—so his gross payment plus taxes—

—and I do not know how taxes got into this——would be $2,873.

That works out to an average of 7.2 per cent over the whole loan. When I read those remarks, Mr. Chairman, and when I read over the previous debate during which the minister and the hon. member for Essex South were lamenting about farmers having to go out and pay 10 per cent for money borrowed if they wanted more than the maximum of $20,000 and $27,500, it seemed a terrible thing. The hon. member for Essex South referred to these people who lend money as Shylocks. The more polite term for them is "loan sharks". But who is the loan shark now?

Mr. Hays: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, there is absolutely no change in the first $20,000. It was exactly the same a year ago or three years ago. This is principal and interest. Let us get this matter straight.

Mr. Hamilton: The minister has made a remark which I am going to follow up. He said that on the first $20,000 the interest rate is unchanged at 5 per cent, and that is what the amendments say. Why did he say last night that on the first $20,000 the payment would be $1,332?

Mr. Hays: That is principal too. There is no change.

Mr. Hamilton: All right. Let me now go back to the amendments. Clause 4 is adding a new section 16A, subsection (1)(b) of which states:

—where the amount of the loan exceeds twenty thousand dollars,

(i) five per cent per annum on the first twenty thousand dollars of the loan—

—and 5 per cent on the first $27,500 when a farmer borrows under part III. Then when you define what is the interest rate on the additional amount, subsection 4 of the new section says:

With the approval of the governor in council, the corporation may from time to time by order prescribe...a rate of interest applicable to any loan made by the corporation, which rate shall be sufficient, if the whole amount of the loan were to be loaned by the corporation at that rate, to return to the corporation an amount equal to the cost to the corporation of any money borrowed for the purposes of the loan and the expenses of the corporation in respect thereof, including a reasonable reserve against loss.

If you go back, Mr. Chairman, and read the remarks of the minister in Hansard, he points out that the cost of the money is at a rate of 5.375 per cent, or 5⅜. The cost of operating the corporation is .87 per cent, and the minister expects the reserve against loss on the money will be one eighth or one quarter. Now if we take the lowest possible figure of one eighth we get an interest rate of 6⅜, which is what is charged on the second part of the loan. Is that correct?

Mr. Hays: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. Hamilton: The minister says that is correct. If he will take a piece of paper and a pencil and figure this out, this is what he will find. Let us suppose that a man wants to borrow $20,000 plus an additional $1,000. On the first $20,000, at a rate of 5 per cent the interest will amount to $1,000.

Mr. Hays: That is interest.

Mr. Hamilton: That is interest. We are talking about interest. To complete the picture under the amendment, if you take the whole $21,000, it must be an amount equal to an interest rate of 6⅜.

Mr. Hays: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. gentleman could be in the house a little more often and would read the act more carefully he would be able to understand it.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Who are you to talk?

Mr. Hamilton: So what is wrong? Is it the drafting? The amendment says that the interest rate shall be sufficient that if the total amount of the loan were to be loaned by the corporation at that rate, it would return to the corporation the total cost of the loan, which is a rate of 6⅜ per cent. That is what the amendment says. Does the cost not have to be at 6⅜ per cent on the total amount of $21,000? The minister said if I were here more I would know what is going on. Let me tell him that I have been looking at the record and I should like an explanation of this. Either there is some very odd drafting in this bill which does not make sense, or how does he explain that on a loan of $20,000 the repayments would amount to $1,551? Do I understand that that will include the amortization payment as well as the interest?

Mr. Hays: Yes.

Mr. Hamilton: Then how does the minister get around this problem. If the whole amount of the loan were to be lent by the corporation the interest must be equal to the total cost, which is 6⅜ per cent. Is not the whole amount of the loan $21,000? The minister shakes his head. What is the total amount of the loan, then?

Mr. Hays: Mr. Chairman, I will be glad to explain this when the hon. gentleman is through, and I hope he will be able to understand it, because I am sure most hon. members will.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): You will have to change this bill.

Mr. Hamilton: Well, I think I have said enough to the minister to indicate that he had better have a good explanation of this; because as I read these amendments, under subsection 4 you get a rate of 6⅜ per cent on the total amount borrowed; and if the total amount borrowed, as I said a moment ago, was $21,000 you would have to pay $1,337 and some cents interest. If that is so, then the interest rate on that additional $1,000 would be not 10 per cent but 33 per cent. If a man wanted to borrow an extra $5,000 and he obtained a rate of 6⅜ per cent on the total amount of $25,000, the rate of interest would have to be 11.8 per cent.

[Mr. Hamilton.]

I want to know whether these figures are correct. If they are not, then something is the matter with the amendments and a change will be required. If I am wrong I will be glad to get up and say so. I was not going to take any part in this particular debate until I read what the minister said last night.

So, under part II on the first $20,000 at 5 per cent you pay $1,000 interest. But the amendment says you must pay the total interest on the whole amount. Thus 6⅜ per cent on $21,000 is $1,337. Therefore to get that total on the full amount you would have to charge $337 on the $1,000, which would be 33.7 per cent. Now, if you take $5,000 more than the maximum, you pay 5 per cent on the first $20,000, which is $1,000, and then for the whole $25,000 at 6⅜ per cent you would need $1,592. Therefore to make up that sum you would have to charge $592 for the $5,000, which is 11.8 per cent. Take the example of $10,000 more; it would be 9.1 per cent.

Then under part III of the act, where the basic figure is $27,500, interest at 5 per cent would amount to $1,375. But to get 6⅜ per cent on $55,000 total cost, the total amount of interest would have to be $3,503. Therefore to get $3,503 you would have to charge $2,128 on the second $27,500 or an interest rate of 7.7 per cent. But if you just want $1,000 extra, then the figure would be 44 per cent for the extra $1,000. If you want $5,000 extra it would be 13.8 per cent on the extra $5,000, and if you borrowed $10,000 extra the rate would be 10.1 per cent on the extra amount.

An hon. Member: You are wrong.

Mr. Hamilton: I hear a voice saying I am wrong. I can only go by what the minister says and by what is contained in the amendment before me. If what the minister said earlier about the manner in which these rates are to be charged was correct, then the interest rates I have quoted are also correct. If I am wrong I want to find out. We do not wish to hold up good legislation, and this is good legislation. I know that every year or so it has to be amended, and we intend to support these amendments. But these doubts have been placed in our minds after reading what the minister said earlier in this debate and after reading the amendment. It may be that the minister intends to change the cost of money on the upper part of the loan far beyond the additional penalty which has been mentioned, and to carry that cost right down to the whole amount.

I know how the minister feels about amendments to this act. This legislation is intended to help certain types of farmers, the farmers who are trying to establish commercial farms. It is not supposed to help a man farming in a really big way. But these provisions certainly cannot help those with low incomes, as those the hon. member for Roberval has talked about. Neither, by and large, can it help young people to become established and this, above everything else, is one of the things I should like to see accomplished by this legislation; because young people today cannot be assisted unless they have a father or some other relative who is able to help them. Eventually, I hope, many of these young people can be raised to the status of commercial farmers.

When I was minister I had this problem before me and I had one or two ideas about it; I had been hoping that in these amendments a start, at least, would be made. I had hoped to bring them forward in 1962 when I brought in some amendments, but a doubt remained as to whether the ideas we had at that time would have worked in practice. The provinces of Ontario and Manitoba both felt there were weaknesses in the act in this respect. They themselves brought in bills to help young farmers.

I hope the minister's advisers will continue to work on this problem of young farmers so that we may be presented with amendments likely to be of assistance to them. I know that the precedents in the United States are not altogether suitable for us in Canada, but I do think a move in this direction is the big task before us.

I will close by expressing the hope that when we get to the particular clause concerned the whole question of interest rates will be cleared up, with examples, so that we know what interest rate can be expected in connection with loans of the type under discussion.

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

Mr. Korchinski: I would not normally have risen, but I heard an hon. member say "filibuster".

Some hon. members have received answers from the minister to questions they raised earlier in the discussion, and I am wondering whether the minister is prepared to reply to several points which I raised yesterday. For example, I asked the minister whether there was any possibility of provision being made for appeals, whether an appeals committee could be set up. My second question concerned the interest rate to be set. Was it to be set annually, or semi-annually, or would it fluctuate from day to day? How were people going to know what rate of interest they would be expected to pay when they approached a farm credit officer for a loan?

My third question was in relation to the annual payments. Since there is to be a separate rate for loans above $20,000 or $27,500, I was wondering how the annual payments would be calculated. Would there be a higher annual payment in the first instance until the amount additional to the $20,000 had been paid off, or would another rate apply after this repayment had been made?

Those are the three questions I raised yesterday, and had they been replied to I should not have needed to intervene again at this point.

The Chairman: I do not wish to complicate the business of the committee, but I wonder whether in the case of questions having to do with particular clauses other than clause 1 we might not wait until we have reached the clause concerned before the minister answers those questions. I understand that this suggestion was made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle as far as his intervention was concerned with regard to interest rates. It seems to me this was a valuable suggestion, and perhaps other members of the committee would be willing to agree. For example, questions which have been asked with regard to interest rates might be renewed or answered by the minister when we reach that particular clause.

Mr. Korchinski: That might be possible and I would go along with it, but the first question I raised might not relate to any particular clause.

Mr. Hays: I would be glad to answer one particular question, the question asking whether there might be provision for appeal. Under the provisions of the act the corporation has the responsibility to decide whether or not to make loans to individual applicants. Many farmers feel that when an application is declined they should have the right to appeal from this decision. The corporation has decided under the authority of section 11 (1)(d) of the act to set up an appeal board in each province composed of farmers or representatives of farm organizations who will be independent of the corporation and who will be asked from time to time to consider appeals by individual farmers with respect to decisions made by the corporation. In this way both the corporation and the applicant will have the benefit of an independent review of decisions. We are now in the process of arranging this.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Fane: No. May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Fane: Mr. Chairman, as almost everybody says, I did not intend to speak on this matter at all. However, I find I am constrained to speak because of certain remarks the minister made last night. The minister must be corrected because should such remarks go forth from here unchallenged he will be in worse odour in the farming regions than he is now. First of all, the minister said about the farmers last night, as found on page 4222 of Hansard:

> Some of them may even need money to finish putting in their crops.

It takes about three months for inspection and appraisal of the land to be made, and if a farmer made an application now he would be pretty late getting his crop in by the time he got any money from the Farm Credit Corporation. He would certainly have to wait a long time.

The remarks that the minister made about lawyers do not have very much to do with the bill but nevertheless they were made in discussing it. When the minister makes remarks in this regard such as he did, I think he cannot know what is going on in his department. Lawyers are not too plentiful in my part of the country, and in my constituency there are five. There are two firms in the town of Vegreville. One firm is headed by my Liberal predecessor in the house. That firm was doing some of the work. The junior partner in the other firm is the Liberal heir apparent in my constituency. Both these firms were doing this work.

The processing of Farm Credit Corporation loans was taken away entirely from the firm headed by the former Liberal member of parliament for my constituency and all the work in the constituency of Vegreville was given to the other firm. Believe it or not, work was taken away from the senior partner in that firm and given to the junior partner. The same girl will do the work and the only difference will be that a different man in the same firm will sign the documents. Believe me, that is a smart way of doing business. Incidentally, both these men were at one time very strong Liberals. As a matter of fact, the lawyer from whom the work was taken away was the returning officer in my constituency for 30 years. I do not think the minister knows what is going on in this regard.

I might say that I was told by a senior official of the Farm Credit Corporation that the processing of loans by the lawyer who had been the returning officer for that constituency was done more quickly than by any other lawyer in the province of Alberta. But the work was taken away from him and transferred across the hall to another lawyer in the same firm. The same girl will be looking after the work, so there is not a hope in hades of the work being done any more quickly or efficiently. However, that is by the way. I just wanted to put that on record.

The minister is very worried about farmers moving away from the farms, and he may well be. While Bill No. C-100 no doubt is a very good bill and the amendments will work quite nicely for farmers who have two or three sections of land, the bill makes no provision whatever for people with only a quarter section. A quarter section can be an efficient, economic unit. People can make a living from a quarter section if they want to work hard enough. I am talking about the west. I do not know what conditions are in Quebec or Ontario. But the Farm Credit Corporation is under the impression that the smallest amount of land that can constitute an economic unit is half a section. That is the premise on which they work.

Now, if a man has a quarter section and he needs, say $5,000 in order to get another tractor—no, I had better not say a tractor, because then he could get a farm improvement loan—but let us assume he requires something else, then he cannot get any help from the Farm Credit Corporation because there is no provision for it. I found the same fault with this act when it was first brought into being. It provides for a large outlay, but does not go down the scale far enough to provide for smaller amounts. If one is thinking in terms of two quarter sections of land in Alberta, stock and equipment to operate it properly, then that takes quite a little bit of money, especially if the farm is purchased as a going concern.

However, let us assume a man wants a loan of $5,000 to help straighten out his business. What happens? The Farm Credit Corporation inspector comes out and says "You will have to have another quarter section; perhaps you can buy an adjoining piece of land and that will cost you about $10,000 if you are lucky". Then, the stock for that quarter section will cost another $5,000 or $6,000, so in order to get a loan of $5,000 this man will have to go into debt to the extent of about $16,000 more to the Farm Credit Corporation because they want him to have an economic unit. This is not where assistance to the farmers should start. Assistance to the farmer should start at the bottom, where the need is greatest. It is the farmers who are on small, family farms who need assistance, these people with a quarter section. They do not want to extend their operations because, perhaps, they are getting on in years and may not have any family. I mean they are not likely to be 20 years old, and they have no family to whom to turn over the farm. They just want to get the farm organized so it can be worked efficiently by the man himself.

People of this type cannot get any help, so I think provision should be made in this bill to cover such situations. The object of the bill is very good. It is to increase the capital available to be lent to the farmers of Canada, and that is very good. But when it comes to increasing the size of the loan up to $55,000, then I say one would need to have a big operation to make this economically feasible. I do not believe a farm could carry a loan of that size unless it consisted of at least two and a half sections or about 1,600 acres. The idea seems to be that the farmer is expected to borrow himself rich. This is something that cannot be done. I feel that in the majority of cases $55,000 is too large an amount to be made available, especially if the interest on the amount over $20,000 is going to be set at 6½ per cent or 7 per cent. The payment of interest on a loan of that size will just about take all the profit a man will be able to make from his farm in a year.

I say to the minister therefore that he should draft his amendments so they will include the small farmer, the farmer with a quarter section. He should make the 5 per cent interest rate mandatory, whatever the size of the loan that is granted. A 6½ per cent interest rate is too great a strain on any business such as a farm. I say to the minister that the more $55,000 loans that are made and the more interest the farmers have to pay, then the more farmers we will find moving off the land. The farmers who move off the land are mostly those who have small farms and who just cannot get help. They cannot compete under the conditions with which they are faced. I believe these amendments would be a lot better if they included help for the people on a quarter section.

As I said that my remarks were going to be brief, I think I will make any further remarks I have to make on the other clauses of the bill as they come before the committee.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I have a few more questions to ask before we pass the first clause. I am not yet convinced on this question of the credit corporation making large loans. I am somewhat concerned that the amendments increasing the size of the loans to $40,000 or $55,000 might cause an undue increase in the cost of land. I should like the minister to give me some idea as to what relationship there is between the price of the land and the loan. I suggest in some cases in western Canada it is perhaps 50 per cent of the going price of the land. If I am wrong in this suggestion, I should like the minister to correct me. This has been my experience in some areas in which the Farm Credit Corporation has operated.

If my assumption is correct, then I believe that an applicant for a $40,000 loan would be buying an $80,000 farm or between $80,000 and $100,000. This leads one to ask where the prospective purchaser would get the other $40,000 or $50,000 which would be needed, after borrowing $55,000 under part III of this act. I come back to my conclusion that these provision are a direct help to the large farmer who has the extra $50,000 in his pocket and who goes to the Farm Credit Corporation to borrow another $40,000 or $50,000.

I should like to correct any false impression the minister may have in his mind when he suggested yesterday that I had a great deal of land in the Hanna district. The Hanna district lies east of Calgary some 200 miles from the Rocky mountains. It has been referred to on many occasions as the dried out part of Alberta. During the thirties farmers were shipped out from that area and the government paid the cost of shipping them out. Much of this area was broken up at one time, but now has been allowed to go back to grass. It is an area which, to some extent, is a bit behind the rest of the province of Alberta. If anyone has not got a large holding of land he cannot survive in that area because it takes 50 acres to support one cow. I do not know whether the minister was fully aware of this, and that most people in the Hanna area have to have a fairly large provincial lease in order to run a fair amount of cattle. I mention this so that it may receive better understanding.

I am pleased with the corporation's operations in this district which is a unique one in its own regard. It does not operate in the municipality. It operates under what the Alberta government calls special areas. They will only allow one cow to 50 acres, and you cannot buy the land from the provincial government. There are something like 3 million acres under provincial lease, and in 1961, or the spring of 1962, the federal government and the Farm Credit Corporation worked out an agreement with the province whereby money could be lent on this leased land for the purchase of it.

That was a major step forward in this dried out part of Alberta. It is an area which suffered tremendous economic losses during the thirties, recovered to some extent during the forties, but is still at the far end of what might be called an agrarian revolution with regard to enlarging farms. In order to enlarge their holdings most farmers in this area must have an opportunity to buy out their neighbours. In fact, any person coming into a special area cannot purchase land until it has been advertised for one month and the local residents have an opportunity to meet the price which the outside purchaser is prepared to offer. If a local resident meets this price, then he gets the land and the outside person has to go somewhere else to look for a place. The reason the provincial government has written this provision into its special areas act is to try and help local farmers enlarge their holdings.

In many cases when leased land comes up for sale all a resident farmer needs is a small loan, something in the neighbourhood of $10,000 to $15,000 to enlarge his holding. As I say, this is a unique area in Canada but it is an area in which the corporation, during the short term of years it has been operating there, has played a great part. I hope it will continue to play an even greater part.

I have mentioned that the district went through a tremendous economic upheaval in the thirties, with the result that bankers, lending institutions, and more particularly the old farm loan board would not venture into the area to make loans. Now the corporation is doing a tremendous job of work in the district and out of one office in Hanna it lent something like $500,000 last year. This is a small amount compared with the totals loaned in other parts of Alberta and throughout the country, but it helped a great many farmers in the district.

Under the new scale of loans proposed in this bill $500,000 would represent only 10 loans. There are some 3,000 farmers still operating in this district and I would like to see more than 10 of them benefit from loans given by the corporation.

There is a tremendous lot of cultivated land in many parts of my constituency, and in these areas it has been my experience that the corporation lends something in the neighbourhood of half the going price. If this is not the case I would like the minister to correct me, but if it is, it suggests that a purchaser must have another $30,000 to $50,000 to back up his proposed loan in order to buy a farm, and if he has this he does not need a loan from the corporation.

Last night the minister told the committee what he thought an economic unit should be. He said that a dairy farmer must have a big enough milk contract to justify his operation and provide his family with a good standard of living. He suggested that a dairy farmer should have 100 acres of pasture for his cattle, and that an economic beef herd in eastern Canada should include 50 cows. I would like to think that the same would apply to western Canada and, if I am wrong, again I invite the minister to correct me.

Further, before we pass clause 1, I would ask the minister to enlarge upon what he feels is too large a unit upon which the corporation should make a loan. We are all aware of the principle upon which the corporation was set up, that of helping those who need help most. Last night the minister said there were still many farmers who operated too large holdings to receive loans under the Farm Credit Corporation. He has outlined what he considers a minimum holding should be, and I would like him to outline what he considers is the maximum holding. He may point his finger at me, meaning I qualify under the minimum. I am pleased to hear that.

My neighbours and I have suffered severe drought conditions during the past three or four years, but we have been able to survive this by shipping in feed, by a tremendous expansion of P.F.R.A., and by pumping water into dugouts. We have gritted our teeth and borne with the dry weather of the past few years. This year we hope that once again we will be able to grow some feed of our own and raise some crops. This is considered the poor area of Alberta. Sometimes I have referred to it as the forgotten part of Alberta, and certainly from time to time the Alberta government has completely forgotten about it.

I would like the minister to outline what the corporation considers a maximum unit for a dairy herd, a beef herd and a grain farm. Further, is it not a fact that the increase in loans might cause land costs to go up? Is it not a fact also that the standard practice of the corporation is to make loans averaging about half the going price of the land for sale? These are two questions that concern me and which should be answered before clause 1 is passed.

I am still concerned about the proposition of a father borrowing for his son. This was the question I raised last night, and which the minister did not answer. Many other hon. members have referred to this matter of sons aged 16 and 17 years prepared to undertake farming after leaving school, and working with their fathers. I would like to see a father be able to borrow money for a son who is, say, 18 years of age. Earlier today, and not in connection with the Farm Credit Corporation, it was mentioned by an hon. member that 16 years of age was considered in Ontario to be an eligible age with respect to another matter. I wonder if age 16 also has a bearing with regard to a farmer borrowing money for his son in order that he may purchase land. Perhaps the minister would make a brief reply to the three questions I have dealt with particularly in my remarks, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Mackenzie.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Chairman, I hear some groans from the Social Credit part of the house. This being the first piece of legislation the Minister of Agriculture has introduced into this house, one would have thought everybody would have taken advantage of this occasion to try to make this the best piece of legislation he could ever introduce. But obviously there does not seem to be too much concern from that quarter.

An hon. Member: That's what you think.

Mr. Korchinski: That appears to be the case, judging from the groans anyway. The first thing I am concerned about is something the minister mentioned last night. He said that in future any interest charged will take into account a provision for bad debts. This is to be found on page 4212 of Hansard, where the minister is reported as having said that interest would be charged, plus an amount for bad debts. In my view this is a wrong principle to be applied here. First of all, Mr. Chairman, why should any future borrower have to make up for any bad debt in respect of a loan that, perhaps on the advice of the Farm Credit Corporation adviser, somebody had obtained and for one reason or another was not able to repay? Why should anybody obtaining a loan from the corporation in the future have to make up for a bad debt which may have been incurred by the fault of the corporation.

If the department is going to take that attitude, I wonder how the corporation will react when an applicant comes in for a loan. Probably one of the first things they will think about is, "We want to make sure this is not going to be a bad debt". In other words, they will take the view that every loan they approve should be paid off 100 per cent. There may be many borderline applications where the people involved would end up being a good risk, but where the Farm Credit Corporation adviser at the time the loan was applied for may have felt it was not a good risk. The adviser may well have uppermost in his mind the thought that the corporation does not want to incur a bad debt, because if they did somebody in the future would have to make up for that bad debt and the corporation would be criticized for borrowers being obliged to pay a higher rate of interest to make up for it.

I see the minister shaking his head in disagreement, but I think this is what his words mean. I should like to quote from Hansard what the minister said with regard to this question:

> We do not expect this will be much larger, and it will be plus an amount for bad debts.

To my mind this spells trouble. First of all the maximum use of the Farm Credit Corporation facilities will not be obtained because the corporation's adviser will be hesitant about approving a loan for fear it will result in a bad debt and somebody will question his decision. If this practice is followed, naturally any man who asks for a loan in the future will ask the question, "Why should I pay for somebody else's bad debt?" If there is a bad debt incurred by the corporation, I suggest this should be something the government should subsidize. I think the government should pay for these bad debts and should allow the Farm Credit Corporation adviser enough leeway so that he will not withhold a loan in respect of someone who might be a good risk.

I hear voices on the other side of the chamber, Mr. Chairman. I do not know what the argument is over there because, as I said, this is the first piece of legislation the minister has introduced and the record of this government indicates that after scrutiny by the opposition they have had to change so many other things they have introduced. I think this is another of those areas with regard to which they should be prepared to accept some good suggestions. I ask the minister to reconsider his position on this matter and remove the provision that farmers taking out loans should pay for bad debts which may be incurred as a result of a decision made by the farm credit adviser, who may have been thinking properly and on the basis of information he had received but might not have made the right decision. If a bad debt is incurred I do not think it should be considered to be the fault of the Farm Credit Corporation adviser, and the government should revise its position in this regard and provide a subsidy if necessary to make up for any bad debts that are incurred. It should not be the responsibility of the borrowers to make up for bad debts. I wonder whether the minister would care to make any comment on this question, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Hays: Mr. Chairman, the very thing the hon. member is suggesting is in the act at the moment, which provides that the corporation shall establish a reserve out of which may be paid any losses sustained by the corporation in the conduct of its business.

Mr. Korchinski: Where is this provision to be found?

Mr. Hays: This is on page 7 of the Farm Credit Act. It is already in the act, and we do not propose to change this provision. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle mentioned this matter this morning. We are proposing that in regard to amounts in excess of the $20,000 and the $27,500, an amount being not more than one quarter of 1 per cent—and it would probably be one eighth of 1 per cent—be charged to take care of bad debts. The hon. member is suggesting that we should be a little more lenient when considering loan applications. I am sure all hon. members feel that the discussion during the last five days has been to the point that perhaps the administration are a wee bit too tough in regard to granting loans.

I should like to reply to the questions raised by my hon. friend from Acadia, who is not privileged to receive a loan because he has so much money that he would not qualify.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a correction here, on a point of order. The minister is imputing great wealth to me. Great wealth is a nice thing to have even for a minute or two, but I certainly haven't got it. I would like to point out to the minister, though, that no member of parliament is allowed to take advantage of the facilities of the Farm Credit Corporation, and under this clause I certainly could not do so; otherwise there would be no restriction as far as I am aware.

Mr. Hays: I still have a right to my personal opinion—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hays: —with regard to the hon. member and I know he is down here mostly for the sport of it. I have answered one of the questions raised by the hon. member for Acadia. The Farm Credit Corporation was not in the original instance, I believe, designed for the benefit of the farmer who is in a good economic position; the industrial development bank would take care of this sort of person.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Could the minister give us a better outline of this provision? He outlined the minimum, and I would ask him to outline the maximum. It would be a great guide to me in advising my local farmers—and I know this applies to many other hon. members also—if he would outline the maximum as well as he did the minimum yesterday.

Mr. Hays: As I suggested at the beginning of the debate, Mr. Chairman, the annual report is now in the hands of the queen's printer, and we would like this to go to the agricultural committee. It seems to me we could have a thorough discussion on the matter at that time.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Is the minister suggesting that this bill will be referred to the agricultural committee?

Mr. Hays: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): This was the desire of the critic who was the former member for Assiniboia when the matter came up before.

Mr. Hays: I suppose this is a matter of judgment, as to the maximum or minimum. It is not spelled out clearly what are the maximums or minimums. This is a matter of judgment, and it seems to me it is something which should be discussed at the proper time, which I think would be when the annual report is before the agricultural committee.

I should now like to deal with two or three aspects of the debate. We worked all through noon hour in an attempt to make matters as plain as possible. We recognize that it would be unfair to expect those who borrowed amounts—this is answering some of the points raised by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle—in excess of present limits to bear the cost of losses on loans made at the 5 per cent interest rate, and we asked the legal officers of the Department of Justice to draft the bill to prevent this. Subsections (1) and (3) of section 16A specifically provide that loans up to the present maximums shall bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. These same sections of the act indicate that the amount of the loan in excess of that will be at the interest rate prescribed under subsection (4).

Subsection (4) was drafted so that it would provide that the rate of interest charged on the excess amounts and prescribed under subsection (4) would be that rate which would be an economical rate for the corporation if all the money it was lending was at that rate. The two previous subsections to which I have referred specifically indicate that the rate as prescribed under subsection (4) will be applicable only to amounts in excess of the present maximums.

I think hon. members should look at the word "if" in subsection (4), as it is the key word. In determining what would be an economical rate for the corporation it is necessary to look at their over-all operations. The cost of money at the moment—and I mentioned this earlier—which is generally determined four times a year, is 5⅜ per cent. The over-all cost of administration last year was .87 of 1 per cent of the capital outstanding. A reasonable reserve for loss, as I have indicated, may be one eighth but would certainly not exceed one quarter of 1 per cent. This is the rate which would be an economical rate if the whole amount of the loan were to be lent at that rate.

I should like to emphasize that subsections (1) and (3) of section 16A definitely provide that the amounts up to the present limits cannot be lent at the economical rate, and therefore this rate, whether it be 6¼, 6⅜, or some other figure, as the cost of money or the cost of administration changes, will be the rate which applies to that amount in excess of present limits.

If a borrower gets a loan under part II of the act of $21,000, as suggested by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, the interest rate on the first $20,000 would be 5 per cent. The interest rate charged on the additional $1,000 would be that rate prescribed under subsection (4).

I might go back to the rate of 5 per cent because this rate of 5 per cent includes the cost of administering the act. The 5 per cent includes the reserve and cost of administration. If that rate should be 6¼ per cent or 6⅜ that would be the rate charged on the additional $1,000. If a farmer should borrow $40,000, then the rate on the first $20,000 would be 5 per cent, including cost of administration, and, the rate on the additional $20,000 would be whatever rate which might be prescribed under subsection (4).

The legal officers of the Department of Justice and the legal advisers of the Farm Credit Corporation are satisfied that the provisions of clause 4 would prevent the corporation from setting a rate, on amounts in excess of the present limits, which would be designed to cover any losses on amounts lent at 5 per cent.

I am sorry if any hon. members misunderstood any statements I made yesterday with respect to payments, or if I misled them a little when speaking about the 5 per cent rate. I should have included in the 5 per cent the cost of operation and the administration, which was .87 of 1 per cent; and depending on what we had to pay for money, any reserve that might also be included would be included with a maximum of 5 per cent. I hope that that takes care of the points raised.

I have worked out a table, Mr. Chairman, which I think also explains what I have just said, so far as the interpretation of the act is concerned. On a $40,000 loan, with an interest rate of 6½ per cent on the extra $20,000, payments of principal and interest would be as follows. With a rate of interest of 5 per cent on $20,000, the repayments would work out at 6.6 per cent, which would include interest, cost of administration, cost of reserve, and the loan amortized over 30 years. Or at the end of 30 years that portion of the loan would be retired. The principal and interest would amount to $1,322 a year over the whole period and the loan would probably be retired in the twenty ninth year. At a rate of 6½ per cent on $20,000 the repayments would work out to 7.56 per cent principal and interest, costing $1,512 a year on the additional $20,000. This would amount to a total annual payment over the whole amount of $40,000 of $2,834. The average interest rate on today's market would be 5¾ per cent and the average amortization over the whole period would be at 7.08 per cent. After 30 years the whole $40,000 loan would be retired. Perhaps I should explain at this time that when the person who had borrowed $40,000 was down to the last $15,000 he would still be paying 7.08 per cent principal and interest.

As I mentioned yesterday, the Farm Credit Act is a very close copy of similar acts in the United States and other countries, and is certainly an improvement over the old farm loan board; I do not think there is any doubt about that. The limits in the United States are $95,000; $65,000 for land and $30,000 for chattels.

These are some of the studies which we made during the last year and which I think fully justify the increase in the larger amounts. One group of grain farmers in Saskatchewan had an average capital investment of over $31,000. The average cash receipts for those farmers were $4,700 and the average net return was $1,400. Another group of farmers in the same area had an average investment of about $48,500. The cash receipts were $8,100 and the net returns were about $3,600. The net returns to the farmers with the larger capital investment were more than double those of the farmers with the smaller capital investment, and it is natural that they should be because there would probably be the same equipment, and that sort of thing, to take care of the larger economic unit. That is with regard to grain farmers.

Another example is that of the mixed grain and cattle farmers in Saskatchewan. Farms with a capital investment of $38,500 showed cash receipts of about $5,500 and a net return of about $1,400. Similar farms in the same area but with an average capital investment of $57,600 had cash receipts of $8,900 and net returns of $3,340.

The same relationship was shown on farms in Manitoba. There were three groups of grain farms. These had capital investments of about $37,000, $52,000 and $76,000. The cash incomes for this group amounted to about $10,000 with a $37,000 investment, $13,300 with a $52,000 investment and $21,300 with a $76,000 investment. The respective net returns by groups of farmers were about $5,200, $7,600 and $11,800.

A study of the livestock farms of Manitoba has shown that the same farmers with a capital investment of $13,500 had a net return of $1,700. As the amount of capital increased, the net return increased. Farmers with an investment of $55,000 showed an average net return of $6,400.

These are some of the methods by which we can attack these agricultural problems. I know that help is needed by a combination of methods. We need the assistance given by ARDA and some of these other measures, but I think the bill before us has a very important part to play in the setting up of economic units. This provision for making proper credit facilities available is closely tied in with our amendment concerning farm improvement loans, with the crop insurance bill now on the order paper and with the farm machinery bill which we hope to get on the order paper very shortly. I know this is not a complete answer; there must be proper markets, and so on. But we hope these amendments will bring about a marked improvement in the act for the benefit of farmers.

There is one other question I should like to answer. I believe it was raised last night by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam who asked what the rates of interest were under Small Businesses Loans Act. I think we are completely consistent in making the proposals contained in this amendment. In this whole field of government lending, or government guarantee of loans, various practices are followed. Under the National Housing Act a rate of interest is prescribed in much the same way as it is proposed to do under this bill for loans in excess of $20,000 and $27,500.

Under the home improvement loans provisions, the banks make insured loans at a present interest rate of 6 per cent. The industrial development bank lends money to small industry at 7 per cent. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam yesterday referred to the Small Businesses Loans Act. These are bank loans, guaranteed by the government, and in this case the maximum interest authorized is 5½ per cent. The maximum amount of these loans is $25,000.

Then there are fisheries loans. These also are made through banks under government guarantee. The interest rate is 5 per cent and the maximum loan is $4,000. There has also been the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act under which loans have carried a 5 per cent interest rate to a maximum of $3,000. Under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, loans under which are made by banks under government guarantee, the interest rate is 5 per cent. The present maximum limit is $7,500. This brings us to the Farm Credit Act and the present bill and, as the committee knows, the rate of interest on standard loans up to $20,000 and supervised loans up to $27,500 is not being disturbed.

So we think there is full justification for doing what is proposed here. It is consistent with practice in the past, and we think it is right, that after a certain minimum we can go on and charge the economic rate. This rate is based on what the government has to pay for money, plus the cost of administration and the reserve.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Would the minister answer my question with reference to the relationship between the loans and the going price of land? Have any studies been made?

Mr. Hays: We have not made many studies. This is one of the reasons we set up an interdepartmental committee. The loans are based on the ability of a farmer to repay them plus interest in addition to making a living for himself and his family. The value of land varies, of course. If it is a tobacco farm it may be worth up to $1,000 an acre. A dairy farm close to Toronto, for example, is worth more than similar land elsewhere. But the corporation lends the money on the basis of the borrower's ability to pay.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Is it not a fact, in practice, that the loan is approximately half the going price of the land? I am not thinking of a tobacco farm. I am thinking of an average situation across Canada.

Mr. Hays: I still go back to the statement that this is a matter of judgment and administration. The corporation is investing the people's money and it is, naturally, very careful in doing so. In some respects I think the hon. member may be correct. I would point out that the corporation was able to lend $108 million last year, which is a good deal more than in any previous year, and present applications indicate that another record is going to be set. Part of the reason, no doubt, is that more people are becoming familiar with the procedures to be followed under this act.

The question has been raised whether these loans will cause an increase in the price of land. Some people think they will, others that they will not. Nevertheless I think we need to raise this limit and I am sure the hon. member must agree with me, because he said so himself yesterday.

Mr. Korchinski: Can the minister indicate whether, if the amendment is passed, he foresees that there will be a loss in the reserve—in the fund which normally sits there in case of bad debts?

Mr. Hays: The provisions we are seeking will have to do only with the portion of the loan which is in excess of the present level. The reserve to be set up is intended to cover loans in the higher brackets. It will have nothing to do with the lower brackets.

Mr. Korchinski: In other words, there could conceivably be a loss sustained if the corporation has to get its money at a rate higher than the 5 per cent charged under the previous set-up.

Mr. Hays: Yes, we can conceivably sustain a loss.

Mr. Hamilton: I should like to thank the minister for the explanation he has given. What he has done is to say that the experts in the Department of Justice and the Department of Agriculture have interpreted this subsection under discussion to mean that the interest rate arrived at will not be a rate sufficient to cover the losses or carrying costs of the whole loan; it will just cover the cost of that section of the loan which is over $20,000 or $27,500.

Mr. Hays: The estimated .87 per cent will pertain to the whole loan. Any losses incurred will come from the reserve established for the larger loans.

Mr. Hamilton: Perhaps I might take a little longer on this point. First of all, I have learned from experience that when the legal officers of the crown advise you, you accept their word because they are the final authority to which we can go. If they interpret the language of this amendment in that way, I will accept that finding for obvious reasons. But the point raised by the hon. member for Mackenzie is a valid one, that since the Farm Credit Corporation is paying 5⅜ per cent on the money it needs to borrow there obviously must be a tremendous loss on the amount of money lent under the original provisions of the act. I think that is true. If you are borrowing money at 5⅜ per cent and there is a cost of 1 per cent to carry on the work of the corporation and set up a reserve, then the cost of handling a loan of $20,000 or less is 6⅜ per cent. The point the hon. member for Mackenzie was making was that if you do not have enough money in the corporation accounts to absorb this continual drain, would it not be necessary to come back to the house and ask for a vote to make up the loss on loans up to $20,000 and $27,500?

Mr. Hays: This will be done by special vote as it was done last year.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Capital.

Mr. Leboe: On clause 2 I have a few questions I should like to put to the minister for purposes of clarification. First of all, I should like the minister to inform us as to what the total loan capacity would be under this provision. Would the $24 million from the consolidated revenue fund which is placed in the capital account of the corporation mean a borrowing capacity of $600 million? Would the total amount of loans that the corporation could make be $600 million or $624 million?

Mr. Hays: It would be $624 million.

Mr. Leboe: If I understand correctly, I believe the corporation does not pay any interest on the $24 million in its capital account. Is that right?

Mr. Hays: That is right.

Mr. Leboe: I should like to ask the minister a question having to do with clause 2, but I should like to relate it to clause 4 which provides for a new section 16A. My question has to do with the part of clause 4 specifically stating that there is going to be a varying interest rate according to the cost. In that connection I should like to know where the consolidated revenue fund gets the money it is going to lend. I should like to find out, because there is a varying cost here. I should like to know from the minister exactly where the money in the consolidated revenue fund comes from which has an influence on what we are dealing with here, the interest rate.

Mr. Hays: That is quite a question, Mr. Chairman. The government, of course, gets its money from various sources. It gets it from taxes. It gets some of its money from crown corporations such as Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited, and Air Canada, which made a little money last year. In the case of a deficit, say in the Export Credits Insurance Corporation the government has to go to the people and borrow money. Whenever I want to get any money from a crown corporation for the Farm Credit Corporation I tell the officials to be sure to get it from that portion of the money they have had to raise by way of bonds and to pay members of parliament with the money they get from taxes.

Mr. Leboe: I like that last sentence, because this leads me right into the core of my question. The minister referred to borrowing. Can he tell me whether or not in connection with this legislation the government has sold bonds to the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Hays: We should have the Minister of Finance here. The only thing I can do as a businessman is to borrow on behalf of the Farm Credit Corporation and then repay. I think the hon. member is relating this to clause 4 of the bill. The particular money we would get would come out of that portion on which something had to be paid to get it.

Mr. Leboe: In other words, the minister is indicating to me that there are certain funds being made available to the government on which they do not pay anything. Is that what he is indicating?

Mr. Hays: That is your statement.

Mr. Leboe: I want to know whether the minister is indicating that to me. I have in mind that the economic rate is going to be based on the cost, and it seems to me we should be in a position to know the situation. That is why I took the trouble to telephone the minister's office and talk to him about this question. As he will recall, I wanted him to get in touch with the Minister of Finance so he would have an answer to this question. I think it is an important question. I believe that if the bonds of the government related to this particular act were confined to bonds sold to the Bank of Canada, and the profits from the interest rate on those bonds reverted to the consolidated revenue fund we could supply money to the farmers at a much cheaper rate than 5 per cent. I think this would be a very important step, particularly in the case of smaller farmers in the lower income brackets, from the point of view of making their farms economic units. That is why I should like to find out from the minister if any of the bonds that the government sells to get this money are sold to the Bank of Canada and whether the Bank of Canada actually retains these bonds for any length of time. This is what I wanted the minister to find out from the Minister of Finance before he got away. Apparently he did not get an answer for me.

Mr. Hays: I would be very glad to take this matter under serious consideration. We will investigate it thoroughly.

Mr. Leboe: Will you give me an answer some time?

Mr. Hays: Yes, I will be glad to investigate this matter and give the hon. member an answer, if we can get one.

Mr. Leboe: "If we can get one". I should like the minister to undertake to give me an answer because I know that if he persists, as I hope to do from now on, he will get an answer, and I would rather the minister would do the persisting.

Mr. Hays: I will be very vigorous in this regard.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Chairman, this clause enables the borrower to acquire farmland or to advance money to a person who is a son, son-in-law, daughter, and so on. I will not read the whole clause. I wonder whether the person who is willing to sign a document enabling his son or daughter to acquire land must be a farmer or whether he may be a businessman, financier or any other type of individual?

Mr. Hays: In the first place, Mr. Chairman, he must be a farmer. Probably I should explain subclause 1 of clause 3. Suppose a father has two sons who wish to take up farming. His own farm unit may not be large enough to support the two of them. He may wish to transfer to one of his sons but at the same time to assist the other son to buy a farm of his own. This son may have worked for years on the family farm and contributed labour at a relatively low cost to his father.

Although the father may wish to assist the son financially it may be that his own farm, while adequate for his needs, did not produce enough revenue that he could make savings and have the money available to assist his son. This clause would permit him to borrow from the corporation and turn the money over to his son to permit him to make a down payment on the purchase of another farm. The son, who would then have an equity in the farm he was buying, would be able to go to the corporation and obtain a loan under part III of the act, the part where there is supervision, to pay the balance of the purchase price of the farm and to purchase livestock and equipment.

He would probably share in the use of his father's machinery and exchange labour with him, so that his requirements for machinery would be modest and he could use more of the credit available to him from the corporation to purchase livestock. Under this arrangement, it may be quite possible for a father, even with a modest sized farm, to join with the corporation in providing the capital necessary to start his son up in a farm career of his own.

Mr. Korchinski: Supposing a farmer might not qualify for a loan because he may have too large a holding and the corporation refuses him a loan for his own purposes. Then he turns around to the farm credit officials and says he wants to purchase land for his son. Would he be able to do this?

Mr. Hays: If the son is going to farm on his own and he needs the land for this purpose, the corporation would entertain such an application.

Mr. Korchinski: What provision would the corporation have for investigating whether or not the son is actually farming on his own? Could the minister indicate what they would have to look for, and would the officials go around every so often to see if the son were actually farming on his own? Perhaps the father wanted to expand, and used this method of doing it.

Mr. Hays: I suppose the same principles would be applied as are applied today on any loan. The officials would probably ask the hon. member, if this were in his area, and this would be good, solid information upon which they could act.

Mr. Korchinski: Will the minister also give me an indication as to whether the father and son have to sign the document or who makes the repayment in this case? Is it the son who is responsible or is it the father?

Mr. Hays: The father pays back the money he borrows from the corporation and the son pays back what he owes.

Mr. Korchinski: In other words, then, there will be two payments that would have to be made to the corporation.

Mr. Hays: Not necessarily, but possibly.

Mr. Korchinski: What do you mean, "not necessarily"? Either the father has only one payment or the son has one payment, or there is a separate payment for each loan.

Mr. Hays: The father would pay for the amount that he borrowed to help the son, and the son would pay back the amount he owes on his own loan.

Mr. Korchinski: Suppose the father does not qualify because he does not have a large enough holding to qualify, would he be able to assist his son in this case? Is there any provision which makes it possible for the son to be given assistance under those conditions?

Mr. Hays: I suppose if the man could not pay back his loan, the loan would not be granted. It is a matter of judgment as to how this would operate. The corporation, I believe, will co-operate with anyone to see that a combination of circumstances such as those to which the hon. member referred would be resolved, just as long as they were able to receive their money. If it were a father and son relationship they would probably work that out without too much difficulty.

Mr. Korchinski: Suppose a father and son have to make payments and the father makes his payments but the son does not, or refuses to do so; what happens in a case like that? Does the corporation foreclose on the father, or on the father and son? What is the situation?

Mr. Hays: The mortgage held on the father's farm would be dealt with separately, and we would deal with the son in so far as his mortgage is concerned. I suppose this would be the procedure. There are two separate mortgages.

Mr. Korchinski: I am suggesting that the father is making his payments and the son is not. What happens in a case like that? Why would the father be penalized for what the son is not doing?

Mr. Hays: We would do the same thing the hon. member would do. We would take a look at the situation objectively, approach it with great caution and dignity but with a sense of dispatch, and I think we would be able to resolve the problem. I can see the hon. member's concern in this regard, but I believe the supervisor of the Farm Credit Corporation would take everything into account, check the regulations and if it were a big problem he may even go to his superior. However, I feel we could resolve this problem. We are not trying to set up anything difficult, and it seems to me these problems could be handled.

Mr. Korchinski: What steps would the corporation take in the event the father passed away?

An hon. Member: Insurance.

Mr. Korchinski: All right, someone volunteered information about insurance. What happens if the father has been making his payments and the son is willing to continue making his payments? Is there any provision to take care of a situation like this?

Mr. Hays: It would be handled in the same manner as the case of a farmer who dies today. In some cases part III loans carry compulsory insurance. Insurance is not compulsory for farmers who have part II loans, but about 60 per cent of them are insured for the protection of the borrower. I suppose that situation would be handled exactly the same way today as when a person dies.

Mr. Korchinski: I think this is important because in some cases the son may have been making payments for 15 or 20 years. He does not want to find himself suddenly in a position where he may lose his property. Is there any provision or is there not, to safeguard against such a situation? It is quite possible to get into a situation such as this.

Mr. Herridge: Is it not true that every person who signs a document assumes an obligation? If as a result of unfortunate or unforeseen circumstances he is not able to meet this obligation on time, the corporation will accept its responsibility to the government and the people and also consider the circumstances in its usually humane manner to arrive at a satisfactory settlement?

Mr. Hays: I should like to thank the hon. member for his complete explanation. I am sure it will satisfy the hon. member for Mackenzie.

Mr. Korchinski: I thank the hon. member for his wonderful co-operation with the minister, but he still did not answer my question. Let me put it another way. In the event of the death of a father, would this debt be immediately recoverable or be considered a bad debt?

Mr. Hays: May I ask the hon. member to give a specific case?

Mr. Korchinski: I have not got a specific case because you have not got the bill before the house yet.

Mr. Hays: There are two separate loans and they would have to be repaid. Each one is treated as an individual loan. There are provisions in the agreement and these people are supposed to discharge their obligations. If one member dies, then the same thing would happen as if he died today and one loan was in existence. We have two loans here and we are dealing with two separate people. They are both obligated to discharge their own responsibilities.

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Chairman, I should like to have some clarification with regard to beekeeping. I cannot see where in this paragraph it says a beekeeper can obtain a loan. Can he obtain a loan if he is strictly a beekeeper, or does beekeeping have to be a sideline? If he farms half a section of land and has a couple of hundred hives can he obtain a loan strictly to improve or get more hives? Must he be strictly a bee farmer?

Mr. Hays: If he wants to be a bee farmer, a grain farmer and a livestock farmer, as is my hon. friend, he can be so. If he wants to retire and go to town, and be a bee farmer all by himself, this will take care of him too.

Mr. Nasserden: With regard to loans made to sons and relatives, does the unit the young person is going to set up have to be an economic farm unit?

Mr. Hays: We would hope it would, but we might see the son starting off on a modest venture, and he would probably be sharing his father's equipment and increasing his unit from time to time.

Mr. Nasserden: Am I correct in assuming it would not have to be an economic farm unit?

Mr. Hays: Not necessarily, if he were just beginning.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Interest on part II loans.

Mr. Hamilton: I want to make now the remarks I originally intended to make on this amendment. First of all, I would like to remind the members of the committee that the subject of interest rates has been the core of the whole debate on farm credit ever since the bill was introduced originally. I should like to read into the record the original clause introduced in this house on June 29, 1959, and then I think the history will become dramatically clear. Section 9(c) read:

> Interest rates on loans shall be at a rate that, in the opinion of the corporation, is sufficient to provide for the interest payable by the corporation to the Minister of Finance and the expenses of the corporation, including reasonable provision for reserves against losses.

This was the original draft brought into the house in June 1959. In those days we had on the government side a large number of members now sitting on the opposition side, who stood up in their places and said they did not want that provision as it was. The government of the day yielded to the members of the government party and changed that clause 16(c) to read as follows:

> The interest rate on loans shall be 5 per cent per annum.

In the amendment proposed it is stated that section 16(c) shall be repealed, and that is why earlier today I mentioned the doubt in my mind whether the forces that want high interest rates back in Canada had won a victory over the Minister of Agriculture. I wonder, in view of the struggles we had in 1959 to get the principle of the stabilized interest rate of 5 per cent for agricultural loans, whether that principle has been lost to a degree in these new amendments, and particularly in this amending clause 4.

Once you get it accepted that you are going to depart one step from the principle of stabilized loans and apply a variable rate of interest to loans above a certain amount, it is not much of a step backwards to try and apply that principle—as finance people try to do—over the whole of the original part of the loan.

Today we have accepted in effect that we are going to put amendments through that will allow for the keeping of this 5 per cent principle on loans up to $20,000 under part II and on loans up to $27,500 under part III, but will the minister give the committee his assurance, and I hope with it the assurance of the whole government, that there will be no further steps taken to try and change the 5 per cent rate on the first part of the loans up to $20,000 and $27,500, to this variable amount?

This assurance from the minister would be a great help to us in the opposition. We belong to the group that fought for and won the principle of stabilized interest rates. Now the minister is varying the rate for the higher amounts. We are not going to quarrel with this too much, but if we do accept this one step does it mean the minister will be coming back and asking for the same principle to be applied to old loans?

The second question I would like to ask has to do with the variable part of loans. As I understand the principle now, when the interest rate goes up every three months, when the interest rate is set by the Department of Finance, the Farm Credit Corporation under this new amendment will be duty bound to sit down and decide what the interest rate is going to be for loans above $20,000 under part II and above $27,500 under part III. Will the new contracts needed for the next three months be at this new interest rate?

If the answer to that question is yes, then my major question is this. What happens when interest rates turn down? Let us say the cost of money, plus the cost of running the corporation, totals 4½ per cent—and this has happened—then will the additional amounts be at 4½ per cent, and the original amounts of $20,000 and $27,500 still be at 5 per cent? In other words will the interest rates follow steadily the fluctuating cost of money to the Farm Credit Corporation from the Department of Finance?

My third question, which is supplementary to the second one, is this. If a man has signed up today for a loan, part of which is going to be at 6⅜ per cent, and next year the rate is down to 6 per cent, and down to 5 per cent two years from now, will he be given any opportunity to get a change in his contract or will he be stuck for the whole life of the contract at 6⅜ per cent, even if the cost rate goes down?

Mr. Hays: With regard to the first part of the question, there is no intention on the part of the government now, or in the future that I know of, to change the 5 per cent rate. This has been in existence for some time—that is on the smaller loans. The other is just the same as any other mortgage. If we buy money at 5⅜ per cent and contract it out for an additional amount over $27,500, this rate would apply through the terms of the loan. There is no provision today for an escalation clause so far as the 5 per cent interest rate is concerned.

If interest rates were to go to 4 per cent—and they have been down to 4½ per cent—the 5 per cent rate would not change, and I suppose this is the same as if you buy a house. This is the basis under which you operate. The recipient of the loan would know throughout the life of the loan that this is the amount he has contracted for; and if it were on today's basis, including both principal payments and interests, the rate would be 7.08 per cent. If it was at the 5 per cent, the smaller part on today's basis would be 6.61 per cent.

Mr. Hamilton: This bringing in of principal payments is rather confusing, and the minister admitted that a little while ago. He says that for now the government is not going to change the 5 per cent rate, but I would like a little stronger assurance from the government than that, stating that the ordinary farmer will have guaranteed to him, for perpetuity actually, a stabilized interest rate. We have accepted the figure of 5 per cent, which I think has covered the history of borrowing for the last 30 or 40 years.

As a matter of fact, the government has lots of precedents in this regard. If you want to borrow money from the people, as is done under government annuities, you just go to the government office and they will tell you that for the period of your life annuity the maximum amount you can get is 4 per cent. They know this is the maximum they can guarantee, and the Canada pension plan talk is all based on 4 per cent. I point out to you that when you are asking people to lend their money to the government all you will give them on long term contract is 4 per cent. However, we, when we were the government, accepted this principle in reverse, and said that when lending money to farmers we would accept this long term average of 4 per cent, to which we added 1 per cent for costs. The minister has departed from this principle for loans above the previous limits. All I am asking for now is a little stronger assurance from the minister, representing the government, that the government has no intention now or in the foreseeable future—and when I say the foreseeable future, I mean as far ahead as 15, 20, 25 or 30 years—of changing this situation. A long term contract has been made with farmers of Canada that the interest rate will be stabilized, based on 4 per cent plus the cost of running the corporation, and if we could get this strong assurance from the minister—I know that some members of the government will fight with him, and the finance people will fight for the principle for which they have always fought—I think we would be happy to go along with an interest rate which is a little higher on the higher rate of borrowing.

Mr. Hays: Mr. Chairman, first of all I want to thank the hon. member for the confidence he has in the government, that it will be here for another 20 years. In this regard I can assure him that we will take this question into close consideration. We have indicated in a very tangible way that we think this 5 per cent rate should be held this year, and this amendment will take us into the future as far as 1966. Certainly it is my feeling that this should be done. I share the opinion and the views of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle; I also believe that high interest rates are often the cause of many problems in so far as agriculture is concerned, and personally and as the Minister of Agriculture I would oppose it very vigorously if this rate were sought to be changed.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, that last sentence is all I wanted, because if the Minister of Agriculture will fight for this I know the people in the back benches will support him.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member for Qu'Appelle permit a question, as he has completed his remarks? The hon. member mentioned what a fight the backbenchers in his party put up to see that there was a flat 5 per cent interest rate on farm credit loans; and that is quite correct. But would he not admit at the same time that the seven N.D.P. members in the house at that time put up an equally vigorous fight for the same principle?

An hon. Member: In caucus?

Mr. Herridge: In the house.

Mr. Hamilton: This is very true, Mr. Chairman, and this is why I cannot understand why the N.D.P. have sat so quietly during this debate and let these interest rates go up. As I read Hansard, there was not one member of that party who raised any question with regard to these interest rates.

Mr. Winch: You were not here when the other members spoke.

Mr. Hamilton: No, but I did read Hansard.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, our concern was very similar to that of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, but not wishing to take the time of the house we did not think it necessary to repeat his arguments. We endorse them.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture how many generations these lawyers were removed from the land before they received their education, because I think the bill could have been drafted in much more simple language to the advantage of this committee and all concerned. The bill may be understandable to a great many people, but why was it not drafted in simple language so that the ordinary farmer would know exactly what he was signing before he signed an application for a loan? There are many farmers who will be so anxious to obtain money that they will sign this document before they realize what they are doing, and because they may not understand the language in which it is drafted. The minister has explained it this afternoon. Why was it not explained in the bill before it was given to us?

Mr. Hays: I can assure the hon. member that before we send out the changes we will make them very plain so that everything will be thoroughly understood. There has been no change in the Department of Justice in the last two years, so the same people drafted this bill as drafted the previous one.

Mr. Cardiff: In other words, you hire a group of lawyers to draft the bill and then put it out in language people can understand. Why don't you do that in the first place?

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Chairman, I have a question for the minister in relation to clause 4. However, at the outset I should like to inform him that I firmly believe it would be very desirable and much more acceptable if the government would arrive at a stabilized rate of interest with regard to loans in excess of $20,000 under part II and $27,500 under part III, instead of using the sliding scale of interest which they have put into these amendments. Last night the minister said, as I understood him, that in relation to loans in excess of $20,000 under part II and $27,500 under part III there would be an added amount to cover what it cost the government to borrow that money, plus the cost of operation of the corporation, plus an amount of, I believe he said no more than one quarter of 1 per cent in relation to bad debts. I am wondering what assurance the minister can give the house that this will not exceed one quarter of 1 per cent. I see nothing in the amendments as listed in Bill No. C-100 in regard to this and I am very interested in knowing just how the minister can assure the house that this will not exceed one quarter of 1 per cent.

Speaking on the desirability of maintaining a stabilized interest rate instead of having a sliding scale, I am thinking of the case which occurs quite frequently when a smaller farmer applies for a loan of possibly between $20,000 and $25,000; then when the consultants go out to look over the farm and make an assessment they sometimes, and in fact quite often, find that to make it an economic unit it is desirable for the applicant to request a larger loan. In such a case the man would be told, if he applied for $25,000 to make his unit economic, that he should ask for $30,000. However, on the first $20,000 he is going to be paying 5 per cent, but in regard to the larger amount recommended by the corporation the interest rate will go up quite excessively. I am thinking that we might find a farmer may not wish to pay these interest rates, and he will be put in quite a predicament as to whether to accept the recommendation of the consultant and apply for a loan of $30,000 or whether to leave it as originally applied for, in which case he would not be making it an economic unit in the eyes of the corporation. I think this is an area in which we could run into difficulty, and we should have a stabilized interest rate of possibly 5 per cent. I would like the minister to tell us what assurance he can give the committee that one quarter of 1 per cent will be the ultimate limit applied to the interest rate to cover bad debts.

Mr. Hays: Our experience in the past has been that it is less than one tenth of 1 per cent, and the loss has generally always occurred on the smaller loans. The hon. member suggests that quite often when a farmer is making application for a loan in order to make his unit economic it is suggested that he should ask for more money. In this regard I might say that all our branch managers were called in from all across Canada and were here for quite some time. We suggested to them that they should adopt a little more vigorous attitude in so far as loans were concerned, not to hold people down but to see that they did have an ample amount which would make their farms an economic unit. Sometimes the difference between 10 and 12 cows, in a cow and calf proposition, is the difference between $1,000 and $1,200 revenue; and the difference of another 100 acres would facilitate their paying back the loan much more easily, if they had enough money to provide for such an operation in the first instance. I have said all during the debate that this would not be more than one quarter of 1 per cent. It will more likely be below that—probably one eighth or something like that. This will be a reserve set up on that portion of the loan in excess of the $20,000 or the $27,500.

With regard to the stabilization of the interest rate, it is liable to slide up and down; but the farmer who borrows money will have a steady rate throughout the life of the loan. There will be no escalation clause in it. He knows that on the first $20,000 he will pay 5 per cent. If he were to borrow today he will pay 5⅜ per cent plus the cost of the operation of the corporation, which is becoming smaller as time goes on due to the magnitude of the loans being made. The cost is about .87 of 1 per cent plus the one eighth of 1 per cent.

Mr. Simpson: I hope the minister's predictions are correct and that the rate will not increas over that one quarter of 1 per cent.

[Mr. Simpson.]

I should also like to make it quite clear that I was not criticizing the corporation in any way for suggesting in many cases a higher loan to make a farm a more economic unit. I think that is a very good feature of their assessments. I myself have had several cases where this has been done and it has worked out quite satisfactorily. I have also had cases where the loan was not approved to the amount the applicant wished. In these cases in the opinion of the farmer, of course, he felt he needed the amount to make the unit economic, whereas in many cases the corporation felt that his holdings did not justify a loan of that size. Here again we have a clash of opinions as to whether the amount of a loan would make the farm an economic unit. I did want to make it quite clear that I am not criticizing this aspect of the corporation, because I know they are very anxious to assess these farms to the best of their ability and to make a loan of the nature which will make a farm an economic unit.

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Speaker, I am in agreement with the amendment, but I am concerned at the increased rate of interest which will be charged on the extra money. As the former minister of agriculture said, the members of our party put up a terrific fight both in front and behind the curtain with the Department of Finance to keep the interest rate at 5 per cent. Now it is going to be increased.

I think the Minister of Agriculture will agree that farming is a risky business. A farmer may have a crop failure and have to carry his payments over the year, and a high rate of interest could be very harmful. I am sure he would like a steady rate of 5 per cent right across the board, and I wonder whether the minister would be supported by his backbenchers and those interested in farming if they went to the Department of Finance and asked them to keep the interest rate down to 5 per cent. We have not heard from these backbenchers today, but we on this side should like to keep the rate of interest at 5 per cent. If the minister is interested in doing this, would he consider referring the matter back to the agriculture committee? I am sure he would get enough support from our members on the committee, and if the minister also felt that it should be 5 per cent on all of the loans he could bring the matter back to the house again.

Mr. Hays: We feel that the present amendments which charges an economic rate on the increased loan is the proper approach at this time. I can assure the hon. member that I feel that I do know farming, because I started out with nothing. I think all farmers will agree that this is not too much to ask, when you stop and think that last year, outside of the amount of money put up by the federal government, the farmers borrowed $235 million at interest rates in excess of 10 per cent. Therefore this act will help solve some of their problems. When you stop and think about it, an extra $5,000 on part II loans up to $25,000 costs only $75 a year amortized over 30 years.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, the minister seems to be very complacent today that the opening up of the interest rate in the second part of this proposal places the stabilized rate in the first part of this proposal in no danger. I cannot share the view he has expressed today. If he and the backbenchers across the way have been unable to hold the fort in this regard today, once this is in operation the demand to raise the rate on the first $20,000 will become much louder than it is at the present time, and it will only be a matter of time before the minister comes back to the house and says it has worked so well for those who have been paying the economic rate that all farmers should be paying the economic rate, and there will be very little criticism of that from them.

I think this legislation will be much better if there were a stabilized rate so that everyone would be treated alike, not only six months from now but a year or two years from now—or for whatever time a loan were taken out. I do not think it is too late at this time for the minister and the government to decide to do this. After all, the amount of money which might be involved for a year or two under the circumstances prevailing today is not so great when you compare it with the over-all needs of the agricultural industry and the entire budget of the nation. For that reason I ask not only the Minister of Agriculture but all members of the cabinet —and I am sorry to see so few of them here today—to take this whole problem into consideration.

Mr. Moreau: How many backbenchers have you over there?

Mr. Nasserden: If you want to make a speech you can make one.

Mr. Moreau: Why don't you make one?

Mr. Nasserden: I will if you will allow me.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not like to hear the hon. member misrepresent the facts as to the attendance in the house at the moment.

Mr. Nasserden: I said there were not too many ministers of the crown present at the moment.

Mr. McIlraith: There are six present at the moment; and my hon. friend will see that the vast majority of the official opposition is absent from the house, and that there are only two frontbenchers out of the whole front row of the opposition present at this time.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think it might be as well if we returned to the substance of clause 4.

Mr. Nasserden: I am very much aware that our boys have been here most of the day and yesterday to deal with this question, and our farming members are also here today, as well. I think the minister will agree with that. If I understood correctly, the minister was not too happy because we questioned some of the clauses in the legislation he is bringing forward. I hope he will get that smile back on his face and things will go much better.

Last night when this was discussed I was seriously disturbed by something the minister had to say. He referred to the fact that the money was running out and he was going to hold that as a club over the heads of the opposition with regard to this measure. This is not the first time members on the front benches across the way have tried to utilize a weapon of that kind with regard to legislation which they want to bulldoze through the house. In this case we agree with some of the proposals put forward but on this particular item regarding the changing of the statutory interest rate on these loans I should like to see the government as a whole give the matter more consideration.

I think the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose that this whole measure be referred to the committee on agriculture is a good one. We on this side assure the minister that we will help him in his fight with members of the treasury board with regard to this matter. I see the minister smiling, or laughing. This is no laughing matter. We think this measure should be referred to the agricultural committee for further consideration, and I believe we could do a great deal to help the minister in this regard. One thing is certain. Farmers across Canada would know what the interest rate would be from time to time, and all farmers would know that they would be paying the same interest rate as their neighbours who might take out a loan at a different period in the life of this act. I hope the minister will give us an answer.

Mr. Korchinski: I wonder if the minister could indicate whether the interest rate will be known at least for a three month period or a four month period, or every half year. What is the situation to be? Will the rates fluctuate from day to day?

Mr. Hays: We would possibly set a rate of interest for the year. It would not be less than a year; it might even be longer.

Mr. Korchinski: I would suggest that if the government has to get this money at varying rates it could take an average and set the rate out for the coming year so farmers would know what they would be expected to pay. I think this is only fair because confusion would result if the rate were to fluctuate from month to month.

Mr. Hays: I will be glad to follow the hon. member's suggestion. We will do exactly that.

Mr. Simpson: In relation to interest rates, I wonder if the minister can assure the committee that the interest rate on any loan in excess of $20,000 or $27,500 would be determined on the date the application was received by the corporation.

Mr. Hays: I rather think we would have to pay regard to the interest rate on the date the application was approved, not on the date it was made. I believe this is laid down in the act and the regulations, and there has been no change as far as this requirement is concerned.

Mr. Korchinski: In introducing this new aspect of the legislation the minister must have had some information either from within his department or from other sources respecting the need for loans of this type. He must have believed there were farmers who wished to borrow more than $20,000 or $27,500. I wonder if he has any information as to the number of loans the corporation anticipates making in this category in the first year. Farm credit advisers across the country must have suggested a possible figure. As the minister said, they met here in Ottawa and it was on the basis of suggestions made by them and by others that these amendments were brought forward. Could the minister indicate, for example, how many loans of this order were requested in the course of last year.

I am asking this question for the following reason: I am wondering how much money we can possibly expect to save by increasing interest rates above 5 per cent. If only a few loans are to be taken out, it seems to me we should drop this whole clause entirely. I feel that by adopting it we would be opening the door to a revision of the act in a year or two upon the recommendation of the minister's supporters, or some financial firms, to the effect that this is not the right way in which to conduct business, with the result that the rate would be increased from 5 per cent to whatever rate might be necessary to recoup expenses, write off debts and so on. The minister said he anticipates that a certain amount of money will not be recovered under the 5 per cent provision. If this is the case, I wonder how much he will save by increasing the interest rate above 5 per cent; I am wondering whether it is worth the trouble.

Mr. Hays: About 13 per cent of the loans last year were for the maximum amount. We anticipate that these people will be back, because to most of this 13 per cent the amount available was not sufficient. Of course, the percentage will grow as time goes on, as more people become familiar with these terms of the legislation. I think a great many people in Canada are still not familiar with this act. I believe there is still a great educational program to be carried out. The need for these additional amounts is substantial and the number of applications will surprise hon. members. I think, also, they will be surprised to see which provinces they come from.

Mr. Korchinski: Since the minister has indicated that perhaps 13 per cent took the maximum loans last year, it is conceivable that 13 per cent more will take them out in the coming year. If we have provided loans to the extent of $100 million, we can expect another $10 million or $12 million in the following year. Therefore what we are really concerned about here is not an interest rate of 5 per cent on that $12 million, but on just a fraction of it. So it is obvious that the government will really save very little by introducing this legislation. I repeat that the amount of saving to the government is going to be infinitesimal, but to the individual farmer the amount is going to be considerable as he pays off his loan over a period of years.

If we must concern ourselves about trying to remedy the financial situation of the government, then let the minister say so. Are we going to provide legislation that will be beneficial to the farmer, even at the expense of a little money from the government? This is the important feature. As I have already pointed out, I am concerned that we are opening the door for the future in such a way that the interest rate will be increased still more.

We still do not know what the rate is going to be. The minister has not indicated whether it is going to be 6 or 7 per cent. But if the minister wants to raise the rate in the future and wishes to amend the legislation again for that purpose, he will be able to say, on the basis of the precedent we are setting here, that the corporation is again losing money and the rate should be raised.

Is the minister prepared to accept the responsibility of saying that money must be saved for the government, or is he introducing this legislation for the benefit of the farmers? Since the minister cannot give us an indication of the rate we must assume that the amount of money the government is going to save will be very small and that in effect the government is not concerned about the welfare of the borrowers but is perhaps trying to assist the Minister of Finance. What position is the government taking? Whom are they helping?

Mr. Hays: Our whole purpose, of course, is to help the farmers. Under this amendment we are doubling the size of loans. I can see the Farm Credit Corporation lending a total of $1 billion in the future. I do not know how high it is going to go but at that time I suppose it will be a revolving sort of thing. Many of these loans will never be completely repaid by the original borrower. There is provision in the bill that when a farmer passes on or retires his son can pick up the loan and carry on in much the same way as a man who owns a house and dies before the mortgage is completely paid off. He may own the house all his life and never get it completely paid off.

This is a long range policy. It is tied in with three other pieces of legislation that we hope to have before the house in the next 30 days. It is difficult to explain some of these things until we have all parts of the picture together. This particular piece of legislation will do twice as much, so far as providing capital for farmers is concerned. At the time the Farm Credit Corporation was established I think it was possibly adequate then. But times have changed and now we need to take the next step, which we have done. We are certainly not discriminating against small farmers because we have not changed the situation so far as they are concerned. But in the case of the farmer who wishes to borrow above a certain amount we are simply trying to see that he does not have to pay an excessive amount of interest, that he does not have to go outside of the Farm Credit Corporation and obtain money at 12 or 15 per cent. I think this provision takes care of this situation.

Mr. Southam: Mr. Chairman, I spoke on second reading of the bill on June 9 and the minister will recall that at that time I registered a strong protest against the interest rate being increased at all. I should like to do so once again on this clause. In listening to the debate and interpreting the mood of the house I feel that hon. members are not too happy about this provision. The minister just said that this amendment is being made in the interests of the farmers. I do not think the farmers are going to feel too happy about increasing the interest rate from 5 to 6½ or 7 per cent, or whatever the rate is going to be, on the additional amount of loan.

In answer to the hon. member for Mackenzie I believe the minister said that only a small percentage, possibly 13 per cent, of the total number of loans are going to be in this category. If we use a figure of approximately 12 or 13 per cent of the total applications, it is obvious we are only dealing with a small section of the total farming population. The extra cost of administration and setting up the tables, to which the minister referred in trying to explain this matter, is going to involve a certain amount of money. To me it appears that whatever effect the minister is trying to achieve from an increase in the interest rates on loans over $20,000 and $27,500 is going to be lost. It is going to mean a bigger headache for the advisers in the field in trying to explain the legislation to the farmers.

I think the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose had a good idea when he suggested that this matter should be referred to the committee on agriculture for consideration at one meeting at least. Possibily that would give government members an opportunity to support this provision. The hon. member for Kootenay West said that he was in favour of the low 5 per cent interest rate we introduced when the legislation was brought in in 1959. I have not heard too many members of his party support his stand, although he did get up in his place a few moments ago and put forward that view.

This whole thing has turned out to be a very contentious matter and I should like the minister to explain to the committee again just what the specific point is in increasing the rate from the present 5 per cent level to which the farmers are accustomed to the new rate on the second part of the loan. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle referred this morning to the fight our party had put up in objection to the views of members of treasury board at that time. I expect the Minister of Agriculture has had the same problem on his hands but apparently he has not had the support of enough of his backbenchers. When he says he is working in the interest of the farmers, all I can say is that I do not think farmers across the country are going to be too happy if this interest rate provision is adopted.

Mr. Moore: On the same point brought up by the hon. member for Churchill, I should like to ask the minister to tell us whether a farmer will know at the time he applies for a loan what the interest rate he will be expected to pay on that loan.

Mr. Hays: He will know. We will set the interest rate on the second part of the loan. It will be set for at least a year and possibly longer, so he will know. The rate on present loans is not going to be changed in any way and the additional loan rate will be set. It will be something over 5 per cent.

Mr. Moore: The farmer will know the exact amount of interest at the time of application?

Mr. Hays: That is right.

Mr. Pascoe: A few minutes ago the minister referred to a point I dealt with on second reading. He said that there are three or four other measures in the farm program coming forward in the near future. As I said then, I think those measures should have been made known to parliament before we were asked to deal with the farm credit legislation so that we could see where the farmers stood under this program. I think this is an important point, having in mind particularly the minister's promises about reducing the cost of farm machinery. I think that would influence operating costs.

One point I want to bring out right now concerns a particular program that I feel we should be sure is going to be in force again this year, and that is the cash advance on farm stored grain.

The Chairman: Order; I am afraid I cannot permit a reference to other legislation. I should like to suggest to the hon. member that the committee will have to deal strictly with the clause before it, that is clause 4 of this bill. I do not believe the hon. member should refer to other legislation which may be introduced later.

Mr. Pascoe: The reason I mention it, Mr. Chairman, is that it relates to the ability of the farmer to pay these interest charges. For example, this year the delivery quotas were quite slow in coming in, and a farmer may have to make his payment at a time when he could not deliver his wheat. It is for this reason I think we should be told he is going to be able to get a cash advance, interest free, to make a payment on his loan. This is the point I wanted to bring out.

I am sorry the minister has not got the annual report for this year. He says it is in the hands of the queen's printer. The minister has told us the interest charges are going to be based on the cost of money, plus the operating cost, plus the cost of building up a reserve. The last report says:

> Costs of salaries, office accommodation, and other operating expenses increased from $2,466,717 in 1961-62 to $3,186,399 in 1962-63.

This represents an increase of almost three quarters of a million dollars. Can the minister inform us what the operating costs are going to be for the past year? This report also states, with reference to building up a reserve, that the reserve for losses had been built up to an amount of $3,748,862 in 1962. Can the minister tell us what the reserve is at this time?

Mr. Hays: The report is still at the queen's printer. The cost of operation last year was .871 per cent and we lent $108 million. The present reserve is $1,665,340.

Mr. Pascoe: It is down from what it was.

Mr. Hays: But the cost of operating the Farm Credit Corporation is also down. It is the lowest this year that it has been since the corporation was formed, .87 per cent.

Mr. Forbes: Before we leave this clause, I should like to ask one question of the minister. I believe this is the only clause under which I can ask it. At the present time the Farm Credit Corporation will lend up to 75 per cent of the appraised value of the farm. People who are otherwise qualified have difficulty in raising the other 25 per cent. I would remind the minister that if you are an urban dweller and you want to purchase a house you can obtain one for 10 per cent down, and in some cases less than that. I wonder if the minister would give consideration to increasing the amount of the loan to 80 per cent or 85 per cent of the appraised value of the farm?

Mr. Hays: We have this under consideration, and it is for this reason we have established this interdepartmental committee. We are taking a look at these problems and I realize this is a problem.

Mr. Nasserden: I have one question I should like to ask. The minister mentioned one eighth per cent or one quarter per cent for a reserve. Can he give a definite figure that will be used for this purpose if the bill passes?

Mr. Hays: The reserve we are building up is only for losses and the losses have been less than one tenth of 1 per cent. I have many times pointed out that it will not be more than one quarter of 1 per cent, and I suggest it would be less than that. Perhaps one eighth of 1 per cent; it is difficult to estimate a specific figure.

Mr. Nasserden: Am I to take it that at the beginning there will not be any charge in that regard until some losses occur? What figures will be put in?

Mr. Hays: Well, when the act was originally passed, provision was made on the same basis. The amount that was put into reserve was one eighth of 1 per cent. This is the figure the hon. gentleman mentioned as being something like $3 million and which is now down to something like $1,665,000. We are just speaking of those amounts in excess of $20,000 and $27,500. There is going to be no change whatever in the present amount.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Interest of corporaton in secured lands.

Mr. Herridge: I did not say much on clause 4 because when Progressive Conservative members take a socialist approach to a clause I am quite willing to yield the floor and listen to them. The explanation of clause 5 reads as follows:

> The new subsection (2) would make the interest in land acquired by the corporation by way of security or the realization of security taxable by a taxing authority notwithstanding that the corporation only holds such interest as an agent of Her Majesty.

While I am somewhat illiterate, I do grasp, I think, the meaning of the clause. My question is this: Why is this new clause required when it was not previously in this act?

Mr. Hays: As I understand it, this part of the act is being amended so that the municipalities will receive protection for their share of the taxes which might be delinquent. This is the interpretation of this part.

Mr. Herridge: Was this clause inserted, then, as a result of discovering the municipalities did not have this protection previously? There were some instances where their equity was found to be unprotected.

Mr. Hays: Yes, this change was suggested by the provinces.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 6—Maximum to one person.

Mr. Korchinski: I was just wondering why the loans made under clause 6 cannot exceed $40,000? Is there any provision to make it possible for loans under part III to be $55,000?

Mr. Hays: I think the provisions of clause 7 go up to $55,000.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 7.

Mr. Hamilton: There is one question I should like to ask here in connection with the second part of the amendment. Is the crop payment plan still in effect whereby the applicant or the present holder of the loan decides to pay on the basis of the crop payment plan?

Mr. Hays: This is still in effect.

Mr. Korchinski: The reason I asked the earlier question is that it seems to me under clause 6 someone could back up two loans, if necessary, while under clause 7 this cannot be done. There is not a similar provision here.

Mr. Hays: No, you cannot because under part III the loans are supervised loans for young men.

Mr. Korchinski: Would it not be possible to back up somebody under part II and at the same time qualify under part III?

Mr. Hays: We will take that into consideration, but we have not had such instances at this time.

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported and read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Mr. McIlraith moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $469,308,421.26, being the aggregate of—

(a) One twelfth of the total of all of the items set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1965, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, $329,299,209.25;

(b) an additional one twelfth of the amount of agriculture item 5, privy council item 25 (schedule A) of the said main estimates, $2,259,116.67;

(c) four twelfths of the total of all of the items in the supplementary estimates (A), laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, $134,897,245.34;

(d) an additional seven twelfths of the amount of loans, investments and advances item L37a (schedule B) of the supplementary estimates (A), $2,625,000.00;

(e) an additional two twelfths of the amount of loans, investments and advances item L12a (schedule C) of the supplementary estimates (a) $227,850.00, be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1965.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Nowlan: Before the resolution carries I presume the minister is going to refer to the items and give us the usual undertaking given at this time.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The resolution provides for supply up to July 31, 1964, so that if there is the much talked about long week end by way of holiday it will be necessary to come back for further interim supply if the estimates are not then passed.

Mr. Nowlan: I don't understand the minister's reference to "if". I am sure that is a mistake.

Mr. McIlraith: I appreciate that interjection very much. This interim supply bill is comprised of one twelfth of the total of the items set forth in the main estimates. It is comprised of four twelfths of the total of all items set forth in supplementary estimates A. That brings them up to the same point as the main estimates have been provided for under interim supply bills.

It provides for an additional one twelfth of the amount of the agricultural item No. 5, that is, the item having to do with research and general operations of the experimental farm. The reason for that is because there is more of the work done in the summer.

It provides an additional one twelfth of item No. 25 of the privy council, which covers centennial administration expenses. That is to pay for part of the costs of the memorial building in Charlottetown. There is an additional seven twelfths of item L37A, which is the uranium contract that expires in June of this year, and the whole payment will then be due. The effect of this will be to provide for the release of eleven twelfths of the whole item, and reserve one twelfth so that there can be full opportunity for debate when the estimates are before the house.

There is provision for an additional two twelfths of item L12A, which is loans to the government of India to finance the purchase of aircraft and associated spare parts in Canada. That is an old program and this provides for completion. It will be seen that in no instance is any item released by this bill, and the form of the bill I might add, is in the usual form for interim supply bills. I want to give the formal undertaking that the passing of this bill will not prejudice the rights and privileges of hon. members to discuss any item of the estimates when it comes up for discussion in committee of supply. I am undertaking that such rights and privileges will be fully protected and not curtailed by the passage of the bill.

Mr. Nugent: There is enough time before five o'clock to mention one subject which has been raised recently and has been of considerable importance during the last week or so. That is the revelation of the number of people who have been held in jail for what I consider to be an unconscionable length of time, in connection with immigration cases.

I do not want to be unfair to the minister or to the department of immigration staff. I recognize that there is a strong duty on the immigration staff to check to make sure that Canada's laws for immigration are upheld and we do want civil servants who will try to uphold the laws. But with that realization must come the realization to the minister that, unless closely watched, the zealousness of one civil servant can result in considerable harm to individuals, and that in this democratic nation the prolonged incarceration without rightful cause of anyone in prison is one of the most harmful things that can occur.

I am sure the fact that there are many cases must cause the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration much soul searching, and in fact should cause him to do much departmental searching to find out how this could happen. I am sure they must cause the Minister of Justice more than a little concern.

If there is one thing that it is essential we in this country present to the rest of the world, and perhaps to reassure ourselves of, it is that in Canada the freedom of the individual is sacred. Many countries have seen fit to subjugate the citizen's rights to the welfare of the state to a greater degree than others. Here, where perhaps the individual rights to freedom have been subjugated to departmental efficiency, or where freedom has been taken away because of some departmental inefficiency—or where there is a suspicion of this in even one case—I am sure members of parliament will be most concerned and alert to make sure this is not the sort of thing that can happen frequently, that can happen often, and with or without a lot of soul searching and thorough investigation by the department.

In a country where our system of law is based on the premise that it is better that ten guilty men should go free than that one innocent man should be punished, it seems to me almost incredible that we can have so many people held so long in jail, with so little explanation. These are my introductory remarks.

May I call it five o'clock.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if the committee would be disposed not to see the clock for a few minutes? Is there a disposition on the part of the opposition groups to have the interim supply bill dealt with either by not seeing the clock for a few minutes or by waiving the private members' hour?

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: May I suggest consideration be given to that when the Speaker is in the chair.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the committee have leave to sit again, later this day or the next sitting of the house as the case may be?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the house would consider continuing with the interim supply resolution and bill with a view to concluding them tonight?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of a number of members in this group to have considerable discussion on the matter raised by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona and we certainly expect the minister to answer in considerable detail, because we are far from satisfied, in fact we are completely dissatisfied with the answers we have had up to now. Therefore I am certain we would not finish it even by six o'clock today, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, perhaps my point was a little misunderstood. I was not asking hon. members to waive their right to discuss a rather important question that had been raised; I intended to ask whether they would consider letting this interim supply bill go through and discuss this matter—which will merit, I gather, a rather lengthy and full discussion—on another occasion, either on the main estimates or at some other time that could be arranged.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, how can we answer that question unless the minister can give us some idea as to when "some other time" will be. If "some other time" is going to be next week or two weeks from now, perhaps we should think about it; but if "some other time" is going to be next September, of course we could not agree to that.

Mr. McIlraith: I would think we could arrange to call the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration first, Mr. Speaker. I wanted to check to make sure they were in, but this has been verified. We could discuss this matter on the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, if they were called first.

Mr. Churchill: When?

Mr. McIlraith: I do not know how to make it more firm than that, because with the flag debate starting next week surely it is not suggested that I should fix a day now. We have tried to follow a pattern of getting the estimates forward for discussion—and it is becoming increasingly necessary that we do so—on suitable occasions. I would certainly go as far as indicating that the first estimates called would be those of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, if that is agreeable to all hon. members.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has announced that we will be starting the flag debate on Monday and then we have the constitutional amendment to consider. I have no intention of speaking in the flag debate, but I have a feeling that a large number of members will want to speak in it; therefore this question may not come up for weeks. In any case, while it is the only matter on which I would like to speak, I am sure there are other matters on which other members would like to speak. It does seem to me that if the government wanted this kind of arrangement it should have been discussed among those people who usually discuss these things and agreement reached—but not at five o'clock on Friday afternoon. I am not disposed to agree, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McIlraith: I appreciate the hon. member's difficulty, Mr. Speaker, but it is not usual on interim supply to enter into a discussion of the general administration of the department, even though the matter may be considered important. I wonder if it would be agreeable to hon. members to continue the discussion on interim supply now and see whether that part the hon. member urgently wants to raise is dealt with today. Then perhaps the remainder of the points hon. members wish to raise could be dealt with when the main estimates are called.

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Speaker, I want to deal with another matter on interim supply, which may or may not take more than five minutes. I want to deal with the question of the order of business of the house, which may take me about five minutes; but there may be other hon. members who are interested in the same subject, and this I do not know.

PRIVILEGE

MR. TREMBLAY—ARTICLE APPEARING IN TORONTO NEWSPAPERS

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a serious question of privilege which affects me as minister of the crown responsible for the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and which also affects members of this house and the public in general. It concerns a statement which appears in today's issue of a Toronto newspaper which reads as follows:

> I asked if the minister had read the Telegram report that official transcripts supplied to a defence lawyer had been tampered with, and two questions and answers deleted.
> Yes, Mr. Tremblay had read that. He investigated it, he said, and was satisfied that this was not so.
> How, I asked, could he be sure his officials were supplying him with the full story.
> If documents were being edited and awkward bits being deleted, in material supplied to the Supreme Court of Ontario, why should those responsible hesitate to keep back information from the minister?
> [Mr. Orlikow.]
> For the first time, Mr. Tremblay's composure was ruffled. "What reason do you have for thinking that might happen?" he asked.
> "Only that there was evidence to indicate it had happened to one document at least, and perhaps two", I replied. And Mr. Tremblay said he would look into that again.

The author of this article visited me in my office last night, the 11th of June. In the course of discussion reference was made to a previous allegation made by his newspaper that documents had been altered. He was informed that this allegation had been carefully checked and had been disproved. The author then undertook to provide me this morning with evidence that various documents were being altered and that I was not receiving true information from my officials in Toronto. If any such charge could be substantiated it would be a serious matter to the department and to me. To this moment he has produced no such evidence and I am therefore entitled to assert that the charge is not only unsubstantiated but mischievous.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills, private bills.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

PROVISION OF MINIMUM RATE OF WAGES FOR EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-36, to provide for minimum wages for employees in federal works, undertakings and businesses.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the explanatory note to this bill sets out its purpose rather clearly. It reads as follows:

> The purpose of this bill is to establish a minimum rate of wages with respect to all employees in Canada who come under federal labour jurisdiction. This bill provides that such minimum rate of wages shall be $1.25 per hour. The bill also provides that its terms do not affect any employee whose rate of wages is higher than the minimum established by this legislation. However, any rate of wages less favourable to employees than $1.25 per hour is superseded by this bill.

About a quarter to five I went up to the cafeteria to have a cup of tea. As often happens when one goes there, one finds oneself sitting opposite a favourite newspaper reporter, and that was my experience today. After I had had my cup of tea I said I would have to leave and get down to the house to move my minimum wage bill. His reply was "Pardon me if I don't come down; I've heard that one before". I asked him how old he was; I think he knew what was coming. He said: "I am only 35". Of course, the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) knows what my reply was. I said: "Yes, this matter has been the subject of discussion in the political life of Canada for at least 10 years longer than you have been alive." And that is the situation, Mr. Speaker.

I realize my hon. friends opposite get tired of hearing about 1919, but it is still one of the facts of Canada's history that in that year the Liberals made certain promises to the people of Canada, and one of those promises was for a national labour code. Here we are 45 years later and we still have not got it. I wonder where this myth got started that the Liberals are a progressive outfit; that the Liberals are the people who will do things for Canada. When one looks at their record, one realizes that they are just about the slowest moving aggregation known to political science.

Miss LaMarsh: Give us another ten members.

Mr. Knowles: What an interjection to come from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh). She did not have the experience of sitting in this house when the Liberals had an overwhelming majority. But I have had that experience, and they did not move any faster when they had an overwhelming majority than they do now when they are in a minority position. As a matter of fact, in this minority position they feel the prodding even more sharply than when in a majority position. I suggest that it is a subject for study by the political scientists in this country as to how the myth ever got started and how it has ever been maintained that the Liberals are a progressive people, moving in the direction of progressive social legislation. I said they were the slowest moving aggregation known to political science. In fact they do not move at all. After 45 years we are still waiting for most of what they promised in 1919.

I know what the answer will be today to my proposal for a national labour code. I can see it on the face of the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Labour. He is going to say: "Does the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre not know that this was mentioned in the speech from the throne; that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) promised it in his speech on the address; and that the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) confirmed the promise?" Three or four times since, during the session, we have been told that a national labour code is going to be brought in by this beneficent Liberal government. Well, we have had these promises through the years. The Minister of National Health and Welfare made a delightful interjection a moment ago. I think of what happened after the election in connection with the Canada pension plan and of the promises we were assured would materialize on the statute books last session. Those promises were repeated this session, but so far we are still waiting. However, today we are discussing one of the elements of a national labour code, and I submit it is not good enough for the Liberals to keep on fooling the people of Canada that somehow, if the people will stick with them, they will get some of this legislation.

I was tempted at the start of this session, even though I filed all my bills which are part of a national labour code, to let them stand in view of the clear cut promise the government had made. But here we are on the 83rd day of the session and there is no suggestion of a national labour code on the order paper in any way, shape or form. There have been conferences, and no doubt the parliamentary secretary will tell me about the conferences which have been held between the Department of Labour and representatives of provincial departments of labour. He will tell me that there are all sorts of involvements and complications which have to be worked out, that these have to be studied, and that one of these days these problems will all be resolved and we will get the legislation. We will also be told that the government does not like to see this done in a piecemeal sort of way and that it is a mistake on my part to bring in a bill regarding vacations with pay on one occasion, a bill regarding statutory holidays with pay on another occasion, and a bill regarding minimum wages on still another. I am sorry I am taking away the hon. member's speech; I can see it vanishing from his face as well as from his notes. But, Mr. Speaker, we have listened to this time after time when the Liberals were on that side of the house.

It was, of course, different when they were sitting on this side of the house. When I moved this very bill now before the house in the last parliament, who was the member to stand up and speak strongly for it and say it was good legislation and should be supported? It was the then hon. member for Inverness-Richmond, now the Minister of Labour. This is interesting. It is a nice political in-and-out playing of the game, but it is not good enough for the people of Canada. It is part of a gigantic hoax which the Liberal party has been perpetrating on the people across the years, and if it is going to be true to its promise of 45 years ago, true to the promise of the Minister of Labour which he made on November 8 of last year, which was made in the speech from the throne, and true to all the promises which have been made, in view of the fact that this measure is not yet on the order paper the least the government can do, the least step it can take to show that it has some concern for its promises, would be to let this bill have second reading today and refer it to the industrial relations committee so that that committee can start studying the various elements of a national labour code. I think that this should happen to all of the bills I have on the order paper relating to this subject. I submit that if the government does not do that, it means that its promises about the things which really matter are not taken as seriously as some other promises which it seems anxious to push along, despite the difficulties which might be created.

I do not need to go into the details of this bill. Everyone knows what a national minimum wage would involve. It would involve setting a figure and declaring that no employees coming under federal labour jurisdiction should be paid a rate of wages less than the amount in this bill, namely $1.25 an hour. This has been a figure advocated for a number of years by the Canadian Labour Congress. At the recent convention of the Canadian Labour Congress, which the Minister of Labour attended—he promised that a labour code would be brought in at this session. That was only a few weeks ago, however, and I do not expect action that fast from the slow moving Liberals—at that convention the congress had before it a proposal that the amount asked for be $1.50 an hour. That proposal was one of those left over at the end of the convention and it was referred by the convention to executive council of the Canadian Labour Congress. I believe this proposal will be endorsed by the council and that $1.50 will become official policy as far as the Canadian Labour Congress is concerned. I suggest that this is a more realistic figure for today, and if I do not get this bill through this year, the next time I bring it in the amount indicated will be $1.50 an hour.

[Mr. Knowles.]

This bill cannot, of course, apply to all the workers in Canada. It can only apply to those who come under federal labour jurisdiction. Nine tenths of our workers come under provincial jurisdiction. In some provinces minimum wage legislation is in effect—not very advanced, as yet—but some of us feel that if we put appropriate legislation on the federal statute books it would give a lead to the provincial governments and we could move along in giving this kind of protection to our people.

All parties in the house are committed to advanced labour legislation and to this particular item of labour legislation, namely a minimum wage rate, and I hope that because we all believe in it and because there is no other such proposal on the order paper at this time either in the name of the government or anyone else, the house will be fair and let this bill have second reading today, upon which I would move that it be referred to the standing committee on industrial relations.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): At the risk of violating the rule against repetition I should like to make my speech. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has referred to the promises made by the Liberal party over many years. I think he realizes, despite his misgivings, that practically all the good social welfare legislation which is on the statute books today both federal and provincial has been brought in by the Liberal administrations.

As he himself has said, nine tenths of those employed in Canada today come under the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities. We attach a great deal of importance to this proposed legislation. I have made some extensive notes and I am sure the house will be prepared to forgive me if I take some time to explain the difficulties which arise when legislation of general application is introduced in Canada, that is, legislation encompassing the whole of our territory from Newfoundland to Victoria, or Vancouver island. As the hon. member said earlier, there is no question about it; the Minister of Labour will be introducing legislation which will embody this minimum wage provision and other labour standards legislation.

Mr. Knowles: What year?

Mr. Byrne: My information is that it is before the officials of the Department of Justice for drafting and should appear before what is normally termed the summer holiday.

I have on other occasions pointed out that these are extremely complex problems and must be considered in the light of their effect on private industry and regional differentials. The government has therefore been giving this matter serious and urgent consideration. This does require considerable time to expound and, certainly, the hour allotted to private members' legislation would be completely inadequate to deal with this question in detail.

The government's proposed legislation, as is I believe the case with the hon. member's proposal, anticipates covering all industries under federal jurisdiction including transportation and communication, banks, grain elevators and feed mills, crown corporations and so on. And, of course, it would be expected that it would have application to all those employed by the government itself. In total, about 11 per cent of the non-agricultural force would, therefore, be covered.

Industries within the federal jurisdiction are for the most part relatively high wage industries. It is estimated that some 50,000 workers out of a total of about 550,000 within federal jurisdiction currently receive wages of less than $1.25 per hour. This represents about 1 per cent of Canada's non-agricultural labour force.

While complete statistics are not available as to the number of workers within provincial jurisdiction who earn less than $1.25 an hour—

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question? Since he has just said that that figure is roughly 10 per cent of the federal labour force, does he think it is fair to say it is 1 per cent of the total? He should compare like with like.

Mr. Byrne: I do not know that I understand the hon. member's question correctly, but this 10 per cent does represent about 1 per cent of the total labour force.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member created the impression that the passing of this legislation will affect only 1 per cent of the total work force in Canada. But it would affect 10 per cent of those covered by federal labour legislation, and could it not be presumed that this kind of legislation would, if enacted generally affect 10 per cent of the total working force of Canada?

Mr. Byrne: The hon. member can make his argument if he wishes. I am sorry he did not find time to do that when he was talking about former Liberal promises. Perhaps next time he will deal with this matter in more detail.

The field of provincial jurisdiction includes many high wage industries, but it also includes a number of low wage industries. Industries such as bakeries, food canning, confectionery, dairy products, leather footwear, clothing, textiles, saw and planing mills, retail trade and some of the service industries including laundries, hotels and restaurants employ substantial numbers of workers at rates below $1.25 per hour.

Mr. Winch: Aren't you ashamed of that?

Mr. Byrne: Yes, there is no doubt that $1.25 is a very low rate indeed, and it is difficult to understand how individuals and families are able to live on such a rate. At the same time, it is the provinces which are responsible for setting minimum wages in these areas. I think the hon. member will agree that even in Saskatchewan we have not yet arrived at $1.75 an hour as a minimum rate of general application.

It is estimated that the immediate cost to the employers directly affected would be approximately $17 million in one year. Of this immediate increase, about one third would likely be borne by the banks with whom, I am sure, not many members are likely to feel much sympathy. They could absorb part or all of the increased costs by transforming year-end bonuses to the payment of higher rates of wages. There may be, however, important secondary cost effects through the impact of this legislation on the wage structure of the economy. It is not possible to make an estimate of these secondary cost effects but it is thought by some people secondary effects could be significant. These are the people, of course, who are opposed to the suggestion that there be a minimum wage established. Surely the establishment of a minimum wage standard and, for that matter, better working conditions for Canadians, is a highly desirable objective. But the matter must be approached with a certain amount of caution; otherwise serious consequences and dislocations do result. I am sure the hon. member has noted that just the other day in Ontario it was necessary to revoke an order for $1 an hour, I believe, and reduce it to 85 cents so that messengers would continue in their jobs.

While many workers within the field of federal jurisdiction are members of labour unions, there are also many who are not covered by labour legislation or who do not enjoy the protection of a union. Each of the provinces has extensive minimum standards legislation applying to labour within its own jurisdiction, but with some gaps. In addition, there is a significant gap not covered by minimum wage legislation within the field of federal jurisdiction. I am certainly hopeful and feel quite sure that this will be attended to within the next few months.

Some of the industries covered by the hon. member's proposal could probably absorb the consequent increased labour costs through increased efficiency or a marginal reduction in costs. But to the extent that the wage increases go to persons who would use their increased income to buy goods, there is no question that there would be a stimulus to the economy.

The view has been advanced by opponents of the minimum wage that the introduction of such a proposal would encourage wage increases and the extension of fringe benefits throughout the country. Such a move, it is said, could be interpreted as placing the authority and the prestige of the federal government behind those who would be seeking so-called excessive increases. It is said that if this were to occur it would affect our competitive position at home and abroad at a time when it is vital for the Canadian economy to maintain and extend its ability to compete.

It is my opinion that the extension of such legislation as we anticipate, and as is anticipated by the hon. member, would set a desirable pattern and I believe it should be pressed forward. I doubt that a minimum of $1.25 an hour would lead to any excessive demands, and I am sure hon. members agree that this is a very basic minimum.

Mr. Knowles: It is really too low.

Mr. Byrne: On the other hand, few rates in industries organized by unions are as low as $1.25 an hour, so that it can be argued that it would be difficult for unions to use the introduction of federal legislation as a basis for raising wages already above that minimum.

In Canada most negotiations take place at the local level. They are concerned with the problems and experiences of workers in these local areas and at local levels. The parties involved in the bargaining usually pay attention to the factors that govern their local situations and, of course, the ability of the industry to pay. In these circumstances it would seem that the introduction of a federal minimum wage would not be a determining factor in evoking wage increases, except where other factors warranted such increases.

Apart from its possible effect on collective bargaining, federal legislation would have an important impact on wages outside federal jurisdiction if it led to extending higher provincial minimum standards. The provincial governments of Canada have set minimum labour standards over a wider range than is proposed in this bill. The rates for some industries are higher than proposed in this bill, but all provincial minimum rates of general application are lower and in many cases substantially lower. In this regard I would draw attention to the province of Saskatchewan and some of the maritime provinces. In the province of British Columbia, of course, the standards are a little higher and they have a minimum rate for construction of $2 an hour.

Generally speaking low wage industries in Canada come under provincial jurisdiction which help to explain the fact, as I have said earlier, that there have not been greater demands for legislation in the federal field. Provincial orders of general application set minimum wages varying from 50 cents an hour in Newfoundland to $1 an hour in the Toronto-Oshawa-Hamilton zone of Ontario. Orders applicable to particular industries are generally higher, ranging from 60 cents an hour for hotels and restaurants outside metropolitan Montreal in the province of Quebec to $2 an hour for the construction trades in the province of British Columbia. The impact which the passage of federal legislation might have on provincial standards would depend in part at least on the strength of the consideration each province would give to its particular economic situation and its social needs before advancing its standards.

It has been suggested by other opponents that legislation providing for minimum hourly wages of $1.25, the same as exist in the United States, will be regarded by some people as an indication of parliamentary support for wage parity between Canada and the United States. At the present time wage differentials between Canada and the United States are in the order of 15 to 25 per cent over a wide range of industries, and this situation has prevailed virtually throughout our history. It is true that these wage differentials help certain branches of Canadian industry to overcome competitive advantages enjoyed by large scale firms in the United States.

The area covered by federal jurisdiction in the United States is much broader than in Canada. United States federal legislation covers many traditionally low wage industries which in Canada come under provincial jurisdiction. Therefore federal minimum wage legislation in Canada is not comparable to federal legislation in the United States.

The view has been advanced that an increase in costs to import competing industries, some of which such as clothing and textiles pay low wages, would limit the ability of such industries to compete with imports. Moreover, some of the increased costs of services to export industries, it has been suggested, could result in higher export prices, thus tending to reduce rather than expand exports, with consequent significant balance of payments implications. At the same time it should be noted that Canada's export industries fall mostly under provincial jurisdiction and that for the most part these industries already pay wages well above the minimum proposed in this legislation. The introduction of this legislation should thus have little or no effect on exports, even if the provincial minimum wage rates were to be raised to the federal level.

To the extent that the introduction of federal minimum wage legislation would tend to equalize minimum wage and other labour standards throughout the country, this of course could have adverse effects for those regions of the country badly in need of new industries and employment opportunities. It is widely believed that lower wage costs in these less developed regions are an important element in helping them to attract new industries in competition with the more favourably placed regions of Canada. But such is a spurious argument in my opinion and should hold no place in long range Liberal planning.

Mr. Knowles: "Long range" is right. Well put.

Mr. Byrne: But to allay such existing fears it can be argued that the effect of federal legislation on regional differentials would not be very great. The legislation would provide standards for minimum wages and its effect on average wages in any province would be limited. If this turned out to be the case, existing differentials in average wages would not be seriously disturbed. Moreover, it is sometimes held that the value of low wages to regions of slow growth is open to question.

Existing industries in these areas have frequently suffered from poor organization, antiquated methods, inefficient labour and as a result low productivity. It is essential in some cases to improve the quality of the labour output as a means of achieving higher productivity. To the extent higher wages and other improved labour standards can promote efficiency and increase income, the underdeveloped regions would be stimulated.

Members, in the true spirit of co-operative federalism, I am sure would want to consider the fears of provincial legislators and the relations with the provinces in any subsequent discussions we may have. Some provincial ministers of industry have referred to the difficulties that would arise for the provinces if scales of salaries and wages paid by the federal government did not take account of regional differences. Provincial standards applicable to industries in general, where they exist, are appreciably lower than the proposed federal levels. As mentioned earlier, some rates for particular industries are higher. Moreover, in many provinces the minimum wage legislation sets out rates for different regions within each province.

For these reasons, some provinces may feel that the introduction of a high general minimum standard for all industries under federal jurisdiction, regardless of their location, would place those provinces in a rather difficult position. On the other hand, the power of the federal government to legislate in this area is quite clear. Some provinces have, in the past, pointed out the administrative difficulties arising from the absence of legislation covering industries within provincial boundaries but under federal jurisdiction.

Now, having regard to the intense study given this question by officials, members of the government and the hon. member himself, I am sure the hon. member, if he will have patience, will find that the proposed labour standard legislation introduced by the government of Canada will incorporate most, if not all, the objectives he has in mind in considering Bill No. C-36. I am sure the hon. member will agree also that this legislation must be kept in perspective and in relation to all the other standards that will be introduced, having regard to the cost and the effect on the provinces and the various regions of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. G. C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is perfectly aware that in the province of Saskatchewan, which was until recently administered by the hon. member's good friends, the minimum weekly salary is about $34 for 44 hours of work, or approximately 76 or 77 cents an hour. This proves, to some extent, that the problem does not only concern the federal government but also the provincial authorities.

Even if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre seems to be introducing most of the bills concerning labour standards, it does not mean that his party is the only one in the house interested in labour conditions, for the Liberal party has been pioneering in that field, but without putting the cart before the horse. That is what makes the difference, from a political standpoint, between the two parties. And the workers know they can depend on the Liberal party, because its past record is a guarantee of its future policies.

The hon. member is well aware that, in the near future, the government intends to introduce in this house a complete program of labour legislation covering all the most urgent problems and designed to establish minimum wage rates, minimum working hours, statutory holidays and other working standards for establishments under federal jurisdiction.

Those measures were announced in the speech from the throne and repeated in many circumstances both by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen).

As a matter of fact, in a statement made to the delegates of the Canadian Labour Congress assembled in Montreal, on April 21, 1964, the Prime Minister said:

> In addition to the pension legislation, the federal government intends to undertake other projects in the field of social welfare and labour, matters which are of particular interest to this congress. Among those problems, the one dealing with work standards has been too long neglected.

The Prime Minister stated that the Minister of Labour would say more a little later, and that is when the Minister of Labour, who followed the Prime Minister, stated:

> Parliament will be asked during this session to set up national labour standards "in order to set a good example in that field".

Mr. Speaker, all that is in accordance with the Liberal party platform which was published and distributed from coast to coast during the last election campaign.

The government is fully aware, not only of its promises, but also of its responsibilities, and it has no intention to legislate out of hand in so important and so serious a matter.

I can assure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that a quite important committee made up of Liberal hon. members meets regularly to discuss those problems and that members of that committee are fully aware of the needs of the working class. They are also conscious of the many problems to which the passing of a new legislation in that field will give rise.

It should be considered that provincial governments, while being favourable to legislation designed to set a reasonable minimum wage, do not seem very enthusiastic as regards setting a minimum rate of $1.25 per hour, the effect of which would be to upset, for some time, certain sectors of the economy.

Of course, we should consider all the problems that could result from this legislation, the problem of service contracts, or manufacturing contracts. I know that certain industries, in several provinces, operate factories outside the large urban centres and, therefore, are favoured with cheaper labour. We should not take offence at that situation, since such legislation has enabled certain regions far from large centres to become industrialized and has prevented an exodus towards large cities.

If the minimum rate of $1.25 an hour is extended to all regions, there is reason to believe that industries established in remote places, away from the larger cities, will no longer benefit from any advantages, because then they will be faced with transportation costs which will no longer be compensated by payroll savings.

Far be it from me to be against a minimum rate of $1.25 but we must face the facts, and those are problems which must be discussed and examined thoroughly before setting up legislation for that purpose.

Until now the federal government has had limited responsibility as far as salaries are concerned, and that because of the 1935 legislation and other similar ones, even dating back to 1907.

Every province has legislated in the field of minimum wages, but wages offer a great deal of variation and very little similarity.

There is no doubt that the introduction by the federal government of minimum wage standards would help to equalize incomes, and would promote a better distribution of goods and a higher purchasing power.

Therefore, the principle of the minimum wage being accepted, at what amount should it be set?

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre introduced a bill suggesting a minimum wage of $1.25 an hour. In a year or two it might have to be increased to $1.50. But on the basis of the present situation, it must be admitted that this figure of $1.25 would settle certain difficulties and would materially improve a serious situation.

A while ago, I was saying that in Saskatchewan the minimum rate is $34 a week. If you examine the situation in the other provinces, you will see that in Newfoundland, the standard is 50 cents an hour for men and 35 cents for women; in Prince Edward Island, it is 90 cents an hour. The situation in Nova Scotia is rather unusual in that only female employees are mentioned; it is set at $21.60 per week in centres of more than 8,000 population, but it is much lower in smaller communities. In New Brunswick, the minimum rate is 60 cents an hour and, in Quebec, it is 70 cents an hour in certain areas, including the district of Montreal, and 64 cents in the rest of the province. In Ontario, the standard is $1 an hour; in Manitoba, 70 cents; in Saskatchewan, $34 for a 44-hour week, and $34 a week in Alberta.

Most Canadian provinces have minimum wages which are much lower than the said minimum of $1.25.

It has also been mentioned that some 50,000 employees would benefit from such increase in minimum wages. If, for example, minimum wages were increased to $1.10, some 23,000 employees would benefit.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, $1.25 per hour is fair and reasonable under the present circumstances.

How does the government intend to set minimum wages at $1.25 per hour? As I said earlier, there are several problems and I mentioned, for example, that of small industries situated outside large urban centres.

As I said before, those small industries have often established themselves in those places because labour was cheap there. We should not forget that it was that cheap labour which made possible the industrialization of those areas.

I come back to the point I raised earlier. If a minimum salary of $1.25 an hour was set for the whole of Canada, it would not only tend to reduce the number of industries in some parts of the country, but also induce an exodus of workers towards large cities.

The government is conscious of those problems. As far as I am concerned, I know about them personally because I have studied them carefully. I am sure that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is also aware of the situation.

We must consider here the whole problem concerning the standard rights of the workers.

Since the government stated repeatedly its desire to introduce general legislation on those problems, I think that all the main problems mentioned in the address in reply to the speech from the throne should be taken into consideration.

Indeed, it would be to no avail to submit piecemeal legislation to be brought before the house.

I can assure you Mr. Speaker, that the promises made by the Liberal party during the last election will be carried out and that every Canadian will benefit therefrom and, of course, will be pleased.

But, the legislation which the government may introduce will not satisfy the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, nor his party. As I said before, they are people who love to put the cart before the horse. They are men in the van, and we need men like that. I admire them for their optimism—

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: We want to get out of the horse and cart age.

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: I can assure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that, in the end, the cart will certainly run very well, even if the horse is before it, and not behind it.

I have had the opportunity of studying those problems seriously for some time. I think that the freedom of the labour unions —which until now was the cornerstone of our system with regard to workers' rights— to promote better labour standards is still the best weapon to help workers solve their problems.

I feel that there is good reason to be satisfied. According to the figures given by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Byrne), you will note that there is only a small number of workers whose salary is lower than that minimum. It must be remembered that, in some cases, for instance hotel and restaurant employees, not one hon. member believes that those people get only the minimum wage prescribed by the act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The hour for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the acting house leader with regard to the business for next week. We are aware that the resolution pertaining to the two flags is to be considered on Monday. Is it the intention of the government to have that debate continue without interruption during the course of next week?

Mr. MacNaught: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member I must say the only interruption will be if the constitutional amendment is ready to go before the house.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, June 15, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CAOUETTE—C.B.C. INTERVIEW WITH CREDITISTE MEMBER ON FLAG ISSUE

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege to protest strongly against what the C.B.C. did over the week end.

Last Friday several hon. members from both sides of the house were invited to take part in interviews so they could voice their opinions on the Canadian flag.

Now, the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau), who is a member of our group, took part in an interview which was recorded Saturday evening at ten thirty. All political parties were represented and their views were aired on the public television network, except that those people forgot to present the opinions of the hon. member for Shefford.

Mr. Speaker, I strongly protest against the arbitrary manner in which the C.B.C. eliminated a member of any group in the House of Commons.

I have no objection to all parties having the opportunity of expressing their views, but I strongly object because members of our group were denied the same opportunity as others.

I would ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Lamontagne) to inquire into the reasons why the hon. member for Shefford was prevented from making his views known on the C.B.C. television network last Saturday night.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Second report of standing committee on privileges and elections—Mr. Pennell.

STANDING ORDERS—CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT

Mr. Robert Temple (Hastings South) moved that the second report of the standing committee on standing orders, presented to the house on Wednesday, June 10, 1964, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

LAND EXCHANGE, QUEBEC-NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 879—Mr. Lambert:

1. Has the government of Canada received any representations or communications from the government of either Quebec or Newfoundland with respect to presenting a petition to the parliament of Britain, so as to pave the way for an exchange of lands between the two provinces in Labrador and Ungava and, if so, what is the nature of such representations or communications?

2. What has been the reply by the government of Canada?

Mr. Davis: 1. No.

2. Not applicable.

CANADIAN MEMBERSHIP IN FAO

Question No. 987—Mr. Latulippe:

1. Is Canada a member of the world food and agriculture organization and, if so (a) since what date (b) how much does membership cost this country (c) what have been the main Canadian contributions to this organization?

2. What government department is responsible for Canadian participation in this organization?

[Translation]

Answer: 1. Canada is a member of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization.

(a) Since the organization was founded, following the first conference of F.A.O., in Quebec in 1945.

(b) Canada's contribution was $645,679.11 for 1963 and $796,687.54 for 1964.

(c) Canada being one of the main producing and exporting countries in the agricultural field, and with regard to the fishing and forest industries, is giving support to F.A.O. and its various activities. Canada is a member of the F.A.O. council, of the products committee and other subsidiary agencies and branches of the food and agricultural organization.

2. Under the food and agriculture organization of the United Nations Act of 1945, the Secretary of State has to report every year to parliament on Canada's participation in F.A.O. Canada's share concerns several departments, which are represented at the interdepartmental committee of F.A.O. under the chairmanship of a senior official of the Department of Agriculture.

Questions

*CONSTRUCTION OF PENITENTIARY, DRUMHELLER, ALTA.

Question No. 1,071—Mr. Woolliams:

1. When will the construction of the Drumheller penitentiary (institution for young offenders) commence?
2. Will this institution be especially designed in every regard for the purpose of rehabilitating young offenders and, if so (a) what is the plan in this regard, and (b) what program will be followed?
3. From what provinces will young offenders be placed in the institution?
4. How many young offenders, under 21 years of age, are now incarcerated in penitentiaries in Canada?
5. How many are incarcerated under 15 years of age?
6. What age is the youngest prisoner in Canada?

Mr. Macdonald: 1. The construction of the Drumheller institution is expected to commence in October 1964.

2. The Drumheller institution has been designed specifically in every regard for the purpose of rehabilitating young offenders.

(a) The plan is to construct an institution of medium security based on the principles of the most up to date concepts of the correctional process, which will incorporate the required facilities for young offenders from western provinces and certain selected adult first offenders.

(b) The program will be based on the principle of individual attention, using diagnostic processes from social, medical and psychological points of view; and will include the following elements: education, vocational training, religious observance and spiritual guidance, social education (citizenship training), physical education and recreation, cultural activities and hobbycrafts, guidance and counselling.

3. From Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

4. 1,091 inmates under 21 years of age are now incarcerated in penitentiaries in Canada.

5. One inmate is under 15 years of age.

6. The youngest prisoner in a federal penal institution in Canada is of 14 years and eight months of age.

NEW CANADIAN FLAGS FOR NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Question No. 1,095—Mr. Leboe:

Has any department, agency, or commission of the federal government ordered new Canadian flags for Canadian government property or institutions in the Northwest Territories and, if so (a) did boxes or cartons labelled "new Canadian flag, made in U.S.A." shipped to northern points, actually contain new flags (b) what are the prime features of these flags?

Mr. Lamontagne: In so far as the Department of Public Works is concerned: yes, newly manufactured Canadian red ensigns have recently been sent to the Northwest Territories.

(a) No. The flags in question were contained in boxes marked Canadiana Textile Print Works Ltd., Port Credit, Ontario.

(b) Canadian red ensigns of light weight silk screen nylon, complete with ropes and toggles to commercial standards.

The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources has purchased flags from Canadian suppliers for direct shipment to various settlements in the north. Departmental records do not indicate the specific labelling which may have appeared on cartons provided by the suppliers, and contain no other information bearing on this question. Where flags are purchased for, or used on departmental installations, the design is in accordance with the established practice respecting official flags.

PENITENTIARY CONSTRUCTION, ST. PIE DE BAGOT, QUE.

Question No. 1,103—Mr. Ricard:

In connection with the proposed construction of a penitentiary at Grand Rang St. François in the parish of St. Pie de Bagot, what was the amount of money spent for the services of personnel from the departments of public works and justice, and for the services of outside professional people in connection with each of the following items (a) land appraisal (b) search for water (c) farm appraisal (d) various engineering jobs (e) various architectural jobs (f) various notarial tasks?

[Translation]

Answer: (a) and (c)—$1,161.10; (b)—$14,346.10; (d)—$3,145; (e)—$354.09; (f)—$1,062.42.

*H.M.C.S. "PROVIDER"

Question No. 1,168—Mr. Fisher:

1. What was the total cost of putting H.M.C.S. Provider into service?
2. Has the R.C.N. any distinction between the accounts to put the ship into service and the expenditures needed to correct any deficiencies and, if so, what is the estimated total of the latter costs?
3. Is H.M.C.S. Provider on a working up trip across the Atlantic and, if so, what purposes other than the general one of training have caused this exercise?

Mr. Cardin: 1. $16,850,000.

2. Yes. Trials have determined that some equipment was either deficient in performance or in need of some adjustment to provide for greater efficiency. As Provider is still conducting trials, the total amount to be spent on these deficiencies and adjustments is not yet completely known, but it is expected that a proportion of such costs will be borne by the shipbuilder under the terms of the warranty agreement.

3. Yes. In company with H.M.C.S. Yukon, Provider is carrying out trials to bring her replenishment system to a fully operational and worked up state, as well as carrying out fleet exercises. In addition, Provider will visit Newcastle-on-Tyne to instal certain items of replenishment equipment which are being replaced under warranty by the equipment manufacturer.

WORLD FAIR REGIONAL REPRESENTATIVES

Question No. 1,180—Mr. Latulippe:

1. How many regional representatives of the 1967 world exhibition have been appointed to date?
2. What are the names of those representatives?
3. What regions do they represent?
4. What are their general functions?
5. How many offices will be opened for those representatives?
6. Where and when will those offices be opened?
7. What amounts are provided toward the administration of those offices?
8. Is a special system of representation provided for with municipal councils by those regional offices for the purpose of municipalities participating to any program concerning the exhibition?
9. Have any Canadian embassies assigned personnel to promote the exhibition abroad?
10. Have the directors of the 1967 world exhibition corporation examined, or are they examining, the possibility of creating regional committees, for instance, one for the eastern townships, one for the northwest district of Quebec, in all provinces, in order that the whole of the Canadian population may participate?

[Translation]

Answer: 1. Three.

2. Allan A. Rowan-Legg, Squadron Leader T. J. MacKinnon and Major General Edward Chester Plow.

3. They do not represent any region in particular but rather the 1967 world exhibition in the following regions: Rowan-Legg: Ontario, Major General Plow: Atlantic provinces, MacKinnon: British Columbia.

4. In their respective regions, they will help the world exhibition by keeping in touch with exhibitors, looking after public relations and, during the exhibition, visitors to the exhibition on tour in Canada, especially important people and foreign businessmen.

5. Three for the abovementioned representatives and a fourth one in Winnipeg, for the prairies, in 1964. The opening of other offices is also contemplated.

6. Vancouver on June 15, 1964, Toronto on June 1, 1964, Halifax on June 15, 1964, Winnipeg has not been opened yet.

7. $173,000.

8. Proposals concerning the participation of municipalities as exhibitors are submitted to the provinces concerned. The corporation deals directly with local groups with regard to public relations.

9. Canada's embassies abroad have no personnel specially responsible for promoting the 1967 world exhibition, but all our ambassadors and high commissioners as well as their staff receive documentation about the exhibition and do their best to promote it in the countries where they are posted.

10. Yes, but only where the initiative is taken at the local level.

WINTER HOME CONSTRUCTION BONUS

Question No. 1,181—Mr. Starr:

1. How many qualified for the $500 bonus under the winter home construction program as of April 15, 1964, when this program ended?
2. What is the total cost of this program, including the $500 bonus?

Mr. MacEachen: 1. 28,000 dwelling units qualified under the winter house building incentive program.

2. The total cost of the program is estimated at $14,500,000. This covers the incentive payment and administration, including advertising costs and the cost of inspections carried out by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

NATIONAL REVENUE EMPLOYEES, COMPTON-FRONTENAC CONSTITUENCY, QUE.

Question No. 1,187—Mr. Latulippe:

1. How many customs officers or other employees of the department were dismissed or replaced in Compton-Frontenac since June 18, 1962, and (a) what was the name of each (b) what was the reason in each case?
2. How many persons have been newly employed in Compton-Frontenac by the Department of National Revenue since June 18, 1962 and, (a) what is the name of each such employee (b) what is the nature of each position, and (c) what is the salary paid to each?

[Translation]

Answer: 1. Strictly speaking, there were no dismissals, but an employee, Mr. Léo Lambert, part-time cleaner, was dismissed during his training period, because he was found unable to hold a job with the Department of National Revenue, customs and excise division.

Questions

Mr. J. A. F. Morin, customs and excise officer 3, died on August 18, 1963, and his position has been filled by the promotion of another employee.

2. Since June 18, 1962, the civil service commission appointed the following employees: Léo Lambert (see above), cleaner (part-time), $874; J. M. F. Rancourt, customs and excise officer 2 (seasonal), $3,150; K. P. Flanders, customs and excise officer 2 (seasonal), $4,230; J. A. C. Lessard, customs and excise officer 3 (transferred), $5,100.

* ACTION TO REPLENISH UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE FUND

Question No. 1,192—Mr. Ricard:

What action does the government intend to take to replenish the unemployment insurance fund, which had a deficit of nearly $26,000,000 in April, 1964?

Mr. Byrne: This has been taken care of in the supplementary estimates, which provided for the unemployment insurance fund to obtain loans not exceeding $55 million.

USE OF PESTICIDES IN CANADA

Question No. 1,206—Mr. Orlikow:

Are the pesticides aldrin, dieldrin and endrin, still being used in Canada and, if so, is the government giving consideration to reports that their use has caused the death of millions of fish in the Mississippi river in the United States?

Mr. Lamontagne: Aldrin, dieldrin and endrin insecticides are registered and are being used in Canada on a declining scale. Other insecticides that have advantages in use are tending to replace them. Information on the Mississippi river incident is carefully assessed, as it becomes available, for any possible implication in relation to Canadian conditions. Consideration is being given on a continuous basis to the effects on fish life of pesticides used on land and in forests.

CRANBERRY PORTAGE, MAN.—ASSISTANCE WITH MUNICIPAL DEBT

Question No. 1,221—Mr. Simpson:

1. Is the government considering financial assistance to the residents of Cranberry Portage, Manitoba, in relation to the very heavy debts with which they have been saddled in the matter of school debentures, which were negotiated in good faith on the continuance of the mid-Canada radar site at that location?

2. If not, will the government ensure that full consideration will be given to this matter at an early date?

Mr. Drury: 1 and 2. The whole question of the future of the mid-Canada radar site is presently being discussed with the Manitoba government. Such discussions, however, do not contemplate any payments.

HIGHWAY PAVING, GUYSBOROUGH COUNTY, N.S.

Question No. 1,227—Mr. Armstrong:

1. What contracts have been approved at any time by the federal government in connection with the construction and the paving of highways in Guysborough county, Nova Scotia, under the roads to resources program?

2. In the case of each contract, what has been, or is anticipated to be, the federal contribution?

Mr. Laing: 1 and 2.

WORLD FAIR—CONTRACTS FOR SOD

Question No. 1,232—Mr. Madill:

1. Were tenders called for the supply of sod for the site of the 1967 world exhibition and, if so (a) were they open to producers of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec (b) were any tenders received from producers of high quality sod in the province of Ontario (c) were tenders from producers in the province of Ontario competitive?

2. Has a decision been reached to award contracts to one or more British Columbia producers and, if so, has it been demonstrated that sod of a quality comparable to that available in the province of Ontario can be shipped from the province of British Columbia to the Montreal site at a competitive price?

Answer: 1. (a), (b), (c) Yes.

2. No.

IRON ORE PRODUCTION

Question No. 1,237—Mr. Tucker:

What was the total production of iron ore, in dollar value and in tons, in each province of Canada, from January 1 to December 31, 1963, inclusive?

Answer:

Iron Ore, 1963

RECIPIENTS OF UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE

Question No. 1,239—Mr. Orlikow:

As of May 1, 1964, how many people classified as employable unemployed were receiving assistance in each province under the provisions of the Unemployment Assistance Act?

Miss LaMarsh: Figures are not available on the number of employable unemployed covered by the sharing provisions of the Unemployment Assistance Act on May 1, 1964. The act does not require the provinces to provide data on this basis.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION SHIPBUILDING CONTRACTS

Question No. 1,241—Mr. MacEwan:

1. What was the total amount of contracts awarded by the shipbuilding branch of the Department of Defence Production from January 1, 1964, to May 31, 1964?

Questions

2. To what companies were these contracts awarded and what was the amount of same to each company?

VOCATIONAL TRAINING PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES

Question No. 1,245—Mr. Balcer:

1. Since 1960, what amount was received for each year, by province, under the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act?

2. Did any amendment or agreement made in 1963 permit the province of Quebec to recover, under the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act, amounts more closely related to those received by the province of Ontario?

Mr. MacEachen:

1. Province	1961-62	1962-63	1963-64
Newfoundland	$ 2,975,268	$ 13,194,166	$ 5,751,551
P.E.I.	200,063	975,257	1,730,467
N.S.	1,150,420	3,634,753	4,726,554

Totals	$35,729,623	$207,915,440	$136,431,968

2. Yes. An amendment to the agreement effective April 1, 1961 permits payment by the federal government of 75 per cent of provincial expenditures incurred on training facilities up to a specified maximum and 50 per cent thereafter to March 31, 1967. This specified maximum federal contribution of 75 per cent was determined by applying a per capita cost of $480 per person in the 15 to 19, inclusive, age group residing in each province as determined by the 1961 census. Under this formula the province of Quebec will be eligible to receive payments on a 75 per cent basis for training facilities up to $224,364,400. Ontario under the same formula is eligible to receive $209,703,800.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

RECOMMENDATIONS OF JOINT INDIAN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Question No. 868—Mr. Howard:

What action, in detail, has been taken with respect to each of the following recommendations of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Indian affairs:

"(a) The question of transferring health services for Indians to the provinces should be discussed at a dominion-provincial conference, but the present health program should be continued and extended until such time as this can be accomplished.

(b) Provincial welfare legislation and services should be used for the benefit of the Indian population.

(c) Social welfare should be placed on the agenda of a dominion-provincial conference with a view to transferring jurisdiction to the provinces.

(d) A substantially increased public investment should be made in Indian housing and sanitation facilities.

(e) A revolving loan fund for housing purposes should be established."?

Return tabled.

MOTOR VEHICLE PURCHASES, CAPE BRETON NORTH AND VICTORIA CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 882—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

1. Since April 8, 1963, what government departments have purchased motor vehicles for use in the constituency of Cape Breton North and Victoria?

2. In regard to each purchase, what firms were invited to tender, what were the names of the firms that did tender, who was the successful tenderer and what was the amount, and what were the amounts of the tenders of all others who tendered?

Return tabled.

LEVEL CROSSINGS, COMPTON-FRONTENAC CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 1,144—Mr. Latulippe:

1. How many level crossings are there in Compton-Frontenac?
2. How many accidents have occurred at these crossings in the last five years?
3. Where did each such accident occur?
4. In each case, what was the number of persons killed, seriously injured, slightly injured, and what was the amount of material damage?
5. How many signal lights have been installed in Compton-Frontenac in the last five years?
6. What is the number of signal lights in Compton-Frontenac, and where is each located?

Return tabled.

* H.M.C.S. "BONAVENTURE"

Question No. 1,169—Mr. Fisher:

1. Does the government plan to modernize the aircraft carrier H.M.C.S. Bonaventure within the next two years and, if so, what is the estimated cost of the modernization?
2. In the time interval before a complete modernization, is there any intention to spend any money in rectifying present defects in the ship or to reduce the maintenance backlog or to prepare specifications for the modernization and, if so, what is the estimate for these expenditures?
3. How long will the Bonaventure be out of service in the interval before modernization begins?
4. Has there been any shortage in personnel on the H.M.C.S. Bonaventure in the past two years in so far as the establishment for technicians is concerned and, if so, what are the details?
5. What has been the repair and maintenance cost of the Bonaventure, year by year, since its acquisition by the R.C.N.?
6. What is the estimated service life of the Bonaventure?

Return tabled.

TRADE

WHEAT—POSSIBLE REDUCTION IN SALES TO RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is related to a news dispatch in today's New York Times from the correspondent in Moscow to the effect that prospects of a normal wheat crop in the Soviet union will result in no further purchases being made, except for nominal amounts, of Canadian wheat in the coming year. Can the minister say whether he has any information in this regard and whether there is any basis, which I hope there is not, for the article in question?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, my understanding of the position is that the Russian government are not at all clear, so early in the season, as to their ultimate supply position and are awaiting clarification before deciding whether they will buy wheat from any part of the world.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Can the minister say whether there has been any indication to Canada that there now is uncertainty in this regard on the part of the Russian government?

Mr. Sharp: Well, Mr. Speaker, I would just say that there has never been anything but uncertainty in this regard, and no one has said anything else. The Russian government have made it quite clear that they would declare their intention to purchase next year after they had seen what crop prospects were like for the coming year.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has there been any indication to the Canadian government from the Russian government to the effect that, on the basis of anticipated returns at the present time, there is a possibility of a great reduction in the amount of Canadian purchases?

Mr. Sharp: The Canadian wheat board have been in constant communication with the Soviet government in connection with possible wheat purchases, and when the Russian government makes its decision it will communicate with the wheat board.

GATT—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, of which I have not given him notice. I understand the conference in Geneva is breaking up tomorrow. Could the minister give us any information as to the reconciliation of the viewpoints of the have-not countries and the have countries, which is so important to trade negotiations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I had an oral report from my officials this morning, which was rather incomplete. I would prefer to await the written report, and then I think

I would be able to satisfy my hon. friend as to what has come out of the conference.

Mr. Nowlan: I thank the minister.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MONTREAL—REPORTED WILDCAT STRIKE OF LONGSHOREMEN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour and ask him if there is any truth in the report that there is a wildcat walkout of longshoremen in the Montreal area. If so, what is being done to bring about a resumption of work?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Yes, there is a walkout in Montreal having to do with the adjustment in the pension fund. The commissioner appointed to settle the strike last fall is now undertaking to provide as quickly as possible an interim report that might be used as a basis for the resumption of work.

THE MINISTRY

APPOINTMENT OF EXECUTIVE ASSISTANTS IN HOME RIDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a question regarding the two orders in council passed appointing staff for two cabinet ministers to serve in the constituencies of the cabinet ministers in question. I ask the Prime Minister, is it the intention of the government to continue these orders in council in effect, and is it the intention of the government to extend this policy to cover other cabinet ministers?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Privy Council has already indicated that he is to make a full statement on this matter, and I hope he will be able to do so very shortly.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—EXTENSION OF PERIOD OF COMMITMENT OF CANADIAN FORCE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

[Mr. Sharp.]

Has the government reached a decision about continuing Canada's participation in the U.N. force now on Cyprus?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there will be a meeting of the United Nations' security council next Wednesday, I think after which I will be in a position to make a statement about that matter.

[Text]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

OTTAWA—REQUEST FOR X-RAY EXAMINATION OF POST OFFICE EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister received a request from employees of the Besserer street post office, Ottawa, for an immediate X-ray of all local employees to end the grave concern that a tuberculosis outbreak is imminent? If so, what is the minister's intention with respect to this request; and would she give consideration to arranging for X-rays of post office employees working under similar conditions in some of the larger post offices in Canada?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. friend for giving me notice of this question, but I do not as yet have the information. I would be glad to obtain it and reply to my hon. friend later.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CONTINUATION OF STUDIES BY FLQ MEMBERS IN PRISON

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice?

Can the minister tell us if his department has investigated the possibility of allowing the F.L.Q. members now serving time in St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary to keep up their studies while they are confined there?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is no particular urgency to this question. Would the hon. member put it on the order paper.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: In view of the fact that the prisoners started a hunger strike this morning to ensure the success of their request, I feel that the situation has become urgent and, considering the urgency of the situation at the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary and especially the fact that the other prisoners have expressed their sympathy, I would ask the Minister of Justice to have an investigation carried out.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have given a ruling, and the hon. member has the privilege of debating this at 10 o'clock if he wishes.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I ask this matter be taken up at ten o'clock, at which time we will not be deprived of our right to raise this issue.

[Text]

CANADIAN FLAG

SUGGESTED POSTPONEMENT OF DEBATE TO HOLD PLEBISCITE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister set aside the flag debate in view of the growing demand among Canadians for a national plebiscite, as evidenced by the 18,000 signatures affixed to a petition delivered to his office this forenoon?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope the debate will proceed in a few moments, when this will be one of the matters I will talk about.

Mr. Coates: As a supplementary question, is not this an indication that the Prime Minister does not care—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question is strictly out of order.

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): I have a question for the Minister of Justice, just a point of clarification. Is the flag which flies over the parliament buildings while parliament is in session recognized as the flag of the nation?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): This calls for a legal opinion and therefore goes against a rule of this house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ELIMINATION OF REFERENCE IN RESOLUTION TO UNION JACK

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Does he propose to remove the last part of the resolution concerning the union jack, so as not to induce members to scuttle the debate by making lengthy speeches?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: This question is out of order.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise simply to ask Your Honour this. What is wrong with that question? The hon. member is asking whether the Prime Minister intends to break the resolution into two. I know we want to do everything we can to assist, but I do not understand the reason for that ruling. I am sure it is a very good reason, but it is not apparent.

Mr. Speaker: The initial and apparent reason is that the same question was asked on Friday, I think, or if not Friday on Thursday. It is a repetitive question or a repetitive statement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But I think we are entitled to an answer, are we not, on a matter so important as this? Repetitive questions sometimes arise from the failure of a government to give answers of any kind.

INDUSTRY

REPORTED REMOVAL OF PLANT FROM NIAGARA FALLS TO BRANTFORD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and ask the hon. lady whether she has conferred with the Minister of Industry concerning the loss of an industry in Niagara Falls, namely, the Dow Corning silicones industry, which has decided to locate in the designated area of Brantford?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me this is a question for the order paper.

Inquiries of the Ministry

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

PROVINCIAL PARTICIPATION IN FISCAL AND MONETARY POLICIES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

Could the minister inform the house as to whether the government proposed to establish jointly with the provinces permanent offices to deal with taxation, currency and trade?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

[Text]

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

APPROVAL BY QUEBEC LEGISLATURE OF PROPOSED AMENDMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. Could the right hon. gentleman tell us whether he has received word from Quebec as to when the government of that province may be able to give its approval to the proposed amendment to the Canadian constitution, having to do with survivors' benefits?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The legislature is debating that matter this afternoon. I hope the debate will be a short one, and that we can get ahead with our resolution here.

IMMIGRATION

JOSIF VERGAKIS—REQUEST FOR REASON FOR DETENTION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the minister of immigration. It has to do with a man by the name of Josif Vergakis, a 20 year old seaman who was apprehended on April 27, having been taken into custody at the request of the hon. gentleman's department. Bail was granted to him in the sum of $1,000. He put up the money, yet he is still in custody. Is it because he refuses to answer questions which are placed before him, or for what reason is he being held in this country?

[Translation]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of that particular case, but I will be pleased to make the necessary inquiries and provide the information.

[Text]

FLOODS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): In the absence of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources I wonder if I could direct a question either to the Postmaster General, as the other cabinet minister from British Columbia, or to the acting minister of northern affairs with respect to the flood situation in British Columbia. News reports indicate that the floods have abated somewhat, but perhaps one of the members of the cabinet could give the house a reasonably up to date indication of the situation.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): I am sure that the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources is in a position to deal with that.

Mr. John N. Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): The minister is in British Columbia at the moment looking into the gravity of the situation on the Fraser and Skeena rivers. I might say that at his request I was in Dawson City and Mayo last Thursday and Friday to look at the situation on the Yukon and Stewart rivers. I am glad to report with regard to these particular waters that the levels seem to have dropped. At Mayo the flood waters are one and a half feet below the five feet above normal which they once were, and at Dawson City, for the first time, the waters have begun to recede and were six inches lower than the previous mark of ten feet above normal.

Mr. Howard: May I ask the parliamentary secretary whether the minister has any plans now to make an offer of assistance, to work with the provincial government in this situation?

Mr. Turner: I am sure that once the minister has had an opportunity to view the situation he will be in a better position to answer that question himself on his return.

SHIPPING

MONTREAL—FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN STUDY OF WATER LEVEL

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Can he tell us whether the federal government will be represented at the meeting to be held on June 30 next to study the critical situation of the water level in the port of Montreal?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I would have to look into that question.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I.—SALE OF HOTEL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport and ask him whether he is now in a position to answer a question I put to him on May 25 regarding the sale of Canadian National Railways hotels, with special reference to the one in Charlottetown.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I imagine the hon. gentleman knows the answer to that question already. I was advised some days ago that the hotel had been sold.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): A supplementary question to the umquhile government house leader. Are the opposition or all hon. members to assume, when a question is taken as notice and an answer promised, that the answer will not be given unless they ask the question again at a later date?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege might I say a word about that. All I undertook to do was to bring the question to the attention of the railway authorities. The announcement of the sale of this hotel, which was an administrative matter, was made at a time when the house was not sitting. It was made by a political friend of the hon. gentleman, the premier of Prince Edward Island. I thought it would be rather redundant to take up the scarce time of the house by repeating that announcement.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege, I should say that I for one assume that the minister makes himself aware of his responsibilities and of what is happening under the jurisdiction of his department at all times and as soon as he can. When he tells the house that he will seek the answer to a question I think we always assume that he is seeking the answer so as to make the house aware of what is the answer. I find now that we have to be more careful.

AIR CANADA

CANCELLATION OF CONNECTING FLIGHTS FROM HALIFAX AND SAINT JOHN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Minister of Transport about a maritime matter on which I hope he will be better informed. Will the minister investigate and report on the many protests which have been made regarding the cancellation of certain Saint John-Halifax connecting Air Canada flights; and will the minister guarantee their restoration or give an opportunity for other regional carriers to move in?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad indeed to make the fullest possible inquiry to get the information the hon. gentleman asks, but I know the hon. gentleman is not seriously suggesting that I should take over the operation of T.C.A. myself.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the most urgent importance to direct to the Prime Minister. From what appears to be a deliberate government policy of rooting out little by little our distinctive terms and designations which remind this nation of its past, is the Liberal party dedicated to turning this country into a republic?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is out of order.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LA MACAZA, QUE.—PROTESTS AGAINST STORAGE OF NUCLEAR ARMS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Has he heard about the appeal made on Saturday and Sunday near the base of La Macaza against the storing of nuclear arms?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that this question requires a little research. Would the hon. member put it on the order paper.

QUEBEC—ADMISSION FEE TO WATCH CHANGING OF GUARD

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Could he tell the house whether in some places in Canada army officials require an admission fee from spectators in order to attend the daily changing of the guard?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Grégoire: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the Associate Minister of National Defence take some action so that the senior army officers at the Quebec citadel abolish the amount of 75 cents which is required from every tourist who wants to see the changing of the guard?

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Speaker, I shall check whether this statement is accurate.

[Text]

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON REORGANIZATION OF MILITIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I too should like to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Ten days ago he told the house that one part or the first part of the Suttie committee report would perhaps be available within a week. I wonder whether he can now tell us if that report is available.

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the first part of the Suttie commission report has been made available. I am now studying it. The second part will be made available toward the end of the month, I think. However, before making it public and before sending it to the special committee on defence it would be preferable to have both reports made public simultaneously.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR SHOWING OF FILM RESPECTING PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Secretary of State whether he has yet had a reply from the C.B.C. as to any reconsideration it is giving either to showing the controversial film called "Mr. Pearson" or releasing it to other agencies who will demonstrate it to a national audience.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday the Secretary of State told me he would answer today my question about which members of the privy council saw the restricted film; on how many occasions the Prime Minister saw it; why the C.B.C. did not broadcast the film; and whether members of parliament will have a chance to see the film. May I now have an answer, please?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, this is exactly the same question as that asked by the hon. member for Port Arthur. I have not yet received an answer from the C.B.C. When I do receive it I will be very glad to give that answer to the House of Commons.

Mr. Fisher: A supplementary question. I should like to ask the minister whether the question put by the hon. member and other questions which have been put could not be answered to a considerable extent without resort to the C.B.C., since they involve his associates in the cabinet. We have never had a clear answer to that, and the Secretary of State does not need to go to the C.B.C. to get it.

SUGAR

REPORTED LOWEST PRICE SINCE JANUARY, 1963

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Could he tell the house whether he read a report published in L'Action on June 13, 1964, to the effect that the price of sugar is at its lowest level since January 24, 1963?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member put this question on the order paper.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN—RETENTION FOR CERTAIN PURPOSES OF UNION JACK

On the order: Government orders:

May 28—the following proposed resolution:—

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag and also to provide that the royal union flag, generally known as the union jack, may continue to be flown as a symbol of Canadian membership in the commonwealth of nations and our allegiance to the crown—The Prime Minister.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before you put to the house the question which is contained in government order No. 44, I wish to raise a point of order. My point of order relates to the form in which this motion is laid before us. Initially may I draw your attention to standing order 50, which reads as follows:

Whenever Mr. Speaker is of opinion that a motion offered to the house is contrary to the rules and privileges of parliament, he shall apprise the house thereof immediately, before putting the question thereon, and quote the standing order or authority applicable to the case.

This standing order is spelled out a little more fully in Bourinot's fourth edition at page 297—of course it is an old standing order—where he says:

If a motion be out of order, the Speaker will call attention to the irregularity, and refuse to put it to the house under the forty sixth rule. "Whenever the Speaker is of opinion that a motion offered to the house is contrary to the rules and privileges of parliament, he shall apprise the house thereof immediately, before putting the question thereon, and quote the rule or authority applicable to the case."

Consequently, if on reading the motion, he detects an irregularity, he will at once apprise the house of the fact without waiting to have a point of order raised.

It is not my contention that the resolution offered in the name of the Prime Minister is contrary to the rules of this house, but it is my contention that the form of it is contrary to the privileges of parliament; indeed, that the form of it denies an ancient right and privilege of parliament. I raise this point of order now before the debate starts at all, not insisting that there be a ruling today but because I feel that if we do not raise the point of order now we might be told later on in the debate that we were too late. As I say, it will not be a matter of concern to me if a ruling is delayed, provided such a delay does not prejudice our right to have the point considered which I wish to lay before the house.

I have said that in my view the form in which the motion is presented to us offends against an ancient right and privilege of parliament. I find this ancient right and privilege spelled out in at least six authorities, Redlich, May, Campion, Todd, Bourinot and Beauchesne. Three of these are authorities who wrote on the practices of the parliament of the United Kingdom, and the latter three are Canadian. May I, Mr. Speaker, without reading all of them draw attention to two or three of these authorities and to the way they put the point. I drew this sentence to the attention of the Prime Minister a week ago last Friday on orders of the day. It is found on page 298 of Bourinot's fourth edition:

A motion which contains two or more distinct propositions may be divided so that the sense of the house may be taken on each separately.

I should also like to draw the attention of the house to citation 200, subparagraph 4 of Beauchesne's fourth edition. I shall read it again just to make the point that it is in Beauchesne, even though it is in exactly the same words that I have just read from Bourinot. It reads:

A motion which contains two or more distinct propositions may be divided so that the sense of the house may be taken on each separately.

I mentioned Todd, the Canadian authority. He puts it this way:

If a question contains more parts than one it may be divided into two or more questions by the order or with the consent of the house.

An hon. Member: What is the reference?

Mr. Knowles: That is the reference to Todd, who wrote in about 1840 on the practices of the legislature of Upper Canada.

An hon. Member: What page?

Mr. Knowles: I am sorry, I have not the page; I will get that for you later, Mr. Speaker; the book is in the library. Likewise I would draw attention to May's thirteenth edition, page 278, where this appears:

The ancient rule that when a complicated question is proposed to the house, the house may order such question to be divided, is observed in the following manner.

I feel that having read that sentence, Mr. Speaker, I must read the ones that follow, but I emphasize the fact that May is confirming the fact of the ancient right to have a complicated question divided into its component parts. The paragraph goes on:

> When two or more separate propositions are embodied in a motion or in an amendment, the Speaker calls the attention of the house to the circumstances; and, if objection be taken, he puts the question on such propositions separately, restricting debate to each proposition in its turn; though this course is rarely adopted, because it is generally recognized that, if a motion formed of a series of paragraphs is submitted to the house, the question should be proposed on the principal paragraph, which determines the decision of the house upon the various proposals contained in the whole motion. If the necessity should arise, separate subjects contained in a motion can be placed seriatim before the house by way of amendment.

Without reading them, Mr. Speaker, may I say that this is also discussed in Campion and it is also discussed at some length in Redlich. I do not feel it is as appropriate to read from Redlich as it is to read from the later authorities, because he belongs to ancient times and his work discusses the procedures in a day when the Speaker himself formulated and put the motions to the house based on the things that were said by members. It was out of that practice that the custom arose of the house being able to say to Mr. Speaker, "Please, sir, you put too much in the motion. It should be divided." Redlich describes this situation back in the eighteenth century, and he and Campion and May also point out that this right has been protected down through the years.

Bourinot, on the same page from which I read a moment ago, page 298, has a little more to say on the matter of complicated questions, and I think it is very helpful to us in the situation that we face at this time:

> As respects what are known as "complicated questions", they may always be divided into distinct parts, with the consent of the house. No individual member, however, can ask, as a matter of right, that such a question be divided, since the house alone can properly decide whether it is complicated or not and into how many propositions it may be divided.

I want to make it clear that I am not claiming any right as an individual; I am presenting the point that the house as a whole has the right to decide whether or not the question to be put before us today can be divided into its component parts. Let me continue reading from the same paragraph on page 298 of Bourinot's fourth edition:

> The fact is, the necessity of dividing a complicated question is now obviated by the facilities offered for moving amendments.

[Mr. Knowles.]

I notice that in this volume that passage has been underlined. I suppose somebody has quoted that on some occasion as an argument against the right I am now maintaining. But I would draw attention to the sentence that immediately follows. It reads:

> But, in any case, it is always open to a member to move formally that a question be divided.

I submit that if authorities such as those I have named, whose works span the centuries, namely Redlich, May, Campion, Todd, Bourinot and Beauchesne, all declare that it is an ancient right of parliament to have a complicated question divided, surely this is an occasion when we as a House of Commons should be allowed to exercise that right.

May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that this right which has been asserted over the decades—indeed, over the centuries—is obviously rooted in common sense. It does not make sense to ask a deliberative assembly to cast one vote on a question which contains two distinct propositions. I shall refrain from getting into anything that can be called a debate on the motion the Prime Minister is about to move, but may I use today's proposal as a clear example of what common sense calls for. There are members in this house who favour part (a) of the resolution but are opposed to part (b), yet among those members who take that position some have declared they will vote for the combined motion and some have declared they will vote against it.

Likewise there are members of this house who favour part (b) and are opposed to part (a). Some of those members have declared they will vote for the combined motion and some have declared they will vote against it. In other words, Mr. Speaker, it is utterly impossible, in view of the way in which the motion has been put before us, for the house to give a clear and meaningful vote on this question.

I want to make it very clear that I raise this question not out of any personal or party interest, not with respect to the interests of my party or with respect to the interests of any other party in this house. I raise it because I feel that on this important question of a flag for Canada we in parliament owe it to the Canadian people to see to it that under our rules and procedures we come to a clearcut decision.

So far as I personally am concerned I favour both parts of the motion now before us. I would like to see the first part modified, as everybody knows, but I favour both parts whether they are put before us separately or whether they are put before us together. In other words I am not raising this matter out of any personal concern, and the position I take is the position taken by most of my colleagues. But because I feel it would be unfair to Canada for parliament to take an unclear decision—because that is what would result if we had a vote on these two propositions at one and the same time—I feel that the ancient right of parliament spelled out so well by Redlich, May, Campion, Todd, Bourinot and Beauchesne should be respected on this important occasion.

Anyone who has studied the authorities on procedure at all knows that things that can seem to be very clear can be confused by something else. I have no doubt, from the question I put to the Prime Minister a week ago last Friday, that others have been studying this question as well, and no doubt attention has been drawn to our standing order 44 which seems to stand in the way of the ancient right which I am now claiming for parliament as a whole. Standing order 44 provides as follows:

> When a question is under debate no motion is received unless to amend it; to postpone it to a day certain; for the previous question; for reading the orders of the day; for proceeding to another order; to adjourn the debate; or for the adjournment of the house.

We are governed by our standing orders. Standing order 44 is pretty clear. It says that when a motion is under debate there are only certain kinds of motions that can be made, and that standing order does not list a motion for the dividing of a complicated question as a motion that can be moved in such a circumstance. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, initially we do seem to be in some difficulty. We have an ancient right given to us across the centuries, but our own standing order 44 seems to stand in the way of our exercising that right. But because we have this ancient right, because it makes common sense, because acting upon it seems to be the thing we should be doing for Canada in the course of this debate, I think we should find a way of exercising that ancient right if it is at all possible.

One of the authorities I read a moment ago said that the practice of dividing a motion has been obviated by the right we now have to move an amendment. That will not do in this case. An amendment could not divide the question. There could be an amendment to cut out part (a) or part (b), but the effect of that would be only to confirm or defeat one part. It would not give us a chance to vote on the two propositions separately. Likewise I do not see how we could revert to motions and bring in a question that would deal with the matter. It would require unanimous consent, and I do not look for unanimous consent to be given very often during the course of the debate on the flag.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that what we have to find is a procedural motion of a kind that can be made while the debate on the flag is in progress. One other course would be for Your Honour just to rule, as a Speaker did 81 years ago, that the motion should be split, or as Speakers used to rule in the parliament of Westminster. That is one possibility, but in case you feel that that is too much for you to take on your shoulders I suggest that the house has to find a way to bring in a procedural motion that can be moved while the debate is in progress and that will have the effect of splitting the main motion into two parts. If there is such a procedural motion there is no doubt that it can be moved.

Mr. Bell: How about the government?

Mr. Knowles: I have not yet said who might do it. As a matter of fact the hon. member for Saint John-Albert is anticipating my remarks. I intend to suggest that another minister, another member of the government, the Leader of the Opposition or anyone can move such a motion. The point is that I think it ought to be moved, and my reason for raising the point of order now is in the hope that we can get a ruling from the Chair that such a course of procedure would be possible as a means of resolving the situation.

May I point out that if it is agreed that a motion can be made to divide the question into two parts, that motion could be debated and could be voted on, and the house itself would thus make the decision whether or not the question should be divided. In the house itself making the decision—by a free vote, I would hope—there is no question but that we would be in line with what all the authorities have said, namely that it is an ancient right to have a question divided, and that although one member cannot demand it as a personal right, the house itself can make such an order.

I had reached the point where I was suggesting that what is necessary, unless somebody can come up with a better way, is a procedural motion of a kind that would be in order. I draw the attention of the house to citation 195 in Beauchesne, fourth edition, found on page 165. I am going to read the first paragraph. It is not particularly relevant but it is close to the question. It reads:

> A substantive motion is a self-contained proposal not incidental to any proceeding, amendable and drafted in such a way as to be capable of expressing a decision of the house.

What we will have before us in the name of the Prime Minister is a substantive motion. But the next paragraph is germane to the problem I have raised. It reads as follows:

> Privileged motions, which must not be mistaken for questions of privilege, deal with situations arising from the subject matter of, or the debate on, the original question either in consequence or in anticipation of a vote or through the necessity of resorting to new proceedings.

That is exactly the kind of motion we would need in the course of this debate unless, as I say, some other way is found to deal with the matter. We will need a vote on a matter that will arise in anticipation of the vote. I draw hon. members' attention to the next two sentences in the citation with regard to what happens when motions of this kind are made:

> They must be given the right of way when proposed during a debate. They are divided into superseding motions and amendments.

The various kinds of such motions are then indicated. So what we have reached at this point, Mr. Speaker, is that it is possible, despite standing order 44 which seems to say that nothing of this kind can be done, to bring in a motion during the course of the debate—some member of the cabinet or anybody else in the house can do it—which would be in order, which would not require notice, which would not require unanimous consent, and on the basis of which by a free vote the house itself would make the decision.

One of the kinds of motions referred to on page 195—as well as in several other places—that can be made under that heading is a motion for reading the orders of the day. I suppose many members have seen that phrase in our rule book a number of times, "reading the orders of the day", and have wondered, as I have, what it meant. The authorities are not extremely helpful, but it is interesting to go back to a precedent. In this connection I went back, proceeding from a footnote in Bourinot, to the session of 1883. On March 16 of that year a very interesting proceeding took place in the House of Commons. Sir John A. Macdonald was prime minister at the time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Knowles: I paused for a moment so that applause could be noted because I agree with what Sir John A. Macdonald did on that occasion. I hope his supporters will take the same position and, since he was speaking from the government side, I hope the government will take that position as well.

The reason I looked up this debate on March 16, 1883, was that Bourinot referred to it as an occasion when a motion that had two distinct propositions was split. It is an interesting motion and was to the effect that a paragraph out of the speech from the throne, a paragraph that had to do with the sale of liquor, should be referred to a special committee and that, notwithstanding a certain standing order, that special committee should be composed of certain members. This motion to refer a paragraph to the committee and that the committee should consist of certain members was split into two parts.

The Liberal opposition of the day, the spokesman for which on that occasion was Hon. Edward Blake, objected to what was being done. The Speaker of the day, in very clear words, simply said that the motion could be divided. This reference will be found at page 253 of Hansard for March 16, 1883. The reason for the desire to divide the motion was that the propositions were distinctly separate. One was the idea to set up a committee to deal with the sale of liquor; the other was the question as to who should be on the committee. Apparently there were many members of the Liberal party who did not want to be members of the committee, and a furor developed. At any rate, the motion was divided into two distinct parts and they were voted upon separately; in fact there was a recorded division in both cases.

This is an example, Mr. Speaker, of where research into past procedures is sometimes more rewarding than one expects. Oddly enough, when one studies the incident that took place on March 16, 1883 one finds something that will help us today. It is not only that a complicated motion can be divided, that Mr. Speaker made the ruling that it could be divided, but the point that is really interesting is how they got to the motion at all on March 16, 1883. It referred to a paragraph in the speech from the throne. The speech from the throne had already been debated and the address thanking His Excellency for it had already been passed. During the course of that debate, however, there had been considerable discussion about this paragraph relating to the sale of intoxicating liquor, and there was a desire generally expressed to deal with it separately. There we have the same question; how do you deal separately with something that is included in something else?

It is in the record, and I invite members to look either at Hansard for 1883, which I have here, or the Journals for 1883. They will find that on that date, March 16, 1881 they got at it in this way. Sir John A. Macdonald, the prime minister of the day, made a motion that the orders of the day be read, and specifically that the paragraph from the speech from the throne relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors be read at the table. Both Hansard and the Journals indicate that this paragraph was read at the table by the Clerk of the house. When the paragraph had been read at the table of the house Sir John A. Macdonald, on the basis of its having been read, moved that it be referred to the proposed committee as I have already indicated. The motion was debatable and it was debated at great length, Sir John A. Macdonald and Hon. Edward Blake being the main contenders. Thus the matter was resolved.

I submit that unless somebody can find a better way of doing it we have, in this precedent, an answer to our problem. Standing order 44 says that when a question is under debate there are only certain kinds of motions that can be moved, and one of them is the motion to read the orders of the day. Such a motion could be moved by any member who can get the floor in the course of the debate, be he a cabinet minister, a Liberal backbencher, a member of the official opposition, or any other member. This motion having been made, if it passed then the Clerk, according to precedent, would be called upon to read at the table the orders of the day. We could dispense with all the rest but order 44, but once he had read order 44, the motion that the Clerk Assistant read just a moment ago, I submit that on the basis of what happened on March 16, 1883, it would then be in order for a member of the house—I think it should be done by a cabinet minister but it would be in order for any member of the house—to move that the question which had then been read by the Clerk at the table be divided into its two parts for the purpose of taking a vote.

If hon. members think this is a bit novel, then I say it is a novel situation to be deciding upon a flag for the people of Canada. Parliament has never dealt with this situation before, and the decision we take may last for a long time. It seems to me that in these circumstances we owe it to ourselves, but even more may I say that we owe it to the people of Canada, to try to find in our procedures a way of making this decision in a most clearcut fashion, a way of arriving at a vote that will be meaningful. As I say, Mr. Speaker, you in your research may have found some other way which seems better, and if so that is fine with me; but if no other way has been found, I suggest consideration be given to the proposals I have made.

If I may sum up, I hope I have shown by reference to the six authorities from whom I have quoted that the right to divide a complicated question is an ancient one that parliament is entitled to have observed on this occasion. I have already shown that under our standing orders there are difficulties. But I have shown by reference to what happened in 1883 that these difficulties can be overcome. I hope Your Honour will at least be prepared today, if you are not able to give a final ruling, to say that this matter is one with which the house can deal at some point in the debate that is about to commence. It is immaterial to me whether the division is made so we can debate the propositions separately or whether it is made just before the vote is taken. It seems to me that one debate ought to be enough, but I will leave that to Your Honour and to the house. Whether or not we do have separate debates, I do insist that to have a clear, meaningful decision we should have two separate votes.

I hope, therefore, that this parliament will show its respect for the things that have come down to us across the centuries by assuring in this debate the right to have separate votes, and that Your Honour will stand with those who in the past have contended that this is one of parliament's undoubted rights.

Mr. Speaker: Are there any other hon. gentlemen who care to make remarks on this point?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I would defer to anyone on the government side if he wished to deal with this matter. I have certain remarks I should like to make, but since this is a government motion I thought they would be the first to insist that it remain as it is. It represents the policy of the government, carefully considered, and the motion is carefully drawn with the two ideas put into one motion for a definite purpose. I am sure they would not want to see any change in that motion so prematurely. However, if no one from the other side is willing to speak I should like to deal with the procedure put before us by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

I wondered at this, Mr. Speaker, when everybody here was eager to hear the presentation of the Prime Minister. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has taken 30 minutes to put forward a rather odd suggestion which he has advanced in various devious ways, and is asking Your Honour to reach a conclusion. Before you do that, sir, I certainly think you should hear from others who have also given some consideration to this point. You might want to look back at another reference, Hatsell in 1770, who first dealt with the matter.

I was surprised that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre placed his reliance on our standing order 50 which reads:

> Whenever Mr. Speaker is of opinion that a motion offered to the house is contrary to the rules and privileges of parliament, he shall apprise the house thereof immediately, before putting the question thereon—

I fail to see where any of the rights and privileges of parliament are abrogated by the introduction of the resolution that is before us, and I do not see that the Speaker is called upon immediately to examine this and take some action. In fact the hon. member did not give any reference to any incidents when the Speaker had intervened under such circumstances, and certainly he was unable to point out that this offended against any ancient right or privilege of parliament, although he used that expression.

The hon. member is quite right in giving us the references he did, with the one omission I have mentioned, and in the parliament at Westminster there has been in effect a method by which, from time to time, motions may be divided. Although our reference books, Beauchesne and Bourinot, refer to this they do not give satisfactory examples from Canadian practice, and in fact Beauchesne rather skims over the whole thing without any substantial reference whatsoever. So you have to go to May for the references. I wonder why the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre quoted the thirteenth edition of May when we have, and have had for a number of years, the sixteenth edition available. Why does he not get up to date when dealing with a volume as important as May, which has been available in its sixteenth edition for a number of years?

Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw your attention to a number of references which I am prepared to give where, in the British House of Commons, certain motions are divided; but before doing that may I draw your attention to the fact that there are occasions when motions are not subject to division in the British house, and this should have been drawn to your attention by the hon. member who preceded me. In May's sixteenth edition on page 607 you will find this sentence in the middle of the page:

> The practice of the house by which a motion or amendment embodying several propositions is divided by the Chair if objection is taken to it on that account, so that questions may be put on each proposition separately, is not followed in committee of the whole house.

So you have that restriction on this division of motions in British practice, and then you have a further restriction. I give the reference. In 1928, as recorded in the parliamentary debates for the United Kingdom, volume 217, column 678, a member of the house requested the division of a motion which was then before the house dealing with the sittings of the house. The hon. member asked if there would be two votes on this particular motion and Mr. Speaker replied:

> No, only one. The business specified under the standing order may include two or more bills and sometimes it includes some other government business.

I draw these two examples to your attention, sir, so you may be clear on the fact that the practice of dividing motions is not carried throughout the business of the house. It only pertains under certain circumstances.

The circumstances under which it may be done can be drawn from a number of references in the British House of Commons running from 1888 to 1928. There are not many references, half a dozen, and in each instance the motions were divided on the request of an hon. member. That is the way they do it there, and the motions that were divided were dealing with matters very distinct one from the other.

The first example I cite, on April 19, 1888, volume 324, page 1828, had to do with a motion which embodied in its first part mention of the earning of grants for cookery, in connection with a bill dealing with education in Scotland, and in the second part it dealt with grants for drawing in reckoning the total of 17s. 6d. per scholar in average attendance. These were two very separate and distinct propositions, and the Speaker said he had no objection to taking them separately. As a matter of fact the motion was not proceeded with; it was withdrawn.

The second example, and this is one of considerable importance, is on July 17, 1905, page 897 in the same reference volume. There was a resolution before the house which the Speaker had been asked to look at. He did look at it and he said:

—the resolution ought to be divided into at least eight, and probably nine, resolutions.

The substance of that was that Mr. Balfour, the proposer of the motion, withdrew it and said he would bring it back again in the form of a bill.

The third example is on November 13, 1912, volume 43 of the fifth series of that year, where you will find a lengthy discussion with regard to a division of a motion before the house, which is worthy of your attention because I think this one rather sets the pattern. The motion before the house at that time dealt with an amendment for the suspension of the standing orders of the house and a recasting of a guillotine resolution, that is allocation of time; and, most important, for the rescinding of an amendment passed by the house a few days earlier.

The Speaker decided that so far as he was concerned the suspension of the standing orders was immaterial, it was the type of thing introduced into many motions. But he said there were two propositions before the house, one being the rescission of an amendment—this is a most unusual practice indeed, to reverse a decision made earlier by the house—and the second proposition was to remodify the timetable which had been passed by the house two weeks earlier. He said in effect that that motion might be divided, and they would deal separately with the really important question, the rescinding of the amendment. So he cut the question into two parts.

The last reference I would give is in 1920, volume 131, column 2606. There was a motion before the house asking for the suspension of the eleven o'clock rule, and at the same time asking that business other than supply might be taken on a supply day. The Speaker agreed that the motion might very well be taken into two parts. The question affecting the suspension of the eleven o'clock rule might have meant an all-night sitting and was an important question to be decided by the house. The second part of the motion dealt with something entirely different, namely the taking of business other than supply on a day set aside for supply. There was no resemblance between the two propositions put forward in the motion.

This, in addition to the examples quoted by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, represents very largely, if not completely, the examples Your Honour will be able to find in the various reference books. So it is quite clear that in the first instance the division of a motion before the house is not often made. It occurs when two distinct and opposing points of view are presented in one motion, and in such cases the Speaker, for the convenience of the house, makes the division. In some of the examples I have given the motions were withdrawn because of the objections raised and something else was substituted.

Now may I deal with the somewhat dubious method by which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wants to get around standing order 44. I think Your Honour will have to give most serious consideration to this proposition about reading the orders of the day on some subsequent day and then, at that stage, considering a superseding motion. I would want to examine the record very carefully myself in that regard, but I doubt whether on the basis of the example given to us this morning by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre it would be sound or safe for such a rule to be established here. I think, Mr. Speaker, you must be looking ahead to the business of the house in the future. The adoption of such a suggestion would result in the establishment of a precedent for the future, and all the ramifications which would follow from such a precedent should be carefully examined. Standing order 44, without repeating it in full, certainly says that no motion can be received when a question is before the house except to amend it, postpone it, and so on; and after reading the citation I am not sure that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is giving a correct interpretation of what happened in 1833. However, that is for Your Honour to look at. Even in the motion to which the hon. member drew our attention, two very separate matters were brought to the attention of the house. One involved the setting up of a committee to consider the sale of liquor, and the other asked the house to consider the names of the people who should be appointed to that committee. It is obvious that those two matters could easily be dealt with separately.

I conclude simply by saying that the examples I have been able to draw to Your Honour's attention are so far removed from the motion before us that I doubt very much if you could give them serious consideration in relation to what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said. The motion which is before us amounts to the setting out of a principle, an exposition of the policy of the government, and the two ideas are so closely related that I think they must be considered as a whole. I will leave the matter at that point.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): The references to which allusions have been made by my hon. friend are, of course, known to hon. members of the house. I wish to draw Your Honour's attention to this, that these authorities all advise to the effect that where a resolution contains different propositions, consideration can be given to dividing it within the limitations referred to by my hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre.

But what is the proposition here? The government introduces a resolution. The contention now is that this resolution, which must have taken a great deal of thought and consideration on the part of the government, does infringe on ancient rights, rules and privileges of parliament. This places a Speaker in a very difficult position. It may well be that the government now finds itself in a position where it would like to see a division of the resolution which it has itself created. It may very well be that. But let us read the proposition. It is this:

> That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada—

Here it goes on to describe the three maple leaf flag.

> —and also to provide that the royal union flag, generally known as the union jack, may continue to be flown as a symbol of Canadian membership—

And so on. How does one divide that? Does one divide it by leaving out "and" and "also"? You cannot divide this proposition. This is an entire proposition. This was the government's policy. This is what the Prime Minister told Mr. Smallwood, the premier of Newfoundland, in the telegram which was tabled here. It is not a question of a resolution being produced which ignores the rights and interferes with the privileges of parliament. This is something which represents the carrying out of a promise by the government.

No doubt the government now finds itself in a somewhat invidious position. Did not Premier Smallwood himself, following receipt of the telegram in question, interpret that telegram and interpret the conversation he had with the Prime Minister in the legislature of Newfoundland? At any rate the premier announced during a session of the legislature that he had received an assurance from the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister, replying to a telegram from Premier Smallwood, said:

> There is no question of the federal government's intention to recommend that both the union jack and Canada's proposed new flag be proclaimed by the Queen.

Premier Smallwood had asked for an explanation of the course to be followed by the government if the motion were adopted to authorize the government to provide that the royal union flag, generally known as the union jack, may continue to be flown as a symbol of Canadian membership in the commonwealth of nations, and so on. Premier Smallwood had asked for an explanation of the course to be followed by the federal government. He wanted to know what would happen. He went even further. He said the Minister of Transport was in London on Thursday to see Her Majesty the Queen on the flag issue. He said he had been informed of this by the Prime Minister. This, he said, was an honour to Newfoundland.

Now the government stand on a certain resolution they placed before parliament. It may be that they find it a little difficult. I am sure there would be no co-operation or discussion between the government and the hon. member who proposes the course we are considering, but if there was not the hon. member is a mind reader of the first rank; he knows the position in which the government now finds itself in having this resolution in its present form.

Mr. Pearson: I rise on a point of order. The right hon. gentleman is surely dealing now with substantive matters, not just the point which is before the house; but since he is doing so, and referring to what he considers to be the policy of the government in this matter, may I point out to him and to the house that the government has no intention of moving that this resolution be divided.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right. I am happy to have that assurance, which means that the Prime Minister of this country says that the resolution does not contravene the ancient rights and privileges of parliament. I agree with him in that regard; it does not. That being so, Mr. Speaker, you are now to be placed in the position where one member of the house raises a question and the government, represented by the Prime Minister, and myself speaking for the opposition—

Mr. Grégoire: No, not for us.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —for the official opposition. There is really only one opposition, but I am speaking for the official opposition.

Mr. Grégoire: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the hon. gentleman would wait—

Mr. Grégoire: On a point of order, I should like to ask the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) if he considers only himself a member of the official opposition. Are there not others also in the opposition?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are dealing with one point of order, and the Leader of the Opposition was speaking to that point of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, now that I have the official approval of the Prime Minister that, in his considered opinion, with which I agree, this resolution does not constitute any invasion of the ancient rights and privileges of parliament, or he would never have brought such a motion before the house, may I say this was the agreement that was made between Premier Smallwood and the Prime Minister according to the telegram which was filed. Therefore, I say that you, Mr. Speaker, are placed in the position where, if you were to determine upon and were to direct the breaking up of this resolution and separating the two parts, you would be so doing contrary to the rule that separation is allowed only where there are two distinct propositions. In this case there are not. The words provide, first, for a three maple leaf flag—and there can be no division in that—and also for the royal union flag. If you were to rule that the government have produced a resolution which consists not of one proposition, and a distinct one, but of a conjoined or conjuctive proposition—"and also" —you would, as I see it, be acting contrary to the rules. I cannot thank the Prime Minister too much for having risen and, with that certainty permitted of him by his position, telling the house that he does not intend to separate this resolution. Would he not want to if it did infringe the rights of parliament, because he is here to uphold them?

Under all the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I ask you not to uphold the suggestion put forward in the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. To do so would be contrary to the rules and would put you in the position where you would have to interpret what was in the minds of the government. Separation takes place only when there are distinct propositions put forward. In this case the undertaking was—if there are any notes to be handed around I should like to get them myself—to bring before the house a joint resolution. May I point that out once more, because it has happened several times and I do not wish to refer to it again.

Mr. Speaker: May I just clear up one slight misunderstanding at the moment. Surely the Chair has the right to consult with his Clerk.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there was no consultation on Your Honour's part a moment ago. This has happened several times when during the course of argument notes have passed to you. That is not consultation; that is giving advice without consultation.

Mr. Pearson: How disgusting.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak only briefly on the proposition which has been put forward to the house this afternoon by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). In his opening remarks I think he laid the situation fairly clearly before the house when he said that the resolution which is now before parliament is not contrary to the rules, but may contravene some privilege of the house. If you look, Mr. Speaker, at the resolutions which are on the order paper for today, it is possible to find a number of resolutions which do contain more than one proposition notwithstanding that they deal with the same subject. Item No. 44 in my opinion certainly does propose two separate matters to the House of Commons, but surely both deal with the same subject, namely a Canadian flag, or two flags.

I think this resolution is somewhat different from others which are on the order paper today, because I believe there will be no bill following this resolution to which members of the house would be able to move amendments. Nevertheless, notwithstanding what is contained in government order 44, if there are members of the house who feel they are unable to vote either in favour of or against the whole resolution, they have the option open to them to move an amendment to delete part of the resolution which is before them. That opportunity is open to all hon. members no matter what the item of business before them, particularly resolutions to be followed by a bill. Hon. members have the opportunity to amend each of the clauses of any bill presented to the committee of the whole.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think that perhaps you have the prerogative, when this motion is moved, to ask for the consent of the house, if the house so desires, to deal separately with the two matters raised by the resolution. There is also the option open to any hon. member, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, to move that the resolution be divided, and at that time it would be easy for you to take the sense of the house as to whether the house wants to do that.

I am not going to go into all the citations brought to the attention of the house both by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill). It seems to me there is abundant precedent for putting before the house a motion which includes propositions like the two contained in the motion before us at the moment.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) referred to the year 1883 and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) quoted excerpts going back to 1770. For my part, I would like to go back to the year 292 B.C., when the Athenian Alcibiades came before the first democratic parliament in the world, the Athenian areopagus, and proposed, in a single resolution, that the Athenian parliament simultaneously declare war against Sparta, the Peloponnessus and Sicily.

The Greek areopagites, in their great wisdom, then thought that they should divide the motion, so as to declare war against Sparta and the Peloponnessus, but not Sicily. Mr. Speaker, this happened in the year 292 B.C. This means that the most ancient rights of the people's representatives do not go back only to the 16th and 18th centuries, but to the 3rd century B.C.

Mr. Speaker, the most ancient right enjoyed by a member of parliament who is called upon to cast his vote, is to do so—as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said a few moments ago, quoting many authorities in support of his argument—on a resolution which is in no way complex, but simple, so that he may express his opinion and say fully and completely what is on his mind.

Now, this is not the case of the resolution before us today. This resolution is complex to the point of creating a dilemma for several members of the house, and I can easily illustrate this with an example.

Suppose that the resolution would include a first distinctive flag, with three maple leaves, and a second one which would be the French tricolour, for instance, to recall the origin of the first citizens of this country. I am convinced then, that many hon. members would have been prepared to vote for the three maple leaves, but not for the French tricolour—and I would have been the first one—because we want no tie with any country. The Prime Minister himself, in such a case, would have had, for all practical purposes, to vote against that resolution.

Now, Mr. Speaker, many members of this house face the same dilemma. Therefore, it shows beyond any doubt that the resolution as presented to us is a complex, and not a simple one.

Further, that resolution is not a simple one, because it calls for a single vote on two conflicting matters. On the first one, we express our Canadianism and on the second one, we express our allegiance to another country and that, through one single vote on the same resolution.

That goes to show how complex is the said resolution.

Far be it from me to dwell on the matter endlessly, but the complexity of the resolution now being brought before us seems obvious enough to me. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, it is up to the house to find a way to divide the resolution. In my opinion, that is very simple. It is up to the Prime Minister himself to divide it. He has stated that he does not want to do it, but I must tell him that when he went to Winnipeg to make his speech, he gained the respect of everybody in Canada. He showed he had a lot of guts. He faced a somewhat hostile crowd, but he won the respect and approval of all the young Canadian people for the courage he showed on that occasion.

Even though he stated on several occasions today that he refused to divide his motion, that is, to back-track when necessary, as he has already done, this is not characteristic of someone unable to make up his mind, but rather of someone who can appreciate the good points of a solution.

I appeal personally to the Prime Minister so that he himself will introduce a motion to divide this resolution in two parts, which would prevent any conflict or split and enable hon. members to vote according to their conscience. In addition, this would remove the dilemma in which the resolution places them today.

In view of the circumstances, I feel it is the duty of the Prime Minister of Canada today to divide the motion so as to give satisfaction to a large number of members who are anxious to vote in favour of a distinctive national flag but who object to any allegiance to another country. It is the Prime Minister's duty to enable those members to vote for a distinctive national flag. We cannot support the motion as it stands at present. That is why the Prime Minister must make it possible for us, representatives of the province of Quebec who wish to drop any allegiance to another country, to vote in favour of a distinctive national flag.

That is why I call upon the Prime Minister personally to allow us to vote not only once on the two flags, but twice: once for the national distinctive flag and the second time for a symbol of allegiance to another country.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have just a very brief contribution to make to this discussion. I have listened to the very interesting and ingenious argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), but it seems to me he is met with one fatal obstacle. He has attempted to stick-handle around it, but it is still there. I refer to standing order 44, which is in simple, definite, precise, unambiguous words:

> When a question is under debate no motion is received unless to amend it; to postpone it to a day certain; for the previous question; for reading the orders of the day; for proceeding to another order; to adjourn the debate; or for the adjournment of the house.

I call to Your Honour's attention that right at the beginning of the standing order it says the date when this rule apparently came into effect, was either promulgated or amended to its present form, was July 10, 1906. I think the standing orders of this house, like any statute, are designed to meet certain situations and I have not any doubt that the very interesting case and precedent cited by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and other similar cases might well have been part of the reasoning behind the appearance of this particular rule in its present form.

If the hon. member, or any other hon. member, can produce any Canadian citation or precedent indicating that subsequent to July 10, 1906 there has been a case where a resolution has been divided, despite the provisions of standing order 44, then Your Honour would be met with a different situation. But the only citations mentioned, as I understood the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, subsequent to this date were English citations. There is no indication before Your Honour that there is an English rule comparable to this. I submit that on the basis of standing order 44, the very clear and precise wording of this rule, and the fact that the only citations which have been mentioned are those prior to this date, Your Honour is in the position that he must follow this rule. This is the rule laid down by the house for the guidance of Speakers and of the house in the future. I must fall in with what the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) has said, that barring the decision by the government to bring forward a new resolution or two new resolutions we are bound by the resolution as it stands, as Your Honour is bound by the provisions of standing order 44.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member for Peace River a question before he sits down? Is he not aware of the fact that I proposed that we follow standing order 44, by having a motion to read the orders of the day and carrying on with the kind of procedure that was used by Sir John A. Macdonald?

Mr. Baldwin: I would submit, Mr. Speaker, with all deference, that the hon. member is simply begging the question there.

Mr. Speaker: Are there any other hon. gentlemen who wish to speak on the point of order? I am sure it will come as no distinct surprise to all hon. members that I, too, have done a little homework in the last few days; in fact, considerable research. Along with my advisers I have given this matter as much consideration as was possible and I have reached an opinion which I think it my duty to give to the house.

Our standing orders do not specifically provide for the dividing of a complicated question. However, such Canadian authors as Bourinot and Beauchesne, and such British authors as May, do recognize such a proceeding. May, at pages 411 and 412 of his 16th edition, states:

Point of Order

The ancient rule that when a complicated question is proposed to the house, the house may order such question to be divided, has been variously interpreted at different periods. Originally the division of such a question appears to have required an order of the house, and in 1770 a motion "That it is the rule of this house, that a complicated question which prevents any member from giving his free assent or dissent to any part thereof ought, if required, to be divided", was negatived on a division.

As late as 1883 it was generally held that an individual member had no right to insist upon the division of a complicated question. In 1888, however, the Speaker ruled that two propositions which were then before the house in one motion could be taken separately if any member objected to their being taken together. Although this rule does not appear to have been based on any previous decision, it has since remained unchallenged.

Then follows the sentence that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre read, if I am not mistaken.

The house does not recognize the right of individual members to insist on the division of motions moved in committee of the whole house, or of motions giving specal facilities for the transaction of public business—

It would appear from the foregoing that in accordance with recent practice in the British house, that is, since 1888, the decision whether a question is to be divided rests with the Speaker.

May I give to the house a summary of recent proceedings in the British house with regard to the division of complicated questions which I have found recorded in their parliamentary debates. On April 19, 1888, column 1,828, Mr. Speaker said:

It may be for the convenience of the house that the hon. gentleman's two propositions should be put together, but if any hon. gentleman objects to their being taken together, they will be put separately.

July 17, 1905, columns 897 and 898:

A member raised a point of order asking the Speaker to rule as to whether when a resolution contains various different propositions it should not be divided and each put separately. It will be seen that the Speaker decided that, in his opinion, it should be divided.

October 8, 1912, column 161:

Mr. Speaker: —If the noble lord finds himself in any doubt as to how to vote upon it I shall be very glad to put it as two questions.

November 13, 1912, columns 1,994 and 1,995:

Mr. Speaker: —the rule, of course, is that if any hon. member feels embarrassed in voting upon a resolution, that the Chair shall divide the resolution, in order that the member may, if he wishes to vote "Aye" on the one part and "No" on the other, not be embarrassed by having to vote "Aye" or "No" on the whole of it.

[Mr. Speaker.]

July 15, 1920, column 2,606:

At the request of a member who asked for a ruling with regard to a motion in the name of the leader of the house which he contended consisted of two questions, the Speaker is reported as saying:

If it will suit the hon. and gallant gentleman, I will put the question in two parts.

May 14, 1928, column 678:

A motion having been made and a question proposed "That the proceedings on the currency and bank notes bill and on the bankers (Northern Ireland) bill be exempted, at this day's sitting, from the provisions of the standing order (sittings of the house)", a member raised a point of order submitting that there were two questions involved in the motion and asked whether two divisions or only one division would be taken. The Speaker decided not to divide the motion on the ground that the business specified under the standing order could include two or more bills, and sometimes it includes some other government business.

This reference will serve to indicate, at least in my opinion, that the speaker in the British house has a right of discretion in such matters.

In Canada, on the other hand, Bourinot, at page 298 of his fourth edition, states in part as follows:

As respects what are known as "complicated questions", they may always be divided into distinct parts, with the consent of the house. No individual member, however, can ask, as a matter of right, that such a question be divided, since the house alone can properly decide whether it is complicated or not and into how many propositions it may be divided. The fact is, the necessity of dividing a complicated question is now obviated by the facilities offered for moving amendments. But, in any case, it is always open to a member to move formally that a question be divided.

A motion which contains two or more distinct propositions may be divided so that the sense of the house may be taken on each separately.

The footnote to the foregoing commentary indicates that Bourinot's comments are based on a proceeding which occurred in the British house in 1770 which, however, it should be noted, refers to the ancient practice in the British house.

In the same regard paragraph 4 of citation 200 of Beauchesne's fourth edition reads as follows:

A motion which contains two or more distinct propositions may be divided so that the sense of the house may be taken on each separately.

While this citation is a reiteration, in part, of what has been stated by Bourinot, no indication is given as to the procedure to be followed in making any such division.

May I at this time thank all those hon. members who have made such a valuable contribution to our discussion this afternoon on what is a very difficult problem. The Chair very much appreciates having the benefit of their experience and knowledge. I have looked into our records and have failed to find any case which establishes a clear and proper procedure on the matter. It is true that there are to be found instructions to committees to divide bills, or to introduce more than one bill based on a single resolution adopted in committee of the whole; but such instances, in my view, are different from and not applicable to the present situation.

I have considered other cases which might have some bearing on this question, in particular the procedure followed in 1947 and 1948 when a motion was divided in our house, and I might perhaps be permitted to deal more in detail with that instance, which seems to be the nearest to the problem confronting us today.

On Wednesday, December 10, 1947, when a motion to approve a general agreement on tariffs and trade, together with a complementary agreement with the United Kingdom was being considered, an amendment was proposed thereto as follows:

> That the said resolution be not now proceeded with, but that the same be referred to the committee of the whole house with instructions to divide the subject matter thereof into two resolutions, one relating to "the general agreement on tariffs and trade, including the protocol of provisional application thereof, annexed to the final act of the second session of the preparatory committee of the United Nations conference on trade and employment held at Geneva from April 10 to October 30, 1947, together with the complementary agreements of October 30, 1947, between Canada and the United States of America," and the other resolution relating to "the complementary agreement of the same date (April 30, 1947) between Canada and the United Kingdom."

It is suggested that this amendment was irregular in that "it is not an amendment to a motion to move that the question go to a committee". In this connection see citation 202, subsection 6, Beauchesne, fourth edition.

At any rate, when this debate was resumed on March 10, 1948, a subamendment was proposed in the following words:

> That the amendment be amended,—
> (b) by adding at the end of the said amendment the following:
> "the said resolutions to be expressed as follows:
> 'That it is expedient that parliament do approve the general agreement on tariffs and trade, including the protocol of provisional application thereof, annexed to the final act of the second session of the preparatory committee of the United Nations conference on trade and employment held at Geneva from April 10 to October 30, 1947, together with the complementary agreement of October 30, 1947, between Canada and the United States of America; that the house do approve the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.'
> 'That it is expedient that parliament do approve the complementary agreement of October 30, 1947, between Canada and the United Kingdom relating to the general agreement on tariffs and trade; and that the house do approve the same, subject to the legislation required in order to give effect to the provisions thereof.' "

Subsequently the subamendment, amendment as amended and main motion as amended carried. In this connection see the Journals, March 10, 1948, pages 240 and 241. In dealing with this proceeding it must be said that, if the amendment itself was irregular, it logically follows that all subsequent proceedings thereon were also irregular. In this regard it would appear that this procedure was carried on through an arrangement among and with the consent of all parties and cannot be considered as establishing a proper procedure. See Hansard, March 8, 1948, pages 1951 and 1952; also Hansard, March 10, 1948, page 2080.

To summarize our procedure, it can be said that no clear precedent concerning the dividing of a question can be found in our annals and that the ancient British procedure set out at page 298 of Bourinot's fourth edition has been superseded by another practice in the British house.

In other words, this would appear to be an unprovided case and ordinarily, under such circumstances, reference is made to current procedure in the British house. Such action is provided for by virtue of our standing order No. 1, which reads as follows:

> In all cases not provided for hereafter or by sessional or other orders, the usages and customs of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland as in force at the time shall be followed so far as they may be applicable to this house.

Accordingly, it is my view that the procedure which applies in this case is the current procedure used in the British house, one which perhaps has not been used too frequently but which nevertheless must be recognized, and if it is to be observed on this occasion it would appear that the question of the dividing of a complicated motion rests with the Chair.

In line with the ordinary procedure of our house, any decision in this regard would, of course, be subject to an appeal to the house.

Now, motion No. 44 which is under consideration today reads as follows:

That the government be authorized to take such steps—

Shall I dispense with the reading of this motion?

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Mr. Speaker: Taking into consideration the references and quotations just cited, and more especially the view expressed by the Speaker of the British house on November 13, 1912, where he said:

—the rule of course is if any honourable member feels embarrassed on voting on a resolution that the Chair shall revise the resolution in order that the member may, if he wishes to vote "Aye" on the one part and "No" on the other not be embarrassed by having to vote "Aye" or "No" on the whole of it,—

—I must come to the conclusion that the motion before the house contains two propositions, and since strong objections have been made to the effect that these two propositions should not be considered together, it is my duty to divide them as follows:

(a) That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

(b) That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to provide that the royal union flag, generally known as the union jack, may continue to be flown as a symbol of Canadian membership in the commonwealth of nations and of our allegiance to the crown.

Therefore, unless there should be an appeal to the house from my decision, and my decision is not sustained, it is my intention to put the question on the first part of the motion as divided.

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

Mr. Speaker: Since there is no appeal, the question now is as follows:

The Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) moves, seconded by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau):

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Are the members ready for the question?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the interesting discussion that preceded the opening of this debate, we went into a great deal of constitutional and parliamentary history. I do not propose to go back to 292 B.C., but I would remind the house that this is the 750th anniversary of the signing of Magna Carta, June 15, and perhaps it is an appropriate occasion for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to indicate that he is still standing on guard to protect what he considers to be the ancient rights and privileges of parliament.

Today is another anniversary, a little closer to home both in time and in space. One hundred years ago today, on Monday, June 15, there was a dramatic moment in Canadian history when, in parliament, Sir John A. Macdonald and George Brown, two strong and even bitter political opponents, agreed to meet and try to end their long antagonism for the purpose of creating a Canadian confederation which one day would stretch from sea to sea. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution which is now being discussed one hundred years later will, when action is taken on it, result in a united effort, above party and above personalities, to strengthen and ensure the survival of the confederation which Macdonald and Brown, putting patriotism above all else 100 years ago, did so much to create.

The resolution before the house, the procedural significance of which you have now indicated in so far as its possible division is concerned, reads as follows:

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag and also to provide that the royal union flag, generally known as the union jack, may continue to be flown as a symbol of Canadian membership—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Order, Mr. Speaker, that is not the resolution. You have separated it.

Mr. Pigeon: You have to change your speech.

Mr. Bell: The Prime Minister has the wrong speech.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition that I am not even allowed to read anything concerning the second part of the resolution as I open this debate. I ask your ruling on that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. You have decided that this motion consists of only certain words. The Prime Minister now finds himself in difficulty and he is trying to use the entire motion in order to forward his speech because he has not the material for the earlier part.

Mr. Pearson: I don't find myself in any difficulty whatsoever. The right hon. gentleman seems to find himself in a state of some excitement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Smallwood will be surprised.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, that was an uncalled for interjection, and I hope the right hon. gentleman will play his part in trying to keep this debate worthy of the occasion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On a question of privilege, it was to keep the debate worthy of the occasion that I asked that the Prime Minister stay within the rules and deal with only those portions that are today before the house, which is your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I objected to the division, and the Prime Minister, having taken advantage of the division is still holding to the original because he knows what Mr. Smallwood would think.

Mr. Pearson: It is too bad Mr. Smallwood has been brought into this debate so early in the proceedings—

Mr. Nowlan: He was in two weeks ago.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have a ruling. I would like your guidance as to whether, in my discussion of the resolution, I am not at any time to refer to the second part which deals with the royal union flag.

Mr. Speaker: The resolution was divided into two parts, (a) and (b), or resolutions Nos. 1 and 2, whichever terminology you care to apply. Under the heading of relevancy we are of course discussing a flag for Canada, which is the first resolution before the house. The question of relevancy is a very difficult one to rule on, and I would respectfully suggest to the Prime Minister that he try to stay within the resolution as proposed to the house by myself.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, does your ruling—which I of course accept—mean that we are to continue debate on the first part and take a decision on that and then, only after that decision are we permitted to speak on the second part?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what you agreed to.

Mr. Pearson: All right, I don't mind.

Mr. Speaker: The point before the house is a flag for Canada. The second resolution deals with the union jack, and I have suggested to the house that the joint resolution, if you want to call it that, be separated. We are now dealing with the first part, the flag for Canada. I admit that in dealing with this subject it is very difficult to rule out any reference to the past history of this country. You cannot just automatically forget the stirring years of the past history of our country, and therefore it seems to me that the Prime Minister, within reasonable limits and within the rule of relevancy, is entitled to make reference to things that have gone on in the past, which I presume might involve a reference to the union jack and what it stands for.

Mr. Pearson: So that there will be no misunderstanding later, may I ask you, sir, when is the second part of the resolution to be introduced in the house?

Mr. Speaker: I propose to introduce the second part or second resolution, if you wish, when the first part has been taken and determined.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I am quite happy about your decision. It clarifies the atmosphere and I shall be very happy to abide by it. I am now speaking and introducing that part of the resolution which deals with a Canadian national flag, and it would be impossible to deal with the Canadian national flag without showing how that flag has evolved, how it symbolizes the past and I hope, if I mention the union jack, hon. gentlemen opposite will not be too indignant.

Mr. Chatterton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, you indicated only a few minutes ago that the second resolution will be introduced in due course. Will that happen whether the first resolution is defeated or approved by the house?

Mr. Speaker: That is correct. It will be on the order paper as a separate resolution.

Canadian Flag

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, if I may continue, as I said a moment ago, this is a serious, a solemn and historic occasion and I venture to hope, as I also mentioned a moment ago, that the debate will be worthy of the occasion.

This is the first time in our history that parliamentary action has ever been requested by a Canadian government to decide on a national flag.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In that regard would the Prime Minister allow a question? Is it not a fact that the order in council of 1949 said that the red ensign shall continue to be the flag until parliament otherwise renders a decision?

Mr. Pearson: If my right hon. friend will conceal his impatience he will find I am dealing with this as I go along. I may say the order in council was not made in 1949. It was in 1945. But, Mr. Speaker, that is just what I was going to say. There was an order in council passed on September 5, 1945 and part of it read—and I shall return to it later:

> Until such time as action is taken by parliament for the formal adoption of a national flag...the red ensign may be flown.

Those are the words of the order in council.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Read all the words. You left some out.

Mr. Pearson: No such action has been taken by parliament. Until now no government has asked parliament to take such action. I know, as do all hon. members, that in 1945 a flag committee of the house was set up which made a report with a recommendation in regard to a flag.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was in 1946—the report.

Mr. Pearson: The committee, I said, was set up in 1945, which is correct. The report was made in 1946, I think in June or July. That report was made but no action was taken by parliament at that time, nor was any action asked by the government of Canada at that time. Someone says on the other side that if it had been asked for it would have been taken.

Mr. Nowlan: That is right.

Mr. Pearson: I am not here to dispute or agree with that, but it was not taken and therefore this is the first occasion on which parliamentary action has been asked for.

In order to meet the point that we as a government are rushing into this matter, that what we are asking parliament to do now has come in some way as a surprise to parliament and the people of Canada, it is desirable for me to put on the record the commitments I have made, as the leader of my party and now as the leader of the government, in regard to this matter. Back in January, 1960, following a broadcast I made, I issued a statement—and the broadcast dealt with this matter too. I made my position clear. This was as far back as 1960. And I proposed in that statement on January 27, 1960, the submission by government to parliament of a measure which, if accepted by representatives of the people in parliament would, I hoped, settle the problem of a national flag by agreement on a distinctive design which, unlike the red ensign—a flag never given formal sanction by parliament—could not be confused with certain United Kingdom or colonial flags and which was easily identifiable as Canadian. This was the position I took at that time, and it is the position I have taken consistently since that time. Indeed, in the letters which I have received over the years—and I have received a great many, especially in the last six weeks on the flag question—I have written as follows—and I am quoting now from a letter I have been sending out for a good many years to people complaining about action which might be proposed to change the red ensign. My replies have included these words:

> I assure you that I respect the union jack or the red ensign and all that they stand for in our history and traditions; and as a symbol of freedom and democracy. I have been proud to have served under the union jack in war and to have lived under it in England in peace and war. I hope that it can be kept, and flown on appropriate occasions as a flag symbolizing Canada's association with the other nations of the commonwealth and our monarchial connection. I do feel, however, that there should be a Canadian national flag which could not be mistaken for the emblem of any other country and which, by its acceptance, would be a strong unifying force in our country.

At our party rally in 1961 which laid down the policy to be followed by our party, the statement of policy included these words:

> A Liberal government will establish a distinctive Canadian flag within two years of taking office.

We are carrying out that policy laid down at the party rally. It was in the election platform of 1962 and, in 1963, the undertaking was repeated in exactly the same words:

> A new Liberal government will submit to parliament a design for a flag which cannot be mistaken for the emblem of any other country.

Our party's commitment to ask for a parliamentary decision on the flag extends over many years. The present resolution, therefore, should come as no surprise. We are not proceeding without due notice, nor are we ramming anything down parliament's throat as has been suggested.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Pearson: Now, for the first time in our history, parliament is being asked to decide this matter—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: —and parliament will decide it, one way or the other.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: I have also given pledges to parliament since the election of 1963—pledges in parliament. On November 12, 1963 the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked me a question with regard to representations I had been receiving from the Royal Canadian Legion on the flag issue, and in the course of my reply I stated:

I repeated to them, however—

The reference is to the Royal Canadian Legion.

—the commitment that this government had entered into for the production through parliament of a Canadian national flag within two years of being elected.

The Leader of the Opposition then asked:

Would the Prime Minister say whether such a flag will come before parliament, or simply be declared by way of order in council to be the national flag of Canada?

I replied that it would be a matter for parliament's decision. And it is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: On February 24, 1964, in answer to a question asked in this house I repeated that parliament should certainly be put in a position to decide for or against a particular flag. Parliament is now being put in that position.

May I call it five o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions.

DISABLED PERSONS ACT

AMENDMENTS CONCERNING PHYSICAL AND MENTAL CONDITIONS

Mr. Heber E. Smith (Simcoe North) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of enlarging the definition of a disabled person in the Disabled Persons Act, and the regulations pursuant thereto, to take into consideration such factors as the physical condition, the mental condition and the age of the applicant, and other factors which create a condition of permanent unemployability.

He said: While the business which has just preceded this private members' hour has generated a great deal of heat, I am not so sure that the matter now to be discussed is not equally important and deserving of the consideration of parliament.

It was just a year and a few days ago that I first brought a resolution before the house asking the government to consider an extension of the definition of the word "disabled" under the Disabled Persons Act.

At that time it was suggested by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Ryan) that such a course of action would be followed. We have waited a year, but the action has not come. A year ago I said there were four things which ought to be considered. The first would be the physical condition of the person concerned; the second would be the mental condition, the third would be the age and the fourth would be any permanent unemployability which might flow from the first three conditions. If the government does not change its mind—and that is a broad assumption to make; I cannot be sure this is government policy yet, because I have not heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) give official approval—some small steps are to be taken along the lines I have suggested. These are reflected in communications dealing with the Canada pensions act and the definition of disability for disability benefits. The proposal is as follows:

The general intention is to recognize those medical impairments in which disability is so prolonged and severe that the person is unable to secure substantial gainful employment. He need not be completely helpless to be unable to engage in substantial gainful activity.

If the government persists in this proposed definition it will certainly have my support. I should like to see them carry that definition into the Disabled Persons Act; and I mean carry it into the act now, not next year or in 1971, when the disability benefits under the proposed Canada pension plan commence.

Even if the Canada pension plan is enacted there will still be severe limitations on the pensions of those who are disabled. In the first place, the benefits, as I read the proposal, do not start until 1971 in the case of disabled people, which is still some six or seven years away. The second class of people who will not benefit are those who never become eligible under the proposed Canadian pension plan—for example those who never complete two years' contributions. There are many people who fall into that category at the present time, people who drift on from one relief roll to another. They will never come within the ambit of the proposed Canada pension act.

The third matter which I think should be taken into consideration concerns the benefits which are proposed. They are too low in the case of those who are disabled and unemployed. The benefits will not help the people who need them most. Surely the government's first responsibility is to help those least able to help themselves.

I would like to turn for a moment to another related part of the Disabled Persons Act—and this also applies to blind persons' pensions—and that is income ceilings. Income ceilings are very low. Where a wife or a husband is disabled, the earnings of the working spouse are considered in the eligibility of the disabled spouse for a pension. In most cases where either the husband or the wife is paraplegic extra expenses are involved in the home, but because of a very modest income on the part of the working member of the family they are disqualified. I know of one instance where a wife works and her husband's drug bill is something like $60 a month. Therefore I suggest the earnings of the working spouse should not be considered in fixing the income ceilings of such people under Disabled Persons Act.

Another instance which has come to my attention concerns the case of a wife in a wheelchair. The oldest daughter is kept at home to keep house. The father is the operator of a small farm, and the income is something like $1,500. They are disqualified under the act, and the daughter has to stay at home instead of earning.

There has recently been held in Ottawa a very fine conference on the family, which dealt with how to keep families together. I should like to suggest that one very practical and speedy way to help families with a disabled mother or father who are struggling to keep the family unit together is by lifting the income ceiling and paying the disabled person's pension, regardless of the earnings of the working spouse. I think the same provision as to income ceiling should apply to families where the wife is blind. In such cases there are always extra expenses involved, no matter how skilled she is. There are many matters which call for outside assistance. Insufficient use is made of food and many tasks have to be done by outside help. If a man is on a modest income and his wife is blind I think she should get the blind person's pension regardless of her income. This would help this sort of family. I realize our hospitals are crowded, but the present provisions of the act and the regulations under the act tend to keep a family apart. They tend to force a family to put a disabled member into a hospital or nursing home. It is always cheaper to keep disabled persons in their own homes.

Since this matter is not of the controversial nature of the one we have just been dealing with, I hope everyone will support it; and I am sure the government will get very quick action if they take the necessary steps I have suggested.

Mr. H. C. Harley (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on the hon. member's notice of motion. First of all, I should like to put a few facts on the record in connection with disability pensions. As all hon. members know, these pensions were first brought in in 1954. Since that time the numbers of pensioners have been increasing. In 1963 there were 50,621 people who received the pension, at a cost to the government, as part of course of a shared program with the provinces, of almost $20 million. The same year there were 17,659 applications, of which 5,500 odd were approved, something over 11,000 were declined, and 780 were either withdrawn by the applicant or the person involved passed away. Of the 11,500 which were declined, over 10,000 were turned down on medical reasons.

At the present time the federal administration of this plan is under the old age assistance division of the welfare branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare. That branch is responsible for the federal administration of disabled persons allowances. The medical features of the act are the responsibility of the medical rehabilitation division of the health branch. Medical decisions on applications are made both by the provincial and the federal medical examiners. At the present time there are federal-provincial agreements for sharing the cost of special medical examinations and medical referees. I should like to say in passing that, having been a medical practitioner, I certainly agree with the hon. member that we should simplify the application forms. They are very complicated and take a great deal of time to complete.

I am also interested in the hon. member's fourth point concerning permanent unemployability. I am not sure in my own mind whether he means permanent unemployability or permanent disability.

Mr. Smith: Unemployability.

Mr. Harley: Unemployability. Then this brings up the point: Are they one and the same? There is grave difference of opinion about this. Under the act at the present time we must assume they are the same thing. Many things other than health can make one permanently unemployable; I have only to mention education and skill. At the present time if one is not well enough to work and earn an income he applies for a disability pension.

I should like to read the definition of a permanently disabled person contained in the present Disabled Persons Act and the disabled persons regulations which were passed in December 1960. It is as follows:

> For the purpose of the act and these regulations, a person shall be deemed to be totally and permanently disabled when suffering from a major physiological, anatomical or psychological impairment verified by objective medical findings which is likely to continue indefinitely without substantial improvement and, as a result thereof, such person is severely limited in activities pertaining to normal living.

I should just like to deal with the interpretation as it is given here. The first factor, physical condition and mental condition, are covered in that definition. Then it refers to physiological, anatomical or psychological impairment. As far as age is concerned, at the present time the act specifies that a person must be 18 years of age and over to draw this allowance, and they can continue drawing it to the time they can be turned over to the old age assistance programs. I am not sure whether the hon. member means it should be granted to those below the age of 18.

Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Harley: Certainly.

Mr. Smith: Would he agree that under the present definition "normal living" excludes the ability to work and earn a living?

Mr. Harley: Would the hon. member rephrase his question, please?

Mr. Smith: The regulations refer to a person carrying out the functions of normal living. Is working for a living not one of those functions?

Mr. Harley: Again, Mr. Speaker, this brings me to the question of definition. I agree that one necessarily does not have to be working to be living normally, or vice-versa. To illustrate this, the act takes into consideration physical and mental factors as well as age. I should like to give to the house some statistics relating to people who now draw this allowance. The greatest number of people draw this allowance for reasons of mental deficiency. The second largest group are those suffering from arteriosclerosis and degenerative heart disease, which is of course most common in older people. The third group consists of those suffering neoplasms, or cancer as most people refer to it. The fourth group are those suffering from schizophrenia, which is of course another mental disease commonly known as split personality. When we come to the definition of "disability" as given in the regulations I think we should read into the record what the regulations say at the present time about disability. Reading from the disabled persons regulations, again, of December 16, 1960, we see:

> For the purpose of enabling the provincial authority to consider the eligibility of an applicant as regards his total and permanent disability, the applicant shall furnish or cause to be furnished, in such form as may be required by the provincial authority, a medical report signed and dated by a qualified physician, which shall state
> (a) the nature, extent and prognosis of the disability,
> (b) the findings upon which the diagnosis and prognosis were made,
> (c) the limitations in function imposed by the disability,
> (d) any other pertinent information concerning the disability, including any recommendations for further diagnostic work or treatment as may be relevant, and
> (e) any additional information required by the provincial authority.

Then section 2 is:

> The provincial authority shall consider the medical report required by subsection 1 and, before determining that the applicant is totally and permanently disabled, shall cause such medical investigation to be made as it may deem necessary in the circumstances.
> 3. The provincial authority shall, at least once in each year, cause such further medical review or investigation to be made as the nature of the recipient's disability may require.

I think this provision goes into great detail. As I have mentioned to the hon. member, on occasion I have had these forms to fill out and I certainly agree with him that they could be simplified; but I think what they ask for under the definition of "disability" is a reasonable thing. They want to be sure before they grant this pension that it is not going to be a temporary thing. They want to be sure also, of the basis on which the diagnosis was arrived at and how severely it is going to limit the person involved, and to obtain any other information they may deem desirable.

I would like to suggest to the hon. member that the regulations as they stand are all right, but the major problem is in their application. The regulations should be the same across Canada. To show what I mean, there is a table giving the percentage of recipients to the total population range. The last figures available are for 1955. They range from .750 in Prince Edward Island to .046 in the Yukon Territory. Taking into account the population, this means that 16 times as many people are drawing this pension in Prince Edward Island as are drawing it in the Yukon Territory. These figures are based upon the percentage of population in these two areas. I certainly agree with the hon. member that these figures show that the regulations are not being applied in each province uniformly.

Mr. Smith: Disabled people do not stay in the Yukon; it is too cold up there.

Mr. Harley: I am sure that would not account for 16 times as much disability. I would like to mention in passing, Mr. Speaker, that the most common age groups in this area of disability are 18 to 19, when the pension is first allowable, and 60 to 64, at which time most of these people become eligible for old age assistance programs.

I agree 100 per cent with the hon. member with regard to the income ceilings. I think these should certainly be raised. There is no question that a great many people spend a large part of their income on buying drugs for their disability. I think it would be a very simple thing to allow bills for drugs to be added to the income ceilings. Drugs these days are very expensive and I am sure they could take practically all the pension allowed for some illnesses. I would also agree that the allowances are not suitable and should be graded.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say I am sorry if I have misinterpreted what the hon. member has said, but at the present time I think many of the things he is looking for could be achieved if the application of the regulations was changed. In my opinion the application of regulations could be changed in such a way as to make them more uniform and more applicable across the country.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the attendance in the house and the galleries is not quite as large now as it was between 2.30 and five o'clock, but to a great many Canadians—in fact, to far too many—the matter we are now discussing is of very great importance. I commend the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Smith) for presenting this motion again this session as he did last session. I hope that one of these days what he asks for will be attained. It is not necessary to speak at any length to indicate our support of this motion; I indicated that support when this same proposition was before the house at the last session. However, I would like to take just a moment to thank the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Harley) for supporting the proposition, but at the same time to express my disagreement with him when he suggests there is nothing wrong with the regulations and that all that is wrong is the manner in which those regulations are applied.

If I recall correctly, during the course of his remarks he himself quoted from the act and from the regulations setting out the definition of "total disability". I submit that that definition is itself a barrier preventing many people receiving the allowance under the Disabled Persons Act. We have all had experience with this act. We have all had experience with people who have been denied the benefit that is available under it for the simple reason that they could still feed themselves and look after themselves in the most elementary ways. What we are concerned about is that the definition itself be broadened so that people who are disabled in the ordinary sense, as we know them and as we see them, can get the benefit of this act.

It does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that in relation to this piece of legislation, as in relation to other pieces of social security legislation, parliament should in this affluent age be much more generous than we have been thus far. We sometimes tend to pride ourselves on the number of pieces of social legislation that have been put on the statute books during the past 40 years, and therefore we think we have done a good job. I submit that in terms of our capacity and in terms of the needs that some of our people suffer we really have not done very well at all.

I shall have something more to say on this general subject the next day that private members' notices of motions are called, because the very next one on the list is in my name and calls for doing something about filling the major gaps in this country's social security program. Therefore I need say nothing more on this occasion. I simply want to support wholeheartedly the request that has been placed before the house in the motion moved by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Smith) and I hope that hon. members who are present will permit this motion to be voted on before six o'clock.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I notice there are a number of members who want to speak on this notice of motion and for that reason I am going to be very brief. I want to say that we extend our congratulations to the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Smith) for bringing forward this notice of motion again.

I was interested in the remarks made by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Harley) when he spoke of the interpretation of what total and permanent disability means. In my experience this has been the biggest problem we have had. I believe that one of the major improvements that could be made in applying the regulations under the Disabled Persons Act would be to take into consideration the matter of income as opposed to permanent medical disability. After all, the provision of money by way of a pension certainly is not going to do very much toward correcting the medical problem, and in my opinion the legislation is specifically designed to provide income for those people who have disabilities of such a nature that they are prevented from earning income. Therefore I think the emphasis should be placed on the consideration of whether or not the individual applying for a pension can in fact earn any income. If the present interpretation or definition of permanent and total disability, from a medical point of view, is to be the criterion, then I think we are losing sight of the purpose of the act which is to provide income for people who are disabled in such a way that they are unable to earn it themselves.

Over the years I think most members of the house have had experiences in attempting to get applications for disability pensions approved. Almost invariably you run up against the question of what permanent disability means. My experience has been that unless a person is almost confined to bed, disabled to the point where he cannot even move around the house and cannot do anything, quite apart from being able to earn income, the application is not approved. So some credence can be given to what the hon. member for Halton has said, that perhaps the present wording of the regulations would be satisfactory if they were applied a little differently. I hope that when the government is ready to make changes in the application of the act they will give high priority to the consideration of the ability to earn income rather than the degree of medical disability.

In the province of Alberta the provincial government has recognized the shortcomings of the federal act and of a number of other acts where the province and the federal government co-operate in providing pensions. They have proceeded to set up what they call social allowances for people who find themselves in a position where they cannot quite qualify under the regulations of the federal act. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) may be interested in this because, as he has pointed out, he has a notice of motion standing on the order paper, in fact the very next one, which is designed to fill some of the gaps. I think that he and other members of the house could benefit from studying what the province of Alberta has done during the past few months.

Today the social welfare agency of the province of Alberta considers each application on the basis of the individual merits and individual needs of the case. No specific pension is predetermined as used to be the case. They take into consideration the cost of living, including such things as food, clothing and shelter. They even take into consideration the matter of drugs. After all these factors are considered they arrive at a monthly payment, call it a pension if you will, that will meet these requirements.

In addition, Alberta has now embarked on a rather large program of building nursing care hospitals or custodial hospitals, if you prefer that term. These are designed for people who are disabled but have afflictions of a nature not requiring active hospital treatment. They are not even in the category of those who would be accepted into auxiliary or chronic care hospitals. These new hospitals are designed for people who are unable to take care of themselves.

I can foresee a situation developing where it will be substantially cheaper for a number of disabled people to be committed to these nursing care hospitals and it will cost Canadian taxpayers more to keep them there than to provide a reasonable pension enabling them to stay at home. If some income were provided to take care of the purchase of drugs and other necessities of life, in many cases these people could quite adequately be taken care of in their own homes. In some cases I think this would be more satisfactory to the persons involved and more satisfactory to their families. I think, therefore, some consideration should be given to extending and broadening the definitions and the qualifications under which the federal government participates in this program for these people.

I know that that kind of motion has been introduced into this house a number of times. I am ready to admit also that there have been some concessions or some relaxing, if you like, of the regulations over the years. I do not believe that this procedure has reached the point whereby we can make payments that would be in the best interests of both the people involved and the Canadian taxpayer. I say that because there are many services that could be provided for disabled persons in their own homes which, because of a lack of income, they are prevented from having.

I should like to extend our support to the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Smith) on this motion. I hope, too, that some of the opinions expressed by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Harley) are going to be accepted by the government so that we can have some broadening of these definitions.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I shall only take a few moments because I notice there are other members who would like to speak on this subject. I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Smith) for having brought this matter up on several occasions. I certainly agree with the remarks made by him, by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Harley) with certain qualifications, by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member who just resumed his seat. I am very glad to see the minister is listening to this debate, and I am sure she would do well for herself if she dealt with this matter as quickly as possible by recommending to her cabinet colleagues some of the suggested changes. In addition, she would be doing a great service to a large number of people in this country who are disabled to a total and permanent degree.

Of course, it is this question of what is total and what is permanent that causes all the problems in the administration of these regulations. Without being unkind to the medical profession, I would say that very often it depends upon which doctor you go to whether it is decided you are permanently and totally disabled. I mean no disrespect to the medical profession but doctors, like the members of other professions, have differences of opinion. Some doctors seem to be more flexible in their views than others, and the regulations are very rigid. Indeed, unless the medical facts can be made more flexible it is going to be very difficult for any but a very limited number to gain any benefit from this legislation.

I should like to give the house an example that recently came to my attention indicating the need for a change in these regulations. A lady in my constituency was judged totally and permanently disabled by the Ontario workmen's compensation board. As no doubt hon. members from Ontario know, this board has very rigid rules as to what is total and permanent disability. Certainly, they are never too generous in their interpretation of these regulations. In any event, the applicant in question was judged totally and permanently disabled by the workmen's compensation board but for technical reasons, namely that part of the disability was caused not by the industrial accident but by other causes, the patient was only able to get a small pension. Then, application was made for the disabled persons allowance. However, she was told: "The workmen's compensation board may say you are totally and permanently disabled, but we do not have to say so." She did not get anything.

This is the kind of thing that needs checking up. I hope the minister is putting this item high on her agenda for changes in the regulations. I was particularly interested, of course, in this question of raising the ceilings on permissible income for those receiving these benefits. If anyone needs a little extra income it is these people who are disabled. They need it for drugs and the services of people to come in and help look after them and their living quarters. Certainly, these ceilings should be raised.

There is one suggestion I should like to make to the minister and it may be one that could be introduced without causing too drastic a change in the resolution. I suggest the adoption of the same principle that is used, at least in theory, by the Canadian pension commission. If there is some question of whether or not a person is going to be permanently and totally disabled in the future, the pension commission gives the benefit of the doubt to that person. I believe the application of such a principle might be of great help to these people. In all fairness, no one wants to be paying a pension to every applicant who comes along and who is not entitled to a pension. If this benefit of the doubt principle were applied, it might be helpful in the interpretation of these regulations.

In conclusion, I may say that I hope the minister will give consideration to recommending these changes just as quickly as possible. One further matter I should like to mention is this question of the blind pension. It has been suggested over the years that the blind persons' allowance be paid to these persons regardless of income; that there be no income qualification. I suppose the principle here is that if a person is deprived of his sight he is deprived of one of the most valuable assets in making a living, and that compensation should be paid regardless of income because, regardless of what income he may have it is presumed he would be able to make more if he had his sight. This argument would apply to those who are receiving the disabled persons' allowance. They are, likewise, deprived of their ability to make a living, in whole or in part, and therefore should receive some basic compensation from society. I feel this is a point that is worthy of consideration. I believe this principle should be given consideration to a greater extent than it is at the present time in considering employability or income producing ability. This should be taken into consideration in assessing the amount that should be received by those who receive the disabled persons' allowance.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Smith) for bringing to the attention of this house the sorry plight of many people in this country who are not just sick but totally and permanently disabled. It is true that the people in this category are unable to work. However, some attention should be given to the fact that by seeking to enlarge the Disabled Persons Act and the regulations, as a result of this motion, I believe the hon. member is confusing the whole issue.

The hon. member's motion, Mr. Speaker, would upset the basic principle of the Disabled Persons Act by introducing the concept of employability. Such a step would make the disabled persons allowance superfluous, and impossible to distinguish from the Unemployment Assistance Act which is now a part of the social legislation, federally and provincially, because it is a partnership.

So far as enlarging the definition of a disabled person is concerned I fail at the moment to understand how the present definition can be enlarged further. This definition can be found under the Disabled Persons Act, office consolidation, 1961, and it states:

> For the purposes of the act and these regulations, a person shall be deemed to be totally and permanently disabled when suffering from a major physiological, anatomical or psychological impairment verified by objective medical findings which is likely to continue indefinitely without substantial improvement and, as a result thereof, such person is severely limited in activities pertaining to normal living.

In my own experience as a medical practitioner I cannot agree with the statements that were made in this house concerning the applications for Ontario, because in my private experience I notice that more and more patients for whom I have filled out the medical reports for disability pensions are being accepted by the Ontario medical advisory board. However I must say a complete evaluation of the patient's status physically is not the entire solution in this matter, because a social report is also required by the regulations.

This social report is designed to provide the medical review board of each province with a clear picture of the applicant in his normal circumstances. It provides evidence of the degree of actual handicap which the impairment involves, and also indicates the extent to which the applicant has overcome difficulties in the past. It helps to identify those persons who would be capable of helping themselves if they received special assistance.

The intention of the act is not to make sick people permanently and totally disabled. In Canada we have progressively been making laws, and through government funds helping to increase the rehabilitation services. In this field of disabled persons I think that is where much emphasis and effort should be put in the future, that is, trying to make these people not only comfortable but placing them in the position to be active, even active to such a point as to earn a living. Nobody wants to be called a cripple and a useless person.

I would also like to draw to the attention of the house the vocational rehabilitation act which was passed by this parliament. This act also helps to assist in returning disabled persons to gainful employment. Furthermore, international meetings are convened from time to time to study social security problems, including the particular problem to which we are addressing our attention at the moment.

I would like to draw to the attention of hon. members that the International Social Security Association in its "Report on the Activities of the Working Group on Harmonizing the Criteria for the Evaluation of Invalidity" published in its bulletin of October, 1962, recognizes several elements posed by the complex problem of invalidity evaluation. I believe most hon. members will find this report helpful to them in studying this problem and in seeing how social agencies of various countries are working zealously to harmonize the criteria upon which a medical review board can call a person permanently and totally disabled.

For the record, and so far as my own province of Ontario is concerned, I would like to state that the disabled persons allowances act of Ontario, dated 1955, states in its regulation (4) that an advisory board is to be established "consisting of three persons, of whom at least one shall be a duly qualified medical practitioner" and in regulation (2) that the "chairman of the advisory board shall be a duly qualified medical practioner." Furthermore the regulations state:

> The advisory board shall assist the director in determining eligibility of applicants by > (a) reviewing medical evidence submitted in support of the application,
> (b) obtaining any additional necessary evidence, and
> (c) furnishing to the director a report on the evidence with a specific finding as to whether or not the applicant is totally and permanently disabled as prescribed by the regulations under the Disabled Persons Act (Canada).

This board is not a static thing. It meets from time to time to discuss definitions of chronic illnesses, to bring up to date the evidence of medical research so far as certain chronic illnesses are concerned, and what is available in the field of rehabilitation to return these people to an active way of living.

Further this board reviews medical statistics and I should like to point out that in the year April 1960 to March 1961, in which, in the 10 provinces of Canada, 6,448 cases were approved, the greatest percentage of the disabled were found in the category of mental, psychoneurotic and personality disorders. This group consisted of 2,164 disabled persons, or 33.6 per cent of the total for that year. This group contained not only cases of mental deficiency, such as those we call mentally retarded, but also schizophrenic disorders and other personality diseases.

The second group was the group called diseases of the nervous system and sense organs, and consisted of 20.3 per cent of the total, or 1,306 out of the 6,448. This category consisted of epileptics, spastics suffering from cerebral paralysis, cerebral embolism and thrombosis, multiple sclerosis, cerebral spastic infantile paralysis, and other disabilities.

The third group consisted of persons afflicted with diseases of the circulatory system and these formed 17.9 per cent of the total, or 1,154 cases. They included arteriosclerotic and degenerative heart cases, hypertensive disease not otherwise reported, other and unspecified diseases of the heart and chronic rheumatic heart disease. This was followed by a category called "diseases of the bones and organs of movement", which cases formed 7.7 per cent of the total. These were people suffering from rheumatoid arthritis and allied conditions, osteoarthritis and similar disabilities. A further group consisted of people suffering from terminal stages of cancer. Some of these cases dragged out for many months, even years. They accounted for 5 per cent of the total, or 322 cases.

Next in line came the allergic, endocrine system, metabolic and nutritional diseases. These diseases included diabetes mellitus. The next group covered infective and parasitic diseases; and the next group consisted of diseases of the respiratory system including bronchitis and other diseases which render a person chronically and totally disabled.

As I have mentioned, I believe our efforts should be directed towards rehabilitation. The government should be congratulated for having taken steps last year to help the agencies which are working in this field. I think we should not only help the disabled to obtain pensions with greater facility; we should make it possible for them to enjoy life —to pass measures to put them on their feet again, and even give them an opportunity of earning a living.

Mr. Rémi Paul (Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière): Mr. Speaker, allow me to congratulate the sponsor of this motion who put forward the true reasons why he submitted this recommendation to the government for consideration so that amendments could be made to the Disabled Persons Act in order to extend its benefits to a greater number of persons, not because they are ill, but rather because they are permanently unfit for work.

The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) is against this resolution as a matter of principle—

Mr. Haidasz: On the contrary.

Mr. Paul: I realized quite well that the hon. member attempted to assimilate the wording of this resolution to the present legislation, and more especially to the Unemployment Assistance Act.

I think that the hon. member, who is a medical doctor by profession and whose reputation is well established, can quite readily grasp the difference between an individual who is temporarily ill and who puts his family in such financial straits that it must get social assistance and another individual who does not fall into a category of infirmity or specific disability which would make him eligible for benefits under the present provisions of the act.

Mr. Speaker, it often happens that some people who are physically able to look after themselves are denied a disability pension although their health prevents them, as so well stated in the resolution moved by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Smith), from holding a permanent position.

Mr. Speaker, I feel the government should make the necessary changes to broaden the scope of the act or to make its benefits more readily available because, as I said a while ago, it often happens that a person who suffers from diabetes, asthma or heart trouble cannot qualify for a pension under the Disabled Persons Act.

Yet, legislative changes must be made to enable such people to follow treatments and to look after the needs of their family. In fact, I greatly appreciated the remarks made by the hon. member for Simcoe North who suggested that the pension for invalidity should be paid directly to the disabled and not be considered as family income as it is under the present legislation.

For instance, last Saturday, a widow with five deaf-mute children, some of them suffering from epilepsy, came to my office. She cannot receive the full amount of the pension now provided because it is alleged that the $30 collected for each of her children goes into the family budget. And yet, we know that the health condition of those persons can entail a great deal of expenses.

Mr. Speaker, I know that the hour for the consideration of private members' business is just about over, but I should like to commend again the hon. member for Simcoe North for introducing this motion. I am convinced that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh), who has followed the debate rather carefully, will take into consideration the suggestions that were made so that the largest possible number of people in need of assistance may benefit from federal assistance.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour for consideration of private members' business having expired, the house will revert to the business interrupted at five o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock this day are as follows:

The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Coates), Canadian flag, reported threats to supporters of red ensign; the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Gray), housing, request for further consideration of redevelopment projects; the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Smallwood), trade, steps to increase exports to Britain.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, in dealing with this important resolution before us and the procedure that might be followed to bring it into effect, if it meets the wishes of parliament, there has been some criticism to the effect that the resolution should not be submitted to parliament at this time but that there should be a referendum or a plebiscite before action by government or parliament; or that it should be submitted—and this has been another proposal—to a federal-provincial conference for agreement and a decision.

As to the latter, Mr. Speaker, surely this would not be the most effective or the right procedure to follow. Those provinces which have separate flags chose them without reference to the federal government or federal parliament, and they were, of course, right in doing so. The choice was within their own responsibility. Similarly, the choice of a national flag is the responsibility of the federal government and the federal parliament. Reference of the matter to a federal-provincial conference would not only in my view be the wrong procedure constitutionally, but it would postpone any decision for a long time. Every province presumably would have to agree on a design, which would presumably mean that every provincial legislature would have to agree on a national design. Any such agreement would certainly be a long and difficult process if indeed it were possible at all.

As for a referendum or a plebiscite, I have received a great many representations on this emphasizing the desirability of following this course in a matter of such deep and wide national importance. It is interesting, and it is therefore important to look into the precedents in regard to the use of the referendum in our parliamentary and constitutional systems.

There have been only two precedents for referenda or plebiscites in Canada. One was in 1898 when there was a plebiscite on prohibition. The prohibition plebiscite act of 1898 provided for a direct appeal to the people on this matter. The plebiscite at that time involved the substantial application of all the procedures required by the dominion elections act. The result was that there was a substantial majority in favour of prohibition in the over-all vote and a very large majority for prohibition in all the provinces except Quebec, which was strongly against prohibition. Perhaps because of this division no action of any kind was taken as a result of that plebiscite.

There is another instance, closer to our day, of the use of the plebiscite, and some hon. members in this house were in parliament at the time and recall this. It was in 1942 when the government of the day consulted the people about conscription, and the terms of the plebiscite read: "Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the method of raising men for military service?" Before this plebiscite could be undertaken legislation had first to be passed to provide regulations to set out in detail the provisions for taking the vote. Those regulations comprised 78 sections, and 37 forms were necessary for all aspects of the vote. It required many months, from the introduction of the legislation on February 13, 1942 to the announcement of the results on May 11, 1942. Those are the only two instances in our history, Mr. Speaker, when this constitutional device was adopted.

There are strong arguments, I submit, against a referendum or a plebiscite. In the first place, I believe it is essentially out of keeping with our system of parliamentary democracy and responsible government. The very fact that there have been only two plebiscites in the entire history of this country and, so far as I am aware, none at all in the entire history of the United Kingdom indicates that this is not a part of our parliamentary system of government. The essence of our parliamentary system is that the people elect members of parliament on the basis of broad positions of policy and programs and they expect the members of parliament to assume the responsibility of making decisions in the national interest based on those positions. That is the purpose for which members of parliament are elected. The government's responsibility is to decide on policy, to present that policy to parliament for consideration, and they hope support, and to stand and fall on the decisions parliament takes. If parliament decides that it cannot support a government on a matter of major policy, our system does then provide for a referendum, a referendum to the people in an election.

Votes in a special referendum on a special subject would be by constituencies, and any cleavage on racial or geographical lines would be highlighted over the six or seven months period of the referendum and subsequent action. That seems to me to be a great disadvantage in the adoption of this constitutional procedure.

This disadvantage was emphasized in the debate in 1942, when the government came to parliament with a proposal for a plebiscite in that year. I quote from Hansard of January 26, 1942, and the words of the acting leader of the Conservative opposition, Mr. Hanson, when he said, as reported at page 26:

> Let this government—

—referring to Mr. Mackenzie King's government—

> —rise to the level of its duty; let it not be afraid to lead. A plebiscite is not a policy; it is the negation, it is the avoidance of a policy... Its purpose is to avoid rather than to face responsibility; it is to avoid rather than to enforce the performance of a duty. It is not a declaration of faith; it is a declaration of impotence.

So spoke Mr. Hanson at that time. The member for Lake Centre, now the right hon. gentleman, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) speaking in the same debate on January 30, 1942, as reported at page 186 of Hansard, said this:

> Allow the members of parliament to vote on this question. Do not submit the question to the people of Canada, for in my opinion, the taking of a plebiscite at this time may well destroy the unity of Canada.

Later, when the decision was made, he said this on February 25, 1942, as reported at pages 836 and 837 of Hansard:

> A plebiscite is to be taken regardless of the fact that in the long history of Great Britain, with all the constitutional changes which have taken place, no government has ever submitted any matter to the people by way of plebiscite.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the time has now come for the government, in our tradition of responsible government, to take action by submitting this resolution to parliament for decision. Parliament will then take the responsibility and parliament will decide. If the government resolution is defeated, then on a matter of such major importance the government has obviously lost the confidence of parliament. If an amendment is submitted, as I presume there might be, substituting the red ensign for the maple leaf design, and if it were passed, then that flag, by action of the parliament of Canada, would become the flag of Canada.

Some hon. Members: It is.

Mr. Pearson: By order in council it is, until parliament makes a decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: But if parliament accepts the resolution as it is now, then the flag in the resolution, accepted by parliament, will be submitted to the Queen for a royal proclamation, as is the proper procedure, and it becomes Canada's flag by true parliamentary mandate. It will not be the flag of a person or a party; it will be the flag of the people of Canada by the decision of their representatives in parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Webb: A political flag.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I believe that this is the right procedure. I believe that this is the right moment in our history to take this decision. May I quote the Right Hon. Vincent Massey, speaking in Charlottetown on June 1 at the annual meeting of the Association of Canadian Clubs. He said then:

> Historians, I am sure, will point to the early 1960's as a time of doubt about our future as a nation, when we were subject to dangerously heavy constitutional and emotional strains; when the very structure of our national life was questioned; when people were prepared to ask whether the Canadian experiment was worth while; when union with a more powerful neighbour was talked about with a freedom that would have been looked on as treason in former years; when the cynics and the fainthearted dared to belittle the deeds of their fathers and instil doubts in their sons.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that a national flag of the kind described in this resolution, that will be exclusively Canadian, will bring us closer together; give us a greater feeling of national identity and unity. Today especially, as Mr. Massey has reminded us, we need faith and confidence in ourselves as Canadians, with pride in Canada, devotion to our country. I believe that the adoption of this resolution will help to produce that result. If I did not deeply and sincerely so believe, I would not be introducing it into this House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, in taking this position, I know there are others—

An hon. Member: Joey.

Mr. Pearson: —who are as patriotic and as Canadian as I am or can ever hope to be, who disagree honestly and deeply. I respect that kind of honest disagreement. I know, also, that a flag issue is bound to raise strong and deep and genuine emotions. All national symbols have a deep meaning and create strong sentiments. That is why they are so important in national growth; in nourishing loyalty and patriotism among those who make up our nation. It is inevitable, therefore, that there will be strong emotional reactions when there is any suggestion that old symbols should be dropped, or adapted to new conditions and new needs.

Whatever our strength of feeling may be, however, on one side or the other I am sure we can discuss this matter in this house with respect for each other's views and in a way, as I said this afternoon, which will be worthy of the historic importance of this occasion. We have a responsibility to history in this debate and I am sure we all wish to be worthy of that responsibility, on whatever side of the house we sit. And when a decision is reached, whatever that decision may be, we will all, I know, abide by it and do what we can to secure its universal acceptance in this country.

Mr. Speaker, the resolution before us represents another stage in our development as a nation. It reflects and underlines a healthy Canadian nationalism—not a nationalism that is narrow or prejudiced or chauvinistic. There is no room for that in this age of interdependence, when the demands of even the most fervid nationalism have often to be subordinated, in the interests of the nation itself, to the requirements of internationalism.

And so, in its recognition of our new nationalism, the maple leaf flag of this resolution does not ignore the obvious truth that nationalism is not enough, or the equally obvious truth, as was pointed out to us some days ago in the house by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas), that, while it is a heartening and stirring thing to have a distinctive national flag, it is even better to have it flying over a free and flourishing country with social justice and social security for all.

Why, Mr. Speaker, do I think it is a desirable thing to have a new flag now? In order to answer my own question I want to look at the record. The flags we have used for Canada have already changed as Canada has evolved from colony to self-governing dominion to independent nation, to a sovereign state respected among the states of the world. As these changes of symbol have taken place to keep pace with other changes, our formal links with the United Kingdom have changed also. But our ties of friendship and, for so many Canadians, of kinship, have not weakened. They are as strong as ever. But they are not now associated with any kind of political or legal subordination, and that makes it possible for them to be stronger. There are now ties of affection, respect, tradition and adherence to the same basic ideals, cherished links through having the same Queen and being members of the same commonwealth of nations. But as our formal ties have changed, and they have—I wish I had time to go over the record of the changes; it is a good record for Canada—so have our formal symbols changed.

In this evolution I believe that the time has now come for another change, by the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag which cannot be mistaken for or confused with the emblem of any other country but Canada. I believe that a flag of the design described in the resolution would be a good one for this purpose, that it will symbolize and be a true reflection of the new Canada and, as such, will strengthen national unity and give us a deeper sense of national identity and national pride. It will be something around which all Canadians, new and old, native born and naturalized, of all racial stocks, can rally, and which will be the focus of their loyalty to Canada. So I believe that the position taken in this resolution is forward looking, is responsible, is wise and is deserving of support by this house and the people of this country.

It is argued, Mr. Speaker, and I can appreciate the strength of the argument, that the flag of this resolution ignores our past. In my view it does not. No one would deny, of course, that we have a responsibility to the past. But we have also a greater responsibility to the present and to the future. Moreover, our responsibility to the past will be best discharged now by being true to its real substance and its real meaning and will relate that past to a united nation in the future. To do that, Mr. Speaker, we all have to make certain concessions of sentiment, as we have in the past as our nation has grown. May I quote the words of Premier Stanfield of Nova Scotia in this connection on April 6 last at the Canadian club in Montreal, when he said:

> Surely, however, it is not necessarily patriotic for me to insist that something I value highly must be adopted as a national symbol if it is objectionable as a national symbol to a large number of Canadians. Surely the Canadian thing for us to do is to find symbols which are mutually acceptable. Let us emphasize what we have in common. Surely we can have a national anthem and a flag that unites Canada.

In that same spirit the Canadian Chamber of Commerce not long ago adopted the following resolution at its annual meeting:

> That the parliament of Canada formally adopt and authorize a distinctive national flag.

Because, as the resolution went on to say:

> A distinctive national flag would be a strong, unifying influence, consistent with the status of full nationhood.

I should also like to quote a resolution of the Association of Canadian Clubs adopted at Charlottetown as recently as June 2 last, which reads:

> Canadian clubs in biennial conference assembled support a Canadian flag that is simple, dignified and distinctive; and offer their services, if and when parliament has approved a Canadian flag, in promoting its acceptance throughout Canada.

Some hon. members will say: Have we not such a flag now? I do not think so, and I should like to explain why I do not think so. The red ensign has served Canada honourably and well since it was designated for such service by order in council; but those who are in favour of retaining it and making it permanent and official by parliamentary action must surely realize that basically—this is certainly no disrespect to the red ensign—it is the flag of the British merchant marine and that it is similar, except for a different coat of arms, to the flags of certain British colonies.

I have done some research on this and I have no doubt other hon. members have too. It is true, and this has a bearing on the distinctiveness of the red ensign and its identification with Canada, that apart from Canada and its merchant vessels more than a dozen merchant navies, British companies and other countries, British colonies, use the British red ensign as a base for their flags. Indeed, half of these are British colonies. The majority of these flags based on the red ensign have a badge or coat of arms in the fly which, at no great distance, may be easily confused with the Canadian shield, or vice-versa.

That, Mr. Speaker, seems to me to detract from the acceptability of the red ensign as a permanent distinctive and exclusively Canadian flag, truly representative of all the people of this country, and I am confirmed in this view when I examine, as I propose to do now, the way the red ensign developed for Canadian use.

The red ensign was first authorized in 1892 for use on Canadian ships by the British admiralty. It has since been authorized by the Canadian and British governments for Canadian use in various respects, but never by parliament as a national flag, and only by order in council until parliament has acted on a national flag.

It was, for instance, used on government buildings at the beginning of this century but, because of the lack of formal adoption as a national flag, it was withdrawn by the minister of public works from such use in 1908.

In an effort to clear up subsequent uncertainty as to what was the Canadian flag, even for government buildings, the colonial secretary in London stated in 1912 that the union jack was the national flag of Canada. And so it remained for many years; all through world war I, when the union jack was the flag of the Canadian forces under which Canadians served and under which many Canadians died. The red ensign, though many of my correspondents do not seem to appreciate this, was not in use during world war I in any way, shape or form for the Canadian forces.

It was not until January 26, 1924, that an order in council was passed authorizing the red ensign to be flown for limited use over all government buildings abroad, and that became essential because we were building up a diplomatic service and for obvious reasons we had to have some flag to fly over Canadian embassies that was not the union jack.

And so the situation remained until towards the end of world war II when in 1944, by order in council, the red ensign was authorized to be flown by our forces overseas. Then, on September 5, 1945, was passed that order in council to which reference has already been made more than once, decreeing that, until such time as action is taken by parliament for the formal adoption of a national flag, the red ensign may be flown wherever place or occasion may make it desirable to fly a distinctive Canadian flag. That is the authority given in 1945, not by parliament but by order in council, by which the red ensign has been flying as a Canadian flag.

It is very interesting to note that, as this evolution in our flag symbols took place, there was always very strong opposition expressed to any change. This was especially true when the red ensign was officially authorized to replace the union jack, when very great objection indeed was taken in certain quarters to the change from the union jack.

In my view, the time has come for a further and final change. If, as I believe to be the case, Canada needs a national flag and if the red ensign is not the most appropriate design for this purpose, what should that design be? In my view, it should be based on three red maple leaves because that is our formal and historic emblematic link with our Canadian past. The record shows this quite conclusively.

The maple leaf itself has been accepted as a Canadian symbol since long before confederation. It is deep in our history and in our traditions. Contemporary records all through the nineteenth century are full of references to it. For instance, during the visit of the Prince of Wales to Canada in 1860, all citizens of Upper Canada were asked to wear sprigs of maple leaves as the emblem of their land so that, in the words of the old Toronto Globe, they would be known to the world as Canadians. The symbolism grew until Canada came to be known, as it is known now, as the land of the maple leaf.

Canadian Flag

In war it has become the emblem of the men in uniform; their official and their unofficial emblem. The words "maple leaf", in fact are synonymous with Canada in uniform. Those words mean a great deal, as the maple leaf badge does, to all veterans of the two world wars. The official badges of the three armed services all include maple leaves, and have for a hundred years. A similar situation applies to regimental badges. Of the 462 cap badges of Canadian units in world war I, 409 included the maple leaf; of 133 in world war II, 83 included maple leaves. It is the official emblem of Canada in NATO and is the central device of the Canadian U.N. patch worn in Egypt, the Congo and Cyprus. It is on regimental flags, war service buttons, medals and decorations. It was used by the Royal Canadian Naval ships in world war II for identification by painting a large red maple leaf on the front.

Just after the end of hostilities in world war II the Canadians forces newspaper, the Maple Leaf, printed many letters from soldiers on the question of a distinctive Canadian flag, indeed they encouraged expression of viewpoint of the men in uniform who were at that time awaiting demobilization. A majority favoured a flag with a maple leaf design as a unifying element, representative of Canada itself, without reference in its design to one or the other of Canada's found-in graces. The Canada medal authorized in 1943 but not yet issued has three maple leaves conjointed on one stem.

An hon. Member: What happened to that?

Mr. Pearson: We will be resurrecting that, perhaps, one of these days.

A special copy on parchment of the bill of rights printed for distribution to schools, and with the name of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) on it, bears three maple leaves on one stem, although I confess this insignia is not as prominent as I wish it had been.

The Leader of the Opposition, on December 20, 1963, as recorded on page 6226 of Hansard, in discussing the world fair symbol—hon. members will recall that debate when the house took violent exception to a symbol which has now been judged by North American experts as the symbol of the century—said this:

—I would have thought that this would be an ideal occasion to place the maple leaf in the centre to show it was Canadian.

[Mr. Pearson.]

I am inclined to think he was right. Then, as recorded on page 6233, the right hon. gentleman had this to say:

—I was particularly impressed—by the hon. member for Leeds, who pointed out that the official emblem of Canada is three maple leaves.

All this is pretty impressive sponsorship for the three maple leaves design.

Indeed, the three joined red maple leaves have for us a historic and heraldic significance which, in my view, make them preferable on a flag, to a single maple leaf which has not the same significance and has not, in fact, any formal emblematic authority; but that does not necessarily exclude it from consideration.

The three joined maple leaves first appear in our history in a heraldic sense in 1868, when Queen Victoria gave "armourial ensigns" to Ontario and Quebec based on a sprig of three maple leaves. The Great Seal of Canada also carries three maple leaves.

Mr. Aiken: So does the red ensign.

Mr. Pearson: So does the red ensign; indeed it does. I think it accounts for about one forty secondth of the flag.

Then in 1921, and I believe this is of very considerable and formal significance, an order in council was passed and a royal proclamation was issued approving arms for Canada which included, as the purely Canadian part, three maples leaves on one stem with the motto "A mari usque ad mare" and established white and red as the official colours of Canada.

If I may paraphrase this royal proclamation of 1921 establishing the arms of Canada, by simplifying the heraldic language, what it said in essence was this: The King, at the request of Canada, assigns to Canada the national colours white and red, and declares that the national emblem of Canada shall be three red maple leaves on one stem, on a white field. These shall be used to represent Canada on all appropriate occasions.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, that answers the two questions "What are our national colours"? and "What is our national emblem"? By order in council on April 26, 1922, this Canadian coat of arms replaced the shield formerly used on the red ensign, and in 1957, under the administration of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, the arms of Canada with the three joined maple leaves were simplified and confirmed.

In 1939, at the beginning of the second world war, the government authorized a battle flag for the first division and presented that flag to the commander of the division as it embarked for overseas. The basic feature of its design was three red maple leaves on a white background.

Then in 1962 the Queen adopted as a personal flag for Canada one which had in its design the three red maple leaves, joined, on a white background. This flag, which flies only over the place where the Queen is actually in residence in Canada and is not used or authorized to be used for any other purpose, was announced from the palace in London and government house in Ottawa as a "flag of the arms of Canada charged in the centre with Her Majesty's own device." This of course, was done after consultation with and agreement from the Canadian government.

In the light of this, Mr. Speaker, can there be any doubt that the design recommended in the resolution is a proper one; with Canadian history, Canadian tradition and official sanction on the highest levels behind it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: It is because this design has such a history and because, with the blue sea-to-sea border, it makes a striking and beautiful flag, that the government is putting it before parliament in this resolution. The single maple leaf, I repeat, has not the same historical and heraldic significance even though it also, with the blue borders, I am told makes a very attractive flag.

Mr. Speaker, there was a second part to this resolution which, by your ruling, will now be considered separately, and of course I naturally accept that ruling. However, I think no one in the house will object to my making now just one point about the other part of the flag proposal which the government hopes the house will in due course consider and accept.

We are now considering the adoption of a national flag. In my view we would not contradict or weaken in any way the creation and the acceptance of that new flag if the house should also decide to recognize our historic past and our commonwealth presence by continuing to honour the flag which is particularly the flag of the monarch who is now the head, and the only head, of the commonwealth. We will be returning to that subject shortly.

My colleague, the hon. member for Leeds, (Mr. Matheson) recently put in essence the case for a national distinctive flag in these words:

> A flag sends a message. The question is what message do you wish to send?

Then he added:

> —It's time Canada had a flag that sent the message "Canada".

This, Mr. Speaker, is the reason why there is such strong support, I believe in this house, and I believe in this country, for the flag embodied in this resolution.

I have received a great many written and oral opinions about the flag in recent weeks. Most of the letters and telegrams I have received are in favour of what the government proposes. Many are opposed. Much of the opposition, I believe, is based on a misconception of the purpose and the meaning of our proposal. Much of it is due to a sincere, and indeed at times a passionate refusal to drop the union jack in any design of a national flag. I can sympathize with that feeling even if I do not agree with it.

This resolution does indeed mark a break with the past, as every accepted stage in the evolution of men and nations must mark a break with the past. But this break does not dishonour or repudiate the past, or the flag symbols of that past under which many of us have served and lived. I for one, and there are a great many others in this house who will support this resolution and who will join with me in this, honour those flag symbols, and I proudly acknowledge what they stand for in justice, freedom and human rights. I pay my tribute to the British people whom this flag particularly symbolizes and from whom we have inherited so much—a people whose courage and service to mankind has not been excelled by any other people in history. I have seen the union jack carried doggedly and heroically in combat; I have seen it flying defiantly over the fires caused by the bombing of London; I know something of the decency, the goodness and the fortitude of the British people. All this is part of our tradition, too—a proud part; it will not be betrayed in any way by the proposals in this resolution. None of these things will be altered in our minds and in our hearts when we support this resolution. We support it as Canadians, because the stand it takes is Canadian and because it marks another stage in the growth of Canada.

As I have said, I have had many letters stating that this is why the resolution is getting support from people of all races and walks of life and from every part of the country.

One distinguished Canadian citizen and soldier who has given me a very warm and generous assurance of support for the Canadian flag of this resolution with a maple leaf design is Colonel Keiller Mackay, former lieutenant governor of Ontario, one of the founders of the Royal Canadian Legion and at the present time grand commander for Ontario. There are many others. I received this letter from a lady who signs herself as a member of the I.O.D.E. She wrote:

> Speaking only for myself I feel that anything and everything which will unite Canada from coast to coast is good. I want my children and my grandchildren to be glad and proud they are Canadians—not because their forebears came from England or France or any other part of the world but because they are part of one unique country, united from sea to sea.

I received the letter which follows from another lady, from Camp Valcartier, perhaps she is the wife of a soldier. In any event she writes from an army camp:

> Canada is a marvellous meld of many people with a wonderful mosaic of colourful backgrounds bound together with a common love of freedom and equality. We are grateful for a national flag which is, for many of us, the culmination of Canada's birth as a nation. Today, everywhere, Canadians must stand taller and prouder—for here at least is a flag that truly belongs to us.
> Now is the time for all of us regardless of race, creed or party, to unfurl the new flag with a new pride and happiness in our hearts and, please God, with charity in our hearts too, that will ensure the promise that the future holds.

I was also very interested to read the script of a broadcast delivered on May 29 by a former Conservative member and parliamentary assistant from Halifax, Mr. Edmund Morris. This is what he said in his broadcast:

> No flag design will satisfy everyone at the time of its inception. Once having determined that there should now be a designation of a national flag, it followed inescapably that some one design would have to be chosen by Canada in preference to the many hundred alternative suggestions. It has been said that if the United States were now to be choosing a national flag, there would doubtless be those who would oppose the stars and stripes.
> The challenge to opposition M.P.'s is to perceive that no single act could do more at this juncture for much-praised national unity that for them to close ranks with other M.P.'s and to make the adoption of the flag unanimous.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nowlan: Which Halifax member is going to retire to provide a senatorial vacancy so that this man can be appointed?

Mr. Pearson: The hon. gentleman is too cynical.

Here is another very interesting letter from Mr. John J. Hogan, Q.C. of Bathurst, New Brunswick. He writes:

> A Canadian flag, distinctively Canadian is a standard long ignored, now desperately needed and an absolute "must" if we are to achieve our destiny.
> We all respect the threefold cross of Britain; the tricolour of France; the flags of those countries in which so many new Canadians had their origin, but we will love our own flag, and the sooner we can demonstrate that love, the better for all of us.

One of Canada's most distingushed soldiers, Major General R. R. Keefler, speaking on June 2, had this to say:

> I have been a member, in good standing, of the Canadian Legion, and I completely disagree with their present public attitude concerning the red ensign. In the first place, being a modification of the British merchant marine flag, it is by no stretch of the imagination distinctive or even identifiable by foreigners as Canadian.
> I suspect that the majority of Canadians would accept gladly one flag that is simply and uniquely Canadian. Whether the national symbol turns out to be one maple leaf or three maple leaves, is not so important. It is important, in my opinion, that the flag be distinctively Canadian.

There are those who say that this proposed flag does not portray Canada's history.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: I hear hon. gentlemen opposite saying "hear, hear".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: I hear them say it even more loudly.

In fact, it does more than that. It portrays the proud result of that history—one nation, independent, united and strong. It tells the result of our march to independence. It will portray our confederation fortified and united. In doing this, in symbolizing the end rather than the means, it recognizes all that our past has achieved. But it does more than look to the past, wherein lies our most vivid memory; it looks to the years ahead—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: It is the goal, not just the dream, of the millions who sought here new horizons of hope and happiness.

An hon. Member: Hallelujah!

Mr. Pearson: I am sorry hon. gentlemen opposite can mock this kind of debate and this kind of discussion. A member said "hallelujah" and I agree. Hallelujah, that we can have a flag which will symbolize this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: That was the hallelujah chorus.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I was rising on a small question of privilege. Had I known I was going to get so much applause I might not have done so. I hope I did not understand the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) correctly because he left the implication, to me at any rate, that certain groups in this house had a monopoly of loyalty to Canada or to this country.

Mr. Pearson: No one, Mr. Speaker, could take that interpretation from what I said; and nothing in what I said bore that interpretation or implication. On the other hand, if I wished to be sensitive I could say that no one on the other side of the house has a monopoly on loyalty for the things for which we stood in the past and for the people from whom we have descended. My hon. friend will remember that when I began this part of my speech I said that there were people in this house who violently object to the stand we are taking, and I said that I respect their objection. They are as good Canadians as I cculd ever hope to be.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the flag we are submitting in this resolution results not only from our growth but from our diversity, the achievement of peoples with pasts in other countries; but they are now concerned, as we are all concerned, with one future only, and that is the future of Canada. We are all concerned with Canada's future in a world at peace, in freedom and security. So this flag, if it is adopted by this parliament, will stand for one Canada; united, strong, independent and equal to her tasks.

Mr. Nowlan: What about the union jack? Are we to adopt that too?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I will be delighted to talk about the union jack, but when I mentioned it this afternoon I was howled down by my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. The right hon. Prime Minister was not howled down. He began to read a prepared speech on the subject; and then whether or not he anticipated your ruling he apparently overlooked it. Then when he got in a mess he said he was howled down by the opposition. We were simply trying to make him conform with your ruling, and I would suggest that the Prime Minister does that in the future.

Mr. Pearson: I do not understand my hon. friend's interjection. When I began my speech this afternoon I read the resolution, and the last part of the resolution included that part which dealt with the union jack as the symbol of the commonwealth and the monarchy. Then before I could read the words that follow, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) got up and stopped me.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, all I am doing is to ask the Prime Minister this. He is talking about the flag of Canada which is going to denote national unity. Is he taking the union jack which Joey Smallwood forced upon him, or is he going to take the other one?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, if I answered that question you would rule me out of order, of course. However, I hope to answer it in due course when we discuss this part of the resolution separately, when I hope to satisfy my hon. friend's legitimate curiosity.

As I was saying when this interruption occurred, Mr. Speaker, this flag in the resolution, if it is adopted by parliament, will symbolize a Canada united, strong, independent and equal to her tasks. It will recognize that we cannot be saved or sanctified merely by the valour and devotion of our ancestors. It remains to us in each new generation to do our own duty in changing conditions. Our willingness to do that duty means adaptation and change. It means sacrifice; it means work; it means endurance. And how we meet this challenge in the future under what I hope will be a distinctive Canadian national flag will determine the destiny of our country.

In these restless, soul-searching days about which Right Hon. Vincent Massey spoke in Charlottetown last week we are being asked particularly to give to the hearts and minds of our children a feeling of national identity, national pride, national loyalty. We are asked to provide for them a symbol of our independent strength and of the bright promise of a future for them. We are asked to help them to be more conscious of our country and more proud of Canadian citizenship. Mr. Speaker, I believe that a distinctive maple leaf Canadian flag will help them in their search of this objective. I believe that it will stimulate them as they would be stimulated by the inspiring words of one of the great founders of confederation, D'Arcy McGee, when he wrote on this subject:

> All we have to do is, each for himself, to keep down dissensions which can only weaken, impoverish and keep back the country; each for himself to do all he can to increase its wealth, its strength and its reputation; each for himself...to welcome every talent, to hail every invention, to cherish every gem of art, to foster every gleam of authorship, to honour every acquirement and every natural gift, to lift ourselves to the level of our destinies, to rise above all low limitations and narrow circumscriptions, to cultivate that true catholicity of spirit which embraces all creeds, all classes and all races, in order to make of our boundless province, so rich in known and unknown resources, a great new northern nation.

On the monument to Montcalm and Wolfe on the heights of Abraham are written these words—

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Have you put it up again?

Mr. Churchill: Is it still standing?

Mr. Pearson: That is a very unhappy intervention. "Are you going to put it up again?", my hon. friend says. On the monument to Montcalm and Wolfe on the heights near the plains of Abraham are written these words:

> Valour gave them a common death
> History a common fame
> Posterity a common monument.

Mr. Speaker, it is for this generation, for this parliament, to give them and to give us all a common flag; a Canadian flag which, while bringing together but rising above the landmarks and milestones of the past, will say proudly to the world and to the future: "I stand for Canada".

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as is known, I will not be in the house tomorrow and therefore I will have to restrict myself very considerably in these remarks. This evening I had hoped to be in Toronto to speak to those great lovers of freedom, the Baltic peoples—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —but my presence was needed here. I am going to speak at limited length tonight and keep within the bounds of what I hope will be reasonable expression. I shall try not to follow the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in some of his inflammatory remarks, although I am going to welcome the opportunity before this debate is over to answer several that he made.

However, Mr. Speaker, it is of interest to note this, that there was no mention in all of his speech of the contribution of the people of French origin in our country. There was no mention of the contribution made by Sir George Etienne Cartier, with Macdonald, to the bringing about of confederation. This was a significant omission in every part of his remarks. As he concluded by quoting Thomas D'Arcy McGee's immortal words, that our purpose in this nation should be to build unity and to avoid dissension, I say to the Prime Minister this, "Physician, heal thyself. You have brought in, at a time when there are many other matters that ought to have received the consideration of the house, this question that cannot have any other effect than to divide this nation as it has not been divided."

The Prime Minister gave the house a roll call of anonymity coupled with a reference to two or three persons who had expressed themselves. I am going to give him an opportunity, before I conclude, to have a roll call of the people of Canada on this question; to give to the Canadian people, by the only means that can determine this question and on the basis of previous experience and precedent, to which he alluded, the opportunity to express their views on this subject. I want the government, secure in its concepts that it is right because it may be able to command a majority of the house, to give to individual Canadians everywhere the right to decide the question of the kind of flag that they believe will unify, strengthen and maintain the great traditions of our country.

The Prime Minister speaks as though he had the authority of the Canadian people. I think of some of the members from British Columbia. I see the hon. member for Victoria, British Columbia (Mr. Groos) sitting over there, representing a great constituency; I see members from Vancouver. I have before me the policies of the Liberal party as distributed throughout the length and breadth of British Columbia just prior to the general election of 1963. In them there is not one word about a distinctive flag with the union jack removed therefrom.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Indeed, I remember so well that in Amherst on December 29, 1961, when he said something about a distinctive flag and was asked what would be on the flag, he said, "Of course, I will not tell you". He was afraid to face the people of Canada on this, because when the record was produced it was found he used the same excuse that he used with respect to the "Mr. Pearson" film of the C.B.C., "I could not understand some of the things being said". The answer he gave in 1962 to a broadcast station in reference to this question was, "I shall not let you know".

When did he, across Canada at any time, say that he intended to bring in a distinctive flag that had no reference whatever to Canada's heritage and our past, to the contribution made by the French and by the British to the building of this nation? I ask that question, Mr. Speaker. There has not been one word. We have important matters to bring before parliament that deserve attention. The Prime Minister says he is bringing about unity in this country. I say to him that by this action—and the apologetic manner was apparent throughout his speech today—he realizes he has caused in this nation cleavages and fissures and separations that more than a generation of people to come will recall, those that have strong opinions either way—and he mentioned that—or conscientious opinions either way, but certainly strongly held. No one in this nation today would say that there is an overwhelming majority of opinion in favour of the change he is trying to bring about—and he knows he can do it—to separate this nation from the past. He says that when the maple leaf design is produced, it will be peculiarly Canadian. Well, all I have to say in that connection is this. While I wore the maple leaf badge, too, in the first great war—and I was proud of that—and while everyone realizes that under the Meighen administration the national symbol of Canada was declared to be the three maple leaves, not since that date in 1921 has any leader of this nation claimed that a distinctive national flag should be other than the union jack, with also a reference to the French contribution upon it.

Mr. Nowlan: Meighen would have died if anyone had suggested that to him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As a matter of fact, I am going to refer to the committee of 1945 and of 1946. I followed the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in the views he has expressed. I recall the speech he made at a resort in April or May of 1963 when he spoke of two nations, two flags, two anthems. Is this the way to bring about unity within this country?

Mention was made today of Macdonald. What did Macdonald say? He viewed Canada as one nation despite the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) ridiculed this in a speech very recently. On the other hand, the Prime Minister said this evening that he believed in one Canada and that this action would produce one Canada. It will produce one Canada, separate as never before, and that is the reason I am going to make a special appeal to him.

What did Macdonald say? Speaking in the provincial parliament of Canada in 1865 he said that we shall build "a great nationality commanding the respect of the world, able to hold our own against all opponents and to defend those institutions we prize."

Cartier at the same time said, "We are joined together". He went on to say that only through British North American confederation could we prevent absorption into the vortex of American confederation. He went on to say that was contemplated at the time of the American union. He said, "We shall build in Canada a unity", and went on:

> As early as 1775 the French Canadians were solemnly addressed in a proclamation by General Washington who called upon them to abandon the flag of their new masters, inasmuch as they could not expect anything from those who differed from them in language, in religion, in race and in sympathies.

He said, "Not two nations", and then:

> The question for us to ask ourselves was this. Shall we be content to maintain a mere provincial existence when by combining together we could become a great nation?

With regard to the objection that a great nation could not be formed because Lower Canada was in great part French and Catholic and Upper Canada was English and Protestant and the lower provinces were mixed, he said that was futile and worthless in the extreme.

They builded this Canada and they brought it together. All through the years references have been made to flags. I heard Mr. Mackenzie King speaking in the house on a number of occasions and the stand that Mr. Mackenzie King took was this: We want a distinctive flag for Canada, but no one can contemplate a distinctive flag without the union jack being included therein. On the 21st of June, 1943, he said, as found on page 3823 of Hansard:

> A national flag is one which normally is used by a single nation only, and which is used to distinguish that nation from others at international gatherings and to serve as a symbol of it. The red ensign, with the union jack in the first quarter next to the staff, and the Canadian coat of arms in the fly, has for over 70 years been very generally used in situations where a flag specially distinctive of Canada was essential.

I call Mr. Mackenzie King, gone to his reward, to the attention of the Prime Minister, about to secure his reward. Yes, I am reading from Mr. Mackenzie King, and I know the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) will say that everything here is confirmed by him.

> It was first authorized by the government of Sir John A. Macdonald shortly after confederation for use on Canadian merchant vessels. Its use as a distinctive emblem on all buildings owned or occupied by the Canadian government and situated outside of Canada was authorized by order in council on January 26, 1924. It has been popularly accepted as a flag distinctive of Canada. The union jack, while not a flag distinctive of Canada, may correctly be flown on land in any part of His Majesty's domains.

I question whether this would be a suitable time at which to have parliament determine which particular flag—the union jack, the red ensign or some other flag to be specially designed—should be declared to be the national flag of Canada.

Then in 1944 he used very strong words in this regard. I spoke in the debate on external affairs and said something should be done about bringing about a Canadianism within our land, Canadian citizenship and the like, and also that action be taken in respect of a flag. He went on to say, as found on page 6276 of Hansard for August 11, 1944:

And anyone who raises the question of race to prejudice anyone of another race in this country is doing the greatest disservice that can be done to Canadian unity and to Canadian nationality. And not only do I wish to see our people recognized as Canadians, but I also wish to see a Canadian flag recognized in this country.

Those were the days in 1944 when the Minister of Transport was, one might say, at the periphery of prime ministerial greatness.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, they will not laugh when they hear the next paragraph.

I would like to see it the flag that our Canadian men are fighting under today. We have a Canadian flag unfurled in battle today by our very brave men in Italy and in France. I think in time the people of this country of Canada will say we want to have as a Canadian flag the flag they are carrying in battle today.

I know, Mr. Speaker, I am just giving the gospel according to Mackenzie King. The Prime Minister did not sit under him but I am fairly certain he had an official position. Then Mr. King went on to say, and I can give the quotation if anybody wants it, that as far as a flag for Canada was concerned he could not under any circumstances see such a flag without having thereon the union jack as part of that flag.

What has happened? I know there are different views on this matter. Some say they want the Canadian ensign. Others say they want changes made in the Canadian ensign in order to show fully the fact that our two races were brought together in confederation.

What about a distinctive flag? There is a new definition being given to a distinctive flag by the Prime Minister. He would have us believe that a distinctive flag is one upon which there is no reference to the heritage of our country, nothing of the greatness of its past. He said: Don't worry about the past; we are going to look into the future. I am not going to make any reference to the tremendous inspiration he apparently has in mind will be aroused in the hearts of Canadians as they look at this new emblem he has produced. But I am going to say this. In 1945 a committee was set up. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) was a member of that committee, as was the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). There is no mistake in that connection. The resolution appointing the committee referred to the fact it was expedient that Canada possess a distinctive national flag, and a joint committee was set up to consider and report upon a suitable design for such a flag. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) attended the committee meeting on December 4, and he said this:

In the new world we will be better fitted to do our part if we have an essential feeling of internal unity and oneness.

He also stated that the committee was to report on a suitable design for such a distinctive flag. He said that it should be a symbol of this great nation, one to which affection and loyalty could be attached and which could become a sign of unity and purpose and make Canada great. The minister of justice of that day, Hon. Mr. St. Laurent, had said this earlier. Hon. Mr. St. Laurent, when he was prime minister and while he was minister of justice had no other view than that, in the union jack being upon the flag of Canada, there was no suggestion of subservience. He said, and I am simply paraphrasing his remarks, that it is simply bringing to the notice of all Canadians what they owe to their British traditions.

I believe there are many who would like to see the preservation of the red ensign but are only too willing, in the interests of bringing about national agreement, to have something additional placed thereon. This was the situation in 1945 and 1946. What should be done about it? Well, the decision in 1946 was this:

Your committee recommends that the national flag of Canada should be the Canadian red ensign with a maple leaf in autumn golden colours in a bordered background of white, replacing the coat of arms in the fly; the whole design to be so proportioned that the size and position of the maple leaf in relation to the union jack in the canton will identify it as a symbol distinctive of Canada as a nation.

This was the recommendation made by this committee, and the vote on it was 23 in favour and 1 opposed. The one opposed was Mr. Lacroix. I point out that fact. The members of all the various races met there and they did not regard a distinctive flag as one that would separate us from our past. Indeed, the Secretary of State for External Affairs being the heraldic expert of that day—he has since been replaced by the hon. member for another constituency—said that these are the detailed specifications for the ideal Canadian flag. I am reading from the bottom of page 4 and the top of page 5. It should be easily recognizable and not like any other.

Now, mention was made of the maple leaf this evening. Certainly, in two world wars the maple leaf was generally recognized as Canadian. However, it is interesting to note that in 1915 the state of New York adopted the maple tree as its official tree, representative of the state.

The flag should be visible at a distance. Now, that is an interesting thing. I ask you, how far you are going to be able to see that white flag in winter?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As it so happens, that is one of the qualities that is required, and mention was made of that in the evidence given before the parliamentary committee. Hon. gentlemen opposite, therefore, have not even read the records of 1945 and 1946.

The flag should be symbolic of the country and its position as a sovereign state in the family of nations, lending itself to a variation for different purposes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Why not read 4 and 5 as well?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I read all five of them. I simply judge, after reading all five, that what is being produced today in this resolution does not in any way meet the qualifications that were then suggested by the hon. gentleman. The flag is a symbol of unity and not a symbol of the most bitter division in Canada. As this country approaches its one hundredth anniversary, surely the Canadian people should not have forced upon them at the will of a government enjoying whatever support it has through third parties in this house or elsewhere, a flag that is today being criticized so widely. It is no time to play with Canadian unity. It is no time to bring about division within this nation.

What about the circumstances under which it was produced? I understand it was incubated in nine days. What has been happening in the last few months since this government has gone into this field of dominion-provincial relations, national symbols and the like, has been strong blows at unity, driving wedges between province and province, race and race. Indeed, as a result there has been encouraged a rise in emotions such as has not been seen in this land. Sir, this is why, in discussing this subject one does not wish to do anything to arouse emotional feelings. If the government had calculated a means whereby division could be secured in this nation, they could not have gone about it in a more effective manner.

I sometimes wonder whether what is being done is designed to distract attention, to create a diversion from the confusion and the chaos of the government in so many fields since it took office. I say this, why was not a committee of parliament set up, of both houses, as took place in 1945, when agreement was arrived at? However, for some reason, that recommendation was not carried into effect. Why should there not be some action taken to bring about a flag that is distinctive? This does not mean distinctive, because it has not anything to show the British relationship of this country and its past, or distinctive showing the great contribution during the past of the French period, nothing on it showing the tremendous contributions under British rule such as parliament, the rule of law and freedom. Why are these things to be swept aside—simply because a government believes it has the power? When the Prime Minister indulged in quotations he did not think of bringing to the attention of the house the letter he received from the various intellectuals who signed that message of May 27.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I received no such letter.

Mr. Nowlan: He did not read it, that is all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is not the first time they have not told him in his office. That letter read:

> We believe, as you do, that the flag should be a source of national unity, and that it should be unmistakably Canadian in character. However, we protest that the maple leaf flag is neither of these things. Its only advantage is that it is innocuous, that it produces tepid approval, mild disapproval, or indifference, and that it can therefore be adopted without any display of strong feeling whatever. We have a despairing feeling that this insipid flag, instead of promoting national unity, will produce only an indifferent response, and in doing so will subtly undermine the Canadian will to survive. We believe profoundly that this negative approach to our national symbols erodes our national spirit.

I could quote a great deal more but I will see a copy is sent to the Prime Minister for his private edification.

Mr. Pearson: I would not like to mislead the house, Mr. Speaker. I received no such letter but I did get a letter on my desk. It was addressed "Dear Mr. . . ." blank, and there was no signature to it, but it had that body.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the attitude of retreat has become almost a regular course. Now, sir, I mentioned the necessity of action being taken to bring about modifications. What are some of the objections that can be raised as against the flag design in this resolution? First, there is the domination of parliament by the executive. We had that during the days of the pipe line. We are having it today on the part of this government, for a few minutes ago the Prime Minister left the impression that in the event that parliament decided on the free vote which he offered, and it was against the particular type of design he placed before parliament, the government would consider itself defeated. Only a few weeks ago he said, "Oh, we will give you a free vote in parliament."

Second, it simply means this, that the government has adopted as its definition of a distinctive flag, any one that does away with the union jack. Well now, why? Australia and New Zealand do not do away with the union jack on their flags. Other parts of the commonwealth do not, but why is Canada taking this lead?

I think that even today South Africa in its flag carries the union jack. As a matter of fact the flag of Hawaii carries the union jack. Why is this removed? Surely Canada deserves something better than having a symbol, the symbol of three maple leaves, effective as a symbol and brought in by a Conservative government under the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. But a symbol is a long way from a flag which should epitomize something of the past and of the greatness of a country and thereby includes its people in the potentialities of the future.

I believe, as I did when I spoke in this house on February 4, that this matter should have been placed before a conference of the provinces and the dominion, securing their views, not because they would have any authority but because they would bring about a spirit of Canadianism, agreement, and the meaning of Canadianism. We endeavoured to call such a conference together. The scope of the conference would be to study ways and means of repatriating the constitution—> —the problem of adequate representation in the public service, crown corporations and other government agencies; the recommendations in the Therrien report; the choice of a national flag and other symbols of our national sovereignty. In brief, the conference will be asked to examine biculturalism and bilingualism in a comprehensive manner.

That was not followed. We were defeated. A royal commission was set up for the purposes of dealing with Canada's national problems and then suddenly, without having directly at any time pointed out that one of the first things to be done would be to produce a so-called distinctive flag without any commemoration of the country's past, the Prime Minister rushes in to produce the subject matter of this resolution.

Sir, you cannot have a national conference now; but the basic condition of good government is consent, the consent of the governed, in other words, the people. Is there any national determination that we should turn our backs on the past, that we should forget everything that has gone by—

Mr. Grégoire: Ask Balcer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and that we should produce something innocuous and insipid.

Why was it that no action was taken following a recommendation of the committee in 1946? I do not know, but I do know that General Crerar, the commander of the first Canadian army in world war II, stated when he was in Ottawa receiving the official welcome of the government of Canada on August 8, 1945, that right hon Mr. King made a statement that is significant of his views, supported as those views were by those of Mr. St. Laurent:

> As we moved away from the central entrance of the parliament buildings, Mr. King turned sideways in the car and looked upwards to the peace tower where, at the top, the Canadian red ensign waved. He then said, "And that, General, is another problem which your Canadian army has solved for Canada—the manner of our national flag."

That was his view. As I see it a national flag must bear the history of its country in its fullest. Otherwise it is meaningless. I quote from Barlow in his history:

> The study of flags is really the tracing of history by sight.

In other words, it is accepting for those countries newly become nations, great nations, strength and inspiration from the past as they go forward to the future. Sir, to bring about a change that denies our past requires a degree of national agreement. I do not say unanimity, but I do say the intangible element of the spirit of all Canadians, a national unity determined by the proof of national identity.

There is in all our hearts deep and abiding Canadianism. Canadians think of themselves as Canadians and as nothing else. I do. My people come from two races but I think of myself as a Canadian; and always, from my earliest days in this house, I advocated a Canadianism unhyphenated while fully recognizing the constitutional rights under our constitution and the British North America Act.

You cannot force a flag on the people of Canada and secure from them that mystic something which some ridicule as nationalism —the patriotism of men and women who love their country. A flag design is not a trick by which one group imposes upon others some evidence of a Canadianism that all will not accept.

I have admitted that for many years there has been a sentiment for a distinctive flag. I have shown that a distinctive flag is now being defined as it never was in the past—as one which denies Canada's past. It is a strange thing that we are being asked, and in haste, to reverse the past, to accept the design of the Prime Minister which he unveiled at 24 Sussex street to a selected audience, before parliament had it. The desire for a flag is one thing; agreement on a design is another.

There have been many suggestions. I have received many outstanding ones. I should have thought that instead of saying to parliament, "This you do, or parliament will face the consequences" some other course would have been followed. This is not the way, in a spirit of Canadianism, of toleration, of understanding, in which a thing like this is brought about. A flag is not something which can be ordered by parliament. A flag must be something to evoke the emotions of the heart, a rallying point for the finer sentiments of the people joined together in a nation. We have come to agreement on many things throughout the years. After all, surely there is not such a rush. Surely we do not set a zero hour for the determination of something which the Prime Minister says will be ours always? That is the finality which he places on a design chosen by himself and preferred by him.

Mr. Grégoire: Well, you had five years in which to do it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Cannot we, in the spirit of unity in this country—not with one group or another trying to press the crown of intolerance on any part of the country—cannot we bring about something which will represent Canada? This is the opportunity for the Prime Minister to rise to statesmanship, to depart from the course of partisan extremism—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I see that the main derisive applause comes from those who would separate this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. There are only a few minutes remaining and I understand the Leader of the Opposition may not be here tomorrow. He should be entitled to those few minutes.

Mr. Caouette: A question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I therefore suggest a national referendum—

Mr. Caouette: A question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) to allow the Leader of the Opposition to finish his discourse.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, surely the question of privilege must be heard—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have the floor. The Prime Minister cannot interrupt me. This is exactly the trick he has tried to play before. I want to move my amendment.

Mr. Speaker: Under the rules of the house I must interrupt the proceedings and listen to the question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wish to move my amendment—that all the words after "that"—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps by unanimous consent we would be able to extend the time a little further.

Mr. Pickersgill: We agree.

Canadian Flag

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The Leader of the Opposition states that our group is trying to divide the country; I will tell him, before all hon. members, that the speech he is now making will divide the country.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: The applause from the Liberal party after what has been said indicates their agreement with the hon. member. I wish to move—

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Will you shut up?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I move:

That all the words after "that" in line one be deleted and the following substituted:

"As the proposal to change Canada's national flag will affect the unity and destiny of Canada now and for years to come, the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to conduct a plebiscite prior to any further action being taken by the House of Commons, in order that all Canadians may be given their rightful opportunity to declare their choice concerning a national flag."

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Would it be possible to have that amendment in French?

An hon. Member: Two official languages.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: In the short space of time that is left I should like to say that although the suggested amendment reads like a statement of principles it does, neverthless, in my opinion, have to do with the method, which is one of the things we are considering. I propose, therefore, to accept the amendment.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, would Your Honour give an opportunity for hon. members who wish to do so to indicate why this amendment is not in order?

Mr. Speaker: I waited—a short time, I admit—but no one seemed to indicate any disapproval. And I may tell the house I am prepared to give reasons why in my humble opinion this motion is in order.

Mr. Coates: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Coates) called it ten o'clock.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) should have the floor.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, may I ask what is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Favreau: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, the debate on the present resolution will continue.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

(Subject matter of questions debated under adjournment motion).

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved:

CANADIAN FLAG—REPORTED THREATS TO SUPPORTERS OF RED ENSIGN

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, on June 4 I posed a question to the Prime Minister with regard to threats which were made on the lives of Canadians who were supporters of the red ensign and of its retention as Canada's national flag. At that time the Prime Minister replied to me in a manner which I considered unsuitable from many points of view. One of the points of view which caused me a great deal of irritation was the flippant manner in which he treated the threats which were made on Canadians because they supported the red ensign.

In this connection I should like to refer to an article which appeared in the Toronto Daily Star, which said, among other things, that Richard O'Hagan, spokesman for the Prime Minister, said that the Prime Minister was joking. Well, Mr. Speaker, when the point is arrived at in this country where the lives of Canadians are threatened, and not only their lives but the lives of their families are threatened, and the Prime Minister treats this as a joke, then in my opinion the whole matter relating to a national flag has reached that sense of proportion that it should be removed from the public until the point is reached where a sense of proportion can be given to the matter by the Prime Minister of this country.

At the same time and on the same date, June 5, there appeared in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald the following headline: "Threats to P.M. over flag". Here is the Prime Minister of this country facetiously making statements in reply to serious questions, which are interpreted in one way by the Prime Minister's office, and by his officials who answer the telephone, as meaning that no one really cares in his office whether Canadians were being threatened, and by another newspaper which did not obtain the same information as meaning that a very serious situation had developed in this country as a result of this flag issue. Regardless of what the spokesman in Mr. Pearson's office had to say, it is my opinion that the headline in the Halifax newspaper was more closely attuned to the feelings of Canadians with regard to this flag issue. It is the type of issue that has inflamed the passions of Canadians; it is the type of issue that can only result in further divisions in this country; it is the type of issue that will promote bigotry and bias and all the things the Prime Minister endeavours to tell the Canadian people he does not wish, and indeed is endeavouring to eliminate. At the same time, if the statement by Mr. O'Hagan is correct, it is an indication of just how much out of touch is the present Prime Minister with the views of Canadians in this country in relation to their symbols, and especially in relation to the flag now flying.

How far are we expected to go in this country when we hear reports of people being threatened with their lives because they support the red ensign; when we hear reports of red ensigns being burned, as was reported in Toronto recently; when we pick up newspapers from all across this country and see Canadians making the statement that all the Liberal party is doing with this flag issue is selling out to the province of Quebec.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Coates: "Shame" does not mean a thing from over there. It is the people in every province in this country who are saying it.

An hon. Member: Why are you saying it?

Mr. Coates: I am saying it because these are the facts of life, and it is about time that you in your life faced up to these facts.

Mr. Clancy: Yes, you have slowed us up for years.

Mr. Coates: This type of retort coming from the benches of the Liberal party is just an indication of the highly charged, emotional state of the Canadian nation as a result of this flag issue; and it is an issue which should not be treated lightly, as the Prime Minister tries to treat it every time someone asks him a question about any flag except his personal choice. This type of facetious reply received from the Prime Minister is as great an irritation to Canadians generally as anything that can be said about this flag issue. Why the passions of the Canadian people have been allowed to be aroused to the extent indicated in the initial day of this flag debate is more than I can understand and more than most Canadians can understand.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just sat down has in his solemn way given the house what, even by his own admission, he does not know to be true, or false statements. He made reference to a statement appearing in the newspaper with regard to the purported remarks of one of the staff of the Prime Minister's office. He himself threw doubt immediately on the soundness of his own proposition by saying, "if the statement by Mr. O'Hagan is correct". I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members of this house that it is the obligation of the hon. member not to guess at whether it is correct or not; he stands on the words he has tendered to this house. If he has not gone to the trouble to find out whether or not they are correct, then his words are not worth listening to.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I had to get out the Parliamentary Guide to look up the hon. member's qualifications because I was baffled by his statement. The statement which the Prime Minister made on June 4 in answer to the hon. member is found on page 3925 of Hansard and reads as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman will send me a copy of his report I will be glad to examine it, and if the circumstances warrant it can be passed on to the police and to the mayor of Ottawa.

I point out, Mr. Speaker, that this is the responsibility of the provincial authorities and more particularly of the municipal police of this city.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I am not arguing about that statement.

Mr. Macdonald: Mr. Speaker, I have a right to my full three minutes.

Mr. Coates: The Prime Minister said—

Mr. Speaker: Order. There must be some decorum here. The hon. member for Rosedale.

Mr. Macdonald: I can understand the hon. member trying to cut me off because he cannot bear to have the truth of the matter put on the record. I point out that if the hon. member was sincerely interested in bringing this matter to the attention of the provincial police or the municipal police authorities it was his obligation to do so.

Mr. Coates: I did not have to do so.

Mr. Macdonald: Did he bring it to the attention of the Prime Minister as the Prime Minister invited him to do? My information is that he did not. This is a rather cynical attempt at a partisan political attack and I think it can be rejected as of absolutely no value whatsoever.

Mr. Clancy: May I ask a question of the hon. member? Is he giving the policy of the government?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

HOUSING—REQUEST FOR FURTHER CONSIDERATION OF REDEVELOPMENT PROJECTS

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, on June 10 I asked the Postmaster General the following question, as found on page 4152 of Hansard:

> Now that the amendments to the National Housing Act have been passed by the house, will the minister cause further consideration to be given to extending federal government assistance to a proposed municipal project to acquire land for the redevelopment of an area in downtown Windsor for commercial purposes, and to similar projects throughout Canada?

I suggest that this is a matter of urgent interest and concern, Mr. Speaker, to many cities and towns throughout Canada, cities and towns that have downtown areas now used for commercial purposes which are fitting areas for urban renewal. Until the recent amendments to the National Housing Act the federal government, it was understood, could not participate in projects to acquire and clear such areas unless they were to be used later for housing purposes. But in many cases, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that a use involving housing would not have been and would not be the highest and best use, the most logical use for the land in question.

Many municipal governments felt they should be able to propose plans of urban renewal incorporating the most logical use for these downtown areas. Such a use in many cases would be commercial or even industrial. After all, there might already be commercial areas all around it, and to permit such land to be used later for commercial purposes might give further aid to the construction industry because of the more complicated buildings that would be involved.

Housing or apartment projects once built might give employment only to a few caretakers or maintenance men. Building housing commercial or industrial enterprises could well give employment to hundreds or even thousands. Also, commercial or industrial buildings could return a greater tax revenue to the municipality and, as one member of the house has suggested, such a use might be a further source of funds for the building of public housing elsewhere.

Now that the National Housing Act has been amended I think it most important to ask the question I placed before the house the other day, since it seems to me that there is some lack of understanding of the effect of these amendments on the part of certain municipal officials in some parts of Canada. In answering this question I hope the minister, who I am happy to see is in the house, will be able to clarify, therefore, exactly what the federal government will now be able to do and how far it can go in assisting in projects of urban renewal, where there are areas now used for commercial purposes and where it is proposed they be used later for similar purposes, because of the importance of facilitating renewal of the cores and hearts of our cities.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I move we adjourn for lack of a quorum. We are seven short.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think I heard the hon. gentleman, and I think I see a quorum.

Mr. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. There is no reason why the hon. member who has just spoken could not have obtained an answer from his minister. He is a member of the government. We are wasting our time. This is our grievance period, not the government's. They can do anything they want and they have the power to do it. He has wasted ten minutes now. Why did he not see the minister?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): When this question was asked in the course of the debate on June 2, I said that the answer had been given in my remarks. I referred the hon. member for Essex West

(Mr. Gray) to my remarks at page 3794, the second column, the last paragraph on that page. They were in the first three paragraphs on page 3795.

Under the old act, that is the one that is still in force actually until we have royal assent for the new legislation, section 23, as pointed out by the hon. member for Essex West, required that in order to get a contribution from the federal government toward urban redevelopment or renewal projects, a substantial part of the area had to be used for residential purposes, or else had to be used for residential purposes after the urban renewal program had been put into effect. This clause has now been repealed, or at least it will be repealed if and when the new bill, C-102, becomes law.

Under the new legislation it will be possible for the federal government or Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, to make grants to municipalities who request it for the clearing of lands which may be used wholly or partly for residential purposes wholly or partly for commercial and industrial purposes. I point out, however, that while the federal government can contribute its share towards such a project, it cannot lend funds for the building of industrial plants on that prepared land.

TRADE—BEEF—STEPS TO INCREASE EXPORTS TO GREAT BRITAIN

Mr. C. S. Smallwood (Battle River-Camrose): I shall be brief. When I asked my question of the minister the other day I felt it was important to the economy of Canada as well as to the beef producers of Canada. Since that time I have read that Argentina, one of the world's leading beef producers, has ordered meat rationing and is imposing export controls to ease the beef shortage caused by two years of drought.

In order to be brief, I shall repeat my question to the minister. I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in view of this serious shortage of beef, will the minister inform the house what action his department has taken in regard to the export of beef to Great Britain? I ask this question in the interests of the economy of the country and the beef producers. May I have an answer?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): For some months, Mr. Speaker, my department and the Department of Agriculture have been following the developing beef situation in both the United Kingdom and on the continent of Europe. Our trade commissioner in London has been making a special study of the situation and has kept our Canadian packing houses fully apprised of developments. I understand that a number of these firms are now in touch with their agents in the United Kingdom in an effort to develop some sales.

The problem had been, but is now growing smaller, that Canadian prices were somewhat out of line. The spread is now becoming narrower and therefore we are continuing our efforts to sell beef, in the expectation that it will come into line and that we shall be able to supply part of that market. I am unable to say exactly what the spread is at the moment because, of course, there are so many cuts and so many qualities of beef concerned.

I would like to assure the hon. gentleman that, like himself, we have been following the situation very closely and share his concern to enlarge our market for beef overseas.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.24 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. GRÉGOIRE—MEETINGS OF RAILWAY COMMITTEE DURING FLAG DEBATE

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege with reference to the statement made in the house by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) on June 10, 1964, when he introduced a motion to refer the annual budgets and reports of the C.N.R. and T.C.A. to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. At that time the Minister of Transport said:

> I can assure all hon. members...that any substitution of membership desired by any party will be promptly made by the whip.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in respect to the sittings of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, the substitutions desired by our party have not been made, because we were informed too late that the representatives of the C.N.R. would appear this week before the standing committee.

This happens at the same time as the very important debate, mentioned yesterday by the Prime Minister, on the Canadian flag.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, we feel that the Minister of Transport, as he always did in the past, should today comply once more with his statements and see to it that the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines will not sit as long as the matter of the Canadian flag will be before the house, first of all, because of the commitment he made on June 10 last, as stated on page 4142 of Hansard, right hand column.

Second, we ask that the committee should not sit this afternoon or this evening for the very important reason put forward by the Minister of Transport this morning, in the committee, when he said that he could not be present at the sittings of the committee because of the very important matter now before the House of Commons.

Third, we think that this committee will not be able to sit, not only this afternoon, this evening and tomorrow but as long as the flag matter is being discussed, because we think this matter is very important and the Prime Minister himself saw fit to mention that it is very important and that we were living historic days in Canada.

For those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I appeal personally to the Minister of Transport, because I know he always complied with his undertakings in the past, and I ask him to see to it that the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines does not sit during the debate on the flag.

[Text]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Perhaps in the absence of the chairman of the committee I might say that I did go to the committee meeting this morning. Being rather old fashioned I thought it would be in the railway committee room, and I was late. In any event I am not a member of the committee, but by the time I got there the committee had made a decision to sit at different hours. This is a decision of the committee and is not appealable, as I understand it, to the house. I do not see how we can do anything about it unless perhaps the chairman might consider, in view of the historic importance of the proceedings this afternoon, having the committee meet at five o'clock.

I am just saying he may do that, but that would have to be arranged behind the curtains, sir. It is not the business of the house. So far as the undertaking I gave is concerned, it was with regard to substitutions. I am told the notices were sent out two days before, and I am quite sure that my hon. friend the chief whip would have made the necessary motions if he had had them in his hands.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Minister of Transport to be more explicit. Instead of saying that this can be arranged behind the curtains, if the minister took it upon himself to recommend to the committee that they avoid sitting during the flag debate, I feel that the chairman of the committee, who is a distinguished member of the Liberal party, would gladly accept his suggestion.

Banking and Commerce Committee

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege—

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I doubt very much if this is a question of privilege, but in view of the importance attached to it by the hon. member, the short discussion we have had has not done any harm. It is up to the chairman of each committee to run his own committee and not to ask for instructions from the minister concerned. Matters are referred to the committee, and it seems to me that the committee is in charge of its own affairs.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

SECOND AND THIRD REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. L. T. Pennell (Brant-Haldimand) presented the second and third reports of the standing committee on banking and commerce, and asked for unanimous consent to move that the third report be concurred in.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, we are unwilling to give the unanimous consent so that the report be concurred in now. We want to have the time to see it so as to be sure that we will not be taken in again by the Minister of Transport as we were the last time.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Grégoire: No; 48 hours' notice.

Mr. Speaker: Is there or is there not unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Grégoire: There is not.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

WINNIPEG MAINTENANCE BASE—APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSION OF INQUIRY

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I should like to table order in council P.C. 1964/857 of June 11, appointing Mr. D. A. Thompson, Q.C., of the city of Winnipeg a commissioner under part I of the Inquiries Act to inquire into and report upon problems relating to the future of the aircraft overhaul base maintained by Trans-Canada Air Lines at Winnipeg international airport, and other related matters.

I should like also, for the convenience of hon. members, to table a letter I addressed to Mr. Thompson yesterday, the text of which was agreed upon with the government of Manitoba, setting out the scope and nature of the review.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

INQUIRY AS TO CONSIDERATION OF PROPOSED AMENDMENT

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Could he tell the house if he has been officially notified by the Quebec government that the provincial legislature has approved the constitutional amendment concerning the pension plan?

If so, could the Prime Minister tell us whether he intends to adjourn the debate on the first flag resolution in order to discuss the pension legislation, or to wait until the debate on the first flag is over?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, the resolution was passed last evening in the legislature in Quebec. Official notification of the action of the Quebec legislature is now in the post and I have heard about it by telephone. We will be putting a resolution forward for the order paper this afternoon which will permit discussion of the matter in this house on Thursday.

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he intends to give up definitely the resolution on the union jack so as to save the time of the House of Commons?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: This question is out of order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—REPORTED CONSCRIPTION OF GREEKS INTO PERMANENT ARMY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and draw his attention to the report that the government of Cyprus is now conscripting hundreds of Greek Cypriots in the 19 year old class for the purpose of organizing a permanent army. This has been done over the protests of both the British and Turkish governments, as well as the Turkish Cypriots.

I want to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether any representations are being made by the Canadian government to the government of Cyprus, directly or through the United Nations, pointing out that this will have a serious effect upon the successful operation of the peace keeping force in Cyprus.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): This matter has been discussed by the United Nations and also by the Canadian high commissioner in Cyprus. However, it is not yet clear whether the act to which the hon. gentleman draws our attention will have the consequences and the implications he suggests. Some officials in the United Nations have taken the temporary view that this may be a step in the right direction. However, this remains to be seen.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): In view of the question asked by the leader of the New Democratic party and a number of disturbing reports recently over the C.B.C. and in the press concerning Cyprus, would the Secretary of State for External Affairs at an early date, perhaps this week or the beginning of next week, make an extensive statement on motions bringing members of the house up to date on the situation in Cyprus?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member for Annapolis-Kings mentioned this very matter to me today, and he had intended asking me a question along those lines. I told him, as I will tell the hon. gentleman, that the suggestion will be carefully considered.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the secretary of state if he is now telling the house that increasing the Greek Cypriot army despite the protests of the Turkish Cypriots and the British and Turkish governments may be the right course for the Cypriot government to follow?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I did not say what my view was. I said the view was put forward by United Nations officials that this might be an effective way of assisting to provide for control over certain elements in one of the communities, a control which is not now in existence. That is what I said. We are now examining the position to see whether this represents the view of other contingents in the United Nations force. It was not the view stated by the government of Canada.

Mr. Douglas: To which elements of the population did the hon. gentleman refer?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was referring to elements in the Greek community.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Since it is rumoured that Canada will renew its participation to the United Nations force in Cyprus, which will entail a supplementary expenditure of about $2 million, would the minister consider suggesting to the United Nations that this huge amount be distributed so as to help the economic conditions of the Cypriots instead of imposing this force upon them, because I believe this would pave the way for an agreement between the two communities in Cyprus?

Has the minister any comments to make on that subject?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, before the United Nations force was set up the Canadian government had made the same suggestion as advanced by the hon. member; unfortunately, it was a long range proposal and it was not considered acceptable in February.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton West.

Mr. Macaluso: My question has already been asked by the hon. member for Three Rivers.

POLAND—REPORTS OF RELIGIOUS INTOLERANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Joseph P. O'Keefe (St. John's East): My question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the present intense interest in symbols, in tolerance and in freedom, would the minister check the accuracy of yesterday's report on religious intolerance in Poland where over 2 million children are affected or involved, as contained in yesterday's edition of the Globe and Mail, page 3.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. member would like to put this question on the order paper.

Inquiries of the Ministry

STEPS TO PROMOTE INDEPENDENCE OF BALTIC STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. My question arises from the current interest being taken by the Soviet union in the Baltic area. Is the government using this opportunity to press for independence of the states of Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, while answering that question I wonder whether, with the consent of the house, I could refer to a question asked earlier by the hon. member for St. John's East, which I think is equally in order, concerning certain discrimination between children in Poland. I want to assure him that that question will be looked into. This other important matter is, of course, under continuous review.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

TRANSFER OF JURISDICTION OVER NATIONAL EMPLOYMENT SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Labour and ask him when he expects that the national employment service will come under the direct jurisdiction of the Department of Labour.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): It is proposed that an item will be placed before the house in the supplementary estimates which will, if approved, effect this transfer. It will be effective following that action by the house.

Mr. Starr: Are any difficulties being experienced in the transfer of this service?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker. There is a committee of senior civil servants under the chairmanship of Dr. George Davidson examining ways in which this separation might be effected, and this study or examination is still continuing. It is as a result of the work of this particular group that action is being taken in this way to sever the national employment service from the unemployment insurance commission.

[Later:]

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour. It relates to a question asked of him a little earlier by the hon. member for Ontario regarding the transfer of the national employment service to labour department jurisdiction. If I heard the minister's reply correctly he indicated that a special vote would be introduced in this connection. I wonder whether the minister would agree that this vote could be referred to the industrial relations committee so the whole proposal could be studied in some depth by members of this house.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the policy decision to make this transfer was announced in the house some months ago, and it follows from the recommendation of the Gill committee, the national employment committee and other persons interested in the effective functioning of the national employment service. Inasmuch as this vote will be dealt with in committee I think we will be able to have a pretty good discussion on its purposes at that time.

Mr. Barnett: I am sorry but I could not hear the latter part of the minister's reply.

Mr. MacEachen: The point I made was that this particular item in the supplementary estimates will be discussed in the committee of supply, and that will permit of a discussion which I think will make it unnecessary to refer the matter to the industrial relations committee.

Mr. Barnett: A supplementary question. Would the minister not agree that some useful purpose might be served by giving members of the house the opportunity of studying in some detail the proposals as they will affect the administration and operation of the employment service throughout the country? In this manner we would have an appropriate opportunity of questioning the administrative officials as to how this will work out in its operation in various parts of the country.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, this is a point that I will be glad to consider. I believe that at present the actual details of such a transfer have not been fully worked out, and indeed cannot be fully worked out until it is possible to give some legislative basis for this transfer. The details are being worked out at present.

CAPE BRETON—CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING FUTURE OF NO. 18 COLLIERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour if he has had recent correspondence with the executive of the united mine workers union concerning the future of No. 18 colliery?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I received a communication some days ago from the president of the united mine workers, district 26, with regard to this colliery.

Mr. MacInnis: May I ask a supplementary question. My question was whether the minister had answered this request from the executive.

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker. I have been attempting to get the president of the united mine workers on the telephone at Glace Bay during the last two days. I discovered this morning that he is in Washington, but I will be communicating with him as soon as he returns.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRIES AS TO FILM RESPECTING PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister a question relating to the Pearson film. My question is not based upon the story in today's Globe and Mail on the film "Mr. Pearson" but is related to it.

In view of the grave doubts that now exist about the actual facts and the information that have been given to us by the government in so far as the government's role in this matter is concerned, as distinct from the C.B.C., is the Prime Minister prepared to offer the opportunity for a debate upon this matter or to give us a full account of the relationships of his office in this film making?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there will be an opportunity, if the hon. gentleman desires to take advantage of it, when interim supply is up for consideration in a few days.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In relation to the celebrated yet restricted film on the Prime Minister, was an oath of secrecy administered to Richard Ballentine and his technical crew during the filming of this production prior to their being admitted to meetings of the cabinet or a committee of the cabinet?

Mr. Pearson: To my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, there was no such admission of unauthorized persons, including those mentioned by my hon. friend, to any meeting of cabinet or committee of the cabinet.

Mr. Fairweather: I have another question on the same subject, Mr. Speaker. Have any other journalists or technicians been given equal privileges to view the Prime Minister in a day, or whatever it was, of his life?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It does seem to me that many of these questions should be put on the order paper.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State, the minister responsible to parliament for the activities of the C.B.C. With respect to the hour long documentary film "Mr. Pearson", can the minister inform the house whether the C.B.C. in its final editing found it necessary to edit out some crude and vulgar references by Mr. Gordon Robertson, Clerk of the Privy Council, with respect to the present Leader of the Opposition?

Mr. Speaker: This question is surely one for the order paper, along with the others.

[Later:]

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Secretary of State a question about the film "Mr. Pearson". Now that we have had articles in depth about this film in the Winnipeg Fress Press of last Thursday and the Globe and Mail of today, would the Secretary of State urge upon the C.B.C. the necessity of answering the questions that have been put on the order paper by various members about the machinations surrounding this restricted film?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have received an answer to the question put to me by the hon. member for Port Arthur on this matter, and I am informed by the C.B.C. that there is no change in the decision already reached on this subject.

Mr. Fairweather: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder what the answer of the C.B.C. is to my simple little question. When are we going to have an answer to my question? I should like to know.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member put this question on the order paper.

An hon. Member: It is on the order paper.

Mr. Lamontagne: I understand that an answer will be provided tomorrow.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State.

For two or three weeks questions have been asked here and there about the famous Pearson film now in the hands of the C.B.C. Now, some of us have seen it and others have not, but most of us have not seen it.

What is preventing the Secretary of State from inquiring exactly about the reasons why that film is not shown on T.V. in order to settle the matter? We are told day after day that it is the C.B.C. or the B.B.G. which make the decisions, while the Secretary of State is perfectly aware of what is going on. Why not show it once and for all, so that we will no longer hear about that matter in the house?

Mr. Lamontagne: The decision rests with the C.B.C. alone. The corporation has already replied twice, through me, to the requests of the hon. members.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Secretary of State.

The minister is well aware of the fact that the C.B.C. comes under his jurisdiction and that if he makes suggestions to the B.B.G. or to the C.B.C., the corporation will pay heed to them. Under the circumstances we do not want to hear the excuse that it is up to the C.B.C. to decide and that the minister has nothing to say in that connection.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, as long as I am the minister responsible—

Mr. Caouette: Irresponsible—

Mr. Lamontagne: —to parliament for the C.B.C., I will not interfere with the programs presented by the corporation.

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): Could the minister tell us, in view of the criticism which seems to be aimed from all sides at this crown corporation, and because of the unceasing questions which always remain unanswered, whether the government intends to convene immediately a committee of the house to study the C.B.C. policy?

[Mr. Fairweather.]

I believe such a step is called for, because of the lack of answers in the house in this regard.

Mr. Lamontagne: I think that there were explanations by the C.B.C. on various occasions. There were two press releases on the matter, and I do not see what a parliamentary investigation could possibly add.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

There is no question of a parliamentary investigation. I should like to remind the minister that the C.B.C. is responsible to parliament, and I feel that it is absolutely necessary that parliament make an inquiry so as to know the policy and the attitude of that corporation toward the Canadian public.

[Text]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask a supplementary question. May I ask the Secretary of State since the C.B.C. decided not to show this film, which is their right, why was it shown to persons outside of the C.B.C.? Why was Mr. Ballentine told that the purpose in showing this film to persons outside the C.B.C. was to decide whether or not the film would be shown?

Mr. Lamontagne: I am told, Mr. Speaker, that according to the terms of the agreement between Mr. Ballentine and the C.B.C., two copies of the film were given to Mr. Ballentine. Mr. Ballentine had agreed to show these films only to special film societies.

Mr. Douglas: The minister has entirely missed my point. I asked him why the film was shown by the C.B.C. to persons outside of the C.B.C. Is the minister saying now that it was shown by Mr. Ballentine? Then could I ask the minister if the disapproval of the film, which according to this report was registered by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, was communicated to the C.B.C.?

Mr. Lamontagne: I am not aware of this, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, shall we have the opportunity of seeing the Pearson film?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have had quite a long discussion of this matter this afternoon. I do not think it should be continued any further at this stage.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, we do not want the matter to degenerate into a debate, but we would not want the minister to fail in or shirk his responsibilities. He should give a clear answer. If a group of citizens or even one person had the right to show the film, I do not see any reason why all the hon. members of the house would not be invited to see it, as well as the Canadian public. The minister should assume his responsibilities.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I have no lesson to take from the hon. member for Villeneuve—

Mr. Caouette: You surely have.

Mr. Lamontagne: The film was shown by its maker who had been given copies under an agreement he had signed with the C.B.C.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Could the Secretary of State tell us how many times in the past the C.B.C. has refused to telecast films which it had paid for? What amount of money was wasted in that way during the last year?

Mr. Lamontagne: I do not have that information here, Mr. Speaker.

[Text]

Mr. Fairweather: I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State. Is it a fact that the working prints of this film are worn out because they have been shown so many times to various people to decide whether or not we can see it?

REPORTED SMALL CANADIAN COVERAGE IN NEWS BROADCASTS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, about the question the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) asked me last June 2, the C.B.C. advises as follows.

The French television network gives, every night of the week, a national news bulletin lasting approximately 13 minutes, followed by a regional news bulletin lasting approximately seven minutes.

According to an investigation made by the research department of the C.B.C. in Montreal on the 1963 news bulletins, two thirds of the news items read on the national broadcast dealt with Canadian matters and one third with international events.

Taking into account the regional news bulletin started in June 1963, the proportion of Canadian news reached 80 per cent during the last part of the year.

I would like to take this opportunity to reply to the question the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) asked me last June 10.

The C.B.C. advises me that, in 1963, the total amount paid in fees is made up as follows: 95 per cent to artists living in Canada and 5 per cent to artists living abroad.

CANADIAN FLAG

INQUIRIES RESPECTING CONSIDERATION OF PROPOSED RESOLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Would he inform the house whether his department is continuing to distribute a card game called "The Canadian maple leaf" in which the three maple leaves are referred to as jokers, and the winner of the game is the player left with the one maple leaf? Can we draw from this that there was collusion between the Liberal party and the New Democratic party before this flag debate began?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is obviously out of order.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; this is a very important point.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the question is out of order there is not much more I can say.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; we are now involved in a flag debate concerning three maple leaves, and one department of the government is publishing the fact to the world that they are referred to as three Canadian jokers.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will have ample opportunity, and very shortly, to put his views before the house.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I will debate it at ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister advise the house whether the government will consider the resolution which is government order 44(B) a question of confidence in the government?

Some hon. Members: Answer.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean Chrétien (St. Maurice-Laflèche): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the leader of the house.

Since the Leader of the Opposition did not have sufficient time last night, would the house allow the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) to finish the speech of the Leader of the Opposition?

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister did not have time to complete his speech, would he allow the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) to do so?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is intended for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, during the debate on the distinctive national flag, Mr. Speaker, you made a ruling which was approved by the press, as well as by all members of the house. You said, at that time, that you had studied for three or four days the matter under dispute, in order to decide whether the two projects should be divided.

This is my question to the Prime Minister. Did his advisers suggest to the Prime Minister, or is it the latter who suggested to the advisers, that you should make such a ruling? In other words, before making his statement yesterday afternoon and before you made your ruling, did the Prime Minister know what the ruling would be? I am putting this question to the Prime Minister.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am very surprised at this question, but I hasten to answer it. There was absolutely no communication between any member of this house and myself on this important question. The Clerk of this house, who is my chief adviser, and I did considerable research on the matter, but I want to assure all hon. members that there was no collaboration, no communication and, as far as I know, no leak from my office nor from the office of the Clerk.

[Mr. Chatterton.]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO IMPLEMENTATION OF GILL REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Does the government have any intention of bringing forward amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act as a result of the Gill committee report?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the policy of the government with respect to this matter was put forward by the Prime Minister in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Mr. Grafftey: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In spite of the minister's reply, could the house be given some idea of whether the government plans to bring these changes forward, as reported, and when?

Mr. MacEachen: I think the situation was set out at that time, Mr. Speaker. The timing will depend on the disposition of other parliamentary business.

TRADE

GATT—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of current newspaper reports that the United Nations conference on trade at Geneva has concluded with rather indecisive results, I wonder whether the minister would make an early statement on motions bringing the house up to date on the results of this conference.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have been speaking to my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and either he or I will make a report as soon as it can be put together.

IMMIGRATION

JOSIF VERGAKIS—STATEMENT ON REASON FOR DETENTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Leader of the Opposition inquired about the case of a seaman, Josif Vergakis. I have looked into this case. Vergakis deserted his ship on August 26, 1963. He was apprehended on April 28, 1964 and detained under the authority of the Immigration Act pending the holding of an immigration inquiry to determine his right to remain in Canada.

Concurrently with this action prosecution proceedings were instituted by the police authorities. He was charged with illegal entry into Canada and appeared in court on May 4, his case being remanded. The court granted his release on bail of $1,000. Notwithstanding the court's acceptance of bail, Vergakis continued to be detained for the immigration inquiry which was opened on May 6. The inquiry was immediately adjourned at the request of Vergakis' counsel, and he was released. Because of different adjournments, occasioned in part by Vergakis' refusal to answer questions, the inquiry was not completed until June 14, at which time he was ordered deported. He has entered an appeal against this order.

In the light of the deportation order and the fact that Vergakis is a deserting seaman, the special inquiry officer decided that he should be detained. The next day, an application for release having been made to the special inquiry officer by Vergakis' counsel, the detention order was withdrawn. He is free pending the outcome of his appeal and trial. The trial is scheduled to take place on June 26.

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): A supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the continuing series of reports and statements in connection with the Immigration Act and the alleged denial of the rights of individuals, would the Prime Minister not consider having a committee of parliament examine the Immigration Act with a view to clearing the air in a lot of these matters?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before considering that matter, I think it would be well to await the conclusion of the discussion which will undoubtedly be taking place on this matter on interim supply.

HOUSING

REPORTED INCREASE IN COST INDEX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance but in his absence perhaps I might ask it of the Prime Minister. My question arises from a dominion bureau of statistics cost of living release of June 12 indicating that the housing index rose one half point in May over April of this year and has risen 2.3 points over one year ago. Would the Prime Minister advise the house whether this increase is considered to be caused by the increase in the sales tax on building materials? If so, what action is the government taking to counteract it?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will put this question on the order paper—it does entail a good deal of research—he will get a reply from the Minister of Finance.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Veterans Affairs I wish to direct a question of some substance to his parliamentary secretary. Does the parliamentary secretary know whether the minister intends to introduce any amendments to the Pension Act, the War Veterans' Allowance Act or any other legislation affecting veterans and their dependants during this session?

Mr. C. W. Carter (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for giving notice of his question. I shall have to take it as notice and bring the matter to the attention of the minister on his return.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO FILLING OF VACANCY ON UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. Has the government yet decided whether, and if so when, the vacancy created on the unemployment insurance commission will be filled?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, no decision as yet has been taken on this appointment, but I would hope that such decision will be made within the next short while.

[Later:]

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the Canadian Labour Congress submitted the name of Mr. Reamer for appointment to the unemployment insurance commission?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have received no official communication from the Canadian Labour Congress yet on this point, although I have had informal communications with certain officers of the congress. Until I receive a formal communication I think I ought to withhold discussion of any particular name.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the present intention of the government to ultimately follow the recommendation of the Canadian Labour Congress in this regard?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the policy of the present government on appointments of this kind involving consultation with organized labour was set out by my colleagues the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs away back in 1959 in this house, and that policy will be followed in making such appointments.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

INTENTION TO MOVE CONCURRENCE IN COMMITTEE REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand a question in his role as chairman of the standing committee on privileges and elections. Is it a fact that as chairman he intends to move concurrence in the report he tabled yesterday, as he indicated to the committee?

Mr. L. T. Pennell (Brant-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, may I say to the hon. member for Port Arthur that I propose to keep the undertaking I gave to the committee, and in due course I will move concurrence in the said report.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

STATEMENT ON READINESS OF PROVINCES TO ATTEND CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, last week after I explained why it was decided to convene the federal-provincial ministerial conference on Indian affairs later in the year rather than in May, as had been tentatively planned, the hon. member for Northwest Territories asked me whether invitations to participate in this conference were extended to the governments of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. The answer is no. However, the question of their attendance is still under consideration.

Also in relation to the conference, the hon. member for Churchill asked whether some of the provinces did not indicate that they were prepared to go ahead with programs needing ratification by this conference, and stated that some very important projects would be delayed six months. At the time I said that I was not aware that a delay in the conference could have such consequences. I can reaffirm this. We have no knowledge of any provincial program of special interest to Indians which requires ratification by the conference and in consequence will be delayed by the convening of the conference in October.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MONTREAL—STEPS TO SETTLE WILDCAT STRIKE OF LONGSHOREMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. What does the minister intend to do to stop the longshoremen's strike in Montreal?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member would put this question on the order paper, as it probably requires a long answer.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The question is one of national urgency which affects the economy of Canada, and I would like to know what the minister intends to do to settle as soon as possible that strike which is prejudicial to the interests of the whole country.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Villeneuve—

Mr. Pigeon: The minister is ready to answer. This is an important question.

Mr. Speaker: Whether or not the minister is ready, I suggest that the question be put on the order paper. Perhaps at ten o'clock the hon. member—

Mr. Pigeon: I give the minister notice of my first question.

[Later:]

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Can he make a report to the house on the situation in the harbour of Montreal and inform the house whether anything is being done to stop the longshoremen's strike which has started there and to prevent it from spreading to the harbours of Three Rivers, Quebec and Saint John?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, happily the strike is confined at present to the port of Montreal and there is no indication that it will spread to Three Rivers or Quebec. The issue in dispute really is an issue between locals of the I.L.A. and the administrators of the pension fund. Judge Lippe, who was appointed commissioner subsequent to the last strike, is now engaged in resolving these differences with respect to the operation of the pension fund, and it is hoped that this will be possible in the near future.

NORTHLAND NAVIGATION LIMITED—SIGNING OF AGREEMENT WITH S.I.U.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, some seven or eight days ago I brought to the attention of the Minister of Labour a complaint from local 400 of the brotherhood of Canadian transport and general workers in Vancouver concerning the possibility of a certain shipping company signing an agreement with the S.I.U. which the union considered most unfair to them. The minister promised to make inquiries into the matter. Has he any information to give the house with regard to this question?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Perhaps a misunderstanding arose between myself and the hon. member. I thought his question had not been allowed. I shall be glad to have an answer as soon as possible.

PENSIONS

CANADA PLAN—PRESENTATION OF NEW RESOLUTION AND WHITE PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Now that all the provinces have been heard from with respect to the latest version of the Canada pension plan, can the Prime Minister say when a new resolution will be placed on the order paper regarding the plan itself or, in the meantime, when a white paper regarding the revised version of the plan will be presented to the house?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the resolution with regard to the constitutional amendment, as I have already said, will be placed on the order paper tomorrow. We will get the white paper before hon. members just as quickly as we possibly can.

FLOODS

SOUTHERN ALBERTA—STEPS TO ALLEVIATE SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will he inform the house and the country what the government intends to do concerning the flood disaster areas in southern Alberta, namely Waterton lakes, Glenwood, Stand Off and Cardston?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to look into this matter.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed, from Monday, June 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker:

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada, a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, this is a momentous and historic debate, and I trust that I and others who take part will approach it with the open-mindedness and the sense of responsibility which the importance of the question deserves.

I believe that as Canada approaches its one hundredth birthday it is important that we give due consideration to the symbols of Canada's nationhood. The New Democratic party at its founding convention, held here in Ottawa in 1961, called upon the Canadian people to recognize that the time had come to acquire the symbols of nationhood, and we set forth three important symbols; (1) a distinctive national flag (2) a national anthem and (3) a Canadian constitution domiciled in Canada and capable of being amended by Canadians.

I think it is incongruous that after 97 years Canada has not yet adopted these symbols of our national independence. In the long process of evolving from a colony to a nation Canada has achieved the realities of national independence, but we have repeatedly delayed the adoption of the symbols that would give our independence meaning in the eyes of the world.

The reason for the long delay is rooted in our history. In 1867 the British North America Act brought together the English and French people in the partnership of confederation, and since that time people from many lands and speaking many tongues have come to Canada to make this country their home. That successive governments have evaded the issue of selecting national symbols is not due to any desire on the part of the government of Great Britain to retain any of the relics of our colonial status. The delay has been due to our own inability to agree on the form these symbols should take. We, the Canadian people, can acquire these earmarks of national independence any time we want them. The only obstacle that lies in the way is our inability to agree among ourselves as to what these symbols should be and how they should be adopted. In the words of Cassius in Shakespeare's Julius Caesar:

> The fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars, But in ourselves.

I believe the Prime Minister is to be commended for grasping this thorny nettle that his cautious prececessors have all evaded.

Whether one agrees with the Prime Minister or not, I am sure all hon. members who listened to his address last night must have been impressed with his profound sincerity and his deep sense of conviction. There can be no doubt about the need for Canada to face up to the problem of adopting symbols that will proclaim our national independence to the world. However, I want to devote my remarks to three particular aspects of this problem; first, the government's timing in introducing this matter; second, the methods it has employed; and third, the design which the government has submitted.

First of all let me say a word about the government's timing in this matter. Why is this resolution before us at this particular time? On June 3 the Prime Minister gave the house a long list of legislation which he contended must be dealt with before the summer recess, and in making a statement on behalf of our party at that time I agreed with it. But now the Prime Minister has introduced this controversial and emotionally charged issue that will delay action on the very legislative program which he outlined as requiring immediate attention. I wonder why the government is obstructing the action of parliament in dealing with the government's own program. That is a question that needs an answer.

The Prime Minister's answer is that he made a commitment to the people of Canada in the last general election. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that he made a lot of other commitments to the Canadian people on subjects that were even more important than the adoption of a national flag. He made commitments on questions having to do with the welfare and economic survival of the Canadian people. For instance, the Liberal party committed itself to a program to promote full employment and economic growth, but we have seen no measures calculated to deal effectively with the problem of unemployment or the lack of economic growth.

Last February we had over 600,000 unemployed in Canada. Even now in the summer months we have something over 300,000 unemployed. John E. Snyder, one of the great industrialists of the United States and head of the United States Corporation, said before a congressional committee last October that automation was eliminating 40,000 jobs a week in the United States, and a symposium held in Montreal recently made an estimate that in Canada there are somewhere between 4,000 and 4,500 jobs a week in which men are being displaced by technological equipment.

This problem of automation is a growing problem. It will be an increasing problem not only for this generation but for generations to come. Jobs for the young people who are annually entering the labour market are something about which the government and this parliament should be concerning themselves. Instead of that we are probably going to take several weeks arguing about a national flag.

The problem of poverty in this country is something which the government tends to sweep under the carpet. The other day Dr. O. J. Firestone, vice dean of social sciences at the University of Ottawa, said that one Canadian out of every five lives in a state of abject poverty. He went on to say that though we speak a great deal about the unemployed we tend to ignore the fact that there are 3,800,000 Canadians who live constantly in poverty whether they are working or not. This is something which ought to touch the conscience of Canada, yet we are doing nothing about it.

The government speaks of commitments, but the Liberal party committed itself at the last election to provide medical care insurance under which every Canadian citizen would be entitled to have their medical bills paid if they were in excess of $25 per year. We have heard nothing about implementing this commitment. The government promised to the young people of Canada 10,000 scholarships of $1,000 each for four years. No action has been taken. Instead, the government has reduced its commitment to one of interest free student loans. But no legislation has been brought down, despite the fact that we are now in the middle of the month of June and if students are to get any benefit from this legislation it ought to be available well in advance of the opening of the university year.

During the election the government made much of the fact that it intended to set up a Canada development corporation with a development fund. The government said this was the keystone in its plan for economic development; this was the program for economic expansion; this was the program which would provide jobs and create new industries in the underdeveloped areas; this was the program which would help regain control by Canadians of the Canadian economy. Well, a resolution concerning this matter appeared on the order paper last fall. Since that time it has been dropped into the wastepaper basket of oblivion and has been heard of no more.

The government also made a commitment to the Canadian people to do something about regaining control of the Canadian economy. Most members will recall that prior to the election the Minister of Finance was cast in the role of a St. George who was going to do battle against United States control of the Canadian economy. They will remember that he wrote an article which was circulated by the millions, entitled "Buying Back the Canadian Economy". What happened?

Mr. Herridge: He was unhorsed by his own colleagues.

Mr. Douglas: St. George rode forth to do battle. He made a few strokes with his sword which, though they did not wound the dragon, succeeded in annoying him. The dragon roared in the voice of United States under secretary George S. Ball, and the Minister of Finance and the government fled the field, leaving the Americans in complete control. We contend that a Canadian flag is all very well, but that the government ought to concern itself about who owns the real estate over which the flag is going to fly. A symbol of national independence will have little meaning if in the meantime Canada has become an economic satellite of the United States. In that case, we shall be able to choose for a flag an American eagle with a beaver clutched in its claws.

During the last election the government claimed it was the only party in Canada which could make co-operative federalism work. In the space of more than a year which has elapsed since the government took office nothing fundamental has been done to close the fissures and divisions which have appeared in our federal system. A flag in itself cannot provide unity. Unity can only come about when a country has unity of purpose; when a government is prepared to tackle the social and economic problems confronting the people and unite them behind a national policy. Then a flag, which is a symbol of national unity, will have meaning.

The New Democratic party supports the idea of a distinctive national flag, but we are against the government's scale of values and its order of priority. This flag will not put food into one empty belly or provide jobs for the thousands who are out of work. It will not bring medical care to a sick child or ease the load on the poor and the afflicted. It will not supply decent housing for the aged or educational opportunities for the young. It will do nothing to give Canada social and economic independence in an era when United States corporate control is stretching its tentacles across the Canadian economy.

These are the problems which beset this nation, and so far the government's major contribution has been to take up its own time and the time of parliament with an untimely controversy over this flag issue. I think the government has put the cart before the horse. I think we ought to strengthen this country and unite it. We would then be in a position to talk more intelligently about a flag. It is my view that the whole question of a flag could have been left until we had dealt with the legislative program now before us. There would have been plenty of time to deal with the flag resolution next fall or next winter.

I wish to say a word, too, about the government's method of introducing this measure. I recognize that this is a difficult matter to deal with. I think the government would have been well advised to select two or three designs and submit them to a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate in the hope that some measure of agreement could be reached. This might have prevented the selection of a flag from becoming a partisan issue or being involved in political diatribes. Normally, when a government is a majority government, a decision of this nature can be made by the government members, but the present government is a minority government and surely it would have made sense in this situation to have attempted to reach some all-party agreement.

I think the government further confused the matter by putting both the question of the distinctive national flag and the retention of the union jack as a symbol of our relationship to the commonwealth and our loyalty to the crown in the same resolution. I feel, Mr. Speaker, all of us are indebted to you for separating the two questions. I believe this gives every member a chance to stand up and be counted on each issue so there can be no opportunity for equivocation or misrepresentation.

It has been moved by the Conservative party that we should refer this matter to the people of Canada in a plebiscite. I am free to confess that when this was a matter of academic discussion I would have had considerable sympathy for this approach. I think now, Mr. Speaker, the time for a plebiscite is long past. Opinion in Canada has now polarized around two flag designs, the red ensign and a maple leaf design, and I do not think we would do any great service to Canada by submitting this question to a national referendum. We would in effect have a miniature general election and, as the right hon. Leader of the Opposition is himself quoted as saying in a C.B.C. radio and television interview last Wednesday, "To have an election on the basis of a matter like this will divide this country as it has not been divided in the past".

I think all the arguments against having an election on such an emotionally charged issue apply equally to having a referendum at this particular stage. Anyone who witnessed the confrontation on parliament hill when the proponents of the red ensign and the proponents of the maple leaf design faced each other across a cement sidewalk, and heard some of the comments that were made, must realize that this situation, in a more inflammatory form, would be re-enacted in a thousand communities in Canada. I think we would only inflame passions, we would only increase national disunity, and we would do a great disservice to the people of Canada by having a referendum at this time. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I am doubtful now that a referendum would settle anything. It would show us what people think in particular localities. I doubt that it would give us a consensus of national opinion. In the final analysis parliament itself would still have to deal with the matter. I think, therefore, that parliament has the responsibility to deal with it now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: I would have preferred that this matter be left, as I have said, until we had dealt with more important issues on the order paper. But now that the government has precipitated it into the House of Commons I say that parliament must accept its responsibility; parliament must make the decision as to what national flag this country will adopt. This is our task. I do not think we can shirk it or pass it on to anyone else.

The third thing I want to say something about, Mr. Speaker, is the actual design of the flag itself. I have a good deal of sympathy for those who advocate selecting the red ensign, with some modification, as the national flag of Canada. As one who was born in Scotland I have a deep attachment for British traditions and British institutions, I would be very happy, personally, with a flag in which there was the union jack in one corner and the fleur-de-lis in another, thus paying tribute to the two great founding races that came together to make up the partnership of confederation. But, Mr. Speaker, we are not selecting a flag for my personal preference or for anyone else's personal preference. We are trying to select a flag that will speak for the people of Canada as a whole. We are not selecting a flag for this particular generation alone. We are seeking to select a flag design that will have meaning for our generation and for all the other generations of Canadians who will come after us.

I think we have to recognize that the maple leaf design is the flag best calculated to do that.

We must remember that there are over 5 million Canadians who are of neither British nor French origin. For them neither the union jack nor the fleur-de-lis has the deep significance that it has for those of us who are of French or British stock. It seems to me that these people have a right to a national flag that is distinctly Canadian and that for them is meaningful and significant.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Douglas: Later, please. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, there are millions of Canadians who were born in this country and who look upon Canada as their native land. This number will grow with the passing of the years. These young people have no deep feeling of attachment for the land of their forefathers; to them this land, Canada, is their native land. In the years that lie ahead they will have a struggle to retain Canada's national identity, lying as we are along the border of the United States, exposed to their movies, their magazines and their television shows. I suggest that if the young Canadians of this generation and future generations are going to retain their national identity they need a flag that speaks not of Britain nor of France, but a flag that says to them "Canada, my native land". I am supporting the maple leaf design because I believe it is the flag for the Canada of tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: The New Democratic party believes, however, that a single maple leaf is to be greatly preferred over the sprig of three maple leaves proposed in the resolution. The Prime Minister has good, traditional, heraldic reasons for adopting the three maple leaf design. But in this flag issue we are breaking tradition in many respects. We are breaking a lot of heraldic rules in putting, for instance, the two blue bars on the flag—of which I approve. I think we ought not to be bound by either tradition or the advice of heraldic experts.

I think there are two very compelling reasons for using the single maple leaf rather than the design proposed by the Prime Minister. The first is the matter of identification. One of the purposes of a flag is that it can be easily identified. A person looking at our flag from some distance ought to be able instantly to recognize that flag and the country which it symbolizes. This can certainly be done much better by a single, large maple leaf standing out on a white background, with a blue bar on either side.

But I think there is a more important reason, Mr. Speaker. One of the problems of Canada has been to bring together the many diverse groups which make up our population, and I think one single maple leaf would speak of national unity. There are not three Canadas; there is only one Canada, made up of two founding races, with two official languages, with two cultures, with many ethnic groups—but one country, with one purpose and one destiny. I think we need a flag which says to the world that, though we have come from many lands speaking many tongues, we are united together in common bonds of allegiance to parliamentary democracy, to social justice and to democratic institutions.

I was pleased that the Prime Minister said in the course of his address yesterday that when it came to the matter of design parliament will decide. I hope the Prime Minister will allow the members to decide in a free vote. I hope that the members will be allowed to vote according to their personal preference. I know from conversations I have had that there are members in all parts of the house, how many I do not know, who would prefer a single maple leaf. I hope that the government will make it clear to their supporters, and that all of us will make it clear in the various parties, that this is a matter of individual preference. It is not a matter of partisan politics. It is not a matter of party discipline. It is a matter of selecting what we think will best denote to the Canadian people what Canada means as it is depicted pictorially on a flag.

Before leaving the question of the single maple leaf, may I say that I would have moved an amendment to give the house an opportunity to express its opinion on a single maple leaf design, but since the official opposition have an amendment before the house it would not, of course, be possible for me to move that amendment at this time. However, later in the debate we shall certainly introduce an amendment to give the house an opportunity to say whether it would like a single maple leaf rather than the three maple leaves proposed in the resolution. I hope hon. members will give this matter some thought, and we hope that enough of them will vote for such an amendment to make it possible for us to have a flag which, in our opinion, would not only be distinctively Canadian but would be representative of the national unity which we are seeking to build in this country.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I just say a few words about the two blue bars, which have been neglected in most of the discussions.

Mr. Churchill: The same as the Guatamalan flag.

Mr. Douglas: I think they are rooted deep in the traditions of our country. It is said that when the fathers of confederation were meeting and trying to select a motto and a title for Canada there was a good deal of discussion. It will be recalled that Sir John A. Macdonald wanted to use the term "the kingdom of Canada", and it was Sir Leonard Tilley who, on reading the 72nd psalm, found his attention arrested by verse 8, which says:

> He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth.

He came to the meeting of the fathers of confederation on that day and made the suggestion that it should be called the dominion of Canada, and that we adopt the motto "A mari usque ad mare"—"From sea to sea". The term "dominion" has been dropped, but I would like to think that the idea has not. I would like to think that the two blue bars on our flag will have a deep significance for the people of Canada. Irrespective of what our religious affiliation may be, or even if we have no religious affiliation at all, I think that all of us agree that we would like to see this a land from sea to sea where certain moral and spiritual values will be supreme; that this would be a land where the things of the mind and the spirit will have priority over mere material progress or personal acquisition. I would like to think that those two bars on the flag will tell the world that we have placed a high value on things other than mere material aggrandizement.

There is a verse in the Bible to the effect that "the measure of a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things he possesseth." I think that is not only true of individuals; it is true also of nations. I do not think that Canada's greatness in the future will depend solely upon the height of its skyscrapers, or the size of its gold reserve, or the amount of its trade balance. I think that in the final analysis Canada's true greatness will depend upon the extent to which it is concerned about protecting and advancing the rights and the opportunities of even the humblest citizen within its borders.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this debate will not be unduly prolonged and that it will not cause animosity. I think we should do all in our power to keep from setting Canadian against Canadian at a time when a spirit of unity is needed as never before in our history. I hope that we can conduct the debate on this controversial issue calmly and without rancour; and when we have made a decision I hope that we in this parliament and the people of Canada from coast to coast will join together under whatever flag we choose to help build a Canada that is strong, free and united.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Leboe).

Mr. Choquette: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

I respect the feelings of the hon. member for Villeneuve but, last week you ordered the hon. member for St. Denis not to put up a flag in the house so that the great debate which is going on at present would not be turned into a spectacle.

Consequently, I respectfully request that you call the hon. member for Villeneuve to order and ask him to take down the flag he has on his desk, the same way you did for the hon. member for St. Denis.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for drawing this to my attention; I had not noticed it until now. Will the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) take down the piece of bunting on his desk.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, the resolution under consideration has nothing to do with the flag I have before me. I brought the same flag to the house a fortnight ago, but it is not the one mentioned in this resolution.

I realize the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) just wanted to show off, as he always does both in his province and in this house in order to draw the attention of all hon. members to this flag. Therefore, I would ask you to bear with me, because I am supposed to speak after the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Leboe) and I shall deal with the resolution as it stands without referring to any others, unless I want to move an amendment to that effect, something which I shall decide then.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Notwithstanding the very interesting remarks, two wrongs do not make a right and if it was wrong for the hon. member for St. Denis to show a flag it is wrong for the hon. member for Villeneuve to show a flag. It is my duty as chairman and Speaker of the house to try to keep things under control, and such incidents as this do not help the Chair. Therefore I suggest that the flag be taken down.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: When I make my speech, will you let me use this flag to explain what it means and let me show it to all the house?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: The answer to that question is no. An opportunity has been given to display other flags on the front lawn of the parliament buildings and perhaps this could be displayed there. Once more I appeal to all hon. members. There is enough emotion generated by this type of debate and we do not need any outside assistance. Therefore I would suggest that the flag be taken down out of respect for the sensibilities of other members in the house.

Mr. Caouette: I will comply with your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I am not going to take it down, but I will take it off.

Mr. Choquette: On a question of privilege—

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

A while ago the hon. member accused me of showing off, and yet I have always been polite with him. I hope that he went further than he intended to, because I had no such intention when I raised a point of order.

I have always been very polite and I would like him to be also with all hon. members.

Mr. Caouette: I am always more polite than the hon. member.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Now that both members are recorded on Hansard I think we can leave it at that.

Mr. Bert Leboe (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, first of all it is my privilege to say that the views I will express, and those of other members in the Social Credit party, will be expressed on an individual basis.

Mr. Caouette: Which party?

Mr. Leboe: The Social Credit party.

Mr. Caouette: Are you sure?

Mr. Leboe: The views that I express will be entirely my own and certainly will not involve concurrence by any other member of this group. As found on page 4319 of Hansard for yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) said:

> Mr. Speaker, in taking this position I know there are others who are as patriotic and as Canadian as I am or can ever hope to be, who disagree honestly and deeply. I respect that kind of honest disagreement.

I hope that when I deal with some of the remarks of the Prime Minister he will regard me as one of those to whom he referred in using those words. Before I proceed with that part of my remarks I should like to refer to something said by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas). He suggested that a plebiscite should not be held, and that the parties should have been brought together to discuss this matter. I wish to say that I do not believe this is a party matter in any way, shape or form. I do not think it would have been right for the parties in the house to get together behind closed doors in some smoke filled room and decide what kind of flag Canada should have. He has said that the matter has polarized itself around two designs. This again I do not believe. My correspondence tells me that there is a great deal of latitude in respect of a Canadian flag. I will deal with this matter a little later, but I think I can show there is every reason to believe that this problem can be solved very easily without taking up very much time of the house.

The hon. member also mentioned that the other ethnic groups would want a flag with nothing on it having to do with the two founding races. Here again I disagree wholeheartedly. On the basis of my contacts with the people of the country, my contacts with other members of parliament and the letters I have been receiving, it is my belief that there are just as many people in the ethnic groups who would have us retain something of the red ensign, not necessarily the whole of it, as there are people who would want a completely new Canadian flag. I fully concur in what the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam said in respect of the order of business. As a matter of fact, after we had discussed interim supply last Friday for five minutes I rose in my place and said that I wanted to discuss this very matter on interim supply, and if I am in the house when interim supply is called again I hope to do that very thing; so I do not need to go into the matter here.

I should like to deal very briefly with the speech made by the Prime Minister in introducing the resolution. As found on page 4308 of Hansard, the Prime Minister quoted this statement of his party's policy:

> A Liberal government will establish a distinctive Canadian flag within two years of taking office.

I would call your attention to these words, Mr. Speaker, that a Liberal government will establish a distinctive Canadian flag within two years. It is my opinion that this is exactly what they are doing, and part of the machinery they are using to do this is contained in the Prime Minister's speech when he said that if parliament decides that it cannot support a government on a matter of major policy our system does provide for a referendum to the people in an election. I want to make the point very clear that I believe this is a part of the machinery that the government is using to carry out its commitment, which was that a Liberal government would establish a distinctive Canadian flag within two years.

In election campaigns many promises are made and many ideas are put forward as to what a government will do; but yesterday, Mr. Speaker, we were confronted with deciding on two issues in one resolution and you, Mr. Speaker, and rightly so I believe, divided the two issues so that they could be voted on separately. Compare this with the long list of election promises on election day. Are we allowed on election day to sort out the various promises of the various parties seeking election and say: I am going to put my X behind this, and I am going to eliminate this? No, we have no choice.

As a matter of fact, in the Prime Minister's speech yesterday he said that we are responsible for broad policies. The flag issue is not a broad policy. It is the narrowest of narrow policies and it is something that certainly must fall within the purview of a reference to the people in a plebiscite. The Prime Minister also had a great deal to say yesterday in his speech about the unity that this action would bring about. I agree with the editorial that appeared in the Globe and Mail this morning which said in effect that this was a very bad joke.

I do not believe that this action is going to bring unity to Canada at all. I certainly suggest to those people who believe it is going to bring unity to Canada that they travel throughout the length and breadth of this country to find out what the people are saying and thinking. By no stretch of the imagination, Mr. Speaker, is this action going to bring about unity in Canada.

There were a great many references in the speeches yesterday to symbols. We had a sort of by-play by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) on this question of symbols because at one stage he told us we were going to part company with the past, and at another stage the symbols were rooted in the past. I refer to page 4320 of Hansard where the Prime Minister is reported as saying:

> In this evolution I believe that the time has now come for another change by the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag which cannot be mistaken for or confused with the emblem of any other country but Canada.

In contrast to that statement, the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 4321:

> The maple leaf itself has been accepted as a Canadian symbol since long before confederation. It is deep in our history and in our traditions.

Then, on page 4323, he is reported as saying:

> This resolution does indeed mark a break with the past, as every accepted stage in the evolution of men and nations must mark a break with the past.

This morning, Mr. Speaker, a cartoon came to my desk. It depicts a lady sitting at a table with a politician. She says, "Sir, this is the first opportunity I have ever had of sitting with a politician; is it true that a politician can talk out of both sides of his mouth at once?" We cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker. We cannot cut the ties with the past, as the Prime Minister said, and link ourselves with the past in our minds and in our hearts. This is impossible. I say to you that the time has come when we must be sensible about this proposition and refer it to the people of Canada.

There was a reference to the maple leaves being one forty secondth part of the flag. I for one, cannot see what the size of the maple leaves on the flag has to do with what it represents. If we followed this principle, then we should have a flag about 50 by 100 flying over the parliament buildings, if the size of the flag means much. In this connection, speaking of emblems, is it not true that in Great Britain they have the lion for an emblem and in the United States they have the eagle. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) referred to the eagle clutching a beaver. Is it necessary that we have the maple leaf emblem brought into the flag at all when, according to the Prime Minister, we are going to depart from the past? Why have this long discourse about the maple leaf being rooted in the past?

I say to you that the maple leaf about which we are talking is found only in this part of eastern Canada. It is not a Canadian emblem, by any means. It has been accepted as an emblem, certainly, just as we have other emblems. This is no reason for including it in a Canadian flag. I like the maple leaf.

An hon. Member: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Leboe: Sit down; you will have all kinds of time to speak on this resolution. If we are going to have an emblem that has roots deep in the past, then certainly there is nothing more deeply rooted in Canada's past than the red ensign.

I should like to deal now with the statements of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Canadian club. I should like to quote from page 4320 of Hansard where the Prime Minister quoted from the resolution of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce:

> That the parliament of Canada formally adopt and authorize a distinctive national flag. A distinctive national flag would be a strong, unifying influence, consistent with the status of full nationhood.

I should like to refer to the other quotation which was from a resolution of the Association of Canadian Clubs:

> Canadian clubs in biennial conference assembled support a Canadian flag that is simple, dignified and distinctive; and offer their services, if and when parliament has approved a Canadian flag, in promoting its acceptance throughout Canada.

In that connection, I should like to read from P.C. 5888 of 1945. I have a certified copy signed by R. B. Bryce, Clerk of the Privy Council. Before I read this, I should like to refer to a statement made by the Prime Minister in which he quoted a portion of this order in council to the effect that the red ensign may be flown from buildings owned or occupied by the federal government, within and without Canada. However, he failed to read the important part of the order in council which states:

> His Excellency in council, on the same recommendation, is further pleased to declare and doth hereby declare that it shall be appropriate to fly—

Not may fly—

> —it shall be appropriate to fly the Canadian red ensign within and without Canada wherever place or occasion may make it desirable to fly a distinctive Canadian flag.

If you compare the wording of this order in council P.C. 5888 and the resolution of the Canadian clubs and the chamber of commerce you will find this order in council complies with a request for a distinctive Canadian flag, which is here referred to as the red ensign.

I believe most members of the house, as a matter of fact I think all members of the house know exactly where I stand on the issue because I circulated a 20-point statement outlining my personal views. In this statement I suggested several things, and I am going to review them at this moment. First of all, I said:

> The people of Canada have never been asked nor have the people said they want a new flag other than the "red ensign".

I fail to find anyone who can prove to me that the people of Canada have said so. If the people of Canada have said so, I want somebody to stand up in their place and tell me when they said so.

Mr. Grégoire: My constituency did say so.

Mr. Leboe: Your constituency is a part of Canada, the same as mine. Let us have a vote on the matter and then we will know.

I continue to quote from the statement outlining my personal views:

> The chief electoral officer should be notified that the opinion of the people is necessary to settle the matter and, therefore, should proceed to have a vote taken by way of a transferable ballot on which a number of choice designs, including the "red ensign", are manifest.

This is one point I should like to make in connection with the speech of the Prime Minister and also the reference by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. I should like them to listen carefully to this proposal:

> All votes should be sent to a central point for counting so that the place of origin of any vote cannot be determined.

There will be people who will say this cannot be done. This is what is wrong with many of our governments today; they say this or that cannot be done. I am telling you it can be done and it should be done. The number of votes in each poll would be recorded so we would know how many votes were cast, but we would never know who cast a vote for what. The chief electoral officer's report should be submitted to the permanent body of parliament, the Senate of Canada, for appropriate action.

I believe this is essential if we are going to have a permanent flag because surely, if the government of the day can bring in a flag by the method we are using today, then another government within two or three years can do exactly the same thing and we will have a flag for every political party that becomes the government of Canada. I believe this should be prevented at all costs, but the action we are taking and what we are proceeding to do will certainly bring about such a situation.

It is all right for hon. members to say, "Oh, they will never do it." This is the type of thing that traps old people at 45, because they think they have too much common sense; but then they get carried away. If we find ourselves in a position where another government can bring in another flag, then who will be the laughingstock of the nations of the world?

The Prime Minister said, as reported at page 4319 of yesterday's Hansard:

> It will not be the flag of a person or a party; it will be the flag of the people of Canada—

I ask him for how long—till we get another prime minister? In my opinion this is certainly not the way to do it.

The Prime Minister referred to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) and quoted him in connection with the flag's sending a message. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, the flag does not send any other message than the image we create here in Canada. I do not care what flag hangs on the pole, the message received by the people who see that flag will be according to the image we ourselves create. It is not the flag that makes Canada; it is Canada makes the flag. Let no one say a flag is going to make a nation; it is a nation that makes a flag.

I dealt with the order in council and I mentioned that in it at two different places it represents the Canadian red ensign as a distinctive Canadian flag. I feel that the red ensign should have a running chance with any other flag that might be presented. If the red ensign has been the flag of this country for 40 years, and we have waited 97 years for parliament to do something about a flag, I cannot see why we should get into this—I was going to say godawful hurry—debate on a flag issue at this point, when we have such a large body of opinion in the country telling the Prime Minister and the members of this house that it does not necessarily want the flag that has been proposed in this resolution.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come for this house and its members to waken up to their responsibilities and listen to what is being said in this country. We have no divine right as parliamentarians to pass over a large body of expressed opinion. I have said in this statement that the government may or may not have had more seats, had it not had something about the flag in its literature. I was going to say propaganda, but no one knows what effect if any this point had in the election.

I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) that we should not be embroiled in a flag fight at this time, and take up the time of the house with this issue when we have so much major legislation before us. I say to you, sir, that western and eastern Canada will never submit to such arbitrary action on the false premise that the elected representatives are doing what they were sent here to do.

I have said that the establishment of a national flag is not an administrative problem. It is aside and separate from any other issue, a distinct and peculiar problem and requires, therefore, particular action having regard for the feelings, emotions and desires of the majority of Canadians. We cannot brush aside all these things and say to the people at large that we, as a group of little dictators here, can do something without any reference to the people of the country who have voiced a very strong opinion on it.

On my desk I have two communications in favour of a new flag, but the rest of the communications are in favour of the red ensign. Anybody who wishes may look through my files to verify this. I say that the choice of a national flag is one place where the democratic voice of the people must be heard before action is taken.

I said that all the members in this house could not deny the democratic right of the people to voice an opinion on something that is supposed to last, shall we say, forever,—a flag that is going to represent Canada's future and its past. Are we as a little group, who have never been returned to this parliament on the basis of this issue, to decide that question? I say it is wrong in principle and it will be just as lasting as it is wrong because another prime minister, if he has a majority in the house, can bring in another flag.

Mr. Churchill: That is right.

Mr. Leboe: These people laugh.

Mr. Caouette: You people.

Mr. Leboe: If you are going to be prime minister some day, maybe you might.

Mr. Pigeon: Never. We will have a revolution.

Mr. Leboe: We got some reaction out of that.

Mr. Caouette: The reaction of the Conservatives.

Mr. Leboe: The flag which the hon. member had on his desk a little while ago would likely be the one he would promote.

Mr. Caouette: Well, it is from B.C. anyway.

Mr. Leboe: Regardless of where it is from. No clear mandate has been given to the government to bring in a new flag, and therefore to do so is not being brave or courageous but is overemphasizing the importance of the proposed action. It is not related to the majority of opinions. To stand on your head on the edge of a cliff is neither brave, courageous, nor common sense, and this is exactly what the Prime Minister is doing in his political career—standing on his head on the edge of a cliff.

No vote on the proposed resolution regarding the flag can be a free vote for government supporters regardless of where they sit in the house. I say regardless of where they sit in the house because we in this party have constantly supported the government, so long as it was going ahead with its legislative program, because the people of Canada wanted that, and because we wanted it. But right now we cannot be in the position of having a free vote in the house when we have the Prime Minister threatening the very people who sit beside him with an election which the people of Canada do not want, if this resolution is not carried. So far as I am concerned, and I said at the beginning that I am speaking personally, this is a type of blackmail when the Prime Minister says such a thing to the people who are sitting with him.

Mr. Rock: He did not say such a thing.

Mr. Leboe: He said "or else" we would have an election. I have won four elections out of five and I am not particularly resisting one. If there is a change around here I think I will be sitting somewhere around these parts. I may not be around over there, but I will be around these parts.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pigeon: Hear, hear.

Mr. Leboe: I see one of the Quebec boys is applauding when I say "in conclusion", but he is the only one applauding. As I said on June 5:

> I predict that if the resolution on the flag comes to a vote that the government party and the official opposition will divide almost to the man on party lines, giving ample proof of emphasis on party political considerations and a representative vote on the issue reflecting the wishes of the electors will be pushed into the background in the hope that ignoring the facts will make them disappear.

There have been a number of polls as to the way we are going to vote in this house. Many guesses have been made; and understandably. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) said, "Our party is for a flag with one maple leaf". Is this a free vote? Is this a free situation? No; these are party considerations. We have got a situation where, when the vote is counted, there is going to be almost to a man a straight division on party lines. Why not? It has been taken as a party consideration. Why? Because the Prime Minister has said there is going to be an election if this thing does not carry. It was thrown right into the political arena, and therefore I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that we should at this time pass the decision over to the people of Canada. Let them have four or five different designs, including the red ensign, to choose from. Let there be a transferable ballot. Every member of this house knows what a transferable ballot is. In case there is anybody who does not, it is a ballot whereby you put your first, second, third, fourth and fifth choice on the ballot and if your first choice gets the lowest number of votes your second choice becomes the first choice, and so on. In the final analysis, one flag would have a majority of over 50 per cent of the votes in this country and we would have a flag which could be introduced into the parliament of Canada and carried through this House of Commons and we would have a permanent flag for Canada. This is what the Prime Minister said he wants and, if he is going to get it, I say to him in all sincerity, this is how to get it.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, listening to the hon. member who just resumed his seat, I would be inclined to suggest to him to sit next to the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), since he spoke exactly in the same way and he used the same terms, with the same objective in mind.

He stated among other things that he had on his desk an enormous number of letters suggesting him to introduce to the house the red ensign as our national distinctive flag. He also suggested to us in English:

[Text]

"Stand on your own head."

[Translation]

Since we are not used to standing on our heads but rather on our own feet, he should have said: "Stand on your own feet."

[Text]

"Stand on your own feet." But be Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, before coming to the heart of the matter, I should like to remind the house of the amendment proposed last night by the Leader of the Opposition. He narrowly missed proposing it but he nevertheless succeeded in bringing it forward.

[Text]

As the proposal to change Canada's national flag will affect the unity and destiny of Canada now and for years to come, the government is authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to conduct a plebiscite prior to any further action being taken by the House of Commons, in order that all Canadians may be given their rightful opportunity to declare their choice concerning a national flag.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, only a few words on that amendment to the main motion.

The Leader of the Opposition was for during five years—

An hon. Member: No, for six years.

Mr. Caouette: —for six years, prime minister of Canada. Seven or eight years ago the Leader of the Opposition advocated and promised a distinctive national flag. What prevented him, during the years 1958, 1959, 1960, 1961, from presenting his referendum or plebiscite to the Canadian people in order to know what flag they wanted as their national and distinctive emblem?

The Leader of the Opposition is now attempting to play petty politics, to set forth that his group is more important than opposing groups. Moreover, I maintain that the Leader of the Opposition is using the resolution now before us in an attempt to create a climate of misunderstanding all across Canada, in an attempt to set the English speaking people against the French. That is what the Leader of the Opposition is trying to do.

An hon. Member: He does it in his own party.

Mr. Caouette: As a matter of fact, he does it in his own party.

I shall name no one and I shall give no names of hon. members, but yesterday I met members of the Conservative party who seemed completely dissatisfied with the speech the Leader of the Opposition was making. It is strange to note that, during an election, the same Leader of the Opposition does not make the same speeches. Only at this time, because the government had enough daring and courage to present a distinctive national flag for Canada, which we have been demanding for 25 years in this country, the Leader of the Opposition is trying to make us believe that the flag presented by proposal (a) in the resolution is bound to satisfy only the French Canadians of the province of Quebec.

Never in the past did the province of Quebec have to choose between three maple leaves or one, but it has always suggested and still suggests that the adoption of a distinctive national flag must not be turned into a debate on race, religion or colour, but be exclusively and entirely a Canadian matter, exactly as proposed in the resolution.

I wish here to congratulate the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Pearson) for having had the courage to make the speech we all know before the members of the Canadian Legion —I should say before a few members of the Canadian Legion—because even if the Prime Minister met 1,500 or 2,000 of them in Winnipeg, there are thousands of others throughout Canada who did not like at all the way he was treated in Winnipeg.

When he spoke on that occasion to the members of the Canadian Legion gathered for their congress in Winnipeg, the Prime Minister stated that the time had come for Canada to have a real flag different from those of other countries and which will be officially recognized throughout the world as the emblem of Canada.

From the time of their first election campaign, our group of Creditistes as well as the other Social Credit group have favoured and advocated the adoption of a distinctive national flag and a distinctive national anthem. Here is what one could read in the campaign program distributed throughout the country in 1962:

A Social Credit government would proceed immediately to the adoption of a distinctive flag and a national anthem.

Not a flag and a national anthem related to others, but quite distinctive.

In the province of Quebec, the publicity handed out during the election campaigns by the Ralliement Creditistes also showed that we wanted to provide Canada with a distinctive flag.

So, on November 21, 1962, the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) moved:

That this house is of the opinion that the government should agree within one year—

That was in 1962 and we are now in 1964.

—to a design for a suitable distinctive national flag and introduce legislation in this house for the adoption of this emblem.

It was a Conservative member, the parliamentary secretary of the then minister of veterans affairs, the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Jones), who had the sad honour to kill the motion.

At the opening of the session in May 1963, I deplored the fact that on the occasion of the state ceremonies which accompany the arrival of the Governor General, only the royal anthem God Save the Queen had been played, and not the national anthem O Canada. I also deplored the fact that no Canadian distinctive flag had been set up.

I said then:

> Why did we not have a distinctive national flag at that time? I remember that in 1956-57, when the Conservatives had taken over, we expected to have a distinctive national flag. I hope that during all those years in the opposition the Liberals had the opportunity of studying the feasibility of giving Canada a distinctive national flag and a national anthem.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, time has come for Canada to have a really distinctive emblem.

Now, the members of the house and the people of Canada were bewildered to see, on May 27, the Prime Minister suggest not one design of a national flag, but two designs of emblems for Canada.

We would be the only country in the world to have had the chance to have two flags and two national emblems.

The press and all other information and publicity media, put out by that action on the part of the Prime Minister, had a lot to say about it.

First, I should like to quote Le Devoir of May 28. That newspaper carried the following front page headline on four columns and three branches.

> Pearson proposes two flags:
> One national, with three maple leaves;
> One royal, the union jack.

And the news item was as follows:

> Three red maple leaves on a white field with blue edges, such is the design proposed yesterday in the House of Commons and which may never become Canada's flag. Because, in their attempt to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds, it may be that the government lost the majority which would have enabled them to provide the country with a distinctive flag, 33 years after independence and 96 years after the constitution of the provinces into a federation.
> Their mistake—

> —is that they joined the resolution introducing the flag to a statement of policy reaffirming our allegiance to the British crown and authorizing the flying of the union jack besides the maple leaf.

Here, I cannot refrain from referring to other countries that belong to the commonwealth of British nations, or the British commonwealth of nations. I have in mind Jamaica where, after acceding to independence, they did not vote for two flags, but for only one. It is a small country of 1,200,000 people which has its own distinctive national flag and anthem, with no outside connection whatsoever.

If, with our own emblem, our own flag, we cannot declare ourselves linked or united to the communities or countries that are part of the commonwealth of nations, then I say, sir, that we do not even deserve our Canadian independence or our sovereignty, as stated yesterday by the right hon. Prime Minister.

On May 28, a three branch title, spread over five columns on the front page of a newspaper said this:

> The Pearson plan (two flags and two anthems) stirred up opposition.

The news item itself did not fail to emphasize the confusion bred by the government project. Let me quote part of the text:

> The government proposal whereby Canada, which has been without a flag and without a national anthem since its beginning, would suddenly be provided with two flags and two anthems, has created further confusion and led to various reactions in political circles, not only because of its contents, but also of its form. By all appearance...

added the article,

> ...not only the French Canadian, but also the Anglo-Saxon members of parliament would vote against such a proposal, but for different reasons.

The reasons for that criticism were made known to us yesterday afternoon, when we had to discuss whether we should accept the government proposal or have two separate motions, due to the fact that the government, in order to please everybody, and not to be the victim of a colonialism which still exists in some parts of Canada, wanted officially to confirm the remnants of an obsolete nation, imposing them on the majority of Canadians who want Canada to be a sovereign, independent and free country, without any trace of colonialism.

At this stage I want to bring to the attention of the government and to the Prime Minister the fact that on May 27, when he introduced his resolution including the two flags, the first member to ask for a division of that resolution so that we might vote twice, once on a distinctive flag and then on the union jack, was the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire).

Mr. Speaker, we always asked that a distinctive national flag be adopted not for the mere pleasure of seeing some bunting on a pole, but to have a distinctive national flag which would mean something to Canada. As the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) said the other day and repeated this afternoon, a flag symbolizing the security of the Canadian people as well as the freedom of all individuals who have built up and live in this Canada of ours.

That is why we want to adopt a distinctive national flag.

Mr. Speaker, may I point out that it is five o'clock?

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely private bills, public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. S-30 respecting The Dominion of Canada General Insurance Company—Mr. Lachance.

THE CASUALTY COMPANY OF CANADA

Mr. G. C. Lachance (Lafontaine) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-31, respecting The Casualty Company of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, Bill No. S-31, is to grant The Casualty Company of Canada the right to use also a French name which is mentioned therein and reads as follows:

La Casualty, Compagnie d'assurance du Canada.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, could the hon. member tell us how many people make up that company's board of directors, that is the number of Canadians compared to the number of foreigners, for instance, and the number of directors living in the province of Quebec compared to the total number of directors?

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I must point out to the house that the hon. member can only answer that question on the understanding by the house that he is not closing the debate.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I take exception to that procedure for the simple reason that if this bill is referred to a committee there will be ample opportunity for any hon. member to ask questions at that time. Furthermore, when the bill comes back from the committee for concurrence in its final stages, particularly in the committee stage, there will be abundant opportunity to ask questions, where interrogation can take place back and forth.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I have to agree with the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) that perhaps the proper procedure is for hon. members to ask their questions and then allow the hon. member moving second reading to answer the questions when he winds up the debate on second reading. That might be the better procedure. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, what type of procedure are we following here—with a bill put before the house in this way, no explanation being given by the hon. member sponsoring the bill or anything like that? A question has been asked the hon. member in respect of the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I recognize that a question has been asked of the sponsor of the bill, but I do not think he would be permitted to answer this question on second reading unless it were understood that he was not closing the debate. An hon. member who sponsors a bill and speaks for a second time on second reading under our rules closes the debate. When the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) asked a question I reminded the house that the hon. member for Lafontaine (Mr. Lachance) could only answer the question on the understanding that he was not closing the debate. That permission was not given by the house.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING SERVICE IN THE UNITED KINGDOM

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-37, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1952.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill, Bill No. C-37, is to grant eligibility for an allowance under the War Veterans Allowance Act to those veterans of world war I who would qualify for an allowance except that they served in the United Kingdom less than 365 days prior to November 12, 1918. The allowance, however, would be less than a standard allowance as it would be calculated on the fraction of the number of days served in fact.

One of the requirements at the present time is that a veteran must have served in the United Kingdom for 365 days, and as many people know we have a number of veterans who just fall short of that required number of days service. In other words, if a veteran did serve in the United Kingdom 364 days out of the 365 he was not entitled to benefits under the War Veterans Allowance Act.

This bill is designed to eliminate what I consider a discrimination in our veterans legislation against certain member of the services who served in the army—and this applies only to the army—during world war I. Under the present terms of the War Veterans Allowance Act personnel of the army in world war I, as I said before, must have served 365 days outside of the territorial waters of North America, or in a so-called theatre of war such as France, Belgium, or, during world war I, in the Dardanelles, before they became eligible under the act. Travelling on the Atlantic ocean, for example, was not considered service in a theatre of war for a soldier during world war I. Naval personnel or seamen assigned to the same vessel, on the other hand, were considered for purposes of the act to be on active service and qualified for the benefits under the act by making only one voyage in dangerous waters. Herein I contend lies the discrimination between the various services. I say that the personnel of the army have been discriminated against in this case.

Bill No. C-37 is only a means by which I propose to bring once again this evident discrimination between our veterans before the members of this house. The bill itself proposes a sliding scale of eligibility of the veterans concerned. I would much prefer, as would other hon. members of this house, to see the deletion of that clause which refers to the 365 days service in our veterans allowance legislation.

I wish to cite as examples three cases, just to illustrate the point I am trying to make. In case No. 1 we will refer to a veteran by the name of Bill. He is a Canadian and was born in 1898. He volunteered in 1916 but was turned down on account of faulty vision, or on account of his eyes. However, he was accepted in 1917 and sailed from Halifax in November, arriving in England on December 6, 1917. He served seven days a week in forestry battalions in the old country. He returned to Canada in 1919. His length of service was actually two years. His present health is very poor and he is unable to work. His eligibility under the War Veterans Allowance Act is nil.

In the second case I wish to cite we will call the veteran Jack and he was born in Scotland in 1900. He was called up by the British army in the last six months of the war and was sent to France where he was given the job of looking after a gasoline engine 40 miles behind the line. He was discharged from the British army in 1919. He migrated to Canada in the late 1920's and after 20 years in Canada he qualified and now receives the full war veterans allowance under our Canadian legislation.

The third case is Leo. Leo's case is much the same as Jack's except that Leo was born in Italy, but he migrated to Canada about the same time that Jack did. He also, having been an allied soldier in world war I through service in the Italian army, qualifies according to the act, and I say rightly so.

These three cases I have cited are not hypothetical at all, but are actual cases. Jack and Leo need not enter into the argument I intend to put forward. The fact is that Bill deserves full recognition as a Canadian volunteer. It was not his fault that he did not arrive in England prior to November 11, 1917. The fact is that he tried; he volunteered.

To a number of hon. members it may be a revelation or appear inconceivable that we still have today men, and some women too, in this country who served two or three years in the Canadian forces, and yet through certain quirks of the legislation enacted after world war I they are still without entitlement to war veterans allowances.

If time permitted it would be interesting to acquaint hon. members with what research reveals as the reason why such legislation was enacted by our predecessors which left many of our veterans without benefits under this act. In the early stages of world war I recruiting was done on a voluntary basis and remained on this basis during the years 1914, 1915, 1916 and part of 1917, I believe. A number of veterans of world war I travelled many miles at that time at their own expense to enlist in units that were recruiting The situation was a little different at the time of world war II, but in those days they did not appear before a medical board as recruits did at the time we enlisted, but only before the unit's medical officer. The result of his examination sometimes depended on how badly the unit required men.

This statement is not intended as a reflection on the medical officers of 50 years ago, because there were a number of jobs in all units in those days that did not require what we consider now to be an A category man. It must be remembered that to a greater extent in those days fatigues pertaining to administration of a unit were done manually, and most hon. members are aware that transportation was horsedrawn. In fact, it took an army of men to do the daily chores in any unit. It was generally agreed at that time that it took six men behind the lines to keep one man fighting at the front, and all six of these men were considered to be indispensable at that time.

It was not until the unit was warned for overseas that a medical board appeared and the members of the unit were given a thorough medical examination. Even then, doubtful eyes but a good pair of feet would sometimes get the volunteer accepted. The men that were turned down by the medical board were not necessarily discharged from the army. At this time, as I have said, there were many jobs for low category men, and in addition to these administrative jobs there were other units being formed at that time which needed recruits. These consisted of pioneer battalions, labour battalions, forestry battalions, railway troops and others, most of whose strength consisted of low category personnel. Most of these units were eventually sent overseas, and once there it was the luck of the draw whether you were sent to a forestry unit in southern France or whether you were amongst those who ended up in Scotland or in some English forest with a lumbering unit. I am making these remarks because you will see later that these men were entirely bypassed when it came time for the enactment of veterans allowances. Let me remind the house that I am still referring to the years 1914, 1915 and 1916. Conscription had not yet entered into the picture.

By this time, however, Canada was 100 per cent involved in a war and found herself trying to supply an army 3,000 miles from her shores. By 1916 casualties with wound stripes on their arms were appearing on the streets of our cities. The flow of volunteers was drying up. Our daily newspapers carried headlines regarding the fearful toll of Canadian casualties on the Somme. Men who found enlistment impossible a year before were now being accepted and those with an A category were being dispatched to England as fast as they could be sent there. Those with lower categories took their places on administrative staffs, and there they remained, to add to the list of forgotten soldiers so far as war veterans allowances were concerned.

By 1917 Canada was scraping the bottom of the barrel for voluntary casualty replacements. The government decided that other means had to be found. In 1917 a general election was held in Canada with conscription as the issue. A union government was elected and a conscription act was passed. This was greatly resented in some parts of our country and it was found difficult to administer. By some it was claimed to be an act of exemption rather than one of conscription. It may have had the desired result but it did nothing toward quieting the bitterness and animosity which the volunteer troops had ingrained in them toward the new recruits. Men arriving in England after the act of conscription was passed were immediately dubbed conscripts, and this name stuck to them for the duration, even though included in the 1917 arrivals were many men who had volunteered early in the war but who had been held in Canada for one reason or another until the latter part of 1917 or the beginning of 1918.

After the war the troops came home and set about re-establishing themselves under the legislation provided for them. So far as war veterans allowances were concerned, it was decreed that a man who had served in the trenches had shortened his life by ten years and he should receive benefits not allowed the man who had served only in England. The term "theatre of actual war" then appeared, and all of continental Europe was included even though conditions in some parts of France were superior to and less dangerous than those in some parts of England and Scotland.

The resentment held by first line veterans toward those soldiers who had enlisted under the act of conscription did not end with the war. Some veterans organizations went so far in fact as to bar such soldiers from membership and recommended that they not be eligible for gratuities and allowances. This attitude no doubt had some influence on the Canadian cabinet of that day, and for years the volunteer soldier who did all his soldiering in this country or in Great Britain remained without entitlement so far as war veterans allowance was concerned.

After the second world war, when the new brand of veterans legislation was introduced, veterans organizations commenced to change their thinking and from time to time briefs were presented to the cabinet of the day asking for changes whereby these forgotten veterans of world war I would be remembered. In 1957 the War Veterans Allowance Act was amended to make eligible all veterans who had served in Great Britain for at least 365 days prior to November 12, 1918. We know that the amendment has now been reworded and the time is now computed from the time the soldier's convoy left Canada rather than from the time it arrived at a British port.

There are some who say the line has to be drawn somewhere. I am one who does not think so. If there has to be a yardstick for measuring the soldier's days of service, then in my opinion it should commence on the date of his attestation. This is the date he placed himself in the hands of the military authorities and attested to serve his country for the duration. In my opinion, it is somewhat ridiculous to measure this 365-day period from any other date than the soldier's date of attestation. This was the date he ceased to be the master of his days, so far as his private affairs are concerned.

I would say that the irony of this whole subject is that there are few members in this house who are familiar with the act who do not agree that the time is long past for this act to be amended. It is not, nor has it ever been, a case of showing charity to these veterans who are so affected. They have earned their entitlement, which we believe they should have been given from the start.

The original War Veterans Allowance Act was amended some time ago to include veterans from our allies in the first war after a residence of 20 years in this country. This length of residence has now been shortened, as we all know, to 10 years. The result is that we are paying, as taxpayers of Canada, war veterans allowance to veterans of the imperial army, Italian veterans and to veterans who served in the Russian, French and Belgian forces during world war I. I want to make it quite clear that I do not regret the eligibility of these veterans, but I do say, let us also look after our own.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Pilon (Chambly-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek for the public-spiritedness he has shown in introducing this bill, and also for his devotion to the cause of our war veterans, a cause held dear by all of us, in that same capacity.

We all recognize the country's enormous debt of gratitude to the men and women who, directly or indirectly, are affected by this measure. Let us not overlook any means of improving the lot of these veterans, in the matter either of pensions or of hospitalization.

The successive governments, since the last war, have neglected nothing in this respect; they have realized that the people who sacrificed themselves for the preservation of democratic rights are the very people who today must be credited with the development of our society.

However, the hon. members who will follow me will surely be puzzled when they see the difficulties the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Teillet) will face when dealing with the eligibility referred to in the bill now before us. Our legislation should be the same for all. We know that its application will be very complicated.

First of all, before proceeding with the consideration of this bill, the government should ascertain unequivocally the number of those eligible, which will not be easy.

Second, the number of those already receiving old age security, unemployment assistance or disabled persons allowances should be ascertained so as to prevent any overlapping in the payment of benefits, which would complicate all the more the work of the department.

The partial eligibility resulting from service in the United Kingdom, namely 365 days, should then be established, as well as the pro rata payment, or a month's service in the United Kingdom, on a 30/365 basis.

It should also be pointed out that many veterans already receive benefits. If they should come under this act, it is wondered whether they would not suffer a decrease in pension during a certain period. That is where the whole pension and allowance structure should be revised. The whole matter should be thought out.

After such compiling, amounts payable would not be related to established figures and it would be most difficult to prepare estimates. In short, it would thus be very hard to administer Bill No. C-37 and to relate the amounts set with revenues.

Should we stick to the period of 365 days to compute our claims and our compilations? I do not see its immediate importance and I should like to make it very clear at this point that the government is now doing all it can to improve the lot of veterans in so far as allowances suitable to their case and needs are concerned.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise simply to say a few words in support of the bill which we have before us. If I understood the last speaker correctly, he said there was no immediate importance to the proposal in the bill. I should like to suggest to him that while this may not be a matter of immediate importance to him, it could be of extreme importance to a veteran in need of assistance who is edged out of eligibility by three or four days or a week.

I believe that one principle which has long been established and recognized in Canada is that the veterans of Canadian forces are entitled to premium consideration with regard to their eligibility for pensions and related benefits because of the fact they have been members of those armed forces and involved in the risks, dangers and disabilities that have arisen from their service in the cause of their country. I may say that my own reaction is that this proposal put forward by the hon. member is a modest one. It is only too bad that when the step was taken to include the veterans of the first world war who had been in the United Kingdom during their service rather than in France, this formula was not included. Certainly it does seem to be a minimal step in regard to fairness, so far as eligibility is concerned, if one is going to accept the principle that some period of service is necessary for eligibility for war veterans allowance.

I must say that so far as my own personal reaction is concerned, particularly after the lapse of all these years, a Canadian veteran who served overseas in the first world war and who needs the benefits that are provided under the War Veterans Allowance Act, should now be entitled to those benefits. I do not know how many Canadians would be involved in that situation in this day and age, but certainly any veteran who is in a position where he meets the eligibility requirements of the War Veterans Allowance Act, regarding his circumstances, and who is a veteran of the first world war, is of an age where he should have entitlement by right to the still rather limited benefits which that act provides over and above those which might be available to him under some other form of assistance supported by public funds.

That is all I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, because I am sure there are other hon. members who want to take part in this discussion. I am sure there is hardly a member of the house who is not from time to time made directly aware of the kind of problems faced by veterans, and particularly by those who are now reaching more advanced years.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) for doing the work necessary to find some of the gaps and injustices that exist in the application of the War Veterans Allowance Act. As has just been pointed out, I am sure almost every member of the house has at times been confronted with a problem where he knows a veteran who has applied for such an allowance, and is satisfied there is every moral justification for granting one, but then runs into the problem of the interpretation of the regulations, which prevents it from being granted.

I do not believe there are a large number of war veterans who would become eligible following the passage of this amendment; but even if there were a large number, inasmuch as it specifically deals with world war I, most of those veterans are now reaching an age where we certainly have a responsibility to make some provision for them, if they need it.

There is also provision in this bill for calculating the allowance on the basis of the number of days actually served in Britain, if they were less than 365. For that reason it seems to me that a very large additional expenditure would not be involved, but it would correct one of the injustices that exist.

I do not quarrel with the priority of qualification—if you would like to call it that—which is in the present act respecting service in an actual theatre of war, nor even with some of the other provisions of the act. But with reference to veterans from the first world war we have to accept the principle that, whether they served in a theatre of war or not, they did in fact suffer from loss of income and from the opportunity to develop their jobs and businesses while they were in the army. This should be an increasingly important principle to bear in mind because of the present age of most of those veterans.

I also prefer, as a condition for qualification under the act, the date of attestation as a basis of calculation, rather than the actual number of days served overseas. But if the government is not prepared to accept that date, at least it would be a great improvement if it were to accept the amendment proposed in this bill.

Hon. members should also take into consideration the fact that soldiers had very little control over where they were going to be posted, especially up until 1917. I am not exactly sure of the rules that applied at that time, whether if a man were conscripted it was only for service in Canada, or if there was a specific date when conscription meant for service anywhere in the world. I shall be very brief because I think the time has come when we should accept this principle of service anywhere, be it in Canada or elsewhere. This bill would be an improvement and would remove some of the gaps and injustices in the act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Pugh).

Mr. Pugh: May I defer to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Thank you very much. I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) for raising this problem and going to the trouble of presenting a bill and bringing in a very well documented case for our consideration.

I was very much interested in some of the things he said and in his knowledge of the situation with regard to first world war veterans. I took particular note of the indication he gave that he realizes that men who served in an actual theatre of war in the first world war were not at times too kindly disposed to those who did not reach that theatre of war.

Even in a theatre of war such as Belgium and France, the men who were up in the front lines were not too enthusiastic about people who were serving in the base installations. At times that attitude of mind prevailed even with regard to those men who were at rear headquarters and battalion headquarters just behind the lines. That attitude of mind prevailed for a long time, and I am sure it affected the drawing up of legislation in this house and the definition of the word "veteran." The word veteran, to a man who fought in the first world war, meant a person who had actually served in a theatre of war and who had been in grave danger.

The second world war changed the picture very considerably, because men and women from Canada served virtually all over the world, and places in the first world war which were free from serious attack became theatres of war in the second world war. A man who served in Britain in the second world war served in a theatre of war, whereas in the first world war this was not the case; he had to cross the channel before he really ran into any danger. Those of us who were in Britain in the second world war know perfectly well that we were often in a much safer place in a military camp than were civilians in the towns and cities.

So the word "veteran" has changed its meaning over the years and is not as distinctive as it was just subsequent to the first world war. This has caused some difficulty in the Department of Veterans Affairs when legislation was being drawn up, as well as to the veterans organizations. The definition of the word "veteran" has been considerably modified, as is instanced in the notes to the bill in front of us. I quote from the reference to section 30, subsection 3, where a veteran is described as a person who served in the United Kingdom during the first world war for at least 365 days prior to November 12, 1918. Enlargement of the term "veteran" has caused some heartburning in official circles for a long time.

The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) indicated the interest of people now in the older veterans, and the advantages of the War Veterans Allowance Act. Of course, it was originally drawn up, as he said, to make provision for men who served in a theatre of war—men who served in the trenches and returned without any visible sign of having served overseas—that is, they were not wounded. Yet as time elapsed medical officers observed that a number of the men who had served in the trenches aged prematurely; unwounded men who had perhaps served for a year or two years or even longer during the engagements in France came home to Canada without any extra provision being made for them at all. But the aging factor became apparent and, consequently, the War Veterans Allowance Act was developed and veterans aged 60 and over, in difficult economic circumstances, became eligible for assistance under that measure.

With the development of social security and a changing attitude in Canada, the Pension Act and the War Veterans Allowance Act have been extended, and I think properly so. The proposal now placed before us is one which is worthy of very serious consideration. I recall, when I was minister of veterans affairs, dealing with this particular problem of the number of days of service in the United Kingdom. The question of the cut-off date arose. As time goes on, people say: That should be shifted. I think it is only right that it should be shifted with changing conditions. I well recall that we took a good look at the survivors of the South African war. I remember saying to my officials: The survivors of that war are in their eighties and nineties; let us relax the regulations as far as they are concerned, and at least give them a few years of happiness if we can provide some assistance for them. And we did. We were able to assist some of them. Yet under the terms of the act as it stood, they did not qualify.

Now we have reached the stage where the average age of those who served in the first world war is 71. These men are a vanishing race. Some of them, who volunteered for service and who, through no fault of their own, did not reach the theatre of war in France, or who, again through no fault of their own, were in Britain for fewer than 365 days, perhaps require a little more attention than has been given to them up to the present time.

I am not sure that the bill as presently drafted may not need some modification. It is perhaps the type of bill the subject matter of which should be referred to the committee on veterans affairs. Unless this is done it will lapse and this particular problem will not receive the attention it deserves. It will not receive the attention it deserves because the spokesman for the government, the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pilon) raised the usual objections which come from officials. He said it would be difficult for the department to administer; that it would be hard to determine the number of people who might qualify.

Well, all these difficulties can be overcome. The records are there; they just have to be searched. They show when a man enlisted, how long he was in Canada and how long he was overseas. They have been carefully kept and this is not an insuperable job at all. I was amused to hear the objections which emanate from officialdom. I do not mind the officials raising the objections; that is their job. They have to point out to ministers and parliamentary secretaries the difficulties in the way of new legislation, and they are responsible for showing that these difficulties exist. But as far as the government is concerned, it should deal with these difficulties and take the necessary steps to put some new measure into effect, if it is found as a matter of policy to be worth while.

[Mr. Churchill.]

I think that a bill of this nature is commendable and that the subject matter should be carefully studied. A spokesman for the government might have undertaken to do this. The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Carter) is present, and, given the chance, he might have said earlier that his department intended to consider this question and, perhaps, bring in some amendments later in the year. If on the other hand the department intends to do nothing, then the subject matter should be referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs. Let them have a go at it. Officials could be called in to indicate the problems which arise and others could, perhaps, show how these problems could be overcome.

I was glad to hear the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) and the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) indicate their approval in principle of this measure. They paid their respects to those who have served abroad, and I think Canada generally has been appreciative of those who have volunteered to serve abroad in the defence of freedom. If they are older people, now, I think it is within the capability of the committee to say whether something might not be done for them.

I raise just one question before I sit down. I wonder whether it would be advisable to make a strictly proportionate estimate of the amount of money which might be paid. Perhaps an easier rule of thumb could be introduced in this regard, because you might get 201 over 365 for one man and 59 over 365 for another. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it might be simplified by being divided into three parts, or something of that nature. Even that eventually would not satisfy everyone, but it would remove part of the difficulty of having to deal with, say, 500 people each one having a different percentage of entitlement. However, that is something the committee could decide. I would like to express my approval of the bill, and if it comes to a vote I shall certainly vote in favour of it.

Mr. H. C. Harley (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I would first of all like to commend the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) for bringing this matter before the house. I certainly agree with the principle of his bill. However, I agree with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) that he does not go far enough in his bill, and because he does not go far enough it is going to give rise to difficulties that have not been mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill).

The section we are discussing today was brought in in 1957 by the previous government. It allowed those veterans who did not get beyond the United Kingdom to become eligible for war veterans allowance, provided they had served a year prior to November 12, 1918. In world war I the United Kingdom was not classed as a theatre of war, but in world war II it was. Therefore veterans of world war I and world war II have been treated differently, with the balance in favour of the veterans of world war II. I should like to read just one quotation from the debates of 1957 in this connection, Mr. Speaker. I have other quotations, but I do not wish to take up the time of the house. I shall read from page 822 of the House of Commons Debates, 1957-58. The hon. member for Acadia at that time, Mr. Quelch, said:

> Then I understand that veterans who saw service in England only, under certain conditions will be allowed to receive the war veterans allowance. I have always argued that where a veteran volunteered for service in any theatre of war he was entitled to the war veterans allowance even though he did not get beyond England because that was not his fault. He had volunteered for service anywhere. If the army found that they could use him to better advantage in England than elsewhere, the veteran should not be penalized as a consequence. I am hoping that the legislation will provide that all these veterans who volunteered for service overseas and were left in England will be eligible for the war veterans allowance.

When this legislation was originally drafted it was said it was to look after those who were pre-aged due to hardships and the dangers of serving in the trenches in world war I. The one year provision of service prior to November 12, 1918 was actually recommended by the Royal Canadian Legion and the government accepted that recommendation. I have my doubts about the administration of this bill, for two reasons. First of all, I think for the first time we are going to fragment eligibility. At the present time you are either eligible for a pension or you are not eligible, and then you draw an amount based on the pension or on your disability, depending on the kind of pension you draw. Here we are introducing, for the first time in legislation, a percentage of eligibility. The hon. member in his bill mentions as an example 200 days of service. Therefore a man would be really 200-365ths eligible. At the present time, as most hon. members are aware, the war veterans allowance for a married man is $144 a month. If we were to carry this bill to its extreme, where the man served for one day in the United Kingdom—which is possible—for compassionate reasons or for some other reason—

Mr. Herridge: Or on the high seas.

Mr. Harley: I thank the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). As I was saying, if a man served for one day in the United Kingdom he would be eligible for a pension of 1-365th of $144 a month, which amounts to 40 cents a month. I think this is highly impractical; there must be a cut-off date somewhere. I disagree with the form of this bill, and in a few moments I shall deal with what I think should be done in this respect. There should be no time limit. With regard to the second reason, which is really based on the first, this fragmentation makes the bill administratively impossible. I have already pointed out that you could have a situation where a veteran was eligible for a 1-365th pension amounting to 40 cents a month. What happens to the veteran who is receiving war veterans allowance and who is entitled to receive treatment for any illness in a war veterans hospital? Does this mean he is eligible, again, for 1-365th of his medication, medicine and drugs? In other words, again there has to be a cut-off date for his treatment. If this date is not to be included in any legislation it becomes administratively impossible for the authorities to calculate what would be the entitlement of a veteran in hospital, having regard to the fraction of time that he served.

As I said when I rose to speak on this bill, Mr. Speaker, I think it is an attempt by the hon. member to bring in a very good principle. I personally believe the bill should be amended by removing from clause (b) all the words after "world war I", which would then mean that anybody who served in the United Kingdom during world war I would be eligible. I think any veteran who served in England in world war I should be given the same entitlement as a veteran of world war II. I would be prepared to support the bill, with that amendment, completely.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, as it is not yet six o'clock I wonder whether the house would give consideration to maintaining this particular bill in its priority on the order paper in order that further discussion could be had on it later this session? I see that it is not yet six o'clock, and I would ask that this permission be given by the house.

Business of the House

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Does the house give unanimous consent to allowing this bill to retain its position on the order paper?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): There is not unanimous consent. Before I declare the hour for the consideration of private members' business ended I should like to point out to the house that with regard to the bill we have been debating there is some doubt in the mind of the Chair as to whether the bill is in order. The Chair has not intervened, for the simple reason that the Chair was not of any definite decision, and neither was the matter raised by any hon. member who spoke in the debate. I bring this to the attention of the house because I would not want the house to use this debate, when there is some doubt in the mind of the Chair, as a precedent for another debate, when there was no doubt in the mind of the Chair.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, may I say a word on this matter before we leave the subject? I was quite prepared to debate this point if it were raised. I think hon. members will agree that the topic about which I spoke was the eligibility of veterans under the existing provisions. In other words, the money has been provided; the question is just those who are eligible to partake of that money. It has nothing to do with money matters, as far as I am concerned; this question is the eligibility of veterans to partake of money already provided by parliament.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock p.m. this day are as follows:

The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), immigration; John Thomadakis, opportunity to obtain legal counsel: No. 2, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Regan), national defence, Halifax; dismissal of civilian cook: No. 3, the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire), administration of justice; continuation of studies by F.L.Q. members in prison.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker:

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned at five o'clock I was saying that a great many Canadians who want to see Canada free at last from any colonial signs also want Canada to be recognized as a sovereign, independent and free nation.

If so, why did the Prime Minister, after indicating a clear track in Winnipeg, suddenly resort to a switch if not to please some fanatics still existing in our country, not only on one side but on both sides, because I have always considered that those who wanted to see Canada connected with foreign affairs as well as those who do not want to see anything but their own personal interest, are hindering national unity.

Throughout Canada, the press was critical of the government's action. I should like to quote an editorial which was published in Le Devoir and which was written by one of French Canada's most moderate newspapermen, a man who has no hallucinations, Mr. Paul Sauriol. This is what he had to say:

Dividing the resolution would make it possible for the government to get out of a mess. A resolution on a distinctive flag and on the anthem O Canada would surely be carried.

Here, I must congratulate Your Honour for the decision you took yesterday with respect to the resolution. Perhaps it would not have compromised national unity in the long run, because personally I do not feel that the flag issue can strengthen national unity in Canada. There are other factors which will help to strengthen Canadian unity and not just the adoption of a flag or a national anthem. But separate resolutions will help us to consider the matter objectively.

As for the resolution on the union jack and God Save the Queen, they are not essential to the election promise concerning those British symbols. In any case, separate resolutions would help to indicate the subordination of the old symbols to the new ones.

Mr. Sauriol concluded his editorial of June 2 by saying:

> The union jack and God Save the Queen are not in England symbols restricted to the crown as such; they are the national flag and the national anthem of the United Kingdom. Mr. Pearson's proposals emphasize the British character of the crown in Canada. These traces of imperialism are bound to create deep uneasiness in the province of Quebec at the present time.

Not only in Quebec, but also in many other Canadian provinces.

At this point, I would like to say that we Quebeckers would object just as much to a symbol representing France which is, in the final analysis, the country where we have our roots, whose soil has nurtured our own French Canadian roots—our forefathers came from France—but we would not accept a French symbol as an emblem for Canada. We want to be what we have always been, true Canadians who are determined to remain so, Canadians who want emblems and symbols meant especially for them and for nobody else in the whole wide world.

Then again, the editorial writer in La Presse, Mr. Guy Cormier, did not mince his words and put on kid gloves when he maintained, on June 3 of this year, that this political principle, "divide and rule", set down by one of the Prime Minister's predecessors, namely Mr. Mackenzie King, no longer applied nowadays.

Here are a few excerpts from that editorial:

> Mr. Pearson, who went to Winnipeg to take the bull by the horns, will not try to come and sell the union jack in Quebec. When he came to Montreal last week, to attend the convention of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Prime Minister did not even refer to the matter. He knows how Quebec feels about the union jack.
> He is trying to gain time, time being the best ingredient in which to dissolve a compromise.
> But Mackenzie King's recipes are now worthless.

Mr. Speaker, it does not mean that we have no respect for the union jack. When the union jack is presented to Canada as the flag, the emblem of England, we agree, we acquiesce and we recognize it as a flag that advocated and spread the ideas of personality in the whole world, and we are prepared to respect it. But when an attempt is made to impose the union jack as a national emblem, we do not agree at all, not any more than we would agree for the emblem of France or for Frenchmen who would come to Canada and tell us what we should or should not do. We can decide for ourselves. The Prime Minister tried to gain time, because time is the ingredient which can best dissolve compromise. But Mackenzie King's recipes are no longer worth anything. No, Mr. Speaker, the recipes cherished by Mackenzie King are now worthless in Canada, in 1964, especially when the people of Quebec realize how they were exploited for years by politicians belonging to all the old parties.

The government had to retreat and capitulate. They took their time, letting the resolution simmer on the order paper for weeks.

And suddenly, we are faced with an intervention by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who, with references to support his argument, claimed it would be better to divide the original resolution. The right hon. Prime Minister contributed his patter, half one thing and half another, whereas Mr. Speaker's decision was perfectly in accord with the arguments and quotations put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

It is evident that the ruling made yesterday afternoon was not a spontaneous one, issuing from the debates which took place in this house before five o'clock, but that the whole thing had been orchestrated by a master hand.

Mr. Speaker, we appreciate your ruling, for it now allows us to study this question of a distinctive flag with all due objectivity and without running against contradictory factors which would have precluded us from voting yes or no on the original motion.

However, I shall not go so far as to say that we are entirely satisfied with the choice of a distinctive flag made by the government.

If, on the one hand, the government no longer forces us to vote for legislation which materializes and recalls our subordination to the crown of Great Britain, it nevertheless remains that the flag design bearing three red maple leaves is in itself of British and regal inspiration.

First of all, let us read the text of the resolution:

> That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white.

Here is an admittance, Mr. Speaker. It is not an emblem chosen by the Canadian people in 1964. There is no question of an emblem selected by the Canadian government in 1964. But the emblem is that proclaimed by King George V in 1921. Besides, here is how this royal proclamation by George V in the year 1921 reads in part:

[Text]

We do hereby, by and with the advice of our privy council, and in exercise of the powers conferred by the first article of the union with Ireland act, 1800, appoint and declare that the arms or ensigns armorial of the dominion of Canada shall be...and the third division argent three maple leaves conjointed on one stem proper...

Given at our court at Buckingham palace, this twenty first day of November, in the year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and twenty one, and in the twelfth year of our reign.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the hon. member a question? Will the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Caouette: Yes, definitely.

Mr. Churchill: I wonder whether the hon. member would translate the word "argent" for us?

Mr. Caouette: Definitely, if it does not take any of my time.

Mr. Churchill: Thirty seconds. Will the hon. member translate the word "argent" in the passage he read and tell us what it means?

Mr. Caouette: Silver.

Mr. Churchill: Silver maple leaves, and it does not say anything about red or on a white background.

Mr. Caouette: They had red, but were probably using argent or silver around those maple leaves at that time in 1921.

Mr. Churchill: Where is the red?

Mr. Caouette: This is 1964 and probably my hon. friend is still in 1921.

Mr. Churchill: You did not answer the question.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: That document was tabled on December 4, 1945, before the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons when it was considering the question of a Canadian flag. For the information of committee members, Colonel A. Fortescue Duguid, official heraldist and historian of the Canadian expeditionary corps during the war of 1914-18, translated the royal proclamation into simple words, as follows:

The king, at the request of Canada, attributes to Canada white and blue as national colours and declares that the national emblem of Canada shall be constituted by three red maple leaves on one stem against a white background.

[Mr. Caouette.]

That, he said, answers the two following questions: "What are our national colours? What is the Canadian emblem?"

Now, Mr. Speaker, since those colours and that emblem were given to us in 1921 by King George V, they are not colours and emblems typically Canadian, chosen finally by Canada, by Canadians, by the Canadian parliament, but by the king of England and Scotland, who was then the emperor of India.

Such is the origin of the Pearson flag. It is not a flag that he has chosen. It is not colours that he has chosen. It is not an emblem that he has chosen. They are relics from the past, old souvenirs taken out of the drawers of Buckingham palace or of the colonial office and assigned to Canada more than 43 years ago.

Last night I heard the Leader of the Opposition tell us that we must not abandon old souvenirs; I regret that he is not here at this time, for I would tell him and his colleague, and especially his assistant—who is not his assistant but still the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer)—

Mr. Pigeon: Why don't you shut up.

Mr. Caouette: —that I would not like to put on the boots of my great grandfather in 1964. But if my hon. friend from Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is at ease in the boots of his great grandfather, let him put them on; then he will greatly help the parliament of the Canadian people.

Mr. Pigeon: You always lack judgment.

Mr. Caouette: Would the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption Montcalm have a question to put to me?

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member for Villeneuve a very simple question. I want to ask him when he is going to resign for the good of the Canadian people?

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, you can see that the question just asked by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm shows exactly what his frame of mind has been since he has come to this house. It is a stupid question which does not even deserve an answer, because the hon. member is but a simple member or a simple-minded one, I do not know how to put it.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I am of the opinion that the hon. member for Villeneuve has shown a lack of judgment in his comments, and that is why he has his speeches prepared by somebody else, because it is impossible for him to give a speech without notes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I ask hon. members to restrict their comments to the matter now under consideration?

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, you know quite well that I was restricting myself to the matter under consideration. However, the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is always outside the question or off the track, as the saying goes. Let us leave him alone and proceed with the discussion of the matter now under study.

Mr. Pigeon: Go on reading, read well.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm says: "Go on reading", I suggest to him to read from now on, because when he does not, he is irresponsible, incoherent and he speaks like a stupid member.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Villeneuve is out of order; he is departing from the matter under discussion.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is still in the field, not in a potato field but rather in a tobacco field, since he comes from a tobacco-growing county.

And to proceed with my remarks on the resolution under study—

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, under standing orders, a member is not supposed to read his speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Once again, I would ask hon. members to deal strictly with the matter under consideration.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, standing orders prohibit a member from reading his speech, and this is what the hon. member for Villeneuve is doing.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm told me that he was in favour of the red ensign. Therefore, let us leave him alone, and not bother with him any further.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I assume that the hon. member for Villeneuve is in favour of the union jack.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I would not want you to include in my own time the minutes taken up by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm in making trivial remarks.

Having been in power for five years, a period marked by indecision, retreat and withdrawal, the former prime minister who enjoyed for four years, a majority never seen before in our country—

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is forbidden by the rules of the house—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member for Three Rivers raising a point of order?

Mr. Balcer: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Under the rules of the house a member cannot read his speech and I ask you to apply the rules.

Mr. Grégoire: He is saying that because he cannot read.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member for Three Rivers tell me on what standing order he is calling?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, it is an old custom, which has always been recognized in the house, that a member cannot read his speech. On the other hand, it must be recognized that in the case of some hon. members it is a little more difficult to apply the rules, especially when those members are not too sure of their arguments. However, I feel that the house must bear with the hon. member for Villeneuve and let him read his speech.

Mr. Speaker, I now remember that it is standing order No. 44 which reads as follows:

[Text]

It is a rule in both houses of parliament that a member must address the house orally, and not read from a written, previously prepared speech, for the reason that, "if the practice of reading speeches should prevail, members might read speeches that were written by other people, and the time of the house be taken up in considering the arguments of persons who were not deserving of their attention."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member will read page 125, in the middle of the page, he will see that there has been a growing practice in the other direction. We all know, of course, that over a period of years the practice has been growing in the house to allow members, in certain instances, to read the speeches that they present to the house. Unless serious objection is taken at this time, the hon. member may continue to read his speech and I suggest that the matter be left there.

Mr. Balcer: I want to be tolerant. I know that the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) is not used to making speeches and in the last couple of years he has made very few of them. I am ready to permit him to continue to read the text of a speech which has been prepared by some other member—I don't know who.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Could the hon. member for Villeneuve tell us whether his speech was written by Mrs. Gilberte Côté-Mercier?

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I am just consulting my notes, but the hon. member for Three Rivers would not understand, since he does not know how to read. In fact, he is afraid that I might quote from the speech made by his leader yesterday evening, because it would be embarrassing for him to hear a rerun of such an anti-Canadian speech, which was so detrimental to national unity.

When the Conservative leader spoke yesterday evening, the hon. member for Three Rivers was sitting behind the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm and both were white in the face while listening to his remarks.

And now, the hon. member for Three Rivers is telling me tonight that I am reading my speech.

Mr. Balcer: It would be better for you if you read it.

Mr. Caouette: Should the hon. member for Three Rivers be aware of the situation, I can meet him anywhere in the province of Quebec. He is the deputy leader, no, not the deputy leader but perhaps the deputy leader of the Conservative party in Quebec, and I am ready to meet him anywhere in the province.

[Text]

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It has been brought to the hon. member's attention that he should deal with the matter before the house. Whether he wishes to treat this as a serious problem or whether the members of the Liberal party who are laughing at the antics going on in the corner, wish to treat this as a serious matter, that is for them to decide. However, we should not be wasting our time listening to what is going on now. Your Honour should press the ruling you have just made that the hon. member should stick to the point before the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; the point raised by the hon. member is of course well taken. As he has mentioned, the Chair has brought to the attention of the hon. member for Villeneuve the fact that he should limit his remarks to the subject matter before the house at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I am ready to agree that I should limit my remarks to the resolution presently under consideration, but I would ask the hon. member who just rose on a point of order to inform his colleagues of his own political party to sit still and quiet and be at least polite in this house.

[Text]

Mr. Winkler: I have yet to hear you say anything relevant.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I hear the whip (Mr. Winkler) of the Conservative party objecting to our remarks. Let me finish my speech on the resolution, and I wish the Conservatives would shut up.

Mr. Speaker, according to the Leader of the Opposition, the people have to be consulted through a referendum. In view of that suggestion, I shall ask the Leader of the Opposition and the members of his party, those for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) and Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) included, why they did not resort to that referendum when they were in power in Ottawa and free to do so, while they enjoyed the greatest majority a political party has ever had in the federal parliament? Why did they not resort to that referendum or plebiscite that the Leader of the Opposition now asks of the party in office?

Mr. Pigeon: You defeated us, with the Liberals.

Mr. Caouette: Today, the Conservatives come up with proposals they never had the courage to introduce themselves while they could—

[Text]

Mr. Starr: I wonder if the hon. member for Villeneuve would allow a question?

Mr. Caouette: If you want to ask me a question right after my speech, you will have one half hour to ask me questions.

It is not because the hon. member is not my friend, he is one of my best friends and I am one of his.

Mr. Starr: I object; it is the worst thing that could happen to me.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, would it be possible to silence the stupid people who interrupt from time to time in this chamber?

As far as we are concerned, Mr. Speaker, we will vote for the motion introduced by the government and will not be afraid to assume our responsibility for that action before our electors.

We intended to move an amendment to that motion, or an amendment to the present amendment, in order to propose the flag that I had this afternoon in the house. We will not do so.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Caouette: We will not do it because we are anxious for a distinctive national flag to be adopted in this house for the whole of Canada. We do not have the right to delay the adoption of a distinctive national flag, and I am not saying that because I am a Liberal, far from it; I may be one in the true sense of the word but not in the shrunken sense it has at the level of a political party.

Mr. Speaker, we will fully support the first government resolution and we will vote against the Conservative amendment because it is meaningless, since that party did not take its responsibilities when it was sitting on your right a few years back.

We will vote and we will not be afraid to take our responsibilities. That is why, Mr. Speaker, our group will vote against the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Trois-Rivières and the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm will no doubt join us in that respect.

On the other hand, we are not satisfied with the proposed design; we would have preferred another one. Still, before the 10.30 edition of the C.B.C. news last night, I saw on television the new maple leaf flag flying from some flagpole and I must admit that it did attract attention. The flag is a means of creating, not so much pride, at home, but a deep satisfaction in having a typically Canadian flag, representing all sections of Canada and not only part of it.

Mr. Speaker, a few days ago, when we came into this house with the miniature design of a flag we were favouring, I heard a Conservative member say that we only had a rag to offer. I shall answer him exactly as Molière says in "Les Femmes savantes": "Rag it is, if you call it that way, but my rag is dear to me." The rag that the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada has presented, is agreeable to us; it is dear to us because it represents the Canadian spirit.

But we can neither imagine nor accept that the Conservatives or the non-Canadian elements—I repeat it, they are not Canadians—object to a distinctive national flag.

This emblem which we want for Canada is the one advocated by La Ligue du Canada and the Native Sons of Canada. It will not be accepted, we will not put it forward as a subamendment or an amendment, because we are looking forward to the disposal of the flag issue, and we feel that there are more important problems to deal with in Canada. The flag must mean something for Canadians and we do not want to see an unemployed strolling about with a flag which for him would mean poverty amidst plenty.

The right hon. Prime Minister expressed it very well yesterday afternoon, when he said: Not only the flag, but also the fight against undeserved poverty in a Canada of plenty. In that respect, we shall support the Prime Minister without reserve.

Yet, at the same time, I shall ask the Prime Minister to listen to us and to consider the suggestions we have made during the past three years in the House of Commons.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I interrupt the hon. member, because his time expired at eight thirty o'clock. I thought I might grant him about five additional minutes, considering the various points of order and questions of privilege which were raised during his remarks.

Unless he is just about to finish his remarks, I would suggest that the hon. member give his place to another member.

Mr. Caouette: Only two minutes more, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pigeon: No, Mr. Speaker, no, no, no.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Favreau: To my mind, it would be in order that the five parties grant the hon. member another five minutes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Villeneuve will admit that he cannot continue his remarks without the unanimous consent of the house. He has been refused this unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Yes, yes, yes.

Mr. Pigeon: No, no.

Mr. Caouette: I think I have unanimous consent—

[Text]

Mr. Pigeon: No, Mr. Speaker.

Canadian Flag

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would be permitted two more minutes so that I could ask him the question I intended to ask him during his speech, when he said I would have half an hour in which to ask a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it clear the hon. member has the unanimous consent of the house to continue now?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member does not have unanimous consent. The hon. member for North York.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Could I know who objects to my going on for two more minutes so as to conclude my remarks? I have seen nobody objecting to that.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I object to the hon. member for Villeneuve continuing to read his speech.

[Text]

Mr. John H. Addison (York North): Mr. Speaker, in the twenty fifth parliament of Canada I had the opportunity in my maiden speech of following the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette). This is now the twenty sixth parliament of Canada and, as I watched the spectacle across from me this evening, while it seemed to me my maiden speech was a very important one, the speech I hope to be able to make this evening will be perhaps the most important I shall ever make in this house.

I represent the riding of York North and in it, from north to south, we have the towns of Sutton, Newmarket, Aurora and Richmond Hill. Many of these towns were settled by United Empire Loyalists who left the United States during the rebellion against Britain, to live in a land loyal to British tradition and constitutional monarchy. These people preferred king and country to the so-called war of independence. They settled in Canada, and Canada has become strong with their strength and courage.

When the Loyalists came to Canada they bore with them the flag of union, the union jack, and it flies proudly today throughout my riding. The descendants of these people are still loyal to those traditions even today. In my riding we recall the indomitable little firebrand and rebel, William Lyon Mackenzie, our loyal representatives over the years, Aylesworth, Mulock, King, all leaders in government, pathfinders over the years, reformers loyal to the traditions of the flag of their day.

Flags, Mr. Speaker, are a strange creation. They are used as merely pieces of silk held aloft in some instances to identify the status of a chief, to mark the arrival of a leader, or to denote the arrival of an enemy.

They were first used in India and China, primarily for the purpose of identification. Other uses arose. They were used to show the forces of the leader. In medieval times, the flag was the first point of attack. When the flag had fallen, consternation among the flagless army ensued, and the battle was soon lost. In victory, the flag rallied the victorious army to the chase to press on to the eventual rout of the enemy. Moreover, at sea the flag was more than a rallying point; it became a method of signalling. All this, of course, is aside from mere decoration and display for which flags have been used. What English seaman has forgotten the white naval ensign of Nelson at the battle of Trafalgar? One of my hon. friends says it was the red ensign. In fact, that ensign is a good example of a flag which served as identification of the status of a commander, as a signal, as a rallying point and later for decoration and display after the battle.

In one word, then, Mr. Speaker, flags have become for us after all these uses, symbols. They become the physical manifestations of the emotions for which they stand. They remind us of our past, indicate our present status and point with pride to the future.

One of the flags I intend to vote for when the final division bells ring is the union jack. It reminds Canadians of their past traditions. It indicates our present status in the commonwealth of nations and points with pride to our future close association with Great Britain. The other flag for which I intend to vote will be a distinctive Canadian flag which will remind us of our Canadian past with a world recognized symbol of that past, the maple leaf; it will show our present status as an independent nation, being, in the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), a flag which is Canada's own and only Canada's. Moreover, it will point with pride to our future as a united nation—one Canada from sea to sea, strong, powerful and free.

I wish to direct my remarks to the amendment which has been proposed by the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), that is, the proposal to submit this question to a national referendum or plebiscite. I am astonished that the Leader of the Opposition should have made this suggestion because as late as last Wednesday speaking on C.B.C. television, he had this to say:

> Put this matter of the flag before the Canadian people and I fear the result.

On the same program, he said: "You say, should it go to the Canadian people? I say, no."

An hon. Member: You wouldn't be quoting him out of context, would you?

Mr. Addison: For someone who is well versed in British traditions as well as in the parliamentary traditions of this country to propose a referendum, is astonishing. A referendum strikes directly at the entire concept of British parliamentary democracy. As the encyclopaedia of Canada says at Volume 5, page 232:

> A referendum is a constitutional device whereby a question with which the legislature does not feel itself capable of dealing is referred to the electorate in a popular vote. It has been borrowed from the United States.

The same encyclopaedia concludes:

> It is clear, however, that both the referendum and the initiative are alien to the spirit of British parliamentary government.

Why are they alien? The answer can be found in the words of Professor Dicey, the late distinguished expert on constitutional law and practice. Professor Dicey says this:

> The referendum diminishes the importance of parliamentary debate and thereby detracts from the influence of parliament. That this must be so admits of no denial; a veto, whether it be exercised by a king or by an electorate, lessens the power of the legislature.

Of course, it is easy for us to see why the referendum has been used so often in the United States. There the division of powers is definite. In the federal government, and in each and every state government, the legislative branch is distinct from the executive branch. The president is separated from congress; a governor is separated from the state legislature. Thus the referendum or plebiscite is resorted to. Incidentally, the Encyclopaedia Canadiana, volume 8 defines plebiscite this way:

> A device for ascertaining the opinion of the electorate on a question, but not involving any legal obligation on the legislative body to act upon it.

When the executive branch and the legislative branch in the United States disagreed, resort was made to the people to solve the disagreement and the public at large was asked to vote. The executive arm would request the referendum, the people would vote, and then the legislature would be forced to act in accord with the simple yes or no of the people. That may be compatible with the separation of powers in the United States. It is not compatible with the British and Canadian parliamentary and ministerial tradition. As the distinguished professor of government, William B. Munro said in his book "American Influences on Canadian Government":

> In Canada a provincial legislature is elected, and a ministry is placed in power to carry out the will of the legislature. If, then, the people can directly initiate legislation, if they can directly enact or reject legislation, the whole principle of unified ministerial responsibility is seriously impaired. For a ministry cannot serve two masters —the legislative body insisting on one thing, and the electorate requiring something different.

Our system of government is based upon the direct responsibility of the ministry to the legislature and of the legislature to the people. There is no "double harness" here; a ministry does not ride the legislature and ride the people at one and the same time. The ministry proposes to parliament; parliament acts, and if parliament does not approve, the ministry tenders its resignation and the people vote for a new leadership. It is, I think, significant that in the 1920's—and this will interest hon. gentleman opposite in particular—the Progressive Conservative premier of Ontario, Hon. George Ferguson, announced that there would be no more popular votes on the liquor question in the province but that the legislature and cabinet would deal with the issue and take full responsibility for it—as ought to be done in any scheme of government based on the direct responsibility of the ministry to the legislature, and of the legislature to the people. This government, too, has that responsibility, and if parliament disagrees, the government will resign; or if the people disapprove, they may vote out the government at the next general election. But a parliament is elected to decide all questions of government and take responsibility for its decisions.

One party is given a mandate by the people on the basis of that party's leadership and the platform presented at the time of the election; another party forms an opposition, Her Majesty's loyal opposition, to play its role in that responsibility. A referendum isolates an issue; demands a simple yes or no. At times of great emotion—and any referendum on the question of national symbols would be a time of great emotion—a simple yes or no cannot decide governmental policy. At times such as this we have all been subjected to the pressure groups that lobby here in the house. A referendum gives pressure groups time to organize, to spend a great deal of money and further cloud the issue by excessive emotionalism. The balkanization of this country would be a sad sight; the spectacle would become demeaning to parliament, because the legislature would be ignored in this particular process. If we had a referendum or a plebiscite the men elected to this legislature would be left to stand and watch, to abdicate their responsibility. The cabinet would be left in an invidious position as well. It must make a proposal under a plebiscite, a proposal it was elected to implement, not to the legislature, not to the people's representatives, you and I,—and written in such a way as to demand a yes or no. It must bypass parliament and go directly to the people and then tell parliament, in effect, the result.

It is little wonder, then, that the referendum has almost never been used in Canada—I think, twice—and I believe never in British political history. I would like to quote from the Prime Minister's speech of yesterday, as reported at page 4319 of Hansard, when he referred to the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) and his remarks on January 26, 1942 concerning a plebiscite. The present Leader of the Opposition had this to say:

> Allow the members of parliament to vote on this question. Do not submit the question to the people of Canada, for in my opinion, the taking of a plebiscite at this time may well destroy the unity of Canada.

Then the Prime Minister said yesterday:

> Later, when the decision was made, he said this on February 25, 1942, as reported at pages 836 and 837 of Hansard:
> "A plebiscite is to be taken regardless of the fact that in the long history of Great Britain, with all the constitutional changes which have taken place, no government has ever submitted any matter to the people by way of plebiscite."

Mr. Nesbitt: What did the Liberals do in that period?

Mr. Addison: They were not very successful, I think, as you probably realize. In reply to the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), I am speaking now of plebiscites, not the government in question. I should like to quote Professor Munro again, speaking of the role of the provinces, and his remarks are also attributable to the central government. I would like to place this on the record:

> In the Canadian provinces, where the ministers are responsible to the legislature, and when a general election can be held at any moment... there is scarcely a single valid argument that can be put forth for direct legislation. There are no plebiscites in England where the theory of ministerial responsibility is understood and appreciated in its various implications. The practice of referring issues directly to the people is an importation from the United States where ministerial responsibility does not exist.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to quote excerpts from a television interview of last Wednesday, June 10, of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, who said this:

> But this is not a matter for an election. This would solve nothing. As a matter of fact in parliament today it is parliament's responsibility to took after this matter, providing we could come to a reasonable degree of agreement.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I reject the amendment proposed by the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winkler: That is no surprise over here.

Mr. Ricard: We kind of expected that.

Mr. Addison: I reject it because, as the Leader of the Opposition knows, it is demoralizing and demeans the parliament elected to consider the actions of the government of the day. We were all elected to be the people's representatives and decision makers on behalf of the people. In fact, those who are elected to serve Canada in parliament owe the electors more than the advocacy of non-controversial ideas. We members of parliament owe Canada our best judgment, and we fail Canada if we fail to exercise that judgment or if we pass our responsibility for judgment back to the electors who sent us to parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Addison: The government is the Queen's representative and the ministers of the crown. Parliament sits in judgment on the ministry, and parliament decides whether or not the ministery may continue with the confidence of the people's representatives. This parliament has had submitted to it one resolution on the flag issue, which was subsequently divided by the decision of the Speaker yesterday. The ministry has met its obligation to submit a proposal for a distinctive Canadian flag to parliament, and parliament, in the British and Canadian tradition, must now decide. The leader of our party has campaigned on a distinctive Canadian flag in the last two elections.

An hon. Member: Where?

Mr. Addison: It has been a prominent plank in our party's platform for the last four years.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Addison: Later, Mr. Speaker. Our responsibility was to submit the design to parliament—and this we have done. For myself, I advocate a flag, as I said previously, which is Canada's own and only Canada's; a distinctive Canadian flag which cannot be mistaken for that of any other country; a flag which represents the past, symbolizes the present and points to the future. The flag of the union, the union jack, is much loved in this country and I will vote to retain it in our land.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): What about the red ensign?

Mr. Addison: But I will vote, too, for our own Canadian flag, one that I know will be flown throughout my country with pride, respect and patriotism.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member will accept a question now.

Mr. Addison: Yes.

Mr. MacInnis: In closing his remarks the hon. member continually referred to a distinctive Canadian flag. I would ask him to review the notes that he just read, and he will find that his original remark was "one of the flags that I intend to vote for". Then he went on to speak about another flag. How can the hon. member open a speech by referring to one of the flags he intends to vote for, then speak about another flag, and close by referring to "a distinctive Canadian flag"?

Mr. Addison: I intend to vote for the distinctive Canadian flag put forward by the government in this resolution, and for retaining the flying of the union jack.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, one of the statements coming forth from Liberal spokesmen today which will be heard over and over again almost to the point where you will consider one parroting the other is to the effect that "I will vote for a distinctive Canadian flag". Mr. Speaker, flying over the peace tower at this time is a distinctive Canadian flag. It is distinctive because it represents our past, our history and tradition, the sacrifices our people have made in war and peace, the founding cultures of our nation—a flag that is representative of everything that is great in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Coates: I hear "No", Mr. Speaker. That is the "no" of those who are now on the road, not only to destroying our flag but to removing this country from the British commonwealth of nations. That is the "no" of men who have no respect apparently for our past, for our British tradition, for the things that we hold dear. These are the men who are now marching us down the road to republicanism. The republic is next. This is the thing that the people of this nation fear. This is the thing that the people of this nation must face up to. If they say "yes" to the elimination of the union jack from our flag, what will they say "yes" to next week? That is the question I should like answered.

With regard to three maple leaves, if this party opposite is so terribly concerned and dedicated to maple leaves, why not "The Maple Leaf Forever" as our national anthem? We hear nothing of that, not a word. The maple leaf on our flag is representative of nothing; it is representative of nothing of our past—of our past tradition, of our past history, of our association with either Britain or France.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we also hear a great deal of talk about this being an election promise. This was one of those election promises which has to be fulfilled. The Liberals told the Canadian people they were going to give them a new flag within two years, and they have to do it. What about the two ministers of agriculture? What about the $2 wheat? What about the—

[Translation]

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that what is before the house at present is the amendment moved yesterday by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, which was accepted by Mr. Speaker and, since there was no appeal from the ruling, it was therefore also accepted by the house.

This amendment deletes all the words after "that".

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I think I have the right to state my point of order. My point of order is the following. An amendment is before the house.

[Text]

My point of order is to the effect—

Mr. Nesbitt: You are just wasting time, that is all.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely we on this side can speak as well.

Mr. Favreau: My point of order is to the effect that what is before this house is the amendment which was presented yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker). This amendment bears on one point, and it is the following. Must the procedure to be followed with respect to the adoption of a Canadian flag be the adoption of a resolution by this house; or must the procedure be by way of plebiscite?

The hon. gentleman, who I admit has been interrupted by my point of order, began his speech and was not interrupted by a point of order, I think he will agree, until the last part of it, when he said two things. First of all, he said that the question was, what flag should be adopted; and second, he said that the three maple leaves flag was one which meant nothing. He thus engaged upon a full discussion, not of the amendment which is before this house but of the very merits of the resolution which has been presented by the government, and which seeks the authority of this house to take the means to adopt as the official flag of Canada a flag with three red maple leaves on a white field. Mr. Speaker, I say that the amendment, by removing the original resolution and limiting the discussion to the question of procedure to be adopted, has clearly put before this house one question which this house must answer—

Mr. Winkler: Political trick number one.

Mr. Favreau: —and that is, what procedure we have to adopt. If the answer is in the affirmative—that is, if the amendment is accepted by the house—then there is no resolution. But if the answer—

Mr. Lamb: Mr. Speaker, this argument which the minister is making here tonight is not to the point at all. The minister got up to ask a question and is now making a speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, the minister did not rise to ask a question but to raise a point of order. I would suggest that the minister be allowed to make his point of order. If other hon. members want to comment upon it and offer advice for the guidance of the Chair I will be very pleased, of course, to hear their comments.

Mr. Favreau: If the amendment is negatived, Mr. Speaker, then we will have to deal with the merits—

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Pickersgill: There cannot be a question of privilege on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member allow the minister to conclude his point of order first, after which he might raise his question of privilege.

Mr. MacInnis: I wish to raise the question of privilege now. My question of privilege is that in the point of order the minister is raising we do not need a political speech from him to decide whether or not the particular point of order he has raised is a proper one. I submit that the point of order does not stand, and the precedent for that statement will be found only a couple of weeks ago when the member for—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I feel that the hon. member perhaps has a point but it seems to me it is the type of point that he might make after we have heard the Minister of Justice out. The hon. member may be right. I am not saying that I disagree with what he is saying now, but I suggest that he give the Minister of Justice the opportunity to submit his point of order, after which I shall be very pleased to hear any arguments the hon. member may wish to submit in opposition to the position suggested by the minister.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member who has just spoken has already understood my point of order quite well because he thinks he is in a position to establish that it does not stand. Therefore it must be clear enough as I have presented it so far.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, the minister has now directed a personal remark to me, and as you and every member of the house know any remarks made in this house should be directed to the Chair. The minister has directed a personal remark across the floor to me, and it is apparent to me that he has not quite got clear what the Minister of Transport told him to say.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister of Justice.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I am ready to admit—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I suggest to the minister that it might be of assistance to the Chair if he would come quickly to the point of order.

Mr. Favreau: My point is quite simple. It is that we should not on the present amendment deal with the merits of the main resolution. The speaker preceding the one who was interrupted by my point of order made it clear that he was limiting himself to discussing the matter of whether or not we should have a referendum.

One reason why I think the discussion should be limited to the amendment, as a matter of procedure, is that this question must be voted upon before we get to the merits of the main question before the house. Otherwise it will be impossible (a) to get to that point and (b) to give any other member who wishes to move an amendment, if there are any, the opportunity to do so, because we will not be able to settle the amendment and vote thereon until such time as we are at the end of the debate on the main resolution and in a position to vote on the amendment and on the resolution itself, which I think is wrong from the standpoint of the procedure of the house.

I suggest with due deference that Your Honour should rule whether or not in discussing the amendment hon. members are to be allowed to deal fully with the subject matter of the main resolution, that is, the merits of the flag question and the design of the flag or whether, subject, of course, to reasonable flexibility, they should not be basically contained within a discussion of the subject matter of the amendment itself.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, without going into the question of what has gone before and the remarks of previous speakers who have roamed the field extensively, may I point out citation 201 on page 168 of Beauchesne, which Your Honour has no doubt already found. At the bottom of the page the following appears after a reference to the question of an amendment to the main motion:

> In that case the debate that follows is not restricted to the amendment, but includes the motives of the amendment and of the motion, both matters being under the consideration of the house as alternative propositions.

I think it is very clear that when speaking on an amendment we are also speaking on the main motion. As long as I have been here that has been very clearly understood.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, the point of order raised by the Minister of Justice proves beyond any doubt that, in some Montreal ridings, people are not as quick as elsewhere in the province or in the country.

The suggestion of the minister to the effect that we should deal only with the amendment seems to me quite irregular, since this afternoon the leader of the New Democratic party (Mr. Douglas) as well as a representative of the Thompson group and myself have had the opportunity to discuss part (a) of the resolution, and also the Liberal representative who spoke after me.

Now, if the discussion is restricted to the amendment, this means that once the vote is taken on the amendment, everybody will start again to speak on the main motion. So, I am of the opinion that the best way to avoid as much as possible any waste of time of the house is to allow a general discussion on both the amendment and part (a) of the resolution introduced by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I admire the objectivity of the hon. member for Villeneuve, but I must tell him that if, this afternoon, we deliberately decided not to interrupt the leaders of the New Democratic party, the Social Credit and the Ralliement Créditiste, it is precisely because we were of the opinion that it would have been unfair not to grant the advantages the leaders of the Liberal party and the Conservative party had enjoyed yesterday, in dealing with the whole question. I feel that it would not have been appropriate to interrupt leaders of the three other opposition parties, merely because the leader of the official opposition had moved an amendment. Furthermore, I spoke about this to the house leaders of the various parties. I told them that as soon as the first speaker following the last opposition party leader would rise to speak, I would request Mr. Speaker to limit the debate to the amendment moved by the leader of the official opposition last night.

I have not raised a point of order sooner only to allow the leaders of the three other opposition parties to benefit by the same advantages that were granted the leaders of the Liberal and Conservative parties. I believe that each of the house leaders can certify the accuracy of my statement.

[Text]

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on the point of order. If the Minister of Justice is sincere in what he says, that special consideration is being given to the leaders—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I understand the hon. member for Villeneuve is rising on a question of privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

I was unaware of the meeting which took place among the various house leaders or group leaders, to the effect that the party leaders would be entitled to discuss just about any subject on the main motion. Consequently, I wish to withdraw the charge I made a while ago against the Minister of Justice, and I concur in his statement to the effect that all members should abide by the understanding arrived at this noon between the representatives of the various parties.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I suggest to hon. members that the turn the argument is now taking is rather irrelevant and has nothing to do with the point of order originally submitted by the Minister of Justice. The hon. member for Ontario.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak to the point of order. If the Minister of Justice was sincere in stating that an arrangement was made or an understanding was reached that the leaders of the various groups in the house would have a wider field of discussion on this matter, not entirely pertinent to the amendment as he now suggests, why did he not rise in his place on a point of order when the hon. member for York North was speaking?

Mr. Favreau: I want to dispel any misunderstanding. I never said that there was an arrangement or an understanding. All I said was, and I think I will be confirmed by all the house leaders, that it would be advisable, the decent thing to do, to allow the other leaders the same range of discussion as the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition in their speeches. One of the parties did not agree and it was for that reason I said a few minutes ago, in order to correct the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste, that if I did not object to his not being limited it was because I thought this was the proper thing to do for the leaders.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a question of personal privilege, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Justice has just indicated to the house that an arrangement had been made. Of course, not all the house leaders agreed to it, and we will go along with that. He has called to our attention that special privileges were to be extended to the party leaders. Since when has he taken it upon himself to deny to every member of this house the same right? We all arrived here by the same method and we are all entitled to the same privileges. The Prime Minister said that there would be freedom of debate for every hon. member in this house, and what the Minister of Justice is suggesting now would deny that right.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The remarks made by the hon. member confirm the suggestion I made just a moment ago that we are getting away from the point which should be decided at this moment as to whether or not a legitimate point of order was raised by the Minister of Justice. I would appreciate any further comments on that specific point.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, it would seem to me that the point of order made by the Minister of Justice would have had considerable force if it had been made at the right time. In other words, I would think that when we have an amendment before this house it would make a lot of sense if we were to discuss the amendment. This does not appear to be the rule. I further suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that to change the rules in the middle of the debate to extend privileges to certain members that are not available to other members would be a serious mistake.

Mr. Churchill: If your ruling, Mr. Speaker, is going to follow the argument put forward by the last person who spoke, I would be quite content. However, in case you are still in doubt, I want to support what he just said. You simply cannot change the rules part way through a debate.

Let me say that there is no misunderstanding. The government house leader has mentioned an attempted arrangement amongst the house leaders, and I think in doing so he has gone beyond what he should do. Why does he mention in the house that there was a meeting of house leaders and one did not agree? Well, all right, I did not agree. Let us be frank about the thing. I did not agree because you cannot impose this type of closure on members of this house. May I direct your attention to the rule of relevancy and the comments on relevancy on page 111 of Beauchesne's fourth edition:

> Relevancy is not easy to define. A wrong comprehension of it may have a serious effect on the freedom of speech. Members are often deprived of their right to speak on the pretext that their remarks are irrelevant when as a matter of fact they refer to matters perhaps remote but yet related, even indirectly, to the question under debate. In borderline cases the member should be given the benefit of the doubt. A great deal of latitude must be allowed in the House of Commons which is a forum where every phase of public affairs can be discussed and every member has the right to be heard, even if in doing so he sometimes disregards the rigidity of procedure.

Finally, may I say that yesterday Mr. Speaker dealt with the subject of relevancy as recorded on page 4307 of Hansard. You can read there where he said it was difficult to—

An hon. Member: Read it all.

Mr. Churchill: Shall I read it all?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Churchill: The Prime Minister was mixing up the two resolutions, (a) and (b) and a point was raised. Then, Mr. Speaker said this:

> The point before the house is a flag for Canada. The second resolution deals with the union jack, and I have suggested to the house that the joint resolution, if you want to call it that, be separated. We are now dealing with the first part, the flag for Canada, I admit that in dealing with this subject it is very difficult to rule out any reference to the past history of this country. You cannot just automatically forget the stirring years of the past history of our country, and therefore it seems to me that the Prime Minister, within reasonable limits and within the rule of relevancy, is entitled to make reference to things that have gone on in the past, which I presume might involve a reference to the union jack and what it stands for.

Yesterday, sir, the Speaker allowed freedom of discussion and a wide ranging debate, such as was allowed today, by those who have taken part in the debate up to this point. I believe that is where the matter should stand for the future.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to say a word on the very point that has been raised by hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. Yesterday, we had a most unusual procedure adopted of having a motion made by the government divided so that the house could express itself clearly on each half of that proposition. The right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition, and who is not here tonight, took exception—

Mr. Nesbitt: Where is your leader?

Mr. Pickersgill: It is quite evident he is not here today and he said he was not going to be here. The right hon. gentleman I am sure would agree with me if he were here—

Mr. Pugh: I rise on a point of privilege.

Mr. Pickersgill: Am I not allowed freedom of speech in this house, about which we just heard?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please; I understand the Minister of Transport is now on a point of order. Perhaps he might be allowed to finish his point, then I will be glad to hear the hon. member on his point of privilege.

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand that while a point of order can be raised about a question of privilege, a question of privilege cannot be raised about a point of order. There have been many decisions to that effect.

Yesterday the right hon. gentleman opposite objected to my right hon. friend, the Prime Minister, making any reference to the question which was separated from the question which we originally started to debate. He got up immediately and sought to circumscribe the Prime Minister's speech in that way. While the Speaker did say that there might be some little latitude allowed in making casual references, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre read only that part which suited him. The Speaker made it quite clear the Prime Minister could not go on and debate the second part of the motion, I think it was called.

An hon. Member: Who is debating it?

Mr. Pickersgill: The Leader of the Opposition moved an amendment which struck out the whole of the motion that was then before the house and substituted an entirely different question. Surely, sir, what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. If we cannot be permitted to debate these two closely interrelated propositions that were originally put on the order paper by the Prime Minister, then surely when a motion that is clearly different and distinct from the motion which was moved by the Prime Minister is before the house, on the very basis on which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked for a division, this proposition should be debated and decided. After it has been decided, if it is decided in the negative, we will have an opportunity to debate the other questions without having the two intermingled and confused. This, I understood was the purpose of the original division which His Honour made yesterday. It seems to me that if His Honour, the Speaker, be right in the decision he made yesterday, then it is equally right these two distinct questions should be debated and decided separately.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Speaker, I think sometimes the Minister of Transport inadvertently—maybe he is not thinking—uses words which he would otherwise probably regret. He made a statement in regard to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) knowing full well that everyone in the house knows where the Leader of the Opposition is.

Mr. Pickersgill: Where is he?

Mr. Pugh: He used words which were intemperate and it is to these words I object, that the Leader of the Opposition is not now leading his party. I think the minister should withdraw those words.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not say he was not leading his party. If I did, I take that back. I thought I said he wasn't in his place, and he certainly isn't in his place and I don't know where he is. If the hon. gentleman wants to tell us where he is, I am sure we would be interested.

Mr. Pigeon: Where is the Prime Minister?

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Speaker, if I could revert to the point of order just before Your Honour makes a decision, we had a wide ranging debate far from the point of order which was originally raised. In view of that I would suggest that, when you do make your decision, the 27 minutes which I believe have been taken up on this matter will be accorded to the hon. member who was stopped when he was making a perfectly legitimate speech.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: I should like to say a few words on the point of order. It is clear that we are now engaged in a very important debate since the point is to choose a national flag.

Yesterday, when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) who, incidentally, is not in his seat at this time, proposed his amendment, he gave a completely different course to the debate introduced by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson).

The Prime Minister had the opportunity to discuss the matter of the flag generally. The Leader of the Opposition, who is not in his seat now, had the same opportunity, but he changed the course of the debate by proposing an amendment on a completely different matter: the referendum.

An hon. Member: That is true.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Grégoire: This morning, seeing the turn things were taking, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) called us together to ask us whether we would accept that the party leaders should continue to discuss the matter of the flag generally, which was extremely polite on his part. It was proper, during this debate, that each party leader should be able to express the opinion of his party, as the Leader of the Opposition who, incidentally, is not in the house at this time, put forward the attitude of the Conservative party on that matter.

We agreed that after the party leaders had made their speeches, everything would come back to normal and other speakers would discuss the amendment and once the amendment had been rejected—because I am convinced it will be—everyone could rise again to discuss the general matter of the flag.

Mr. Speaker, it was not necessarily an agreement in the proper sense of the word but an arrangement among us. Unfortunately, the house leader of the Conservative party was not there because, as a child who has been deprived of his sugar, he has been sulky for the past three months and does not attend our meetings any more. That is why he could not enter into an agreement on behalf of his party. But in the present situation, I maintain that we must go along with the standing orders and deal with the plebiscite.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

[Text]

Mr. Churchill: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to be insulted by this hon. member from Lapointe. Will he withdraw the statement he made about me a minute ago, or does he lack the courage to do so?

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre asks me to withdraw the words by which I was saying that he had not attended our meetings for the last two months. If he asks me to withdraw that, I call to witness all the other house leaders that he did not attend those meetings for two months, nor this morning.

If that is what he wants me to withdraw—

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. I might bring to the attention of hon. members that the turn of the discussion has very little bearing on the point of order which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) attempted to make quite a long time ago, and I would suggest to hon. members that they allow the Chair to express an opinion as to the point which he raised.

The minister stated that hon. members contributing to this debate, while the amendment proposed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) is still under consideration, should be restricted to comments relative to the point of the amendment itself, that is, the holding of a plebiscite. As has been suggested by a few of the hon. members who spoke on this point, I am wondering if the point of order which is raised by the Minister of Justice does not come a bit late.

I fully agree that a number of speakers prior to the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Coates), who now has the floor, have contributed to this debate with quite a great deal of latitude, and it seems to me it would be very difficult for the Chair at this point to restrict hon. members and deny them the latitude which has been accorded to speakers who preceded them.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) referred the Chair to citation 119 of Beauchesne's fourth edition which deals with relevancy of debate in the following terms:

> Relevancy is not easy to define. A wrong comprehension of it may have a serious effect on the freedom of speech. Members are often deprived of their right to speak on the pretext that their remarks are irrelevant when as a matter of fact they refer to matters perhaps remote but yet related, even indirectly, to the question under debate. In borderline cases the member should be given the benefit of the doubt. A great deal of latitude must be allowed in the House of Commons which is a forum where every phase of public affairs can be discussed and every member has the right to be heard, even if in doing so he sometimes disregards the rigidity of procedure.

Hon. members will recognize it is not easy for the Chair to refer to this particular citation because it does tend to weaken the position of the Chair, but I think it is very relevant in this instance, particularly in connection with the type of debate in which we are now engaged.

Hon. members have also referred the Chair to page 418 of May's sixteenth edition, which I would like to quote:

> The object of an amendment may be either to modify a question in such a way as to increase its acceptability, or to present to the house a different proposition as an alternative to the original question.
> The latter purpose may be effected by moving to omit all the words of the question after the first word, "That," and to substitute in their place other words of a different import. In that case the debate that follows is not restricted to the amendment, but includes the purpose both of the amendment and of the motion, both matters being under the consideration of the house as alternative propositions.

This of course has been confirmed or restated in Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 201, which is substantially the same as what I have just read to the house, and which it may not be necessary for me to read.

In view of the citations to which I have just referred, we should not try to limit the debate to the substance of the amendment but rather we should allow hon. members to make reference in the course of this debate to both the amendment and the main resolution.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I thank you for your decision and would like to say that not only have we a split resolution but I have a split speech. About a half an hour ago, when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) tried to delay me, I was attempting to indicate what I felt about the resolution and the amendment. I was pointing out the reasons surrounding the introduction of this resolution into the house, and the great desire on the part of the government to ask parliament all of a sudden to confirm a new flag design.

I might refer back to not very long ago, to the day when the Prime Minister came into the house and outlined the priorities in legislation which he considered were necessary for the house to consider before we could recess.

At that time the flag resolution was not even considered a priority piece of legislation. All of a sudden, for some reason best known to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), parliament is confronted with this emotional debate at a time when many, if not most, of the promises made by the government during the election campaign of April, 1963 remain unfulfilled. I say: why this great haste all of a sudden? Why this argument that the government must implement a particular promise within the time limit indicated when it was in opposition, because it was a solemn commitment which must be undertaken? When was this solemn commitment given, and where, and how often during the election campaigns of 1962 and 1963? I should like to refer to an interview which the Prime Minister, when leader of the opposition, gave in my constituency at Amherst, Nova Scotia. A number of questions were asked him by a reporter regarding the flag matter. Among the questions put to him at that time was the following:

> Do you think Quebec will oppose anything except a flag with the fleur-de-lis in it? Must they have this part in it?

The Prime Minister's reply was:

> Well, we would have our Quebec ministers in our cabinet decide what the design would be and they would make their views very clear at that time, I am sure.

In the same interview, the right hon. gentleman stated that he would not be mentioning the flag, or this new proposed flag, when he spoke in Amherst that evening. Well, I am afraid statements of this kind could be forthcoming from many areas of Canada. Indeed, my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) pointed out last night that the British Columbia section of the Liberal party, when putting out its program, omitted any reference to a new flag because of the known feeling about a new flag design in that province. To say that we are today discussing the flag issue because it was a commitment made to the electors in 1963 is in my opinion the height of ridiculousness—nothing could be farther from the truth.

I think the emergency committee to save the Canadian red ensign which signed an open letter to the Prime Minister sets this point out very well when it states:

> It is said that our representatives were elected to decide the flag. There was more than one plank in the Liberal platform, and many who voted for your party's flag resolution, sir, did not dream that a "distinctive flag" must exclude all symbols of our heritage. Surely, most Canadians rejected a flag change when the majority rejected the party that proposed it. The reference in the platform to a "distinctive" flag was misleading. A flag "distinctive" from what? The adjective is irrelevant to the debate. It is the right slogan for the wrong battle—a battle won years ago when Canadians rightly demanded a flag distinct from the great union flag of Britain. The resulting "distinctive" flag was, of course, the Canadian red ensign, which was so described in the order in council of 1945. The ensign, bearing the shield of Canada, cannot be confused with any other flag on earth. We are disturbed by the cranked-up campaign to exchange this distinctive flag, rich in meaning, for one created out of whole cloth which many millions of us think distinctly undistinguished.
> Surely a government sincerely concerned for national unity would honour and perpetuate the graphic symbols of both French and British founding peoples. The present government, apparently unable to reconcile the legitimate claims of each, is ducking the problem by erasing the memory of both. Three quarters of the United States flag is devoted to reminding Americans that they began as 13 British colonies. Unlike Dahomey, Gabon, Mali, and the Malagasy republic, Canada was not born yesterday. We neither need nor want a brand new flag. Should you doubt this, sir, we urge you to put it to the test. Only a plebiscite will relieve the building bitterness of a victimized majority.
> Canadians know that a parliament, precariously balanced, should not decide this issue. They know that members are not being asked to vote for a flag, but against an election. They know that a plebiscite will clear the air and unite all who honour the democratic process. They know that this issue, unlike most others, requires no arcane knowledge and no deep study. It is an issue on which every Canadian has an opinion, and should have a vote.

What do Canadians have to say? I should like to quote from some editorials in various newspapers across this country which feel that a plebiscite is the only fair way in which to handle this question at the present time. Before I do so, I should like to say this: It can never be said that the Prime Minister did not have every possible opportunity to keep this matter out of politics, to keep it from becoming a partisan political debate. He was given the opportunity. Indeed, he appeared to have taken the opportunity, and then, for some reason best known to himself, he backed down. He half committed himself to a plebiscite in this house by giving each and every member the right to vote in favour of the red ensign, or of this new maple leaf design which he considers to be a distinctive flag. The Prime Minister need only have selected one of his members, allowed him to introduce the resolution, and said to the country: There will be no vote of confidence on this matter; it is a matter which each member of parliament can decide freely and on the basis of his knowledge, both personal and with regard to his constituency. If this had been done there would be no one in this country today asking for a national plebiscite. The people would feel that their representatives would be responsible enough to make the fairest possible decision.

But what has happened? The whip has been cracked; the people of this country have been told it is a flag which the Prime Minister has indicated is his personal choice—and let there be no mistake about that. Mr. Val Sears in a column in the Toronto Star on May 20 last, pointed this out clearly and concisely when he said:

> As drinks were served and the newspapermen nibbled on sandwiches, Mr. Pearson brought out several flag designs on cardboard, selected one with a cluster of three maple leaves and two blue bands and placed it on the mantelpiece as his choice.
> He said he was prepared to have the government stand or fall on the maple leaf flag.

The Prime Minister was careful, however, to make clear that the flag on the mantel was his personal choice.

Well, Mr. Speaker, it is going to be everybody's personal choice, apparently, unless Canadians are given some opportunity to indicate what their personal choice might be; because we are told that we either vote for it or the public will not only have a plebiscite as to the maple leaf design but they will have a plebiscite as to the government of this country. And even at this late date, if the Prime Minister had any wisdom left I would say he would not want to let the Canadian people make that decision at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coates: What do the newspapers of this country say? Apparently the Prime Minister is becoming more selective as to newspapers and newspapermen than he was when he was leader of the opposition, because I understood only eight reporters were invited to this little get-together. These were eight very carefully selected gentlemen. I know most of them, and they are very nice gentlemen; but I understand there are 120 such gentlemen in the press gallery and I would think they would be somewhat offended at not having been invited.

An hon. Member: And a young lady.

Mr. Coates: Yes; not only one young lady, but a very attractive young lady. If the Prime Minister had been wise he would have invited her. Certainly had I been the prime minister I would have seen that the young lady was there too. However, seeing that the Prime Minister is selective in the reporters he chooses, he might also be as selective in the newspapers he now reads. With this thought in mind, Mr. Speaker, I would like to put the views of a few of the newspaper editors in this country on the record so the Prime Minister may take a look at what they suggest and how they view this autocratic attitude he has with regard to his personal pennant. The daily Gleaner of May 27, 1964, had this to say:

The only logical way the Pearson government could get out of the flag impasse in which it now finds itself would be to submit the red ensign and the maple leaf designs to a national referendum, with the winner automatically becoming Canada's flag.

We go to the other end of the country, where the Vancouver Province says this about Mr. Pearson. The heading to the article is "Mr. Pearson flirts with political suicide". The concluding part of the article is as follows:

Mr. Pearson's Liberal predecessors, Mackenzie King and Louis St. Laurent, understood the political danger of trying to invent a new Canadian flag. They knew that such a move would do more harm than good to national unity and they steered well away from the flag controversy.

Now Mr. Pearson has headed directly into the hurricane zone.

The winner of the Nobel peace prize has become a contender for another distinction—that of kindling the worst racial conflict in our country's history.

There is not much talk about national unity in that editorial, Mr. Speaker. And for my good friend from Bonavista-Twillingate I will quote from the daily News of St. John's, Newfoundland, which had this to say:

In fact, it might be imagined that it would be better in the first instance to sound popular opinion by means of a referendum. And only if it should be shown by this means that there is an overwhelming demand for a new emblem, should any change be considered.

Take note, Mr. Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill).

An hon. Member: He isn't here.

Mr. Coates: The Charlottetown Guardian had this to say:

There are a lot of people in Canada who may want to retain the old flag but do not want yet another national election at this time. This issue would present them with a painful choice. It could be averted by a national referendum, thus leaving the country at large to make a free choice in the matter. But Mr. Pearson will have none of that.

I now come to the Toronto Telegram. I might mention that while this paper has been a strong supporter of the Conservative party, I remember that not very long ago it was a strong supporter of the Liberal party. It had this to say in an editorial entitled "Statesmanship":

It is highly probable that the Progressive Conservative opposition will move an amendment to Mr. Pearson's flag legislation asking for such a plebiscite. Mr. Andrew Brewin, the N.D.P. member from Toronto-Greenwood, has expressed the belief that most of his colleagues would vote for it. Mr. Arnold Peters, N.D.P. member from Timiskaming, and New Democrat Barry Mather of B.C. have reinforced this assumption.

I wonder if they have talked to their leader on this matter and convinced him that he also should be supporting this amendment. Another issue of the Toronto Telegram had this to say:

In the Telegram's view the Prime Minister has been recklessly unwise in rejecting the proposal for a plebiscite on the issue. Only by such a device can the people of the nation freely and clearly express their choice.

The Victoria daily Colonist had this to say:

Parliament has yet to express itself on the flag resolution but even among the doubts expressed by M.P.'s of all groups about the new design, and preference by many for a national plebiscite, the trend indicates that the government's measure will pass...

Unless at the last minute M.P.'s vote on the new flag as conscience and personal choice dictate it will never be known whether their decision is based on conviction or political expediency. And this will acerbate the division of public opinion that exists on the subject of a national flag.

Then the Quebec Chronicle had this to say:

First things first is a good rule even for prime ministers. The flag issue now before parliament is unlikely to be over in a few days; it is bound to generate a great deal of bitterness in the country, even though the intentions of the government are above reproach.

For one thing, the country must know why Mr. Pearson had to move in such a hurry. Is he trying to do with the flag what Judy LaMarsh coudn't do with her pension plan? Or does he consider a national flag such a trivial piece of business that it wasn't really worth while consulting anybody on its design?

Mr. Speaker, those are some of the questions that some of the newspapers in this country are asking the Prime Minister about a national referendum.

May I call it ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the acting house leader about the business for tomorrow and Thursday and Friday, if he has the information.

Mr. MacNaught: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will go on with this debate. On Thursday we will consider the constitutional amendment. If it should be finished on Thursday, we will then continue with this debate.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

(Subject matter of questions debated under adjournment motion).

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved:

NATIONAL DEFENCE—HALIFAX—DISMISSAL OF CIVILIAN COOK

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, on June 10 I asked a question of the Associate Minister of National Defence in the following terms:

[Mr. Coates.]

Is the minister aware that a civilian cook named Lorne Edward Pace, with 12 years of good service in the R.C.N. and two years as a civilian cook with the R.C.A.F. in Halifax, has been discharged for taking home a 50 cent cake? Would the minister investigate the matter—

Mr. Speaker at that time ruled that the matter should be on the order paper, and I indicated according to the procedure relevant that I should like to discuss it in this period after ten o'clock.

Despite the fact that the question was ruled as one for the order paper, the associate minister of defence promptly conducted an investigation into the matter, and as a consequence of his investigation I received the following letter from him dated June 11:

Dear Mr. Regan:

I wish to inform you that I have had the dismissal of Mr. Lorne Edward Pace, cook at the combined mess, R.C.A.F. Gorsebrook, Halifax, investigated.

I am satisfied that the action taken was unduly harsh, and I have directed that Mr. Pace be reinstated forthwith.

From the time of his release to the date of his reinstatement, he will be considered as under suspension without pay.

Yours very truly,
Lucien Cardin

I should like to use these few moments to thank the associate minister of defence for his prompt action in this matter. Too often in years gone by it has been the way of ministers of the crown to tend to defend actions of their subordinates which have been too extreme. I think it is very much to the credit of our present associate minister of defence that he took this prompt action to rectify this injustice.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that this case has ended happily. It was one in which a man was discharged by his superiors for taking home a cake which was more than a day old. Early information indicated that this cake would have ended up in the garbage; I now understand this is not the case but that it would have been used for pudding. Someone said to me a few moments ago that the proof of the pudding is in the eating. I think that while this case has ended very well we must wonder how many Lorne Edward Paces there are whose cases do not come to the attention of parliament or to ministers of the crown.

In this instance radio station CHNS in Halifax and Edmund Morris, a former member of this house, brought the matter to public attention. After that I contacted the minister during the question period, and I understand the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Crouse) had also contacted him in this regard. Certainly he should have some share in the credit for bringing the matter to the attention of the authorities. However, the case spells out, I think, the need for haste in providing an independent arbitration board to deal not only with discharge grievances but grievances of civil servants and government employees, including the hourly paid classifications. I have in mind grievances arising not only from discharge but from working conditions, classification and other matters.

As we all know, at the present time there is a committee investigating a system of collective bargaining for civil servants and other government employees, and presumably this system of collective bargaining, as is the custom in industry today, would include a system of totally independent arbitration. I think this is needed and I would urge haste in the work of this committee, because the matter has been under study for some time now. I think that if our government employees are not to be second class citizens where cases of this type go unnoticed, it is very important that as quickly as possible there be established by the authority of parliament a system of independent tribunals through which the grievances of all types of government employees and groups of government employees can be handled, so as to bring about fair and final disposal.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.06 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, June 17, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF MINISTER AND AMBASSADOR OF THAILAND

Mr. Speaker: May I call the attention of hon. members to the fact that we have in the Speaker's gallery a distinguished visitor in the person of the associate minister of national development of Thailand, Hon. Mr. Buchana, who is accompanied by the ambassador of Thailand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES—HEADLINE IN TORONTO "TELEGRAM" RESPECTING MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Frequently when one wishes to raise a question of privilege he advises Your Honour in advance. Today I have not done so. Indeed, I have not indicated to anyone my intention to raise this point of privilege about which I feel very strongly.

Mr. Speaker, one of the principal attributes of the chair which Your Honour occupies is its impartiality, and in this respect this parliament is doubly honoured in the person who now occupies the chair.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: You, sir, are human like the rest of us. You have made mistakes and you may make other mistakes, but your impartiality is beyond question. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I was shocked yesterday when I read in the home edition of the Toronto Telegram this heading over an article on the front page: "Mr. Speaker saves the Liberal party."

Mr. Cooper: It was you saved them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: I am not concerned about these interjections. The facts as to what happened on Monday will take care of themselves, but I am concerned and I hope all hon. members of the house are concerned about our respect for the Chair.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: If the implication in that heading were correct you, sir, should not be in the chair, but it is my submission that it is totally incorrect. As a matter of fact may I say, and this so often happens, that the heading is not borne out by the article itself, which was written by a staff person of the Toronto Telegram here in Ottawa. Let me indicate that fact by reading the first sentence:

> Speaker Alan Macnaughton last night ruled against the government and the official opposition and, as they say in the west, lived to tell the tale.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the writers for the Telegram here in Ottawa have no marks against them, but a headline writer in Toronto has committed an error which I feel this parliament, this House of Commons, cannot ignore. Let me state my view, which I think is widely shared. Your Honour did a great deal of work—and this was very obvious—before you rendered the decision you made on Monday; and in my view, far from what is implied in this headline being the case, you saved parliament from being put in an impossible position and you saved the nation from being confronted with an equivocal and unclear decision.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that even as writers such as Mr. John Bird of the Toronto Star who said you did a good job for the nation on Monday, and such as Mr. James McCook who in the Ottawa Journal said it was Mr. Speaker's day on the hill, the Toronto Telegram will join with all of us in paying tribute to the courage and impartiality of the person who now occupies the Chair of the House of Commons.

DEFENCE

Third report of special committee on defence—Mr. Hahn.

GRAIN

WHEAT, OATS AND BARLEY—ANNOUNCEMENT OF INITIAL PAYMENTS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I wish to inform the house that initial payments for the basic grades of western wheat, oats and barley delivered during the 1964-65 crop year will be at the same level as the present crop year.

The initial payments effective August 1, 1964 are: for wheat: $1.50 per bushel, basis No. 1 northern in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver; for oats: 60 cents per bushel, basis No. 2 Canada western in store Fort William/Port Arthur; for barley: 96 cents per bushel, basis No. 3 Canada western six row, in store Fort William/Port Arthur.

For all other grades of wheat, oats and barley the initial payments for the 1964-65 crop year will be established at a later date by the Canadian wheat board.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. O. Cooper (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce regarding the price of wheat. When is he going to announce the $2 wheat that was promised during the 1963 campaign?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have made all the announcements for 1964-65 that have been authorized by this government to date.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has he forgotten so soon the pledges made during the last election campaign to increase—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is out of order.

FINANCE

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND—REPORT ON MEETING OF GROUP OF TEN

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): I returned last night from a meeting in Paris of the ten countries participating in the general agreements to borrow of the international monetary fund and would like to report to the house on what transpired.

Hon. members will recall that last year on the occasion of the annual meeting of the international monetary fund the ministers and governors of the group of ten announced their intention of studying the functioning of the international monetary system and of the probable future needs for liquidity, and instructed their officials to examine these questions and report to them. Progress has been made in this work, and the ministers at their meetings on June 15 and 16 examined the studies and analysis which had been prepared. Following this discussion we gave further instructions to the officials for drafting a joint statement which will be made public during the summer at the same time as the international monetary fund issues its annual report, which I expect will also be discussing this matter of international liquidity.

It is still too early to predict what the conclusions of all this inquiry will be, but I would like to assure the house that Canada has given steady support to proposals which will strengthen the system of international payments and ensure the growth of liquidity that will be needed in the future. These objectives are clearly in the interests of Canada, with our considerable dependence on international trade and payments.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): I am sure the house will have listened with interest to the minister's statement. I am sure, too, that we all agree with the policy he has outlined, which is a continuation of the government's policy to strengthen these organizations.

When one reads the papers from time to time and sees the way in which some countries are increasing their rates, and the possibility of further difficulties in the future, I think it is a very good thing indeed that we have such an organization as the international monetary fund.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, we favour a little less the discussion of the group of ten who meet in Paris from time to time to consider the monetary system, because we know that their objective—besides, it was mentioned in a release—is to achieve an international monetary system for the most industrialized countries.

We believe that the day Canada will participate in a single and integrated international monetary system we will lose a part of our sovereignty and become the prey of foreign financial interests, even more than we are at the present time.

That is why we recommend to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) that he use discretion in his discussions with the ministers' of finance of those ten countries, because we intend to see to it that Canada's sovereignty in the monetary field shall be preserved since it is the basis of any political sovereignty.

QUESTIONS

NATIONAL MUSEUM

Question No. 1,042—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. What are the plans for the reorganization, development and expansion of Canada's national museum?
2. Will the new museum be ready for 1967?
3. When will legislation be introduced into the house designed to overcome the administrative difficulties under which the existing museum has laboured; and as presaged by the resolution introduced into the house on January 24, 1963?

Mr. Lamontagne: 1. (a) Natural history

The staff of this branch has shown orderly development in the past few years. Future planned expansion will take care of those subjects which fall naturally under the responsibility of the federal national museum. Future plans for the zoology division include the addition of scientific and supporting staff in invertebrate zoology and quaternary zoology. The national herbarium will be expanded to include specialists in lichens and algae. The mineralogy and palaeontology functions will be strengthened by the formation of a geology division and the addition of staff in palaeobotany and invertebrate palaeontology.

(b) Human history

(i) Archaeology: The archaeology division is being brought back to its previous strength, with one specialist in physical anthropology and one in sub-arctic archaeology; at the same time a staff increase is intended to provide three specialists, one in each of the following: Atlantic provinces, Quebec and British Columbia.

(ii) Ethnology: A new chief has been appointed, Mr. A. D. DeBlois, M.A. It is intended to fill his former position with a new ethnologist; and to make a staff increase providing specialists to cover the fields of boreal forest ethnology and Canadian ethno-history; and three juniors, one in each of these fields; also a cataloguer and a preparator.

(iii) History: A chief historian has been appointed, namely Mr. F. J. Thorpe, who is a bilingual scholar and who has done graduate study at the University of Ottawa, and in Paris with specialization in French Canadian history.

(c) Science and technology

The appointment of a director of the intended museum of science is under consideration as a matter calling for early action. His duties would be to carry on the formation now of the collection of scientific and engineering material which will be needed for the display halls of the science museum when it is built, and which has to be made in advance, as opportunities to secure objects present themselves.

(d) The national museum's program of research is being carried forward, with an ever growing series of publications adding to scientific knowledge and public awareness of the museum's role in that field.

(e) Common services

Increases in the staff of the library, photography, education and museology divisions are required in order to handle the increased public services requested and in order to prepare exhibits of national importance for the new museum building in 1967.

2. The Department of Public Works has undertaken to have the new museum ready to hand over to the museum staff by 1 January, 1967.

Planning of exhibits for the new museum is proceeding; but no guarantee can be given that the whole of the two acre-odd exhibition space can be properly filled with exhibits worthy of the national museum of Canada in so short a period as six months.

3. The government is presently considering proposed legislation and hopes to be able to make an announcement about it later during the present session of parliament.

PROSECUTIONS FOR COMBINES OFFENCES

Question No. 1,096—Mr. Winch:

1. From January 1, 1959, have any persons or corporations been fined for infractions of sections 411 or 412 of the Criminal Code (which were repealed on the 10th of August 1960) or for infractions of part V of the Combines Investigation Act offences in relation to trade (enacted by chapter 45 of the statutes of 1960) and, if so (a) what are their names (b) what was the amount of the fine in each case (c) when was the fine imposed (d) what infraction occasioned the fine?
2. Have any persons or corporations been fined more than once for such infractions since January 1, 1950, and, if so (a) what are the names of the persons or corporations so fined (b) what was the amount of the fine in each case (c) what additional infraction occasioned the fine (d) was the fine increased because of the previous conviction and, if so, in what amount?

Mr. Macdonald: 1. Yes.

Questions

TRANSPORT DEPARTMENT BUILDING PROJECTS, COMPTON-FRONTENAC CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 1,138—Mr. Latulippe:

1. Has the Department of Transport undertaken any building projects in the constituency of Compton-Frontenac for 1963-64, and, if so, who were the tenderers and what was the amount of each tender?
2. To whom were the contracts let?
3. How many contracts did the Department of Transport let without calling for tenders and what was the amount and the type of work involved in each case?

[Translation]

Answer: 1. No.

2. Not applicable.

3. None.

U.S. TRANSPORT COMPANIES IN CANADA

Question No. 1,157—Mr. Latulippe:

1. How many United States air transport companies are licensed to operate in Canada and what is the name of each such company?
2. What was the total annual turnover for such companies during 1962?
3. What is the total number of Canadians employed by such United States companies?
4. What was the total amount of taxes, customs duties and other fees paid by such companies in Canada during the past year?

[Translation]

Answer: The air transport board advises as follows:

1. There are 195 American air transport companies licenced to operate in Canada. They are listed in the Directory of Canadian Commercial Air Services which can be obtained from the queen's printer, in Ottawa, and which can be consulted in any public library or at the library of parliament.

2 and 3. The air transport board does not know.

4. Existing statistics do not give the total amount of excise tax and customs duties paid. The customs and excise division does not levy any fees.

AIR TRANSPORT COMPANIES OPERATING IN CANADA

Question No. 1,158—Mr. Latulippe:

1. How many licensed air transport companies are operating in Canada and what is the name of each such company?
2. What is the total annual turnover of these companies?
3. How many persons are employed in Canadian civil aviation?
4. What branch of the Department of Transport deals directly with the problems of Canadian civil aviation?

[Mr. Macdonald.]

[Translation]

Answer: In so far as parts 1, 2 and 3 are concerned, the air transport board advises as follows:

1. 438 Canadian air transport operators are licensed to operate commercial air services within Canada. Each is listed in the Directory of Canadian Commercial Air Services obtainable from the queen's printer, Ottawa, and available for reference in all public libraries and in the parliamentary library.

2. In 1962 the last year for which complete figures are available, the operating revenues were $292,674,904.

3. It is estimated that 18,512 persons are employed by Canadian commercial air transport operators.

4. The civil aviation branch is mainly responsible for dealing with the problems of civil aviation in Canada including the control and setting of safety standards. The telecommunications and electronics branch and the meteorological branch are, however, deeply involved in the solution of civil aviation problems related to the provision of telecommunication and weather services.

3. It is not possible at this time, to anticipate the total number of personnel reductions during the next 12 months.

*ADMISSION TO U.S. OF CANADIAN-BORN CHINESE

Question No. 1,222—Mr. Fairweather:

Must a Canadian of Chinese descent enter the United States through the so-called oriental quota and, if so, (a) under what authority can Canadian citizens be subjected to grading in this way (b) what steps have been taken by Canada to insure that the United States of America will not differentiate between passports of Canadians born in Canada?

Mr. Haidasz: The United States immigration and nationality act contains special quota provisions for persons whose ancestry lies in what the act calls the Asia-Pacific triangle. This includes persons of Chinese ancestry regardless of place of birth, citizenship, or passport.

The Prime Minister made a full statement on this subject in this house on October 18, 1963, at page 3738 of Hansard and a copy of his statement was sent to the U.S. state department. He said, in part:

I should like to make it very clear that as for Canadian law and policy, the present government, like its predecessor, is firmly opposed in principle and in practice to racial discrimination.

With respect to the United States law relating to immigrant visas, and this is the matter immediately under discussion, it has since 1924, with some exceptions, been based on a national origins system. There are quotas, however, based on country of birth for most countries of the world. A separate—and this is the exception—and very small quota, based on ancestry and not place of birth, was provided for persons whose ancestry lies in what that law calls the Asia-Pacific triangle. If persons born in Canada and Latin America fall within the rules relating to ancestry in the Asia-Pacific triangle, they come under this particular quota.

—While it may not be appropriate, Mr. Speaker, for the Canadian government to make official and formal representations to the United States government against the racial origins features of United States domestic immigration law, this does not mean that the Canadian government favours the inclusion of racial origin provisions in the immigration laws of the United States or any other country. These provisions, however, are not directed against Canada. A prospective immigrant of Chinese ancestry would find himself up against the Asia-Pacific quota provisions regardless of what country he was born in.

An additional reason, Mr. Speaker, for not making formal representations to the United States government is the fact that on July 23 of this year President Kennedy sent a message to congress proposing important changes in the quota system. He described the national origins system as 'an anachronism, for it discriminates among applicants for admission into the United States on the basis of accident of birth'. He specifically proposed the repeal of the Asia-Pacific ancestry formula—The president's proposals are now being considered in congress.

*WINTER HOUSE CONSTRUCTION BONUS

Question No. 1,224—Mr. Rynard:

1. During what period in the winter of 1963-1964 was the $500 incentive bonus payable for winter-built houses?

2. During the same period in the winter of 1962-1963, how many housing starts were made in Canada?

Mr. Byrne: 1. Payments under the winter house building incentive program were available for dwellings in structures of not more than four units on which most of the construction work was carried out between December 1, 1963, and March 31, 1964. The final inspection date was subsequently extended to April 15, 1964. Dwellings started prior to December 1, 1963, were eligible for the incentive payments provided that construction work had not proceeded beyond the first floor joist stage, or its equivalent, at that date.

2. Monthly data on dwelling starts are available only for urban centres of 5,000 population and over. These data indicate that during the period December 1, 1962 to March 31, 1963, there were 9,326 single detached dwelling starts and 1,456 semi-detached and duplex starts. The number of triplex dwelling starts and fourplex dwelling starts is not available since these figures are included in statistics relating to apartment buildings of all sizes.

MIGRATORY BIRDS PROTECTION—DISCUSSION AT CONFERENCE

Question No. 1,233—Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton):

1. Does the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources possess any information which leads it to believe that the possibility of securing an amendment to remove the protective features of the migratory bird regulations will be discussed at the federal-provincial wildlife conference scheduled for Charlottetown June 18-19, next?

Questions

2. Does the department favour any relaxation of the protective features of the present regulations?

3. Will the department send a representative to the conference to state their intention of continuing to protect the migratory birds, by regulation?

4. Is the department aware of the news release from Ottawa dated May 30 which suggested the possibility of securing a federal licence to hunt migratory birds would be discussed at the conference?

Mr. Laing: 1. The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources has no information suggesting that at the forthcoming federal-provincial wildlife conference an attempt will be made to secure an amendment to the migratory bird regulations so as to remove their protective features.

2. Since all pertinent information on current numbers of migratory game birds is not yet available, it is not possible to decide at present whether the regulations will be changed for the 1964 hunting season.

3. The department sponsors the conference and will be represented by the minister and the chief of the Canadian wildlife service who will continue to discharge their responsibilities under the Migratory Birds Convention Act and regulations.

4. Yes.

CONTRACT FOR AIRPORT IMPROVEMENTS, TRENTON, N.S.

Question No. 1,240—Mr. MacEwan:

1. What were the names of the tenderers and the amounts of the tenders for the strengthening of the aircraft parking apron and taxiway at the Trenton airport, Trenton, Nova Scotia?

2. To whom will the contract be awarded?

Mr. Pickersgill: 1. Three bids were received: Warren (Maritimes) Ltd., New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, $27,838; Tidewater Construction Co. Ltd., New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, $34,142; Aberdeen Paving Ltd., Bedford, Nova Scotia, $36,430.

2. The contract is being awarded to the lowest bidder—Warren (Maritimes) Ltd., New Glasgow, Nova Scotia.

ALLEGED SHORT MEASURE OF PRODUCTS SOLD IN WAXED CONTAINERS

Question No. 1,247—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Has the attention of the Department of National Health and Welfare been drawn to an article which appeared in the March, 1964 issue of the Canadian Consumer in which it is stated that, in tests conducted by the association on milk and fruit drink products sold in waxed containers, 13 of 21 brands tested failed to give full measure and, if so, what action was taken by the department to insure that companies selling products to the public in waxed containers, would deliver the amount indicated on the carton in the future?

2. Does the department check food products under its jurisdiction on a continuing and regular basis as is required by the regulations of the Food and Drugs Act?

Miss LaMarsh: 1. The department is aware of the article in the March 1964 issue of the Canadian Consumer relating to the net contents of dairy products, fruit juices and drinks sold in waxed cartons. The food and drug directorate has checked the products named in the article. Where violations were encountered, warning letters were sent to the manufacturers. Rechecks on a number of products have indicated that they are now satisfactory in regard to the net content declaration. A further survey of such products is in progress.

2. The food and drug directorate of the Department of National Health and Welfare, to the fullest extent possible with present staff and facilities, checks food products for compliance with the Food and Drugs Act and regulations.

TREATMENT OF DEFENCE DEPARTMENT PERSONNEL ON TERMINATION OF EMPLOYMENT

Question No. 1,254—Mr. Starr:

Will the government set out its reasons for adopting a policy in the Department of National Defence as its affects the army personnel and the civilian personnel of that department in that it provides for different treatment with respect to civilian personnel on termination of employment.

Answer: There are important and fundamental differences between the conditions of service of members of the forces and those applicable to civilian employees.

The civilian staff of the government as a whole is not being reduced whereas a substantial reduction in the strength of the armed forces is planned. It is thus possible in many instances to effect the transfer of a redundant civilian to another government department with no appreciable effect on his career.

Most civilian employees whose positions are redundant have obtained from their jobs training and experience that is useful to these employees whereas the training and experience of many members of the forces is of little direct value in the labour market.

Members of the forces, once enrolled or commissioned, are required to serve during pleasure or in accordance with the terms of their engagement and they may be required to serve at any place. If they wish to resign for any reason, they incur a financial penalty.

Civilian employees, on the other hand, are under no obligation to serve anywhere, and they may resign to take a higher paid position, or for any other reason, on giving two weeks notice.

The member of the forces who is compulsorily retired is thus inherently in a more difficult position than the civil servant whose position becomes redundant.

However, the Department of National Defence sought and obtained the assistance of the Department of Labour, the national employment service and the civil service commission to supplement the efforts of the department in placing redundant staff. The efforts of all these agencies have been reasonably successful in that well over half of the redundant employees have been placed in alternate jobs.

The majority of those laid off who were unable to find alternate employment were contributing to the unemployment insurance fund, and were, of course, entitled to unemployment insurance, a benefit which is not available to members of the armed forces who do not contribute to the unemployment insurance fund.

In addition, the treasury board agreed that civilian employees between age 50 and age 60 who were released because of abolition of their positions, and who so wish, may be considered as special cases under the public service superannuation act and paid an immediate annuity equal to the actuarial equivalent of the annuity payable at age 60. The usual gratuity based on one week's pay for each year of service is, of course, also payable to civil servants whose services are terminated.

Treasury board also agreed that removal expenses up to $500 could be paid to civil servants with five years service in classifications above the first promotion level who transferred to other government employment at another location.

The Department of National Defence and other agencies of the government will continue their efforts to ease the readjustments involved for civilian employees whose employment is affected by the changes taking place in the Department of National Defence.

WINTER WORKS EXPENDITURES, ROBERVAL COUNTY, QUE.

Question No. 1,255—Mr. Gauthier:

What amounts were spent on winter works in each of the following municipalities in Roberval county during the year ended March 31, 1964: (a) St. André (parish) (b) St. André (village) (c) Chambord(parish) (d) Chambord (village) (e) Lac Bouchette (f) St. François de Sales (g) Roberval (town) (h) Roberval (parish) (i) Ste. MOVING OF FISHERIES DEPARTMENT PERSONNEL, PICTOU, N.S.

Question No. 1,276—Mr. MacEwan:

What moving and trucking firms are listed for the electoral district of Pictou, Nova Scotia, for the moving of personnel of the Department of Fisheries?

Answer: None. The removal expense regulations places responsibility for removal on the employee who makes his own arrangements subject to provisions in these regulations. One requirement is that he obtain estimates for shipment of household effects from two or more carriers. The employee is recouped for his cost of removal.

*CONVERSATIONS RESPECTING FILM ON PRIME MINISTER

Question No. 1,299—Mr. Fisher:

Did the Secretary of State for External Affairs have any conversations of any kind with either Mr. Alphonse Ouimet, Marcel Ouimet or Ron Fraser of the C.B.C. between April 29 and May 26 regarding the Intervideo production, "Mr. Pearson" and if so, what was the purport of these conversations?

Mr. Haidasz: The answer to this question is no.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

DEFENCE PRODUCTION AIRCRAFT CONTRACTS

Question No. 1,242—Mr. MacEwan:

1. What was the total amount of contracts awarded by the aircraft branch of the Department of Defence Production from January 1, 1964, to May 31, 1964?

2. To what companies were these contracts awarded and what was the amount of same to each company?

Return tabled.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I want to raise a point of privilege under questions. May I ask why I should have to wait another week for answers to questions Nos. 1,290 and 1,291.

Both questions are very simple and both ministers concerned are present. One reads:

Where is the office of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration?

The second one reads:

Where is the office of the Minister of National Health and Welfare?

Surely those questions could be answered without delay.

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the delay here is due to the problem of interpreting the precise meaning of the word "office". Does this refer to a place, or does it refer to a particular legal function performed by the minister? When this question has been dealt with, the answers will be forthcoming.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the statement made a moment ago by the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State, to the effect that it is apparently impossible to define the words "in the office of a minister", can the Minister of Justice have an investigation made as to how it was possible on April 10 and May 22 to pass orders in council appointing certain people to employment in the offices of certain ministers? Will he check to see whether those orders in council were valid?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): I will with pleasure, Mr. Speaker.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, motions Nos. 127, 128, 129, 130, and 131 are acceptable. I ask that notice of motion No. 123 be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Motion No. 123 stands.

MUNICIPAL RESOLUTIONS RESPECTING FLAGS AND ANTHEMS

Motion No. 127—Mr. Pigeon:

That an order of the house do issue for copies of all resolutions from Canadian municipal authorities received by the Prime Minister since the introduction of the proposed resolutions concerning the two flags and the two anthems appearing on the order paper as items 44 and 45?

Motion agreed to.

Inquiries of the Ministry

DIRECTORS OF CHARTERED BANKS

Motion No. 128—Mr. Orlikow:

That an order of the house do issue for a return showing the names and addresses of all directors of chartered banks in Canada as of June 11, 1964.

Motion agreed to.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH NEWFOUNDLAND GOVERNMENT RESPECTING FLAG

Motion No. 129—Mr. Pascoe:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before ths house a copy of all letters, telegrams, and documents exchanged between the Prime Minister or any minister acting on his behalf and the premier or any minister of the government of Newfoundland regarding a flag.

Motion agreed to.

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING FILM ON PRIME MINISTER

Motion No. 130—Mr. Fisher:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Prime Minister's office and the C.B.C. regarding the film project, "Mr. Pearson", including the letter from Richard Ballentine which may have set out the right of the Prime Minister's office to limit or censor the film and the letter from Mr. Reeves Hagan to the Prime Minister's office which may have redefined the limits set out in the Ballentine letter.

Motion agreed to.

PAYMENTS TO SENATORS AND MEMBERS

Motion No. 131—Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands):

That an order of the house do issue for a return showing payments of indemnity and allowances under Senate and House of Commons Act since October 1, 1963.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCE

INCREASED DEFICIT IN BALANCE OF PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Minister of Finance has informed us that he just returned last night he may not be conversant with the figures released this morning by the dominion bureau of statistics with respect to our balance of payments position, and the rather surprising increase in our deficits in the quarter just past as compared with the same quarter last year. The minister may have information with respect to that, but I would appreciate it if he would comment on this matter at the earliest opportunity. As I understand it, there has been an increase of some $103 million in the deficit for this quarter as compared with that of one year ago.

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the dominion bureau of statistics released this morning the official estimates of Canada's balance of international payments covering the first quarter of this year. The deficit on current account totalled $341 million compared with a deficit of $238 million for the same period a year earlier.

The deficit was made up of a surplus on merchandise trade of $44 million in the first quarter and a deficit of $385 million on non-merchandise account. The trade surplus was $26 million smaller than that a year earlier when it will be recalled the temporary import surcharges were still in effect. There were also some imports of a non-recurring nature in the first quarter of this year which reduced the extent of the merchandise surplus. On the non-merchandise account our deficit on travel account was higher than a year earlier. Travel abroad in the first quarter was undoubtedly stimulated by the date of Easter, which fell in March.

The first quarter of each year is typically the weakest on our current account, and it was to be expected that a large deficit would be incurred. I suppose also this is one of the difficulties caused by increased prosperity. However, apart from a substantial repayment to the international monetary fund in the first quarter, our official holdings of gold and foreign exchange declined by only a relatively small amount in this period of seasonal weakness.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question. Can the Minister of Finance tell us if the greatest part of that deficit is due to the outflow of Canadian capital in dividends and interest paid to foreign companies?

[Text]

Mr. Gordon: As I suggested a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, the greater part of the increase or a big factor in the increase was the increasing travel expenditures of Canadians, presumably due to the fact that they are better off.

Mr. Nowlan: Perhaps they want to get away from this government.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Gordon: Certainly there is no question that a big item is the amount of interest and dividends paid abroad.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I direct to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the fact that the balance of payments deficit on travel is so great, can we expect shortly a further announcement of assistance to the tourist industry on the great lakes, and particularly Georgian bay, in meeting the low water problem?

[Translation]

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, may I point out to the hon. member that, as far as the tourist industry is concerned, I feel that he could put his question to another minister.

It is only incidentally that the Department of Public Works can help the tourist industry by making navigation on the waterways easier. If that is what the hon. member has in mind, I must tell him that my officials are preparing a plan in that connection and he is aware of the attention they are giving thereto.

[Text]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Minister of Finance tell us what part of the international payments deficit is due to dividend and interest payments, and whether it has increased over the same quarter for the previous year?

Mr. Gordon: I do not have the exact figures here, Mr. Speaker, because I did get in rather late last night, but I will be glad to get that information and supply it to my hon. friend.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance said there were a number of non-recurring increases in imports. At the same time he said there was a surplus of $44 million on merchandise account. Can he tell us how much of that surplus of $44 million on merchandise account is also non-recurring, such as payments for wheat?

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, I am sure my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce would question the premise of my hon. friend. I think the minister is hopeful that shipments of wheat will continue at a very high level.

REPORTED TAKEOVER OF CANADIAN LOAN COMPANY BY U.S. INTERESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. Does the minister intend to investigate the takeover of another Canadian loan company, namely the Delta Acceptance Corporation Ltd., of London, Ontario, by the United States Avco Loan Company of New York?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker; there are no laws against that sort of thing.

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): As a supplementary question, would the minister consider investigating whether this takeover would have been necessary if the assets and resources of the now defunct Canada development corporation had been available?

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what the hon. member means by "the now defunct", so I am not able to answer the question.

The figures on our current account show that our balance of payments situation remains a problem toward which we shall continue to work for a solution. The increase in the deficit was affected by the special factors mentioned, and is not to be regarded as disturbing.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

AUTHORIZATION FOR USE OF ROYAL UNION FLAG

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Has the government received written authorization from Her Majesty the Queen for the usage of the royal union flag, generally known as the union jack, in the circumstances prescribed in the resolution on the order paper, order No. 44(B)?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. It would surely be inappropriate to make a request for any such authorization, if it were required, until parliament deals with the matter.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the government's intention to ask that the subject of a distinctive flag for the commonwealth be brought up at the forthcoming meeting of commonwealth prime ministers, or is there any talk now that the subject of such a distinctive flag will be brought up?

Mr. Pearson: I think we had better wait until we see what the Canadian parliament does with the resolution before we broaden its scope.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the deliberate use of the flag design favoured by the Prime Minister to harass and embarrass the Leader of the Opposition in western Canada—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is completely out of order. Perhaps the hon. member would care to rephrase it.

AGRICULTURE

ARDA—DELAY IN APPROVAL OF PROJECTS IN QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Forestry a question. Can he tell the house why the federal government is delaying approval of the 116 rural development projects submitted by the government of the province of Quebec?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, since ARDA was introduced, the government of the province of Quebec has submitted 116 projects at a total cost of $8 million, which have been approved, the federal government's share being $4 million.

Fourteen projects, at a total cost of $7 million, implying a federal contribution of $3,800,000, are now under consideration. Mr. Speaker, I think that if I listed all those projects I would immediately answer the hon. members question. Two of those projects were submitted on April 23, 1964; two on May 22; one on May 25; one on May 26; three on May 29; one on June 2; one on June 8; two on June 11, and the last one, yesterday, June 16.

Therefore, the greater part of those projects was submitted less than a month ago.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question. Why the delay in approving the 29 specific projects about which Mr. Courcy, minister of agriculture of the province of Quebec complained yesterday when he upbraided the Minister of Forestry for infringing on a field which did not concern him?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. In view of the shortness of the question period today I suggest that the minister might make a reply tomorrow on motions or at some other time in order to conserve the time for questions.

REQUEST FOR ROYAL COMMISSION INQUIRY INTO SITUATION IN EAST

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Does the government intend to set up a royal commission on the precarious state of agriculture in eastern Canada, in view of the fact that hon. Mr. Courcy, minister of agriculture of the province of Quebec stated he was in favour of such a royal commission?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Northwest Territories.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister was ready to answer.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I was just going to say I was going to look into the matter.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—EXTENSION OF PERIOD OF COMMITMENT OF CANADIAN FORCE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

We have asked him many times if the mandate of the Canadian forces assigned to the United Nations would be renewed within three months. The minister replied that the government had not taken any decision on the matter. Therefore, how can he explain the fact that we learn today, from a statement made by the Minister of National Defence, that the mandate of the Canadian troops in Cyprus will be extended by three additional months and probably for an indefinite period?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Minister of National Defence made a statement in that sense. I have his statement before me and, for the moment, I cannot add anything, except to repeat what I told the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) the other day, namely, that when the security council will have taken a decision I will be in a position to make a statement on behalf of the government.

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the Secretary of State for External Affairs exercise some pressure on his colleague the Minister of National Defence, in order that Canadian forces rotate every three instead of every six months, as now proposed? In my opinion, six months is too long a period and the rotation period should be reduced to three months.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, there is of course no reason to do what the hon. member is asking me.

[Text]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he can give the house the assurance that in the event the security council decides to extend the term during which the peace keeping forces in Cyprus will continue to operate, the Canadian government will be prepared to announce that Canada will continue its contribution to the peace keeping forces for that period?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, sir.

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell us the content of the communiqué from the Minister of National Defence with regard to the duration of time in Cyprus?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, what I said to the hon. member for Lake St. John who asked me the question, was that there was nothing in the statement attributed to the Minister of National Defence in Cyprus—warranting the conclusion which the hon. member with the best of intentions I know—reached. The Minister of National Defence was dealing with the question of rotation of troops.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs is on a related subject. In view of the statement of the secretary general of the United Nations that the problem of arms reaching Cyprus is critical and may be a decisive factor in determining the ability of the United Nations efforts in Cyprus to succeed, can the minister tell the house what action, if any, has been taken or is contemplated by the government, either through the United Nations or in conjunction with our NATO allies, to prevent the further spread of these arms to the Turkish and Greek Cypriots?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for giving me an indication of his intention to ask this question. I am in full agreement with the United Nations secretary general's statement in his report to the security council yesterday when he said: "The problem of arms in Cyprus is critical. Indeed, it may be the decisive factor in determining the ability of the United Nation's effort in Cyprus to succeed."

As I mentioned the other day, the government has been in consultation with the United Nations, and with its NATO allies on this problem. Strong representations have been made to all the governments concerned, and in addition bilateral representations have been made to other countries which might supply arms, urging that all such shipments be prevented.

Mr. Brewin: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs assure the house that aircraft and other armaments provided by Canada under mutual aid to NATO are not being delivered to Turkey or Greece in such a manner as might increase the danger of war between these two NATO countries?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I can certainly give the house that assurance. No F-104 aircraft paid for by Canada under mutual aid for NATO are being delivered to Turkey or Greece this year, as the Minister of National Defence informed the house in his reply to a similar question on May 13 last.

ANGOLA—USE BY PORTUGAL OF CANADIAN ARMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs supplementary to the one with regard to the moral use of Canadian arms supplied to other nations. Can the minister say whether arms supplied by Canada to the Portuguese have been used to butcher women and children in Angola?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question of the export of arms and military equipment from Canada to Portugal has come up on a number of occasions during the past few months, and I believe the house is familiar with the government's policy.

Inquiries of the Ministry

On October 21, 1963 I stated that Canada has not made any contributions of military assistance to Portugal since November, 1960. So far as commercial sales of arms are concerned we have, from that date, refused to authorize the export of any arms or equipment which in our judgment could be used against the African population in the Portuguese overseas territories. Portugal is aware of our attitude in this regard. Our policy is in keeping with the United Nations security council resolution of July 31, 1963 to which we have adhered.

I should add that I am not aware that anybody has suggested that Canada's military assistance is being used by Portugal in Angola, except as indicated by the hon. gentleman himself.

Mr. Herridge: Is the minister aware of the fact that I quoted a newspaper dispatch in asking my question on this matter?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am now aware of that fact.

TRADE

REPORT ON CONCLUSION OF UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, may I in response to a question asked by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings—say that I have a reply with regard to the conclusions of the United Nations conference on trade and development. In view of its length I suggest that I table it. In view of its importance, as the hon. gentleman suggested to me privately, we might agree that it become part of today's record.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): This would be agreeable to me, Mr. Speaker; I think it should become part of the record. I am glad to know the minister has rectified his omission of yesterday. I am glad that as a historian he has recognized the fact that Port Royal was the capital of this country in the days when Stadacona and Hochelaga were Indian villages, and that it was in the constituency of Digby-Annapolis-Kings.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If I did any offence to the "historicity" of the hon. gentleman's constituency, of course, I take the opportunity of correcting it at once, and recognize that a fitting member represents such an historic community.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree that this reply be printed in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of reply above referred to see appendix "A".]

CANADIAN FLAG

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT POSITION ON DIVIDED RESOLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister declared that the government would stand or fall on the original flag resolution, will he advise the house whether he takes the same position with regard to resolution (B) which deals with the union jack?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the technical situation is that there is only one resolution which has been divided into two parts. The position of the government with regard to the original resolution has not been changed because of the fact that it has been divided.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST FOR ADJOURNMENT FOR ST. JEAN BAPTISTE DAY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. P. Antoine Bélanger (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that the national holiday of French Canadians will be observed next week, that is Wednesday, June 24, is the Prime Minister in a position to tell us whether the house will sit on that day and whether the hon. members from Quebec will be able to participate in that celebration and enjoy a holiday, without neglecting their duties here?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I can think of no more appropriate way of celebrating this important day in our history than being in this House of Commons deciding on a Canadian national flag.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REPORT OF COMMITTEE RESPECTING COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): I should like to direct a question to the President of the Queen's Privy Council. Will the President of the Privy Council indicate what progress is being made by the committee which is developing a system of collective bargaining for government employees, and when this committee will complete its work? Can he reassure the house that a system of arbitration of employee grievances will be included in any eventually established system of collective bargaining?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Important as this question is, would the hon. member put it on the order paper.

FLOODS

SOUTHERN ALBERTA—STEPS TO ALLEVIATE SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): Yesterday I directed a question to the Prime Minister, but apparently he did not have the information and there was silence. Part of the answer regard P.F.R.A. at Glenwood rests with the Minister of Agriculture, and he is not in the house. The other minister concerned is the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Kindt: In his absence may I direct my question to his executive assistant. My question is as follows. Will he inform this house and the country on the government's program to meet the flood disaster situation in southern Alberta at Waterton lakes, Glenwood, Stand Off and Cardston?

Mr. John N. Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I assume the hon. member will permit me to answer as parliamentary secretary to the minister. The water levels, fortunately, are receding at Waterton lakes national park and the people are returning to their homes. We have not yet got a firm estimate of the damage, but the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources will be visiting the park personally at the end of this month.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

SUGGESTED POSTPONEMENT OF HEARINGS BY ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gene Rhéaume (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Will he consider asking the "B. and B." commission to postpone further hearings in order to deny racial fanatics a national platform from which to advance their dangerous and divisive ideas?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CONTINUATION OF STUDIES BY FLQ MEMBERS IN PRISON

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice.

Could he tell us what steps his department intends to take about the hunger strike which has been going on for three days at the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I must say that two of the inmates in one place and four others in another place had gone on a hunger strike Monday. Two of them gave it up, one Monday morning and the other Monday afternoon, and the strike was over yesterday afternoon or evening in the case of the other four.

As for the steps that have been proposed, especially concerning the possibility for some to carry on their university courses, I am giving the most serious consideration to this matter and I shall soon be able to report on it.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

NEW DIAGNOSTIC PROCESS RESPECTING HEART DISEASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I gave her very inadequate notice, but perhaps she can answer it. Has she had her attention called to the statement by a distinguished United States doctor that politicians and air line pilots would be well advised to submit to a new heart disease diagnostic process called cine coronary arteriography; and will the minister give consideration to having this equipment installed in the House of Commons so as to promote the physical longevity of cabinet ministers and perhaps other hon. members of the house?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member did show me a newspaper clipping just before entering the house, and I pointed out to him that perhaps some hon. members felt there were enough films being taken of them already without worrying about one of their hearts. However, I should like to say that it is not the belief of this government that it will be necessary to resort to such techniques in order to prolong its own longevity.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

QUEBEC—ADMISSION FEE TO WATCH CHANGING OF GUARD

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) asked whether, in some places in Canada, army officers required payment of an admission fee by spectators to attend the changing of the guard and, in a supplementary question, he asked if I could take some action so that army officers would abolish the amount of 75 cents which is required from every tourist who wants to see the changing of the guard at the Quebec Citadel.

I wish to inform the house that the amount of 75 cents to which my hon. friend referred is required from every person who wishes to visit the Quebec Citadel, with or without the changing of the guard.

The Citadel is an important historic site and armoury whose operation and management fall exclusively under the Royal 22nd Regiment and not the Department of National Defence.

Because of the great number of people who visit the Citadel, it is necessary for the 22nd regiment to hire guides recruited among war veterans and students. The admission price is used, among other things, to pay the guides' and watchmen's salaries and for the maintenance of the regiment's museum which is open to the public all year round.

Because of the way the Citadel itself is built, and because it also holds the Governor General's summer residence, the changing of the guard takes place inside the walls and people who are already in the Citadel at the time of that ceremony can of course see it without paying anything extra.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MONTREAL—SETTLEMENT OF WILDCAT STRIKE OF LONGSHOREMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Can he report any progress to the house relating to the dockers' strike in the port of Montreal, and whether in his view a settlement is imminent?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, my officer in Montreal advises me he has been notified by an officer of the I.L.A. that work will resume tomorrow morning.

PRIVILEGE

MR. RICARD—FAILURE TO BE RECOGNIZED BY CHAIR

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I wonder if, in rising, I am in your way when you want to recognize other members behind me, since, a moment ago, you seemed to be looking behind me to try to recognize other members, while I rose many times myself and you failed to recognize me.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is surely no question of privilege here. The hon. member has himself asked two questions today, and it does seem to me that other hon. members are entitled to ask one question.

CANADIAN FLAG

OFFICIAL ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DESIGN

The house resumed, from Tuesday, June 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker.

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada, a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, before concluding my remarks last evening I outlined to the house what newspapers in every province of this country were saying in support of a national plebiscite in order to determine the views of the Canadian people with regard to a flag design. Today I would like to turn to another subject, the Canadian red ensign, and its evolution in becoming Canada's national flag.

We are aware, today, how this debate has evolved—how the original resolution proposing two flags has been split so that a debate might go forward on only one of the two flag proposals. We know from the debate of Monday that Your Honour's decision in this regard was based on British parliamentary tradition. We learned during the Prime Minister's speech that the main reason for his party's objection to the Canadian red ensign is the fact that it was originally a British design. To see the Prime Minister performing in this way presents a curious spectacle. To begin with, he holds an office which originated in Great Britain. He speaks in parliament, which is a British institution. He spoke for two hours in a language which was English. Yet, at the same time, he rejects all that is British in our flag. I would point out to him that Mr. Ilsley in 1945 stated that the ensign flew almost uninterruptedly in Canada from confederation until 1904. It has been honoured in Canada for more than 70 years. How long does it take for an immigrant to become a Canadian under the Liberal government?

The Canadian ensign is Canadian by adoption, by assimilation and by tradition. In addition to the union jack it contains the maple leaves and the fleur-de-lis. It is, of course, the presence of the union jack which bothers the Prime Minister and his friends. It is so British that it is still part of the flag of Hawaii, one of the states of the United States. Mr. Speaker, the union jack contains the crosses of Saint George, Saint Andrew and Saint Patrick based on an ensign confided to William of Normandy by Pope Alexander. No one has ever accused William of Normandy of being British. These three crosses symbolize the Christian background of our peoples. Now they are to go. What of the maple leaves? The Prime Minister based his case on a royal proclamation by George V. As far as I know, he was British. Has the right hon. gentleman ever read the words of "The Maple Leaf Forever"? It begins:

> In days of yore from Britain's shore
> Wolfe, the dauntless hero, came—

He did not come here as a tourist. As far as I know, he was British. Why is it all of a sudden necessary to eliminate from our flag any reference to our British tradition? I say to you, sir, that to the best of my knowledge no Canadian in Canada is anxious to remove the fleur-de-lis from the red ensign; no Canadian in Canada is unwilling to consider a compromise; no Canadian in Canada, as far as I know, is unwilling to put this red ensign to the test of a national plebiscite. The only fair way in which Canadians will ever be able to know what the Canadian public really thinks about our flag or about a flag design is to secure from them their opinions on the matter.

The Prime Minister took great pleasure the other evening in placing on record certain letters he had received from Canadians who supported his flag proposal. I wish to take a few moments in order to put on the record some of the views of those who have written to me on this subject. I have a letter here from a gentleman in Halifax, Nova Scotia, who has something to say about the red maple leaves which appear in the flag design proposed by the government. He says:

> I do not know that it is obligatory that the flag should be approved by the college of heralds, but the college is certainly the final authority in such matters. For the official specifications for the coat of arms for Canada granted in 1921, the three maple leaves in the section at the bottom of the shield are green on a white field and not red. This follows the design of the sprig depicted in the coat of arms of the province of Quebec, three green maple leaves on a yellow field. In the Ontario design the maple leaves are gold on a green field.
> I was chairman of the committee of the general synod of the Anglican church which adopted a coat of arms in 1938. The arms consist of the cross of St. George with four green maple leaves in the centre of the shield. The original design suggested red maple leaves and the Garter King of Arms promptly told us that red maple leaves would mean a dying church and the only proper colour was green. Moreover that was the colour of the maple leaves in the Canadian coat of arms of 1921.

I certainly hope the red maple leaves on the design before us do not indicate a dying nation.

Also, I received a letter from a Canadian in Ottawa making clear in great detail how long the red ensign has been in use in Canada and referring specifically to a pamphlet put out in the early years of this century by John S. Ewart entitled "Sir John A. Macdonald and the Canadian Flag". This article tells us that for many years the red ensign has been in use in Canada and exhibited as our national flag.

With regard to a referendum, I have received many letters both from people living in my own constituency and from residents of other areas in Canada urging that the government should not endeavour to foist its personal preference on the Canadian people but, rather, that it should secure the opinion of the Canadian people on what the design should be. The Prime Minister took great delight in reading letters he had received in support in reading and in support of his point of view. I happen to have available to me a copy of a letter he received from a lady who is not a Canadian; she is a resident of Rochester, New York.

I wish to read what this lady had to say, just to point out that all the letters the Prime Minister has received do not support his particular pennant, are not in agreement with his handling of this matter, and indicate just how autocratic he and his party have been in the procedure they have followed in this instance. The letter reads as follows:

> There is just one tragedy. I have no influence to stop this flag from being presented to the people and I have no influence to change the government's mind. Actually, in a free country, two different designs, the red ensign and other should be presented to the country and a vote taken. Then the people who are supposed to be free would really be exercising their rights as free people. There is just one thing I can do. That is, turn my face away from the new flag and blink violently once or twice and swallow a great big lump in my throat—I remember most vividly a very handsome young man, who was not a born Canadian, who in 1940 put his hand up lovingly on a red ensign and said, "I am going to fight for my adopted country. I shall protect this flag. I shall be brave and some day I shall kneel before the Queen". His page in the Book of Remembrance is turned each July 1st—and several years ago the Queen visited the chamber where the book is on July 1st and I wept all that day and wondered if my darling air force officer knelt before her and if she knew it.

Mr. Speaker, that is the type of letter that shows the shame in the action that has been taken by this government in autocratically and dictatorially forcing a personal pennant, a flag that is meaningless, on the Canadian public in its efforts at this time.

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, at this moment I am very conscious of the fact that I am but a backbencher, participating however in a rather historic debate, one in which many great orators have already expressed their opinion and the opinion of their colleagues. Speaking in this house is not an easy task. One is always aware of the fact that this is a house of debate, made up of an audience that is both critical and at times very cruel, but an audience that in the final analysis fulfils its mandate to the people of Canada.

There are times when I sit in the back bench, listening to great Canadians participating in debate, that I become very conscious of my heritage. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that there are great Canadians in this house; such great Canadians as the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), Mr. Douglas, Mr. Knowles, Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton), Mr. Martin and so many other memorable people who have dedicated their lives to Canada through the medium of elected office. I suppose I am not alone, gentlemen, when I think back to the great men who by their words have sanctified this chamber; the almost legendary figures of Canadian history, speaking in a time when public speaking was a way of life—men like Brown, Cartier, Laurier, Macdonald, Lapointe, Bennett, D'Arcy McGee and Chubby Power. It is little wonder then, gentlemen, that in participating in this historic debate I am very conscious of my limitations.

But, Mr. Speaker, despite those limitations I cannot visualize one member of this house, regardless of his political beliefs, regardless of whether he is for the new flag or the red ensign or the union jack, whether he wants or does not want a referendum, participating in this debate unless he is motivated by sincerity and honesty both to himself and to the people whom he represents. Perhaps I think too highly of this place. Certainly it has its critics. Certainly there are moments, even in this debate, when in the eyes of the press and the people in the galleries we do not conduct ourselves in a manner befitting our high office. But, Mr. Speaker, it is to the everlasting credit of this house that with very few exceptions our conduct has stood the test of time. Our way of life has made it possible for parliament to render its decisions with dignity and sincerity and with an honesty that is unequalled in any other country in the world.

I should hope that when this debate is over, when the new flag is accepted or rejected, whether we have a referendum or whether we do not, all of us without exception can look back and say; that we have conducted ourselves with dignity, that we voted honestly for what we thought to be in the best interests of Canada and Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mackasey: For myself, Mr. Speaker, I represent 90,000 Canadians residing in Quebec's third largest city, the proud city of Verdun; and knowing this community as I do, my political instincts—which, incidentally, have served me well in the past both in civic and federal life—have suggested that possibly I should refrain from participating in this debate. At first glance this would be the prudent thing to do; but the Irish, gentlemen, even those of us born in Canada, are not known for their timidity or for their prudence.

My riding has strong ties with Great Britain and France. The residents of Verdun are almost equally divided amongst those who claim French as their mother tongue, and those who claim English. One might think at first glance that in voting now for the red ensign I would alienate my French speaking friends, or in voting for the new flag I might be rejecting the English. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, practically all the English speaking peoples in Verdun originate from the British Isles, and our community is proud of the fact that thousands of people from Newfoundland, long before that province became part of Canada, migrated to and still live in the city of Verdun. These are a proud people who brought with them a great love of the union jack, of history and of the British Isles. So it is only natural that I did some soul searching before coming to a decision both on the referendum and on the flag. I thought, Mr. Speaker, of the fact that Verdun in the first world war sent more volunteers overseas than any community of similar size in Canada. I remembered too our equally impressive record in the second war and the fact that Buzz Beurling, a great war hero, was brought up in the city of Verdun. I am vividly aware of the presence of two fine Legion branches in my community, endorsers of the red ensign, branches which remember Canada's history in a manner that should be the rule rather than the exception. Our older branch annually celebrates the battle of Ypres with a military parade second to none in Canada; a parade designed not to glorify war but to point out war's futility; a parade in which our hospitalized veterans are not forgotten. Our second Legion, branch 202, recognizes Dominion day in a manner almost extinct now in Canada—a return to the days when the simple things of life were important, to a field day complete with foot races, fireworks and family participation.

Despite these strong ties with Great Britain, Mr. Speaker, and remembering too our glorious war record and the contribution which the city of Verdun has made to Canada, I must when the time comes vote for the new distinctive Canadian flag so eloquently introduced into this house by a man who must go down in history as one of Canada's greatest sons. It is a flag which I hope will emphasize, not the differences in our backgrounds, but rather will serve as a symbol acceptable without reservation to all Canadians, including those millions who originate not from the founding races but from other nations—great Canadians who have contributed much to make Canada such a wonderful country.

There have been in this debate many fine speeches, including that of the leader of the New Democratic party, which have emphasized the need for unity and tolerance in Canada. I am one of those fortunate people in this country who know of the benefits of tolerance and understanding, for in my community I have been exposed to the best of two cultures, of two languages, of two peoples different in many ways. They are two peoples impatient with each other sometimes but who, Mr. Speaker, in my province at any rate, have lived together, played together, prayed together, and at times have fought together, people who respect each other always in complete freedom and always as Canadians.

There are those in this country, Mr. Speaker, who regard the new flag as an appeasement to French speaking Canadians. There are some who think this way who are motivated by hate, and we can only feel sorry for them. There are other sincere people who are motivated by a lack of understanding of what I know to be warm, friendly, intelligent people, people who, Mr. Speaker, time after time in the annals of Canadian history, have proven their allegiance to Canada, their respect for the commonwealth and their loyalty to the monarchy as head of the commonwealth of nations. I am proud to be part of a French speaking community. I might add, Mr. Speaker, that these are people ready and willing to sacrifice their own historic symbols for what they think is in the best interests of a united country.

I would ask all hon. members who are listening to my humble remarks not to fall into the trap of hatred. I would ask them not to judge Quebec or French Canada by the acts of those who would separate our country; those who would build up a case for separatism founded upon their own failure and inability to adjust to the ever changing face of Canada and Quebec.

There are some fine people in this house who have made a strong and excellent case for a referendum; but whether we like it or not, gentlemen, such a referendum would in no time at all, in the days before its consummation, deteriorate into a carbon copy of another general election. Picture if you will not only politicians touring the country and voicing their opinions on the flag but countless other Canadians caught up in the swell of emotions; Canadians from all walks of life emphasizing our cultural differences and widening the still bridgeable differences of opinion in our nation. That is the type of situation, Mr. Speaker, which could lead to violence and even to anarchy.

Nor can I accept a referendum as a convenient method of shirking my responsibilities; and in this regard I speak only for myself. To be willing to face my responsibilities is one of the very few virtues I have brought to this house, Mr. Speaker. I feel deeply that there comes a time in the life of every politician when he must look the issue straight in the face; a time when he must accept the challenge or forever fade into oblivion. For I have long come to the conclusion that doing what is right is, in the final analysis, doing what is politically right.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that I visualize the day when the advantages of the many cultures of this nation will become apparent to all Canadians; when the languages of Canadians of different backgrounds from our own will not be something to fear but something to cherish. I visualize the day when Canadians from sea to sea will have learned to respect each other, yes even to love each other as we do in Quebec; a day when Canada will start back on the road to the great destiny predicted for it by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. This I may not see in my time, but perhaps it will come in my children's time —a day which I feel will be hastened by our new distinctive Canadian flag, a flag which will be this parliament's contribution to the future greatness of Canada.

Mr. O. W. Weichel (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker, before speaking on this resolution concerning a distinctive Canadian flag I should first like to mention that on January 23, 1961 I had the privilege of taking part in the formulation of a resolution which was brought forward by the former member for St. Boniface, which asked for a distinctive flag. At that time I mentioned that if a change was necessary we should adopt the flag suggested by His Majesty King George V in 1921. I think that if a referendum or plebiscite were held all people in Canada would have the opportunity of expressing their own personal opinion.

Canadian Flag

The Royal Canadian Legion, dominion command, passed the following resolution in 1958, at which time I stood behind it 100 per cent:

> Be it resolved that this convention requests the federal government to place the selection of a Canadian national flag before the people in the form of a referendum or plebiscite, using > (a) the flag recommended in the majority report of the parliamentary committee of July 1946;
> (b) the flag recommended in the minority report of the same committee.

From time to time, Mr. Speaker, we have had requests concerning a referendum or a plebiscite. The red ensign, which after all is a distinctive flag, to me at any rate, has been my choice since the first great war, at which time I had the honour of serving my country. During the second world war a son of mine did likewise and I now have two sons carrying on this fine tradition in the Scots Fusiliers.

Further on in my remarks I will dwell on the red ensign and explain why I think it should be retained as the national flag of Canada, which is my right as a citizen of this great country. According to this resolution, we as members of this house are asked to decide on a new distinctive flag and in so doing to express our views and those of our constituents. This is not a party political question at all. It is one which concerns the very soul of the nation. It is one upon which every Canadian is entitled to have a say now that the government has insisted that it is an urgent national question. If Canadians are not prepared to act in defence of the symbols of their heritage today, they are inviting destruction of that very heritage tomorrow.

I believe that to ask hon. members to make a decision on behalf of their constituents in this regard is one of the most unfair procedures to which members could be subjected, as we well realize that people are divided on this question. In some areas you may have 60 per cent of the people in favour of the retention of the red ensign, and vice-versa in other areas. In voting on this important question we are really only speaking for those whose opinion may coincide with ours.

It has been suggested that a free vote of members of parliament and senators be allowed. Even with such a vote there would be a natural tendency, human nature being what it is, for government supporters to vote for the government's own design, and it is far from certain that a parliamentary vote on an issue of this nature would accurately reflect the feelings of all the people of Canada. If such a referendum or plebiscite were held the ballot could contain reproductions side by side in full colour of the Canadian red ensign and the flag design sponsored by the government and under each design could be a square in which the voter could record his preference by merely writing an X.

I do not know the exact rules when asking for a referendum or plebiscite, but in regard to choosing a new flag or continuing with the red ensign may I make the suggestion that we should debate this resolution so that every member may have an opportunity to express his views and that after the debate is completed an educational campaign, like the one suggested by the former prime minister, Mr. King, be carried on in order to supply information as to the full meaning and history of the flag to every citizen in Canada, for their study and consideration. When the next election is held a plebiscite could also be included so that people could then vote according to their convictions. In this way we would have the personal opinion of every Canadian.

In an editorial in The Legionary of May, 1964, the following article appeared:

> In a free democratic country, where public opinion is neither regimented nor suppressed, instances occur when people are stirred to the innermost depths of heart and soul. Then it is that government by the people, for the people, is given true effect by a national vote on the issue at stake.

Mr. E. V. Heesaker, dominion president of the Canadian corps association, must have provided the Prime Minister with a lot of food for thought when in a telegram on Tuesday, May 19, 1964, he had this to say:

> Surely the present government's memory is not so poor that it cannot recall April, 1942, when your political party then in power asked the Canadian people through a national plebiscite to relieve them of an election promise of 1940 not to draft men for overseas service. We would respectfully point out, Mr. Prime Minister, that if an election promise by your political party then was reversed by a national plebiscite, why cannot your election promise of 1963 re a new Canadian flag be similarly acted upon?

I would wholeheartedly support such a plebiscite and would abide by whatever decision was reached, as would all Canadians of good will and moderation. As I previously mentioned, how can 265 members of parliament deal fairly with such an important question when voting for over 19 million people? After all, I feel that such a plebiscite is just as important as the one on conscription during the second world war.

The question whether or not Canada should have a new distinctive flag has been a perennial one. It crops up sometimes from the most unexpected sources, which would appear to indicate a serious lack of information concerning the flag itself and the source from which the propaganda originally emanated. Does it stem from citizens loyal to Canada and the crown or from subversive forces who desire to dismember the British commonwealth and break every link that binds together all the units of our great commonwealth of free and equal nations? God forbid. I say this because in the past I spent some time in England and Scotland and I came home thanking God that there were people in Great Britain ever ready to help, wonderful people, people whom I consider among the finest in the world.

Such information should be given to all who raise the question in order that the general public will be able to weigh the various arguments with understanding of the various issues involved and arrive at an intelligent conclusion. Surely we all realize that the Canadian red ensign has gradually grown up with the dominion until today it is the symbol of Canada's place of importance, not only among the great dominions of the commonwealth but among the nations of the world, as a symbol of leadership and prestige. It is a well known fact that people from other countries of the world recognize our Canadian red ensign as Canada's national flag. But are we in Canada too complacent about knowing our own flag? Ask yourselves this question in all sincerity.

Our men and women of the army, air force and navy services have proudly served under it in foreign lands, just as their fathers did before them during the first great war. To them it represented all for which they stood, all for which they were ready and willing to lay down their lives if necessary, and for it many shed their blood.

Have those of you who are ready to discard this fine flag asked yourselves this question? What would the 110,000 men and women who laid down their lives during the first and second great wars say if they were able to come back to this life? What would be their reaction to such a move? I am sure their answer would be: Why do we need a new flag?

Some time ago I read in one of our daily papers that in choosing a new flag we should forget our past. Just imagine someone like myself forgetting my past. What would the answer be from the thousands of disabled veterans, the blind, the amps and paraplegic cases like myself, who have to carry our scars to our graves? Can we forget the past? I ask hon. members that question. I am sure we have carried our scars without complaint but I ask you not to make our load a greater burden.

By common custom the Canadian red ensign has been recognized as a distinctive Canadian flag, and this position was tacitly acknowledged and confirmed by prime minister Mackenzie King, who was born in Kitchener in my riding of Waterloo North and whose former home was redecorated by the former government as a historic place for visitors. We have not forgotten the former prime minister of the Liberal party. No, we have redecorated his home because we wanted to preserve it for historical purposes. He said that only an act of parliament is now required to make it the national flag of Canada, but before the final step is taken there should be an educational campaign, as I mentioned before, to supply information as to the full meaning and history of the flag so that every citizen may be assured that it is the most eminently suitable flag for our use. I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that if the present government had carried out the wishes of the prime minister of that time such a resolution would not be necessary now.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) mentioned something which I have in my speech and should like to repeat. The distinguished commander of the first Canadian army in world war II, General Crerar, recorded an incident of great historical significance to all Canadians when recounting the official welcome to him in August, 1945, by our wartime prime minister Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King. The general wrote in the March, 1963 issue of The Legionary:

> As we moved away from the central entrance of the parlament buildings Mr. King turned sideways in the car and looked upwards to the peace tower where, at the top, the Canadian red ensign waved. He then said, "And that, General, is another problem which your Canadian army has solved for Canada—the matter of our national flag".

When our prime minister of that day made this remark to General Crerar he was, in effect, saying that history produces an acceptable national flag for a people. At a time like this can we overlook statements made by such distinguished Canadians as these men and others?

It is not generally known that in 1921 the Canadian government specifically requested

Canadian Flag

His Majesty King George V to order a new coat of arms for Canada. In response to this request, His Majesty commanded the Royal College of Heralds to design a suitable coat of arms. The coat of arms is in use today, and in accordance with custom, the design of the shield has been displayed on Canada's flag. The Canadian red ensign is the distinctive flag for Canada. It properly shows upon it the union jack, which is the flag of the empire and commonwealth of nations. This proclaims to all the world that Canada is one of the great nations in that group. In a like manner Australia, New Zealand and South Africa also display the union jack in the upper corner of their own national flags. Surely Canada is not ashamed to be in that company. I know that we who fought with their fine men are honoured to share with them anything that will honour our country and theirs.

The emblem of the shield dates back to very ancient times. The couchant lion—or heraldic leopard—came to us from France, and was the emblem on the flag of William of Normandy. Ever since 1066, it has been incorporated in the heraldry of the British kings. The red lion rampant on the golden field is even more ancient, as it was the emblem of the Scottish kings and came to them from ancient Ireland, where it had arrived from the east about 580 B.C. However, it was also the family emblem of Brutus and Trojan, who founded the city of London about 1100 B.C. The harp emblem is equally ancient and was taken into Ireland by the Tuatha de Danain, the Danoi of the ancient Greek writers. The fleur-de-lis of the fourth quarter of the shield is well known as the lily of France, and held a proud place in the arms of the British kings from the time of Henry II down to the time of George III, proclaiming the French ancestry of the sovereigns from the distaff side of the house. Just about the time this emblem was removed from the royal arms, it began to appear in the heraldry of Canada and has been with us ever since.

It should be remembered that it was this emblem, not the tricolour, which came with the French settlers into this country long before the tricolour was used in France. I mention the emblems on the shield because it is my honest belief that not too many Canadians are familiar with these representations on the red ensign. The Canadian red ensign, therefore, symbolizes the main streams of history, with their common Christian heritage, which combined to produce the Canadian nation. Even the colours of the flag, red, white and blue, have a rich meaning. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the red symbolizes the blood of Christ shed for the remission of sins; the white represents the righteousness of the saints, and the blue, loyalty and dedication to service. What else would we want?

[Mr. Weichel.]

The establishment of the Canadian red ensign through history, tradition and custom, was formalized on September 5, 1945, when our Governor General signed an order in council P.C. 5888 which stated that:

> The red ensign with the shield of the coat of arms of Canada in the fly (hereinafter referred to as "The Canadian red ensign") may be flown from buildings owned or occupied by the federal government within or without Canada...and that it shall be appropriate to fly the Canadian red ensign within or without Canada wherever place or occasion may make it desirable to fly a distinctive Canadian flag.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that I have given a very complete explanation of the Canadian red ensign. I hope that the Prime Minister will still give very serious consideration to withdrawing this resolution and giving every Canadian the privilege of voting for the flag of his or her choice. I still feel that such an important decision should not be left up to the members of parliament because, after all, such a vote could cause grave doubts in the minds of a great many citizens as to whether or not it represented the will of the people. These doubts could linger on for years and would remain a serious obstacle to the attainment of national unity.

Here, Mr. Speaker, is probably one of the most important parts of my speech. I say that when the Canadian red ensign design is examined dispassionately, without prejudice or unreasoned emotion, it can be seen that every desire of our multiple religious, racial and cultural background is answered. I realize that this flag is the cause of a great deal of controversy. It is such an important question that controversy, of course, is quite natural. However, when some people criticize the Royal Canadian Legion unfairly and say that organization is trying to run the government or is playing politics then I, as a member of this great organization since its inception, must bitterly protest such charges and statements. The cartoon in the Ottawa Citizen was grossly insulting to any legionnaire and I would say also to the Prime Minister. It is beyond my comprehension why the manager of this respected daily newspaper would allow some thoughtless, brainless guy to carry out such a cartoon. I have the cartoon here with me.

Mr. Winkler: May I ask the hon. member a question? Is he referring to Mr. Christopher Young?

Mr. Weichel: I do not know who the fellow is, but whoever he is I am letting him know what I think of him. This is the picture. I would say it is a terrible insult to every legionnaire, as well as to our Prime Minister. May I ask you, Mr. Speaker, does this contribute to unity in Canada, a picture like this? I should say not.

The Royal Canadian Legion, with its thousands of members, surely has the same right as any Canadian citizen to express an opinion in our democratic way of life. Yes, in case some people forget, let me remind them that these men and women, along with their comrades who paid the supreme sacrifice, carried the banner when our fine country was in need of their services. Let us not forget that. I as a disabled member, along with all members, can truthfully say that this organization has never played politics—

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

[Text]

Mr. Weichel: Mr. Speaker, I would like to go ahead with my speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Villeneuve is rising on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, last night two Conservative members, namely the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) and the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon), claimed that I was reading my speech whereas I was just consulting my notes.

I do not want to be mean but I notice that the hon. member who has the floor at present is reading his speech.

There is a provision in our standing orders which forbids the reading of a speech in the house and it is on that basis, not because the hon. member is a Conservative, that I insist that he speak without reading his text.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. A similar point of order was made yesterday evening and, if I remember well, I pointed out to the hon. member who raised it that no provision of our standing orders forbids the reading of a speech in the house.

[Text]

Mr. Weichel: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any argument there at all. The Prime Minister and many others here have done this too. If I were 20 years younger I would try to do it without reading.

Mr. Herridge: Let him who is without sin cast the first stone.

Mr. Weichel: I might mention again that I, as a disabled member, along with all members can truthfully say that this organization has never played politics and has given no one the impression that it was trying to tell the government what it should do. Their big job has always been to work for the benefit of all the veterans, especially the disabled. Such efforts have been highly recognized by all broadminded Canadians, and I am sure the Legion does not want a pat on the back for doing what it is doing here. Its members, along with other veterans organizations, have done much in keeping Canada's security and unity at a high level.

To those who criticize this great organization in respect of the flag issue, may I bring to their attention the numerous community and international activities engaged in by the Royal Canadian Legion. We can think of the Netherlands pilgrimages, Legion sports for young and old and the conference of British commonwealth ex-service leagues. This group is continually working for the peace of the world, while we are sitting here trying to do our little bit too. It has been working for an increase in pensions for the amputees, the blind and the paraplegics, as well as for thousands of others. It has engaged in service bureau work and runs its poppy campaign, which is perhaps one of the greatest and outstanding efforts of these men in assisting veterans in need. If the government had to take over this work it would cost millions of dollars each year.

Then there is its community service, which should be recognized by all people in certain communities. It has programs ranging from physical fitness for our young people to low rental housing for the old. The Legion and its numerous branches across Canada has been establishing training camps and the success of these ventures, with competent coaches such as Mr. Dyson, has been outstanding. Then we have the junior Olympics, leadership, training, bursaries and—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt my hon. friend but I am sure he will recognize at this point that he is straying considerably from the question at issue, and I suggest he may wish to return to the question which is now under consideration.

Mr. Weichel: Of course, Mr. Speaker, but this all comes from the criticism which the Legion has been receiving regarding the flag. I mention these services only to show the tremendous work which the Royal Canadian Legion is doing and has done for the welfare of thousands of Canadians. Its work, along with that of the war amputees of Canada, army, navy and air force association, Canadian corps association, Royal Canadian Air Force association, the Canadian navy association and others, has been tremendous.

These people who waste their time in order to criticize some of Canada's finest men should hang their heads in shame and thank God that we have men who, in time of need, gave their all for freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, ever ready and willing to make outstanding contributions for the betterment and welfare of our great Canada.

In closing may I say that these men in a democratic way, which is their right, have chosen to support the slogan favouring the royal Canadian ensign, "This is Canada's flag, keep it flying". My conscience tells me to support this solgan because thrice without hesitation our young men have fought under this flag and given their lives, and the best of their lives, for the righteous cause against the narrow nationalism of others. I am supporting the Leader of the Opposition in his amendment regarding the plebiscite.

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening with keen interest to all the contributions this afternoon and I confess I was rather moved by the comments of my hon. friend, the member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey).

As a young man he went to St. Patrick's school in Quebec and I went to the Protestant high school. We were mortal enemies in those days at football, hockey and such things, yet I am amazed in how many ways his views and mine tend now to parallel one another.

I recall that I was brought up next door to a boy two years younger than myself, a boy who was an orphan. His father had been killed serving as a field officer in the British Indian army, and our literary fare was Chums, Boys' Own Annual and the Waverley novels. I used to become irritated by this young fellow, almost to the point of desperation and whenever he was just at the point of getting a thrashing he would look up at me and say, "John, are you British?" He and I knew exactly what he meant because to us, sir, being British meant being generous, being valorous and being kind.

I hope in my comments this afternoon I will be as worthy as those who have preceded me in being just that. We can touch on this subject of flag only in the spirit of chivalry.

I know that in the retirement of the Canadian red ensign some people in this country will exult, and I know that some will weep. For my own part I will be one of those who will be misty eyed, as though witnessing the retirement of a good ship of the line; but I think it would be helpful to review in a very cursory way something of the history of the flags of Canada and particularly the flag which is now characterized as the Canadian red ensign.

I have before me, sir, the Canadian Almanac of 1896 and in it an expert of those days, E. M. Chadwick, wrote an article entitled, "The Canadian Flag". He was a well known geneologist, a Queen's counsel who wrote considerably on armourial matters, and he recommended as the flag of Canada a blue ensign, which some hon. members might care to look at later, which contained in the fly a white roundel charged with three red maple leaves conjoined. On the opposite side of the page—this appears on page 232, there is the badge of the Royal Military College club, which had been in active operation for some years.

Again you have in the arm of the knight the perennial three maple leaves on one stem. This is not just a curious coincidence. I discovered, looking at some of the books on coinage we have in the library, that in the reigns of Victoria, Edward VII, George V, George VI and Elizabeth II coinage was issued in gold, silver and copper bearing the device of the sprig of three maple leaves. This pattern apparently evolved long before any formal attention was paid to it by the college of heralds or any of the authorities. New Brunswick, in 1862, had a five cent piece composed in this fashion. There is a token of 1866 which was used as money in Montreal showing a beaver, and in the beaver's mouth is a sprig of three maple leaves. In short the development of Canadian symbolism referred to by the Prime Minister has had a long history. Indeed, he could have spoken much more extensively with respect to the various patriotic societies in Upper Canada and in Lower Canada—Quebec, as we know it today. The St. Jean Baptiste Society had early adopted this symbolism as its own. So also had the Leinster regiment, the Royal Canadians, and also the native sons. It is natural that since these emblems had become popular over a long period of time they should at last become incorporated in formal grants of arms.

There are some who complain that this business of a new flag is a concession to the French. But the French are part of us. They are part of Canada—part of our family. In my household we have a lot of little people. In a family, every member is loved whether they are big or small, or young or old, and the interest and the anxieties of each member are important. The distress of one, as I see it —and I am trying to speak in the British sense—is the distress of all. Arthur Miller puts it this way. He says: "There are no unimportant tears". I do not think it is a concession to do what is just and what is kind. It is only by caring for one another and being joined together and being firmly rooted in this rich Canadian soil that our maple leaf family can survive.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Matheson: The red ensign, which is referred to as the red duster, is the most common flag in the world. I referred a moment ago to the article appearing in the Canadian Almanac. It would interest hon. members to know that as recently as 1962 Her Majesty's stationery office in England published a broadsheet called "Flags of the Commonwealth". As hon. gentlemen know, in the hierarchy of British flags there is an established precedence. There is the sovereign's standard—her own banner which flies over her residence; in England it would be Buckingham palace or Windsor castle or wherever she might be. Then there is the union flag. Then there is the white ensign of the royal navy. Then there is the blue ensign. Then there is the red peter or red duster, which is for the merchant service. What actually happened was this: in early colonial days on February 2, 1892 by admiralty warrant authority was reluctantly given for a defacement—that is the technical term; I am not being rude—of the red ensign to be used on board vessels registered in the dominion, and there soon followed provision for other colonial representation. As hon. members know, Australia and New Zealand have national flags each of which was adopted in 1901, one year before the peace which brought an end to the South African war. At the present time the commonwealth countries which are authorized to fly the blue peter charged with the badge of their territory as their national flag include Aden Colony, Antigua, Barbados Bahamas, Bermuda, British Guiana, British Honduras, British Solomon Islands, British Virgin Islands, Cayman Islands, Dominica, Falkland Islands, Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, Fiji, Gambia, Gibraltar, Gilbert and Ellice Islands, Grenada, Hong Kong, Kenya, Mauritius, Montserrat, North Borneo, Northern Rhodesia, Nyasaland, St. Christopher-Nevis-Anguilla, St. Helena, St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Sarawak, Seychelles, Southern Rhodesia and Turks and Caicos Islands. This list is taken from the broadsheet to which I referred a few moments ago. Already, in 1964, it is somewhat out of date because changes are taking place fairly rapidly.

Today, the red ensign is, I say, the most common flag in the world. By the provisions of section 73 of the merchant shipping act of 1894, it is the sea flag for all ships and boats belonging to any British subject except Her Majesty. For her own ships, it would be blue; white, if belonging to the royal navy. As of 1961—and again I hesitate to be categoric, because the situation changes—some commonwealth merchant vessels including those of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Cyprus, Somaliland, Western Samoa and Tanganyika territory, and of the British North Borneo Company, may, by admiralty warrant, fly the red ensign with the badge of the dominion, state, protectorate or trust territory in the fly, while all other colonial merchant vessels wear the red ensign free from any badge or distinctive mark. So if you come within hailing distance of the red duster and your telescope isn't working too well you should shout out the question asked of Jonah: "Whence comest thou? What is thy country and of what people art thou?"

I might add that various yacht clubs have permission to fly the red ensign defaced by the badges of their clubs, and, of course, this ensign is the house flag of a number of old British companies such as our Hudson's Bay Company, the one which comes first to mind. In addition to these British variations of the red ensign, there are approximately 48 other ensigns, jacks, national and state flags in the world which have red fields. About 18 of these have a device which occupies the upper left corner of the flag, while 16 others have a badge or device in the fly of the flag.

So, in a real sense, the red ensign is a sea flag which, however hard we may try, could not possibly be appropriated by ourselves, either by the order in council of 1945 or by act of parliament as being the distinctive property of Canada. Our military routine orders of 1944 and order in council of 1945, were taken under the pressure and impetus of war and I do not think they can ever be regarded by reflective people as having effected any change in the traditional status of this flag of the sea. It is said that on one occasion Edward, Prince of Wales was somewhere near Admiralty Arch when he looked over toward Canada House and saw the red ensign. He is reported to have remarked: "I see the flag, but where is the ship?"

If we had followed the advice of a number of experts in Britain and in Canada in the early colonial period we would have ended up with a blue ensign charged with a roundel in the fly containing three red maple leaves and we would have thereby followed the pattern of other colonies such as Australia and New Zealand which established their flags and tended to confirm them in their proper purpose. Let us not overlook that the red ensign flies today in Australia and New Zealand, as well as in many other former colonies, but used correctly as their merchant sea flag.

Turning to consideration of the proposed flag of Canada, the one submitted by the government, I believe our flag must represent our country, our whole country, and nothing but our country. I refer respectfully to an address which was given by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he was the hon. member for Lake Centre, on November 13, 1945. Speaking on a flag resolution, he said:

> In my opinion, any flag which is determined upon must embody two ideas: one, Canada as a nation with a distinctive flag; the other, Canada within the empire.

This view was, I think, tenable once, but it is no longer valid today when we note that 17 members of the commonwealth family by 1962 carried flags bearing no colonial insignia whatsoever. I believe that if this resolution is adopted and steps are taken to produce this flag, Canada will possess a banner of exquisite aesthetic quality already, in Shakespeare's words, "loaden with honour". It is a strange claim to make for a flag that has not yet been unfurled, but may I ask hon. members to listen to me as I give the house a number of instances that I have discovered which embody this precise flag emblem; that is, three maple leaves conjoined on one stem.

This emblem may be found in the arms of Ontario, granted by royal warrant on May 26, 1868. That was the grant by Queen Victoria. Hon. members will recall that in the arms of Ontario there are three gold leaves on a green field. The St. George's cross is an honourable augmentation and refers only to the past. The arms of Quebec, by the same royal warrant, was differenced by having three green leaves on a stem on a gold field. This was the old trick of the heralds of simply reversing metal and tincture to difference members of the same family. This left out one metal, silver—white, the noblest metal—and it left one remaining colour of a leaf in its natural state—red. I think we can only suppose that at an early stage when these achievements were determined for the provinces of Quebec and Ontario it was in the mind of the heraldic advisers at that time that there must be held in reserve for the nation Canada the combination of red leaves on white field.

Then the Great Seal of Canada, by the same royal warrant of 1868 embodies the two sets of three maple leaves of the two key founding provinces. Then we discover the amended crest of Baron Lisgar after he had accepted the appointment of second governor general for Canada. His earlier crest, as I recall, had a lion with a sword in its paw; the sword was struck off this second crest and in its place the lion held a sprig of three maple leaves. Then there is the badge of the Royal Military College club, Kingston to which I have already alluded, and firmly established by 1895. Then there is the Canada general service medal issued in 1899 for service in 1866-1870 in the Fenian raids and the Red river expedition.

Then we have the armorial bearings that were assigned to Sir Wilfrid Laurier by the royal college of heralds after Sir Wilfrid had become prime minister. This was obviously a new coat of arms that was struck for a Canadian prime minister, and he was given the insignia of three maple leaves on one stem on both his shield and his crest. This was apparently following the device given to a governor general several years earlier.

Then there was the crest of the Royal Military College granted by George V on September 16, 1920, the same perennial sprig of maple leaves. We come, I think, at last to the significant and important moment in history when there was heraldically speaking the fixing of the new flag of Canada. I have searched Hansard, but I do not think Canadians have ever really realized how much work was carried out in connection with this matter by the committee established by Sir Robert Borden. At the conclusion of world war I it appears that a great many service people of military rank and experience had come back to Canada feeling that their own military insignia was somewhat deficient and lacked character and stability. Therefore a committee was set up by Sir Robert Borden, composed of Major General Willoughby, G. Gwatkin, who probably was the most knowledgeable man in this area, Thomas Mulvey, under secretary of state, Sir Joseph Pope, under secretary of state for external affairs, and Arthur G. Doughty, dominion archivist. There was also a Colonel Hamilton who helped these gentlemen in the capacity of secretary. These people—I want to point out "these people"—not just the college of heralds, worked at this matter for many months. I have read the correspondence involved and some of the proceedings. They thought this matter out very carefully, and as we look at the centre block of this parliament today and see the beauty of the heraldry there is in this building, in the entrances and porticos and elevator doors we can see the handiwork of a group of people who were looking a long way ahead. I hope Canadians will not think of this flag as being a creation of a government, because I do not think it is; I think it is the most honest search possible for what is distinctly and clearly and uniquely our own.

The arms of Canada were proclaimed by George V on November 21, 1921 at the request of the government headed by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen pursuant to the recommendation of the arms committee set up by Sir Robert Borden's government on March 26, 1919. I ask you to note this, gentlemen, that a flag was flown on Confederation square in Ottawa to celebrate the royal visit of 1939. This flag was flown in a place of honour, and it showed three maple leaves conjoined on a white field. This was immediately prior to the war, and at this time Ottawa had this insignia emblazened up and down its streets. Some hon. members may care to look at the Illustrated London News of May 27, 1939, particularly pages 988 and 989, in this connection.

Then there was the Canadian active service force flag which was adopted by the war cabinet and militia council on December 7, 1939, as the battle flag for the commander, 1st Canadian division, and later presented to George VI. This is referred to, incidentally, in the last edition of "Flags of the World", edited by H. Gresham Carr. It is perhaps rather presumptuous for an author to say this, but he says in this book:

> After due consideration, the writer ventures to suggest that a flag similar to that designed for the Canadian active service force in 1939 might well be adopted as a new national flag.

This book dilates on the fact that our own system of flags has really fallen pretty much into disarray. In that flag there was a union jack in canton. This was included apparently because of the natural tradition and relationship of Canada to Great Britain and the fact that our forces were going to be in the United Kingdom for some period. Also on the flag, and to the right were the three traditional fleur-de-lis, which incidentally are also part of all British heraldry but the basic flag was three red maple leaves conjoined on a white field. Respecting the fleur-de-lis I think that having burned the Maid of Orleans in the 15th century and having discovered that she was such a saintly creature, the British thereafter did everything they could to appropriate her symbolism as their own.

Then there is the officers' hat badge of the Canadian Women's Army Corps, 1942; the Canadian Infantry Corps cap and collar badge, 1943-1951; the badge of No. 5 initial training school, R.C.A.F., 1943; the badge of H.M.C.S. Donnacona, being the naval division, Montreal. Then there is the Canada Medal, 1943. That had three maple leaves on one stem. There is the badge of the famous 405 R.C.A.F. fighter squadron, adopted in 1946; the ship's badge of H.M.C.S. La Hulloise, a frigate; the war service lapel button for military service during 1939-1945, adopted in 1946; the cap and collar badges of army officers on the general list below lieutenant-colonel, 1946; the Canadian Army badge, which I have been told was actually chosen by George VI himself in 1947. That badge consists of three maple leaves, two crossed swords and the crown. Then there is the Canadian forces decoration. A good many hon. members of the opposition who are not happy about this emblem that is being suggested wear the Canadian forces decoration.

Mr. Churchill: We like the emblem, but not as a flag.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for his intervention. I respect the hon. gentleman; he is not only decorated but is a veteran of two wars. However, I would point out to him that flags are a specialized form of heraldry and when we are discussing flags and heraldry it is really the same subject. Unless a flag in some respects conforms to tradition, we might as well follow, if you like, the republican ideas of some people and break with the past. For my part, I hope that will not happen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Matheson: If my hon. friend would look at the Canadian forces decoration when he goes home tonight he will notice that it is a very beautiful medal, one of the finest we have ever struck. He will notice the three maple leaves conjoined on one side and a portrait of Elizabeth on the other. Then there is the Prince Edward Island regiment's cap and collar badges and button adopted in 1950; the Canadian general senior cap and collar badges and button adopted between 1955 and 1961; the revised emblazon—to answer the comments of the last speaker—of the arms of Canada as announced by the Hon. Ellen Fairclough, secretary of state, on October 8, 1957. I think it would be worth while if hon. gentlemen would take the trouble to read that announcement. Then we find the Canadian Guards cap badge and buttons of 1947. The button has the three maple leaves and around it the motto "A mari usque ad mare". The cap badge has three red maple leaves conjoined on a white field. The other evening the Prime Minister mentioned the beautiful illuminated version of the Canadian Bill of Rights of August 10, 1960, signed by the then prime minister, now the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. It displays not only the full armourial achievement, but under the styling the three red maple leaves conjoined just as they appear on the proposed flag, the same three red maple leaves as they appear on the history of world war II, the three volume edition of "Canadians Serving Overseas".

Then—and this is a pretty compelling argument, to me at least—on Her Majesty's personal royal banner as Queen of Canada there is featured the three red maple leaves on a white field, and this was created by Her Majesty on August 15, 1962. Actually the 1/42nd or the 1/48th part—depending on how you measure it—of the Canadian red ensign is the three red maple leaves on one stem. This incidentally is the only part of the ensign alluding to Canada.

Certain hon. gentlemen have suggested that we are dishonouring the past by trying to support this kind of recommendation. I would ask them as they leave the chamber at six o'clock tonight to go over to this rather famous statue of Sir John A. Macdonald to the east of the Senate entrance where they will find below the statue the emblazoning of the great seal of Canada in which this device appears in the position of honour twice. I would ask them also to examine question No. 1,449 asked of the former government, when under date of February 5, 1963 I was advised by a Conservative ministry that our national emblem was three maple leaves conjoined on one stem with the colours red and white, and this by royal proclamation.

Mr. Churchill: What royal proclamation is this?

Mr. Matheson: The royal proclamation was the proclamation to which I referred of November 21, 1921. This is really the juridical foundation of Canada's symbolism. There are two dates of very considerable consequence in our heraldry. There are the royal warrants of Victoria of 1868. Then we jump to the royal proclamation of 1921. But before 1868 and after 1921 there were many steps taken by military and civil authorities and by the college of heralds tending to confirm us in our use of symbolic devices.

Mr. Churchill: I do not like to interrupt, but the hon. member's speech is very informative, and I do this with the best of motives. In the royal proclamation of November 21, 1921, what colour was assigned to the maple leaves? Second, are the colours red and white designated therein as the colours for Canada?

Mr. Matheson: No. I thank the hon. gentleman for this useful and helpful intervention. I should have touched on this because it was referred to by the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Weichel). The colours which were assigned to Canada in the proclamation of November 21, 1921 were the colours white and red. These were set out in two places, the wreath of the liveries and again in the mantelling. The shield itself consists of actually five components. At the top there are the quarterings, which are the Plantagenet lions of England—the lion rampant of Scotland, the harp of Ireland and fleur-de-lis of France, which I am happy this committee was wise enough to bring back into our heraldry, because it has been lost since the battle of Culloden, when both protagonists used the fleur-de-lis as part of their standards, both the Hanoverians and the Jacobites. This was brought back with great pride by the authorities in England. In the base, the position of honour or distinction for Canada, were three maple leaves on a white field. Those maple leaves were painted green. The wording of the grant used the words proper, which in their heraldic sense mean "in their natural state". We are told that in its natural state a maple leaf could be green, gold or red.

With regard to green maple leaves on a white field, perhaps my hon. friend as a privy councillor has had that kind of shield in his office in the past. This shield was depicted in many of the earlier exemplifications as being green. Actually they can be found in the ceiling of the Senate chamber. But this was corrected in 1957. At that time I believe my hon. friend was a member of the government, and this was corrected in an announcement by Hon. Ellen Fairclough. This satisfied a lot of experts in this field who had been very much distressed that our arms did not conform, for instance, with the grant of the Canadian army badge, which was granted by King George VI in 1947. You will recall that the 1st division adopted a flag of three red leaves on white in 1939. It appeared clear to all those who were devotees of the heraldic arts that the pattern had to be white and red. You see this in the colours of the Royal Military College of course. You see them in the early medal ribbons to which I have referred of the 1899 period.

Mr. Churchill: Are the words actually in the proclamation though?

Mr. Matheson: The colours are set out as white and red. Perhaps my hon. friend would permit me to send him a copy of the material, because he might care to go into the corrections which were effected by Hon. Ellen Fairclough in her announcement. This was confirmed by the subsequent act of Her Majesty in her exemplification of her royal banner, which I have examined at the College of Arms in England and which has three red maple leaves on a white field in base. This was done in 1962, whether or not as a result of consultation with his government I do not know. I think it would simply be done on the basis of the heraldic instructions which had been received as a result of the royal proclamation.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business, as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions and public bills.

Expansion of Social Security

SOCIAL SECURITY

SUGGESTED EXPANSION OF LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give immediate consideration, in consultation with the provinces, to the advisability of filling the major gaps in this country's social security program, including medicare, the provision of income maintenance during illness, pensions for widows dependant children, adequate survivors' benefits, and retirement pensions, when necessary, at sixty years of age, as well as to the advisability of improving legislation already in effect, so that Canada's social security system might be as complete and comprehensive as this country's economy now makes possible.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is an interesting coincidence that at five o'clock on each of the days thus far that we have been debating a national flag for Canada, an item under private members' business regarding some measure of social security has come up for debate. On Monday we had a resolution having to do with the Disabled Persons Act. Yesterday we had a bill relating to the war veterans of world war I. Today we have this resolution of mine calling for some very definite steps forward in the whole field of social security.

In connection with the debate on the flag we are thinking about this country's future. Frequent references are made to getting ready for an adequate celebration of our 100th birthday three years from now. It seems to me that the terms of this resolution suggest a very specific and concrete way in which we might really try to grow up as a nation by the time we are 100 years old. I hope that whatever else we may do to celebrate our centenary we will make every effort to strengthen and improve our social security system so that it will be as complete and comprehensive as this country's economy now makes possible.

Mr. Basford: We will.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I have often made speeches in various parts of the country concerning the progress we have made in Canada in the field of social security, and it is one of the facts of our history that we have made some progress.

Mr. Basford: Under a Liberal government.

Mr. Knowles: Hon. members will not be surprised if I say to them that I have indicated with some pride the part that our predecessors, speaking for this party, and that some of us in this party, have played in prodding whatever government has been in power to put social security legislation on the statute books. This country will never forget, and indeed it never should forget, the debt that it owes to my predecessor, the former member for Winnipeg North Centre, the late J. S. Woodsworth, for the part he played nearly 40 years ago in prodding the government of that day to place upon the statute books our first old age pension act. But, Mr. Speaker, even after we catalogue the things we have on our statute books that come under the heading of social security legislation, such as old age pensions, family allowances, pensions for the blind, pensions for the disabled, unemployment insurance, benefits of various kinds for our veterans—

Mr. Basford: All Liberal measures.

Mr. Knowles: —I want to say quite frankly that I do not think we really have very much to boast about. In terms of the affluence of our society, in terms of the amount of wealth we are capable of producing, in terms of what we can make available for certain kinds of projects, the speed with which we can raise money for war, if necessary, the way we can raise money for other projects—in the light of all that I submit we are really not doing very well in this terribly important human field, the field of social security. I urge very strongly, if we are concerned about our image as a nation in the eyes of the world, if we are concerned about having a country over which we can proudly fly whatever flag we choose, that we pay very serious attention to filling the gaps in our social security program and to improving the pieces of legislation we already have on the statute books.

In the resolution itself I refer specifically to some of the gaps. The first one I mention is medicare. It is only a couple of years ago, of course, that this was a very warm subject in one of the provinces of this country. Some people thought that the government of that province was away ahead of its time in what it was endeavouring to put on the statute books of that province, but in a matter of months medicare became a part of the platform of most of the political parties of this country. I suggest that we really will not be a civilized country, we will really not be showing concern for the country and for the human beings who make up our country, until we have a program of medicare for all citizens of this country. Just as it took participation by the federal government along with the provinces to get hospitalization on a nation-wide basis, so it will take participation by the federal government in a program of medicare if we are to get legislation of this kind for all our people.

Another gap that we must soon try to fill is that of providing income maintenance to persons who are unemployed because of illness. This has long been one of the main weaknesses in our unemployment insurance legislation, namely that when people are unemployed because of illness there is no unemployment insurance benefit for them. Oh, we improved the act a few years ago in one slight respect. We now provide that if a person becomes unemployed because there is no job for him, is healthy at the time, starts drawing his unemployment insurance benefits and later becomes ill, he can continue to draw his unemployment insurance benefits. But for those who are unable to go to work because of illness there is no general program for the maintenance of income. This is a very serious gap in our social security legislation.

The next two references in my resolution are to widows with dependant children and survivors generally. I welcome the fact that tomorrow we shall be considering the proposed amendment to the British North America Act, otherwise known as the constitution of Canada, under which we hope to be able to bring in the revised version of the Canada pension plan which will include, as we now understand it, provisions for widows of certain ages and widows with dependant children. This is good. We are glad to know we are moving in this direction. But even after we enact the proposals that have been placed before us in certain documents that have been laid on the table I suggest we will still have a long way to go.

Then there is the whole question of the age at which pensions are payable. At the moment the only age at which one can get an old age pension with no means test is 70. Under the new Canada pension plan it will be possible to get a pension at age 65 but for a great many people, particularly for women but also for many men, the fact remains that there are times when that pension is needed at age 60. I think we are going to have to consider this whole question in these terms. This is one of the areas that I feel should be receiving close attention. This is one of the gaps that needs to be filled.

Our unemployment insurance legislation needs to be overhauled. We have been assured that this is being considered, but like some other things under this slow moving government we have, we seem to have to wait and wait and wait.

One of the phrases or slogans, Mr. Speaker, that is current these days is an interesting one, "The war on poverty". President Johnson of the United States has declared such a war on poverty in his country. It is a slogan, as I say, that many speakers both in and out of politics are using these days. It is a good phrase; it is capturing our imagination. It is my contention that we should do something about it, and that the place to begin a war on poverty is by filling in the gap in our social security legislation, by improving the social and economic position of those people who are suffering from the effects of poverty.

Most members are aware of the book that Michael Harrington wrote, entitled "The Other America", in which he pointed out the existence of poverty in that country. I have in my hand a pamphlet by Dwight Macdonald entitled, "Our Invisible Poor", which is more or less a summary of what Mr. Harrington set out in his book. Mr. Macdonald points out that it is Mr. Harrington's estimate that between 40 and 50 million people in the United States or about one quarter of the population of that country are now living in poverty. If that is the case in the United States, since in most respects the figures for Canada run about 10 per cent of those for the United States, it would follow that there could be between four million and five million Canadians who are living in poverty as defined by people like Michael Harrington and Dwight Macdonald, a definition which is accepted by President Johnson and by others.

Not long ago there appeared an interesting article in the Toronto Daily Star. It appeared in the issue of that paper dated Saturday, March 14, 1964. This article was entitled, "Canada: 3,000,000 Poor". The author is Dr. Albert Rose. I should like to read a few sentences from the paragraph preceding this article:

> How many poor people are there in Canada? One of the most respected social scientists in Canada, Dr. Albert Rose, professor of social work at the University of Toronto, said recently there may be 3,000,000 Canadians—as many as one out of six—who can't afford a minimum adequate standard of living.

Then, there follows the article by Dr. Rose. It is interesting that when he sets out the categories under which one finds these people who make up his estimate of three million poor Canadians, these are the categories: The unemployed, the disabled, widows or deserted mothers with dependant children, unmarried mothers with dependant children, children in the care of children's aid societies or institutions, blind persons and aged persons. This is a very interesting article which I commend to members generally. I should like to read just one paragraph:

> As yet in Canada, there has not been sufficient research to document the extent of poverty more clearly. A reasonable estimate might be that the "self-supporting poor" are at least twice as numerous as the group in dire poverty, at least 2,000,000 persons. Canada's "poor" population, then, may number a total of 3,000,000, as many as one in six persons.

This is a rather sad picture, Mr. Speaker, and it is significant we are called upon to face that fact for this hour during a day when we are debating the kind of flag we want to fly over our country. The other day my leader said that what was very important was the kind of country over which the flag would fly. It is not a very happy thought that any flag would fly over a country such as Canada in 1964 in which an outstanding social scientist could say there are three million poor, perhaps more. I urge that we make an attack on this problem of poverty at the point where poverty exists. We can do it by overhauling our social security legislation, by regarding this as a task that cannot wait. We are in an affluent society in some respects. The capacity for producing wealth is great. We have automation and we have cybernation.

There was an interesting suggestion made in Charlottetown the other day by David M. Winch, assistant professor of economics at the University of Alberta, when discussing the possible impact of automation on the economy. He said that perhaps the time has come to provide a minimum allowance for everyone to spread the income amongst all our people. The idea is gradually gaining some currency that the day will come when we may have to pay people for doing no work at all because the machines will have taken the work away from us. We may be paying people and encouraging them, in every possible way, to live in cultural ways and play their part in helping others.

The social legislation we have put on our statute books does record the progress we have made in 50 or 60 years, but compared with the needs of our people, compared with our capacity, we have only begun. To put some meaning into the whole effort to produce the kind of social security legislation which would make us proud, we have to do a good deal more than we have up until the present time. Therefore, I present this resolution to the house and hope the house may see fit to let it come to a vote in this hour. I urge that this house approve of the proposition. If we are going to adopt a flag to fly over our country, let us have a country in which we have done everything we can for our people. We can do it if we will try to improve our social security legislation as I have suggested in this resolution.

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it was very interesting to listen to the comments of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and particularly interesting to hear him refer to Mr. Harrington's book, "The Other America", or poverty in the United States. He mentioned that one of the ways of combating poverty was to overhaul our social security system.

I believe I can point out that the activities this government has undertaken in the last year have gone a considerable distance in this direction. The hon. member said something about a slow moving government, but when you consider what we have done in this period of a little over a year, perhaps the Canadian people will not think the government has been as slow as all that.

Mr. Knowles: I am all ears.

Mr. Munro: That is fine; I believe that, although the hon. member's speeches have been helpful on many occasions, it cannot be said the hon. member is any more innocent of contributing to delays in furthering legislation during the last year than any other hon. member in this house.

There was one thing in Mr. Harrington's book that the hon. member did not mention and which was his basic thesis, as I understood it after reading the book. It is true he said that social security in the United States had to be revised in order to get down to the economic underworld of the United States, as he termed it, but he also put tremendous emphasis on education.

The hon. member referred to the fact that in the United States, progressively with automation and the wealth and affluence of that society, fewer and fewer people would be indulging in extensive work and undertaking the hours of work which they do now. This is quite true and it is only through education that the problem can be coped with. Mr. Harrington pointed out that the United States primarily has to examine itself and its affluence to determine what share of that wealth must be directed towards educating its people, so that those people who, from generation to generation are becoming more enmeshed in the economic underworld and have no opportunity of breaking through, can be assisted. He stated that this can only be done by the federal government primarily undertaking a very extensive program of educating these masses, some 30 million to 50 million people, and further that this would require tremendous expenditures by the federal government.

Therefore overhauling the social security system is only one area that has to be tackled. I do not think it was ever suggested that overhauling the social security system in the United States would anywhere near cope with the real problem. If people do have more leisure time it is all right for those who have jobs, but for the people who have no work at all, he questions very seriously whether an overhaul of the social security system is going to do very much good unless it is accompanied hand in hand with a whole new outlook by the federal government towards education. I am talking not of academic or classical education but primarily of technical education.

I do not think social security should be regarded as all important in tackling this problem, especially in view of some of the gaps in social security programs which have been filled over the last year or so. In saying that, I do not mean at all to de-emphasize some of the gaps which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) pointed out, but I think a review of some of the things that have been done should be put on the record.

1. In the past year we have increased the amount of old age security. I am not suggesting that the government takes sole credit for this. Without the help of other groups in the house it could not have been passed, but it has been done. The amount has been increased by $10 a month for those people over 70 years, and this is certainly an improvement.

2. Blind persons allowances have also been increased by $10 a month.

[Translation]

Mr. Boutin: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

[Text]

Mr. Munro: Would you repeat that, please?

[Translation]

Mr. Boutin: The hon. member has just stated that his party has increased old age security benefits by $10 a month. Does he not think that in doing so, the government worked against the other classes of society, since it raised personal income tax by 1 per cent to help the aged? It imposed a burden on those workers who must pay for such assistance.

[Text]

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question I would suggest that the funds necessary to pay this have to come from taxes in some form or another. There can be a great argument on economic grounds as to which is the most equitable way to raise these funds, and I think we must take into account that an increase in corporation taxes was levied in order to pay for old age security benefits. I do not know whether the hon. member has taken that into account.

In a period of little over a year we have increased the amount of old age security, and raised blind persons allowances.

3. We have increased disabled pensions by $10 a month.

4. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to the Canada pension plan. With the implementation of this plan some of the most serious gaps are going to be filled, and I would point out to the house that the constitutional amendment necessary for the Canada pension plan will be brought before us tomorrow.

5. To a considerable extent this plan will help the widows with dependant children. and the orphans to which the hon. member referred.

6. I hope and understand it will also make some allowance for the hardship imposed by funeral costs, which many people find very onerous.

7. Further, the government has indicated it regards as a priority measure, and hopes to deal with it in this session, the extension of family allowances, which to some extent will contribute to the over-all cure that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did not mention, but which is referred to in Harrington's book. This will at least give some encouragement to those of our children who want to go on to higher education.

8. There is also the question of interest free loans, which generally falls within this area, interest free loans for students who wish to acquire a higher education. Some of these measures I have mentioned have already been implemented. Others are regarded by the government as priority legislation for consideration at this session, and taken together they go a long way towards filling many of the gaps.

9. The hon. member mentioned, so far as welfare legislation is concerned, that pensions under the Canada pension plan will now be available at 65 years. This in itself goes a long way to fill in what undeniably is a serious gap. Therefore I think that the government and all the parties that have helped to pass this legislation can take some considerable pride in these measures.

10. Another point to which the hon. member referred was what he termed medicare. It is true that the Liberal party had health care in its program, and this will go a long way to alleviate the hardship of those Canadians who, because of low incomes or unemployment, cannot afford proper medical attention. This is part of our program which will be implemented. We are committed to implementing it.

Mr. Knowles: When?

Mr. Munro: The hon. member has been told that in answer to several questions. He knows about the royal commission on health services, and it would be foolish for the government not to await the findings of that commission and make an extensive study of them before bringing in proposals with respect to health care.

Mr. Knowles: That was the answer a year ago.

Mr. Munro: Then that must have been about the first question which the hon. member put to us when we assumed office. The commission was considering its report then. Is the hon. member suggesting that we should go ahead and bring in a detailed plan without taking into account the tremendous research that has been done by this royal commission? Surely he is not suggesting that? Surely it is sensible to study this report to find out how the recommendations which seem to be most feasible can be implemented? We are told that the time is not far off when this report will be made available, and we look forward to receiving it.

I would think that in the normal life of a parliament—and sooner if at all possible—if a medicare program can be brought down then it, taken in conjunction with the proposals already implemented by this parliament, and in conjunction with those which the government indicates it considers as priorities, will fill many of the gaps in our social security system.

There are other areas that should be taken into account in such a review. There is our hospital legislation, and our veterans allowance legislation is currently under review. In that respect I suggest that we in the Liberal party cannot relax our efforts in furthering social welfare legislation. We do not deny that we need the help and assistance of those in other parties in this house who have advocated these measures for so long, but it would be a mistake to think that the true and sole concern for many of these people rests in any one group. I think this party has indicated its sincere concern for these people, and the government has a record of showing this concern. It has proved its concern, as the legislative records of this country will show.

There is one other area of activity with which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will, I am sure, be familiar. I refer to the various welfare conferences which have been held under the direction of my hon. friend and colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) since this government took office. All the deputy ministers of welfare met here in Ottawa on February 14 and 15 and the meeting reconvened on May 28 and 29. Many proposals for an extensive review of our social security programs were considered at these meetings. These proposals are now receiving intensive study not only by the federal government but at provincial level. These arrangements are, of course, based on the acknowledgement that the provincial governments have extensive jurisdiction in this field and must be consulted. Thus, to say that we are slow in moving in this area is a harsh judgment indeed. We all know that in dealing with problems which go to the heart of the federal-provincial relationship, a number of meetings must be held before agreement can be established. One is dealing with various points of view which must, inevitably, be expressed by representatives of ten different provinces, and these things just cannot be done overnight. I think we can all be thoroughly satisfied, in the light of the conferences which have been held to date, that a sincere effort has been made to arrive at a consensus expressed by all the provinces, which consensus is necessary before proceeding with a review of our social security arrangements so as to fill some of the gaps to which the hon. member has called our attention.

I will not continue any further. I would simply place on record, again, the fact that this government is carrying on the very activities which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is recommending in his resolution.

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the parliamentary secretary were not too encouraging. In my opinion, they were lacking in precision. The resolution introduced by the hon. member on my left is very important.

We would have liked to know from the government at what time the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) will announce to the house the convening of a federal-provincial conference to consider as soon as possible which steps should be taken for a complete overhaul of our social security program in order that part of the medical costs be paid jointly by the governments and that the latter increase the pension paid to widows with dependant children.

What is it waiting for to grant a pension to citizens 60 years of age? We would have liked the representative of the Minister of the National Health and Welfare to tell us what exactly the government proposes to do. It is very fine to speak of former action taken by the various governments in power, but it does not fill the present gaps in the social security field.

Mr. Speaker, Canada is, with the United States, one of the countries with the highest standard of living. We have the means and revenue to fill those gaps and rectify the unfair deal to the widows and people of 60 or more, who are not getting any pension now. The government spends fabulous sums for maintaining a Canadian force in Cyprus—and I am not against it—but, if we have the means to meet the whole cost of maintaining our troops in Cyprus, without its being defrayed by the United Nations as a whole, we also have enough revenue to pay those medical expenses.

I wonder why the government does not, as soon as possible, introduce some legislation providing at least a pension for the people of 60 and over. At this time, with automation, with our young people who have a trade, everybody knows that it is impossible for any Canadian citizen to find work after the age of 45. We have, in our statutes, no legislation to force private enterprise to give employment to people of 45 and over, as is the case in New York state.

With regard to this matter, I think that the government imposes some restrictions with regard to the penitentiaries under federal jurisdiction by refusing employment to people over 45 years of age. Now, I think it is disgraceful to act like that.

We should see to it that our pension system is revised as soon as possible, even at this session, in order that persons who are 60 years old may receive their pension.

Mr. Speaker, I also think that medical expenses should be paid, partly, by the government. And our citizens should assume their responsibilities and part of the medical expenses, even if it is only a small amount, should be paid by the person being treated, so that it cannot be said that the government is paying for everything, is giving everything free, for we all know that nothing is free, and so that nobody can say: we do not have to pay. We know that whenever something is free, the poorer classes always pay through direct or indirect taxes.

Mr. Speaker, the social legislation put in our statute books by the various governments is fine but it does not go far enough and it would seem that our democracy is afraid to cross the threshold and adopt a measure providing for pensions at age 60. All hon. members say that each week end people come to ask their recommendation for a job. It is impossible to find employment for persons of 45 and over, even if they have a trade. In my opinion, it is the duty of the government to protect that class of citizens, to bring in legislation to correct such an injustice and to provide for the payment of a pension for all Canadians who have reached the age of 60.

Mr. Jean-Louis Frenette (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I consider as a striking coincidence the fact that we should be considering this resolution right after this afternoon's debate on the adoption of a distinctive national flag. This reminds me of a remark one of my fellow citizens made to me last week. He seemed to feel that th government and the members of parliament were giving too much consideration to the adoption of a national flag and none at all to the improvement of the lot of the destitute and the needy.

We are all agreed with the hon. member who presented this notice of motion that it is absolutely necessary, and it is becoming more and more urgent, to revise completely our policy in regard to social security legislation.

We are noticing every day how some of our citizens are ill provided for, how they lack financial resources for various reasons and, unfortunately, they are still ignored by those who have the responsibility of legislating to bring relief to the misery of others.

The notice of motion covers, of course, a very large field and we could very well stray far away from social security measures, but I think we will shortly have the opportunity of considering fully a measure which will permit us to make some suggestions as to the best means to improve our social legislation. As a matter of fact, we are told that a motion will be introduced tomorrow to amend the Canadian constitution in a way which as we hope, will allow setting up a pension scheme beneficial to all Canadian citizens.

Mr. Speaker, we agree to discuss this item of social legislation, and it is no secret for anybody that the political group to which I belong has, since its inception I would say, vigorously advocated some improvement in our social legislation, more particularly with regard to the welfare of our older citizens, of those who have gone before us and made Canada the pleasant place we live in today.

For a long time, Social Credit has thought about improving the lot of those people and, at this stage, I would like to read a quotation to prove my argument. It is an excerpt from a manifesto of the Canadian Social Credit organization in the 1962 election. This is what it says:

> Social Credit believes that Canadians owe to their older citizens a better deal than the one they get today. Those people have built this country, working much more for less than any salary paid today. Moreover, those who have taken what, in their day, seemed to be a reasonable care of their old age, have been shamelessly robbed by price inflation. Canadians owe them a compensation for what the devaluation of the dollar robbed them of.
> In 1931, a worker was earning $1,100 a year, and an insurance policy of $5,000 meant a considerable amount of savings. Today, those $5,000 are hardly worth more than $2,650 and the income earned by any worker for 4½ years now represents his average salary for less than nine months.
> Older citizens in Canada have another cause for worry: the high cost of medical services and medicine at present is often beyond their means, yet they know that they will need them more and more in their later years.
> Even the monthly $75 pension granted like all the increased pensions, during an election year, is evidently inadequate to provide even a simple standard of living to those who, through hard work, have built the country that permits us to make a living today, and that gives us good earnings—provided you are employed—for much less work than in bygone days.

Canada could also afford to pay a pension to people aged 65 years or more who do not work full time, and to grant them medical care. The aims of Social Credit, as concerns assistance to the aged, would be:

1. An insurance plan for medical care paid by the government to any person over 65 years of age.
2. The qualifying age for old age pension would be lowered to 65 years for all those whose yearly income is below the income tax exemption level.
3. The pension rate for aged people would be increased.

Mr. Speaker, this proves to hon. members that our group has always been concerned with social legislation.

Also, as the hon. member said in his notice of motion, amendments should be provided in the legislation granting a pension to disabled persons or to others affected by some ailment and condemned to remain inactive.

Here, I would like to recall, in a few words, an intervention, which I found particularly clever, from the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière (Mr. Paul) on Monday last, when he said, as mentioned on page 4317 of Hansard:

Mr. Speaker, I feel the government should make the necessary changes to broaden the scope of the act or to make its benefits more readily available because, as I said a while ago, it often happens that a person who suffers from diabetes, asthma or heart trouble cannot qualify for a pension under the Disabled Persons Act.

Mr. Speaker, it seems that this matter of amending our social legislation meets with unanimous approval, and I am a little disappointed—not that I want to blame anyone —to see the small number of members in the house to discuss as important a matter as the one which is now under consideration. I am often absent myself, but I sincerely believe that if all hon. members wanted to make the effort, they could take more interest in the study of such matters. Then they would be more justified, during election campaigns, to talk at length about that matter and even to use in a most deplorable demagogic manner other people's miseries.

Mr. Speaker, we are lucky to live in such a rich country as Canada and I think that it would be an insult to the Creator and to Providence if we were unable to organize in order to take advantage of the many resources which were given to us.

I have here a comparative table of the salaries paid to workmen in various countries of the world. I know that this comparison is somewhat unsatisfactory, but I think that the salary level nevertheless gives a rather accurate idea of the standards of living which exist in those various countries. I see that Canada is second, with an average salary of $1.89 an hour; this brings me to make a comparison with some measures of social security now in effect in other countries much less favoured than ours. Like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I feel that it is urgent to act, instead of just talking and using the question for political purposes.

A few weeks ago, the Gospel reminded us of the parable of the lost sheep, in which we see that the good shepherd, when he realizes that one of his sheep is missing, must leave the others to go and look for the one which needs his care.

That parable, I think, could inspire those who are governing us and remind them that it is not really the people who have everything from the point of view of wealth and security that they should be worried about, but those who are in want, although not necessarily poverty striken, and who are quite unable to meet the requirements imposed upon them by their responsibilities.

We should help the poor and the needy a great deal more. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) referred a while ago to the figure of about $3 million. In my opinion, that is an eloquent figure which deserves our attention in view of its importance.

A while ago, the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Boutin) asked the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) if he was taking into account the increase in income tax compared with the increase in old age pensions, the pensions to the blind and others. I noted that the hon. member did not try too hard to give a better answer than was necessary. This leads me to ask the following question: If the Canadian parliament were not called upon to pay today, merely in interest, an amount of a billion dollars a year, would it not be easier then to establish social welfare legislation which would protect our fellow citizens from difficulties.

I conclude my remarks by leaving this thought to hon. members' meditation. Let us try to find a means to eliminate this huge interest of approximately a billion dollars and then distribute this same amount, according to need, to those who are now living in insecurity and poverty.

I hope earnestly that this notice of motion will come to a vote, so that we can be aware of those who really want to ensure the welfare of their fellow citizens and who have a real sense of responsibility as the people's representatives.

Mr. Pierre-André Boutin (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, of the five minutes remaining for the discussion of this notice of motion, I shall take only three, so that in the last two minutes, we may bring to a vote the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

For many years, Social Credit has been advocating the principle contained in this motion. As a matter of fact, it says that consideration should be given to reducing the age of old age pensioners to 60. I feel that legislation to this end could be enacted by the present government even this year, if it introduced a measure designed to pay old age pensions as from 60 years of age.

However, in order to ensure the security of a certain class of society we should not, as a result, increase the insecurity of other classes of society in this country. This is somewhat related to the question I directed earlier to the parliamentary secretary to the minister, namely that if the old age security pension is increased, the government by the same token, and we had that evidence not very long ago, increases the insecurity of another class of society, since in the same piece of legislation a 1 per cent increase in the personal income tax was also introduced.

With the present system, I wonder where all this will lead us to if, in order to get elected, political parties advocate a further increase in social security.

Under the present system, we know, and the Liberal party has proved it, that by increasing security, insecurity becomes greater by the same token.

Would it not be more advisable for the government to consider looking elsewhere to obtain the necessary funds to pay for that security.

As the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Frenette) said earlier, if only the interest paid on the national debt were used and made available to the Canadian people to pay social security, we would then have enough funds to increase and even double family allowances throughout Canada.

We are not asking the government to double family allowances, but to distribute the amount we pay in interest on the debt of Canada on security measures for all Canadian citizens. And this somewhat follows the proposal made by the hon. member who introduced this motion, that is, the advisability of improving legislation already in effect. In order to improve our social security legislation according to the economy of the country—surely, resources are not lacking in Canada—all we have to know is how to organize our economy in order to develop those resources so that every Canadian can be given more security.

Here, I would point out that the federal government raised the old age pension by $10 last fall, but surely, it is not the old people in the province of Quebec who benefited from that, because Mr. Lesage, with his regime of grandeur, managed to cut by $10 a certain security given to the aged. Therefore, they are still getting the same amount of $75 they were receiving before the $10 increase given by the federal government.

I leave the last two minutes to the house so that we can take the vote.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in the little time which remains I should like to say a few words on the motion. Just over 20 years ago the late Lord Beveridge published a report on social insurance and allied services. At that time he put forward a minimum standard of security, and I know that the hon. member who has introduced this motion has worked carefully towards this since that time. But there has been a shift in our thinking and in our objectives in our approach to the problem. The terms of the motion provide a major income maintenance program, such as pensions for widows with dependant children, survivors benefits, retirement pensions, etc. This is a requirement of a major attack on poverty. That is the inference which I draw from the remarks of the hon. member, which were at a very high level. There was no reference to meeting the problems of constitutional adjustment or negotiation with the provinces, although there is reference to it in the resolution.

The problem of a government which is responsible for the implementation of legislation is one of priority. I have listened in this house, Mr. Speaker, to priorities which have been urged by the hon. member. On one occasion it is t.b. and mental institutions. On another occasion it is the improvement of disability programs. On another occasion it is the problem of housing. All of these are highly desirable, Mr. Speaker. But the government of the day have certain basic objectives in mind. The first and foremost objective is a high level of employment, productivity and income. The second objective is a national measure of the distribution of the results of the productivity of the economy. This calls to mind the unfortunate fact that to do this we have to raise taxes, and the level of taxation and the means of raising more taxes suggests that these priorities have to be followed, and everything cannot be done at once.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Might I ask the acting house leader what is the business for tomorrow and Friday, and if he can forecast the business for Monday as well it would be helpful.

Mr. MacNaught: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will be considering the address in relation to the constitutional amendment. When that is finished, whatever time remains this week will be taken up with the debate going on prior to five o'clock. On Monday we will be, as far as I know at this moment, continuing with the flag debate.

Mr. Knowles: Unless it is carried before that.

Mr. MacNaught: I hope so. I hope I will be mistaken.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX "A"

REPORT BY EXTERNAL AFFAIRS MINISTER ON GENEVA TRADE CONFERENCE

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I know that the house would wish me to report on the results of the UN conference on trade and development which met in Geneva over the past twelve weeks and which ended yesterday.

The house will recall that this conference was called to consider how trade can play a greater part in the economic development of the less developed countries. If the pace of development in these countries is to gather sufficient momentum, they will need to increase their imports of capital goods and raw materials. These growing import requirements must be financed in large measure from their own export earnings. In actual fact, the less developed countries have experienced a continuing decline in their share of world trade and their export earnings have not provided them with resources commensurate with their import needs. It was to these problems that representatives of 119 countries addressed themselves in Geneva. I attended the opening ministerial session of this conference, and the statement which I made to the conference outlining the Canadian position on the issues involved has been tabled in the house.

The house will appreciate that these are complex and difficult problems for which solutions cannot be evolved at a single conference. What the conference has been able to do is to create greater understanding of the fundamental issues involved and to chart the course for future progress. A number of key issues emerged during the conference. One of these was the problem of how less developed countries could increase their export earnings from trade in primary commodities. Most of these countries are still dependent on a narrow range of commodities for a very large proportion of their export earnings. The conference has recommended a program of action designed to improve the terms of access to world markets for these products. It also agreed that new efforts must be made to arrive at international arrangements which would assure producers of primary commodities a more dependable source of export income.

Of course, as the house is aware, even the most effective international arrangements may not be able to eliminate all fluctuations of commodity prices. Such fluctuations can disrupt development plans which, in the nature of things, must be based on longer term expectations of foreign exchange earnings. To help ensure that these plans can go forward without disruption, the world bank has been asked to study how these difficulties might be alleviated through new types of multilateral assistance.

The conference recognized that, however much the prospects for their traditional exports are improved, the less developed countries would come to depend increasingly on exports of the products of their new industries. This underlines the need for reductions in the barriers to world trade being made on a basis which will afford these countries the fullest possible opportunity of expanding their industrial exports. In the Kennedy round of tariff negotiations coming up in the GATT, industrialized countries will be expected to ensure that products of interest to the less developed countries are included within the scope of the negotiations without expecting full reciprocity from the less developed countries for benefits they may derive from these negotiations. As far as Canada is concerned, the likelihood of market disruption from imports of the less developed countries' manufactured goods would be lessened if there were freer access for these goods in the markets of the industrialized countries generally. There was, however, a difference of view on whether the industrialized countries should also grant tariff preferences to the less developed countries for their exports of manufactures. This difference was not resolved and the secretary general of the United Nations has been asked to arrange for further study of this difficult issue.

The conference acknowledged that, whatever part was played by trade, the international community would have to continue to support by means of aid the efforts of the less developed countries to accelerate their rates of growth. As the house is aware, the target of the current United Nations development decade is to enable these countries to achieve a minimum annual rate of growth of 5 per cent by 1970. In view of the rapid population increases in these countries, however, even a 5 per cent growth rate would not allow any real narrowing of the gap that now separates their standards of living from those of the advanced countries. The conference recognized that a responsibility in narrowing this gap remained with the developing countries. It also recommended measures that the international community should undertake to aid the development of the less developed countries and in this regard it recommended that each developed country endeavour, within the measure of its capability, to achieve a level of assistance that would come as close as possible to 1 per cent of its national income. The special position of capital importing countries was, however, recognized. The house may be sure that the government will give careful study to the implications of this recommendation in the light of the action which we have already taken to make substantial increases in the Canadian external aid program during the current fiscal year.

The conference also reached agreement that there should be new institutional machinery within the United Nations to carry forward the work begun at Geneva and to bring into focus the problems of trade as they affect economic development. The general assembly of the United Nations at its next session will be asked to endorse the holding of similar conferences on a regular basis and the establishment of a new trade and development board. The house will be pleased to learn that Canada, as a major trading nation, is assured of a continuing place on the new board, where it will have continuing opportunities to help find solutions to the trade problems of the developing countries with a proper regard for the interests of other countries with more developed economies.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government has played a positive and constructive role in this conference. As the house is aware there had been concern, for a time, that the conference might not be able to achieve agreement on the means of dealing effectively with the issues before it. I am glad to be able to say that, in a spirit of accommodation and realism on the part of all concerned, agreement on a very wide front was achieved in the final days and hours of the conference. This, Mr. Speaker, is a good augury for the further endeavours which all countries will have to make in attacking the problem of underdevelopment. In this task the less developed countries recognize that theirs is the primary responsibility. If, however, their own efforts are to be effective they must be supplemented and supported by constructive international action. I can assure the house that, for its part, the government will study the results of the conference in that spirit and will continue to co-operate fully in further international efforts to create conditions in which the less developed countries can participate more fully in the benefits of world trade.

I would not wish to conclude my statement without paying particular tribute to Mr. Dana Wilgress, the leader of the Canadian delegation, who brought his wide experience and great understanding to bear upon the issues facing the conference and who, I know, was in no small part responsible for the success which has attended its deliberations.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 18, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NUGENT—MOTION FOR REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF NEWSPAPER EDITORIAL

Mr. Terry Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting all hon. members of the house. It arises out of an editorial in the Ottawa Citizen of yesterday, Wednesday, June 17 headed "The End of the Affair" dealing with the report of the standing committee on privileges and elections.

The report of that committee is printed in Votes and Proceedings of Monday, June 15. The essence of that report is contained in paragraph 5 and the following paragraph which say there is no evidence of bribery or attempted bribery, and no question of privilege. As a member of that committee I feel that the deliberate misconstruing of that report by this editorial writer cannot go unchallenged.

The first sentence of the editorial says in part:

> When Mr. Gérard Girouard, the Social Credit-turned Conservative M.P., accused the director of the Liberal party of trying to bribe him into joining the government side—

That is a deliberate lie by the editorial writer. There never was any such statement made by the hon. member for Labelle, and in fact throughout the hearings of that committee the hon. member for Labelle himself said there was no attempt to bribe him. The house will remember that when the hon. member for Labelle rose on his question of privilege on April 27, as recorded at page 2583 of Hansard he said:

> The benefits: a party in power and a fat electoral fund for the next election.

The only suggestion that there had been a bribe offered was the statement by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in this house on April 28, when he rose on a question of privilege concerning this matter and said, as recorded at page 2645 of Hansard:

> I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the member for Labelle has alleged in this house that he was offered a bribe, that he was offered certain advantages if he would take a certain position in this House of Commons.

The only suggestion of bribery which was made by anyone was that statement by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The statement made by the editorial writer is therefore completely and directly contrary to the facts, and since the hon. member for Labelle himself denied there was any attempted bribery it is obvious that the editorial writer is deliberately lying when he makes this accusation against that hon. member.

Further, Mr. Speaker, there appears this sentence in the editorial: "Thus, Mr. Davey is vindicated". The house will recall that the hon. member for Labelle rose on a question of privilege because he had been termed by Mr. Davey a "Liberal reject". The committee in considering this whole matter spent a considerable length of time examining the question and the evidence as to whether the hon. member for Labelle had in fact tried to join the Liberal party or had in fact been rejected. The report of the committee makes no reference whatsoever to Mr. Davey's charge. Mr. Davey was by no means vindicated by the report of that committee, so this is the second deliberate lie by the writer of the editorial.

That is not the only objectionable part of the editorial, because the writer then goes on to make allegations against an hon. member of this house which can only be called scurrilous. I will read the rest of the editorial so that hon. members may fully understand the slanderous imputation which this editorial writer makes so falsely against a member of this house. the last two paragraphs read as follows:

> We are left with Mr. Girouard, and a nasty precedent. Parliamentary privilege is absolute, and no legal action can lie against a member who makes an accusation that would be held defamatory if it were made in another place. But privilege implies responsibility. And the "honourable members," as they love to call themselves—

And I would just point out that "honourable members" is put in quotation marks > —must be careful not to defame without justification individuals outside the house who do not share their legal immunity.

> If Mr. Girouard can escape this incident without censure, there will be a temptation for unscrupulous members to think that it is worth making any reckless accusation against a political enemy.

Even if the charge is eventually disproven, there is always the chance that a bit of mud will stick. Someone in the house who shares Mr. Girouard's immunity ought to express the indignation of those members who are honourable in fact as well as by usage.

In my opinion the use of the words "honourable members" in quotation marks followed by "as they love to call themselves" is more than a slight against the hon. member for Labelle; it is a sneering imputation that members of this house are not fully entitled to such an appellation. Further, sir, the sentence "If Mr. Girouard can escape this incident without censure there will be a temptation for unscrupulous members to think that it is worth making any reckless accusation against a political enemy" contains more than a suggestion that there are unscrupulous members in this house. There is also an implied accusation that the committee on privileges and elections failed to do its duty with regard to this reference. Finally, Mr. Speaker, the phrase "the indignation of those members who are honourable in fact as well as by usage" is a clear allegation that not all members of this house are honourable.

Seldom if ever have members of parliament who conscientiously try to do their duty been subjected to such a scurrilous and unfounded attack as this writer makes upon the hon. member for Labelle. I cannot conceive that any member of this house would allow such wholesale attacks on all hon. members as these slanderous inferences constitute. I believe that newspaper editorial writers have a responsibility for at least quoting their facts accurately. They should have at least some regard for fairness. We as members of parliament must protect the position of members of this house as honourable members or fail utterly in our responsibility to those positions.

Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Rhéaume):

That this editorial be referred to the committee on privileges and elections so that the editorial writer and/or the editor of the paper responsible for this editorial may be given an opportunity to appear before that committee to explain their conduct and for the committee to report back to this house their recommendations as to what action should be taken in this regard.

I have the newspaper, and I will table it.

Mr. Speaker: Are there other hon. members who would like to give some guidance to the Chair?

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to speak on the motion for a moment. In reference to the irresponsible editor and the editorial I would just like to read from the sworn testimony on page 51 of the proceedings of the committee on privileges and elections. This is what the hon. member said—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think this is the time for an extended debate. The question is, have other hon. members in this house any advice to tender to the Chair so I may reach a decision as to whether this motion is in order and should be put to the house.

Mr. Woolliams: I am speaking to the motion, Mr. Speaker. Surely it is material to the motion to point out what are the facts. The hon. member said:

I explained the facts in the house. If any of you wish to have further details with regard to the interpretation that may be given to my statement, I will be happy to supply you with them.

And this is what he said:

I am not accusing anyone of anything. I have repeated facts and words in order to clear myself of the accusation made against me.

Those words which he refers to as having been said in the house on April 27, 1964 were "the benefits of the party in power and a fat electoral fund for the next election". So I say, Mr. Speaker, that the editorial was most irresponsible, and I therefore rise in support of the motion in question.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, after the experience we had with this particular case before the committee on privileges and elections I think it would be most regrettable if this motion were accepted by you. I would like to point out that the report has not been concurred in, and we have an undertaking from the chairman of the committee that concurrence will be moved. This will provide an opportunity for debate; it will open up a chance for all hon. members to have their say. I thought it was a pitiful editorial and most unfair, but I do not see how this particular action can really do much about setting it right. If we wanted to, I think any member of the house could take exception on almost any day to some editorial somewhere in connection with our role as members of parliament and how we carry out our duties.

I would like to point out to you, sir, that we will have the chance for a full debate. I know the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) and others of us who were on the committee certainly intend to take that opportunity to point out one of the implications from our hearings that was touched on by the editorial writer. I suggest that there would be a duplication in accepting this motion and at the same time having the debate on concurrence. I think everything could be fully aired then.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): As the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) just said, Mr. Speaker, I think we shall have an opportunity to give our impressions on what went on at the meetings of the committee when we will be asked to approve its report.

However, contrary to what the hon. member for Port Arthur and others before him stated, I do not think the editorial was as irresponsible as all that. Personally, I feel the proceedings of the committee left us quite sceptical about the value of such a committee.

Some hon. members contributed to conceal the truth or to have it concealed, and members of the committee completely washed their hands of the matter submitted to them. However, we shall have the opportunity to discuss this matter further when concurrence in this report will be moved. At that time we shall give our impression, which is far from favourable, about the work done by this committee and the results achieved.

I have not read the editorial in question, but according to what the hon. member who moved the motion said about it, I believe that the editor's remarks are rather justified.

[Text]

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, when the report was tabled two days ago it became a public document. The editorial quoted by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona was comment on that public document. The main part of the hon. member's argument, I respectfully submit, was irrelevant and ought not to have been received because it was an attempt to review the evidence given in committee. It has been indicated that the committee report will be put before the house by way of a motion for concurrence, and then can be debated. Therefore that part of the hon. member's remarks should not have been received, since they were an attempt to anticipate that debate.

The latter part of his remarks were an expression of his opinion as to the editorial, and the assertion of the view that the editorial was irresponsible. Irresponsibility of editorials is no part of the concern of this house. Surely the argument that in his view an editorial writer wos irresponsible cannot be put forward as the basis for a motion on the ground of breach of privilege of the hon. members of this house. The question of the responsibility or irresponsibility of editorial writings is completely irrelevant to the motion made. The fact that the hon. member does not like the editorial is quite his privilege. Others may like it.

The point here surely must be that the hon. member must make a prima facie case that the privileges of an hon. member have been breached. That case has not been made, and has not been argued by the hon. member beyond the mere assertion that, because of the irresponsibility, that result follows. Unless he can show some improper reflection on the personal character of an hon. member and separate that from mere comment on a public document as a public proceeding in this house, then the case must fail.

For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I respectfully suggest that no question of privilege has been raised that should call for a motion to refer the editorial to the committee.

Mr. L. T. Pennell (Brant-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I rise only for the purpose of confirming and endorsing what has been said by the hon. member for Port Arthur. May I respectfully point out that the press were present during the hearings and heard all the evidence. The report of the committee having been delivered, it seems to me, with the greatest of respect, that the press can now make what they deem to be fair comment. The motion for concurrence is now on the order paper, and the same opportunity to comment will be accorded every hon. member of the house in due course when the motion for concurrence is moved.

Mr. Speaker: If there is no other comment it is my duty and obligation to find whether a prima facie case of privilege has been made out, and I wish to thank all hon. members who have spoken for giving me their advice.

Members may recall that only eight days ago, on Wednesday, June 10, I had occasion to give a long dissertation on a question of privilege, and perhaps I could refer to a few citations quoted therein. The first was Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 104, paragraph 5, which is as follows:

> As a motion taken at the time for matters of privilege is thereby given precedence over the prearranged program of public business, the Speaker requires to be satisfied, both that there is a prima facie case that a breach of privilege has been committed, and also that the matter is being raised at the earliest opportunity.

These references are to be found at page 4140 of Hansard and, of course, in the original texts. Later on I referred to Abraham and Hawtrey, page 40, which says:

> To constitute a breach of privilege a statement reflecting on the conduct of a member in his capacity as a member need not be untrue but it must tend to lower the house in the eyes of the public.

Then again, Bourinot's third edition page 152:

> To constitute a breach of privilege such libels must concern the character or conduct of members in that capacity.

Then Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 104, paragraph 2:

> It has often been laid down that the Speaker's function in ruling on a claim of breach of privilege does not extend to deciding the question of substance whether a breach of privilege has in fact been committed—a question which can only be decided by the house itself.

Lastly, Abraham and Hawtrey at page 41:

> If the Speaker decides that the member has made out a prima facie case, the member must make some motion in reference to the matter. He usually moves that the matter of the complaint be referred to the committee on privileges...

I have had the advantage of reading the editorial in question and I have a copy in front of me. It seems to me that if this editorial referred in general terms to members of parliament none of us, I suppose, would be so thin skinned that we could not accept some rather healthy criticism, but this editorial does cite the name of one hon. member once or twice, together with someone who is not a member. In other words it focuses attention on a certain member, and to that degree in a not very favourable light.

It seems to me it is my duty to determine, first of all, whether there is a prima facie case, and whether it has been raised at the earliest opportunity. On the second point, this is the earliest opportunity. As to the first point, it is for the house to decide whether there is a breach of privilege but it is for me to decide whether there is a prima facie case, and in my opinion there is.

Mr. Nugent moves, seconded by Mr. Rhéaume:

> That this editorial be referred to the committee on privileges and elections so that the editorial writer and/or the editor of the paper responsible for this editorial may be given an opportunity to appear before that committee to explain their conduct and for the committee to report back to this house their recommendations as to what action should be taken in this regard.

[Mr. Speaker.]

The question will, I hope, be decided by the house. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I want to argue against this motion.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fisher: I can certainly put my views forward. This is now a debatable motion. I want to argue against accepting the motion, and I want to make my reasons quite clear. I agree that the editorial is very scurrilous, but I want to point out to hon. members that there is implicit in what has already taken place in this matter, particularly with regard to the hon. member who is impugned by the editorial, a contradiction in relation to the evidence submitted to the committee between the evidence given by that hon. member and that of another hon. member.

I do not see how we can possibly deal sensibly with the issue brought forward on the question of privilege until this house as a whole has decided on this other fundamental point which I suggest lies right at the heart of that matter and at the heart of this comment. For that reason I put it to the house that we should not accept this motion.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question? Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those against please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Nugent) which was negatived on the following division:

Pickersgill	Webster—107.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Harkness: I was paired with the Minister of National Defence. Had I voted, I would have voted for the motion.

Mr. Groos: I was paired. Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Fourth report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills—Mr. Loiselle.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

FIRST VOLUME OF REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Tomorrow at one o'clock, if the house agrees to revert to motions, there will be tabled volume 1 of the report of the royal commission on health services.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

ADDRESS REQUESTING AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR SURVIVORS' AND DISABILITY BENEFITS

On the order: Government notices of motion:

June 16—The Prime Minister—The following proposed motion:—

That a humble address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen in the following words:

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the ..... Commons of Canada in parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that you may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to be expressed as follows:

An Act to amend the British North America Act 1867.

Whereas the Senate and House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled have submitted an address to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom for the enactment of the provisions hereinafter set forth:

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

Amendment as to legislation respecting old age pensions. 30 & 31 Vict., c. 3; 9 Eliz. II, c. 2.

1. Section ninety four A of the British North America Act, 1867 is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor:

Legislation respecting old age pensions and supplementary benefits.

"94A. The parliament of Canada may make laws in relation to old age pensions and supplementary benefits, including survivors, and disability benefits irrespective of age, but no such law shall affect the operation of any law present or future of a provincial legislature in relation to any such matter."

Short title and citation.

2. This act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1964, and the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1960, and this act may be cited together as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1964.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of standing order 21 this government notice of motion stands transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders later this day.

IMMIGRATION

JOSIF VERGAKIS—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO DETENTION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to thank the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration for the answer he gave on June 16 with regard to one Josif Vergakis. At the same time I should like to ask him whether it is a fact that Vergakis was kept in custody following an order given for bail, which he was prepared to put up. Was he kept in custody from May 6 to June 14 for the alleged offence of refusing to answer questions? Is that correct or is it not?

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): It is not correct, and I think the explanation is given in the answer I gave this week.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If I read the answer correctly that is the position. I ask the minister whether in view of this case, another very sordid example of administrative lawlessness, he will now consider having this matter looked into by an independent commission to the end that situations of this kind will not be permitted to continue.

[Mr. Pearson.]

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, as you know, when a supply motion was presented last week an hon. member dealt with a matter respecting immigration. When that motion comes again before the house in the next few days, I shall be very glad to supply at that time all required information to the house, as well as to the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker).

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: One of the provisions in Magna Carta is that justice shall not be denied, neither shall it be delayed. Will the minister give consideration to the appointment of even a one man commission to look into this case so that arbitrary actions of this kind in this country may end?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to assign an official to make the necessary investigation in the department with respect to charges levelled against the administration of the department of immigration.

[Text]

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the hon. minister not consider that a special committee of this parliament, which after all is responsible for the liberties of people, would be an appropriate body to look into this whole matter of the immigration law and the difficulties that have arisen?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, upon receiving this report, I will be very glad to submit it to any committee of the house for full consideration.

[Text]

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. The minister has told the house that he is prepared to follow up any accusation brought to his attention. The question I want answered is, what protection is there for the liberties and rights of those people receiving this treatment of whom we may not hear?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, the investigating commissioner will be able to take all the necessary steps so as to examine the charges that have been laid against the department during the last few days.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, would the minister give us the name of this person, who belongs to the department, I take it?

Mr. Tremblay: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, it is someone outside the department making this inquiry? Who is this person?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to announce the name of the person entrusted with this responsibility at the beginning of the week; it will not be a department employee.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then he has not yet been appointed; is that correct? Mr. Speaker, I would point out to the minister that it is difficult to put on Hansard either a vertical or horizontal movement of the head.

Mr. Tremblay: The decision has been taken, but we have not yet appointed this man.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. He said that the report of this as yet unappointed official would be referred to a committee of the house. Which committee would be considering this matter, please?

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I will put this report before the house. It seems to me that it is up to the house to find a way to examine the report.

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): At the same time as the name is given, would the minister also state the terms of reference?

Mr. Tremblay: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

PENSIONS

CANADA PLAN—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON UNIVERSAL APPLICATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the government proposing to take action to bring private pension plans into the same situation in the rest of Canada as Mr. Lesage apparently announced yesterday would be the case in the province of Quebec, in view of the fact that the pension plan in Quebec and the pension plan for the rest of Canada are supposed to be on an equal footing?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): We will be discussing this matter shortly, Mr. Speaker. It is difficult for me to answer that question in detail on the orders of the day, but I will be glad to take it as notice.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRIES AS TO FILM RESPECTING PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister on the basis of the answer that he provided in the house the day before yesterday to a question by the hon. member for Royal. To make the question understandable I will read the relevant part of the question and the answer. The hon. member for Royal asked, concerning the restricted film on the Prime Minister:

> —was an oath of secrecy administered to Richard Ballentine and his technical crew during the filming of this production prior to their being admitted to meetings of the cabinet or a committee of the cabinet?

The answer was as follows:

> Mr. Pearson: To my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, there was no such admission of unauthorized persons, including those mentioned by my hon. friend, to any meeting of cabinet or committee of the cabinet.

I have in my hand a copy of the Montreal Gazette of yesterday which shows what purports to be a still picture from this controversial film. It is labelled "At cabinet. This picture of Prime Minister Pearson addressing the cabinet was taken from the controversial film". I would like to ask the Prime Minister —and I am sure there is a rational explanation for this—whether he could give to the house a more rational explanation of this apparent contradiction, so that unhappy interpretations will not be placed on this apparent difference.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not, of course, responsible for pictures that appear in the newspapers or for the captions put under them. I repeat what I said the other day, that neither this photographer nor anybody connected with him was admitted to any meeting of the cabinet or to any committee of the cabinet, nor to take any pictures of the cabinet in session or committee of the cabinet in session.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question addressed to the Secretary of State. I am wondering whether he is aware that if he visits a certain location in downtown Ottawa tonight, knocks three times and gives the password "Mike sent me" he can enjoy the otherwise restricted film "Mr. Pearson" which has been tastefully cleaned up so as not to offend the sensibilities of the Secretary of State for External Affairs; and would he pass on this good news to the C.B.C.?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I realize the general interest in this subject, but I am not at all sure that the original question was not out of order on two grounds; first, because it asked whether a statement made in a newspaper was correct, and it seems to me that the caption underneath a picture could be the equivalent of a statement; and second—well, I think the first ground is sufficient.

Mr. Fairweather: As always, I gladly accept your ruling, sir.

Mr. Hamilton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, do I understand you have just ruled that my original question was of doubtful validity, according to our rules?

Mr. Speaker: I did not rule, but I made a very strong suggestion; at least that was intended. The question has already been asked and there have been two or three supplementaries, but if we were to start over again I am afraid I would have to rule that in my opinion it was a statement made in a newspaper.

Mr. Hamilton: Then I have to give notice to you, sir, that there are serious implications in this matter which I will have to deal with at a time when I review all the facts before me. I am serving notice of that.

AGRICULTURE

QUEBEC—METHOD OF CONSULTATION RESPECTING ARDA PROJECTS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the minister of "rural development", forestry and "ARDA"?

[Mr. Pearson.]

Is it true that the minister telephoned Quebec's agriculture minister to tell him that he did not want to deal with him any longer about the ARDA regulations and that from now on he intended to deal directly with the premier of Quebec?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I talked to him three times yesterday and I never dealt with the matter in that way.

[Text]

SASKATCHEWAN—CUT IN BUDGET FOR ARDA RESEARCH PROJECTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of forestry and rural rehabilitation. In view of the importance of the ten major research projects under ARDA being carried out by the centre for community studies in Saskatoon, what has been done to overcome the difficulties resulting from the decision of the Saskatchewan government to cut the budget of that organization by two thirds?

Mr. Speaker: This is a question requiring a detailed answer. Would the hon. member put it on the order paper.

ARDA—DELAY IN APPROVAL OF PROJECTS IN QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Forestry in connection with ARDA. Can the minister tell the house whether it is true that his department has not yet approved the 29 specific projects, amounting to $7,500,000, submitted by the department of agriculture of Quebec?

If so, can he tell us why.

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I gave a detailed answer to that question yesterday at the request of the hon member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard).

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Forestry. Could he tell the house whether it is true that he is taking advantage of ARDA to interfere in provincial affairs?

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, the debate on that point results from a misunderstanding. During three telephone conversations I had yesterday with hon. Mr. Courcy, everything was settled and we agreed on the interpretation to be given to ARDA in the province of Quebec. We are to meet in Mont Joli next July 4; members of the press gallery of the House of Commons and of the Quebec legislature will be present.

Mr. Pigeon: Another supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister tell the house who was wrong, the Quebec minister of agriculture or himself?

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, I will publish this afternoon the whole text of the speech I gave in Matane and the hon. member will have the opportunity to see the stand taken by the Quebec minister of agriculture and myself in that respect.

Mr. Pigeon: I have another supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister ready to table—

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is becoming a debate.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

EMPLOYMENT BY ROYAL COMMISSION OF RESEARCH STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Would the minister inform the house whether the two man royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism plans to hire 45 full-time and part-time researchers at public expense to undertake various projects; and if so, would he tell the house the exact nature of these projects?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I think this question should be directed to the Prime Minister.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker; and in view of the nature of the question and the lengthy reply that would be required, I suggest it be put on the order paper.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): A supplementary question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Will this same commission be holding public hearings or meetings in Toronto and Montreal?

Mr. Pearson: I believe they have already held meetings there. I am not sure.

Mr. Woolliams: No, they haven't.

Mr. Pearson: But I also believe their public sessions are completed.

Mr. Gene Rhéaume (Northwest Territories): A supplementary question to the Prime Minister. The question arises from press reports of today. Can the Prime Minister confirm that the B and B gang will in fact be examining television, radio and newspaper media in this country?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's West.

Mr. Rhéaume: Mr. Speaker, I would like to debate this question at ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Could I suggest to the hon. member that the use of the word "gang" in connection with a royal commission does not exactly dignify such a body.

Mr. Rhéaume: Mr. Speaker, I give notice that I wish to debate this question at ten o'clock.

REPORTED STATEMENT BY MEMBER OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister which is prompted by a report in today's Gazette in which a member of the royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism is quoted directly as saying that he did not believe in the recommendations of the commission, which would not change anything. Is the Prime Minister investigating this utterance, and has he had word of any resignation from any member of the commission?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think if I investigated every utterance made on the work of this commission I would be doing nothing else.

TRANSPORT

DELAY IN SHIPMENTS OF FREIGHT TO NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Richard Cashin (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Could the minister inform the house what steps the government is taking to alleviate the great backlog of freight waiting to be shipped to Newfoundland via North Sydney and Port aux Basques?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker—

Inquiries of the Ministry

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I seem to be a little slow today, but that does strike me as a very good question for the order paper.

Mr. Cashin: Mr. Speaker, I serve notice that I will be debating this question at ten o'clock.

NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING SATELLITE TRACKING STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, now that you have allowed that last important question maybe I can rephrase the question I put to the Minister of Transport last week in regard to the construction of a multimillion dollar satellite tracking station in eastern Canada. Are negotiations still going on between the governments of the United States and Canada and, if so, how soon can we expect a further announcement regarding developments with respect to this matter?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I believe the negotiations are going very well, but I should not like to predict when they will be concluded.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ASSISTANCE TO JAPAN FOLLOWING EARTHQUAKE DAMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Has the Canadian government made any offer of assistance to the government of Japan to assist those who have been afflicted by the disastrous earthquake in that country?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, nor have we yet received detailed reports of the unhappy damage in that country.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REPORTED RELATION BETWEEN CONSUMPTION OF FISH AND CANCER

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries?

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

In view of the statement that I heard last night concerning fish, does the minister propose to set up an inquiry into the merit of that statement to the effect that the consumption of fish could be one of the direct causes of stomach cancer? We would also like to know whether the minister proposes to launch a drive against fishing and fisheries as his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh), did against the use of cigarettes?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member put this important question on the order paper.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the import of this question is of such a nature and of such great importance to a vast number of people in one of the primary industries of Canada that, with great deference to you, sir, it should not be placed on the order paper, but that if the Minister of Fisheries is in a position to make a reply of some nature at this time he should now do so.

Mr. Speaker: With the unanimous consent of the house, if the minister is ready, and in view of the importance of the question, the minister may be prepared to make a statement.

[Translation]

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the question is so important that it would be impossible for me to deal with it during the question period. But all hon. members can take my word for it, it is a good thing to eat fish at every opportunity.

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Since the minister willingly replied "with your approval", I feel the question I raised is most important, as mentioned by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Crouse), and I think the minister should take it more seriously and give it the consideration it deserves.

Mr. Robichaud: In order to give the matter more serious consideration, I should have to see and examine this report.

[Text]

NATIONAL ANTHEM

INQUIRY AS TO DIVISION OF RESOLUTION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister?

Does the government intend to divide the resolution on the two anthems: "O Canada" and the royal anthem, as it has been done for the two flags?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: A supplementary question—

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: I cannot see any possible supplementary after a "no" answer.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I ask you this question.

Do you intend to divide the resolution on the two national anthems, "O Canada" and the royal anthem, as you did for the two flags?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: It gives me pleasure to rule that question out of order.

Mr. Pigeon: May I discuss it after ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

SHIPPING

MONTREAL—FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN STUDY OF WATER LEVEL

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Prime Minister?

Last Monday, June 15, as reported on page 4291 of Hansard, I asked the Prime Minister whether the federal government would be represented at the meeting to be held on June 30 next to study the critical situation of the water level in the port of Montreal. Can the Prime Minister give us an answer today?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. I apologize to the hon. gentleman, and will try and get an answer tomorrow.

EFFECT OF LOW WATER LEVEL IN GEORGIAN BAY AND LAKE HURON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Loney (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Will the minister give immediate consideration to the communication he has received from the Georgian bay development association with regard to the current low water levels in the lake Huron and Georgian bay area?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, apparently this is a much more urgent matter than the matter of getting freight to Newfoundland, but I am glad to tell the hon. gentleman that I have been giving urgent consideration to this matter for many months.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I object to the slur that was just cast on the Chair.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would withdraw this slur on the Chair.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, if I said anything that was disrespectful to anyone I apologize at once.

Mr. Speaker: I hasten to assure the minister that I did not hear him.

Mr. Loney: A supplementary question. Could I ask the Minister of Transport if he is aware that this communication refers to a letter written to the Prime Minister on April 28 which as of June 16 was unanswered?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with all the Prime Minister's correspondence but I will look into the matter and consult with his office. However, I can assure hon. members that there is no member of the house more concerned about the levels of Georgian bay and lake Huron than my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, who represents in this house a very large part of that area.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. I wonder whether the minister would indicate to the house whether he has any objection to sign stealing here in the house and, if so would he camouflage his signs a little more.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUESTS FOR STATEMENT ON PRIORITY OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the time element, with September drawing close now, would the Prime Minister advise when he expects to announce the student loan policy?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): We hope to proceed with that, Mr. Speaker, as soon as we finish the resolutions on the flag and the anthem and the pension proposal which we will be bringing before the house. We will then proceed with the student loan and youth allowance matters.

Mr. Starr: A supplementary question. In any event, if all these matters are not cleaned up does the Prime Minister not think that the student loan policy is sufficiently important that one of the debates could be broken into so this could be put through?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I cannot contemplate that we will not be able to dispose of these other matters before the middle of July.

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, does the government intend to grant two kinds of loans to students, in view of the fact that we will have two flags?

[Text]

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. When can we expect the amendments to the Farm Improvement Loan Act and the Crop Insurance Act to be brought before the house?

Mr. Pearson: As soon as we complete the measures already mentioned.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport having to do with the timetable respecting legislation. There is a report in this morning's paper which says "Transportation legislation shelved once more." In view of the tremendous importance of this legislation to a number of the provinces, and in view of the preparation which they must make to meet the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, would the Minister of Transport give some assurance that the resolution will be passed so that we can see the bill, and that then there will be a waiting period before it is proceeded with?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that if most hon. members followed the excellent example of the hon. member for Medicine Hat it would not be too long before we reached this measure.

[Later:]

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, now that I have recovered from the unexpected and perhaps unwarranted flattery of the Minister of Transport, I wonder whether he would answer the question. The newspaper article to which I referred indicated that some official or officials of the Department of Transport had said that the transport legislation will be still further delayed. I should like to know if there has been a change of attitude by the Department of Transport with respect to priorities.

Mr. Pickersgill: There has been no change with respect to priorities, but in view of what has been going on it reads to me like rather intelligent speculation as to what might really happen.

Mr. Gene Rhéaume (Northwest Territories): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister consider using his influence with his colleagues to arrange to have the transportation legislation brought in prior to the resumption of the flag debate?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, sir.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the answer he gave the hon. member for Ontario a few moments ago regarding the student loan legislation, does he think the flag issue is more important than bringing in legislation to help students?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, but I recognize that my hon. friend would be very grateful indeed if we would rescue him and his party from their dilemma in regard to the flag debate.

UNITED NATIONS

PROSPECTIVE OTTAWA MEETING ON STAND-BY UNITS FOR PEACE FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister make a statement to the house with reference to the news report that a meeting will be held in Ottawa this fall of nations interested, with Canada, in the forming of peace keeping machinery to be available to the United Nations? Are these reports correct, and can the Prime Minister make a statement on the matter to the house?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the matter is under consideration. Discussions have taken place through diplomatic channels and I hope a report on this matter will be made in a very short time either by myself or my hon. friend the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING JUVENILE DELINQUENCY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice; he may not be in a position to answer it today. I put a question on the order paper with reference to juveniles incarcerated in the penitentiaries of Canada. The answer to that question showed that one child under 14 or 15 years of age was in a penitentiary. Is his department considering implementing the recommendations of the royal commission with reference to the investigation of juvenile delinquency, and in particular taking some steps in regard to children of that age being placed in the penitentiaries of Canada?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for bringing this to my attention.

WATER RESOURCES

LAKE ONTARIO—POLLUTION THROUGH DUMPING OF OILY WASTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport of which I have given him notice. In view of the current heavy pollution of the waters and shores of lake Ontario bounding Prince Edward and Lennox counties, which is apparently created by the ruthless dumping of oily wastes by shipping on the lake and which is ruinous to the beaches, the tourist industry and to fish and game, will the minister use his authority to investigate forthwith the origin of this pollution and use all means available to him to apprehend, prosecute and stop this flagrant and barbaric breach of the law?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I am very much against pollution, Mr. Speaker, and I will do everything I can.

INDUSTRY

PETERBOROUGH, ONT.—REMOVAL OF PART OF PLANT TO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Fred F. Stenson (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry. Is he aware that the Fisher Gauge plant in Peterborough is moving part of its operation to the United States on account of the 11 per cent sales tax that is going to be levied on production machinery? I should also like to ask him if his department was in touch with this plant in Peterborough.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Yes, Mr. Speaker, my officials have been in touch for some time with the Fisher Gauge operation in Peterborough. We are aware of the factors which have led them to consider removing part of their operation to the United States. I think it would be unwise or untrue for me to suggest that the 11 per cent sales tax was the only reason for this move. There are a number of complex factors, and we are endeavouring to correct as many of those factors as we can to try to prevent this move taking place.

Mr. Winkler: Have you discussed it with the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Stenson: A supplementary question. I understand the Department of National Revenue has had auditors in the plant. What recommendations have been made to the minister's department or the Department of National Revenue with regard to this plant? I asked the minister, I think, and the Minister of National Revenue for this information some time ago, and I have not received it.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the hon. member really wishes me to disclose recommendations made by one department to another.

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): A supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Some time ago I asked if he kept a breakdown of the returns to the government from the 11 per cent tax. I ask him again, does he keep such a breakdown?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): I am not clear as to the question. Would my hon. friend be kind enough to repeat it a little more specifically?

Mr. Pugh: Does the minister's department keep a breakdown of the revenue to the government as a result of the 11 per cent sales tax?

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, there seems to be quite a lot of misunderstanding about this tax. I should like to point out, if I may, that it is a general tax which applies to a wide variety of products. The Leader of the Opposition asked me a question the other day. He seemed to think it was a tax that had been placed on drugs by the government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What has that got to do with building materials?

Mr. Gordon: The tax has applied to drugs for a long time, and I would remind my hon. friend that it was his government that increased it to 11 per cent.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, that kind of evasive action is the reason the Canadian economy is slipping in so far as our balance of payments is concerned. Can the minister give the intelligent answer we would like to have as to how much is realized month by month from the imposition of the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials? I understood that to be the question. Does the minister's evasion indicate that they have no such records?

Mr. Gordon: I do not know whether my so-called evasive answers are responsible for the improvement in the economy, but if so perhaps it is worth while. As far as this specific question is concerned, I would be glad to get the information and supply it to the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If you had said that in the first place you would not have had any difficulty.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that this particular matter has been well gone into.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

WEST BLOCK—INQUIRY AS TO OPENING OF EXERCISE ROOM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Joseph Slogan (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works which is of extreme importance to all members of parliament. My question is prompted by the lecture delivered today to the voluntary health committee of parliament by Dr. Dudley White emphasizing the vital need for exercise in the prevention of heart disease, especially among politicians. When will the exercise room in the west block, which was ready last year, be opened for use by members of parliament?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Paul Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this question does not come under the exclusive jurisdiction of my department, but I will take up this matter with the various organizations looking after the welfare of the members of parliament and I will give an answer to the hon. member later.

PARLIAMENT HILL

REQUEST THAT R.C.M.P. IN ATTENDANCE BE BILINGUAL

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, last week I directed a question to the Prime Minister and he told me that he would look into it personally. I wanted to know whether all the members of the R.C.M.P. on duty on parliament hill in Ottawa to welcome tourists, are bilingual.

I should like the Prime Minister to tell me whether my recommendation was implemented.

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have taken this matter up with the Minister of Justice who is responsible, of course, for the R.C.M.P. He is in discussion at the present time with the R.C.M.P. on ways and means of dealing with this matter, and hopes to be able to make a report very shortly.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REQUEST FOR BILINGUAL INSIGNIA ON NEW CARS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

The Canadian National Railways has just ordered 500 cars from the National Steel Car of Montreal.

Would the minister tell us whether the inscriptions on those new cars will be bilingual?

[Text]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I could not answer that question offhand.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

ADDRESS REQUESTING AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR SURVIVORS' AND DISABILITY BENEFITS

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister) moved:

That a humble address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen in the following words:

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the ..... Commons of Canada in parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that you may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to be expressed as follows:

An act to amend the British North America Act 1867.

Whereas the Senate and House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled have submitted an address to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom for the enactment of the provisions hereinafter set forth:

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

Amendment as to legislation respecting old age pensions, 30 & 31 Vict., c. 3; 9 Eliz. II, c. 2.

1. Section ninety four A of the British North America Act, 1867 is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor:

Legislation respecting old age pensions and supplementary benefits.

"94A. The parliament of Canada may make laws in relation to old age pensions and supplementary benefits, including survivors' and disability benefits irrespective of age, but no such law shall affect the operation of any law present or future of a provincial legislature in relation to any such matter."

Short title and citation.

2. This act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1964, and the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1960, and this act may be cited together as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1964.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to move what I hope will be a joint address of parliament for the amendment of section 94A of the British North America Act. If the resolution is approved by this house, then we shall of course move a motion requesting the concurrence of the other house, which can be expressed by inserting the words "Senate and" in the resolution.

The purpose of this proposed amendment, Mr. Speaker, is well known to the members of the house. It is a purpose which I believe is supported by all parties in the house. The means for achieving this purpose, survivor benefits in pension legislation, that is by submission of a resolution to the parliament at Westminster, is of course strangely out of date and indeed inappropriate. But at the moment, it is our only means available to this parliament for making this kind of constitutional change. It is, of course, an unhappy situation as we approach the centenary of our confederation and as we approach the 35th anniversary of the passing of the statute of Westminster. It is a situation which I am sure all members of the house and all Canadians would like to see changed. But we have to deal with the situation as it is at present with regard to the procedure to be followed in this matter. If the procedure is anomalous, as it is, and if indeed in a sense it is humiliating to go to another parliament to ask them to do something of this kind for us, it is a self-inflicted humiliation.

The existing section 94A was created by a constitutional amendment in 1951. This 1951 amendment made possible the old age security system under which all Canadians are paid a flat rate monthly pension on reaching age 70. This amendment provided simply that the parliament of Canada, as well as the legislatures of the provinces of Canada, might enact legislation regarding old age pension. This, of course, has led to joint jurisdiction in this matter.

Now, that provision was adequate for the old age security system under which everyone became a beneficiary at a certain age, and no one became a beneficiary before that age. I think we can all agree that this is the foundation of our social security system but that it is not, in itself, enough. I believe it is generally agreed that the time has come to supplement the universal flat rate pension with a broad scheme of social insurance. This is certainly the government's belief, and discussions that have already taken place in the house have shown that it commands general support in the house.

The main benefit under any proposed pension scheme of the kind which I hope will be introduced shortly into the house will, of course, be a retirement pension. For a great majority of people who go on working to the usual age of retirement, the plan will provide an earnings related pension which, in combination with the old age security benefits, will I believe assure that people continue to have at least a modestly adequate income on retirement. But such a plan is not complete unless it provides assurance also to people who unfortunately are not able to go on working to the usual age of retirement. This is the purpose of supplementary benefits in a contributory pension scheme.

In the documents which I tabled in the house last week, I think it was, the supplementary benefits that we propose, which would be covered by this kind of amendment if it were adopted, were described in some detail. They were of four kinds and I will outline them briefly. First, there would be the pension for widows of contributors; second, there would be the benefits to dependant children of contributors who die; third, there would be pensions for contributors who became disabled before reaching retirement age; and fourth, there would be a modest death benefit payable to the estate of any contributor.

These benefits are supplementary to the pension plan but they are not themselves old age pensions. The beneficiaries are not necessarily aged. An important group of them, indeed, are children whose father is dead, or whose mother is dead in a case where it was the mother who supported the family.

The constitutional amendment is necessary to make it clear that this parliament has the power to legislate such supplementary benefits of the kind I have mentioned. The amendment, as proposed in this resolution, would be simply an adaptation of section 94A of the British North America Act to cover this broader purpose. It adds to old age pensions, and I quote from the proposed amendment, "supplementary benefits, including survivors and disability benefits irrespective of age". This, Mr. Speaker, is the only change, though it is an important change. It is the only change of substance.

The amendment also takes advantage of the opportunity to tidy up the wording of section 94A by deleting an unnecessary "it is declared" and an unnecessary phrase "from time to time". These are deletions from the original 94A. There are also certain consequential changes in the latter half of the section, that part of the section which safeguards the continuing jurisdiction of the provinces in relation to pensions and related matters. The present wording of the section refers only to pensions. In order that the safeguard will apply equally to the supplementary benefits proposed, the amendment refers more broadly to "such law" and "any such matter"—that is, the supplementary benefits as well as the pensions themselves. These are the changes that are proposed in the resolution, Mr. Speaker—one of substance, the other of wording and a consequential amendment.

I should like to make it quite clear that the rights of the provinces are unaffected by this amendment. Indeed, I feel that goes without saying or the provinces would not have unanimously agreed to the wording of this formula. The existing section 94A provides that no federal legislation shall affect the operation of any federal law, present or future, in relation to old age pensions. The proposed amendment retains the same provision in relation to both pensions and supplementary benefits. As the house is aware, the wording of the amendment has been submitted to the provinces. As I have just said, this resolution is being brought before the house only after all the provinces have officially expressed their concurrence in the proposed wording.

In conclusion, I should like to express my appreciation of the co-operative spirit in which the premiers of the provinces have considered this matter with the federal government. As a result of that co-operation, we can now make a most important social advance in this parliament. I am sure all hon. members will wish to participate in that advance for the good of the people of Canada. I believe, therefore, that this amendment which is before the house will receive the approval of this house.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is one of the unique ironies of Canadian history that parliament should halt consideration of the question of national flags in order to make an application, by way of an address to the British parliament, to ask that house to amend the Canadian constitution.

In these days of discussion regarding Canada's position as a nation, the panegyrics one has heard in the last few days as to the steps being taken by the government, make the application for the present address before the house rather ridiculous. During the period we were in office we tried to bring about, through the initiation of action within our country, the repatriation of the Canadian constitution. We dealt with that on more than one occasion. There were times when we were very close to agreement. We started in 1960 by the convening of two conferences to repatriate the British North America Act, and we hoped that we would be able to achieve that.

Discussions took place over a period of time, and in particular on November 2 and 3, 1960, following which a communique was issued. The conference had available for discussion the drafts of the various alternatives which had been previously suggested, forming the basis for a possible formula under which the power to amend might be transferred to Canada, and a committee representative of all the provinces started to consider the various submissions made.

It was unanimously agreed that the provisions concerning language and education, and one or two others, should be entrenched, but the area of disagreement was mainly that dealing with legislative powers of the provinces under section 92.

A further meeting was held on January 12 and 13 of the following year. There was considerable opposition, and the chief opposition to the entrenchment of much of section 92 originated from the government of Saskatchewan. There was as well, of course, continuing opposition from the government of Quebec in this connection.

In 1961 various meetings were held and finally a draft bill was made public on December 1 of that year. That draft bill would have made possible the removal of one of those anachronisms that speaks out loudly and definitely whenever we in Canada wish to make any changes that have a constitutional import. As I said a moment ago it is ironical that we, because of the failure of our governments federally and provincially to arrive at agreement, still have provisions that are not applicable to any other independent nation within the commonwealth. Whatever the views of the past may have been, certainly there has been no justification for this during the last 40 years.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) mentioned the Statute of Westminister. It enacted nothing new. The Statute of Westminister simply placed into legislative form the accepted principles of the association within the commonwealth. For many years successive governments hoped to bring about agreement in this regard but now in 1964, while we talk about emblems, national symbols and all that kind of thing, we go cap in hand to Westminister in order to secure changes that are necessary from the point of view of both economic and social security.

I am going to say no more in this connection, except that it is not Westminster that exercises by its own wish this authority over Canada. It is the failure of Canadians to build within this nation one Canada. That is the reason for this situation.

Dealing specifically with the amendment, it is a strange thing that when we were in office and said such an amendment was necessary if survivor benefits were to be provided, those who now sit on the treasury benches argued that no such constitutional amendment was necessary to provide for such benefits. The hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith), when he was minister of national health and welfare, dealt with this matter on a number of occasions, and each time this question came before the house those who now sit on the treasury benches said such a course was entirely unnecessary. Well, repentance has its reward, however late. It takes place, I am told, in the religious world; but this is a remarkable turnabout on the part of a government which, when in opposition, enunciated the principle that all of these things could be done right here in parliament without there being any necessity of securing a constitutional amendment.

We tried to get this amendment consented to. All of the provinces excepting the province of Quebec agreed. All were prepared to accept and to consent to an amendment to provide for the provision of contributory retirement pensions. We had the legislation ready. We had at all times supported the need. We had before parliament and ready for presentation, as set out in the speech from the throne, legislation that would have provided for these things that are now provided for in the suggested bill that will be presented following the acceptance of this amendment by Westminster.

Sir, to say the least, the course of the government on pension legislation and contributory pensions has been marked by evasion, retreat, withdrawal, defiance of the provinces and finally by capitulation on the part of the government, it having failed to cooperate through consultation with the provinces. It has been a wonderful story. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) is not here. I can understand that. Remember when she came before parliament —she now appears—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: She came before parliament in the month of July last, saying, in effect: Here is the pension plan. It is the greatest thing which has ever been presented anywhere at any time. The hon. lady went on to point out that it had to be passed by parliament—"Either you pass this plan in the form in which I have presented it, or I will not continue as minister". It was not passed. It was not considered. And she still is minister.

Then there was the second plan which evolved out of other considerations into which I shall not inquire at the moment. This second plan was supposed to be better than the superlative plan number one which died even before birth. Number two, in turn, was one of those measures it was said which men would look back on in the years to come as a milestone in the field of social security legislation. We said of both of those plans, number one and number two: You cannot bring them in without a constitutional amendment. We asked for that almost a year ago. And the answer was that there was no necessity whatever for such an amendment.

We endeavoured ourselves, in January 1962 and earlier, to secure the consent of the provinces to bringing in legislation which would enable provision to be made for contributory pensions. In order that there may be no doubt about this, I wish to place on record a copy of a letter which was sent to all the premiers of Canada in this connection. This letter appears in Hansard of 1962 at page 76 and it reads, in part, as follows:

> My colleagues and I in the federal government have come to the conclusion that the Canadian social security system should be improved by the addition of a plan for graduated old age pensions on a contributory basis in addition to the basic old age security pension, for all those who can reasonably afford additional provision for their old age and who have not already undertaken it under private pension plans or other contractual arrangements.

In other words, our plan was to operate in conjunction with existing plans; it was not intended to impose a new system over and above existing plans. The letter continues.

> We believe that a plan of this kind, which would have some resemblance to the American social security laws and the recent British legislation, should also contain provisions for the payment of benefits under certain circumstances to the widows and children of contributors who die, and to former contributors who become permanently disabled.

I emphasize this because it shows clearly there is nothing new about what is being produced here today over and above the measure we endeavoured to bring in and in respect to which an amendment to the constitution was required. Then I went on to point out:

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

> The British North America Act was amended in 1951 by the addition of the following as section 94A—

This has now been set out by the Prime Minister in the course of his remarks, and I will therefore not repeat it. The letter continues:

> The law officers of the crown advise me that this authority would permit parliament to enact a contributory, graduated old age pension plan—

That is the authority of the amendment of 1951—

> —but would not permit the inclusion of benefits payable under certain circumstances to widows and children, nor to contributors who become disabled before they are old. To extend the law in this most desirable way, it would be necessary to replace the present section with one reading—

And I then set out the manner in which the amendment could be made.

Hon. gentlemen now sitting opposite on the treasury benches said this was nonsense. The present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) who then was not only an authority on agriculture but an authority as well on health and welfare, said this was not necessary. He said there could not have been such an opinion received from the law officers of the crown. But there was. This government said, when it came to office, that such an amendment of the constitution would not be necessary. They have found out, after two experimental jumps, that finally, before making the effective jump, they now have to ask for something which they repudiated as being unnecessary for a period of years.

The section we suggested, and which we wanted to bring in, was this:

> It is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada may from time to time make laws in relation to
> (a) old age pensions, and
> (b) pensions and other benefits incidental to, or conducive to the better operation and administration of, a scheme of old age pensions,
> but no law made by the parliament of Canada under the authority of this section affects the operation of any law enacted by the legislature of a province in relation to any of the matters specified in paragraphs (a) and (b) of this section.

This is, in effect, what is being done today, after the delay on the part of this government of a year while telling us such action was not necessary. Now hon. members opposite recognize that it is. I went on to say:

> My colleagues and I had hoped that agreement would have been reached by this time on a means of amending Canada's constitution in Canada and that this change in section 94A would have been one of the first amendments made under the new arrangements. It is now evident that it will take some further time to reach agreement on the methods of amendment of the constitution in Canada and it will therefore be necessary to proceed by way of an address to the Queen—

All the provinces of Canada with the exception of Quebec agreed. Mr. Lesage took the stand that unless we set out in detail what we proposed to do with this power he would not give his consent. We pressed him again in the fall of 1962 and we received the same answer. He advanced a proposition which constitutionally was untenable, namely that a province has the right to ask a federal parliament to give full details of whatever action it intends to take under amendments to be made to the British North America Act.

I will not go into that correspondence now. It is set out in detail in Hansard. It shows clearly that the only reason this legislation is not on the statute books today—portable pensions available under a contribtuory plan —is that this constitutional amendment was denied. The present government, however, when it first came to office, undertook that all these things were to be done in those 60 days of never to be forgotten indecision. They tried, they talked—and they ended up by withdrawing. Finally, there was a dominion-provincial meeting. Then the situation became abundantly clear when Mr. Lesage said: I will not accept the plan you have produced. This was the revised version—the second jump, which was the epitome of all the parliamentary advances in the field of social security. Mr. Lesage said: I will have nothing to do with it; it is not good; I have a better plan. And he proceeded to set out in detail the plan he had. Indeed, he went so far, I understand, as to prepare a bill. At the conference in Quebec no agreement was reached. The Prime Minister of Canada said: We will have to try to do something about it, but we stand firm on the plan enunciated by my colleague the minister of health and welfare. That is what the right hon. gentleman said in effect. Her plans today are forgotten; the schemes are things of the past—they have joined the limbo of forgotten things. Two weeks after that meeting in Quebec the government of Canada decided that they would give a carrot, a large carrot to the provinces. They promised new plans of sharing in taxation fields, plans that are going to greatly increase the income tax of Canadians because $60 million will have to be raised this year and double that amount next year. Those are the things that happened. They brought out this new scheme; they said, "Here is the money", which they had refused two weeks earlier. But they went further and they said to the premier of Quebec, which was the fact, that his plan was immeasurably better than the ill digested plans they had placed before the house.

On May 14 the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) wrote a letter to the premier of Quebec. He said:

I acknowledge your letter of April 29. I fully agree with you that the spirit which marked the recent arrangements between the federal government and the provinces must continue to inspire and characterize federal-provincial relations.

I am happy, in particular, that your government has decided to participate in the work of the joint committee on taxation...

I am also gratified by your approval of the pension plan which I outlined in its main aspects in my telegram of April 19. I intend to submit to parliament the proposed amendment to the constitution concerning supplementary benefits, as soon as it has been endorsed by the provinces.

Then he said this:

I have learned with pleasure that the preliminary meeting which the officials of our two governments held last week to make preparations for the negotiations which are to take place at the beginning of June on "contracting out", has been useful and fruitful.

Contracting out? What do the ministers surrounding the Prime Minister say about this? What about the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp); what does he say about contracting out? I read from a speech which he delivered a few days before that particular date, when he said this, "some confusion on this point seems to have arisen as a result of the misbegotten phrase 'contracting out' ". I do not know where the illegitimacy comes in, but certainly that misbegotten phrase was the one that was created by the Prime Minister to describe what was being done. It is a matter of great interest to look back over the years and to read what some of these people said when evidence was given before a joint committee of both houses, upon which occasion the chairman of the House of Commons representation was hon. Jean Lesage. That was in 1950. They met together and called various witnesses before them—and one of them was Mr. Mitchell Sharp.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He gave evidence which is reported at page 950 of the minutes of proceedings of the joint committee on old age security; this was for the financing of a plan of old age security for Canadians, and there was presented a brief prepared for the joint committee by the Department of Finance. I ask hon. members to read this evidence. It bears about as much relationship to this present plan as does the present plan to the first one that was brought before the house. Mr. Mitchell Sharp gave evidence as follows:

> The fundamental characteristic of a "pay as you go" system is that those who are working pay the cost of providing pensions for those who have retired. The financing of a "pay as you go" system is a matter of distributing the current cost of pensions over the population in what is considered to be a proper way. In other words, it is essentially a revenue problem, even though the scheme may be "contributory" in the sense that it is paid for in whole or in part by a special levy or contribution.

Then he referred to the deferred equity plan. But the interesting thing in connection with this matter is that among the witnesses who gave evidence was none other than the present Secretary of State (Mr. Lamontagne). He gave evidence at that time and he gave his views in regard to various matters. This is of interest. This is the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker; the man who over and over again criticized us because we had budget deficits, created as a result of the extra assistance we gave to the provinces. What did he say when he gave evidence here in parliament? At page 1041 he is reported as having said this—and I refer to Professor Lamontagne:

> Q. For general taxation purposes, then, that would assume that the taxes levied upon us now are excessive and not needed for the general revenue of the country?
> A. Yes.

Just prior to answering that question there is this passage:

> Q. Do you mean you would lower the income rate as it now exists?
> A. Yes, for general taxation purposes.

This was the economist talking, not the politician. A little further on it becomes even more interesting as he gives his general views on the question of the economy. I wonder whether he has whispered any of these things to the Prime Minister and the other members of the government:

> Q. You say you would therefore lower them? Assuming that we continue to receive the revenue we now get for expenditures that are necessary, do you say that we should lessen those expenditures?

Here is his answer:

> Not lessen our expenditures—

In that this government has certainly run true to the Lamontagne viewpoint of 1950. They have not lessened our expenditures; they have increased them by several hundred million dollars.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I bring this to the attention of the government. He said, "Not lessen our expenditures"—and certainly they have learned that lesson. They did not need the Secretary of State to give them that advice. This is the next part of his answer:

> —but I do not believe in the balanced budget—

This is interesting. This is one of the ministers of this government talking. Now we begin to see why the talk of a balanced budget has now ceased and does not have any efficacy in their thinking. Then he said:

> —and I think we will experience deficits in the near future.

Those prophecies on the part of the Secretary of State, Professor Lamontagne as he then was, came a lot nearer to the facts and were much truer than those of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) in "Troubled Canada." Professor Lamontagne was asked this question a little later on, as reported at page 1042:

> When you spoke of reducing the rates of income tax you had in mind the fact that today we are spending, in our budget, about $100 million on old age pensions; and you say you would take that out of the budget, put it in the social security levy, and reduce the income tax by the amount that results in the $100 million of taxation?

His reply was:

> Not necessarily; but that is another question.

Then he was asked:

> Subject to what you said about balancing the budget?
> A. No, I do not favour a balanced budget.

This is tremendously interesting. I suggest, sir, that when we come to financing this new plan of social security Mr. Lamontagne be called in, and his professional opinion that the time has come for a reduction in income tax be carried into effect, regardless of whether or not there is a balanced budget, because when he was an economist before he became a politician he did not believe in a balanced budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about this plan?

An hon. Member: He would take off the sales tax, too.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes. He spoke of a reduction in taxation. Certainly no government in so short a time has increased taxation on so many.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They talk about reducing taxes. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce were not in Saskatoon trying to sell a second class product today to the people of that city in my province, I would refer to the fact that they pointed out that a sales tax on building materials would increase the cost of construction. He apparently did not want anything of that. This is before Mitchell Sharp, the economist of 1950, became Minister of Trade and Commerce in the government of 1964.

It has been, Mr. Speaker, an interesting study in the course of manipulation in planning, a sinuous course which has been followed by this government and which now culminates in the application of something which each and every one of those who sit opposite and talked about it said was unnecessary, namely an amendment. Mr. Speaker, you are not surprised, you are not shocked, you are not disturbed. You have seen so much of this in the last 14 months that you would be surprised, shocked and disturbed were the government not to follow this course in this case, as in so many others. We thought we had touched bottom with changes, alterations, withdrawals and retreats one after the other as this government brought in some measure or other, advanced it to the house and then took it away again to be amended. Take for example the pension plan, which was brought in with a blare of trumpets and then taken back to the workshop of the minister of health and welfare even before it got on the road. Then it was found that it would not operate and the government produced another plan. Then they found that would not operate. As I was saying, we thought we had touched bottom, but this government has shown unfathomed depths in its incapacity in this case as in so many others.

What will be next, Mr. Speaker? We said 14 months ago that this amendment was necessary. At that time we did not have the same minister of justice. That minister of justice has gone to another reward; I do not know whether that was because of his opinion given in 1964 that a constitutional amendment was not necessary. I am sure the present minister would never have agreed with that, otherwise we would not have this measure before us today.

What I am saying, Mr. Speaker, is that this is the kind of dawdling and playing around which has characterized this government. I was in Saskatoon yesterday—I notice my absence was noted—and I think the harvest looks pretty hopeful. I found the people there talking about this pension plan, and they are starting to ask when they will get it. You remember, Mr. Speaker, immediately after the election the old pensioner who thought he was going to get an extra $10, but who found that the government would not act until we forced them by moving an amendment. This plan which will be brought in—providing there is not yet another change —will not be in effect for a long while. Payments will start, as I recall it, in 1966; contributions will start earlier. When the government brings in this legislation I think they should widen the powers for which they are now asking in the amendment so as to cover additional possibilities which may arise in the future.

As far as this amendment is concerned, we support it. We said that it was necessary in 1962, when this contention was ridiculed by those opposite. I am not going to clutter the record by repeating the loud denials of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin), or the lesser ones of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), or of other ministers, this galaxy who today occupy the front benches of the government. I would simply point out this—and it cannot be denied—that what they said was unnecessary is today the necessity which we said it was. When this amendment is passed, as I am sure it will be, and Westminster makes it law, we can thereby proceed to start to retrieve the loss of 14 months caused by the incapacity and stubborn tenacity with which this government bulled its way ahead, bringing in plans for parliament which were ineffective, ill-born, or at least ill-conceived. After 14 months what we said was necessary then is now being done.

We support this amendment and welcome the fact that it is being brought in now. I conclude where I began, namely by saying, what a commentary this is. When the front benchers of this government talk in such stentorian tones of what they are doing to bring about national symbols and national unity, while at the same time bringing about symbols of national disunity, we have to go to Westminster and say, "Will you please allow us to amend our constitution?" Not because this is what Westminster wants, but because there is not in this country of Canada that oneness, that determination of Canadians whatever their province, to join together as one nation to make this a great nation. No nation can achieve greatness when there are divisions within it which deny the right of the parliament of one's country to deal with one's own constitution.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we regret that there have been so many delays in connection with the proposed Canada pension plan. However, we are hopeful that this third start may be more successful than the other two turned out to be. There have been a number of references this week to history. Perhaps I might see a hopeful omen in the fact that we are making this third start on the 56th anniversary of the day that the first legislation in this country respecting pensions was dealt with in the House of Commons of Canada. It was on June 18, 1908, a day that I have a personal reason for recalling, that the Government Annuities Act was given its second reading and put through committee of the whole. Perhaps on this occasion a third start to the Canada pension plan on June 18, 1964, will be a little more successful.

Since there have been these delays, Mr. Speaker, we are also glad that the point has now been reached where we are facing the necessity of obtaining an amendment to the constitution. I should like to look at this question of obtaining an amendment to the constitution a little more objectively than, in my opinion, the previous speaker did. The fact is that prior to 1951 there were no references in the constitution to old age pensions, and therefore such old age pension legislation as we had was ours because it did not involve any direct tax or direct contribution for old age pensions. In other words, the original old age pensions act of 1926 was possible without any special authority in the British North America Act.

But when in 1951 it was proposed, as a result of the work of the committee on old age security to which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) referred, to bring in an old age security act, it was the opinion of the law officers that we had to obtain an amendment to the constitution. Why? Not because there was anything essentially different in the pensions that pensioners would receive—even the removal of the means test was not a constitutional problem—but because special taxes were going to be collected, taxes that were earmarked for the specific purpose of pensions. Therefore we had to obtain the amendment to the British North America Act that is contained in section 94A.

But we have reached the stage in our amending of the constitution of Canada where we seem to feel we have to get unanimity among the provinces and the federal government, so each time we get an amendment we get just the amendment that we need to fit the piece of legislation that is in mind at the time. In 1951 all we were seeking to do was to provide a pension that was partially contributory in the sense that special taxes would be collected. But it was only an old age pension. It was payable only at age 70 so far as the Old Age Security Act was concerned, and so section 94A was written just to meet that particular situation.

It strikes me that the first and second versions of the Canada pension plan, the one that was first presented to us on July 18 last year and the one that was presented to us on March 17 this year, were in order under the constitution as the constitution stands, because those versions of the Canada pension plan did not go into the field of survivors' or disability benefits, did not provide for payments for anyone who was to be entitled to those payments on any basis other than age. The provision for widows in the first and second versions included the requirement that such widows be of a certain age, at least 65. So I think it is quite clear that as versions Nos. 1 and 2 of the Canada pension plan stood, no further amendment to the British North America Act was necessary.

The reason we now require one, the reason that the former government felt that it required an amendment to the British North America Act, was that the new plan, as indeed the legislation envisaged by the former government, goes beyond old age, goes into the field of benefits for people who are not old in age but who would qualify for those benefits because of being left as orphans or dependants or widows, or as persons who are disabled. The reason, therefore, that we require today an amendment to the British North America Act is that versions Nos. 1 and 2 of the Canada pension plan, as a result of negotiations with the provinces, have been enlarged upon. We are moving into a broader field and that is the reason we need an amendment today. We are glad that the negotiations with the provinces have resulted in this decision to move into these other fields and therefore we welcome the step that is now being taken. I hope that this step being initiated today will be successful all down the line.

Remarks have already been made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and by the Leader of the Opposition about the strange irony of today's proceedings. We are in the middle of a week in which most of the talk in this chamber has been about our national identity, around the flag, around the symbols of nationhood. Yet here we are, despite our national identity, despite our independence as a nation within the commonwealth, finding that we have to go to the legislative halls of another country to get an amendment to our own constitution. The Leader of the Opposition referred to the irony of this situation. I hope he will not mind my correcting his words slightly. I think he said it was ironical that we should have to make an address to the British parliament. Actually our address is not to the British parliament; it is to Her Majesty the Queen of Canada. But it amounts to the same thing because we are asking her to place our proposal before the parliament of the United Kingdom.

I think the Prime Minister put it very well when he said we are employing means strangely out of date and inappropriate. This is all very true, Mr. Speaker, and we say it every time we have to do it. Every time the necessity arises for an amendment to the British North America Act we go through the ritual we are going through today. We say it is strangely out of date and inappropriate, but that we have to fall back on it, that it is the only means we have.

The excuse for not having repatriated our constitution is, of course, an understandable one, namely that we have not been able to reach agreement among the provinces as to what kind of constitution we would provide in Canada, and as to what the arrangements would be for amending that constitution. I want to urge that we should not leave until we have drafted some perfect constitution, the question of repatriating our constitution, the question of bringing it to Canada and making it a Canadian document. I think we should be smart enough to find a way to bring to Canada the present constitution as it is, leaving to the future the working out of an arrangement for amending the various sections, particularly sections 91 and 92. I suggest that this could be done.

There was circulated among all of us a few days ago an address by a gentleman who is the head of one of the commercial firms in the country. I forget his name for the moment. As a matter of fact, I lent my copy to someone else so I do not have it with me. But I do know that in the course of that address this gentleman referred to the words of J. B. McGeachy, a name known to all of us, who made what I thought, even though oversimplified, was a useful suggestion. He said: Why do we not just pass an act here in Canada declaring that the British North America Act of 1867, as amended by all of the amending acts across the years, be known as the constitution of Canada and that it be amendable in Canada by a device to be worked out later? That is an oversimplification, of course. There are difficulties, particularly in the latter part of that suggestion, but it does seem to me that Mr. J. B. McGeachy has a suggestion that the experts and the lawyers should look at as one that we should try to carry out. I believe we could pass an act in the parliament of Canada making the present British North America Act and all of its amendments, by our say-so and with the approval of the representative of Her Majesty, an act or a series of acts of this parliament.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Could I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Knowles: Certainly.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Since the British North America Act was set up to provide for the authority of the provinces as well as that of the federal government, would we not have to have the concurrence of the provinces?

Mr. Knowles: This is a very good question. I want to answer it and I will be glad to do so, but I suppose I had better do so at eight o'clock. I have the answer but it is one minute after five.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Knowles: All right, I will. I will be glad to. Mr. Speaker, may I try to answer this question as briefly as I can?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Knowles: You mean that one Conservative will not let another Conservative get an answer?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock the house will proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely private bills, notices of motions (papers), public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. S-8, respecting The General Accident Assurance Company of Canada—Mr. Wahn.

Bill No. S-9, respecting Scottish Canadian Assurance Corporation—Mr. Wahn.

Bill No. S-14, respecting The Dominion Life Assurance Company—Mr. Weichel.

Bill No. S-12, respecting Allstate Insurance Company of Canada—Mr. Ryan.

THE BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY OF CANADA

Mr. J. E. Brown (Brantford) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-27, respecting The Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity to say a few words.

I wish to point out to the house that the net income of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada for the year ended on December 31, 1963 amounted to $68.3 million.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether it would not be in the public interest that the federal charter of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada be completely revised, since in my opinion it is outdated.

I also wonder whether it would not also be in the interest of the Canadian people that the provinces consider the possibility of nationalizing the Bell Telephone Company of Canada within their territory.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. member will allow the Chair to interrupt him for a second, I should like him to show, if possible, how his remarks are related to the amendment before the house.

As the hon. member knows, he cannot take advantage of an amending bill to refer to other sections of the legislation to be amended.

Consequently, I would urge the hon. member to limit his comments to the substance of the amendment under consideration.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, if I refer to section 1 of this bill, I notice that subsection 8 reads as follows:

The business of the company shall be managed by a board—

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

If they want to increase the number of directors, it is surely to look after the business of the company. That means look after the company's earnings. Therefore one can surely talk about the earnings and profits made by the Bell Telephone Company of Canada in the Canadian areas where it is operating.

In short, that certainly allows me to make the necessary remarks as far as that public utility company is concerned. That is why I referred earlier to the net income of $68 million realized by the Bell Telephone Company of Canada. It is the largest monopoly in the world. There is none larger or more powerful in the whole world.

It is time that authorities concerned assumed their responsibilities and amended first the federal charter of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, which is a state within a state.

I do not wish to question the devotion to duty of this company's employees, who work in the best interests of the Canadian people. However, I feel bound to draw to the attention of the house this powerful monopoly, the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

I remember that, at a convention held by the chambers of commerce in L'Assomption, nationalization of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada was requested. Several organizations have also talked about that in the past and they are still talking about it.

With your kind permission, Mr. Speaker, I will read a few extracts of the report which was submitted by the chamber of commerce of L'Assomption about this matter.

[Text]

Mr. Francis: May I ask the hon. member a question. I am trying to follow the hon. member's remarks and he is probably aware, as are other hon. members, that most of the business of this company is outside the province of Quebec. Is he relating his remarks only to the activities of the company in the province of Quebec, or to its activities in the whole of Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, the charter of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada is a federal one, but the nationalization of that company is a provincial matter. First of all, may I point out that I encourage my province to take the necessary action to nationalize that company as soon as possible. I have nothing against that company's employees who give the best of themselves in the public interest; besides they are very well treated by the authorities of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

That company is very good to its employees but in a great number of regions in Canada it has no competition, it is entirely free to do as it pleases. That is why I feel that it would be in the public interest to nationalize that company since such a decision is up to the provinces.

In my view, the federal charter of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada is too old. Until the provinces take the necessary steps to nationalize the company within the scope of their jurisdiction, I feel that in the public interest the government should amend the act and refer the charter of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada to a special committee so that it might be brought into line with present day circumstances since, in my opinion, the company often abuses the wide powers it enjoys under its charter.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I will give a summary of the discussions held at the convention of the chamber of commerce of the Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm region—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think I was very lenient with the hon. member, since I allowed him to stray quite far from the subject matter under consideration. If the hon. member would read the explanatory notes of the bill, he will realize that the bill now before the house is rather limited. It deals exclusively with increasing the number of directors from 15 to 20.

I do not think that an amendment as explicit as this one permits discussion in this house of all the sections of the act concerning the company in question.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, if it is decided, through this bill, to increase from 15 to 20 the maximum number of board directors, it is surely because the Bell Telephone Company of Canada has made enormous progress in the country where it operates. This is one of the reasons why I wanted to draw the attention of the house to the huge profits made by that company. If profits were only $4 or 5 million, it would be acceptable, but they are of the order of $68 million, and it is only for that reason that—

[Text]

Mr. Pennell: I wonder if I may be allowed to ask the hon. member a question purely for my own information. Are there any other telephone companies operating in the province of Quebec?

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to answer—

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I suggest the question asked by the hon. member concerns an aspect of the matter which is again irrelevant and out of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked a question and, even if I come back to this matter, I can answer him without being out of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member would be out of order if he were to reply.

Mr. Pigeon: I also agree that private companies such as that of Mr. Jules Brillant, a member of the legislative council, should be taxed and should not be granted an exemption.

If this bill to increase from 15 to 20 the number of directors is introduced, it is surely not because the volume of business of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada has decreased. Each year, on the contrary, their profits have been increasing.

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I think the point you brought up a moment ago should be insisted upon. We are only dealing with a measure of an administrative nature, and yet my hon. friend is showing himself a supporter of the socialist philosophy.

I understand that he has been rejected by his party since he showed his intention to vote against the union jack, but that is no reason to betray his party.

Therefore, I still insist that this bill is a purely administrative resolution and that there is no reason to expound virtually communistic principles simply because the bill seeks to increase the number of directors.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to reply to the hon. member who is still inexperienced in the house by telling him that every year I have spoken about the Bell Telephone Company, and I know that many hon. members, including the President of the Privy Council (Mr. McIlraith), agree with a good deal of my contentions even if they sit on the government side.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member has no right to impute intentions, motives or feelings to an hon. member who is absent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

Mr. Pigeon: As concerns especially the province of Quebec, there has been some improvement as regards the bilingual staff and the promotion of French speaking Canadians, but this improvement is insufficient and, moreover, there are still complaints about bilingualism as applied in the telephone book. Things are not perfect, and so if the company wishes to get the sympathy of some members in this house, if the company wants us to co-operate in helping it to increase the number of its directors so its profits will be increasingly exorbitant, it might start by granting adequate promotions to bilingual Canadians, especially in the province of Quebec, in order that the public of that province be adequately served, for it is entitled to be attended to in its own language, be it one or the other. Such is its right.

Mr. Speaker, that is why I wanted to avail myself of this opportunity—

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Order.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I request your co-operation. I think that my intentions are well known and that I am entitled to express my opinion. I do not think too highly of the remarks of the hon. member who remained seated. The hon. member for Lotbinière rose to his feet when he tried to make his point. The hon. member for Longueuil has no right to take advantage of the fact he is on the government side to make remarks contrary to the rules of the house.

I know the company is powerful and it sometimes uses the appropriate means to get rid of persons it finds embarrassing. I say that because it is now time, in 1964, that the company's charter be entirely reviewed, at least until it is taken over by certain provinces as a public enterprise. I think it is urgent that its charter be entirely revised.

I remember, Mr. Speaker, that a few years ago, the company decided to build a telephone exchange in the town of Repentigny, though it had not even asked the municipal authorities for the necessary permit. Building was started without the previous consent of the civic authorities in Repentigny by just using—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I once more ask my hon. friend to limit his remarks to the bill now before us.

[Mr. Choquette.]

[Text]

Mr. Francis: May I ask, do I interpret the hon. member's remarks as objecting to the head office of this corporation being in the province of Quebec, in the city of Montreal? Would he prefer to see it outside that province, outside that city?

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had visited the province of Quebec and more particularly the city of Montreal, a little more frequently, he would see that the Bell Telephone Company controls the whole city of Montreal, and a vast area in the province of Quebec.

I am surprised at the hon. member's standing up so vigorously for that company. Does he have shares or an interest in it? Personally, my only concern is to defend the interests of the people of Quebec, and I am speaking from that angle only. Moreover, I know that a great number of hon. members share my views.

I remember that, during a former session—and I see some hon. members who agreed with me—

Mr. Dupuis: Never.

Mr. Pigeon: I made speeches against the Bell Telephone Company of Canada. I made them in the public interest, and I think the time has come for the hon. members to muster enough courage to express their views, at least as far as the federal jurisdiction and charter of this powerful company are concerned, because this company is the most powerful monopoly, second only to that of Mr. Khrushchev in U.S.S.R. In my opinion, it is urgent that the federal government should refer the charter of this company to the committee so that it can be revised.

[Text]

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Carleton): I cannot allow the remarks of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) to go unanswered. I think he has made a despicable attack on a thoroughly reputable organization which is attempting to do a job. I would point out to the hon. member that the operations of this company extend substantially beyond the confines of one province, though the head office is maintained in one province. I must tell the hon. member that if attacks of this kind on businesses such as the Bell Telephone Company are kept up they will do nothing but harm to the province of Quebec, whose interest he is supposed to have at heart. I regret having to speak in these terms, but it is the only language I can use in the light of the hon. member's own words, though it is language of a kind which hon. members of this house should refrain from using whenever possible. The head of this company is, I believe, a man whose native tongue is French. Lately the company has undertaken a program of public relations in an attempt to deal fairly and squarely with these issues, and I hope that when the board of directors is enlarged, representation will be given to the particular parts of this country in which its business is conducted.

Mr. Lamb: How many shares have you got?

Mr. Francis: I am not a shareholder in the Bell Telephone Company, and I will tell the hon. member that right away in response to his inquiry. But if the hon. member who made that interjection is thereby expressing agreement with the remarks made by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, I hope he will have the courage to get up and say so, because I think the people of Canada would like to know if he is a party—

Mr. Pigeon: I wish to ask a question. I would appreciate very much if the hon. member could name, around the world, another monopoly like the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

Mr. Francis: Again I do not like to answer in elementary terms, but the understanding of the hon. member is very limited. It seems there is a public authority which regulates telephone rates. Public utilities are often given franchises, which means that because of the technical nature of the service offered it is recognized that only a limited number of organizations can operate it. The procedure then is to regulate rates and charges. If the hon. member feels that the board of transport commissioners, or whatever authority is regulating the rates is not doing its job, his proper course would be to complain to that authority. If he does not think this is the correct remedy, I wonder what he hopes to achieve by these diatribes, these attacks on the integrity of an organization which, as far as I am concerned, is conducting its business reputably and honourably as a good citizen of our community. I do not intend to sit back and allow this kind of irresponsible, ultra-nationalist, socialist thought to be placed on record in Hansard without an answer being made, because I will have no part of it in any way, shape or form.

Mr. Pigeon: How many shares do you have?

Mr. Francis: For the record, I am not a shareholder in this company, nor is my wife nor are my children nor, to the best of my knowledge, is any member of my family. But if I were, I would be proud of it.

[Translation]

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

In the course of his remarks, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) said that I was speaking at the same time as he was. Now, I do not wish to discuss the principles he set forth, but I simply said that I find it strange that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm should want to trade bilingualism within the Bell Telephone Company for large profits.

In fact, he said: We are prepared to let the company make tremendous profits, provided there is bilingualism in its administration. Those are the remarks to which I object.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I could make a ruling now on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Longueuil. I think there was no question of privilege.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, as far as the question of privilege is concerned, the hon. member for Longueuil made a serious charge against me. He misquoted my remarks. I said that until such time as the provinces which wish to, will take their responsibility, and more particularly the province of Quebec, to nationalize the service of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada within their territory, the Bell Telephone Company should give more encouragement to bilingualism in the province of Quebec and favour the promotion of French Canadians.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, on that same question of privilege—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is groundless. Perhaps some hon. members should explain their remarks, but such explanations do not really constitute a question of privilege.

[Text]

Mr. Olson: I rise on a point of order. When the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm was speaking I distinctly heard him—over the translation system—accuse the hon. member for Carleton of having, as motivation for his interruption, the fact that he probably owns some shares in the Bell Telephone Company. The hon. member for Carleton stated specifically and clearly that he did not have any shares in this company. The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm interjected on two occasions since then, saying "How many shares have you got?" This is a direct violation of the rules of this house and I think the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm should apologize. I do not believe any member of this house should be able to get away with accusations of that kind and persist in them, despite a denial.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: The hon. member for Victoria, Ontario, made the same interjection, and those remarks also apply to him.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure it is not right for a member to suggest that other hon. members are contributing to a debate because they have a financial interest in a particular matter. I am sure the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) and the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario (Mr. Lamb) did not wish to impute motives to the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Francis), and I have the impression he was satisfied with this when he rose and denied that he had a financial interest in the company in question.

Perhaps the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm and the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario will accept the suggestion I am making to them, that they did not intend to impute to the hon. member for Carleton any such motive, and we might leave it at that.

[Translation]

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the remarks of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon), I just want to say how surprised I am to detect an obvious incompatibility between his party's principles and the socialist doctrine—

Mr. Pigeon: Progressive Conservative.

Mr. Choquette: —which he advocated in his remarks.

Private enterprise is the system which we respect in Canada, and I think that a great number of Canadians would like to see this system of private enterprise maintained, encouraged and strengthened.

[Mr. Olson.]

Mr. Speaker, if private enterprise is successful, there is cause to rejoice. Of course, everyone is against monopolies which crush or oppress, but that is not a sufficient reason for allowing the state to increase unduly its interference and to impose controls such as those advocated by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

The Bell Telephone Company of Canada is a prosperous company, everyone knows it, and I think that is to the credit of its president who is a French speaking Canadian. The service that the Bell Telephone Company of Canada gives to all its customers is excellent and I do not see how the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm can reach such radical, extremist and derogatory conclusions as those he expressed a few moments ago.

Mr. Speaker, I will not speak very long, but I could not let the rather wild remarks made by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm go unchallenged. I no longer recognize in him the pupil of Messrs. Antonio Barrette and Maurice Duplessis, the greatest enemies of nationalization and socialization, and I wonder what happened to the pupil of Messrs. Duplessis and Barrette—

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. member.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm speaks again, I take the liberty of reminding the hon. member for Lotbinière that he is also straying away from the matter in hand.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. member and ask him why he bears Mr. René Lévesque a grudge for having nationalized the Shawinigan Falls company which was a very small company compared with the monopolistic Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The question of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is definitely out of order.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I would have liked very much to answer the hon. member's question, but if you rule it out of order, I shall abide by your ruling. However, I had a ready answer.

There is no comparison possible between the nationalization of power companies and that of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada. In any case, since the nationalization of power companies is most advantageous to the province of Quebec, I do not see why the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is against it.

Mr. Speaker, the bill before the house deals with the activities of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada and section 1 reads as follows:

> The business of the company shall be managed by a board of not less than five nor more than 20 directors, as may from time to time be determined by resolution of the shareholders, and each such director shall be proprietor of at least ten shares in the capital stock of the company, or such other additional number of shares, not exceeding forty additional shares—

Mr. Speaker, I cannot see how the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm could enter upon such a ridiculous course as he did a while ago, when we are merely asked to increase the number of directors from 15 to 20.

Here is a company which has a gigantic capital and manages a gigantic affair. It merely asks that the number of its directors be increased.

The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm takes this opportunity to engage in quite a ridiculous demagogy and deliver an emphatic speech requesting the nationalization of a company which is merely submitting a petition of an administrative character, asking for an increase in the number of its directors.

What is wrong with that, Mr. Speaker? What is wrong with the fact that a company requests an increase in the number of its directors?

When a company does good business, it is quite normal and legitimate on its part to look for an increase in the number of its directors, with a view to better efficiency which, besides, has been excellent up to the present. Now, the company is more ambitious than that. It wishes to improve its efficiency. In my opinion, it is perfectly justified in submitting to the House of Commons the bill before us, and I feel that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is going astray—and it is not the first time, as everyone knows. Everybody knows, Mr. Speaker, how he flies off at a tangent when a serious matter is being discussed; he always tries to divert the question and invariably places it on the level of petty politics.

Mr. Pigeon: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) claims I am not acting in the public interest in this house. He has no right to question the work I am doing in the House of Commons and, if he wanted to prove he is working in the public interest, he could be present in the house more often and follow the example of the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

Mr. Choquette: I am taking note of the comments made by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, but—

Mr. Dupuis: Ridiculous.

Mr. Choquette: —I doubt very much, Mr. Speaker, that his contribution in this house—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Choquette: —is as valuable as he claims.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not imagine the hon. member wishes to continue dealing with the contribution made to this house by another hon. member, nor do I think such is the question now before us.

Mr. Choquette: I thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall continue my remarks on the bill under consideration.

I do not see why the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is opposed to the bill, for I remember that the number of members on the C.N.R. board of directors was increased from seven to 12 under a Conservative government. The principle of Bill No. S-27 is exactly the same. I do not see why the hon. member is so strongly opposed to it—

Mr. Pigeon: It was a crown corporation.

Mr. Choquette: It does not make sense. Whether or not it is a crown corporation does not matter, Mr. Speaker, the principle is the same.

Mr. Dupuis: That is right.

Mr. Choquette: The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm should know —even if I know he does not know too much —that a crown corporation operates independently from the government. The government may sometimes grant financial aid to a crown corporation, but it operates as independently as a private company, like the Bell Telephone.

The bill seeks to increase the number of directors of the company, because it is expanding, prosperous, ambitious and daring in its prospects and its projects, and anxious to give satisfaction to the population. But the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm strongly objects to that. I wonder about the logic of his attitude and what he is driving at.

That is why I want to conclude by saying that the bill before the house is excellent. We are dealing with a highly efficient company and it would be advisable to grant what it is asking the House of Commons.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, wonders never cease. When I heard the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) urging the nationalization of the Bell Telephone Company I realized that his close association with this group has had some influence on his political philosophy. We are pleased to welcome him into the ranks of those who see the necessity for the public ownership and control of public utilities such as the Bell Telephone Company, and so on.

Mr. Choquette: Communist.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lotbinière called me a communist—

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pigeon: —he should withdraw his remarks—

Mr. Dupuis: —I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Pigeon: I rise on a question of privilege, which has priority over a point of order, as you should know as Minister without Portfolio.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

[Text]

Would hon. members resume their seats. I believe the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) is rising on a question of privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has made an accusation against me which is absolutely false and ridiculous.

If a government has ever nationalized crown corporations, it is certainly this government. On the other hand, the Quebec government has nationalized the Shawinigan company and I do not think that it is a communist government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pigeon: The hon. member should withdraw his words.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I did not hear what the hon. member for Lotbinière said.

[Mr. Choquette.]

Mr. Dupuis: He said that Khrushchev was a communist.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm objects to certain words, he should mention them and then we could hear the possible explanations or the withdrawal of those words by the hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I have specifically mentioned them. I would not want the hon. member to mistake the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm for his father who was a member of the Godbout administration, the most rotten administration the province of Quebec ever had.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Choquette: That is communism, Mr. Speaker.

[Text]

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, these interruptions are interesting and somewhat unusual. However, I think it is most unfair for the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) to suggest that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) is a communist. The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm could just as well say that the hon. member for Lotbinière is a communist because the communist party supports the Pearson pennant. I do not think this makes any contribution to the debate, but it does indicate what a ferment our society is in. Never did I expect to see the day when a member of the Progressive Conservative party would take such a strong stand with respect to nationalizing a public utility, and I congratulate the hon. gentleman. In contrast, let us remember the great advocate of republicanism, liberalism and freedom from control who has just made a blatant defence of one of the worst forms of free enterprise. We have the worst form here, because the Bell Telephone Company is controlled by the American Telephone Company, a fact which we discovered during hearings of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines some years ago. We also discovered that it is controlled to the extent that all the patents used by the Bell Telephone Company are controlled by a subsidiary of the American Telephone Company.

Mr. Choquette: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Herridge: Certainly.

Mr. Choquette: I should like to ask the hon. member whether he himself is the owner of a private telephone company.

Mr. Herridge: Yes, I am quite willing to admit that. Under the isolated circumstances in which I live my family owns a 40 mile telephone line in order to telephone our neighbours. Let me say that it is operated on a community basis and is a thoroughly socialist enterprise. We lose several hundred dollars a year, and we make no profit whatever because we provide free service to a number of the members of the community. We have one subscriber who pays us $2.25 a month. So I am really fulfilling the functions of a public utility which, to date, the B.C. Telephone Company has not wished to assume, although I have suggested to the company on a number of occasions that it would be very nice if they would purchase our company, and give this profit free service.

Mr. Choquette: Would the hon. member permit another question. I am wondering whether the hon. member would easily accept the nationalization of his own company?

Mr. Herridge: Yes, that is what I am getting at. We would be delighted. We are carrying it on at considerable loss because of our public spiritedness, which we can scarcely afford.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I support the principle of the argument put forward by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, and I can see from the nodding heads that he has many other converts to this principle in the Progressive Conservative party. This shows that you cannot judge the political philosophy of parties today, whether they be Conservative or Liberal; it depends so much on the individual nowadays. But I for one, and I know I also speak for the members of my party, am very pleased to see this conversion to our political philosophy and their advocacy of the same in the House of Commons. We trust that serious consideration will be given by the persons concerned, particularly the people of Ontario, to bringing this company under public ownership so that the profits remain in Canada, the control returns to Canada, so Canadians will also have full control over the services. I do not criticize any officers of the company under these circumstances; they are simply performing their duties under a free enterprise, profit seeking system. In conclusion, I did not intend to speak in this debate, but my heart was warmed and thrilled on listening to the speech of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a few remarks to make concerning Bill No. S-27 respecting The Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

In principle, this bill is rather simple, as noted by several other members who have spoken before me, because it only requests an increase in the maximum number of directors from 15 to 20, that is five new directors.

Now, this bill has not yet been considered by the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. In my opinion, several items could have been cleared up before it is passed tonight.

We would like to know the number of capital shares of this company at present, the Canadian shares and the American shares. We would also like to know the names of the directors of this company. We would like amendments to be brought in after explanations have been given.

That is why we would like to have more time to consider this bill, since the last paragraph provides that the majority of the directors shall reside in Canada. In my opinion, it is not so much the appointment of five other directors which is important but rather the number of new shares which will be necessary to get those directors elected.

Indeed, if the company has developed—and I must admit that it gives good service in general, although there may be some places in Quebec or elsewhere in Canada where the service is not quite as good—it should be able to appoint five new directors if it is authorized to do so.

This company will be able, at the same time, to look carefully into the complaints made in the house today.

I do not agree at all with the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm who suggests—

Mr. Choquette: He is not the only one.

Mr. Rondeau: And not necessarily with the hon. member for Lotbinière who suggests that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is actually urging that the Bell Telephone Company of Canada should be nationalized.

As a matter of principle, we have always been against the nationalization of companies, because while we feel that a trust or private monopoly is bad, a state monopoly is no better.

It would be a lot easier to inquire into the rates charged by the Bell Telephone Company of Canada for long distance calls as well as for service, which are too high, it is true; in fact, we must admit that the rates are too high and that they are rising steadily.

The company of course makes a profit, of which I am not jealous. It is quite all right for the shareholders who have invested some capital in the Bell Telephone Company of Canada to make a profit. But, in view of the fact that, at the present time, that company has a monopoly which gives it absolute control, if we want to call it that, over all the long distance or other telephone services in the province and in the country, it is free from any competition and it is, therefore, in full control of the situation.

For instance, it is very costly to make a long distance call to a place located only 50 miles away, whereas if the call is placed to a very distant place, the charges are low, so to speak. I have placed calls to places located only 50 miles away, which cost me $2.00, that is the same as for calls lasting the same length of time to Toronto, which is located 300 or 400 miles farther.

I feel that if five new directors are appointed, if everything remains the same within the Bell Telephone Company, surely it is our responsibility to keep our eyes open about the activities of that company which now has a monopoly and absolute control over that service.

I would rather favour the establishment of a control board that would examine the administration of the company outside of the present board of directors, which will be enlarged.

The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm said that he was in favour of a state enterprise; we already have one in the province of Quebec.

As far as the hon. member for Lotbinière is concerned, he has contradicted himself. He has praised private enterprise and said that it was the best production system in the world.

An hon. Member: It is true.

Mr. Rondeau: And in his concluding remarks, he said that the nationalization of electric power in the province of Quebec was a splendid achievement and very profitable to private enterprise and to the government. Whereupon, I might say that he has been as much of a demagogue as the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the management of that important company throughout Canada be thoroughly examined by the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, which has not yet had the opportunity of studying the bill. However, the present management of the company would be asked a great many questions. Some improvements might be suggested—for instance, that Canadian capital in this company be raised to 51 per cent.

I wonder whether the bill before us is not rather a means of transferring an apparent American control into the hands of some new Canadian directors, in order to avoid the 15 per cent tax on American capital in Canada.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I brought those few remarks to your attention, in order to ask the house to refer the bill to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, so as to have various aspects of the matter thoroughly examined.

[Text]

Mr. M. J. Moreau (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, it was with a great deal of surprise that I noted the heat which this simple little bill has generated. I cannot see why the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) raised the argument he did. I just cannot see where the adoption or rejection of this bill has anything to do with the nationalization of the Bell Telephone Company, and I would suggest to the hon. member that if he has strong feelings in this regard the proper place to make such a speech would be in the provincial legislature of either Ontario or Quebec.

It is interesting to listen to the arguments advanced by the hon. member who just took his seat with regard to monopoly type corporations, public utilities which are virtually in themselves monopolies, and I think many members would have some sympathy with the idea of nationalization in an industry where competition is impossible. But as I said, I do not see how the adoption or rejection of this bill has anything to do with the nationalization of the Bell Telephone Company.

I wonder about the motives of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm in making the speech he did at this particular time. I would certainly have appreciated it if the hon. member had risen and withdrawn the remarks he made about the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Francis) concerning the ownership of shares. If the purpose of the hon. member's imputation was not to discredit the hon. member for Carleton, I do not know why it was made at all. I think we would have all been interested in hearing an explanation from the hon. member rather than from yourself, Mr. Speaker.

I would be quite prepared to entertain arguments for and against nationalization, particularly in the case of a utility company which by its very nature is monopolistic. However, I must remind the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) that whereas the charges of foreign ownership may be true in part there is another side to the argument. I think all hon. members know that the Bell Telephone Company of Canada does have its shares listed on the Toronto and Montreal stock exchanges and also that there are thousands of Canadian shareholders of the Bell Telephone Company. As a matter of fact, it is one company in our economy that has been acting in every way as a Canadian citizen, and it has certainly played a very large role in the development of our communications system.

I would even suggest to the hon. member for Kootenay West that his telephone line would not be very much good if he did not enjoy the benefit of the communications system existing in this country brought about in large part through the co-operation of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada. I am not suggesting for a moment that the Bell Telephone Company or other telephone companies co-operate with the hon. member out of the goodness of their hearts. It is probably very good business for them to do so, although from the description of the operation given by the hon. member I am beginning to wonder how generous they are in some cases.

I find nothing objectionable in the bill increasing the number of directors. I also suggest to the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm that he may even find that the company is seeking to do this in order to increase the number of French Canadian directors on the board. I am surprised that objection has been taken.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, it is six o'clock. The hon. member has killed the bill. Six o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Shall I call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pigeon: You killed the bill.

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, may I have the consent of the house to refer Bill No. S-28 to the committee on banking and commerce?

[Text]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock p.m. this day are as follows:

The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Horner), Canadian flag, alleged card game concerning proposed design; the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Rhéaume), bilingualism and biculturalism commission, enlargement of scope of investigation; the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin), transport, alleviation of great backlog of freight shipped to Newfoundland.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

ADDRESS REQUESTING AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR SURVIVORS' AND DISABILITY BENEFITS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That a humble address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen in the following words:

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the ..... Commons of Canada in parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that you may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to be expressed as follows:

An act to amend the British North America Act 1867.

Whereas the Senate and House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled have submitted an address to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom for the enactment of the provisions hereinafter set forth:

British North America Act

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

Amendment as to legislation respecting old age pensions. 30 & 31 Vict., c. 3; 9 Eliz. II, c. 2.

1. Section ninety four A of the British North America Act, 1867 is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor:

Legislation respecting old age pensions and supplementary benefits.

"94A. The parliament of Canada may make laws in relation to old age pensions and supplementary benefits, including survivors' and disability benefits irrespective of age, but no such law shall affect the operation of any law present or future of a provincial legislature in relation to any such matter."

Short title and citation.

2. This act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1964, and the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1960, and this act may be cited together as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1964.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, when this debate was interrupted at five o'clock I was in the midst of making a suggestion as to a course of action that might save us from this ironical situation of having to send an address to Westminster every time we want an amendment to our constitution. Just at that point the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Muir) had asked me a question and I was prepared to answer but for the fact that some hon. members called it five o'clock. My hon. friend's question related to the fact that the British North America Act is the constitution, fundamentally, not only for Canada as a federal state but for our various provinces.

I believe I state my friend's question correctly when I say he asked me if I did not think the provinces should be consulted with respect to any basis upon which we would try to repatriate our constitution. I want to answer that question. May I do so, unless my hon. friend puts a further question to me, by stating what I think we should do.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that every time we require an amendment to our constitution we go through the same rhetoric that we have had in this house today. We say it is ironical; we say it is inappropriate, that it is out of date, but there is nothing else for us to do. We put off until some later time the actual repatriation of our constitution. I think it is fair to say that the repatriating of our constitution breaks into two parts. First of all, there is the question of getting it over here into Canada. Second, there is the question of reforming it, changing it to make it closer to what we might want. I think our difficulty is that we cannot do these two things at one and the same time because we cannot agree on a formula for amending the constitution, or the other changes we might want to make in it. Therefore we put off the first step of bringing it here to Canada.

My suggestion therefore is—and as I said this afternoon I took the idea from something attributed to Mr. J. B. McGeachy—that we should take the first step right away, that is we should bring to Canada our constitution exactly as it is now. We should not, in this first process, seek to make any changes in it at all. We should just bring it to Canada in its present form. I suggest that the way to do that is for us, in the parliament of Canada, to pass an act, which would have royal assent before it would be law, declaring the present British North America Act and all its amending acts to be statutes of the parliament of Canada.

At that point the hon. member for Lisgar put to me the question, should not the provinces be consulted before such a step is taken? I say, readily, the answer is yes.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): I wonder if I might ask the hon. gentleman a supplementary question at this point?

Mr. Knowles: Certainly; go ahead.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Is it not a fact that the agreement of the provinces for the repatriation of our constitution has not been forthcoming in the past?

Mr. Knowles: Yes, that is true, because every time in the past we have tried to get provincial agreement to the repatriation of the constitution we have had, at the same time, a proposal for amending it. I think the provinces might agree to bringing the constitution to Canada, even though they would not agree to some particular change that is being proposed. I am trying to suggest a means of repatriation to which I think the provinces, after some consultation, would agree.

Let me outline briefly the situation as it now exists. When we want to get an amendment to the constitution, we think it is difficult. Actually, I do not suppose anywhere in the world the constitution of a state the size of ours can be amended with as little legislative process as is the case for Canada. What do we do? We pass a resolution in this House of Commons and we ask the members of the other house to pass the same resolution. In both cases, it is a one stage debate. It is not a bill with first, second and third readings or any committee of the whole stage. It is just a one stage proposition so far as debate is concerned, and that is all there is to it.

The next step is for the address that has been passed at the one stage debate in this house and the one stage debate in the other house, to be transmitted to Her Majesty. She causes the bill that is included in our resolution to be presented to the parliament at Westminster. It is a rule with them over there not to discuss it at all. The bill is presented and somebody says in amazement, what is this? It is pointed out that it is a request from Canada for an amendment to the constitution of Canada, and it is passed without any debate whatever. Any suggestion that there is any protection, any hold-up in the amending of our constitution because it has to go to Westminster, is a myth. There is no protection; there is nothing there at all. It is the simplest legislative process for amending a constitution that there could possibly be. There is a one stage debate in this house, a one stage debate in the other house, and the rest of it is so much rubber-stamping, so much red tape.

If my hon. friend from Lisgar will hold his question for a moment, I suggest that instead of our passing an address to Her Majesty asking her to place our amending proposal before the United Kingdom parliament, we should pass an address of this house and an address of the other house to His Excellency, the Governor General of Canada, asking him to cause to be placed before the parliament of Canada a bill to amend the constitution.

I immediately direct hon. members' attention to the fact that that process would actually be legislatively lengthier than the present process, because then we would have the one stage debate which we have now on this resolution, and afterwards a bill would come before parliament with first and second readings, consideration in committee of the whole and third reading, in this house, and in the other place as well.

Some years ago there were amendments to the British North America Act which were obtained without the consent of the provinces. I recall in my own day in this parliament when one of the provinces actually objected to an amendment sought by this parliament. No attention was paid to that objection at Westminster. But in more recent years, with the exception of the amendments passed under our right to pass amendments to our constitution regarding things that are purely federal, any amendments that touched the boundary line between section 91 and section 92 of the B.N.A. act, in all cases were not sought by this parliament until it had the unanimous agreement of the provinces. That tradition, I suggest, is so well established that it is as good as law.

Just as this government, in the last few weeks or couple of months, has engaged in consultations with the provinces to get this amendment that is now before us for a specific purpose, in a similar manner I believe the provinces would agree to the kind of proposal I have outlined, because what we would be asking the provinces to agree to is just the taking of one step, bringing to Canada the present constitution exactly as it is without any change.

The only difference we would make so far as amending it—until such time as a constituent assembly might do something about it—the only change we would make, instead of going through the form we are now going through of sending an address to Her Majesty asking her to place a bill before the parliament of Westminster, is that we would pass a resolution addressed to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada, asking him to place a bill before parliament, and we would debate it ourselves.

Undoubtedly questions may be asked about this. Maybe somebody else has a better idea. But I do think it is something less than dignified for us to be talking so much as we are these days about our nationhood and independence, and yet forever to be going through this form of getting an amendment to our own constitution by having to send a request to the legislative halls of another country.

So, I place that suggestion before the house, before the government, hoping it might be thought about in between the times when amendments are introduced. This question never seems to be faced seriously except when we are actually in the throes of trying to get an amendment to the constitution. Unless some leadership along this line is given, then you can bet your last half dollar, or last half crown if you want—

Mr. Winkler: Or your boots.

Mr. Knowles: —or your boots, that come the next time for an amendment to the constitution, whatever government is in power will stand up and say again that this is an ironical situation, that this is outdated, that we should not be doing it this way, that we should have our constitution here, but that so far this is the only machinery we have got.

Surely the provinces have had enough experience with amendments that change the boundary line between sections 91 and 92 to know that no action is taken in that area without unanimous agreement among the provinces and the federal government. Surely, therefore, they would respond to this kind of suggestion. I believe all of them would feel happier if they knew we were doing it here.

I suspect that when this amendment reaches Westminster and the House of Commons and the House of Lords have to deal with it, some of the members will wonder what is going on that Canada, which they think of as an independent nation, equal in status with Britain in the commonwealth, has to send them such a request.

I suggest that this question be faced seriously. Let it not be something we just talk about. In the same way as we have taken other nettles and grasped them and tried to do something about them, we should grasp this one and achieve this symbol of nationhood, namely having our constitution here in Canada. I do not know if I have answered the question my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Muir) had in mind or not, but I take it his silence gives consent.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): I would be very pleased to oblige the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member had better get to his own seat then.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): May I speak from another seat here?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Is it not a fact any time a discussion on the repatriation of a constitution has taken place with the provinces, one of the provinces in particular has trusted the British parliament more than it was willing to trust the Canadian parliament? Further, if the situation outlined by the hon. gentleman were achieved, is it not a fact that this particular province, or any province for that matter, could tie up the constitution for years in the Supreme Court?

Mr. Knowles: I thank my hon. friend for the question. First may I say it is my proposal that before we pass the kind of act I am suggesting we should consult with the provinces. The other answer I give is that unless I am mistaken—and I would be glad to be corrected if I am—each time there has been any discussion with the provinces about repatriating the constitution it has not been simpliciter, it has not been on the sole grounds of bringing the constitution to Canada as it now is. The discussion has always included some formula for amending it, some formula with respect to the dividing line between federal and provincial jurisdiction. My suggestion is that initially we bring the constitution to Canada unchanged, that we take it just as it is, for the sole purpose of having it come under our own national domain.

This debate, Mr. Speaker, revolves around two things, one being the method we have to use or get our constitution amended, and the other is the subject matter of the amendment that is before us in the resolution of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson). As has already been indicated, we welcome the subject matter of the amendment. We are glad that the current understanding between the federal government and the provinces is that a Canada pension plan, with provisions for survivor and disability benefits, is agreed upon, and we hope this amendment can not only be enacted at the earliest possible moment but that, without any delay, the new Canada pension plan itself will be brought in so that we can get it on our statute books.

For my part this is far more important than another matter that is under discussion these days, and I hope before the weather gets much warmer we will have gone through the whole process not only of getting this amendment but of getting the actual Canada pension plan on our statute books.

There are one or two things about the wording of this amendment that leave me with something less than complete satisfaction. This afternoon the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) asked the Prime Minister whether the proposed Canada pension plan would include a provision, for Canadians in the rest of the provinces, similar to that which the province of Quebec has announced for Canadians who live within that province. He referred in particular to a requirement that other pension plans dovetail in with the Canada pension plan in a certain way. I see the difficulties involved. I also see there is no chance of the federal parliament moving in that direction under section 94A as proposed. That is obviously in the field of property and civil rights and I would say that in this respect the amendment to the constitution we are considering does not go far enough. I must also draw attention to the fact that the phrasing of the section 94A which has now been agreed upon does not remove certain words which were there before—words which seem to give to provincial legislatures the power in the future to veto, to declare null and void, decisions of the federal parliament. I am referring of course to the last few words which say:

> —but no such law shall affect the operation of any law present or future of a provincial legislature in relation to any such matter.

I suppose this was a case of having to present to us what could be agreed on by all 11 governments, but I think it is unfortunate that when 94A was being revised this somewhat complicated phrase which has stood in the way of certain other negotiations was not amended.

Perhaps it might be useful to have on record somewhere in today's Hansard the two sections 94A alongside each other. The Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition both referred in their speeches to the old section and to the new section. Neither of them read the sections in full. I should like to do so. Section 94A as it now stands, reads as follows:

> It is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada may from time to time make laws in relation to old age pensions in Canada, but no law made by the parliament of Canada in relation to old age pensions shall affect the operation of any law present or future of a provincial legislature in relation to old age pensions.

The new 94A as it will stand after this resolution is passed and the rest of the red tape has been completed will read as follows:

> The parliament of Canada may make laws in relation to old age pensions and supplementary benefits, including survivors' and disability benefits irrespective of age, but no such law shall affect the operation of any law present or future of a provincial legislature in relation to any such matter.

I do not intend to take these phrases and dissect them word by word. I would merely point out there has been a slight change in the wording of the opening part and also a slight change at the end. The change might not be material in either case, though one never knows what may happen when questions such as this go before the courts in the course of the years. The substance of the change is, of course, in the middle part of the proposed new section where there has been added to old age pensions the reference to supplementary benefits, survivors' and disability benefits irrespective of age.

I find it somewhat unfortunate that it was not possible to include wider provisions such as may be necessary with respect to disability pensions and survivors' benefits and, possibly, to the operation of the Canada pension plan as a whole. I think it is also unfortunate that this future veto power over federal legislation which seems to exist in the hands of the provinces under the wording of 94A, both as it now stands and as it will be after this resolution has passed, has been allowed to continue. Nevertheless, despite one's feeling that it should be better, it is good we should be taking this step; it is very good, in fact, that we are actually doing something about survivors' benefits and improving the position of people who are disabled during their working years. And I am glad to know that on the passing of this amendment to the British North America Act it will be possible to bring in the third version of the Canada pension plan which, despite the fact that it is still not all it should be, is an improvement over what we had in the two earlier versions.

So, I repeat, we welcome the substance of the amendment before us. We wish it were possible for us to do this piece of work—the amending of the B.N.A. Act—here in Canada as a grown-up nation. We hope we shall be able to attend to that matter very soon. In the meantime, once we do get this amendment through, let us get on with the job of placing this most important piece of legislation—I refer to the Canada pension plan—on the statute books of this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Chapdelaine (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak very long and I do not pretend either to be an expert in constitutional matters. However, I would like just the same to express the views of our party about the proposed amendment under consideration.

First of all, I would like to say that we support that motion to amend the constitution because we have no choice in the matter; indeed at the present time, pensions which will be paid to widows, orphans, disabled people who have contributed to a pension plan could not be voted if we refused to approve that amendment to the constitution.

Nevertheless, may I make a few timely remarks in regard to the situation in which we are now faced with the problem of amending the constitution.

We already know that all provinces have agreed to that amendment, and we are glad to note that the province of Quebec has also given its assent. I believe that this province decided to agree following sensible negotiations.

If we examine both resolutions, we note a strange likeness between the two and it is for the benefit of this legislation that it will be passed.

The resolution concerning the amendment submitted by the federal government reads as follows:

> The parliament of Canada may make laws in relation to old age pensions and supplementary benefits, including survivors' and disability benefits irrespective of age, but no such law shall affect the operation of any law present or future of a provincial legislature in relation to any such matter.

The motion submitted to the Quebec legislature is drafted along the same lines and reads as follows:

> However, no existing law shall affect the operation of any law present or future of provincial legislatures in relation to any such matter.

We can conclude then that there has undoubtedly been consultation. I do not object to that; on the contrary, I am very happy about it.

I heard the Leader of the Opposition state this afternoon that he was unable to introduce his pension plan because the province of Quebec had not agreed to this amendment; I would say, Mr. Speaker, that if the province of Quebec refused its consent at that time, it was perhaps because the Diefenbaker government would not guarantee that the rights of Quebec would be safeguarded.

I think that any federal government should take this into account at the present time, because the province of Quebec, due to its present economic, cultural and social development, will never tolerate to have its rights infringed by a central government unwilling to acknowledge its special status.

I am glad that this government was successful in its negotiations with the province of Quebec in respect to this amendment. I am also convinced that if the Diefenbaker government had remained in office, it would have been impossible to reach an agreement because I am under the impression that the present Leader of the Opposition has some kind of grudge against Quebec which is becoming more and more obvious.

Mr. Pigeon: That is not true.

Mr. Chapdelaine: I shall even go further and say that if we still had a Conservative government in power, confederation would be a thing of the past, because Quebec would have separated.

Mr. Pigeon: What you are saying is untrue.

Mr. Côté: That is an impression.

[Mr. Chapdelaine.]

Mr. Chapdelaine: This is all the more true, Mr. Speaker, as—

Mr. Pigeon: Be logical.

Mr. Chapdelaine: —the Leader of the Opposition does not even have now the support of the Conservative members from Quebec.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has just made a gratuitous statement.

Mr. Chapdelaine: When the vote is taken on the flag issue, we will have an opportunity to see whether my contention is true or not.

If the present Leader of the Opposition had acted with more diplomacy when he wanted to negotiate with Quebec, I feel that he might have obtained the same results as both the provincial and the federal governments have obtained as far as relations with Ottawa was concerned.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the hon. member for Sherbrooke, if he will permit.

Mr. Chapdelaine: I have no objection.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pigeon: Sit down. I am going to ask my question. Is the hon. member talking about the Conservative party? Can he tell the house whether he shares the views of the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Leboe) who spoke on behalf of his party on the flag issue?

Mr. Chapdelaine: Mr. Speaker, I do not share them at all, and I am proud to say so.

Mr. Marcoux: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm has just said that the hon. member for Cariboo spoke on behalf of his party, which is totally incorrect, since he said himself, on many occasions, and especially at the outset of his remarks:

> The views that I express will be entirely my own and certainly will not involve concurrence by any other member of this group.

I am asking the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm to kindly withdraw his words.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I am happy to find out, with my colleagues, that Mr. Thompson's party is divided in two, once again.

[Text]

Mr. Pickersgill: You had better get a mirror.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I think the debate is slowly drifting away from the resolution before the house. I ask the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Chapdelaine) to continue his remarks and to remain as closely as possible within the resolution before the house.

Mr. Pigeon: I support your views, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Chapdelaine: Mr. Speaker, it may seem that I have somewhat deviated from the resolution before us, but I think that in the study of an amendment to the constitution, we should take into account the background and former work and see why there have been some failures and why we have not yet been in a position to repatriate our constitution.

I firmly believe, that the attitude of the Leader of the Opposition during the six years he was in power is the reason why we have not made any progress in that direction. The Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The allegations of the hon. member for Sherbrooke are completely false, because if there is a party which has contributed to the promotion of the cause—

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pigeon: Sit down. I rose on a point of order, let me speak.

Mr. Favreau: I rise on a point of order—

Mr. Pigeon: Do not apply closure. Sit down.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. Will both hon. gentlemen sit down, please.

Mr. Pigeon: The Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau), too.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pigeon: Sit down, you. He refuses, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) rose on a point of order.

Mr. Pigeon: Yes, Mr. Speaker. He was on nothing.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I have risen on a point of order, too.

Mr. Pigeon: I was on a point of order. Sit down. You are after me.

Mr. Favreau: The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm was making a speech.

Mr. Pigeon: I am on a point of order. He is on nothing, on no point, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. Perhaps the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm would give the Speaker an opportunity to speak, and perhaps the Minister of Justice would allow me to hear the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm; and then I will hear the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pigeon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; you protect the rights of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm. Thank you very much. I disagree with the statement made by the member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Chapdelaine). He was completely wrong in his statement. Mr. Diefenbaker, my leader, did his best in the public interest, and we were defeated because of the collusion of the Liberals with Social Credit.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I must advise the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm that, while he may have some disagreement with what has been said by the hon. member for Sherbrooke, I do not think the remarks he just made really constitute a point of order.

Mr. Pigeon: But I think the Minister of Justice—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The hon. member for Sherbrooke.

Mr. Pigeon: On a point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): The hon. member for Sherbrooke.

[Translation]

Mr. Chapdelaine: Mr. Speaker, I have said and I repeat that if no progress has been made in the negotiations to repatriate our constitution during the last years, it is only on account of the attitude taken by the Leader of the Opposition and people such as the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

Mr. Speaker, how can we expect the Leader of the Opposition to get along with the Quebec Liberals when he is not even enable to get along with his own members from the province of Quebec? He could not even get the hon. member for Three Rivers to second his amendment on the flag motion—

Mr. Pigeon: That is untrue.

Mr. Chapdelaine: —and I shall go even further and say that he found no seconder for his amendment on the flag motion, as can be seen in Hansard.

[Text]

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; this debate has strayed far away from the matter in hand, and I would suggest that the hon. gentleman who is now speaking is out of order.

Miss LaMarsh: Your leader started it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I would have to agree with the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Muir) and I will once again ask the hon. member for Sherbrooke to confine his remarks as closely as possible to the motion before the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I am sure the hon. member for Sherbrooke will do that in the remaining remarks he intends to make.

[Translation]

Mr. Chapdelaine: In any case, I was coming back to more serious considerations.

Now that better relations seem to prevail between Quebec or French Canada and the federal government, now that people are beginning to understand that co-operative federalism can exist and that Canada can live with Quebec just as Quebec can live with Canada, we should consider repatriating the constitution immediately.

It was said this afternoon that the present situation is anachronistic because we have to go to London to vote pensions to needy mothers, widows and orphans.

At this point, I should like to quote the introduction of the speech delivered at—

[Text]

In a speech delivered to the judge advocate general's conference in Ottawa on May 3, 1961, Mr. Driedger, Q.C., in his introduction, said:

> Canada is unique among the independent nations of the world in that she does not possess complete power to amend her own constitution. Canadians are well aware of this limitation on the sovereignty of their nation and many efforts have been made in the past to find a satisfactory method of mending the constitution of Canada in Canada. So far, these efforts have not been successful. Constitutional amendment was discussed briefly at the dominion-provincial conference of 1927.

[Mr. Chapdelaine.]

Then Mr. Driedger made continuous reference throughout his speech to the various occasions on which this subject has been discussed.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we have a speech by the former minister of justice, Mr. Chevrier, delivered on September 6, 1963 in Alberta before the Canadian Bar Association in which he stated:

> It is anachronistic that the oldest self-governing country of the commonwealth, except Great Britain, is the only one which has absolutely no legal power to amend its constitution. We have, in actual fact, the power to amend, since the United Kingdom parliament would amend the B.N.A.A. at the request of the Canadian government, but we do not have the legal power. I am sure that the parliament of the United Kingdom would like to be relieved of the responsibility of implementing the amendments requested by us and would gladly approve any piece of legislation which we would introduce to confer on ourselves full and final power to amend.

Such being the position taken by a former minister of justice—and to which, I imagine, the present one would subscribe—I cannot see why we should wait any longer before taking concrete steps towards the repatriation of our constitution.

I know it is not so much repatriation but a subsequent problem that would create some difficulty. I refer to the revision of the constitution which would have to be legalized and settled to the smallest detail before all the provinces could accept it.

Bearing those things in mind, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the present Minister of Justice to call a conference on the constitution immediately in order to solve this problem. Even if the conference should last for some time, I think the present Minister of Justice has no alternative, because of the pledge taken by his predecessors; he must keep the commitments made by his predecessor, especially those taken in the speech he made on September 6, 1963 before the annual meeting of the Canadian Bar Association, when he stated:

> It is now more urgent than ever to develop such a formula, for it would be most regrettable if we had to celebrate the centenary of confederation in 1967 without being a completely sovereign state in law as well as in fact. I intend to call a new conference on the constitution early in 1964 in order to consider this most important question.

That is the pledge which was taken by the Minister of Justice's predecessor in office and the present incumbent cannot ignore it. I would ask him to give immediate consideration to that undertaking and to try to convene a constitutional conference during the next few months, considering the climate which prevails at present concerning the debate on the national flag, a climate which makes us feel more independent, a climate which is improving as the discussion goes on, which is favourable to a better understanding between the two groups of citizens, French speaking and English speaking Canadians, and which will make our country stronger. In my opinion, the time is ripe for the convening of a constitutional conference.

I am sure that, by negotiations, we shall find the means to repatriate our constitution and to amend it right here in our country.

Besides, other speakers have mentioned and everybody agrees that it is nonsensical, both legally and socially, that in order to amend its constitution Canada should have to apply to a parliament which is not interested in our procedure and would gladly let us take our own initiatives in this field. I feel like the others that it is nonsensical that we have not yet devised a means to repatriate our constitution and to do whatever we want with it.

I express once again to the Minister of Justice my wish and that of my party that he will convene as soon as possible a constitutional conference in order to solve this problem once and for all.

I do not think it would take as much time as we imagine to arrive at a solution that would be fair to all parties.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, the motion under study is precisely a motion of the kind which may seem ridiculous in 1964. In 1867, such a motion could have been accepted, submitted overseas, returned to Canada and adopted by our own parliament after having been approved by another parliament. But it is ridiculous that such a motion should be presented in 1964, when for over 20 years, from both the Liberals and the Conservatives, we have heard serious statements, half-serious statements, sometimes untimely statements, to the effect that we are members of a sovereign nation, that we live in an entirely free and independent country, a country free from economic political and social ties.

In 1964, on this day, June 18, at page 3 of the order paper, we read:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that you may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kindom to be expressed as follows:

British North America Act

Whereas the Senate and House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled have submitted an address to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom for the enactment of the provisions hereinafter set forth.

1. Section ninety four A of the British North America Act, 1867 is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor:

The parliament of Canada may make laws in relation to old age pensions and supplementary benefits, including survivors' and disability benefits irrespective of age, but no such law shall affect the operation of any law present or future of a provincial legislature in relation to any such matter.

Mr. Speaker, three great points emerge from that motion.

First, the obligation for Canada to go to Westminster in order to amend the constitution, which definitely and clearly implies a suggestion of dependence and a state of inferiority.

Today, we heard the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) tell us that he was prepared, seven, six or five years ago, to introduce legislation to repatriate the constitution. Later on, we heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) saying how important it was to repatriate the Canadian constitution. And the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Chapdelaine) just repeated the same thing. As far as the Liberals are concerned, they go one better.

The government which is introducing this motion has among its members a gentleman who has placed on the order paper a notice of motion to the effect that parliament should pass legislation to amend the British North America Act in such a way that no resort would be necessary to the parliament of the United Kingdom. As a matter of fact, I wonder if the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) is not on the verge of delegating the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) to London to introduce the resolution now before the house.

Mr. Speaker, the same member is requesting the adoption of a distinctive flag which is the subject of the resolution now under consideration. Furthermore, he is asking that a Canadian citizen be no longer a British subject and that the word "dominion" be not used to designate Canada officially; that the supreme authority of Canada be symbolized in an essentially Canadian manner without reference to the sovereign of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Speaker, those ideas which are gaining ground with the Liberals, and similar concepts are taking root among the Conservatives. As to the members of the New Democratic party, they advocate a repatriation of our constitution.

Indeed, I think that the constitution would have been brought back long ago, and I wonder whether the original text has not been lost abroad, so that one would be able to determine whose signature it bears. For the past ten years or so, there has always been some talk about the constitution. I have begun to wonder whether the Minister of Justice will not, some day, state that the constitution having been put on some dusty shelf in the parliament of Westminster, the original text has been irretrievably lost, so that we should make out a new one here, in this parliament.

The second point which emerges from the motion before us is the opportunity and the need of having a truly Canadian constitution and, as various hon. members stated this afternoon, a constitution which would be conceived by Canadians for Canadians, and not for one single element of Canada.

This does not mean that we are rejecting everything which has come to us from England. I would be the first to admit—and this may come as a surprise tonight—that, under the British system, we probably had greater opportunity to develop Canada than we would have had under the French regime.

At this stage of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, may I quote an example taken from everyday life. When a father raises a family, he may still slap a misbehaving two-year-old. He might pull, from time to time the ears of a child of ten, but when the child is 35, I hardly think any father would dare to raise his hand against his son or daughter. Why? Because at 21 a child is said to attain his majority. I admit he may be given some advice, offered some suggestions, but to force a child to do the things done by his parents is something which, to my mind, does not seem to be in the natural order of things.

Mr. Speaker, we have had a confederation, a constitution, for nearly a hundred years. Is it not time, after 97 years, or before we celebrate Canada's centennial, to amend the constitution so that the two groups which founded the Canadian confederation can enjoy a larger measure of autonomy and be assured of their complete freedom in the political, economic and social fields? The way I look at it, it is high time—otherwise, the day will never come—to see to it that the abuses and mistakes which make the proposed amendments necessary are corrected.

Mr. Speaker, the motion under study underlines a third point; it recognizes that Canada is really composed of two nations. Some do not wish to recognize it, they will be behind their time. There are others who have recognized it for a long time; but, more and more, all Canadians will have to admit it.

On many occasions, in this house, I stated that we were asking nothing, that we wished to take nothing away from others, but that we wanted our rights to be fully recognized. That is why, when our group met in Quebec on January 26, 1964, we asked that the province of Quebec should control money and credit under the term of a new constitution and in the framework of a new confederation. Should the province of Ontario want the same thing, it is up to that province to decide; but as regards the province of Quebec, we want it to control its trade and commerce and its immigration policy and that it should recover all its taxation rights. The government had better take notice of these points, since all organizations, not only in the province of Quebec, but also outside of the province of Quebec, are increasingly claiming such rights.

Indeed, in the province of Quebec influential politicians made such claims, including Hon. René Lévesque; the mayor of Montreal, Mr. Jean Drapeau, the minister of municipal affairs, Hon. Pierre Laporte, and the premier of the province of Quebec, Hon. Jean Lesage.

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: And Réal Caouette.

Mr. Caouette: Réal Caouette, if you wish. And Charles Auguste Choquette also.

Mr. Herridge: Comrades in arms.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, those words can be considered lightly or not at all.

In every Canadian province, as I found during my visits, people wonder what is happening in the province of Quebec, whether that province is in a turmoil, whether this evolution is dangerous, and so on. I do not think so. I do not believe so, as long as the federal government will not yield nor submit, but will consider straightforwardly the just demands of both elements of the country, so that they are treated equitably and fairly, in short, placed on an equal footing throughout the country.

Mr. Speaker, under the motion, Quebec chooses its own pension plan, and the Minister of Justice must recognize that this motion is submitted to the House of Commons in order to meet Quebec's requirements.

Mr. Guay: They always talk about Quebec.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I hear my friend from Lévis (Mr. Guay) say that we always talk of Quebec. We have a fairly good advance on him, because he did not even have time to talk of Quebec since he came here. As a matter of fact, I wonder if he remembers which riding elected him in the last general election.

Mr. Guay: The Social Crediter does know.

Mr. Caouette: The fourth point which emerges from this motion is the fact that Quebec chooses its own pension plan. But it seems that this amendment to section 94A of the British North America Act is a threat, or its wording is not quite clear.

For instance, would it not be possible, at a given moment, for the federal government to decide an increase in the rate of old age pensions without consulting any province, which would perhaps establish or create double taxation, as is now the case?

As a matter of fact, in the province of Quebec, we have two income tax laws: a federal one and a provincial one. Does not section 94A call forth the possibility of such double taxation as a result of an increase in the old age pensions, in the pensions for the disabled or any other social measure?

We accept the general principle of this motion, because it leaves Quebec free to choose its own pension scheme. We will propose an amendment in order to ensure that the spirit and the letter of section 94A will not go beyond the intention of the government when it changes the British North America Act.

Mr. Speaker, in order to support what I said earlier, I refer to the newspaper Le Devoir of June 18, that is this morning's issue, which reports that the St. Jean Baptiste society of Montreal submitted a brief to the committee on the constitution—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I hear one of my hon. friends say "oh, oh". One should remember that the St. Jean Baptiste society is a provincial organization and that it does not just operate in Montreal. It is a Canadian organization, it is our national association, and everyone should consider it as such.

Those people voice suggestions, they have not known any bomb, they have not hit below the belt as the popular expression goes, but here is what they say. I quote:

> Official recognition of the existence of two nations, consecration of two national and sovereign states(Quebec being the national state of French Canadians), replacement of the British North America Act by a new association of a really confederal character, creation of a "Republic of Quebec", sovereign state freely associated to (English) Canada, implementation by that state of Quebec of a vast program of economic liberation, social and cultural progress: those are the principal conclusions of the strong brief submitted by Montreal's St. Jean Baptiste society to the parliamentary committee on the constitution—

That brief is now before the parliamentary committee. The article ends as follows:

> The essence of the thesis is that there are two social and cultural facts which are gradually becoming more dissimilar, as they materialize in two national communities; we have here two brands of nationalism which are equally natural and legitimate; Canada would fall into a state of numb inferiority if it were not built up again on those basic facts, in the form of a voluntary association of two national, sovereign and equal states, each having all its internal autonomy and part of an external sovereignty which both would administer and manage in common—under a constitution and renewable treaties—a certain number of fields being under the jurisdiction of confederate organizations or agencies, where both national states would be equally represented.

Mr. Speaker, not only Canada, but other countries, like Jamaica, and other member states of the commonwealth of nations, as well as countries associated with France, have regained greater freedom, in the economic and political fields. I shall quote on this subject another French Canadian nationalist, a man who always commanded the greatest respect, I mean Canon Lionel Groulx—

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

I listened with much interest to the hon. member for Villeneuve and I must admit that he is a most eloquent speaker. But, as we are here to discuss a resolution asking the parliament of Westminster—

Mr. Stanley Knowles: —the Queen.

Mr. Choquette: —to authorize the amendment of the constitution, I wonder if it is truly in order to discuss the absurdity of the fact that we have to ask the parliament of Westminster to approve the amendment. I wonder if it would not be more appropriate for the hon. member to restrict himself to the substance of the proposed amendment. Indeed, we all agree that it is absurd to have to ask the approval of the parliament in London, but I feel it would be more relevant to discuss the substance of the resolution.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say one thing about the point of order raised by the hon. member for Lotbinière. All those questions were discussed today by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

I understand the hon. member for Lotbinière has a notice of motion bearing number 40, at page 21 of the order paper, which makes him the number one separatist in this house.

Mr. Speaker, I am not in the habit of telling the hon. member for Lotbinière what to say. On the other hand, I do not intend to get into the habit of letting him tell me what I should say.

Mr. Choquette: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to start a discussion, but I can see the hon. member is adding fuel to the fire, while my own comments were objective.

I should like you to give a ruling, after which I shall rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I would ask you, at the same time, to rule on the constant interruptions of the hon. member for Lotbinière and also on the demagogy he is indulging in here in this house, when interrupting the hon. member for Villeneuve.

In my view, this is essential at present.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Villeneuve.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I believe it is my duty to rise on a question of privilege at this time. Now that you have ruled—

An hon. Member: There is no ruling yet.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I would like you to rule on my point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The ruling of the Chair is to the effect that the speech delivered by the hon. member for Villeneuve was within the scope of resolution now under consideration.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I thank you for this ruling.

Now, allow me to rise on a question of privilege, because I feel bound to do so. I am convinced that the hon. member for Villeneuve went too far, as usual. He said that I was the staunchest separatist in the house.

[Mr. Choquette.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Choquette: I note that those who applaud are the very ones who divided their party in two, as well as the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) who actually left his party.

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière has the floor at present. On the other hand, I would ask him to state as briefly as possible the question of privilege he wants to submit to the house.

Mr. Grégoire: It is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Choquette: Are you through?

Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege concerns me personally. The hon. member for Villeneuve has claimed that I am the most separatist-minded person in the house.

I formally deny such an accusation and I state that I am in no way a separatist. I may be, in fact, I am surely a republican but I am not a separatist. The only separatists here are those—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would ask hon. members to co-operate with the Chair, bearing in mind the proprieties of the house.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member for Lotbinière proclaims himself to be a republican.

Since Canada is not yet a republic, the hon. member for Lotbinière, to be consistent with himself, should resign immediately.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm has no basis for a question of privilege; he is in fact, raising an argument. I would ask all members, once again, to co-operate with the Chair, so that the hon. member for Villeneuve may carry on and finish his remarks.

Mr. Caouette: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Lotbinière has just mentioned that he might be a republican. Now, I would suggest to the new Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) to delegate the hon. member for Lotbinière, as a republican, to London in order to introduce this motion which the government is asking us to pass today, so that we may obtain more freedom and better justice for the province of Quebec.

I was referring, Mr. Speaker, to a statement made recently by Canon Lionel Groulx:

Master in one's own house. To be master in one's own house, continued Canon Groulx, this would mean, for a nation having reached or claiming to have reached maturity, to be master of its policies, its government, its parliament, its legislation, and not to be, in this field, under any unseemly trusteeship. It would also mean, as much as possible in this day and age, to be master of its economic and social life, to develop for itself and not for others its natural resources, to have the means to finance its administration, its institutions of learning and of social welfare.

Canon Lionel Groulx has been fighting for half a century, not only in Quebec, but throughout Canada, to help us acquire such mastery, both at the federal and provincial levels.

That amounts to one thing, Mr. Speaker. We want the provinces to enjoy as much autonomy as possible. Let Ottawa lift its embargoes when the development and even the full developmeent of a province is at stake.

On the other hand, I am surprised to see the motion only concerns old age pensions and supplementary benefits. We should get to Westminster with an amendment or a final decision under which the constitution would come back to Canada. Then we could amend the constitution.

The fears being spread about a repatriated constitution, to the effect that quarrels and misunderstandings would spring up when the time came to amend the said constitution, are not worthy of consideration. The danger of misunderstandings must not prevent us from taking action. It is better to act and make mistakes than to do nothing, that is not to act. Then, one does not run the risk of making mistakes, but one does not act. Let us act, even if we run the risk of making mistakes. Besides, we all make mistakes, because we are human and there is no perfect human being.

Mr. Chapdelaine: Does the hon. member for Villeneuve allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. Caouette: Certainly.

Mr. Chapdelaine: What is the solution advocated by the hon. member to amend the constitution?

Mr. Caouette: To amend the constitution so as to give back to the provinces the control of money and credit, the control of their trade, their immigration, the full recovery and use of their taxation rights.

If those provisions were included in a constitutional reform, peace would be restored in Quebec, Ontario and other Canadian provinces.

Mr. Speaker, let us pass a piece of legislation to put a branch office of the Bank of Canada at the service of the provinces, which could use it to develop normally, and there will be no more wrangling between Quebec and Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia, Quebec and Alberta; there will not be misunderstanding but argument.

Mr. Speaker, the time allotted to me was quite shortened a few minutes ago, but I must just the same conclude my remarks. Before concluding, I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) the following amendment:

That the following words be added to section 94A after the words: "in these matters"; However, this amendment to the British North America Act will only apply to the provinces which will ask it.

I have French and English copies of this amendment.

Mr. Speaker, this amendment detracts in no way from the merits of section 94A, but it gives us the assurance that no province will be subject to undue pressure from federal authorities.

Those are the remarks we wanted to make about the amendment moved by the government.

In conclusion, I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to the statements made in this house by Liberal, Conservative and other members, to the effect that it is ridiculous that, in 1964, we should have to ask permission to amend a constitution which might not be ours at the present time.

If this constitution is not ours, let us leave it over there and draw up a constitution here, with the help of a committee on constitution, as suggested earlier by the hon. member for Sherbrooke. We shall then feel not only as people who loudly proclaim their independence and the sovereignty of their country, but who shall prove to the whole world that we do enjoy that sovereignty, whereas today, in 1964, we give indisputable proof that it is still the parliament at Westminster which decides what the Canadian parliament shall pass.

Let us become our own masters and start right away. Let us not wait another half century before asserting that we are, in Canada, Canadians in the best interests of the whole country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the Chair might read to the house the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Villeneuve.

[Translation]

I move, seconded by Mr. Gauthier, that the following words be added to section 94A after the words "to any such matter": but this amendment to the British North America Act does apply only to those provinces who will ask for it.

[Text]

Would hon. members care to offer comments for the guidance of the Chair in rendering a decision as to the acceptability of the amendment?

[Translation]

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I think that this amendment is decidedly out of order. In fact, if we read its wording carefully, we realize that it applies to the provinces. I think it is important that we should all read the text of this amendment at once. It wants to add, in the text of the resolution, after the words "to any such matter", in the last line of the new wording of section 94A, that the address ask Her Majesty to request the parliament of the United Kingdom to approve the following words:

However, this amendment to the British North America Act will apply only to the provinces which ask it.

If such an addition to the wording of section 94A were adopted, we would be faced with a constitutional nonsense which would contradict entirely the purpose, the scope and the framework of the amendment requested by the resolution introduced by the right hon. Prime Minister.

In fact, the purpose of the new section 94A is to allow the parliament of Canada to legislate. Now, the proposed addition to that amendment provides that the amendment, that is the new section 94A, will apply only to the provinces upon request.

This would take away any meaning that the new section 94A might have, because section 94A, which deals essentially with the powers of the federal parliament to legislate as far as pensions and miscellaneous provisions are concerned, cannot apply, from the constitutional view point, to the provinces even if a province requests it.

I would think that what was meant—but surely it is not for me to draft an amendment to a measure introduced by the government—is that if an act is passed under the constitutional amendment, that act will apply only to the province which requests it and, at that time, it will not be clear either if the request must be made before that act is passed by the parliament of Canada or after.

But, I wish to point out that, in any case, the text must be read as it now stands. It is intended to apply to the provinces, when they request it, a constitutional provision which can apply only to the federal parliament, according to the general text of the British North America Act.

That is why I submit that the amendment is entirely out of order, because it is contrary to the very nature of the subject matter and also because it would render meaningless the aim and object of the resolution now under consideration.

Besides, in practice, if that amendment could be taken to mean that it should apply to an act to be passed by the federal parliament under the new section 94A, that would make the procedure so complicated that, to all practical purposes, it would become inapplicable.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I point out that all the provinces have given their approval and that the province—that is Quebec—which had decided to proceed by means of a resolution introduced in the legislature, did so, and that the Quebec legislature has now approved that resolution, that is approved "entirely" the request for an amendment.

Therefore I submit that first, this motion in amendment is unacceptable because it is out of order as regards the constitution and the rules of the house; second, even if it were in order, the amendment should be rejected as it proposes a procedure that is inapplicable, if not inextricable.

Mr. Rémi Paul (Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière): Mr. Speaker, I think that the mover of this amendment is thinking of the practical aspect of any legislation which might subsequently arise from the possible amendment to section 94A of the British North America Act.

It is not often that I share the views of the Minister of Justice, but I agree with the remarks he just made, because the point is that we must consider tonight the constitutional aspect of the problem.

Under the proposed amendment, the Canadian parliament is asked for the power to sanction the wish of the house, to enable the federal government to legislate in some precise matters.

Now, the effect of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Villeneuve is to present the practical aspect of this amendment.

The hon. member for Villeneuve certainly wants to give the provinces the freedom to agree to such and such legislative plan which might subsequently be presented by the government, following the permission that the parliament of London will give to it of legislating in the particular matters mentioned in section 94A.

The effect of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Villeneuve is to place on the same footing the provinces and the federal government in this field of legislation, when the effect of the proposed amendment is to give complete jurisdiction to the federal government in this matter, even if from a practical viewpoint, nothing will stop the provinces from reaching agreements or legislating through special legislation, jointly with the federal government in order to find a field for the application of the powers which will be granted to the federal parliament following the passing of this resolution.

I think the hon. member for Villeneuve is to be commended for his desire to put into effect a legislation which may follow the passing of the amendment. But that amendment, in my humble opinion, is not constitutional, because it would give the provinces a power that belongs exclusively to the federal government.

Anyhow, I think that this amended clause would not be practical, since adding that phraseology would serve no useful purpose because it would not give more power to the federal parliament, and the London parliament would not give us more power. On the contrary, this might complicate even further the interpretation of the British North America Act which, since 1867, has lent itself to many difficult interpretations and whose application has sometimes given rise to bitter discussions.

For those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Villeneuve is out of order.

[Text]

Mr. Thompson: I wish to ask one question. Could we have an English translation of the amendment? The wording of this amendment, as I have here, does not make a complete sentence. Therefore, it does not mean anything at all.

Mr. Caouette: We had sent copies.

Mr. Thompson: This is a copy—the one I am referring to. But it is an incomplete sentence and it does not make any sense.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I could read the English version of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That the following words be added to article 94A after the words "any such matter":

"but this amendment to the British North America Act, 1867, does apply only to those provinces who will ask for"

Mr. Thompson: For what?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may support the request of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) and appeal to someone to help us out. I know I would be in the same position if I were trying to give a French translation of a motion I had drafted in English, but as I listened to the translation of the French text that I got through my earpiece, it was quite different from what was placed before us in English paper, I wonder if you, sir, could give us a hand in this connection and give an English translation of the French text that is before Your Honour.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will attempt to give a translation of the French text that is before the Chair:

I move, seconded by Mr. Gauthier, that the following words be added to article 94A after the words "any such matter":

"but this amendment to the British North America Act will apply only to such provinces as ask for it".

[Translation]

Mr. Chapdelaine: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments on the legal point of view. It is the custom that all provinces must agree before we address to the London parliament a request for the approval of an amendment to the constitution.

This means that before addressing itself to London, the government ascertain that all provinces are agreeable to such an amendment. In fact, we can take the example given to us by the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon, when he said that his pension plan had not been put into effect because the province of Quebec had not agreed to a request for an amendment to the London parliament.

All the provinces have now given their assent.

The resolution reads as follows:

—but no such law shall affect the operation of any law present or future of a provincial legislature in relation to any such matter.

I understand the point of view of the hon. member for Villeneuve, but I believe his amendment comes too late. Such amendment should have been moved before the requests were made to the provinces, to obtain from them unanimous consent, and to apply to London afterwards. At that time, there might have been some use for this amendment whose object is to have only the provinces wishing to use it so authorized.

In the circumstances, it is too late because all provinces have already given their consent. We know, moreover, that to amend the constitution or depart from it, each time, whatever the motive, however small the change may be, it is necessary to apply to London. We have proof of this in this motion, since we have already obtained an amendment to the constitution to pay pensions to the aged. If the law could have been extended or somewhat enlarged, we might have included in it the benefits or payment of pensions to widows. But, the usage is so rigid that I do not believe —besides, circumstances are there to prove it —that we can, without prior agreement of all the provinces, obtain an amendment to the constitution on any point, however minute it may be.

In the circumstances, this amendment, I believe, adds nothing to the actual resolution, since the provinces have already given their consent and with regard to the case with which we are dealing, the provinces could not withdraw their consent, since they have already given it, and in order to apply to London to amend the constitution, such a consent was required.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words with regard to this amendment and its constitutionality or lack of it.

First of all, let us start from the beginning. The British North America Act, passed in 1867, gave certain powers to the federal government and to the provinces.

Now, under this act the provincial governments had exclusive power to legislate on old age pensions and on what is mentioned here as——survivors' and disability benefits irrespective of age.

And now, on the occasion of the presentation of a specific piece of legislation on old age pensions, the federal government, without the consent of all provinces, but of the majority of them, wants to pass a pension scheme directed to the majority of provinces.

Then, in order to amend the constitution, the agreement of all provinces is necessary. All provinces have given their consent, but some of them want to continue to be masters in that field.

I agree that the legislation indicates clearly that:

—it shall not affect the operation of any law, present or future, of a provincial legislature in relation to any such matter.

Mr. Speaker, if it becomes more complex, it is because of the amendment to the constitution: the federal government is requesting privileges acquired through the constitution, through the British North America Act, in fields already reserved to the provinces, in order to legislate in a very specific and very precise field, that is to bring in a new act concerning old age pensions.

When the federal government wishes to amend the legislation it may bring in this year or next year, then, a new legislation will become unavoidable. But this new legislation, without affecting any act to be presented by the government of the province of Quebec, may not suit the province of Quebec or another province, but the amendment to the constitution, as proposed now, will nevertheless authorize the federal government to bring forward an amendment or a new piece of legislation to amend the act concerning old age pensions without having to consult a province. The government will have the authority to do it.

It was mentioned a while ago,—I think it was by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Chapdelaine) or the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière (Mr. Paul)—that if the ten provinces have accepted the amendment to the constitution that is proposed today and, consequently, gave one more responsibility to the federal government, it is only because of the new old age pension plan that the federal government intends to set up. But every time the federal government will wish to bring an amendment to its legislation, it will require the passing of a new act. Then, the provinces will have no say in the matter; the federal government will hide behind the amendment we are voting today and the parliament of Canada will have authority to legislate on old age pensions.

The hon. member for Sherbrooke mentioned that it should not affect the operation of any act present or future passed by a provincial legislature. But let us suppose that in two years from now, the federal government should decide to raise the taxes by 2 per cent and to increase by so much the pension paid out, that will not affect at all the present or future legislation, but nevertheless, the provincial government will have nothing to say.

Mr. Speaker, it is well known that when the federal government infringes upon a field of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, it goes all the way out, even if such jurisdiction is guaranteed by the constitution because there is no court to which an appeal could be made with respect to such interferences. There is no remedy to the situation and the record is there to prove it.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, the province of Quebec had no need for this amendment to the constitution. It can and it is going to legislate on its own in the field of old age pensions.

Why has the Quebec government decided to join in with the other governments with respect to the amendment under consideration? It is merely to oblige the nine other provinces which prefer a federal pension scheme. Since the Quebec government has so graciously co-operated: why do we not give it in return the necessary guarantees so that, later on, the provinces will not regret having agreed to this amendment, as was so often the case in the past when they relied on the good faith of the central government. It may be that the present government deserves the confidence of the province but, in the future, in 20 years from now, another government may not be as worthy of their confidence or may not be as kind.

I say that the subamendment is constitutional and that it completes the other one because it bears no relation to the legislation which the government proposes to introduce this year concerning old age pensions.

It is a complementary amendment because it is connected with the future legislation that the federal government will wish to move as regards the Old age Pensions Act; it will also permit the government to legislate on the supplementary benefits, including survivors and disability benefits, irrespective of age.

We dread the results of the amendment to section 94A and that is why the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Villeneuve is drafted in such a way that the legislation might not intensify the current disunion concerning the constitution.

I think there is enough of that already. The subamendment is constitutional and comprehensive. It is all the more constitutional, let us not forget it, because it stems from a privilege exclusive to the provinces, and since we are then giving to the federal government part of the rights and prerogatives which, under the British North America Act, belong to the provinces.

If the provinces agree to allow the federal government to legislate for the benefit of the other provinces, it does not mean that they want the federal government to obtain, under the constitution, all the rights and every latitude. I think the federal government should be satisfied with the permission it obtained this year from the provincial governments to legislate in those fields.

On the other hand, it should give the provinces the assurance that, in the future, federal government legislation will not encroach upon provincial fields. It is a privilege which belongs to the provinces, and Quebec has agreed to part with it out of kindness for the other nine provinces.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that to save a principle is far more important that all the arguments put forward by representatives of the four other parties. We must save the principle that, in such fields, in provincial fields, the federal government should never be able to take action without the consent or the agreement of the provinces, more particularly of the province of Quebec.

For those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I believe you should declare the amendment in order.

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question? In view of the hon. member's statement that what section 94A is doing is giving something to the federal parliament—surely he agrees that that is what it does; it does not give anything to the provinces—

Mr. Benidickson: Not very much.

Mr. Knowles: —can he not see our problem in that his amendment does not seem to make any sense? It is not relevant in that it says that it does not apply to the provinces. Section 94A does not apply to the provinces either. This is an amendment giving the federal parliament power; and when an hon. member comes along with an amendment which says that it does not apply to the provinces unless that is asked for, our problem is that it does not seem to make any sense in English or in French.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, if I may, I shall answer the question of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

The amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the subamendment of the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) maintain for the federal government the privilege and power of legislating in those fields. The subamendment moved by the hon. member for Villeneuve does not deprive the government of that power to legislate. Yet, the power to legislate in the matter of old age pensions will now only apply to the provinces which accept it.

I want to tell the Minister of Justice, as well as the Secretary of State (Mr. Lamontagne)—who advocates co-operative federalism—that if we accept this today, it will be a precedent which may repeat itself in many other fields under exclusive provincial jurisdiction, even in the nine provinces which would like the federal government to enter certain fields. The federal government may legislate on behalf of all provinces which are willing, but not for those who are not. This will facilitate amendments to the constitution as nine provinces will welcome them, while respecting the rights of the provinces which do not want those amendments. This will be a precedent which will more easily justify any future amendments to the constitution and which will be a new means of repatriating the constitution. At that time, the amendments will only apply to the provinces which are willing to accept them.

The Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Pearson) frequently stated that Quebec was not a province like the others. Almost everybody agrees on that. Therefore, let us put those words into practice and try to agree on the constitution, so that if it suits nine provinces, all the better, and if it does not suit the tenth, it will not apply. By doing so, I think that we will attain the best kind of confederation which will satisfy everybody.

Mr. Speaker, I think that this answers the question of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps I might point out to hon. members that since royal assent is about to be given perhaps it would be wise to wait until tomorrow before the Chair renders a decision. I might also point out that the remarks and comments made on the point of order by several hon. members have related exclusively, to my mind, to the question of the constitutionality of the amendment, which really does not assist the Chair in reaching a decision. What the Chair has to decide is whether the amendment is acceptable from a procedural standpoint, and very little has been said by hon. members on this point. I must say that as far as the Chair is concerned this is a difficult question to decide, being a borderline case, and in view of this I am sure that hon. members will not mind waiting until tomorrow before the Chair give its decision, in view of the fact that we are just about to have royal assent.

[Mr. Knowles.]

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, June 18, 1964

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Roland A. Ritchie, puisne judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 18th June, at 9.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
A. G. Cherrier,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether we could have the order of business for tomorrow and Monday while we are waiting?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, if I may first be allowed to say so, I wonder whether we could have unanimous consent of the house once we return from the Senate, to complete the proceedings on the motion to amend the resolution, so that tomorrow we can proceed with the debate?

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, what does that mean? I understand we still have to get a ruling tomorrow.

Mr. Favreau: I thought that the Speaker meant that because it was adjournment time he could not render his ruling until tomorrow. I did not understand that he was asking for time to consider the matter. I withdraw my suggestion if that is the case.

Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we will complete the debate on the resolution concerning the constitutional amendment, after which, because of the arrangement which has been made among the parties, we will dispose of second reading of the bill concerning the Roosevelt-Campobello international park. Then we will resume the debate on the flag resolution.

Mr. Churchill: I thought it was the understanding that we would not take the flag resolution on any day when it would only be for a limited time, that it would always be a full day's debate. I thought it was the understanding that if we were on legislation and there was some period of time left, an hour or an hour and a half, we would proceed with other legislation.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, the understanding was that we would not resume the debate on the flag resolution in the middle of the day or at an indeterminate moment. However, I must say that I tried to get agreement today—it is not my hon. friend who did not agree—to fill the day completely in case we had some time left, and I could not get agreement, so I suppose we will have to go on with the flag debate. But I must say that the lack of agreement did not originate with the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. Churchill: This is a red letter day.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to certain bills:

An act to amend the Farm Credit Act.

An act to amend the National Housing Act, 1954.

An act to amend the Judges Act and the Exchequer Court Act.

An act to amend the Income Tax Act.

An act respecting the Payment of Certain Provincial Taxes and Fees by Crown Corporations.

An act to amend the Bank Act and the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

An act to authorize the construction and maintenance of a bridge across the St. Lawrence river between the city of Ste. Foy, in the county of Quebec, and the municipality of St. Nicolas, in the county of Lévis, both in the province of Quebec.

An act to incorporate Canadian Conference of the Brethren in Christ church.

An act respecting the General Accident Assurance company of Canada.

An act respecting Scottish Canadian Assurance Corporation.

An act respecting Allstate Insurance Company of Canada.

An act respecting The Dominion Life Assurance Company.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

(Subject matter of questions debated under adjournment motion)

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved:

CANADIAN FLAG—INQUIRY RESPECTING DISTRIBUTION OF PLAYING CARDS

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): While this might be a frivolous matter for discussion in parliament, I am sure all Canadians across Canada would be shocked to learn that the Department of Trade and Commerce is putting out, publishing and giving away, not only in Canada but all across the world, at trade fairs throughout the world and in New York at the present time, games of chance, games of cards in particular, which to some extent deface what may well be Canada's national flag—Canada's national symbol. Surely, the Canadian public expects more of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

At various times members of parliament use various methods to draw attention to the misguided efforts of government and departments of government. Certainly this is a good example, and I should like to be given some pertinent answers with regard to the publishing of these cards by a spokesman for a government which has a history of being against lotteries and games of chance.

The playing cards are needed to play a game described as "The Canadian Maple Leaf" and a game called "Canadian Timber". These games have similar sets of rules. The rules are published and a copy is included in each pack. This has a direct bearing on a subject which the house has lately been considering, a subject to which the government itself has given priority in debate. The pack consists of four sets of 13 Canadian tree cards —and the three maple leaves are jokers. That is what it says: The three maple leaves are jokers. The significant thing about these cards is that the maple leaves on them are an exact replica of the design which it is now proposed shall constitute the design of Canada's national flag.

I do hope that if this emblem of three maple leaves is accepted as the flag of Canada, or even if one maple leaf is accepted, the Department of Trade and Commerce will immediately cease to publish decks of cards of this kind. For the trouble of asking, I got 100 decks of these cards from the Department of Trade and Commerce. I still have lots of them in my office.

An hon. Member: Do you like the game?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): The game is a simple one related to the game called "Old Maid", when I was a boy. If the hon. member would like to join the old maids, or play "Old Maid", that is his privilege. According to what one reads in the press, it will not be long before the three maple leaf design constitutes our national flag and, as I say, the emblem on these cards is an exact replica of the design proposed for this flag. It is noted on the joker that it is put out by the Department of Trade and Commerce, Ottawa, Canada; it says, "Printed in Canada on Canadian paper". You would almost think this was a theme song for Canada—printed in Canada; made in Canada. The only thing they have not got on it is "Made in Canada". However, I would hope the Department of Trade and Commerce would have most of their work done in Canada.

I would certainly like to know how long they have been distributing these decks of cards, this game of chance, with the exact replica of the proposed maple leaf design. I would like to know what has been the cost to the Department of Trade and Commerce. Is this the way they are promoting Canadian trade? Certainly most Canadians think this is not the way the department should be promoting trade.

I would ask, what has been the cost; how much are Canadian taxpayers being asked to pay to promote this game of chance distributed by the Department of Trade and Commerce? I might go on to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the winner of the game called "Canadian maple leaf" is the one who has the one remaining maple leaf, the one remaining joker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): This may please some members in the house. It may not please the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), and if the Department of Trade and Commerce proposes to continue to distribute this game, perhaps this should be brought to their attention. I think it has been a direct waste of the taxpayer's money and has placed shame upon the Canadian maple leaf, which has always been, and will always remain, an emblem representing Canada, whether or not the flag gets the approval of parliament. In addition, I would like to know for how many years this game has been distributed and at what direct cost to the Canadian taxpayers; and will distribution be continued? I add this last thing: Will it be continued after the flag with three maple leaves on it is approved. If this happens, will the department continue to distribute this game and describe the three maple leaves as jokers? Will they continue spreading this impression across the world, to the detriment of the Canadian public?

Mr. Churchill: It sounds like the colouring books, the pigeons and the truth squad.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Exactly.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I might perhaps commend the hon. member who has just concluded his speech on his acknowledgement of the maple leaf not only as the emblem of Canada but, in his words, as representing our national flag. I am glad to see there is at least one convert on the other side of the chamber as a result of the debate so far.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drury: Unfortunately, this opportunity does not permit me to ask the hon. member a question.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Ask it anyway.

Mr. Drury: But I was fascinated to learn that he had secured from the Department of Trade and Commerce 100 of these decks of cards and that he had already used a number of them, apparently, in playing a rather simple game which he described as "Old Maid". I would hope he would have more to engage his attention than this undoubtedly fascinating game designed by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I have not used the cards. I obtained 100 decks to see whether it was possible to obtain them.

Mr. Drury: The "Canadian timber game", to which reference has been made, was a sales promotion distributed and designed by the trade publicity branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce. It was first introduced in January of 1963. The cards were at that time designed and produced.

The purpose of the trade publicity branch was to provide some kind of give-away item, not all over the world and at world fairs but at the trade and commerce exhibits at lumber shows in the United States. To date, and since the cards were first produced in January of 1963, there have been some 12 or 13 lumber shows in the United States of America at which these cards have been given away. They are designed to advertise Canadian lumber products, the fact of their excellence and of their availability in Canada.

If the hon. member complains a little that references to Canada, the quality of Canadian paper and to "Made in Canada" appear to be a little overemphasized on the cards, I can assure him that their purpose is for use on the American market, for propaganda purposes. It seems to me that, even though they date back a couple of years, this is not an unsatisfactory scheme of trade promotion. One of its great virtues is its basic cheapness. The hon. member has 100 decks and has played with them, he will have discovered that they do not last very long. The reason is their very low cost. The cost of producing one of these decks of cards in the numbers which were ordered back in January of 1963 does not much exceed the cost of paper itself.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES—EMPLOYMENT BY ROYAL COMMISSION OF RESEARCH STAFF

Mr. Gene Rhéaume (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I raised this question not only today, when I got no answer at all—perhaps because of what you felt was the unfortunate wording of the question,—but I raised a similar question the other day and got no answer from the Prime Minister. To me at least, it seems no one in this house could take objection to this question. It relates to my contention that the bilingualism and biculturalism commission is doing an excellent job of inflaming racial animosity in this country, and that it is in the best interests of Canada for the Prime Minister to call it off and to put an end to what I, in a moment of excitement today, described as the B and B gang. When I used the word "gang" I did so in the context of a group of people who go around terrorizing, and upsetting the equilibrium of the nation, and who do so at the expense of society generally.

Any of the hon. members who listened to the radio broadcast of the B and B session in Quebec City two nights ago would surely have been reminded of the broadcasts which we hear of these "You were there" records—the sort which take us back to the Nazi rallies in Germany before the serious advance of the nazi movement in that country, where people lost control of themselves. I for one categorically reject the impression that the radio broadcast of the proceedings at that hearing represent the feelings of the people of Quebec. They do not, and no hon. member anywhere in this house would espouse that position. However, I do espouse the position that the B and B commission has a greater divisive effect in this country today than any other single force at work, and I think that the onus is on the Prime Minister, if he is sincere—and I suspect him to be since—in his avowed purpose of unifying the country, to do this. I suggest to the Prime Minister and to the government that this is the time to place the good of the nation above the good of the Liberal party, because there are those who believe sincerely that the whole purpose of the Liberal party in the bilingualism and biculturalism commission, in the flag debate and in a few other things is to divide the country and ruin it, to pit Catholic against non-Catholic and French against non-French, and that these vehicles do this in an excellent way.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Rhéaume: Members opposite can holler "shame" if they wish, but there is a substantial body of opinion in Canada that wants the Prime Minister to stand up and call off the bilingualism and biculturalism commission. All one needs to do, if he wants to be non-partisan, is to read editorial opinion in this country. It is to the effect that the terms of reference of this commission should be reviewed. Today we read that this commission is going to investigate the press, television and radio services of this country. One of the commissioners says that they have to go overseas, take this divisive and disruptive vehicle of theirs to every country in the world and make Canada the laughingstock of the world.

Where will it end? I suggest to the government that it is time they sincerely reviewed this matter. Recall the commission. The commission has suggested that it is prepared to submit an interim report. Now is the time for the government to have the courage to ask the commissioners to present an interim report, then review it in the light of experience so far and decide if at this particular time it might not be better to call the whole thing off, at least until Canadian passions have been allowed to settle in the wake of the disturbance this particular commission has caused.

An hon. member: Two flags, two Canadas.

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to say that the purpose of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in establishing the bilingualism and biculturalism commission was to promote national unity in Canada and to save confederation. As far as newspapers are concerned, the commissioners appointed by the governor general in council by P.C. 1963-1106 of July, 1963, were given certain terms of reference which refer inter alia to the role of the mass communication media. The performance of the duties conferred upon them by those terms quite conceivably might lead them to study newspapers, etc. The decision whether or not to do so extensively would be one to be made by the royal commissioners.

TRANSPORT—DELAY IN SHIPMENTS OF FREIGHT TO NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Richard Cashin (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, on the orders of the day I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) a question as to what steps the government was taking in order to alleviate the great backlog of freight that exists now on the run between North Sydney and Port aux Basques. The problem of freight moving to Newfoundland by that run is one that has been quite difficult for a great many years, and the service provided to consumers in Newfoundland all the way from Port aux Basques to St. John's is hampered by the lack of what we feel are badly needed facilities on the run between the two ports of North Sydney and Port aux Basques.

This, of course, is only one part of the over-all problem that concerns us in Newfoundland in respect of a co-ordinated federal policy on transportation. During the past year we have been greatly encouraged by the arrangement whereby the federal government will pay 90 per cent of the cost of building the trans-Canada highway, thus coming in line with the recommendation of the MacPherson report.

We are also encouraged by an earlier announcement last fall concerning additional ferry service to Newfoundland. At that time reference was made to an east coast ferry, an automobile ferry, and also an additional rail car ferry to go into service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques. This problem has existed for some time, but it has been accentuated in recent weeks in a temporary way by the unfortunate waterfront situation in St. John's.

There is a general feeling abroad however that we cannot wait until these new ferries are constructed. There must be some immediate action taken because of the seriousness of this problem. I point out that this question is again part of the over-all problem we have in Newfoundland. In particular, the MacPherson commission did recommend that there be a full transportation study, especially in Newfoundland, of its transportation problem. Action is necessary on this particular question because of the very recent waterfront situation in the port of St. John's and the declining business in the port.

It has been pointed out that one of the things that may in some way contribute to this is the lack of a co-ordinated federal policy. It was for this reason I did rise this afternoon to ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) a question on this one aspect of transportation policy for Newfoundland. In the past year particularly we have been encouraged by the initiative taken by this government, it is still a fact we cannot wait for the completion of the long term plan. We do feel there should be some immediate action taken on these points.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in order to meet the critical traffic problem foreseen to develop this summer and next winter, and for the next two or three years, the government has purchased and undertaken to convert the ferry New Grand Haven. This ferry was built in 1951 by Canadian Vickers Limited at Montreal, and until recently has been operated by a United States company between Florida and Cuba.

To meet the particular traffic requirements of the Newfoundland service certain modifications will be necessary and they will be undertaken in an eastern Canadian shipyard. The vessel will be ready for freight service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques early in 1965. The total cost, including conversion, will be approximately $2,250,000, which I think makes this vessel, at today's prices, a bargain.

It is also going to meet an urgent need until such time as the rail car ferry can be constructed, which will be several years. I may say that I had intended, in any event, to announce tomorrow, and the hon. gentleman's question gives me an opportunity to anticipate the announcement, that the contract for the new ferry to operate between North Sydney and Argentia has been let to Marine Industries of Sorel. This vessel, of which an interesting description will be issued tomorrow, is expected to be in service by November, 1967. I think this underlines the importance of acquiring this ferry which happened to turn up in Florida and which I believe is going to meet a very real and urgent need.

As for the broader study mentioned by the hon. gentleman, it was part of the settlement which was made of the longshoremen's strike in St. John's by my colleague, the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) the other day. There was an undertaking given by the government that not only would we set up an industrial inquiry commission to look into the problem, but that we would inquire into the whole problem of transportation between the mainland and Newfoundland, as forecast as being necessary by the MacPherson commission. The groundwork for this study is already under way in my department, and the study will be undertaken shortly.

Mr. Scott: Is it possible to ask the minister one question?

Mr. Speaker: I think we could afford one question.

Mr. Scott: Could the minister tell us the specifications of the ferry just announced to carry freight train cars across, and whether the freight handling will be done on the Newfoundland side or the other side?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am afraid the hon. gentleman is rather ahead of me because the specifications for the rail car ferry have not yet been completed. That is one reason we have not called for tenders for this, and it is one of the reasons we are buying the second hand ferry to meet the gap; but I may say the second hand ferry will not be carrying rail cars.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.38 p.m.
