New Phase of Scott Act Prosecution. A new phase of Scott Act prosecution was presented in Moncton the other day, when a liquor dealer, named Ryan, caused proceedings to be taken against a man named Armstrong for counselling or procuring the prosecutor to sell intoxicating liquors. It appears that Ryan was convicted and fined in an ordinary Scott, Act case for selling liquors, Armstrong being the principle witness against him. Then, Ryan turned about and had the law applied to Armstrong, who was also convicted and fined $50. It thus appears that the buyers as well as the sellers of intoxicants can be punished under the Scott Act. It is said STR. "MIRAMICHI," Capt. "It's very queer, sir, but all over the of the doors unlocked." Mr. Murray started off at a good round pace, Slater following hard at his heels. The chief warder tried his hand himself. He tried every lock in the prison; not one of them vouchsafed to budge. Not one, that is, with a single ption. The exception was in Ward B, No. 27. Mr. Murray had tried all the other doors in the ward, beginning with No. 1-tried them all in vain. But when he came to No. 27, the lock turned with the customary ease and the door was open. Within it was attention, waiting to be let out. Mr. Murray stared at him.

"Hum! there's nothing the matter with this lock, at any rate. You'd bet-Oliver Mankell went down-stairs-he

The din was deafening. The prison ers, secure of a grievance, were practising stepdances in their heavy shoes on the stone floors; they made the narrow, vaulted corridors ring.

"Silence those men!" shouted Mr. Jarvis, the second warder, who was tall and thin as the chief was short and stout. He might as well have shouted to the wind. Those in the cells just paid not the slightest heed. If they the doors are closed." were locked in, the officers were locked or if they couldn't. Mr. Paley's house was in the centre of the jail. Paley, by the way, was the governor's name. The governor, when He came down to the chief warder in rather primitive disarray.

"Anything the matter, Murray?" "Yes sir; there's something much the matter, indeed."

"Mankell?"

"He came in yesterday. It's that magician."

When they reached the cells, it was easy to perceive that something was wrong. The warders hung about in twos and threes; the noise was deafening; the prisoners were keeping holiday.

"Get me the keys and let me see what I can do. It is impossible that all the locks can have been tampered with."

They presented Mr. Paley with the keys. In his turn he tried every lock in the jail. This was not the work of a minute or two. The prison contained some three hundred night cells. To visit them all necessitated not only a good deal of running up and downstairs, but good deal of actual walking; for they were not only in different floors and in different blocks, but the prison itself was divided into two entirely separate divisions—north and south—and to pass from one division to the other entailed a walk of at least a hundred yards. By the time he had and the prison, the same in yesterday. It's that that would keep me from giving you food."

This was not the sort of language Major Hardinge was accustomed to hear from the average prisoner, but the major that and the arches and in the art of picking locks had a certain excuse, He addressed the baffled workmen.

If you can't pick the lock, what can yon do? The question is, what is the shortest way of getting inside that cell? "Get a watch saw, cried the gentleman on the other side the door.

"And when you've got your watch-saw?" enquired the major "Saw the whole lock right elean away. Lor' bless me! I only wing! I was where you are, I'd show you at thing or two. It's as easy as winking. Here's all us chaps a starving, all for want of a little hexperience!"

"As aw'll be no good," declared one of the locksmiths. "Neither a watch-saw nor any other kind of saw. How are you going to saw through those iron starchoss? You'll have to be."

"You won't find it an easy thing to do." This was from the average prisoner, but the major probably felt that on this occassion the certain excuse. He addressed the baffled workmen.

"Well, this is a pretty start. I've never come across anything like it in all my days before." Mr. Paley passed his hand through his hair. He had never come across any thing like it either.

"I shall have to telegraph to the con missioners. I can't do anything without The following telegram was sent,-

"Cannot get prisoners out of night ells. Something the matter with locks. Oliver Mankell, standing decorously at | Cannot give them any food. The matter is very urgent. What shall I do?" The following answer was received,-

"Inspector coming down." The inspector came down-Major William Hardinge. A tall, portly gentle-man, with a very decided manner. When was the only man in Canterstone jail he saw the governor he came to the point

"What's all this stuff?" "We can't get the prisoners out of the night cells.' "Why?"

"There's something the matter with "Have you given them any food?"

"Yes sir; there's something very much the matter, indeed."

"What is it?"

"We can't get any of the doors of the night cells open."

"You can't get—what?"

"There seems to be something the matter with the locks."

"The locks? All of them? Absurd!"

Well, there they are, and there's the men inside of them, and we can't get 'em out—at least I've tried my hand, and I know I can't."

"I'll come with you at once, and see what you mean."

Mr. Paley was as good as his word. He started off just as he was. As they were going, the chief warder made another remark.

"By the way, there is one cell we managed to get open,—I opened it."

"Well you are a couple of keen ones! What, can't pick the lock! Why, there managed to get open,—I opened it myself."

"I thought you said there was none?"

"There's that one,—n's that man Mankell."

"Mankell? Who is he?"

"Mankell? Who is he?"

south—and to pass from one division to the other entailed a walk of at least a hundred yards. By the time he had completed the round of the locks, Mr. Paley had had enough of it. It was not surprising that he felt a little be wildered,—not one of the locks had shown any more readiness to yield to him than to the others.

In passing from one ward to the other, he had passed the row of day cells in which was situated B. 27. Here they found Oliver Mankell sitting in silent state awaiting the call to work. The governor pulled up at sight of him.

"Well, Mankell, so there was nothing the matter with the lock of your door?"

Mankell simply inclined his head.
"I suppose you know nothing about the locks of the other doors?"

Again the inclination of the head. The man seemed to be habitually chary of speech.
"What's the matter with you? Are
