories and later became superintendent of the Eastern Dairy School, Kingston, Ontario. About 1898 he entered the service of the New Zealand government as first director of dairying in that dominion and remained in New Zealand for about eighteen months. He returned to Canada about 1900 and again joined the staff of the Dominion dairy commissioner. In 1900 he organized the work of cargo inspection at Montreal, which service is designed to ensure proper handling of perishable produce intended for export. In 1902 under the direction of Mr. Ruddick central cool cheese curing rooms were established at Woodstock, Brockville, Cowansville and St. Hyacinthe for the purpose of demonstrating the benefits to be derived from the proper curing of cheese. During the latter part of 1904 James W. Robertson resigned as dairy commissioner and Mr. Ruddick was made Dominion dairy commissioner. During the great war he acted as a member of the cheese commission, set up to purchase and export Canada's surplus cheese. In 1918 the name of this commission was changed to the Dairy Produce Commission and it handled surplus butter and condensed milk as well as cheese. In 1921 the milk utilization service of the dairy and cold storage branch was organized. This service is designed to promote the domestic consumption of milk and milk products. In 1923 the grading by federal officers of butter and cheese for export became compulsory and the grading service was organized under Mr. Ruddick's direction. The same year the division of dairy research was established, the object of which is to determine causes of defects in cheese and butter and to suggest remedies.

In 1924, Mr. Ruddick was given the honorary degree of LL.D. by Queen's university of Kingston, Ontario.

I regret very much that Doctor Ruddick has arrived at the age of seventy years when he is supposed to retire from his duties. I am sure the Dominion of Canada will lose the services of an honourable, faithful and efficient servant in the person of Doctor Ruddick.

Mr. BRADETTE: What is the amount of the reduction, if any, in connection with the Kapuskasing experimental farm?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): First, in reply to my hon. friend from South Battleford, so that he will not worry unduly, the vote last year was $46,145 for the experimental farm about which he asked. The vote this year is $40,000, so the reduction amounts to $6,145, the greater part of which is a salary reduction. With reference to Kapuskasing, last year the vote was $48,045; this year the estimate is $41,000, a reduction of $7,045.

Mr. BRADETTE: What activities will be particularly curtailed?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The chief reduction is in salaries. Land improvement work will be curtailed and there will be some reduction in the live stock division.

Mr. BRADETTE: I really believe the land improvement work could be dropped for the time being, but I want to protest as strongly as possible against any curtailment of work in connection with live stock. We in northern Ontario hear on many occasions of the wonderful things that are being done for the western farmers. We do not begrudge them anything, but northern Ontario is a new and rich agricultural section of the country. It is in what we call a clay belt, and instead of being curtailed the live stock activities should be increased for the very good reason that many of our farmers cannot afford to go to southern Ontario, Quebec, or the western provinces for the stock they require. I think the full activity of this branch should be maintained. I speak feelingly on this matter, because while I was on the government side of the house I asked every year for an increase in the amount voted for the Kapuskasing experimental farm, and I was to some extent successful. I think this is not the right time to curtail the amount spent in that way. I fully realize the situation in which the minister now finds himself, but I hope he will be able at least to maintain the live stock activities carried on at the Kapuskasing experimental farm. I do not want to say more on this subject, because I have spoken on the matter previously.

There is another question I should like to ask the minister, and in this connection I should like to give all credit to the province of Ontario. Last fall they threatened to close the Hearst demonstration farm, but we are glad to learn that they are not going to do so. I understand, however, that the federal government has built a dwelling house at Kapuskasing for the superintendent of the Hearst demonstration farm. We know that this gentleman, who is exceptionally well qualified for his work, should live in the town of Hearst, and the settlers of that district do not want to see the head of that demonstration farm moved to Kapuskasing. Experimental farms come under the jurisdiction of the federal government, while demonstration farms come under provincial jurisdiction. It has been brought to my notice that a certain amount of money has been spent by this government for the construction of a house for the superintendent of the Hearst demonstration farm, and I should like to know from the minister if that information is correct.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I may tell my hon. friend that the reduction is in the number of cattle. We decided, for the very reason the hon. gentleman has in mind, that we must give all the assistance possible in these new areas, but we felt that we would do more in that way by disposing of the grade cattle and increasing the number of pure bred cattle so there would be more seed stock available in that new country. With regard to the closing of the Hearst demonstration farm, which is a provincial farm, as I stated at the outset this action was taken in accordance with the policy of cooperation between the federal department of agriculture and the provincial department. It was felt that the money expended on the Hearst farm could be better used in further assistance to farmers in northern Ontario and that the work could be well carried on, as far as attacking agricultural problems was concerned, at the Kapuskasing farm. I did not catch the last question of the hon. member.

Mr. BRADETTE: I have received a number of letters to the effect that the federal government spent a certain amount of money in the construction of a dwelling house for Mr. Hanlan, a friend of mine of the north country, the superintendent of the Hearst demonstration farm. The people in Hearst, who expected the demonstration farm to be maintained, believed Mr. Hanlan should remain in Hearst so that there might not be any conflict between the activities of the two governments. It will be hard to explain why a provincial official should come under federal jurisdiction, and why his activities should be curtailed to a certain extent.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): His activities will not be curtailed. It was felt that it would be better for him to live on the farm where the experiments were being conducted, so a cottage was built at a cost of about $3,100. So long as he makes that cottage his headquarters my understanding is that he will continue to occupy it.

Mr. BRADETTE: We were under the impression that the Hearst demonstration farm was to be maintained by the provincial government. The statement appeared in the press that activities at that farm were not to be curtailed, and if that is to be the case it seems strange that the superintendent should reside at the Kapuskasing farm.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The Hearst farm is a provincial farm, but in conference we agreed that it would cut out waste, without removing any great benefit from agriculture, if the provincial government should close that farm and have that money available for other purposes. It was agreed that Mr. Hanlan, who is now residing on the Kapuskasing farm, should make that his headquarters.

Mr. BRADETTE: Then I understand that by arrangement between the two governments the demonstration farm has been closed. I think that is a bad move, because I maintain that the provincial government should have continued to operate the demonstration farm at Hearst. In northern Ontario we need to have all the agricultural experiments that we can get the benefit of, and the activities carried on at the Hearst demonstration farm were doing a great deal of good. This farm is at least seventy-five miles from the Kapuskasing farm, and it dealt with matters that were not taken up at Kapuskasing. If it is at all possible I think the federal authorities should tell the provincial authorities that the Hearst farm should be maintained and that Mr. Hanlan, a very able agriculturist, should be sent back to Hearst. He might extend his activities to Kapuskasing or other portions of northern Ontario if possible, but he should be located at Hearst, and I hope the minister will use his influence to bring about that result. The province of Ontario should be able to maintain that farm without asking the help of the federal government, or at least without discontinuing its needed services at Hearst.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I gather that the Hearst farm is in the constituency represented by the hon. member. There is no gain, so far as experimental work goes, in having a farm at Hearst, because soil and other conditions are almost identical at Kapuskasing. With regard to the Ontario department of agriculture, we have spent a great deal of time in bringing about cooperation in attacking agricultural problems of an experimental or research nature, and it was agreed after full consideration that there was no advantage in operating the two farms.

Mr. BRADETTE: I want to thank the minister for his explanation. He said something about the experimental farm at La Ferme, pointing out that the soil was not of such a quality as warranted the continuation of great activities there. I happen to know something about the constituency so well represented by the hon. member for Pontiac. The statement that the soil is low is not quite right; it is fairly high and fairly hilly. Has the minister in mind some other site for an experimental farm in northern Quebec? This is important. Although I do not belong to the province of Quebec, I am interested in the northern section of Canada and its agricultural development, and I am fully convinced, from the series of experiments we have carried out at Kapuskasing and La Ferme, that the possibility has been demonstrated of extensive colonization in that district. Does the department intend to choose another site? I said that the land was not altogether low; it is not typical of the clay belt, but it also has some good farming features. Did the minister have in view another site on which enormous sums would be spent before it could become an experimental farm? I thought it would be wise to maintain activities for a few years instead of curtailing them on that farm.

Mr. REID: Is it the policy of the experimental farms to sell their surplus products?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. REID: This being so, I wish to lodge a complaint with the minister on behalf of the honey producers of British Columbia. In their search for a market they were told by the wholesalers that they would have to accept 2 cents less per pound owing to the fact that the experimental farm had sold honey at a lower price. If we have surplus products from our experimental farms, surely the penitentiaries and other government institutions could take them. It is very unfair to our producers in British Columbia for them to have to compete with the experimental farms. We have to meet competition from the rest of the world, particularly from the east, and our situation is aggravated when the honey producers have to compete with an experimental farm that has the dominion behind it. I hope the minister will take this matter into serious consideration and in future prohibit such competition in the open market with our producers.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No doubt the instance cited by the hon. gentleman is correct. It certainly is not the policy of the farms to compete with private producers by underselling them. My information is that they sell to the wholesalers at prevailing prices, and as a matter of fact we have had a good deal of criticism by reason of the high prices charged by the experimental farms. I shall be glad to take the matter into consideration.

Mr. REID: The complaint was made to me on behalf of the honey producers of the province.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, may I submit to the committee the correspondence exchanged between the hon. Adélard Godbout, Minister of Agriculture for the province of Quebec, and myself. This correspondence refers to the distribution of seed grain in Quebec. On May 10, last, I wrote the following letter to the hon. Mr. Godbout:

Hon. Mr. Adélard Godbout,
Minister of Agriculture,
Quebec.

Dear Mr. Godbout,—

Mr. Emiliano Simoneau, farmer, of Windsor Mills, informs me that he will be unable to sow his land this year. He has not the funds necessary to purchase seed grain.

Mr. Simoneau is an excellent farmer who is much attached to his land, he would be thankful to receive government assistance. This gentleman is desirous of securing 100 pounds of millet, 100 pounds of medium red clover, 25 bushels of oats and 10 bushels of barley. If you could possibly assist Mr. Simoneau, he would greatly appreciate it.

Yours faithfully,

F. J. Laflèche, M.P.

The following is the Hon. Mr. Godbout's answer:

Department of Agriculture
Province of Quebec

Office of the Minister.

Quebec, May 16, 1932.

Mr. F. J. Laflèche, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—

I am in receipt of your confidential letter, dated the 10th inst. and in which you request assistance from the provincial government on behalf of Mr. Emiliano Simoneau, farmer, of Windsor Mills, in order to enable him to secure seed grain.

The provincial government in fact, distributes seed grain to farmers in need in the poorest parts of the province. This distribution is carried out through the medium of parish committees presided by the local parish priest, the members of these local committees are, in fact, better able to judge of the needs of each person.

The amount set aside by the provincial government, this year, to assist the farming class in purchasing seed grain for those who most need it, is still larger than last year.

For your own information, allow me to point out to you that we have again requested, from the Dominion government this year, assistance for the Quebec farmers, just as they do for other provinces; unfortunately we have not been able to obtain anything, no more than we were able last year.

May I further state, for your information also, that we were informed last year that the Dominion Unemployment and Farm Relief Act could not be so interpreted as to apply the money for the relief of those in need, to purchasing seed grain.

You will readily understand that, under these circumstances, it is impossible for us to do more. Indeed, although it may not seem very large for each parish, the contribution of the Quebec government, alone, this year, amounts to a much larger sum owing to the great number of parishes of the province, where we are obliged to contribute, and this, notwithstanding that money is scarcer this year. We requested the government, at Ottawa, to contribute an amount equal to the one we, ourselves, apply to these purchases of seed grain; if the Dominion government had consented, at least, to contribute a portion, even had it been only half of what we appropriate for that end, or again if the government, at Ottawa, had but guaranteed the amount required, I think that we would have probably been able to distribute to all farmers that were in need, in Quebec, the quantity of seed grain they required.

It is unfortunate, indeed, that the Dominion Act in this respect does not equally apply to all the provinces.

May I assure you of my best endeavours,

Yours faithfully,

Adélard Godbout.

I should like to inquire from the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), whether it is a fact that the Quebec provincial government has made such a request and whether the Dominion government refused to consider it.

This question interests particularly the Quebec farmers, since the press siding with the opposition contend that the Dominion government grants all the requests coming from the western provinces and refuses those from Quebec. The Minister of Agriculture of Quebec has written to the local member of the county of Wolfe a similar letter as the one addressed to me.

It is important to know definitely whether the statement of the Minister of Agriculture for Quebec is founded on fact or not. I therefore beg the hon. Minister of Agriculture to inform the committee in this respect.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe signified his intention of asking this question with reference to assistance from the federal government to the farmers in the purchasing of seed grain in the province of Quebec. On May 2 I received the following telegram from the Minister of Agriculture of the province of Quebec:

Hon. Robert Weir,
Minister of Agriculture,
Ottawa, Ontario.

An inquiry reveals that a very great number of farmers and settlers are absolutely unable to secure their seeds this spring. The Quebec government has already granted $200,000 to answer the most urgent requirements but we realize that it is insufficient and that another $200,000 will be necessary to meet the situation. We hope that the federal government could supply that additional amount. Letter follows.

Adelard Godbout,
Minister of Agriculture.

On May 5 I replied to the Minister of Agriculture for Quebec in this letter:

Ottawa, May 5, 1932.

Hon. A. Godbout,
Minister of Agriculture,
Quebec, Que.

Dear Mr. Godbout:

I asknowledge receipt of your telegram of the 2nd instant, reading as follows:

An inquiry reveals that a very great number of farmers and settlers are absolutely unable to secure their seeds this spring. The Quebec government has already granted $200,000 to answer the most urgent requirements but we realize that it is insufficient and that another $200,000 will be necessary to meet the situation. We hope that the federal government could supply that additional amount. Letter follows.

And also your letter of the 3rd instant. We have no authority or appropriation to provide for the purchase or distribution of seed in any province and, therefore, I am unable to comply with the request which you have made.

In case you have been misinformed with regard to the situation, I might say that we are not purchasing or distributing seed grain for any province as this is considered to be a provincial responsibility entirely.

I believe the letter from Mr. Godbout to the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe was written on May 16, at least ten days later. I have endeavoured on different occasions to make this point as clear as possible: the federal government has not purchased seed for any farmer in any province of the Dominion of Canada. If for any reason the provincial governments felt that they could not carry on the services of government and have submitted that condition of affairs to the federal government, the matter has been given full consideration and money has been loaned to the provincial governments when the federal government felt that the demands were warranted. I do not know that I can make this point any clearer than that. I have made that statement before in the house more than once, and I regret that Mr. Godbout evidently did not understand my letter, although I do not know how I could have made it any clearer than in the language I used. The government of Quebec has not made any request to the federal government for a loan to help to carry on the services of government and look after their farmers in connection with seed grain or other matters. If they had, no reasonable person would suggest for a minute that they would not be treated the same as the other provinces. I do not think there is anything I can add in respect to this matter.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to protest against the remarks just made by the hon. Minister of Agriculture. In order that the Quebec farmers be granted assistance by the Dominion Minister of Agriculture, the latter insists that, as an essential condition, the government of that province should prove that it is so financially embarrassed, that it is unable to provide for its own agricultural requirements.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Exactly like in all other provinces.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): What the Quebec Minister of Agriculture requested the dominion government to do, was that the government or the Department of Agriculture should grant the Quebec farmers an amount equal to the one contributed by the provincial Department of Agriculture. I think, it is only fair, especially, when we are aware of the fact that if the Minister of Agriculture occupies his present position, it is due to the numerous pledges made to the Quebec farmers. They were promised, among other things that they would be assisted in all their requirements. There is no better time to do so than now. This government has now been in power for two years and has done nothing to help the Quebec farmers. The hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) for whom I have much regard—he is aware of it—

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): He deserves some.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): —stated, a moment ago, in the course of this debate, that the impression should not spread in Quebec that the government grants nothing to this province and all to the western provinces. It is not only an impression—we are facing a fact—and I am quite convinced that the Quebec members, whether they belong to the Liberal or Conservative party, if they wish to be impartial, will necessarily come to the conclusion that the Minister of Agriculture has done nothing to help the Quebec farmers.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Order!

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): And when the provincial Minister of Agriculture asks the dominion minister to co-operate and requests him to grant to our farmers a similar amount to that granted by the provincial government, in order to assist the farmers in purchasing seed grain, the only reply from the minister, is that the dominion government gives no seed grain to any province; if any province wishes to secure seed grain, that province—I repeat what I stated at the outset—it must be so financially embarrassed that it is unable to provide for their own agricultural requirements.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Not necessarily.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): I wish to protest against the stand taken by the Minister of Agriculture. It is said, not only in Quebec but also in Ontario, that this government seems to grant its favours rather to the western farmers. I state that this impression is founded on facts. Last year, when the question of granting to western farmers a 5 cents rebate per bushel of wheat exported, came up, we requested the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the hon. Minister of Agriculture to grant a similar rebate to those who, in Quebec and Ontario, were engaged in the dairy industry. This request was refused. On various occasions, this session, we again made the same request. In my comments on the budget, again I made the request to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture, that they grant to the Quebec farmers a similar amount to the one granted to the western farmers. When the government conceded this 5 cents rebate per bushel of wheat exported, they were not making a loan to the western provinces, but a gift. We ask the Minister of Agriculture to grant, this year, to Quebec the same amount which was given last year to the three western provinces. I think that this is a legitimate and fair proposition, and I cannot understand why the request made by the hon. Mr. Godbout—

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): There was never an official request made.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): —was not granted by the dominion government.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GOBEIL: The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska in his remarks just before six o'clock referred to the correspondence of the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe with the Minister of Agriculture at Quebec and to the letters read by the Minister of Agriculture passing between himself and the Hon. Mr. Godbout, and it was apparent from the whole remarks of the hon. member that he had one object and one object alone in view and that was to sidetrack the question. The letter of Mr. Godbout to the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe said in part:

> It is indeed unfortunate that the federal law in this respect does not apply in the same way to all the provinces of Canada.

That was the contention of the hon. Minister of Agriculture in the province of Quebec. The federal Minister of Agriculture in his answer made clear that the same law and the same treatment applied to everyone in Canada. Now what is the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska asking for? He is asking for special treatment for the province of Quebec; not that Quebec should be treated the same as the other provinces, as Mr. Godbout contended in his letter, but that Quebec should receive special treatment. He asks that the federal government at Ottawa should make a special grant to the province of Quebec for the purpose of buying seed grain, and so I say, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member is trying to sidetrack the question.

I can quite understand that the Quebec government would not dare to make application to this government for any aid for the citizens of the province of Quebec, for the very good reason that the Prime Minister of the province in his manifesto issued at St. Raymond, declared that there was no unemployment in the province of Quebec and that any there might be the government of the province of Quebec could very well take care of.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What has that to do with seed grain?

Mr. GOBEIL: Well, if the situation in Quebec was so flourishing that there was no unemployment, and if the Quebec government could take care of any unemployment there might be without help from the federal government, I do not see how Mr. Godbout or Mr. Taschereau or the provincial government can now come to this government and ask for aid.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Ferguson said in 1930 that the Ontario government could take care of the unemployed in the province, and then later he lambasted the Dominion government because it did not assist.

Mr. GOBEIL: I am not aware that the government of Ontario has applied to this government for seed grain.

[Mr. Gobeil.]

Mr. BRADETTE: You may not be aware of it, but we know it.

Mr. GOBEIL: How can the Quebec government come here and ask for aid in view of their declarations? If they ask for aid they will receive at the hands of this government exactly the same treatment as every other province of Canada. But in view of the declarations the premier of the province made in his manifesto, and which have been repeated several times since, not only by himself but by every member of his cabinet, and in view of the amount that the provincial government allowed to be expended on the roads last year during the election campaign, I think it would be very hard for them to prove to this government that the province of Quebec was entitled to seed grain. But if they come to this government and put before them the situation exactly as it is, I feel sure this government will grant them every aid and lend them money just the same as it has lent money to the western provinces. Perhaps the government of Quebec will come to this government and say: We owe to the citizens of the province of Quebec ten or eleven or twelve or thirteen million dollars for work done on the roads of the province last year and not yet paid for. I trust the house realizes the situation in which our poor people of Quebec are placed. I do not know the exact figure, and I do not think the provincial government itself knows, but it does owe approximately ten or twelve million dollars for work done on the roads last year. I know one parish in my county where the provincial government still owes $12,000 for work that was done, and in general fifty per cent of the work was useless. But the money was spent just the same; the poor farmers of Quebec earned the money and as yet they have not received one dollar of it. I could give you the names of many municipalities in my constituency in which work was done for which the provincial government owes money. So I say, Mr. Chairman, that if the Quebec government would put the facts as they are, not as they represent them to be, before this government, they would receive just the same treatment as any other province. Mr. Taschereau claims that he is going to have another good surplus on the thirtieth of June. Very likely he will show a surplus, but the province will still be owing to its citizens between twelve and fifteen million dollars. I repeat, that if the Quebec government places before this government, the situation exactly as it is in the province of Quebec, I have no doubt that the provincial government will receive its seed grain, because undoubtedly Quebec is in as bad a position as many of the other provinces.

But that is not all. Not only is money owed by the provincial government to farmers and settlers who have been working on the roads, but the provincial government also owes practically all grants to schools, practically all grants to farmers' clubs and practically all grants to agricultural societies of every kind. They have not made any payments since last year. Then I do not know how many hundreds of thousands of dollars is owing by the provincial government to its employees for salaries. One man told me personally that the provincial government owed him over one thousand dollars in salary. That is the situation with all their employees in the province of Quebec. I do not wish to delay the committee, Mr. Chairman, but I think these facts should be placed before it so that every member will realize the situation in which we are placed in the province of Quebec.

There is just one other matter. The Minister of Agriculture this afternoon was very charitable. He said he thought the Quebec Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Godbout, must have misinterpreted his letter. I disagree in that regard, because I believe Mr. Godbout understood perfectly the meaning of the letter. When he wrote the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe he knew he was not writing the truth. He knew that the statements in his letter were not according to facts. Although he is a new minister in the executive council of the province of Quebec, and although we may say he is a new politician, he has learned the game very quickly.

Mr. SPOTTON: They do in Quebec.

Mr. GOBEIL: They certainly do. He has followed the example of the rest of the council. Politics is the first thing they think about; it is ahead of everything. Politicians in that province think first of the party; then if the interests of the citizens do not conflict with party interests the citizens are given some consideration. The fact is, however, that every day of the year they are sacrificing the interests of the citizens of the province of Quebec, because they are not in accordance with the interests of the Liberal party.

I conclude by saying that Mr. Godbout was not sincere at all. I have no doubt he sent a similar letter to many other people, in an effort to deceive the population of the province of Quebec. He is trying to put a load on the federal government which they themselves cannot carry. That is his intention, and that is what he has been doing.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Chairman, I was just going to—

An hon. MEMBER: What do you know about Quebec?

Mr. HEENAN: I was just wondering. Mr. Chairman, may I have permission to get into this fight. I must say I do not know any more about the province of Quebec than does the hon. member who has just spoken.

Mr. HACKETT: Whom are you complimenting?

Mr. HEENAN: I do know, however—and I think the hon. member for Compton does not know it—that this government owes something to the province of Quebec. My hon. friend's leader promised in 1930 that he would put every man to work, or perish in the attempt.

An hon. MEMBER: Cheap.

Mr. HEENAN: The province of Quebec has been forced to proceed with its plan of road work because of the failure of this government to carry out its promises.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The old story.

Mr. HEENAN: The Prime Minister of Canada promised to put old age pensions in the province of Quebec.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not.

Mr. HEENAN: The Prime Minister promised to put old age pensions in the province of Quebec.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: Consequently, Quebec having to pay its share of old age pensions in other parts of the country, this government owes something to that province.

Mr. VENIOT: I notice that under the relief work carried on in the province of New Brunswick $60,000 was spent for clearing land. I have been informed that part, if not all of the money was expended to clear land of the experimental farm at Fredericton. Could the minister give the committee any details in that connection?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That work would be under the unemployment relief measures, and comes under the Department of Labour.

Mr. VENIOT: I know it does, but the money was expended by officials of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): What amount does the hon. member think was spent in the work of clearing land?

Mr. VENIOT: In the report of the superintendent of unemployment relief there appears an amount of $60,000.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): $60,000.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, expended on a fifty-fifty basis, divided between the federal and provincial governments. My information is that the greater part of that sum was expended on the clearing of lands connected with the experimental farm at Fredericton.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Although that does not come under the Department of Agriculture, my information is that the money spent for clearing land on the experimental farm at Fredericton totalled about $6,000.

Mr. VENIOT: Only $6,000?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. BOULANGER: How much was loaned by the federal government to each of the prairie provinces for the purchase of seed grain?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have not that information before me; it does not come under my department.

Mr. BOULANGER: Will the minister undertake to bring it down to-morrow?

Mr. BENNETT: It is not in the minister's department.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That does not come within my department. If the question were put on the order paper the Minister of Finance could answer it.

Mr. BOULANGER: If I put a question on the order paper at this late stage of the session I would never get an answer.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): How many experimental substations are there in Alberta?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Two.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): One of them is at Morrin.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Is the hon. member speaking about illustration stations or experimental substations?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am referring to experimental substations, and particularly to the rock farm at Morrin.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think the farm to which the hon. member is referring is neither an illustration station nor a substation, but a farm used by the entomological branch for experimental purposes.

Mr. BOULANGER: Will the minister tell me if the money loaned to the prairie provinces for the purchase of seed grain is loaned under the provisions of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I understand it is.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. BOULANGER: Is it correct to say that the farmers are giving notes to the provincial governments for advances made to them for seed grain?

Mr. BENNETT: Probably I had better answer that question. The Dominion of Canada offered to lend money to any province desiring to purchase seed grain for its people. It loaned money; it did not give it. The provinces of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta secured loans for that purpose, for which they gave their treasury bills or notes payable with interest. They made the arrangements with their own people as to the terms on which they loaned the money to them or bought the seed grain for them.

Mr. BOULANGER: Is it possible to get the amount of the loans?

Mr. BENNETT: I have not the figures in my head. I think however it was about $6,000,000 in Saskatchèwan, about $1,650,000 in Manitoba and less than $150,000 in Alberta.

An hon. MEMBER: That information has been given before.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; I speak subject to correction. In order to assist last fall Mr. McFarland took some preliminary steps to secure seed grain, which was subsequently bought by the province and distributed to the population, for which I understand under the provisions of a statute they gave notes secured by liens against the crops which will be grown with the seed. The terms and conditions under which the money was expended for seed, and the conditions under which the settlers received the seed, are wholly within the power of the provinces, and they made their own arrangements.

Mr. BOULANGER: Suppose the farmers do not give any security for their notes, and suppose that times continue to be bad, the notes will not be paid, and then the provinces will turn round and say to the federal government: We have not been able to collect on our notes, and therefore we are not going to pay our loan. Then eventually the loan will be written off. This is the money of the whole Canadian people to which the people of my province are contributing; and in that way they are contributing for the purchasing of seed grain in some sections of Canada while at the same time they are not receiving the same benefits.

Mr. BENNETT: Observations such as we have just listened to are what make for national disunion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: It is talk just such as that which brings public men into disrepute. The hon. gentleman is a past master at that sort of thing; that seems to be his one job, to endeavour to stir up animosity between provinces or between peoples. He knows perfectly well that the money loaned by this dominion to the provinces was secured by the treasury bills or bonds which they gave for the loans. He knows further—as every hon. gentleman knows—that the provinces made their own arrangements with respect to the purchase and distribution of seed grain, and took a loan upon the crop to be grown therefrom. To suggest that these men would repudiate their obligations or endeavour to escape the debts which were created does scant justice to the hardy pioneer spirit which they have shown. The other day a gentleman who had just come back from the west told me that the only optimists he had discovered were the men who are doing just what these men are doing. I cannot but deprecate—and I think every fair-minded man deprecates—this attempt to have it appear that Quebec is paying money for seed grain in Saskatchewan, and that possibly it will be lost money, a bad debt, and will have to be written off. If the province of Quebec desires to take a loan from this dominion for the purpose of providing its settlers with seed grain, that is available to-morrow. What is more, that is well known, too. I have seen the circulars that have been sent about by some members from Quebec for the purpose of endeavouring to have it appear that this government is favouring the three western provinces at the expense of the people of Quebec. I am bound to say that decent-minded people resent that kind of thing. There is no part of this country more willing to make its contribution to the national well-being than Quebec, and the hon. member does not interpret the genius of those people in their attitude towards the other provinces.

Mr. BOULANGER: What the Prime Minister deprecates so strongly now was part of the campaign of the Tory party in 1930.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Very cheap.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): When party feeling has subsided—

Mr. LAPOINTE: It has not.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): —may I ask the Minister of Agriculture to tell me what was the character of the work carried on at the Morrin rock farm substation, or whatever they call it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The chief work was a study, under the entomological branch, of the western cut-worm.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): They were also carrying on some investigation into the wire-worm?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is that work to be continued or has it been curtailed?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I understand it has not been curtailed; it will be continued.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I have not heard any discussion with regard to the illustration stations which come under this item, except as to the extent to which the item has been reduced. I think $17,555 apportioned for the illustration stations has been reduced. I would commend to the minister the work of these small illustration stations—at least as I know them. It so happens that in the province of Saskatchewan we have just four experimental farms. Obviously they are very far removed from each other, and it is impossible for the people in general to get in touch with them. In my own constituency I happen to have two of these small illustration stations, and I can say in regard to one of them that it is doing a splendid work in a small way at a minimum of expense. I think I am correct in saying that the total expenditure in connection with that one illustration station is about $250, possibly less, and yet it serves a community within a radius of twenty-five or thirty-five miles. I have figures showing that the expenditure in connection with some of the experimental farms amounts to over $40,000 each. Therefore one hundred and sixty of these little illustration stations could be run at the same expenditure as is necessary for one of the large farms. I am quite sure what they would accomplish would be comparatively more than what is accomplished by the large farms.

I do not know whether the minister is curtailing the work of those illustration stations or closing some of them out, or whether he is just decreasing the amount of money expended on each, but I would bespeak his favourable consideration for them. The large farms operating in Saskatchewan are located on a type of soil that is qute different from the soil in some other districts, and that is where the small stations can perform a very useful work. The one in my own district is close to the town in which I reside and is located on a heavy type of soil. We are fortunate in having a good practical farmer to supervise that station. He keeps everything in good shape. The farm is located on a well-travelled provincial highway, and is open for the inspection of the public at any time they go by. Every fall the supervisor has a field day when some two or three speakers are brought in either from the Scott or Swift Current experimental farms and a general assemblage of the farmers of the district is held under the auspices of the Kindersley Agricultural Society. I have been privileged to attend a number of those field days, and they impressed me very favourably. Considering the small expenditure made, the number of people that take advantage of those gatherings would indicate that the benefits to the local farmers are more than one might expect. Possibly from seventy-five to a hundred farmers assemble for the afternoon to listen to the addresses and inspect the different crops on the illustration station. They also get information with regard to different kinds of grain and grass seeds, and so on. Therefore I would say that having regard to the expenditure involved the work done by these small illustration stations is of considerable advantage to the farmers in the locality and should be continued. So far as Saskatchewan is concerned, have any of the illustration stations been closed?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Three have been recently closed.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: How many are still in operation?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Twenty-eight.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): I think last year a two hundred and fifty acre farm was purchased near Regina for experimental purposes. What is being done with the land?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It was suggested that we purchase an experimental farm in that heavy clay ground, but it was felt we could achieve the purpose and deal with the problem that they wished dealt with much more cheaply by renting a half-section. The work carried on is the study of weeds and especially of soil conditions, and the work is being continued.

Mr. SANDERSON: I should like to ask the minister a question with regard to dominion experimental farms in Ontario. Other than the farm here, what other experimental farms are there in this province?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is Kapuskasing in the north and Harrow in the southwest.

Mr. SANDERSON: That would make three, the one at Ottawa and the two the minister has just mentioned?

[Mr. Carmichael.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Those are the experimental farms, and there is a substation at St. Catharines.

Mr. SANDERSON: There is a reduction of $833,000. What proportion of that reduction is made in connection with the three Ontario farms?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The reduction in the substations is $16,000, and the reduction in the central experimental farm is $106,402. The percentage of reduction in Ontario is about 21 per cent, I am told, while the total reduction is about 24 per cent. The reduction of $106,402 in the amount to be spent at the central experimental farm in Ottawa is due to the fact that this farm is much more expensive to run under ordinary circumstances.

Mr. DONNELLY: I would like to know if the three illustration stations in the southern part of Saskatchewan, at Agema, at Rockglen and at Gravelburg, will be kept in operation this year.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They are still in operation.

Mr. McINTOSH: I should like to ask the minister if any of the illustration stations in the northern part of Saskatchewan, or to be more exact in the riding of North Battleford, have been closed.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In all there have been three recently closed. Is the station at Churchbridge in my hon. friend's constituency?

Mr. McINTOSH: No, I do not know where that is. I think before the last government went out of office there was an investigation made into the possibility of opening an illustration station in the northwestern part of the riding of North Battleford, north of the Beaver river. I asked for and received a parliamentary return last session in that regard, and the decision at the time was that establishment of the station in question could not be entertained. I am sure the minister will agree with me that during the last two years a great many farmers have gone into that part of the north from the southern and central parts of Saskatchewan, and because of this, that area is now fully settled. I believe the time is at hand when the people in that northern area would be very grateful to the minister if he would take up that question again and do what he can to open an illustration station there to guide and help the farmers in the development of that splendid territory.

While I am on my feet I want to thank the minister for what he has done in opening a new illustration station at Hafford, on the Canadian National railway between North Battleford and Prince Albert. I am not sure whether or not that station is in operation, but I know it was intended to have it going this year.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is in operation.

Mr. McINTOSH: Thank you.

Mr. BOULANGER: Just a few minutes before recess I understood the minister to say that his department contemplated the closing of the experimental farm at La Ferme, in the Abitibi district of northern Quebec. I strongly urge the department that this farm be continued, because of the peculiar situation which exists in that part of the country. This is a new country which has been opened to agriculture for only perhaps fifteen or twenty years. The people have gone there with that pioneer spirit upon which the Prime Minister is so prone to expatiate in this house. It seems to me that by closing down the experimental farm at that point the department would do a very poor service for those pioneers, those new settlers, those brave and worthy Canadians who are trying their best to open up a new district. I hope the Minister of Agriculture will take the case of these pioneers into his very serious consideration and not close down the experimental station at this point.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Chairman, the discussion seems to have wandered rather far from the item before the committee, and if I may I am going to direct a question to the minister which is not directly associated with the item now under discussion.

On different occasions in the house mention has been made of a marketing board; something has been said in favour of such an organization and something has been said against it. The county which I represent, so far as it is engaged in agriculture, is largely devoted to dairying and is deeply interested in butter, which is selling at a very low price. Whether or not a marketing board would prove successful in coming to the rescue of the beef producers or the wheat growers I do not know. It seems to me that the useful service which might be rendered by a marketing board depends to a very great extent on what proportion of the commodity produced is available for export, because it is the portion which goes into the markets of the world that determines the price at home. We are told that the consumption of butter in Canada has decreased materially due to hard times. We are told that last year we produced about 280,000,000 pounds of butter and that this amount, less than about 3 per cent or from 10,000,000 to 11,000,000 pounds, was consumed in Canada. The rest was exported, and the price of that small portion which was exported has fixed and determined the price of that which was sold in the country. As someone put it, if we produced 100 boxes of butter and shipped one box, the price at which we could sell the one box determined the price of the remainder. If it be true that we have but this small surplus to export, and we are exporting it to countries whose currency is depreciated, and as a consequence we are obliged to accept a price which is not only low in the face value of that currency, but lower still when it is transferred into our own currency, might we not do something for this industry by applying to our butter industry what other countries similarly situated have done? One-half of one cent levied on each pound of creamery butter produced in Canada last year, estimating the production to have been about 200,000,000 pounds, would have given $100,000, which would have been sufficient to raise the price of our export butter 5 or 6 cents a pound. And if it is the price of export butter—

Mr. SANDERSON: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I would direct your attention to item 39, which is dairying.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): The hon. gentleman is right. This discussion is absolutely out of order. If hon. members are to return to the marketing board we shall never get through the estimates.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was discussed all afternoon yesterday.

Mr. HACKETT: That is quite true, but we have talked about everything under the item expect butter, and my suggestion was merely this—

Mr. SANDERSON: May I ask for your ruling on the point of order, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I must uphold the point of order; the present discussion is out of order. The committee is now considering experimental farms.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Not yet. I do not think I should allow this vote to go by without expressing some of my disappointment at the emasculated condition it was in when it first came down. Earlier in the session I was capable of being shocked, and in fact I was shocked when I first saw the vote; but I have had so many shocks since then that my shock-absorber has reached the saturation point, and I have ceased to be shocked any more. Besides that, I am somewhat mollified by the supplementary estimates, at least to the extent of about six per cent. There has been some reparation, especially in connection with this vote for experimental farms, so that the government has come back to normal to the extent of six per cent. I am not going to blame the minister very much. I have been in his shoes so many times and so long that I know he did not bring down the estimates to council in this dismantled form in the first instance. I am sure that his director, sitting in front of him, did not pass them on to his deputy in that reduced way in the first instance, nor the deputy to the minister, the minister to the treasury board, and the treasury board to council. There was a nigger in the woodpile somewhere else when these estimates were prepared, and I am wondering who it was. The then Minister of Finance (Mr. Bennett) has, of course, to sit hard on the chest; that is his duty. But if you have a good case—

Mr. GAGNON: I rise to a point of order also. The hon. gentleman is out of order, and it is to be regretted—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am talking about this vote and the smallness of it, and I was going to give the minister a kindly tip how to avoid such disastrous reductions in the future. If the minister says that he does not want it, I will not give him the advice—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: —but I am not going to heed the howlings of the rear guard.

An hon. MEMBER: He doesn't need your advice.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I needed it at one time, and I suspect the minister won't be any the worse for it. However, we will let it go and I will give it to him confidentially.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, it is not carried. You don't like my tips over there. I wonder whether the minister would consider this—

Mr. GAGNON: I want a decision on my point of order.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is no point of order about it. As I was saying, I want the minister to consider this. We have had various kinds of cuts this session—the Bennett cut, the Rhodes cut, and the cut on civil servants—but this experimental farms cut is "the most unkindest cut of all," and I was wanting the minister to avoid it another year. We have been promised that the ten per cent cut in salaries and indemnities will be for one year only, and if the minister would assure us that he would endeavour to have his colleagues seriously consider making this reduction in connection with experimental farms and agriculture generally for one year only, trying to get back to normal next year, I would not say anything further. In fact, I would not say anything at all about any of the estimates because there is not much use doing so, particularly now the government have demonstrated in the supplementary estimates their recognition that they made a profound blunder in reducing agriculture in this way in the first instance. I want to express my appreciation of what the government has come to realize and admit this to be so, and I trust that the minister will endeavour to put agriculture in the same one-year category as the rest of us in regard to reductions. I am asking for agriculture only what has been granted to myself, namely, that this reduction as in the case of the members' ten per cent cut, will be for one year only. The Senate has got the same promise and so have the civil servants, and surely agriculture, which sustains us all and keeps half the people of Canada occupied, is worthy of the same consideration that is given members of the house and of the Senate. I do not even ask the minister for a reply; I simply ask him to take this suggestion into his very best reasoned consideration and work hard for its consummation next year.

Mr. CAYLEY: I have just one question to ask the minister. I know that he realizes the mistake that he has made in connection with the estimates, and I have faith that he will play the game, in spite of what my friend has said. The minister knows quite well how important the tobacco industry in southern Ontario is, and what rapid strides it has made. He knows what it means to those farmers engaged in it. He knows what is being done in part of Oxford county, in Norfolk and Elgin, in experimentation and demonstration for the benefit of the farmers who are following along that line. May I ask for a statement from him in this regard.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The Harrow station, in the vicinity the hon. member is discussing, is carrying on experiments and there are illustration stations which are also doing demonstration work. In addition to that, there is the soil survey, which is perhaps the most important thing of all in connection with the growing of tobacco. That is not being curtailed.

Mr. CAYLEY: Is there any likelihood of establishing another demonstration farm east of that in Norfolk county or in Oxford?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Only demonstration plots this year, not demonstration farms.

Mr. MacLEAN: Can the minister give any information in regard to the experimental ranch at Summerside, Prince Edward Island? A considerable amount of money was spent there in improvements last year, and if the minister has any information under his hand I should like to have it. I should be glad if he would inform me as to the first estimate, also the total cost of the house, how it was built, and in fact all the information he has regarding the whole matter.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The house referred to was built by day labour and cost approximately $8,000.

Mr. MacLEAN: Built by whom?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): By day labour, not by contract.

Mr. MacLEAN: Who was in charge of the work?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am afraid I have not that information available, but I shall be glad to forward it to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McINTOSH: A few moments ago I was referring to the possibility of establishing an illustration station in the northwestern part of the North Battleford federal riding, for the Loon lake, Makwa and other districts, and I intimated that a report had been made on this matter three years ago. My own impression of that report is that it was political in character and absolutely unjustified, and I ask the minister if he will personally look into it and if possible investigate the area with a view to establishing in this new and rapidly developing district an illustration station as soon as possible. If he will do this, I shall be obliged.

Item agreed to.

Assistance to fairs and exhibitions, including the Royal Agricultural Winter Fair, $350,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What fairs are affected by the reduction of $300,000?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The amounts of grants to B class fairs are not changed, nor are those to regional fairs. There will be some reduction in the grant to the Toronto royal winter fair, and the grants to A class fairs are being reduced to $2,500 while the grants to the other winter fairs are reduced to $2,500. The grants to boys' and girls' clubs of various kinds are not being reduced.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am gratified to hear that the grants to class B fairs are not being reduced below $1,500. If I remember correctly, a few years ago these grants ran as high as $4,000 each. Under the old government they were dropped to $2,500 each, and then brought down to $1,500 each. I understand some pressure was brought to bear upon the department this year to make a further reduction, but the minister did not accede to that request. He did the right thing by not making that reduction. The only reason I am saying anything to-night in connection with this matter is because I would like to impress upon the minister the importance of raising these grants in the near future from $1,500 to $2,500. These fairs are doing work equally as good as, if not superior to, the class A fairs and I do hope the minister will give all the support he can within the next year or so to a move in this direction. If he does, I am satisfied he will have the support of the agriculturists of Canada in the districts in which these exhibitions function.

Mr. BOWMAN: Do I understand that the grants to regional fairs have been dropped?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The same sum is included in this vote for regional fairs as was included last year. The plan we are following in this connection is to select one B class fair in each province to which a special grant of $1,000 is given. This grant is made in an effort to encourage healthy rivalry between the different communities surrounding the particular B class fair. The different townships or municipalities surrounding that centre group together in making district exhibits. Last year the district winning the most points at that fair is given out of the $1,000, a grant of $400 by the fair board as first prize to be used to encourage the local agricultural association or society. This method brings the district together as a unit rather than dividing it under the old system of individual prizes. The district winning the second highest number of points is granted $300, the next district, $200, and the next, $100. This procedure will be followed for a number of years in each province in an effort to see the results obtained. I might say that we were very gratified last year at the results obtained and we purpose continuing such grants to different B class fairs. In this way the grants for B class fairs will be practically raised.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): Is the department looking after the provincial winter fair at Guelph as usual?

Mr. GOULET (Translation): Mr. Chairman I notice, by this item, that the government is carrying on its policy of cutting down expenditure. Last year the government appropriated for agricultural exhibitions the sum of $650,000. This year the grant is reduced to $350,000. It is a cut of $350,000 at 46 per cent. The assistance given to agricultural exhibitions represents outwardly, since it is a kind of advertisement, assistance to farming. The item therefore entirely sums up the government's policy. This year, the government under pretext of cutting down expenditure, thought fit to reduce the estimates of agriculture. Others who preceded me in this debate have stated their views on this kind of economy as vexatious as it is irrational. If there is a department where the estimates should have been increased instead of being cut down, it is certainly that of agriculture.

It is common topic that agriculture is the foundation of the national economic structure. This house has often heard it repeated. It appears daily in the press. Economists are unanimous in proclaiming it. A nation without agriculture cannot subsist. History gives us many proofs of this. The world of to-day would not be undergoing such a serious crisis, if it had not forgotten that underlying principle. It is not only in the economic field that a chasm intervenes between the principle and the practice. But it is always amazing to note how easily under the sway of ambition, one neglects what would prove its strength and resistance, and how easily one forsakes the prey for the shadow.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): The Canadian people have done so.

Mr. GOULET (Translation): The shadow is overcapitalized industry, industry on a large scale. The prey is the land, the soil, agriculture. A number of countries such as England, Germany and Japan, owing to an overcrowded population from which they suffered had to forsake the land and go in for an intensive and unbounded industrial development. They depend on other countries for their living. And it is in the former countries that the crisis is most acute: it is industrial, financial, commercial, and therefor social in character.

Here, in Canada, there would be no reason to suffer from such depression, if we had strictly adhered to the principle that agriculture is the foundation of all lasting economic structure, if we had not despised this axiom, a common-place one, so admitted by all. Canada encloses a vast area of land suited to farming but not yet settled. The land at our disposal is perhaps not unlimited as it was truly pointed out, it is, however, considerable, especially in Ontario and Quebec.

We are fortunately witnessing a change of thought which we would, however, like to see, more general. Some still imagine that when they have discussed trade, finances, currency, gold standard, transportation, they have covered all topics and feel quite at their ease.

They are laggards, they were responsible for the fiasco of our immigration policy and our deplorable emigration to the United States. Governments are still entangled in the webs of incoherent economic theories.

Broadminded people clearly saw the path to follow. They advocated settling the country and the back to the land movement in order to relieve congested cities and bring back the deserters to the farm.

Mr. GOBEIL: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. gentleman is reading his speech.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): It is rather late in the session to raise that as a point of order.

Mr. GOULET (Translation): However, it is important to convince ourselves that we must, to insure the success of the back-to-the-land movement, begin by improving the condition of agriculture. Much was done to foster industry. It was no doubt necessary. Measures of urgency are always measures of urgency. But now that industry seems to enjoy permanent assistance through a protective tariff, special transport rates, dumping duties, etc.; would it not be opportune to grant an efficient and substantial assistance to agriculture?

It has been considered. There has been enough proof of good will. Up to the present, however, people have been too exclusively concerned with the one-crop (wheat) system of the west. There again, the government was right to grant a rebate of 5 cents per bushel of wheat exported. The appeal of the western provinces was urgent. The situation there was desperate. However, since so much was done for the single wheat crop, why should nothing be done for mixed farming and live stock breeding in the eastern provinces.

The situation of Ontario farmers is alarming for all those who are well acquainted with it. If in Northern Ontario and New Ontario, the situation is less critical, owing to more favourable local markets and better prices for farm products, it is nevertheless a fact that the farming sections of the south-west, and especially those of the east, comprised within the counties of Russell, Prescott, Stormont and Glengarry are seriously affected by the crisis. Their condition has become alarming. The lack of markets for farm products and the extraordinary low prices prevailing, have placed especially the farmers of these sections, not only in straitened circumstances, but are forcing them to abandon their farms either through the land being seized or sold by sheriff sale in order to recover the taxes.

I was informed, a few weeks ago that, in a parish of my county and in the most fertile concession a number of families were abandoning their farms. They found it impossible to meet the taxes and their rents. The banks admit that they will have to levy execution in order to recover their loans. Farmers are therefore in great difficulties. It is urgent, as urgent as to grant a rebate on wheat, to come to their rescue.

Mr. GOBEIL: I rise to a point of order. Mr. Chairman, and it is that the hon. member is not speaking to the question before the chair. The hon. member for Stanstead was called to order for not speaking to the question, and I think the hon. member for Russell should be called to order.

Mr. GOULET (Translation): It behooves the government to do its utmost to improve the lot of the farming class. In the counties of Russell and Prescott, farmers draw their main revenue from the sale of dairy products; milk, butter and cheese.

Without disbursing a cent, the government could give some relief which has been requested for a long time past by owners of cattle. We have reason to believe that the milk producers do not get all that is coming to them by right. I wish to congratulate the member for Prescott (Mr. Bertrand) on the speech he delivered last week. The hon. member for Prescott drew the attention of the government to the treatment meted out to the farmers by the dairies.

The producer receives $1.10 per cwt. of milk delivered under contract. For the surplus or balance he receives 55 cents per cwt., the accounts being settled weekly or every fortnight. While the city consumer pays for his milk 9, 10 and 11 cents a quart. As there are forty quarts in a 100 lbs. of milk, the consumer therefore pays $3.60, $4.00 or $4.40, per cwt. The difference between what the producer receives and the consumer pays, is therefore $2.50, $2.90 or $3.30. Is this margin not excessive? Is it entirely absorbed by the cost of pasteurization, bottling and delivery? Nobody could believe that, and such is practically my view in the matter.

At all events, it behooves the government to ascertain, once for all, the reasons for this remarkable spread between the prices received by the producer and those paid by the consumer and it should redress the grievances of the producers of that section of the country. These grievances are the more so justified seeing that their milk would but give them a return of 55 cents per cwt...

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. GOULET (Translation): ...because the dairy factory reckon it as surplus.

It is contended that the milk, cheese, butter and leather trusts hold the farmers in bondage.

Mr. TETREAULT: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. gentleman is not speaking to the question before the chair. The hon. member for Stanstead was called to order for not speaking to the question, and I submit the hon. gentleman is equally out of order.

Mr. GOULET (Translation): They are so strongly held in bondage that they find it impossible to break their shackles. They are forced to accept the price offered to them. The Quebec government is holding an inquiry in connection with the milk industry. They started...

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Let them complete their work.

Mr. GOULET (Translation): . .the inquiry a few months ago, and I am informed that the results obtained up to now are very satisfactory.

The Dominion government have experts, in this connection, in the Department of Agriculture. Would not these experts be most willing to hold an inquiry of this kind? The government should appoint a commission to study thoroughly this question of farm product trusts. It is regrettable to note how easily and remorselessly the government forsake the farmers, when it does not, through its negligence, hand them over closely bound to the trust which exploit them.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Carried.

Mr. GOULET (Translation): The farmers request also, not only in Ontario counties but throughout every county of Quebec, a bonus on butter and cheese. Precedents have been established by assisting industries which were certainly not as deserving as the dairy industry. Election pledges were made in this connection, and we are still waiting for these pledges to materialize.

Last Sunday, at three different meetings, held successively at St. Albert, Hammond and Marionville, in the county of Russell, the farmers were unanimous in endorsing a request to the government for the granting of a bonus on butter and cheese. And I am pleased to act as their mouth-piece in praying to government to comply with such a reasonable request on their part.

The farmer, without being taxed with exaggeration, could claim redress for many other grievances. Why should they be backward about it since others do not have the same scruples and unceasingly request millions of dollars from the government? For whom was the Hudson Bay railway constructed? For whom is a trans-Canadian highway being built? For whose benefit—does parliament enact the high protective tariff which is a loss to the treasury of many hundreds of millions of dollars per year?

The farmer requests to be exempted from the Bankruptcy Act. Is it not possible to grant him more favourable interest rates so as to carry him through the present crisis?

The government would be well advised to increase the appropriations for Agriculture instead of cutting them down, and grant to the man on the land some of the favours which it reserves to industry and trade. If it earnestly wishes a return to prosperity the path is opened. No class of our community is more deserving of sympathy than that of the farmers. No class, either is more courageous when faced with difficulties. However, this must not be a reason to foresake them.

Mr. HOWARD: Mr. Chairman, I just wish to say a word on this item which affects particularly my section of the country. May I appeal not only to hon. members on this side of the house, but to hon. members opposite who represent eastern township constituencies to support what I am going to say. The eastern townships of the province of Quebec constitute one of the leading dairying sections of the dominion. Every fall in that section we have what are known as regional or county fairs. After the county fairs have been held in the different counties the prize winners go to the city of Sherbrooke and exhibit at a class A fair known as the "Canada's great eastern exhibition," which is held every fall in that place. For years past the federal government has agreed to pay to the farmers in prize money one-third of the money paid out by the directors of the exhibition association, up to $5,000. The province of Quebec pays two-thirds of the prize money up to $10,000. Hon. members will note, therefore, that the government is not giving a grant of that amount to the exhibition. The prize money is handed out to the farmers, and goes back into the eastern counties of the townships. I want hon. members to understand that the federal government pays one-third and the provincial government two-thirds of the prize money.

As everybody knows, last year the Eastern Townships Agricultural Association, with headquarters at Sherbrooke, had a very bad year, went considerably behind in their receipts and suffered a severe deficit. This year it was questionable whether or not the fair would be carried on. If it were a local fair it might possibly get more support from the surrounding country, but being a class A fair and the climax of all our county fairs in the eastern townships, it is in a class by itself I think the government and hon. members opposite who come from the eastern townships should insist that the department pay at least one-third of those prize moneys which go directly to the farmers. The grant I have been describing was cut off entirely. I understand from the minister that the department will consent to give $2,500, but I claim that under present conditions that sum is not sufficient.

A few moments ago the hon. member for Compton criticized the legislation of the province of Quebec. I ask him to consider the difference in treatment in this connection given by the federal and provincial governments. The province of Quebec pays two-thirds of the prize moneys, which go direct to the farmers, or the sum of $10,000, on the condition that the federal government will pay one-third, or $5,000. The federal government has cut the grant off entirely. On the other hand the exhibition directors went to Quebec and were told that the provincial government would pay its share, just the same, that they would pay their $10,000 regardless of the action of the federal government. The federal Minister of Agriculture has since decided that help to the fairs is necessary to the continued development of the live stock industry, and has decided to pay one-half of the regular sum, namely, $2,500. I thank him for that, and I am not criticizing. If, however, he realizes the absolute necessity of trying to keep agriculture to the forefront and trying to keep the boys on the farms, trying to ensure the permanence of that dairying section of the eastern townships, he would make an exception in this particular case. I expect the other hon. members from the eastern townships to back me, and take steps to have the federal government's share replaced at the $5,000 figure.

Realizing that the prize money goes not to the exhibition authorities but directly to the farmers, the provincial legislature has decided, in spite of the fact that the federal government has reduced its share to $2,500, to give a further $2,500 to help out in the present crisis. I said this afternoon and I repeat to-night that it is unfortunate to cut the estimates of the Department of Agriculture to the extent of $3,000,000. Surely that is one industry which should have been encouraged. In this particular instance I appeal to the hon. members for the eastern townships, whether they be Conservatives or Liberals. I ask them to get together, to get behind this movement and have the grant replaced at the old figure of one-third of the sum paid out in prize money up to $5,000.

Mr. BOWMAN: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the regional fair grants to class B fairs throughout the Dominion to which the hon. member has just referred, may I say that last year in the province of Manitoba the class B fair was held at Dauphin, in my own constituency, and was chosen as an experiment. I have before me a letter from the president of the Dauphin fair board in which he states that last year they had the most successful fair in the history of their organization. They attribute their success very largely to the grant of $1,000 received from the government for the purpose of experimenting in regional fairs.

I had hoped that the minister would see fit to continue the grants to fairs which made the experiment last year. The department must remember that the $1,000 does not go to the fair board, but to the district. As the minister has explained, it is divided in the sums of $400, $300, $200 and $100 to the districts winning first, second, third and fourth marks respectively. By the distribution of this money a friendly competitive spirit has been aroused among the exhibitors in the outlying districts. The district served by the central fair has been divided into districts, each of which has a class C fair. As a result the boards of directors of the class C fairs have taken a very active interest in the class B fairs. The consequence is that in a very large district covering perhaps a radius of one hundred miles, there has been a keen competitive spirit among the class C fairs to earn these grants of from $100 up to $400 as the case may be. It should be pointed out that when these moneys were distributed they were in turn added by the winners to their prize lists, and so the grants had a cumulative effect. Might I point out to the minister that while the class B fair at Dauphin in Manitoba did not get any money from the actual grant, nevertheless the managers were put to a very large expense in arranging for the competition, additional stabling room alone representing an expenditure of $600.

If it can possibly be done at this late stage, I would suggest that the same grant be given to the fairs that made the experiment last year in order that they may continue it further. I have it from the authorities at home who have been in charge of the local fair for years,—and it is one of the most successful in western Canada,—that this is the best spent money that has ever been contributed by any government for fair or exhibition purposes. I trust the minister will see his way clear to continue this grant but on a larger scale.

Mr. HACKETT: While the hon. member for Sherbrooke was on a mission to foreign parts the officers and directors of the eastern townships exhibition came to Ottawa, where they met the members for the eastern townships—and would have met the member himself had he been here. Those gentlemen and the members waited upon the Minister of Agriculture, and it may be that one of the results of the conference was the grant of $2,500 which is to be made by the federal government. At that time only $10,000 was available from the Quebec government. If a further sum of $2,500 has come to the fair from the province, it has been received recently, because when here the directors were very definite that $10,000 was the maximum that would come to them from the provincial government. The hon. member for Sherbrooke suggests that we are all interested in that fair.

Mr HOWARD: Hear, hear.

Mr. HACKETT: That is quite true. I am sure he knows the government is very much interested in it, and that if the government has not found it expedient to contribute as much this year as in the past, it is for the very best of reasons. We know that demands upon the treasury have lately been very heavy. The exhibitors from the eastern townships will this year, even on a reduced prize list, receive more as prizes than they ever have in the past by reason of the new policy introduced by the exhibition authorities excluding all professionals who for many years have taken away the prizes from these local shows.

Mr. HOWARD: Would you suggest then still further reducing it if that is going to give them more money?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): With reference to the statement of the hon. member for Sherbrooke, the sincerity of his desire to help agriculture and his interest in it is, I think, best exemplified by the fact that he does not even know how the federal grant has been given to the Sherbrooke fair. The rest of his speech did not deal with agriculture so much as Quebec versus Canada, and I would think we have heard enough of that to-night. Regarding the policy of this department in assisting the live stock men in Quebec, we feel that the money we are expending in a different way, as was discussed the last day my estimates were before the committee, is of greater benefit to the farmers of that province than the contributions to fairs in the past. I prefer without any hesitation to allow the farmers of Quebec to pass judgment on our policies rather than those who are actuated by purely political motives.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What was the amount of the grant to the Quebec city provincial exhibition last year, and what is the amount to be given this year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Last year Quebec city got $5,000 as a straight grant and $3,000 as a building grant; this year those grants will be $2,500 and $3,000 respectively. This year I understand the provincial government are convinced there is so much merit in the regional system of fairs that they have decided to adopt that system for the entire province.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: In view of the number of communications that we have received from the officials of the B fairs and the anxiety they display, have they been notified that the grant will be again paid in full this year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They will be notified.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Has the ten year grant of $25,000 for the royal winter fair expired yet? I think it expires this fall.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Last fall.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Will the grants to the twelve or fourteen A and winter fairs throughout the country be continued in full?

[Mr. Hackett.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The A fair grants will be $2,500 as a straight grant.

Mr. CAYLEY: Where will the regional fair be in Ontario this year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Last year it was at Peterborough.

Mr. RAYMOND: What was the grant to the Valleyfield fair last year, and what will it be this year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It was $5,000 last year and this year it will be $2,500.

Mr. DUPUIS: I should like to know if small county fairs will receive grants this year.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The federal government does not give grants to county fairs.

Item agreed to.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Post Office—outside service, $31,451,100.

Mr. POULIOT: As my good friend the Minister of Finance said the other day, I have obtained quite a number of returns this session and I am very grateful for the information they have contained, but this discussion will last much longer if the minister does not give satisfactory replies, because then I will have to submit my case to the house. If the hon. gentleman who is Postmaster General will be fair enough to give fair answers to my fair questions, however, the discussion will be very short. We have been speaking of fairs for the last few minutes; now I will speak about fairness.

There is a matter which caused some concern to the house some time ago. I refer to the case at St. Eusebe de Cabano, and I remember that when the question was answered in the house it aroused quite a storm. The gentleman who is now postmaster there carried liquor for the purpose of canvassing during the last provincial election, and I have denounced him from my seat in this House of Commons. I do not know what are his politics, because he changes so often, but he was appointed by the present Postmaster General, who has been fair enough to promise an investigation into this case. This is satisfactory, but the answer is not complete. We have had investigations held by commissioners who have not been sworn, though they have administered the oath to witnesses. I should like to know from the hon. gentleman first if such an investigation is carried on under his instructions, if the commissioner will be sworn before undertaking that investigation, and in the next place whether the investigation will take place before the end of June. That was the date I mentioned previously. Now I will ask whether it will take place before the end of July, and I would be very grateful to the minister if he would answer my questions.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to inform the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) that I shall do everything possible to give him satisfaction in connection with the case of St. Eusebe de Cabano. I further wish to state that it is not the usual practice to have the commissioner sworn in. I simply followed the practice adopted, in the past, by my hon. friends in the opposition when they were in power.

The commissioner is appointed by order in council and carries out the inquiry which is requested of him when a reasonable complaint is lodged. So far as the date of the inquiry in question, I may state that it will be held as soon as possible, but as to fixing a date, a day, that is rather difficult. I do not think that the hon. member for Temiscouata can expect as much.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Will the commissioners be instructed to find the postmaster guilty?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The Postmaster General's answer pains me much because I have personal knowledge that certain commissioners, immediately after the inquiry, had first stated that they had nothing to reproach the person charged, then later on put him to the rack. They sent in reports without first taking the oath. The hon. Postmaster General is very kind to promise me that an inquiry will be held in the case of St. Eusebe de Cabano, however, if the commissioner does not take the oath, I would rather not have the inquiry; in fact, if there is none held, the commissioner will not be given the opportunity to lie about the person charged.

This is all, sir, I have to say to the hon. Postmaster General, for the moment, with reference to the St. Eusebe de Cabano affair. There has been an offence committed by a postmaster, an offence far more serious than others for which postmasters have been dismissed. In the present case the postmaster will have to undergo an inquiry before an individual who is not a commissioner but an executor, I do not care to have an inquiry, and I wish to thank the Postmaster General, all the same, for his kindness, but there is always the immanent justice which will settle the case of the postmaster who transported liquor during election time.

With regard to the oath taken by commissioners I should like to make a constructive suggestion which will help bring about economy in the department. I have not much faith in these investigations. They have cost a good deal of money, though I do not blame the Postmaster General for that. I understand very well that the supporters of the defeated candidate hang around him like flies around a jar of honey, trying to get something for themselves or for their friends. They consider him like honey in order to get money, but the point is that these investigations are rather a farce. They have been carried on for a number of years; sometimes they are fair and sometimes they are not. I suggest first of all that the complainants, or those who give evidence against any postmaster, should never be given a job. At the present time, in my county, I know of nine cases in which men who have given evidence against the postmaster for political reasons have obtained the job. This is most unfair. A man is out of work and he decides that he is going to get a job. There is a good man already occupying the position, one against whom no one has anything to say. But it happens—and this is true only too often—that only one man, the man who wants to get the job, is prepared to say that to his knowledge the postmaster has been a political canvasser. The leaders of the Conservative party, one after another, will say, "To my knowledge that man has never played politics since his appointment," and the only evidence against him is the evidence of the man who is anxious to get the job. And at times that man is appointed by the minister instead of by the commission. Now I can assure the minister that the man who gets the job at the expense of the other fellow deliberately lies in many instances. This, I submit, is most unfair, and to sum up my suggestion, I say that in these cases there should be no political investigation by a commissioner, but instead there should be required two or three affidavits from people who are absolutely disinterested. People who have no interest whatever in the matter should give evidence to the satisfaction of the new lawyer in the department of the Postmaster General.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is he?

Mr. POULIOT: I refer to Mr. Lalonde, and I congratulate the minister on that appointment, for it is well to have a lawyer there to check the returns. I am entirely in favour of that; it is a very wise move. We shall see how he does his work and whether he is entitled to blame or praise. If he does his work well, he will receive some praise from me, because there are other lawyers who carry on investigations in a most unfair way. I ask the minister, is not that a sensible suggestion? It would save $33,000 in the Post Office Department.

I very much regret that two departments presided over by ministers from the province of Quebec should show the largest number of investigations and dismissals. It is very sad. Is it not better to have two or three affidavits sworn to by people who are not looking for jobs themselves than to have only one witness, and that witness the very man who is anxious to get the job? He is sure to give such evidence as he thinks will bring him the job. I know of instances where a man has lied in his evidence and his statement has been denied under oath by other people. I will mention cases with which the Postmaster General is familiar, and which are repugnant to any man's sense of justice and fair play. The commissioner asks a witness: Do you swear that this man has never played politics since his appointment as postmaster? The man swears, yes. Later on the question is asked him: Do you swear that of your knowlege? He replies; Yes, I swear it. And further on: Do you remember whether that man has ever played politics? The answer is, no, I don't remember. Very well. Then he says in his report, "This man does not remember that the other man has played politics." It is not a negation; it is a shade, a distinction, but it is crooked just the same. And it is more crooked for the commissioner to act that way, to put words into the mouth of the witness. Moreover, the evidence of the man was denied by another person. I would therefore ask the minister to consider very seriously the suggestion I have made in the interests of economy, and for the sake of the dignified and proper discharge of duties which are quite onerous. Is it not reasonable to ask that those who shall lodge complaints or those who shall give evidence shall not be persons who are likely to benefit from their own action? It is fair play, so much so that there is not an honourable member who will get up in this house and say otherwise. But not only that; if the minister wants to enjoy peace in his department, he must establish general principles by which people shall abide—principles which must govern members who have been elected from the Conservative party and defeated candidates as well, who, perhaps, are most troublesome to the peace of mind of the minister.

I wish to cite some cases, and I shall be very brief. I will start with the case of Sully of Témiscouata county.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I know the man.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. POULIOT: The ex-Minister of Justice says he knows the man. He knows the postmaster who has been dismissed, and I know him too. He is well known by his fellow citizens, and that explains the fact that he has been mayor of the municipality for many years. But before taking up the Sully case may I once more ask the minister whether he will kindly consider my suggestion that complaints shall be lodged only on the strength of affidavits sworn to by people who are not likely to be appointed, or by a member of parliament, from his seat or over his own signature.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I was about to ask the hon. member for Témiscouata if I might answer the suggestions he has just made as to this new method of carrying on investigations. I say without hesitation that the suggestions of the hon. member for Témiscouata are worth looking into. The method is a new one, never followed by my predecessors. I do not know if the hon. member for Témiscouata has consulted with the former Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) who enjoys a wealth of experience; if he has not, I shall make it a point to ask his opinion when the time comes because the matter is of a truly serious nature.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): As to the commissioner, I am rather surprised at what the hon. member for Témiscouata says. He is a lawyer, he is intelligent, he has political experience—

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): —he knows perfectly well that since the time of Laurier up to the present, investigating commissioners have been appointed by the governor in council. If the hon. member for Témiscouata desires to make certain exceptions in the case of a few errors that may have happened, as he says, very well. But why denounce all the investigating commissioners?

As to having three commissioners sworn I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that this method has not been followed heretofore. If complaints are made against certain commissioners there are ways of bringing such charges. But the hon. member for Témiscouata mentions no names in his denunciations; he accuses all those commissioners who, in the past, have carried on investigations without being under oath. This, to my mind, does not reflect his real thought.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the committee and of the hon. member for Témiscouata, I shall answer the questions asked the other day when we began the discussion of the Post Office estimates. I wish to be well understood. My hon. friends of the opposition will admit that I have sufficient parliamentary experience to know what constitutes a proper reception of their remarks, their protests and their criticisms. I am ready to accept, and to answer as decently as I may, the varied criticisms of my opponents. If I have not continued, before this, the discussion of my departmental estimates, it was, first of all, because I had not been called upon to do so, and also because my deputy was the victim of an accident and has not recovered sufficiently to permit of his resuming his work.

The hon. member for Témiscouata began by mentioning certain cases. I prefer this method to that followed last week. You understand how difficult it would be for me to answer a volley of questions from all sides at once, and all treating of entirely different matters. Mr. Chairman, I have never been afraid of any task assigned to me: I have never given ground in the presence of duty, nor turned tail before an antagonist. The hon. member for Témiscouata knows me well enough to realize that I am fully disposed to answer, to the best of my ability, any reasonable question asked of me.

As regards the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) he will allow me this evening to advise him, in the most well-intentioned language, to refrain from overstepping the mark when giving evidence of his animosity towards myself, an animosity that I fail to understand, but which appears to be inspired by people outside of this house.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Mr. Chairman, may I be allowed—

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): If it pleases the committee I would like to finish my reply; the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville can speak afterwards.

Mr. DUPUIS: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) claims that I have a personal feeling against him. I should like him to withdraw that remark because I speak here only as a member of parliament, as a representative of the people and in the interests of the people.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I never said what the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville claims I did. I continue. The reproaches he hurled at me from the other side of the chamber fell mostly on the former Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot). The hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville had he any right to attack me in the peculiarly violent manner he used the other day? Had he any right to declare that he was being abused, to decry my treatment of postmasters in the county of Laprairie-Napierville? There are seventeen postmasters in that county; only one was dismissed. There you have my crime!

An hon. MEMBER: Injustice.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): I beg your pardon; if the hon. minister will consult his departmental files he will see that there were three or four dismissals.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That's nothing.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I say again that only one postmaster was dismissed in Laprairie, and his dismissal followed on a report of the commissioner appointed by order in council.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Was he under oath?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): A commissioner appointed by order in council. Under the Liberal administration such commissioners were never sworn and the hon. member made no protest.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if you please, let us settle this matter of dismissals; let us see how great was my guilt, how far my hon. friends on the Liberal side were justified in being scandalized at my conduct. Out of a grand total of 12,487 postmasters in Canada the present government, since August, 1930, has dismissed 650—

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Not very many!

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): —after investigations conducted by commissioners appointed according to the law and regulations laid down by preceding governments.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Will the hon. minister allow a question?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Pardon me; when I am through with my statement the hon. member can speak as long as he wishes.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Just one question; I would like to know, for the province of Quebec—

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I will come to that. I made these dismissals following personal declarations of sitting members, or the reports of my departmental inspectors. Dismissals may be due to different causes: political partisanship, unsuitable premises or faulty administration. I did not cause a single dismissal to be made without the authorization given under the law and the regulations established before I took up the Post Office Department.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Under the Liberal régime of my hon. friend the member from Laprairie-Napierville, 1,147 postmasters were dismissed, yes, 1,147.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Within how many years?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Of which number 387 were made without any investigation whatsoever. From September, 1926, to August, 1930, the Liberal government dismissed 676 postmasters, 211 without the slightest investigation and without any complaints that may be found in the files of the department.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Shame! Shame!

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): I shall wait patiently.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): What were their salaries?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I have been accused of undue severity towards the postmasters in Quebec, my own province; I have been called a traitor to my province.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): For shame!

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): It is true.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): There are other Liberals who do not speak in the same way.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): In what way?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): In such a way as to ensure me the praises of opponents whom I have fought. I ask my hon. friend to read Le Soleil of Quebec which says that I have always shown myself to be a loyal and honourable opponent. That is what I wish to be, now and always. It is said against me that I dismissed too many postmasters in Quebec province. There are 2,469 postmasters in Quebec, and 317 of them have been dismissed.

Mr. PERRAS (Translation): That means eight per cent.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Did our friends across the aisle dismiss a greater or a smaller number? If their dismissals were more numerous why did our friends of the opposition who in those days sat at the right of the Speaker, not protest against what to-day they call a revolting evil?

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Dismissals were made with more fairness then.

Mr. LARUE (Translation): Yes, without investigation.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Our opponents dismissed postmasters without an inquiry and mostly without any complaint having been lodged against them.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): That is what the Marine department does.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): We are speaking of the Post Office Department. Our opponents dismissed, while they were in power in their last regime, 396 postmasters in Quebec province, and 189 between 1927 and 1930.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Those dismissed were not postmasters; they were Louis Philippe Pelletier's padlocks.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I like the natural talents of the hon. member for Temiscouata better than this witticism, which is rather strained. Hands off the grave of a man who would well know how to defend himself if he were here to-night.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): Give us the number once more.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): From 1927 to 1930, 189 in the province of Quebec.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Four years.

Mr. LARUE (Translation): Without an inquiry.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Such are the facts, Mr. Chairman, and that is the crime. On this matter of postmaster dismissals my hon. friend the ex-Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot)—towards whom I do not believe I have been lacking in consideration, in courtesy and in broadmindedness—had this to say last week:

"Under my administration 162 postmasters were dismissed for political partisanship. My successor has dismissed 474."

And our Liberal friends cried: shame! My hon. friend's answer was very clever; but it was not complete. What my hon. friend from Gloucester did not say, or did not wish to say was that besides the 162 he mentioned he also dismissed 317 postmasters without any investigation, without any complaint even, to be discovered in the departmental files.

Do our hon. friends of the opposition approve of this method of inquiry and this policy of dismissal under their own administration?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): You have talent for imitating bad examples.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville says that the former Postmaster General set us a bad example?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): You followed his example.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): This number, Mr. Chairman, shows political partisanship not on the part of the dismissed postmasters but on the part of the minister who dismissed them without an inquiry and without any complaint having been made against them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is not surprising—and my hon. friends on the opposite side will admit as much—that these dismissals have brought about reprisals, have given rise to complaints and local criticisms against postmasters who had taken an active part in politics. It has been said: the Postmaster General is dismissing postmasters in his own province, but very few are being let out in Ontario and in the west. That is so. Why? It is a matter of compaign customs, of political turn of mind, of precedents. The same minister has jurisdiction over postmasters in Ontario and in the western provinces. From that part of the country he has not received one-fourth as many complaints as have come from the maritime provinces and from the province of Quebec. That is why there have been fewer dismissals in Ontario and in the west than in the eastern provinces.

Mr. RAYMOND (Translation): Do you mean to imply that the people of Quebec are not so well-behaved as those in the other provinces?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member from Beauharnois is far too intelligent to have understood any such thing.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): It does not show.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes, one can see it in his face. I say again that it was not a pleasant duty for me to make these dismissals. Those who know me, those who are not blinded by party spirit and are willing to do me justice, realize that this part of the administrative task assigned to me has been most unpleasant.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): We know it. May I ask a question of the hon. minister?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): You may.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Is it not a fact that in a number of cases these dismissals were insisted upon and demanded by the minister's colleagues? It was generally after one of his colleagues had passed through, my former opponent in Kamouraska riding—

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The useless being.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): —that these dismissals took place—unjust dismissals, as I shall have occasion to show later on.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member for Kamouraska has just said that he intends to deal more fully with this subject on some later occasion. With his permission I shall await his explanation before replying; no doubt by that time I will understand better just what he means.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): You can ask the Solicitor General.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): There are members in the opposition ranks who can bear witness to my sense of fair play. There are members on the other side who have made representations to me and been listened to; there are opposition members who have asked certain things of me, which I was only too glad to perform, when at all possible. I put politics behind me—

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): —I did not consider whether they were opposition or government members.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): That is true.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Some are listening to me, others are absent, who can bear me out in this. I wanted to make this statement about dismissals in order to acquaint the house with the true facts and so that our Liberal friends should discern my administration from another angle than that used so far.

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): May I be allowed to complete the history of the case I brought up on April 28, that of Noël Fontaine of Laprairie. The hon. minister has just stated that I should not complain because there have been but few dismissals in the county of Laprairie-Napierville. That is like someone saying to me: "Don't complain; the thieves robbed only one individual in Laprairie-Napierville. Let them be."

The case of Noël Fontaine is the most typical that can be brought to the attention of the house. The hon. Postmaster General says he means well and that I appear ill-disposed towards him. It seems to me that when I have spoken in the house I have very often shown that I esteem the hon. minister, that I have a very high regard for him and that if he had made all these dismissals it was because his hand had been forced. In my remarks of April 28 concerning the Noël Fontaine case I stated clearly that the pressure came from the outside, that people in the county had appealed to the defeated candidate and he in turn to the minister. It was fair to the hon. minister to remember his words to me: "If Noël Fontaine did not mix in politics, if his wife alone went to meetings, Noël Fontaine has no cause to worry." I can go further and repeat what the minister said in Laval-Two Mountains when two Conservatives from my constituency went to see him. When the dismissal of Noël Fontaine became known in Laprairie two Conservatives and one Liberal called on the hon. minister who told them then and there: "Try to get Gustave Monette to withdraw his complaint and Noël Fontaine will not be interfered with. I wash my hands of the whole affair."

I am sure the hon. minister did not enjoy ordering these dismissals. I know, for instance, that when an investigation is made on a postmaster with the definite intention of relieving him of his functions, it is not a pleasant thing for the Postmaster General. To show more clearly how repulsive the dismissal of Noël Fontaine was to the hon. minister may I remind the house that the inquiry was held in February, 1931, and that the dismissal was not made until shortly before the provincial elections, when a delegation of Conservatives from Laprairie waited upon Mr. Gustave Monette and gave him to understand that if he did not cause Noël Fontaine to be dismissed the Conservatives would remain at home or would work for the Liberal candidate.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Shame!

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Those are the circumstances which justify the hon. minister and which explain his conciliatory attitude of a moment ago. I want to be just towards him. Nevertheless this iniquity has been perpetrated against a postmaster who remains independent, impartial and who only seeks to do his duty. Allow me to give you a few more details concerning the dismissal of Noël Fontaine. The investigation did not reveal a single thing to his discredit. So then the attackers turned on Mrs. Fontaine. False testimonies were used, and I can prove it. A lady testified at the inquiry, under orders from a Conservative leader—I should not employ that expression, for the great name of Conservative, as I understand it, cannot apply to people capable of such action. A vile individual forced an ailing woman to commit perjury by swearing that she had heard Mrs. Fontaine speak at one of my opponent's rallies during the last campaign. This same woman admitted two months later—the thing made her positively ill—in the presence of two witnesses, that she had sworn a false oath, that she was sorry and that she begged Mr. Fontaine to forgive her all the trouble she had caused him. What did they do? They got false witnesses to swear that the postmaster's wife had addressed a meeting held in the interests of Mr. Gustave Monette. Six witnesses, two Conservatives and four Liberals, swore under oath that Mrs. Fontaine was not present at the meeting in question; they established an alibi. Notwithstanding this, Noël Fontaine was dismissed. But how did they go about his dismissal? The investigating commissioner was Mr. Bruno Nantel—

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): A good Liberal!

Mr. DUPUIS (Translation): Mr. Bruno Nantel made a report in which he quotes the evidence—I could mention the names of witnesses—and draws his own conclusions. Is there anything, I shall not say more disgusting, because that is unparliamentary, but more iniquitous than a report from which the names of witnesses who proved the alibi of Mrs. Fontaine are deleted. The following persons appeared as witnesses during the investigation: Jeannette, Mrs. Paul Bonneterre—I wish the hon. Postmaster General would inquire as to how, where and by whom these names were struck out—Samuel Racine, one of the leaders of the Conservative candidate, Wilfrid Ste. Marie, another good Conservative, David Racette, Emilien Lamarre, also a conservative, and Mrs. Arthur Lamarre. Six witnesses, two Conservatives and four Liberals, came and proved beyond all doubt that Mrs. Noel Fontaine, the same evening when she is accused of having attended the meeting of Mr. Gustave Monette, was at St. Mathieu de Laprairie. What did they do? They struck out the evidence of those six witnesses. I call the attention of the Postmaster General on that fact and I am asking him to explain to the house why those statements in favour of Noel Fontaine were struck out.

Mr. Chairman, I simply wanted to draw the attention of the committee to these facts that came to my knowledge only recently, after the remarks I made the other day. The question is serious enough to be worth mentioning.

I have only a few words to say about the very fair request that I made to the hon.

Postmaster General. I addressed him very courteously, and I shall now say it in English.

At page 2985 of Hansard will be found my question to the hon. Postmaster General:

May I ask the hon. Postmaster General when he intends to continue with the estimates of his department?

To this question the minister gave quite a vague answer. I do not blame him. He might not have been in a position to answer definitely, because, as I understand, it was a matter to be decided by the cabinet. He said:

I have no objection to discuss the estimates of my department immediately if the rules so permit. I will submit them again to the house when the rules permit me.

I repeat, that is not an answer to my question. Then the right hon. Prime Minister brought forward another matter altogether. When he was through I said:

A few minutes ago I asked the hon. Postmaster General when he expected to proceed with his estimates. As he seems to be unable to answer, I would ask the right hon. the Prime Minister if he is able to tell the house when the Postmaster General will proceed with his estimates.

What did the right hon. Prime Minister answer? He said that I had insulted the Postmaster General. I did not catch that at the time because the right hon. gentleman spoke in an undertone, otherwise I would have asked him in all fairness where and when and in what manner I had insulted the hon. Postmaster General.

Mr. MANION: It is not a compliment to say that a minister cannot himself answer a question.

Mr. DUPUIS: It was only my interpretation of the fact that as the Postmaster General was not able to decide the matter alone it might have been decided by the Prime Minister. It was not intended as an insult at all. If it was an insult it would have been the duty of the Prime Minister to ask me to withdraw my remarks, because I have no right to insult a member of this house.

Mr. POULIOT: And no insult ever came out of your mouth.

Mr. DUPUIS: I bring this matter up because I do not want to have the reputation of insulting anybody. If the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals would ask my good friend Mr. Monette, my opponent at the last election, I am confident he would tell the minister that I never insulted anybody even in the heat of the campaign, and it was a very strenuous fight. It was very unfair on the part of the Prime Minister to say that I insulted anybody.

Mr. POULIOT: Never mind.

Mr. DUPUIS: I should like the Prime Minister—he is not in his seat at present—to withdraw his statement. If I did insult the Postmaster General I would expect him to ask me to withdraw what I had said.

Mr. POULIOT: The Prime Minister will withdraw the next time he comes to the house.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): The hon. Postmaster General spoke, a few moments ago, of the discussion that took place when his estimates were submitted to the committee, on April 28th. On that occasion I called his attention on the activities of a man named Garfield MacKinnon and I asked him to be kind enough to say what his department intended to do.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, in reply to the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, I must say that the information I gave the other day to this house has been corroborated by the legal adviser of the department.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): Based upon what?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Based upon the fact that MacKinnon has a right to form an association, to ask the rural mail carriers to become members of it and to exact a fee of $5 to cover organization expenses. He promises them that by being members of that association they will be better protected. The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, who is a good lawyer, will admit that I should not be blamed for not having taken legal proceedings against that organizer. Perhaps he will say: Yes, but the Postmaster General received complaints or an affidavit signed by three citizens of Megantic. From a legal point of view can that affidavit be taken into consideration by the department? I am informed that it cannot, because it bears three signatures. The affidavit says that at the end of January, 1932, a man named Garfield MacKinnon, who styles himself as secretary of the Rural Mail Carriers' Association, called at the homes of the undersigned, and asked them to contribute a sum of $5 as mail carriers, failing which they would lose their contract. It says also that the said Joseph Cote was the only one to pay $5 and the others refused to do so. That is the statement of Antonio Boulanger, Wilfrid Boulé and Joseph Côté. Is that affidavit sufficient evidence to allow the post office department to prosecute that promoter? It is not, according to the information I received from the legal adviser of my department. We advised the inspectors throughout the province and the whole country that MacKinnon was not authorized by the Post Office Department to form such an organization and that the rural mail carriers were not bound to listen to his representations or threats. We even issued a public statement to that effect, and we asked all our inspectors and superintendants to take up the matter and to warn the people that the Post Office Department had nothing whatever to do with that promoter.

Mr. Chairman, if that man MacKinnon commits any fraud in a province, it is up to the Attorney General of that province to prosecute him or else let the people whom he has deceived lay a complaint with the Attorney General.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): The hon. Postmaster General is perfectly right in saying that this man MacKinnon has the right to organize the rural mail carriers; to that extent, certainly there is nothing wrong. He has also the right to exact $5 from the mail carriers who wish to join his association. If the activities of that man were limited to these two things, the Postmaster General may be sure that I would not object. The only point on which the Postmaster General has some doubt is whether the sworn statement that was sent to him by the hon. member for Megantic (Roberge) is sufficient to establish before the courts that MacKinnon obtained money under false pretences. Here is a man going through all the parishes of the province of Quebec—and others, I presume—gathering the mail carriers together and telling them that they will lose their contract, unless they pay him a sum of $5. That is the kind of pretence that induces the mail carriers to pay $5 in order to join the association.

I respectfully submit, Mr. Chairman, that such a threat is what might be called extortion and according to the provisions of the criminal code the department has a perfect right to prosecute that man MacKinnon. The evidence in the hands of the department is complete. The hon. member for Megantic has offered the Postmaster General to bring three witnesses to prove the facts. To tell these people that unless they pay him $5 they will lose their contract shows very clearly that MacKinnon was extorting money. The hon. Postmaster General has three witnesses at his disposal.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): How could the Postmaster General deal with a man who is not in his employ?

[Mr. Sauvé.]

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): The hon. Postmaster General will easily understand that it is a question of public interest. Here is a man who travels through our counties and obtains money in the way that I have just mentioned. Therefore it seems to me that if there is anybody that is interested in protecting his employees or the people connected with the Post Office Department, it should be the Postmaster General. I think his reputation is at stake. I don't reproach him with not having taken any steps before this very day, for he had not enough evidence; but he has it now, thanks to the activities of the hon. member for Megantic. Now the hon. Postmaster General says that anybody can lay a complaint: either the Attorney General of the province of Quebec or the person who has been deceived. In this case I respectfully submit that it is for the Post Office Department to see that the mail carriers in the different provinces are not victimized by cheats and swindlers who are acting in the way that I have mentioned in order to extort five dollars from people under contract with the government. By his threats, MacKinnon leaves the people under the impression that he has some influence on the Postmaster General.

Mr. Chairman, I am not unaware of the fact that some Conservative members, being deceived by MacKinnon whom they didn't know, accompanied him when he made his tour of the province. The presence of these Conservative members or candidates alongside of MacKinnon led the people to believe that he had a certain influence with the Postmaster General or else that he was an employee of the department. I shall not speak any further on this subject, but I most respectfully submit that it is about time that the Post Office Department should prosecute MacKinnon.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Does the hon. member mean that this affidavit is legal and can be accepted by a court?

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): MacKinnon can be charged not with perjury, but extortion. Whether it is a sworn statement or not, that has no effect on the charge to be laid against MacKinnon, because, as I already said, it is not a charge of perjury but one of extortion and the department has three witnesses to prove it.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Does my hon. friend not think that it is up to the party that has been wronged to prosecute?

Mr. HOWARD (Translation): No.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): It is very well in a private case; but here is a question of public interest and under the circumstances as I have mentioned a moment ago, the most interested party is the Post Office Department.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of discussing the estimates of the hon. Postmaster General to-night. As I thought he would not be able to get through to-night I intended to discuss them later on. But since the activities of that Mr. MacKinnon have been brought up again to the attention of the house, I think it is my duty as a former Postmaster General to say a few words about the behaviour of that gentleman while I had the honour of being at the head of that department.

In 1928 my attention was called on the activities of Mr. Garfield MacKinnon. I gave instructions for an investigation to be made and I found out that Mr. MacKinnon was going through the different districts of the country. I even saw him in my own constituency. I did not know then whether he was authorized by the Post Office Department to canvas the rural mail carriers such as he was doing. Upon my return to the department I made inquiries and Mr. Anderson, superintendent of mail contracts, informed me that Mr. MacKinnon was not connected at all with the Post Office Department and that he had organized an association which was not recognized by the department. We endeavoured to get some evidence about the activities of that gentleman and his false representations to the mail carriers. Had I been able to secure affidavits such as those of which the hon. Postmaster General has now in his possession I would have prosecuted Mr. MacKinnon; but we had none, and for several reasons. When we saw that we could not secure any evidence, I publicly denounced in this house the activities of Mr. MacKinnon. At that same time I sent—

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The postmasters were warned.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): I sent a circular letter to all the mail carriers warning them against MacKinnon. That was on the eve of the election in 1930 and Mr. MacKinnon was then pleading for the mail carriers.

A debate took place in this house in which four or five present members of the government took part. They were urging an increase in the price paid to the mail carriers and they even pledged themselves,—I have here their very words—if they came into power, to give the mail carriers a monthly salary or else to pay them at the rate of $70 a mile. Hon. gentlemen promised to carry out that change upon their coming into power. They are now in power, but they have never kept their word. To prove what I have just said, I have here a circular letter from the Conservative party in which they criticize the then Postmaster General and promise to raise the salaries or the rate allowed in the rural mail contracts. They were to give rural mail carriers a monthly salary or $70 per mile.

Mr. MacKinnon was then going throughout the country pretending that he had a formal promise from the present members of the government, who were then members of the opposition. When our Conservative friends came into power, MacKinnon asked them to fulfil their promises, but he did not succeed. And since then MacKinnon still travels around and states that he has the promise of hon. Mr. Sauve, Postmaster General, and hon. Mr. Guthrie, Minister of Justice, that they are both in favour of a rate of $70 per mile for rural mail contracts, or else a monthly salary, and the mail carriers being placed under the Civil Service Commission.

Moreover, some of the French-Canadian members from the province of Quebec attended meetings at which they are reported as having asserted that they, as Conservative members of this house, knew of hon. Mr. Sauvé and hon. Mr. Guthrie being in favour of that plan. Acting on the faith of these promises MacKinnon asked the mail carriers to pay him five dollars. I want to be well understood; I am not saying that the Postmaster General is responsible for what happened, but I want him to know—

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I know pretty well.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): —what is going on in his own province.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation) Hear, hear!

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): I want the hon. Postmaster General to know that some hon. members who are supporting him as members of the government, some members from the province of Quebec, are attending these meetings and are telling the people—I shall give some names—

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Very bad, very bad.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): —telling the people that the Postmaster General and the Minister of Justice are ready to adopt MacKinnon's plan.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Would the hon. member give the names?

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): I am going to give them right here.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Give them out.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): I have before me a circular letter from MacKinnon which is written both in French and English. I shall now read it in both languages:

Mail Contractors Association Meeting
Richmond, Que., December 22, 1931.

Dear Sir,

An Association meeting of all the Mail Contractors for the County will be held in Richmond, in the Town Hall, on Tuesday evening, December 22nd, at eight o'clock.

Your Worthy Representative, and member of Parliament, Mr. François Joseph Laflèche, will be present and address the meeting.

All the Rural mail contractors, and The Post Office to Post Office mail contractors, and the Post Office to Railway Station Mail Contractors, are urgently requested to attend the meeting as matters of great benefit to the mail contractors will be discussed.

Kindly arrange to attend this meeting without fail.

Yours very faithfully,
Garfield MacKinnon, Secretary,
Canadian Mail
Contractors Association.

P.S.—If there are former contractors of recent time in your locality, kindly invite them to attend meeting also.

This meeting was held. Garfield MacKinnon delivered a speech and the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe also spoke at the meeting.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): This is more serious.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): According to a report of this meeting which I have here there were between 50 and 60 persons present.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): At Brompton?

[Mr. Sauvé.]

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): At Bromptonville.

Mr. HACKETT (Translation): At Richmond.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): I will read this report in English.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Oh, oh.

Mr. VENIOT: It is to the effect that the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe had spoken at the meeting and had said that the hon. the Postmaster General and the hon. the Minister of Justice were in favour of an allowance to mail contractors of $70 a mile.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): This is absolutely false. I will tell the hon. member he is speaking an untruth.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): Did you speak at the meeting?

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Certainly, sir.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): And you deny—

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): I deny having said what you have claimed to-night.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): I am pleased to learn that the hon. member denies, and that for two reasons: the people who were present will read the hon. member's denial—

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): I hope so.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): —and they will judge thereby who speaks the truth.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): That is understood. They will observe that the party who wrote this report lied and that you are lying at the same time.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I ask the hon. member to withdraw his words. He has no right to say in this chamber that an hon. member lies.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): I do not say you lie but that you distort the facts.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): That is still worse.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): If it is worse, all the better.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): If the hon. member wishes to deny, all he need say is that what I am reading is untrue.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): And I do say so.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): However, withdraw your remarks.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): You are ill-informed.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): Learn to choose you words when addressing me, because I am too old a man to have you call me a liar.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): You reproduce the letter of a liar.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): If the hon. member were any kind of a man he would walk out and take his medicine from me, old as I am.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): That makes no difference.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): Old as I am, I can give it to him.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): I have met stronger men.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): The hon. member does not deny being at the meeting.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): No, I do not deny it.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): Could the hon. member tell the committee what kind of a speech he delivered on that occasion.

Mr. HACKETT (Translation): A fine speech.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): Would he deliver here the same speech he delivered that night?

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): What speech?

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): You spoke at that meeting?

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): What did I say at that meeting?

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): You spoke and I am asking you whether you would deliver the same speech to-night?

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): What speech?

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): I did not deliver it, you know all about it.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): If you know nothing about it, don't mention it.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): The letter I have here charges you with—

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): That is nothing, that is some Tobin talk.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): That letter charges you with having said that the hon. Mr. Sauvé was in favour of...

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): I positively deny having said that.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): You deny it?

Mr. GAGNON (Translation): Would you have any objection to telling us who signed that letter?

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): I have not the right to tell but I will use it.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): You have the right to make charges, but you have not the right to say whence they come?

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): Sit down.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): It rubs in.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): It rubs in.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): It does not rub in at all.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): The man is William Provencher.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): He is Tobin's man, that is not surprising.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): Provencher is as honest as you are.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): That is not true, he is not as honest as I am. He is a man who refuses to pay his employees.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I will go further now. Provencher was the mail carrier and I hold in my hand the original notice advising him of the renewal of his mail contract.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): You may possibly choose to be Tobin's "dust-pan".

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): You are excited, sit down.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Withdraw that statement.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe has in a single sentence twice infringed the rule. He must withdraw the word "dust-pan", and his attack against a member of another chamber.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): I withdraw the word if it is unparliamentary, but inwardly...

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): I want him to withdraw according to the rules of the house.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand) (Translation): That is unnecessary, he has withdrawn the word.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): That is not sufficient.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): Is it possible to preserve order?

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): The hon. member is so excited that he is not afraid to address the house in that manner. The hon. member is too excited to know how to express himself in this chamber.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Start by being a gentleman and the others will follow your example.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Oh, oh!

Mr. VENIOT: If he did lose his job he has got a good one to take its place. No one can fool the public like hon. members did in the last elections. I am prepared to obey the rules, Mr. Chairman, but I ask that you keep order on the other side of the chamber and not allow interruptions from those who do not understand me when I am speaking in French.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Speak in French.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): The hon. member tells me to speak in French. If I had had during my youth the same opportunity as the hon. member to acquire an excellent French education under the just laws of the province of Quebec, instead of having to suffer the effects of the persecution directed against my language, I would speak French better than he does to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Hear! hear!

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): If any one wants to examine closely the language used by this gentleman and the language I use, I ask myself whether my language would not be more proper than his.

I hold in my hand the notice which the superintendent of mail contracts forwarded to Provencher advising him that his contract had been renewed for a period of four years at the rate of $200 as in the past, without the formality of calling for tenders. What happened? He receives a notice that his contract will be continued. Following the meeting attended by the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe when Provencher refused to subscribe the $5 demanded, he receives a notice that his contract is not renewed and that tenders will be called for.

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): That is not the reason.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): I did not say what was the reason. The hon. member is getting excited again.

Tenders are called for and received. Provencher put in a tender for $595; a man named Richer for $800; one Blake for $825, and one Boulanger for $875. The contract was awarded to Richer at the price of the lowest tender, that submitted by Provencher.

Richer had put in a tender for $800 and Provencher for $500, and Richer learnt that he would secure the contract if he would lower his tender price to $595. That happened after the meeting of December 22nd at which Provencher refused to pay $5 to MacKinnon. I do not say that is the reason.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): There is no connection.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): The Post Office Department gave me these figures. Surely, Mr. Chairman, they are correct. Surely, the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe will not say these figures are false. If the figures are incorrect, I have been deceived by the Post Office Department.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): You have been deceived principally by Provencher.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): I am certain I have not been deceived. Now, Mr. Chairman, having acquainted you with MacKinnon's conduct, I do not ask you to take action—

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Ask Taschereau.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): Be intelligent.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): How sad, Mr. Chairman. I regret very much that my language and my remarks should have excited the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): There is not as much excitement as you imagine.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): I had always taken him for a perfect gentleman, and I still regard him as such, but the hon. member forgot himself in his excitement.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): He did not forget himself.

Mr. PERRAS (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I submit that when Mr. Taschereau's name is mentioned in this chamber he should be called the Hon. Mr. Taschereau.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): Now, sir, I am putting you on your guard. I am not asking you to institute proceedings against MacKinnon.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): He has been doing that for the past twelve years.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): But I again ask you to renew, if you have not already done so, the notices issued in a circular letter, two or three years ago, to all small contractors, to urge mail carriers not to have anything to do with this man who is at the head of an organization which the Post Office Department does not recognize. I believe that is all the minister can do under the circumstances. After that, should the carriers want, as we sometimes say, to let themselves be fooled by this Mr. MacKinnon, let them suffer the consequences of their foolishness.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I may say that a statement will be given to the newspapers within a few days which will produce the effect desired by the hon. member for Gloucester.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, the honourable Postmaster General has spoken of the dismissals that have occurred in the province of Quebec. I do not intend to delay the house discussing this particular subject, but I do wish to point out that at the time his predecessor, the honourable Louis-Philippe Pelletier was appointed Postmaster General, the powers that be ordered the dismissal of so many postmasters, that one need not be surprised that there should have been to some extent certain reprisals when the Liberal party assumed office in 1921. Now, should the reprisals be kept up ever lastingly, this thing will never end.

Reference was made a moment ago to dismissals that took place upon the representations of members. I noted among others that of a postmaster whom I was instrumental in appointing and who afterwards canvassed against me with the use of liquor which he dispensed in the post office. The situation being as it was, I deemed it my duty to ask for his dismissal. I do not think the department has any record on the matter, but they had my word. I supplied the honourable Postmaster General with full explanations and outlined the whole case.

Another thing that impresses me in connection with the suggestion I submitted a moment ago to the honourable Postmaster General—and I thank him for having so favourably received what I did say—I wish to say that in the province of Quebec the Conservative members did not behave too badly in connection with the post offices since there were only 78 dismissals—according to the return secured by my honourable colleague from Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Girouard)—in counties represented in the house by Conservative members. On the other hand, 160 dismissals were made at the request of defeated candidates.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): That is a fact.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): That is wrong.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Those gentlemen seem to look upon these demands for dismissals as a form of sport.

That is why I wish to complete the suggestion I made, a short while ago, to the hon. Postmaster General, and request him that all complaints against postmasters be made by affidavit; that two or three affidavits at least, be required from responsible and disinterested persons. The defeated candidates have a perfect right to request the dismissal of postmasters, however, in such cases, their requests should be supported by an affidavit. This would result in giving a fighting chance to postmasters and a reason for the hon. Postmaster General to act. A member would be entitled to request the dismissal of a postmaster, and even the department would be required to conform itself to the complaints lodged by the member. I think this suggestion is but a fair one towards my colleagues who, to-day, support the government. If they continue to behave as they have done since the beginning—I am referring simply to the members who are in the house—things will run smoothly. I must congratulate the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon. I do not know what has transpired since, however, when the report was published there had been no dismissals in his county. I think he has given proof of broadmindedness. I shall, perhaps, have an opportunity of discussing with him another subject, when the dairy industry question comes up, however, to use an English proverb "I give the devil his due."

Previous to referring to the de Sully affair, I would like to inquire from the hon. Postmaster General, whether he has any objection to appointing a commissioner who would take the oath, in connection with the St. Eusèbe de Cabano inquiry, or whether he intends to send a commissioner to hold the inquiry, without being sworn in, and have him, later on, sworn in.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I have no idea who will be the commissioner holding the inquiry at St. Eusèbe de Cabano; it is not the practice to have commissioners sworn in. It is likely that the person who will hold the inquiry will not need to take the oath to dispense justice. I like to follow the precedent established.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): So far as I am concerned, I never established such a precedent. I must frankly confess that I was unaware whether they were sworn in or not, however, I never established the principle that they should not be. I was unaware of the fact, and never gave it a thought.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The practice was introduced before my hon. friend became Postmaster General.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): I should like to obtain some information from the Postmaster General in connection with a subject which was referred to me some time ago. It especially concerns the staff of the Quebec post office. I suppose what takes place in Quebec also happens in all post offices. I am informed that the employees of the Quebec post office have to submit to two tests yearly. In other departments, employees must undergo one entrance examination, after that they are not further troubled. However, it seems that in the post office they have to undergo two tests a year, one on the Postal Guide and another in connection with the assortment of mail. I was further informed that lately, the employees at Quebec were threatened with a cut in their salaries if they did not pass successfully the two yearly tests. I do not know exactly what truth there is in such information, however, I understand that civil servants' salaries are fixed by act of parliament and that the various chiefs of departments or even the minister directing the department, have no right to reduce the salaries of employees. Can the hon. Postmaster General inform me whether this is a fact or not?

With reference to the same subject, might I request the hon. Postmaster General to show some consideration for the old civil servants of his department. It is contended that it is quite a task for these old employees to undergo with success these yearly tests. For instance, those who have reached 50 years are not gifted with the memory they had when younger. In consideration of their long years of service, I think they should be, at least, exempted from one of these tests, and only be required to pass the Postal Guide test. Moreover, I am told to obtain the yearly statutory increase, it is but necessary to pass the Postal Guide test. Lately, in Quebec, they have become much stricter and in order to obtain the statutory increase, one must undergo both tests, namely the Postal Guide and the one connected with the assortment of mail. I have been informed of this fact.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): In reply to the hon. member for Bellechasse, I must state that I have never heard that any employee was threatened with the loss of his position for refusing to pass the test. They might have been told, perhaps, that they would receive no increase.

As to the tests, the post office employees have to undergo it yearly. Those who have 20 or 25 years service and are 50 years old, have still a better knowledge of the subject matter they are examined upon than the younger employees. As regards suggestion of the hon. member with reference to being lenient towards certain employees, I shall take note of it and communicate with those in charge of the post office at Quebec.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): I was shown a letter that I have not with me. If I remember well, it was written by the postmaster, at Quebec, to an employee and was couched in the following terms or thereabouts I quote from memory: "Sir, you have neglected to present yourself for the mail assortment test. You had better conform yourself to instructions received, otherwise your salary will be reduced." I do not think that the head official of a service has the right to threaten an employee with a cut in salary, as salary classification is fixed by statute.

I wish to thank the hon. Postmaster General for his encouraging words with reference to old employees. I would request him to specially look after those who have 20 or 25 years service and have reached the age of 50. This test in connection with mail assortment is rather a memory or mechanical affair. When a man has reached a certain age such a test is of a nature to embarrass him much more so than when he was a young man.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): To follow up the few remarks which I addressed to the hon. Postmaster General in the course of this sitting, I simply wish to point out to him the fact that the visit in my county of my genial friend the hon. Solicitor General, in the course of the provincial election, coincided exactly with the change of postmaster at St. Pascal. I am aware that representations were made to the hon. Postmaster General. It was not unknown that the the Solicitor General knew how to reach the ear of the Postmaster General. Again—it affords me pleasure to repeat it—I have a high esteem for the Postmaster General and I am quite convinced that, above all, he bears no ill feeling towards anyone. He is too much of a countryman to harbour such thoughts. I think that, coming from my lips, he will not take exception to this term. But, perhaps, he allows himself to be too much solicited by the Solicitor General.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Hear, hear!

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Not now.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): No, not now, because the ocean intervenes.

When the Solicitor General visited my riding in the course of the provincial election, he was accompanied by an escort. He had taken the precaution to especially bring with him loud speakers to be well heard by a meeting numbering 250 people. His main success was exactly to have the postmaster at St. Pascal replaced.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): That is an accomplishment.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): I should like to be informed by the hon. Postmaster General why Mrs. Côté was dismissed at St. Pascal. The reason given, according to the evidence on file, was her age, I would, therefore, like to be informed whether the Postmaster General is aware of the age of the person who replaced her.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): A lady's age is never mentioned.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Mrs. Coté was dismissed on the report of the administrator, at Quebec, because of her age. I am informed that the person who replaced her is younger than her.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Could the hon. Postmaster General inform the house, exactly, how many years younger?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): No, not exactly.

Mr. GAGNON (Translation): Will the hon. member allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Certainly.

Mr. GAGNON (Translation): I understand that the hon. member has the complete file before him in connection with the dismissal of the postmistress of St. Pascal?

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Yes.

Mr. GAGNON (Translation): Could the hon. member quote one single letter from the Solicitor General requesting the dismissal of Mrs. Côté?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The Solicitor General does not write himself, his secretaries do the writing. That is why he has secretaries.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): In answer to the hon. member for Dorchester, I cannot state that I have a letter from the Solicitor General, however, I am aware that urgent representations were made and I base my contentions on the coincidence with the visit of the Solicitor General and the dismissal. The date of the dismissal closely coincides with that of the election.

I am putting the question to the hon. Postmaster General who is certainly better informed than I am. He can tell me whether I am wrong or right in my suppositions. Note that I have nothing to say against this dismissal. What grieves me, however, is that they have dismissed a widow who was greatly in need of the income derived from that office. I simply say that the dismissal coincides with the visit—

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): —the visit of a cruel man.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): —the visit of the Solicitor General.

I do not wish to protract the discussion on that matter, but I do want to ask the minister if he really thinks that there were sufficient reasons to dismiss the postmaster of Kamouraska, Mr. Edouard Guy. If he does, then what are these reasons? I am also wondering whether it were wise on the part of the Postmaster general to appoint a man who had previously been dismissed for other reasons than partisanship. It was not on account of partisanship that the predecessor of Mr. Guy, whom he later succeeded, was dismissed. Would the hon. Postmaster General give me some information about that?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member wants to know why the postmaster of Kamouraska was dismissed?

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Yes, in the first place; then whether it is wise to appoint a former employee who has been dismissed. Mr. Langlais was dismissed after an investigation held at my request. The investigation showed clearly that, during the election of Hon. Mr. Stein, now Justice Stein, Langlais had distributed libellous pamphlets, a copy of which must be in the department's files. Langlais had sent these circulars through the mail, and without any stamps. He was dismissed for mismanagement, not for partisanship. The investigation showed it very clearly. Then Mr. Guy took his place. After the investigation held about Mr. Guy, the Postmaster General appointed again to that position the man who had been dismissed, five or six years previously, for the reasons that I have just mentioned.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I was unaware of the fact just mentioned by the hon. member. I am going to inquire about it. I frankly admit that no such case has ever been submitted to me, either for Kamouraska, or other counties.

As to the reasons for dismissing Mr. Edouard Guy, postmaster of Kamouraska, here they are:

> The postmaster has openly expressed his political opinion—that is the report of the commissioner—has attended political meetings and mingled with groups of people carried by truck to one of these meetings.
>
> He admits that he had discussed politics with friends and that he went to the camp of the men who were working at a wharf, there to "preach" his political faith. At a meeting in Kamouraska, he asked a man named Danjou to throw down the Conservative paper, Le Journal, and trample over it, that nobody would touch it. When he heard a drunken man yell at the Kamouraska meeting, he remarked to those who were near him: "That is the kind of men who are for the Conservatives." He stated to one Pelletier that "his people knew how to give contracts and that it would not be any better if the d . . . Conservatives came to power."

I think that postmaster was acting contrary to the law.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): He would have been better, had he been deaf and dumb.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): What surprises me about that investigation, is the fact that one of the principal witnesses was Colonel Beaubien, who spends the summer in Kamouraska, as a tourist. I would not like to say anything that might deprive our beautiful shores of their tourists, but Colonel Beaubien, if my information is correct, works in the Customs department and spends his time talking politics. Throughout the election he was busy recruiting votes and he was one of the principal witnesses at that inquiry. Is the law that applies to the post office department the same as that which obtains in the case of the Department of National Revenue? That is the first point that I would like to clear up.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I have to deal with the law that rules the Post Office department.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): I would ask the hon. Postmaster General to draw that matter to the attention of his colleague, the minister of National Revenue, in order that, in the future, there may only be one weight and one measure in the government and that such things do not happen again. Witnesses have asserted that the postmaster had gone to a meeting in a truck with other people who were going to the same place. I have here an affidavit quite the opposite, in which he states that he went in his own car and attended very peacefully a political meeting at Rivière Ouelle. Some trouble occurred at that meeting, but he certainly was not responsible for the noise that was made. I could even read to the house several affidivits to that effect. And it is a man like Colonel Beaubien, who acted as a partisan, who spends his time making political propaganda, who appears as a witness. Without questioning the truth of his statement, one must however admit that he was a rather biased witness.

This is the last point that I want to bring to the attention of the Postmaster General. I am asking him to go through the file and to give me a square answer. If the documents which are in his hands prove that what I have just stated is right, can he tell me whether a man who distributes, through his post office, political circulars without stamps, and who has been dismissed, can be reinstated as postmaster, however staunch Conservative he may be?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Certainly!

Mr. SAUVE Translation): The hon. member must remember the answer which I gave him a moment ago. I stated that I would study the question and that it had never been brought to my attention before.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): If the facts are as I have stated to the Postmaster General—

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): After thinking it over, I shall make a decision.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): We have just witnessed a spectacle that is not much in favour of the province of Quebec, a real family quarrel. The unfortunate statements of the Postmaster General regarding the habits of the people of the province of Quebec are rather uncomplimentary for hon. members who represent that province in the house, and specially for its people. However, as the hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville said, I am still under the impression that the hon. minister shows much more skill in following bad advices, than in following good ones.

Nevertheless, this discussion has brought out the fact that the Postmaster General ordered these dismissals in a spirit of revenge, because the previous administration had committed the same wrong.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Pardon me, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member wants to set a good example, why impute me such bad motives? He knows that I do not share them and that I do not harbour any such thoughts.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): I am glad to know it.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): How many postmasters have I dismissed in the constituency of the hon. member?

Mr. DENIS (Translation): I shall not make any comparisons, because comparisons are always odious, specially when referring to wrong-doings. However, I am ready to admit that we must not put too much weight on the statements of the Postmaster General. If I were to give him any advice to restore the good reputation of the people of the province of Quebec, I would ask him to stop these dismissals, which are more or less unfair, specially when they serve political ends. It seems to me that both parties, Liberal and Conservative, have something more important to deal with than the dismissal of good civil servants because they were of such or such a political faith.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): If their services are satisfactory, I think they should be maintained in their position.

Now, Mr. Chairman, may I be permitted to ask the Postmaster General if the names of the temporary employees of the Post Office Department who were dismissed on the first of April, have been put on a new list of eligibles? Were the names of the chauffeurs who were let out, also placed on these lists? These men who paid a fee of $2 to take part in the examination to qualify for these positions, thought they were permanent. It is unfair that these employees be dismissed forever.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member will allow me to tell him that the case which he just mentioned falls under the Civil Service Commission, not the Postmaster General. I am informed that a list has been prepared and forwarded to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Could the hon. Postmaster General inform me if a contract was awarded lately for the carrying of mails by motor cars in the city of Montreal, with a view to dismissing these chauffeurs? To whom was the contract awarded and were there any tenders asked for?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): A trial contract was awarded, not because we wanted to dismiss the garage employees, but because we have discovered, after an investigation, that dishonest methods had been resorted to, calculated to deprive the department of certain receipts, by distributing gasoline to people outside the department. By this new trial contract, we have already saved $6,000.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Could we know the name?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The minister has the right to cancel the contract whenever he wishes, for it is well understood that it was just a test, in order to know what was the most economical method; either the department carrying on the work, or a contractor, such as it is done elsewhere.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Could we know the name and title of the person to whom the contract was awarded?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Mr. Ernest Laurent, of Montreal.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Does he carry out the work himself, or has he let out a subcontract?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I do not think so. It was Mr. Ernest Laurent who accepted the contract. I think he looks after his business himself. Perhaps he has some employees, but he is the boss, according to the information I have.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): I do not know myself whether I am well informed or not, but I heard that a sub-contract was awarded to one Paul Denis.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Any relative of yours?

Mr. DENIS (Translation): He may be; I do not know.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): According to my information, I know that Paul Denis is related to Laurent. Paul Denis has no contract, but he works for Laurent. He has more experience in this kind of work and he was employed under the administration which my hon. friend supported.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I heard a moment ago the hon. member for Dorchester ask the hon. member for Kamouraska if he had seen a letter from the hon. solicitor general in the files. The Solicitor General's letters are aerial, invisible; they are personal letters that reach the minister, but laymen like you and me, Mr. Chairman cannot see them.

This reminds me of a film of Grace Cunard, a serial which was a great success some twenty years ago and that was entitled "The Crushing Hand." The reason for my protesting against the numerous lady secretaries of the hon. Solicitor General is because these secretaries are carrying on a work whose results we know, but whose machinery we cannot see. The minister acts as a medium between defeated candidates who are a little sour-mouthed and each member of the government. I think we should put a stop to that, and when a defeated candidate wants to deal with a member of the government, he should send his communications directly to him and do away with such a costly and useless medium.

I revert now to the suggestion that I offered at first to the hon. Postmaster General. Before discussing each case, I want to make some preliminary remarks and state my position. If there were affidavits stating the complaints against the postmasters, sworn affidavits by responsible persons, the postmasters would then have a certain recourse either before the criminal or the civil courts, against those who gave the affidavits, should they not tell the truth.

Now I am going to give a typical case, that of Sully. The postmaster was dismissed —I shall not speak of the investigation—after the commissioner had insisted on hearing him. I think that is not fair, because a man is presumed innocent as long as he has not been found guilty. It is an elementary principle of British common law and specially of the criminal law. A man is not guilty, until it is proven otherwise. In the case of the commissioners, it is different. They want the postmaster to testify and prove his own case. They compel him to do so. In this connection, the Postmaster General has made a very timely decision and instructed the commissioners not to compel the postmasters to testify, but the commissioners told me that they would send the Postmaster General to a certain place which I cannot mention in this house. I was surprised to see that the commissioner to whom I refer had so little respect for the hon. minister, when the latter was proclaiming a principle of law so universally recognized, specially in the British Empire. The postmaster was nevertheless dismissed.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Two men applied for the position. One even sent his application as soon as it was rumoured that the postmaster might be dismissed. He applied for the position long before the dismissal. I am glad to see the right honourable Prime Minister in his seat, because it was to him that the application was sent in the first place. That man, named Jean, applied first to the Prime Minister, and reminded him that he was a great war veteran and he was entitled to the position, should it become vacant. Upon instructions from the Prime Minister, his private secretary communicated with the Postmaster General to whom he forwarded Mr. Jean's letter; and, what is of the utmost importance, Mr. Chairman, is that the secretary of the right hon. Prime Minister mentions that the correspondence is being sent to the Postmaster General upon instructions from the Prime Minister.

The first letter from Jean to the right hon. Prime Minister is dated February 12, 1931. On February 17, 1931, Mr. Merriam informs Mr. Jean that he has forwarded his request to the hon. Postmaster General.

(Text)

"To be brought to the Minister's attention, please.

(Sgd.) A. W. Merriam, Private Secretary."

There is a letter dated October 5, 1931, addressed to Mr. Jean, and which reads as follows:

"I am instructed by the Prime Minister to acknowledge receipt of your letter dated September 25."

You no doubt, know that the position of postmaster is relevant of the Civil Service Commission. Vacancies in such positions are advertised by this commission and candidates must forward their applications within the stipulated time as advertised. Veterans are always given preference over other candidates, pursuant to the act. I would therefore suggest that you address yourself directly to the Secretary of the Civil Service Commission, at Ottawa, and to the Postmaster General who has entire jurisdiction over his department.

At all events, I am submitting to him your request immediately.

This letter appeared in the file which was tabled in the house. I congratulate the right hon. Prime Minister for having instructed his secretary to forward such an answer to a veteran of the Great war.

Mr. Jean wrote to the hon. Postmaster General, on February 27, 1931. Mr. Gaboury, the deputy minister answered on March 4, 1931—note well this letter, sir:

"If it becomes necessary to make a change, the appointment of the new incumbent will be made by the Civil Service Commission. However, your application has been noted and will be referred to that commission if there is occasion."

What happened? There is some correspondence which might indicate differently, however, I attach no importance to it. On September 19, 1931, Mr. Jean writes again to the hon. Postmaster General—a long time after March 4, 1931. The deputy minister answers on September 28, 1931:

If it becomes necessary to make a change, the permanent appointment of the new incumbent will be made by the Civil Service Commission. The minister, however has taken your application under consideration.

Mention was made of permanent appointment. First, there was but a question of the appointment which was to be made by the Civil Service Commission. Finally, following inquiries held in the county of Temiscouata, by people with whom the minister is well acquainted, and whom I do not care to name, so as not to place them in the limelight, on February 5, 1932, a person by the name of Tardif, a blacksmith, was appointed. Was he appointed by the Civil Service Commission as the deputy minister wrote on March 4, 1931? No, he was appointed temporarily by the hon. Postmaster General who set aside the veteran.

I communicated with the commission on this matter to inquire why the vacancy was not advertised. I received the answer that the postmaster had not been dismissed after an inquiry had been held, but that he had been suspended, and that was the reason why the notice had not been posted. I wish to inquire from the hon. Postmaster General whether he intends to re-establish in his office, Jean-Baptiste Plourde, the former postmaster? I shall continue then . . . . Will the hon. Postmaster General inform me whether he has the intention to reinstate former postmaster?

Mr. BENNETT: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I had not much more to say.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a motion before the chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): It is moved that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

FINAL REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—

FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I desire to present the seventh and final report of the select standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government. I am very happy to say this is a unanimous report. It is as follows:

The select standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government beg leave to present the following as a seventh and final report:

Your committee to whom was referred for consideration and report the accounts and the estimates of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, and the various bills presented to parliament relating to the operations of the railways and shipping owned and controlled by the government, held eighteen public meetings, in the course of which they examined many witnesses, including three directors and the necessary executive officers of the company including the president.

1. Bill No. 21—

Your committee had under consideration Bill No. 21 "An Act respecting the Canadian National Railways and to authorize additional provision of moneys to meet expenditures made and indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1931."

The object of this bill was to authorize the Canadian National Railways to issue additional securities to the extent of $11,372,498.86, for the purpose for the year 1931 of financing where the amounts available from net operating income and investments were insufficient.

In other words the Canadian National Railways Financing Act, 1931, which authorized the issue of securities to the principal sum of $68,500,000 the estimated requirements for 1931, was insufficient for the purposes of the railway to the extent above mentioned, and this bill became necessary by reason of the ascertained income deficit arising from the operations of the railways, and full explanation of this bill was given in the House of Commons by the Minister of Railways and your committee reported the same without amendment.

2. Bill No. 34—

Your committee also had under consideration Bill No. 34 "An Act respecting the Canadian National Railways and to authorize the provision of moneys to meet expenditures made and indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1932."

The object of this bill was to authorize the Canadian National Railways to issue securities to the extent of $61,500,000 for the purpose during the year 1932 of financing where amounts available from net operating income or investments may be insufficient. This sum is made up of the following:—

(a) Net income deficits, including profit and loss, but not including interest on Dominion government advances, not exceeding	$42,784,610
(b) Equipment principal payments, sinking funds, miscellaneous maturing or matured notes and other obligations secured or unsecured, not exceeding	11,681,651
(c) Construction and betterments, including coordinations; acquisition of real or personal property, and working capital, not exceeding	7,033,738
Total	$61,500,000

The detailed statement of the financial requirements and estimated capital expenditures for the year ending December 31, 1932, was placed before your committee, amounting to the said sum of $61,500,000, and while the management of the system last year expressed their intention of reducing operating expenses and have put into effect economies which they affirm will approximate $28,000,000 in the years 1931 and 1932, yet the difference between estimated operating revenue and estimated operating expenses for the current year falls far short of meeting the interest on the funded debt in the hands of the public, which, without regard to any interest due to the government, this year amounts to the sum of $56,849,244.65, an increase in 12 months of $1,634,267.18. Reference to the annual report of the company shows that the net additional capital expenditure for the period of nine years from January 1, 1923, to December 31, 1931, amounts to the sum of $419,669,620.64 which has imposed an additional annual interest burden of $20,936,821 for the same period and accounts for approximately 37½ per cent in the increase of the annual interest charges due to the public. There is also $1,357,650 due the government for interest on unfunded debt.

In the light of the aforegoing it is difficult for your committee to appreciate, from a business standpoint, the wisdom of some of the capital expenditures made and included in the total increase above referred to. Doubtless had the present world depression not so adversely affected the system or continued for such a great length of time, better results from these capital expenditures would have accrued to the system. In view, therefore, of the results of the past two or three years, your committee strongly recommend that until there is marked improvement in the earnings of the system, capital expenditures should be limited strictly to the barest necessities, always consistent with efficiency.

Your committee had under consideration also the annual report for the year ending December 31, 1931, and have agreed to report the same.

3. Operating Expenditures—

The operating expenditures for the year 1932, exclusive of eastern lines, are estimated at $139,304,000, while the operating revenues for the same period are estimated at $157,248,000.

The operating revenues for the year 1931 amounted to the sum of $177,273,738, or approximately $20,000,000 more than the estimate for 1932.

In view of the rapid decline of the operating revenues, your committee are impelled to recommend that the most stringent economy be exercised by the management in all the controllable operating expenditures, and in this regard your committee recommend that with respect to executive officers and other salaried officials of the railway, a thorough revision of salaries downward be made. In the report of your committee for the year 1931, a specific recommendation to that effect was passed and in response thereto the report from the sub-committee of the board of directors, directed to the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals, dated the 16th February, 1932, was submitted to your committee. This report announced that on July 31, 1931, a horizontal cut of ten per cent, affecting all officials and officers in receipt of salaries of $4,000 and over, became effective, and has resulted in an annual saving of $545,652, affecting in all 828 officials and officers. This means that the annual cost of the said 828 officials theretofore amounted to approximately $5,456,200. The sub-commitee of the board of directors were of opinion that specific rather than further horizontal reductions in salaries should be made, and stated that an examination of the salaries exceeding $5,000 was under way, having in view additional economies. No subsequent report has been received, but your committee concur that specific rather than a further horizontal reduction in salaries should be made, and in this connection desire to point out that in a statement submitted and produced to the committee, it would appear that as of July 21, 1931, there were 96 officials receiving $10,000 and over and 37 officials receiving $15,000 or over. Your committee are of opinion that the salaries paid to the high officials are excessive and should immediately be substantially reduced.

Your committee would further point out that there would seem to be a multiplicity of officials and the number of higher paid officials should be substantially reduced, especially those acting in the capacity of assistants to heads of departments. Your committee therefore recommend that the sub-committee of the board of directors set up to deal with this matter be instructed to put into effect immediately the principles underlying this recommendation.

Included in the activities of the sub-committee of the board dealing with the salaries of the executive heads and other officials, was the subject matter of the remuneration received by the president. Under the terms of his contract of engagement dated September 23, 1929, the president shall receive a fixed annual salary of $75,000 per annum, without any extra fees or remuneration of any description. It has come to the attention of your committee that the president is still in receipt of an additional $5,000 fee from the Ontario Car Company and the special annual allowance for expenses not to be specifically accounted for approved by the board of directors on November 18, 1929, amounting to $15,000, and your committee recommend that the matter of the receipt of said fee of $5,000 shall be again considered by the board of directors with a view to its possible cancellation. With respect to the special allowance of $15,000 your committee recommend that the payment of the same be reviewed by the board of directors as being inconsistent with the terms of his contract of engagement.

Following the recommendation of your committee of last year, made on the suggestion of the president, a Royal Commission on Transportation has been set up by the government and is now functioning. This commission has not yet finished its labours or reported its findings. Your committee are not desirous of anticipating the findings of the commission but your committee are of the opinion that the report of the commission which it is anticipated will be brought down shortly should be studied with the greatest care, not only by the government itself, the systems of railways concerned, but by the Canadian people generally, so that the views of the commission may be thoroughly understood, and if deemed advisable given effect to at the next session of parliament.

4. Maritime Freight Rates Act and Eastern Lines—

Your committee have also had under consideration item No. 317 in the estimates providing for the payment to the Canadian National Railway Company as required by the Maritime Freight Rates Act of the deficit incurred during the period under review on eastern lines. The amount of the estimated deficit is $6,217,400, and in addition the sum of $1,750,000, representing the estimated amount by which the revenues of the lines will be lessened during the year by the reduction of rates applicable to eastern lines by the application of the Maritime Freight Rates Act. In view of the legislation existing your committee are of opinion that the amounts asked for are necessary and proper to give effect to the letter and spirit of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, and in the operation of the eastern lines. Your committee are, however, of the opinion that the two items above referred to, the deficit in operation of the eastern lines, and the amount required in operation of the eastern lines, and the amount required to reimburse the national railways for reductions in tolls under the application of the Maritime Freight Rates Act should not be included in the same estimate, and should be severed and shown separately, even if legislation to effect that end is necessary, and respectfully recommend that appropriate action in the premises be taken so as to provide that the amount required to provide for the payment of the deficit in operation on the eastern lines be entirely severed from the amount required to be paid in reduction of tolls under the application of the Maritime Freight Rates Act.

Your committee has also had under consideration item No. 316, being the amount required under the Maritime Freight Rates Act to provide for payment from time to time during the fiscal year 1932-33 of the difference, estimated by the Board of Railway Commissioners and certified by the said board to the Minister of Railways and Canals, as and when required by him, occuring on account of the application of the Maritime Freight Rates Act between the tariff tolls and the normal tolls, referred to in section 9 of the said act, on all traffic moved during 1932 by the independent railway companies mentioned therein, and your committee are of opinion that this amount is necessary to implement the provisions of the act in that regard and should be granted by parliament.

5. Canadian Government Merchant Marine—

Your committee have had under consideration item No. 314 in the estimates, relating to loan to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, to be applied in payment of deficits in operations of the company and of the vessels under the company's control during the year ending December 31, 1932, amounting in all to $440,000, a decrease of $148,500 over the previous year.

Your committee have also considered the balance sheet of the company and are of the opinion that the said sum of $440,000 is required for the purpose of the company and should be granted by parliament. Your committee reiterate their views and believe that the time has come when the government should, if possible, abandon the policy of operating a government merchant marine, and if possible arrange for a sale or lease of the fleet, and where practicable, and not contrary to imperial or inter-dominion relations, make arrangements with other shipping companies so that the trade of Canada may be protected.

6. Canadian National (West Indies) Service—

Your committee have had under consideration item No. 315 in the estimates, relating to the loans to the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, to be applied in payment of deficits in operations of the company and of the vessels under the company's control, during the year ending December 31, 1932, and interest requirements, which amounts to $820,000 as compared with $755,000 for the year 1931.

The year ending December 31, 1930, resulted in an operating loss of $523,136.98, while the operating loss for 1931 was $446,568.53, which is slightly above the amount of the subsidy previously paid to an independent company by the government for a much inferior service. Your committee are in agreement with the principle that this steamship service is a matter of treaty obligation and should be continued, but your committee are of opinion that the utmost vigilance should be exercised by officials directing and in charge of this steamship line so that, if possible, the cost of operation to the dominion should be reduced to a minimum, consistent with efficiency, and at the earliest possible moment turned into an operating profit. The service performed by this line on both routes is an excellent one and should be constantly brought to the attention of the Canadian people whenever and wherever possible with a view to their patronizing the service.

With respect to the traffic originating in the British West Indies, served by the ships, your committee are of opinion that every effort should be made to induce the residents and commercial interests in such colonies to patronize the service thus made possible for them at so great an expense by the Canadian people, to the fullest possible extent.

7. Expense Accounts of Officials—

Your committee have had under consideration the question of expense accounts of executive and other officers of the company. After fully considering the matter, your committee desire to record their belief that there should be a much stricter supervision of all expense accounts, and before payment they should be supported by vouchers and that other necessary evidence of payment should be presented to a properly constituted committee of directors set up for the purpose of examining and passing on same and that payment of all such expense accounts, whether submitted by the president, executive heads or all other officials should be strictly limited to business purposes and that with respect to company entertainment accounts, only those authorized by the same separate and controlling body should be approved. Last year your committee made a strong recommendation in reference to this matter and reiterate what was then said, especially in relation to such matters as club dues, entertainments and donations. A system of control similar to that in vogue in the best regulated industrial houses, finance and other institutions is required, and your committee earnestly recommend that the board of directors forthwith put in effect such effective control as is necessary in the premises. The subject matter is one that cannot be effectively dealt with by a parliamentary committee but the principle involved is an important one, and in the opinion of your committee the best qualified body to deal with the matter is the board of directors.

These recommendations should apply specifically to all officers of the company irrespective of their rank or station.

8. Audit—

According to the evidence submitted to your committee on a previous occasion it has been shown that the government employs a reputable firm of chartered accountants to make a running audit of the railway operations. The auditors sign the annual report and give a certificate attached to the consolidated balance sheet in which they state:—

"We have examined the books and records of the companies comprising the Canadian National railway system for the twelve months ended the 31st December, 1931. The investments in road and equipment appearing in the books of the companies as at the 1st January, 1923, were accepted by us.

"We certify that, in our opinion, the above consolidated balance sheet is properly drawn up so as to exhibit a true and correct view of the affairs of the system as at the 31st December, 1931, and we further certify that, in our opinion, the relative income and profit and loss accounts for the year ended the 31st December, 1931, are correctly stated."

Your committee are of opinion that the audit now in effect is not sufficient and should go much further, and the auditors should be empowered to go into every phase of the system's operations with power to call attention to any matter calling for comment in their judgment similar in principle to the powers vested in the auditor General of Canada.

9. Financial Control—

Heretofore there has been control of the capital expenditures of the company but down to a comparatively recent date the expenditures on operation were vested entirely in the executive heads of departments, and were subject only to the review of the president. No such power should be vested in any one man or small group of men under the same control. In no sense can such a system be deemed to be effective, and in the opinion of your committee, this position should be remedied forthwith.

On the 2nd June, 1931, a special by-law No. 18 was enacted by the board of directors establishing a finance committee under the authority of the statute relating to the company, which by-law was duly ratified by order in council No. P.C. 1398, passed on the 17th June, 1931. There was already governmental control of capital expenditures under the statute. By-law No. 18 provides for the setting up of a committee of the board of directors to be known as a "finance committee" to consist of three members of the board, namely, the president of the company who was to be the chairman of the committee, the director holding the position of deputy minister of railways and canals, and the director holding the position of vice-president in charge of the legal affairs of the company. The by-law further provides that such finance committee shall, notwithstanding anything in any other by-law to the contrary, have supervision and control over all matters relating to the capital expenditures of the company, and particularly in respect to the provision of the moneys therefor and the allocation of such moneys. The by-law as enacted and confirmed is silent with respect to expenditures for operation and maintenance and in the opinion of your committee the scope of the by-law should be immediately enlarged by appropriate action on the part of the board so as to provide that two additional members of the board shall also be members of the finance committee and that all expenditures for materials and/or supplies, or expenditures of any other character, save and except payrolls, amounting in value to say $25,000 or over, should first be passed upon by the finance committee and subsequently ratified by the board or the executive committee. Your committee are of the opinion that such a provision would have a healthful and beneficial effect not only on the volume of purchases, especially as unanimity on the part of the entire committee is necessary under the terms of the by-law, but also the manner and character of purchases, and your committee earnestly recommend that immediate steps be taken by the board to give effect to the principles underlying this recommendation.

10. The President's Residence—

Your committee had under consideration the fact that on the eighth of August, 1930, pursuant to a resolution of the board of directors passed on September 23, 1929, the residence No. 1415 Pine Avenue, Montreal, was leased by the railway company for a period of ten years, as a residence for the president at an annual cost closely approximating $20,000.

Having regard to all the evidence adduced and having special regard to the president's contract of engagement, dated September 23, 1929, as ratified and confirmed by his contract with the government dated October 25, 1929, whereby the prisident agreed to serve as president and chairman of the company, including the various constituent and subsidiary companies comprising the system, and for the full and entire services to be performed from time to time for the fixed annual salary of $75,000, without any extra fees or remuneration of any description, and in addition, but subject to the by-laws, rules and regulations applicable, all reasonable out-of-pocket expenses incurred in connection with the duties of his office or offices, your committe are of opinion that the leasing of the residence appears to your committee to be in contravention of the contract of engagement and even if legal was unwise and should not have been authorized.

The whole transaction in the opinion of your committee was a successful attempt by the board of directors to do indirectly what could not be done directly by expenditure on capital account, namely, to procure a residence for the president free of rent, taxes and repairs, and your committee consider that the action of the board of directors in this regard indicates that while they may not have exceeded their legal powers they did not exercise that degree of prudence, care and judgment requisite in the premises.

Your committee recommend that the whole transaction be reviewed and investigated by the directors, with a view to ascertaining its legality, and if possible obtaining its recision.

11. Off-Line Offices in the United States—

In recent years a large number of off-line passenger and freight offices have been established in leading cities of the United States, with a view to obtaining traffic for both branches of the service.

Data received with respect to the expenses of and gross receipts from all such offices show that results have been fairly satisfactory with respect to freight traffic but with respect to passenger traffic the results achieved so far have not been commensurate with the cost.

Your committee investigated with some care the situation with respect to the New York passenger office now located at 673 Fifth Avenue. The initial cost of acquiring these premises and of alterations amounted to the sum of $429,223.05, and the annual cost of operation including the rental of the premises 505 Fifth Avenue, formerly occupied as passenger offices and which are still under lease and at present unoccupied, is now $252,902. The gross amount of passenger traffic sold in 1931 was $502,353, including transportation sold on other lines.

Your committee recommend that the whole question of the New York and other off-line passenger offices should be carefully reviewed by the management in conjunction with the board of directors.

Your committee further recommend that careful consideration be given by the management and by the board to the question of closing such of the offices, both passenger and freight, as have not achieved satisfactory results, and also of cooperating with other railway systems by joint arrangement so as to effect as much saving as possible.

12. Pensions—

A memorandum respecting the various pension schemes in effect was submitted to your committee.

On December 31, 1931, there were 2,476 retired officials and employees on the pension list and the total pensions paid for 1931 amounted to 1,248,000.83.

These pension systems comprise:—

(1) The Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railway employees provident fund, which is still in force.

(2) The Grand Trunk Railway of Canada superannuation and provident fund, scheme, closed in 1907 and the presently subsisting Grand Trunk scheme.

(3) The Canadian National Railway pension scheme, set up in 1929, and in force at the present time.

All of the above mentioned schemes have legislative sanction and authority, but inasmuch as in a return filed with your committee it appears that during the past five years numerous employees received pensions in excess of what the pension schemes applicable to such employees call for your committe are of opinion that attention should be called to this apparent excess of jurisdiction.

Your committee are of opinion that the whole situation respecting pensions should be reviewed, not with any view to reducing statutory pensions but with the view to putting the pension schemes on a sound economic basis, including, if deemed desirable, the inclusion of the principle of contribution.

Your committee is of opinion that inasmuch as the pension schemes now in effect are statutory the payment of amounts in excess of the amounts called for by such schemes are not justified in principle, and your committee recommend that the attention of the board of directors be called to this situation, with a view to taking such action in the premises as may be deemed desirable and just, having regard to the fact that the principle of pensions is an established principle and crystallized into legislation.

Your committee realizing that the exercise of political patronage or influence in the operation of this publicly-owned enterprise would do great injury recommend continued vigilance on the part of all concerned, to avoid the introduction of practices so detrimental to the public interest.

14—

Your committee recommend that the proceedings and evidence taken be printed as an appendix to the Journals of the House, and that 700 copies be printed in blue book form, 500 in English and 200 in French.

15—

Your committee are glad to state that the report is unanimous.

A copy of the minutes of proceedings and evidence is tabled herewith, all of which is respectfully submitted.

R. B. Hanson,
Chairman.

By unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Duff, that the seventh and final report of the select standing committee on railways owned, operated and controlled by the government, be concurred in.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to make any reference to the past of the railway system. In that past there may be something to forgive and much to forget. In the report itself, I find much that is pious and something that is practical. It is encouraging in that it is unanimous; it shows that an attempt is being made to lift the railways out of party strife, that is eminently commendable. But what is discouraging is that to-day, when the country is faced with such terrible obligations and when such heavy demands are made upon its purse, no suggestion has been made whereby the tremendous losses resulting from the operation of the roads might be further and substantially and immediately curtailed.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the royal commission?

Mr. HACKETT: It is true that a royal commission has been appointed, composed of very eminent men. We have reason to hope that a finding will be made which will enure to the benefit of the people of Canada and help both railway systems. But as I had occasion to say some time ago, this report cannot be made available for some time, and it cannot be made effective until the lapse of further time, I was therefore hoping that out of this understanding which appears to have been arrived at by the members of all parties who formed the committee some practical and unanimous suggestion might come whereby the tremendous expenses of useless competition could at least temporarily be curtailed.

We had it from the president of the national system that the expense of competition was very great indeed, and there was an inference from what he said that tremendous savings could still be made without seriously impairing the effectiveness of the service, if competition and the expense arising from it could be eliminated. I am of those who believe that if this committee could have accentuated that fact, that if a unanimous committee representing all parties in the house had impressed upon all the roads in Canada the absolute necessity, for the time being, of keeping down these expenses, it would have been productive of results. We have heard on all sides forebodings, ominous statements have been made of the perils which overhang the country to-day; yet here is an opportunity of saving, some $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 in the operation of the two railways, in the next twelve months. The principal obstacles in the way of effecting those economies are the faces that have to be saved.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that a unanimous and forceful recommendation from the committee would have had to be heeded both by the government-owned roads and by those privately-owned. We have been told that this drain upon the financial energies of the country is the greatest financial peril that confronts us to-day, and it seems to me regrettable that the committee has not considered the possibility of temporary and immediate economies.

With regard to the merchant marine, the report is about what it was last year. There was a recommendation last year that the service be suspended and that the boats be given away or cease to be operated. They have been operated for another year and the net result is that another half million has been lost. And apparently the same procedure will be followed again this year. I understand that hon. gentlemen of the special committee have agreed not to debate this report. I am not bound by that agreement. I hope, however, that I have said nothing which is controversial in a party sense, which will provoke recriminations from the other side of the house. I firmly believe what I have said, and believing it, I felt it was my duty to speak as I have.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): It seems to me that it is hardly in order that a report of this character should be submitted to the house and a few minutes later concurrence moved. I take it that a report of as great importance as this ought to lie on the table for a day at least, until members have had on opportunity of reading it. It is not good practice that we should simply pass this report as a matter of form, even though it comes as a unanimous report from the committee. However, I should like to make a few remarks with reference to what has been said by the last speaker (Mr. Hackett). He suggests that there has been no report on the major problems of transportation in this country. I had thought that we all understood that the committee could not very well discuss these problems while they were under consideration by a royal commission, so that under the circumstances I do not see that the committee could have done anything else than it has done at the present time. But when the hon. member, in closing his address, suggested that he hoped he had not raised any controversial questions, I must enter my protest against his assumption that we all agreed with him.

The hon. member suggests that there are tremendous losses resulting from the operations of the road. By centering attention on the Canadian National Railways he is apt to give the impression that it is because of the public ownership of this road that the losses have occurred. I submit that there are tremendous losses resulting from the operation of the Canadian Pacific Railway at the present time. If anyone will consider the way the shares of the Canadian Pacific have dropped within the last few months, he must be convinced that that road also is in a condition which is far from satisfactory.

It is quite true that the Canadian Pacific Railway does not come under review in this house as the Canadian National does. As someone suggests, it is a pity that it does not, since it has been so largely built up by public funds; and since it has been maintained by the public, seeing that there is no other way of maintaining it, there being often involved the payment of heavy freight rates by the public to say nothing of subsidies. Under these conditions, it does seem to me that its operations might come under review in this house. It is hardly fair at any rate to criticize to the last detail the operations of the Canadian National Railways and let the other road go without criticism.

As I tried to point out last year, when the report of the committee was under consideration, by centering attention on all these details of the Canadian National Railways, the public is led to think that there has been the utmost extravagance. Undoubtedly, there has been extravagance. But I submit that similar extravagance is a commonplace in other corporations. Someone mentions Lucerne. Yes; and a score of things connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway which are extravagances do not come under review in this house, even though the expense must ultimately be borne by the people of Canada.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Do two wrongs make a right?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, but it is not always wise to center on one wrong to the absolute exclusion of another.

Mr. CHAPLIN: All we had to do was to examine this road.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not in the slightest blaming the committee; I am prepared to vote for the report of the committee. I cannot see how the committee can report otherwise. But I do point out that we are examining only one road; indeed I am not for the moment discussing the report of the committee but rather the statement made by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett).

Mr. HACKETT: What statement?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The statement was made that there were tremendous losses resulting from the operation of the road.

Mr. HACKETT: All railroads in Canada?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is all I want to hear—from all railroads in Canada.

Mr. HACKETT: That is what I said.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is not what the speaker said; he said there were tremendous losses resulting from the operations of the road, that is, the Canadian National Railways. In all fairness I want to point out that there are also tremendous losses resulting from the operation of other roads.

Mr. HACKETT: That is what I said.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did not catch that, but as long as it is admitted, that is all I want. The member for Stanstead also referred to the useless competition being carried on and urged that it should be curtailed. He quoted the president of the Canadian National Railways as saying that savings could be made if competition could be eliminated. I have no doubt that that statement is true and I agree with it. I am very glad that we are getting away from the old idea that competition is the life of trade and are beginning to learn that the contrary is true. We are beginning to learn that railway operation is by its very constitution in the nature of a monopoly. I quite agree with what I believe to be the position taken by the hon. member, that sooner or later we will have to have an amalgamation of the roads in this country, but I contend it should be not only an amalgamation of the railroads but an amalgamation of our whole transportation system including railroads, motor service and air service. I think that will have to come sooner or later but when it does come some of us will insist that it will not be a private monopoly but rather a great public service. Like the hon. member for Stanstead I hope I am not saying anything which will prove to be very controversial. If we are all agreed on my proposal, there is not very much more to be said on the matter. However, I think I have as much right to take my statement for granted as has the hon. member. It seems to me that there is a useless waste in all competition and we should not centre on this one particular instance. Competitive industry involves an enormous waste and if I understand anything of the general trend today in business, not merely in transportation but in all productive industry, there is a tendency to eliminate waste and develop monopoly. I think monopoly is bound to come but when it comes we will insist that it must not be a private monopoly but a government monopoly. I hope that one of these days those principles which were so clearly enunciated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) with regard to air control will be put into practice with regard to transportation control.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is only one observation which I should like to make. I should not like the country to understand that it would be possible by giving effect to any recommendation of the committee to make a saving of $50,000,000 in twelve months. It is perfectly ridiculous to make any such statement because that cannot be done under present conditions in this country. We must realize this when we consider the sum total of the revenues of all Canadian railroads and appreciate that the railway situation on this continent is one which beggars all description. The shares of the New York Central Railroad are to-day selling for less than $12 whereas a few months ago they were selling at over $200 each. Practically the same condition exists in connection with the shares of the Pennsylvania Railroad. The Baltimore and Ohio Railway has passed its preferred dividends and the shares of all trunk line systems in the United States have fallen to a market price that one could never have possibly anticipated. This has been brought about by lack of traffic and when you take the traffic of the two roads in this country and deduct the operating expenses it will be seen that under no circumstances would it be possible with the traffic available to save a sum anything like $50,000,000 per annum or even a reasonable fraction of that sum. I merely mention this because I would not like a thought of this kind to go out to the country at this time. The Royal Commission on Railways and Transportation is giving to this matter that attention which I think has never been given before to the details of our transportation systems as affected by the railways of the country.

Mr. HEENAN: May I inquire of the chairman of the committee whether or not a recommendation is made that salaries and wages shall be further reduced?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not wages, but the salaries of the higher executive officers.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. HEENAN: I was wondering whether or not a recommendation of this kind should be included in the report of the committee unless the committee has ascertained that the salaries—I am not speaking about wages—paid by competing lines in the United States and Canada are lower than those paid by the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There was some evidence given before the committee in that connection.

Mr. ARTHUR DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): I note that the report makes no mention of the quarters of the right hon. Prime Minister at the Chateau Laurier, in Ottawa. I think that this item should have been included and for this reason I am entirely opposed to the report.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SATURDAY SITTING

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) has been good enough to inform me that since yesterday his friends have been able to make arrangements in connection with the commitments previously made so that, with the consent of the house, we may meet to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock and sit from three to six o'clock. However, we shall have to take up that business which the hon. members whom the hon. member for Acadia represents would like to discuss. In connection with the business to be taken up to-day I should like to consult the convenience of the house. Our idea is to take up item No. 26 on the order paper at the moment and advance that a stage. Then if it is convenient to all we will proceed with No. 17, No. 20 and No. 22. The Post Office estimates have been fairly well advanced; we might conclude the discussion of them. Immediately after that we shall take up National Revenue which has been waiting for some days; then items, other than Agriculture with respect to which it is desired by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) and his friends that one item should stand, if that is convenient to other members of the house.

If it meets with the general consent of the house, I would move:

That this house shall meet at 11 o'clock a.m. on Saturday, the 21st instant, that there shall be an intermission from one to three o'clock p.m., the order of business and procedure shall be the same as on Fridays and the house shall adjourn at six o'clock p.m.

Mr. BROWN: Can the Prime Minister tell us when he will take up order No. 21, second reading of Bill No. 74, to amend the Canada Shipping Act (coasting trade). It comes between Nos. 20 and 22.

Mr. BENNETT: I have especially not mentioned that, for the reason that in connection with that measure representations have been made which I have been very closely investigating. The extent of the tonnage that is under the British flag in Canadian registry but owned outside Canada is apparently much larger than was thought or than appeared from the original investigations. There are some 800 Canadian sailors engaged on those ships and I am making some further investigations, before making any statement with respect to that, but on Monday something will be said in regard to the matter.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): So far as the official opposition is concerned, the arrangement which the Prime Minister has outlined for to-day's business is entirely satisfactory. We also cordially approve the motion which he has made as to sitting to-morrow. As regards the balance of the business of the session, whatever order the government cares to select will be wholly satisfactory to us.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Civil Service Act, and to provide for the payment of gratuities to members of the Civil Service Commission on retirement, and to officers, clerks and employees in lieu of retiring leave.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the Secretary of State just intimate to us what is proposed?

Mr. CAHAN: The bill which will be founded upon this resolution simply carries into effect the recommendations made in the select special committee's report which is dated May 10, 1932, and the bill, in making amendments to the Civil Service Act, is expressed almost verbatim in the terms of certain sections of this report. On the advice of the Minister of Justice and of the law officers of his department, it is deemed advisable to carry these proposed amendments into effect by express enactment rather than by order in council as had been previously suggested.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Cahan thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 99, to amend the Civil Service Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the bill is printed and will be available for distribution at once, so that members may have an opportunity of studying it between now and to-morrow.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT

The house resumed from Friday, April 8, consideration in committee of Bill No. 10, to amend and consolidate the Fisheries Act —Mr. Duranleau—Mr. Ross in the chair.

Sections 1 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

On section 7—Fishery leases and licences.

Mr. ERNST: There is an obvious error in the printing of this clause. In line two on page three the word appears as "hereafter." It should be "hereinafter." I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Licences for whale fishery.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think subsection (2) should be deleted; it was deleted in committee, and there must be an error in printing.

Mr. ERNST: I move that subsection (2) of section 9 be deleted.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 10 and 11 agreed to.

On section 12—Use of nets regulated.

Mr. NEILL: Why put certain words in brackets?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think the words in brackets were those added by the committee.

Mr. NEILL: They will not appear that way in the act?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No, the brackets will not appear in the act.

Section agreed to.

Sections 13 to 25 inclusive agreed to.

On section 26—Use of explosives prohibited.

Mr. ERNST: There again there appears to be an error in printing. The correct reading as passed by the committee would be in line 25 of the clause the words "other than porpoises, whales, walruses, sea lions and hair seals." Accordingly, I move that the word "and" in the second line of clause 26 be deleted, and the words "sea lions and hair seals" be added after the word "walruses."

Mr. NEILL: The amendment is quite in order. I must point out however that there is an order in council forbidding the killing of walruses in Hudson bay. Would that not conflict with this clause? Under it there is permission to kill with rockets and explosive materials. Under order in council dated July 3, 1931, there is a prohibition to kill walruses, except to a limited extent by Eskimos in the north. It seems to me we have contrary provisions.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The law as adopted will prevail.

Mr. ERNST: They can be killed only under licence.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 27 agreed to.

On section 28—Fish guards only where minister deems it necessary.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, may I inquire from the Minister of Marine whether the amendments to this legislation were discussed with the Minister of Fisheries of Quebec and whether the latter had the opportunity of expressing his views in this respect?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): My reply, sir, is that nothing in this act can affect the prerogatives of the province of Quebec. The amendments to the act which are mostly before the house aim at making the statute more conform with the decision of the Privy Council, in the case of the Quebec government versus the Dominion government. It is simply a new codification of the old Fisheries Act from which we delete the provisions which were found ultra vires, pursuant to the judgment of the Privy Council.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I have no doubt that this legislation was examined with the greatest of care, however, I would be much obliged to the minister, if he would be kind enough to inform the committee whether these questions were discussed with the Quebec Minister of Fisheries.

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I am unaware whether the officials of my department have communicated with the hon. Minister of Fisheries of Quebec. It is quite possible that they have. However, I know that the Quebec Forests and Streams department generally accept the provisions and amendments of the legislation we submit to them.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): The minister is not certain whether his officials have communicated with the Forests and Streams department of Quebec?

Mr. DURANLEAU (Translation): I can not assert it. However, I may inform my hon. friend that there is absolutely nothing in the act, as amended, which can affect the rights of Quebec. It is a re-edition of the former act from which we delete the provisions which were found ultra vires pursuant to the judgment of the Privy Council. The elimination of those provisions is to the advantage of Quebec, since we conform with the decision of the Privy Council.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Out of delicacy, you thought proper not to communicate with the hon. Minister of Fisheries of Quebec.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Cheap! cheap.

Section agreed to.

Sections 29 to 47 inclusive agreed to.

On section 48—Special licences for oyster beds.

Mr. MacLEAN: Is it the policy of the department to lease oyster beds in Prince Edward Island?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, it is the policy of the government to lease those areas.

Mr. MacLEAN: When was that policy decided upon?

Mr. ERNST: The hon. gentleman is probably aware, Mr. Chairman, that it is only within the last year or so that the oyster fisheries of Prince Edward Island have come under federal control. In so far as leasing the beds is concerned, there has been since confederation division of jurisdiction; the beds were the property of the province and their regulation and control was a matter of federal authority. In order to encourage development of the oyster fisheries the province has passed over to the dominion the right to lease the oyster beds.

Mr. MacLEAN: I quite understand that, but I should like to get from the minister when his department decided on the policy of leasing the oyster areas, say in Richmond bay, Grand river and Bideford river, and the other sections which have come under the jurisdiction of the dominion government recently.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I cannot say at what time the leasing policy was adopted for particular areas. As a matter of fact for several years it has been the policy of the department to lease the oyster beds. I might add for the information of my hon. friend that section 48 is a re-enactment, word for word, of section 61 of the old act. So we do not intend to change the policy in that regard.

Mr. MacLEAN: If I understand correctly, when the Dominion government took over the areas they started to develop them in an endeavour to make them productive. Considerable money was expended in that connection, but no policy was decided upon as to leasing. I think that last season a joint meeting was held at Charlottetown between officials of the department and provincial officials, and that then the policy of leasing the areas was decided upon. Is that correct?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Of course, it would be very difficult for me to give the policy of the department with respect to every oyster fishing area in Canada. We want to encourage the industry as much as possible, and it is the policy of the government to do all in its power to that end. If my hon. friend has any suggestions to make with regard to any particular areas we shall be quite content to hear them, and, if meritorious, to give effect to them.

Mr. MacLEAN: There is some division of opinion regarding which policy should be followed, whether those areas should be brought back into production for public fishing or should be leased. I do not suppose the minister could give us any information of any leases that have been applied for, or to what extent this matter has been advanced in Prince Edward Island?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have not any information at hand.

Mr. ERNST: I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that such questions are not in order on a particular clause of the bill; they are matters for discussion on the estimates of the department. No minister can be expected to have such information on hand at this time.

Mr. MacLEAN: With all deference to my good friend from Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst), Mr. Chairman, I would remind him that we have waited all during the session for the fisheries estimates to be discussed. The same may be said with regard to the agricultural estimates; they have been left until the last days of the session. As there may be no other opportunity to bring this matter before the house I think the minister while putting through this bill should have had his deputy present to give whatever information might be required. However, I will not press that point at the present time, if, when the fisheries estimates come up, we are given opportunity to discuss this matter.

Section agreed to.

Sections 49 to 57 inclusive agreed to.

On section 58—Use of rockets or explosives.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I believe there has been an error in the reprinting of the bill. The word "seals" in the third line of the section should be deleted, according to the decision of the committee.

Mr. ERNST: I move that the word "seals" appearing between the words "sea lions" and "hair seals" be deleted.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 59 to 76 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill as amended reported, read the third time and passed.

TRADE TREATY WITH RUSSIA

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a matter touching the privileges of this house. I have just been advised that there appears to-day in one, if not more, of the leading United States newspapers the statement that negotiations looking to a trade agreement between soviet Russia and Canada were under way, and that it was anticipated they would be successfully concluded in time for approval before the meeting of the Imperial conference in Ottawa in July.

I desire to say that no negotiations of any kind, form or description whatever between soviet Russia and Canada have been initiated or are under way, or are intended to be initiated or put under way.

LIVE STOCK RECORDS

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 73, respecting the incorporation of live stock record associations.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Ross in the chair.

Sections 1 to 12 inclusive agreed to.

On section 13—Affiliated association.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Might I ask the minister what change this makes in the present act?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This is to enable an association to act as an incorporated body.

Section agreed to.

Sections 14 to 23 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

WINDING-UP ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No 81, to amend the Winding-Up Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee, Mr. Ross in the chair.

On section 1—"Insurance Company."

Mr. JACOBS: Will the minister explain the purport of the bill.

Mr. GUTHRIE: As the house is aware, there are three new insurance acts which have been recently passed by the Senate. To a large extent they modify the legislation which has heretofore existed in Canada in regard to insurance, and the Senate has likewise passed this bill to amend the Winding-Up Act, to bring it into conformity with the new bills which have been passed by the Senate in respect to insurance. Sections 160-173 of the present Winding-Up Act apply to our insurance laws as they have existed heretofore. Now, with our new legislation, it is necessary to amend the Winding-Up Act to comply with the changes in the insurance legislation. The Senate has therefore passed this act, which amends the Winding-Up Act and brings it into conformity with the acts which are now before the house. If this bill is passed, I do not propose to ask for its third reading until the other bills are finally passed by the house.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is nothing in sections 160 to 173 except the purpose of making the act conform with the other acts?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the only purpose, to make it conform with the new bills.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Part III repealed.

Mr. GUTHRIE: At this stage I would ask that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again. I have been reminded that there is one further amendment that has been suggested by the Department of Insurance, which should be but has not been incorporated in this bill. Later on today I will produce the other amendment.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Can the minister indicate substantially what is the intention of the proposed amendment?

Mr. HACKETT: The other amendment is merely to bring this bill into harmony with the Bankruptcy Act. The trustees must now all be licenced, and to preclude people who in the past might have been exploiting the Bankruptcy Act from exploiting the Winding-Up Act, it has been suggested that all liquidators be licenced trustees.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Ross): Mr. Guthrie moves that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This day.

Motion agreed to.

Progress reported.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

SUPPLY

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Post Office—outside service, $31,451,100.

Mr. BRADETTE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to renew the request which I addressed last year to the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé), in connection with the inauguration of a mail service north of Driftwood. I then forwarded some correspondence and a petition to the hon. Postmaster General who, I am sure, has this request under consideration. There are forty to sixty Austrian and German families located at seven or eight miles distant from the post office of Driftwood and the minister can readily understand the difficulties these citizens experience in getting their mail. I therefore renew my request in this respect. In the past, I know that the Post Office department has done every thing possible to give a reasonable service to the new centres of settlement in northern Ontario. Such a service is very important to these new settlements. The Postmaster General will realize the exact situation if he considers that these people find it impossible to get their mail more than once or twice a week. If the hon. Postmaster could accede to my request, these settlers would regularly receive their mail.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I just had, last week, an opportunity of discussing this question with the officials of my department. We intend to look into this matter this year, subject of course to the funds at our disposal. We are at present studying the whole situation.

Mr. HURTUBISE (Translation): I wish to put a question to the Postmaster General and I rely on his kindness to enlighten me on the matter. I want to know whether representations have been made by the Dominion Railway Mail Clerks' Association, of North Bay, with reference to lowering the age limit from 65 to 60 years, in connection with their pensions. I received a letter requesting me to plead their cause with the minister. Previous to continuing my remarks, I would like to inquire whether such a request was addressed to the Postmaster General.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): In fact, we have received a letter to that effect and we are looking into the matter.

Mr. HURTUBISE (Translation): I strongly support the request of this association. As a doctor, I must, first, inform you that these civil servants live in an atmosphere and conditions quite exceptional. They do not live a regular life, are continuously exposed to danger, breathe coal fumes during their whole life time, and have to put up with continuous vibrations during their working hours. I have no statistics on the subject at my disposal, however, I am convinced beforehand that, if such statistics could be collected, they would show that the average length of life for these employees is much shorter than among the ordinary workmen. I therefore beg of the Postmaster General to take this request under his serious consideration.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): It is exactly the task we have undertaken.

Mr. HURTUBISE (Translation): It is under consideration?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Yes.

Mr. HURTUBISE (Translation): Thank you.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, last evening, I did not wish to frighten the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). Just at the moment the house adjourned, I was congratulating him for having shown some consideration to a veteran of the Great war who was applying for the position of postmaster and I shall translate in English what I stated in this respect:

Je félicite le très honorable premier ministre d'avoir donné instruction à son secrétaire de répondre de la sorte à un vétéran de la Grande Guerre.

The translation is as follows:

I congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) on giving instructions to his private secretary to answer a veteran of the great war in such a manner.

I will not press this point any further except to say that my impression is that the right hon. gentleman is rather timid. He reminds me of Sir Lomer Gouin, who covered up his shyness by loud speech.

To continue my argument, the hon. Postmaster General stated publicly, on more than one occasion, that he would protect even against his friends, the postmasters who had fulfilled their duties and the employees of his department who had taken no active part in politics. The charges of "political partisanship" were accumulating on his desk. The complaint of the defeated candidates were twice as numerous as those of Conservative members elected. Was it to compromise that the hon. Postmaster General had forms of letters and affidavits prepared, in the autumn of 1930, and during the winter of 1931, so as to give these employees the option of willingly resigning if they had taken an active part in politics? The Postmaster General probably took advantage of these forms to clear himself of their dismissals. Five hundred and twenty-three letters or forms were forwarded by the Postmaster General to certain postmasters, however, the result was not what he expected, since only 33 resigned. Then the hon. Postmaster General had recourse to petitions in connection with political partisanship. On May 12, there were 474 of them.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Not petitions, but inquiries.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Certainly, inquiries; inquiries in connection with political partisanship, at the request, mostly, of defeated candidates. On May 12, 474 had been held at a cost of $33,103.64. In a return laid on the table at the outset of the session, at the request of the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. St-Père), in Quebec alone, 78 investigations had been ordered at the request of Conservative members, and 160 at the request of defeated candidates. However, the information was not complete. It was only completed to-day, and I wish to thank the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) for having tabled the answers to questions put to the minister with reference to inquiries in connection with political partisanship, petitioned for since August, 1930.

This information covers the inquiries in connection with political partisanship since August, 1930:

* Three requests afterwards withdrawn.
 One investigation for fifteen employees.
 One of the two investigations for ten employees.

In the case of the Department of Fisheries, three investigations were requested, but the requests were afterwards withdrawn.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Can my hon. friend inform the house as to how many requests for investigations were made?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I have not all the details that my hon. friend asks, however, I shall be in a position shortly to answer all his questions, by means of another schedule.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): 434.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Petitions for inquiries?

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): 434 inquiries in connection with political partisanship.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): There were 434 investigations as regards political partisanship. How many dismissals resulted as a consequence?

Mr. VENIOT (Translations): They were all dismissed.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I do not think that the information of my hon. friend is correct. I am aware that in my county...

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): I do not mean in Quebec alone, but throughout Canada.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I do not think that the figures quoted by my hon. friend are correct. The hon. member informs us that each time a request for an investigation was made...

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I made no such statement.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): No, it was the hon. member for Gloucester.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): No, no.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Then I did not understand. How many requests for investigations were made and how many dismissals took place after inquiry?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I shall give a list shortly. (Text.) I shall give to the committee a list of direct dismissals and those due to a change of site or something else. With my hon. friend's permission I shall proceed with that, and as I read the whole summary I hope the committee will have no objection to having it put on Hansard in the same form as I have it.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): The hon. member has no reason to complain. I think it is a fair war. If the hon. member cannot quote the number of applications for inquiries with reference to the Post Office department, I would ask him to confine his remarks to the cases having to do with the items that are under discussion.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend is not at present presiding over the committee. I am giving these figures in order to compare what has been done in the Post Office Department with what has occurred in other departments. There have been far more investigations in the Post Office Department than in any other and next in point of numbers is the Marine department. I am sorry the departments in which there have been so many dismissals are headed by two ministers from Quebec.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): The hon. member is unfair in his statement. These inquiries were necessary, because the way the postmasters in Quebec meddle in politics is most scandalous—

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Yes, that is a fact.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): ...it was absolutely fair to hold investigations. When an inquiry revealed that a postmaster should be dismissed, he was; when the inquiry showed that there was nothing to justify a dismissal, he was not. I have been informed that 86 postmasters were found not guilty, at these investigations, and were therefore not dismissed.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): That is possible.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): The others were found guilty of political partisanship. Must we lay down the principle that public officials may become political agents? I requested some dismissals in my county, but nobody was dismissed without first holding an inquiry, because I think it is unfair to order a dismissal without first inquiring into the facts. On the other hand, if following an investigation, it is found that a public official acted as a political heeler or partisan, I think it is only fair that he should be dismissed, in order to teach employees that they are civil servants and must not have any party connections.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, if my hon. friend for Montmorency would be kind enough to allow me to proceed with my remarks, he could after, if need be, contradict my statements, that is if he thinks fit or is able to do so. At present, I simply wish to establish certain facts. I am discussing requests for investigations; I shall discuss, just now, dismissals. These investigations, with the exception of three, were requested either by defeated condidates or by Conservative members. In three instances, the requests for inquiries addressed to the department of my hon. friend, the Acting Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Duranleau), were withdrawn. I am very pleased of the fact that it happened in his department, because it atones somewhat for the number of investigations ordered by the Minister of Marine.

Mr. LaVERGNE (Translation): What objection can my hon. friend possibly have to an application for an inquiry?

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member who has the floor should be allowed to proceed with his speech.

Mr. POULIOT: Yesterday I had two desks filled with my files and to-day, in order to expedite business, I have reduced the number of documents to what I hold in my hand. I am ready to proceed and to show my goodwill, but if there is objection, the debate on the Post Office estimates will last for a week. I am being fair to all, but I wish to be treated fairly. I have points to make and part of the work of the session is to point out what has been done. I complain very much of the fact that especially in Quebec the sour-mouthed defeated candidates, are worse offenders in respect of dismissals than the Conservative members. This is the point I wish to make to the committee and the country. When there are so many unemployed, so many who are suffering and in dire distress, we see these defeated candidates and members wasting the time of the Postmaster General by asking him to cut off the heads of numerous people who, notwithstanding what the hon. member for Montmagny has said, are innocent of political partisanship and yet are treated in the same way as if they had paraded the streets and made speeches in favour of Liberal candidates. This is what I am strongly protesting against.

Concerning the commissioners, my personal knowledge is that some of them have been most unfair, indeed, so unfair that their actions could be reported to the bar of Quebec. I can see that my hon. friend from Montmagny is not a mind reader. Let him be patient a while. He knows I have every regard for him; I have never said anything unpleasant to him. In order not to waste the time of the house at this late date in the session, I am curtailing as much as possible what I have to say, but I am here to say what I think is necessary and no one will prevent me from doing so.

Mr. LAVERGNE: No one wants to do that. What I should like to know from my hon. friend is this: Can there be any objection to any citizen, whether he be a member or a defeated candidate, asking for an investigation in regard to any public service? If there is, the point of my hon. friend is well taken. But if there is no objection to a man asking for an investigation, anybody's conduct can be investigated.

Mr. POULIOT: Certainly.

Mr. LAVERGNE: So much the better for him if he comes out clean-handed. If not I think he deserves punishment. I cannot see anything in the point that so many investigations have been asked.

Mr. POULIOT: Probably not, Mr. Chairman, but what I am after is justice and fairness. When investigations are carried on fairly, and when fair play is exercised, I have no objection. When after investigation the commissioners state that there is nothing against a man, but make a report against him I say they deal most unfairly, and it is against that sort of practice I complain.

I have said nothing about requests for investigations made by Conservative members of this house. I care not whether they come from the province of Quebec or any other province. I did not complain about them, but I do complain about the fact that the defeated Tory candidates in the province of Quebec are always asking for the heads of postmasters, so that they may replace them with people who are often not worthy of the positions, and have not the qualifications of their predecessors. I have written the Postmaster General telling him that so far as I am concerned I have no objection. If he wishes he may dismiss all the postmasters in my constituency, because by so doing he would be helping me politically. I do not object to his cutting off heads; from a political standpoint. I do not object to that.

Mr. SAUVE: But I would object.

Mr. POULIOT: I congratulate the minister on his response, and I hope he will realize that hon. members on this side are better friends of his than the people who advise dismissals. I should like to make a statement which will make matters somewhat clearer to hon. members, and particularly the hon. member for Montmagny. The day all postmasters are dismissed in all constituencies—as happened in Gaspe, at the request of the defeated candidate, a man who tried to enter the Senate—the day that is done in every constituency hon. members may be sure that Liberals will be elected in those constituencies. Why? Because the people will not stand for injustice and unfairness—that is the reason.

If I have been somewhat vehement in my remarks it has been to show the viciousness of the system, to put the Postmaster General on his guard against those so-called friends who in one moment kiss him and in the next stab him in the back.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Where is the injustice about which my hon. friend talks?

Mr. POULIOT: I am not speaking against requests for investigations generally, but when made by some people those requests show ill will. I am in favour of fair investigations, those conducted with fairness and where fair play is in evidence. That is what I am for. I am sure my hon. friend from Montmagny must agree with me on that.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. POULIOT: Then why talk so much about it?

Mr. LAVERGNE: I agree, but I should like to know when he deems an investigation to be unfair.

Mr. POULIOT: I have not five tongues; I have only one, but I try to make the best use I can of it. I cannot hide what I wish to say, and at times words do not come as fast as our thoughts.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They are coming pretty well.

Mr. POULIOT: We have to do the best we can. I am speaking to the committee as I would speak to a jury or a court of justice. It is for the sake of justice that I stand today in this committee to defend the cause of men who are not guilty, and to complain about the practices of unfairness and injustice carried on by the Post Office Department. I know the minister well enough to say that I am sure he has done his best. His duty now however is to establish general rules and principles for his department to follow, and special rules for those people outside the House of Commons. When a man is not elected—and the hon. member for North Huron knows this—when a man is not elected he should not be entitled to the same privileges as members of parliament, because his actions cannot be discussed in the House of Commons. My hon. friend from Montmagny, for instance, may make a complaint against a postmaster. I mention him only as an example, because I do not believe he would do so. If however he were to make an unfair complaint the matter could be discussed in the House of Commons during the discussion of the estimates for the Post Office Department, in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, or on some other occasion. He would be here, and we could discuss the matter with him. But those who are not in the House of Commons, escape. They write private letters to the minister so that they will not appear in the public files. What about those people? They cannot be located. They go away and hide themselves, and I am not going to play hide and seek with them.

I am here to prevent any injustice being done by the Postmaster General. He knows my intentions are honourable. He knows what I am doing now I do in the name of justice, and he knows that I have done other things for a similar purpose when as leader of the opposition in the province of Quebec he gave me his support. It is in appreciation of his treatment of me in those days that to-day I wish to treat him fairly. When he was leader of the opposition in Quebec he helped me, and I thank him for it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. POULIOT: No. My hon. friend should not interrupt me because I do not wish to be disagreeable to him. After those preliminaries, which I should have liked very much to spare the committee, I should like to say a few words about a commissioner who carried on many investigations, but was sworn only after he had acted. He reminds me of a man who goes to communion before going to confession. I do not wish hon. members to think that I am complaining about all commissioners. I repeat the statement I made yesterday, namely that I commend the department upon the appointment of Mr. Lalonde as attorney. I do not know if Mr. Lalonde will fulfil our expectations, and although I am not in accord with all statements hon. members opposite may make about him we will see what he does, and judge him afterwards. His appointment may be a step in the right direction, and although we do not know what the future may hold it will reveal itself in due time.

I should like to say a few words concerning dismissals. In the province of Quebec there were 479 investigations, and in the other provinces only 238. In other words the province of Quebec had twice as many investigations as all the other provinces combined. The defeated candidates in the whole of Canada asked for 465 investigations, whereas members asked for only 252, or about one-half. The defeated Conservative candidates of the province of Quebec asked for 362 investigations, whereas the defeated Conservative candidates in the other eight provinces asked for only 103. In other words the defeated Tory candidates in the province of Quebec asked for three and one-half times as many investigations as did those throughout the rest of Canada. As for dismissals, the services of 436 postmasters were dispensed with on the grounds of political partisanship; resignations after having received the forms from the department numbered 33; change of sites, 75; other reasons, 91,—or a total of 635. I said I would mention the indirect dismissals. Through post offices being abolished 436 postmasters were dismissed. This brings the total changes up to 1,071. At the time these post offices were closed certain mushroom offices were opened in the neighbourhood and the appointees got their nomination through a political patron. There were 210 of these new post offices opened. This brings the total changes up to 1,281. The total number of investigations was 597.

There is another thing I complain of, and may I put the hon. minister on his guard with reference to it. I refer to stool pigeons —in French "mouchards;" people who make complaints against postmasters in order to get their jobs. I asked this question:

In how many cases, since August, 1930, has a postmaster charged with active political partisanship been replaced temporarily or permanently by a person making the charge or giving evidence against him?

The answer was:

In view of the fact that it will take some time to prepare the answer, it is recommended that this question stand as an order for return.

No order for return has been tabled. Perhaps this is because they are so numerous that there is no accountant in the Post Office Department who can number them. These people gave evidence against the postmasters, at times without corroboration, and were appointed to the vacancies they had been instrumental in causing. I have some of these cases, and they are rather interesting. Here is number 1:

Q. Was Mrs. Emma Rioux alias Mrs. Joseph Rioux, widow, heard as a witness in an inquiry held in connection with political partisanship in which Johnny April, postmaster of Gironde, county of Témiscouata, Quebec, was the person charged?—A. Yes.

Q. Was said Mrs. Rioux appointed postmistress replacing said Johnny April?—A. Yes.

The committee will notice that I am expediting this business as much as I possibly can. This is all I have to say about the post office at Gironde. As my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) points out there are so many of these cases that it is not my fault if the minister's estimates are delayed.

Number 2:

Q. Did Pierre Fortin lodge a complaint against Joseph Morneau, postmaster of Ivry, county of Témiscouata, Quebec?—A. Yes.

Q. Was said Pierre Fortin appointed postmaster to replace said Joseph Morneau?—A. Yes.

Q. Was he appointed after a regular inquiry was held?—A. The regular procedure was followed in this case. The appointment was made by the department on the recommendation of Mr. C. E. Dubé.

Mr. Dube, naturally, is the defeated candidate for the county of Temiscouata. The "regular procedure" mentioned means that no procedure was followed, that is, there was no investigation. Number 3:

Q. Did Isidore Ouellet lodge a complaint against Narcisse Ouellet, postmaster of Lamy South, county of Témiscouata, Quebec?—A. Yes.

Q. Was said Isidore Ouellet appointed postmaster to replace said Narcisse Ouellet?—A. Yes.

Number 4:

Q. Was François Michaud heard as a witness in an inquiry held in connection with political partisanship in which Joseph Michaud, postmaster of La Richardiere, county of Témiscouata, was the person charged?—A. Yes.

Q. Was the said François Michaud appointed postmaster to replace Joseph Michaud?—A. Yes.

Those are four cases for the consideration of the committee. I have some others that I will give in a minute. The return has not yet been tabled, but I can show by what has happened in my own constituency the course that has been followed throughout the country. I have been in other constituencies and there I found the same condition as in my own constituency, that the people who lodged complaints against the postmasters did so in order to get those jobs. That is what I wish to prove. They were interested witnesses, I submit it is putting a premium on stool pigeons to encourage them by accepting their uncorroborated evidence. That is why yesterday I suggested to the minister that he consider only sworn complaints made by people who are absolutely disinterested, that is, who do not want the postmaster's position. By taking this course he will secure much more reliable testimony. May I read to the committee a letter to the Postmaster General written by Mr. Philippe Fraser of Notre-Dame des Sept Douleurs on the 30th of March, 1931:

Mr. POULIOT (Translation):

Notre-Dame-des-Sept-Douleurs,
March 30, 1931.

To the Hon. Arthur Sauvé,
Postmaster General,
Ottawa, Canada.

Sir,—

I have read your letter to Joseph Michaud, postmaster of La-Richardière. There is not a person, in the whole of Canada, who is more Conservative than I am. I receive the Debates of House of Commons, and I feel that I could not possibly allow the Prime Minister to be insulted, as he has been since the outset of the session, without putting up a fight. Take, for instance, the case of the Imperial conference and the sale of wheat; do you not think that one must be light-headed to carry on such a discussion? The wheat of the northwestern provinces could have been sold by the former Minister of Agriculture while on his trip to Europe, or in his pastoral visit to display his fine motor car. When he returned from abroad, did he state that he had tried to do something in this connection; there was nothing to show, except the expenses.

A flock of sheep! Is it possible, sir?

That is what a Conservative leader of the county of Temiscouata wrote—

I shall speak to you about Joseph Michaud. I have already spoken to you about him, you referred my letter to Mr. Dubé and that made him angry, however, that has no importance. I cannot, as an honourable man, do otherwise than help Mr. Michaud. And after having read your letter, I am ready to take the oath that Mr. Michaud was never guilty of any offence as mentioned in the letter. Those who are responsible for this are people in this locality; one voted for the Conservative party on July 28, 1930, because he had been thrown out by the Liberal party, while the other is on the fence.

Perhaps Mr. Michaud voted Liberal, however, I never asked him and he never told me. Mr. Michaud is a thorough gentleman, who has all the true Conservatives on his side.

I am the clerk of the council and I am pleased to sign his paper and I would not like to see this affair go any further.

Take courage, sir; I wish you God speed.

Yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) Phillipe Fraser.

Coming back to the stool pigeons, here is case number 5:

Q. Did Eugene Lepage lodge a complaint against David Lebel, postmaster of Montagne Ronde, county of Témiscouata, Quebec?—A. Yes.

Q. Was said Eugene Lepage heard as witness in an inquiry held in connection with political partisanship in which David Lebel was the person charged?—A. Yes.

Q. Was the said Eugene Lepage appointed postmaster to replace said David Lebel?—A. Yes.

That man lodged the complaint against the postmaster, gave evidence, and afterwards was appointed to the job.

Q. Did Alexandre Lebel lodge a complaint against Andre Beaulieu, postmaster of Raudot, county of Témiscouata, Quebec?—A. Yes.

Q. Was said Alexandre Lebel a witness in the inquiry in connection with political partisanship brought against said Andre Beaulieu?—A. Yes.

Q. Was said Alexandre Lebel appointed postmaster to replace said Andre Beaulieu?—A. Yes.

Q. Did the Postmaster General receive a petition signed by a number of persons to the effect that only one man, Alexandre Lebel, wanted to change the site of the post office?—A. Yes.

And he got it. Number 7:

Q. Did Mrs. Emile Ouellet, widow, lodge a complaint against Omer Sirois, then postmaster of Rioux, county of Témiscouata, Quebec?—A. Yes.

Q. Was said Mrs. Emile Ouellet appointed postmistress to replace said Omer Sirois?—A. Yes.

Q. Was she appointed after a regular inquiry?—A. The regular procedure was followed in this case. The appointment was made by the department on the recommendation of Mr. C. E. Dubé.

May I read a letter from Mrs. Ouellet, for it will probably interest the committee?

Mr. SPOTTON: Sure.

Mr. POULIOT: She wrote the right hon. Prime Minister on January 10, 1931, as follows:

(Translation) If you only knew how proud I am of my party and how I would dislike being deceived in this way.

I hope therefore that you will look into the matter and that I shall have my office for the end of January.

Yours devotedly,

Widow Emile Ouellet.

(Text): Here is a very nice letter written to a certain Mr. Dubé on March 1, 1931:

(Translation) Time passes and still no change as regards the post office. I would like to know if it is the intention to change it or not. You could not believe how much harm the Conservatives are doing themselves by not even being able to change this office which is altogether unsuitable to the district. There are no more postal notes and there are all sorts of complaints. He laughs in our faces and tells us we can't get the post office away from him. We got worked up about our party last summer and we became a laughing-stock. I must not annoy you further with these things; you know more about them than I do; but I would like to tell you that a big change is going to take place in the Conservative party, and rightly so, for after all Mr. Sauvé is Postmaster General.

Your devoted servant,

Widow Emile Ouellet.

This gives an idea of the complaints that are made to the Postmaster General. I know that at times he is greatly bothered by such complaints, but he understands very well that this is no reason why he should agree with everything that is said to him. Here is another very important case, about which I said a word yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): The hon. gentleman has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. ROBERGE (Translation): Mr. Chairman yesterday evening there was some talk of Garfield MacKinnon. There were interesting exchanges from both sides. Since I myself brought this question up on April 14, I would like to add a few words to complete the discussion. On April 28 the hon. member for St. Johns-Iberville (Mr. Rhéaume) brought the matter up again; he was told by the hon. Postmaster General that Garfield MacKinnon has been going around the country for the last twelve years. Mr. Chairman, if Garfield MacKinnon has been exploiting our letter carriers for twelve years it is no fault of mine for up to last January I had never even heard of the man. The first time I knew of his existence was when he came to Plessisville; I immediately warned our mail carriers not to join this association and told them I would find out about this man as soon as I got to Ottawa. When I had obtained the information I wanted I gave it to the house; I proved that this man is really a highway robber who has been mulcting people for the past twelve years.

The hon. Postmaster General stated on the floor of the house that he had given a satisfactory explanation to the member for Megantic, after the necessary inquiries had been made. I can say that the Postmaster General, the deputy minister, the superintendent and all his colleagues helped me in my efforts to obtain an investigation. But the minister added that he could do nothing because his legal adviser had informed me that the affidavit I had given him was not sufficient to warrant a conviction. At the time this explanation satisfied me; but since then I have consulted competent lawyers, and the hon. members for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Girouard) and for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Fontaine) have told me the affidavit sufficed to bring about this man's arrest.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): The attorney general of Quebec province can have him arrested.

Mr. ROBERGE (Translation): I'll come to back to that. You find it ticklish.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Not so ticklish as all that.

Mr. ROBERGE (Translation): I can say to the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe (Mr. Laflèche), and to any other hon. member, that when they lose $5 they would rather keep mum about it than institute proceedings against a young man who lives in Ontario, and thus expose themselves to shelling out $200 or $300 of their own money.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): The attorney general of the province can have him arrested.

Mr. ROBERGE (Translation): Anyway, if you yourself were swindled out of $5 you'd suffer in silence.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The Attorney General would never dare to have the man arrested because this man was at one time recommended by the hon. member for Richmond-Wolfe.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): I emphatically deny that. I have had no connection whatever with MacKinnon. You are only trying to mix my name up with his; you are acting for someone higher up.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): The hon. member for Megantic has the floor and unless he gives permission he may not be interrupted.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): We know all about your tidy little system and your immigration side-line.

Mr. ROBERGE (Translation): The hon. member's share wasn't big enough.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Not big enough? I could hand you some, if I wanted to.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): Order, order.

Mr. ROBERGE (Translation): The hon. Postmaster General should have one of his Quebec inspectors ascertain if the affidavit I furnished the minister was not in accordance with the facts and did not suffice to warrant a conviction. Let him send one of his inspectors into the counties where MacKinnon operated, Richmond-Wolfe, Megantic, or elsewhere; there he can get all the affidavits necessary to prevent this man from exploiting the people. I think I have done my part; and the department should do as much to protect our mail carriers.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I do not intend to take up much time, Mr. Chairman before coming to the subject I wish to discuss let me simply point out certain facts to the hon. member for Témiscouata whom I hold,—and he knows it,—in high esteem. I listened to him very attentively and, if I understand aright, his thesis is that anybody is entitled to lay a charge of political partisanship against a postmaster. Every citizen has as much right as a member of parliament to lodge a complaint against a postmaster. The hon. member for Témiscouata finds fault with the fact that enquiries were granted. Would he rather we came back to the old system, when the member for Gloucester,—him, too, I like very much,—dismissed postmasters without an enquiry? There still resides in my county a widow, the mother of eleven children, who was dismissed by the member for Gloucester. She asked for an investigation; it was refused. I requested the present minister to re-appoint, her because I thought she had been dismissed unjustly. On that score I rather feel that one cannot praise too highly the minister's sense of justice and of fair-play. Far from showing himself a rabid partisan he has often run the risk of displeasing his own followers by dealing justly with postmasters and standing up for them.

I may say that most of the postmasters let out in my constituency were dismissed at my request, but never without an investigation. I did not want a single one of them to be dismissed without an enquiry; but unfortunately I realized that they were in truth political agents, active partisans. If there has been any scandal about the matter it came not from the fact of their dismissal, but would have been the consequence of their being retained in office. The postmasters who had mixed in politics could have been dismissed on my personal recommendation. I did not act in that way because the facts were unknown to me.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): What commissioner made the enquiries in Montmagny county?

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): In one case Mr. Gosselin; and in the other I believe it was—I had nothing to do with the investigation. I always refused to intervene with the investigating commissioner either for the complainant or for the postmaster. When a postmaster appealed to me for protection I answered: I will interfere no more than I would if an enquiry were requested against you or by you.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): Did not the hon. member advise these postmasters to hire a lawyer to defend them?

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I advised each one of them to employ a lawyer. In my own county I defended none. I know that in certain cases the enquiry proved the postmaster innocent; and I myself recommended that he be retained in office. I could have had him dismissed on my personal recommendation, as was done under the former Postmaster General; but I did not do that. As regards those who took the responsibility of recommending dismissals that concerns them. Far from accusing the Postmaster General we should be grateful to him for having defended those postmasters who were unjustly accused. There were numerous dismissals? Whose fault was it? The thing is that the federal employees in the province of Quebec, like those in the provincial service, had become political agents.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Why add "in the provincial service?"

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I add "in the provincial service" because during the last election campaign 60,000 of them overran our roads.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Can that have any bearing whatever on matters of federal administration?

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Yes.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Not the slightest.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): The hon. member says he fails to see how that has anything to do with federal matters. The day when he understands that will be the last Day of Judgment.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): I understand that as well as you do. Otherwise I would be known, like yourself, as a person of no importance.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): The hon. member says he understands things as well as I do; and that I understand as well as the hon. member; that is not very flattering towards me.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): I do not need any dissertations.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): The hon. member has no need of dissertations?

Mr. DENIS (Translation): No.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Then let him take a book and read. That will do him no harm.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): You've read too much for what you have understood.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Leaving aside the illustrious member for St. Denis and his remarkable interruptions, which throw a great deal of light on the debate, I shall continue.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): You won't throw any light on the subject.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): If there have been a large number of dismissals it is because the complaints were equally numerous; and the complaints were so numerous because the facts were evident.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): There was also perhaps the reason that lots of people wanted post offices.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): It may be also that a number of people wanted to be postmasters. The hon. member for Temiscouata raised a great deal of objection to the fact that certain people who had lodged complaints were allowed to testify. I would find it rather strange if such people were not called as witnesses. If they declare that to their personal knowledge the postmaster had taken an active part in politics, it would appear rather remarkable to me if these people were not put into the witness box. That they themselves should have been appointed afterwards? Most of the appointments are made by the Civil Service Commission, except in the case of small post offices. So the Civil Service Commission, and not the minister, is responsible.

When I rose it was not to speak of this matter; the remarks I have made are merely by-the-way. I understand the department authorizes licensed agents to sell stamps where they will, within a specified territory, either in their own homes or by soliciting at others homes. They make rather remarkable incomes; some receive commission ranging as high as $10,000 and $15,000 a year. On the other hand a letter from the Post Office Department, signed by a Mr. Atwater, reveals that a certain postmistress who through the sale of stamps, boosted the revenue of her office to $400 or $600, from the $200 it was previously, is being subjected to an enquiry at the present time because she sells too many stamps. She has signed a sworn statement to the effect that she sells no stamps outside her post office. The fault found with this postmistress, Madame Jean, is that she sells stamps to people who do not mail their letters at this post office. Am I to understand that, according to the department, when a person buys a stamp in a post office that person must lick the stamp there and then and mail the letter in that post office? Or is this Mr. Atwater exaggerating when he forbids a postmistress to sell as many stamps as she is asked for? When a person comes into the post office must the postmistress, before selling any stamps to that person, ascertain whether the customer resides in the parish or in the neighbourhood and if all letters are to be posted immediately? Or is Mr. Atwater being overzealous? I would like to know.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Although my attention has not been called...

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): Louder, Mr. Minister.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Although my attention was not drawn to these facts by the hon. member for Montmagny, previous to the house meeting. I am sufficiently well acquainted with the case to answer.

The case to which the hon. member for Montmagny calls attention is a matter of daily occurrence. Why? Because the postmaster is paid on the basis of the quantity of stamps he sells. It is but fair that a village postmaster should count on local clients in order to retain his revenue. Should a postmaster carry on propaganda on another postmaster's territory, the latter's salary is decreased, his revenue falls off, and that is not fair. The regulation has been in effect for a very long time and it is observed. When a postmaster fails to comply, an official of the Post Office department writes him and inquires how it happens that his revenue is increasing so abnormally.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): That is not what happened in this instance. I wrote the department three times on the subject. The postmistress in question does not carry on any propaganda. The number of her clients has increased because citizens go and buy stamps at her place. These citizens include the village notary who directs a large office and who uses a lot of stamps as a notary, clerk of the municipality and bank agent. What appears extraordinary to me is the fact that the department is opposed to an increase in its own revenues, and secondly that the department's letter states the postmistress does not ascertain whether her clients reside in the locality.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): The government does not lose anything.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): In the first place, the government does not lose anything, and what is more, the thing appears ridiculous to me.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): That has been the law since there is a Post Office Act.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Where is the law that compels a postmaster to sell stamps only to parties he knows, to those who reside in the locality, or, as Mr. Atwater states, only to persons who mail a letter in the post office where they purchase their stamps? I am passing through a village and I stop to purchase stamps as I go by. According to Mr. Atwater's letter, I would be required to mail my letter at that very office.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): There is no sense to that.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): No sense whatever, particularly when the Post Office department tolerates a vicious practice; there are licensed agents who sell postage stamps and receive very large commissions. That is a vicious practice. I ask the Postmaster General to instruct Mr. Atwater to accept the statement submitted to him and to cease annoying this postmistress who is only performing her duty, who carries on no propaganda and who is being persecuted at the hands of an over-zealous official.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): Would the hon. member allow me to ask a question in order to clear up the matter? Does the postmistress you speak of sell postage stamps to persons living outside of her postal district?

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): That is not the case. She only sells stamps in her own post office.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): The hon. member does not grasp my question: Does she sell postage stamps to persons living outside of her postal district and who come to her post office to purchase them?

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): That is quite possible.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation) : If she does that, she violates the Post Office Act.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): Then, the law is badly worded. I would like to ask the hon. member for Gloucester a question: I am passing through Gloucester or Bathurst and I ask the postmaster to sell me a stamp. Should he refuse to sell me a stamp because I am not a resident?

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): No. We are speaking of a continual practice.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): There is no continual practice in this case.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): That is the law.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): I understand that is the law but it is badly worded.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I may say to the hon. member for Montmagny that we will not only study the act but the case he has just submitted to the committee. If necessary, we will order an investigation.

Mr. MARCIL (Translation): I would like to mention a case that occurred in my riding. A man who was not satisfied with a change made in the post office did not purchase a single stamp at that post office during seven years. The department held several investigations. The man was interviewed, and the department finally acknowledged its inability to right the matter. This gentleman who was a man of high social standing had the right to purchase stamps anywhere outside of his district. He did so during seven years and the department admitted its inability to stop him.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): As I understand the matter, a party has the right to purchase stamps but he has no right to sell them.

Mr. MARCIL (Translation): The department was unable to prevent that man from picking out the post office where he chose to purchase his postage stamps.

Mr. LaVERGNE (Translation): The member for Temiscouata is right.

Mr. VENIOT (Translation): When a situation such as that outlined a moment ago by the hon. member for Montmagny arises, the department in accordance with the regulation notifies the postmaster that the commission on the sale of stamps to residents of another district will be deducted from his salary and paid to the postmaster of the district wherein the persons purchasing the stamps reside.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): That is ridiculous.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): How can the matter be controlled? One may purchase stamps at a very distant post office, not necessarily at the neighbouring post office.

Mr. LaVERGNE (Translation): That comes back to what the hon. member for Temiscouata said a moment ago: One had the right to purchase, but one has not the right to sell. That proves how ridiculous the regulation is.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I would like to address you in regard to the Sully case. However, before I do so, may I be permitted to reply briefly to the observations of the hon. member for Montmagny with respect to investigations. I agree with him that any Canadian citizen has the right to lodge a complaint against any civil servant not only of the Post Office department but of any other department as well. That is an inalienable right vested in every British subject. However, there is a marked difference between lodging a complaint against a postmaster and securing his dismissal merely on the strength of a signature. According to established custom, the securing of a postmaster's dismissal on the strength of a signature belongs to each member of parliament. The members have the right to lodge complaints against postmasters. Should a member mention in a letter that a postmaster has, to his own knowledge, meddled in politics, the minister usually dismisses the postmaster. It seems to me the same power should not be granted to a defeated candidate. The latter should not enjoy the same privileges as a member of parliament. Should he be elected at a later date, he will then enjoy those privileges.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): It is a shame.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I have many files with reference to dismissals that have been made in Lake St. John county since the month of August, 1930, upon the member's personal recommendation. I have not got those files here. They are in my room. My hon. colleague from Charlevoix-Saguenay also has a number of files. The custom has obtained in the Post Office Department of granting dismissals upon the written request of a defeated candidate.

Mr. LaVERGNE (Translation): So reads the law.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): It does not seem to me to be just, even though the law—

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): Not for defeated candidates.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): It is going a little too far in the case of defeated candidates.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): We even experience difficulty in getting them dismissed. We experience more difficulty in that respect than the defeated candidates.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I do not believe my hon. friend from Richmond-Wolfe experiences any difficulty worth mentioning. I happen to know he is very kind-hearted and that he sympathizes with those who are in distress. As a physician, he meets people and knows something of their misery. He tries to cure them and I am sure he is not doing justice to himself.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): At least he does not use his bistoury on the postmasters!

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I would like to ask the hon. Postmaster General a question in connection with the Sully post office. I have been told that the postmaster in charge there had not been dismissed but suspended. I would like to know whether the hon. Postmaster General intends reinstating Mr. Jean-Baptiste Plourde as postmaster at Sully?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I understand a returned soldier by the name of Jean is a candidate. His name is before the Commission.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I would also ask the hon. Postmaster General and if his answer is favourable that will be my last question in connection with this file, if the Commission is aware of the vacancy, if the Commission published the necessary notices so that the appointment of the postmaster be made with the least possible delay.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Certainly.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): Before my hon. friend from Témiscouata takes up another case, may I be permitted to ask the hon. Postmaster General to give me some information with reference to the comparatively recent appointment of a new postmaster at St. Vallier. I understand there are two candidates for the position. Here is a case where the hon. Postmaster General was not compelled to dismiss the man, because the postmaster died. He had to be replaced. The two candidates seeking appointment were a Mr. Bélanger and a Mr. Bérubé. The Civil Service Commission required the two candidates to try an examination so as to determine their fitness and qualifications Mr. Bérubé was placed first. The Civil Service Commission subsequently recommended Mr. Bérubé's appointment to the Post Office Department. Rather than give effect to the Commission's recommendation, the Postmaster General rejected it, in accordance with Article 24 of the Civil Service Act, I believe, without giving any reason and took upon himself to appoint Mr. Bélanger. Of course, Mr. Bérubé wanted to know why he had not been appointed.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): This is not a permanent appointment. The minister can only make temporary appointments.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): I cannot say whether this is a temporary or permanent appointment, but the fact remains that the hon. minister rejected the Commission's recommendation and appointed Mr. Bélanger.

Mr. Bérubé quite naturally wanted to know why he had not been appointed and also why Mr. Bélanger had been chosen in his stead. Mr. Bérubé wrote the hon. Postmaster General, in French, naturally, and the minister had one of his employees answer him in English, and tell him in his letter—

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member is not fair.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): It is true, I have seen the file.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member knows the French language well enough not to say that I had a reply sent in English. The official answered in English.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): Mr. Bérubé certainly received a reply worded in English. He inquired why the other candidate had been selected in his stead and the only reason given him in English is: "You have been found unsuitable."

You can imagine this poor man's dismay to be called "unsuitable." He asks himself what can that mean. He asks himself what threat that word can imply. Does that mean he beat his wife, that he committeed some crime, that he robbed the poor-boxes in the church? His reputation at once suffers for it. You can imagine all the people in the parish of St. Vallier asking themselves why the Post Office Department calls Mr. Bérubé "unsuitable."

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): What is the official's name?

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): I cannot say, I believe it is Mr. Coolican.

Mr. GAGNON (Translation): Why was his letter published?

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): I suppose he tried to find out among his neighbours the meaning of this word. He wanted to know what he was being charged with.

I would like the minister to tell us quite frankly for what reason he appointed Mr. Bélanger and why and in what manner Mr. Bérubé is "unsuitable."

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member for Bellechasse surprises me. I do not recall having been made acquainted with this correspondence that was exchanged between an official of my department and Mr. Bérubé. I will make the necessary inquiries—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): The minister is very busy.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I am busy enough performing my duty and the hon. member for Quebec East should cease treating me in this manner.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): I am speaking the truth, the minister is very busy.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I know quite well what the hon. member means to convey by those words. I do not think I deserve such treatment. The Liberal party was very strongly condemned in the past because of the numerous dismissals ordered by the Post Office Department. I am happy to note that the present administration is following in the very foot-steps of the Liberal party that preceded it in office.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): And putting on speed.

Mr. MARCIL (Translation): Of course, the country has developed; there are more post offices and dismissals are more numerous.

The young members of this house who have not the experience which they will acquire if they pass thirty-five years here, will learn later on that it is dangerous pastime to go about changing postmasters and trying to please everybody. It is a grave mistake: in the first place it is a mistake on the part of the department authorizing the change, though it is compelled to do so in accordance with legal requirements, but it is chiefly a mistake on the part of the member or of the man who represents his party in the county—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): Hear! Hear!

Mr. MARCIL (Translation): —as happened in the past. Unfortunately, in our part of the province of Quebec, the postal service was considered with very few exceptions as a patronage service.

In my constituency, there are about one hundred post offices and at least fifty have changed hands. What is the disadvantage? Well, the man who was put out awakens and he in common with all his relatives becomes a determined opponent of the administration that dismissed him. And in view of the fact that there was a half-dozen candidates seeking the job and only one was appointed, the others become malcontents.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Hear! Hear!

Mr. MARCIL (Translation): By an extraordinary coincidence—I do not want to hurt anybody—practically in all cases where the department made a temporary appointment, the post office inspector gave a rating that corresponded to that made by the department in the first instance. It is probably a coincidence, but the department's appointments were ratified by the post office inspector.

The Civil Service Commission in the creation of which I had a hand, in this parliament, since I voted in favour of this system in 1908, was required at the outset to deal only with the inside service. Later on, in 1917, we placed the outside service under the Act notwithstanding protests on the part of people with considerable experience who believed such a move was a mistake. I note with pleasure to-day that the present administration is beginning to realize the mistake committed at that time. Postmasters whose revenue is less than $3,000 have just been placed under the control of the department. This is as it always should have been, because in the outside service, the rural postmaster is not a "civil servant" as defined in the act. He is some merchant, blacksmith, or grocer who employs a young girl to attend to the office, who is appointed by the party to which he belongs and who will probably be dismissed when the other party wins. That is the present system. I am pleased to note a change is being made and that henceforth the department itself will make appointments. This will do away with the camouflage that has existed for years under the present system. Appointment of postmasters in the outside service by the Civil Service Commission was a joke. The inspectors told me all in turn that they were absolutely powerless in such cases, they had no officials to investigate conditions that existed in such and such a part of the country, to make the candidates try qualifying examinations, and in last analysis they were compelled to go by the post office inspector's report. This inspector is an employee of the Post Office department. He acts for the Civil Service Commission, but he is nevertheless an employee of the department and a man who is naturally pretty well acquainted with the sentiments prevailing in the district, who knows the intentions of the defeated candidate or the member who represents the riding. When he goes to a post office to conduct an investigation, whether it is a matter of coincidence or otherwise, this "rating" is always in favour of the man selected by the administration of the day. That is the old system. I am pleased to note that proceedings will henceforth be conducted openly and that the system applied years ago will be revived.

When I had the honour of being elected a member for the first time, there were no such things as commissions, no Civil Service Commission, no Railway Commission, no Board of Pension Commissioners, no commission of any kind. The member was the people's real representative. If there was something to be done in his riding, he would go and see the minister. The latter trusting him took action in line with his recommendation. The matter was settled and if the member had committed a blunder he was the first to suffer. The electors knew whom to blame, they knew where to place responsibility. To-day, parliament has given up all its powers. We are here merely as voting machines to vote hundreds of millions, even thousands of millions. When I was elected in Bonaventure county in 1911 it was not for the purpose of waging war on Germany, yet we were compelled to wage that war. We are far removed from the system that prevailed years ago. Under the real parliamentary system such as I would like to see in existence to-day, the people's representatives should form the link between the ruling powers and the people. At the next election, Mr. Chairman the candidates will be answerable to the people for all that was done in this parliament. If the country was well administered so much the better; if it was badly administered, so much the worse. They will have to bear their share of responsibility towards the people.

Mr. Chairman, I asked the minister last year that when investigations took place they should be conducted with as much decorum as possible, so that the people may realize that the commissioner sent to a village is truly the representative of constituted authority. Each commissioner should be instructed to conduct his investigation either in the post office or in some public building, in order to invest the inquiry with a certain formality and raise the prestige of the department. I am sorry to say I noted in many cases in my county the proceedings were not conducted in that manner. That state of things has the effect of bringing discredit upon the department.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Instructions to that effect are given.

Mr. MARCIL (Translation): The instructions are not carried out. As a rule the commissioner proceeds to the postmaster's place of business and calls up the other interested parties over the telephone. The investigation starts, the witnesses do not appear. The residents are not surprised at what takes place. They expected as much, they know that all governments dispense their favours to friends.

Conducting proceedings in the open is all to the good. In all the investigations in my county, only two postmasters were held guiltless of the charges levelled against them, and probably by chance, they were two Conservatives. All the others were Liberals. I would certainly not want to be judged on the strength of evidence such as that given when these investigations were held. In a word, that is the state of affairs. The people must have something to do; they must busy themselves with public affairs and have their say. I have a word of advice to give the members: Do not make too many changes in the post offices, you will be all the happier later on.

[Mr. Marcil.]

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I only have three more cases to submit to the hon. Postmaster General. I will be very brief. A postmaster at Denonville was dismissed and the man who took his place was thoroughly qualified. He was so qualified, that he was unable to either read or write! That is the reason why he was not appointed in the first instance. Wilfrid Corbin, of St. Paul de la Croix, wrote the minister the following letter which speaks for itself:

My brother-in-law who lives in Montreal, Wilfrid Lebrun, and whom you know quite well and who is also the brother of Delphis Lebrun, your own brother-in-law, had told me repeatedly that you were a just man, but I can judge by what you are doing there that you have no greater sense of justice than any other "Blue." I understand you figure that will give you a chance. That will give you a chance, but I think you will not stay there long.

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): To whom was that letter addressed?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): To the hon. Postmaster General. Mr. Corbin who wrote that letter to the minister misjudged him, but that just goes to show that the minister is misjudged when he lends an ear to complaints that come to him from various sources and that are not voiced by members of this house.

The first paragraph of the letter explains why Mr. Corbin wrote in that way:

Dear Sir:

I learnt to-day that you are taking the post office from Thomas Dubé's place. That was quite a surprise to me. In the first place, the post office inspector came here and did not hear any complaints. Thomas Dubé did not meddle in politics at all; neither did any member of his family.

Everybody was satisfied except three families who are on the fence and who want to have the post office removed and placed in the house of Théodule Michaud, the leader of these lukewarm people.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I beg your pardon, what parish is that?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Denonville.

There was a time when we needed the post office, but we no longer require it. In the first place, my papers will never go through this post office any more. Furthermore, here is a situation that I never saw before, the appointment of a postmaster who can neither read nor write, and whose wife is likewise handicapped. His children are but slightly educated and they are not of age. I am 60 years of age, and I never saw such a state of affairs before. I want an answer, an answer from yourself, not from the deputy Postmaster General nor from any of the house writers.

You will address the letter to Wilfrid Corbin, St. Paul de la Croix. Otherwise should you address it to Denonville, it will remain there as a dead letter. An answer.

The letter produced a good effect. Miss Irène, a daughter of Théodule Michaud, was appointed postmistress. She knows how to read and write.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): How old is she?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Eighteen or nineteen years of age, but at all events, Mr. Chairman, you will observe—

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): How do you know her age?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I saw her age in the return.

Mr. Chairman, it is an unspeakable thing to appoint as postmaster a man who can neither read nor write. The department made a report, and not only was the minister deceived by those people with whom you seemed to sympathize a moment ago, Mr. Chairman, but he was even deceived by the officials of the department who stated that the people were quite satisfied with Mr. Michaud, when the latter could neither read nor write and did not even know his ABC. He made amends to some extent by appointing a young girl who could read and write. I will go no further.

Another case, is case No. 8 referred to as the stool pigeons' case. This is the Notre-Dame-du-Lac case. The questions and answers are in English.

1. Did J. T. Voisine lodge a complaint against Antoine Landry, postmaster of Notre Dame du Lac, county of Témiscouata, Quebec?
2. Did said J. T. Voisine bear witness in an inquiry held in connection with political partisanship in which said Antoine Landry was the person charged?
3. If so, was it on the evidence of said J. T. Voisine that the commissioner based his report against said Antoine Landry?
4. Was said J. T. Voisine appointed acting postmaster to replace said Antoine Landry?

The initials of the man are J. T., and the Christian name is Thomas. They did not say that it was the man, on whose evidence the commissioner based his finding, who received the appointment. The fact is, however, that that man was appointed, the only difference being that they used the Christian name rather than the initials. Stool pigeon.

Mr. Chairman, an inquiry was held into the Notre-Dame-du-Lac case. Going through the file one notes in the first place a letter from Mr. E. N. Dumas dated September 30, 1930, in which he asks to be appointed to this position, prior to the inquiry and the postmaster's resignation. On January 24, 1931, Mr. C. E. Dubé, forwarded Voisine's complaint against Landry to the hon. Postmaster General—this is the same Voisine who was subsequently appointed postmaster. On February 11, 1931, there is an affidavit from Antoine Landry, postmaster at that time, who states that he did not meddle at all in politics. On February 27, 1931, Mr. Green, the superintendent of the postal district, notwithstanding all his good intentions and good will to please those who control patronage for the time being, wrote the minister as follows:

The district superintendent has reason to believe that these circulars were treated at the office of delivery in the regular manner.

Now, let us turn to the inquiry. Voisine gives evidence:

In June or July, 1930, we received two circulars signed by Mr. Jean-François Pouliot, Liberal candidate. These two circulars were in favour of Mr. Pouliot and the Liberal party, and bore the caption: "Welcome to Mr. Bennett and the Dairy Industry." These two circulars were placed in my letter-box at the post office on separate occasions. Mr. Antoine Landry was the postmaster at that time. During the last election contest, I saw Messrs. Pouliot and Landry together. I do not know what they were talking about.

I was just going to deliver the circulars for which I paid one half-cent each in accordance with the law.

During the last election contest, in 1930, Mr. Landry was in the post office with Mr. Théophile Leclerc. I entered. Mr. Landry was holding the St. Laurent newspaper. That issue contained a report of the sums of money Mr. Pouliot had secured since his election as a member. Mr. Landry, after giving the details to Mr. Leclerc stated that even though Mr. Pouliot might have shortcomings he was the best man since he had secured so much money for the county.

This may be exaggerated, but I do not think it is a crime to speak in that way.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): It is true.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation):

I do not know whether a person has the right to deposit circulars upon payment of same. To my knowledge, many people have these circulars. When I saw Mr. Pouliot and Mr. Landry, they were between the post office and the church. I saw Mr. Pouliot greeting other people and speaking to them. Messrs. Leclerc and Landry were the only people in the post office. I have no knowledge that Mr. Landry read Mr. Charles-Eugène Dubé's articles.

J. B. Voisine.

Mr. Théophile Leclerc: I do not recall having talked politics to Mr. Antoine Landry at the post office. I am his brother-in-law.

As I explained to the committee, yesterday, he started off by denying that there was any talk of politics between Mr. Landry, his brother-in-law and himself, but finally, the commissioner asked him: "Do you recall whether there was any talk on that score?" He replied: "I do not recall." He answered the commissioner in the terms of the questions put to him.

Mr. E. N. Dumas who was a candidate and who put in the first application for the position, states:

I have no knowledge that Mr. Antoine Landry displayed any political partisanship.

I am quoting from the minutes of evidence written by the investigating commissioner.

Philéas Roy—mayor, Conservative leader of the parish: I am not aware that Mr. Antoine Landry showed any political partisanship.

Eugène Nadeau: I found a circular from Pouliot in my letter-box. That is all I received. I have no knowledge that he displayed any political partisanship.

Maxime Michaud: I am not aware that Mr. Landry displayed any political partisanship.

Robert Beaulieu: Mr. Antoine Landry acted as a deputy returning officer in July, 1930. The polling booth was his home. Apart from that, I have no knowledge that Mr. Landry displayed any political partisanship.

Dominique Côté—another candidate: I have no knowledge that Mr. Landry displayed any political partisanship.

Ernest Caron: I have no knowledge that Mr. Landry displayed political partisanship.

Miss Maria Lévesque—she was employed as a house-maid at Landry's: I never was aware that Mr. Landry showed any political partisanship.

There was only Mr. Voisine's evidence.

On July 15th, 1931, the Postmaster General submitted to the Governor General in Council a memorandum requesting that Postmaster Landry be dismissed. He was dismissed on August 18th, 1931, by the terms of Order in Council 1994. On September 7th, 1931, Mr. Omer Bouchard forwarded to the Postmaster General a petition signed by 95 Conservatives in the parish asking that he be appointed. Those people said to themselves--

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): Carried?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): No, not quite so fast.

The CHAIRMAN (Translation): I beg the hon. member's pardon, I thought he had concluded his remarks.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I am showing all the good will I can. I had about twenty cases to submit. I still have only one and a half.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): I also have several, but in order to meet the convenience of the house I will not deal with them.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Omer Bouchard forwards his petition. Ninety-five Conservatives of the parish of Notre-Dame-du-Lac sign it. Is that petition taken into consideration? No. On September 7th, Mr. Antoine Landry forwarded a petition which I intend placing on record. Out of 234 persons who reside in the postal district, 196 signed his petition addressed to the Postmaster General:

The undersigned petitioners respectfully submit:

We are all taxpayers or residents of the parish of Notre-Dame-du-Lac, in the county of Témiscouata;

We have known for many years Mr. Antoine Landry, our present postmaster whose office is situated near the church of Notre Dame-du-Lac, and we can certify that since he holds that position he has always performed his duties most satisfactorily to the public, not only with respect to the good management of the office but also by the courteous manner with which he has always received the people having dealings with this office.

Now, we personally know that certain parties are causing to be signed at the present time in this parish a petition alleging that Mr. Landry has resigned as postmaster, that this resignation has been accepted by the Post Office Department, and furthermore, that you had advised him another postmaster was being appointed;

We also know that these allegations are absolutely false, and that as a consequence, the signatures secured by the few persons at the head of the movement, were so secured upon false representations, for Mr. Landry never handed in his resignation and did not receive from your department any notice advising him that he was being replaced.

For these reasons, your petitioners earnestly pray you not to give effect to the petition submitted by the present opponents of our postmaster, and to retain the latter in his present capacity so long as he continues to give satisfaction to the great majority of the people and to your department.

And we shall forever pray.

Made and signed at Notre-Dame-du-Lac this seventh day of September, nineteen hundred and thirty-one.

This petition bears the signatures of 196 heads of families out of 234, and the parish priest and notary head the list.

Mr. Dumas wrote on September 7th for information but there was none forthcoming. On September 12th, Mr. Théophile Leclerc forwarded an affidavit to the hon. Postmaster General to the effect that his evidence had not been correctly reported. And he repeated what he stated at the time. I will not take up the time of the committee reading that affidavit.

On September 24th, 1931, the minister ordered the transfer of the post office to Mr. Voisine. On September 26th, 1931, Mr. C. E. Dubé wrote the deputy Postmaster General.

With reference to the application of Mr. Dominique Côté, a returned soldier. He spoke to me again on the subject and I would have been pleased to recommend him. However, I am advised that he is not qualified in any way, as he is uneducated.

This is absolutely false, because this returned soldier is sufficiently educated to manage a post office.

I recommend that Mr. Thomas Voisine be temporarily appointed.

This, notwithstanding the petition in favour of Mr. Bouchard which covered a large number of Conservatives had forwarded to the minister.

. . . . and when the Civil Service Commission decides to name a permanent postmaster, Mr. Côté will have every right to apply and the commission will be able to judge whether he is qualified, which I do not believe.

Mr. Gaboury, the deputy Postmaster General replied on September 30th:

I beg to state in reply to your letter that the department is issuing instructions for the temporary transfer of this office to Mr. Voisine with the understanding, however, that this temporary transfer, does not imply any special right to permanent appointment which rests exclusively with the commission.

When the temporary transfer has taken place the vacancy will be advertised in the usual manner.

Thus, on September 30th, the minister cautioned Mr. Dubé by telling him that the appointment rested with the Civil Service Commission, and that Mr. Voisine could not hold the position for all time.

The file contains an affidavit which I, myself, signed on October 24th, 1930, to the effect that I had paid one half cent per circular, and the minister had this affidavit in his possession before the transfer was ratified. I must, however, give credit to the minister for trying to suspend action. On November 3rd, 1931, Mr. Underwood sent the following communication to Mr. Tanner-Green:

Re Notre-Dame-du-Lac. Suspend all action towards transfer to Thomas Voisine. Wire how matter stands.

Mr. Green replied as follows:

Your wire of date Stop Notre-Dame-du-Lac transfer to Thomas Voisine 28 October.

(Signed) S. Tanner Green.

After that, a soldier, Mr. Dominique Côté, signed an application form in the hope of securing appointments as a returned man.

Mr. Chairman, in order to summarize my remarks on the Notre-Dame-du-Lac subject. I would like to ask the hon. Postmaster General whether the matter is actually before the Civil Service Commission and whether the commission has received from the minister an official request that the position be advertised so that the Civil Service Commission may make an apointment with the least possible delay?

Mr. SAUVE: Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried?

Mr. TOTZKE: No, Mr. Chairman. If I may be allowed to give the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) a little breathing space, I should like to direct the attention of the minister to one case of dismissal of a postmaster. First I desire to read to the committee part of a speech made by the Postmaster General in Montreal last April. I agree very heartily with the views expressed in this speech, but I regret that he has not lived up to them, or perhaps he expressed them after he had taken action on the case I am now bringing to the attention of the committee. This is the newspaper clipping to which I refer:

A civil servant, faithful to duty, has the right to count upon the justice of any government, regardless of party, Hon. Arthur Sauvé, Postmaster General, declared in an address at a meeting of the Montreal Post Office Employees' Association last night.

These are the few facts in connection with the dismissal of the postmaster at Jansen, a man who had given satisfactory service for twenty-three years. The complaint against him was forwarded to the department by Mr. E. S. Wilson, the defeated Conservative candidate in the constituency of Humboldt at the last election. After referring to what had happened to him personally when he had visited this town, Mr. Wilson proceeds to make what seems to me to be a very peculiar charge of political partisanship:

During the 1930 federal election campaign I again met Symons—

Symons is the name of the dismissed postmaster.

—but outwardly his attitude had changed, although I am informed that it is considered at Jansen that his activities under cover in the last election can be disclosed, and it would appear that he had a radio in the back of the post office with a loud speaker and entertained the public whenever possible with speeches by exponents of the Liberal cause.

This is the first time, Mr. Chairman, I have heard there were any Liberal radios in existence. He proceeds:

Some of the business men in Jansen who are conducting businesses in competition with Symons find it necessary to post their outgoing mail to a large extent on the train in order to ensure its delivery.

These are the main causes of complaint given by Mr. Wilson, the defeated Conservative candidate. These matters were referred to the superintendent of postal service at Saskatoon, and he reported on February 5, 1931, in part, as follows:

It would seem that the great majority of patrons of the office are fully satisfied with the present service. It is our opinion that the agitation against the postmaster is due in a great measure to business rivalry, and the jealousy so often found in a small community. Mr. Leightner's business—

Mr. Leightner was one of the complainants.

—conflicts with that of Mr. Symons in the real estate, loan and insurance branches while Mr. Schroeder—

Another complainant.

—as well as conducting a general store, owns a garage and acts as agent for the International Harvester Company and Imperial Oil Company.

Mr. E. J. Symons, postmaster, is of English birth, 43 years of age, has been in the Jansen district since 1906, and postmaster there since May 29, 1909. His services have always been considered satisfactory and no previous complaints of any serious nature appear to have been made.

In view of this and the expressions of opinion given to the inspectors by other business men of the village, I do not feel that the charges made in the affidavits returned herewith warrant a recommendation for any change in postmastership.

That is signed by J. H. Hunter, district superintendent at Saskatoon. Apparently that report should dispose of any complaints made by patrons, but nevertheless after the report had been sent to Mr. Wilson at Humboldt he again insisted that an investigation be made. On June 17, 1931, the department referred this matter to Commissioner George Wilson, who is a barrister at Kinistino, and a brother of E. S. Wilson, the defeated Conservative candidate. After this was done Mr. Symons, the postmaster, sent the Postmaster General the folowing telegram, dated July 28, 1931:

A charge of partisanship against me as postmaster is up for investigation before George Wilson, commissioner, at Jansen, Saskatchewan, Thursday. July thirtieth, two p.m. E. S. Wilson who is a witness was twice Conservative candidate federal election, is a brother of the commissioner holding investigation. I request some other commissioner be provided to hold investigation as to charges against me to overcome bias in the matter. Kindly give consideration to this subject.

When I heard of this I interviewed the Postmaster General, explaining the matter to him, and he agreed that it was not in the best interests of the public service, and not the best way to determine political partisanship, to have a brother of the defeated Conservative candidate act as commissioner. The hon. gentleman agreed that he would find another commissioner, and I was perfectly satisfied. I felt that if another commissioner were appointed, proper evidence would be brought out and if the postmaster had been guilty of political partisanship he would suffer the consequences. However, as a result of that telegram and the interview I had with the Postmaster General, on July 30 the Deputy Postmaster General wired Mr. George Wilson as follows:

Please suspend all action on investigation re E. J. Symons, postmaster at Jansen. Wire reply.

Of course the commissioner accepted the instructions contained in that telegram and wired that he had cancelled the investigation. Following this, a letter was sent by E. S. Wilson, to the Postmaster General under date of July 31, part of which reads as follows:

My purpose in writing you now is to ask that another commissioner be instructed to proceed with the investigation. It seems unfortunate that instead of my friends at Jansen receiving the cooperation of your department, by I presume press of business or some other substantial reason, everything seems to have been done to delay the procedure. . . .

I would ask that when you instruct another commissioner you have him take up with me personally the matter of a suitable date in order that I may arrange a time with Mr. Bates and with the complainants at Jansen.

The defeated Conservative candidate, then, accepted the decision of the Postmaster General to get another commissioner to conduct this investigation. Now I should like to read the reply of the Postmaster General to this letter. It is under date of August 7, and reads as follows:

I was very pleased indeed to get the full explanation in regard to the investigation in connection with the political charges against the postmaster at Jansen, as I could not quite understand the telegram which we received from the postmaster asking that some other commissioner be called upon to hold the investigation.

Here may I interject that the Postmaster General must have understood it, because I saw him personally in connection with the matter. The letter proceeds:

Your letter of July 31, however, clarifies the situation and unless you particularly desire that another commissioner should hold this investigation, I am perfectly willing to give instructions that the case be dealt with by your brother.

After the defeated Conservative candidate had accepted the decision of the Postmaster General to employ another commissioner, apparently the hon. gentleman changed his mind and said that unless the defeated candidate particularly desired another commissioner he would see to it that the defeated candidate's brother conducted the investigation. Further, the Postmaster General says:

There is no objection whatsoever to your giving evidence, neither is there any objection to your brother being commissioner at the hearing where you are giving evidence.

Now I wish to direct the attention of the committee to this telegram, which was received from Mr. Wilson:

Re Jansen post office. Your letter August seventh request Commissioner George Wilson, Kinistino, be instructed to continue investigation. Writing.

So after the Postmaster General had, in a way, suggested that perhaps it might be more advisable to have his brother conduct the investigation, of course Mr. Wilson made that request. When I heard of this, after the promise that had been given me by the Postmaster General, I sent the following wire to the hon. gentleman under date of August 27:

You promised me during session that Commissioner George Wilson would not conduct hearing of charges against postmaster at Jansen. Am now informed he intends holding investigation September third. Protest most strenuously against brother of man preferring charges acting as commissioner and trust you will make other arrangements. Kindly wire me.

I did not receive a wire in reply, but some time later I received the following letter from A. Lalonde, secretary to the executive, who said:

In conclusion, however, I am instructed by the Postmaster General to assure you that in view of your strenuous representations against the commissioner, when the report is received in the department it will receive his personal consideration.

That letter is dated September 1, 1931. Naturally I was pleased to have the promise of the Postmaster General that he would give personal attention to the evidence in this case when it was received, and under date of September 5 I wrote him as follows:

My protest against the brother of the defeated candidate acting as commissioner to investigate charges of political partisanship in which his brother was personally interested, was not intended to be personal in any way, as I have not the pleasure of knowing the commissioner in this case, but as a general protest against this kind of thing being done. We know very well that, under certain circumstances, one is sometimes unconsciously biased no matter how fair one tries to be.

The investigation was held, and the commissioner sent in the folowing report:

After hearing the witnesses I find:

1. That the postmaster attempted, during the 1926 dominion election campaign, in conversation with the Conservative candidate for the Humboldt constituency, in which Jansen is situate, to discourage the candidate. Further in the same election the postmaster introduced the Liberal candidate for the Humboldt constituency to an elector whereupon the Liberal candidate made remarks to the elector in support of his party. These remarks were made in the presence of the postmaster.

The effect of that is that the postmaster made certain remarks to the Conservative candidate during the time of an election, which remarks were intended to discredit him in his campaign. Whether that can be classed as a charge of political partisanship I do not know. The candidate admitted that he was alone with the postmaster of Jansen at the time, but in his evidence the postmaster said he had no recollection whatsoever of having made remarks of that kind to the candidate. As to the statement that the postmaster introduced me to one of the citizens of the village, I recall that very well. He did introduce me to one of the citizens who was one of the staunchest Conservatives, but that introduction came quite casually. I was standing talking to the postmaster, not talking politics at all, and was introduced to this man, and I did make a few remarks in a jocular way concerning the election. I knew very well that he was a strong Conservative.

The second finding of the commissioner reads:

That the postmaster permitted the use of his automobile for the conveyance of voters to the polls on the day of the provincial election in 1929. Evidence was adduced by the defence to the effect that the car was so used without the knowledge of the postmaster. This evidence I discount.

The facts of the matter in connection with the use of that car are these. The postmaster, according to the evidence adduced, and which was corroborated by other witnesses, was in the hospital at Saskatoon at the time of the provincial election of 1929. He had been in the hospital two weeks prior to the election and remained there two weeks after the election, and I would suggest that a man in hospital is not very fussy about what use other people want to make of his car. It was also shown in the evidence that the man who had used the postmaster's car had been working for him at various times and had got the use of the car on different occasions.

The third finding is this:

That the postmaster on the day of the dominion election in 1930 asked one William Henry Schroeder—

Mark you, this William Henry Schroeder was one of the complainants in the affidavit sent in against the conduct of the post office, which the superintendent of postal services in Saskatoon had dismissed as groundless.

That the postmaster on the day of the dominion election in 1930 asked one William Henry Schroeder if he were going to do any driving that day. Mr. Schroeder said he would if there were some remuneration about it. The postmaster said there were a few good Liberal votes that might not be able to get out to vote and Mr. Schroeder asked whom, whereupon the postmaster handed Mr. Schroeder a piece of paper with the names of from three to five persons written thereon. Mr. Schroeder brought in the voters.

That was absolutely denied by the postmaster, and there was no corroboration. This Schroeder was one of the men who were in competition in a business way with the former postmaster. When it was known that there was a likelihood of the postmaster at Jansen being dismissed, the citizens of the district and the patrons of that office got busy and circulated a petition which was forwarded to the Postmaster General, asking that the services of Mr. Symons be retained. One of the petitions was from the rural municipality of Prairie Rose, No. 309. It was signed by the reeve, the deputy reeve and all the council. This petition reads:

Jansen, Saskatchewan,
September 15, 1931.

We, the undersigned members of the council of the rural municipality of Prairie Rose No. 309, Jansen, Saskatchewan, having learned of the attempts being made to have Mr. E. J. Symons, postmaster of Jansen, dismissed from office hereby respectfully petition the Postmaster General, Ottawa, to retain Mr. Symons in office solely on his merits and his past services to the community.

We have known Mr. Symons for more than twenty years, and during the whole of that period have always received the most courteous, efficient and obliging service at the Jansen post office, and for these reasons humbly crave your clemency in this matter.

A petition was signed by 358 residents of the district, and patrons of the post office, praying that Mr. Symons be retained in charge of the office. There was also a telegram from the dominion secretary of the Canadian Postmasters' Association, dated Estevan, Saskatchewan, November 27, 1931. It reads:

Hon. Arthur Sauvé,
Postmaster General,
Ottawa, Ont.

Canadian Postmasters' Association protest strongly against dismissal of Postmaster Ernest Symons of Jansen, Saskatchewan. In view of no evidence of partisanship having been given against him at inquiry and also in view of the fact that the commissioner who conducted the inquiry was the brother of the complainant, public feeling locally is very strong against his dismissal, and our association respectfully asks you that his case be reconsidered in accordance with your promise of August 13, 1930, in which you advised us as follows "I am not infallible but if I should commit an error I shall do my best to repair it."

Briefly, that is the history of the dismissal of the postmaster at Jansen on a charge of political partisanship. Now, I know personally that during the last election in 1930, at any rate, Mr. Symons took no part in the campaign. We have the petition of 358 residents of the district, asking that he be retained; we have the telegrams from the postmasters' association, asking that he be retained; we have the opinion of these postmasters that there was no ground for the conclusion that this man was guilty of partisanship. I have quoted from the telegram from the secretary of the postmasters' association some words of the Postmaster General to the effect that he was not infallible and that if he made mistakes which were brought to his attention he would reconsider them and try to have them rectified. I have also read the statement that the Postmaster General made in Montreal, to the effect that no civil servant need fear anything from any government so long as he did his work. I submit that the record in this case does not bear out the sentiment expressed by the Postmaster General at these different times. After the evidence had been submitted to him on several occasions, I went and interviewed him, praying that he reconsider all the evidence in connection with the case. I got a number of promises, but apparently nothing was done, and I submit that if this is the sort of investigation that is going to be carried out when charges of political partisanship are made against postmasters, there might just as well be patronage plain and simple instead of having it camouflaged in this way.

I have not much more to add except that I hope the minister will take a different attitude in the future. I do not expect that there will be any review of this case now, inasmuch as the new postmaster has been appointed, but I do hope that the minister will review the case for his own guidance in future. If he will consult the record for the Humboldt constituency since I have had the honour of representing it in this house, he will find that no postmaster has even been dismissed on any charges whatever on my recommendation—never on any charge of political partisanship—and I hope he will keep the record of that constituency clear in the future.

Mr. SAUVE: In answer to the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Totzke), all I can say is that my remarks in Montreal explained my feeling at that time and at the present time. I am sorry if a misunderstanding has arisen in the case mentioned by my hon. friend, and I shall be very glad to go further into the matter.

Mr. DONNELLY: Could the Minister advise me as to the name of the present postmaster at Rockglen in the constituency of Willow Bunch? This office was vacated some time ago because of a charge of political partisanship brought against the postmaster, Mr. Sproule. I entered a protest against this dismissal. I might say that this man was appointed some years ago on my recommendation. I went to the village when this matter was being taken up. Five or six applicants for the position had presented themselves to the people gathered together in the town hall, and they voted to have Mr. Sproule appointed postmaster. This man is a returned soldier and is a member of a Conservative family; none of the family have ever been known to vote Liberal. They come from the old family of Sproules here in the east, and probably some hon. members know what they are like—they are dyed in the wool Conservatives. A year or two ago a feud was started between this man and another man in the district, the other taking a solemn declaration that he was going to get this postmaster some time or other. When the government changed he seized the opportunity to lodge a complaint of political partisanship. I do not know that I should interfere in this matter from a political standpoint, because I think the action taken by the department has gained me many votes in the district. The father and mother of this man are very indignant over the dismissal. The chief complaint against him was that he had been a Liberal scrutineer in a provincial by-election in 1929. Both the scrutineer and the deputy returning officer took their oath that that was not so. Another charge was that he was acting as a Liberal secretary, but the Liberal secretary has taken his oath that he was not. The facts are that this man is a real estate agent and the returning officer asked him to come up to show him how to open the office to start the poll. He said he would; he was there for ten or fifteen minutes in the morning, and because of that he lost his job. He was doing no scrutineering at all. The board of trade of the village has entered a protest and half a dozen affidavits have been signed by different people in the district protesting against this man being dismissed. The affidavits state that nothing was known of any political activity. A petition was sent in, I think, signed by all but two of the people who patronize this post office protesting against the dismissal. Strange to say, the man who was foremost in having this man dismissed, a returned soldier who had been living with Mr. Sproule some two years ago and who was looking forward to getting the position, did not get the position which he was promised. The department went outside the village some thirty or forty miles and brought in another man to act as postmaster. This man is one of the applicants for the position, but I do not know whether he has been appointed as the permanent postmaster.

Mr. SPROULE: Does the hon. gentleman connect my name with that case?

Mr. DONNELLY: I cannot help it if the hon. member happens to have the same name.

Mr. SAUVE: I have not the name of the present postmaster, but I shall obtain it and let my hon. friend know.

Mr. DONNELLY: The man who has applied for the job and who was appointed temporary postmaster is Mr. Lawrence. He is a returned soldier, a blacksmith, who had been living some forty miles out from the village. Apparently there was no one in the district good enough for the position and they went outside. Perhaps the department could not find a Tory in the district. I know this man has put in an application and I was wanting to find out if it had been accepted. As I say, I protest against the dismissal of Sproule because he was a good postmaster even if he was a Conservative. His work was very satisfactory to the patrons of the office. He was not appointed because he happened to be a Conservative, he was appointed because it was thought he would give good service, and I think the department has made a mistake in his dismissal.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Mr. Chairman, for the last hour I have been debating with myself whether or not to take part in the discussion on these estimates. I am adverse to taking part in a pyrotechnical and polemical discussion on estimates of this kind, but inasmuch as there are two matters in which I am much interested and about which I am very deeply concerned, and inasmuch as many people in my district are agitated over these matters, I think it worth while to discuss them before the committee. I am very sorry that I was unable to follow fully the hon. members for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) and Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) who spoke in French, but I believe the hon. member for Bonaventure mentioned the new report and referred to the administration of the Civil Service Commission. I understand the hon. member for Temiscouata referred to men having sore mouths, and while I should like to speak with the sweet tempered moderation of which the poets make so much mention, in view of the extreme nature of these cases I cannot see my way clear to speak in any other tone than that of vigorous protest. I do not know why, but there has been no branch of the administration with which I have had so much trouble as with the Post Office Department. Ever since I came to the house in 1926, the Post Office Department has been a sort of jinx to me, and not only that, but in some respects a destroyer of the ideals which I had brought to the house. I entered parliament as a young man after the election of 1926 and one of the first things that was brought to my attention was the post office case at Mundare. A young high school graduate, George Woitkiw, asked me to intercede on his behalf with the Civil Service Commission. I therefore sent in my recommendation to the secretary of that body; I also visited the office of the Civil Service Commission and made a personal investigation of the case. What did I discover? I discovered, first, that Mr. Woitkiw received by far the largest petition in his favour, namely, 354 as against 115 for Mr. W. A. Stewart; second, he was favoured on pure merit by Doctor Roche, chairman of the commission; third, he received the following favourable recommendation from the district superintendent of postal service:

> George Woitkiw has actually been in charge of the work of the Mundare office for the past five years. He is particularly well equipped by reason of education and languages to take care of that office. His disposition and attitude towards the public are all that can be desired. The petition in his favour is to be considered practically the voice of the district, both the English-speaking and other sections.

[Mr. Donnelly.]

Finally, he received the following commendation by the chief examiner, Mr. Bland:

> On the three counts of being assistant postmaster, having had six years' experience in the office, and knowing the foreign languages which are necessary for the proper qualifications of the duties, I think Mr. George Woitkiw is the logical choice.

All hon. members will agree with me that, strictly on merit, Mr. George Woitkiw, whom I have just mentioned, should have been given the position of postmaster in the village of Mundare.

Mr. BROWN: Did the returned soldier question enter into the matter?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: No; not a single returned soldier applied for the position. George Woitkiw did not get the job. Why? Because there was a nigger in the woodpile, and possibly many hon. members are interested in knowing who this nigger was. There was a villain who entered into the drama which arose out of my efforts to secure justice for Mr. Woitkiw, as well as to prevent the prostitution of the Civil Service Commission into a mere political patronage dispensary. That nigger in the woodpile was the ex-Postmaster General. As I have already said, I entered the House of Commons a young man, brimful of all the noble aspirations about which we hear so much, extremely zealous for the public welfare with an overwhelming ambition to reform and set things right, fairly saturated and oozing with evangelistic fervour; in a word, I came here as a young man with the highest of ideals. All those ideals were exploded by this single action of the Post Office Department away back in 1926.

The other day I placed on record Mr. Coolican's letter to the Civil Service Commission, asking, yes, I will say demanding, that the other applicant, that is, Mr. Stewart, friend of the defeated candidate, be given the Mundare postmastership. I do not know who this Mr. Coolican is. He evidently must have been acting under instructions from his department. To make a long story short, in this case I think merit was, figuratively speaking, given a slap in the face and patronage was restored again to its former unholy place. I am sorry to have to mention this matter. The other day a report was brought down in the house in regard to the reformation of the civil service administration, and the question I am asking myself now is: Will this new report and the subsequent legislation implementing its findings be successful in sustaining the merit system, or will they continue to allow the percolation of patronage into the administration of the Civil Service Commission. On that occasion I expressed the opinion that unless a sufficient check were exercised on that body, and particularly on the Post Office Department and its officials, it would not be long before patronage would again begin to creep into the administration of the commission. I repeat: Unless this check is found and made sufficiently effective, nothing less than a trio of saints of the nature and character of St. Peter, St. John and St. Paul, would ever be able to keep the demon of patronage out of the Civil Service Commission, especially if the new commissioners were after the pattern of that saint of two thousand years ago who cut the ear off a patronage hunter of that time. I would not be so cruel as to suggest that the ex-Postmaster General should have an ear cut off, but if patronage is not eradicated, something of this nature might not after all be a bad idea. In such an event I know a lot of men who would be bereft not only of ears but of arms and legs as well.

My original intention, however, was to discuss, not the Mundare post office, but another matter that comes under the purview of the present administration. On March 23, 1931, I was advised by the district superintendent of postal service that unless fifty per cent of the eligible residents along the newly proposed Ryley route subscribed for rural mail delivery boxes, in other words, unless thirty-two of the sixty-three eligible residents along that route paid for boxes, said rural route would not be placed in operation. The establishment of that route was authorized and the contracts thereon duly awarded in 1930, but I have been told that in consequence of the failure of the residents of the locality to purchase rural mail delivery boxes, the service would not be put into effect. Several weeks ago I interviewed the Postmaster General and his deputy, Mr. Gaboury, and I was informed that the reason the aforementioned rural route was not put into operation was that the number of boxes was too small and the number of subscribers did not come up to the required amount. About twelve days after I had interviewed the Postmaster General, I received the following letter from the office of the district superintendent of postal service:

Edmonton, Alberta,
March 21, 1932.

Re: Ryley No. 2 R.R. proposed

Dear Mr. Luchkovich,—

In answer to your letter of the 16th instant, regarding the number of boxes on the above, I beg to say that I am taking the matter up personally with the postmaster at Ryley, in an endeavour to increase the number to the required amount.

Should I be successful I will let you know.

Some weeks later I received the following answer from Ryley:

The postmaster at Ryley was asked by the inspector, Mr. Hale of Edmonton, to see that the required number of applicants was raised as requested. This has been completed and were sent to Edmonton about three weeks ago. Will you kindly give this your attention.

M. B. West,
Ryley, Alberta.

Now I ask the Postmaster General in all sincerity if he thinks it is fair and just, under the circumstances, to ask these people to raise the number of boxes to the required amount, and then after the Ryley applicants had brought the number up to that amount absolutely refuse to put the rural route into operation. This is downright duplicity, evasion and equivocation.

Mr. BENNETT: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): No, sir, one more question, the last, the right hon. Prime Minister will admire my diligence.

Mr. BENNETT: We can get up and go out now.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I would have liked to say how well things went on. I have but one question to ask the hon. Postmaster General and if he answers favourably, I shall not be obliged to go over the whole pile. I wrote to him, on May 17, in connection with the post office of St. Arsène, and I simply want to know whether I can expect an answer to my letter.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I did not quite catch what the hon. member said.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): I wrote to the hon. Postmaster General on May 17, last, in connection with the post office of St. Arsène. I trust that the Minister has found time to read my letter; I would be much obliged if he could give me an immediate answer.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member for Témiscouata may rest assured that he will receive an answer to his letter, tomorrow morning.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): What will be the answer?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): As soon as I have prepared the answer, I shall forward it to the hon. member.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The Postmaster's answer is very vague, he must understand what I mean, and his answer should be ready.

So that the whole committee may understand my remarks, I shall continue in English. The site of the post office was changed at the request of the son-in-law of the man who is secretary-treasurer. He has said he was inspired by public interest, but he had only the interests of his family at heart. The fact is, however, that the post office was changed at a time when the Postmaster General had no complaint against the postmaster in question. In fact that particular postmaster was supported by several Conservatives in the parish who sent petitions to the minister stating that the man in question had not indulged in party politics, that he had been very quiet and did not bother about politics at all. This particular case is unique in that, although a Liberal, the postmaster was supported by Conservatives.

Not only that, but the minister himself wrote me stating that the management of the post office was satisfactory. Those two points ought to have been sufficient to leave the man in peace. Without any notice being given to the postmaster, however, the office was changed; it was transferred to some other place. At that time I wrote the Postmaster General, and no doubt he regretted what had been done as he regretted what happened at Notre Dame du Lac. He wrote to me that he had no objection to the man making his application to the Civil Service Commission, provided he offered a new site. That application was made, because the man believed in the minister's word. He was reluctant to apply. After I showed him the minister's letter he asked me, "What kind of man is the minister?" I said, "He is a good man; he is an honest man; you can rely upon him. If he tells you you may file your application you may be sure he will not object to your appointment. You are running the risk, but you are dealing with a fair man." He said, "If the minister is a fair man I will make my application, and if I am not appointed by the Civil Service Commission I shall not complain. If I am appointed by the Civil Service Commission the minister will confirm the appointment, and I shall be perfectly satisfied. I run only a fifty per cent risk." That man was appointed by the Civil Service Commission, but despite the fact the site he has offered is satisfactory, the minister has not yet approved the appointment. Surely the minister does not wish that man to have a wrong opinion of him.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He will not prevent the appointment.

Mr. POULIOT: I know that; I see that in his face; I know he will be true to his word. I know he will not disappoint that man who has played the game. He sent his application in the belief that the minister would stick to his word. I see him saying "yes." Does he mean "yes?" I am through with my speech if he answers "yes."

Mr. STEVENS: Is the hon. member carrying on an auction sale?

Mr. POULIOT: I hope the minister will fulfil my expectation. Does he mean "yes?"

Mr. STEVENS: How much am I offered?

Mr. POULIOT: I expect "yes" from the good minister.

Mr. SPOTTON: Ah!

Mr. POULIOT: I expect "yes" from his tongue and lips.

Mr. SAUVE: I shall do my best.

Mr. POULIOT: I shall be disappointed if the minister does not live up to my expectations.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I was requested to draw the attention of the Postmaster General to an act of injustice which, incidentally, did not take place in my constituency, but in the adjacent county, that of Dorchester. Mr. Couture, former postmaster of Frampton, has written to me enclosing the famous statement of the hon. Postmaster General at Montreal, in which it is stated that he extends his protection to postmasters and undertakes to shield them against all ills, annoyances and misfortunes which might happen to them, in a word, he becomes the father and protector of the unfortunate postmasters. Mr. Couture begs of me to inquire from the minister why he has not persevered in his good intentions. Mr. Couture was not dismissed as postmaster because he had taken an active part in politics or because he was guilty of political partisanship—no blame could be attached to him in this connection. Notwithstanding all the efforts of those seeking positions given by the Conservative party in the parish, they could find absolutely nothing against Mr. Couture to justify a dismissal founded on political partisanship. They then had recourse to other means, the site of the post office was changed. Mr. Couture contends that he was never notified of the decision to change the site of the post office, and that he was never given the option of choosing another location for the post office. However, the district superintendent contends that on two different occasions he wrote to Mr. Couture to notify him as follows:

I am instructed by the Postmaster General, through the Post Office Department to request you to kindly find a more convenient locality for the post office.

Mr. Couture, in a sworn statement—and his assistant also makes a sworn statement in that sense—that never did the letters of Mr. Green, superintendent of the Quebec postal district reach the post office of Frampton. Mr. Couture was never notified that the intention was to change the site of the post office and he was never notified to look for another locality. Finally he was dismissed, and the reason given was that he did not comply with the instructions from Mr. Green, which he swore never having received, a statement which is corroborated by his assistant. If it is a fact that Mr. Green really requested Mr. Couture to look for another locality for the post office, he was more fortunate than the people of my constituency, to whom the same mishap occurred. At St. Lazare, the postmistress was dismissed when the site of the post office was changed; there was no question of having written to her, or having given her the option of getting another locality. They had nothing to reproach her politically; however, in order to replace her by a Conservative election campaigner they simply changed the site of the post office. Following the provincial election, the new postmaster, at St. Lazare, a man named Bélanger, was appointed for services rendered to his party, having held a committee room in his residence—a Conservative committee, needless to say. I wrote to the hon. Postmaster General to request him to dismiss Bélanger, since he had dismissed liberal postmasters who were far from being as guilty as Bélanger. The Postmaster General, however, answered me very singularly, saying, "He kept a committee room in his home, but that has no importance whatsoever, as he is not yet permanently appointed as postmaster." He was shortly after. He was qualifying to become permanent postmaster.

Mr. Chairman, I avail myself of this opportunity to point out to the Postmaster General a number of other cases; I shall close my remarks in two minutes.

First, with reference to investigations held, some one suggested to the Postmaster General that he should simplify the procedure. I would suggest to him a more radical reform, namely: to entirely dispense with such investigations; it would be more honest. These investigations are but a camouflage, it is simply a smoke screen to mask the intentions of the Postmaster General. Before the inquiry ever begins, the postmaster is, usually, already dismissed or—it is a foregone conclusion—the site is changed, the camouflage is but a smoke screen. Why not be honest about it, why not entirely eliminate these investigations? Let the Postmaster General take the responsibility of the dismissal or of maintaining in office the postmaster.

As evidence that these investigations are a joke, most of the six or seven inquiries held in my constituency were presided over by a former defeated candidate in the county of Bellechasse. Following an inquiry held at La-Durantaye, one of my uncles was dismissed. I think, if the Postmaster General had wanted to display some courtesy towards me, he would have maintained him in office, especially as there was nothing against him. That investigation was presided over by a defeated candidate in the county, and the candidate whom I defeated in 1930 was also entrusted with preparing the evidence and the false witnesses. You will, sir, readily understand what importance can be attached to such inquiries! Instead of holding investigations of that kind, why not act honestly and simply dismiss the unfortunate victim unjustly charged. Moreover, he expects to be dismissed, it is a foregone conclusion: To the victor belong the spoils!

I now come to the case of Mr. Laurent Tanguay, an employee in the Department of Justice, to whom I often referred. I requested his dismissal. I charged him here, in the house, under my responsibility as a member, with political partisanship. As a member of parliament, I requested an investigation, it was not granted. I charged Tanguay with having openly and impudently taken an active part in politics, during fifteen days. At the last provincial election, he was the principal speaker of the Conservative candidate, in the county of Bellechasse. I thought, as a simpleton: Since postmasters were dismissed for the acts of their children or wife, they would also dismiss Tanguay. I thought that if I lodged a complaint, as member of Parliament, the department would act, an investigation would be held and Tanguay dismissed. I have never heard any further about my complaint and so far, nothing has been done. I was, recently informed, by the reply made by the Postmaster General to the hon. member for Megantic, that Tanguay had thrown off all restrain. The latter, it seems, is an employee in the Justice department but in truth, his duties consist in filling vacancies, he looks after the petty work of "patronage" for the Conservative party, at Quebec. Not only was he given an office in the post office in Quebec—a government building—but he is given an assistant from the Post Office department to help him in his work; his correspondence is forwarded under the privilege of the postal frank of the Quebec District Superintendent.

Mr. Chairman, I never before heard of such a notorious abuse. When the Liberals were in power, those who handled patronage for the Liberal party did not have the impudence of installing themselves in government buildings and making use of the officials for their own work. They did not have the impudence of using the frank for their correspondence. Those are the facts I wanted to point out and against I protest.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I merely want to ask the hon. Postmaster General whether a rural mail service has been established at Rivière-Ouelle, and who has been appointed mail carrier?

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): The hon. member for Kamouraska will admit it is somewhat difficult to answer on the spur of the moment. I could give him an answer tomorrow by letter, but I cannot answer him now.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I would ask the hon. Postmaster General, when he forwards me that reply, to explain also an anomaly that exists with respect to that appointment. In the first place, on December 10, tenders were called for in connection with this contract. The tenders were opened: Pierre Boucher, of Rivière-Ouelle, $510; Louis-Philippe Boucher, $550 and, among others, Alfred Lebel, $594. The day the tenders were received, Alfred Lebel wrote the hon. Postmaster General as follows:

Honourable minister:

It was due to an error that I put in a tender of $594 in connection with the Rivière-Ouelle mail contract, rural route No. 1. Please correct my tender and insert the amount of $505 which I am willing to accept.

I find it somewhat strange that Lebel should have written the day the tenders were to be published, that is December 10, that he agreed to reduce his tender price to $505, exactly $5 lower than that of Pierre Boucher to whom the contract was awarded, nevertheless. Several requests were forwarded to the hon. minister. He always replied: No, it is impossible, the contract was awarded to Pierre Boucher, the lowest tenderer, and nothing can be changed. Finally, I find a letter written by the hon. member for Dorchester who, I suppose, has developed a certain fondness for the county of Kamouraska since he contributed with his excellent friend the Solicitor General to the splendid victory I won in 1925. The hon. member for Dorchester, since it is signed O. Gagnon, said:

[Mr. Boulanger.]

Dear Mr. Anderson,

re Rivière Ouelle Mail.

In view of the fact that M. Lebel is carrying the mail between the central post office and the two small post offices which will be closed. I think it is only fair that Lebel gets the contract.

Yours truly,

O. Gagnon.

And then, instructions were given and I can find absolutely nothing in this file that justifies this change of front on the part of the minister. Here we have the man who put in the lowest tender; his contract is signed, and there is only a letter signed O. Gagnon which the hon. minister can possibly identify more readily than I could, and that results in the department facing about in this manner. And they fall back on that because the gentleman who holds the contract says he made a mistake which he is very slow in pointing out and stating that he is prepared to correct that mistake by submitting a tender at a price lower by $5 than the tender price of the man who had secured the contract.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I wish to say to the hon. member for Kamouraska that I will ask the superintendent, Mr. Anderson, to give me all possible information on the matter and I will pass this information on to him.

Mr. VENIOT: I am anxious not to delay the passing of the estimates of the Postmaster General; it is now almost six o'clock, and if there are no other hon. members to speak I will be as brief as possible in order to put through these estimates by six o'clock. I have waited all afternoon; I did not want to take the place of any other hon. gentleman, so I hope the committee will bear with me in the few remarks I have to make. As I sat listening this afternoon I was reminded of scenes that occurred in this house in 1929; to-day I saw the chickens come home to roost. I did not feel so sorry for the Postmaster General as I did for some of his colleagues, who had to listen to complaints with regard to violations of the regulations, and complaints with regard to the way dismissals have been made. These same complaints were made against me in 1928, when I was Postmaster General.

With those opening remarks I wish to direct the attention of the Postmaster General to a case in which I think action should be taken immediately, not in the interests of the officials concerned but in the interests of the principle laid down in the Civil Service Act with regard to the method of making appointments. I have in my hand the record with regard to a vacancy at Oliver Siding in the county of Restigouche. I am not going into the question of the dismissal or the appointment, but the report of the district superintendent at St. John should have been forwarded long ago to the Post Office Department. In that report I find these words:

> . . . it may very reasonably prove in the interests of the department eventually if the appointment of a permanent postmaster be delayed for as long a period as possible. The rating has been signed with this qualification.

I want to direct the attention of the Post-Master General to this condition of affairs. No superintendent should be allowed to make a report like this. The reason for this recommendation is that the man who was then temporarily in charge of the office, after a dismissal had been made for political reasons—and this office comes under the Civil Service Commission—was under a cloud for some sort of misdemeanor, and bitter complaints had been sent to the department. This man was brought before the courts on a criminal charge, but the grand jury threw it out. I do not say whether or not this man was guilty of wrongdoing; I know nothing of the case, but I say a report of this kind should not be sent in, recommending that this man be not appointed permanently for the present and that the qualifications be not sent to the Civil Service Commission until it is seen whether or not the man will prove worthy of the confidence that was placed in him in the beginning. That is a practice that should be stopped, and the district superintendent who countenanced that report should be reprimanded. Nothing like this should be allowed to prevail in any department of the government. If a man is worthy of being appointed to a position it should be given him; he should not be appointed temporarily in order to see if his reputation will improve. I may add that in this case a couple of returned soldiers wrote the district superintendent at St. John for forms with which to apply for that position, but they were never favoured with a reply.

There is another case to which I should like to refer, having to do with the appointment of a postmaster at St. Quentin, in the county of Restigouche. I do not want the minister to inquire into the qualifications of that man but I do want him to inquire into his nationality. My information is that he is an American subject, and if he is not a British subject he has no right to a position under the Civil Service Commission.

Then there is a case in Green Point, in my own county, to which I should like to refer. A Madame Thomas Fournier was appointed temporarily to this vacancy. I want to remind the Postmaster General that under the act a married woman cannot be appointed postmistress if her husband is capable of supporting the family. In addition to that, some ten or twelve years ago, when members of this family looked after the post office at Green Point, they were dismissed because of shortages in their accounts, and I should like that matter to be taken into serious consideration. I believe there is a scheme on foot to have some of the people who were connected with those dismissed for shortages appointed in charge of that office.

I have one other case to draw to the attention of the minister, and I hope to conclude in a few minutes. This is a case in the county of Colchester, Nova Scotia. If the minister does not know it already I want to inform him of the way in which some of his superintendents are notifying postmasters to get off the job. I have here a letter dated Halifax, March 29, 1932, addressed to Mr. A. J. Yuill, Old Barns, Nova Scotia, reading as follows:

> Dear Sir:
> I have received instructions from the department at Ottawa to relieve you of the post office and to transfer it temporarily to Mr. Harold Crowe Chisholm. The reasons for the change are that the proposed site is more suitable and centrally located. You will be advised of the date on which the transfer is to take place.

That is signed by the district superintendent; the man is dismissed and then held in office until the transfer takes place. If I had been that postmaster I would have walked out the moment I received that notice. The reason given is that the other place is more centrally located. Well, the old post office is situated, we will say, where the Postmaster General is sitting, and the new one is situated where I am standing in relation to him. It is only 60 feet across the street; they are opposite each other. Why that reason was given, therefore, that it was more centrally located, I do not know.

The Postmaster General said last night that during the time I had the honour to be Postmaster General I had made 317 dismissals without investigation, without report, or without reason. He must have been wrongly informed by somebody. I know that he would not do me an injustice. However, I have here the record which I have submitted to the house at different times in regard to dismissals, and that record I will place on Hansard once more. From October, 1926, to April, 1928, there were 473 dismissals made by myself, and during that time 383 of these dismissals were made on report submitted either by inspectors or by investigating commissioners. That is on record. Among those there were 56 dismissed for shortages, abandonment of office, arrest of postmasters. There were 47 due to unsatisfactory management, and on investigation and report. There were 49 due to changes in site, on the report of inspectors, and there were 4 reinstatements. In interest of service, on report, there were 91, and no reason given, 90. The next list shows 84. All of these 84 were dismissed on certain reports after investigation, except 2. In the next list there are 45, and of these, in every case except 2, there were reports from inspectors or investigating commissioners. This list is made up as follows: Shortages, abandonment of office, and arrests, 22; unsatisfactory management, on reports of inspectors, 9; changing site contrary to orders, 1; interest of service, on report, 2; changes in site, on report, 6; and political partisanship, 5.

That makes a total of 602 up to the beginning of the year 1930. I have not the record with me from that date up to June, 1930, but up to the present time, under my hon. friend opposite, there have been 597 dismissals in eighteen months, or an average of 33 per month, whereas during my time there were 602 dismissals in a period of four years, or about forty-five or forty-six months—I am not counting the 400 referred to by the hon. member for Témiscouata—and that gives an average of 14 a month. So that we have 14 a month on my part as compared with 33 on the part of the present minister.

I should like to have gone into some other matters such as postage stamps, for example. I see that there have been laid on the table supplementary estimates in which an additional amount of $266,000 is asked for. I understand that this is for extra cost of postage stamps and other matters connected with the department. As I say, I should like to have been able to deal with these matters, but I wish to facilitate, as far as I can, the passing of these estimates, and with these few remarks that I have made I will now do what I can to help the minister get the estimates through.

Item agreed to.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

[Mr. Venoit.]

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

The house again in committee of supply Mr. LaVergne in the Chair.

Civil government—National Revenue—
Salaries, $956,772; contingencies, $50,000.

Mr. EULER: Mr. Chairman, will my hon. friend—

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (Minister of National Revenue): If my hon. friend will permit me, I should like to say a word.

Mr. EULER: Certainly.

Mr. RYCKMAN: As I look at this book of estimates, I see two pages in front of me and I see that in nearly every case the effort that has been made to decrease the estimates has been followed by success. The increases are in the Department of National Revenue, and they are considerable in amount. These increases, however, are more apparent than real, having been occasioned by the treatment which the board of customs has received. In past years the board of customs, a board set up under section 3 of the Customs Act, attracted to itself a personnel, which of course involved expenditures. This year it was thought desirable that the personnel of the board should be put where it properly belonged and that the expenditures so involved should also appear under civil government, which, in fact, they are. Therefore there are these apparent increases, but they are due to the taking over of 184 employees attached to the board of customs with an expenditure of about $414,000, so that in effect this is not an increase, although it is so styled.

The result of the appropriations that are laid before the committee to-night in connection with National Revenue is that there is a decrease of over $3,140,000. I was very anxious to say that and I am pleased the hon. member for North Waterloo gave me the opportunity, because the initial page was spoiled by these large increases for which, as a department, we are not responsible at this time. They are a bookkeeping entry, if I may so put it, taken into the account for the first time, and hereafter these items will appear under National Revenue, civil government.

Mr. EULER: I presume the amount of increase, then, will mean a decrease in the other very large item, No. 277?

Mr. RYCKMAN: My hon. friend is right.

Mr. EULER: It is a transfer from one to the other. In connection with the board of customs, does my hon. friend really think the 100 or more employees who are supposed to be under the control of that board are so in effect? I used to think it was pretty much of a misnomer; perhaps my hon. friend does not see it in that way.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I would agree with my hon. friend. The answer to his question is no.

Item agreed to.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps my hon. friend desires to make a statement explaining the decreases in this item.

Mr. RYCKMAN: If my hon. friend will permit me, I do not know that I am very anxious to talk, but since I have been invited and drawn to my feet, let me make this brief statement. When these estimates were prepared I was impressed with the absolute necessity of special economy. I knew we had to cut according to the cloth; I felt that the cloth was scanty and I still feel that is so. When these estimates were first prepared I thought it might be possible to cut them even to the very quick, with the result that the estimates of this department are put in at a figure that does not allow us efficiently to carry on. I realize, as I am sure all hon. members do, that if a business needs money, the expenditure of it may mean either the saving of the business or a large profit to it. I was forced to the conclusion, after these estimates were prepared, as they were a couple of months ago, that we needed more money, and therefore I have a supplementary estimate running into something like $780,000. If the committee is good enough to pass that item, nevertheless the result will be that we have saved and bulked in decreases more than $3,140,000. I want the committee to give me that extra sum I have mentioned. During the past year we have spent some special amounts in connection with customs and more especially in connection with income tax, and the harvest has been abundant. In and about one city over $500,000 was collected in revenues. I am anxious that the Department of National Revenue shall function to the satisfaction of the House of Commons and the country. There has been no extravagance that I know of. If any member of the committee knows of unwarranted expenditures, unnecessary developments, or any action taken which needs explanation, I should be very happy to have the matter mentioned to me at this time. I am not inviting contest; I have nothing but a plain story to tell with regard to the business activities of the Department of National Revenue. There have been statements made, however, that with the loss of revenue, which I am convinced could not have been avoided, there was not the best management in the department. I will yield to that charge; I will not however yield to the statement of anyone who says that there was not an earnest, painstaking effort to produce the best results in the department of which I am the head.

Mr. EULER: I believe I might almost congratulate the minister on the fact that he has been able so substantially to reduce his estimates. The only point which occurs to me is the one which he has mentioned himself.

Mr. RYCKMAN: That I have gone too far?

Mr. EULER: Yes, perhaps. After all the Department of National Revenue is successful only to the degree to which it collects revenues. That collection takes the greatest degree of supervision and vigilance and cannot be accomplished without certain activities. For instance there must be adequate allowance for salaries and travelling expenses of officers of the inspection, investigation and andit services. The investigation and audit services are particularly important because it is through the exercise of those services that the department is able to ascertain where the revenues are not being paid as they should be. I am wondering whether the minister has gone too far, and that through the elimination of certain expenditures he may lose more than he gains. That is, he may lose more through loss of revenue than he gains by the cut. I merely make that observation in passing. If he is not, it might be fair to assume that the late government spent too much—an accusation I should not like to admit. There is no doubt the cut is very large. In the first item there is a decrease of almost $2,000,000. I presume that is partially attributable to the fact that there has been a ten per cent reduction in civil servants' salaries. I should like to ask the minister, however, whether he is quite certain that he is retaining a sufficient auditing and investigating staff to get the necessary results by way of revenue, and I am wondering if he is not losing revenue because of the decrease in his expenditures.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The interrogation of the hon. member is most appropriate, and the subject to which he has directed my attention is the one which has troubled me most. Finally, however, after going into executive sessions with the officers of the department we have decided that if the supplementary vote is granted we can carry through with a strong arm. That being so, in these times I am not going to fight for any margin to work upon, because we need all the margins we can get to carry on the business of the country. As my hon. friend has said, the whole thing amounts to only a straight business proposition. Will the sum for which we ask advance the interests of the country, or will it not? After the best consideration we in the department have been able to give, we have come to the conclusion that the sum before the committee is sufficient.

I shall now show how the $1,964,860 is made up. The estimate for the year 1932-33 is $6,600,000, as compared with $8,564,860 for the year 1931-32, or a decrease of $1,964,860. This sum is made up as follows:

Vacancies not provided for, 330; attached to that, $568,245; ten per cent on salaries, $657,661; decrease in contingencies, $738,954; amount required in 1932-33, $6,925,000; amount approved in estimate, $6,600,000.

Hon. members will note that the amount short is $325,000, which is made up in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. EULER: So that we may form a better judgment could the minister tell me how many people were employed in the audit and investigation branches, and how many are now employed in those branches. In other words, what is the reduction in personnel?

Mr. RYCKMAN: The number on the inspection branch, the investigation and values branch, the investigation and drawbacks branch and the audit branch totals 277. Their salaries amount to $738,440,—less ten per cent, of course. I do not like to advertise this fact too freely, but I must say that the vacancies have not been filled. Where there was a chance of sailing along with the smaller staff, and yet making the same time, these vacancies have not been filled. Therefore the number is less to-day by reason of our manipulation of the vacancies.

Mr. EULER: Have any been laid off?

Mr. RYCKMAN: No.

Mr. EULER: I see in connection with the preventive service there is an item of $1,340,000. Last year it was $2,108,991, or a reduction of $768,991. I suppose that reduction is due to the fact that the service has been taken over by the mounted police. No doubt the answer to that query, at least to some extent, would be "Yes." There is still left however a very large sum for the preventive service. I am not suggesting it is too much, but I should like to know where the dividing line comes between the estimate for the preventive service which now goes to the mounted police branch of the service, and that which still continues within the control of the department itself. I gathered from statements made about two weeks ago that the preventive service is now taken over by the mounted police. Is this vote for the branch of the mounted police doing preventive work, or is it for the Department of National Revenue? Where is the dividing line?

Mr. RYCKMAN: My answer is this: These estimates were prepared before the mounted police finally took over the preventive service. The result is that the mounted police have all those who were formerly in the preventive service with the exception of fifty-eight men and seventy who have retired from the service. This item, if adopted, will be turned over to the mounted police except what is necessary to provide for the fifty-eight men whom we must retain. They are retained, I may say, because they are investigators, examiners and auditors. The mounted police, we hope, will detect crime, and we will follow it up.

Mr. EULER: Now we know that in the mounted police force the salaries are lower than they were in the preventive service. Was the estimate made on the basis of the old salaries or of the salaries paid to the mounted police?

Mr. RYCKMAN: It was made in anticipation of the cut.

Mr. EULER: So in future this estimate for the preventive service will almost entirely disappear from the estimates of the Department of National Revenue?

Mr. RYCKMAN: That is right.

Mr. EULER: Last year I recall half a million dollars was added to the usual estimate for the administration of the Income War Tax Act.

Mr. RYCKMAN: It was $350,000.

Mr. EULER: I was under the impression that it was about half a million dollars. I asked at the time the then Minister of Finance —the Prime Minister—why the amount was increased, and he stated—I thought very fairly—that he felt by the expenditure of the additional sum so much more income tax would be collected that the outlay would be well repaid. I see this year the amount is reduced. Would not the same argument apply this year as applied last?

Mr. RYCKMAN: We hope to do what we did last year. We spent the money out of the income tax vote. As I am informed none of this $350,000 was infringed upon, but owing to the extra money we found available in the vote and spent we added a good many thousand dollars to the revenue. We propose to keep on in the same way, if we can.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I desire to ask the minister a question, but frankly I cannot find any particular vote of his that covers it. There is in a sense hanging over certain of our industries something in the way of a threat of prohibitory tariff legislation now before the United States Congress, dealing with coal, oil, lumber and copper. I am particularly interested in lumber; I am not very familiar with the other commodities. We have a favourable trade balance in lumber with the United States, notwithstanding that we import a very substantial quantity of American lumber. But balancing our imports of the lumber industry as an industry against our exports, my opinion is that the balance is in favour of that country because of the fact that there is being used in the lumber industry in all parts of Canada, particularly in British Columbia and to a considerable degree in Ontario, a very large volume of equipment in the way of logging, saw mill and planing mill machinery imported from the United States. But without going into details, the lumber industry itself estimates that the importation of this American equipment more than offsets our favourable trade balance in lumber with the United States. In the eastern provinces we are suffering to a very considerable degree by the dumping of lumber products of certain grades, mainly into Ontario and Quebec. Under existing legislation has the Department of National Revenue power to protect the lumber industry against this dumping if the proposed tariff is put into effect at Washington? In other words, if the United States authorities determine to make it impossible for us to trade with them at all in lumber, can we, without new legislation being passed, protect our lumber industry? If the minister could give me that information the whole lumber trade would appreciate it very much.

Mr. RYCKMAN: As I think members of the committee pretty well know, if there is any attack made which, in the language of section 43, "prejudicially or injuriously affects the interests of Canadian producers" a special value for duty can be fixed on instructions from the governor in council to the Minister of National Revenue. If unfair or slaughter trade is introduced into Canada by the United States, there is a ready weapon at hand in that section of our law. It was placed upon the statute books at the instance of a Liberal government in regard to natural products, and therein in my opinion they did well. It has been carried somewhat further by legislation which this parliament enacted covering any products which were dumped or slaughtered here to the prejudice of those engaged in the business of those products in this country. My answer therefore would be yes.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Thank you very much.

Mr. DUFF: With regard to duties affecting lumber coming from the United States, is it not true that last June this government put on a special duty of one per cent, and the American government immediately retaliated, in fact practically put a gun to the head of my hon. friend the Minister of National Revenue and told him that if he did not take off his duty they would put a special duty of $1 per thousand feet on boards, planks and deals of fir, pine, spruce, hemlock or larch in the rough or not further manufactured than dressed on one side when imported from Canada, with the result that my hon. friend as Minister of National Revenue had to go to the governor in council and ask for an order taking back what this government has done?

Mr. RYCKMAN: My hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) is right in his basic facts.

Mr. DUFF: Thanks, very much.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. RYCKMAN: He is wrong in centering that matter around me.

Mr. DUFF: You are the head of the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I had nothing whatever to do with putting on the one per cent excise tax. It seems that at the present time there is in the United States tariff something that some of us were not altogether too familiar with. It involved only one per cent, and we cloaked that one per cent by describing it as an excise tax. There is in the United States tariff a provision, speaking from memory, that if any tax is placed against United States lumber a tax of $1 per thousand, or some such figure, comes into effect as a countervailing tariff, so when our one per cent excise tax was passed they came back with this provision. What was the reasonable thing to do? We replied that we did not want the $1 a thousand against us, and it was not applied against Canadian lumber because we took off the one per cent tax here. I am sure my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough will not blame me for advocating the removal of that tax.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend knows that I believe in free trade. I do not believe in any tariffs, any restrictions or any regulations which will affect the trade of Canada. But if I understood correctly what my hon. friend said in reply to the hon. member for East Algoma, the minister was not quite frank. Consequently I take him to task, because if my information is correct this special tax against American lumber was passed by this government on June 2, and our United States friends immediately protested.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I know my hon. friend does not want to misinterpret what was done. This was not a special tax against United States lumber; it was a one per cent excise tax on everything.

Mr. DUFF: It was not a tax applied by the Liberal government, so I consider it an extra, special tax. In any case the fact remains that this tax was put on by the present government, and immediately that was done the United States government said to us, through our representative at Washington, "If you do not take off this tax we will put a duty of $1 per thousand against all lumber and manufactured wood products coming from your country." If my information is correct the United States government went even further and said to our representative, "We are not satisfied that you should say you will take off the tax," though hon. gentlemen opposite were glad to do so; the United States government said, "We want you to pass an order in council." A few years ago, when we were in power and hon. gentlemen opposite were sitting on this side of the house, we were told that our tariff policy was made in Washington. Here, however, is a distinct case where this government, not at the request but at the insistence of the United States, passed an order in council removing the one per cent excise tax on lumber and leaving it on all the other goods imported into this country.

Mr. YOUNG: Was the order in council framed in Washington?

Mr. DUFF: I would not be surprised, although I have no definite information. I do know that the United States were not satisfied until the order in council passed by this government was placed in the hands of their government, to show good faith. At the insistence of the United States this government was compelled to remove this special duty on lumber, and I should like to know why that was done in the case of lumber, at the request of the United States, when it was not done in connection with all other products.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. DUFF: No, I want an answer.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You will not get it.

Mr. EULER: I have a few questions to ask, which I think the minister can answer very easily. Some two years ago we made provision for the introduction of the eight hour day in connection with the employees of the department. That was not completed at the time I left the department, and I should like to know if it now has full application.

Mr. RYCKMAN: There is an order in council dealing with the Department of National Revenue, which is copper lined and iron bound with regard to the eight hour day. I wondered why some other departments were not affected at the same time. That order in council is being lived up to, though it has cost the department an immense amount of money. I have been told that by reason of the eight hour day something like $600,000 of extra expense has been put upon the department. That was the figure mentioned to me; it is not accurate at present, but I know I am safe in saying, from what has come before me, that a very large sum of money has had to be expended in order to carry out that provision. I do not wish to be understood as complaining, but my hon. friend from North Waterloo knows how necessary it is to have men at the ports at all times, and as a result the expense has been very considerable. I think the answer to my hon. friend's question, however, is that it is being lived up to in letter and in spirit.

Mr. EULER: Just a word with regard to the sales tax. Some two years ago large sums of money were owing the department by brewers and distillers. I am not now referring to those cases which were taken to the courts. Other firms owed large sums of money, and it was necessary to nurse them along a bit. I should like to ask the minister if those amounts have been collected or the indebtedness materially reduced.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The amounts have been materially reduced, and I think I have helped reduce them.

Mr. EULER: Were any applications for licences made last year?

Mr. RYCKMAN: There was one application, but if my memory serves me aright no licence was issued.

Mr. EULER: Is the department still observing the practice of consulting with the provinces with regard to the issuing of licences?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Yes.

Mr. EULER: In connection with amounts owed by brewers and distillers, there is one other question. The department took legal action against several brewers and distillers with regard to the export of liquor or beer; in many cases a settlement was made voluntarily and they agreed to pay, usually in instalments. Then I understand that one case, the Carling case, was carried to the privy council, where a decision was rendered against the department. Have any of the other concerns, who perhaps had cases more or less similar to the Carling case, applied for the refund of the amounts paid, and if so, what is the attitude of the department in this connection?

Mr. RYCKMAN: As my hon. friend knows, the Carling case was won by the department in each court until the privy council was reached. The privy council, however, held that the department was wrong. Before the case reached the privy council, as my hon. friend has said, settlements were made with indivdual brewers. Naturally, after the judgment of the privy council, some of those concerns who had paid their taxes thought that if they had continued in litigation a little longer they might have enjoyed the fine result that came to the Carling company. But the settlement with these brewers was made before the judgment of the privy council. The settlements were made upon the advice of their attorneys, acting for them in these suits, and, may I say, they were made independently of what the privy council judgment might be in the Carling case. They are being held to these settlements, and not one has received any consideration by trying to hark back to the position they would have been in if they had travelled along with the Carling people all through.

Mr. EULER: One other question in connection with liquor matters. In view of the prohibition of export to the United States via Canadian ports and the consequent export of liquor to the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, from which points we do not know where the liquor went, although we may have a suspicion, and in view of the fact that the exporters of liquor and beer had paid no excise tax, may I ask whether there is reason to believe that any of that liquor was smuggled back into Canada? Is there any suspicion that this has taken place, and if so, to what extent?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I do not think my hon. friend should ask me what my suspicions are, but since I have been in the office I have certainly learned more about smuggling than I knew before, and if I may venture a guess, I should say that some of it has returned. How much, I do not know.

Mr. EULER: Has it been necessary to increase the preventive service in consequence?

Mr. RYCKMAN: No, but that amendment to the Export Act meant a serious falling-off in the revenue.

Mr. DUFF: The excise tax having been increased from one to three per cent, what is the position of the Department of National Revenue with respect to the order in council passed on October 20, 1931, revoking the excise tax so far as the importation of lumber from the United States was concerned? Is lumber from the United States now free of the excise tax of three per cent or not?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I think that would be a proper question for the Minister of Finance. I see that I have not made myself clear to at least one member of the committee in regard to lumber. The position of lumber was this. There was in the United States tariff a countervailing provision that if any duty, even the slightest, were put on—and they took note of one per cent—then, if I remember rightly, they put on a rate of $1 a thousand.

Mr. MALCOLM: One dollar and fifty cents.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Whatever the figure is, the argument is the same. That figure went on. It was not fair, since the balance of trade was largely in our favour, that for the sake of one per cent excise tax we should deny to those who shipped lumber from Canada the privilege of doing so, because they would be met with a prohibitive tariff. If anyone objects to our action in that regard, then he will have to have his argument with somebody else.

Mr. DUFF: But there are other items of trade besides lumber in which we have a favourable balance with the United States.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Yes, but there is no countervailing item in the United States tariff.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, there is.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Not many.

Mr. DUFF: There are several in connection with which there is a balance of trade in favour of Canada. Why should lumber be picked out in this regard? If it is a fair proposition to take the excise tax off lumber, surely it is just as fair and in the interests of the common people of the country that the excise tax should be taken off other commodities. I asked the minister whether the order in council passed on October 20 last, taking off the one per cent tax on lumber, would apply to the increase from one to three per cent brought down by the Minister of Finance in his budget, and he sidestepped my question by referring me to his colleague. I have in my hand a copy of the order in council which was passed, and the name of the Minister of Finance is not mentioned in it. It was the Minister of National Revenue who applied to the governor in council for the passing of the order in council.

Mr. RYCKMAN: It certainly was.

Mr. DUFF: Then why not take the responsibility? Why should the minister want to burden the Minister of Finance any further? Goodness knows he has enough trouble now without the hon. gentleman trying to place this additional burden on him. The order in council states that His Excellency the Governor General in Council "on the recommendation of the Minister of National Revenue", and so on. Not the Prime Minister, who was Minister of Finance at that time, nor the present Minister of Finance, but the Minister of National Revenue. It was on his recommendation that it was done. Why, then, when I ask a fair and reasonable question, should the minister practically tell me that I ought not to ask it on his estimates but wait until the estimates of the Minister of Finance come down? I contend that if it is fair to take the excise tax off lumber imported into Canada, other industries which suffer by having imposed upon them this tax of three per cent should be treated in the same way. The discrimination is not fair. All industries in Canada, whether they be farming, fishing, lumbering, or mining, should be treated alike. No special favour should be shown any one industry, and if the Minister of National Revenue is going to recommend to the government the taking off of the excise tax in connection with lumber, it is only right that every other industry should be placed in the same position.

Mr. RYCKMAN: There is nothing in the Minister of National Revenue having made the recommendation to council. As is well known, all recommendations in connection with the administration of revenue are supposed to be made to council by the Minister of National Revenue. That's that. With regard to sidestepping the hon. gentleman's question, I was not aware that I was doing anything of the kind. The hon. gentleman is no more apt to sidestep than I am; I do not think either of us is given to that. The point, however, is that there was in the United States tariff a special countervailing item, and it was felt that in the balance the lumber industry of the country would be benefited if that one per cent, as it was then—there was no question of three per cent at that time—were not insisted upon. The moment the proposition was put before one, it was yielded to as the only proper thing to be done. My hon. friend from Bruce says that it is $1.50 a thousand. Would it not then be a fine thing to have imposed on us $1.50 a thousand for the sake of one per cent? Even the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough would not suggest that.

Mr. DUFF: Hear, hear.

Mr. RYCKMAN: If he can suggest any other item that travels parallel with lumber and in regard to which the United States tariff has a countervailing duty, and if such an item has not received consideration, I think I can say on behalf of the government that it will. But I do not think any other item exists. An hon. gentleman speaks of coal, but we have not trodden on the toes of the coal industry. There have been threats to do it but it has not been done.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Twenty-five cents.

Mr. MALCOLM: The minister has hardly given the information asked for by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff). I think it is clear that the one per cent excise tax imposed on imports by the Minister of Finance was treated by the American government as a duty.

Mr. RYCKMAN: That is right.

Mr. MALCOLM: The Prime Minister distinctly told us that this was not a duty. However, it is a tax on American imports and the American government has treated it as a duty. Because of the one per cent so-called excise tax imposed by Canada on American lumber importations, the American government availed themselves of the countervailing duty provision in their customs act and applied a duty of $1.50 per thousand feet on Canadian lumber shipped into the United States. The minister was very wise in passing the order in council on October 20 of last year under the provisions of which lumber coming in from the United States was exempted from the payment of the one per cent excise tax. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough wants to know what is going to be done with the three per cent excise tax put on this year. There is no order in council governing the 3 per cent tax and there is no doubt the $1.50 countervailing duty will now apply against Canadian lumber entering the United States. Is the minister going to change the order in council to exempt American lumber from the three per cent excise tax? Every hon. member knows how the lumber industry in this country has suffered during the last few years. Every hon. member knows that the American market is one of the few profitable markets left to our lumbermen. Every hon. member knows that the lumbering industry is in a very bad way and if we lose the American market or have to pay $1.50 per thousand feet in duty it will mean more unemployment, and, goodness knows, unemployment is bad enough at the present time. I think either the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Revenue should give a clear statement to the committee as to whether or not this three per cent excise tax shall apply to lumber, then the lumbermen will know how to act.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The three per cent is in the same position as the one per cent; it will not apply.

Mr. MALCOLM: I respectfully submit that the order in council of October 20 does not cover the situation to-day; it cancels the one per cent tax on lumber. Is the minister going to amend the order in council to make it exempt from the three per cent tax?

Mr. RYCKMAN: The higher tax does not apply.

Mr. MALCOLM: I beg the minister's pardon. The order in council distinctly states that the one per cent excise tax as incorporated in last year's budget shall not apply to American lumber; that order in council does not cover this year's budget.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I have no hesitation in asking my hon. friend to let me know when he hears that the three per cent tax is being put on.

Mr. YOUNG: I think I might tell the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) that any government possessing the power to change a potato into a radish surely can change a one into a three. Can the minister tell the committee how much was collected last year in dumping duties?

Mr. RYCKMAN: My hon. friend asked that question, I think, last year, and I believe the answer given at that time was that no separate record was kept. Duties are being paid every business day and we do not label them as dumping duties, we take them all in as part of our receipts.

Mr. YOUNG: I am not desirous of putting the minister or the department to any more trouble than is necessary, but I do not see how they can keep their records straight without having this information. Reports come in with the collections from outlying ports; the officers in the department must check those reports against the cash coming in, and they must check them against the rates as laid down in the schedules. If the dumping duty is collected it must be reported as such and the department should have a record. For a long time I have wanted to know just what these dumping duties are costing us.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron): They want to forget about them.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I should be very glad to give the hon. gentleman the information he desires, but I am told that the office has not the information. We have hundreds of people in our checking branch but it has not been found necessary to make any segregation of these amounts. I should like to have the information myself, but until my hon. friend asked for it, no one seemed to be anxious to have the information supplied.

Mr. YOUNG: For that much, many thanks. Upon what commodities or articles was a value for duty placed during the last fiscal year?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I will give my hon. friend a list of the articles covered by the orders in council passed. The orders in council were passed on the following dates and cover the following items:

April 2, 1931, bituminous coal.
April 22, 1931, asparagus, lettuce, green onions and shallots, onion sets, potatoes, rhubarb and spinach.
May 4, 1931, vegetables.
May 16, 1931, cucumbers.
May 20, 1931, strawberries.
June 8, 1931, cabbage and cauliflower.
June 25, 1931, apricots, cherries, raspberries, beans, beets, carrots, celery, peas (green), and tomatoes.
July 10, 1931, apples.
July 21, 1931, peaches, plums and prunes.
July 27, 1931, canteloupes, muskmelons, honeydews, casabas and pears.
August 18, 1931, grapes.
August 18, 1931, hats, hoods, shapes, bodies and cape lines.
September 10, 1931, grapes.
September 17, 1931, wicker furniture.
October 8, 1931, ferromanganese.
October 29, 1931, lime.
November 17, 1931, women's and chidren's clothing.
November 27, 1931, metal name plates.
November 30, 1931, slack cooperage stock, staves, hoops and headings.
November 30, 1931, hardwood doors.
December 3, 1931, jute twines.
December 12, 1931, cotton fabrics and artificial silk fabrics.
December 22, 1931, pot cleaners.
December 22, 1931, electric lighting fixtures and portable electric lamps and shades.
December 31, 1931, knitting machine needles.
January 31, 1932, refined granulated sugar.
February 1, 1932, rhubarb.
February 2, 1932, wire rope.
February 13, 1932, cotton wiping rags.
February 13, 1932, fringes, tassels and gimp, exclusive of those made substantially of tinsel or bullion, cords and windowshade rings.
February 17, 1932, umbrellas.
February 18, 1932, brass and copper products.
March 3, 1932, thumb tacks and furniture nails.
March 4, 1932, sheet rubber goods.

On April 25, 1932, the brass and copper products bulletin was modified by taking out of it those importations entitled to entry under the British preferential tariff.

May 7, 1932, asparagus, lettuce, green onions and shallots, radishes, spinach.
May 13, 1932, cucumbers, mushrooms, onions, not otherwise specified, rhubarb.

That, I think, is the list.

Mr. YOUNG: I want to deal with only one or two of those. I have under my hand bulletin No. 3185, dated January 30, 1932, refined granulated sugar, fixing the value of refined granulated sugar at $2.30 per 100 pounds. Would the minister mind telling us who asked for this order in council, and how this value of $2.30 was reached?

Mr. RYCKMAN: It was asked for by the sugar beet farmers and by the sugar beet refining industry located at Wallaceburg and Chatham.

Mr. YOUNG: There is an understanding, is there not, that wherever such a request is made, those making it must satisfy the minister that they are in a position to supply the demand. When this order in council was passed, were the sugar beet farmers and refiners in a position to satisfy the market for sugar?

Mr. RYCKMAN: It was understood that this would be for the benefit of the market. There were 6,000 sugar beet farmers who depended upon this order in council.

Mr. YOUNG: This was in January. I do not think the beets were grown then. Had those farmers grown enough beets to be in a position to satisfy the market?

Mr. RYCKMAN: The contracts are made in January. It would be the beets harvested in the fall of the year.

Mr. YOUNG: Had they on hand enough beets, grown the previous year, to satisfy the market until the next crop came along?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I do not know that they had a supply of beets on hand, but we were looking forward. This legislation in my view, supported as I was by counsel, was proper; all from whom information could be got were in favour of this being done and it was done.

Mr. YOUNG: Then my hon. friend had this order in council passed in January in order immediately to shut out sugar which would be replaced next fall by sugar from beets to be grown this summer; is that the idea?

Mr. RYCKMAN: The idea is that otherwise no beets would have been sown this spring, no crop of sugar beets would have been raised and 6,000 farmers for whom my hon. friend has often shown sympathy—

Mr. YOUNG: I never asked for protection for them.

Mr. RYCKMAN: —and in whom he has a keen interest would not have grown beets so that two industries would have suffered.

Mr. YOUNG: My hon. friend cannot say that I have ever asked for protection for those farmers. How did he arrive at that figure of $2.30?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I have not before me at the moment the exact arithmetic, but I can tell the hon. member how it was arrived at. It was a question of the freight rate and the consumption of sugar in Toronto. The freight rates were taken into consideration. The sugar beet is raised in western Ontario and it must be remembered that the sugar is not marketed in large quantities west of Montreal except Toronto. The figuring was done by the officers of the department who said that the figure was fair and proper.

Mr. YOUNG: They worked this out, but on what basis did they figure?

Mr. RYCKMAN: My hon. friend will have to ask them.

Mr. YOUNG: Can my hon. friend explain this? I see that the value is given as $2.30 in United States funds. Why is the Canadian dollar not good enough for the measuring of these values?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I love the Canadian dollar, but I like any other money I can get. I apply the same principle to the people of this country.

Mr. YOUNG: That is very good logic, but I can remember last year members of the government expressing indignation that the people of the United States did not value our dollar as highly as we did. Now I see my hon. friends do not value the Canadian dollar as highly as they do the United States dollar. I do not mind that, but when that condition prevails, they should not complain that the people of the United States do not value the Canadian dollar as highly as we do.

Now let us come to gasoline—

Mr. GOTT: It was forty-five cents a gallon under a Liberal government.

Mr. DUFF: The Minister of National Revenue, in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Weyburn, stated that he placed this exorbitant duty on sugar in order to help 6,000 farmers.

Mr. RYCKMAN: It was not a duty.

Mr. DUFF: What was it, then?

Mr. RYCKMAN: A value for duty.

Mr. DUFF: It means an extra tax in favour of those whom my hon. friend calls the beet sugar farmers.

Mr. YOUNG: And adds the dumping duty.

Mr. DUFF: Yes. The minister said that he did this to help out 6,000 farmers. This is a beautiful, noble sentiment, but there are in this country other farmers than those 6,000 beet sugar growers. For instance, there are the farmers in the constituency of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, New Brunswick, a gentleman who supports this government. There are other farming constituencies in this country, in which potatoes are grown; what has been the effect on the potato market, due to the policy of the Minister of National Revenue? Did his policy with regard to sugar affect the potato growers and potato shippers?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Did it increase the price of sugar?

Mr. DUFF: Yes, it increased the price of sugar, and it did worse than that. A moment ago my hon. friend expressed his sympathy towards 6,000 beet sugar farmers. I say that not only 6,000 beet sugar growers, but 16,000 potato growing farmers were affected by the policy of the Minister of National Revenue with regard to the dumping duty he placed on sugar.

Then, another class of people in addition to the farmers was affected. I have heard the expression that fish and potatoes go together. Because of the mistaken policy of this government, by carrying out the policy enunciated a moment ago by the minister, not only did it affect the farmers of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick but it affected the great fishing industry of the maritime provinces. Cuba offers one of our principal fish markets, and my information is—I think I know what I am talking about—that the minute my hon. friend and his government introduced this special legislation and had it so arranged that he could put any value he liked on sugar, the sugar growers in Cuba, or the government of Cuba, deliberately and properly, increased or doubled the duty on fish and potatoes going into that country. That is what the minister has done, and it is useless for him to tell this committee, and through it the country, that he is protecting 6,000 sugar beet farmers when, in fact, he has ruined a perfectly good market for potatoes and fish.

An hon. MEMBER: Ruined?

Mr. DUFF: Yes, ruined—both of them.

Mr. MacLEAN: I rise to support the remarks of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough. Every word he has uttered is correct, and he has properly described the effect of the dumping duty on business in the eastern provinces. Could the minister give the names of the countries from which sugar was coming when the dumping duty was applied?

Mr. NEILL: If I might be allowed I should like to go back to the matter of lumber.

Mr. MacLEAN: Wait for an answer.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has the floor.

Mr. MacLEAN: But I asked a question.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has the floor.

Mr. MacLEAN: He will wait for a minute.

The CHAIRMAN: He may wait if he wishes, but he has the floor.

Mr. NEILL: I will yield to my hon. friend.

Mr. RYCKMAN: It applied to all countries with which we have an intermediate or general tariff.

Mr. MacLEAN: From what countries were imports coming at the time the dumping duty was applied?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Sugar comes from Cuba; we have an agreement with the West Indies. In the short time I have been in the department we have had sugar from Mauritius.

Mr. NEILL: I should like to revert to the matter of lumber, and the answer given by the minister to the hon. member for East Algoma. Probably I did not hear the minister correctly, but the answer seemed to satisfy the hon. member. Whether his satisfaction was due to understanding it or due to some congenital or hereditary respect for the minister as a member of his party, I do not know. The complaint of the hon. member for East Algoma was that the people to the south of us, in a bill now before congress, were imposing a heavy and almost prohibitive duty on our lumber going into the United States. He also mentioned coal. I think it is now ascertained, however, that there is a provision in connection with coal which entirely relieves us in Canada of any danger from that source. The hon. member said that the bill would prove very dangerous to our lumber trade, and in that I heartily agree. I did not know it was a question of moment in the east, but it certainly is worthy of very serious consideration in British Columbia. The duty would very materially affect the lumber trade, which, as my hon. friend sitting beside me says, is now in a very bad condition

The hon. member for East Algoma stated the case, and as I understood it he asked the minister to take some action. He did not however definitely state what action he thought should be taken. If I heard the minister's reply correctly I think he quoted section 42 of the Customs Act.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Section 43.

Mr. NEILL: And he said if any lumber or anything else entered Canada in a manner prejudicial to the manufacturer or producer of that article in Canada, he would be quite pleased to put on the dumping duty. In all courtesy I submit that is hardly an answer; it is not a solution of the difficulty. The grievance is that the United States are threatening to exclude our lumber, and I cannot quite understand how by preventing their lumber from coming in we are meeting the situation. Probably the lumber in connection with which the minister expresses his willingness to put on the dumping duty might not be coming in in a manner prejudicial to the producer. If it had been, the duty would have been put on already.

As a rule lumber does not come in and go out at the same points. We find our lumber entering the United States from British Columbia; large quantities in the shape of hard wood or other lumber not readily available in Canada come into the eastern provinces from the United States. The remedy as I see it is not the putting on of an illogical or possibly improper dumping duty. Instead of going in for retaliation some other action should be taken. Tariff wars in the past have not been successful anywhere, and I am wondering if we could not adopt some measure of reciprocity, if I may use the word. I think the word used on the continent of Europe, when they do not wish a strict definition, is "conversations." The word does not bind anyone to anything until some progress has been made. I would suggest that our ambassador at Washington should be instructed to enter into "conversations" with the powers that be with a view to arranging some measure of reciprocity in regard to lumber. He should suggest that it is desirable that we be allowed to ship our lumber from British Columbia into the United States. It is badly needed in the north western states where the farmers are in difficulties. Their only lumber supply comes from British Columbia. On the other hand American hardwood lumber is needed and could be shipped into our eastern provinces. By such action probably more could be accomplished than by waving the bloody shirt and talking about excessive dumping duties. In case I have misunderstood the minister, would he amplify the policy he proposes to meet the situation? This is a very urgent matter, so far as the lumber business of British Columbia is concerned.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I do not think the situation has been made clear, but I shall attempt to say what was in my mind when I answered the hon. member for East Algoma. I understood from his remarks that there was a danger of the United States putting on a heavy duty against our Canadian lumber. I think that is the understanding of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. If that is done, the countervailing arrangement, if we may so describe it, is gone. Then if they put the duty on our lumber entering the United States, and at the same time dump their lumber here to spoil our markets—

Mr. NEILL: Not necessarily.

Mr. RYCKMAN: That is how it was put by the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson).

Mr. NEILL: Pardon me. He said they would not let our lumber go in. He said nothing of their lumber coming in to prejudice our market.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Yes, he spoke of our market being prejudiced by their action.

Mr. POWER: I was not present when the member for Antigonish-Guysborough first brought this matter to the attention of the minister, but from what I have been told I think he explained it so that members of the committee are familiar with the facts. The point I wish to bring to the attention of the minister is that this order in council which was passed repealing section 88 of the Special War Revenue Act, chapter 54, was ultra vires. The order in council states that:

> The governor in council on the recommendation of the minister acting under the powers conferred upon him by section 11 of the customs tariff as amended is pleased to order and it is hereby ordered that certain lumber shall be exempt from payment of the tax of one per cent.

That is to say, by order in council he repealed a statute passed by this parliament. Reference is made to section 11 of the customs tariff. I think members of the committee will remember that when this excise tax was being discussed last year my hon. friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young) brought up the question that it was a customs tax. This was indignantly denied on the other side; they said it was an excise tax. Nevertheless in order to get authority to repeal that section they refer to customs tariff section 11. I challenge my hon. friend the minister, who is a lawyer, to assert that this section gives him any authority. The section provides:

The governor in council may by order in council make such reductions of duties on goods—

Not excise tax.

—imported into Canada from any other country or countries as may be deemed reasonable by way of compensation for reductions on Canadian products granted by any such country or countries.

There was no reduction from the United States.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Oh yes, there was.

Mr. POWER: No, the United States simply said: If you put a tax of one per cent on our lumber going into Canada, there is automatically under our tariff act a countervailing duty of $1.50 a thousand on Canadian lumber.

Mr. MALCOLM: Hear, hear.

Mr. POWER: They said: If you dare tax our lumber we will put into effect the $1.50 duty. There it is. I will read it to the minister:

Boards, planks and deals of fir, pine, spruce, hemlock or larch, in the rough or not further manufactured than planed or dressed on one side, when imported from a country contiguous to the continental United States, which country admits free of duty similar lumber from the United States, shall be exempted from the duty of $1 per thousand feet.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Is it a $1 or $1.50?

Mr. POWER: Maybe I have the old one.

Mr. RYCKMAN: It is $1.

Mr. POWER: I do not remember. But the moment we imposed that excise tax, automatically the United States government was obliged to impose their tariff. Now, forsooth, we say: We will repeal this act by repealing the excise tax on the ground that we get a reduction from the other country. We did not get a reduction; the other country imposed something on us and we had to repeal our duty. That is the first authority the minister had to rely on.

Mr. RYCKMAN: What about the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act?

Mr. POWER: He was not quite sure and he endeavours to combine two authorities entirely separate. In effect he says: One act does not go far enough, but if we can cite seventeen sections of seventeen different acts we may be able to put them together and get them right. I will come to the second authority which my hon. friend relied on. I think it will be admitted that the first is no good, but it cannot be any better when combined with the second one. The second authority relied on is section 91 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act. And do you know, Mr. Chairman, what it speaks of? Remission of duties. The minister must know what "remission" is. It certainly is not repeal of a statute. The section reads:

1. The governor in council, whenever he deems it right and conducive to the public good, may remit any duty or toll payable to His Majesty, imposed or authorized to be imposed by any act of the parliament of Canada, or by any act or ordinance of the legislature of the late province of Canada, or of any of the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, British Columbia or Prince Edward Island, in force in Canada, and relating to any matter within the scope of the powers of the parliament thereof, or any forfeiture or pecuniary penalty imposed or authorized to be imposed by any such act or ordinance for any contravention of the laws relating to the collection of the revenue, or to the management of any public work producing toll or revenue, although any part of such forfeiture or penalty is given by law to the informer,—

And so on.

2. Such remission may be total or partial, conditional or unconditional, and may be granted either before or after, or pending any suit—

And so on.

3. If the remission is conditional, the condition, if accepted by the person to whom the remission is accorded,—

That is, by the United States.

—shall be lawful and valid, and the performance thereof, or the remission only, if unconditional shall have the same effect as if the remission had been made after the duty, toll, penalty or forfeiture had been sued for and recovered;—

And so on.

4. No remission shall be made in any case—

In any case.

—unless such case has been considered, and the remission, whether total or partial, conditional or unconditional, has been recommended by the treasury board, and sanctioned and ordered by the governor in council.

I submit this section deals entirely with the remission of duty which has been collected, and does not deal with the repeal of a section of an act passed by this parliament. It cannot by any interpretation be made to read that the governor in council has the right to say that the tax imposed on a certain class of commodities shall be repealed. Remission implies the refunding of a toll which has already been paid. The very word "remit" means to give back. The action taken by the government is simply tantamount to saying: This law shall not apply to lumber coming in from the United States.

Mr. MALCOLM: That is all.

Mr. POWER: There is the situation. I contend that these orders in council were beyond the powers of the governor in council, that this excise tax is still in force, and that if the Minister of Finance persists in making a three per cent tax instead of a one per cent tax, even if the government is right in its contention that the one per cent tax is repealed, certainly there will still be two per cent payable on every bit of lumber that comes in from the United States.

Mr. MALCOLM: That is the point.

Mr. POWER: The only honest, straightforward, decent way to do this business is for the minister when he brings down his special war tax legislation to write into it that lumber shall be one of the articles exempted from the payment of that tax. That is the only way to do it, because if he does it in any other way I submit he will be doing the wrong thing, he will be introducing legislation which is slipshod, and which, I firmly believe, will not stand a test before any court in Canada. As my hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) points out to me, the order in council reads:

His Excellency the Governor General in council, on the recommendation of the Minister of National Revenue and under the powers conferred by section 11 of the customs tariff,—

Which I submit does not apply.

—as amended by chapter 30 of the statutes of 1931, and by section 91 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act,—

Which I submit only applies to remissions.

—and any other powers thereto enabling.

So they said to themselves, "We will take one section of one act and perhaps we will get somewhere, and if that is not strong enough we will take another act and perhaps we will get somewhere with it. We have not time to look up all the statutes; we are very busy men, working twenty-four or forty-eight hours a day. We will just include any other powers we have, and if we do not have them we will say so anyway and a lot of people will believe it." I wish to protest against that sort of legislation; I sincerely hope a minister of procedure will be appointed by the government so that these things may be done regularly.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have another protest to register. My hon. friend from Weyburn asked the minister what was the basis on which the minimum value for duty of refined granulated sugar was fixed at $2.30 per hundred pounds, and the minister said he did not know. Then my hon. friend from Weyburn asked what was the machinery, how it was arrived at, and whether there was any investigation, and the minister replied that the officers of the department fixed that point. My hon. friend from Weyburn persisted and asked on what basis it was fixed, but the minister replied, "You will have to ask them." Have we come to that, Mr. Chairman? Is that parliamentary government? The tariff is changed, not by parliament, and when we ask the reasons for the change we are told we will have to ask the officers of a certain department. That is no longer parliamentary government; that is bureaucratic government with a vengeance. Last year the government insisted on enacting a law creating a tariff board; that was the main legislation of last session. This body was constituted for the purpose of investigating all matters concerning changes in the tariff; they were to study and consider all applications which might be made. More than one year has elapsed since this law was passed but still we have no tariff board. We are to have an Imperial conference this summer at which tariff matters will be discussed with all the other nations of the empire, but no board has been appointed to investigate these matters. Surely if there was need for a tariff board that need exists at the present time.

I do protest against the answer of my hon. friend that we should apply to the officers of the department in order to learn why the value of $2.30 was fixed. Surely hon. members of this house have the right to know what tariff changes are made, when they are made by order in council and on what basis they have been made, without being obliged to inquire of the officers of the department.

Mr. RYCKMAN: First I might reply to my hon. friend from Quebec South, who has left the chamber. His statement seemed rather peculiar; he assumed that because the United States called this one per cent tax a customs duty, and contended that it thus came within their law, it was essentially a customs tax. Then my hon. friend proceeded to say that the customs tariff cannot be read to apply, so he denies his own argument. I do not think it is necessary to proceed further except to say that hon. members of this house who belong to the privy council will know that order after order is drawn up making remissions or refunds under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the minister accept the interpretation of the United States?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I do not think it matters. What is the difference between an excise tax and an excise duty?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Why call a customs duty an excise duty?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Because we like that name, and its application is different from the application of a customs duty. This excise tax was intended to cover everything; it applied to lumber, but when it became important to take it off lumber it was removed. This tax was treated in a different way from our customs duties, which of course are regulated by the customs tariff. But I am not going to split hairs with anyone who says it should be called a customs duty, because certainly it is collected at our ports when the goods come in.

Now I should like to say a word in reply to my hon. friend from Quebec East. It almost makes me smile to think what would have happened if the tariff board created last session had been functioning in the interval. The tariff board was not appointed because with the kaleidoscopic world changes that have been taking place this has not been a proper time for the operation of such a board. Look at the authority given that board; what were its duties? The board was to investigate the cost of raw material, the costs of manufacture, labour conditions and so on, and gather such information as the Minister of Finance might request. What would have happened if this board had been operating on September 21 last? Everything they might have done under that authority would have been practically worthless, but this legislation which we have placed on the statute books has been made use of. This was not for the tariff board; it was for the governor in council, working with the Minister of National Revenue, under express enactment. My hon. friends opposite had no objection to that when they were in power; as I say, it was initiated by them and they made use of it time and time again. I am sure every ex-minister knows that, so surely no objection can be taken now. My hon. friend from Quebec East became quite fervent in saying that the governor in council had acted without the advice of the tariff board, but my hon. friend knows that even if there had been a tariff board it would not have been part of the functions of that board to look after this matter.

My hon. friend made another statement which is hardly correct, and I think perhaps I can see why it was made. I did not say that the basis of this calculation on refined granulated sugar was made only by the department. First we had our investigators go into the matter and then, in consultation with members of council, we asked the officers of the department to figure out what the basis should be. I cannot do the arithmetic, and I think my hon. friend will be fair enough not to ask me to do it at this time. As I told him, I know that the freight rates from the south and the freight rates from Montreal to Toronto entered into the computation. A demonstration was made, which assisted in coming to a conclusion. As I say, I cannot go through the arithmetic, though I know the facts, but it was decided by the governor in council, after investigation, that this was a proper thing to do, so it was done. I hardly think my hon. friend is fair when he imagines—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Who made the investigation?

Mr. RYCKMAN: The investigation was made chiefly by Mr. Breadner and Mr. Richards, officers of the department. Mr. McGregor, representing the sugar refiners, was also consulted.

Mr. YOUNG: Cane or beet refiners?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Both.

Mr. BROWN: What has been the general result of the policy which the minister has followed? Has it redounded to the welfare of the revenue or has it had the effect of keeping out of Canada large quantities of fruits and vegetables, which so exercised the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite during the last parliament?

Mr. GOTT: I should like to have the opportunity of answering the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. BROWN: I may say—

Mr. GOTT: I thought the hon. gentleman had concluded.

Mr. BROWN: I may say to the hon. member for South Essex that if he wishes to answer the question I shall be interested to hear what he has to say, although I will not accept his statement as authoritative. When he has finished, the minister can answer.

Mr. GOTT: I want to say to the hon. gentleman that there is one section of Canada that appreciates the fact that there is in power to-day a government with backbone and determination enough to put into effect policies that are in the interests of the producers of Canada. The hon. member has asked what effect this policy has had. Let me tell him this. I pleaded with the former Minister of National Revenue to put into force dumping duties against the huge importations from the United States, but they would do nothing. For five years I pleaded with the government which the hon. gentleman supported, to take some steps to stop these considerable importations, but they did absolutely nothing. At that time, when our cabbages were ready in western Ontario, the Canadian market was flooded with Virginia cabbages; when our potatoes were ready, we found the Canadian market flooded with Michigan potatoes; when our tomatoes were ready, Mississippi tomatoes came in and flooded the market; when our cucumbers were ready, Louisiana cucumbers were coming in in vast quantities. The hon. gentleman wishes to know what this government did, and what the effect of its policy has been. On April 22, 1931, the government passed an order in council putting a market value of 15 cents per pound on asparagus, and I may tell the hon. member for Lisgar that this had the effect of protecting the producers of Canadian asparagus. A little later on, on June 11, they put on a rate of 4 cents against American cabbage, and that permitted the growers of cabbage in Canada to sell their product on the Canadian market. That is what it did, Mr. Member for Lisgar. On June 11, an order in council was passed imposing 8 cents a pound on carrots, and I could go all down the line, mentioning the various orders in council that have been passed, every one of them in the interests of the producers in the district I have the honour to represent. Let me say to the hon. gentleman that I have the honour to represent in this house the most diversifield farming section in Canada, and the growers of South Essex appreciate the action of the government in 1931, and the action which they propose to take in 1932, to protect Canadian growers and give them the Canadian market, which otherwise would be flooded with American produce.

Mr. BROWN: And now will the hon. gentleman answer the other part of my question and say how the revenue has been affected.

Mr. GOTT: I will say this to the hon. member, that any country that is built up on imports is bound to fail.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I am glad that I have some friends who can come to my help—

Mr. GOTT: I was only expressing the sentiments of the growers of South Essex.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I may say to the hon. member for Lisgar that complaints have not come to us in any number at all. The growers are satisfied with what has been done, and they are anxious to have what was done last year repeated this year. My hon. friends opposite must have believed in the policy themselves, because they did the same thing. As regards the revenue, it has fallen off; but let the hon. gentleman remember that the revenues of this country compare very favourably with those of other countries. Naturally there has been less business and therefore less revenue, but I do not think this country is suffering very much when the business of buying and selling, which is natural to the country, is done within the country. If, therefore, a little loss in customs revenue has meant work to Canadians in Canada, and business in this country, I, for one, am satisfied to see that diminution in revenue. Just one more observation in this connection. I do not see why these questions with respect to policy should be addressed to me. I am willing to answer if I am called upon to do so, but I am trying to administer the department, and if there is any question with regard to administration, such as the question in relation to lumber, then I think it is quite proper that I should be asked to say something by way of explanation or in support of what we have done; and if there is any condemnation, very well. But that it should be left to this late date in the session for me to deal with policies of government—that, I submit, is not expected from the Minister of National Revenue. However, I shall be glad, if it will satisfy hon. members, to continue in my humble way to try to answer any questions that may be asked.

Mr. BROWN: I do not think the minister can evade responsibility for answering as to the effects of his own policy.

Mr. RYCKMAN: If the hon. member will permit me, I did answer.

Mr. BROWN: Perhaps I misunderstood the minister, but I understood him to say that he should not be expected to answer—

Mr. GOTT: He counldn't expect you to understand.

Mr. BROWN: I asked the question for this reason. We all remember that the usual argument that was advanced against the importation of fruit and vegetables from other countries was that by the time the Canadian fruits and vegetables were ready for the market the edge had been taken off people's appetites and that they had been satisfied. I have been walking up and down the streets of Ottawa in the last few days, and I see the grocery stores filled with fruits and vegetables from the south, just as they used to be in years past, and I was interested to know whether the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite have really had any effect on that trade. We remember how the Minister of Railways used to go up and down the country declaiming against the many million dollars' worth of fruits and vegetables that were coming in from abroad. I believe the figure he used to quote was $40,000,000. Of course we all know that this included all kinds of fruit and vegetables that were never grown in Canada at all. Now in view of what I see in Ottawa to-day I am interested to know whether the policies of the government have really had the effect of curbing the importation of early strawberries and melons, for example.

Mr. MANION: We have the revenue from them anyway.

Mr. BROWN: That is what I want to find out.

An hon. MEMBER: You know it now.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I want to express my hearty agreement with the minister in one respect. If I understand him correctly, he has stated that it would be absolutely impossible for any tariff board in the world to keep in touch with the kaleidoscopic changes which have been made by the present government. With that statement I entirely agree.

Mr. SPENCE: And of the last government, too.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think my hon. friend has missed the point entirely.

Mr. SPENCE: Not a bit of it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In answering the hon. member for Quebec South I think the minister missed the point of the argument. As I understand the hon. member's argument it was that the statutes under the provisions of which these orders in council were said to have been passed permitted the remission of certain duties, whereas the orders in council themselves attempted to fix the tariff duties. Apparently the minister has missed the distinction which the hon. member for Quebec South was endeavouring to make. I submit that there is no authority under the provisions of acts cited in the orders in council for the powers contained in the orders.

[Mr. Brown.]

Mr. YOUNG: I have another bulletin before me, number 3766, dated November 7, 1931, fixing the value for duty on gasoline at so much per wine gallon, the American gallon. I believe that that is a smaller gallon than the Canadian imperial gallon. A few moments ago the minister told us that he preferred the American dollar to the Canadian dollar because it was bigger, so I should like to know why he prefers the American gallon to the Canadian gallon when it is smaller. Surely if a big dollar is better than a small one, a big gallon should be preferred. I should like to know how the valuation of 7.72 cents per wine gallon was fixed on gasoline coming from the Pennsylvania district. The minister could not give us the information in connection with sugar; perhaps he can in connection with gasoline.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The unit used is the home consumption unit. The hon. member said he did not know why the American wine gallon was used—

Mr. YOUNG: The dollar is the Canadian dollar.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The home of the American dollar is in the United States.

Mr. YOUNG: Why not leave it there and use our own dollar?

Mr. RYCKMAN: No, we would like to have some of theirs. The action taken in connection with gasoline was not taken under section 43, it was taken by the department in the ordinary course of business. A committee of the house has been considering this question but I have not been able to attend any of its meetings nor have I had an opportunity of reading the report. As I understand it, the value of gasoline was fixed on the basis of the price of crude and the action was taken by the officers of the department without any information being taken from or carried to the minister. The officers are expected to administer section 6 of the law without reference to the minister. I am sorry I cannot answer the questions asked by my hon. friend.

Mr. YOUNG: The bulletin I have states that this action is taken under the provisions of subsection 2 of section 36 of the Customs Act.

Mr. RYCKMAN: That requires no order in council to be passed or action to be taken by the minister.

Mr. YOUNG: When the departmental officials are satisfied that dumping is being practised and they set a certain valuation, they must have some source of information. They cannot accept the word of anyone who drops in and says gasoline is being dumped. They must have something upon which to base their decision. Upon what do they base it?

Mr. RYCKMAN: They make as full an investigation as can be made. They have the entree to the books of any manufacturer or firm in the business. If they are denied that entree the company will soon find out that it did not pay to take that stand.

Mr. YOUNG: Who asked for this valuation?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I am sorry I do not know; it did not come to the minister.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The consumer.

Mr. YOUNG: Someone must have asked for it. This thing does not work automatically to that extent.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Why could not my hon. friend have addressed his question to the committee when this matter was under investigation?

Mr. YOUNG: I was not a member of the committee.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I have had nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. YOUNG: I was asking the minister.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I am sorry but I cannot give the information.

Mr. YOUNG: I do not know that anyone appeared before the committee to tell how these valuations were arrived at or at whose request they were made.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The officer of the department who has had most to do with the matter of valuing gasoline is Mr. Richards and I understand that he attended before the committee. If there are any members of that committee present to-night perhaps they could give the information which was given to the committee.

Mr. YOUNG: Did the Canadian refiner request this action?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I have no knowledge of any requests.

Mr. YOUNG: Did any independent distributor other than the refiners make any objection?

Mr. HACKETT: Ask the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) to give an explanation.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The distributors want to bring in gasoline from Roumania. I know more about that than I do about this question now under discussion.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the minister tell the committee what he knows about that phase of the matter?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. YOUNG: No, I want an answer.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I submit that that is not a very fair question, but if I must answer it I will do so. A gentleman from Montreal, since the committee last rose, told me he was anxious to deal in Roumanian gasoline. About a week ago another gentleman told me the same thing, and I know there are one or two others who have spoken to me on the same matter. There is quite a move now to import Roumanian gasoline into this country.

Mr. YOUNG: Hon. members receive these bulletins from time to time stating that valuations for duty are being fixed and we are always in hope that we may be able to find out how these things are done. It is rather disappointing to find the minister does not know anything about the matter.

Mr. RYCKMAN: My hon. friend must be fair; I know how it is done, it is done by the officers of the department as a matter of routine under the provisions of the law as it stands on the statute books.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister does not seem to be able to tell us at whose request this action was taken, who furnished the information or upon what basis the decision was arrived at.

Mr. GOTT: Those who know most about it.

Mr. YOUNG: Those who know most about it could not get what they want. This is very disappointing from our point of view. A little while ago I asked the minister whether he could tell us what dumping duties could be collected, and he thought this was hardly a fair question. But I have under my hand a statement of the quantity of gasoline imported last year and the total amount of duty. This statement does not show the dumping duty. We know, under the act as it stands, under the provisions of this bulletin, a dumping duty is collectible. We also know the act is so framed that the importer has the privilege of paying that duty to the government or to somebody else in some other country. What I wanted to know was whether those dumping duties were being collected for the benefit of Canada. I desire to know whether the importer was paying this dumping duty to the Canadian government or to somebody in some other country, with Canada deriving no benefit therefrom. It is to our interest to know whether these dumping duties are being collected and to what extent.

As regards using the United States dollar to measure values and the Canadian gallon to measure quantities, it appears to me one explanation is this: in fixing the value the minister uses the United States dollar because by that means he can raise the duty as high as possible and then he uses the larger gallon to raise the duty still further. In every case he uses the measurement, whether of value or quantity, that gives him the highest rate of duty.

There is just one other matter about which I want to ask a question, and that is in regard to women's and children's clothing. A few weeks ago the minister said something about the importer of misses' dresses wanting to bring into this country 10,000 dozen at a cost of thirty-three and a third cents a piece. Will the minister say how those goods were shut out, how the values were fixed and at whose request?

Mr. RYCKMAN: The goods did not come in.

Mr. YOUNG: I presume they did not come in because the value was placed too high.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The person who was interested in the proposition was told that if there was dumping, the dumping duty would be imposed, and the matter was not proceeded with.

Mr. YOUNG: Do I understand that the statement was that they would make the duty high enough to keep the dresses out?

Mr. RYCKMAN: No, that is not correct. The statement was plainly made that under the dumping law, if there was dumping, the dumping duty would go on, and so the business was not carried out.

Mr. YOUNG: The effect, anyway, was to shut the dresses out. I should like to give the minister the other side of the picture. Ten thousand dozen or 120,000 ladies' dresses could have been brought into this country at a cost of thirty-three and a third cents apiece. The minister says: No, you shall not bring them in. A friend of mine who wished to secure a maid to help his wife in the house, believed he could get one in the dried out districts of Saskatchewan.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. YOUNG: This is not a laughing matter. He went there to get one. He said: I went into house after house where there were grown up young ladies willing and anxious to go out to work, and they could not do so because they had no clothes to wear. They were actually in their bare feet.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. YOUNG: It is all very well for hon. gentlemen to laugh, but if they were in that position, they would not laugh. That was the situation. While people in this country are going in rags, in their bare feet, the minister boasts in the house that he has deprived them of the opportunity to secure dresses at thirty-three and a third cents apiece.

Mr. MALCOLM: I am not going to delay the passing of this estimate, but I should like to make one observation, particularly because the Minister of Trade and Commerce has come into the chamber. The hon. member for East Algoma referred to a probable duty on lumber being put into effect by the United States and referred also to the disastrous result this action might have on the Canadian lumber industry. Later on the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough discussed with the minister the fact that the countervailing duty of $1.50 per 1,000 feet applied on Canadian lumber by virtue of the fact that we had applied a one per cent excise duty on United States lumber entering Canada. The hon. member for East Algoma, when he was speaking of the possible duty being applied by the United States, appealed to the Minister of National Revenue and, I think, to his colleagues in the government, that if this were done, it would be advisable to retaliate against the United States by imposing a duty on their lumber entering Canada. I do not suppose I shall have another opportunity this session, so I now want to warn the Minister of National Revenue, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the government that there could be no more foolish or destructive policy for the government of Canada to adopt than to retaliate by placing a duty on lumber entering Canada from the United States.

All lumber unfortunately has been treated in our customs tariff under one item. Lumber consists of the production of a variety of trees and has many uses. We in Canada are quite dependent, whether we like it or not, on the United States for oak lumber, hickory lumber and walnut lumber. The hon. member for Lincoln knows quite well that hickory lumber is essential in the manufacture of certain commodities in which he is interested; I know that walnut lumber is essential in the manufacture of certain commodities in which I am interested, and I warn the minister not to treat this item of lumber as though it were just one commodity. The lumber item should be divided into several classes; then we could treat it properly with regard to the question of customs duties. I appeal to the minister and the government, should the United States impose a duty against Canadian lumber, not to jeopardize and injure the existing industry in Canada by retaliating and putting a duty against raw material which it simply must secure from the United States if we are to keep our men employed in certain branches of the woodworking industry. What the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has said is quite true; the proper thing to do is to conduct negotiations with the United States with a view to keeping lumber duty free between the two countries. Canada gets the best of the lumber trade between the two countries; we ship to the United States more than we buy from them, and what lumber we buy is of a type we do not grow. I advise the minister not to indulge in any foolish policy of tariff reprisals on lumber even if the government has the power to do so.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I should like to know the regulations in respect of the entry of books of an educational character published in Great Britain but not published in this country. The reason I ask the question is this: to-day I received a letter from a friend of mine in my riding, who, while a farmer and not a very wealthy one, is by way of being a student of economics. From time to time he orders publications from the old country and this one, when it reached Red Deer, which is a customs port, was held there for duty purposes. Believing that such books were admitted free, he protested to the collector there who informed him that the only books of an educational character exempt from duty were books not printed or reprinted in Canada which were actually included in the curricula of Canadian universities, schools or colleges, and that this book, of which my friend unfortunately neglected to give me the name, but which I am sure from my knowledge of him, was educational, was not in any curriculum. It was published by George Allen and Unwin of London, England. It was apparently on economics. He stated that he was not particularly concerned with the small amount of duty that he was obliged to pay on this book, but he was concerned as to the policy, because he thought—and in this I very strongly agree with him—that brains, ideas, should come in as far as possible duty free. If they are desirable books used in the study of economics or any other branch of education, I think they should be allowed to come in without payment of duty. As I do not know the book in question I cannot argue about it, therefore I am asking the minister the practice in regard to books of an educational character printed and published in the old country, but not in this country. I refer to books not found upon the curricula of Canadian universities, schools or colleges; because the minister realizes that there are many works of an educational character, but modern in tendency, which have not found their places upon the shelves of our schools. I hope the time may come, however, when they will.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The items of the tariff dealing with books are 169 to 176. I believe my hon. friend is referring to 175. If he has not a copy of the tariff schedule, and will so inform me I shall be very happy to send it to him.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I was referring particularly to the interpretation of the tariff items dealing with books.

The CHAIRMAN: Order; the discussion must be relevant to the item.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: We are discussing collectors at the custom ports, and I am asking as to the discretion exercised by collectors.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I should be very happy at a very early date to give my hon. friend any information he desires in regard to the tariff items.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What are the instructions to collectors in regard to the duty on books, or the instructions regarding books entering free? What books enter free?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I believe I had better read the items:

175. Books not printed or reprinted in Canada, which are included and used as text books in the curriculum of any university, college or school in Canada; books specially imported for the bona fide use of incorporated mechanics' institutes, public libraries, libraries of universities, colleges and schools, or for the library of any corporated medical, law, literary, scientific, or art association or society, and being the property of the organized authorities of such library, and not in any case the property of individuals — the whole under regulations prescribed by the minister—provided that importers of books who have sold the same for the purpose mentioned in this item, shall, upon proof of sale and delivery for such purpose, be entitled to a refund of any duty paid thereon.

Then item 176 is as follows:

176. Books, bound or unbound, which have been printed and manufactured more than twelve years.

Then, other books on the free list are:

Books, embossed, and grooved cards for the blind; and books for the instruction of the deaf and dumb and blind; maps and charts for the use of schools for the blind.

And, further,

Books printed by any government or by any association for the promotion of science or letters, and official annual reports of religious or benevolent associations and issued in the course of proceedings of the said association to their members and not for the purpose of sale or trade.

The CHAIRMAN: Order; we cannot discuss items 175 and 176 of the schedule. This discussion is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am directing my remarks to the discretion of the collectors. Is discretion given to the collectors whereby an individual may be permitted to bring in a book free of duty, no matter what the character of the book may be?

Mr. RYCKMAN: If the tariff schedule does not allow the entry of the book without payment of the duty, certainly the collector has no authority to say that duty shall not be paid.

Mr. VENIOT: It is a fact that certain goods are exempt from the excise tax, and of the number I understand lumber is one. That is so, is it not?

Mr. RYCKMAN: That is my recollection, but I will look it up.

Mr. VENIOT: From memory could the minister tell whether or not there are any other goods exempt from the three per cent excise tax?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I would answer my hon. friend by stating that this matter will be before the house in the form of a resolution sponsored by the Minister of Finance, and schedule 3 of the Special War Revenue Act will be under consideration. This is a very long schedule and—

Mr. VENIOT: The section referring to the excise tax is not very long.

[Mr. Ryckman.]

Mr. RYCKMAN: Oh, is the hon. member referring to the excise tax?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes.

Mr. RYCKMAN: It will be under review when the resolutions of the Minister of Finance are considered.

Mr. VENIOT: I am just dealing with the customs end of it. As the excise tax is collected by the Department of Customs I thought the minister could give me the information. However I shall not press the matter. I was bringing it to the attention of the committee for the benefit of the hon. member for South Essex. I see that raw leaf tobacco when imported by licensed tobacco and cigar manufacturers is free of the three per cent excise tax. How does that affect the Canadian grown tobacco?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Tobacco is already subject to a very heavy excise tax.

Mr. GOTT: Is the hon. member suggesting that the tobacco industry should be further taxed, despite the fact that it is now taxed $48,000,000 yearly?

Mr. VENIOT: I am not talking about taxing the tobacco industry at all. I was merely asking for information so that the hon. member for South Essex might have a better understanding. A few nights ago he was talking about the protection which should be given the Canadian tobacco growers. He should understand that the three per cent excise tax does not apply to raw tobacco coming from foreign countries into this country, for certain purposes.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I suggest that the hon. member allow the matter to stand. He has asked for information as to what would come under the three per cent excise tax. He may ask that question when the resolution is before the committee.

Mr. VENIOT: Just a minute; this matter is not under consideration by the Department of Finance. A definite decision was made last year. The only consideration given to it this year is that the tax has been increased from one per cent to three per cent.

Mr. RYCKMAN: We seem to be at cross purposes. I understood the hon. member to ask me what articles beside lumber were free from this tax. I have asked him to look into the resolution which has been introduced and will be discussed. I should not like to tell him something to-night and learn to-morrow or next day that I was wrong.

Mr. VENIOT: I think we are at cross purposes, because the resolutions to be discussed in the committee of ways and means will not include exemptions. They will only deal with the increase of the excise from one to three. But those resolutions do not give the exempted articles; those were passed last year.

Mr. RYCKMAN: They will be in the bill, I have no doubt.

Item agreed to.
