VOLUME III, 1960

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM THE TWENTY-FIFTH DAY OF MARCH, 1960, TO THE TENTH DAY OF MAY, 1960, INCLUSIVE

INDEX ISSUED IN A SEPARATE VOLUME

THE QUEEN'S PRINTER AND CONTROLLER OF STATIONERY
OTTAWA, 1960

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, March 25, 1960

The house met at 11 a.m.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Seventh report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills—Mr. McCleave.

VACANCY

Mr. Rodolphe Leduc (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, I hereby give notice, pursuant to section 10 of the House of Commons Act, that a vacancy has occurred in the representation of the House of Commons for the electoral district of Labelle, in the province of Quebec, by reason of the appointment to the Senate of Hon. Henri Courtemanche, the member therefor.

NATURAL GAS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—ANNOUNCEMENT RESPECTING DISCOVERY

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will have been pleased to read this morning in the press of a natural gas discovery in the Northwest Territories. According to information which I have received, the Home Oil Company Limited has obtained substantial showings of gas in a test well which they are drilling in the southwest corner of the Mackenzie district in the Northwest Territories, about eight miles north of the British Columbia boundary and about eight miles west of the Simpson trail.

This well is the second of a series of six which are to be drilled by Home Oil Company this winter and next winter on a farm-out arrangement with Canada Southern Petroleum Limited, which is the holder of permits to explore for oil and gas in approximately 1¼ million acres of potential oil and gas land in the southwest corner of the Mackenzie district. Home Oil Company, which is a Canadian company, is committed to spend $6.5 million on this land during the next five years. Several other oil companies are also actively engaged in the search for oil and gas in this general area, which has been for some time regarded as very promising. It is worth noting that this area forms the northerly geological extension of the Kotcho lake and Petitot river areas of northeast British Columbia in which in recent months impressive discoveries of gas have been made.

It is at this time far too early to attempt to evaluate the significance of the present discovery. In itself it is not conclusive proof of a major gas field, but it is certainly a most encouraging indication and tends to support the expectations that the area may have a very substantial gas potential.

In order to provide easier access to this area, which lies about 150 miles north of the Alaska highway at Fort Nelson, I have made provision in my departmental estimates for the fiscal year 1960-61 for funds to survey the route of a road from the British Columbia boundary through this area. The precise route to be followed by the road will be chosen in such a way as to serve best the interests of oil companies engaged in the task of developing the resources of the area.

Mr. Speaker, I did not plan it this way but it seems to me to be very auspicious that this discovery of a new petroleum area in the north should come so close to the 20th anniversary of the first election to the House of Commons of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) who has done so much to attract attention to the north.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think it is unusual to make announcements of this kind in the House of Commons on the development of our natural and human resources. We can, however, welcome them both because the country is in need of both. The announcement which the minister has just made underlines the variety and the richness of the resources of our country. As I say, the announcement, although it is unusual, is welcome. It also points up the desirability of early action being taken to make possible the export of gas from this country.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): The development of Canada's natural resources is important to the future of our nation. We have some differences with the policy the government is following but, of course, any indication of their development is most welcome. I really do not see how this matter could have very much association with the anniversary of the Prime Minister's entry into politics in this country.

An hon. Member: Gas.

Mr. Argue: Somebody says it has to do with gas. Of course, that was not my thought.

Mr. Hees: It is the beginning of a great development era.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Argue: If the Prime Minister wishes to take credit for this development since it is coming about the same time as this anniversary, of course this anniversary will have to bear many other responsibilities including some of the difficulties of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes). I do not really think there is any connection between the development of Canada's resources and this welcome anniversary.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BOMARC MISSILE—REPORTED REDUCTION IN U.S. APPROPRIATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister seen the Washington dispatch to the effect that the United States appropriation for the Bomarc B missile is being cut from $421 million to $50 million for the next fiscal year and will the minister tell the house what effect this announcement will have on Canada's defence policy?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, Canada has been consistently consulted regarding a possible revision of the joint air defence plan which might be adopted in order that the development of defence and warning against ballistic missiles might be accelerated. This would be in accord with our belief that the Soviets are placing greater emphasis on missiles and less on bombers.

As the hearings before the subcommittee of the committee on appropriations of the house of representatives have not been completed, the house will realize that it would be highly improper for me to comment upon the actions of this committee or to make any statement at this time on a speculative press report of a meeting that was supposed to be held in camera.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question. Does the minister not agree that this announcement from Washington means, in effect, that the program is washed out, that the Bomarc is a dead pigeon?

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with what the hon. member has said but, as I stated, it would be improper for me to make any further comment at this time.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Will Canada proceed with its Bomarc installations in the event that the United States appropriation is cut by this amount, and if—

[Mr. Hees.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the minister's replies have already indicated that he does not propose to answer the hypothetical aspects of these questions, and the hon. member is now getting into the purely hypothetical because, as has been indicated, this is a matter before a committee. As hon. members know, there are several stages to committee proceedings before there is any ultimate disposition of the matter.

Mr. Argue: Then my question is this. Is it the Canadian government's policy to proceed with the installation of bases for the Bomarc missile?

Mr. Pearkes: As the hon. member knows, we have selected two sites for the Bomarc units. On one of those sites, at North Bay, construction has started. Construction has not started on the other site.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, the minister has told the house that—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Hellyer: —the question is hypothetical because the report concerned a meeting which was held in camera. May I now direct to him this question. Is the minister aware that Dr. Herbert F. York, the defence department's chief scientist, told the senate defence appropriation committee in an opening hearing—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is apparent from the question as far as it has gone that the hon. member is proposing to give some information rather than ask for some. If he has a factual question to ask of the minister, I suggest he put it.

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, Mr. Speaker. In view of the critical review of the Bomarc program which is under way in the United States at the present time, as announced by Dr. York at an open hearing, will the minister now suspend all work on the Canadian Bomarc sites and the SAGE installations until the outcome of the United States review is complete?

Mr. Pearkes: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister if he still retains confidence in this weapon?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister justify further expenditure of the taxpayer's money on a SAGE-Bomarc system which no longer retains the confidence—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me the hon. member is putting forth a case rather than asking a question.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I think it is a very important question whether this system which is no longer effective justifies the expenditure of the Canadian taxpayers' money.

Mr. Speaker: I am not denying that it is an important question. I am only suggesting it is not the proper place to debate it.

[Later:]

Mr. Hellyer: May I put another question? Can the minister tell us whether tenders have been called for the same work at the Bomarc site installation at Mont Laurier.

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should reply to this in place of the Minister of National Defence. Tenders have been called, and tenders have been submitted to the Department of Defence Production and we are studying those tenders at the present time.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister tell us when the contract will be awarded?

Mr. O'Hurley: It depends on the length of time it will take to study the tenders.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister tell us whether the length of time required has any reference to or any relationship whatsoever with the controversy raging at the present time in respect to the cancellation of this program?

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Speaker, when we get a contract demand from the Department of National Defence we work on that contract demand until such time as the Department of National Defence advises us that they want to cancel it, and so far we have not got any notice to that effect.

RADAR GAP FILLERS—INQUIRY RESPECTING INSTALLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct another question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister tell the house whether or not the government is proceeding with the installation of the radar gap fillers which are designed to give warning against the approach of manned bombers?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Regarding gap fillers, sites have been selected but in all cases the ground has not yet been acquired and no construction work has started.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

REPORTED U.S. CONFUSION OVER PRIORITY PLANS FOR LOCKAGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport and ask him if his attention has been drawn to an article in the Chicago Tribune entitled "Priority plan for seaway upsets lines", in which it is stated that United States shipping interests are in a state of confusion over conflicting information from Canada on the status of priority plans for lockage? Is the minister aware of this, and has any priority been established as between different forms of cargo on the St. Lawrence seaway or the Welland canal?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the article. Last year when congestion occurred in the Welland canal priorities were instituted which I think served the shipping interests very well. If at any time further congestion occurs, priorities will again be instituted. We hope that this year it will not be necessary to introduce such priorities.

Mr. Chevrier: The point of my query was that the United States lines were complaining that they had asked for information from Canada and had received no reply within the last 30 days, I think it said.

Mr. Hees: The inquiry was not directed to me. However, any information about priorities will be given if such priorities are needed. As I say, we hope priorities will not be needed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISARMAMENT—INQUIRY AS TO INCLUSION OF RED CHINA IN CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As the disarmament conference is now progressing, I wonder whether the minister could report whether approaches have been made to include China in the disarmament conference, because otherwise disarmament might be only one-sided.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): If the hon. member would refer again to the western plan he would find there a suggestion that in the second stage there should be a wider conference called to which all nations with significant military power would be invited.

DISARMAMENT—CANADIAN ATTITUDE TO FRENCH PROPOSALS AT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if the six principles proposed yesterday by the representative of France in the ten power disarmament committee as a necessary foundation for a disarmament treaty, and which have been accepted by the Soviet union, have been accepted by Canada?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not had a report from General Burns as yet. I understand that Mr. Moch was in fact speaking for all of the five western countries when he made that proposal, and the reaction to it seems to me a very hopeful sign.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the minister say whether or not those six principles which were outlined in today's press were put forward by France with the knowledge of the government of Canada?

Mr. Green: I cannot give a definite answer to that, but I presume they were.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

SOUTH AFRICA—STATEMENT ON APARTHEID POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister if he is now in a position to report on the situation in South Africa.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I have received a report from the high commissioner in Capetown. While, of course, the hon. gentleman would be the first to aver that I cannot refer to the contents of the report, I can say that it indicates that there are, and will be, widely differing interpretations of why and in exactly what circumstances the incidents took place.

The house will be aware that the South African government has taken steps to institute judicial inquiries into the tragic happenings, and I understand that the formation of a larger commission to investigate the background of the various contributing factors is under consideration by the Union government.

This government is fully aware from questions asked in the house, from press comments, and from correspondence which has been received, that there exists in Canada a profound current of anxiety at the measures which the South African authorities considered it necessary to take. I have already made it clear on numerous occasions that the government has no sympathy for policies of racial discrimination and that we deplore the development of a situation which has given rise to such tragic violence and loss of life.

There have been requests that some positive action should be taken by the government. We understand the sincere feelings and motives which have prompted these suggestions.

However, as to the suggestions themselves, the government must have one over-riding criterion in mind. The important consideration is not whether any action or statement by Canada would relieve Canadian feelings, but what practical effect such action or such a statement might have in South Africa itself. In other words, we have a responsibility, and a solemn one, to reconcile the natural desire in the circumstances to demonstrate by positive action Canadian feelings of distress and, on the other hand, the necessity of ensuring that any such statement or action would help, and not hinder, those people who so strongly merit sympathy and concern.

The weighing of these considerations is a responsibility which rests on the government alone, and in no sense do we seek to evade it. The conclusion of the government is that at this time no beneficial purpose would be served by diplomatic protests or by even more extreme measures to intervene in this tragic situation.

I might add that in the last two days an announcement was made in the parliament of South Africa by the prime minister that he intends to attend the prime ministers' conference in London in May. In 1957 the then prime minister found himself unable to attend. The fact that the present prime minister will attend is a circumstance which, I am sure the house will understand, will ensure that the feelings of the various component parts of the commonwealth can be properly made known.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister in the light of what he has just said whether he is in a position to comment on a press report to the effect that he informed a delegation of the national federation of Canadian university students, when he received them on Wednesday last, that he was opposed to taking too strong a stand on the tragic South African situation because of his desire to be in a position to mediate at the forthcoming prime ministers' conference in London?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I will make no attempt to comment on a press report but, in saying that, I would not go as far as the statement in question implies according to the reading thereof by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in the light of what the Prime Minister has said, whether he is now willing to revise the statement he made in the house on February 16, as reported at page 1139 of Hansard of that date:

> Today it would be extremely hard to find two nations between which Canada could be a go-between.

Mr. Speaker: I think the Leader of the Opposition will appreciate that that is not an appropriate contribution to the proceedings at this stage because it is an argumentative question.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question in view of the reply which he has just given to the Leader of the Opposition on the question of apartheid in South Africa. Will the Prime Minister now revise the statement he made in this house in reply to a question I put to him earlier in the session to the effect that he would not initiate any discussion of this matter at the prime ministers' conference?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows that what takes place at the prime ministers' conference is secret. I am glad to notice the tremendous interest of the hon. gentleman in apartheid because I seem to recall that on a number of occasions when he was one of the representatives at the United Nations in New York and the vote took place on the South African question, he led in Canada's position about taking no attitude and having no vote thereon.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I thank the Prime Minister for this historical narrative and ask him if he proposes to initiate a discussion of this important matter at the prime ministers' conference?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I expected that question to be asked and therefore in order to make sure that the historical record is correct I would remind the hon. gentleman that if he will look at the answer given by the former prime minister, the Right. Hon. Louis St. Laurent, on June 22, 1956, with regard to prime ministers' conferences, he will find a complete answer to his question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRANSPORT

WALPOLE ISLAND—REPORTED INADEQUATE SUPPLIES OF FOOD AND FUEL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport and ask him if he has seen a statement in this morning's Globe and Mail which reports that food and fuel supplies were reported yesterday to be running low on Walpole island in the St. Clair river and that the island residents are attempting to obtain a United States coastguard cutter to break through the icebound channel? What has happened, may I ask the minister, to the usually efficient services of the Department of Transport?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would say that the usually efficient services of the Department of Transport are as efficient as usual. I have heard no complaint in this particular regard. As always happens when we do hear complaints or receive requests for service we supply them as quickly and efficiently as is reasonably possible.

Mr. Chevrier: I am bringing this to the attention of the minister now. Is the minister going to take cognizance of this and bring assistance to these islanders?

Mr. Hees: I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the islanders do not need the assistance of the hon. member for Laurier. If they want assistance from this government I am sure they will ask for it. If they ask for it, every consideration will be given, as always, to requests of this kind.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question? Why, then, is the United States coastguard service going to the assistance of those people rather than the Canadian service?

Mr. Hees: Perhaps because they have a cutter in the immediate vicinity. I would say that would be the logical answer.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

MOUNT HOPE, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO CLOSING OF STATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct another question to the Minister of National Defence. Does his department contemplate an early closing of the R.C.A.F. station at Mount Hope?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): I will have to take that as notice. I do not think we contemplate an early closing but I will look into the matter and let the hon. member know.

[Later:]

Mr. Pearkes: May I confirm the answer I gave to the hon. member for Trinity regarding Mount Hope airport. There is no intention of closing it in the immediate future. There are certain changes being introduced for the purpose of efficiency and economy but there is no intention of closing the airport.

Mr. Hellyer: May I direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration? Is she pleased to hear the minister's answer to the question?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): With regard to the conversations which have taken place between this minister and my colleague, yes.

HOUSING

C.M.H.C.—INQUIRY AS TO DIRECT LOANS TO BUILDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Will the minister make a statement to the house soon clarifying details in respect of direct lending through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for 1960, and in particular the details of eligibility for applicants earning less than $5,000 annually?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I will be very glad to consider that request and go into the matter with officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

"INVITATION TO CANADA"—INQUIRY AS TO FRENCH VERSION OF PUBLICATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. This morning I received a copy of a very beautiful and artistic publication entitled "Invitation to Canada".

(Translation):

This copy of Invitation to Canada is a pre-publication issue made by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

(Text):

Are we to understand that there will not be any French version of this publication?

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I believe there was a French version but I will take this as notice and look into it.

AGRICULTURE

MANITOBA—INQUIRY AS TO MEETING OF PREMIER WITH MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he has recently received a visit from the premier of Manitoba to discuss agricultural matters, and can he clear up the mystery surrounding this visit?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): There is no mystery that I know of in connection with the matter. The premier of Manitoba did come to see me the day before yesterday. We had a general discussion on various matters, and I have nothing to report to the house in connection with it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the minister seen the report in the Winnipeg Free Press, for March 23, which discussed this as a mystery visit to Ottawa and indicated the premier could not give any information about it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is one of those questions that there has been some controversy about. In my opinion without any further thought, it is not a proper question; it is simply asking for verification.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was not asking for any verification. I simply asked the minister whether he had seen the report.

Mr. Speaker: If that is it, it is not perhaps a relevant question at all.

SUPPLY

INTERIM SUPPLY

The house resumed from Thursday, March 24, consideration in committee of supply of the following resolution—Mr. Fleming—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $603,488,902.52, being the aggregate of (a) one sixth of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1961, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, $593,558,978.34; (b) seven twelfths of the amount of item 212 of the said estimates, $904,166.67; (c) one third of the amount of item 36 of the said estimates, $216,666.67; (d) one sixth of the total of the amounts of items 176, 183 and 184 of the said estimates, $615,247.00; (e) one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of items 62, 263, 367, 394, 460 and 463 of the said estimates, $8,193,843.84; be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1961.

The Chairman: Shall I dispense with the reading of the resolution?

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Vancouver East just before ten o'clock last night raised the question of racial discrimination in South Africa. I do not think there is any division among Canadians in their attitude toward this very difficult problem. I think Canadians, and I think political parties represented in this house, believe that a mistake is being made by the government of South Africa in giving less than equal treatment to the coloured people in that great nation.

I think, however, there is a difference of attitude in Canada as to what steps should be taken by the government and as to what Canada's general approach should be to this great problem. It is not a problem that is based solely on the essential principle that there should be equal treatment to the people of all races. It is based also on the practical world situation today. As we see the growth and development of many new independent nations, particularly in Asia and Africa, it is of the utmost importance that the democratic nations, and that the white race, should not appear to be in opposition to these important and welcome developments. If the democratic nations, if a country like Canada, should appear to be opposed to these natural developments, it will jeopardize our democratic system in the future, and it will certainly weaken the western world, including the commonwealth of nations.

So, for many reasons, it is essential that the voice of Canada should ring out strong and clear in opposition to apartheid in South Africa. The Prime Minister's statement this morning showed that this government does not support the racial policies of the government of South Africa. But I think it confirms a belief that we in the C.C.F. have, and we think can be substantiated, that the government's policy on this question is unnecessarily soft; that the government has not taken, in the past, a forthright stand of opposition to the policies that are being followed. I have looked over the record of the discussions and the votes at the United Nations. I have in my hand the terms of the resolution which was presented to the general assembly last year, and the vote on this resolution. The resolution reads as follows:

Recalling its resolution 1248 of 30 October 1958 on the question of race conflict in South Africa resulting from the policies of apartheid of the government of the Union of South Africa,

Deeply convinced that the practice of racial discrimination and segregation is opposed to the observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms,

Considering that government policies which accentuate or seek to preserve racial discrimination are prejudicial to international harmony,

Noting with concern that the policy of apartheid is still being pursued,

1. Expresses its opposition to the continuance or preservation of racial discrimination in any part of the world;

2. Solemnly calls upon all member states to bring their policies into conformity with their obligation under the charter of the United Nations to promote the observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms;

3. Expresses its deep regret and concern that the government of the Union of South Africa has not yet responded to appeals of the general assembly that it reconsider governmental policies which impair the right of all racial groups to enjoy the same fundamental rights and freedoms;

4. Appeals to all member states to use their best endeavours as appropriate to achieve the purposes of the present resolution.

I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this is a very moderate and well considered resolution, and that it is a resolution about which there should be no equivocation so far as Canada's position is concerned, and that in voting on a resolution of this type the government should be prepared to vote in favour.

What has been the result of this discussion and this vote? The result has been Canada has abstained, and the argument as to why Canada has abstained has been that Canada would not wish to do anything that might lead to South Africa leaving the commonwealth. I want to hasten to say I do not want to see the government of South Africa leave the commonwealth. I like to see the commonwealth strong and as influential as it can be. But I think there are greater and more important considerations than that very question. A more important consideration is the question of racial discrimination. Canada should not hesitate, and should not have hesitated for any reason, to support the resolution to which I have referred.

What has been the attitude on the part of other nations? There were 67 nations who supported this resolution; three nations opposed it and seven nations abstained. Canada abstained. Canada was the only commonwealth nation that abstained. I am sorry, I am mistaken. Canada and Australia were the only commonwealth nations that abstained. The United Kingdom voted against the resolution. All the other commonwealth countries, Ceylon, Malaya, Ghana, India, New Zealand, Pakistan, stood by their principles and voted in favour of the motion. They voted to condemn or to criticize racial discrimination.

I think this is a soft policy of the Canadian government that is not supported by the Canadian people.

Mr. Green: May I ask the hon. member if he does not realize that Canada did vote in favour of those paragraphs in the resolution which did not mention South Africa, but which dealt with racial discrimination.

Mr. Argue: Yes; so far as the paragraphs are concerned which do deal with racial discrimination, Canada voted. But when it came to paragraph 3, the nub of the resolution, the heart of the resolution, Canada backed away and refused to take a stand in opposition and took no stand at all so far as this particular section was concerned. As I have said, Canada abstained from voting on the resolution. My friend says that in the view of the government discrimination is only bad if it is outside the commonwealth.

If this had been a resolution directed against a non-commonwealth nation, certainly if it had been directed against an east European nation, Canada would not have hesitated to make a strong, ringing declaration. I suggest that there should not be one attitude to one group of nations on the question of racial discrimination and different attitude, no matter to what degree, to racial discrimination within the commonwealth. I am, therefore, critical of the government for not having taken a strong stand at the United Nations and for not having issued a strong diplomatic protest to the South African government at this time.

The United States government made an official statement. The Canadian government, through the Prime Minister, has been stating Canada's position in the house. But I believe that in general ours has been a position that is less frank than the Canadian people would desire. My first suggestion, therefore, as to what should be done so far as our country is concerned is as I have outlined.

Second, I would think that the Canadian people would be fully justified in doing as are many people in the United Kingdom, for example, at this time, in refusing to purchase goods on sale in their country which have been produced or manufactured in South Africa. If the goods produced in South Africa on shelves in Canadian stores were not moving at this time to the same degree they have moved in the past, I think this situation would be a clear indication to the government of South Africa that the people of Canada protest this mistaken, inhuman and unchristian attitude and policy of that government.

There is in this morning's press a report that the United States ambassador to the United Nations, namely Henry Cabot Lodge, current president of the United Nations security council, will be calling the 11 nation body together early next week to deal with the South Africa racial conflict. Third, I would hope that Canada would take a firmer position in the future within the councils of the United Nations on this question, that Canada would support and would call for a full inquiry now into the situation in South Africa by the United Nations or any agency of the United Nations, and that Canada would support a strong protest from the United Nations security council in respect of the situation in South Africa and the attitude of the South African government.

I have noted in recent days that a petition is being circulated amongst the members of the United Nations asking for a special session of the United Nations to protest any further atomic tests by the government of France and that there are almost enough signatures supporting a United Nations special assembly meeting to require that such an assembly be undertaken. I would think that a special session of the United Nations itself on this question is fully justified in the interests of humanity. In any action that can be taken by the United Nations I would hope that Canada give this action its wholehearted, full and unequivocal support.

The fourth thing I suggest is that Canada should not only welcome, as we do, the statement that Prime Minister Verwoerd of South Africa will be attending the prime ministers' conference; but we should have from the Canadian Prime Minister—our Prime Minister—a clear indication that this question of racial discrimination will be raised at the prime ministers' conference in the interests of humanity, of basic democratic fair play. I suggest also in the interests of maintaining and extending the influence of the commonwealth.

After all, Mr. Chairman, it is not the size of an association of nations, in my opinion, that is most important as far as influence is concerned. It is no longer mainly a question of the size of armaments or the type of armaments in the arsenals of any given political power that decides its influence in the world. In the main I think it is a question of the record and the attitude of the government to basic human freedoms and rights of the citizens within the nation. If the commonwealth is to be strong, we must take all possible steps to remove the cancer in the commonwealth body which is damaging to its existence and is weakening its strength.

Once again, in order to make our position completely clear, may I say that we are not asking a nation that has taken a wrong course and that today is in conflict with humanity to remove itself from the association of the commonwealth of nations any more than we would ask that a nation within the United Nations that has undertaken an unjustifiable act should be expelled from the United Nations. We think the thing to be done is to take every feasible step to clear up the malady or the affliction and to remove this sore and this blight on the commonwealth and on humanity itself.

The easiest thing in the world, Mr. Chairman, is for anyone to be intolerant of others because of colour, religion or economic or social status. I think it is part of the conflict and the competition of life in every person and in every nation that we continue to work on the question of racial equality as well as economic equality, freedom of speech and the other rights that we all hold so dear.

The main purpose of my rising at this time, Mr. Chairman, is not to make a sweeping condemnation of the government, and I do not do that. From my associations with hon. members opposite and from the public statements of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs I can say that I know of no one in this chamber who condones what is being done in South Africa. It is a question of emphasis. It is a question of practicability. I think it is also a question of how we view this kind of discrimination and of the importance we attach to it.

I hope the government will take a stronger position on this question that is not governed by questions of one nation being in or out of a given organization but is based on a type of fundamental conviction that all people are in fact born equal and should have equal rights in human society.

Mr. Hellyer: I feel that we cannot grant this interim supply without objecting to the inclusion of funds for the SAGE-Bomarc program. When the government cancelled the Avro Arrow a year ago last February the inference was drawn that air defence was no longer valid. The minister himself, in explaining this cancellation, suggested that the threat from manned bombers was diminishing and that the threat from intercontinental ballistic missiles was increasing. This was obviously true, Mr. Chairman, and was a fact which was well recognized. But at the same time the minister added that the threat from the manned bomber continues. Many times in the intervening months he has gone on record as saying that in any all-out war in the foreseeable future manned bombers would be used as well as intercontinental ballistic missiles and that they would be used at least for mop-up operations. In that event it was essential, the minister told us, that Canada should continue with the defence against manned bombers. I see the minister is nodding his head, I presume in assent.

Almost immediately, however, a contradiction was introduced and the contradiction was the continuation of a half policy of air defence. The government clearly gave the impression that the Bomarc was a superior while at the same time less expensive alternative to the manned interceptor as a defence against manned bombers. The impression was conveyed to the Canadian people through the press, and was widely accepted at least for a time, that the threat from the bombers was diminishing. We could, the government told us, safely cancel the Avro Arrow, the world's most outstanding all-weather interceptor, but at the same time we had to continue with a defence against manned bombers. It was, of course, a defence only for a very small part of the Canadian nation, but we had to continue with a defence against manned bombers.

Not only did the government decide to proceed with the installation of the SAGE-Bomarc system, but it has also tried to convince us and the Canadian people, though not too successfully, that it should continue to operate its CF-100 squadrons even though that plane is subsonic and the latest Russian bombers which might be sent in in attack against the North American continent are supersonic.

The inconsistencies have begun to make an impression, but it has been a very difficult process to try and impress upon the government and the Canadian people the fact that the government's policy was no policy at all. As a matter of fact, I think it has been easier to convince the Canadian people than it has the government. The government's intransigence on this particular point is a mystery to all of us who sit in the House of Commons, at least on this side of the house, and I am sure to most of the press gallery and to thinking Canadians.

Why would the government cancel the first line of defence against the manned bomber, and continue with the second line? This question has never been answered satisfactorily. Time and time again those of us on this side of the house have said: All or nothing. The continuation of the SAGE-Bomarc program without supersonic interceptors makes no sense whatsoever to the Canadian people, and anyone should be able to see that.

The recent announcement from Washington that the SAGE-Bomarc program was being held up for a month for reconsideration was because the United States authorities were convinced that due to the present accuracy of long range intercontinental ballistic missiles and because the SAGE-Bomarc installations are fixed installations they are indeed very vulnerable to missilry. The United States decided to pause for a fresh look; but not our government, which decides to go blindly on down a road leading to nowhere without giving any satisfactory explanation as to where they expect to wind up.

We believe, Mr. Chairman, that this is not good enough. If the minister would tell us that he was going to continue a complete policy of air defence, that would be one thing. If he told us he was going to re-equip the air defence squadrons and that in addition to that he hoped that the Bomarc B would be successful so that it might be used as the second line of defence, we could at least see the logic of that policy, whether we agreed with it or not. But why, at the present time, the minister refuses to tell us whether or not he intends to re-equip the air defence squadrons, while at the same time telling us that he does intend under any circumstance to continue with the installation of the SAGE-Bomarc system, it is to us a matter of complete mystery.

We repeat, Mr. Chairman, that as far as we are concerned, the SAGE-Bomarc installation by itself is ineffective and a waste of the Canadian taxpayers' money. Not only does it protect too small a part of our nation, but it is far too vulnerable to attack by enemy missiles. It is vulnerable not only to attack by intercontinental ballistic missiles; it must be remembered that one ICBM direct hit on one of these bases would wipe out the base completely and provide an air corridor through which any number of enemy bombers might fly. The bases are also vulnerable to air-to-ground missiles, missiles carried by attacking bombers; and these missiles could be launched some hundreds of miles out in advance of reaching the Bomarc bases. The Bomarc missile and the SAGE system would not be able to differentiate between attacking dummy missiles and the real thing, and they would of necessity be fired one after another and once the half squadron has gone there would be nothing left to defend our cities and the approaches to the North American continent. All would be gone; the corridor would be open and the bombers would fly through.

These overriding considerations, Mr. Chairman, are of the greatest importance. But in addition to this the missile itself has not been proven satisfactory from a technical standpoint. And so we on this side of the house take the view that, first of all, we have had no assurance that the missile will ever be effective. It is small comfort to us to be told by the Associate Minister of National Defence that it took 80 tests before the Bomarc A became operational and that undoubtedly after as many tests the Bomarc B will reach the same stage of effectiveness. This is no comfort whatsoever.

Even if it should become operational, and we repeat that we are not the least bit convinced that it ever will, we still say that with the government's present half policy toward air defence this expenditure makes no sense whatsoever and is a complete and utter waste of the Canadian taxpayers' money. Time and the time again we have raised this subject in the house. Every time the minister has given us some bland assurance that he has confidence in the missile. The minister feels that ultimately it will be successful. After all, he says, there have only been seven tests and quite often it takes many more than this before success is achieved. We wish that we could be as optimistic as he, but we are not.

Mr. Chairman, let me read some of the comments which have been made. After the sixth test questions were raised, and I have here an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of February 2, 1960 entitled "$6 million start made on nearby Bomarc site. Cabinet ignores failure." This article goes on:

> The sixth straight fizzle of the Bomarc B missile, the type that will come to Canada in 1961 has not slackened government plans to build launching bases near North Bay and Mont Laurier.

Then the next sub heading is "Tenders called", and it continues:

> Tenders have been called for concrete work estimated to cost $6.2 million for first-stage construction of the base 100 miles northeast of Ottawa while questions are being raised in the commons about the Bomarc's worth.

Questions are still being raised, and still the cabinet refuses to act. Still the cabinet ignores failure. This cabinet seems to have something in common with the Bomarc B in that after a repeated series of failures it still does not realize that it is incompetent to do the job.

Then after the seventh test this report appeared in the Ottawa Journal of March 8, 1960:

> PM says not suspending Bomarc plans.
> Furore in the commons yesterday over the second straight failure of a Bomarc B test missile led Defence Minister Pearkes to protest that "we are losing all sense of proportion in this matter".

Mr. Chairman, let me ask you, are we losing all sense of proportion? This weapon is the one on which the government has hung the whole air defence of Canada. This is the only weapon in the government's plan to defend the Canadian nation against air attack either by manned bombers or by missiles. Yet we are told by the minister that we are losing all sense of proportion in this matter. Is it not a matter of concern that the survival of our nation is at stake? The article continues:

> There are many more tests to come, he (the defence minister) indicated, and success is anticipated in them.
> In addition, he stated that failures to date have not been of a basic nature but that of small components; that the United States is paying the lion's share of the cost of the Bomarc program, even in Canada, and that Canada so far has spent relatively little on the program.

Further on, the article states, under a subheading "80 Test Flights":

> The Bomarc A, he explained, went through 80 test flights before becoming an operational weapon.
> The implication was there that the Bomarc B might do the same and he was sure that failures experienced to date "can be overcome."

We know the story of the Bomarc A. Even after 80 tests, when it did become operational, it is still no good. Attacking bombers can fly over it, or under it, and it can be jammed by radar. It is an ineffective weapon, and what assurance have we that this new weapon will be of greater use even if it does become operational?

Again, after the seventh failure, another article appeared, this time in the Globe and Mail of March 8, 1960. The heading is: "Pearkes Again Voices Confidence in Bomarc". One thing one can say about the Minister of National Defence is that at least he appears to be a congenital optimist. We only wish he had something to be optimistic about. This report is from the Ottawa bureau of the Globe and Mail, and the dateline is Ottawa, March 7. It begins:

> Following a telephone consultation with U.S. defence secretary Gates, defence minister Pearkes today again told the commons he was hopeful that mechanical failure in the Bomarc B missile would be overcome.
> The weapon—scheduled for a key role in Canada's air defence—failed for the seventh consecutive time in a test launching attempt at Cape Canaveral, Florida, on Saturday.

Further on, the article states:

> He (Mr. Pearkes) then reported his telephone talk with Mr. Gates, who gave him assurances that "if there is any change made at all in the defence program for the North American continent under NORAD, Canada will be consulted." Bomarc B is part of the program.

What we cannot understand is why, if the minister has been consulted, and if he has been informed of developments in the United States, he should continue to insist that Canada go ahead with this installation and continue to spend the taxpayers' money on a program which obviously has lost the confidence of military and scientific people in the United States. Why does Canada insist on throwing money down the drain? As this article says, $6 million is being spent merely for a start on a base at North Bay.

This amount of $6 million is far greater than the sum which was involved in other so-called scandals—horses on the payroll, the printing bureau and so on—and I am not for a moment suggesting that there is anything wrong in this latter case; I am merely pointing out that it is necessary to keep these things in proportion. The minister tells us that we should not lose all sense of proportion in these matters. This is a very important matter. Since when are we to be told: what is $6 million? I say that $6 million is a very important sum to the taxpayers of Canada. If it were spent in some other field it might be of real benefit. If it were spent, for example, on scientific research and development it might well achieve something of lasting worth in the military sphere, perhaps with derivatives of value to our industrial development and growth.

We would like to hear from the minister why he asks us to vote funds for the continuation of this program in the circumstances I have outlined. Why does he come and ask parliament to vote money for an expenditure which 95 per cent of thinking people know is going to turn out to be a complete and utter waste?

I was looking for another clipping reporting a meeting recently addressed by the Associate Minister of National Defence. As I recall it, it reported the associate minister as indicating his confidence in this weapon system and as saying he thought that after it had been tested a number of times it would prove to be successful. According to the report, as I remember it, the associate minister urged that Canada should continue with these plans for the SAGE-Bomarc system, and the hon. gentleman went one step further, he said that this missile should be established at other locations across Canada.

Mr. Sevigny: On a question of privilege, I most certainly never stated the last portion of the remarks which the hon. member for Trinity is imputing to me. I simply said that the Bomarc A was considered successful and that it was reasonable to hope that the Bomarc B would eventually prove to be a success, also. That is all I ever said. I deny having said what the hon. member is imputing to me at the present time.

Mr. Hellyer: I accept that correction. I am very disappointed to hear it. I was referring to a report in a newspaper, and I know that sometimes these reports are not completely accurate. But I had thought that the associate minister was for the first time showing evidence that he had some concern for the defence of people west of Toronto, that he was giving consideration to the needs of the people of Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton, Saskatoon, Victoria and other western cities and towns. It is disappointing to hear him confirm that I was wrong and that he, too, has given no thought to how the air defence of Canada should be enlarged in order to include a greater portion of this country than just the area around the great lakes basin.

Mr. Sevigny: Will the hon. member for Trinity permit a question? Is the hon. member aware of the fact that the Bomarc program is part of an integrated program under the supervision and direction of the organism well known by the name of NORAD which is in charge of the defence of the North American continent?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, I am well aware of that, and that is just the point I am trying to make, that when this integrated program is being integrated out of the United States' plans it should at the same time be integrated out of the Canadian plans. If we have an integrated program we should be consistent and not insist that we go blindly ahead with our own installations at the very time when the United States, the senior partner in this NORAD agreement, has decided that the program is no longer valid. How can the two ministers put any other interpretation on the facts. A reduction in the amount of money to be spent this year from $421 million to $50 million is surely a clear indication that the program is going to be washed out and that any expenditures we make are going to be money down the drain? Do the two ministers deny that? Can they not see the handwriting on the wall? Can they not see that our friends in the United States have come to the conclusion that the expenditure of this vast amount of money on the SAGE-Bomarc program as they had set it up even as late as a year ago is no longer consistent with their objective and the amount of money they have available to spend?

If the two ministers cannot see that, I feel they should rise in their places and explain this matter to parliament and the Canadian people because as yet they have not done so. If any further reason was required we now have it to indicate that the fullest, frankest and freest discussion of defence policy should take place at the earliest possible date.

One further dramatic piece of evidence to indicate that the government has no policy and that it should seek the advice of all hon. members of the committee has now been presented to us. Again we urge the minister and the Prime Minister that when the defence committee is established every effort be made not to restrict the discussion there but that it take the fullest possible form and that we be allowed to discuss, not only matters of expenditure and particularly past expenditure but also matters of policy affecting this country, not only in its isolated sense, but in its relationship to its NORAD and NATO partners. This discussion is essential and we again urge the minister and through him the government to allow what the Leader of the Opposition asked for earlier in the year, a full and complete policy discussion.

In the meantime, Mr. Chairman, it is obvious to us that this SAGE-Bomarc system makes no sense whatever in its present form. As a single defence mechanism against manned bombers we feel it is a waste of public funds. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Essex East:

That the amount requested by the Minister of Finance by way of interim supply in item (a) of the proposed resolution be reduced by what fraction of the estimates for the Department of National Defence being requested in the present resolution is destined for the Bomarc and Sage systems.

The Chairman: It seems to me the Chair can hardly accept this amendment because it is impossible from its wording to determine the exact amount by which there would be a reduction in the main resolution. Unless the hon. member can find an amendment which would make it in order, I cannot accept it.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, my amendment in amended form would read as follows. I move:

That the amount of interim supply in item (a) of the proposed resolution be reduced by $1 million.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, not too long ago I had the privilege of visiting Halifax in company with the hon. member for Trinity. I am not sure who is the most effective missionary but on two days in succession I find myself in complete agreement with the hon. gentleman. The hon. member for Kootenay West referred yesterday to the excellent C.C.F. speech made by the hon. member for Trinity and today I find myself again in complete accord with him. I do not wish to add too much to what has been said. In view of recent developments we are becoming more and more convinced that Canadian defence policy is just the tail of the kite of United States defence policy. When a kite is flying it goes in one direction but the tail may go in five or six other directions. They are tied together but the tail goes in another direction.

I do not know who is responsible for this. I hope the Minister of National Defence is not because I have great personal regard for him. I think rather this is the fault of the cabinet as a whole and unfortunately the poor minister must face the consequences. He has stated on a number of occasions that he has confidence in this missile. We in the opposition and Canadians generally have no confidence either in this missile, in the government's defence policy or in the minister in having to present this policy to parliament and the people. If the blame is the minister's own, in the face of everything we have seen today I think the greatest service he can render his country is to resign from his office. If, on the other hand, it is not his fault and he has only to face the music on behalf of the cabinet, then it is time they took another look at what they are trying to do. I do not think they have the confidence of parliament or the Canadian people with regard to defence policy at the present time.

Mr. Pearson: Is the Minister of National Defence not going to say anything about the statements that have been made on defence policy this morning?

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I replied to various questions about defence policy in the question period this morning.

Mr. Peters: I wish to support the amendment that has been moved. I recently visited North Bay a number of times and inquired of the people there and learned there is a difference of opinion about what is going on with respect to the Bomarc development. The people are entitled to know what is happening. We know the value of the class B Bomarc and are completely unsatisfied with this. If Canada is going to pursue the defence policy that has been outlined in the past few years we will obviously have to have bases in Canada and for this reason Mont Laurier and North Bay were chosen. Canada will have to give some assurance to the people that we are not building bases that cannot be used for anything else in the light of developments with respect to the Bomarc B in the United States. I believe that one of these days the minister will come to parliament and tell us that the United States government has scrapped its program for Bomarc B missiles and that we are now going to use Nike, Thor, Atlas or some other missile presently under development. If we build cement bases in North Bay they should be suitable for use with other types of missiles.

We cannot change our program overnight in the House of Commons and say that this nation will be able to go into the production of another type of missile, because the fixtures that have to be installed for this type of firing are not interchangeable from one rocket to another. Each one requires a different type of base. For this reason I think we should discontinue our work on the Bomarc missile base at the present time and wait until we have more assurance that this is the type of missile we are going to use, because I doubt whether it is. We should be in the position to be able to change over.

I should like to ask whether in fact any Bomarc missile base is in the course of erection in North Bay area. It is my understanding that there is a trailer parked on the highway at about the approximate place at which the semi-automatic ground environment tunnel is to be, and this is the extent of the development. In fact no work is taking place on the Bomarc missile base at all.

This may be a very hush-hush matter. If it is, the people of North Bay may not know everything that is going on, but some of the citizens should be in a position to know. They know of absolutely no work going on at the missile base. The only work that is going on is taking place at Trout lake, and the Trout lake development is the semi-automatic ground environment for the eastern central command. There will be a tunnel between the environments and it is not really a missile base anyway.

If we are voting an appropriation, if we are voting supply toward this missile base, then we should know whether it has been started or not. The minister has informed the house that the Mont Laurier base has not even got to the stage where we own the land, although we have an option on the land where the base will be built.

I am in agreement with the hon. member for Trinity with respect to this amendment. It would seem to me that we should at least leave ourselves an opening, and if we are building a Bomarc missile base at North Bay today we should be sure it will be applicable to some other type of missile. We should be giving consideration to an alternative plan because, obviously, if we have any more failures in the Bomarc missile development program there will be no missiles developed in the United States. Canada is not in a position to make another mistake such as we made with the Arrow. I do not think we are in a position to make that kind of a mistake more than once every 10 or 15 years, and we we have already made it. This is a worth-while amendment and it has my full support.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, this amendment which the hon. member for Trinity has moved in an impressive, reasonable, logical statement is one of no confidence in the defence policy of this government, with particular reference to the expenditure of money. We are being asked to vote expenditures of money now on some aspects of that defence policy which, in our view, make no sense whatever, especially in the light of the information we have received in the last day or two from Washington concerning the Bomarc missile, and not only the Bomarc missile but the whole system of continental defence which is under review and re-examination in Washington at the present time. In the light of what has happened to this particular missile, and in the light of this re-examination which is taking place in Washington of the bases of our continental defence system, to which we are attached, it seems to us, Mr. Chairman, to be the height of folly to go ahead with expenditures of this kind.

In so far as the Bomarc is concerned, surely a single dollar now being spent on Bomarc facilities and Bomarc bases is, to say the least, in very great danger of being wasted, especially, Mr. Chairman, when the government cannot make up its mind as to what kind of weapon this Bomarc would be if it were successful technically. The Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister have recently thrown some doubt on the advisability, which some of us share, of using nuclear warheads in this particular weapon if it should in fact be technically successful, and there is no evidence to that effect. But the Minister of National Defence has been quite specific and categorical on this subject. He has not retreated one inch, so far as I know, from the position which he announced on March 10, 1959, when he said, as reported at page 1776 of Hansard:

> Both the Prime Minister and myself have on several occasions stated that there will be two squadrons of Bomarcs... These will be separate units with complete establishments of personnel, missiles and launching apparatus.

He made clear, as the Prime Minister made clear at that time and on other occasions, that those two complete squadrons would not achieve their maximum effectiveness unless they had nuclear warheads. However, there is no indication, even from the minister's statement this morning in answer to a question, that the government's confidence in this missile, which confidence has been pretty well abandoned in the country where it is being made, is shaken in any respect. This is just one example of wasteful expenditures of money on national defence policy.

Another example, perhaps, is the Lacrosse missile. On October 1, 1958 the Prime Minister announced that we would establish a battery of Lacrosse missiles at initial cost for equipment of $1,198,000. It was stated by the minister in the house on July 3, 1959 that there would be an item in the estimates for that purpose. The minister said, as reported at page 5443 of Hansard:

> There is money provided in the estimates for the initial procurement of this Lacrosse weapon.

We were told on February 22, 1960, as reported at page 1296 of Hansard, by the minister, who had said the year before that there was going to be an item in the estimates:

> ... we are not at the present time in a position to make any firm recommendations or place a firm order.

He was referring to this particular missile. This is the kind of thing which surely gives us the right to make this kind of motion of no confidence in the spending policy of this government in matters of defence.

What is the relationship of this uncertainty, to say the least, to the whole question of continental defence? The Bomarc is likely to be a failure; the CF-105 has been scrapped. We now have our continental defence, in so far as there is any defence of any kind, through interceptors composed of squadrons of CF-100's, squadrons of CF-100's which could not possibly be effective against the latest potential manned bomber let alone missiles for which they were not designed to be effective, squadrons of CF-100's which the minister himself said on May 28, 1957 were obsolete. On that occasion he was reported in the Victoria Times of May 28, 1957 as saying:

> Millions of dollars have been spent developing and producing the CF-100 jet fighter, which now are obsolete and unsaleable.

They are the planes which are now the only equipment we have in respect of continental defence. Presumably in these particular estimates which we are now being asked to vote, there will be some money for the maintenance and upkeep of the CF-100's in our continental defence squadrons.

There is something even more surprising than the incidents I have mentioned in regard to defence policy and which gives us even better cause to question the advisability of spending money of this kind on this kind of policy. The Acting Secretary of State said in this house on March 11, 1960, page 1972 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I did not consult my colleague, but I still say that our $281 million contribution to the Colombo plan has done much more for world peace than the billions which we have had to spend on defence.

We are being asked to spend more millions on defence which, according to the Acting Secretary of State, are not as effective for defence as are the expenditures on the Colombo plan. When we questioned the Minister of National Defence on that particular statement, he agreed with it. His reply is found on page 1973 of Hansard, where he said:

> Mr. Speaker, all members of this government agree with the statements made by another hon. member of the government.

If the Minister of National Defence agrees with that kind of statement, how can he justify expenditures of this kind on things like the Bomarc, presumably on the Lacrosse, and on other aspects of continental defence which are increasingly under question in Washington as being of no value at all for defence. This is the kind of thing, which gives us every right to move a vote of no confidence in the defence expenditure policy of this government. This is the kind of thing which leads us even now to insist that this whole question of defence policy should be re-examined from the very foundation. Perhaps the minister even now will do his best to make that possible in the committee which is being set up, restricted though its terms of reference may be. Perhaps the minister even now in this committee will say something to justify the expenditure of millions of dollars on this kind—if you can call it that—of defence.

Until he can do that and do it convincingly—which is not going to be very easy in the light of the evidence we are getting every day—we will support this motion as an indication of no confidence in the defence expenditures and defence policy of this government.

Mr. Argue: Before a vote is taken I want to make it clear that we in this group will support the motion for precisely the reason given by the Leader of the Opposition, namely that we have no confidence whatever in the defence policy of this government. We feel, and feel very strongly, that Canada today by and large is spending $1,600 million on a defence program for obsolete weapons, obsolete equipment, and that is an expenditure that is a sheer, fabulous waste of money. We think it is not only a waste of money but it is bound to lull the Canadian people into a sense of false security, certainly any of them who may put some credence in the statements of the Minister of National Defence. We feel that a great part of these hundreds of millions of dollars should be diverted from the Department of National Defence—any expenditures such as this—to the economic assistance of the emerging nations in the world.

If that were done we feel convinced that we would get a far greater degree of security for our nation, and for others believing in our type of system. We believe that before the defence committee that is being established there should be a full, complete and unfettered inquiry into defence policy; that there should be no endeavour, as there will be undoubtedly, to prevent the committee from making recommendations that would clear up the defence mess into which our country has been plunged. The most disturbing feature, I think, of our whole policy is the complete reliance of the government on the United States defence program. We are the tail on the United States defence policy. We are in the hip pocket of the United States on defence policy. We are called a partner, but we are not a partner. We are not a partner in policy. We are not a partner in basic discussions. We are merely the errand boy for the United States in this defence program.

The government does not even know from day to day what United States defence policy is. They are not informed. Apparently they do not even listen to the radio to hear the reports that are coming forward. What is the announcement now? The announcement is that the United States is going to reduce its own expenditure from $420 million to $50 million on the Bomarc.

Mr. Speakman: Who told you?

Mr. Argue: Who told me? It was not the Minister of National Defence. He is not in the know. He has not been informed. This announcement was on the radio this morning, and I think there is every indication that this is the thinking, the likely policy, in the United States.

The Minister of National Defence told us on a former occasion that the United States would be putting some $70 million into the Canadian section of the Bomarc defence system. We are being left high and dry, obviously, if the United States expenditures are cut from $420 million to $50 million, if we had originally expected $70 million as our share in this development. This government promised that Canada would be able to hold its head high. We would have an independent policy, and that where our policy was associated with the United States we would be an independent partner with a substantial voice in defence policies.

We are not being consulted. Obviously, the government is not being consulted. The government is not even being informed of the very tremendous changes in the United States defence system. It is obvious that Canada is merely waiting to follow the statements of policy that emanate from the United States from time to time. This, for Canada, is a very degrading position. We not only stand defenceless today because of the policy of the government, but in the eyes of the world we must look a complete, but somewhat unimportant, satellite of the United States.

I hope the Minister of National Defence will not allow this vote to be taken without some comment. He may not wish to give opposition members the satisfaction of a reply but he owes the people of Canada a reply outlining the government's attitude at this time in these very rapid developments in the defence policy of the United States.

The Minister of National Defence has taken a posture on these huge expenditures on obsolete weapons. He is not willing to compromise on this attitude. Obviously it is a misdirected policy. I think the policy should be changed. If, in order to change its policy, it is necessary for the government to change the minister who occupies that portfolio, then this should be done. We need a new attitude and a new policy in the Department of National Defence. If one reads the editorial pages of some of the main newspapers of this country that traditionally support either the government party or the opposition party one will see a clear indication that people in all walks of life supporting all political parties say that this government's defence policy is misdirected, useless and in need of a thorough and complete overhaul. For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, we are delighted to have the opportunity to support this amendment.

Mr. Pearkes: I am going to reply to the criticisms which have been made because, as I pointed out this morning on the orders of the day, a great deal of this criticism has been based on a speculative report which can only be described as a leak from a meeting of a committee which is being held in the United States and which was held in camera. However, I want to contradict flatly the statement which was made by the hon. member for Assiniboia a few minutes ago that Canada was not being consulted. Canada has been consulted step by step and Canada's opinion has carried weight. I can say quite frankly that I have been speaking almost daily with the secretary of defence or Mr. Douglas who is his deputy in Washington. I am fully informed of the proposals which are being presented to the committee on appropriations at this time. But until that committee has heard all the evidence and until the committee has reported upon what its recommendations are—and I say "recommendations" advisedly because, as far as Canada is concerned, nothing will be done without consultation with Canada—I am unable to say anything. I am not going to talk about matters which are based purely on a newspaper report which, as I say, purports to be a report of a committee held in camera.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Argue: The minister has said that the report is a leak or that this was a confidential inquiry in camera. Does the minister deny the report? Does he deny that there is going to be made a very slashing reduction in the United States appropriations for the Bomarc missile?

Mr. Pearkes: As I said, I have no comments to make at this time.

Mr. Hellyer: I have just one comment based on the minister's statement of a moment ago. If he has been as well informed as he has led this committee to believe, I cannot understand—nor, I am sure, can my colleagues—why, when the United States air force itself decided to suspend operations temporarily pending a re-evaluation, the government did not accept the advice given them by those on this side of the chamber on January 26 last. That is the very least that should have been done.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: The question is on the amendment.

Amendment negatived: yeas 23; nays, 82.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I have a few remarks that I should like to make before this resolution passes, Mr. Chairman, and I wonder whether I might call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks on the subject raised by the leader of our group, the hon. member for Assiniboia, when he spoke this morning, the recent incidents that are very much in the minds of the Canadian people at the present time, namely, the racial violence in South Africa.

I should like to impress upon the government in particular the importance of one aspect of this question which I do not think has been stressed so far. The incidents of wanton butchery the other day, reprehensible though they are, are overshadowed by what could develop from these incidents. History down through the years is dotted with examples of people in such straits as the coloured people of South Africa being driven in pure desperation to blood baths which have spread right across a whole continent, and which in fact could spread right across the world. We may find a situation where this policy of apartheid will spread and become a war between the races.

If we stop to look at the possible reason behind what happened, Mr. Chairman, I think we will find it is really based on a false premise. I think the reason the situation came about is due to the fear of the white people that if the coloured people are given equal representation in a place where they outnumber the whites there is a danger of their treating the whites in turn as the whites have treated them in the past. Again, I think if we look back in history we will find that there is no basis for such fears. Only the white race down through the years seems to have been cursed with this rapacious greed for wealth and power. The red people of this country did not have it; at least, they did not until we taught it to them. The brown people of the West Indies and the Far East did not have it until we brought it to them. The black people of Africa did not have it. It would appear that the white race is the only race that seems to be cursed with whatever it is that seems to bring about this war between races.

I should like to impress upon the government and the Prime Minister that if we do not speak up against this sort of thing we will be seen in the eyes of all coloured peoples of the world as condoning by our silence what happened the other day. I cannot recall any injustices in our history, Mr. Chairman, which were corrected unless somebody spoke out against them and did something. I say that if we do not speak out against this injustice we will stand condemned in the eyes of all the coloured people in the world.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1961, the sum of $603,488,902.52 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada as set forth in the resolution concurred in this day in the committee of supply.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, the government is asking us today to authorize supplementary estimates for the Department of Agriculture representing a fairly large sum of money.

We note that the first item in the supplementary estimates requires no elaborate comments, even though it calls for a rather high amount in administration costs of the agricultural stabilization board, considering that we are being asked to vote an amount of $57,661,176.

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. gentleman must be under a misapprehension as to the matter we are now discussing. We are in committee of ways and means at this time, the committee of supply having reported the former resolution. The hon. member is discussing one of the items in the supplementary estimates which we have not yet reached.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We are trying to save time.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words about the agricultural stabilization act—

I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, I thought I could deal with agricultural stabilization, during the discussion on supplementary estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member for Essex East is to blame.

(Text):

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-54, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1960.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time? Now, by leave?

Mr. Pickersgill: By leave.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved the second reading of the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the minister could assure us that the bill is in exactly the same form as the resolution?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The bill is in the usual form.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee and reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Mr. Pickersgill: By leave.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Livestock division—

634. Grants to agricultural organizations, as detailed in the estimates—further amount required, $43,000.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): With regard to these grants to agricultural organizations, I do not suppose that the Minister of Finance can possibly be expected to have any knowledge of the important subject of agriculture, certainly only in very general terms, and that being the case, and as I notice that the Minister of Agriculture is not here, I am glad to see that the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture is present. Perhaps he can assist the minister in answering questions which, as I say, cannot be expected to lie within the wide range of knowledge that the Minister of Finance possesses on matters which are of substance as well as matters involving procedure in this house.

Item agreed to.

635. Quality premiums on high grade hog carcasses and administration costs—further amount required, $800,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary could give a brief explanation of this item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. gentleman does not mind, I will endeavour to reply to his question, and I assure him and the hon. member for Essex East that I am not without some farming experience. I speak as a one-time farm labourer, and I shall endeavour as best I can to answer the questions which come from those two expert agriculturist friends of mine.

Item 635 contemplates the provision of an additional sum of $800,000. The original estimate here was a substantial one and it has already been increased by supplementary estimate. The marketing of hogs during the present fiscal year has exceeded all previous forecasts indicated in the main and previous supplementary estimates. Based on the figures for the marketing of hogs since January 1, 1960, the forecast of hog marketings to the end of the fiscal year is 148,000 hogs per week, and an additional sum of approximately $800,000 is required for the payment of the premiums on grade A and B hogs which are eligible. Included in the estimate is the $9,000 required for the printing of additional premium warrants.

Mr. Pickersgill: Speaking as one who was born on a farm in Ontario and raised on a farm in Manitoba, I should like to ask the minister if these premiums were for the purpose of stimulating the production of hogs, and if the hon. gentleman finds any inconsistency in the fact that these premiums are paid to stimulate production when, at the same time, the government has changed its support policy in midstream to cause the contrary effect on production. How does the minister reconcile those aims in the treasury board?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. gentleman is not giving us a correct surmise when he says that the purpose of these premiums is to increase production. The purpose of the premium payment is to encourage the improvement of quality.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can the minister tell us what the division of this expenditure is? I see it covers not only quality premiums on high grade carcasses but administration costs. What are the administration costs?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is $9,000 for the printing of premium warrants and $791,000 for the payment of the quality premiums on A and B carcasses.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thank the minister for reminding me that Mr. Gardiner started these quality premiums before the war for the purpose of getting into the United Kingdom market. Can the minister tell us how many hogs or hog products have been shipped into the British market in the past year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

Plant products division—

637. Contributions to the governments of the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, in accordance with terms and conditions prescribed by the governor-in-council, of one-half of the amounts paid by the governments of those provinces for transporting haying equipment, fodder and livestock to and within those provinces on and after July 1, 1958—further amount required, $13,500.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Just a minute, Mr. Chairman. You are going so fast that the Minister of Finance and I are having difficulty in following what we are called upon to vote. This looks like a rather important item although the amount involved is not as large as the preceding vote. Perhaps the minister could give us some information.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Vote No. 637 contemplates the provision of $13,500 as Canada's contribution to the governments of two of the western provinces, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, toward the cost of transporting haying equipment, fodder and livestock to and within these provinces after July 1, 1958, as indicated in the item No. 637. There have been payments made. The actual expenditure to January 31, 1960 was $34,541, and it is estimated that the amount required to provide for these payments to the end of the present fiscal year is an additional sum of $13,500 in round figures. The bulk of it is for the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Pickersgill: Was any of that money expended in the main vote for Alberta?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, this is for Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

Item agreed to.

638. To extend the purposes of vote 614, further supplementary estimates (1), 1959-60, to include the transport of livestock bedding other than straw, $1.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River expressed some concern about this dollar item. Perhaps the minister would tell us what the purpose of it is?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman. The purpose of this item is not to add money but to enlarge the scope of an item that was previously passed in the supplementary estimates which was an item of $300,000. It made provision for payments toward transportation costs on shipments of fodder and straw and on the movement of cattle from October 12, 1959, to the end of the present fiscal year. It is desired to extend this cost-sharing to include sums paid on other forms of livestock bedding such as shavings and sawdust due to the shortage of straw, particularly in Manitoba.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister say where the shavings and sawdust come from?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I cannot in all cases, Mr. Chairman, but it is intended for use in Manitoba principally.

Item agreed to.

639. Prairie Farm Assistance Act administration—further amount required, $134,000.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance will perhaps recall that when we were discussing the crop insurance legislation last session there was some discussion about the relationship of prairie farm assistance to crop insurance. Can the minister say whether or not any of the reluctance of the provinces to participate in the federal scheme is due in any way to the attitude taken by the federal government toward payments with regard to prairie farm assistance and any beneficial consequences to any individual farmer under the Crop Insurance Act?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I should think not, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In view of what the Minister of Agriculture had to say about this subject, I think the minister will recognize that his brief reply is hardly relevant or helpful in the matter. I am asking if one of the provinces has objected to the scheme because a farmer cannot obtain both benefits?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the point of my answer was that I think the two subjects are not related. The hon. gentleman is seeking to impinge a discussion in relation to crop insurance on an item that relates to prairie farm assistance.

Mr. Argue: These two things are different, Mr. Chairman, but they are closely related because to the extent crop insurance may be adopted in given areas it will reduce the amount of crop insurance paid under prairie farm assistance and—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think I can satisfy my hon. friend, Mr. Chairman. There is nothing in this item that is being voted now that provides for crop insurance. This is simply an additional amount of $134,000 to be added to the amount previously voted by parliament to provide the administrative requirements of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. It arises out of inspections. That is the immediate occasion for asking for the addition.

Mr. Argue: I understand that fully. I can tell the minister why he needs the money. As time goes on and more and more inspections are made under the act during a given crop year, it is found that certain sums of money are required and so parliament has to vote them.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is specifically this situation in the west. These increased inspections were the result of early snow in the prairie provinces. It was necessary to re-inspect areas that originally were considered ineligible for assistance. In some cases several re-inspections had to be made. It is this situation which has given rise to the need for this additional appropriation.

Mr. Argue: If one could interpret from what the minister said that those with crops under the snow would become eligible it would be a welcome innovation, but I do not think that is what the minister is saying.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I repeat what I actually did say, Mr. Chairman. These additional expenditures were due to early snow on the prairies and re-inspections became necessary because of that fact.

Mr. Argue: I would hope that the minister would consider the question I am about to ask under this item. I think it is as relevant as any discussion about prairie farm assistance can be. Is there any indication that certain areas will be brought under crop insurance during the coming year so that there may in fact be somewhat less money required for prairie farm assistance? The minister well knows that the provinces are complying with the federal legislation and passing complementary legislation to make it operative, but is there any indication that certain areas will in fact have the 25 per cent sign-up necessary to bring them under crop insurance?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, that will depend, of course, entirely on the governments of the provinces themselves and their legislatures but there is nothing in this item that pertains to this subject. There is no provision in this item in relation to crop insurance.

Mr. Argue: The minister misunderstood my question. I did not ask whether the province of Manitoba would provide some type of crop insurance scheme. My question was this. Has the government any indication that a given area or a number of areas will come under the crop insurance plans that are being provided?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I understand that there has been no conclusive indication in that respect but again that is a situation that could change as a result of provincial action.

Mr. Argue: The minister's statement tends to confirm my impression that a vast majority of areas in the prairie provinces do not consider the crop insurance plan set out in legislation passed last year sufficiently attractive in order to come under the provisions of the act and therefore exclude themselves from the provisions of prairie farm assistance. I think the scheme was misconceived in its various clauses, was brought in without the consent of the provinces and got off to a bad start. Worse still, there is not sufficient incentive for the vast majority of areas to get the 25 per cent sign-up which is the minimum requirement.

Item agreed to.

640. Estimated amount required to recoup the agricultural commodities stabilization account for the net operating loss of the agricultural stabilization board during the fiscal year 1959-60, $57,661,176.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Under this item, we are asked to vote an amount of $57,661,176 under the heading "Operating loss sustained by the agricultural prices stabilization board". That, Mr. Chairman, is the highest amount Canada has ever spent to support farm prices, since the passing of the Agricultural Prices Support Act in 1946.

If we look at the report, we find that the total amount spent under the act since 1946 is approximately $100 million, including the losses arising from the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease, mainly in the western provinces, and which accounted for $70 million of that amount.

Under the Liberal administration, from 1946 to March 1957, the Agricultural Prices Support Act cost $25,052,806.98.

Now if you look at the expenditures for the past three years, that is since the Conservative government took over, you find that in 1958, Canada spent close to $6 million, and in 1959, $15,124,000. Now, for the year 1959-1960, we are asked to vote $57,661,176.

That means that since the election of the Conservative government, it has cost the taxpayers the substantial amount of $78,773,819 to support agricultural prices.

In short, therefore, it can be said that in the last 12 years of Liberal administration, it cost us $25 million to support those prices, while in three years of Conservative administration, the amount expended was $78 million.

(Text):

Mr. Speakman: Will the hon. member permit a question?

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: If I may, I shall go on with my remarks and you can ask your question when I have finished. Those are substantial amounts and no doubt did a lot of good to farmers. But did the Agricultural Stabilization Act, which the Conservative government introduced, help farmers to the extent called for by their requirements and by fairness? No, far from it. While farmers had been promised support prices tied to cost prices and set 12 months in advance, the government recently backed down on this plan.

Admittedly the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) did set interesting prices for certain commodities in 1958, 25 cents for pork and 44 cents for eggs; but what has happened since? Many businessmen, manufacturers, and even professional men went into pork and cattle breeding with resulting well known awkward surpluses.

Then the government was seized with panic, and the Minister of Agriculture went back on his wonderful promises and forgot the fine arguments he had used when the bill was being considered.

It is true, as Mr. Paul-Henri Lavoie said in the Terre de Chez Nous of May 6, 1959, that:

Whenever surpluses substantially exceed marketing possibilities, a high class show is put on, led by groups whose real intentions are concealed by high-sounding names. Panic-stricken government authorities rush into legislation which often bears the earmarks of expediency.

What a face-about since the statements the Prime Minister made in 1957 and 1958.

What reversal too, in the attitude of the Minister of Agriculture who recently made the following declarations during the convention of the Catholic farmers' federation in Toronto:

(Text):

We have managed to maintain better prices for a considerable number of commodities, particularly through the operations of the stabilization board, but only so much is possible along these lines.

(Translation):

The minister claims that his government helped maintain better prices for a considerable number of farm commodities. But, of course, he is very careful not to say for which ones. Were they better prices for wheat, oats, barley, pork, eggs, etc.? Of course not. And in the same speech he said that the prices obtained were higher than those obtained by U.S. farmers.

In closing his remarks, the minister said:

(Text):

The policies of this government during the past two and a half years were designed to improve farm income position and share of the national wealth.

Can you imagine, Mr. Chairman, a responsible minister making a statement like that when it is known to everyone, especially to farmers, that the net farm income in 1959 was 7 per cent lower than in 1958, that is, by $88,174,000.

In spite of the huge amounts we spend to support the prices of farm products, those prices keep coming down, while the cost of goods and services required by the farmers keep rising. In this connection, I should like to quote a few figures which I would ask the Minister of Agriculture to consider, after he has had a chance to read my remarks, since he is not in the house this afternoon. I would ask him to consider and ponder those figures, and I dare him to challenge their accuracy.

If we compare the average price of certain farm products in the ten-year period running from 1947 to 1956 with the average price in 1957, 1958 and 1959, we find that during the last ten years of the Liberal regime, wheat was selling at $1.49 a bushel, whereas in the last three years it has been selling at $1.23. In the last three years, barley, that used to fetch $1 a bushel, has been selling at 75 cents a bushel. Oats, which between 1947 and 1956, was selling at 65 cents, has been selling at 53 in the last three years. Prices of flaxseed have similarly dropped from $3.36 to $2.67; pork is down from $27.16 to $26.19 a cwt.; eggs, which used to sell at 41.6 cents a dozen, have been selling at 35 cents a dozen in the last three years.

I could go through the list of all farm products, and we would find similar price drops. I have here all the figures. For instance, rye which used to sell at $1.50 a bushel during 1947 to 1956, sold at 58 cents a bushel in 1958; the price of potatoes dropped from $1.99 to $1.73.

Mr. Pigeon: What about butter?

Mr. Boulanger: Butter has been selling at 64 cents and I hope the government will keep it at that level. It is the only product on which eastern farmers depend for staying on the farms.

Mr. Pigeon: Why was it not increased under your administration?

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I have just given figures of farm prices and shown that there has been a steady decline as a result of Conservative party policy. Now if we look at the price index of goods and services bought by farmers we find that, there too, prices are detrimental to farmers. In 1956 for instance, the price index for goods and services bought by farmers was 247.6; it went up to 255.9 in 1957, 259.9 in 1958 and to 273.5 in August 1959. This is to say that, since 1956, the price index of goods bought by farmers has gone up by 25.9. If we take the index from January 1, 1959 to August of the same year, we notice an increase of 13.6 in eight months.

We have not heard the Minister of Agriculture deal with the price index of goods bought by farmers.

As for the farm prices index, it was 234.6 in 1956, and three years later, in 1959, it reached 238.1, an increase of 3.5.

Prices of goods and services increased by 25.9 while farm product prices did so by only 3.5. In addition, with the prices the farmer now gets for his product, he can buy 27 per cent less of the goods and services he needs, as compared to 10 years ago.

If we examine the report of the royal commission on price spreads of food products, we note that in 1957 farmers obtained for every retail sale dollar: 53.9 per cent for beef; 59.7 per cent for pork and 77.1 per cent for butter. I could mention a lot more products but shall mention only a few: on the price of canned tomatoes, the farmer's share was 18.3 per cent; on evaporated whole milk, 41.1 per cent.

In 1949, for every dollar paid by the consumer for farm products, farmers received 59 cents, whereas they were getting 44 cents in 1958.

Yet, as reported in the April 27 issue of the Ottawa Journal, the Prime Minister had this to say in Newcastle on April 26, 1957:

(Text):

His party's agricultural program, he said, would include a system of flexible price supports, aggressive salesmanship around the world for Canadian farm products and an early commonwealth conference.

Between 1951-1955 he said, the farmer's share of the consumer price dollar dropped from 59 to 51 cents.

(Translation):

That is what the Prime Minister was saying two and a half years ago.

Today, the figure has reached 44 cents. The Prime Minister dared to say, as did the Minister of Agriculture himself, as reported on page 255 of Hansard of January 23, 1959:

Therefore I feel it is quite apparent that the cost-price squeeze which was a cause of hardship to the farmer under the Liberal administration ever since 1951-52 has been finally halted and reversed.

Mr. Chairman, only after we have compiled all the figures for the years during which the Conservative party will have been in office shall we be able to realize all the damage caused to our farmers.

Since the Agricultural Stabilization Act has not achieved the purpose for which it was passed, I suggest that the government should establish a commission composed of farm experts and leaders of farmers' unions, in order to consider and work out a plan consistent with farmers' needs. In a word, an advisory committee capable of establishing an over-all plan for amending the Agricultural Stabilization Act, so as to set definite support prices, in relation not to some percentage of the average price over the last ten years but to the production cost index.

I ask the Minister of Agriculture and the government to instruct the committee on agriculture to discuss the Agricultural Stabilization Act and to investigate the estimated loss to our farmers.

I am making these suggestions, because I have some doubt as to the ability of the Minister of Agriculture. It is hardly possible that the experts, or the officials of the Department of Agriculture, who have been advising the Minister of Agriculture and all the other cabinet ministers these last twenty two years, are not still giving the present Minister of Agriculture, and the present government, the same sound advice. However, this act has not achieved the expected results, and I challenge the minister to prove that it has helped give the farmer his fair share of the national income, to which he is entitled. The net income of farmers, as I said a moment ago, has been $88 million less in 1959 than in 1958, in spite of those $57 million we are now called upon to vote.

I challenge the Minister of Agriculture to show us that the Agricultural Stabilization Act has safeguarded the interests of the small farmer. Moreover, I challenge him to show us that farmers have known, 12 months in advance, the prices of farm products such as eggs and pork. I also challenge him to show us that his act has not been the cause of a price upheaval in the field of farm products in the course of the last two or three years.

If the minister has nothing to fear, he will accept this challenge and ask the committee to look into that matter and to report to the house. His refusal will be the clear evidence that his government has repudiated its promises, the Agricultural Stabilization Act and farm people.

BOARD OF BROADCAST GOVERNORS

641. Salaries and expenses of the board—further amount required, $23,889.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the Minister of Finance can tell us why there should be such a rather considerable increase in the expenditures as there appears to be. Perhaps he could also refresh our minds as to what the original vote was.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Item 641 contemplates the provision of an additional $23,889 toward salaries and expenses for the board of broadcast governors. The item in the main estimates was $200,000. It has been found necessary to add to this amount in order to cover expenses partly as a result of the public hearings being conducted by the board of broadcast governors for second television licences in Winnipeg, Vancouver, Montreal and Toronto.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister say whether a corresponding amount has been saved within the C.B.C budget as a result of the transfer of these quasi-judicial functions to the board of broadcast governors?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not reflected in the supplementary estimates. But of course when the functions of the adjudicating body were detached from the normal functions of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, I think there was some expectation that there might be some saving. But that would have nothing to do with the present item which arises by reason of the fact that more public hearings were found to be necessary during the course of this year.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister confirm recent rumours about who is going to get the licence in Toronto?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. I do not know.

Mr. Pearson: Can the minister give us any indication of the principles on which the board operates in the giving of these licences?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think I will have to refer the hon. gentleman to the act and to what the board has said in indicating the standards to which it wishes those holding or receiving licences to adhere.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

Indian affairs branch—

642. Welfare of Indians—Operation and maintenance—further amount required, $410,000.

Mr. Peters: Does the minister care to indicate whether this item is an indication that the amount of welfare assistance being paid to Indians in various localities has been increased as has been asked for by a number of members in past years?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, sir. This item covers both direct relief assistance to Indians and also payments for the care of indigent Indians including maintenance of juvenile delinquents.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does it reflect any change in policy?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. There is an increased scale of food relief that is reflected here.

Mr. Benidickson: That is perhaps identified by an order in council or a change in the regulation. Will the minister give us that information?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The scale became effective on April 1, 1959, the beginning of the present fiscal year.

Mr. Peters: May I ask whether this scale will be made available?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. If the hon. gentleman wishes the detail of it, I shall be glad to see that it is sent to him.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

North Atlantic Treaty Organization—

644. Further contribution by the Canadian government towards the cost of constructing the North Atlantic Treaty Organization permanent headquarters—To increase by 248,029 new French francs the amount of the contribution provided for in vote 92, main estimates, 1959-60; the equivalent in Canadian dollars estimated as of March, 1960, is, $48,018.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder whether the minister can tell us the total cost of this building, the total cost of Canada's participation in it and the percentage of the cost which has been allocated to Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. The total cost of the new NATO headquarters building in Paris is 4,739,745,800 French francs or 47,397,458 of the new or so-called heavy French francs. The equivalent in Canadian dollars is approximately 10¾ million. Canada has contributed to date $605,002. With the item now appearing in the supplementary estimates, the total contribution toward the construction of the building will be $653,145. Canada's proportion is 6.08 per cent of the total.

Mr. Pearson: It appears that this building is now completed. I understand it is completed and occupied.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Almost. The delegations moved into it just before the annual meeting of the ministerial council in December. The meetings of the ministerial council were held in the building December last. However, the building was not altogether complete at that time.

Mr. Pearson: It appears that the cost will be in the neighbourhood of 10¾ million Canadian dollars. Has the minister the figures there for the original estimate of the cost of this building.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was estimated, I am told that, that 900 million French francs would be the total construction budget for the year 1959. An amount of 1,097 million French francs was approved as the 1959 budget and a further amount of 192,745,800 French francs has been approved as the 1960 budget. I am told that provision will carry the building to completion.

Mr. Pearson: The question I asked was whether the minister has before him the original estimate of the cost made four or five years ago. I think it was a figure very much smaller than the ultimate cost which is now $10¾ million.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not that information.

International Civil Aviation Organization—

645. Payment to the International Civil Aviation Organization in part reimbursement of compensation paid its Canadian employees for Quebec income tax for the 1958 taxation year—further amount required, $1,427.

Mr. Chevrier: I think perhaps the minister should give us some explanation of this item. I know there was at one time a considerable amount of difficulty in connection with the province of Quebec in so far as the arrangements for the building in Montreal were concerned. I know that some time later the difficulties were ironed out. I think the committee should be given an idea first as to how much the building costs the government in so far as occupancy is concerned and, second, as to what arrangements have now been made with the government of the province of Quebec in connection with certain diplomatic exchanges or emoluments, if I may so call them, to which members of ICAO felt they were entitled. I wonder what amount of information the minister can give us on that matter?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This item pertains only to a particular provision in respect of ICAO. This is the item under which provision is made to cover payment of Quebec income tax reimbursements in respect of the members of the staff of ICAO in Montreal.

Mr. Benidickson: That is Canadian staff?

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, those who are subject to the Quebec tax. That is the entire purpose and scope of this item.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I think we should be entitled to a little more information. Perhaps I should know this but I do not at the moment. I think under this item we should be entitled to know what is the position of the government so far as ICAO is concerned. I think too we should be entitled to answers to the questions I put a moment ago. I would not think they would be hard to answer, nor would I think the information would be difficult to obtain because it is of a more or less public nature as it has been discussed in the meetings of one of the subcommittees of ICAO.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. gentleman will appreciate that this is simply a small amount added to an amount previously voted by parliament. This is simply a further amount required.

As to broader questions involving the relationship between ICAO and the Canadian government, may I suggest to the hon. member that I think the proper place for that would be in discussion of the main estimates of the Department of Transport when in committee of supply on the estimates for 1960-61. This item the committee is now asked to approve is a small additional amount required to complete the reimbursement that the house approved when it passed the original item of $9,000. It relates purely and simply to this one matter of reimbursement in respect of the Quebec income tax.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not going to insist on the matter because I feel the item is one which the house would want to approve in any event. But I wonder whether the minister would bring it to the attention of his colleague because I feel the house should get an explanation of the entire position so far as ICAO is concerned.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would be pleased to bring that to the attention of my colleague, the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister whether these Canadian employees pay federal income tax, and is there reimbursement in respect of that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They are not reimbursed for federal income tax. The reimbursement extends only to additional tax for which they are liable by reason of the headquarters of ICAO being located at Montreal where they are subject to a provincial income tax as well as the federal income tax.

Mr. Pearson: Then the salaries of the Canadian employees of the organization are subject to federal income tax, I take it, from what the minister has said?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Canadian employees of ICAO are exempt from federal income tax, but like all other members of the international secretariat are required to pay a similar amount to ICAO in the form of a staff assessment.

646. Commonwealth scholarship plan, $11,000.

Mr. Chevrier: The matter of commonwealth scholarships was discussed, I believe, during the debate on external affairs and I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs at that time what number of Canadian students would benefit under the commonwealth plan. I wonder if the minister could give us that information?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is the hon. gentleman referring to the fiscal year 1959-60 or to the fiscal year 1960-61?

Mr. Chevrier: This vote is for 1959-60.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, but I thought the question put by the hon. gentleman, if I correctly recall it, concerned rather the fiscal year 1960-61.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know that I had that in mind when I put the question because it was a general question. I simply asked the minister how many Canadian students would benefit under the plan and the minister said he would let me know in the course of the debate. I am sure there were other questions, but I did not get an answer.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Then I would be glad to remind him and get the answer for the hon. gentleman. This item is a new item of $11,000. There is provision for this in the 1960-61 estimates. It has not appeared previously in the 1959-60 estimates, but it was found necessary to make some provision during the present fiscal year to finance Canada's participation in the scheme before March 31. Approximately $2,600 is required to cover travelling and living expenses for members of the Canadian scholarship committee to meetings which will have been held before the end of the fiscal year, and an amount of $8,400 has been recommended to be paid to the Canadian Universities Foundation for services which they have rendered.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the minister say how many students will benefit under this plan, and what the total cost of it will be?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There have been no students designated as yet. The plan, of course, came out of the commonwealth trade and economic conference which was held in Montreal, and it is contemplated that when the plan is launched—hon. members will recall it is this September that the plan will be officially launched—there will be approximately 1,000 students from all parts of the commonwealth for whom scholarships will be provided.

In the distribution of cost the United Kingdom indicated at that conference that it was prepared to accept one half of the cost. We undertook on behalf of Canada to bear one quarter, and other countries of the commonwealth came forward and indicated the shares they were prepared to assume.

The next stage was the conference held at Oxford last July at which all the countries of the commonwealth were represented. It was an educational conference and the details of the plan were worked out there by a quite impressive array of educationists from all parts of the commonwealth.

Mr. Chevrier: May I go a step further and inquire whether the number of students in Canada will be in proportion to the participation by Canada in the total cost, that is, a quarter thereof?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think not necessarily, Mr. Chairman, but I speak subject to correction and I will bring that question of the hon. gentleman to the attention of my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Chevrier: Is it possible to find out now what is likely to be the cost of this plan which will be inaugurated, as the minister said, in September?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The item provided in our main estimates for 1960-61 is $500,000 as Canada's share. Of course, it will take time to have this plan fully set up. In other words, there will not be a thousand students selected all in the first year. It is expected that the period of a student's study abroad for which the scholarship will be provided will vary from two to three years on an average. Consequently, when the scheme is fully in effect Canada's contribution is likely to be at least $1 million a year.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I believe this is a very welcome and a very forward step which is being taken by the commonwealth nations in providing for an exchange of university students on the basis of a thousand scholarships. I think that providing educational training, particularly to people who come from the less developed countries, will enable them to be of immense service to their own countries when they return, and to make a part, admittedly only a small part, of Canada's educational facilities available to those students is a very excellent gesture. This is not a grand scheme involving fabulous sums of money. It is more of a symbol of what can be done among nations of the commonwealth to promote good relations and to promote the training of citizens of various countries in order to help in the future development of their own lands. The point I should like to make at this time is that I do hope this scheme may be broadened or that a scheme similar to this may be added thereto. We are a bi-cultural nation. We have universities in Canada engaged in education and training where French is the language used. I ask the minister to what extent the facilities of our French universities can be used in addition, of course, to the facilities of our English universities.

I make the suggestion to the minister that Canada should explore the possibility of entering into an exchange scholarship scheme with the French community, having in mind particularly the fact in Africa a number of nations within the French community are now emerging to national and independent status. This would be not only a means of providing educational facilities for young citizens of those countries but it would also tend, I believe, to improve our relations with the French community and provide facilities for the training of the citizens of those countries to help in their own future development.

I think it would be somewhat difficult, considering all the circumstances, to provide a very substantial portion of training in our French universities for students already coming to Canada under the commonwealth scheme. Therefore this might be an innovation of a type which would enable our French-speaking universities to play a full and important part in the training of citizens from other countries in our own land.

As I am sure the minister will recognize, this suggestion is not being put forward in any partisan way but is merely an obvious extension of the kind of plan which I believe will commend itself to the Canadian people as a whole and which could play a useful part in the development of the lives of citizens in other countries of the world and also in the national development of the countries from which those people come.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I was just going to ask almost the same question as the one just put by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue).

I might now ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) to give us more specific details. When Canadian students want to study in another commonwealth country, will they be allowed to do so in their own language, if they are French-speaking Canadians, or will they have to enrol at an English university?

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The basic duality of the Canadian culture, of course, is kept in mind at all times. When the Canadian educationists were selected to represent Canada at the Oxford conference last summer, the Canadian group included some very distinguished educationists from the French-speaking universities. I think hon. members will bear in mind that in the provision of openings for students the question rests basically with each university to decide what accommodation it is in a position to offer. In addition, of course, in ascertaining what scholarships can be made available to students from other lands arrangements must be worked out in association with the Canadian universities themselves. This is one reason why the Canadian scholarship committee has been set up.

Mr. Pearson: We have already expressed our support for this scheme. We did so when it was first announced. It is a valuable and imaginative initiative. We all wish it success, and we approve of the estimates for this purpose.

As the minister has pointed out, the value will largely be of a reciprocal character. We think of the scheme largely in terms of students from other parts of the commonwealth coming to Canada, but there is also, of course, the value which the scheme will have for Canadian students who go abroad. As the minister has stated, its special value will be the opportunity it will afford to students from what we sometimes call the materially underdeveloped parts of the commonwealth, though they may not be underdeveloped in other ways at all.

I should hope, though I know the committee will have to work these things out, that special encouragement will be given to these students to go to parts of the commonwealth other than the United Kingdom, because there are so many existing schemes and scholarships by means of which they can go to the United Kingdom at the present time. By the same token, I hope it will be possible to encourage Canadian students to go to parts of the commonwealth other than the United Kingdom to continue their work, because we have so many arrangements enabling our students to go to the United Kingdom at the present time, arrangements from which many of us have benefited.

It may well be that a Canadian student in, let us say, an Asian country of the commonwealth will not learn as much about high level bridges as he might in some other commonwealth country, but he will perhaps learn a good deal about building bridges of understanding, and I am sure that is one of the purposes which the government had in mind when they encouraged this development.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thank the Leader of the Opposition for what he has said about this vote. A great deal of thought was given to this enterprise before it was launched at the commonwealth trade and economic conference at Montreal.

I do not think it would be amiss, in referring gratefully to his memory, to recall that the Canadian position at this conference with regard to the enterprise we are now considering was put forward by the late Hon. Sidney E. Smith. It was a project which was very dear to his heart. I do not need to remind the committee that he had taken a very active part in higher education in Canada and in developing the concept of the value of exchanges in the educational field between the different countries of the commonwealth.

The United Kingdom took a leading part in sponsoring this proposal. Lord Home, the secretary of state for commonwealth relations, spoke for the United Kingdom on this subject and it was, I think, as those of us who were privileged to be present will recall, one of the high points of the conference. Some of the expressions which came from the representatives of the colonial territories in relation to this plan would have warmed the hearts of all hon. members had they been present to hear them spoken. High hopes are held concerning this commonwealth scholarship scheme, and it may be that over the years students will enjoy benefits as a result of this plan which will enable them to devote to the service of their countries in the commonwealth talents and training which will be of very great value to the people of all parts of this family of nations.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the minister could say whether any thought is being given to an extension of this plan or to a new plan of a similar nature for an exchange of students with the French community as an appropriate way to recognize the bilingual nature of our country as well as the desirability of such a plan and the further advantage of improving our relations with that community.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is, of course, a commonwealth plan. No suggestion has ever been made that there should be an extension of this plan to include countries outside the commonwealth. As far as a separate plan is concerned as between Canada on the one hand and the French nations on the other, I have not heard of any suggestion of that nature as yet.

Mr. Argue: Although the minister has not heard of it, I have made this suggestion on a number of occasions. The minister will be pleased to know it was given an excellent response in the French language newspapers of this country and a number of impressive articles have subsequently appeared supporting the idea. I commend it to the minister and to the government for consideration.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Thank you.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think the committee would like to be reminded that this is not exactly a new idea. There were a great many blocked funds after the war and under the aegis of my hon. friend, the Leader of the Opposition, they were used for precisely this purpose not only in France but in many other countries of Europe.

(Translation):

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few remarks on this item.

I believe that student exchanges within the commonwealth are an excellent thing and that, because of them, we may reach better understanding and closer relationship between commonwealth countries.

Equally excellent, at least in part, are the suggestions of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). There is such a thing as "l'Union culturelle francaise," which is not a government agency but which has a similar purpose among French communities or French groups scattered throughout the world.

Besides, I believe the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has already received with great cordiality a delegation from that organization.

I do not know in what form something similar might be provided for the people of French language and culture, who represent no less than a third of Canada's population. However, knowing the extremely friendly feelings of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) towards our ethnic group, I should be extremely happy if he could find a way to give equal opportunities to Canada's French-Canadian group. Perhaps, for instance, something similar might be attempted within NATO, where there are a number of French-speaking countries, or perhaps we might consider student exchanges between Latin America and French Canada.

Besides, it should not be restricted to French Canadians, but should be open to all Canadians, whether English- or French-speaking, wishing to get closer to French cultural centres. I am sure the Minister of Finance will give the matter careful consideration, in view of the true friendliness he has always shown to Canada's French language cultural group.

647. Gift of uranium to the international atomic energy agency, $61,842.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, this vote represents a gift of uranium to the international atomic energy agency. Would the minister give some indication as to what other gifts of uranium were made to this international agency by other governments?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, Canada made the one gift in this case. A request was made by Japan for three tons of natural uranium metal. That request was made to the international atomic energy agency. Canada offered to provide the entire amount and that offer was accepted.

Mr. Pearson: I am not objecting to this vote, Mr. Chairman, and indeed, I support it. I think it was a good thing to have done, but the fact that we are the only government that has taken this action is interesting because the United States which is also a large producer of uranium has been making gifts of enriched uranium to other countries in connection with the building of reactors in these countries. Indeed, I believe United States policy has been to assist these countries in the construction of reactors of a type which can use only the kind of enriched uranium that is made in the United States and not in Canada. It is an interesting contrast, if you like, that we are making our gifts of uranium to the international agency without any commercial considerations attached to them—nor should there be, of course—while the United States seems to be making gifts of enriched uranium which we do not produce to individual countries in connection with reactors being built in those countries, sometimes at the expense of the United States.

648. Expenses in connection with Canada's participation in the world refugee year and, notwithstanding section 35 of the Financial Administration Act, to authorize payments to be made pursuant to this vote up to the 1st day of April, 1961; there shall be charged to this vote and included in the unexpended balance of vote 55 of the main estimates, 1959-60, an amount equal to the amount spent and charged to that vote in connection with the world refugee year, $600,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to recall to the committee that when we were discussing world refugee year in the last session of parliament I reminded hon. members that the government of Canada just before the Hungarian uprising had had a survey made by a senior officer of the immigration branch and a senior officer of the citizenship branch of the refugee camps in Europe with a view to seeing whether we could not on our own do something more than was then being done about reducing the population of these camps, and that by a curious coincidence I was on the verge of making certain recommendations to my colleagues when we were overwhelmed by the Hungarian problem and the matter was left in abeyance for the time being. I confess that I regret to have to say I never had another opportunity to make those recommendations.

Meanwhile, of course, the suggestion came for a general approach to this problem under the aegis of the United Nations commissioner for refugees in the form of world refugee year. We are all very pleased to hear the announcement the other day that the movement of the 100 families had been so successful and had cost so much less than was anticipated that the government proposed to make some extension of that program. When I have concluded perhaps the minister would tell us what numbers he envisages would be included in this extension. I am not going to urge at this time that there should be any very large increase in the strictly governmental participation in this scheme because I believe that the concrete and constructive suggestions I intend to make would in fact be preferable.

As soon as it was published I carefully examined the little booklet prepared by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration setting out the conditions for the admission of unsponsored and sponsored refugees to Canada. In most respects it seems to me these conditions are highly satisfactory. There is one of these conditions that has so far seemed to be an obstacle to one single refugee being brought to this country under private sponsorship. I should like to read that requirement to the committee. The requirement is that the sponsor must—and then there are set out four requirements which I will not bother to read:

(v) provide assurance, where the refugee suffers from illness which will require treatment in Canada, that he will receive the medical care he needs. When the illness is such that institutional care is necessary, the approval of the provincial health authorities must be obtained before the refugee can be permitted to come to Canada.

The brochure then lists certain conditions that must be fulfilled by the refugee. He must be of good character and so forth.

It goes on to say:

The Canadian government does not set a limit to the period or to the extent of the responsibility assumed by the sponsors. Relief of indigent residents of Canada is normally the responsibility of the municipalities and the provinces. A sponsored immigrant who finds himself in need of assistance is a burden on the municipality or the province if his sponsor fails to live up to the guarantees he gave when applying for the immigrant's admission. This will explain that the Canadian government should insist that sponsors of immigrants, including refugees, accept full responsibility for the persons brought to Canada under their sponsorship until they become eligible for normal municipal or provincial social and welfare benefits. Sponsors who may wish to ascertain the extent of their responsibility and the nature of the welfare assistance available from municipal or provincial authorities, which vary from province to province, are requested to get in touch with these authorities for further information. Sponsors may also wish to take advantage of hospital insurance plans in respect of the refugees whom they have sponsored.

As the representations which were made to the Prime Minister the other day by the welfare council, and which the Prime Minister put on Hansard on March 3, clearly show, the welfare council and others interested have found that this requirement is one that is in fact in practice a bar to any effective action. It has proved to be up till now and in my opinion it will continue to be a complete bar. I know it is not intended to be. I am not for a minute suggesting that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration or the government as a whole put this requirement in deliberately to make the sponsorship unworkable, but that has been the effect of it.

Not only has it been the effect, but it is precisely what I told the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the last session of parliament would be the effect. I had some experience in administering the Hungarian refugee movement and I know that it is almost impossible for the federal government to negotiate with provincial and municipal authorities about this particular matter with any finality or with any satisfaction, and it is quite impossible for private sponsors to do it. I am sure that is why the welfare council made the recommendation it did. It was that the federal government, in consultation with the provinces, arrange as expeditiously as possible for the acceptance of public responsibility for established public health and welfare services for privately sponsored refugee families admitted under the government's program for private sponsorship during the world refugee year.

When the Prime Minister announced on the seventeenth of March the decisions that the government had already reached with respect to these representations he said that they had agreed with some of them, and I am sure that there was a good deal of satisfaction taken over that. The first of their recommendations and, far and away, sir, the most important of them, the Prime Minister said he was not able to deal with at that time because a decision had not been reached about it. Now, here is my suggestion. I do not agree entirely with the recommendation of the welfare council and I am going beyond what they suggested. If we really mean business at all about this world refugee year and about private sponsorship—personally I should like to see more private sponsorship and that is what I am urging, more private sponsorship and more ease for private sponsorship instead of any large addition to the direct government movement—I am quite convinced that this problem can be very easily solved if the government will do, with respect to these privately sponsored refugees, precisely what was done in the case of the Hungarian refugees.

The federal government should undertake the residual responsibility of health care after a certain period for those refugees who are admitted and who are going to be selected by the United Nations commissioner for refugees. I think it is quite reasonable to expect that the sponsors should look after them for a year. It seems to me, sir, that should be done instead of trying to leave the sponsors with an open-ended commitment which many of those voluntary organizations cannot in conscience undertake because they cannot be sure that two years hence they may have the same officers or the same personnel or, in fact, that they will be in a position to carry it out. Most of them are composed of people who take their responsibilities and regard their word seriously, and would not want to subscribe their names to something that was not going to be carried out.

It seems to me, sir, that this is not suggesting any very great burden on the treasury. I am going to give two reasons for this view. The first is the one that was given the other day by the Prime Minister or by the Secretary of State for External Affairs; I forget which one of them it was that told us how much less costly and how much more encouraging this movement of the 100 families was than it was expected to be, how much more quickly those people were recovering and how much easier the integration was proving to be. But I think even more striking, sir, were the answers which the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration gave the other day to the questions I put on the order paper about the Hungarian refugee movement.

As the committee knows, we admitted to this country 37,727 Hungarian refugees, most of them without any medical examination whatsoever before they arrived in Canada. It is true they were given a medical examination for the purpose of determining after they got here whether they could be landed as immigrants or whether they would be admitted temporarily under other status. Now, it happens that 1,380 of those 37,000 were allowed entry as non-immigrants and, in most cases, they were allowed entry as non-immigrants for health reasons because they could not satisfy the medical requirements. Three years later there are only 17 of those people receiving help from the federal government out of a total of 37,700. Out of 1,380 who could not satisfy health requirements—I do not say they were all people who could not satisfy the health requirements but most of them would have been—there are 17 today, three years later, receiving help from the federal government.

If I may be permitted, sir, to refer to this, the other day I had the privilege of attending the tea given by the Hungarian-Canadian committee in Knox church, and I wish that every hon. member could have been there because that function was organized almost entirely not by the older Hungarian community, though they helped, but by people who came here three years ago without a thing except the clothes they were wearing and who today are as well dressed as anybody you would see in Ottawa. Most of them spoke very good English, and it was a function that anyone in any part of Canada would have been proud to have had a part in organizing. Now, sir, that was something that was possible because the Hungarian refugees did not moulder away for years in camps. There was enough action taken, enough co-operation and enough world interest to get them dealt with quickly. We can hardly expect quite as good results in the case of the residual population of those camps who have been there for so long; but surely that is all the more reason why we should do everything practicable that we can to make a really worth-while contribution to this refugee problem.

I do believe that there is plenty of voluntary enthusiasm for this refugee movement of a practical nature and that if we could get rid of this one obstacle with regard to continuing health care—I do not say that the government should do it all; I think it would be quite reasonable to say that the sponsors should take that responsibility for the first year but I feel that the government can do what we did for the Hungarians—then after one year if the refugees cannot satisfy the normal municipal or provincial health and welfare requirements for such care as is publicly given by these provinces or municipalities, the federal government should in fact accept that residual responsibility. If that were done I venture to say that on that basis it would cost a very small sum indeed. It would remove the most irritating obstacle, and it is really not reasonable to expect the municipal and provincial governments to give commitments about this matter. I am sure that the Minister of Labour, who was once the mayor of one of the leading cities in Ontario, would agree, because I know he held those views some years ago when I was minister of immigration and he was a private member of this house. These people may live in a municipality and then go somewhere else, or they may not ever have been taxpayers of the municipality at all. There is migration from one province to another.

As a matter of fact, what we are trying to do here is to make a national contribution to this problem. All of us with experience know this will continue to be a practical obstacle to the movement of people, and it could be removed for a very small contribution. It does seem to me, sir, that it should and could be done and that the vast majority of the Canadian people would be very pleased indeed to see their government do it. I am sorry the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration are not here to listen to what I have to say. I am sure that with the experience they have had already they would find it very difficult to disagree with the opinion I have expressed.

I know from my experience that in the final analysis the barrier that has to be overcome is the barrier provided by the treasury board and its chairman. The chairman of the treasury board is in front of me, and I appeal to his large heart, as well as to his head, because I venture to say, sir, that most of these people who may require medical care now will be making a contribution five years from now to the production of this country out of all proportion to anything it will cost the taxpayers to carry out the suggestion I have made.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder whether the minister could give me some information as to the extent of this problem when world refugee year is over. I have heard it said, and I do not know whether or not the statement is accurate, that by the end of June—I think that is the closing date of world refugee year—all the camps in Europe will be cleared.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman, that is the hope and expectation. The year began on June 28, 1959 and closes July 1, 1960. It is the hope and expectation that the camps would be cleared by the end of that period.

Mr. Pearson: If that can be done, and it looks as if it will be done, then that is the end at long last of a chapter of post-war experience. It is not a very happy commentary on our society that it has taken from 1945 to 1960 to clear the European camps of refugees. Some countries have perhaps done more than others, but I think our record over the years in Canada has been good in this respect. However, no one can deny we could have done more. Some of the European countries, without our resources or our wealth, have made proportionately a much larger contribution than we have in Canada.

However, the problem will not be ended when world refugee year ends because, as the minister knows, there will be refugees in camps outside of Europe. There is the problem of Asian refugees and the refugees in the Middle East. I express the hope that this activity will not end with the ending of world refugee year. Perhaps it would be a good idea to continue world refugee year to focus the attention of the world on this problem. Perhaps the government will have an opportunity of continuing this work in continuing world refugee year. If they do, I think they will get very general support in the house and in the country.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the minister the figures for the addition to one hundred?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no figure available yet. It is not possible yet to be at all precise about it. The 100 families numbered altogether 344 persons. It was found that the cost was approximately $225,000. Now, if this works out in proportion it might be expected, that on that basis another 500 refugees could be accommodated within the scope of this present appropriation. But I do not want to lead the committee to think that I am making any estimate now as to the number that could come within the scope of the appropriation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the Minister of Finance indicate whether or not he is bringing the suggestions I have made to the attention of his colleagues?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. I hope I was not delinquent in that respect. I listened quite intently to the remarks that were so earnestly delivered by the hon. member, and I will certainly bring them to the attention of my colleagues, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Item agreed to.

649. Canadian government's assessment towards financing the United Nations emergency force in respect of the calendar year 1960 in the amount of $307,182 U.S., notwithstanding that payment may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of March, 1960, which is, $291,919.

Mr. Pearson: This is a vote of $291,000 for Canada's assessment toward financing the United Nations emergency force in respect of the calendar year 1960. The minister knows, of course, that when this force was established it was understood by those who supported the establishment, whether or not they contributed to it in terms of men and material, that the expenses of the force would be shared amongst the governments concerned at the United Nations. Therefore, I should like to know the amount of the total expenses of this force and the contributions made by Canada to it, and what proportion of the total expenses those contributions represent. If he has the figures, I should like to know what has been contributed by the other governments.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the approved budget of the United Nations expeditionary force during 1960 is, in round figures, 20 million United States dollars. In so far as assessment is concerned, there is a provision for a voluntary contribution on the part of the United States and the United Kingdom of one half of the total. Canada is assessed for 3.11 per cent of 50 per cent of the $20 million, less equalization credits or 307,182 United States dollars. The equivalent in Canadian dollars is the amount of this item.

Mr. Pearson: I take it from what the minister has said it has not been possible to work out at the United Nations assembly a graded scale of contributions covering all those members who are willing to be covered. I know there are some members in the United Nations, including the communist states, who have not contributed and who have indicated they will not contribute one dollar to this international activity. Has there been an agreement on the allocation of expenses amongst the other members or have they just worked it out by rule of thumb, as the minister has indicated?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am afraid it has been the latter situation. As a matter of fact, there are many members of the United Nations that are delinquent so far as contributions to the support of the expeditionary force are concerned. I have a list before me. There are some 30 of them that are delinquent for a three-year period, half a dozen for two years, and another half a dozen for one year.

Mr. Pearson: That, of course, is a very unhappy record from which no one can get any satisfaction. I know there are some members of the United Nations, as I have just stated, who have objected to this assessment and have said from the beginning that they would not pay anything toward the expenses of this international force. I know the Arab states have taken that position, namely, that it was not the kind of activity that would involve them in any expense of any kind. I know there are also some other members of the United Nations who have supported and approved this emergency force but who have not done anything to meet its expenses at all. The minister has indicated the expenses of Canada as being placed at 3.11 per cent. It seems to me that is not an unreasonable percentage.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is 3.11 per cent of the 50 per cent.

Mr. Pearson: I take it that allocation would not cover the expenses incurred for the maintenance, supply and transport of our own contingents in that force?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Pearson: In addition to meeting all the expenses of the Canadian participation, and Canadian participation has been very respectable, to say the least, in that matter we have made a contribution to the force as a whole as well?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, indeed. Canada has made a very notable and formidable contribution to this enterprise, not only through her contribution of men to the force but in her contribution toward its cost.

Mr. Pearson: So we pay all our own expenses and help to pay the expenses of some other participating governments which are not able to meet their own expenses?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Pearson: I am not complaining about that fact but it is deplorable that a great international effort of this kind, which has certainly made a contribution to the stabilization of conditions in that part of the world, should not be maintained on a more equitable international basis.

Item agreed to.

650. To reimburse the agricultural commodities stabilization account for dry skimmed milk donated to international relief agencies, organizations and governments—further amount required, $1,064,220.

Mr. Peters: I should like to ask the minister for some clarification of this particular item. Last year the Minister of Agriculture told us that we had a surplus of about 25 million pounds of skimmed milk that we could not give away. As you will recall, Mr. Chairman, at the time the price of skimmed milk was not exceedingly high in Canada. Yet we have found that in one year we have been able to give away $1 million worth of skimmed milk powder.

I think this is a matter of great importance to the farmers of Canada, particularly as it relates to the argument that is used that any purchase under stabilization or stabilized prices of agricultural products will create or is apt to create a surplus if it is done in a sizeable amount. This is a case where the federal government have been able to take the surplus and to use it for worth-while purposes and have been able at the same time to do something else.

If you will note, Mr. Chairman, in local stores in the city of Ottawa the price of skimmed milk powder has gone up approximately 40 per cent. A year ago 10 pounds of skimmed milk powder in Ottawa cost $2.50. Today 10 pounds of the same skimmed milk powder cost $3.40 or $3.50. Hence the effect of this give-away program has been, in my opinion, advantageous on several counts. In the first place it has been able to increase the price of the product in the local market and so to stabilize the production of this commodity for local consumption and at the same time it has been used for very worth-while purposes in the relief agencies to which it has been donated. I would ask the Minister of Finance whether he can tell us what international relief agencies benefited from this gift and by how much in each case.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The organizations which benefited are eight in number. Perhaps I could give the amounts in round figures. These figures are in pounds. I can give the exact figures if they are required.

Mr. Peters: Oh, no.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Suppose we use the round figures. They are as follows: UNICEF, 46 million pounds; Unitarian Service Committee of Canada, 600,000 pounds; Canadian Lutheran world relief, 2.3 million pounds; Canadian council of churches, 327,000 pounds; Care of Canada, 14.1 million pounds; Canadian Red Cross Society, 60,000 pounds, Canadian save the children fund, 147,000 pounds; Gold Cross, 30,000 pounds. These figures make a total of 64,512,182 pounds.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, next year if we had to provide for the relief of needy people, would we be able to do so?

In other words, is there any milk powder left in storage which we could supply to relief agencies?

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The surplus that existed some time ago has been practically disposed of. I have given the figures, Mr. Chairman, of the gifts to these eight organizations aggregating 64½ million pounds. Broadly speaking, there is no surplus on hand now.

Mr. Benidickson: May I also ask the minister this question? Am I right in thinking that no support is being given to skimmed milk at the present time?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is correct.

Mr. Benidickson: What I mean is that the crown is not obliged to pay anything for the support of skimmed milk under this legislation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is correct.

Mr. Peters: Can the minister tell us whether any of this skimmed milk powder that has been distributed went to Japan? If so, is some of it the skimmed milk powder that has been involved in the recent reports of serious illness as a result of school distribution of this product or is there any further information as to what the actual cause of this occurrence was? If there is not, is the department considering making an investigation in that particular country on our behalf in order to clarify this problem? I think it is generally conceded by all Canadians that there is certainly nothing in skimmed milk powder to produce the results that are indicated and that contamination must have taken place from some other source. As we have established an international market for skimmed milk powder, I think we should protect it and maintain the reputation that I think we have built up and the good will that we have established by the gifts we have made amounting to, as the minister has just told us, some 64 million pounds.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the minister made a statement in regard to this matter in the house several days ago. I think the hon. gentleman probably will find his answer in Hansard in the minister's statement.

Item agreed to.

651. To reimburse the agricultural commodities stabilization account for canned pork donated to Japan for the relief of typhoon victims, $60,000.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the minister tell the committee whether there is still a supply of canned pork on hand?

Mr. Benidickson: We are on vote 651.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes; that is the one. Can the minister tell the committee whether there is still in the warehouses a supply of canned pork? What amount was given to Japan? Does the government contemplate giving additional amounts?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The answer is that there is still a quantity of canned pork on hand, very definitely. Second, the gift to Japan consisted of 100,000 pounds of canned pork purchased at a price of 60 cents per pound, the item here being $60,000.

Mr. Winch: May I ask the Minister of Finance whether he can give an explanation of a peculiar quirk in economics. We have had a great deal of canned pork purchased by the government in order to stabilize the pork producers of this country. We gave it away in these instances. I have no question about that matter at all. We try to sell it at give-away prices, and if the minister would take his wife's place and do some shopping he would find on the shelves a canned pork meat loaf which is imported from France. Can he explain the economics of that situation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I would not think it would be a very general situation that the hon. member has described. How much canned pork comes into this country from France I do not know, but I would think that canned pork from an outside country at the present time would find it difficult to make much headway in Canada with the quantities of pork being produced here and the fact that, under our price support program, such a very large quantity of it is on hand.

Mr. Winch: The thing that brought the matter to my mind is that half an hour ago I got a letter from one of your constituents asking me to find out why.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister said it would be hard to sell French canned pork in this country. Is the government selling any of its own canned pork?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, we are not selling the canned pork in the open market.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the government selling it in some closed market then?

Mr. Benidickson: To whom is it giving the pork away?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In this particular case to Japan. It was found that the number of countries of the world which are interested in acquiring canned pork is a much smaller number of countries than those interested, for instance, in acquiring things like skimmed milk. It is a matter of diet and some religious observances.

Item agreed to.

652. To reimburse the agricultural commodities stabilization account for canned pork donated to international relief agencies, $1,096,442.

Mr. Benidickson: On this item which is related very closely to the previous item perhaps the minister would give us a little more information as to the development of the disposal of canned pork. I think he will recognize that in reply to a question of mine not long ago the ministry indicated that the cost of storing canned pork in this country at the moment was at a figure of about $40,000 per week.

The minister presides over treasury board, and I am sure that as chairman he is very concerned about an item which seems to cost something in excess of $2 million a year. I am confident that memos have been given to him in recent times about this very important item of expenditure, and perhaps before we pass this item the minister might just indicate what the intentions of the government are in this respect.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, in connection with this item the government did provide some 5,500,000 pounds of canned pork to six world relief organizations and we still have a formidable supply of canned pork on hand. I have indicated one of the reasons just now, but I can assure the committee that my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, is doing all a man can do to meet this problem of our very large surplus.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Contingencies and miscellaneous—

653. Telephone service at Ottawa for all departments—further amount required, $87,000.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister would give some explanation of this item. I remember that when we were on the other side of the house there was always a great deal of complaint—sometimes it was vociferous and sometimes it was bitter—about the tremendous amounts of telephone bills. This is a large amount by way of an addition. It is a supplementary item of $87,000, and while it is for telephone service at Ottawa for all departments I presume it covers a certain amount having to do with long distance calls. I wonder whether the minister would be good enough to break it down, and after having done that perhaps he might tell us what the total amount of the telephone bill is going to be for the fiscal period 1959-60.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, it is one of the misfortunes of the Department of Finance that the telephone expenses of all departments are charged to the Department of Finance. This was a consolidation which was carried out some time ago before the change of government. I accept no responsibility for this kind of consolidation. It makes the Department of Finance appear sometimes to be assuming responsibilities which do not belong to it. This item is to supplement a vote in the main estimates of $1,326,200, and this additional sum is required to meet the increased cost of monthly accounts for switchboard equipment and local service by reason of a tariff adjustment effective December 1, 1958, to apply to the fiscal year 1959-60.

Mr. Chevrier: Where is the switchboard?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Here in Ottawa The hon. gentleman asked for the figure for the forthcoming year. Item 118 in the main estimates for 1960-61 gives the figure as $1,458,800. We have been faced with the results of these tariff adjustments.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the $1,458,800—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No—$1,413,200 is the total for 1959-60.

Mr. Chevrier: Is that for Ottawa alone?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): To which year is the hon. gentleman referring?

Mr. Chevrier: 1959-60. The minister gave me a figure of $1,326,200, I thought.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The sum of $1,326,200 is the same vote in the main estimates for the present year, and that is to be increased by $87,000, making a total for this present fiscal year of $1,413,200.

Mr. Chevrier: Is that for Ottawa alone?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Benidickson: The Minister of Finance indicated that prior to his assumption of responsibility in the Department of Finance it had been felt by all departments that the Minister of Finance who is in charge of treasury board was perhaps the person who, over all, should review possibilities of economy in connection with an item of this kind. That is why it is under the minister's jurisdiction.

The minister has introduced estimates into this house for the forthcoming year which include an item such as is before us, and I find that under column 8 of his estimates for the coming year it is indicated that he proposes to spend $22 million as against $19 million in the last fiscal year. I suggest to the minister that this is a point that should be carefully considered by the Minister of Finance, because it was given to the Minister of Finance as an item for economy for a very good reason. Yet we see increases despite the fact that the Minister of Finance in past years used to complain against the former administration that they allowed this item to rise.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister tell us, as a result of his listening in, how many unnecessary telephone calls and how much unnecessary cost through the sort of wasteful extravagance which he talked about in June of 1957, if he remembers that date, he has been able to eliminate?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I can say this, that I have stood pretty firm against requests for extending services in different departments.

Mr. Pickersgill: Are there as many telephone instruments in the government departments today as there were on June 21, 1957?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would not want to undertake to answer that question offhand because it would depend to some extent on how you measure the equipment. There has been a good deal of consolidation in equipment, switchboards, and that sort of thing. Changes of that nature have been occurring in the past couple of years. If the hon. gentleman wants something specific I would be glad to get that information for him, but I would hesitate to make a general answer.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think we want to hold up these supplementary estimates, but in view of the fact that for many years we had to listen to eloquent speeches on this subject from the hon. gentleman and some of his colleagues, I think that when the main estimates come along we should like a report from the Minister of Finance as to what he is doing about this telephone problem. It does seem a lot to be spending, $1½ million, for just the calls which take place in Ottawa, not counting those made in the rest of the country.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I cannot control the rates, of course. The hon. member will agree with that, I think.

Mr. Benidickson: This item deals with telephone calls with respect to Ottawa.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Telephone service.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not expect the Minister of Finance to have full details with respect even to the section of the department which is strictly his, the minister's office, and still less with respect to the whole of his department, but I do hope that between the present time and the presentation of the final estimates for the coming year he personally will investigate whether or not there is adequate control in his own office over the number of long distance calls that are being made in comparison to the number made under his predecessor.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister did not answer my question in relation to the number of local calls as compared with long distance calls. Could the hon. gentleman tell us how much of the account which he has mentioned went for long distance telephone calls?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I do not have the breakdown showing that. This is a figure which covers the telephone service.

Item agreed to.

654. To authorize the treasury board to delete from the accounts certain debts due to, and claims of Her Majesty, each of which is in excess of $1,000, amounting in the aggregate to $960,734.50, $1.

Mr. Chevrier: With regard to this vote, there is a detailed statement on page 16 of the various claims which amount to $960,000, roughly speaking $1 million. This sum is made up of claims as high as 153 in number from the Department of National Revenue and 52, in another instance, from the Department of National Defence, the first amounting to $674,000 and the other to $170,000. Can the minister give some indication what these claims are for?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. This is really an annual practice. Under the amendment to the Financial Administration Act passed a year ago, provision was made that there might be write-offs of certain amounts without further reference to parliament. Careful investigation has, of course, taken place to determine whether there is any hope of the recovery of the amounts claimed. That investigation is carried on in the first place by the particular department concerned, and then the matter goes to the treasury board. The details shown on page 16 indicate that the amounts in the various departments aggregate $960,734.50. The reasons for the applications differ. Sometimes it is a case of insolvency. Sometimes it is a case of a claim which, except against the crown, would be long since outlawed under the statute of limitations. Sometimes it is a case where it has been found that there is just no hope of recovery, involving, for example, some indigent person advanced in years who has no hope of ever being on his feet financially again to answer a claim. The claims vary in amount, but I would say they average between $1,000 and $2,000. There may be some in excess of that figure. In the Department of National Revenue I see two claims of $23,000 each. But in every case I can give the committee an assurance that there is no suggestion of writing off any claim which has any real value whatever. Incidentally, those two cases that I mentioned in the Department of National Revenue arose respectively in 1932 and 1937, and in this list which is before me some go back even to 1925.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know that I understand fully what the claims are for, and how it has anything to do with this item of telephones.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We are on the next item, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman: Shall item 654 carry?

Mr. Chevrier: No. What are these debts for?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They arise in a multitude of ways. These are sums owing to the crown and they arise in different departments in just about every way that debts can arise in favour of the crown. This is a procedure that is carried out periodically.

Mr. Chevrier: I was not questioning the procedure. I wanted to get some information about these various items. The minister a moment ago said something about the statute of limitations. Does the statute of limitations apply as against the crown?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It does not run against the crown.

Mr. Benidickson: I noticed that the minister, when answering the inquiry of the hon. member for Laurier, thumbed through three or four pages of notes, information which is always supplied, as we all understand, to the minister when items of this kind are being discussed. I do not think that the committee wants at this stage to go into an exhaustive discussion of every item that might be represented in the over-all total, although this item is very large. I think, perhaps, that in the circumstances the minister might be willing to review and then table the explanatory notes that I am sure have been provided by the treasury board with respect to these write-offs which involve possible claims of the crown with respect to sums of over $1,000 in each case. Otherwise, as I think the minister will agree, the discussion here could go on interminably. Certainly on this side we would want a little more information about, for example, the 153 claims of the Department of National Revenue which total $674,000. I would be willing, if other members of the committee are willing, to have the minister submit his explanatory notes to explain this item.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With respect, I do not think that is a very happy suggestion. There are pages and pages of this material. I may say that with respect to one of the departments to which the hon. gentleman referred, the 153 claims that pertain to the Department of National Revenue, the list which I have, running to several pages, consists of bankruptcies. All these cases involve bankruptcies. In some cases one dividend was paid and that was the end of it. This is a matter of writing off the balance of a claim against a bankrupt estate. There is nothing unusual about this practice, and I am sure the hon. gentleman was familiar with it when he was parliamentary assistant to the minister of finance. I can assure members of the committee that these items are not written off if there is any hope of the recovery of any portion of them.

Mr. Benidickson: As so often happens, we find that when an offer is made to the Minister of Finance which might reduce the time taken in discussion in parliament the hon. gentleman seems to adopt the attitude that he just cannot be generous in replying. The recourse open to us is to begin immediately to ask, with respect to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, for details about the two claims indicated there which amount to $2,860. I was quite prepared to forgo the privilege which I think is mine as a member of the committee to go into this thing exhaustively because I am quite satisfied that the minister presiding over treasury board, and with the officials from whom he has help in reviewing all of these cases, acted in accordance with the proper principles that would be expected to apply, but I think we are at least entitled to the detailed information to establish that that is so. If the minister does not choose to do that I am afraid we will have to pursue this case by case under the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I suggest to the hon. gentleman not in any spirit of want of co-operation but as a practical matter that I do not think his suggestion is practical. The reason why it is not practical is that there are 17 or 18 pages, many of which are in small print. That has never been asked for before. If it were placed on Hansard there would be endless tables.

Mr. Benidickson: I would be quite agreeable to having the facts tabled if not printed in Hansard. The alternative, of course, as the chairman will recognize is to give—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will accept the suggestion of having a copy of these pages tabled. I may not be able to do it today.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not mean those particular pages but whatever the minister considers circumspect and proper with respect to the two claims for citizenship and immigration and the 153 in national revenue, and so on. I expect some co-operation and compliance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is entirely acceptable. If the hon. member is asking for tabling I accept his suggestion at once. I was speaking about having all of these pages in small print copied into Hansard.

Mr. Pickersgill: We are all familiar with the fact that from time to time lists are published in newspapers of names of people with bank accounts about which they have forgotten. Is any effort made to give publicity to these debts owing to the crown before they are written off in the localities in which the people live? There may be some charity cases, as the minister has said, where this would not apply but there may be other delinquents who, if they knew their names were going to be published might pay.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I trust that in the case of anyone indebted to the crown who is in a position to pay the department concerned is making strenuous efforts to collect, but these have not been publicized in that way.

Mr. Benidickson: I assume that the minister being in charge of items in the main and supplementary estimates would be the one to decide as to the appropriateness of putting in an item of this kind here or elsewhere in the estimates, something that might relate to a forsaking on behalf of the crown on a bail bond, let us say, in a narcotics prosecution case. Would this be the item under which he would ask parliament to deal with the matter if there had been a forsaking on the part of the crown receiving a bail bond?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A debt to the crown can arise in many ways. If the hon. gentleman will tell me that he has a particular case in mind about which he wants me to make an inquiry I will be glad to do so.

Mr. Benidickson: I draw the attention of the minister to some questions that have already been raised this session but I assume that they conceivably refer to payments not necessarily made in the 1959-60 fiscal year.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There are no such payments involved in this item.

656. Contribution to the New Brunswick fishermen's disaster fund, $50,000.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, when the announcement was made last June that the federal government was prepared to contribute to the New Brunswick fishermen's disaster fund the announcement was received by all hon. members with appreciation. I should like the minister to inform us why there has been such a delay in providing this money. I understand the payment has not been made because the money was not voted. Since the announcement was made we have had before the committee a number of supplementary estimates—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I can assure the hon. member that the money was paid. It was paid promptly last August. This is provided now to reimburse the governmental fund out of which the money was paid then.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am going to crave the minister's indulgence for one moment to utter one sentence that is completely out of order, and it is this. We have had some very disastrous storms this winter which are going to make it virtually impossible for many fishermen on the Atlantic coast to carry on their fishing operations this year unless some assistance is given to them. Although not of a magnitude comparable to the disaster that occurred on the prairies last fall, it is a disaster that is every bit as great so far as the Atlantic coast fishing industry is concerned. I should like to ask the minister if he would commend this problem to the attention of the Minister of Fisheries to see if something could be done about it.

657. Assistance in the construction of vessels of the dragger or long-liner type—further amount required, $124,512.

Business of the House

Mr. Robichaud: Has the minister received any representations to the effect that there should be an increase in the amount of $165 per gross ton which is covered by this type of assistance?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I am not personally aware of any. I will refer my hon. friend's inquiry to my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries. The figure mentioned is the standard subsidy. Of course, exceptions may be made to some of the restrictions attached to that subsidy by the minister but I am not aware of any representations myself. I will refer the matter to my colleague.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, I wish to take this opportunity to ask the Minister of Finance to give serious consideration to increasing this assistance. This assistance covers subsidies on dragger and long-liner vessels and was first introduced during the war. After the war it was decided it should be carried on and the assistance was amended at that time. Since 1947 a total of $2,464,000 has been paid under this type of assistance.

When the system was introduced on the basis of $165 per ton, the cost of a 55- or 60-foot dragger was in the vicinity of $25,000. By 1953 the cost had risen to $39,000 and in the last year or two the cost for similar vessels has risen to between $70,000 and $75,000. Therefore, the subsidies which in the early years covered as much as 23 to 25 per cent of the cost of those vessels have decreased in their coverage to less than 10 per cent. I would ask the minister therefore to give serious consideration to increasing the subsidy to, let us say, $265 or $275 per ton. If for some special reason it is advisable not to increase the total amount, I feel in view of the fact that in the last four or five years the amount paid under this subsidy has been— Mr. Chairman, I see that it is now five o'clock.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: If I may interrupt you at this stage, Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance and the government that so far as we on this side of the house are concerned we are quite prepared to go on with the consideration of the supplementary estimates, provided that is the view of our friends who sit to the right of us. If it is, perhaps this would be an opportunity of getting on with the business of the house.

Mr. Herridge: This group, under the particularly pressing circumstances that exist at the present time, are willing to go on with the estimates for the remainder of the afternoon.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thank hon. members for their co-operation and appreciate this offer very much. I gladly accept it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chevrier: I thought you were going to turn it down.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not that one.

Mr. Speaker: I think the motion was adopted that the resolutions be concurred in. I must have the concurrence of the house as to whether the committee shall have leave to sit again later this day or the next sitting of the house, as the case may be. By unanimous consent the house apparently is willing to waive the hour for private and public bills and to revert to the business which was interrupted at five o'clock. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I see the Minister of National Defence has a word to say.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to delay the business of the house at this time, but at 5.45 p.m. I propose to ask for the unanimous consent of the house to revert to motions so that I can make an important statement regarding the revised air defence plan.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to revert to motions at 5.45?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Then the committee will rise at that time and report progress.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

Special—

657. Assistance in the construction of vessels of the dragger or long-liner type—further amount required, $124,512.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose and reported progress at five o'clock I was just saying that in the last five or six years the amount spent under this item showed very little variation. I believe that this is the first year that the Minister of Finance has had to come before the committee with supplementary estimates to cover this item. I suggest to the minister that if under special circumstances the government decides that it should not spend more than $400,000 or $500,000 a year as a set limit for this assistance, then in my opinion certain arrangements or agreements could be arrived at with the provinces concerned, since this is assistance that concerns only the Atlantic provinces and Quebec, to the effect that each province could not use more than a certain percentage of that amount, but I still insist that the basis of the assistance should be increased from $165 to $265 a gross ton. My reason for insisting on this is that the fisherman who purchases a boat that costs him $70,000 is put to very heavy expense which he has to cover during the fishing period which in most of the provinces, especially in New Brunswick, Quebec and Prince Edward Island, is limited to a season of six months.

On a $70,000 boat the fisherman is called upon to pay at least $2,000 a year in interest alone. He has to pay insurance costs in the vicinity of $1,000 besides that. In most cases he has to pay municipal taxes on the vessel amounting to $700 or often up to $1,000 a year.

If the purpose of this item is to help the fishermen on the basis of approximately 25 per cent of the cost of the vessel, and as the cost has more than doubled in the last 10 or 12 years, I again urge the minister to give this request very serious consideration.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

660. Northwest Territories—Administration of justice in the Northwest Territories, including the Northwest Territories territorial court—further amount required, $7,300.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister tell us what this item is for? I do not think the details are clear enough.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a sum required to meet additional expenditures incurred in the course of administration of justice in the Northwest Territories. This additional expenditure has been incurred in retaining the services of outside reporters and the services of sheriffs.

Mr. Chevrier: I see in the details that a portion of this item, $5,600, is for the maintenance of prisoners and juvenile delinquents. May I have some explanation of that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): These are expenses incurred in connection with some very lengthy trials, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: Are these expenses in the Northwest Territories defrayed by the federal government and not by the territorial administration, as they would be in a province?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, we are responsible. This is in addition to the item that was provided in the main estimates of approximately $107,000.

Item agreed to.

661. Combines Ingestigation Act—Office of investigation and research—further amount required, $35,000.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the minister give some explanation of this item, and also can he tell the committee what the position is with reference to the Combines Investigation Act. The minister may recall that there was legislation on the order paper at the last session, which was amended first in one direction—I forget the details at the moment—and then later on it was decided to drop another portion of the legislation, and finally it was not proceeded with. Is it the intention to proceed with it at this session?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this $35,000 is required in connection with expenditures for fees and expenses of counsel, reporters, witnesses and other special assistants. The expenditure incurred in this respect was larger than was originally estimated.

In reference to the inquiry about legislation, I believe it is the intention of my colleague, the Minister of Justice, to introduce a bill during the present session.

Mr. Pickersgill: What does this $35,000 represent in relation to the whole item? What is the item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The original item was $452,109.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is about an 8 per cent increase?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Which is a pretty substantial increase. Is this all for one trial?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I understand not, but I speak subject to correction on that point. As to this 8 per cent increase, I think the hon. member will appreciate that in this field it is very hard to estimate. You do not always know when estimating in the previous year what trials you are going to encounter during the following year, or what the length of those trials is going to be. It is very difficult at times to estimate the length of a trial, and so far as the expense is concerned it is determined to some extent by the length.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the minister got the total cost of a recent celebrated unsuccessful prosecution undertaken by the government?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I have not. I would doubt if the expense has been fully tallied up yet, anyway.

Item agreed to.

LEGISLATION

The Senate—

662. General administration—further amount required, $55,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the minister could explain what this item is for. It should be fairly easy to estimate the costs of the Senate, one would have thought.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding that assumption, the Senate has incurred additional expense for publishing Senate debates, of $13,000; printing of other publications, $38,000, and expenses of committees, $4,000, aggregating $55,000. The intermediate item is principally for reporting services for divorces and other committees of the Senate, and the payment of a fee to the economic consultant of the Senate standing committee on finance.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, does this mean that the senators are talking more than they used to do or does it cost more per word to print what they say?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In so far as the printing and publishing of the debates is concerned, and the printing of other publications, all I can say is that this is an expense incurred to the queen's printer and these are the charges that have been incurred. I presume they must be met.

Item agreed to.

663. House of Commons—general administration—estimates of the Clerk—further amount required, $85,000.

Mr. McIlraith: What is the explanation of this item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This item concerns an additional requirement of $85,000 for the publishing of the debates of this house, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the cost of publishing the debates increasing? Is there a new rate or a new tariff or do we just talk more?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is a great deal of talking being done, Mr. Chairman; there is no denying that. In the course of the present fiscal year, not only this session but in the course of the fiscal year, there was a good deal of talking done. There was a good deal of talking done in 1959 and also 1960. Of course, the unrevised edition is published, and then there is the revised edition of Hansard as well, Mr. Chairman. This is a cost incurred which results from the printing and publishing, and I suppose it must be met.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the rate charged by the queen's printer any higher than it was a year or two ago?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think so, Mr. Chairman. Some of his costs undoubtedly have risen; there can be no doubt about that.

Mr. McIlraith: Does this reflect an increase in the number of committee reports and the evidence taken in an increasing number of committees? I have the view that there are more committees sitting than there have been in former years.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I understand, Mr. Chairman, that this is for the Hansard report of the debates of the house only.

Mr. Chevrier: Are there any of these reports of Hansard printed outside the office of the queen's printer?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, my understanding is that they are all printed by the queen's printer.

Mr. Chevrier: None is done outside?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, these are all done at the national printing bureau. This has to be so in the case of Hansard because it has to be in here not later than 11 o'clock the following morning.

Mr. Chevrier: Does that apply to the revised edition as well?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, I am sure that is correct.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I could ask the Minister of Finance what proportion of the salary of the queen's printer is charged against the printing of Hansard.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not believe there is any. I think you will find his salary is payable entirely under the estimates of the queen's printer.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister say to whom it is being paid now because it appears to be the view of the present government that the office is redundant?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is an acting queen's printer, who is the assistant queen's printer, but he is not being paid the salary established for the queen's printer.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask who the acting queen's printer is? Before the minister answers, could he give some reason why parliament has had to wait so many years for the appointment of a queen's printer? It seems to me that is a position of importance to parliament, and surely the government ought to be able to come to some decision on an appointee to a position such as this.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The gentleman who is acting in this capacity, and who is the assistant queen's printer, is Mr. Clifford Watt. The hon. gentleman speaks about the position being vacant for years. I think he is overlooking the fact that the previous incumbent of this position retired from it only about a year ago.

Mr. Chevrier: It was 18 months ago, I am told.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not recall the exact time, but it was about a year ago or perhaps a little more. I am quite sure that no one is suffering and service is being rendered. I have heard no complaints about the service being rendered by the printing bureau in connection with the printing of the reports of the house. I am not in a position, and it would not naturally fall within my province, to make any announcement concerning intentions to make an appointment.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the service is not suffering because there is no queen's printer, does not the minister think the position is redundant and ought to be abolished? Surely there must be some good reason for having a queen's printer. If there is a good reason for having a queen's printer, it is difficult to believe the service would not suffer if the office were left vacant for so long. My own opinion is that it is suffering.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 663 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, Mr. Chairman. This is the only place where I can ask the minister, on the general administration of the House of Commons—I could have asked under the Senate vote, I suppose—when the government is going to get around to appointing a librarian of parliament. This is a crown appointment over which parliament has no control. There is no question, however, that the service to parliament is suffering during the period of this vacancy in this important office. It is an office of pecular interest to us in this house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is nothing in this item that relates to the library of parliament. If the hon. gentleman does not find an answer to his question in due time, there will be other opportunities for him to press the matter.

Item agreed to.

664. To provide, notwithstanding the Public Service Superannuation Act, that Lieutenant Colonel W. J. Franklin, who purported to elect, on the 16th day of February, 1960, pursuant to subsection (2) of section 40 of that act, to continue to be a participant under part II thereof, shall be deemed to have elected, within the period prescribed by the said subsection, to continue to be a participant if, before the 1st day of May, 1960, he contributes to the consolidated revenue fund an amount equal to the amount that he would have been required to contribute had he elected within the said period, $1.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I rise to support this vote. I should like to say a word about the incumbent with whom I have been associated for a period of many years, first in my capacity as a member of parliament for the constituency of Stormont, from which he came, and that of Glengarry as well, but more importantly in my capacity as an honorary colonel of the Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry Highlanders. Colonel Franklin and myself share that honour and that distinction. I feel that on this vote I should express a word of appreciation, I am sure on behalf of those who sit on this side of the house, for his excellent services during the many years he acted as Sergeant-at-Arms.

He was not only a soldier of repute but also proved in this difficult position to be a good administrator. He was above all, I think, a fine gentleman. Colonel Franklin's record in two world wars is one which I am sure most of us here know. His record in the first world war was one of distinction. In the second world war, he immediately offered to mobilize the first battalion of the Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry Highlanders, and that he did with immediate success, but afterwards took command of the second battalion. It was during the period of time that I was on the other side of the chamber and was minister of transport that he was appointed to the position he held with such distinction and, I believe, with such satisfaction to all sides of the House of Commons during his time in office.

I should particularly like to refer to his ability to get along with not only the members of the House of Commons but the many people on the staff who are obliged to come in contact with the Sergeant-at-Arms repeatedly. I think I can safely say that this statement applied to him not only during the years up to June, 1957, but afterwards. It was a position that required a great deal of tact and Colonel Franklin was known for that characteristic.

I think the government should be commended for introducing this item in the estimates. I am positive it will be supported not only by us but by all members who sit on both sides of the chamber who, I trust, will find it possible to approve the words which I have just expressed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thank the hon. gentleman for what he has said. For my part I should like to join very heartily in the tribute he paid to Colonel Franklin. I had a very happy and warm personal relationship with Colonel Franklin. In the 15 years we had been together here I think the friendship which I had been privileged to enjoy with Colonel Franklin was probably unusually warm. I can most heartily and sincerely endorse what the hon. member for Laurier has said about Colonel Franklin.

Just recently I had occasion to convey to Colonel Franklin an expression of personal regard and esteem for the long public service he has rendered. He was a man of very great tact and indeed a man of considerable personal charm. One could not ask for anything happier than the way in which Colonel Franklin addressed himself to the wide variety of duties that fall upon the shoulders of the Sergeant-at-Arms. A great deal of versatility is required of the incumbent of that position. Colonel Franklin's service to the Canadian people through this parliament I am sure will be long and gratefully remembered.

I think we may all be happy indeed at the thought that now in his retirement he is enjoying good health, and we hope he may look forward to many years of happiness in his retirement and the well-earned leisure that goes with it. I appreciate indeed what the hon. gentleman has said about the provision that has been made for his benefit by this item. I hope it will commend itself to all hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: I have other opportunities and means of expressing my appreciation of Lieutenant Colonel Franklin, retired Sergeant-at-Arms, but I should not like the opportunity to pass, as I am now in my seat when this vote is before the committee, without saying that I endorse what has been said by the hon. member for Laurier and the Minister of Finance, particularly as I had the responsibility of working with Colonel Franklin, when he was Sergeant-at-Arms, more closely perhaps than other hon. members of the house. In the three years in which I have occupied the chair I have enjoyed that association and have found him at all times to be a co-operative, and able officer of good judgment. I wholeheartedly endorse what has been said and add my best wishes to Colonel Franklin in his retirement.

Mr. Herridge: On behalf of this group I want to express their appreciation of the services rendered by Colonel Franklin over a good number of years and to wish him a lengthy, happy and healthy retirement. Having said that, I should like to ask the minister why this item is necessary. Would the minister mind explaining this item? It is not quite clear to some of the members of this group.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Very simply the explanation is this. Colonel Franklin had not completed in the prescribed time the papers that were necessary in order to enjoy the benefit of the supplementary death benefit plan under the superannuation act.

Mr. McIlraith: I want to express my appreciation to the Minister of Finance for the words he has uttered under this item today about the former Sergeant-at-Arms and to concur with the remarks made by him, by the Speaker of the house and by the hon. member for Laurier. I greatly doubt whether too many hon. members appreciate fully the amount of detail and work involved each time there is a change of parliament. Such a change creates problems requiring infinite judgment, care and patience. I think Colonel Franklin showed great fairness of mind in those many small but intensely practical problems that arise each time parliament changes, and there have been several of those changes since 1945. Holding that view, I was most appreciative of the remarks of the Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Laurier, His Honour the Speaker of the house and the hon. member for Kootenay West.

There is one point I want to mention about this item. I think it should be mentioned but I do not want my remarks to be misunderstood. I hold the view that the method of the termination of the appointment left something to be desired. We were dealing with an officer of parliament and the officer of parliament concerned is appointed by letters patent—in other words, a commission —almost identical in form with those under which a minister of the crown is appointed.

There is, of course, no question at all as to the right to terminate that appointment at any time. However, I thought that the method of termination without notice on this occasion surely left something to be desired, bearing in mind the fact that the government was dealing with an officer of parliament. I do not want to elaborate unduly on the subject but surely when dealing with an officer of parliament, and particularly one with such an outstanding record, he having also served outside of parliament with such distinction in one of the fine historic regiments of Canada, a little bit more care and a somewhat better technique could have been used in carrying out the termination of the appointment. I do not wish to pursue the matter unduly. However, I should like to feel that the government would take note of my remarks and that, if the occasion ever arises in the future to deal with a similar matter, more care would be used.

Mr. Peters: I am wondering why this vote was necessary. This vote would indicate to me—I may be wrong and if so, I should like the minister to correct me—that no pension had been established for Colonel Franklin during his term here and that now we are waiving the act as such—I refer to the Public Service Superannuation Act—in order to allow him to establish pension benefits. What I should also like to ask is whether this is normal procedure. Do we extend this privilege to others?

I would presume the reason he was not under superannuation was the nature of his position and the fact that there is no foreseeable termination date to that office in the same way as the offices of deputy ministers and other high ranking officials of the government. Will this also be applied to other civil servants in similar circumstances who are not governed by the superannuation regulations?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Colonel Franklin was under the superannuation act. Let me clear up this point at once. This item pertains to the supplementary death benefit plan. It is not related to the superannuation benefit in general.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

Surveys and mapping branch—

665. Geodetic survey of Canada—further amount required, $47,800.

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder whether we could get some general description of this amount?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I can explain this very briefly. This additional sum of $47,800 is required to provide for the purchase of five motor vehicles which were destroyed in a fire at Regina airport on November 1 last, and an underestimation of the amount voted for salaries.

Item agreed to.

Canadian hydrographic service—

666. Administration, operation and maintenance—further amount required, including approval of a grant in the amount of $21,250 made to the University of Toronto toward the cost of a geophysical program in the Great lakes, $392,250.

Mr. Chevrier: There are a number of items here, one of which is pretty substantial. The item being voted is $392,250, administration, operation and maintenance. In the detail there is an item of $280,000 for repairs and upkeep of ships and boats. Would the minister indicate what ships and/or boats this amount is for, and why there was not a sufficient amount voted in the main or further supplementary estimates to cover this?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, there was an underestimate of the amount here required. The department's estimate of the amount required was made before the vessels had been drydocked. After they had been drydocked and examined it was revealed that the repairs necessary would not be as extensive as had been expected. In some cases all repairs cannot be completed before March 31. Therefore the amount required is $280,000 which is included in this estimate.

I can give the ships: C.G.S. Baffin; C.G.S. Acadia; C.G.S. Cartier; C.G.S. Kapuskasing; C.G.S. Marabell; C.G.S. William J. Stewart and C.G.S. Parry. Then for various launches there is a figure aggregating $26,000.

Mr. Chevrier: Are these ships which belong to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys or are they ships which are chartered for that department?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): These are all Canadian government steamships, Mr. Chairman. There were advantages, of course, in having this work done during the present fiscal year because the additional work provided employment in a relatively slack season. The doing of this work will make it possible to commence the 1960 field program early in the next fiscal year.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister has not answered the question I asked. I asked, do these ships belong to the department?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They are government steamships.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, I know they are government steamships from the description the minister has given, but do they belong to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys or are they chartered from some other department such as the Department of Transport or the department of northern affairs?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The title to the ships, of course, is in the crown. The custody, management and operation of the ships is confided to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to pursue this unduly, but this is what I am trying to establish. The Department of Transport has a number of ships. From time to time in the past it has provided some of its ships for hydrographic service to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. What I am interested in knowing is this. There is not an item covering these ships for the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, whereas in the general item under the Department of Transport these repairs are covered. That is why I am interested to know whether these ships, which are the property of the crown, are the property of the crown in the right of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys or in the right of some other department.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): These are ships which pertain to the Canadian hydrographic service of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

Mr. Pickersgill: I notice an item here for something new. Could the minister explain what that is? I judge it is new from the wording of the vote itself.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, this is a further amount required. Is the hon. member referring to item 666?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, to the words "including approval of a grant in the amount of $21,250 made to the University of Toronto toward the cost of a geophysical program in the great lakes". I assume those words must have been put in because they were not in the main estimate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): So far as that part of the item is concerned, it applies to payments to the University of Toronto for operating H.M.C.S. Porte Dauphine for the purpose of carrying out geophysical work on the great lakes. That work was carried out in pursuance of an arrangement under which the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys gave financial assistance for the period from July 23 to November 30, 1959, to the University of Toronto for a program of geophysical studies conducted in the great lakes. Financial assistance was also given to this enterprise by the national research council for a further period. Moreover, the Department of National Defence has assisted by making available the Porte Dauphine for use on the project.

Mr. Pickersgill: I take it this is something not foreseen at the time the main estimates were prepared, and that is the reason for including this language in this supplementary estimate. Is that correct?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I believe that is correct, Mr. Chairman. The provision in this respect was authorized by the treasury board last July.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to have to take up so much time on this matter of the hydrographic vessels. My recollection is that the former government set aside a substantial sum of money for the construction of a hydrographic vessel. My recollection also is that a portion of that sum was voted, I believe since the present government has been in office. I was under the impression that that was the only hydrographic vessel which was the property of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

That is why, when the minister gave this list of vessels, I was inquisitive as to where the title lay and I still have not got a reply to my question. I am still of the opinion, however, that there is just the one vessel in that department for hydrographic services. I may be mistaken as to that, and if I am I will stand corrected by the minister. I knew that other such vessels had been chartered from time to time or had been loaned by other departments of government to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. My only purpose in asking the question was to get the assurance from the minister that there was not a duplication of items in the estimates in that the Department of Transport if it happened to be that department, loaned one or more of its ships to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys for the purpose of geodetic surveys in the northern part of Canada. I wonder whether the minister could clear up my query.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will do my best in that respect. I can assure the hon. gentleman in the first place that there is no duplication. Treasury board would be most remiss if it ever tolerated duplication in the estimates. The charges in respect of ships, shipbuilding and repairs for hydrographic purposes are made to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

Mr. Chevrier: Could the minister answer the first part of my question about the vessel which was built at considerable cost exclusively for the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys for use in hydrographic surveys in northern Canada?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think I had better attempt to answer as to a particular ship, but if I can be of assistance in getting information about a particular ship for the hon. gentleman I shall be pleased to do so.

Item agreed to.

Geographical branch—

667. Administration, operation and maintenance—further amount required, $27,205.

Mr. Chevrier: The amount required for this vote is $27,205, and the largest item is for the continuing establishment. Will the minister give us some idea what the continuing establishment is, and why this additional amount is required?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This amount is required by reason of the underestimation of the cost of the approved programs. The additional amount is based on four items, salaries and wages, $17,500; publication of technical reports, $8,755; a film strip on the city of Halifax produced by the national film board, $50; repairs and upkeep of equipment, $900, making a total of $27,205.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Chevrier: May we call it 5.45 p.m.?

The Deputy Chairman: Since it is now 5.45, in accordance with the understanding reached when Mr. Speaker was in the chair, shall I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

FURTHER STATEMENT ON AIR DEFENCE PROGRAM

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): I should like to ask the house for unanimous consent to revert to motions so that I may make a further statement regarding the air defence plan.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. minister consent to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pearkes: I should like to make a further statement in amplification of the replies I made in the house this morning regarding the revision of the air defence program. As I mentioned this morning, the United States air force has put certain proposals before the appropriations committee of the house of representatives. The United States authorities are releasing at this hour the gist of their proposals which were made to the house of representatives subcommittee yesterday, and I feel it appropriate that this house should be informed of these changes. I should add that this is the statement which is being released by the United States defence department at this time:

The United States air force has proposed substantial changes in its air defence and strategic programs to expedite missile detection systems, to bring in a simplified air defence system at an earlier date, and increase ICBM capability.

The proposal recommends that these projects be financed primarily with funds which would be made available by a reduction in the Bomarc "B" production program and cancellation of the planned installation of advanced SAGE combat centres. An effective SAGE system for control of Bomarc and interceptors will be completed.

The projects recommended by the Air Force include:

1. The acceleration of MIDAS, the satellite system designed to detect ICBMs at the earliest possible moment after launch.

2. The acceleration of the second and third units of the ballistic missile early warning system, the first of whose powerful radars is scheduled to become operational within the next few months.

3. Improvement of the capability of "Century Series" interceptors and modernization of current radar coverage.

Air Defence Program

4. Technical development of an advanced fire control and missile system for interceptors.

5. An increase in the number of Atlas intercontinental ballistic missiles previously programmed to be on launch pads in calendar year 1962. This would be accomplished by increasing the number of missiles and launch pads of some Atlas squadrons previously announced.

6. Insurance of expeditious development and reliability testing of "minuteman," the solid fuel ICBM which is to be manufactured in quantities for installation in hardened underground sites and on railway cars moving at random about the country.

The completed air defence system proposed under the change in program would be operational at least two years earlier than the system previously planned.

These changes will contribute generally to an earlier and effective practical air defence against the weapons on which the Soviet will have to rely for decisive attack within the next several years.

The recommended projects would cost in the order of $500 million during fiscal years 1960 and 1961. The proposed reduction of Bomarc B production and elimination of the hardened SAGE combat centres would make available funds to finance the recommended projects.

The proposed transfer of funds was submitted in classified detail to the house appropriations committee in executive session on March 24, 1960.

The program changes were proposed on the grounds that emphasis in the over-all threat is shifting towards ballistic missiles and that several years' time would be required to bring the advance SAGE combat centres in hardened sites to full operational status. SAGE stands for semi-automatic ground environment. It is an electronic air warning and air defence weapons control network, the heart of which is a computer built by the military products division of International Business Machines at Kingston, New York.

SAGE installations which can be in operation much earlier than those previously proposed in the hardened supercombat centres are scheduled to be completed.

The Bomarc is a surface to air missile developed by the Boeing Airplane Company to operate with all other air defence weapons under direction of the SAGE system. Under the proposed shift in funds, Bomarc units in the revised program would be concentrated in the industrial northeast.

The proposed reduction in total Bomarc strength will not affect Bomarc squadrons programmed for the Royal Canadian Air Force.

Included in the revised air defence budget are provisions for SAGE direction and control in Canada. The Canadian Minister of National Defence has been kept fully informed throughout development of the air force's modified air defence plan.

In further explanation I might say this means that instead of the advanced SAGE combat centre which I announced in July last year it is now propsed to install in Canada a tube SAGE combat centre in lieu of the previously planned transistorized centre. While this program forecasts a reduction in the number of Bomarc B's to be produced in the United States, this reduction does not interfere with the two Bomarc installations which are to be located in Canada. It is still the intention that there will be two Canadian Bomarc sites as an integral part of the modified Bomarc system.

Air Defence Program

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister's statement is obviously a very important one on a vitally important subject. It would not be the part of responsibility on our side to comment on it in any final way until we have had a chance to examine its implications for continental defence and for Canada. I have not yet had that opportunity. The minister with his usual courtesy and consideration in these matters indicated that he would try to give me a copy in advance but it was not possible to do that—and I do not criticize him for this—until I was just entering the house. Therefore, I have not had sufficient opportunity to examine this statement which is such an important and complicated one.

From reading the statement and listening to the minister, however, it is quite clear in my mind that it represents what perhaps may be called a major shift in United States defence policy although apparently not such a shift in that part of the continental defence policy which has been allocated to Canada. It seems clear from this statement that in Washington there is now going to be greater emphasis on the deterrent and less emphasis on defence as such in the hope, no doubt, that by a more effective and powerful deterrent there will be no need for strict defence because it will prevent attack.

This emphasis on the deterrent seems to be shown not only by the reduction in the support to be given by the United States government to Bomarc and to the semi-automatic ground environmental system, but also by the information contained in this statement that there is to be an increase in the resources to be allocated to intercontinental ballistic missiles and to the ballistic missile early warning system.

That in my view, if I understand it correctly, represents a very important shift in United States defence policy which is bound, of course, to have an effect on Canada. But the effect in terms of immediate policy does not seem to be shown in this statement because, as I understand it, while the United States government is abandoning to a very large extent Bomarc and SAGE, restricting Bomarc to the defence of the northeast according to the statement, the two Canadian Bomarc squadrons and the SAGE installations in support of those squadrons are to be maintained. In other words, this statement would appear to indicate that the minister's confidence in this particular weapon remains unimpaired. Perhaps I might put it this way: The United States has changed the kite but the tail remains the same.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, one of the most significant things in the minister's statement is the further confirmation of the very inferior role that Canada is playing in the so-called defence partnership with the United States. As I see our position, there is no longer, if indeed there ever was, a real partnership. The minister in his statement pointed out that the proposed transfer of funds was submitted in classified detail to the house appropriations committee in executive session on March 24, 1960. In other words, this is strictly a made-in-Washington policy in which Canada has had no effective voice.

Mr. Pearkes: That is not correct, of course.

Mr. Argue: The change in United States emphasis away from the Bomarc to intercontinental ballistic missiles demonstrates that the military minds in the United States have decided for all practical purposes that the Bomarc is an ineffective weapon and is in fact a dead duck but Canada remains committed to what is obviously a useless military expenditure in terms of defence, something we in this group have been saying for a long time.

We think every great military authority will confirm that Bomarc weapons are unable to prevent bombers coming through that might be attacking this continent. Even if the Bomarc were operative sufficient planes would get through at any time to destroy the North American continent. We are opposed to the procedure in this regard because we are opposed to nuclear weapons on Canadian soil and in the future these weapons will be equipped with nuclear warheads.

We feel there is altogether too much money being spent on armaments at this time. Those armaments are already obsolete. The minister's statement indicates that we are correct in our view. There should be a large cut in military expenditures and a transfer of this money to economic assistance and improvements in the living standards in underdeveloped countries. This is an indication that on this continent the departments of defence of both Canada and the United States are out of step with the thinking of the people of the world. Now is the time for agreement on disarmament and a change in emphasis from military expenditures to peace expenditures. There is much evidence to support this view.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, may I just answer a couple of questions?

Mr. Speaker: In view of the time, and in view of the usual practice with statements, where comment is permitted but not debate, although the hon. member for Assiniboia perhaps strayed from that in his comment, I think it would be inappropriate to continue the discussion.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire from the leader of the house what the business is for next week?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, it is a little difficult to give a complete list for next week. Monday is private members' day and Thursday evening is budget evening, but for Tuesday and Wednesday we will attempt the following items. Item No. 17 on the order paper is a motion in my name dealing with a reference to the committee on agriculture and colonization of a matter pertaining to feed mills in the prairie provinces.

I expect we will have before us from the other house amendments to the energy board act which I should like to bring forward on Tuesday. Then we would continue with item No. 9 on today's order paper, which is a resolution in the name of the Minister of Public Works dealing with the Trans-Canada Highway Act.

There is doubt as to at just what stage we will return to this particular matter of supplementary estimates. I might put it down for say Tuesday evening, if things move along in the house, and on Wednesday, if it is agreeable, we would, if we had not completed the supplementary estimates on Tuesday night, complete them. Similarly, on Wednesday, if it is agreeable, we would like to pass the resolution having to do with the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act so that the bill could be debated on Friday of next week. There would be no restriction of debate in any way at all, but it would be helpful perhaps to have the bill in front of us. That is all I can usefully outline tonight for next week's business.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask one question? Would the house leader not consider putting over the federal-provincial tax-sharing resolution until Friday, say, because of the fact that many of us who would like to participate in this matter are also on the railways and shipping committee which, as the minister knows, will be sitting on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday of next week.

Mr. Churchill: We will make some such arrangement. I was wondering whether, if the resolution passed without further debate on Wednesday, we could have the bill in front of us for full debate on Friday. If, on the other hand, that does not suit, we might discuss it on Monday.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you.

It being five minutes past six o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

FATHER POINT—PILOT STATION REMOVAL

Question No. 145—Mr. Bourget:

1. Are steps being taken by the Department of Transport to move the pilot station at present situated at Father Point?
2. If so: (a) What sites have been considered for the establishment of this new station? (b) Have estimates of the cost been prepared for each of such sites? (c) In each case, what is the cost of the work involved?
3. Has a final decision been reached on the choice of a new site? If not, when is it expected that such decision will be taken?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

1. Yes, at the request of the pilots themselves.

2. Several sites have been considered tentatively, including Anse aux Basques, Les Escoumins, Anse Noire and Trois Pistoles; and tentative cost estimates developed, but since this whole matter is to be reviewed again—as already announced—no final cost estimates are available as yet.

3. While a temporary move to Les Escoumins has been decided upon for this year, no final decision on a permanent new site has as yet been made and the matter will receive further study during the present year.

DORVAL AIRPORT—DECORATING TENDERS

Question No. 289—Mr. Dupuis:

1. Were tenders called in connection with the decorating of the federal airport in Dorval, Quebec?
2. If so, on what date?
3. What were the names of the firms or persons who submitted tenders, and the respective amounts of each tender?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

1. "Decorating" in its common interpretation is included in the general contract.

2 and 3. Answered by 1, above.

FEDERAL BUILDING—PLESSISVILLE, QUE.

Question No. 306—Mr. Roberge:

1. Was the contract for the construction of a federal building in Plessisville, Quebec, awarded to the lowest bidder?
2. To whom was the contract awarded?
3. Were any extras paid to the contractor?
4. If so, of what nature and in what amount?

Answer by: Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works):

1. Yes.

2. J. O. Lambert Inc., 6 Garagonthier Street, Quebec, P.Q.

3. Yes.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, March 28, 1960

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

VACANCY

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that consequent upon the notification given in this house on Friday, March 25, 1960 by the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Leduc) and pursuant to section 10 of the House of Commons Act, I have addressed my warrant to the chief electoral officer for the issue of a new writ for the election of a member in the electoral district of Labelle in the province of Quebec.

RAILWAYS, AIR LINES AND SHIPPING

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SESSIONAL COMMITTEE

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe) presented the first report of the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping owned and controlled by the government and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ANNOUNCEMENT RESPECTING EASTER ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Hon. members have been making some inquiries respecting the adjournment at Easter time for the vacation that is customarily taken during that season. I simply wish to advise at this time that at some convenient date a motion will be moved for the adjournment of the house from Wednesday, April 13, at the conclusion of the sitting that day, until Monday, April 25.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): The house will not have been surprised at the announcement by the Prime Minister with regard to the Easter recess.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): The statement as to the Easter recess is somewhat of a routine one, since the Easter recess is ordinarily of this duration. Of course this is a very acceptable announcement.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PROPOSED DATES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I should like to announce to the house that last week I sent a letter to the several provincial premiers proposing that a dominion-provincial conference on fiscal relations be held in Ottawa on July 25, 26 and 27 next, if these dates are generally acceptable to the various premiers.

Hon. members will recall that the Minister of Finance, at the meeting of the dominion-provincial committee of ministers of finance and provincial treasurers in Ottawa in October last, announced that the federal government intended to convene a plenary dominion-provincial conference in mid-1960 the purpose of which would be the discussing of the fiscal arrangements between the dominion and the provinces to follow the present tax-sharing arrangements, which will end on March 31, 1962.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): With respect to the announcement with regard to a federal-provincial conference, which also had been forecast, it would be interesting to learn—and perhaps the Prime Minister could tell us now in view of previous statements that have been made on the matter—what will be the position of the municipalities at this conference.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the Prime Minister has announced that the federal-provincial conference will be held in Ottawa. I think such a conference is most essential not only because the agreements are coming to an end, as the Prime Minister has said, on March 31, 1962, but because there are many urgent and pressing fiscal policies with which the provinces wish to deal at this time, regarding the solution of which the federal government can no doubt be of help.

I am pleased that the announcement is a firm one, and does not depend on whether or not the house is in session. I remember that on a former occasion the Minister of Finance said that such a conference could not be held with parliament in session. I do not think there is any need for one to bar the other. I am glad the announcement has been made even though I anticipate that the house may still be in session.

Continental Air Defence Policy

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONTINENTAL AIR DEFENCE POLICY—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the lack of adequate consultation between Canada and the United States, as revealed in statements made by the Minister of National Defence on and since Friday last, over the basic change made by the government of the United States in continental air defence policy, together with the decision of the minister to continue unchanged Canadian expenditures on a weapon for which a drastic cut has been proposed in the United States defence budget.

In speaking to this motion, Mr. Speaker, I do not of course have to do more than mention the importance of the subject with which it deals. I realize that under the standing order in question the matter must be not only important, but the discussion of it should be justified on the ground of urgency.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that statements which have been made in this house and outside the house by the minister and representative of the government have created a state of confusion, misunderstanding, and anxiety in the country which does make it urgent that this matter should be cleared up at the earliest possible date, and that one aspect of this confusion and anxiety—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not want to interrupt the Leader of the Opposition, Your Honour, but he does not have to proceed with his argument to convince us that we desire an acceptance of this motion. He need not continue in that direction at all. We will be most happy to have and welcome the opportunity for a discussion of this question to remove misapprehensions and misinterpretations which have taken place over it.

Mr. Speaker: If there are no hon. members who wish to present a contrary view, then my task is simply one of recognizing the will of the house. I will read the proposed subject matter upon which the Leader of the Opposition asks leave to move the adjournment of the house. It is in these terms:

> I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the lack of adequate consultation between Canada and the United States, as revealed in statements made by the Minister of National Defence on and since Friday last, on the basic change made by the government of the United States in continental air defence policy, together with the decision of the minister to continue unchanged Canadian expenditures on a weapon for which a drastic cut has been proposed in the United States defence budget.

[Mr. Argue.]

Has the hon. member leave to move the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pearson: In moving the adjournment of the house in order to discuss this matter, I do so not only because of the vital importance of the question of continental defence to every Canadian, but also because of our inability in this house to secure from the government any clear statement of defence policy, more particularly of continental defence policy.

This matter was brought up on this side in the debate on the address. I referred to it at some length on that occasion, as did other members of the official opposition. On that occasion the Minister of National Defence did not take advantage of the opportunity which was afforded to him of discussing this subject, a subject so very much in the minds of Canadians at this time, namely the defence of Canada and the defence of peace. Nor did any other member of the government discuss this question of defence policy and, more particularly, continental defence policy; neither have we had any such discussion in the house since that time.

It will be recalled that we had hoped—and, indeed, I expressed this hope in the very first question I asked on the opening day of this session—that the question of defence could be submitted to a small committee of this house where it could be examined from the foundation, and where the whole concept and strategy of defence could be considered; where experts could be sent for, and where the kind of discussion which it seems to me the seriousness of the defence situation at this time warrants could have taken place quite irrespective of what may have been the practice in the house in previous years in discussing this subject.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I rise on a point of order. The hon. gentleman is repeating in almost identical terms what he said on a previous occasion. One might almost conclude that he was reading from the same document he used when he was discussing the motion to set up the committee—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was quite happy for a discussion to take place on the subject matter of the motion for the reason that was given in the motion on this occasion, but I submit that when the adjournment is moved for a given purpose the discussion should be limited to what is contained in the motion for adjournment which has been moved.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should read to the house the limitations which do exist on a debate of this kind, as set out in standing order No. 26, subsection (6):

(6) The right to move the adjournment of the house for the above purposes is subject to the following restrictions:
(a) not more than one such motion can be made at the same sitting;
(b) not more than one matter can be discussed on the same motion;

I may have been a bit hasty in accepting this proposal as it is because there seem to be two matters raised, first the lack of adequate consultation between Canada and the United States, and second, the decision of the minister to continue unchanged Canadian expenditures on a weapon for which a drastic cut has been proposed in the United States defence budget.

As the matter of consultation is something in the past with respect to this item, I take it that the debate basically is on the decision of the minister to continue unchanged Canadian expenditures on a weapon for which a drastic cut has been proposed in the United States defence budget. That is the one matter which can be discussed on the motion. The standing order goes on to say:

(c) the motion must not revive discussion on a matter which has been discussed in the same session;
(d) the motion must not anticipate a matter which has been previously appointed for consideration by the house, or with reference to which a notice of motion has been previously given and not withdrawn;

Paragraph (e) which states that the motion must not raise a question of privilege is not relevant in this instance, but the succeeding paragraph reads:

(f) the discussion under the motion must not raise any question which, according to the standing orders of the house, can only be debated on a distinct motion under notice.

With those limitations before hon. members the subject to be discussed, I take it, is the decision of the minister to continue unchanged the Canadian expenditures on a weapon for which a drastic cut has been proposed in the United States defence budget.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, if I may say a word on the point of order, I submit with respect that you have already allowed this motion to be presented for discussion, and therefore it is rather difficult now to attempt to limit the discussion on the motion to only one part of it, namely the decision of the minister to continue unchanged Canadian expenditures, when in fact you yourself have said there are two parts to the motion, the first relating to the lack of adequate consultation.

While the lack of adequate consultation is a circumstance surrounding the events of last week, I would suggest to Your Honour that it raises something of fundamental importance, namely whether or not there are facilities that are being used for consultation between Canada and the United States. Even though the allowing of remarks concerning the motion as it now stands would rightly limit the discussion in the house, I suggest that you should allow discussion on the motion as it is framed not just part of it.

Mr. Speaker: Dealing with the point which the hon. member for Assiniboia has made, I am quite content with the view he expresses. The consultation which is referred to in this motion for adjournment, of course, is consultation with respect to this particular weapons program, so in essence what we are discussing is the decision of the government with respect to this particular weapon and the exchange by consultation with the United States with respect to this weapon.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I gather that you have agreed to the discussion of these two matters referred to in the motion. While I realize that normally in a motion of this kind only one subject is put forward, I think it is also stated in Erskine May that if two matters are related to each other, Speakers in the past have permitted a discussion of the two related matters. Therefore I take it I am at liberty to discuss consultation between Canada and the United States in the field of continental defence policy, and also the expenditures on the Bomarc B weapon which is part of our weapons system and as such has a bearing on continental defence policy and on the organization of that continental defence policy. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hope to keep my remarks within the limits of these two subjects.

Mr. Speaker: May I say this before the Leader of the Opposition proceeds. A discussion of consultation between Canada and the United States with respect to matters other than the Bomarc, which is the weapon referred to, would seem to me to be beyond the scope of the debate. In that sense there is really only one subject before the house, namely the government's policy with respect to this weapon and the development of that policy in consultation with the United States.

The motion is, of course, a motion to adjourn the house, and its interpretation is related to this document. I expect hon. members will keep to the purpose as we have narrowed it down.

Continental Air Defence Policy

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, these two questions are related to each other. One has to do with consultation with the United States in respect of this particular weapon as part of our continental air defence, and the other with the expenditure of money on this particular weapon which is a part of our continental weapons system. Those are the two subjects, and in bringing this matter forward I had not anticipated that I would not be able to speak a length a least on the background leading up to this particular consultation and those particular expenditures. Because, Mr. Speaker, the basis of this motion is to be found in the statements made by the Minister of National Defence in this house last Friday at six o'clock, and the bearing of that particular statement, which deals with both those matters, on what the minister had said in this house only a few hours before, on Friday morning.

Consultation, Mr. Speaker, if there was consultation, which took place in regard to this matter it was a form of consultation the results of which had not been made known in any way, shape or form to this parliament while it was going on. This, Mr. Speaker, is surely an indication of the inadequacy of the present position of our defence arrangements with the United States of America. Not only are we to be put in a position where we are to continue to spend money on a weapon which is being discarded by the United States defence services—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pearkes: Where do you get that?

Mr. Walker: That is not right.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pearson: From the minister's own statement made in this house last Friday I will be able to show conclusively that it is right. The Minister of Public Works interjects and says that is not right. Let the minister get up and explain why the United States government has cut—

Mr. Pearkes: As soon as you sit down I will.

Mr. Pearson: —the appropriation from $430 million to $50 million. If this does not represent a loss of confidence in a particular weapon, what can represent a loss of confidence?

In any event, there is no doubt that so far as consultation is concerned, we have built up over the years a system of consultation between the government in Ottawa and the government in Washington on defence and other matters. I suppose when NORAD was established by this government—a continental defence organization without any real connection with NATO—one of the reasons it was not brought under NATO control in any effective way was, no doubt, that it would help to develop a better system of consultation between Canada and the United States in defence matters by the establishment of this continental defence arrangement which we know as NORAD. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, surely we in this house had some reason to believe that if there were in fact consultations going on between the two governments in regard to continental defence policy concerning this and other weapons, the house would have some information in regard to them, in regard to the decision taken by the government of Canada on this matter.

One of our complaints—and one of the reasons we brought this motion forward at this time, Mr. Speaker—is that if there was such consultation, there has been no suggestion to that end made at any time in this house during this session, in spite of efforts on our part to try to get from spokesmen of the government some statement about national defence, some statement about the results of this consultation, something about what was going on. We could not do that by setting up a committee because the government was not prepared to agree to any committee except one to discuss past expenditures. We have been questioning the minister, up until last Friday, as to what was going on in these consultations if they were being held in respect of this particular weapon which, once the Canadian-produced Arrow was destroyed, was apparently the new weapon on which continental defence policy was based, the Bomarc B, along with continental defence squadrons equipped with CF-100 airplanes.

We have, therefore, these two Canadian elements of continental defence. We have the Bomarc missile and we have the CF-100 interceptor squadrons. The minister himself said in 1957 that the CF-100 was obsolete. The Bomarc, which was to take the place of the Arrow, as the minister has also said on many occasions and which is quite true, will have no value in action against a missile. The minister has also said that missiles are becoming the main threat. He has not been so conclusive about the effectiveness of the Bomarc B against the supersonic bomber with which the Russian air force is now equipped. But its effectiveness, even if it were developed according to plan and operated according to plan, would be very doubtful indeed against even that kind of threat.

The minister has, in the past, stated that these interceptor planes and missiles would be able to engage and perhaps knock down some enemy bombers. We could not count on too much in that respect. Nevertheless these are the weapons on which we have decided to base our continental defence policy, along with the CF-100's which, according to the minister, were obsolete two years ago. So we have a right to expect that consultation would be going on with the United States in regard to the effectiveness of this missile system and its ground environmental control system, which apparently is also now to be changed, and the possibility of maintaining interceptor squadrons of a type which would be presumably more effective than the CF-100, if such squadrons are to be retained along with the Bomarc in our continental system.

We have not at any time this session been able to get any information of any substantive character on these matters from the minister. We have asked questions; we have tried to bring the matters forward, and we have tried to set up a committee; but we did not learn, until I think it was Friday afternoon, that presumably as a result of consultation, the United States was to issue a statement that the whole basis of continental United States policy was going to be changed.

In the morning, Mr. Speaker, we asked the minister some questions about the reports in the newspapers to the effect that this had been decided. We were told in the morning —this was only a few hours before the minister's statement in the afternoon—that these were merely newspaper reports and we should not worry about them, we should not base any of our statements on reports of that kind. I think the expression the minister used was that they were merely speculative press reports; that remark can be found on page 2446 of Hansard. Yet we have learned since that on the day before, on Thursday of last week, the executive part of the government of the United States, presumably the defence department, had recommended to the appropriations committee of the United States house of representatives a transfer of funds which were to have been devoted to the production of these weapons to be used for other purposes which would increase the deterrent strength of continental defence, perhaps at the sacrifice of the more conventional points of defence.

This was confirmed by the minister himself in the statement which he gave to the house on Friday afternoon at six o'clock. I read from his statement:

> The proposed transfer of funds was submitted in classified detail to the house appropriations committee in executive session on March 24, 1960.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, if that statement was made to the United States house committee on Thursday, March 24, the minister must have known about it if there was anything approaching adequate consultation. This must have been going on for weeks, and surely the minister must have known that the United States government had come to its own conclusions in regard to continental air defence, which conclusions were bound to have had an important effect on Canadian defence, if there is any such thing as Canadian defence apart from the defence of peace and the defence of the continent. Yet we got no reply from the minister in respect to questions we asked on this subject last week.

Now, on this question of consultation, this is what is included in the statement read by the minister on Friday night at six o'clock and this is the last paragraph of the statement:

> Included in the revised air defence budget are provisions for SAGE direction and control in Canada. The Canadian Minister of National Defence has been kept fully informed throughout development of the air force's modified air defence plan.

Well, Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of difference between the United States keeping a minister in the Canadian government informed about what is being done in regard to continental air defence, and consulting with the Canadian government in respect of joint continental air defence in a way which would make it possible for the Canadian government to express some views and to have some weight. If the latter kind of consultation were going on it is surprising indeed, in view of what the minister had to say on Friday morning, that at six o'clock that evening he could give a statement of this kind in the House of Commons. Indeed, one of the most surprising things of this whole surprising episode is the fact that this is a statement from the Canadian Minister of National Defence given in the Canadian House of Commons on a matter which affects Canadian defence policy, and it is headed "Statement being issued by the United States Department of Defence".

This leads us to suspect, Mr. Speaker, to say the least the adequacy of the consultation that has been going on in this matter, which is an unhappy reflection on the relationships between the two governments in a matter of such very great importance to Canada. So we ask the minister, why this snap decision on the part of the government made between Friday morning and Friday evening on a matter of such vital importance? If this decision—

Mr. Pearkes: May I ask the Leader of the Opposition to what decision he is referring as being made between the morning and the evening of last Friday?

Continental Air Defence Policy

Mr. Pearson: The decision made is obviously embodied in the United States statement which the minister gave Friday evening at six o'clock. When we questioned him in the morning about a change in defence policy he said there was no such change and that press reports to that effect were speculative; I think that is the word he used. If a change was to be made in Canadian defence policy, why is it that the minister was not able to make a statement to that effect in the House of Commons on Friday morning, but had to wait until word presumably came from Washington that they were going to make a statement there and then read the United States statement in this House of Commons?

Mr. Pearkes: I wonder if I might answer that question right now. As was stated in the press itself, this was a leak from a meeting of a subcommittee of a committee on appropriations which was being held in camera. Does the Leader of the Opposition think I could hold up my head as an honourable member of this government and disclose a leak or disclose of information which I knew about? I was not going to confirm or otherwise a leak from a secret or in camera meeting.

Mr. Pearson: If any such leak occurred, and perhaps it did—

Mr. Pearkes: I have said so. The Leader of the Opposition must accept my statement.

Mr. Pearson: I accept the minister's statement that a leak occurred in congress because the government of the United States was telling a congressional committee about the changes that were going to take place in continental air defence. But no single member of this parliament who was not a member of the government had any indication at any time in the last month that the Canadian government was even considering such a fundamental change in defence policy.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What change?

Mr. Pearson: While discussion of defence policy was going on in Washington and while the minister now indicates that exchanges were going on between Canada and the United States in respect of it, we were unable to get one single word on defence policy from the minister at any time in the last two months. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, there was nothing to leak in this House of Commons because nothing was said either in public or in private.

An hon. Member: That is why there was no leak.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Mr. Pearson: That is the kind of consultation we have been having. I remember the Prime Minister, a couple of years ago in talking about the improvement in the relations between Canada and the United States, saying that everything was lovely now in the garden of Canadian-United States relations; he was tending the flower so carefully now that everything was fine. This statement does not indicate that this kind of consultation of which the Prime Minister was so proud a couple of years ago is really being very effective in so far as Canada is concerned, in the matter of national defence policy.

What has been the result of the United States decision, which presumably has been agreed to by the Canadian government? I now move on to the subject of the Bomarc B weapon itself, Mr. Speaker. The United States has presumably decided that the deterrent strength of the country—we are not subscribing to that deterrent strength except in an indirect way in Canada, it is the deterrent strength of the United States—should be increased. The minister's statement makes that matter quite clear, or rather the United States statement read by the minister makes that matter quite clear. It is to be increased, if necessary, at the expense of the strictly defence aspects of defence. I am not going to quarrel with that decision on the part of the United States authorities in which perhaps the Canadian authorities have concurred. It may well be that the best defence of peace at the present time is the strengthening of the deterrent. Perhaps the only defence of peace we have at the present time is the certainty on the part of those who might break the peace that, if they do so, they will be destroyed.

In any event, as the statement read by the minister makes quite clear, that is now to be the basis of continental defence policy in so far as it is determined by the United States, that a greater share of their resources is to be devoted to the deterrent strength of that country, and that the money and resources required for this increase of deterrent strength is to be taken from the project known as Bomarc B.

If anyone on the other side of the house thinks this does not represent a change in United States policy in respect of the Bomarc B, all they have to do is read the statement from the minister and the statements that are coming out of the United States at the present time. There is no doubt in the world that in this change the United States government is down-grading the Bomarc B. How otherwise can you explain a slash from $421 million for defence to $50 million? I know the minister has been saying—and indeed it is quite correct—that funds are available from previous appropriations which will enable more than $50 million to be spent on this project. But the fact remains that in so far as the United States is concerned, the $421 million appropriated is to be reduced to $50 million. The down-grading of this weapon appears in practically every line of the statement read by the minister last Friday.

Yet to add to our confusion, and to add to the kind of anxiety that is being shown in the country, in practically every editorial I have read this morning which has commented on events over the weekend—I refer to the Globe and Mail, the Gazette and other papers; and in order to prove this confusion and uncertainty in people's minds, may I recall that yesterday, outside of this house and on a television program, the minister went to some pains to show that this did not represent any great change in the policy of the United States government in respect of this particular weapon.

I have not the text of what he said. I tried to get it, but I understand he was speaking merely from notes. However, I think the minister will agree that he said yesterday on the air—and this is in striking contrast to the impression created by his statement on Friday—that the change in the United States Bomarc program as the result of this statement made on Friday would not be very substantial, that there would still be 12 Bomarc squadrons left plus two Canadian squadrons, which would make 14 squadrons. If in fact that is the situation now, that is a very minor change. But that is certainly not what this particular statement says. How can the minister justify a statement of that kind, that we are still going to have 14 Bomarc squadrons in spite of the changes in Washington, including two Canadian Bomarc squadrons the missiles for which would be paid for by the United States?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If these figures are correct, that there will be 12 Bomarc squadrons in the United States and two Bomarc squadrons in Canada, would the small reduction that is being made be understood by the minister as a proper one and not a major change of policy?

Mr. Pearson: If that is in fact the situation, we have more cause than ever to criticize the minister for the statement he made last Friday.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Leader of the Opposition is running away from the question.

Mr. Pearson: I will come to the question in the next point, and it is a very easy question to answer. If that in fact is the situation, will the minister explain the reduction of $421 million to $50 million to be spent on these Bomarc squadrons? The minister himself on March 7, 1960 as reported at page 1789 of Hansard, had this to say when he told us we were losing our sense of proportion because we were worried about what was happening in the field of national defence, and especially in respect of this particular weapon which had been tried seven times and seven times found wanting.

Mr. Bigg: So what?

Mr. Pearson: "So what", says someone on this side. How many times does it have to fail before this government will give up on it?

Mr. Walker: May I ask a question?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Walker: Did the Leader of the Opposition appreciate that the Bomarc A had 80 failures before it finally succeeded?

Mr. Pearson: Of course I appreciate that. I have been told that enough times in this house; and I have also been told that the Bomarc A was not adequate for the job we have to do, that we need the Bomarc B. If the Bomarc A was such a fine weapon and had so many successes after 80 failures, why do we not arm our forces with the Bomarc A instead of the Bomarc B? We are now discussing the Bomarc B, which the minister has said is to be the basic missile weapon for the Canadian air force, even though it has failed seven times in a row. These are just growing pains apparently, these failures.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will the hon. gentleman answer the Prime Minister's question?

Mr. Pearson: When we discussed this matter we were told that we were losing all sense of proportion.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Unless the hon. member who has the floor wishes—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I just wished to ask him to answer the Prime Minister's question.

Mr. Pearson: I would be glad to. Here is what the minister said with regard to this matter, as reported on page 1789 of Hansard for March 7:

> I might mention that the United States, in this fiscal year, is spending $421.5 million for the development of Bomarc sites across this continent, of which there are 18 interlocking sites. Two of these will be constructed in Canada.

The minister told us on March 7 that the United States is going to spend $421.5 million on 18 Bomarc B sites, including two in Canada. He tells us now that the $421.5 million has been reduced to $50 million; and then he tells people of this country over the air that $50 million will do the work in respect of 14 stations, when he said on March 7 that $421 million would be required for 18 stations. Perhaps the minister can explain that; perhaps he will answer it now. Are there to be 14 Bomarc B stations constructed by the United States and Canada costing $421.5 million this year?

Mr. Speaker, that was the impression he had been giving us, and up until Friday last we had assumed that was quite correct and there was no change. Then suddenly this statement is issued by the United States which said, "we are going to cut this expenditure". Some of the people in the Boeing aircraft company have gone much further even than the statement in regard to the cut. But the minister having given that impression to the country, he tells us now there will be a great change in the whole Bomarc program. Indeed, he said outside the house on Friday that if the current development of the Bomarc did not succeed, it would be out completely. That is from a report in the Montreal Star. Then on Sunday he said that the changes are very minor, not substantial, and we will have 14 instead of presumably 18 Bomarc B squadrons.

Mr. Speaker, the minister then wonders why there is confusion and uncertainty in the country over our national defence policy. A Washington report of last Saturday quotes an official of the Boeing aircraft company as saying that the reduced funds for all these missiles made by the Boeing aircraft company will permit no major production at all, but will be used only to continue research.

Mr. Diefenbaker: From what is the hon. gentleman reading?

Mr. Pearson: From a press statement from Washington attributing a report to a high official of the Boeing aircraft company.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the newspaper?

Mr. Pearson: I have not got it before me—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Ah.

Mr. Pearson: —but the Prime Minister does not have to believe me if he does not want to. I make this statement on my own responsibility as an hon. member, and that should be good enough for the Prime Minister. As a matter of fact it would not be very difficult for me to get the clipping, because there are a lot of others to the same effect.

The fact is that unless the minister can give us evidence to the contrary, this $50 million will probably serve the same purpose as the $50 million the Prime Minister talked so much about when the Arrow was scrapped. It will liquidate the operation. Perhaps this $50 million may serve as a sort of funeral expense for the Bomarc B weapon in the United States and Canada. The minister will have something to say about that later, no doubt; but whatever the fact is on that score, he cannot deny the fact that the United States is moving away from this weapon. I said last Friday that they are changing their kite, but that the same old Canadian tail of the Bomarc B will be used.

Mr. Speaker, at a time when this whole weapon, this whole concept of continental defence, is under review by the United States, how can the minister justify carrying on without a change in Canada in exactly the same way? We are going to build two Bomarc sites and continue our nine continental defence squadrons. We do not know whether we are going to equip them with CF-100's much longer or whether we are going to get new United States planes at great expense. We do not know whether there is going to be brought in perhaps some new kind of army missile. We do not know anything about it except what the minister has vouchsafed to tell us occasionally in answer to questions, some of which had later to be contradicted by the development of events. Never was that confusion worse confounded than it was last week. Therefore perhaps when the minister speaks in this discussion he will try to remove some of this uncertainty—and that is a mild word indeed to use—with regard to the use of this particular weapon as the basic missile for the Royal Canadian Air Force at a time when it is being dropped by the United States, so far as the reduction of expenditure from $421.5 million to $50 million indicates it is being dropped.

Perhaps the minister will also tell us whether he is satisfied with the kind of consultation he has had on this matter, and on other defence matters related to it, with the United States. There is nothing much more important that we could be discussing in this house than this question of defence, Mr. Speaker, and there is no more important aspect of defence policy than that of continental defence. The government has taken its stand; continental defence should be worked out by joint arrangement with the United States through a joint committee called NORAD, rather than having it worked out on a broad collective basis through NATO.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that the government has therefore to justify its concept of continental defence. It has to justify the expenditure of hundreds of million of dollars on weapons which are of no use whatever against missiles, and which are of very little use whatever against supersonic bombers. Of what use are they? When one of these weapons, the basic Bomarc B, is tried and found wanting in the United States, and that fact is recognized by the United States through a reduction of the appropriation for that weapon from $421.5 million to $50 million, then let the government justify expenditures on that weapon in Canada to the amount of $125 million, which the minister says will be the Canadian cost of the installation of two Bomarc squadrons in this country.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question, if I may.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will be speaking in the debate.

Mr. Pearkes: Then I will wait.

Mr. Pearson: If the minister has a question I think he should be permitted to ask it.

Mr. Pearkes: I would like to know whether the Leader of the Opposition could give me the quote where I said that $125 million was being spent on these two Bomarc stations. I have stood up in this house at least three times during this session and said that the total Canadian expenditure on these two Bomarc stations is approximately $15 million, yet the hon. gentleman stands up again and again and repeats $125 million. He knows he is not speaking the truth.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but as I understood the minister who has just taken his seat—I hope I did not understand him correctly—the import of what he said was such that I hope he will reconsider it before Hansard is allowed to go further.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the minister said that I know I am not telling the truth in using that figure. Let the minister prove that. I know what the minister said. He has said more than once—

Some hon. Members: Where?

Mr. Pearson: In the house and outside, and we will be glad to quote him before the debate is over. But the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Leader of the Opposition is preventing me from fighting his battle, and I do not wish to enter into unnecessary difficulties. The Minister of National Defence has in effect accused the Leader of the Opposition of deliberately misstating the facts. He will recall, from his long experience in parliament, that no hon. member, when he has reflected on a statement of this kind which he has inadvertently made, would allow it to stand, and I trust he will modify it immediately.

Mr. Pearkes: The figures I have quoted continually in this house are $15 million. When this first proposal to include the Bomarc was introduced I pointed out that the Canadian content of these stations would amount to approximately $20 million. Then, after a review had been made, I explained to the house that the amount of the two Bomarc stations was approximately $15 million. I know the Leader of the Opposition was in his seat on both those occasions—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I think the minister misunderstands me. I am not concerned about the truth of what he said; what I am concerned about is the propriety of his statement. If an hon. member on one side of the house were allowed to say of another member that he had deliberately misstated the truth, we should lose all the respect we have for each other and debate would not be possible.

Mr. Pearkes: I am quite prepared to change "deliberately" to "inadvertently".

Mr. Pearson: I am glad the minister has made that withdrawal, and we shall be very glad to show before the debate ends exactly what the figures are, from the minister's own sources.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I am pleased to see that the Minister of National Defence and the Leader of the Opposition are once again on friendly terms in the house, even though they are not entirely in agreement as to the policy which is being followed by the government.

The motion moved this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition asks for the adjournment of the house—

> —for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the lack of adequate consultation between Canada and the United States, as revealed in statements made by the Minister of National Defence on and since Friday last, on the basic change made by the government of the United States in continental air defence policy, together with the decision of the minister to continue unchanged Canadian expenditures on a weapon for which a drastic cut has been proposed in the United States defence budget.

I think there is substantial evidence to support the contention that there is a lack of adequate consultation between Canada and the United States. I think the minister himself, in his statement to the house on Friday last in reply to a series of questions, indicated clearly that there is inadequate consultation. As a matter of fact, from the minister's own statement it would seem clear that although he knew something was brewing in the United States, that some inquiry was being made and that some changes might well be made in defence policy, he had no idea that a sweeping change of the magnitude mentioned in the statement he made a few hours later was under contemplation. I say this because the Minister of National Defence had this to say in reply to the initial question put to him by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer). The hon. gentleman said:

> Mr. Speaker, Canada has been consistently consulted regarding a possible revision of the joint air defence plan which might be adopted in order that the development of defence and warning against ballistic missiles might be accelerated.

There are so many qualifications—so many "mights" and so many "possibly's"—in that statement by the minister that it seems to me he did not expect such sweeping changes to take place. The minister's defence, the minister's reply, is that he could not reveal to the house the discussions which were taking place because they were in camera. I would not ask the Minister of National Defence to reveal to the Canadian parliament matters which were before a United States committee in camera, but I do think the minister could have been more forthright with the Canadian parliament and public in the last few months by pointing out that there was every possibility of major changes being made in the defence policy of the United States and, as a result, in the defence arrangements between the two countries.

Instead, the people of Canada have been given no inkling that these sweeping changes might take place. They have been led to believe by the minister's statements that if reliance were placed on the Bomarc missile, the greatest defence possible would be achieved. I think it is disturbing that we should have been able to obtain fuller reports over the radio, a few hours before the questions were put to the minister, than were disclosed to this house; or that people in New York, for example, who read the New York Times should have been in a position to read a story in the issue of Friday, March 25, under a Washington date line of March 24, setting out very clearly the precise proposals which were made to the United States congress.

I repeat that what concerns me most is not the fact that the Canadian government did not disclose secret negotiations, but that it never took parliament or the Canadian people into its confidence even to the point of saying that there were very serious matters under consideration in the United States in connection with this whole defence concept which might very soon lead to a drastic change in our own defence plans.

Mr. Spencer: And also tell our potential enemies that.

Mr. Argue: Well, I suppose our potential enemies have access to the New York Times and probably learn some of the statements which are made on the radio from time to time, although it is impossible for a member of parliament to get from our Minister of National Defence a frank appraisal of the defence situation on this continent and the consultations on defence which are taking place.

For some time the C.C.F. party has questioned the effectiveness of the Bomarc B even at the operational stage as an adequate or worth-while object of expenditure for the defence of this country. Let me hasten to say that we are most anxious that in every respect our way of life—the democratic foundations of this nation—shall be given the fullest protection. But we think it is not protection, and it is not defence, to be spending vast sums of money on weapons which afford little if anything by way of protection. The Bomarc B is a weapon against manned bombers, as I understand it. I do not think there is any military expert here who does not believe that in the case of an all-out Soviet attack by say 1,000 manned bombers, 500 or at least a large proportion of the attacking force would succeed in getting through. Certainly enough would get through to wipe out our civilization as we know it. The protection of this country comes not from a potential number of potentially operative weapons that could wipe out perhaps only a minor percentage of attacking bombers equipped with atomic weapons; rather the protection of this continent comes from the availability of a deterrent, a counter-offensive being undertaken that would wipe out the nation foolish enough to make an attack on this continent.

That is the pith and substance of the United States statement that was read in this house. The United States have decided that there should be a tremendous reduction in their expenditures on the Bomarc, from $421 million to $50 million, in order to concentrate on the development of a deterrent, the ICBM's and IRBM's. We think this is the only military protection there can be for us and for the western world at this time, namely a mutual deterrent.

These are not ideas that are being advanced for the first time today. I made a "Nation's Business" broadcast on January 22 in which I had this to say:

> The Bomarc missile on which Canada will spend hundreds of millions of dollars is already obsolete and a waste of the taxpayers' money. The Bomarc, even with nuclear warheads, would not shoot down enough Soviet planes in the event of an attack to prevent the total destruction of the country. In other words, enough Soviet planes would always get through in a single attack to wipe us all out. This shows that when even dealing with air-breathing aircraft, the Bomarc is absolutely a waste of money from beginning to end.

Canadian defence policy apparently remains unaltered in view of all the substantial changes. We feel that these expenditures are not adding to the defence of Canada. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) at the beginning of this session placed on the order paper a resolution which outlined in some detail the attitude and policy of the C.C.F. with respect to general defence. We feel that recent developments have underlined the correctness of the position we took at that time.

On Friday I said that one of the disturbing aspects of this controversy is something that seems obvious. Canada is not only a junior partner in the common defence of this continent but is not an effective partner, even in terms of adequate consultation. Canada's voice, if in fact it is raised, does not get the ear of Washington. When questioned in the house hon. members opposite do not take us into their confidence to the point of informing us of general discussions and the trend of military thought in the United States.

We have the degrading picture of the Minister of National Defence standing up in the house, after repeating his faith in the Bomarc, and reading a statement which was entitled, "Statement Being Issued by the United States Department of Defence." This obviously was not a joint statement, but something phoned or wired to the minister for him to read in the Canadian House of Commons. That is not good enough for Canada or for parliament. We think the Minister of National Defence should not be merely a messenger boy of the United States defence department, but should put forward Canada's position in the strongest possible terms, and he should take parliament into his confidence.

When party spokesmen in this house engage in sweeping condemnations of Canada's defence policy it behooves them on behalf of their party to offer something in its place. It is clear from what has been said by spokesmen of the Liberal party that they consider the Bomarc a waste of money. What is not clear, however, is what the official opposition put forward as an alternative. Yesterday I heard the hon. member for Trinity speaking on a television broadcast. When asked if he believed there should be a reduction in defence expenditures the hon. member said no. He said there should be more expenditure on defence.

Mr. Pearson: No.

Mr. Argue: That was what I heard him say. No doubt the transcript can be produced. I understood him to say that if we would put half of our unemployed to work it would so increase the gross national product of the country that part of the increase could be channelled into defence expenditures.

I am completely opposed to increases in defence expenditures, and so are members of this group. We think we are already spending too much money in the defence department, and it is not providing adequate or worth-while defence. We think there should be a change in emphasis. There are encouraging signs in the world that a disarmament agreement may not be far away. An agreement may be reached with respect to the suspension of nuclear tests, and some measure of control may be agreed to.

These are the hopeful signs. Here is the place for the greatest possible emphasis. We suggest there should be a transfer of Canada's resources from the moneys now spent on defence to the provision of economic assistance to underdeveloped countries, and to the emerging new countries and states of the world.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question. Does the hon. member take the position that he would disband all forces?

Mr. Argue: No, I would not be prepared to disband all forces. That is a very good question. I think there should be a steady and substantial reduction in our defence expenditures.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Argue: I am answering a question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the motion as presented by the Leader of the Opposition deals specifically with the question of the Bomarc missile, the government's action in connection therewith and certain relations between the Canadian and United States governments. We have now proceeded from the question asked by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) a moment ago to the discussion of another program proposed by the hon. member who is speaking. I suggest to you, sir, that nothing that is now being discussed has anything to do with the Bomarc missile. Indeed, it suggests putting our resources in another field entirely, and is completely out of order.

Mr. Pearson: On the point of order, if I follow it correctly, I was limited by your decision, Mr. Speaker—I do not quarrel with it—to these two matters. If there had been any other decision I would have been prepared to discuss alternative basic defence proposals on that basis.

Mr. Argue: Before you make your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that I was answering a question put to me by the very distinguished member for Calgary South. I thought it was a very good question, and I was endeavouring to give an adequate answer. I have merely given him my first point in the answer I would like to make.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member was led astray by the member for Calgary South he will probably have to find his way back, because on this motion he cannot discuss any question which, according to the standing orders of this house, can only be debated under a distinct motion after notice has been given. In other words, the introduction of other matters goes beyond the scope of the debate.

Mr. Argue: I appreciate that very much. What I shall try to do, however, is relate my remarks to the last part of the motion, which says:

> —together with the decision of the minister to continue unchanged Canadian expenditures on a weapon for which a drastic cut hase been proposed in the United States defence budget.

I support this criticism of the government in continuing unchanged Canadian expenditures on a weapon for which a drastic cut has been proposed in the United States budget, and I submit that ways and means of spending the money which would be released by such a change is in order on the motion because, Mr. Speaker, it would be a rather inconsequential debate if all we could do is criticize the government for having gone forward with those expenditures and have the Minister of National Defence or the Prime Minister, who does this kind of thing so well, say to us "Well, fine; you have criticized what we are doing, but what would you do? What would you do with this money?" I was endeavouring to say that we would change the emphasis from expenditure on a weapon such as the Bomarc B missile to the use of the money to assist underdeveloped countries, and some of the new emerging nations.

[Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace).]

There is another way, Mr. Speaker, a military way if you like we would use the money. We feel that such expenditures could be used for the provision and maintenance of a Canadian defence force which would be available to the United Nations upon request.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interfere with the hon. member's progress in this debate, but I do not comprehend this motion as opening the door for a general proposal with respect to defence. The matter of urgency arises out of the statement of the Minister of National Defence and apparently a change in approach to Canadian defence weapons by our allies in the United States.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, if I can get back to a directly negative approach, which apparently is what is required—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Grafftey: A reflection on the Chair.

Mr. Walker: How about some wheat?

Mr. Argue: There is only one Speaker in the chair. If that is a reflection on Your Honour, I withdraw it. I see there are a great many budding speakers at the far end of the chamber whose main contribution to debate in recent days has been to object to what other members who have the floor are saying.

Mr. Grafftey: You are always out of order.

Mr. Argue: We are critical of the money that is being spent on the Bomarc because we feel that it is an inadequate weapon; that by developing the Bomarc we merely pretend that we have a weapon that can protect Canada in the event of war when in fact no such protection does exist. We object to the Bomarc being stationed on Canadian soil because of our understanding from the government that it is to be equipped with nuclear warheads. We think it is a mistake for the area of the world in which nuclear warheads may be stationed to be increased at this time. We do not think the Bomarc itself provides adequate defence, and we object to it further on the ground that, if the present procedure is followed, it will be equipped with nuclear warheads.

We are convinced, Mr. Speaker, that the government's defence policy is in the wrong direction. We think the policy of the Canadian government has been dealt a serious and crippling blow by this new announcement coming from Washington. Rather than the Minister of National Defence trying to protect the government in pursuing a dead duck, we think the government would be far better advised to re-examine its defence policy, to take the shackles off the defence committee which prevent it from making recommendations, and to allow a full and unfettered discussion not only on the floor of the House of Commons but in any defence committee that is established.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton rising on a point of order?

Mr. Montgomery: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is deliberately refusing to follow the ruling of the Chair. The Leader of the Opposition started it, but he did not pursue the subject.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has a point. The hon. member who has the floor was beginning to discuss the question of a reference to a committee of the house, which is not involved in this debate.

Mr. Argue: I was saying that in my view, in spite of the government clinging unrepentant to this dead duck, to this inoperative and obsolete weapon, it would be far better advised to re-examine its policy and see that the $1,600 million spent in the Department of National Defence is spent in such a way as to give Canada its maximum of defence. In our view this can only come about if the government abandons its faith in the Bomarc missile and spends this money on other more useful purposes.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. This is the first opportunity I have had to reply to the statement of the Minister of National Defence that I inadvertently stated an untruth in my reference to the cost of the Bomarc project. I would like to give the authority for my statement.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry; that is not a question of privilege. I took exception to the accusation, which was a reflection on the conduct of the hon. member. I do not think it is necessary either to justify or to deal with how the matter arose because, as I understand it, the minister has withdrawn his charge that there was a deliberate misstatement of fact.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, but he repeated that I had inadvertently stated an untruth. I would like to clear that point up, if I have your permission, just by quoting from Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: I am not satisfied that the Leader of the Opposition is pursuing the right course in doing this. After all, it is a matter of the parliamentary proprieties and when the minister revised his statement it seems to me that if the Leader of the Opposition was not satisfied with the revision he should have said so. I took it he was satisfied with the alteration that was made.

Mr. Pearson: I was satisfied, of course, when the minister withdrew his original statement and put the word "inadvertently," before the word "untrue". However, I did not have my sources in front of me at that moment, as I have now, and I should like to quote from the sources of the statement I made.

Mr. Speaker: I think there could be a matter of personal privilege there, if the hon. member wishes to make an explanation as a matter of privilege.

Mr. Pearson: That is what I hoped you would give me permission to do. On page 927 of Hansard, February 10, 1960, under the words "National Defence", there is this heading: "Bomarc Missile—Inquiry as to Over-all Cost of Program". The answer to the question addressed on that matter by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) is given by the Minister of National Defence as follows on page 928:

> On July 2 in the same connection I mentioned that the total estimated cost was $125 million, covering two Bomarc stations, SAGE and the gap fillers and so forth. That is a realistic estimate—

I was talking about the Bomarc program and the minister will agree that the Bomarc program includes SAGE because the Bomarc is of no value without SAGE.

Mr. Pearkes: On this question of privilege, may I point out that the Leader of the Opposition has just shown how inaccurate the statement that he made was. He has read a statement that this includes gap fillers, SAGE and other points. There may be a heading on that, which I did not write, regarding the Bomarc.

In reply, too, I should like to call his attention to a statement which was given in the white paper in which it shows very clearly what the cost is:

> Under the cost-sharing arrangements with the United States covering the construction of additional radar sites and gap fillers for the Pinetree system and the introduction of Bomarc missiles and SAGE electronic control equipment, the construction of bases and the provision of unit equipment, estimated at approximately one third of the total cost, will be provided by Canada. The estimated cost of the items to be provided by Canada is approximately $125 million of which $10 million is included in the 1959-60 estimates.

I should like to refer to other references which have been made in this house. In Hansard, July 2, 1959, page 5354, there is a reference to the fact that there is $125 million for SAGE, et cetera, of which $20 million is for Bomarc. At page 919 of Hansard of February 10, 1960 I referred to the fact that $15 million is required for the two Bomarc stations and at that time there was some $393,000 spent. Then in Hansard of March 6, 1960, page 1789, I refer again to the $15 million to be spent on these projects, that is the two Bomarc stations, of which approximately $300,000 has already been spent.

You cannot say that SAGE is required solely for Bomarc. SAGE is required to control all interceptors which may be operating over Canada. The gap fillers are separate from the Bomarc, as are the extra heavy radars which are to be installed in western Canada. I think I have made it clear that $15 million is the total Canadian expense for these two bases.

Mr. Pearson: I just refer again to the heading in Hansard from which I drew my information, "Bomarc Missile—Inquiry as to Over-all Cost of Program".

Mr. Speaker: Does the minister wish to take part in the debate now?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If the minister speaks now, is it the understanding that he will close the debate, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: No.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): I think I should speak at this time because a number of points have been raised which must be cleared up otherwise they will give a very false impression to the people of this country. I have endeavoured to take down rough notes of what has been said. I cannot be quite certain that I have written word for word every point that has been raised.

The first part of this motion deals with the means of consultation that there are between Canada and the defence department of the United States. There are many means, and there is frequent consultation. I should like to run over the general means of consultation, and I want to try to give some idea of the amount of co-operation that there is between Canada and the United States. First of all, shortly after the change of government, this government established the NORAD organization. This was to ensure that there could be frequent consultation between those who are responsible for the defence of this continent. The defence of the North American continent is indivisible. You cannot develop a separate defence for Canada and a separate defence for the United States.

Experience over the last half century has shown that those countries which tried to stand alone were very quickly swallowed up by aggressors. It is only by taking co-operative action prior to the outbreak of war that you can ensure that there will be a proper combined defensive organization set up. I believe that the experience of the past 50 years has shown that had such a defensive agreement been reached in the earlier part of this century, and had it been known that the commonwealth or the United States would enter world war I and world war II, it is quite possible there might not have been any such wars at all. Our fundamental policy, therefore, being that of a deterrent against war, we entered into this North American defence organization which is known as NORAD.

We have at NORAD not only the deputy commander but quite a large number of staff officers who are integrated into the command. If not at the moment, then recently, there has been a Canadian head of the operational division. They are in constant touch with the plans which are being projected for the defence of this North American continent. This organization was set up by this government and we have insurance, in that way, of consultation between the commanders, because the commander at NORAD is every bit as much a Canadian commander as he is a United States commander. He has visited Ottawa frequently and has laid his plans before our chiefs of staff who have had every opportunity to examine those plans and have sent back their comments on those plans. Those comments, to my knowledge, have resulted in modifications of the original plan. That is one level of consultation.

We also have at Washington a considerable staff of officers who are in daily contact with their opposite numbers in the Pentagon. Actually there are today some 60 Canadian officers of the army, the navy and the air force who are sitting in daily on various committees at the Pentagon and from the senior officer—who is Air Vice Marshal Hendrick —right down through that group of officers, they are in daily consultation. They keep the chiefs of staff here in Ottawa advised by letter, telegram and telephone. There is hardly a day but what the chiefs of staff are advised as to the plans which are formulated or which are being developed jointly by the Canadian and the United States officers for the defence of this continent.

Then again, a year or so ago, this government set up a committee of cabinet ministers to confer with their opposite numbers in the United States. The late Mr. Sidney Smith, then secretary of state for external affairs, was the first secretary of state for external affairs to attend a meeting of that committee which at that time was held in Paris. We now have the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), myself and the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley). The last meeting was held last fall at Camp David.

If there is any question at all about that meeting being a meeting of consultation, I should like to emphasize the fact that there was no long table at which we sat down with minutes and paper before us. However, we sat around in an informal group and we had the most intimate discussion on all defence matters. That meeting was attended by advisers. The chairman of the Canadian chiefs of staff committee, namely General Foulkes, was there as was General Twining, the chairman of the United States general staff, and Mr. Gates who was then assistant secretary of defence and now is secretary of defence in the United States. We were also represented by other officials than those of the Department of National Defence. The Department of External Affairs was represented there by its officials. Officials of the Department of Finance were there as were officials of the Department of Defence Production.

At that meeting one of the decisions arrived at was that there should be meetings of the committee of consultation which had not met for some long time previously. However, we thought that if we could revive this committee of consultation consisting of the senior officers of the various departments it could do a great deal of preliminary work prior to meetings of the ministers. A date has already been set early this summer for the next meeting of this committee of ministers. They are to come to Canada this time where there will be every opportunity again of having a thorough discussion of these defence matters at the very top level. It has been decided that there will be two meetings a year of the ministers in the two countries. I suggest that is top level consultation.

In connection with the particular matters to which reference has been made may I say that for weeks I have been familiar with some of the various proposals which were being advanced by the United States joint chiefs of staff, by their air force, turned over and discussed again with the commander at NORAD; and, because he is a Canadian commander as well as a United States commander, those recommendations advanced or the various proposed schemes which were being worked out were referred to us.

As recently as last Saturday week I was talking at some length to the secretary of defence for the United States, namely Mr. Gates, who called me—I did not call him—on the long distance telephone in order to explain to me in detail various proposals. He was leaving the next day in order to go to Germany and he said, "I want to get your views on these matters before I leave for Germany". That was last Saturday week. Since then I have had conversations over the long distance telephone. I have had letters from Mr. Douglas who is assistant secretary of defence and who has been in Washington all this last week end. I had a full report of what the proposals to this subcommittee were. I knew that discussions were going on. I also knew that they had leaked out.

These are tentative proposals. This is a plan which has been formed and recommended to a subcommittee of the committee of representatives in the United States. It is not a fixed plan. It is not one which has yet been accepted by congress. It is not in its final form. At least, the committee has not had the opportunity of hearing General Kuter the commander in chief at NORAD on the final proposals or he has not been able to give his evidence before the subcommittee. It will be a long time before this plan is finally approved. It must go to the committee on appropriations. It must go to congress. Congress may make radical changes in this proposed plan. It is a tentative plan.

When I rose in my place here on Friday all I could say—and all that any honourable man could say—was that this was a speculative story. It had leaked out but not from here. Some astute press man whose job it is to get information, and all of it he can get by whatever means he can get it, had somehow or other obtained the information. I was advised from Washington that there had been a leak. But I was not going to do what I consider would be a distinctly dishonourable action, namely to have stood up here and to have confirmed or otherwise before the Canadian parliament something which I knew was going on in a committee in another country which was being held in camera. I do not believe any hon. member would really have done that.

Following my remarks on Friday morning I was again in touch with Washington. I said that this information, some of it not entirely correct, had been published in Canadian papers and that I thought it was my duty to make a statement in this house if I possibly could in order to clear up the situation. Because I had stated before that it was a speculative story, and if Washington was going to make a statement I said I thought it should be made at the same time as any statement made in the House of Commons. The original statement was to be given out in Washington at 5.15 p.m. As there had not been time to get that statement and reproduce copies here, I asked for a postponement of that time of release in Washington until 5.45, at which time I rose in my place here and asked for leave to revert to motions so that I could make that statement.

The statement I received, of course, was the statement the gist of which I had received some days before. I had one extra copy, and when I received a request from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) I sent him the only spare copy I had so that he might have an opportunity to read it beforehand. As it had come across to me typewritten, it was headed: "Statement being issued by the United States department of defence". I had tried to accommodate the Leader of the Opposition, but now he is tearing his hair because the piece of paper I sent him over so hurriedly in order that he might have a chance to read it through beforehand happened to bear that heading.

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, that is not what I was complaining about. What I was complaining about was that the statement which had been given to the press and also used in this house had a United States heading instead of a Canadian heading. There is your consultation.

Mr. Pearkes: I have described the origin of that statement and the events which took place between the morning session and the evening. Remember that this was a Friday afternoon, the last hour of which is normally devoted to private members' business. But I thought it was desirable that the house should be fully acquainted with all the proposals. If there had been time I could very well have put out a joint Canadian-United States statement, but it was a question of time and getting it out for the information of hon. members.

I feel I have disposed now of these suggestions that there is not adequate consultation between the two defence ministries. If I have not told hon. members of the House of Commons what these proposed plans were and how they were gradually being evolved, I have kept the members of the government informed in that respect, particularly the Prime Minister. There is no question about not being informed ahead of time or not being consulted. I have explained the various processes of consultation.

Now let me deal with this idea that a snap decision was made between nine and six o'clock last Friday that there should be a change. If I could produce the papers, which are all classified, showing how months ago the search to see how funds could be changed from the pure defence of the North American continent to that of increasing the power of retaliation, it would prove conclusively that no snap decision has been made.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

This matter has been under consideration for months. I stood up in this house and explained two years ago how there was a general shift in emphasis coming gradually toward the missile rather than the bomber. But it was a gradual transfer. The fact that there were likely to be changes has repeatedly been stated. None of our defence plans can be rigid and fixed. There must be a large degree of flexibility, because not only are they dependent upon local conditions but they are also dependent upon the attitude of any possible aggressor. If different plans or inventions come to light which a possible enemy may have adopted, naturally you have to change your own defence plans in order to meet those changing threats.

Time and time again the Prime Minister and I have stood up in this house and referred to the changing threat, from bomber gradually towards missile. I am not going to take up a lot of time in making quotations. I have not had the opportunity to look them up, but I will just mention one. On January 18 of this year the Prime Minister of Canada spoke in this house, as reported on page 69 of Hansard, and he said this:

> Defence policy cannot be certain. If it could be certain, and if we could determine today the course for the next three or four years, great savings might be made. If when the hon. gentleman was a member of the government—

The Prime Minister was there referring to statements made by the Leader of the Opposition.

> —it could have been determined in 1945 or 1946 the changes that would take place in the intervening years, billions of dollars could have been saved in Canada on expenditures that had to be made for materials that are today obsolete. If we could anticipate what the U.S.S.R. would do, naturally we would be able to look into the future as to the course that should be followed with the same clarity that all of us can look into the past.

On the same day, in speaking to congress the President of the United States had this to say:

> The last few years have witnessed what have been perhaps the most rapid advances in military technology in history. Some weapons systems have become obsolescent while still under development . . .
> Thus, in the last few years a number of programs which looked very promising at the time their development was commenced have since been completely eliminated.

Those are two quotations which indicate that some time ago it was realized that changes must be made in defence policy and in the type of equipment being used by our defence forces.

These are fundamental changes which have taken place. We are in a period of transition which, I suggest, is unequalled at any time in history. I think it is almost a platitude to say that. We are changing from the day of the manned bomber; now we are talking about missiles; and we have begun to talk about satellites being used for military purposes. That is a long, long way from the type of equipment which was used at the end of the last war.

References have been made to the future. There is no government in the world today which is more sincere in its quest for effective disarmament than the government of Canada. Canada is taking a leading part in the discussions which are now going on, but we would be wrong—we would not be living up to our responsibilities—if we were to anticipate the results of these disarmament conferences by taking action before an effective and enforcible system of disarmament is achieved. We must maintain, not so much our defence as our deterrent power. We base everything on the hope that we can deter an enemy from going to war. I have repeatedly said in recent weeks that there is no defence at the present time against the missile once it has been launched. Therefore we must do everything we can to prevent missiles being launched, and this means we must let the Russians, if they are our enemy, know that if they once start a war they will be met by such a tremendous counter-attack, such retaliation, that the loss to their own country would be so great that it would be suicide for them to attempt war.

The whole philosophy of our defence at the present time is that of a deterrent to war rather than of the actual defence of any particular country. I am not going to stand here and say we can shoot down every bomber that there is. I have heard statements made in this house in the past which were fantastic in the claims they made with regard to the number of bombers that could be shot down. I do not pretend for one moment that the defences we have can shoot down every bomber that might be sent against us. Mind you, the Russians have in their inventories in service today with their air force a large number of bombers, some of which are obsolete, some of which are more modern. None of them, to my knowledge, are supersonic as was claimed by the Leader of the Opposition. I do not know where the hon. gentleman got that information, but I have heard no analysis of the Soviet equipment which makes me believe that the Russians have supersonic bombers in operation today.

Mr. Pearson: On that point raised by the minister, I got the information from a statement he made to the committee of estimates discussing defence two years ago last summer.

Mr. Pearkes: As far as I know the Russians have no supersonic bombers today. They may have tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearkes: They are always changing. I do not laugh at that statement, though hon. members on the other side may. The Russians are changing and advancing in just the same way as we are. They have more advanced types of bombers than those which were in operation when the CF-100 was first made. I have made that statement before. It is quite possible, indeed, it is almost certain, that if war were to break out in the near future Russian bombers would be used.

I claim we have no protection against the missile today. The missile, once launched, cannot be shot down. Missiles will very likely be directed against the forces of retaliation which are, in the main, concentrated in the United States. However, it is more than likely that after the attack in the United States with missiles a bomber attack against the industrial cities would follow.

Nobody has told me that there will not be a war in the next three or four years. I do not think it is likely that there will be one. I do not think that the Soviet union is preparing for war against us today. Nevertheless, I am Minister of National Defence, and to a very large extent I am responsible for the defence of this country against any form of attack which may occur today, next year, or ten years from now, and while we make plans for ten years hence, I still have the responsibility, and the service chiefs still have the responsibility of meeting any possible attack today as best we can.

However, our funds are not unlimited and we would only be playing into the hands of an enemy if we set a burden upon the manpower and financial resources of our country sufficient to meet every possible form of attack. By doing so we should really be reducing the economy of our country to such a state as to be making ourselves susceptible to, may I say, psychological forms of attack. Thus, without overburdening the manpower and the financial resources of the country we have to provide the best form of defence that we can.

I have said, and I repeat it, that there is no defence against the missile once launched. We must therefore stress the power of retaliation. Canada does not play a very important part with respect to the power of retaliation. It has been said we are not in that league because of the enormous expenditure which is required to produce these modern weapons of retaliation. Perhaps I should mention a few of the costs involved. Some of the weapons which the United States started to develop and later had to abandon because of changing conditions included the Dart, an anti-tank guided missile on which some $10 million had been spent. After spending some $387 million, the United States navy abandoned the P6M, and the F8U3 was abandoned after the expenditure of some $136 million. The missile Regulus was abandoned after $120 million had been spent and other missiles which have been abandoned include the Rascal after an expenditure of $448 million and the Navaho, a missile on which there was an expenditure of $679.8 million.

To give hon. members some idea of the cost of some of these missiles of retaliation which are the only defence the west has at the present time—the power of retaliation—there is the Atlas and the Titan. Their development cost over $5 billion. Only a few of the Atlas are in operation. The cost of the Polaris in the fiscal year 1961 is expected to be $952 million. One nuclear carrier costs $471 million. That gives some indication as to why Canada cannot possibly enter that league where great sums of money have to be spent on the forces of retaliation.

What do we do? We are spending large sums of money on defence, part of which is spent on the defence of the North American continent. Part of the expenditure on defence of the continent is devoted to the Royal Canadian Navy so that with our surface ships and marine aircraft we can keep the hostile submarines away from our shores and prevent them launching missiles against our inland cities.

We spend considerable sums of money—millions—on the air defence of this continent in our warning systems which we provide, in part with the United States, as warning against the possibility of bomber attacks. We are looking into the future, working out at the present time means of assisting the United States in detecting the intercontinental ballistic missiles which might be launched against us. The main point of these warning systems is that the forces of retaliation, a number of which are still bombers in the strategic air command, can get off the ground in the few minutes that are available. If there was not that time to get off the ground they would be caught and destroyed on their air bases. Surely that money which is being spent on improving the warning systems is assistance to the only defence that we have at the present time, the power to make it clear to the enemy that it is not worth their while to attack.

We come now to the more immediate problem, the question of the change in the air defence plan. I have emphasized the point that retaliation is our one means of deterring war, perhaps making it as difficult as can be for the enemy to attack. I am sure hon. members have read in the papers or heard comments about the so-called gap that exists between United States missile development and Russian missile development. At the present time the Russians may be a little bit ahead of the United States in their missile development but I think it is compensated by the fact that the United States has available for the defence of the west a variety of means of retaliation. Not only are there missiles presently in operation in United States—few in number, I will admit, but with others coming along in the next year or two—but there is a very large force of bombers which can travel from United States and deliver their bombs on the targets of every city in European and Asiatic Russia if Russia ever starts the attack. Also, to increase the diversity and flexibility of the powers of retaliation from the United States there are the United States submarines—again perhaps few in number but with more coming along—which will have the potential of firing missiles. More and more submarines capable of carrying a Polaris will come into operation which will be able to go to any part of the world and from their unknown position in the ocean deliver their missiles against Russian targets.

In addition to that there are the medium range missiles of the Thor and Jupiter type stationed in the United Kingdom and planned for various European countries. And so, if the United States is a little behind Russia in the actual number of ballistic missiles they have, that is compensated for by the diversity of the United States weapons.

I see that you are on your feet, Mr. Speaker. I hope you are not going to stop me.

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. minister in the middle of a sentence, but unless the house gives indulgence I am obliged to advise the hon. gentleman that his time has expired.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister should be allowed to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pearkes: Thank you. As I was saying, there may be a gap but that is partially compensated by the diversity of the United States means of retaliation. The United States realizes that it is essential that they speed up the production of their intercontinental ballistic missiles so as to close any gap that may exist. Even United States funds, however, are not unlimited. They have to draw from somewhere the money to provide these very expensive weapons and so, because the threat from the bomber is decreasing, they have decided in consultation with Canada and the Department of National Defence that sacrifices must be made in the actual physical defence of this continent in order to make more funds available this year from purely defence to speeding up and increasing the power of retaliation.

The Bomarc program is considered an essential part of the defence plan of the North American continent so that they may deter bombers from coming over and so that some degree of defence can be given to the populated centres of the North American continent which are mainly concentrated in the east both in Canada and the United States. It so happens that the eastern approaches are the ones most likely to be followed up by Russian bombers if Russian bombers are used to follow up attacks of the missiles.

There had been a plan of some 18 Bomarc units distributed across the continent. Some of these stations—approximately four—have been eliminated. Those are ones which were not giving direct protection to the highly industrialized part of Canada. But the remaining stations, three of which are in operation, five of which are under construction in the United States at the present time, are distributed so that they can give protection to Canadian cities from Winnipeg to the Atlantic. There is more than one Canadian city today that will not benefit from the Bomarc plan when it is completed, and it is expected that this Bomarc plan will be completed, or that the last stations will come into operation, in 1963. They will cover every city from Winnipeg to the Atlantic, not our two Canadian ones. Our two Canadian Bomarcs, when established at North Bay and La Macaza, will give coverage from approximately Sault Ste. Marie to Quebec. Halifax is covered by Bomarc stations in Maine in exactly the same way as Winnipeg will be covered by Bomarc stations in the middle west.

That is the picture. There will be this chain of mutually supporting interlinked stations built to cover the Canadian air space for some 400 miles north of the border. The two Canadian stations are key links in that chain. I want to emphasize the fact that this is not an isolated defence; that these are not two lonely stations all by themselves. They are two important links in this chain of stations, and I cannot emphasize this too much because it does not seem to be realized by the general public.

Mr. Pearson: Will the minister permit a question on this point? Is this chain of stations that he is talking about, the 12 or 14 in the United States, to be equipped with Bomarc A missiles or Bomarc B missiles?

Mr. Pearkes: Three are in operation today. Those are equipped with Bomarc A missiles. The Bomarc B missiles will be at other stations. I cannot tell at the moment the number of stations which are A's and the number designated for B's; but in the first instance it will probably be about 50-50. Then, if there is still a threat from the bomber, according to the original plans, the B would take over from the A station.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister this question. Is it contemplated that from its present appropriations the United States will equip those stations with Bomarc B missiles?

Mr. Pearkes: It is contemplated and there are funds available in the appropriation to equip a number of those stations. I am not saying all because three are already operative. The sum of $2,230 million has already been allocated by the United States for this program.

Mr. Pearson: How much of that has been spent?

Mr. Pearkes: As the Leader of the Opposition knows perfectly well, the funds do not go back to the general treasury once they have been voted. There are hundreds of millions of dollars still left in that appropriation for them to develop the program. It is quite wrong to think that $50 million is the only money available. There has been a reduction in order to make more money available for the powers of retaliation. There has been a reduction from $421 million, which was in the original plan drawn up a year ago, to $50 million; but the money which is allocated for the Canadian stations and for other stations in the United States not yet under construction is already voted and available to the United States air force for that particular purpose.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister this question, because it is a very important aspect of the matter, and we have heard nothing about this previously. There is enough money presumably available, from the minister's reply, for the United States to complete its present Bomarc B program?

Mr. Pearkes: It depends—do not smirk and smile like that—it depends entirely on what the Leader of the Opposition means by the present program.

Mr. Pearson: There must be a program.

Mr. Pearkes: There is the present program which includes the whole 18 stations. There is a suggested change in that program not yet approved by congress. There is not enough money—if the amount is reduced to $50 million—to provide for all the original ones, but there is ample money to provide for the reduced number. The reduced number is 14 units.

Mr. Pearson: Some of which are A and some of which are B?

Mr. Pearkes: Some of which are A. At the present time there are three operational, and since there are no B's operational those three must be A's.

Mr. Pearson: We are now getting our defence policy.

Mr. Nesbitt: The Leader of the Opposition has to have it explained.

Mr. Pearkes: There was an interruption and I have lost my trend of thought. I hope that has cleared up the situation. I repeat, up to June of 1960—and, remember, the United States fiscal year starts on July 1—$2,230 million has been allocated to the Bomarc program and Bomarc only; it has nothing to do with SAGE; it has nothing to do with gap fillers. Let me make that quite clear. Do not get confused about other things as you have been confused about the costs of the Canadian Bomarc.

Mr. Pearson: How much of that has been spent already?

Mr. Pearkes: I have not be actual figures. I tried during the debate to get the actual figures. All I can state at the moment is that there are hundreds of millions of dollars not yet spent; that is all they could tell me at the time. I should think that is adequate.

I think I have shown clearly that this is not a useless weapon. This is part of the essential defence of the North American continent. Of course, all weapons are useless perhaps, if they are not used in defence, unless you recognize the fact that they are useful in that they do deter the enemy from going to war. Withdraw those Bomarcs, ruin that chain of defence and then you have left the continent wide open and there would not be a deterrent to the Russian bombers which we know are in the Russian air force today. If we can maintain peace for the next five years, then you may say quite definitely that this has been a most useful weapon and that it has played a very prominent part in the power of retaliation, the power of the deterrent to deter the enemy from attacking this continent with bombers.

You have asked me about the effectiveness of the Bomarc B. Hon. members opposite, with one exception, have almost been rejoicing in the failures that there have been of this weapon.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearkes: They have given every indication that they were pleased that this weapon, in which I have said I have confidence, had again failed. It has failed seven times.

Mr. Pearson: Why shouldn't we mention it, then?

Mr. Pearkes: It is not merely the mention of it, but it is the pleasure which has been shown on your faces when you have mentioned it.

Mr. Pearson: Another form of closure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: We must not even talk about these things; cannot speak about anything.

Mr. Speaker: Order; the Minister of National Defence has the floor.

Mr. Pearkes: These tests of the Bomarc B have been carried out. Those who are connected with it, the officials who have watched these tests, the officials of the company, the officials of the department of defence of the United States, have repeatedly stated, and only as recently as today, that they have confidence in the ultimate success of this weapon. When you come to think of it, you are trying to devise a weapon which has to hit another very small target which is travelling well over 500 miles an hour and at a distance of 400 miles away. That is not an easy thing for anybody to develop.

This Bomarc B is based on the same principle as the Bomarc A. The Bomarc A, within the limits of its range, has proved to be a successful weapon.

Mr. Pearson: Two hundred miles.

Mr. Pearkes: This is doubling that range, but the basis is the same. I have confidence that this weapon will be developed, based upon the information and the statements that I have received. I feel that we should go on with our small share in the preparation for receiving these weapons. The instruments of the Bomarc B's, with their launching pads, when placed at our disposal, will have cost the United States and Canada somewhere in the neighbourhood of $91 million. We are contributing somewhere about $15 million in order to provide the housing and structures for these weapons. Some of the equipment has already been ordered. At the present time one of the sites is being cleared of the brush and the approach road is under construction. It is suggested that we should cancel that because some members opposite have lost faith in this weapon. I have not lost faith in the Bomarc B. I think we should continue with the construction work. We are expecting to hear that further tests have been carried out in the not too distant future. But the principle is sound and the United States have confidence in it.

I say that I welcome the motion which has called for the adjournment of the house because I have had an opportunity, for the first time, to show what our defence policy is. I have had an opportunity of replying to a number of incorrect statements which have been made by hon. members opposite giving a false impression to the people of this country. I have given hon. members information. I have held nothing back. I think any reasonable person can see that we have had every opportunity of consulting with our allies; that they have listened to our recommendations in many cases. We are constantly in touch with them, and I think I have shown clearly that the Bomarc is an essential weapon in our mutual efforts to deter the outbreak of war. We are going to stand by the agreement we have made with our allies. We have entered into an agreement for the development of these Bomarc stations, and we are not going to scrap that sacred agreement with our allies and give up just because somebody says there is a possibility that the Bomarc B may not be successful.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the house has listened with great interest to the speech of the honourable and gallant gentleman, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes). This is the 28th day of March and today marks the first statement that the Minister of National Defence has made in this house since the opening of this session, except for replies he has made to the questions which have been asked him from time to time. If the action taken by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) today serves no other purpose, it will serve the constructive purpose of having encouraged the Minister of National Defence to make at least one report this session on some aspects of defence policy.

It must not be forgotten that the minister with an associate minister is the head of a department that is responsible for a larger expenditure of public money than any other department of government. It is, perhaps, for the minister at some other time to explain why he has only now taken advantage of the opportunity, in the light of the importance of national defence both in terms of international application and of the national budget, to explain to the house some of the matters that he regards as vital to the security of the nation and to the unity of Canada's associated states in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

It is amazing, however, to think that the minister should have used this opportunity of debate to say what the Leader of the Opposition had been denied the opportunity of saying in laying the foundation for his motion. How desirable it would have been if a defence committee had been set up along the lines suggested by him in which it would have been possible for members representing the various parties of this house to explore problems that are in the public mind but which, at this time, remain unanswered.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of National Defence has just finished a speech three quarters of which was devoted to defence policy. That opportunity was denied the Leader of the Opposition and pursuant to the policy of closure being followed by the government I am now being called upon not to make any comments on the remarks made by the Minister of National Defence. The Minister of National Defence discussed the particular issue only in the first ten minutes of his speech and in the last 15 minutes. The body of his speech had to do with defence policy which the Leader of the Opposition was not permitted to discuss.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I remind the hon. member for Essex East that if he had a point of order to raise and wished to object to the course followed by the Minister of National Defence, the time to do it was when he was transgressing.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am not raising a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The point of order is being raised by hon. gentlemen who now want to deny to the opposition a right which the opposition did not deny to the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know the Prime Minister does not like this. He was the one who objected to what the Leader of the Opposition said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I particularly enjoy hearing the hon. gentleman discuss defence and I want him to have the opportunity of touching those peaks he normally touches when he knows little about a subject.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Once again, Mr. Speaker, we have the Prime Minister of this country upholding the great dignity of his office by making observations which, under our tradition, normally would be made only by one who sat in the last seat in the last row. The Prime Minister, of course, has such a high regard for the exposition of all the facts that it pleases him now and then to descend from his high office and to make such constructive observations as the one with which he has now delighted his followers. That procedure, of course, makes the Prime Minister a great parliamentarian.

I am sure the Minister of National Defence will regret having said that we on this side of the house rejoice in the failure of the Bomarc. That is a statement which I am sure the Minister of National Defence, on reflection, will want to withdraw. He knows perfectly well that it is the duty of an opposition to expose the weaknesses of the administration as it sees them. He knows that it is the duty of the opposition to discuss matters which it believes require attention by the administration. I should have thought that the hon. and gallant gentleman would welcome the opportunity to have this particular debate and that, while he might not agree with what hon. gentlemen in the opposition said, he might at least have attributed to them the sincerity of purpose which he expects—and rightly so—and which every hon. member in this house attributes to him. However, I let the statement of the Minister of National Defence speak for itself.

We are not rejoicing at these failures. We are sharing with the people of Canada generally at this time concern and disquietude over this particular matter and particularly over the conduct of national defence by the hon. gentleman and his colleagues who comprise the present government of Canada. That concern is reflected not only in the attitude of the party on whose behalf I am speaking at the moment but is reflected elsewhere in the nation.

In his attitude at the outset of today's deliberations the Prime Minister revealed the concern which he recognized is felt not only by members of this house but by people throughout the country generally because he did not give the Leader of the Opposition time to finish his argument but said, "We accept at once your proposal to discuss this particular matter of the Bomarc". The reason the Prime Minister did so was that, good politician that he is, he recognized the fact that all over this country since Friday last there has arisen a question mark about this government's defence policy. That is the reason why the Prime Minister readily accepted the suggestion that debate on the matter now under discussion should be provided for under the procedure of moving the adjournment of the house.

Addressing himself to the question of consultation, which is one of the main arguments adduced by those of us in this party against the government at this time, the Minister of National Defence outlined the whole mechanism of consultation which theoretically exists between the United States and Canada in matters of military affairs. No one denies that this set-up on paper presents an extremely complete picture. But the question at issue is whether or not, in this instance, the processes of consultation were operative; whether or not in the particular instance—altogether apart from the occasions or the instruments for consultation—they were in fact used; whether or not in fact the minister really was informed of the important events that were taking place in the United States.

As an example of the consultation that exists, the minister stated that he knew what was the total amount of moneys originally voted by the United States for this Bomarc program. Yet when asked by the Leader of the Opposition what was the total expenditure made to date out of the moneys voted the Minister of National Defence was not able to give a definite reply. If the consultation with the United States is as efficient as the Minister of National Defence says it is, surely it would not have taken very long for the Minister of National Defence, in preparing his material for today, to have ascertained from the United States how much money has already been spent out of the moneys voted in the United States for the Bomarc program. We would then be in a position to determine whether or not the argument made by the Minister of National Defence with regard to the future use of the Bomarc was deserving of the validity suggested by the Minister of National Defence.

I refer the house to a statement made by the Prime Minister when he spoke on February 20, 1959 in this house. That was on the occasion of the abandonment of the CF-105. As reported at page 1222 of Hansard of that year the Prime Minister stated as follows:

> Having regard to the information and advice we have received, however, there is no other feasible or justifiable course open to us. We must not abdicate our responsibility to assure that the huge sums which it is our duty to ask parliament to provide for defence are being expended in the most effective way to achieve that purpose.

Those were wise words.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What page was that?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Page 1222. Those were words which the Prime Minister and the members of the government ought to apply to the present situation, namely:

> We must not abdicate our responsibility to assure that the huge sums which it is our duty to ask parliament to provide for defence are being expended in the most effective way to achieve that purpose.

Whether or not one accepts the argument made by the Minister of National Defence, no one will deny that as a result of the incidents on Friday last a prima facie case at least was established for questioning whether or not, in the particular context, public moneys were being properly used for the purpose intended.

In the same debate, as reported at page 1224 of Hansard of that year, the Leader of the Opposition stated as follows:

> Surely if we are going to make this change from an interceptor developed and built in Canada to a missile developed and built in the United States, then we must be confident in our own minds—all of us who have an obligation in parliament in this matter—that this change is going to increase our defence capacity.

In the light of the events which now confront us, how wise these words of the Leader of the Opposition were.

> The principle which the Prime Minister has enunciated in his statement and which should guide not only Canadian but United States policy in this matter is the principle of the pooling of our resources continentally and on an Atlantic basis for collective defence. Surely that does not mean that Canada is to be asked to take part in collective continental defence in so far as planning and operation are concerned but not in so far as the development of resources and industrial capacity are concerned.

The important part of the statement of the Leader of the Opposition is that we have an obligation to make sure that this change is going to increase our defensive capacity.

Now, do events as they were unfolded on Friday and as told to us today by the Minister of National Defence meet the requirements laid down in these remarks of a year ago by the Leader of the Opposition? It is clear, Mr. Speaker, whether the minister agrees or not, that from the events of Friday last there is every justification for questioning the consultation that has prevailed between the United States and Canada in this matter. All we have to do is to review the incidents of Friday last in order to see how justified this statement is and how warranted are the fears of journalists in our newspapers who have expressed editorial opinion, as well as the remarks of commentators through other instruments of dissemination of opinion. Not only in this parliament but throughout the country it is clear that there is an uncertainty in the public mind as to whether Canada, a loyal ally; one that has paid its own way and has been co-operative in its relations with the United States and as a member of NATO; one that has been treated as an equal partner or, in this particular instance, as a satellite, not receiving from her partner the kind of co-operation and consultation expected between two nations equal in function if not in power.

The incidents of last Friday speak for themselves. In the morning the Minister of National Defence expressed doubt about the Washington reports that the United States had practically stopped the development of the Bomarc anti-aircraft missile. Is there any doubt that that was the result of the observations of the Minister of National Defence, that he did express grave doubt as to whether or not these reports which have been referred to were in fact warranted or true? Seven hours later—Hansard is there as a record—the minister rose in his place and read a statement from the United States defence department to the effect that that department and the government of which it is a department was cancelling most of the Bomarc program.

Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition has commented on the fact that the minister read in this house a statement prepared by the information service of the United States department of defence. If we had had the kind of consultation with the United States that the minister argued a few moments ago existed, surely it would have been possible to have had sufficient notice to enable the minister's officials to prepare a statement, in accordance with our traditions, which would have at least expressed the government's opinion on a paper which would have come from this House of Commons or from the Department of National Defence. The reason why the Minister of National Defence used a statement from the United States defence information services was because there was not time, I would suggest, for the minister to make the kind of changes—I do not mean changing words—which would put the statement in a form which would have satisfied the dignity of this country, an equal partner; if not in function at least in status, with the United States in these matters.

Mr. Pearkes: May I ask the hon. member a question. Could he inform me at what time this leaked out?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I could not give the minister the time.

Mr. Pearkes: Perhaps you had some advance notice that there was going to be a leak and I did not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister is in touch with the United States continually and did not need time. He could have done precisely what I said, but for some reason or another the instruments of consultation between the two departments of government have not functioned in this matter, and it is clear not only from the incidents of last Friday but from other incidents during the course of the last six months that the minister and his opposite number and their respective departments have not had the kind of consultation desired.

Mr. Pearkes: Name one.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As a matter of fact, in a matter of this sort why is the medium of consultation not between the Department of External Affairs and the state department? Usually in matters involving the relations of our two friendly states the medium of communication is between the state department and I suggest should be in this instance, as far as Canada is concerned, the Department of External Affairs. But the fact is that if we had not insisted as we did on Friday we would not have had the statement from the minister that we did ultimately receive.

Mr. Pearkes: You cannot substantiate that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister says nonsense. That is his conclusion and I am giving him my interpretation after witnessing the incidents of Friday last. It is clear, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of National Defence was kept in ignorance of the decision of the United States defence department concerning the Bomarc, and I say that is a reflection upon our country and on the kind of partnership which should prevail between this country and our neighbour, particularly in matters of such great importance as this. I think it is quite clear that the United States still intends, and if I am wrong the minister will say so—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey), who usually takes matters so seriously—

Mr. Grafftey: I could not take that seriously.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —I am sure on reflection will not want to be referred to as one having expressed laughter in respect of a matter which now so agitates the people of Canada.

Mr. Grafftey: On a question of privilege, I did express laughter on that last remark.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is also evident that the United States still intends to send to Canada a weapon which the United States now feels is too inefficient for use in its own defence.

Mr. Pearkes: You have asked me to reply to that. It is completely and utterly false.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister says I am wrong, but I can only say that we will find out whether the assurance of the minister today will be borne out by events tomorrow. We have had many assurances from the minister and subsequent events have shown that his optimism was not confirmed.

In any event, if it had not been for the Leader of the Opposition today it would not have been possible for us to have received from the Minister of National Defence an enunciation of policy on this very important matter. We would have again have been treated to a policy of silence or a policy of announcements over the radio, rather than giving this house an opportunity to confront the minister in a friendly manner which is characteristic of this chamber. We would not have had the opportunity of having statements made by the government and having these examined by the Leader of the Opposition and by the house generally in order to arrive at an understanding as to what is the situation. Had it not been for this debate we would not have had some of the elucidations which have come to us this afternoon.

I repeat, to use a United States release instead of a Canadian release, instead of an assessment based upon an appreciation by the government of Canada, was in itself significant. It would be interesting to know whether there was a meeting of the cabinet on Friday last which dealt with the important developments which ensued between the time the minister first spoke on Friday morning and when he made his statement at 5.45 p.m. on the same day, because some of the things the minister said in his statement involved matters of government policy, matters that can only be determined by the cabinet collectively, not on the basis of the view of one minister, even though that minister might be the minister in charge of the department concerned.

The minister said there was no snap decision made on Friday in the United States. If that is the case, why did he express confidence on Friday at 11.30 a.m. and then make a statement later in the day which sought to explain his earlier reaction to the situation? If the minister—and I respect him for this, and the house will respect him for it—was anxious to keep an undertaking made with a friendly government, that is understandable; but surely the parliament of the nation is not to be treated as though it were composed of officials of the department. Surely it would have been possible for the minister to have said: certain circumstances have arisen, and I would ask that at this time that we proceed with some other matter, and I tell the house on my authority as a minister that I will make an important statement on Monday. Surely it would have been possible for the minister to have taken a course of that kind. Instead, he chose a course which has caused lack of confidence, a course which has caused confusion and which has caused uncertainty. I say also, with some justification because of the evidence which is now about us, that it was a course which caused much disquiet in the country with regard to the government's defence policy.

What is the situation in the United States? Is there any doubt in that country as to whether the government of the United States will see to it that the Bomarc B missile will ever be introduced into the United States system, though plans do continue to provide Canada with two squadrons for use at North Bay and Mont Laurier? It would be interesting to know whether it was Canada's idea or the idea of the United States to go ahead with the Canadian sites. That question has never been dealt with by the minister. As far as I can recall, we do not know whose decision it was, and this matter has never been mentioned by the Minister of National Defence.

In the light of the developments of the last few days, the question takes on an added importance. The minister said, if I understood him correctly, that we are not reviewing the efficiency of the Bomarc at all. Yet I see that according to the Winnipeg Free Press of March 25, Dr. Herbert F. York, chief of the United States defence department research, told senators that the Bomarc program was undergoing critical review because of a series of test failures. We have never been told that it was undergoing a critical review. We have been told that the minister has confidence in the ultimate success of this weapon.

Last Friday the minister told us he has confidence in the Bomarc. The minister may have confidence, but what value is that confidence in the light of a statement made by a man who is closely connected with research production in the United States—Dr. Herbert F. York, chief of the United States defence department research division—who must be regarded as a man of great authority in the field and who, I repeat, told the senators of the United States that the Bomarc program is undergoing critical review. Yet the minister says he has great confidence in this particular project.

I hope the minister's confidence is well placed, but we are challenging in this deliberative assembly the basis of that confidence. We are not challenging the integrity or the capacity of the minister. We are challenging something which is of the very essence of our defence at this time, something which is going to cost the Canadian people a great deal of money. Because this is so, and because we are an equal partner with the United States under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, we are asking that we should be consulted by that country and by its department of defence as an equal, just as I am sure we would, unhesitatingly, if the shoe were on the other foot, see that our partner was fully advised of whatever courses we were taking.

The minister questioned the statement of the Leader of the Opposition with regard to the figure of $125 million. I am glad that he withdrew the allegation of lack of veracity with which he allowed his remarks to be associated. But there was justification for what the Leader of the Opposition said. The Leader of the Opposition has referred to Hansard at page 925, to a question asked by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) and the reply of the minister. If there was any misunderstanding, that misunderstanding has been copied by those who report the proceedings of this house. I have before me the Ottawa Journal of February 1 containing an article by the Canadian Press staff writer, Dave McIntosh, a responsible writer on these matters and a man in close touch with national defence. He wrote:

> Canada's contribution to the total cost of the Canadian Bomarc-SAGE program has been estimated at $125 million.

Again, the Montreal Gazette, in today's paper, said in an editorial:

> Of this sum the United States will pay two thirds. This leaves Canada with a bill for $125 million.

Then Mr. Harold Greer, writing on February 2, in the Toronto Globe and Mail said:

> Some $10 million has reportedly been spent on the two bases so far and another $20 million will be spent in the coming fiscal year. Canada's overall investment in the Bomarc program is expected to be around $125 million.

Mr. Pearkes: You believe that rather than what I said in the house?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The point I am making, and the minister has obviously misunderstood it, is that there was justification for the interpretation given by my hon. friend.

An hon. Member: No, there was not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member, who no doubt is well informed on these matters, said there was not. If the Leader of the Opposition is wrong, then Hansard is wrong, the reporter for the Globe and Mail is wrong, the Montreal Gazette is wrong everybody is out of step but the minister. The government, with its great majority, obviously does not like to be caught out on a limb as it has been with regard to this matter.

This matter could have been dealt with effectively if the request made by the Leader of the Opposition for a defence committee had been accepted. At a time when, as the minister says, the intercontinental ballistic missile has provided many transformations in the defence policies of the countries concerned it would have been very helpful if the government had accepted the proposal for the setting up of such a committee so that the minister could have given the kind of statement he has made today and proper precautions for security could have been taken in the circumstances when necessary. There could have been a real examination made of the total defence program of Canada in light of the changes that are being made in the United Kingdom, France and the United States.

We are now face to face with disarmament discussions. The Soviet union is prepared, it says, to reduce its conventional forces down to very low levels. The United States have contemplated reductions in conventional forces, too, and countries like Canada, France and the United Kingdom will be expected to play their part if such a program is arrived at which, of course, we all will do. These steps are now being taken by the Soviet union in my judgment not only because they want to see a comprehensive system of disarmament but because the very strategy of modern war has changed. The new instruments of human destruction now make unnecessary the great expenditures of money that are now being expended in many avenues of defence effort. It would be worth while for us to know in what particular areas of our own national defence these reductions could, consistent with security, take place.

That kind of question and the question that is before us today could have been searchingly examined in a defence committee and we would not be faced—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member keeps coming back to the subject of the defence committee. The house has already disposed of that matter and it is quite improper, as it was for the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), to repeat the argument raised at that time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I regret that you say it is improper, but if you say it is I accept your view. I ask you, however, to remember that the Minister of National Defence discussed the whole question of national defence policy much more generally than I have done.

I now incorporate as part of my own speech two paragraphs from an editorial which appeared in this morning's Globe and Mail which I think characterizes this situation, this debate and the concern of the country at this time:

> The relationship between Canada and the United States is of great interest abroad. While Canada, a relatively weak country, remains a free and independent ally of her mighty neighbour, an ally treated with dignity and respect, Canada presents convincing evidence of United States integrity, of United States good intentions in the world. But if the United States shows any inclination to treat Canada as a satellite, United States integrity will soon be doubted and its good intentions sharply questioned.
> There is no doubt that Canada has been treated shabbily in the matter of the Bomarc. This fact must be drawn to United States attention in no uncertain manner.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to traverse the ground covered by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes). After all, sir, you will have noted in the very fine contribution made by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) that it was obvious that the explanation given by the Minister of National Defence satisfied him for all through his remarks ran the thread that if only this explanation had been given before there would have been no necessity for this debate today.

I wish to point out with great respect, Mr. Speaker, and in no way bringing Your Honour into the debate, that on Friday last after the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) had made rather lengthy speeches on the matter, the Minister of National Defence, as reported at page 2490 of Hansard, rose and said:

> Mr. Speaker, may I just answer a couple of questions?

In reply to this Your Honour stated:

> In view of the time, and in view of the usual practice with statements, where comment is permitted but not debate, although the hon. member for Assiniboia perhaps strayed from that in his comment, I think it would be inappropriate to continue the discussion.

I believe it is obvious from the record that the minister would have answered as he answered today had the rules according to Your Honour's interpretation—and I am not disagreeing with that in any way—not being applied as strictly as they were.

Mr. Pearson: Ten after six.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am very glad that we have had the opportunity of having this discussion today. Indeed, if Your Honour had taken a side glance at the Leader of the Opposition, and the hon. member for Essex East, and had noticed their reaction when I unreservedly accepted this motion to adjourn you would have realized that hon. gentlemen opposite had not expected that we were waiting for just this opportunity.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: You had months to do it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, Mr. Speaker, it is amazing how their consciences prick them at this moment. Otherwise they would not be interrupting. If you could have seen their faces when the motion was accepted you would have realized that it was one of the greatest surprises they ever had. My colleagues and I had been wondering whether or not they would provide this opportunity by such a motion, we did not expect that strategically they would have done so. I want to thank them immediately for having provided this forum, and this opportunity to answer the kind of thing which they have so sedulously and wrongly advanced since Friday.

When you analyse everything that has been said here today you realize the fact that the Liberal party is opposed to a continental defence policy for North America. They are opposed to it because it implies a non-acceptable excessive dependence on the United States.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That, of course, is not a fact.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Both the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Essex East say that is not so. Let me read from a speech delivered by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) on March 26, 1960, as reported by the national Liberal federation of Canada:

> Mr. Chevrier said the Liberal party was opposed to a continental defence policy because it implies a "non-acceptable" excessive dependence on the United States.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not the same thing at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member for Laurier then went on to say:

> —our defence policy should be one of fuller integration within NATO.

Their attitude from the beginning has been one of opposition to the geographical necessity that requires Canada to be joined with the United States in continental defence. I join with the hon. member for Essex East in abhorring any thought that this means being a satellite. It does not mean being a satellite, nor does it involve any sense of dependence on the United States to a degree that would render us in any way subservient. It means two equals joined together as we are, we in Canada requiring for our preservation and the protection of our life itself, close integration in defence with the United States. Any other policy would be dangerous to the future of Canada and the preservation of freedom.

When they speak about the necessity of the fullest consultation one has only to read the references made by various leaders in the United States and in Canada who have recognized the fact that the days of our subservience ended in June of 1957, and the days of consultation began. They talk about consultation. Have they forgotten that they spent some $400 million on the CF-105?

Mr. Pearson: At least it could fly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And they made no arrangement whatever with the United States to make purchases of any of those aircraft when produced when they realized that unless they could Canada could not possibly produce the aircraft at a reasonable or economic price. When they speak of consultation, when the hon. member says that the Department of the Secretary of State for External Affairs should have interested itself in this regard I recall to his mind this fact. When he and the present head of Rio Tinto, Robert Winters, were ministers of the former government an agreement was entered into with the United States for uranium, which cut off in 1962.

Mr. Hellyer: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It secured nothing for Canada on the conclusion of the contract except the expression of a hope rather than anything of certainty, or anything that should lead Canadians as a whole to feel that Canada's interest was going to be protected.

Consultation there was. Consultation there will be as between our two countries on the basis of equality.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the Prime Minister permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, I will be glad to have a question from the hon. member.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the Prime Minister tell us about the consultation which has taken place over the uranium business since he came into office?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will be glad to deal with that at any time. As a matter of fact, consultation was more or less continuous. Representations were made from time to time, and strongly, but we had pointed out to us the fact that the Canadian government had entered into an agreement without there being any provision for the future. Having regard to the surplus which had been built up in the United States, it could not be expected that the United States would continue to pile up a surplus for the future.

Mr. Pearson: One letter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Let me just deal with the two matters. First of all, there is consultation. I think this has been covered admirably by the Minister of National Defence. Second, there were all the observations made over the weekend about dead ducks, the end of the Bomarc, the reduction from $451 million to $50 million this year by the United States. All of that was explained by the minister today as clearly and as definitely as it could be explained.

He pointed out that the numbers of the stations have been reduced from 18 to 14, including the two in Canada, beginning at the head of the lakes and thence taking in the concentration of industry, particularly in Ontario and Quebec, and along the Atlantic seaboard, Halifax and Saint John; thence to New York, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Detroit and that area. All of those areas are encompassed in the new plan which followed from the discussions and consultations.

When the Leader of the Opposition mentioned today that the whole thing had been ditched—I am not sure that was his word—he had heard the minister explaining the facts on Friday, explaining the change that had been made. He knew the actual facts when he was speaking today, as a result of having heard the Minister of National Defence on Friday and yet, in the face of that, he moved the motion which reads as follows:

—the lack of adequate consultation between Canada and the United States—

I have dealt with that. I continue:

—the basic change made by the government of the United States in continental air defence policy—

It is not a basic change; it is an amendment to meet changing conditions.

Since 1945 Canada has spent $20 billion on defence. How many times have we had to change during that period of time? Khrushchev does not send messages to us in advance to tell us what he is going to do. It becomes necessary to have a flexible policy to meet changed and changing conditions.

Today we and the United States are joined in this regard in the Bomarc. In addition to that, the United States is going in for the most tremendous expenditure on ICBM's. Is there anybody in this house who will say that Canada should join in that? Is there anyone in this house who will say that Canada, in order to assert herself in the matter of defence, should enter into a field of expenditure which will run into billions and tens of billions of dollars before it is achieved? We have, within the limitations of the population of this country, done those things which we believe, as a result of consultation with the United States, represent a true measure of defence.

The same sort of arguments take place in the United States committees. The opposition says the United States is not prepared. It speaks of missile gaps and the frightful danger that the United States is in. Read the debates in the British house of commons. See what the leader of the opposition said there. He used almost the same words as the Leader of the Opposition used here today.

Mr. Pearson: They have debates over there.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If it were not for the fact that I am sure the Leader of the Opposition is not a plagiarist I would say that both he and the leader of the opposition in the United Kingdom have a fondness for the same exaggerated words.

We welcome the opportunity of meeting the arguments that were raised today. I thank the hon. member for Essex East. I believe that this is what parliament is for. I want to see the opposition discharging its responsibilities to the full.

Mr. Pearson: Give us a committee, then.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Let me say that when I hear my hon. friend talking about closure—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, a committee.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They talk about closure, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pearson: More diversion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Closure is one word that is written on their hearts. As history shows the word "Calais" was written on the heart of Mary, so they find "closure" written on their hearts. There will never be closure applied in this house as long as this government is in power.

We thank them for having brought up this motion, for having given the opportunity to the Minister of National Defence to make a full and complete answer, I appropriate the words and sentiments of the hon. member for Essex East, "If we had known this the motion for adjournment would not have been necessary".

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, when the house took recess at six o'clock the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) had just concluded an extraordinary intervention in this debate. It is mainly with the points that were raised by the Prime Minister that I wish now to deal. The Prime Minister began by saying that the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) had been quite satisfied with the explanation given by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes), and that if the minister had had an opportunity, which the Prime Minister rather insinuated he had not been given, to give on Friday the explanation which he gave today there would have been no occasion for this debate. I can assure you, sir, so far as I am concerned, and I have consulted my hon. friend and he has authorized me to speak for him, and I think so far as the whole opposition is concerned, we are not at all satisfied with the explanation given by the Minister of National Defence.

The explanation given by the Minister of National Defence, if it had been given on Friday, as it should have been given and as I think I can show it could have been given, would undoubtedly have changed the character of the intervention made today by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). We would have been in possession at least of the point of view of the government. I do not know that we would have been in possession of any more facts, but we would have known the point of view of the government instead of it being a mystery to us and to the country, and we would at least have had some information as to the basis on which they were clinging like leeches to this extraordinary weapon with which no one else seems any longer to wish to be associated.

But the other thing which seemed to me was very extraordinary—extraordinary for any prime minister in the history of this country but not perhaps so extraordinary in the case of the present Prime Minister—was the way the Prime Minister began his intervention this afternoon. He began it, characteristically, by a personal reference to the motives of those who were moving the motion, who were putting it forward. This is the usual way in which the Prime Minister seeks at all times to elevate the tone of debate in this parliament. It does seem to me, sir, that this kind of intervention in a matter so serious as this is unworthy of the head of the government of this country.

Here we are talking about a matter that concerns our very lives, and all the Prime Minister can do is bring the debate down to the level of petty politics, which he does on almost every occasion in which he intervenes in a debate in this house. The Prime Minister's intervention, had we cared to bring it up, was against the rules of the house. He was imputing motives to other hon. members which, I may say, is the main line of argument used by the Prime Minister at all times. I think it is about time some protest was made about this and I do not hesitate, sir, to make it right here and now.

I have no intention whatever of emulating the Prime Minister in this kind of debate. I intend to talk about the motion before the house which, incidentally, the Prime Minister hardly mentioned. Before doing so, I do intend to repudiate, and repudiate utterly on my own behalf—I think I can speak on behalf of our party—any implication that hon. gentlemen opposite have any monopoly of concern for the defence of this country. As a matter of fact, there has not been one effective, constructive thing done by Canada for the defence of this continent since hon. gentlemen began to occupy the treasury benches. The only accomplishment they have to their credit, and they can have all the credit they can get out of it, is the destruction of the Arrow; that is all they have done. This has been their whole defence policy up to now, apart from clinging like leeches to this weapon of very dubious ancestry and of even more dubious performance.

The Prime Minister also told us that subservience had ended in 1957. I have never been able to appreciate what the subservience was before 1957—

Mr. Bigg: Read your history.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have written more history than the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Bigg) could ever learn if he sat here for over half a century. All the hon. gentleman from Athabasca does is to make interventions and comparatively obscure murmurings behind the backs of hon. gentlemen who speak. He never dares to get up and face anybody in this house, and I do not think he ever will.

I was saying that I can remember no example of any kind of subservience whatever in the days before 1957, and I certainly can remember no occasion when any minister of national defence, or anyone else who occupied the treasury benches before June 21, 1957 got up in this house, to which every minister is responsible, and said, "I could not tell you because it was a secret that had to be kept for the United States." That, sir, is the essence of this whole thing.

Mr. Pearkes: Have you no honour?

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, yes, I have honour, and I know who elected me, too. I am going to tell the minister something about responsible government. The minister was elected and the government was elected to represent the people of Canada, not the people of the United States. The minister came in here and said, that the Americans had told congress they were going to change the defence policy of their country but it was a secret and, although we are partners, the Canadian parliament had no right to be told; that is what he told us and that is his whole defence. He said, I knew all the time; they told me, but they said, keep it a secret. We are going to tell congress, but you must not tell your parliament. This is the kind of partnership these gentlemen who are not subservient enter into; that is their idea of equality.

I tell you that since 1867 no more abject example of colonialism has ever been displayed in this country than was displayed this afternoon by the Minister of National Defence. Nobody who knows anything—

An hon. Member: Put your hands in your pockets.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was saying, Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted by a murmur in the house, that anybody who knows anything about politics in the United States, knows this.

An hon. Member: Read some history.

Mr. Pickersgill: He knows that when a proposal to change the defence policy of that country is made to congress, it is going to appear in the New York Times and practically every other newspaper the next morning. If the hon. gentleman knew—as he said he did on Friday; and I believe him, of course; I have not any doubt that is true —that the United States defence department had proposed a change in the policy with respect to the Bomarc and had proposed this change to congress, he ought to have known—or he ought not to have been in his present portfolio if he did not know this—that it would appear in the newspapers. He therefore should have been prepared to deal with that matter here in this house.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that when this extremely important decision was taken by the United States defence department to cut what they were asking for in respect of the Bomarc from $421 million to $50 million; the moment the minister was told that he should have said, "You are going to tell that to congress; therefore on the basis of partnership and on the basis of equality I shall be obliged to tell it to my parliament". Incidentally if we had the defence committee which we ought to have the committee would have been there to which to tell it. But we did not have it. If we are partners and if there is any equality, the moment congress was going to be told about it, we should have been told about it here in this house.

Mr. Pearkes: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister may ask me any questions he likes to ask when I have finished.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: We listened patiently this afternoon to the minister digressing all over the lot. I am going to speak very briefly precisely on the point. When I have finished I shall be extremely happy to answer any questions the minister chooses to ask.

As I was saying, the moment the minister was told that a fundamental change in policy was going to be proposed by the defence department of the United States he ought to have known, from his experience, that the proposal would be public within 24 hours. He ought to have been prepared for that event. They ought to have had an agreed statement worked out beforehand and an agreed technique in case there was a leak, because there always are leaks. If that had happened, when my friend the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) raised this matter on Friday morning the minister would have been able to rise in his place, as he should have been able to do, and give the explanation he gave this afternoon.

This parliament is entitled to nothing less than that. If these things are going to be told to congress, we are entitled to be told about them here. But we were not told. We were told that it was speculative, that there was a leak and things of that sort. The minister now tells us he knew it was the policy of the department all the time but he was in honour bound not to tell. He was in honour bound not to tell what, for heaven's sake? Was he in honour bound not to tell us that in this joint program in which we are supposed to be equal partners the United States government was proposing great changes to their congress but this parliament was not to be told anything about it? That is the point. That is the real point.

If the minister had any sense of his obligations to this parliament and to the people of this country he would have said, "This is intolerable; I cannot agree to it; if you are going to change this policy I insist on being able to tell the people of my country and to tell my parliament". That is the nub of this whole thing. But the plain fact is that the policy with respect to Canada was changed—the minister told us that—not the Bomarc part but the SAGE part. We were told nothing about that. The Americans were told about it but we were not. It was in their statement. In other words, we got our orders from Washington. That is really what it amounts to.

Then even more extraordinary than that, it seems to me, was what the Prime Minister said to us this afternoon. He said the Leader of the Opposition had no business making the kind of motion he made. Why? Because the minister had gone on television and explained everything on television.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is a new conception of the rights of parliament from the great exponent, the great advocate, the man who is going to restore the rights of parliament. What do we get? We get the unemployment policy announced by the Prime Minister on television within two hours of the time when the debate ends. We get defence policy announced on television on a Sunday. That is a new conception of parliament. That is the restoration of the rights of parliament which the hon. gentleman promised the people in this country in 1957 and 1958.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that regardless of the merit of this question—and about the merits I do not pretend to be an expert at all and I am not going to speak about them—what I am saying is that in so far as the parliament of Canada is concerned, every right we have is being trampled in the dust. There is no better example of it than the example we had over this Bomarc question. Moreover, I say that it is intolerable to have our policy dictated to us over the telephone, to have the extraordinary situation we had on Friday morning where the minister speaks of speculation and rumour and then comes in at a quarter to six and says, "I have now orders from Washington; here they are; it is too late to debate them but here they are". Then there is such a commotion in the press over the week end that the Minister of National Defence gives an entirely different explanation over television and because that is done the Prime Minister says we have no right to raise the question in parliament.

Mr. Pallett: He did not say that at all and the hon. member knows it.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman can look at the Prime Minister's words. The Prime Minister said that the Leader of the Opposition should not have brought in this motion because he knew the facts already.

Mr. Pallett: Read his statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Peel, (Mr. Pallett), who never gets the point until it is repeated about three times, may look at the words of the Prime Minister if he wishes to do so and perhaps he will see that after all I am right and he is wrong.

Mr. Pallett: The hon. gentleman had better have a look at the speech tomorrow and see for himself what was said.

An hon. Member: What is the point?

Mr. Pickersgill: Someone says "What is the point?" The point is that we in this parliament are entitled, as soon as the United States congress gets it, to have a proper explanation of the joint policies of the two countries, if indeed they are joint policies. But nothing could be clearer to anybody who reads the editorial writers in papers like the Montreal Gazette and the Globe and Mail, which papers are not notoriously friendly to us but were once friendly to hon. gentlemen opposite—that they cannot find out anything about this matter except what they read in their news columns, it is not surprising that the rest of the Canadian people are puzzled. It also seems to me that that puzzlement, that confusion, that concern, that anxiety has not been assuaged at all by the explanation given by the Minister of National Defence. As for the purely political intervention of the Prime Minister, of course it did nothing to restore the dignity of parliament.

Mr. Pearkes: May I ask the hon. gentleman the question I wanted him to answer? Does the hon. gentleman know that the committee on appropriations has not yet reported to congress?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am glad the minister asked me that question because that is one of the points I wanted to make. This afternoon the minister said—I have a note of it here—said something about it being flexible; yes, he said it was not a fixed plan. Those were his exact words. It is beyond my comprehension what the minister means by that statement. When the defence department of the United States goes to congress and says—

Mr. Pearkes: They have not gone yet. That is the point.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister would allow me to reply. I am replying to his question. When they go and tell congress, "The defence department are suggesting that you cut this from $420 million to $50 million", does the minister really think that congress is going to force more money on them?

Mr. Pearkes: Quite possibly.

Mr. Pickersgill: If it is, let me ask the minister this. Does that mean that congress, not even the United States defence department but congress, is making our defence policy, because that is what the minister is saying? In other words, the minister says that a policy put forward by the defence department is of no particular validity but that the congress of the United States from now on will make the defence policy of Canada. I do not think many Canadians are going to regard that as the end of subservience.

Mr. Speakman: I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would answer a question for me?

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely.

Mr. Speakman: Would he tell the house how much of this reduction, about which he has made such a great thing, is coming out of the Canadian treasury?

Mr. Pickersgill: I said that I would answer the hon. gentleman's question, but perhaps I did him too much credit. I thought the question would be intelligible and capable of an answer.

Mr. Speakman: Just answer the question and do not make statements concerning my intelligence.

Mr. Pickersgill: I quite frankly confess that I did not understand the hon. gentleman's question but if it means what I think it means, that the reduction in the American appropriation affects the treasury of Canada, the answer is apparently not, but I think it should.

Mr. G. C. Fairfield (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised, although not too much, that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) has made a political attack on the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he is unavoidably absent. This is becoming somewhat of a habit as far as he is concerned. The Prime Minister has a lot of business to attend to and the hon. member probably expects him to be absent when he speaks because many of his speeches are in a political vein.

In his opening remarks the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate made one statement that I thought was very intelligent. He said that he did not know anything about the Bomarc and therefore he was not going to talk about it. That was one of his more intelligent statements.

An hon. Member: What was the other one?

Mr. Fairfield: The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) talked about limbs being cut off. When the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) wielded the axe I am sure that hon. members opposite were the ones who were sitting on the limb. The members of the opposition seem to be rather confused about policy generally in respect of defence. They have no constructive criticisms to offer. However, I fear that many of their remarks are accepted in all good faith by the Canadian people and there is serious objection to this, particularly in a debate concerning the Bomarc.

The opposition brought up the matter of consultation and the minister quite openly gave the reasons for the consultations and said that there definitely had been consultations. When the hon. member for Essex East was talking about the leak of information or where the information emanated from he was kind enough to point out to the Minister of National Defence how such a situation could be handled. It was very nice of him, an ex-minister now in the opposition, to do that since he probably has a great deal of experience in offering advice but I would not think with regard to defence policy particularly.

I do not know about consultations with Washington but with respect to NORAD but I do have some knowledge about the organization. I have friends who have served in it and have now come back to Canada. One thing they are worried about is the fact that, instigated by the opposition, there has been a great deal of talk in the House of Commons and throughout the country to the effect that Canada is losing its sovereignty to the United States. They say that the Americans connected with NORAD have become supersensitive on this point and that not only do they consult on all matters but that they also lean over backwards to accept the advice of Canadian defence personnel assigned to NORAD. Yet, financially speaking, our share of the operation is very small although our voice is very loud. This is something that the people of Canada do not know. From the speeches made by members of the opposition both in the house and outside the people of Canada have been led to expect a great deal less.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said that we had shown our abject subservience to the Americans with regard to the Bomarc. The minister explained how the leak occurred. The announcement was made by Washington at five p.m. and the minister made the announcement later. Does the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate think that the parliament and people of Canada should have been given this information before the people of the United States?

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): You would not allow one.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): You would not allow one.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman has done me the courtesy.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Give him the same courtesy.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was going to ask the hon. member whether he does not think that we in this parliament are entitled to the information as soon as it is given to a committee of the United States congress?

Mr. Fairfield: Not as soon as it is given to a committee or subcommittee of the United States congress, especially when it is sitting in camera. The hon. member expects that we should have the information before the United States congress gets it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not before; at the same time.

Mr. Fairfield: That is absolutely ridiculous. Of course, the opposition wants much of this confidential information made known to the Canadian people before the people of the United States get it. I think he is probably right that there should be a joint announcement but in this case in was almost impossible to do so because of the unfortunate leak that occurred. It was really a joint announcement in that the Minister of National Defence could not make the announcement before a quarter to six because of the time lag.

With regard to the Bomarc missile, I hope the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) will go over Hansard very carefully and try to correct the impression he has given the Canadian people that the Bomarc missile is of no use and that nothing is of any use against missiles. No one has claimed that the Bomarc is an anti-missile missile.

Mr. Pearson: Of course not.

Mr. Fairfield: The Leader of the Opposition left the impression that the Bomarc was a useless anti-missile missile. It was never claimed to be an anti-missile weapon at all.

The minister explained very carefully to the rather confused opposition about the Russian bombers and their increasing activity over the past two years. It is quite obvious to our observers that the Russian bombers are doing a great deal of training. Despite the fact that there is a gap in continental ballistic missiles, we still have the danger of the Russian bombers. We have in our armament a fairly good interceptor but, as the minister explained, we cannot estimate at what point the U.S.S.R. may be in possession of a supersonic bomber, and neither can the opposition unless they get a leak from the U.S.S.R. as well, and that might be possible. In these circumstances we are obliged to have some deterrent during the period of time which is available to us, and that will probably have to be the Bomarc ground-to-air missile.

There has been no change in our policy or in United States policy as far as the Bomarc is concerned. The opposition has made great play with regard to the reduction in expenditure from $421 million to $50 million. Though the minister explained the situation very carefully, his words did not seem to have reached or penetrated the minds of the opposition. The fact of the matter is that they have every confidence in this armament. Our policy, and everyone has known it for years, is defensive, and for this reason we do not take any large share in such a field as the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) referred to, perhaps inadvertently, when he stated that we should become full partners with the United States with respect to mutual deterrence.

Mr. Argue: I did not say that at all.

Mr. Fairfield: You had better read your Hansard. I listened very carefully to the hon. member and he said "mutual deterrence". That is beyond our means. That has been explained time and time again, and I am sure the hon. member for Assiniboia will make a proper correction. In the time gap of which I have spoken we shall still be in danger from Russia bombers. We must, therefore, be in possession of this line of defence, the 14 Bomarc units. If we drop the development of these units because of the anxieties felt by the opposition the idea would wrongly be raised in the minds of the Canadian people that we do not know what they are doing, but that the opposition does; that we are no longer capable of continuing to lead the country.

I should like to see any policy other than that advocated by the hon. member for Assiniboia who tried to speak on defence on television the other night, suggesting that no matter how much the government might go into the red we should give more money away to countries abroad.

As to the figure of $125 million, I am sure it was some sort of a mistake which arose in caucus between the two opposition groups. I remember that at one time, as announced in the press by one member of the C.C.F., it was stated that it was going to cost Canada $300 million. So the figure depends merely on how receptive the political audience is, and how many people are likely to question the figures. I do not know how often this matter has to be explained to the opposition. Perhaps in the defence committee the minister could take a blackboard and draw it and print it out in simple words. The opposition could be given copies, and then they might understand.

The minister has confidence in the Bomarc B. I have been told that the Bomarc A was tested 80 times, 82 times, in fact, before it finally became operational. There is no doubt, in my mind at least, that when there was this nonsense in the press that the Bomarc had failed it was repeated by the opposition with a great deal of relish, if not with rancour. Let us face this. The failings discovered by the research experts, despite Mr. York's remarks—he is only one of the defence experts concerned—are small failings which we are sure can soon be fixed, and this anti-aircraft missile will soon be operational.

My main worry about all this is how the Canadian people are going to take it. By their criticism and by the attitude they have taken the opposition are doing, I believe, unlimited harm. Most people do not go into these questions, except to read the headlines in the newspapers. They do not read the technical announcements which are made. A feeling of panic hits them, and they feel the situation is due to the weakness of government policy when, in fact, this is the first time we have had a policy of any fixed type for many years. If it is said that we have not done anything in the field of defence policy, I should like to remind the house of one thing, though it is probably not pertinent to this motion: What about civil defence? That, at least is receiving attention.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Fairfield: There was a certain amount of freedom allowed to the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). He did everything but tell us about the election in 1957.

I believe that in this to-do about the Bomarc bases we must face the fact that they are all part of a defensive line. If we abandon this project, the whole line is cracked. The United States would be forced to abandon it too, because it is the centre of the line, the part most important for ourselves and the United States. Unless we do our share we might just as well abrogate any agreements we have with the United States, including NORAD.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I suppose I, also, shall be condemned by hon. members on the government side because I have the temerity to say a few words about the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he is not here. However, I am afraid that if we have to wait until he is here before we can say anything which involves him, we shall need to keep silent for a great deal of the time we spend in this house. This is not a criticism of the Prime Minister, because I know he is a busy man, but it is a criticism of government supporters who are so touchy that if anyone says anything about the Prime Minister in his absence then, right away, we hear this nonsense: you would not say that if he were here, and so on.

Today, when the Prime Minister rose and so eagerly accepted the challenge of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) to debate this matter of the Bomarc, I am sure we were all hopeful that at last we would get a little common sense out of this very senseless defence program we have been trying to examine for the last number of months. But I am afraid the Canadian people will be just as disappointed as I was.

I remember occasions when the Prime Minister took three hours in which to say nothing in this house, but today he succeeded in doing so in just ten minutes. In the four sessions of parliament that I have attended I never heard him say nothing so convincingly as he said nothing today. The defence he offered for the actions of this government over the past week fell flat on its face. The greatest head of steam he could work up was when he said categorically that Canada and the United States were two equals joined together. I said in this house last week that the only link joining us with the United States is the link joining the tail to the kite, and it is quite apparent that there is no communication line in that link.

The first paragraph of the interesting lead editorial in this morning's Montreal Gazette reads as follows:

> The issue of the Bomarc B has produced almost complete confusion among the Canadian people. Rarely, in matters of defence, has the want of understanding between the government and the people become so wide. The practice of not taking the people fully and frankly into its confidence has left the government in a position where few Canadians understand what it is trying to do, or why it is trying to do it.

If the Prime Minister's speech today was designed to restore the confidence of the Canadian people in the defence policy of this government I would say his attempt was as big a failure as the Bomarc missile.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) also attempted to put up a defence today and I must confess I felt rather sorry for him although I felt even sorrier for the Canadian people. He was faced with an unhappy situation today and I might have skipped him altogether in my remarks. I listened to him carefully and his position seemed to me to be as hopeless as it was last Friday when he expressed his abiding confidence in the Bomarc B. I think we should rename it the BB because in terms of defence today it is just about as useful as a BB gun. Perhaps it will fly some day but as a defence weapon I think it is useless and fail to see how the minister can retain confidence in it. If it ever works, it is not even scheduled to become effective until 1964 which is four years from now. If we look at the happenings of the last three years it is no wonder that the Canadian people are confused at trying to find any sense in the present government's defence policy.

In the last two and a half years what have we seen? The missile-carrying Mark VI was scrapped because we had the Arrow. The Arrow was then scrapped because we had the Bomarc and now we see the Bomarc scrapped as well. I know that hon. gentlemen opposite will say it is not scrapped and that the sum of $50 million remains in the United States kitty for this project but I recall to the attention of hon. members opposite that we still had $40 million in the kitty when the Arrow was scrapped which was just enough to sweep out the empty shell where the Arrow used to be produced and the $50 million we have in the fund today would just about dust off the sites that have been abandoned.

The Minister of National Defence today failed to answer any questions to satisfy the Canadian people or ease the minds of the opposition. I will list just a few. I wish someone on the government side would explain why we have been given different figures representing the cost of these missile bases under the Bomarc program. We were first told that the United States was going to spend $72 million on these two sites in Canada and that Canada would contribute an additional $15 million, making a total of $87 million or a cost of $43.5 million for each site. Then we had an announcement by the minister on March 7 that there were to be 18 bases in the Bomarc line at a cost of $23.5 million each. Now he says the program has not been abandoned but just revised slightly. On March 25 we were told that there would be 14 bases at a cost of $3.5 million each. Is it any wonder that there is confusion in the minds of the Canadian people?

I have been searching for some reason for the adamant stand of the Minister of National Defence and his government with respect to this project. I finally found a reason today which perhaps makes some sense. It is contained in an article by Robert Duffy which appeared in today's Globe and Mail. This is the first indication I have had of a reason why the government adheres so rigidly to the program which has been scrapped by the United States. The article states in part:

> Even the most cynical person here would not suggest that the government's undying loyalty to the Bomarc firework could be decided by electoral considerations. Nobody, however, has noted any tendency in the government to deal urgently with the question of whether or not the program should be revised.

The article deals, of course, with an event which may occur at the site of one of the two proposed bases in Canada, the one at Mont Laurier which is in the centre of a riding where there may be a by-election in the near future.

We have heard the government severely and justifiably criticized by the official opposition in respect to its defence program but the Liberal party has advanced no alternative. We therefore have had an indication of the similar problem we would be facing if the Liberals were in office today instead of the Conservatives.

I wish to read a paragraph from an article by Arthur Blakely, which appeared in the Montreal Gazette today and which reads in part as follows:

> If, however, the Liberals have devised any genuine alternative to existing policies, they have kept it under wraps. They are much more cautious than the C.C.F.'ers about a unilateral program of disarmament. And they have had some difficulty in devising an acceptable alternative to an arms policy which is at least partially of their own making.

It is fine to criticize the government but it is not enough to do so. You should offer some kind of alternative.

I am pleased to see that the United States government has accepted the view this group has been advocating, that the only possible defence is a deterrent rather than just a straight so-called defence. The Prime Minister, the Minister of National Defence and hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Fairfield) have said that a deterrent is beyond the means of this country and that may be so, but if it is true let us face up to the fact. A deterrent is the only defence we have in sight today.

What is the sense of going ahead blindly and spending millions of dollars when all we are doing is going through the motions of defence without ever having one bit of defence for the people of this country? The government seems to think that as long as we spend money we are defended. I say, Mr. Speaker, this is not a good enough answer for the people of this country today.

Mr. Arthur Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make one or two brief comments concerning the remarks of one or two hon. gentlemen who have preceded me and perhaps to say a word, not to enlighten them because at this stage they refuse to be enlightened by the Minister of National Defence, (Mr. Pearkes) or anyone else, but rather to make one or two corrections in the comments they have made. When you reach an impasse in a debate, when the opposition in effect say to you, "We have made up our minds; don't confuse us with the facts", the debate merely comes to a dead stop.

We have seen an interesting performance tonight, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Peters: The same is true of the government occasionally.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): As an example, we have seen the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), obviously ill-prepared, coming in here and giving us a lecture on air defence with little regard for the facts. We have seen the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), with his usual wind and fury, produce something less than his usual mouse. His chief concern apparently is that the statement read by the minister was on a United States letterhead rather than a Canadian letterhead. This was the whole point of his argument. My friend, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), showed his usual lack of intestinal fortitude, which the services generally call guts, in making an attack on the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), something that he would not have done under any other circumstances.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of personal privilege. The hon. gentleman has suggested that I said things in the house this evening that I would not have said if the Prime Minister had been here.

Mr. Walker: That is right.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that that statement is completely untrue, and that I have said much harsher things about the Prime Minister when he was here. I might add, sir, that it is not my fault that the Prime Minister is not here.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): I hardly think that is a question of personal privilege. I do not think it is going to be the most important factor in the debate. I merely make a comment on it because it has become rather consistent practise of the hon. member.

I wish to try to express in as simple a form as one can where the Bomarc fits into the defence system which as it is integrated and is not a single weapon, in our defence; not something on which we are entirely dependent for the continental defence of North America, but rather a component and which is in its early stages of experimentation, something which no one has denied.

[Mr. Smith (Calgary South).]

Before we examine this weapon let us remind ourselves, as the opposition, and in particular the Leader of the Opposition, failed to do, that when one talks about defence one must make some reference to all of the aspects which make up the total defence of this continent. We get the impression—and it is obviously one intentionally left by the opposition—that because this weapon has not been successful, or because the Canadian government rejected the Arrow, Canada is left completely undefended. Nothing is further from the facts and no one knows it better than the Leader of the Opposition.

I think it is safe to say that when this government, through its negotiations with the United States, introduced the defence alliance which we know as NORAD, it was the first step in continental defence that has made some sense in modern defence planning. It was quite obvious that a nation with a defence budget of $1,700 million and a population of 16 million people is not going to be able to give comprehensive continental defence either to itself or to its allies to the south. I have never been able to understand yet whether the opposition support the principle of NORAD or not, because they continually talk out of both sides of their mouths on this and other subjects.

NORAD, then, is a principle of defence upon which Canada must rely to a very large extent. I ask the Leader of the Opposition and his associates whether or not they support this principle? Second, I ask them whether or not they believe that our contribution is in any way subservient to that of the United States? It has already been clearly indicated that in Air Marshal Slemon, the deputy commander, we have the second most senior officer in the air force. In a Canadian air vice marshal we have the chief of operations. The fact is well-known, then, in this house and certainly to the Canadian people, that Canada, in relation to its contribution to all of the defence of the continent, has a far greater say in the continental defence of North America than the United States in proportion to the dollars that are put up for it.

I hope the day will come when we do not insist on dealing with questions of sovereignty in relation to defence which in effect are not questions of sovereignty at all but are introduced purely with a political motivation in order to confuse or distress the Canadian people by suggesting to them that they are going to lose their birthright. The fact of the matter is we share with the United States in the defence of the free world to a far greater extent than any other country. When we think of a budget of $1.7 million and some 16½ million people, we see the picture in its proper perspective.

Let us look at Bomarc and this cost of $15 million and relate it to an integrated system which involves three large radar chains. To the sum of $15 million must be added two groups of separate squadrons of air defence; to the $15 million must be added a complete partner which has not only the use of the deterrent through the strategic air command, but defence squadrons of Europe and, of course, of the United States; the $15 million involves an over-all pattern of defence. This is the subject matter of the debate. I suggest that the $15 million item should be brought into perspective with our own defence expenditures, $15 million in a budget of $1,700 million.

The Leader of the Opposition moved the adjournment of the debate to express a complete lack of confidence, as he said, in the defence policy, because of this principle. I am delighted to see the hon. member for Essex East back in his seat. We always welcome him and his pleasant smile. I would point out that if those in opposition are going to tell us that Canada's defence policy is related only to a single weapon in its experimental stages, which supplements a defence system which is as comprehensive as one can be in relation to that which we can afford, then it brings this debate into proper perspective.

Let us look at the history of Bomarc. First of all, we know that there were several experimental stages of the earlier edition, the model A. There were some 82 tests before it was successful. Because of certain limitations in our air defence we extended our support for NORAD by having two bases built in Canada. Through negotiations with the United States we contracted for those bases. We then agreed to take a certain number of Bomarc B's. It should be remembered, that in its early stages it may not be entirely satisfactory. This, of course, we do not deny, but we have an insurance for an amount of $15 million placed on this one particular weapon.

This is the point I should like to bring home to the house. We hear repeatedly, particularly from the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), expressions of regret that the government decided to cancel the Arrow contract. This is a debate that will long be remembered in this chamber. Certainly, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has never had any firm views on this subject. Certainly, the Leader of the Opposition has never at any time yet agreed with the views of the hon. member for Trinity. It was obvious to this house that the Arrow was not going to be a satisfactory weapon for the air defence of Canada. It was then up to this government to provide an alternative and to supplement the air squadrons, so this $15 million insurance item was put up for the test, to complement our air defence.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Yes, when I have concluded my remarks. Having occupied most of the time of this house in debates on defence, you can wait your turn.

So, having now in the early stages put up this $15 million out of a total budget of $1,700 million, we see these great defence critics trying to create the impression both in Canada and outside of Canada that Canada is left defenceless. Could anything be more silly, more utterly stupid than that observation by the opposition.

We have also had considerable comment from the Leader of the Opposition and his colleagues on the question of consultation. This, of course, is related to the problems, which they have described, of Canadian sovereignty and the infringement by a foreign country. The Minister of National Defence, who is responsible for the defence of this country to a large degree, gave an itemized account of the various consultations which have taken place, all of which are certainly related to his administration and which were not even conceived by the former government. These were all introduced and initiated by the present government. It seems hardly necessary for me to itemize them all again.

Certainly we have had consultations at the cabinet level; consultations between the House of Commons members and the United States senate and congress; then, through NORAD and through the senior levels of government. I took the time during the recess to ask exactly what consultations at the staff working level, if any, took place prior to the statement read by the minister to the house on Friday. I think it is important because this information would be available to anyone if they took the time to ask for it. The impression has been left that all of a sudden there was a telephone call and our Minister of National Defence then had to make a statement which was dictated by the United States and Canada had no say in it whatever.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): This is the impression, and the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) says, "hear, hear."

Let us look at the record. First of all, on February 24 representatives of the R.C.A.F. on the higher level met at Washington with the United States air force. On February 28 in Washington, there was a further consultation on the air defence problem, which the R.C.A.F. again attended. On March 1, in Ottawa, a further discussion on exactly the same problem and a team of senior United States air force officers came here to meet with the R.C.A.F. On March 9 there was a further consultation in Ottawa on the same problem.

These are some of the consultations at the working level during the discussion of various changes in the policy of the United States as it might affect Canada. These are actual examples of co-operation that took place between United States and Canadian forces in determining continental defence policy through NORAD. I suggest this is exactly the type of information those in opposition might have checked before they said anything.

My friend, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, widened the debate when he said that this present government had made no useful contribution to the defence of Canada, or words to that effect. I would answer, first, of course that I am going into an area which is beyond the terms of the initial resolution, but since the subject was introduced to such an extent by the minister for Essex East (Mr. Martin) who explored almost every conceivable alley available, and by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, let us have a look at the record to see what we have done.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a point of order. The hon. gentleman said that my hon. friend from Essex East had widened the debate. The only person who has taken part in this debate who widened the debate was the Minister of National Defence, who spoke generally about policy without exception being taken by anyone on this side. But when my hon. friend—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am speaking to a point of order.

Mr. Bigg: Are you writing history or interjecting?

Mr. Pickersgill: But when my hon. friend from Essex East attempted to reply in kind, he was called to order. I think the hon. gentleman should stick to the motion before the house.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): I realize, Mr. Speaker, that you do an excellent job when you are in the chair, and for this reason I am delighted that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will never find himself in that position. Consequently, I can proceed because I am just replying to comments made by the hon. member in this respect and I shall do so quietly because I know he would like to listen. He said that this government had made no useful contribution to the defence of Canada. I wonder if he would make a checknote of these things.

First of all, he will recognize the change in the type of defence that was recommended, something which the Leader of the Opposition did comment upon when he was in the committee on defence, before the estimates committee.

Mr. Pearson: And I was not allowed to comment on it today.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): At that time, the Leader of the Opposition left some doubt about the ability of the CF-100 in the future—

Mr. McIlraith: I should like to raise a point of order. Surely, there cannot be two sets of rules applied in this house. When members of the opposition sought to debate general defence policy they were not allowed to do so. The point has been raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, and I am sure we have the right to ask the Chair to deal with it.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): May I comment on the point of order? It is quite understandable that the hon. member does not want to hear the record. I am merely replying to the charge made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate who stated that we have made no useful contribution whatever to defence. I think it is important to have it very clear on the record.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Of course, hon. members are usually permitted to answer statements, but I would ask the hon. member not to take more time in answering this question than the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate did.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was one sentence.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would say it was very short.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): You are, of course, being very fair. There was, of course, the re-equipment of our air division of NATO.

Mr. Pearson: That was over two years ago.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): There was the re-equipment of our NATO allies; the establishment of consultations at the top level; United States participation in NORAD; the improvement in defence contracts with the United States; the changes and improvements in the equipment of our navy; the re-equipping and improving of the maritime command with new aircraft; the re-organization of the militia for its new role; the addition of new mobility and fire power for our army—this record could go on for hours and hours. I have not been permitted to do so because of the rules of the house, but I could elaborate upon it. I can understand the embarrassment of the Leader of the Opposition.

There is one point. First of all, we have to decide whether or not the motion to adjourn the house is important in the sense the Leader of the Opposition really realized what he was entering into. He received information, he says, and I gather he feels that this was something to which he had not access before.

He now understands that Bomarc is only one part of an integrated defence, or I hope he does so. He now understands that while it is admittedly completely unproved it still has a potential, and that Canada's contribution is $15 million which is fairly good insurance for the type of weapon we may yet get. He will realize that Canada's defences are not in such complete jeopardy as he would lead the nation to believe. He will realize that this debate has brought before us a very important fact and it is this. The C.C F. for their part would tell us that they would want no defence whatsoever—

Mr. Argue: That is not so.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): —that they do not believe in it.

Mr. Argue: That is not true.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): On the other hand, the Liberals have not a single solitary suggestion to make on how to defend this country; and they are not even sure of the facts or the information with which they entered this debate. The policy of this government enunciated by the Minister of National Defence is a clear and concise example of the problem that must be faced, recognizing that we are in a transitional period and the need for flexibility and recognizing the great problems that are ahead of us. As a result of that, I am sure the Liberals have done a service to this parliament and to this country by giving this government the opportunity through the minister to give a clear indication that Canada is being well defended and well administered.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Bomarc.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: That's right; shout him down before he starts.

Mr. Hellyer: I hope the time allowed for my speech will not be reckoned until the house has come to order.

I must admit that when I heard the news Friday night that the Minister of National Defence had announced to this house that the United States air force was now cutting back its appropriations for expenditures on the Bomarc installations from $421 million to $50 million and that notwithstanding this major shift in United States policy, the Canadian government intended to carry on in its announced policy, I could not believe the news. It seemed to me to be incredible that any government under these circumstances would persist in a policy which appears to be so out of keeping with the times. Indeed, it has been said that this decision is something that no government in its right mind would make.

I have here a dispatch which came from the New York Times of March 25. It reads in part as follows:

> Washington, March 24—The air force proposed to congress today a drastic cut-back in development funds for the Bomarc air defence missile on the ground that it was becoming obsolete.
> Congressional sources reported that Gen. Thomas D. White, air force chief of staff, disclosed the change in plans for the Bomarc missile in secret testimony today before the defence subcommittee of the house appropriations committee.
> General White, the sources reported, said the air force had decided to reduce its request for Bomarc funds in the coming fiscal year from $420 million to $50 million.
> The reason given for the reduction, according to the sources, was "changing military requirements" brought about by the Soviet shift from manned bombers to intercontinental ballistic missiles.
> The supersonic Bomarc missile, which has been under development for several years at an estimated cost of nearly $3 billion, is designed as an unmanned interceptor to down enemy bombers. It is useless against ballistic missiles.
> Another reason for the air force move, however, is that development of an advanced version of the Bomarc, known as Bomarc B, has run into serious technical difficulties that have delayed the time when it will be ready for operational use.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, it has become obvious during the testing program of this missile that it will not be operational in time to fill the function for which it was being designed, namely to fill that important function in the defence of the North American continent against the manned bomber in those days or years before the Soviet has sufficient missiles to send against all major North American targets.

The reasons the United States gave for cancelling this program were, first of all, that it is becoming obsolete; not, as the minister said this afternoon, for other reasons but that it is becoming obsolete. That was their first reason. Then the second reason that I have just read from this Washington dispatch in the New York Times was technical difficulties in development. The third reason is the fact that the Bomarc missile bases are so vulnerable to missiles; I refer not only to intercontinental ballistic missiles but also missiles fired from manned bombers from several hundred miles away.

There have been seven tests of the Bomarc B, this weapon upon which the Canadian government places its defence future; and in each case the tests have been failures. The minister has told us that he is optimistic and he continues to take that attitude. The eighth test is scheduled for some time this coming week. We shall be greatly interested to see whether it flies. If it does so, I suppose we can expect a tremendous barrage of propaganda. The minister will get his propaganda gentlemen here, they will have pictures in all the newspapers and on television and they will say that at last the Bomarc has become a success because it has managed to get off the ground.

Even if the eighth one should fly, even if the eighth missile should manage to get off the ground, there is still a great deal of testing to be done before it can be called an operational weapon. That fact has been made patently clear by the evidence given by the United States military authorities. There is still the problem of finding its target and, once having found the target, of proceeding to the target and of intercepting a supersonic bomber or indeed a supersonic missile fired from a bomber. These, as Dr. York has told us, are major technical problems which have yet to be overcome.

It is because of these major technical problems that the United States air force now believes this weapon may not and in fact will not be available in time to do the job for which it was intended. Even if it should become an operational weapon at some time in the distant future, the bases are still vulnerable to missiles. They are fixed installations and as such offer no promise of a defence capability as far as the North American continent is concerned.

At the same time we were advised by the United States military authorities that they are taking a second look at interceptors. Indeed, some of the money which is being saved because of the cut-back in this program is being diverted to improve United States interceptor capabilities, to improve the effectiveness of the Century class of interceptors. We had an interceptor in this country and it was infinitely superior to the Century class of interceptors. But what happened to it? What happened to the Avro Arrow? What happened to the one thing Canada was developing on its own which was to fit into the NORAD plan, which was to fit into the plan of integrated defence of the North American continent against manned bombers?

We were told again tonight by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith), who is now elsewhere, that much has been said about that great interceptor in this house. We know what happened to it. It was scuttled and the remains were cut up with acetylene torches. It was buried before it had the opportunity to be properly proven.

Mr. Spencer: It should never have been born.

Mr. Hellyer: "Never have been born", my hon. friend says. One thing different about it was that it was a live baby. It flew from the first test. It had real possibilities and unlike this adopted child we are now getting from the United States it was not stillborn and grotesque.

Mr. Walker: Pure imagination.

Mr. Hellyer: This afternoon the minister said that these proposals from the United States are tentative. If I have his words correctly, he said that the program has not yet been fixed. He said that it is not a plan which has been accepted by congress, at least, that the committee has not had the opportunity of hearing General Kuter, the commander in chief of NORAD, on the final proposals, that he has not been able to give his evidence before the subcommittee. It will be a long time, the minister told us, before this plan is finally approved. It must go to the committee on appropriations. It must go to congress. Congress may make radical changes in the proposed plan. It is a tentative plan, the minister told us.

Now he is back to the position he took last Friday morning when he told us that the reports from Washington were speculative, that they were rumours emanating from closed sessions. On Friday afternoon we thought he had given us a statement which was presumably a statement of fact. Today he comes back and says that the plans are just tentative, that they have not been completed, that congress has not yet had the opportunity of dealing with them and, in addition, the committee has not yet heard General Kuter, the chief of NORAD.

It is surprising to some of us to see this recently acquired interest by the government and the Minister of National Defence in the opinions of the NORAD chief. Our government and our Minister of National Defence did not pay any attention to him when he recommended that we carry on with the production of the Avro Arrow. They did not pay any attention to him when he came and asked that we re-equip our air defence squadrons with supersonic planes.

Mr. Walker: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, is the hon. member allowed to carry on with this discredited old alibi of the Avro Arrow, which is a broken, worn record, in a debate of this kind dealing with a specific matter?

Mr. Habel: It hurts.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, you will recall that this afternoon the Minister of National Defence traversed the whole field of defence. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) may not wish to give us the same privilege but I suggest to you that the hon. member who is speaking has exactly the same privilege as the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Speaker: I was following the remarks of the hon. member for Trinity who has the floor. He referred to the choice of the Bomarc as against the Avro Arrow. It seemed to me that one could scarcely say that his remarks were irregular or beyond the scope of the debate.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, we think it is surprising that the government, which has repeatedly turned down and ignored the advice of the chief of this collective arrangement about which we have heard so much in the last two or three days, should now be very much interested in the advice he is going to give to congress, that they should now be in the position of waiting with bated breath for him to come to the rescue of their pet project, the Bomarc missile.

Mr. Grafftey: Nonsense.

Mr. Hellyer: The gentleman who is the chief man in NORAD may in fact tell congress that he wishes he had more funds for the Bomarc program but his chief has recommended to congress that this cut take place, and that is the position in which we find ourselves at the present time. The government of Canada paid no attention when they were advised to do certain things and now they are very much interested in getting some support from that same quarter.

It is interesting that our government, when the policy of the United States was to proceed with a more comprehensive program of continental air defence against manned bombers, contracted out. We said that we would no longer do the things we were best capable of doing, that we would no longer carry on with the project which was undertaken by us as our contribution to this total defence effort.

But now that the basic policy has changed in Washington, when they have finally come to the conclusion that the threat from the manned bomber is diminishing and that funds should be diverted to greater expenditure on intercontinental ballistic missiles, when the United States realizes the vulnerability of fixed installations such as the Bomarc to missilry, then our government does a complete somersault and says that now that the United States has changed its basic policy we want to contract in. When they needed us, when the plan was more comprehensive, we were out but now that the plan is washed out practically in its entirety we want to contract back in.

This raises a very interesting question as to why our government would take this rather inexplicable attitude. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) told us this afternoon that fundamental changes have taken place, that we are in a period of transition unequalled at any time in history. He told us that it was almost a platitude to say this. A few minutes later the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) said, "This is not a basic change". I ask you, Mr. Speaker, which one is giving us the correct information, the Minister of National Defence when he says that we are going through a period of fundamental change greater than in any other period in history or the Prime Minister when he told us just a short time later that this was not a basic change? The inconsistency of their positions was obvious.

The minister went on to spend much time discussing defence policy generally. He also spent much time talking about United States programs that had been scrapped. He did not say very much about the points at issue today. It is inevitable that some programs will not come to fruition; that in a group of programs some will not turn out to be satisfactory. Some money is bound to be wasted when a country or a group of nations attempts to cover the waterfront, as it were, in defence matters. But it is one thing to waste money on defence and it is something entirely different to waste money deliberately. In my opinion, further expenditure on Bomarc sites for Canadians at this period is a wanton and wasteful expenditure of the Canadian taxpayers' money. We cannot condone useless expenditure at this point.

If I may, I should like to comment on a point raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) this afternoon. He quoted me as having said "No" on a television broadcast yesterday when I was asked if I believed there should be a reduction in defence expenditure. The hon. member went on to say that I had said there should be more expenditure on defence. The hon. member is not in his seat. I was going to give him this opportunity to set the record straight. What I said was that the hon. member for Assiniboia had got the cart before the horse in my opinion and that first of all we should find out if there were necessary and useful things which we should be doing. If there were, it was our responsibility as a partner in this collective defence agreement to do them. If there are no expenditures which can usefully be made, it would be time to take the decision to cut defence spending. This is planning, and in this party we believe you must have the facts before making plans, and we are surprised that the hon. member for Assiniboia should take a different view and do it the other way round.

The Minister of National Defence told us this afternoon that this reduction of expenditure by the United States was minuscule. Since when was $371 million minuscule? He will say that he was referring to the expenditure of the United States government—

Mr. Pallett: You were not here. He never said that.

Mr. Pearkes: I yet have not the word the hon. member is using.

Mr. Hellyer: It is in the notes that I have, and I presume it is correct.

An hon. Member: It is not correct.

Mr. Hellyer: I copied it from a press reporter's report.

Mr. Pearkes: Do not put words into my mouth.

Mr. Hellyer: If it is not the correct word, perhaps the minister would give me the word he used.

An hon. Member: Why should he help you?

Mr. Hellyer: Since when was $371 million minuscule? Nor is the expenditure of $15 million of the Canadian taxpayers' money minuscule. It is a colossal waste when spent in this way. The hon. member for Calgary East—

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Calgary South.

Mr. Hellyer: —kept repeating the figure so often—Mr. Speaker, I am trying to get the constituency correct, and if I do—

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): It would be the first time tonight that you have got anything right.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Mr. Hellyer: The hon. member kept repeating the figure of $15 million. This was all the money Canada was spending, and he said it was a small sum.

Some hon. Members: On the Bomarc.

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, on the Bomarc, but how about the rest of the SAGE system? How are you going to control it? Are you just going to push the missiles out there and let them fly without direction? Is that what the government proposes to do? The hon. member has been trying to create the impression in the country that we are only talking about $15 million; we are talking about $125 million.

An hon. Member: Your figure.

Mr. Hellyer: That is the figure which both the Minister of National Defence and the Prime Minister put on the record.

Mr. Pearkes: Would the hon. gentleman at least give me the quotation to which he is referring when he says that I had stated that the Bomarc was costing this country $125 million?

Mr. Hellyer: I see a number of the minister's high-priced help in the gallery. Perhaps they could look it up for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was put on the record this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: No it was not.

Mr. Hellyer: What the Minister of National Defence said was that the SAGE-Bomarc; Canada's contribution to the SAGE-Bomarc system, would cost from $110 million to $125 million.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hellyer: A reduction from the figure of $135 million used by the Prime Minister earlier on. At page 928 of Hansard appears the following:

> Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): On July 2, in the same connection, I mentioned that the total estimated cost was $125 million covering two Bomarc stations, SAGE and the gap fillers and so forth.

Mr. Pearson: All part of the system.

Mr. Hellyer: These are the minister's own words.

Mr. Speakman: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member should raise a point of order from his own seat.

Mr. Hellyer: These are the minister's own words, and this covers the whole system. You cannot just put a missile on a piece of concrete and have it fly itself. There must be some direction.

Mr. Pallett: On a point of order, the hon. member for Trinity has read the answer from the Minister of National Defence purporting to appear on page 928. In order that he may not be guilty of misleading the house, would the hon. member care to read the question to which the answer was given?

Mr. Hellyer: I should be glad to have the hon. member read the whole speech, or question, or whatever it was, when I have finished.

The record stands that the system which is to control the Bomarcs, and the interceptors which Canada has not got because the government turned down the earlier advice of the NORAD chief, is to cost $125 million. It does not matter how many pieces you cut this into, this is the total as given by the minister. If he wishes to change the record he will have plenty of opportunity to do so when this much talked of committee on defence expenditure holds its sittings.

The minister told us that this minuscule reduction of $371 million should be considered in relation to the total United States expenditure on this missile of something more than $2 billion. What the minister did not tell us is how much of that $2 billion or more has already been spent.

Mr. Pearkes: May I correct that statement? I said there were hundreds of millions of dollars left.

Mr. Pearson: You said you did not know the figure.

Mr. Hellyer: So we are told there are hundreds of millions of dollars left. The minister did not say how much was required for the further testing of this missile.

Mr. Walker: Hundreds of millions.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is the first intelligent observation from the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Hellyer: But what if it takes longer and costs more to develop and test the missile than was anticipated? What is to be used for the appropriation if this extra testing is necessary?

Mr. Pearkes: Nothing from the Canadian budget.

Mr. Walker: May I ask the hon. member for Trinity a question? Does he object to the expenditure of $15 million on the Bomarc development where there has been a United States national defence expenditure of $2.2 billion? Does the hon. member object to that, and want us to retire from this part of the defence policy?

Mr. Hellyer: I think the record speaks for itself. It was only last Friday that I moved in the house that the expenditure of this government be reduced by the amount necessary for the Bomarc installations.

Mr. Walker: What have you got to substitute?

Mr. Pearson: Something that would work.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister told us there is lots of money available—

Mr. Pearkes: When did I say that: please quote me.

Mr. Pearson: You said hundreds of millions.

Mr. Hellyer: Is the minister now indicating that there is not enough money available to continue this development?

Mr. Pearkes: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, hon. members are questioning me now about the expenditure of another country. I cannot be expected to know every detail of the expenditure which may be voted by the United States and to answer questions as to how much more money is to be spent.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, with respect I submit that the minister should be able to answer every detail because every detail is relevant to the continental defence of North America.

Mr. Pearkes: I have no right to answer with respect to every detail.

Mr. Hellyer: Every detail is relevant to the question as to whether or not the government should proceed with the expenditure of the Canadian taxpapers' money to instal two Bomarc squadrons, because if there are not sufficient funds available in the United States to continue with the production, development and testing of these missiles, what will we have? All we will have will be two huge concrete monuments, one to the Minister of National Defence and one to the Prime Minister.

The dispatch reads:

> Under the air force's modified continental air defence plan announced Friday, some development for the Bomarc B would be continued, but production plans would be cut to the bone, with the exception of the two squadrons of the Bomarc B to be produced for the Canadian government.
> Even the planned 16 United States squadrons of the shorter range liquid-fuelled Bomarc A are to be cut to 12, and the costly electronic aircraft warning and alert system known as SAGE will be reduced to divert more funds to intercontinental ballistic missiles and giant radar and satellite warnings systems against long range enemy missiles.
> Some Bomarc A squadrons—this missile has a range of some 200 miles against 500 for the B model—are in operation. The original air defence program called for gradual replacement of the Bomarc A with the solid-propellant B model as it reached production stage.
> Now there is doubt in the United States air force whether any B models will ever be introduced into the American system, though plans are continuing to provide Canada's two squadrons at Mont Laurier, Quebec, and North Bay, Ontario.

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member indicate the nature of the document from which he is reading?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It is a dispatch by the Canadian Press writer, Harold Morrison, and it is a Canadian Press dispatch.

Mr. Pickersgill: From Washington.

Mr. Hellyer: The Minister of National Defence seems to be the only one whose confidence in this project is unshaken with the exception of some of his supporters on the benches opposite who have not given the matter as much thought as they might have.

Mr. Nesbitt: Where did you get your information?

Mr. Pickersgill: We certainly did not get it from the government.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister has told us that he has confidence and that he had no reason to believe otherwise. That is not what the records shows. Let me read from the Congressional Record of the United States house of representatives—

An hon. Member: We are in Ottawa, not Washington.

Mr. Hellyer: From the standpoint of our defence policy you would never know it. I wish to read from testimony given to the committee on defence appropriations by Hon. Thomas S. Gates, Jr., secretary of defence, as follows:

> Now, it might be well before this budget is spent or committed further—I mean in the course of the fiscal year 1961—that we have another reappraisal. Such a reappraisal might change the emphasis on certain factors, in which case there might be a change in the air defence plan. I know there have been some further studies on the air defence problem—not along the lines of the F-108, but along the line of reconsidering the continued use, in numbers, of aircraft interceptors. One of the reasons for this is that the Bomarc sites themselves are vulnerable, as fixed sites, to good accurate missiles. An enemy could put a few missiles on a Bomarc site and thus knock out an important part of our continental air defences. Perhaps fighter squadrons because they are mobile will continue to have their usefulness as a supplement to Bomarc.

Has any evidence presented ever been a greater indictment of the defence policy of this government than the evidence I have just read, given by defence secretary Gates?

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Hellyer: After I have finished.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate wouldn't either.

Mr. Hellyer: The evidence shows that reconsideration was being given in the United States months ago, yet when we in this house pleaded with the minister and the government to reconsider all we were given were bland and fatuous assurances that all was well and that the policy of Canada was now in complete accord with that of United States, and that we were now able to repel attack. These were the assurances given us by the minister who has a misplaced confidence in this missile program. We cannot understand why the government insists on going ahead with this program. There must be some reason for the government's intransigence. There must be a reason for it but what it is we have yet to determine.

One hon. member suggested a possible reason tonight, the one raised by a columnist in one of this morning's papers, that this decision had some reference to a future by-election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearkes: You ought to be ashamed of yourself.

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, it is indeed difficult to believe that this government would stoop so low. A more likely reason is that the government is in a position where it must save face.

When this government took office in the summer of 1957 one of the first acts it undertook was to cancel the CF-100, Mark VI, which was to replace the CF-100 now in service. It cancelled the CF-100, Mark VI because it had the infinitely superior Avro Arrow which was coming along and it said the CF-100, Mark VI would be obsolete. It therefore decided to cancel the CF-100, Mark VI, and carry on with the new and greatly improved and highly promising Avro Arrow program. Later on, the Prime Minister said they were reconsidering the Avro Arrow program. Then we all remember the sad day in February when the Prime Minister rose in this house and said the Avro Arrow was obsolescent and so had to be cancelled, and this was done, despite his promise, without any warning. It was announced that we had an alternative in the Bomarc. I was interested to hear the hon. member for Calgary wherever it is—

Mr. Pearkes: Calgary South.

Mr. Hellyer: —say tonight that it was an alternative.

Mr. Pearkes: You do not know where you are, you are completely lost.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): That will help you out in Alberta.

Mr. Hellyer: The hon. member for Calgary South said it was the government's substitute for the manned interceptor. It was to protect Canadians from attack by air from manned bombers. Hon. gentlemen opposite first cancelled the Mark VI to make way for the Arrow and then cancelled the Arrow to make way for the Bomarc and now they do not know where to turn for there is nowhere left to go.

Mr. Pearkes: We are keeping straight on.

Mr. Hellyer: You would turn somewhere else if there was any possible place for you to go, but how could you stand up and say to the Canadian people, "We are going to cancel the Bomarc for the infinitely better bow and arrow," because that is just about the position you are in at the present time. Hon. gentlemen opposite are like babies on the day of birth, completely without air protection whatsoever. This is the end of the cycle as far as the government is concerned. We have no protection from manned bombers, from intermediate range ballistic missiles launched from the sea or from intercontinental ballistic missiles.

Mr. Hees: And we have no protection against you.

Mr. Hellyer: The government's air defence program is washed up and wiped out like this government's defence policy and hon. gentlemen opposite might just as well cancel it out forthwith.

Mr. Roger Parizeau (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, before entering on the subject of the Bomarc I should like to read from Hansard of February 10, 1960, at page 927, a question asked of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer):

> I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. The minister told the house today that the cost to Canada of the Bomarc sites would be reduced to about $15 million as the result of a change in design. Can the minister tell the house what the total cost will be of the whole program, the gap fillers, the SAGE electronic control system, and the Bomarc stations?

In reply, the Minister of National Defence said:

> On July 2 in the same connection I mentioned that the total estimated cost was $125 million, covering two Bomarc stations, SAGE and the gap fillers and so forth. That is a realistic estimate and, of course, it may be reduced a little now that the estimated cost of the Bomarc installations has been reduced.

That is the answer to the question raised by the hon. member for Trinity.

Mr. Hellyer: That is exactly what I said; I read the whole sentence.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am afraid there are too many who want to join in this debate at all times. The hon. member for Lake St. John has not much time left.

(Translation):

Mr. Parizeau: Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the speeches of hon. members of the opposition, and I found, which did not surprise me in the least, they were utterly confused because of their complete ignorance of defence matters and, no doubt, because of the surprise they got when the government allowed them to discuss the Bomarc missile and our relations with NORAD, matters which they were not at all ready to deal with.

As far as I am concerned, I am asking myself the following questions: Should we completely abandon all defence against the bomber menace? If Russia should decide to attack America, should we let ourselves be destroyed? Today, we are able to establish Bomarc bases cheaply. Tests with this defensive weapon are costing the Canadian taxpayer absolutely nothing and we trust that when completed the weapon will give us good protection. As a matter of fact, in case of an attack by 25 enemy bombers, the Bomarc could destroy about twenty of them before they reach their target, while another wave of shorter-range missiles could destroy the other four or five. The Bomarc is therefore the most efficient weapon we know of against manned bombers.

But, you may say, why not scrap the Bomarc if the potential enemy seems to have stopped producing bombers? I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that as long as Russia has at its disposal about 10,000 intercontinental bombers, we must take the necessary means to defend ourselves against that threat, and the necessary means, in my opinion, is the Bomarc B.

Opposition experts—that is, the hon. members for Essex East (Mr. Martin), for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) or the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), whose great experience comes no doubt from their long years of service in the Canadian army—claim that the Bomarc is inefficient. On what basis do they make this assertion? Is it because seven tests on the Bomarc B have ended in failure? Do they not realize that the Bomarc B is to become operational only around 1963 or 1964, which gives enough time to Boeing aircraft experts to improve it at the expense of our American allies? Do they not also realize that a weapon of such precision cannot be put into production after a single test, when it takes years of testing to make a modern aircraft perfectly safe? And incidentally, let me point out that the Avro Arrow had not yet proven itself after a number of tests.

Opposition members would expect American engineers to perform a miracle in successfully firing the Bomarc B at the first test. If the Russians boast of their successes, you may be sure that they never tell about their failures, even though they had many of them before their recent achievements. I do not believe that by reducing the number of bases from 18 to 14, including the two in Canada, the Americans want to show that they no longer have confidence in Bomarc B; I am rather inclined to believe that they tend to direct their efforts towards offensive rather than defensive weapons.

As for us, Canadians, who have always favoured a defensive policy—and it is good that we should stick to it—it is hard to imagine Canada attacking some other country. It is true that the Liberal government of 1939 had seen fit to declare war before London had done so. But I am sure that this government would not do such a thing. Our advantages in keeping Bomarc for our defence lie in the fact that Bomarc B requires little money to provide protection for our industrial centres. And even if Bomarc were to be scrapped in 1970, I am sure that we would have had a good protection during those ten years, at an average cost of $1,500,000 a year. I am convinced that, as a result of the wisdom of the Department of National Defence and of our alliance with the United States in NORAD, we will always find a way to get adequate protection for Canada.

I am convinced that despite the complaints of the hon. members of the opposition and despite their confusion, Bomarc would be useful to the people of Canada in the event of enemy attack.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, perhaps the leader of the house will indicate what the business will be up until Thursday evening?

Mr. Churchill: For tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, for the period 2.30 to six o'clock we shall have the motion standing in my name, which is a reference to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization to examine into the delivery of grain to feed mills in the prairies, item No. 246 on today's order paper. It will be followed by item No. 239 on today's order paper, which is a resolution in the name of the Minister of Public Works, dealing with an amendment to the Trans-Canada Highway Act.

At eight o'clock the Minister of Finance will be available to continue the study of the final supplementary estimates. I am not able to forecast the events for Wednesday and Thursday.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

MID-CANADA RADAR LINE TENDERS

Question No. 86—Mr. Argue:

1. Were tenders called for construction of the mid-Canada radar line?
2. If so, (a) what companies submitted tenders; (b) what was the amount of each; (c) on what date were tenders called; (d) who was the prime contractor; (e) on what date was the contract signed; (f) what were the terms of the contract; (g) who signed it?
3. On what date was construction (a) started; (b) completed?
4. What was (a) the estimated cost; (b) the total cost; (c) what amount has been paid to the prime contractor?
5. Was the government rendered an account by the prime contractor for overtime worked by engineers and inspectors during construction of the line?
6. If so, (a) what was the number of engineers and inspectors employed by the prime contractor on the line; (b) what was the total amount of overtime charged for (i) engineers; (ii) inspectors; (c) what was the total amount of money paid the prime contractor for this purpose, on what dates, and on what date was each account submitted?

Answer by: Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production):

1 and 2. Three (3) contracting agencies were involved in the construction of the mid-Canada line—(1) Department of Defence Production, (2) Defence Construction (1951) Ltd., (3) Trans-Canada telephone system, who appointed The Bell Telephone Company of Canada, one of their members, as project agent in the management function.

Department of Defence Production performed its normal procurement function, placing the management contract, equipment, airlift, installation and petroleum products contracts, and some consultant and engineering contracts to assist the design authority.

Defence Construction (1951) Ltd. was responsible for placing the construction contracts—i.e. buildings, roads, runways, structures and tractor train transportation requirements.

1 and 2. Trans-Canada telephone system, the management contractor, was accountable to the Department of Defence Production and Defence Construction (1951) Ltd., and was responsible for:

Co-ordination and implementation of all aspects of engineering, construction and installation of the system, sealift operations and transportation.

Field supervision of Defence Construction Ltd., construction contracts.

Questions

The Department of Defence Production placed some 495 prime contracts, to the following indicated values:

(1) Management contract, $50,211,000; (2) Signals, wireless and towers, $38,089,026; (3) Petroleum, oil, lubricants, $4,298,683; (4) Mechanical equipment, $1,672,106; (5) Diesel power generation equipment, $4,437,078; (6) Transportation and barges, $13,159,083; (7) Miscellaneous purchases, tools, etc., $215,350; (8) Engineers and consultants, $330,363; (9) Interim maintenance, $2,572,393.

Defence Construction (1951) Ltd. placed nine (9) major construction contracts to the estimated value of $91,692,790.

The management contractor placed subcontracts for goods and services, 273 of which exceeded $10,000 each, totalling $19,996,165.

Department of Defence Production prime contracts: Management contract.

Tenders were not called for in the selection of the management contractor. The mid-Canada line is a system comprising doppler detection equipment, which is similar to radio relay communications equipment, and the necessary lateral, rearward and air-ground-air communications equipment.

After a great deal of study and consultation with the armed forces, industry, and experts in the communications field, it was established to the satisfaction of the Department of Defence Production that the employment of one company in the commercial communications field to manage the project was the most efficient way in which to carry out a project of this magnitude and complexity. The organization in Canada, which most satisfactorily filled the requirements for a management contractor, was the Trans-Canada telephone system. This system comprised all the major provincial and commercial telephone-operating companies and was organized primarily to allow a smooth, efficient and reliable transcontinental telephone system to be achieved. It was because of this that the Department of Defence Production considered the Trans-Canada telephone system the best organization to fulfill the requirement for co-ordinated systems engineering, planning, provincial know-how and the means to bring a large body of experienced and proven communications people together.

On April 23, 1954, Trans-Canada telephone system was requested to submit a proposal on phase one of the work, which included an implementation plan of organization and a master time schedule for the project, together with siting and other field surveys, as requested by the R.C.A.F. design authority. This phase of the work was implemented by letter of intent, dated June 25, 1954, which was superseded on November 5, 1954, by a purchase order. Phase two of the work, i.e. the actual construction of the mid-Canada line, was implemented by a subsequent amendment to the purchase order, dated May 10, 1955. The contract provided for the actual costs incurred, calculated in accordance with costing memorandum DDP 31, as determined by cost inspection and audit division, office of the comptroller of the treasury, Department of Finance, plus sales tax where applicable, plus a management fee of $1,750,000, of which 10 per cent was to be withheld until completion of the work, the remaining 90 per cent to be paid in 24 equal monthly instalments, commencing February 28, 1955.

All the terms and conditions of the above-mentioned letter of intent and contract were incorporated in a formal agreement between the department and the Trans-Canada telephone system which was executed on June 21, 1957.

The above-mentioned letter of intent and the formal agreement were signed by Mr. D. A. Golden, deputy minister, Department of Defence Production. The purchase order, as amended from time to time, was signed by various officers of the Department of Defence Production.

The remaining 494 prime contracts, issued by the Department of Defence Production, were awarded on the basis of:

(1) As a result of competitive tender—387 contracts, estimated value, $36,555,067.

1 and 2. Department of Defence Production Prime Contracts.

(2) Negotiated with a supplier in the most favourable position to supply because—

(a) Only company having previous manufacturing experience.

(b) Delivery implications.

(c) Sole Canadian source of supply—107 contracts, estimated value, $25,646,621.

Of these 494 contracts, 164 for charter of aircraft were based on charter tariff rates and 271 were awarded on a firm-price basis with profits not exceeding 10 per cent. The remaining 59 contracts were awarded on a (i) fixed time rate, (ii) cost reimbursable, (iii) ceiling price basis, with a profit allowances varying between 6¼ per cent and 10 per cent.

Defence Construction (1951) Ltd. Prime Contracts:

The construction of the mid-Canada line was undertaken progressively as plans and specifications for sites, buildings and services were developed. Lacking firm constructions plans and specifications, Defence Construction (1951) Ltd. was obliged to select prime construction contractors on the basis of: (i) past experience, (ii) knowledge of conditions in the north, (iii) availability of experienced personnel, (iv) ownership of sufficient equipment of a proper type, (v) geographical location.

All construction contracts provided for the actual costs incurred, calculated in accordance with costing conditions DCL-31, as determined by cost inspection and audit division, office of the comptroller of the treasury, Department of Finance, plus fixed fees varying from 2.72 per cent to 5.25 per cent, depending upon the magnitude of the project.

1 and 2. Defence Construction (1951) Ltd. Prime Contracts:

Defence Construction (1951) Ltd. also made funds available to the management contractor in the amount of $1,331,780 to provide miscellaneous defence construction (1951) Ltd. requirements—i.e. transportation, materials, etc. No fee was attached to this service.

In addition, forty minor contracts covering freighting, small tractor train operations and minor local construction were placed in the amount of $2,359,000.

Management Contract Subcontracts:

The management contractor's subcontracts covered a wide variety of requirements. The demand for aircraft, ships, engineers, consultants, etc. for construction of the mid-Canada line was such that Canadian sources of supply, already heavily engaged in commercial and other defence work, were taxed to the limit of their capabilities.

Major requirements provided by management contractor subcontracts were:

(i) Aircraft charter subcontracts, to the value of $3,393,954, were placed with a total of 20 aircraft-operating companies at fixed tariff rates.

(ii) Ship charters, in the total estimated amount of $3,823,000, including stevedoring, wharfage and insurance charges, were placed at fixed daily rates or fixed tonnage rates.

(iii) Consultant subcontracts, in the total estimated amount of $2,026,065. These subcontracts were negotiated with firms with proven ability to perform, specialized experience in a particular field or by virtue of the fact that the firm had provided plans to the R.C.A.F. for similar applications, which required only minor modification for application to the mid-Canada project. The rates for consultants were governed by the professional institutes in the various provinces.

(iv) Engineers and inspectors required to supplement the management contractor's staff, both in Montreal and in the field, were subcontracted to the total estimated amount of $3,092,000. The demand for assistance in these functions was such that firms capable of supplying supplementary help to the management contractor were selected, for the most part, on the basis of availability of qualified staff.

3. (a) Phase one of the work, approximately June 15, 1954, phase two of the work, on January 1, 1955.

(b) The R.C.A.F. issued the acceptance certificate to the management contractor on May 5, 1958.

4. (a) The management contractor's first estimate, contained in his first quarterly forecast of May, 1955, was $169 million.

(b) The total cost is $227,718,302, which amount includes: (i) the value of helicopter aircraft, (ii) Department of Transport sealift, (iii) Five (5) Department of Defence Production prime contracts in the total estimated value of $10,443,473, for which final government audited costs are not yet available. (iv) provision of $500,000 reserve allowance to provide for some outstanding government contingent liabilities arising from the construction of the mid-Canada line.

(c) The management contractor has been paid $49,722,118. Reconciliation of the final audit report of the management contract and its respective subcontracts, however, indicates that a further payment of approximately $20,000 is owing to trans-Canada telephone system.

5. Because of the urgency and the remote location of the work, a basic sixty-(60)-hour work week was established for all construction trades. The amount of overtime was, therefore, minimized. Time sheets and payroll records for the trades concerned identify authorized overtime, where applicable. These records were government audited but separate accounts for overtime, as opposed to regular time, were not rendered by the contractors.

Generally, engineers and inspectors in the field were paid a monthly salary. This salary was for a minimum sixty-(60)-hour week, plus whatever additional time was required to meet the demands of the program, with no additional compensation to the individuals concerned. Certain programmed overtime worked by engineers at headquarters locations was paid for at straight time rates, pay for this being a pro rata extension of the pay for the normal work week. No separate billing for this work was rendered.

6. (a) The maximum number of consultants, engineers, and inspectors employed on the project by the management contractor at any one time was 355.

(b) and (c) As outlined in 5 above, it is not possible, without a detailed analysis of all time sheets, to provide figures on the exact costs of overtime. In view of the basic sixty-(60)-hour work week and the monthly salary rate basis referred to above, payment of overtime is not considered a significant factor in the over-all cost of the mid-Canada line project.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION CONTRACTS—1958-59

Question No. 202—Mr. McWilliam:

1. What was the total of all contracts awarded by the department of defence production during the fiscal year 1958-59?
2. What was the total awarded to firms in each province during the same year?
3. What was the percentage value of said contracts awarded to each of the provinces during the year?

Answer by: Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production):

1. $663,355,000 net value. The net value includes the value of amendments which increased or decreased existing contracts as well as the value of new contracts issued.

The total net value of contracts placed by the Department of Defence Production as shown is less than the total net value of contracts placed in Canada in 1958-59 because of some large terminations of contracts placed outside Canada in previous years (for example, those associated with the Astra integrated electronic system and the Sparrow missile which were terminated in September, 1958) and because of some large reductions in the value of certain older contracts for government-furnished aircraft equipment. The figure shown includes the net value of contracts placed by the department on behalf of the Department of National Defence, on behalf of other requisitioning agencies (such as the Canadian Commercial Corporation) and on its own behalf (such as for the care, maintenance and custody of standby defence assets and for capital assistance).

2 and 3. The province in which a head office contract is included is based on the mailing address to which the contract is sent and does not necessarily indicate the location at which the work is performed. For example, contracts placed with head offices in centres such as Montreal and Toronto, or with offices located in Ottawa, are often directed by the companies concerned to plants which may be located in other parts of the country. Nor do the figures for the provinces take into account the large proportion of subcontracting that is inherent in this type of work, or allow for the source of raw materials going into the contracts.

It is not practical for the department to maintain precise statistics on the provincial distribution of its district office contracts because of the very large number of contracts involved. However, as the vast majority of these contracts are placed with local firms, the amounts placed by the offices are a good measure of the value placed in the provinces in which the district offices are located.

(a) The net value of head office contracts placed in each province during 1958-59 and the percentage for each province of the total placed in Canada are as follows:

Province	Net Value $	Percentage
Newfoundland	460,000	0.08
Prince Edward Island	21,000	0.003
Nova Scotia	19,366,000	3.17
New Brunswick	2,284,000	0.37
Quebec	237,683,000	38.89
Ontario	294,918,000	48.26
Manitoba	15,699,000	2.57
Saskatchewan	397,000	0.06
Alberta	7,351,000	1.20
British Columbia	31,636,000	5.18
Yukon and Northwest Territories	1,291,000	0.21
Total	611,106,000	100.00

Province	Net Value $	Percentage
Newfoundland (St. John's)	845,000	1.37
Nova Scotia (Halifax)	11,039,000	17.94
New Brunswick (Saint John)	3,246,000	5.28
Quebec (Quebec city and Montreal)	9,204,000	14.96
Ontario (Ottawa, Toronto and London)	17,196,000	27.95
Manitoba (Winnipeg)	5,230,000	8.50
Saskatchewan (Regina)	1,100,000	1.79
Alberta (Calgary and Edmonton)	7,068,000	11.49
British Columbia (Vancouver and Victoria)	6,599,000	10.73
Total	61,527,000	100.00

EXCISE TAX COLLECTIONS ON CIGARETTES, CIGARS, ETC.

Question No. 291—Mr. Boivin:

1. What amount was collected in excise tax on (a) cigarettes; (b) cigars; (c) tobacco, during each of the years, 1957, 1958 and 1959?

2. What amount of excise tax was collected on (a) cigarettes; (b) cigars; (c) tobacco, each month from January 1, 1959 to date?

Answer by: Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue):

STATEMENT SHOWING THE COLLECTION OF EXCISE TAX, BOTH DOMESTIC AND IMPORTATION, ON CIGARETTES, CIGARS AND TOBACCO DURING THE CALENDAR YEARS 1957, 1958 AND 1959; ALSO, BY MONTHS, DURING THE PERIOD JANUARY, 1959, TO FEBRUARY, 1960, INCLUSIVE

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Sixth report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines—Mr. Fraser.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO SHOWING OF FILM "NORAD BRIEFING"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Was the minister or his department consulted about, and if so did it agree to, the showing in Canada of a United States air defence film called "NORAD Briefing"?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Department of External Affairs has many responsibilities but the censoring of television shows is not one of them. The Leader of the Opposition will have to direct his question to another minister.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister a supplementary question, because it is an international matter. In view of the minister's stated belief in the sincerity of the Soviet in regard to disarmament proposals, does the minister not think it unfortunate that such a film shown in Canada should begin with a fictional episode melodramatically declaring that Russia—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the minister has disclaimed any administrative responsibility in this matter. I do not know on what basis the hon. member could ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the Minister of National Defence whether he was consulted before this film was shown in Canada?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker. I understand that this film entitled "NORAD Briefing" was not a NORAD production nor an official United States film. I have not seen it myself, but I have been advised that some objection has been raised to certain parts of the introduction. I have therefore ordered its withdrawal from R.C.A.F. stations until it can be examined and, if necessary, the objectionable features have been removed.

Mr. Pearson: In view of the minister's statement that this was a United States production, does the hon. gentleman not know—

Mr. Pearkes: I said it was not an official United States production.

Mr. Pearson: Does the minister not know that at least one Canadian officer participated in the production of this film and that it was sent out for exhibition in Canada with the approval of an officer of the R.C.A.F.?

Mr. Pearkes: As I have said, I have not seen this film and I am having it withdrawn until such time as it has been examined.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): A supplementary question. Would the minister inform the house what steps he is taking to make certain that the policy of the R.C.A.F. public relations department as to public relations releases and documentary films coincides with the general policy and purpose of the government in the field of international affairs as announced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs from time to time?

Mr. Pearkes: The policy regarding the publication of films is the same as that governing the publication of articles in the press. They have to be cleared by a senior authority.

BOMARC MISSILE—REPORTED INTENTION OF U.S. TO REDUCE SITES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Would the minister care to comment on the news report from Washington that an announcement is about to be made by the United States government that the number of operative Bomarc sites will be reduced from a total of 14 to 10?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the actual report from the United States and do not know whether or not it is an official statement. I understand, however, that it is not an official statement.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Do I take it from the minister that the Canadian government has no information at this time of an impending United States announcement that the total number of Bomarc sites is to be reduced from 14 to 10?

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, I did not say we had no information about it. I said that I did not believe this was an official statement. When it is desirable to make an official statement as to the number of sites, that will be done.

Mr. Argue: Another supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Have there been any recent exchanges between Canada and the United States on the question of a reduction in the number of Bomarc sites from 14 to 10? I think the house is entitled to that information.

Mr. Pearkes: The hon. member may recollect that I said in the course of debate yesterday that the number of Bomarc units is being reduced from 18 to 14. I did not say anything about the number of sites which would be maintained in the United States, other than that there would be two sites in Canada.

Mr. Argue: Another supplementary question. Are there any negotiations now under way with regard to reducing the number of Bomarc units from 14 to 10?

Mr. Pearkes: I know of none, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence and ask if he would care to comment on an Associated Press dispatch of March 28 to the effect that an order to stop work on the Bomarc missile base at Corvallis, Oregon, is expected any day, the base which presumably is intended to provide protection for Vancouver.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is simply asking for a comment on a newspaper dispatch, which I am inclined to think is stretching both the rules and the practice. If the hon. member has a question of fact to ask with respect to work on a base which has become urgent since the debate yesterday, he might put his question.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, I should like to change the line of my question. Is the minister aware that an order to stop work on the Bomarc missile base at Corvallis, Oregon, is expected any day?

Mr. Pearkes: This Bomarc base is not in Canada; it is in the United States. It is not one that is likely to be retained if the proposed plan to be submitted to congress is approved.

Mr. Deschatelets: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Do I understand from the minister's answer that an order to stop work on this base can be given by the United States without the Minister of National Defence being aware of it?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking for an opinion as to the jurisdiction over the base in question. It seems to me this is something which might better have been brought up yesterday when this subject was being debated.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, there is an agreement between the United States and Canada—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deschatelets: —and I should like to know from the minister whether an order to stop work on this base can be given without Canada being aware of it. I think it is a fair question.

Mr. Pearkes: If the base is not to be continued as a Bomarc base, Canada will be consulted.

HONEST JOHN MISSILE—INQUIRY AS TO MAXIMUM RANGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Rodolphe Leduc (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. What is the maximum range of the Honest John missile?

Mr. Speaker: I do not know whether that is a fair question to put orally. It seems to me that a question asking for information of that kind might better go on the order paper. If the minister has the information, there is no objection to his answering.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that information could be given to the house. Detailed information regarding the maximum range of any particular weapon is of a classified nature, and is not usually given out.

LACROSSE MISSILE—STATEMENT ON FIRM ORDER FOLLOWING TESTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply to a question asked by the Leader of the Opposition on February 22 last regarding the procurement of the Lacrosse ground to ground guided missile for the Canadian army. My answer at that time was that we were not in a position to make a firm recommendation or to place an order.

I would add further that in the fall of 1958 it was announced that the Lacrosse II would be provided for the Canadian brigade group in Europe. Since that time, the fall of 1958, the development of the Lacrosse has changed the nature and the tactical employment of this weapon. Instead of becoming a weapon for use with smaller formations it became apparent that the complexity of the system prevented its use in forward areas.

The Canadian army has now been authorized to acquire the free flight improved 762 millimetre rocket and the Honest John launcher. This weapon is in service with or about to be introduced by other NATO forces as the ground to ground missile at the brigade and divisional level.

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is the minister in a position to tell the house whether this American Honest John is more accurate than the Honest John with whom we are so familiar?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Did the minister say whether this is the improved version of the Honest John rocket that is being acquired by the Canadian forces?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, I said this was the improved version of the rocket which is known as the 762 and is launched from the Honest John launcher. The whole complex is frequently referred to as the Honest John system.

Mr. Hellyer: Is it the intention of the Canadian army to acquire more than one size of this missile? I understand there is also a Little John missile. Is it the intention to acquire that one too?

Mr. Pearkes: The Little John is an entirely different weapon, as I am sure the hon. member for Trinity knows.

Mr. Hees: He would not know.

INQUIRY AS TO PRODUCTION OF NERVE GASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence arising out of a reply given to me on March 24, wherein the minister said he did not know whether nerve gases were being produced in Canada. Has the minister now made inquiries on this question, and is he able to make a categorical denial of the statement of Mr. Minifie that Canada manufactures nerve gases near Ottawa and Kingston?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I understand that there are no nerve gases manufactured by the Department of National Defence in Canada.

Mr. Argue: Or by any other department?

Mr. Pearkes: I am not responsible for other departments.

ATOMIC ENERGY

NUCLEAR TESTS—CANADIAN POSITION RESPECTING CURRENT PROPOSALS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question, notice of which I sent to his office. In view of the announced policy of the government with regard to the cessation of nuclear tests with or without control, may I ask the minister what attitude Canada takes regarding the recent proposals concerning these tests beyond the threshold and underground? Will the minister also indicate whether in the light of the current discussions between the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the President of the United States, Canada has been consulted and has the government taken steps to make her views known because of the nature of those discussions?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): It would be quite improper for me to answer that question at length, and I am surprised that the hon. member for Essex East should have repeated a good deal of what he said in the external affairs committee. We are, naturally, very interested in the discussions taking place between Prime Minister Macmillan and President Eisenhower at Camp David, and we are very hopeful that one result of these meetings will be a long stride forward toward the abolition of any further nuclear tests.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. The minister expressed surprise at the nature of my question. Will he not understand why I am surprised at the nature of his reply?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Why should Canada be more hesitant about stating her position than is Great Britain, particularly when Canada, through the minister—

Some hon. Members: Speech.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question is fast taking the character of an argument, and that is not the proper way to get factual information.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I had difficulty in seeing that you were on your feet—

Mr. Hees: Because you always look the other way.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister a supplementary question. Has the position of the government with regard to the cessation of tests changed in any way since that policy was announced by the minister a few weeks ago?

Mr. Green: In reply to the supplementary speeches by the hon. member for Essex East, may I say that the policy of the government has not changed. We have a great deal of trouble trying to convince him it has not changed, but that is the fact.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the minister whether the Canadian views with regard to the recent Russian proposal on nuclear tests have been made known to the governments of the United Kingdom or the United States?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, the views of the Canadian government on this question seem to be much more thoroughly understood by the United Kingdom and the United States than by hon. members of the opposition.

DOUGLAS POINT, ONT.—TARGET DATE FOR COMPLETION OF NUCLEAR POWER PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. Robinson (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has there been any change in the target date for completion of the nuclear power plant at Douglas Point, Bruce county?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker, there has been no change.

SHIPPING

NORTH ATLANTIC—INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENT ON WEATHER SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport and ask if the minister can inform the house whether a new agreement has been reached at the international conference held at The Hague on the weather ships in the north Atlantic. Will Canada have the same number of ships to operate on the north Atlantic, and will the financial burden be more equitably distributed among the countries involved because of the tentative agreement?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. A conference of representatives of the various nations which support the north Atlantic weather station program has been under way at The Hague for some days and is expected to conclude this week.

It is not expected that this will lead to any change in the number of ocean weather stations and weather ships now provided, but it may lead to some change in the financial distribution of costs among participating states. The final results of the conference are not yet available since the conference itself has not, I believe, yet been concluded.

TRADE

WHEAT—CONSULTATIONS WITH U.S. ON DISPOSAL OF SURPLUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the statement appearing in the Globe and Mail of March 28 suggesting fear of controversy between Canada and the United States of America over surplus wheat disposal, can the minister say whether plans have been made to hold talks between the United States of America and Canada to develop a variable system of multilateral world trade and urge a more determined policy regarding the disposal of surplus wheat?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, Canada and the United States have developed consultative machinery so that views and grievances may be discussed at the ministerial and the official levels. One practical result has been the discontinuance of United States barter deals for wheat in many commercial markets. Approximately six months ago the United States announced that the United Kingdom, Belgium, Luxembourg, The Netherlands, Germany and Switzerland have been deleted from their barter list for wheat, flour and feed grains. Although the United States barter program remains a potential threat to Canadian commercial exports, its actual impact on such exports has been considerably reduced in recent years. We are keeping a close watch on developments.

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF EXPORTS CREDIT INSURANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the recent extension of the scope of operation of the United States export-import bank, would the minister give immediate consideration to expanding the operations of the Export Credit Insurance Corporation, and in particular to widening the basis on which direct guarantees could be issued with regard to negotiable instruments given to Canadian exporters by foreign buyers in respect of export transactions?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This is a rather complicated question. If it were placed on the order paper I think we could give a satisfactory written answer to the hon. member.

TRANSPORT

ICEBREAKER ASSISTANCE FOR CANADIAN SEALING SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, a copy of which has been sent to him. Will the minister please inform the house whether his department received a request to free three Newfoundland sealing ships and one Halifax ship operating along the coast of Labrador? If so, what action has been taken by his department, and when? Since coming into the house I have learned that one of the Newfoundland sealing ships, the Terra Nova, recently sank but I understand her crew was saved.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question.

The C.M.S. Wolfe sailed on March 23 to assist a Norwegian sealing vessel disabled in ice on the Labrador coast. The Wolfe towed the ship to open water and met the salvage tug Foundation Vigilant on March 27. The Wolfe then proceeded to assist the Canadian sealers Camperdown and St. Addresse. When these vessels have been escorted to open water the Wolfe will proceed to assist the sealer Arctic Prowler and take on board 48 crew members of the sunken sealer Terra Nova and transport them to Newfoundland.

TELEVISION

TORONTO—COMMUNICATIONS RESPECTING ISSUE OF LICENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of current comments on the matter, can the Prime Minister tell us whether any oral or written communications have gone from him or his cabinet associates to the board of broadcast governors or to any individual B.B.G. member which suggested or indicated a preference for any particular applicant for a television station licence in Toronto, notably the successful Bassett application?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I say with all emphasis, no.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—REPORTED STATEMENT OF B.C. MINISTER RESPECTING FEDERAL LOAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance whether he has any comment to make on a statement by the minister of lands and forests of the government of British Columbia, reported in the Vancouver Sun of March 24, that the federal government had offered to lend British Columbia half the cost of the development of the Columbia river?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the article in question. I do not think this is a matter than can usefully be dealt with simply by a question based on an article that I have not seen.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

EXTENSION OF BENEFITS TO CANADIAN WOODSMEN IN MAINE—APPOINTMENT OF MEMBER FOR RESTIGOUCHE-MADAWASKA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean-Paul Racine (Beauce): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the offer made by the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Van Horne) on the proposed extension of unemployment insurance benefits to Canadian woodsmen working in the state of Maine, can the minister advise the house whether he intends to accept the offer and appoint the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska as official representative of the government to meet with the governor of the state of Maine and settle this problem, as promised by the hon. member?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question is no.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT BY ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON HOLIDAY AND SEVERANCE PAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether he has yet succeeded in getting a report from the advisory committee of the unemployment insurance commission on the matter of severance pay, which affects many people in Elliot Lake?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to say I have not.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the minister now in a position to advise the house whether he has yet received the report of the national energy board on the recent applications for certificates of public convenience and necessity under part III of the National Energy Board Act?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): A somewhat similar question was asked on March 23. My answer appears at page 2352 of Hansard, and remains the same.

Mr. Macnaughton: I have another question. Can the minister advise the house as to when he expects the decisions on the applications to export gas under part VI of the act?

Mr. Churchill: My answer remains the same, Mr. Speaker, as at page 2352 of Hansard.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): May I ask the minister this question as a result of reading his earlier answer, to which he referred in answer to a question a moment ago. Will he explain to the house which type of application he was referring to? Was he referring to applications under part III or part VI of the act?

Mr. Churchill: I was referring to all applications that had been received.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

NEWFOUNDLAND—REPORTED LOSS OF MAIL BAG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): I wish to ask a question of the Postmaster General. According to the Newfoundland Herald of April 3 it appears that a mail bag containing several hundred applications for 1958 income tax refunds has been lost or stolen between St. John's and Ottawa, thus creating confusion and delaying reimbursement to the people of Newfoundland. Can the minister inform the house how, when and where this mail bag was lost or stolen, and can he assure the people of Newfoundland that they will not have to suffer too long from the disorganization of the Post Office Department?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): I congratulate the hon. member on his foresight, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me that the date on which he referred to this bag as having been stolen is about a week in the future, namely April 3.

Mr. Denis: It relates to the 1958 income tax returns.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Denis: It relates to the 1958-59 income tax returns, the previous year's income tax returns. This is as it appears in the Newfoundland weekly Herald of April 3.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member advise me of the date of the newspaper?

Mr. Denis: The newspaper report is 1960, but it relates to income tax returns of 1958-59.

Mr. Hees: The hon. member had better get a new writer; he is not getting his laughs.

Mr. Denis: May I explain that this is a weekly newspaper and they put on the date of the week in which it appears. Sometimes they appear a couple of days ahead of time. Mr. Speaker will not blame me if it is brand new.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): If the hon. member will finally get the problem sorted out so that he understands it, I shall be glad to answer the question.

Mr. Denis: It is not a question of whether I understand it. It is a question of whether the Postmaster General understands it.

HOUSING

C.M.H.C.—STATEMENT RESPECTING DIRECT LOANS TO BUILDERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): The hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland) has asked me to describe in more detail the policy to be followed this year by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in making direct mortgage loans under the National Housing Act.

I wish first to say how grateful I am for the opportunity afforded by the hon. member, and I thank him for giving me notice of the question. Although I made every effort to answer questions as they arose during the debate on the resolution and second reading of Bill No. C-53, it was not possible for me to review direct lending policy in detail, particularly as final administrative arrangements were still being worked out by corporation officials. Some procedural matters are still under consideration, but I believe I can now, by virtue of the timely question by the hon. member for Nipissing, provide the house with some short additional basic information.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to read an additional answer?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Walker: Thank you very much. Hon. members will recall that during the debate I indicated that if and when the additional funds the government had requested were forthcoming, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation would make direct loans only to applicants with annual incomes of $5,000 or less. I was asked at that time whether the wife's income, if she were working, would be included and I answered "No". I should point out that the corporation has always considered up to 20 per cent of a working wife's gross income in computing the applicant's ability to make monthly repayments of principal, interest and taxes. This practice will not be changed in determining eligibility of an applicant for a loan; in other words, the corporation will take into account the applicant's gross annual income plus 20 per cent of his working wife's earned income. There is no change here; it is a matter of using the same criterion for both purposes.

There have been some comments both here and, I believe, in the other place on possible inequities arising out of proposals to channel corporation mortgage loans to applicants with annual incomes of $5,000 or less. I think we must face up to the fact that regardless of the system used, of the criteria developed, there will always be inequities. We have tried to formulate a plan that will provide the least number of inequities for the fewest Canadian families.

Finally, the $5,000 maximum income figure for eligibility refers, of course, to the average Canadian family. The average family has one or two children and during 1959 some 75 per cent of N.H.A. borrowers fell into these and the no-children categories.

For families that are larger than the average, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is now developing an appropriate adjustment which will probably have the effect of stretching the $5,000 maximum to take care of the needs of the other 25 per cent, that is the smaller number of families with three, four, five and more children.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE TO UNDERDEVELOPED COUNTRIES—CANADIAN POSITION AT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Recently the hon. member for Assiniboia put to my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs a request for a report on the meeting that was held recently in Washington of what is known as the development assistance group. In view of the responsibility of the Department of Finance in relation to external aid programs, perhaps he would permit me to give the house a brief report on that meeting.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to make a report as suggested by him at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This meeting was held in Washington on March 9, 10 and 11. It was the outcome of a decision taken at the meeting of representatives of 13 countries in Paris in mid-January. At that meeting the governments of Belgium, Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Portugal, the United Kingdom and the United States and the commission of the European economic community agreed to meet to discuss the question of techniques and to facilitate the flow of development assistance funds to underdeveloped countries, having discussed also various aspects of co-operation in their efforts to provide such assistance.

The proposed discussions proceeded in accordance with the resolution passed in Paris on January 14. The resolution itself, passed in Paris, serves as the terms of reference of this organization or body now known as the development assistance group. The governments I have mentioned were joined by Japan, which was represented at the meeting as a full and original member with the approval of all other participating governments.

The results of the meeting were encouraging. All who attended the meeting were impressed with the usefulness of the meeting. A communique was issued, and the countries represented indicated their intention to continue to work actively toward the objectives indicated in the original reference. At the invitation of the government of the Federal Republic of Germany it was agreed that the next meeting of the development assistance group will be held in Bonn in June or July next.

Mr. Speaker, it is the view of the government that this new development assistance group will prove to be an effective organ for improving the assistance given by the participating governments to underdeveloped countries, and through a better system of exchanges of information and consultation will increase the effectiveness of existing aid programs and other similar programs.

If it meets with the wish of the house I would be prepared to table copies of the communique issued by the development assistance group at the conclusion of its meeting in Washington.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question, which I asked several weeks ago. Can the minister say whether there was any discussion about areas not now in receipt of assistance but within possible contemplation by various governments? I mean, for example, countries in Africa.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the agenda of the meeting was quite lengthy and detailed, and it covered quite a wide area of discussion. It was called principally to exchange information on the part of governments represented as to their existing programs of aid. Naturally, lines in such matters are not firmly drawn, and I think it was in the minds of the representatives that there are some areas which are better served in this respect than others.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table the communique to which he referred?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PUBLIC WORKS

SHAUGHNESSY HOSPITAL, VANCOUVER —REMOVAL OF EARTH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister of Public Works could say whether the so-called mountain of earth which is causing such a nuisance to residents in and around Shaughnessy military hospital will be removed by the contractor before April 1.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be able to inform the hon. member that the mountain of earth to which he has referred will be removed under the contract by the contractor on or before April 30.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

STEPHEN TRUSCOTT—REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF CONVICTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister had time to note the statement of the minister of reform institutions in Ontario, Mr. Wardrope, in which he expressed serious doubts as to the guilt of Stephen Truscott; and consequently, is there any intention or possibility of making a review of this person's conviction?

Mr. Speaker: If I am not mistaken, the question of clemency is not one on which the ministry can be properly questioned in this house.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I am not asking for clemency; it is the question of a review.

Mr. Speaker: I do not see any difference. It seems to me the same thing.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I will rephrase my question. I ask the Minister of Justice whether he has received any recent communication from the Ontario government or its officials regarding the conviction or custody of Stephen Truscott?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not.

HEALTH INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION TO NORTHWEST TERRITORIES AND YUKON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Could the minister say whether the press reports of yesterday as to the conclusion of an agreement with the Northwest Territories council implementing the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act are correct? Second, what progress has been made with regard to concluding such an agreement with the legislative council of the Yukon?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker, an agreement was signed with the Northwest Territories council yesterday, and satisfactory progress has been made in this respect with the Yukon council. As a matter of fact, I understand they are sitting at this time and probably will be considering the matter.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

VANCOUVER—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DEATH OF INDIAN WOMAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Rodolphe Leduc (Gatineau): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister now in a position to report on the circumstances surrounding the death of an Indian woman which occurred recently in Vancouver, and which he undertook on March 22 to investigate and report his findings to the house?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker. One of the Vancouver members asked that question last week. An inquest has been held; I have had the report of that inquest, and I am preparing a complete report to give the house on this matter.

(Translation):

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO EDUCATION OF ESKIMOS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Is the minister aware of the debate that took place yesterday between Rev. Father Renaud, O.M.I., and his own deputy minister, with regard to the education of natives? Has the minister any comments to make on the matter?

Mr. Pigeon: He has already answered the question.

(Text):

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): No, Mr. Speaker.

"INVITATION TO CANADA"—INQUIRY AS TO FRENCH VERSION OF PUBLICATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Marcel Boivin (Shefford): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Would the minister be good enough to advise the house when we can expect French copies of the booklet just given to hon. members, entitled "Invitation to Canada"?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the hon. member for Hull asked me about a possible French version of this booklet. This booklet is entitled "Invitation to Canada" and is destined primarily for distribution in the United States. The main language there is English, and for that reason that will be the only language in which this booklet will be published.

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): A supplementary question. Does the minister not think he might have a few of these booklets sent to French-speaking countries so they can also be invited to visit Canada?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, this matter of the distribution of the pamphlets of the travel bureau in European and South American countries is under consideration by the department, but no particular decision has yet been arrived at.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

FEDERAL PAYMENTS TO PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if there is anything he could do to expedite the return to the order of the house in response to a question of mine passed on March 9. The question had reference to federal payments to provinces.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): As far as the Department of Finance is concerned, Mr. Speaker, this portion of the information sought by the hon. member was gathered and made available many days ago. I cannot of course answer for the other departments. I presume that in that case more difficult inquiries were involved as a result of the question asked.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I could repeat my question to the Acting Secretary of State.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Secretary of State): The Acting Secretary of State will do everything that is humanly possible to be pleasant to the hon. member.

GRAIN

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF DELIVERIES TO FEED MILLS

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved:

That the standing committee on agriculture and colonization be empowered to examine and inquire into the delivery of grain by producers to feed mills operating in the designated area as defined by the Canadian Wheat Board Act, and to report to the house observations and proposals thereon.

He said: This is a subject which provides a very proper field of inquiry for the committee on agriculture because it deals with a subject which is of great importance to western agriculture.

Over the last five crop years a situation has developed in connection with the feedstuffs industry of the prairie provinces which has created some difficulty. Existing statutes, both provincial and dominion, make all feed plants subject to quota regulations; and those plants that elect to have agreements with the board, making them agents of the board, are required by such agreements to buy from producers at board prices and to issue producers' certificates.

Deliveries of Grain to Feed Mills

The position which has developed is that there have been, and continue to be, two different types of operation of feed plants. One type of operation has elected to have an agreement with the board and conforms with the Canadian Wheat Board Act and provincial legislation; another type of operation does not have an agreement with the board and does not operate in strict conformity with the Canadian Wheat Board Act and provincial legislation. Under the latter type of operation, feed mills may acquire feed grains at a discount under board initial payments.

Feed plants which operate under an agreement and in conformity with the Canadian Wheat Board Act and provincial legislation claim to be at a disadvantage, in that by agreement with the board they are required to buy at board prices and issue producers' certificates, all within the quota. They have repeatedly brought their case to the attention of the board and the government.

According to the records of the board there are 182 feed plants operating in the prairie provinces. These feed plants fall into three main categories, as follows:

(1) Plants operated by large mills, with agreements with the board;

(2) Plants operated by elevator companies, with agreements with the board;

(3) Independent plants which, with a few exceptions, do not have agreements with the board.

Of the 182 feed plants in the prairie provinces, 60 have agreements with the board and 122 do not have agreements. By provinces they are distributed in this way; those which have agreements with the wheat board comprise 17 in Manitoba, 14 in Saskatchewan and 29 in Alberta, making a total of 60. Plants which operate without having signed agreements number 30 in Manitoba, 10 in Saskatchewan and 82 in Alberta, for a total of 122.

In January, 1958, the Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba division of the Canadian feed manufacturers' association submitted a brief to the government of Canada. The main point in their presentation reads as follows:

> The three provincial divisions of the Canadian feed manufacturers' association who submit this presentation now firmly request that existing regulations, whether statutory or administrative, be amended so as to permit feed manufacturers or processors of feed grain to purchase feed grains directly from producers free of quota restrictions, and at prevailing prices on the basis of supply and demand, for processing and resale within the province in which the grain is grown.

In July, 1958 the position of the feed mills was referred to the advisory committee of the Canadian wheat board. The board discussed the requests which had been made for virtual decontrol of the feedstuffs industry and its policy of taking effective action to apply delivery quota policy to feed mills. It was the view of the advisory committee that the provisions of the "exchange" policy instituted by the board in June, 1957 were adequate, and that the board should proceed with its policy of enforcing the Canadian Wheat Board Act as far as feed plants were concerned.

The next step was a consideration of this question by the agriculture committee of the House of Commons last year, and in its report to the House of Commons dated Wednesday, July 15, 1959 the standing committee on agriculture and colonization included the following paragraph:

> The committee further recommends that the whole question of feed mills and their position in the grain trade should be clarified and, if necessary, new legislation introduced.

This, briefly, is part of the background of this situation in the prairie provinces. It appears to be a subject which could usefully be studied by the committee, and in view of its report of last year we are now bringing the matter forward. The committee has power to send for persons and papers. Consequently all interested parties may appear and make presentations. I think this will be very useful in order to clear up any misunderstanding with regard to the operation of the delivery quota system; in order to clear up any misunderstandings there may be with regard to the operation of the feed mills and, in general, with regard to marketing operations as conducted by the Canadian wheat board under the authority of the act. The committee on agriculture and colonization will have ample opportunity during the rest of the session to consider this matter fully and make such report as seems advisable for later consideration by the House of Commons.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): As I listened to the minister I gathered, and I confess I did not recollect this myself, that the committee last year recommended that there should be legislation.

We, of course, have no objection whatever to the motion to refer this subject to the committee. It seems a reasonable thing to do. However, I am surprised that in view of the recommendation which was made last year the government has not some statement of policy of its own with respect to this matter to lay before the house. I would hope that the minister, in replying at the end of the debate, would indicate to us precisely what are the views of the government with respect to this subject, because it seems to me the government has a responsibility for carrying on the affairs of this country and that it should give a lead on questions of this kind. If any useful work is to be done by the committee, it cannot be done without some kind of guidance.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, this resolution may at first glance appear unimportant and innocuous. I find it is an exceedingly disturbing one that could lead to the beginning of a break-down in the orderly system of marketing grain that has been built up over so many years with such great effort by producer organizations and by producers themselves in co-operation with a number of provincial and federal governments.

For those who are not acquainted with the wheat board system of marketing grain and the shipping of grain to mills that presently have agreements, I would like to explain that in the three prairie provinces, in order to deliver grain to an elevator marketing point, such grain to be subsequently exported out of the province, overseas, or processed in the province through mills that have agreements with the wheat board, the grain can be marketed only on permit books which cover the land on which the grain has been grown.

This has made it possible to provide an orderly system of marketing grain. Although I have complained from time to time about discrimination or unfairness in the quotas that apply as between various marketing points, I have never, and I hope I never shall, criticized the principle of quotas and permit books. I am in favour of the wheat board having control over the assembling, storage, buying and selling of grain as defined in the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

Many producers who are acquainted with this operation, to say nothing of people who know very little about it, are often highly surprised to find that the total cost of operation of the wheat board per bushel of grain has been in the past one half cent or up to two thirds cent per bushel. In other words this is an extremely efficient operation that has provided a measure of stability and fairness to the western producer whose grain is covered by this act.

As the minister said, the act does not apply to everyone in every single transaction. It is legal under the Canadian Wheat Board Act, and as far as I know under all prevailing provincial statutes, for one farmer to sell grain to another, for the purpose of feed or seed, outside the wheat board permit system. Further, as I understand it, it is legal for a farmer to sell to any person within the province his grain or any part of it at any price he sees fit. The only limiting law is that the grain purchaser is not at liberty to resell the grain in such a way that it goes through under a marketing permit. Therefore, as the minister pointed out, there are certain feed plants as well as innumerable livestock feeders and other people who from time to time wish to buy and sell grain, who have been purchasing grain in a legal manner directly from the producer.

What happens when this is done? Almost invariably the person or company purchasing the grain takes advantage of the surplus position and the shortage of cash on the part of the producer, and buys the grain at a cheap price. I know businessmen and farmers who may be engaged in the feeding of livestock as a side line who have done nothing to conceal this fact, and as a matter of record they have been very open in advertising for this kind of grain at prices as low as 60 cents per bushel for wheat, which is approximately half the regular initial price for No. 2 wheat in western Canada.

This means that the farmers who must sell their grain at discount prices receive only half what the product is worth. As the minister has implied this undoubtedly is a well-directed campaign organized by the Canadian feed manufacturers' association to escape the provisions of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, and therefore the existing provisions of the law, so they can buy grain from producers at prices, as they state in their request to the minister, governed by supply and demand. That means only one thing, prices lower than the current wheat board marketing prices.

If the agriculture committee should bring forward a decision recommending changes in the act along the lines suggested it would mean a direct bonus from the grain producers to the feed manufacturers. It would mean the feed manufacturers have been given the legal right to chisel grain from the hard-pressed producers at as low a price as they can establish. With a tight money and surplus grain condition this could mean disastrously low prices for grain.

The effect of these proposals is that steps would be taken to reduce the total amount of money paid to grain producers. This reduction would be a direct benefit to the feed manufacturers. I find this a very disturbing move. While I am in sympathy with the reason behind the suggestion of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that there should be some evidence of government policy, I would hope that this motion and the request that the agriculture committee study the matter is not an indication, as I am seriously afraid it is, that the government is going to take a lenient attitude toward this request and open up the marketing facilities on the prairies in such a way as to undermine and undercut the prices for wheat, oats and barley, without doubt to the detriment of grain producers as a whole.

Some may argue that this will mean lower prices to the feed purchasers. That might be an incidental result, but the purpose of the drive is to make money for the feed manufacturers and not to help anybody engaged in the business of producing grain. Grain producers are in no position to have any policy undertaken which would reduce their total gross income. I will not put myself out of order in this debate, but it is well known to hon. members that the great pressure that has come from western grain producers and farm organizations is for the government to take steps to increase their gross income from grain, not to reduce their income, which this proposal if accepted would accomplish.

For the benefit of hon. members I hasten to say that I am speaking on my responsibility as a member of this house. I have not had any submissions from any grain companies whatsoever. I say categorically that no matter whether one or another of those companies may feel there is something for it to gain in this proposal, the implementation of the proposal will do nothing but damage to the grain producers as a group.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the hon. member whether he is not debating the issue as though it were being decided here. All we are deciding in this motion is whether the matter should be referred to a committee which will be able to hear evidence and report back. I do not want to narrow the debate too much, because one must understand the purpose and what problem is to be referred to the committee. I hope the hon. member will not attempt to settle here the problem which the house is referring to a committee.

Mr. Argue: Obviously I am not settling the question. I do not know whether a committee will settle the question. I take it the committee may or may not make recommendations. If recommendations are made for a change, perhaps it will be necessary to have amendments to the Canadian Wheat Board Act; certainly there would need to be changes in the regulations. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, very properly I think, went over some of the difficulties that have been experienced, according to the submissions that have been presented to him, and I have been merely giving the other side of the case which was presented to the minister, in his own words, by the Canadian feed manufacturers' association in January, 1958.

I have been in the House of Commons for 15 years, and I have taken part in a great many debates regarding the Canadian Wheat Board Act. I was here, Mr. Speaker, at the time oats and barley were removed from the act. We had a long and bitter debate on this subject, and it was finally agreed by the government making the proposals to the house and to the provinces that the Canadian wheat board would have certain jurisdiction over oats and barley. The proposals at that time were fully justified. I do not intend to sit here silently and watch any effort by any group to tear down the great benefit that has come from years of constructive effort in building an orderly marketing system for western grain.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the proposal by the Canadian feed manufacturers' association is a misdirected one. This could be the thin edge of the wedge that begins the destruction of the Canadian wheat board system of marketing grain. I am disturbed at times by people who rise in their places in this house and say, "We believe in free enterprise; we are so much in favour of free enterprise that we do not like to see government control". If there is enough of that attitude followed, then they could open up the grain marketing situation, without any controls whatsoever, with absolutely disastrous results to producers in the three prairie provinces.

There may be pressure coming from outside the three prairie provinces; there may be some who feel that if we can break down the wheat board marketing system within the provinces then we can move in huge transcontinental trucking and freight facilities and take the processed feed which has been chiselled from hard-working farmers at 50 per cent of its value and sell it at bargain prices, and go one step further in undermining the orderly marketing system for coarse grains and feed grains within our country. I make an appeal now, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Trade and Commerce to think very carefully on this question before he recommends to his colleagues any changes in the present policy.

The proposals that are made cannot be construed in any way as a help to the small farmer. I have seen, and members from the prairie provinces have seen, certain farmers from time to time accept lower than market prices for their grain. When that happens almost inevitably it is the wheat farmer, it is the small farmer, it is the farmer least able to accept the cut in his price who is forced by financial circumstances to accept those cut-rate, bargain basement prices. This will be no help to the ordinary grain producer; this will merely damage him.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce comes from the prairie provinces. The Canadian Wheat Board Act is being administered under his jurisdiction and in his department. This act is very dear to the hearts of most of the well-informed agricultural producers and leaders in the three prairie provinces. Although this act has been built up though not originated by a previous administration of another party, I would hope that in general the operations of the Canadian Wheat Board Act can be kept apart from and beyond partisan political considerations, and that the Canadian wheat board and the Canadian Wheat Board Act will not be weakened in their jurisdiction and their administration.

When I first saw this resolution, Mr. Speaker, I was naive enough to think it was on the order paper because the wheat board and the government were disturbed by the fact that a substantial quantity of grain is being marketed today outside of the facilities of the Canadian wheat board. I thought this would be an endeavour to plug the leaks and reinforce the orderly marketing system, and that if necessary the government, the committee and parliament might take steps to strengthen the wheat board's jurisdiction and if necessary ask the provinces to enact complementary legislation that this be done.

I would hope that the committee, after hearing all the evidence, instead of agreeing with the drive of the Canadian feed grain manufacturers' association for their own financial benefit, would turn its mind to making recommendations to strengthen the wheat board system of marketing grain. Instead of making recommendations that would inevitably lead to a reduction in the gross income of western producers from grain, the committee might make recommendations to strengthen and increase the returns from grain and improve the wheat board orderly system of marketing grain, which certainly, so far as Canada is concerned, is the best system, in spite of certain failings that some of us point out from time to time, that this country has been yet able to develop.

(Translation):

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, because of this resolution which appears on the order paper in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill), I have been reading various farm newspapers in the prairie provinces in an attempt to learn the views of western farmers on this resolution. Unfortunately, I have not been able to find any indication of the attitude of western farmers.

We would have liked the minister to tell us in greater detail what he has in mind in asking that the committee:

> Be empowered to examine and inquire into the delivery of grain by producers to feed mills operating in the designated area as defined by the Canadian Wheat Board Act, and to report to the house observations and proposals thereon.

We would have liked the minister to go into greater detail before being asked to take a more definite position on this issue.

At this stage of the resolution, when we lack the necessary details, it is hard to say what is behind this bill, or to decide whether it will be beneficial or detrimental to western farmers.

The fact that this motion providing for an examination of the delivery of western grain to the mills is being introduced today probably means, I am afraid, that surprises will be forthcoming at the committee stage. I find this amazing, because in the past there have been agricultural resolutions of a national character which were not submitted to the committee on agriculture and colonization. There was, for instance, the Agricultural Prices Stabilization Act, which was quite important but nevertheless was not considered in the committee on agriculture.

There were also other national matters, such as the legislation on land use, on the conservation of forests and waters, which have yet to be introduced.

In this case, however, it is a matter of local interest, and to my knowledge, it is the first time such a motion is made, proposing that the matter be referred to the committee on agriculture and colonization.

I hope the minister will be giving us more information soon, so that we can be in a better position to assess this legislation, in the interests of western farmers.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the minister going to answer the questions?

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, this is a subject that could involve a very long debate in the house. I gave a brief summary of some of the background material, and certain other matters were filled in by the hon. member for Assiniboia. I think it is perfectly obvious that a committee is the proper place to make a study of such a complicated subject.

Deliveries of Grain to Feed Mills

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate suggested that the government should have either introduced legislation or stated its policy on this occasion. In looking at the report made last year by the standing committee on agriculture and colonization I found that there was not an extensive discussion of this problem, and I reached the conclusion from the recommendation made by them that the committee wanted a much more extensive investigation conducted than was the case last year.

Last year they touched on the problem when they were dealing with the annual report of the board of grain commissioners. They raised a question as to the number of mills licensed by the board of grain commissioners and the number not licensed. They raised a question whether or not P.F.A.A. payments were made by the unlicensed mills. These payments are not made by the unlicensed mills. Two or three similar questions were brought up. There was not an extensive discussion, so the committee ended up with the recommendation that something further be done.

We gave consideration to the question of what type of further investigation should be conducted, whether a commission should be appointed to look into the matter or whether it might better be aired before a committee of the House of Commons. We reached the conclusion that the latter was the best method to follow at this stage.

I consulted with the members of the Canadian wheat board. They said they would welcome a study of the marketing system, the system of quotas and so on. The government has no particular intention with regard to this matter. The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska wanted me to state what my intentions were with respect to the committee. I am not suggesting any plan or giving any directions to the committee whatsoever. The committee are simply being afforded the opportunity to do what they indicated last year they would like to do.

With the reference of this subject matter to the committee its members now will be in a position to call witnesses and have the case presented to them. An opportunity will be provided to interested parties in the prairie provinces to come and state their case before the committee. What the committee winds up with after having reviewed the situation is something we will watch with interest, but the government are not taking any position whatsoever on this problem. We are awaiting the consideration of the whole question by the committee. The committee are widely representative of the farming interests in the three prairie provinces and in part of British Columbia. The members of the House of Commons who are on the committee are farmers with practical experience in the methods that have been followed now for so many years, and they have the background information with regard to the marketing system and the operation of the feed mills.

Nevertheless, there is a matter that requires to be cleared up; whether all mills should be brought under agreements with the wheat board, or whether the situation should be left as it is at the present time. That is a question I cannot answer. There is the question of whether something should be done with regard to the P.F.A.A. payments, reference to which will be found in a question and answer on page 421 of the evidence heard by the committee last year. I am not in a position to answer that question.

And so it goes. The committee could consider the prosecutions that have been undertaken with regard to people delivering to feed mills or feed mills accepting deliveries. Again, I cannot give the answer to the question of whether this system should be continued or discontinued. Under a proper democratic system a committee of the House of Commons, representative of all parties in the house and of the farming interests of Canada, will be able to examine the problem and come to some conclusion.

Whether any change will be required in the act, I am not in a position to state at the moment; but I want it clearly understood that there is no intention on the part of the government to direct the committee in any way. It is intended that there should be a free and frank discussion of a problem which has caused some misunderstanding or disturbed many prairie dwellers. If this is the best way to clear it up, that will satisfy the situation, but it was quite obvious that we had reached the stage where there should be a general airing of the problem. I am sure that many members of the house who have had letters from their constituents or who have written me about this matter would like to have all the evidence submitted.

The committee will be able to call before them the members of the Canadian wheat board, the members of the board of grain commissioners, representatives of elevator companies, representatives of the wheat pools, representatives of the feed mills and individual farmers who have a case to state in connection with these operations. Consequently it will be open to anyone to express his opinion with regard to the operation of the marketing system and the operation of the particular acts that govern this matter and to discuss changes that may be in the minds of some people or, as the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) quite rightly pointed out, who may come forward with measures to strengthen the present system of marketing.

All of this matter is now open to the committee to investigate without any intention, direction or thought in the minds of the government with regard to any changes. The matter is completely wide open without any concealed design whatsoever on the part of the government. I would hope there may be no misconceptions with regard to that matter. This is just a proper democratic procedure to clear the air with regard to certain problems that have arisen over the last few years in the prairie provinces.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister not think that all the arguments he has advanced for this committee apply with equal force to the defence committee which was asked for by my hon. friend?

Mr. Churchill: That is an irrelevant question.

Mr. Argue: I should like to ask a question if I may. It is clear, however, in the minister's mind, is it not, that if changes in policy result from any recommendation or any studies that take place, it is the responsibility of the government for any such change in policy?

Mr. Churchill: Oh, yes; by all means. The government will take full responsibility for any changes that may be subsequently proposed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY ACT

AMENDMENTS TO EXTEND PERIOD OF PAYMENTS AND INCREASE MAXIMUM EXPENDITURES

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act to extend until March 31, 1964, the period during which contributions or payments may be made to the provinces under the act and to prolong until December 31, 1963, the period in respect to which construction costs may be incurred under this act; and to provide also that the aggregate of all expenditures under the act may be increased to a maximum of four hundred million dollars.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Mr. Pearson: Is the minister going to say anything?

Mr. Walker: Hon. members will be glad to learn that I am not going to labour the matter on the resolution stage. The matter was gone into in extenso in the debates in 1949, when the bill was passed; in 1956 when it was amended and when my friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was a member of the cabinet; and again last year when an excellent debate took place at which time the Secretary of State for External Affairs was the responsible minister. All I am going to say this afternoon is that the resolution is divided into two parts.

As to the first, we cannot hope to have the trans-Canada highway completed by the end of 1960 because most of the provinces have not yet completed their part of the project. Because of that fact we are asking for an extension of time from December 31, 1960 to December 31, 1963. We are also asking for an extension of time for the payment of the accounts from May 31, 1961 to May 31, 1964. Because of this extension there will be, of course, further building than we had anticipated. We are therefore asking that the amount of money voted by parliament, which to date is $350 million, should be increased to $400 million.

That is all I have to say at this stage on the resolution. I shall be glad to answer, within my capacity, any questions that might be asked.

Mr. Pearson: The minister has just said that he was not going to labour this question very much this afternoon. Perhaps if there had been a little more labour in the past 12 months it might have brought forth a completed highway. It was a year ago, in the debate to which the minister has referred, that we were told by the minister of that time on February 20, 1959 that with the possible exception of Newfoundland the trans-Canada highway would be completed by the end of this year.

Mr. Walker: May I ask my hon. friend a question? Perhaps my hon. friend does not appreciate the fact that we are not building the highway. The provinces are doing that. If he is blaming any province for not having its share completed. Do I take it that his blame is attributed to the provinces?

Mr. Pearson: I know who is building the highway. It is a co-operative venture between the federal government and the provincial governments. The provincial governments, of course, are responsible for the actual building of the highway but they get support and assistance from the federal government.

Mr. Walker: That is right.

Mr. Pearson: I am repeating what the minister said in this house last year, namely that the highway would be completed by the end of 1960. Indeed we were also told in the report of proceedings under the highway act, on page 1, that such happy achievement would in all probability be accomplished by the end of 1960. If you read that report—and this is the report of operations under the Trans-Canada Highway Act; it is a federal report—you will find the following:

> Present indications are that, with the possible exception of the province of Newfoundland, each of the participating provinces will complete the construction of its section of the highway for 31 December, 1960.

That achievement has not been possible. Therefore the federal government have introduced this resolution on which will be based an act which will require the extension of the period so that this highway can be completed.

It is not so easy, Mr. Chairman, to understand why this highway has not been completed and why the predictions of a year ago have not been fulfilled in the case of British Columbia and Ontario. In Ontario the uncompleted part, of course, is in northern Ontario. The residents there will be disappointed that the road is not yet completed and that the province, which was boasting of its good financial condition a few weeks ago when its budget was introduced, has not been able to finance that part of the highway in northern Ontario or indeed that road which was to be built according to trans-Canada standards to Chapleau from Thessalon and then joining the trans-Canada highway on the lake Superior coast. It is also not so easy to understand why British Columbia should not have completed this highway. That is a province which not so long ago is reported to have burned its mortgage. It therefore could not have been financial consideration that stood in the way of its completion. It is also a province which has a minister of highways who has always shown a burning interest in speeed. In any event, the highway has not been completed and this resolution is required to bring that about.

The trans-Canada highway was one of the projects—this may be forgotten by some hon. members of this house—for national development recommended at the national Liberal convention of 1948 and it was initiated in the following year. Throughout the whole period that the former government was in office the minister who had responsibility for the trans-Canada highway, the Hon. Robert Winters, pushed this project forward with characteristic energy, business ability and zeal.

Originally the federal contribution, as hon. members know, was half the cost of construction with the exception of in the national parks, where of course the federal government bore the full cost of construction of the highway. But in 1955 the federal government of that day decided that an additional incentive was needed to encourage the provinces to complete the road, and as a gap filling incentive parliament was asked, and it agreed, to have the federal government share the cost up to 90 per cent of any 10 per cent of the highway in each province; and of course naturally the provinces picked the 10 per cent which was the most expensive to build.

This amendment in 1956 resulted in greatly increased activity and in some provinces proved a sufficient incentive to ensure completion of the highway. I understand that the highway is now completed in the prairie provinces and in Prince Edward Island. But the experience of 1956 and 1957 made it clear that the cost of building the road was throwing an unfair burden on three of the Atlantic provinces, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. All three of these provinces had to build shares of the road which were disproportionate to their share of the Canadian population and Canadian wealth. Moreover, unlike most other provinces the Atlantic provinces had not shared at all in the substantial federal contribution to the building of new railways and canals.

We felt that on grounds of equity and indeed in the national interest the Atlantic provinces deserved special financial consideration to enable them to complete their sections of the trans-Canada highway. So, Mr. Chairman, the Liberal party at its convention in 1958 recommended, and I quote from the resolution passed at that convention, "Special assistance in the provision of trunk highways in all four Atlantic provinces". Subsequently we stated that in the view of our party the federal government should assume 90 per cent of the cost of completing the trans-Canada highway in the Atlantic provinces. That remains our policy, Mr. Chairman, and we now urge the government in the bill to be founded on this resolution to incorporate a provision to that effect.

Mr. Walker: Would my hon. friend permit a question. When my hon. friend was part of the Liberal government did he or did the government of that day ever make such a proposal to assist the Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Pearson: I have just explained that we did make a proposal in 1956 which increased the federal share.

Mr. Walker: To all the provinces?

Mr. Pearson: All the provinces. Then two years later we made the proposal, in view of the experience with working out that earlier proposal and the special consideration required for the Atlantic provinces, that some special consideration should be given to the Atlantic provinces. That is the proposal we made in 1958 and on which we still stand. We urge the government to introduce a proposal to that effect in the bill which will be founded on this resolution.

We believe that this special treatment for the Atlantic provinces is in the national interest for the following reasons. First, because the Atlantic provinces now suffer under a disability compared with other provinces in the field of transportation. Second, because the Atlantic provinces have a greatly disproportionate share of the national highway to build and a smaller capacity to pay for it than the other provinces. Third, because the Atlantic provinces have proportionately less favourable employment prospects at this time than other provinces, and a speed-up of the trans-Canada highway in those areas particularly would be a stimulus to employment and economic activity in the area, and I know that economic activity would be greatly welcomed. Fourth, the completion of the trans-Canada highway would be a most effective step toward increasing economic development and activity in the Atlantic region.

This should be a very easy proposal for the government to accept because of statements made in 1956 when help was being discussed by members of the then opposition who are now on the government side, some of them ministers of the crown. I recall that in the debate of 1956 the hon. member who is now parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Transport had this to say, as reported at page 2523 of Hansard for March 22 of that year:

> I suggest that this government should pay 90 per cent of the cost of the construction of the whole road.

Mr. Chairman, we are not going as far as that in our proposal. We are suggesting that they pay 90 per cent of the cost of construction in the Atlantic provinces. The present Minister of Justice had this to say, as reported on page 2942 of Hansard for April 16, 1956:

> I said a few words prior to the adjournment on that day in which I had just got to the point where I was seeking to demonstrate that the proposal now before the house—

That is, for 10 per cent of the most expensive part of the road.

> —is neither adequate to ensure the completion of the trans-Canada highway by the date mentioned in the resolution, namely, December 31, 1960, nor is it fair as between provinces which are participating members under the trans-Canada highway agreement.

The Minister of Justice again had this to say as reported on page 2977 of Hansard for April 16, 1956:

> At the present time we are not getting any action. We are not going to have a trans-Canada highway by 1960 as this resolution calls for because this government does not have a sensible, progressive, far-reaching trans-Canada highway policy.

What he meant by that was that the federal government of that day was not paying a big enough share of the cost; so the Minister of Justice will no doubt be in support of this resolution. Then the Minister of Transport had this to say, as reported on page 2955 of Hansard for April 16, 1956:

> I think that we in this parliament, particularly the government, must face up to the hard, cold fact that if this highway is to be built within the foreseeable future, the federal government must assume the financial responsibility for its construction and stop playing around with makeshift methods of trying to get it built.

In short, he was saying that if this highway is going to be built in the foreseeable future the federal government must assume financial responsibility and get on with the job.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member indicate who was speaking at that time?

Mr. Pearson: The present Minister of Transport, the Hon. Mr. Hees, as reported on page 2955 of Hansard for April 16, 1956.

Indeed, the Secretary of State for External Affairs took the same position in regard to the desirability of the federal government paying a larger share, because he said in the same debate, as reported at page 2965 of Hansard for April 16, 1956:

> The government could well afford to offer a larger contribution to the provinces.

In view of the attitude taken by hon. members who are now in the government when they were on this side of the house, we would like to put this proposal to them and we shall, surely, be able to count on their support for what is very modest compared with what they themselves proposed in 1956, namely that the government in the bill to be based on this resolution should assist the three Atlantic provinces in the completion of this trans-Canada highway by contributing the cost of the remaining sections of the highway.

Mr. Herridge: I rise to express the support of this party for the purpose of this resolution. There has been a very hurried assembling of notes on my part; I got notice of this discussion about ten minutes ago. I have always taken a great interest in the building of highways. As a matter of fact, I earned the first dollar I ever earned packing supplies into the mountains for the building of trails. Since that time I have had charge of building many miles of standard highway, so I know something about highway construction. Really, I know a lot about a lot of things, apparently.

On this occasion, when we are talking about the trans-Canada highway system, my mind goes back into the past, the result, perhaps, of the affliction of increasing age. But when I was packing in these supplies I learned for the first time the recipe for what is known as Kootenay mulligan, which was made by the men in the evening for their evening meal. In case anybody is interested in the recipe—

Mr. Pearson: Is it a drink or a food?

Mr. Herridge: I am going to give the recipe now, because I see that the hon. member for Essex East is interested in this, as he is in most things. Here it is:

One empty five-gallon kerosene can
One case of clams
Four gallons of water—

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Herridge:

One bottle of Scotch whisky
One tablespoon of 60 per cent dynamite
Boil for one hour and serve hot.

That brew was actually made on several occasions while I was employed on the first construction job in which I had the opportunity to take part. We have come a long way since those days. I remember that for one road construction job through heavy forest in British Columbia the government of British Columbia allowed the princely sum of $100 a mile—and the road was built 20 feet wide, with the stumps cut off to ground level.

Mr. McGee: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Herridge: Delighted.

Mr. McGee: Would he tell us whether this brew was used for drinking purposes or for removing stumps?

Mr. Herridge: It was used at the evening meal, and it had a most stimulating effect on the crew. I shall never forget one night when, in fear and trembling, with my horses tied up at various trees, I saw that the rest of the crew had taken off all their clothes after dinner. A number of them were Englishmen who had received their education at various universities and who had some knowledge of classical history. They spent most of the night posing around a bonfire on various cedar stumps as Adonis, Venus, Minerva, Diana and Hercules, etc.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did the hon. gentleman say "Venus"?

Mr. Herridge: Yes, in the evening—

Mr. Walker: Is the hon. member suggesting we should revive the making of this brew in order to expedite the construction of highways?

Mr. Herridge: I can say that it was an excellent crew and whether it could be attributed to the effects of the Kootenay mulligan or not the trails were built at very low cost compared with present day costs. I mention this incident to indicate how the circumstances have changed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before the hon. gentleman proceeds—in view of the very interesting story he is now in the process of developing, does he think that the nature of the story from now on is such that the page boys should be asked to leave the chamber?

Mr. Herridge: I am leaving the early history of trail building now and proceeding to modern times.

There has been a latent interest in the trans-Canada highway in Canada for a good many years. If my memory serves me aright, the first Trans-Canada Highway Act was passed in 1919 when the federal government pledged the princely sum of $20 million to be shared with the provinces on the construction of highways within each province, to be used as the provinces themselves designated. The federal government paid 40 per cent of the cost and the provinces paid the other 60 per cent. That initial enthusiasm apparently died down, as far as I had been able to gather, after a few years of experience. Then, in 1932, several measures were passed by the federal government to the general advantage of Canada, in my opinion, under that section of the constitution—I see the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate looking at me; if I make any slips I will refer to him for information concerning the constitutional procedure—providing for public works and other things including highways for the general advantage of Canada. I know that other projects were included at that time—river bank protection, and so on—and I think this was the legislation under which the first work was done on the Big Bend highway round the big bend of the Columbia. The legislation was passed at that time, particularly, in order to provide for unemployment—

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely, the hon. gentleman means "employment"?

Mr. Herridge: Pardon me. I meant to say "to meet unemployment", or "to provide employment", whichever way the hon. gentleman wishes to have it put.

Since I have had the honour of being a member of this house—and I give credit where it is due—under the leadership of the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, the Trans-Canada Highway Act was passed in 1949, though only after a great deal of stimulation from many organizations throughout the country. Incidentally, I may say that the C.C.F. party can take some credit for the victory in this respect, because we have urged the advantages of a national highway program for a great many years. This follows from the fact that our policies are logical and related to planning for the needs of the country and its development.

Finally, we had the recent roads to resources program initiated by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources on a dollar for dollar basis with the provinces. Just what this program has accomplished or may accomplish we are not certain at the present time; the scheme is in its infant stage, but we hope it will grow. The picture will become more clearly defined as the days pass by.

We assume that this legislation now being introduced by the minister is for the purpose of providing funds to enable the trans-Canada highway to be completed. We have all been looking forward to its completion for a number of years. I might say, before passing on, that all this legislation from 1919 onwards indicates that successive federal governments, regardless of their political nature, have had twinges of conscience in connection with their responsibility for the development of a national highway system and the assistance of the provinces in the construction of the trans-Canada highway. There can be no doubt that the development of industry, agriculture and our recreational potential, particularly the tourist industry, makes the development of a national highway system more urgent every day. One only has to read the attractive little booklet published by the Canadian government travel bureau entitled "Trans-Canada Highway" to see how the work which has been done to date has been used as a lure to tourists from other countries, particularly from the United States.

Interesting representations on a wide scale have been made by a large number of organizations to successive governments in this connection especially following world war II when the idea again cropped up that we should do something about a trans-Canada highway. One of the first representations was made by the Calgary board of trade in 1946 to the Right Hon. Mackenzie King the then prime minister of Canada. The brief contains a complete outline of the needs. I will place them on the record because it is obvious that serious thought was given to this question by that board:

Briefly, a few of the reasons why we believe the dominion government should take an active interest in the development of an adequate highway system are as follows:

You will notice they say "system" and not just trans-Canada highway. I continue:

1. To foster and encourage communication between the separate provinces of our dominion with a view of developing a national spirit.
2. To insure Canada to some extent against unemployment.

That suggestion is a possible means of meeting the problem created by seasonal unemployment, particularly in a planned national highways system carried on in co-operation with the provinces given effect to at the time required to do the greatest good with respect to relieving seasonal unemployment. I continue:

3. To attract American tourists and to capitalize on the favourable advertising we have received during the past six years.
4. To keep Canadian tourists at home by making motor travel in our own country as attractive as it is elsewhere.
5. To assist in the development of our natural resources, especially mining and forestry.

That is a fundamental reason, I continue:

6. To provide a better and more adequate postal service in rural areas, and in communities not served by railways.
7. To improve the health of our nation by bringing hospital centres and medical services closer to our rural citizens through the use of motor transport.
8. To develop our educational system by providing roads over which buses may travel and bring the students to the centres where they will receive adequate and proper training. Seven out of ten buses operating in the United States are school buses.
9. To encourage farming by bringing the farmer closer to his market with the use of motor equipment; reducing costs of transportation over short hauls; and making it possible for the farmer to diversify his efforts and market produce which he otherwise would be restricted from doing through lack of roads.
10. To encourage immigration from the United States, where we find the finest type of immigrant that Canada can obtain. Farmers from the middle western states are continually looking for good land such as we have in Canada, but will not move to a country where they are not provided with facilities comparable to those which exist in the country from which they come.

11. To assist the individual owner of a motor vehicle to operate same more economically. It is being suggested that there will be four million vehicles operating in Canada by 1960 if adequate roads are provided.

I think that figure is already exceeded at this time. I continue:

It has been proved, by test, that it costs one half cent per mile more to operate a car on gravel than it does on pavement. It therefore costs an individual who drives his car 20,000 miles in a year, $100 extra; a national economic loss of possibly $100 million a year.

The brief goes on to state:

The United States long ago realized the necessity of national assistance in the building of an adequate highway system and that is why today we find excellent hard surfaced highways extending from coast to coast, and through areas as sparsely populated as northern Ontario.

Northern Ontario has been one of the problem districts so far as building the trans-Canada highway is concerned. The brief continues:

The history of the United States federal highway development is a revelation to most Canadians.

We will admit we are 50 years behind in our development in this respect but if we were to read the history of legislation in the United States and what has been accomplished I think we would learn a great deal. We could use the experience of the United States not only in legislation but as an illustration of the co-operation between the federal government and the states as well as in the administration of highway programs and in the methods used in the building of highways.

The brief deals with the extensive highway system in the United States and refers to the system of highways being developed in Mexico. Anyone who has been to Mexico knows that this relatively poor country from the point of view of Canada's wealth of resources has done a great deal more with its resources in the development of a national highways system than has been done in Canada to date.

This brief written in 1945 urges the dominion government to embark on a program similar to the United States federal aid program providing for the development of a national highways system.

Later on the board of trade of southeastern British Columbia—a most progressive and alert body—made representation to the federal government with respect to the southern trans-provincial highway, being made a part of a national highway system. The latest representations, I understand, have been made by the automobile association of Canada to the present government. They presented an excellent brief. All these representations indicate the growing need for action on the part of the federal government to do something more than has been done in the past.

I will read the concluding paragraph of the brief of the automobile association of Canada to this government:

The Canadian Automobile Association, as a result of these facts and observations, requests the federal government to convene a conference of the federal and provincial governments and representatives of the major municipal governments that would have as its objectives (1) the examination of all matters commented upon in this submission, especially consideration of a national system of highways for Canada; (2) the desirability or otherwise of establishing a continuing body, to be composed of the representatives of federal, provincial and municipal governments, that would act in a consultative capacity, and would make recommendations to the respective governments on the most efficient policies that would serve the national interest in highway construction and administration; (3) the examination and study of present financial responsibilities of governments for road building that would assist governments in accurately assessing this aspect of their mutual financial problems and which would help in the broader field of dominion-provincial fiscal relations; (4) the formulation and projection of road and street programs that would best serve the national interests.

We in this group have no hesitation in supporting the representations of this association. Here is another illustration of the changing circumstances in 50 years. Fifty years ago the members of automobile associations were largely those in the upper crust, the more fortunate in society. What do we find today? The great bulk of members of these associations are working people so when the Canadian Automobile Association makes representations to the government of Canada it does so on behalf of a widespread section of the Canadian people and in so doing does not represent any particular class or interest but a national need.

In drawing my brief remarks to conclusion, I urge the government to take action as quickly as possible in completing the present trans-Canada highway. Meanwhile, a conference with the provinces should be called to prepare for a national highways policy with a view to establishing by mutual agreement and in co-operation, a policy for the building of a national highways system to meet our present needs, to assist in the promotion of the economic development of Canada and provide opportunities for what I would term some massive planning to meet the seasonal unemployment that occurs from time to time in this country.

Mr. Forbes: Mr. Chairman, I wish to express my approval of this resolution to provide funds for the completion of the present trans-Canada highway, but I am of the opinion that we should be providing more money to start a second trans-Canada highway. In view of the fact that the present trans-Canada highway is practically completed in Manitoba and is already completed in Saskatchewan, I would suggest it is time we started on a second trans-Canada highway.

I would further suggest that this highway could well start north of Brandon, follow No. 10 highway through the Riding Mountain national park to a point possibly at Mafeking, or on to Flin Flon, and then extend west into Saskatchewan and lead into Alberta. I understand my colleagues from the western provinces are also interested in this second trans-Canada highway, therefore there is no need for me to say anything about the potentialities of this proposed route except those involving Manitoba itself.

The potentials along the northern route are particularly significant in the light of the future development of our natural resources. In Manitoba it will provide ready access to the extensive mineral development of the Flin Flon area as well as the Thompson-Moak lake developments. In both Manitoba and Saskatchewan it touches extensive forest areas waiting for better transportation to speed the establishment of pulp mills and other forest product industries.

I would like to point out that this route has a far better potential for forest based industries as well as a highway to attract tourists than the southern trans-Canada route. The route would pass through our Riding Mountain national park, and the entire route is in either park land or forest land with numerous lakes and ever-changing scenery of rich agricultural or tree areas.

I contend that the construction of a second trans-Canada highway across the northern areas would be the biggest contribution that could be made under a joint federal-provincial program to the tourist industry in western Canada. At the present time we are nearing the stage where we will have one paved highway across the western provinces. It is a well-known fact that tourists prefer to travel a different route on the return home than on the way out; in other words, a round trip is more interesting than covering the same ground. Not only does this enable the tourist to see more of the country but it also eliminates the tendency, engendered by travelling over the same route, to make the return trip in a minimum of time rather than taking it in a more leisurely fashion, thus spending additional days in the country.

With tourist trade ranking third in terms of foreign exchange, after only pulp and paper and wheat, a second trans-Canada highway should be built with the idea in mind of attracting more tourists to western Canada and encouraging Canadians to see as much of their country as possible.

In conclusion, may I say I hope the minister will give consideration to commencing the construction of this second trans-Canada highway this year. I agree with the hon. member for Kootenay West that the construction of a second trans-Canada highway would add greatly to the employment of men at that time of the year when there is not too much work available, in surveying, brushing and so forth. I hope the minister will give his early consideration to the commencement of this second trans-Canada route.

Mr. Granger: Mr. Chairman, the measure which is to be introduced to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act so that the period of construction may be extended is of particular interest to me and to all of us from Newfoundland, for a large section of the trans-Canada highway goes through my riding. The trans-island road enters my riding just east of Gander and traverses the whole width of it. Only a small part of it is paved and only a part of it has been brought up to trans-Canada highway standards. Part of it is a long difficult stretch known as Halls Bay line, which is far from trans-Canada highway specifications.

The proposed amendment to the Trans-Canada Highway Act is sound as far as it goes but in my opinion it does not go far enough. It should be further amended so that the cost of building the trans-Canada highway would be less burdensome on the tenth province. The number of miles compared with the population and the ability to pay should be taken into account. In order to finish the job I support the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition that the federal government pay 90 per cent of the cost of building the trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland and in the other Atlantic provinces.

I am glad that the Newfoundland situation is known to the Minister of Public Works. Last fall he visited St. John's, Newfoundland, and the press reports indicated that he was very sympathetic. Perhaps I may be forgiven if I may refer to some of the reports of that time. I read from the Montreal Gazette of October 21, 1959:

> St. John's, October 19—Within the powers and capacities of Ottawa, Newfoundland will be given what it has long since deserved, federal works minister Walker said today. He made the statement as he opened a $4,500,000 federal building to house nine government agencies in the Newfoundland capital. Mr. Walker said he is taking back to Ottawa impressions of the island's problems and needs which he will place before the cabinet.

And further:

> This province is entitled to a great deal, he told a conference with Newfoundland journalists yesterday, proceeding to explain that Newfoundland had dropped behind normal Canadian standards of government services because she had entered confederation in 1949, instead of 1867.

He called the trans-Canada highway a gigantic undertaking, requiring a great deal of study. Answering a question regarding the trans-Canada highway across Newfoundland, Mr. Walker said:

"Under the Trans-Canada Highway Act the road is to be built across Newfoundland under a partnership between the provincial and federal governments. I can't say when the highway will be completed, as this also depends on the provincial government, but as far as the road through Terra Nova national park is concerned, for which the federal government alone is responsible, that will be completed in 1960."

And further:

"Will there be any reduction in public works expenditure in Newfoundland next year?" one newsman asked. "Not if I can help it", Mr. Walker replied. "Development here is long overdue", he continued.

Perhaps the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will agree with that. There are other reports, all, I am glad to say, very sympathetic toward us, showing the minister's keen interest in the problems of the tenth province.

I am not alone in believing that increased financial support is necessary if the trans-Canada highway is to be finished in the Atlantic region within a reasonable length of time. The national Liberal convention, in its declared policy early in 1958, said:

The Liberal party, to help remove the economic disabilities of the Atlantic provinces, advocates special assistance in the provision of trunk highways in all four Atlantic provinces for heavy traffic to and from central Canada and the United States, to promote trade and the tourist industry.

The most important of all trunk highways is the trans-Canada highway. Earlier, before the election of 1957, the Progressive Conservative party, in their Atlantic resolutions, promised:

Adjustments of freight rates and provision of transportation facilities to allow our producers reasonable access to the markets of Canada.

And further:

A capital projects program to provide federal capital assistance for provincial projects, destined to enlarge the basic economy of the area.

These are the commitments of the two great parties. The difference, of course, is that we in the Liberal party are in opposition and can only suggest and request, while the Progressive Conservative party is in power and can, if they want to, carry out their promises to provide better transportation facilities in the Atlantic region and to provide federal capital assistance for this important project which would enlarge the basic economy of the Atlantic provinces area.

The most crucial need of Newfoundland is more and better roads and the trans-Canada highway as the spinal column of the provincial road system. In fact, the whole matter of transportation is of the utmost importance to the tenth province and I trust that all Canadians may realize the necessity of bringing the trans-island road in Newfoundland up to trans-Canada specifications and bringing transportation in Newfoundland abreast the rest of Canada.

To my way of thinking the lack of transportation facilities in our province is the concern of all of our nation. When Newfoundland became a member of the Canadian family it was the general intent, and the public seemed to agree completely, that as soon as possible the tenth province would enjoy the public services so long enjoyed by those who have had the benefits of confederation for half a century. One of the greatest of all needs is an adequate road system.

Historically, most of the province's transportation was done by sea. The island was settled by men whose business was fishing and they settled along the deeply indented seacoast as near as possible to the fishing grounds. Hundreds of settlements grew along our coastline. Transportation was mostly by water. The schooner was the stagecoach and the small boat the cab. In time coastal steamers provided more regular service, but the whole of transportation was largely seasonal and isolation was accepted as part of the way of life. This continued for generations, and when road building did begin it was restricted for two main reasons, lack of money and difficult terrain. I might add that these two severe restrictions are still with us at the present time.

Like the other Atlantic provinces, Newfoundland cannot boast of the flourishing economy with which some other parts of the country are blessed. The result is that there are not sufficient funds to build as quickly as is desirable and to maintain the road system which is necessary if the province is to maintain a rate of progress commensurate with the rest of Canada.

I do not think it is necessary, or for that matter proper, to dilate upon the matter of economic ability here except in so far as it affects road building. I should like to emphasize that our province has improved greatly since confederation but at a cost which is draining its resources, and the greatest drain of all is the trans-Canada highway, a highway which Newfoundland must have if she is going to develop.

Before going further I should like to speak briefly on the general concept of the trans-Canada highway. Certainly it was an enlightened move and followed in the traditions of those who dreamed of and built the great transcontinental railways. Great Canadians of the past were well aware of the need for and value of a transportation system. They realized very clearly that transportation was the real key to nationhood. They acted with wisdom and daring and they employed the means of transportation which in their day was the most efficient, the railway. At that time the railway was the most modern and efficient means of transportation. Water transportation, with all its great values, was limited in its uses, and while water transportation provided and still provides vital services it could not do the job which nationhood required. Land transportation could and at that time the railway was the best means available.

I mention this to show that it was not railways as such which the statesmen of the day were concerned with but rather transportation, transportion on a national scale, which was the business of the federal government and which only the federal government could effectively create. The value of rail transportation, its effect on unifying the nation, of which there is living proof in the cities and towns to which the railways gave birth, strength and vigour, and the unity with which Canada has been blessed are all matters of history now. But it is in the light of this history that the trans-Canada highway must be viewed, for whether the transportation is by narrow ribbons of steel or by broader ribbons of concrete the results to nationhood are the same and the principle is the same although the practice is not. The same national concept of transportation is applied to the modern air lines, and who can deny the great service which the federally instituted Trans-Canada Air Lines had rendered Canada.

Canals too have received much federal support. In fact, federal governments of the past were very much alive to federal responsibility in transportation. But in between the railways, canals and air lines the evolution of transportation worked strange wonders with roads. Roads were largely parochial until the advent of the motor car when they were extended from populous centres until they become provincial, and although the twentieth century rolls along on the wheels of motor cars and the whole pattern of transportation has changed, roads still remain anchored to parochial and provincial traditions while in fact the highway has long since surpassed the railway in its importance to national unity and growth.

The originators of the trans-Canada highway recognized the importance of a road from one coast of Canada to the other and the great movement was launched. It was farsighted and enlightened and on the whole has worked out amazingly well. But time has marched on and, like every device of man, weaknesses show up which have to be corrected. The formula that launched the highway and brought it close to fruition needs adjustment to finish the job.

The sharing of costs between the provinces and the federal government on a 50-50 basis was eventually modified so that 90 per cent of the cost of some sections would be borne by the federal government. The reason simply lies in a practical assessment of the facts. Half the cost of building a road to trans-Canada standards was too high an amount to be borne by some of the poorer provinces. Directly and indirectly the trans-Canada highway is of benefit to all of Canada for highways in fact truly carry traffic both ways. This one great road, this trans-Canada highway, is in fact the nation's business. Delay in the completion of the trans-Canada highway has come about because of the kind of terrain, the distances involved, density of population and the ability to pay. In all of these respects the formula is unfair to Newfoundland. Within my own district of Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador there are 151½ miles of trans-island road and of this 18.8—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It is now five o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, before we proceed to private and public bills, I wonder whether I could ascertain from the leader of the house if I am correct in understanding that we go on with the supplementary estimates at eight o'clock.

Mr. Churchill: That is correct, and if we complete them in short order we will come back to the trans-Canada highway resolution.

Mr. Morton: Mr. Speaker, may I refer to orders Nos. 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75 and 76 and on behalf of the sponsors of these private bills ask that they be given precedence over divorce bills. In some cases delay may bring hardship on the companies concerned. With respect to the bill I am sponsoring I know that the company hopes to start operations by May 1. We have had consent before that such bills take precedence.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sorry, sir, but I am afraid we cannot agree.

Mr. Peters: On behalf of the C.C.F., may I say that we will be very pleased to have these bills brought forward. We believe that this is not—

Mr. Speaker: It is obvious there is not unanimous consent. We shall proceed with the order paper.

Mr. Howard: Unadulterated Liberal obstruction.

Mr. Pickersgill: Obstruction?

Mr. McCleave: Talk about obstruction: C.C.F. hypocrites.

PRIVATE BILLS

DONALD SNOWDON

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-31, for the relief of Donald Snowdon—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): With regard to this Bill No. SD-31, may I say that it seems to me there are a great many inconsistencies and contradictions. There are in this bill any number of things which make one wonder how it could have been passed in its present form without at least being tidied up a bit. The first inconsistency we find here may be a minor one but, as I say, in order to tidy the bill up I think something should have been done at some stage. At page 5, which contains the petition, we find that clause 5 thereof states as follows:

5. That after the said marriage your petitioner lived and cohabited with the said ... and there is living of the said marriage one child, ... age seven years.

Then when we look at page 12 of the evidence given before the committee we find that the petitioner was asked this question by one of the hon. senators:

Q. Have you been looking after your little boy since you separated?
A. Yes.
Q. How old is he now?
A. Eight years old.

This may be a minor mix-up but at the same time it is something which, when taken into consideration with the evidence as a whole, points up one of the many things which I intend to point out, one of the many inconsistencies contained in the evidence presented in connection with this bill.

Mr. McCleave: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Yes.

Mr. McCleave: Will he not agree that the petition was dated the 16th day of July, 1959 and the boy could have grown a bit since then?

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I thank the hon. member for pointing out that fact. Possibly that may be one of the things I overlooked in this bill. That would account for this particular difference. I hope the rest of the inconsistencies I intend to bring out can be explained as easily.

We have, for example, on the night in question, which I believe was June 18, 1959, the date on which the alleged adultery occurred, a description of the apparel worn by the respondent and the corespondent. We find at page 12, when the petitioner was being questioned—I believe this time by the attorney, Mr. Cohen—the following questions:

Q. Could you tell us what happened on the 18th of June, 1959, at 5175 Charles roi in Montreal?
A. I went there myself. I found the address where she was living and I went there about 9 o'clock on the evening of June 18. I rang the doorbell, she answered; she was in her nightgown—

Then again, on page 12, the question was asked by Mr. Cohen:

Q. The madam was in the nightdress and ... was in his pajamas?
A. Yes.

Then on page 14, in an answer which the petitioner gave to one of the hon. senators:

When I went there this man was sitting there with her and she was in her nightgown and he in his pajamas.
A. Yes.

Then over on page 15 when the respondent was being questioned she was asked, again by the attorney:

Q. How were you dressed that evening?
A. Baby doll pajamas.

I do not profess to be an expert; I do not know the difference between a nightdress, a nightgown and baby doll pajamas. I do not know whether she was wearing one or all three. But if she was wearing all three, it might lead one to wonder how the alleged offence took place.

An hon. Member: Ways and means.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Then we have again some inconsistency with regard to the residence of the corespondent. If we look at page 15 of the evidence, when the corespondent was being questioned by the clerk of the committee, he was asked his name and his age and we find the following question:

Q. Where do you live?
A. 7100 Querbes, Montreal, Quebec.

Then again when he is questioned by the attorney, we find the following question:

Q. ... have you ever had sexual relations with ... and if so, more particularly on June 18, 1959 at your residence at 5175 Charles roi?

I do not know whether his residence was at one place and he was living elsewhere or whether his residence was the other place and he was living some place else again. But to me there seems to be a contradiction. I will grant you it may not be a serious contradiction but at least it is one that should have been tidied up before this bill was passed.

An hon. Member: Surely you can do it anywhere.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Maybe the hon. member has more experience than I have in that line.

Then we come to the matter which is the basis for the divorce being granted, namely the proof of adultery. If we look again at page 5 which contains the petition, article 7 thereof which states as follows:

7. That on or about June 18, 1959, at 5175 Charles Roi, city of Montreal, district of Montreal, in the province of Quebec, the said . . . committed adultery with . . . who resides at 7100 Querbes, apt. 3, city of Montreal, district of Montreal, in the province of Quebec.

But then when we turn again to page 12 we find his question: This is a question by the attorney Mr. Cohen. I would submit that it is not a question at all but rather a statement supposedly placed in the form of a question. The question reads as follows:

Q. Since the date of the adultery on the 18th of June, 1959, have you ever had sexual relations with your wife?
A. No.

I submit that is not a proper question. That is a statement rather than a question. If it can be classified as a question at all, it is certainly a very leading one. Then on the same page we find the following question. This again is a question by the attorney to the plaintiff in this case. The question reads as follows:

Q. Was there any conversation between you and your wife at that time? Did your wife tell you anything at that time?
A. Nothing. I just said that I had come to visit her and wanted to know where she was living.

Then further down on the page we find the following question:

Q. Did your wife . . . admit living as man and wife with . . . ? Did she admit living with him and having sexual relations with him?
A. No.

Hence it is conclusive that, on both statements contained in the question by the same attorney, the allegation had no basis in fact, at least at that time. This, of course, is supposed to be the day on which the offence was committed. Also at least a shadow of doubt is cast on the statement in article 7 contained in the petition.

Now let me turn to something else, Mr. Chairman. If we look at page 12 we see the question I read a moment ago:

Q. . . .Did your wife tell you anything at that time?
A. Nothing. I just said that I had come to visit her and wanted to know where she was living.

Then on page 13 we find this question by one of the hon. senators:

Q. What did you say to her?
A. I said I had come to visit her. She had a child of her own before our marriage, and we had looked after him.

Then the same senator asked:

Q. When you went to this house where she was living in 1959, give us the conversation you had when she opened the door.
A. When she opened the door she said "Oh Donald." I said "Hello", that I had come to see her. I did not stay too long. I stepped in the doorway for a while, and she introduced this fellow.

Then on page 14 the solicitor jogs his memory a little. He asks:

Q. May I refresh your mind? When you came to my office did you not tell me that your wife said she wanted to marry—

—the respondent, and the answer is yes. The same senator had questioned this matter closely on the previous page because it apparently bothered him. He then asked:

Q. I already asked you about the conversation. It seems difficult to get it.
A. It is over a year since I went there. I went there for one purpose to see how she was living. When I went there this man was sitting there with her—

And so on. It seems to me that this a pretty loosely knit case. I think it is one that certainly could stand much closer scrutiny and I submit that evidence of this kind would never pass any court. I am sure the hon. members of this house who are lawyers would never permit testimony of this kind to go unchallenged. I think this committee should study this matter a little more closely before this bill is passed.

MARY NISBET CLEMENTS

The house in committee on bill No. SD-32, for the relief of Mary Nisbet Clements—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, this case appears to me to be one granted by the Senate committee on the ground of desertion. I believe the hon. senators are perfectly within their rights in saying that adultery does not have to be proven and that desertion is a good cause for divorce; that they can grant divorce on the ground of desertion if they wish. But I am surprised in reading this particular bill at the fact that it does not establish very clearly who wants this divorce, the man or the woman. It would appear to me that they both want it quite a bit, and I think this is ascertained from the evidence.

The evidence indicates that this divorce has been arranged by agreement. The husband deserted the wife in the first place and they are both very happy to be freed from the contract of marriage. The wife points out that she had some trouble with her husband, that he was very expensive. It was a luxury she did not feel she could afford. She points out that she had to keep him. He did not particularly like being married. Though she had known him for some time she had not found out how expensive his tastes were. She says she had to pay as much as $800 to $900 expenses incurred by her husband, and that this was a calamity that she had not intended to have visited upon her and that she could not afford to keep this particular husband. Anyway, the problem was solved because he left her and so deserted her.

I think that in looking at this case the senators felt that the desertion and the fact that he was a very expensive husband were grounds anyway for granting this divorce, and I agree with them. Even in this type of case where there is some agreement it is surprising that questions asked are as inconsistent as they appeared to be in the case we have just listened to. For example, in answer to the question "Was he working right along?", she answered:

> No, he just held a job until a seizure was put on his salary and then he left, and I never knew where he was until he came back.

She has already said he had not come back, that he had left, that his desertion was a permanent affair, but I suppose this inconsistency is not of any importance anyway.

I would like to read the type of evidence given in this particular case to prove the adultery charge. I think it will be agreed that this evidence did not prove an adultery charge at all; the question hinges on desertion and the fact that this woman was much better off without this expensive husband, because her job at the office did not pay enough to keep the poor chap. The adultery section of the bill was brought out by Senator Bradley in his questioning on page 13 as follows:

> Q. What time of the day was this?
> A. About 10 o'clock in the evening. We knocked on the door which was opened by Mr. Clements, who was in bluish-grey pyjamas. I identified myself, told him the purpose of our being there, to get evidence to use in a divorce at a future date. He invited us in, very cordial like. It is a two bedroom house, a bedroom is on the left hand side. The first bedroom was one that had been used. The next bedroom they were using as a utility room; a living room on the right hand side, and a kitchen at the back of that. In the living room there was another young lady, who Mr. Clements introduced me to as Chloe Thomas. He said, "This is the woman I am living with right now."
> Q. That is what he said?
> A. He did definitely say so, sir, right in her presence and that of my associate.

Let us look at this for a moment. I suggest that evidence would indicate that there were two ladies in this house, and I think the sponsor of this bill has been very slack in not ascertaining who the first lady was. It may even be possible that it was the wife who was the first lady and the second one was the one introduced as the corespondent.

On page 12 there appears this question:

> Q. Do you know this woman Chloe Thomas?
> A. No, I don't.

I wonder why they asked her if she knew Chloe Thomas? I suggest that the lawyer in this particular case knew that she knew Chloe Thomas and that the two ladies were together in the house with the gentleman. I would also suggest it is rather surprising that at 10 o'clock in the evening they were both wandering about in pyjamas, because in modern living in the city it is not normal for people to go to bed very early. We are not suggesting that this was a one-night stand. We are suggesting they were living together in common law and I suggest therefore it is not normal for them to be standing around in pyjamas at ten o'clock in the evening unless they have invited the detectives to come that particular night.

I am happy if the Senate has seen fit to grant this divorce on the ground of desertion. I am happy to note that the Senate has decided that a common law alliance will do; that instead of proving adultery, testimony can be given: this is the name of the woman I am living with right now. I am happy that as long as a man will do this it will be accepted as grounds for divorce. I think the Senate is to be complimented on broadening the grounds for divorce and holding that adultery has no longer to be proven.

JOHN THOMAS FRANCIS WHITE

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-33, for the relief of John Thomas Francis White —Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Howard: If I may, I will make a comment or two on this bill. I had thought in my mind that I might at this stage make some comments also about an extremely unkind and unwise remark passed when we entered upon this particular hour by somebody at this end of the chamber. The remark had to do with hypocrisy, but on reflection I realize that such a discussion would be out of order, no matter how unfair and derogatory the remark itself was.

With respect to this particular bill now before us, I should like to point out that it is one to which we should pay somewhat more attention than to certain of the others, because there are two young children born of this marriage, who are involved. One of them is ten years of age, and the other is eight. In addition, this is one of those instances where private investigators or private detectives are concerned and in which they gave evidence on behalf of the petitioner. I should like to make some comments about the evidence which was given by one of these investigators and draw some conclusions with regard to it later on.

The couple in this case were married in 1948, and they parted in April, 1959. An indication is given on page 10 of the evidence in a question put by Mr. Joyal, the barrister who appeared as counsel for the petitioner, when he asked of the petitioner:

Q. When did you cease living with her?
A. Some time this spring. In April, after I had been told she had been seen with somebody else.

Then, later on, the question was asked by Senator Taylor:

Q. That would be April, 1959?
A. Yes.

The respondent—the wife—now has the children, and it is pleasant to note that the committee of the other place, as indicated in the evidence, was concerned about the welfare of the children although they are, apparently, restricted in their consideration of that sort of thing, because it is none of their business, and none of our business, if we are to follow the rulings which were given earlier. Nevertheless I think that though strictly speaking this question may be outside our authority it is a matter which we ought to consider, whether we deal with it openly and express ourselves here in the committee, or whether we keep it to ourselves. I think we must consider what might happen to the children involved not only in this case but in all other such cases if we are to discharge our responsibilities.

This reference to the care of the children is more a hope than an actual indication of something which will exist. On page 12, reference is made to a question asked by the chairman, Senator Taylor. He said:

Q. You mentioned you would like to be able to take the children yourself—

The question is addressed to the petitioner

—and bring them up as they should be brought up. Is there any hope of your doing that?

A. I have made arrangements for an aunt and uncle to move in with me, and my aunt to take care of the children. I feel once I have this divorce and I get a legal separation in the province of Quebec giving me the right to have the children—

I do not know what the possibilities are of the petitioner obtaining a legal separation and custody of the children in the province of Quebec. I do not know what his chances are of obtaining an endorsation of the decision of the committee in so far as his present petition is concerned, though I should imagine his chances are relatively good. I mention this because I think it is something with which we should concern ourselves. The petitioner is at present supporting the children financially, even though the respondent has the children in her care. This is also indicated on page 10 in reply to a question asked by a senator:

Q. What do you mean by saying she has the children at present?
A. I intend that in the future I shall have them as this becomes legal. In the meantime she is maintaining them and I am paying the room and board for her and the children.
Q. You are?
A. Yes.

I raise this matter not only because I think we should concern ourselves with the welfare of the children and their maintenance together with their opportunities for education and so on if the divorce should be approved, but because notwithstanding the indication given by the hon. member for Halifax on another occasion that it is not within our jurisdiction to deal with the question of custody and maintenance of the children, I think it is within our responsibility to speculate and wonder about the welfare of these children in cases where petitions are granted. With regard to this case, I certainly hope that the desires of the petitioner as indicated on page 12 will be met. I feel that his aunt and uncle will provide the children with the best upbringing that is possible for them to give.

I should also like to indicate the possibility of some understanding, some arrangement, existing with respect to this particular divorce, and to suggest that the evidence, was to a degree, manufactured. Perhaps I could refer to one of the investigators whose name is Charles Charron.

I notice that you are looking around the chamber, Mr. Chairman. Is there a quorum of 20 members present so that I shall be able to proceed? I certainly hope that hon. members are not so lax in the discharge of their responsibilities as to allow us to be left with less than 20 present.

An hon. Member: So as to be bullied by three.

Mr. Howard: We are not bullying anyone. We are not bullying a soul. We are indicating that if parliament is to be asked to pass divorce bills it should accept the responsibility of studying them instead of rubber stamping the bills.

Mr. McCleave: How do you fellows know, you never show up at the committee?

Mr. Howard: I cannot because I am not a member of it. Even though the hon. member extended an invitation to me to attend one day I had to decline because I had made a previous arrangement.

On pages 12 and 13 evidence is given by the detective, Mr. Charron, who appears on behalf of the petitioner and who was questioned by counsel for the petitioner. Although the evidence is not usual it has some bearing on what I intend to say later and therefore I shall read it. Mr. Charles Charron was sworn and gave his occupation as investigator. He was questioned by Mr. Joyal, counsel for the petitioner, as follows:

Q. Here is exhibit 2, a photograph. Who is that?

Mr. Charron replied, giving the name of the respondent. I continue:

Q. Was this photograph given to you by the plaintiff in this case?
A. Yes.

I will delete the names of the central figures in this case and the address as I go along. I continue:

Q. Do you remember seeing this Mrs.—on or about the 14th of March?
A. I saw her quite a few times with the same guy that we caught her with at—a duplex upstairs. On a Saturday morning I went there at nine o'clock and Mrs.—came out about one o'clock in the afternoon and she went out. So I lost her. She took a bus and I lost her. So I came back to the house and waited there and about three o'clock she came back with a man and they went up to the house. I went to the telephone booth on the corner and telephoned for Mr. Morin—

Mr. Morin is another detective who appears in this case. I continue:

—to come and meet me, and he met me at four o'clock and we went upstairs and knocked at the door several times before Mrs.—came and opened the door with a pink dressing gown on and bare legs. I asked if she was Mrs.—and she admitted it and I showed her the picture I had in my possession and she admitted it was one taken of her, and we walked into the bedroom and there was a man in bed. So I asked the man his name and when I asked him his name he sat in the bed and you could see that he was nude. His legs were bare. So he said—So she started to scream so we went away.

Is there anything more foolish than to ask us to accept this evidence? Can you imagine two complete strangers at four o'clock in the afternoon being admitted to a home by a woman in a dressing gown who states her name in response to a question, and identifies a photograph of herself, and does not protest when the two strangers walk into the bedroom and begin questioning the nude man in the bed? The detective testified that the woman then began to scream and they left. This occurred at four o'clock in the afternoon and the people had returned home about an hour previous. This is pretty hard to swallow. If this were the only case in which such events occurred the evidence would not be so difficult to accept but the detective is not a novice at this sort of thing.

According to information given in the Senate in answer to a question asked by Senator Pouliot, this detective appeared in 36 cases before the Senate committee in 1959, 41 cases in 1958 and 19 in 1957. He has served his apprenticeship as an investigator in divorce cases. He knows all the answers and what arrangements to make in order to gain entry into homes.

The same individual is also involved in Bills Nos. SD-34 and SD-35 in which his evidence is almost identical except that in the case of Bill No. SD-34, the respondent is a man and the corespondent a woman. He testified that after the completion of the investigation the man started to get angry and so he and his companion left and in one instance he testified that the man started to get angry and pushed him out. I realize it is not in order to discuss other subjects when a bill is before the committee but the frequent appearance of this man in these cases and his behaviour pattern is a point I wish to draw to the attention of the committee.

One wonders from reading his evidence if his questions and answers are not like a gramophone record and if he mentions hostility on the part of the individuals concerned in order to create the impression that no collusion has taken place. I think the gentleman protests a little too much.

The evidence of this man, Mr. Charron, is corroborated by that of another detective, Mr. Morin, who confirms that the woman answering the door wore a pink dressing gown, that they went to the address at four o'clock in the afternoon, that the woman identified the photograph and gave her name, that the nude man in bed identified himself, and so on. It is therefore not a mistake on the part of the first detective when he stated in the evidence that the woman started to scream and so they left.

I submit Mr. Chairman that if she started to scream and if this scream was an indication of objection to those two strangers being there, then it might be quite natural for that scream to be translated eventually into a charge of illegal entry, unless she allowed them to come into the house herself, which is even more strange, if they pushed their way in. If they did that and walked into the bedroom, they were in effect making an illegal entry, and she started to scream. Would it not be logical to assume that they would sit down and that an attempt would be made to find out who those people were and have charges pressed against them. That is not what happened. It may be logical to assume she invited the investigators in because they were not strangers. She knew what was going to happen; she knew they were going to walk into the house; she knew they were going to ask who the particular person was who was in the bedroom, what his name was, in order that his name might be presented in evidence to guarantee that he was the corespondent and that, in fact, he was not her husband. I submit this is the situation.

It is extremely unfortunate, Mr. Chairman, that people have to go to these lengths to fabricate the situation, to manufacture it, to develop it out of thin air, regardless of whether or not adultery had taken place between the corespondent and the respondent. That is beside the point, but it is unfortunate to have to manufacture, to develop, to fabricate a situation and pay $300 to $400, or whatever the charge is, to those so-called investigators who apparently, from the number of cases in which they are involved, have a pretty decent income, and who do relatively little work except phone somebody up and say, "Will you be in a particular apartment at four o'clock with a pink negligee?" They will probably provide that for the person if she has not one herself. They say, "We will come along". That is about the extent of the operation that is carried out by those investigators. It is unfortunate that people have to go to this extent, pay $300 to $400 and pay I do not know how much to the lawyers. I have had figures running from $1,000 to $1,500. Then pay the cost of the private petition to the other place, plus the cost of transportation of the witnesses and the lawyer to the meeting of the committee in the other place and back again, in order to meet the requirements of a statute. It is extremely unfortunate that this sort of thing exists.

What it means, Mr. Chairman, is that we are developing a situation where the rich can get a divorce but the poor cannot because they cannot dig up $2,500. If the poor cannot find it someone else will have to pay it for them. Because of the general situation that is indicated here, this was a strained marriage in so far as its relationship was concerned. There was evidence given to that extent. The petitioner points out that there is no hope of reconciliation. He would like to bring his children up under different arrangements. A broken home could have extreme psychological effects upon the children which would affect them in their later years.

There is no evidence of relations having taken place between them. They tried everything. They have gone to the welfare people and there was trouble almost from the start. The wife said she would be quite willing to live in the same house but would have no relations with the husband. At meal times there was a complete disregard of the husband in so far as meals are concerned. She hardly talked to him except to ask for money. She would not bother to have anything to do with him. These circumstances are not the ones in which a family should be raised.

If we take all these things into account it would appear—I hope this is so—that the children themselves will remain in the custody of the father. This is what will happen if the hopes and feelings of the petitioner come to full realization. If he is able to get custody and have them under his supervision he says that his aunt can look after them or can do the work a wife would normally do in raising children. If that takes place, then they will probably grow up in a much better home environment than would be the case if this divorce were not allowed to be proceeded with.

I raise this question. The investigators have been mulcting the unfortunate souls of every penny they have. People have to make arrangements in order to secure evidence to meet the requirements of the law. In many cases I am sure they have to perjure themselves in order to ensure that the requirements of the law are met. This is an unfortunate reflection upon our system of considering divorce cases. This arises not only in the particular province where these people live but in other provinces as well where the law is just as strict.

This is probably sufficient comment from me on this point to give to the committee my point of view and understanding of what existed. Perhaps others may have some comments to make on the question of whether adultery took place and whether there were arrangements or not. I submit it is quite clear that this evidence was manufactured; it was fabricated. An investigator had to be hired at a cost of $300 or $400, or something of that nature. These people are placed in the unfortunate position of having to go through these steps in order to obtain just an equitable relief for themselves, when, from the evidence, nothing but harm would accrue if the divorce were not granted and the people who would suffer the most are the children. They are ten and eight years old. They will have a much better opportunity to grow up in a less strained and more decent environment than they would have if the divorce were not granted.

Mr. Peters: I am quite concerned with this case, too, because this appears to me to be what I would call a run of the divorce mill that is being operated in the Senate. As the hon. member for Skeena has pointed out, we have in this case the ingredients that make for the effective functioning of this divorce mill. We notice another aspect of this case, Mr. Chairman, that indicates—and it has been indicated in the detective's evidence—that this is an operation which is carried out in a cold and calculated manner by the legal authorities also. Hon. members will notice that in this particular case the lawyer was Mr. Joyal, a barrister-at-law, Ottawa, Ontario. From his questioning it is evident that he is a very competent lawyer and a very capable one. In his questions he leaves no alternative but to get the answer he wishes. He asks the question in such a manner that he cannot help but get the answer he wants. He asks questions like this:

Q. You have no intention at the moment of adopting a new domicile?
A. No.

I suggest that this is a planned question. He did not ask: Do you intend to live in the province of Quebec? Are you giving up your home? Have you any intention of moving out of the province of Quebec? No. He asks this question:

You have no intention at the moment of adopting a new domicile?

Putting in the words "at the moment" would indicate that there was some question of the domicile. Mr. Joyal, being very scrupulous and honest as a member of his profession, asks the question in such a way that he gets the answer he wants. Even if the fellow intended to move in four or five hours, at the moment he has no intention of adopting a new domicile. As was indicated to the committee a few days ago, "domicile" does not necessarily mean where your house is but where you decide to set up your domicile, and it does not necessarily change because you move from place to place.

Mr. Joyal goes on to ask the questions in a very precise manner. I think it would be advantageous for the committee to examine the number of cases that Mr. Joyal handles in this divorce mill because I made inquiries and I found that the lawyers have raised their price within recent times. Their fee to handle a case before the Senate committee used to be $1,000 but now they have raised it. The best information I can get is that they have raised it to $1,500.

Mr. McCleave: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Peters: Certainly.

Mr. McCleave: Does the $1,500 include disbursements to detectives? Will he break down that amount to give us the lawyers' fee and can it be related to this case?

Mr. Peters: I do not know if that amount includes the detective fees. We will come to the detective fees in a moment and probably now is a good time to do it. The investigator in this case, Mr. Charron, has handled 36 cases this year. It is true that he is not the senior man. Mr. Etheridge has handled 67 cases this year so Mr. Charron is not by any means the senior man. However, he is not the junior in this field because he handled 36 cases.

These investigators operate with the legal profession and if you check the evidence you will find that it takes a few days for them to complete their work on a case. Sometimes, as in the previous case, they are occupied for several months. I am not too sure how much money they are paid but I have been told that it is at least $25 a day plus expenses and other costs. If Mr. Charron had 36 cases and takes an average of 10 days per case he works for 360 days in a year. As a member of a union I object to him working for that number of days. I think he should at least be able to leave this dirty business alone on Sundays. I presume he has not a union contract and therefore can work overtime if he wishes. He probably calls himself an entrepreneur who runs his own business.

Mr. McCleave: Will my hon. friend permit a question? Will he try to unionize these detectives and have them join the labour party that the C.C.F. is forming?

Mr. Peters: I certainly would like to organize them because if they were organized I think we could demand that they meet certain conditions. If they were organized they would not be able to break down people's doors or steal nameplates off doors. I think we would limit them to certain hours. They would have to work shifts.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): How about moonlighting?

Mr. Peters: I think I agree with the sponsor of the bill that this would be a very good thing and we would like to do it. It appears to me that Mr. Charron only has five days off in a year and in my opinion he is entitled as a human being to more time off. If we get these people organized—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I do not think the committee is concerned about the organization of these people. We are concerned with Bill No. SD-33.

Mr. Howard: If I may make a comment about the point of order, I respectfully submit that my friend is out of order because in labour matters there is divided jurisdiction. It is obvious that this is a matter that comes under the provincial labour code and not the federal labour code.

Mr. Peters: I appreciate the advice that is being given about the organization of these people. As I was pointing out, Mr. Charron earns considerable money. If he gets $25 a day and works 360 days because he has 36 cases he earns at least over $9,000—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must advise the hon. member that the committee is not concerned with the earnings of certain investigators. We are concerned with Bill No. SD-33. I will have to ask the hon. member to come back to the bill.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I humbly submit that some of these investigators, this one in particular, are organized in some ways. Let us look at his evidence and see how stereotyped it is. He is asked this question by Mr. Joyal:

> Q. Here is exhibit 2, a photograph. Who is that?
> A. Mr. White. That is the photo I had at the time of the investigation.

I should like to refer to the evidence of Mr. Charron in the next case which we will be coming to shortly. He was asked this question by Mr. Joyal:

> Q. This is exhibit 2, filed by the petitioner. Can you identify that photograph?
> A. That is Mr. Edwin Leacy Freeman. That photograph I had at the time of the investigation.

Here we have the same lawyer, the same investigator, the same question and the same answer. I am surprised that they do not get mixed up. The words used are identical with those in the case now before us. I submit this is not very good evidence. It would appear to me that it is rather unusual for a young lady to be entertaining a gentleman in her house at four o'clock in the afternoon and for her to be wandering around in a pink negligee or nightgown. I am surprised about the ease of accessibility to these places. A rap comes on the door.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Peters: I have a few more remarks, Mr. Chairman.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

668. Polar continental shelf project—further amount required, $376,622.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister tell us whether the Canadian government still subscribes to the sector theory of sovereignty?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We subscribe to the Canadian theory of sovereignty.

Mr. Hellyer: This was a Canadian theory. I just wondered whether the government still holds to it.

Item agreed to.

Dominion coal board—

669. Payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council—further amount required, $1,069,866.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the Minister of Finance tell us just what industries in the Atlantic provinces are receiving subventions? The last time the estimates were before us we were told that subventions were being paid on coal not merely for power but also for industrial purposes. It may be that the Minister of Finance would not have this information but I see that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys is in his place. I know he would have it at his fingertips.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The subvention, of course, is available to any company that qualifies by shipments and sales in the areas of Canada in respect of which the subventions are payable. The Dominion Coal Company is by far the biggest of the companies that are in receipt of this subvention.

Mr. Pickersgill: I know something about the subject, of course. I know that for many years subventions have been paid high enough to make coal from Nova Scotia competitive with coal from the United States in the Montreal market and that some extension has been made of that subvention to make it competitive a little bit further upstream than Montreal. In addition to that, I know the amount of the subvention had to be increased because of various increases in costs, mainly of transport although I believe some labour and other costs as well entered into the matter. I know the rate of subvention is very much higher to central Canada. At the moment I am not interested in that matter. However, I understood that a new departure had been made by the present government. We were told that on several occasions. I am familiar, of course, with the subvention paid on coal for the production of power but I was not particularly asking about that matter. What I should like to know is how much is being paid in subventions and what is the rate for industries other than power industries in the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My understanding is that these subventions are, in all cases, payable on shipments out of the maritime area into Quebec and Ontario. As the hon. gentleman is aware, we increased the scale of the subvention, in so far as maritime coal is concerned—

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, yes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —two years ago and again one year ago in order to make it possible for maritime coal to have access to the markets in eastern Ontario.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could spare the minister some effort here. I am not particularly interested at the moment in that matter. What I am interested in is this. I think the Minister of National Revenue told us—as I believe did the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys on one occasion—that subventions were also being paid on coal used within the Atlantic provinces for industrial purposes, and that this was a new policy instituted by the present government. If I am wrong about that matter I should like to be corrected. If the minister will say no subventions are paid for coal used for industrial purposes in the Atlantic provinces, that disposes of the matter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can say there is nothing in this additional appropriation for that purpose. There are three elements in the additional appropriation that is now asked. There is first an increased subvention payment on water-borne and transshipped coal, as a result of an increase in the pithead cost. The second element is increased export shipments to Japan from our western seaboard. The third consists of payments to the Dominion Coal Company to assist in maintaining a larger than usual stockpile. Against these three elements there were some amounts previously provided that were not required. They had been provided for the shipment of Alberta and Saskatchewan coal. There has been a declining movement from that area and what was not expended for that purpose has been offset against the three elements of increase.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister say what the main appropriation is?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The main appropriation was $10,089,350. Already supplementary estimates have been voted of $4,332,900. With the present proposed vote of $1,069,866 this will bring the total amount required for the present fiscal year to $15,492,116.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister say how much of that amount is for the development of thermal power in the Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Of that total?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not believe any of it is but there I speak subject to correction. But I can say that of this additional sum none of the three items of increase relates to the use of power from thermal sources in the maritime area.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister does not know whether any amount out of the total appropriation, including this amount, is being used for subventions for coal for industries in the maritime provinces?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. I think that matter comes under a different vote but I speak subject to correction.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys can throw any light on the point?

Mr. Comtois: No; there is none on this item. There is another vote.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is another vote?

Mr. Comtois: Yes, for thermal power.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thank the minister.

Mr. McIlraith: I should like to ask the minister whether he would outline the method of payment and the amount of the subvention being paid on western coal being exported to Japan. It was the second element to which he referred in his remarks a few moments ago.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a shipment that has been increasing and the government saw fit, two years ago, to increase the subvention for this purpose and one year ago to increase it again. The result has been a quite gratifying increase in the volume of coal being shipped to Japan.

When I was in Tokyo a year ago last autumn I had talks with some of the Japanese ministers and they showed a good deal of interest in increasing their purchases of coal and other raw materials from Canada, particularly through the port of Vancouver. The facilities in the port of Vancouver have been improved for this purpose. This, too, has contributed to and facilitated the substantial increase in the shipments of coal to Japan. The additional amount required for this purpose is $556,402; the rate is $4.50 per ton.

Mr. McIlraith: To whom is that rate payable? I understand there is different treatment with eastern coal; am I right in that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The rate is available in respect of coal which moves to Japan. This is related and confined to the shipments to Japan.

Mr. McIlraith: This item, dealing only with coal being shipped to Japan, has the effect of reducing the price of that coal by $4.50 a ton; otherwise I presume they would not buy.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes; it is to make it competitive in Japan. That was the reason not only for the original institution of subsidies but for the increases which have been made in them; first, to make it competitive, and in the second place to enlarge, it was hoped, the sales, and the result has been successful.

Mr. McIlraith: Just two further points. Would the minister give me the total amount out of this item, the earlier supplementary and the main item dealing with coal being shipped to Japan? I have another question which I think I can pose at the same time, and it is this. I recognize the great difficulties of coal mines in the west and I am not unmindful of them, but we are on the one hand subsidizing an export to Japan to enable them to compete with us, and at the same time we are working with them in having them apply quotas on their exports to this country. Is that correct?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On the first point, the main estimates and supplementary estimates provided subsidies of $675,000 on these shipments of coal to Japan. It was expected that there would be 150,000 tons exported at $4.50 per ton, and that made a figure of $675,000. A revision of the calculation has now advanced the estimated export to 280,000 tons and that accounts for the additional amount now sought.

The hon. member asked about quotas. The fact is that this has been operated as a particular type of export. The government sought to encourage this in the hope that if the market were won in Japan for coking coal from British Columbia, in course of time the market could be expanded there. It is not expected that the subsidy may always have to be paid, but it was thought to be a good investment in the meantime in the hope of opening up a new market. In addition, the hon. member will appreciate that one of the compelling reasons was to assist the Canadian coal mines in the west coastal areas.

Mr. McIlraith: I quite appreciate the compelling reason for adopting this subsidy, I am not quarrelling with that at the moment. But I think it is well to point out that the rather substantial subsidizing of this coal does create other problems in the trade field, problems with which the minister is quite familiar. It means that we are directly subsidizing Japanese exports to Canada. There is some concern in parts of the country about the extent of those exports in some fields. I merely want to point out the problem. I am not being critical of the minister, but I think this problem should be understood.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister tell us where the coal is coming from which is going to Japan?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): British Columbia.

Mr. Pickersgill: Exclusively?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. Crowsnest pass.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, this item has to do with payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council. Could the minister tell us approximately how many tons of coal comes under this program? I understand a total amount of $15 million has been voted so far, including the amount we are asked to vote today. How many tons of coal have been moved?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): According to the revised up to date estimate for the current fiscal year, the total from Nova Scotia, in round figures, will be 3,075,000 tons; from New Brunswick, 151,000 tons; from Saskatchewan 108,000 tons; from Alberta, 129,000 tons; from British Columbia, 280,000 tons.

Mr. Robichaud: Could the minister tell us how many tons have been moved to power plants in the maritime provinces? I also understand that part of this item is to cover transportation of coal to power plants. How many tons does that involve?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): None of this item under discussion applies to movement to power plants in the maritimes.

Mr. Robichaud: Is it under a separate item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): None of it is under this item.

Mr. Pickersgill: Or the main item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is right.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence Services Pension Act—

671. To authorize payment of an amount of $1,431.02 (to be charged to the permanent services pension account) to former Flying Officer T. R. Dunbar (33732) in an amount equal to the difference between the gratuity which was paid to him under section 51 of the Defence Services Pension Act and the amount he would have received had he been paid a gratuity equal to his contributions under section 52 of the said act, $1.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, this is a dollar item and I do not think any dollar item should be allowed to pass without an explanation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I quite agree, Mr. Chairman. This item has to do with a situation involving the flying officer named in the item who was in the air force to begin with on a short service commission. On retirement, he was paid a gratuity for that period of service plus a refund of deferred pay withheld during a particular period. Then he re-entered the Royal Canadian Air Force on a long service commission in April, 1957. He was retired on July 2, 1959 as medically unfit and had no option under the existing regulations except to accept a gratuity.

However, under the revisions in the act which received royal assent last July he would have enjoyed the option had the act applied to him of accepting either a gratuity covering the whole period of service or the repayment of his pension contributions without interest, whichever would be the greater.

In brief, because he just missed out on the effect of the legislation it was the view of the government that it would be only fair to put him in the same position he would have been in if the act had applied to him.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the case unique?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I understand so. It came before treasury board and treasury board considered it on the basis of a possible ex gratia payment. It was felt the more proper course, having regard to control of parliament, was to bring it before the house in this way.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

Water resources branch—

672. Saint John river—federal expenditures in connection with investigations to be carried out by the Saint John river board—further amount required, $25,000.

Mr. Robichaud: I understand that this item has to do with the federal contribution to the investigation which is being carried out by the Saint John river board. Could the minister give us some details about this investigation and the work which has been done so far? Could he tell us what has been the federal government's share of the cost, and whether the province of New Brunswick has contributed to the cost of this investigation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In March, 1959, pursuant to an agreement between the government of Canada and the provincial government in New Brunswick, a four-man board was established to plan, supervise and carry out an investigation to determine how present and future power developments in New Brunswick would be affected by the development and operation of storage on the upper Saint John river and its tributaries. An equal proportion of the cost was to be paid by the two governments. The board was directed to report its findings to the two governments not later than June 30 next.

I am informed that satisfactory progress is being made with the studies essential to the completion of the task, and present indications are that work will be completed and a report made by that date. As to the cost, it was estimated originally at $150,000. That proved to be an underestimate, and the estimate has now been revised upwards to $235,000. Canada's share is 50 per cent.

Mr. Robichaud: Could the minister tell us the names of the members of the board?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There are two officials from the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, and two members appointed by the government of New Brunswick.

Mr. Robichaud: In other words, the salaries of these men are already covered by the estimates of the department of northern affairs, and this total amount is for other expenditures.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is my understanding.

Item agreed to.

Northern administration and lands branch—
Northwest Territories and other field services—

673. Operation and maintenance—to extend the purposes of vote 278 of the main estimates for 1959-60 to include the contribution detailed in these estimates, $1.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is another dollar item.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This item of $1 is intended to amend the scope of vote No. 278 in the main estimates and the reason for the extension that is requested is to provide authorization to increase payment of a contribution to Taurcanis Mines Limited of 50 per cent of the cost of improving the airstrip and constructing an access road to the mine.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the minister could say something about this policy of the government paying 50 per cent of the cost of this airstrip? Is this applied uniformly across Canada, or is it done only in the Northwest Territories?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am informed that it has not been applied in any other place but the territories. Under this policy, the Department of Transport contributes toward the cost of publicly used airports in certain circumstances. There is no provision in the policy by which federal contributions can be made towards private airstrips required by mining companies for the establishment and servicing of mining properties.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does this airstrip belong to the federal government?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The land in question is crown land. The mining company concerned is working claims on crown land.

Mr. Pickersgill: I must say that from the point of view of the treasury this does seem to me to merit a little more explanation than the minister has given. If this mine were in northern Alberta, or Labrador, or somewhere else, then apparently the mining company would have to provide the airstrip itself. However, because it is in the Northwest Territories we are apparently paying half the cost. There must be some principle behind this, and that is what I am seeking to find.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The principle is that where the public is permitted to make use of these airstrips it was felt proper that the federal government should contribute toward the cost. That is the basis of this present contribution, and the reason for the enlargement in the authorization attached to the vote of item 278 in the main estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not want to be difficult about this. We know there is not a very big public in the Northwest Territories. Most of these settlements are not very large. It would be interesting to know, outside of this mining company and its employees and a few federal government officials who have to go there because the mine is there, just how much public use is made of this airstrip. I am not saying whether I object to the policy or not. I do not understand the policy, that is all, and I think that before we vote the money we should understand it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It has been found cheaper to encourage the use of these landing strips than it would be to construct roads. This, coupled with encouragement to open up the use of airstrips to the public, is the reason it was considered a sound policy to make this government contribution of 50 per cent toward the cost of providing an airstrip and an access road to the airstrip.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister will understand, I am sure, that I would feel that a policy of this sort, if it is a good policy, would be equally good in Labrador which happens to be within the bounds of a province. I do not think the minister has given us any reason why this sort of thing should be applied specially to the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Thus far it has been applied only in the territories. After all, the federal government has responsibility for the development of resources in the territories, and as the program is developed it has been confined to the territories for that reason.

Mr. Pickersgill: I agree that the federal government has a responsibility for providing in the territories many of the services which the provincial governments provide in the provinces, but I do not know any provincial government which gives 50 per cent of the cost of building an airstrip for the building of a mine. There may be some who do. But it does seem to me that when we are dealing with a mining company we are not dealing with the territories or with a province; we are dealing with a mining company, and because it happens that a mine is in the territories I do not see why it should appear to be placed at an advantage which would not apply to another mining company elsewhere. The minister has given no convincing evidence that there is any real public use of this airstrip apart from that incidental to the working of the mine. I do not know where this place is; I do not pretend to know. It is only the principle in which I am interested.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps the hon. gentleman is forgetting that the agreement in question with the Taurcanis Mines Limited was authorized on May 3, 1957; the order in council at that time provided for a federal contribution of 50 per cent toward the cost of improvement of an airstrip and construction of an access road to serve the mine up to a maximum federal contribution of $16,000. That has been done. The cost has increased, and that is the reason we are asking for a supplementary estimate.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the minister really has me this time. It is just conceivable that if he did a little more research he might find out that I was at the treasury board that day. I do not think it likely that I was as late as May of 1957. I assume that the present government in asking for this additional amount has satisfied itself that the policy adopted by its predecessor was a thoroughly beneficent policy.

Item agreed to.

Forestry branch—

674. Contributions to the provinces for assistance in forest inventory, reforestation and forest fire protection in accordance with agreements entered into by Canada and the provinces—further amount required, $100,000.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have two questions. First, why do we have this item relating to forest fire inventories, forest protection services and reforestation just previous to the commencement of April in view of the time of year when these activities are normally carried on?

Does the department have a ground check of the work done in connection with each of these activities or do its officials content themselves with an audit of the books or accounts in question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, on the first point I can assure the hon. gentleman there is no seasonal significance to this matter. It is a question of estimating. In other words, the estimate that came before us in the main estimates was one prepared in the autumn of 1958. With the development of the programs of the various provinces that are parties to the two respective plans the amount proved inadequate and this is not the kind of program that can be suddenly arrested.

On the second point I am told that there are spot checks made. It is not possible to make a complete universal check but spot checks are made under the two programs.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister what part of that amount is paid to the province of Quebec.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, no amount is provided for the province of Quebec.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Boulanger: Is it because the province of Quebec has not entered into agreement with the federal government that it is not getting any help under this item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the province of Quebec has entered into no agreement in this field.

Mr. Boulanger: Now that the province of Quebec has a new premier, has there been any correspondence exchanged with a view to sharing in this scheme?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I am informed that there has been no correspondence to this effect, but that there have been some discussions.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister tell me how much the province of Newfoundland has received under this item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the amount paid to the province of Newfoundland is $88,654.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister say whether any part of that is for forest inventory?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is for forest fire protection.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister say whether any recent efforts have been made to conclude an agreement with the province of Newfoundland with respect to forest inventory? I know something of the difficulties in that field but would like an answer to my question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am told there have been no discussions, Mr. Chairman.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, could the minister tell me what amounts have been spent since this policy was adopted by the Liberals?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, over $7 million were spent over the past eight years.

(Text):

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, can the minister tell us if any part of this appropriation is allocated for the fighting of tree diseases such as the Dutch elm disease or the new blight that is affecting the maple tree?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman, that is not under this vote.

POST OFFICE

675. Transportation—movement of mail by land, air and water, including administration—further amount required, $2,344,000.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, this is a substantial amount. Can the minister tell the committee why the vote with respect to transportation fell so short for the present fiscal year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this is a matter of the increased volume of mail and the extension of the services. With the development of the country, it is a growth factor we are facing here.

Mr. Pickersgill: Are there any increases in rates involved?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There are increases in the contract rates, but apart from that the increases are all in volume and services.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister say whether he knows if any recent consideration has been given to the possibility of having an all-up airmail service across Cabot strait? As the minister knows there have recently been a lot of snow storms and there have been periods when the Newfoundland express has not moved very far within a week. In this modern age there would be, apparently, much to be said for having an all-up service from Sydney. Could the minister say whether any recent consideration has been given to that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in the present item for that purpose but I will be pleased to bring the point raised by the hon. member to the attention of my colleague, the Postmaster General.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, would the minister be good enough to place on the record how much the main estimates contain and also the supplementary estimates in order that we may appreciate the relationship?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I think that is the only item of the kind. At this moment I do not have the vote in the main item but I am sending for it and will get it.

Item agreed to.

PRIVY COUNCIL

Special—

676. Expenses of the royal commission on the Great Slave Lake Railway including the payment, notwithstanding the Civil Service Act, of honoraria or allowances as may be authorized by the treasury board, to officers, clerks or employees permanently employed in the civil service for services rendered by them to the commission—further amount required, $7,500.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to hear a progress report on the railway which the government was going to build in 1957 and which is now just a royal commission.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the present item relates entirely to the expenses of the royal commission. The committee is well acquainted with the terms of reference to that commission. It was expected that the commission would complete its work by this time and I am told that the work of the commission is almost complete.

Item agreed to.

677. Expenses pertaining to the visit to Canada in 1959 of Her Majesty the Queen and His Royal Highness the Prince Philip, Duke of Edinburgh, including authority, notwithstanding the Civil Service Act or any other act but subject to the approval of treasury board, to appoint and to pay persons to be engaged temporarily in connection therewith—further amount required, $43,000.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, is this amount of $43,000 additional to what has already been spent for the Queen's visit?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The original amount, Mr. Chairman, was $300,000.

Item agreed to.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

678. Interest charges on outstanding loans that were made for the purpose of acquiring property in the national capital region—further amount required, $110,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister could say whether the government has yet reached a conclusion as to who is to take the place of Major General Kennedy? I am sure all of us are very sorry to learn that a gentleman who has done so much for the development of the national capital is no longer to be there and there is, of course, the greatest concern in the capital that the ablest possible person should be chosen to get on with this work.

Mr. Herridge: I want to join with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, with whom I rarely find myself in agreement, in the complimentary remarks just made with respect to Major General Kennedy whom all of us realize has rendered great service to the Canadian people in his work in connection with the national capital commission.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I, too, am pleased to join with the two hon. members in paying tribute to the work which has been accomplished by Major General Howard Kennedy. The matter will be referred to on some other occasion, but on this occasion I am happy to join with them in this tribute.

We are all aware of the formidable nature of the work that has been performed by General Kennedy. For some years now he has headed the national capital commission.

It has been a project and responsibility very dear to his heart. He has given yeoman service to a cause that I think has left all Canadians conscious of their indebtedness to him. I am not in a position to make any comment on the filling of the vacancy.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the Minister of Public Works could throw some light on it.

Item agreed to.

PUBLIC PRINTING AND STATIONERY

679. Printing of Canada Gazette—further amount required, $21,000.

Mr. Robichaud: Can the minister tell us why there is an extra cost for the printing of the Canada Gazette? Can he inform the committee whether all the work is being done by the printing bureau or is it given out to outside printers on tenders?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The occasion for this supplementary estimate is simply that the costs of printing the Gazette have exceeded the estimate. The original amount in the main estimates was $110,000. The amount of expenditure has fluctuated quite a bit year by year. For instance, in the year 1957-58—I will just give round figures—the expenditure was $110,000; in 1958-59, it jumped to $156,000; in 1959-60, $110,000 was provided, and it is found now that an additional $21,000 is required. But, even with this addition, raising the item to $131,000, it will be seen that the expenditure is still $25,000 below that of the previous year. There are wide fluctuations. There is, of course, revenue derived from this publication in the form of advertisements and sales. As to the placing of printing, my understanding is that it is printed in the printing bureau.

Mr. Herridge: Is the reason for this increase attributable at all to the fact that the extra cost is incurred by the publication of notices of increasing bankruptcies?

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the item carries, can the minister give us some notion of what the revenue is?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The revenue this year is estimated at $110,000. Last year it was $109,000 and the year before $93,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the minister given any thought to raising the fees?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The minister does not like to raise fees. If the hon. gentleman urges me, in deference to him, I will be bound to look into it.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, I took considerable pride in the fact that when I was secretary of state I increased quite a number of those fees and put these things on a paying basis instead of leaving them as a charge on the general taxpayer. I would always commend that policy to the government.

Mr. Robichaud: In view of the explanation given by the minister, and in view of the fact that in 1957-58 the total cost was $110,000 and in 1958-59 it was $156,000, how did they arrive at the estimate of $110,000 for 1959-60?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was thought that the need this year would not be as great. There was an underestimation this year and we either have to have this $21,000 or there will be a carryover. I think the hon. gentleman will appreciate the fact that the size of this publication varies literally from week to week. It depends on what notices come in for gazetting, and it is extremely difficult to estimate this precisely in advance. I can only point to the experience of those recent years as illustrating the wide fluctuations in expenditure year by year.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister say whether the number of statutory orders is increasing?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would have to look into that matter before attempting to answer the question.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister will readily appreciate the reason I asked the question. When we were in office we were accused of government by order in council, and I have taken a certain amount of interest in this question over the years. I have the impression that there are just as many orders now, if not more, than there were when we were in office.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No; I think we are operating on a much more limited scale. Orders in council are made where necessary, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course they were just made for fun when we were in office.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Public buildings construction and services—
Acquisition, construction and improvements of public buildings—
Construction, acquisition, major repairs and improvements of, and plans and sites for, public buildings listed in the details of the estimates, provided that treasury board may increase or decrease the amount within the vote to be expended on individual listed projects—further amount required—

681. Ontario (other than Ottawa), $1.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is another dollar item.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Item 681 appears as a dollar item; it is an authorization in respect of a public building at Spencerville. It is put in here as a dollar item because it is a new building project, and it is a matter of submitting it to parliament. No additional amount is required. Actually, the expenditure is being provided for out of the existing vote, but it is a matter of putting before the committee the fact that a new public building project which was not included in the estimate when the original estimate was passed has now been undertaken.

Mr. Pickersgill: I get a lot of discouraging letters from the Minister of Public Works, who I hope is paying attention to what I am saying now—I got a lot more from his predecessor, I admit—about the difficulty of including new works in the supplementary estimates. I just wonder whether the minister can tell us how this new work managed to get into the supplementary estimates and what special urgency there was in this particular case?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is a post office at Spencerville and there is authority, as the hon. gentleman knows, for incurring expenditure up to the statutory limit of $25,000. The post office was considered to be very necessary. There has been pressure for improved and enlarged accommodation since May, 1955. After some months of negotiations and advertising for rented space it was found that suitable quarters could not be obtained at a reasonable rental, and accordingly the treasury board advisory committee on accommodation standards recommended the construction of an 800 square foot standard plan post office building, and the tenders were called for and the work authorized.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can tell the minister about another place named Hare Bay in Bonavista bay where I have been trying to get a post office building since May of 1955. I appeal to the minister to show the same consideration for Hare Bay that the treasury board has shown for Spencerville.

Mr. Regier: Will the minister explain why this item has to be listed at this time?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have referred to the statutory limit of $25,000. It had been expected that the cost of this structure could be met within the statutory amount. When the tenders were called and as the work proceeded it was found that the work was going to exceed in cost the $25,000; therefore, we brought it to the house for approval.

Mr. Regier: Am I right in assuming that this post office is some 800 square feet in size?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Regier: Is it normal for a post office to cost over $30 per square foot?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It depends, of course, on the nature of the construction, Mr. Chairman. I am told that this particular building is one that was found to be necessary. It is not altogether unusual to find at times that the cost exceeds the estimate originally prepared in the department. We are happy, of course, when we find that the contract price can be lower than the departmental estimate, but it is not always so.

Mr. Regier: I assume the minister's parliamentary secretary has the details there. Can the minister say how much of this money was spent for the purchase of the land?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman, $6,000.

Mr. Regier: Approximately what is the population of this place?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am told that it is approximately 400 souls.

Mr. Pickersgill: The population of Hare Bay is larger.

Mr. Regier: Does the minister regard the expenditure of $6,000 for a lot as being reasonable in a place with a population of 400 souls?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, as choice locations go in Spencerville, this was regarded as a choice location. It is at the intersection of South and Centre streets.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers engineering services—

Construction, acquisition, major repairs and improvements of, and plans and sites for, harbour and river works listed in the details of the estimates provided that treasury board may increase or decrease the amount within the vote to be expended on individual listed projects—further amounts required—

682. Nova Scotia, $1.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is another dollar item.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this is another project at Pictou involving an expenditure toward harbour improvements of $125,000. No additional money is required. It is a matter of including this in the scope of the vote.

Mr. Robichaud: Is this to replace the wharf and warehouse that burned down last fall?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

683. Quebec, $1.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is another dollar item.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The added enterprise here is wharf reconstruction and enlargement at Riviere au Tonnerre and the cost is $82,442. The money is available. Again it is a matter of enlarging the scope of the original authorization.

Mr. Pickersgill: This item reads, "to complete payments". Was this project not in the original estimates?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is an extra payment for the construction and enlargement of the wharf under a contract amounting to some $421,000. The contract was terminated on March 28, 1958, with a final payment of $362,000 in round figures. The contractor submitted a claim for losses incurred in the performance of the work involved, specifically in connection with maintaining facilities for continued traffic during the carrying on of the work. Additional expenses were incurred in the construction of temporary trestles and this delayed the entire project. Since the traffic problem was not mentioned in the specifications, as perhaps it should have been, treasury board took the view that the contractor was entitled to compensation and the extra payment should be sufficient to cover the cost of construction of trestles and the increases in equipment, labour and overhead expenses due to the prolongation of the contract. It is under that circumstance that this payment arises.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

684. Land, air and training divisions—construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment—further amount required, $164,000.

(Translation):

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I should like the Minister of Finance to explain this $164,000 increase of the item for the construction or acquisition of property and equipment.

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The amount involved here, $164,000, represents an advance from the consolidated revenue fund to be charged to the fire losses replacement account for the purchase of an Otter aircraft and accessories to replace a Beaver aircraft and equipment destroyed in a fire on November 4, 1959, at municipal hangar No. 1 at Regina.

Mr. Van Horne: Mr. Chairman, I am wondering what is meant by "training division" with regard to the R.C.M.P. Does that mean an increase in the actual cost of training members of the mounted police?

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, this has nothing to do with training policemen. It has to do entirely with the replacement of an aircraft that was destroyed in a fire.

Mr. Van Horne: Why does it mention the training division?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Because that is the broad heading under which this matter is listed in the estimates. Reference to the main estimates will, I think, make that quite clear to the hon. member.

Item agreed to.

685. Reimbursement of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police revolving fund for the value of cloth which has become obsolete, unserviceable, lost or destroyed, $878.

Mr. Herridge: This item is one for reimbursement of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police revolving fund for the value of cloth which has become obsolete, unserviceable, lost or destroyed. Can the minister explain how cloth under the control of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police can become lost?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is the law that items of this kind cannot be written off against this particular revolving fund account without authorization, and that is the purpose of this item. This is cloth that was acquired a long time ago. It consists of 258½ yards of serge. It was purchased originally for sea dress for the marine division personnel. It was brown when it was purchased from the Department of National Defence. The hon. member will understand that this happened a long time ago. Then it was dyed blue and then is was found—

Mr. Hellyer: Was that after the government changed?

Mr. Robichaud: Was it never dyed red?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was dyed blue for conversion to the battledress type of uniform worn by the special constables who are crew members on board R.C.M.P. marine ships. That type of uniform is now obsolete since special constables are issued a restricted kit similar to that worn by regular members of the marine division. Consequently this cloth is now obsolete and surplus to requirements, but we have to have authorization in this form in order that it may be written off against the revolving fund.

Mr. Pickersgill: What happened to the cloth?

Mr. Herridge: Can the minister explain how it was lost when it was under the control of the R.C.M.P.?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The uniform that it was dyed and adapted for was discontinued and the cloth was then no longer suitable for any of the purposes of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. Pickersgill: What has happened to the cloth?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The cloth has no value now, I am told.

Mr. Pickersgill: Should it not be declared surplus and dealt with by crown assets? Is the government not taking a lot of responsibility on itself?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can assure the hon member there will be no wastage if there is anything to be salvaged but it happens to be a requirement that authorization be obtained in order to square parting with this cloth with the requirements pertaining to the revolving fund inventory.

Mr. Herridge: Would there have to be an adjustment of the revolving fund if the lost cloth were found?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not the cloth that is lost.

DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE

Patent and copyright office—

686. Patent division—further amount required, $248,500.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, for a number of years I have been concerned about the cost of printing patents in the patent office record. The patent office is a would-be revenue producing office. It is a very efficient and necessary office and has a large revenue in filing fees, final fees, assignment fees and other types of fees under the Patent Act. If I am correct in my figures, in 1958-59 we find $520,000 in the blue book. I think I am right in that matter. This year the general estimates were for $608,000 and the supplementary estimates were for $175,000, making a total for the printing of patents of $783,000 or an increase of 50 per cent. In the case of the Patent Office Record, last year the total sum was $165,000 in the blue book; this year the main estimate is $256,000 plus $165,000 in the supplementary estimate, making a total of $271,500, or an increase of over 67 per cent. I have said this previously and I repeat it.

I am under the impression that it is time to make an investigation into the cost of the printing of these patents in the printing bureau. I think the cost is too high. There is no reason why for a continuous operation of this kind it should be so high. The average cost of the printing of a patent I think runs over $5. You cannot expect any more revenue from those buying the patents. The price has been raised to a dollar this year. That is the limit. There will not be any sizeable revenue from that source. On the other hand, the patent office is put in a bad light at a time when the actual income is very large for fees and at a time when the patent office requires better housing facilities as quickly as possible.

The minister knows the situation, as does his assistant. I must say to his credit, that together we led a small band under both administrations—the former one and this one—to try to get a suitable building for the patent office and the trademark office. At the present time it is unfair to be asked to run out to the experimental farm, No. 8 building, to make a small search. It takes half an hour to get there and back to complete your search. If that charge for the patent had not been so high, the patent office would have acquired enough revenue to justify a building at the present time.

I am sure that something must be done. I am sure the Minister of Finance who is eager to save money will ask for an inquiry into the cost of printing the patents. This year these totals are very substantial. The amount runs over $1 million for printing. In a small department like the patent office that is the cost for printing patents and the Patent Office Record. I hope at this stage the members of this committee will start to open their eyes and realize what a sizeable sum is being spent for printing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. gentleman is, of course, quite right in the figures he has used. I appreciate his raising this question and the concern he has expressed over the cost. He has made reference to the fact that on January 1 of this year there was inaugurated an increase in the sale price per copy of a printed patent. The price was doubled from 50 cents to a dollar. But broadly speaking, the problem has been present for some time. I may say frankly that with the current study being undertaken by Chief Justice Ilsley and the royal commission it was thought to be not the time to be embarking on any substantial revision of the fees and printing requirements involved. However, when the report comes forward I can assure the hon. gentleman that I will be more than pleased to consider carefully the suggestions he has made tonight.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I am quite aware of that royal commission. I do not expect much action to be taken on the report for maybe two or three years. I do not think the report of the royal commission will affect at all the situation as to the printing of the patents. This is a matter in which it would be well for the printing bureau to produce costs and perhaps compare costs with outside sources so that we can see whether the actual cost of the printing of a patent is as much as the patent office is paying now. Mr. Justice Ilsley will not be examining the cost of printing patents at all.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Before we pass the item, can the minister give the balance of revenues and expenditures?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): For the present fiscal year, receipts, $1,672,000; expenditures for salaries, printing and other matters amount to a total of $2,463,000; or a deficit of $791,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is a considerable burden on the taxpayers generally. I wonder whether the minister has given any thought to that problem?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. The minister is doing his best to give thought to these problems.

Item agreed to.

Special—

687. Special expenditure in connection with a commission under the Inquiries Act to inquire into the workings of the Patent Act, the Copyright Act, the Industrial Designs Act, and other related legislation—further amount required, $13,000.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance what is the total cost to date of the royal commission on patent, copyright and industrial design and whether any further amount is expected to be expended outside of this supplementary estimate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is expected that this estimate will complete the cost of the royal commission. I refer to this item of $13,000. The item in the main estimate was $11,900.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): What is the total to date?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am afraid I cannot give that information to the hon. gentleman offhand but if he wants the amount for the previous years included, I shall be glad to make inquiries and send it to him.

Mr. Howard: Before we proceed to discuss the item I wonder whether I might ask the minister again at this time, as I have asked him on other occasions, whether he will consider, not only in the supplementary estimates but in the main estimates also, so arranging the printing that the number of the vote appears in the details section of the pages also as well as in the front section in order to make it easier to find the particular item one is looking for. I raised this matter with the present minister and other ministers. Everyone seems to think it is a good idea but no one seems to get around to taking any action in the matter. Are there any complications or reasons why it could not be done?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Of course nothing can be done about the matter this coming year because the main estimates have been printed. However, I shall be glad to give study to the hon. member's suggestion.

Mr. Howard: That is what the minister said last year when I asked him the same question on the main estimates. In any event, I hope that perhaps later on we shall get some indication as to what is the situation.

I wonder whether the minister can indicate when he might expect the commission to complete its inquiry especially in so far as its studies of the Patent Act are concerned?

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): The report is being printed now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. The Acting Secretary of State referred to that matter in the house a few days ago. A report has been submitted by the royal commission and it is being printed now.

Mr. Howard: I did not realize that was the situation or did not appreciate it.

Perhaps I might be a bit out of order but I will attempt to say what I have in mind anyway, Mr. Chairman, knowing that, with the ability you have, you will soon come to a conclusion as to whether I am in order or out of order. However, I will try my best to stay as close as I can to the question of this royal commission and the issue of patents in a preliminary way and perhaps expand on that matter later on under the main estimates dealing with the patent office.

Some days ago, in answer to a question of mine an order for return was made and a return was issued with respect to drugs and pharmaceuticals in the drug manufacturing industry, especially antibiotics and some of the tranquillizers and as to those about whom patents had been issued. The return was granted. I have not got it with me at the moment, but in a preliminary way I would like to say that the drugs I referred to in the question which was answered cover entirely, or almost entirely, the whole range of antibiotic or wonder type drugs which exist and are in use in Canada. Without mentioning the names, generally they are in the tetracycline group, and so on. The return showed that pages and pages of patents have been issued by the patent office, all of them to corporations in the United States and not one to any company in Canada apart from Frosst and company.

I think this is one thing which perhaps the royal commission might deal with. If it has done so we will know when its report is printed and circularized. If not, there is one thing which I think the Secretary of State's office and the patent office might conduct an inquiry into themselves, and that is the need of granting patents for control and manufacture of goods in Canada exclusively to United States corporations. All of these corporations, incidentally, have subsidiary companies in Canada, but it is the head office and address of the corporations in the United States to whom the patents are issued.

Why is not some use made of the licensing section of the Patent Act to ensure that Canadian pharmaceutical manufacturing industries are developed under patents issued by the commissioner of patents in order to bring some competition into the drug field and also assist in bringing down the price of drugs in Canada, which are, as has been indicated, the highest in the world?

I had better not go further on the drug question, and I appreciate the fact that you have let me get so far.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, in reply to the question asked earlier, the cumulative cost of the Ilsley commission to the end of the present fiscal year is $60,200.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

General administration—

688. Exhibitions branch—further amount required, $63,400.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, there is a great deal of interest in exhibitions. Perhaps the minister could start out by telling us why this extra money is needed and then perhaps go on from there and give us the latest dope on Montreal.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, there are two items involved here, an item of $14,600 for salaries and wages following the reorganization of the branch in the Department of Trade and Commerce. Then there is an item of $48,800 to cover the cost of participation in the Daily Mail ideal home exhibition which has been held in London, England, from March 1 to March 26.

Mr. Pickersgill: This seems to have been a kind of expensive reorganization, to cost $14,000. Could the minister say what the purpose of the reorganization was?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): To make a more effective organizational structure in the branch for this purpose. There has been quite a lot of activity in this field. There have been a great many exhibitions and the reorganization which was carried out in this branch was considered necessary to cope with the burden being cast on the exhibitions branch. It is not a very large item. The size of it can be judged in relation to the original item in the main estimates of $790,592. This portion of the supplementary estimate is $14,600.

The other and larger item of $48,800 is attributable to the exhibition I mentioned.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister tell us about the Daily Mail ideal home exhibition? It has certainly caught my fancy and I am sure the public would like to know what it is about.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The exhibition opened in London on March 1 and ran until March 26. It was estimated that approximately 1,500,000 people visited the exhibition. Retail sales were permitted and consumer interest was high. Canadian firms showed a lot of interest in the exhibition and cooperation was excellent. This particular exhibition lent itself to the display of many types of consumer goods, such as household appliances, toys, footwear, textiles, hi-fi, luggage, sporting goods, ladies wear and similar items. Emphasis was placed on processed food such as canned fish, and perhaps there may even have been some from Newfoundland there.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister assure me that there was some from Newfoundland?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A trend house was constructed to promote the use of Canadian lumber in construction. The cost of this particular house was shared with the British Columbia lumbermen's manufacturers' association.

Mr. Hellyer: Could the minister tell us if consideration is being given to the re-institution of the international trade fair which we used to have in the city of Toronto, or something comparable to it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I understand not, sir.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister did not tell us anything about the proposed fair in Montreal. Is that being run by the exhibitions branch?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is nothing in this item for that purpose.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister throw any light on it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think nothing new. The hon. gentleman is aware of the situation. No decision can be expected on this matter until, I think, the month of May.

Mr. Pickersgill: Since this is an exhibitions item, perhaps I may make a slight exhibition of myself and ask the minister if he would do something which I tried to get his predecessor to do, which I think he said he would consider but never did, and that is to put the numbers of the votes in the details as well as in the votes so that it is possible quickly to look from one to the other? The minister would not have to answer half as many questions if he did that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That suggestion was made five minutes ago by the hon. member for Skeena, and I told him I would be pleased to look into it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister tell me if he will do this, now that he has looked into it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will tell the hon. member, as I told the hon. member for Skeena, that I will look into it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister not commit himself for once to something?

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

A—Department—

Canal services—

689. Payment to the Canada Starch Company, in accordance with terms and conditions approved by the governor in council, as part of the cost of construction of dikes and other works erected as a result of the St. Lawrence seaway and power development, to prevent flooding of land owned by the crown and leased to the company, and in lieu of compensation otherwise payable by the crown to the company on cancellation of the lease, $955,048.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister for an explanation of this item.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman. This is an item to pay compensation to the Canada Starch company for property damage the result of flooding of land owned by the crown and leased to the company.

Mr. Chevrier: Why is this not a payment by Ontario Hydro?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This whole aspect of the matter was carefully considered in the light of the agreement between the federal government and the government of Ontario in respect of the hydroelectric power development in the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence river. However, in order that the lease be not cancelled and that the premises be not transferred to Ontario for flooding purposes in connection with power development, Canada Starch Company Limited constructed dikes and other remedial works preventing the flooding of the leased land and adjoining land owned by the company to a total cost in excess of $2,500,000, for which the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario agreed to pay the sum of $1,326,000 in round figures. The construction of the dikes and remedial works permits Canada Starch Company Limited to carry on its business on the leased premises following the raising of the water level in the St. Lawrence river upon completion of the power development works.

Mr. Chevrier: Just another question or two. My understanding of the agreement between Ontario and Canada was that all the works having to do with power were to be performed by the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission and that they would pay the damages occasioned thereby. What I am inquiring about now is why this was considered as part of a navigation expenditure rather than a power expenditure. I presume that is what it is, since we are required to pay a portion of it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. It will be seen in the proportions in which the cost has been shared. The Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario is bearing close to 60 per cent of the total.

Mr. Chevrier: Why should they not pay it all?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): First of all, let me point out that under the lease in question, which goes back to 1937, between the Department of Transport and Canada Starch Company, the company was granted the use of a parcel on the canal reserve land on the St. Lawrence, with the use of 280 horsepower of surplus water from the canal. The lease ran from 1937 to 1944 and was renewable in 10-year terms in perpetuity.

I have referred to article five of the agreement of December 3, 1951, between the government of Canada and the government of Ontario, under which Canada agreed to transfer to Ontario the administration of such lands belonging to Canada as are required for the purpose of the said development, and in accordance with the said provisions the lease is required to be cancelled in order that the leased premises be transferred to Ontario.

This, obviously, was not a simple situation at all. There are three interests involved here. There is the interest of the Ontario government in respect of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission in relation to power development; there is the company, operating on land leased from the crown in right of the dominion—and the company has unquestionably sustained damage to its property in excess of $2.5 million—and then there is the federal government with an interest in this situation in two respects, first of all, as the lessor of the land and, second, in respect of the navigation on the river and canal. This whole subject was very carefully studied. It came before the treasury board, and this proved to be a way of bringing about a settlement of a tangled situation. On the whole, this was thought to be the most successful way of bringing the matter to a conclusion.

Mr. Chevrier: If I understand the matter correctly, then, it is one which appertains both to power and to navigation; to navigation, because of the interest which the Department of Transport had in the lease with the Canada Starch Company; and to power, because of the flooding that took place, or which would have taken place, to the premises of Canada Starch had it not been for the construction of the dike to protect the company's property. I suppose that the agreement reached, from what the minister says, was a solution in dollars and cents covering the compensation to be paid to Canada Starch, part of which was paid by Ontario Hydro, in so far as the power developments is concerned, and part by Canada in so far as navigation is concerned. If that is the case, I can see no objection to this.

Item agreed to.

Marine services—

690. Nautical services, including Canada's share of the cost of the North Atlantic ice patrol; grants and contributions as detailed in the estimates; rewards for saving life from vessels in distress; subsidy to a salvage company; and the payment of expenses, including excepted expenses, incurred in respect of Canadian distressed seamen as defined in section 306 of the Canada Shipping Act—further amount required, $4,880.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the minister give some indication of what is Canada's share in the cost of the North Atlantic ice patrol? I know this situation has been going on for some years, and while this is a small item I presume the minister is in a position to give us the cost of the patrol.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The share of the federal government used to be 50 per cent. It is now 70 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Railway and steamship services—

691. Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals, $825,090.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the minister tell the committee whether or not the government intends to build a new car ferry for service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland? The minister may remember that every time this estimate comes up, that question is asked, and I think the Minister of Transport has initiated some surveys which, I believe, indicate that an additional ferry vessel is required. I wonder if the minister could give some indication that such will be forthcoming?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think I shall have to ask the hon. member to reserve that question for my colleague, the Minister of Transport, on his main estimates. The hon. member is, of course, aware of the third vessel, the S.S. Scotia No. 2. In April 1959 the treasury board gave approval in principle to the proposal to supplement the existing ferry services with that vessel. But as to additional ships, I think I must ask the hon. gentleman to reserve his question for the main estimates. There is nothing here dealing with it, anyway.

Mr. Hellyer: Is the vessel S.S. Scotia No. 2 presently under construction?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is in dry dock.

Mr. Chevrier: It is not a new ship?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, there is a modification being carried out on it.

Mr. Hellyer: Modifications to an existing vessel which is being converted for use as a car ferry.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is right.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the minister bring to the attention of his colleague, the Minister of Transport, the question raised on this side as to whether it is proposed to add a new ferry to the present facilities?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. As a matter of fact I think this matter was referred to in the house not very long ago by my colleague the Minister of Transport, and I believe reference was made to the fact that tenders had been called for the new ferry.

Item agreed to.

692. Newfoundland ferry and terminals, $649,886.

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder whether the minister could tell us what the operation of this ferry cost during the present fiscal year? Was there a deficit and to what amount on the operation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In 1959 operating revenues amounted to $2,116,157; operating expenses totalled $7,916,043; leaving a net deficit $5,799,886.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the item now required exclusive or inclusive of that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is inclusive. Part of this deficit was provided in earlier votes and this is the balance required.

Item agreed to.

693. Construction or acquisition of auto-ferry vessels and equipment—To extend the purposes of vote 415 of the main estimates, 1959-60, to include the vessel detailed in these estimates, $1.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is another dollar item.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This supplementary estimate is required to provide for expenses arising out of the installation of transverse propulsion equipment and water filtering system on the Newfoundland ferry vessel, the William Carson. This additional work costs $167,415. There were funds available within the existing appropriation for transfer to cover the amount, but this item was brought before the committee for approval.

Item agreed to.

694. Yarmouth, Nova Scotia-Bar Harbor, Maine, U.S.A., ferry service—deficit 1959—further amount required, $63,203.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, could the minister give us a quick break-down of the operation of this vessel?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): For the year 1959, the Yarmouth-Bar Harbor ferry service shows the following results: Operating revenues, $1,166,454.02, total expenses $1,360,-656.88, showing a net deficit of $194,202.86.

Item agreed to.

695. Degaussing Canadian-owned merchant ships of 1,000 gross tons and over, of Canadian registry, or of United Kingdom registry if subject to re-transfer to Canadian registry under special inter-governmental arrangement—To extend the purposes of vote 418 of the main estimates, 1959-60, to include Canadian government vessels, $1.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Chairman, I am just wondering why there is apparently a threat from magnetic mines approximately 15 years following the cessation of hostilities?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this item is a $1 item, the purpose of which is simply to extend the scope of the purposes for which the house approved the original vote, item No. 418, in the main estimates. This extension is required to authorize an amendment by adding Canadian government vessels to the scope of the original item. In the current and previous fiscal years expenditures were made on account of installing these protective devices not only on merchant ships but on transport ships such as icebreakers, supply and rescue ships, and those of other government departments. This item is designed to give approval.

Mr. Pickersgill: That does not quite answer the hon. member.

Mr. McGee: As I found out from an exploration I conducted in the dictionary "degaussing" means a device to prevent magnetic mines exploding in the immediate area. Is that not correct?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member's question should be answered, sir.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I have already indicated the purpose of the amendment. I have indicated the work that has been carried on and for which approval is sought. This work is supervised by technical officers of the Department of National Defence. The committee is comprised of representatives of the Canadian maritime commission, the Department of Transport and the Department of National Defence approve of the ships to be degaussed. This is to permit the extension of the service to government ships.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am wondering what the chairman of the treasury board asks the department about when an item comes up. Could the minister take us into his confidence and tell us that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I would be more than pleased to take the hon. gentleman into my confidence on a great many things but the proceedings of the treasury board are, of course, secret, and I think it would not be proper for me to discuss what goes on in the treasury board in reporting here. I can assure him, however, that the purpose of the treasury board is to make very certain that the expenditures for which approval is sought are authorized, are necessary, and that the taxpayers are receiving full value for every dollar to be spent.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, why is this necessary?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Because it is necessary in the interests of safe navigation. I am sure the hon. gentleman would not want government vessels to be exposed to hazards when modern science can contribute to the reduction of the hazards.

Mr. Hellyer: That is quite right, Mr. Chairman. Is the minister able to tell us when the last floating mines were found in the coastal waters off eastern Canada?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not know, Mr. Chairman, but there are quite a few floating around here sometimes.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thought that the minister's last observation to me was very appealing but why did it become necessary only in 1960 to extend this to Canadian government vessels? It seems very late in the day to be giving a protection to Canadian government vessels that was previously given to others. If they have gone without protection for all these years why was it suddenly necessary in the further supplementary estimates?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think I have already dealt with that. This practice is not confined to this year. As a matter of fact it goes back, I am told, to the time of our predecessors in office. The treasury board thought it was high time this matter was brought before parliament for approval.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister mean to say it has been done illegally for the last three years? Is that what the minister is telling us now?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Did the hon. gentlemen say for the last three years? I am told that the practice went on before that. I will not say it was done illegally but there was just enough doubt about it to make it desirable in the view of the treasury board that this matter should be brought to the committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is no new practice if I understand the minister correctly but just a change in language to make sure that every kind of vessel is covered?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Just to remove any question about the practice that has been followed, to make it quite clear that government ships are included within the scope of the authorization.

Mr. Hellyer: Could the minister tell us who does this degaussing process? Is it done by some branch of the government service or by a private company?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I indicated the direction under which the work is carried on, Mr. Chairman. As I understand it it is a service of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister feels it is done by officials of the Department of Transport itself?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, but the work is supervised by technical officers of the Department of National Defence, the navy. I mentioned earlier the committee that is composed of representatives of the Canadian maritime commission, the Department of Transport and the Department of National Defence.

Item agreed to.

696. Maritime Freight Rates Act—Payment to the railway companies operating in the select territory designated by the act, of the difference occurring on account of the application of the act, between the tariff tolls and normal tolls under approved tariffs (estimated and certified to the Minister of Transport by the Canadian National Railway Company and approved by auditors of the said company respecting the eastern lines of the Canadian National Railways and in the case of the other railways by the board of transport commissioners for Canada) on all traffic moved during the calendar year 1959—further amount required, $179,500.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, could the minister give some information to the committee in view of the reports which have been made by the maritime transportation commission as to whether the government is giving consideration to extending the rollback beyond the expiry date of July 31?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): So far as the present item is concerned, obviously no extension is contemplated or is involved beyond that previously approved. This is simply the vote of an additional sum.

As to the question the hon. gentleman has asked, I think it would be more properly directed to my colleague the Minister of Transport on the main estimates for 1960-61.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, this is the usual item which is voted in the main estimates and the addition in these further supplementaries to cover the difference between the tariff tolls and the normal tolls in the select territory. The question that comes to my mind now is this. The minister will remember that a statement was made in the house that there would be no increase in freight rates for a period of one year. I believe that statement was made both by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport in the course of a debate relating to a reduction under the freight rates act and also in answer to a question on the orders of the day which I believe was directed to the Prime Minister.

The year expires pretty soon and I am wondering if the minister is in a position to tell the committee whether we can expect a statement either by the Prime Minister or the Minister of Transport as to whether or not there is going to be an increase allowed. By that I mean, will the railways be allowed to file their applications with the board of transport commissioners for an increase in freight rates? As the minister knows, the Canadian National Railways already filed an application for what I believe was a 12 per cent increase though I may be corrected as to the amount and because of the statement made by the government the application had to be withdrawn. I am wondering whether, because the year expires soon, there will be a statement coming from the government in this respect?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Any such statement, of course, will have to come from the Prime Minister or from my colleague, the Minister of Transport. I do not think it would be proper for me to attempt to answer the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. Chevrier: Does the minister know whether a statement or an announcement will be made before the expiry of the year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will bring my hon. friend's inquiry to the attention of my colleague.

Item agreed to.

697. To authorize the governor in council to grant to Canadian National Railway Company a subsidy of $25,000 per mile, but not exceeding $7,450,000, towards the construction of the line of railway referred to in chapter 49 of the statutes of Canada, 1953-54, as branch line number 1 (described approximately as a line of railway from St. Felicien to Chibougamau and from Chibougamau to Beattyville in the province of Quebec); such grant of subsidy to be made in such manner and in such amounts and subject to such conditions, if any, as the governor in council deems expedient—further amount required, $35,750.

Mr. Regier: I believe the minister will recall that about a week or so ago on the orders of the day I asked, I believe it was the Prime Minister, to comment on the claim of the premier of British Columbia that the federal government still owed the sum of $13 million to British Columbia as a grant for the extension of the Pacific Great Eastern railway from Prince George into Fort St. John. At that time the Prime Minister replied that the federal government had met its commitment; that it had paid its commitment of a grant of $25,000 per mile for a limited length of the Pacific Great Eastern, and no more money was owing to the government of British Columbia. Would the minister care to state whether the government of British Columbia has applied for a $25,000 a mile grant for that portion of the railroad from Prince George to Fort St. John? As the minister knows, the grant that has been paid applied to a section from Quesnel to Prince George. Exactly how can the premier of British Columbia claim that this money is owing?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Item 697, Mr. Chairman, really has no application to any railway but one, and that is one in the province of Quebec running from St. Felicien to Chibougamau and from Chibougamau to Beattyville. It has no application to any other province or to any other line than that one.

As to the matter concerning which the hon. gentleman inquires, I suggest he raise it when the estimates of the Department of Transport are in the committee of supply, the main estimates for 1960-61.

Mr. Regier: Is it the policy of the government to grant railway building assistance to the extent of $25,000 per mile anywhere in Canada, or does each specific case need to be looked at on its own merits?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, every case has to stand on its own merits.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a question with reference to the eastern part of the line. I understand the western part, that is the part from Beattyville to Chibougamau, has been completed and is now in operation. The other half has been completed and is just starting in operation. Can the minister give some indication of the financial position of the line? For instance, what freight is moving on it and are the anticipations of the railway when it asked for this subsidy being met?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think it is really too soon to expect any statistical information that would have any value. The construction of the last section between St. Felicien and Cache lake was opened only on October 28 last.

Item agreed to.

698. Canadian National Railways deficit, 1959—Amount required to provide for payment to the Canadian National Railway Company (hereinafter called the National Company) upon applications approved by the Minister of Transport, made by the National Company to the Minister of Finance, and to be applied by the National Company in payment of the system deficit (certified by the auditors of the National Company) arising in the calendar year 1959 subject to recovery therefrom of accountable advances made to the National Company from the consolidated revenue fund, $43,588,290.

Mr. Chevrier: This is a tremendous amount, Mr. Chairman. I do not think we can allow it to pass without some more detailed comment by the minister. This is the amount of the deficit of the Canadian National Railways. While it is true that this matter is being investigated in the committee on railways, shipping and air lines, owned, operated and controlled by the government, at the present time, it is unfortunate that the committee of the whole house and the committee on railways and shipping is sitting at the same time, because it does make it difficult to follow both; certainly, it makes it extremely difficult for those of us who sit on this side of the house. The minister himself would not want this item to go through without giving a more detailed explanation of it. First, we should be given some reason why the amount of the deficit is as high as it is. What are the reasons for it, and what are the prospects for the calendar year 1960?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I share the hon. gentleman's concern over this very substantial sum. This, of course, is an annual vote in years when the Canadian National Railways show an operating deficit, and it has to come before the house in the late stages of the fiscal year.

The results of the year in question, 1959, from the financial point of view, are not as good as the railway had expected at the beginning of the year. In the budget for 1959, which was approved, it was anticipated that there would be a deficit of $34,400,000. Operations did not develop during the year as favourably as had been hoped, with the result that the company shows an operating deficit for the year 1959 of $43,588,290. While this is not as favourable a result as the budget for the year indicated, it nevertheless is an improvement over the operating results for 1958. The committee will recall that a year ago it was necessary to provide for a deficit of $51,591,424 for the year 1958.

The hon. member has asked as to the present outlook. I may say that the outlook for 1960 is somewhat brighter than the results for 1959. The indications are that unless the company encounters an increase in its operating expenses it should in 1960 show an improved operating result over 1959. But the hon. member as well as anyone in this house knows how difficult it is to forecast nowadays the results of the operations of the line a year in advance.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sure the minister will not feel that I am trying to hold up this item because I ask for some additional information. As I said earlier, I really feel the minister would be advised to give some further information. Can the minister tell us whether this additional increase in the deficit from $34 million, which was estimated, and the $43 million which we have before us, was caused by an increase in over-all labour costs; whether it was because of the failure to obtain increased freight rates or whether it was because of the financing costs of the Canadian National Railways? By that I mean the high interest rates which the Canadian National Railways had to pay. Would it be for those three reasons or some of those three reasons, or other reasons?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The reason was a disappointment in respect of operating revenues. The budget had contemplated operating revenues of $756,500,000; the actual operating revenues proved to be $740,165,041. There were some savings with respect to operating expenses, but the reason the deficit has exceeded the budget in that respect is the disappointment in respect of operating revenues.

Mr. Regier: Would the minister care to comment on newspaper reports of a little while ago that the government of the province of Quebec has agreed to subsidize the trucking industry there? Does the minister know whether this is actually being done and, if so, how can we say we are looking after the welfare of the taxpayers if one level of government subsidizes the chief competitor of the railways while another level is subsidizing the railways?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not seen the article to which the hon. member refers but, of course, the federal government has no jurisdiction in respect of highway transport except in the case of interprovincial and international movements. For that reason I think the hon. member has invited me to comment on a subject that is entirely within provincial jurisdiction. Canadian National Railways, as he is aware, does operate some trucking services as ancillary to its rail operations.

Mr. Regier: Will the minister agree that if provincial governments begin to subsidize the trucking industry the federal government should give consideration to curtailing interprovincial and long distance trucking?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What we are doing in the present item, of course, is subsidizing rail transport in Canada. The present item is a governmental contribution to the cost of operating the Canadian National system, but I would not wish to go further into this field because there are hypothetical elements in the situation in the article to which the hon. member referred.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister did not answer the question I asked him earlier as to what was the reason for the difference in the estimate of the deficit of the C.N.R., $34 million compared with $43 million, and I asked whether it was due to increased labour costs.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did answer the hon. gentleman's question. I pointed out that the cause was a disappointment in operating revenues, that the operating revenues fell $16.4 million short of the operating revenues anticipated in the budget.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, but the operating expenses did not fall in proportion, and that is why I asked whether it was due to labour costs.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I pointed out that there had been some savings. The actual operating expenses were not as much as were budgeted for, but whatever reduction was achieved in that respect did not equal the reduction in the operating revenues compared with the budget. To put it in a concrete form, the deficit of $43.5 million was $8.9 million greater than the budget contemplated but the actual operating revenues were $16.4 million less than the budget contemplated.

Mr. Chevrier: What about the failure of the Canadian National Railways to get any increase in freight rates? Does that constitute one of the reasons for the increased deficit?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No one can say whether Canadian National Railways, if its application had proceeded, would have succeeded in obtaining an increase in railway freight rates by decision of the board of transport commissioners. No one can say that. If one could assume that they would have been granted an increase in freight rates and had carried as much freight at the increased rates as they carried at the present rates, then obviously there would have been a higher operating revenue. I presume that at the same time there would perhaps have been some added operating expenses. But here we are in a completely speculative field and I cannot go further in making assumptions in regard to the possibility of their having obtained higher freight rates or having retained all their traffic.

Mr. Chevrier: But was the 17 per cent increase not reduced in part? It was an interim increase and it was reduced in part. Would that not account for the increase in the deficit?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Again I think we are in the field of speculation. The subsidy that the government provided recompensed the company.

Mr. Chevrier: I will not insist, but will the minister answer this question? Will he attribute any of the increase in the deficit to interest rates?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): So far as the deficit is concerned, obviously interest rates enter into the company's expenditures. They must. It has fixed charges in its total budget amounting in 1959 to $52,918,886. Those are fixed charges. The company has a very substantial outstanding bonded indebtedness and of course this has to be serviced.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Chevrier: What was the interest rate on the last loan floated by Canadian National compared with the previous one?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will have to speak from memory, but I think the coupon rate on the last loan was 5½ per cent and the bonds were sold at a small discount. I do not have those figures with me but I will be glad to furnish them.

Mr. Chevrier: I will take them subject to correction in Hansard. Can the minister say how that compared with the previous issue?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The previous issue was the year before and interest rates at this time were somewhat higher than they were a year ago. Interest rates have risen in the early or middle part of the year and there has been some tapering off since. I will be glad to get the hon. gentleman the exact figures.

The Chairman: Order. It being ten o'clock—

Mr. Churchill: Would the committee care to go on for a few minutes more? We only have ten items left.

The Chairman: Is the committee unanimous?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chevrier: Then I have a question or two I wanted to ask. What was the date of the issue upon which the coupon rate was 5½ per cent?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That issue was put out about three months ago. For the past three years there has been an annual issue by Canadian National Railways. I will be glad to furnish the hon. member with the details of these issues if he wishes them.

Mr. Chevrier: Does the minister know whether there will be one in 1960?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That depends. We never indicate in advance but there has been an annual issue for the past several years.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was just wondering whether the minister could give us the figure for the comparative amount of interest charges borne by the C.N.R. in the current fiscal year and a year ago. I refer to the total.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have given the actual figures of fixed charges. It was about a million dollars less than the budget contemplated. In the previous year the fixed charges amounted to $46.5 million.

Item agreed to.

General—

700. Reimbursement of the Department of Transport stores account for the value of stores which have become obsolete, unserviceable, lost or destroyed, $221,348.

Mr. Pickersgill: What is the point of this vote?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This item No. 700 is a recurring year-end item provided under the authority of section 60, subsection 2 of the Financial Administration Act in order to enable the write-off from the Department of Transport stores account and deletion from the inventory of certain plant, equipment and materials. In this case two sums are involved. There is equipment that is now obsolete or unserviceable and the write-off there is $42,950.34. Another item refers to equipment destroyed, the amount in that case being $178,397.13.

Mr. Chevrier: I should just like to tell my hon. friend that I am going to be a little bit kinder to him with reference to this vote than his colleagues were to me when I introduced the legislation—and I have reference to my dear friend the hon. member for Greenwood. I was obliged to come back several times with a bill to amend the Transport Act. I am not going to make my hon. friend's life miserable, although I think I could do so on this occasion. Does my hon. friend remember that incident?

Mr. Macdonnell: The hon. member flatters me.

Mr. Hellyer: This item of $178,397, the component for equipment destroyed, is a sizeable item. Can the minister give us some indication of the type and variety of equipment that item would include?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. There are two items here into which that sum is broken down. The first represents a total of $127,245.74 of equipment, the contents of the radio test room destroyed by fire on May 15, 1959. The other item amounts to $51,151.39 representing food supplies destroyed by fire at the Frobisher Bay airport.

Item agreed to.

Air services—telecommunications branch—

702. Radio aids to air and marine navigation—Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment—To extend the purposes of vote 427 of the main estimates for 1959-60 to include the construction of works during the current and subsequent fiscal years on Anticosti island on land owned by the Consolidated Paper Corporation Limited, $1.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is a dollar item and it is a peculiar one. My attention was drawn to it particularly by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River who has been obliged to spend the whole evening in a committee and was not able to be here. He drew attention to the curious wording "to include the construction of works during the current and subsequent fiscal years". This would appear to be in anticipation, and I say "would appear to be" because the minister may have some perfectly proper explanation. It would appear to be in anticipation of parliamentary control over expenditures in subsequent years. Perhaps the minister could give some explanation dealing particularly with that point.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Recently treasury board authorized the Department of Transport to enter into long term leases with the Consolidated Paper Corporation Limited for lands on Anticosti island for the purpose of the establishment of a remote transmitter site and associated staff dwellings. Normally the department does not erect works on land not owned by the crown but in this case the company refused to sell and it was considered that the crown's interest was adequately protected by the long term lease. That lease guarantees the crown undisturbed possession for 20 years. I may say that the company has been extremely co-operative in permitting the use of its roads, construction equipment and other facilities. It will therefore be seen that this is an authorizing item.

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand it is extremely unusual for the government to build any structure that is owned by the crown on land that is not owned by the crown. Of course there is a right of eminent domain. Perhaps the minister would explain why there was not expropriation in this case.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This was thought to be a much better deal from the point of view of the crown. As to protecting the interests of the crown in the light of its having erected transmitter sites and the associated staff dwellings, it was felt that the 20-year lease gave adequate protection to the crown. To have proceeded beyond that point and to have expropriated would have been, it was felt by the treasury board in this case, not good business for the crown. This is a better arrangement.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is no rent paid or is it a dollar a year? Is that it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not here information as to the exact rent paid. I will be glad to furnish that information if the hon. gentleman wishes it.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister will admit that it is a little bit difficult for us to form an opinion which we ought to try to form here in the committee as to whether it is good business if we do not know what the rent would have been over the 20-year period as compared with what the probable cost would have been in the case of expropriation.

Mr. Hellyer: I think the minister also should give us some indication of the nature and extent of the installations. This period of 20 years is quite a short period for a lease and is not compatible with the policy of some other government departments. For example, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation would not guarantee a mortgage where the house was built on leased land unless the lease ran for considerably longer than that period of time. Can the minister give us information as to the nature and the extent of the installations and tell us how permanent they are and what their anticipated life would be?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, if we let this item stand for a moment and went on to the next one, I might have that information shortly.

The Chairman: Shall this item stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item stands.

703. Radio Act and regulations—
Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment—further amount required, $50,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: What is this item about? Perhaps the minister could give us a brief explanation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is an addition of $50,000 to the sum of $405,000 that was voted in the main estimates. The amount arises out of a fire in the Ottawa radio test room. This $50,000 is to replenish the fire losses replacement account from which an advance of $50,000 was received.

Mr. Pickersgill: That explanation raises a very interesting point. In the old days when the hon. member for Peterborough sat on this side of the chamber we had our attention drawn in the house to every fire that affected government property. Now that the hon. gentleman is over there on the opposite side of the chamber there sems to be no one who is taking the same interest in fires. Has the minister any figure as to the total fire losses in the last fiscal year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not offhand. I could get that information. The hon. member in effect is asking me what sums were provided for out of the fire losses replacements account during the year. I shall be glad to make inquiries. Is the hon. gentleman asking the amount for the fiscal year or the calendar year?

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: I think for the fiscal year.

Item agreed to.

Civil aviation branch—

704. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment—To extend the purposes of vote 437 of the main estimates, 1959-60, to include construction work on local roads providing access to the new air terminal at Ottawa airport, a contribution to the province of British Columbia in the amount of $22,500 towards construction of a by-pass road at Terrace airport, British Columbia, and authority to charge to that vote the cost of lands purchased, by means of loans provided for the acquisition of land required to control properties in the vicinity of main terminal airports in order to prevent the erection of hazards to flying and for future development of new and existing main terminal airports including facilities for relieving congestion thereat, that are not held for resale, $1.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister give an explanation of this item? Can he say whether any of this amount has to do with the buzzing by the supersonic United States plane of the Uplands airport?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The answer to the second question is no. This is a one dollar item and it is intended to amend vote 437 of the main estimates in order to extend the scope of the item. Item 484 authorizes loans up to $4 million to be used for acquisition of land to prevent the erection of hazards to flying and for future airport development. Such a loan item has been provided annually since 1954-55 when the major airport construction program started. At the present time loans to a total figure of $8.2 million are on the asset side of the balance sheet of which about $2 million are being held for resale. It is proposed to transfer to the current account the cost of those lands which were initially purchased through the loans account which it is not intended to resell. The amount involved is $6.2 million. No additional funds will be required since there will be a lapse in this vote sufficient to cover these amounts.

Item agreed to.

Canadian maritime commission—

706. Steamship subventions for coastal services, as detailed in the estimates—further amount required, $1,095,154.

Mr. Chevrier: Could we get some explanation of these subventions, and also can the minister give some indication of the present status of the Canadian maritime commission? I attempted to get some information earlier but was not too successful. By that I mean, what is the position of the maritime commission? Is it the intention of the government to carry it on? It has had certainly not the activities it used to have, and I do not mean that in any derogatory sense. I certainly do not mean that in a sense which would affect the present holder of the chairmanship of that commission for whom I have a great deal of regard. Incidentally, I think the present holder is a man of many qualifications and I am sure would fill this job satisfactorily.

The point I make now is this. Over and above the subventions which are mentioned here, what are the intentions of the government in so far as the future of the commission is concerned?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, as the hon. gentleman is aware, there was a change in the chairmanship of the Canadian maritime commission during the past year when Mr. Louis Audette, who had been for some years chairman of the maritime commission, was appointed chairman of the tariff board. There has been no change in the status or function of the Canadian maritime commission. If any were to be announced I think the announcement would have to come from my colleague, the Minister of Transport. Certainly there is none which I can announce, and the maritime commission is carrying on precisely as has been the case hitherto.

As to the item in question, this is an enlargement of an item which began in the main estimates with a vote of $5,553,500. It was increased in the supplementary estimates by $54,700 and is now proposed to be increased by a further $1,095,154, required to provide the expenses arising out of the operation of steamship services in various localities. In the eastern local services we have Ile aux Coudres and Les Eboulements. Next is Murray Bay and the north shore of the St. Lawrence river, winter service. Next is Pelee island and the mainland of Ontario. Next is Rimouski, Matane and the north shore of the St. Lawrence river, Quebec. Next, Newfoundland coastal steamship services.

Item agreed to.

Loans, investments and advances—

External affairs—

709. Additional advance to the working capital fund of the United Nations organization in the amount of $30,230 U.S., notwithstanding that payment may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars esitmated as of March, 1960, which is, $28,728.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the minister give some explanation of this item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This item comes under the loans items and is intended to provide an additional advance to the working capital of the United Nations organization in the amount of $30,230 U.S., which is $28,728 Canadian.

In his foreword to the 1960 budget estimates of United Nations the secretary-general once again invited the attention of all member nations to the fact that the cash position of the organization continued to be a source of grave concern. This gave rise to studies of the matter and the result was that the advisory committee made recommendations to the assembly on this and associated questions. A decision was taken to provide an increase and the increase was approved by the United Nations assembly. Canada's share of the $25 million increase is 3.11 per cent, and taking account of credits and advances which had been made in previous years, the amount now required to pay Canada's share is the figure of the item.

Item agreed to.

710. To increase to $7,000,000 the amount that may be charged at any time to the revolving fund mentioned in subsection (2) of section 101 of the Financial Administration Act, chap. 12, statutes of 1951 (2nd session), and extended by vote 630 of the Appropriation Act No. 2, 1955, and vote 662 of the Appropriation Act No. 5, 1958; additional amount required, $1,000,000.

Mr. Chevrier: Could the minister tell us what the object of the revolving fund is and why it is necessary to increase it by $1 million?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this is the revolving fund in the Department of Transport. The amount of the fund at the present time is $6 million and it is used for the purpose of stores required for the various operating services of the department. The situation at July 1, 1959 was that the stores inventory charges against the fund were $5,651,386. The balance for working capital at that time was less than $350,000. There is an average delay of one month in receiving credits to the fund for store issues, and on the basis of an annual stores turnover of approximately $7 million a balance of approximately $600,000 was considered to be necessary to provide adequate working capital. Consequently it is now proposed that the authorized item be increased from $6 million to $7 million on this account.

Item agreed to.

Air services—

Telecommunications branch—

702. Radio aids to air and marine navigation—Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment—To extend the purposes of votes 427 of the main estimates for 1959-60 to include the construction of works during the current and subsequent fiscal years on Anticosti island on land owned by the Consolidated Paper Corporation Limited, $1.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I now have the information on vote 702. The rent in question is nominal. As to the buildings, the radio transmitter and houses to be erected, I might say that the department expects that 20 years will equal the useful life of the facilities. That fact was taken into account when the arrangement was made with the company.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: That item completes the further supplementary estimates.

Resolutions reported and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1960, the sum of $117,844,324 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-55, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1960.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a second time?

Mr. Chevrier: Next sitting of the house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the leader of the house what we shall be doing tomorrow? I am sure the opposition would appreciate it if we could be told what we shall have under consideration this week until budget time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Before my colleague answers that question, may I thank the house for its co-operation in sitting beyond ten o'clock to enable us to complete the review of the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow we shall begin with the second reading of the appropriation bill. We shall follow that with the resolution in the name of the Minister of Public Works dealing with the Trans-Canada Highway Act. If these items are completed we shall take item No. 11 on today's order paper, the resolution in the name of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources dealing with the amendment to the Yukon Act; followed by item No. 12, the resolution in the name of the same minister dealing with an amendment to the Northwest Territories Act. That is Wednesday. On Thursday, the first item of business will be second reading of a bill to amend the National Energy Board Act which I expect will receive first reading tomorrow, followed by any of these three items which have not been completed. Thursday night is budget night. On Friday, we shall commence with the resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance on the subject of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act. If on Wednesday, Thursday or Friday any of the items which I have outlined have been completed and we want more business to do, we would refer to page 3 of the order paper where six bills are listed for second reading, and we would take them in that order.

It being twenty five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CITIZENSHIP CERTIFICATES TO CHINESE

Question No. 296—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. How many persons of Chinese origin received certificates of Canadian citizenship in each of the calendar years 1955, 1956, 1957, 1958 and 1959?

2. How many applications for Canadian citizenship from persons of Chinese origin were pending at the latest available date?

Answer by: Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration):

1. The following statistics reflect the number of persons of former Chinese citizenship who were granted Canadian citizenship:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, March 30, 1960

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MARTIN (ESSEX EAST)—REPORTED DIFFERENCE IN UNEMPLOYMENT FIGURE

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I rise on a question of privilege. On March 24 I asked the Minister of Labour for the latest available figure of live claims for unemployment insurance benefits, and the figure the minister gave was 783,686. At the time I was concerned about the figure, because it was below that which the minister had given for February 4, 9,314 less.

I see that according to today's Canadian Press story the dominion bureau of statistics gives the figure of the number of people regarded as live claimants as of February 29 as being not 783,686 but 814,200.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): When I gave this figure to the hon. member for Essex East on Thursday, February 24, I stated that there were 783,686 live claims. The bureau of statistics figure is 814,241. The difference is accounted for by the fact that the bureau includes fishermen. The figure I gave the hon. member did not include fishermen.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister a question? Will the minister say that when he gave the figures in the month of January fishermen were not included? In any case, fishermen out of work are still human beings out of work.

Mr. Starr: I am unable to say whether or not the figure I gave for January included fishermen. I would have to check on that, but I do say that fishermen were not included in the figure I gave for March because they have also been excluded by the unemployment insurance commission from the unplaced applicants' list.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour, in the light of the answer he gave to my friend the hon. member for Essex East that fishermen were excluded from the number of those counted as unplaced applicants, whether that means that no attempt is made by the commission to find jobs for fishermen.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, most certainly the national employment service always endeavours to find jobs for people; but if they live in areas where their means of livelihood is fishing some difficulty is experienced in placing these people at work in the winter time, and in occupying them in something they have never done before in their lives.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister mean that no record is kept of the names of those persons?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think this cross-exchange is more of a debate than a proper question for this time of day. I wonder if the hon. member could not find another time to pursue the matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: With the greatest deference, this point was raised today by the minister, and it is a very urgent matter if it is true that these names are not considered for employment.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, that is most untrue.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am asking, that is all.

Mr. Starr: In the figures released by the unemployment insurance commission for both the unplaced applicants and the live claimants, fishermen are not shown as part of those figures, but they are included in the figure of the dominion bureau of statistics to which the hon. member for Essex East referred today.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EASTER ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved:

That when this house adjourns on Wednesday, April 13, it stand adjourned until Monday, April 25, 1960.

Motion agreed to.

THE BUDGET

TABLING OF BUDGET PAPERS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I ask leave to table copies in English and in French of the annual budget white paper—and for the convenience of hon. members as well as of subscribers to the reports of this house I move that the budget white paper be published as an appendix to today's Votes and Proceedings and also as an appendix to tomorrow's Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Does that meet with the wish of hon. members?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING GAS TOLLS AND EXPIRY DATES OF LICENCES

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the first reading of Bill No. S-26 (from the Senate) to amend the National Energy Board Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

STARRED QUESTIONS

MAIL CONTRACT, DEER LAKE-NORRIS POINT, NFLD.

Question No. 90—Mr. Batten:

1. To what person, or persons, were the latest contracts awarded to carry mail from Deer lake to Norris Point, Newfoundland?
2. What is the amount of each contract?
3. Were these contracts awarded as a result of tenders being called?
4. Who was the previous mail courier and what was the amount of his contract?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the answers to the four parts of this question are as follows:

1. Charles Theodore Burden and Selby Martin, Bonne Bay.

2. Charles Theodore Burden, $4,000 per year; Selby Martin, $3.75 per trip, four trips per week.

3. Charles Theodore Burden, yes; Selby Martin, no.

4. Stewart Blanchard, Bonne Bay, under temporary arrangements without tenders called, August 17, 1956 to October 1, 1959 at $4,800 per year.

ANNA BADMAN, VANCOUVER—BAIL REFUND

Question No. 91—Mr. McIlraith:

1. Did the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister of Justice, the Solicitor General or any other member of the government receive any representation either written or oral urging the government to refund estreated bail to Mrs. Anna Badman of Vancouver?
2. If so, what persons made such representation and in what form?
3. Was any member of parliament directly or indirectly instrumental in presenting any such representation and, if so, what member or members?
4. Was the refund in question recommended by the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or any other member of the force and, if so, by whom?
5. Was the refund in question recommended by any other police officer or any court official?

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Hon. Leon Balcer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, this question stands as an order for return, as there is more than one department involved.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I feel that the rights of parliament are being seriously abridged by this practice that is growing up. When starred questions are put on the order paper that is done because hon. members want the answers in the house. By waiting a week these answers could be collected, as they were by the previous government, and given in the house in the spirit of the rules.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps hon. members will permit me a minute while I find the rule. Standing order 39 (5) reads as follows:

(5) If a question is of such a nature that, in the opinion of the minister who is to furnish the reply, such reply should be in the form of a return, and, during the question period on Wednesday, the minister states that he has no objection to laying such return upon the table of the house, his statement shall, unless otherwise ordered by the house, be deemed an order of the house to that effect and the same shall be entered in the Votes and Proceedings as such.

Is it the pleasure of the house that this question 91 should be made an order for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: On division.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with respect may I suggest that this should not be put to a vote of the house. When the hon. gentleman said that another course was followed by the previous government, I think that is just what one might call legislative license. The rule provides, as Your Honour stated, that it is not a matter to be submitted to the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a question of personal privilege, the Prime Minister chose to make a personal attack on me—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and to question my veracity about a matter on which he did not take the trouble to produce any evidence whatsoever. I would say, sir, that from the time these starred questions were provided for under the new rules in 1955, this practice was not followed by the previous administration.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has raised this as a question of privilege, and perhaps in so doing has accomplished his intention of making an explanation. I think what was said did not really impute anything improper to the hon. member.

Starred Questions

NUCLEAR REACTOR STATION, WHITESHELL, MAN.

Question No. 92—Mr. Argue:

1. Will a nuclear reactor station be built at Whiteshell, Manitoba?
2. If so, will radioactive waste from the nuclear reactor station be deposited in lake Winnipeg or any of its tributaries, or in what other manner will it be disposed of?
3. What precautions will be taken to ensure no radioactive contamination of inhabited areas, the waters and the fish population of lake Winnipeg and its tributaries?
4. Has the government received a petition from the summer residents of the Whiteshell area protesting against the proposed establishment of a nuclear reactor station there?
5. If so, has the government replied to the petition, and what was the content of the reply?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is yes, a nuclear reactor station will be built at Whiteshell, Manitoba.

In answer to the second part of the question, all the radioactive waste will be safely stored on the property of the Whiteshell research centre. This will be the same practice that is followed at Chalk River. Radioactive liquids are stored in stainless steel tanks and radioactive solids are stored in special vaults constructed of concrete treated with tar to prevent water moisture from seeping.

In answer to part 3, the same precautions will be taken as have been taken over the years at Chalk River. It is important to realize that the atomic energy control board has jurisdiction over all establishments of this nature, and exercises supervision and control so that no radioactive materials are permitted to endanger the population.

The answer to part 4 is yes.

The answer to part 5 is the same as I have given to these other questions.

FREIGHT RATES—EXTENSION OF ROLLBACK DEADLINE

Question No. 93—Mr. Robichaud:

1. Has the Minister of Transport received a telegram from the maritime transportation commission requesting that the rollback of the last 17 per cent freight rate increase be extended beyond the present deadline of July 31?
2. If so: (a) on what date was such a telegram received? (b) on what date was it brought to the attention of the minister? (c) has a reply been made, and of what nature?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): The answer to part 1 is yes.

As to part 2, the telegram was received in my office on March 8 and was brought to my attention on March 16, on which day it was acknowledged with an expression of regret for the delay and with the advice that the matter is now under consideration, and that a decision would be reached before the present reductions terminate.

CHIGNECTO CANAL INVESTIGATION

Question No. 94—Mr. McWilliam:

1. Has an investigation been authorized in connection with the construction of the Chignecto canal?
2. If so, when, and by whom is it being conducted?
3. Have any estimates of the cost of a Chignecto canal project been made since June 1, 1957?
4. If so, what is the amount of the estimate?
5. Have any economic studies been made on the feasibility of the construction and operation of a Chignecto canal since June 1, 1957?
6. If so, what is the result of such studies?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): The answer to part 1 is that no outside organizations have been employed specially for this purpose, but both economic and technical aspects have been studied by existing governmental agencies from time to time and are kept under continuing review.

Part 2 is answered by the answer to part 1.

The answer to part 3 is yes.

As to part 4, an estimate prepared by the Department of Public Works in 1958 set the cost at above $138 million. An estimate prepared by a private engineering firm within the last year suggested a cost of about $90 million, but subsequent review has indicated that government agencies concerned would find it difficult to accept technical assumptions made therein.

With regard to parts 5 and 6, various economic studies have been made from time to time, as indicated above, and the matter remains under continuing review, but I am not in a position to comment further on their results at the present time.

PRESS SECRETARY'S POSITION, FINANCE MINISTER'S OFFICE

Question No. 95—Mr. Godin:

1. Is there a position in the office of the Minister of Finance for a press secretary or public relations officer or some similar official?
2. If so, what is the precise designation of the position?
3. Has any such position been occupied since June 21, 1957, and, if so, for what period?
4. Was such officer paid a salary from public funds and, if so, under what precise authority?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): The answer to part 1 is yes.

The answer to part 2 is, special assistant to the Minister of Finance.

The answer to part 3 is since September 1, 1958.

The answer to part 4 is yes, under authority of P.C. 1958-14/1200 of August 28, 1958.

Starred Questions

PRESS SECRETARY'S POSITION, PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE

Question No. 96—Mr. Godin:

1. Is there a position in the office of the Prime Minister or the privy council office for a press secretary or public relations officer or some similar official?
2. If so, what is the precise designation of the position?
3. Has any such position been occupied since June 21, 1957, and, if so, for what period?
4. Was such officer paid a salary from public funds and, if so, under what precise authority?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The answer to part 1 is yes.

The answer to part 2 is information officer 6.

The answer to part 3 is yes, March 1, 1960.

The answer to part 4 is yes, under the authority of a treasury board minute and appropriation acts passed by parliament from time to time.

C.B.C.—CHAIRMAN OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Question No. 97—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Is the chairman of the board of directors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation a member of the board other than the president?
2. If so, when was such change made and in what manner?
3. On what date was such change or proposed change first brought to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue?
4. What is the specific statutory authority for such change?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): The answer to part 1 is yes.

The answer to part 2 is that the board of directors at a meeting on June 24, 1959, amended its bylaws to provide that the chairman of the board should be a director other than the president or the vice president. By a subsequent resolution at the same meeting the present chairman of the board, Mr. Robert Dunsmore, was elected as chairman of the board of directors.

I cannot recall, Mr. Speaker, the exact date the matter was brought to my attention; it is a matter of management of the C.B.C. There was no formal communication with me; I think I heard of it a considerable time later.

The answer to part 4 is that the authority is the Broadcasting Act, being chapter 22 of the statutes of Canada, 1958.

EAST SAINT JOHN THERMAL POWER PLANT, N.B.

Question No. 99—Mr. Robichaud:

1. Has a request been made to the government of the province of New Brunswick asking for permission to table in the House of Commons the exchange of correspondence between the federal government and the government of the province of New Brunswick, in connection with the East Saint John thermal power plant?

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

2. If so: (a) on what date was such a request made? (b) has a reply been received? (c) what was the nature of the reply?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 is yes.

The answer to part 2 (a) is February 10, 1960; (b) yes; (c) the government of New Brunswick has no objection to the tabling of documents which are not of a privileged nature.

EAST SAINT JOHN THERMAL POWER PLANT, N.B.

Question No. 100—Mr. Robichaud:

1. Has a request been received from the government of the province of New Brunswick asking for permission to table in the New Brunswick legislature the exchange of correspondence between the New Brunswick government and the federal government, in connection with East Saint John thermal power plant?
2. If so: (a) on what date was such a request received; (b) has a reply been given; (c) what was the nature of the reply?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 is yes.

The answer to part 2 (a) is February 26, 1960; (b) yes; (c) the government of Canada has no objection to the tabling of documents which are not of a privileged nature, provided the government is informed which documents the provincial government proposes to table.

PORK IMPORTS FROM U.S.

Question No. 84—Mr. Boulanger:

1. Since the removal of the embargo, February 8, 1960, against the importation of swine, uncooked pork and uncooked pork products from the United States of America, has any amount of these products been imported?
2. If so, how many pounds?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the answer to parts 1 and 2 is that statistics will not be available until some time in April. Further, this is a difficult question on which to provide a suitable answer. Perhaps if the hon. member would consult with me about this we might we able to satisfy his requirements.

Mr. Speaker: The question stands as to the remainder.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: I should like to be sure about the disposition of starred question No. 84 which the Minister of Trade and Commerce answered in part. Is it to stand for revision, or is it to be considered as answered?

Mr. Churchill: It is to be considered as answered, but I pointed out that there is some difficulty in getting the information and that there will be difficulty even in April. None will be available until April, but there will be some difficulty even then. If the hon. member would like to consult with me perhaps the question might be rephrased.

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PUBLIC SERVICE RESIGNATIONS

Question No. 265—Mr. Argue:

1. How many resignations have been received in each government department or crown corporation in each month of each year since January 1, 1957, from (a) professional personnel; (b) administrative officers?
2. How many vacancies presently exist in each government department or crown corporation for positions to be filled by (a) professional personnel; (b) administrative officers?
3. How long has each of these positions been vacant, what are they, what are the academic qualifications desired in each, and what is the salary to be paid?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Secretary of State): This question should be amended by dropping part 3. Parts 1 and 2 can then be made an order for return.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD, MONTREAL—LAND TRANSACTIONS

Question No. 97—Mr. Argue:

1. Has the national harbours board, Montreal, entered into any (a) lease; (b) contract; (c) agreement; (d) rented land, for commercial purposes, since January 1, 1955?
2. If so: (a) what was the date, purpose, and nature of each transaction? (b) what was the name of the firm or persons involved in each, and the nature of the business engaged in by each? (c) what were the terms of each transaction? (d) what was the yearly (i) revenue; (ii) expenditure, received and made by the national harbours board, Montreal, as a result of each transaction?

RAILWAY PASSENGER LINES DISCONTINUED

Question No. 205—Mr. Boivin:

How many railway passenger lines have been discontinued in Canada during the last 10 years (a) by the Canadian National Railways, and between what localities; (b) by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and between what localities?

ANNA BADMAN, VANCOUVER—BAIL REFUND

Question No. 91—Mr. McIlraith:

1. Did the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister of Justice, the Solicitor General or any other member of the government receive any representation either written or oral urging the government to refund estreated bail to Mrs. Anna Badman of Vancouver?
2. If so, what persons made such representation and in what form?
3. Was any member of parliament directly or indirectly instrumental in presenting any such representation and, if so, what member or members?
4. Was the refund in question recommended by the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or any other member of the force and, if so, by whom?
5. Was the refund in question recommended by any other police officer or any court official?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Secretary of State): Starred question No. 91 should be changed to an order for return.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise a point of order at this stage. When you called the item of business involving questions to be made orders for returns a list of questions was dealt with, but included in the list read by the Solicitor General was starred question No. 91. My point is that this starred question was dealt with by Your Honour when the house was considering starred questions. Under the applicable rule, which I deem to be standing order 39 (5), there is a limitation expressed in these words, "unless otherwise ordered by the house". Under the order of business, "starred questions", you put starred question No. 91 before the house and the house dealt with it and made it an order for return on division.

Mr. Speaker: That is correct. Starred question No. 91 was dealt with and it would be irregular for the Acting Secretary of State to repeat that number. The other questions mentioned by the Acting Secretary of State stand as orders for returns.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

PENITENTIARY EMPLOYEES—REGULATIONS AND CONTRACT

Motion No. 78—Mr. Regier:

For a copy of the regulations re administration and contract as given to penitentiary employees.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I wonder whether I could have leave of the house to have the word "contract" changed to "conduct". It is an obvious printer's error.

Motion agreed to.

INQUEST REPORT, JOHN WASLYCHEN

Motion No. 79—Mr. Regier:

For a copy of the inquest report relating to cause of death of one John Waslychen, former inmate of the penitentiary at New Westminster.

Motion agreed to.

ANNA BADMAN, VANCOUVER—BAIL REFUND

Motion No. 80—Mr. McIlraith:

For a copy of the order in council or minute of treasury board of July 3, 1959, authorizing the refund to Mrs. Anna Badman of bail of $20,000 forfeited by order of the county court of Vancouver on July 18, 1956.

Motions for Papers

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, there is no relevant order in council or minute of treasury board on this question but I have here the formal document whereby the governor general exercised the royal prerogative, and I should like to table it herewith.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the revision suggested by the minister, which I take it is acceptable to the hon. member for Ottawa West—

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: —is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

GRANBY AIRPORT

Motion No. 81—Mr. Boivin:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the Department of Transport and the city of Granby, from January 1, 1945 to date, regarding the Granby airport.

Motion agreed to.

D.B.S. QUESTIONNAIRES ON LABOUR FORCE SAMPLING

Motion No. 82—Mr. Hellyer:

For a copy of each regular or special questionnaire used by the bureau of statistics during the months of January and February 1960, in respect to its sampling of the Canadian labour force, including its without jobs component.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I should like to ask the house to allow this to stand until next week, pending the return of Mr. Duffett, the head of the dominion bureau of statistics, who is out of the country on urgent public business.

Motion stands.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ELLIOT LAKE—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON VISIT OF MISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is in a position now to make a report to the house on the fact finding committee that visited Elliot Lake a short time ago, and perhaps also on the visit of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to Toronto to deal with the situation in that area.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I would appreciate it if the hon. gentleman would allow this to stand until tomorrow.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. Have any arrangements been made as yet for members of his cabinet, the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Labour or both, to visit Elliot Lake?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the date for the visit has not been determined. It should be decided very shortly. It is being considered at the moment.

VANCOUVER—REQUEST FOR ACTION ON UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. I do so because of the courtesy of the Minister of Transport and the president of T.C.A. in enabling me to spend two days in Vancouver after three months' absence. On the basis of what I saw there I should like to ask the Minister of Labour, in view of the situation in Vancouver where they now say, in the construction industry and in the fisheries, that they are not in a recession but a state of depression, whether he can inform us what action is being taken, if any, to deal with the unemployment situation in that city.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any such situation in Vancouver as described by the hon. member and have received no representations from anyone in that regard.

[Later:]

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour. Did I understand him to say he had received no information whatever about the situation in Vancouver, and has not yet heard that there is not a recession but a depression in the construction industry?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is repeating the allegations which he made in his earlier question, to which the minister has already replied.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I wish to say something on this, if I may. I assumed that the hon. member was making reference to some special representations in this regard. According to my recollection no such representations have been made.

We all know that in the construction industry not only in British Columbia but across the whole country there are lay-offs during this seasonal period, when construction cannot be carried on in the same way it normally is. Lay-offs have occurred in British Columbia during the winter period not only this year but in previous years, and such lay-offs will probably occur in the future.

Mr. Winch: But I am talking about the present situation—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

SOUTH AFRICA—REQUEST FOR CANADIAN SUPPORT FOR UN ACTION ON APARTHEID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the reported worsening of the situation in South Africa, with the reported arrest of persons, including Europeans, who belong to political parties that oppose the government's policy of apartheid, is Canada prepared to speak up clearly in support of appropriate action by the United Nations security council?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the house knows Canada is not a member of the security council, and the Canadian government has not adopted a position with regard to the inscription or substance of the item. These are matters for the individual members of the council to determine. So far as Canada's views are concerned in respect of the situation in South Africa, they have been clearly expressed and are completely understood.

I think there is nothing more I can say at this time. The matter is being considered by the security council.

Mr. Argue: If the government is not prepared to go further in the House of Commons, I wonder if I might ask a supplementary question. Has the government made any representations to members of the United Nations security council as to what action should be taken with regard to this urgent matter?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I made that quite clear; the view of the Canadian government is known. The members of the United Nations, on the basis of past experience, do not frequently make representations to members of the security council as to the stand of that body.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister whether the government has received any representations from any other member of the United Nations on this matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now, I cannot say from memory. The minister is not here today, and representations would have been made to him. I will bring that question to his attention.

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: With regard to the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition, I think it was, a few moments ago as to whether there have been any representations from other members of the United Nations with respect to consideration by the security council of the South African question, the answer is that there have not.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

MAGAZINE ARTICLE CONCERNING CONSTRUCTION OF SCHOOL AT OLD CROW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources or, in his absence, to the acting minister. Has the minister seen the story in the latest edition of Time magazine which contains certain misstatements of fact in respect to the construction of the school being built at Old Crow? Would the minister look into the general allegations made in that article, and particularly the statement to the effect that 40 tons of building supplies are allegedly being flown into Old Crow to finish the school rather than being freighted in by barge?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Acting Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I have not seen the article to which reference is made, but I shall be glad to bring this matter to the attention of the minister, who will provide an answer as soon as possible.

AGRICULTURE

BUTTER, CHEESE AND SKIM MILK—REQUEST FOR STABILIZATION PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the many representations of farmers and various farm organizations for continued support prices on butter and cheese and restored support prices or deficiency payments on milk powder, has the minister any comment to make on this matter?

(Text):

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): As the hon. member very well knows, when the government is ready to make a statement in connection with the support price of dairy products for the following year it will be made. It certainly will not be made in response to a question without notice on orders of the day.

Inquiries of the Ministry

(Translation):

PORK—REPORTED FAILURE TO OBTAIN DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean-Paul Racine (Beauce): Has the minister received a petition, bearing the signature of more than 300 farmers, complaining that some business concerns are using the registration and numbers given to farmers in order to obtain deficiency payments on hogs? Does the minister intend to inquire into this matter?

(Text):

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have not received this communication which is spoken of. However, I can assure the hon. member that the system we have set for making deficiency payments for pigs is such that it will be pretty difficult for people who wish to try to break the law in this matter. Of course bank robberies are taking place every week, and I have no doubt that certain people will attempt to break this law as well as laws against theft and so on. However, I think it would be difficult for them to make much progress along that line.

(Translation):

PORK—REPORTED TRAFFIC IN PERMITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister not received complaints that there is a traffic in permits granted to hog breeders in the large market areas?

(Text):

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not received any such information.

NOVA SCOTIA—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE ON DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture when we may expect the tabling of correspondence between the premier of Nova Scotia and the minister with regard to deficiency payments? The minister will perhaps know that the premier tabled the correspondence in the legislature two weeks ago.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the latter allegations or statements made by the hon. member for Essex East, but as soon as I have received the consent of the province to the tabling of this correspondence I will table it.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Has the minister asked for that consent yet?

Mr. Harkness: The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker; immediately after the request was made.

IMMIGRATION

IRENE REBRIN—INQUIRY AS TO DEPORTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration about the deportation order made against Irene Rebrin. Can the minister inform the house whether this deportation order was made following a regular inquiry by an immigration board, or was it a ministerial order?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the former is true.

Mr. Crestohl: I would like to direct a supplementary question to the minister. If I understood her reply, she indicated that the deportation order was made following a regular immigration board hearing. If that is so, was an appeal lodged by the person deported?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will permit me I will give him a full report on this matter.

INCOME TAX

APPLICATION TO ENTERPRISES CONDUCTED BY RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I would like to ask the Minister of National Revenue a question in view of the pending investigation into federal income tax as it affects Hutterite colonies. Can the minister say whether this investigation will also apply to commercial and/or agricultural enterprises operated by other religious organizations in Canada?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the word "investigation" is the proper word to use, but as a result of representations which have been made about this matter by the hon. member for Acadia, as well as other hon. members of this house, I have asked my department for a full report of the practice which has been followed in the past with respect to the application of the Income Tax Act as regards Hutterites, as well as the practice under the existing law. A complete study is being made and a memorandum is being prepared on that particular matter.

Mr. Regier: I wonder if the minister would be able to say whether a report is also going to be made as to the application of section 62 to other religious organizations.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is reviving a matter of previous debate. As I recall his contribution to the debate on the grievance raised recently, that was the point he made there.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, this question of mine is as the result of a news item, a copy of which the minister has. It is a new development. I am only asking the minister whether the efforts now being undertaken will also apply to other religious organizations, and the minister has not replied.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, studies in my department are being made from time to time of all matters with respect to the application of our taxation laws.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question. Is this particular study being made in regard to all religious organizations or just one?

Mr. Nowlan: I have answered that question.

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING AWAY FROM HOME LIVING EXPENSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has the minister received any representations that the income tax deduction for expenses occurred in the course of employment while living away from home now accorded to construction workers be extended to woodworkers or else cancelled? If so, what type of consideration has he been able to give?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member might defer that question until the budget debate because it refers to matters which are proper subject of budget resolutions.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL LOAN OFFER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether the federal government has offered to loan the province of British Columbia half the cost of the Columbia river power development.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was asked a similar question yesterday, and I would respectfully refer the hon. gentleman to the answer I gave then.

Mr. Pearson: I asked that question, and the minister said he had not seen the press clipping and that he was not in a position to answer it. I now ask him the question again.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, that was not all I said. I also pointed out that a matter of this kind was not appropriate to be dealt with by a short answer on orders of the day.

TRANSPORT

FORT WILLIAM—INQUIRY AS TO AMALGAMATION OF RAILWAY STATION SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware of any negotiations being carried on by the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway toward the amalgamation of railway station services which would eliminate the Canadian National Railways downtown office at Fort William? If not, will the minister give an assurance that if and when such negotiations are initiated he will inform the house?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. I have inquired of the management of the Canadian National Railways, and I am advised that no such negotiations are going on.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

REPORTED STATEMENT BY PREMIER OF ONTARIO RESPECTING ADDITIONAL REVENUE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. In view of Premier Frost's statement yesterday in the Ontario legislature that he proposes to come to Ottawa in July with the firm resolve of getting $100 million more revenue, will the Minister of Finance say whether, in the preparation of the budget which he will be presenting tomorrow night, he will take into account Premier Frost's thirst for justice—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know all hon. members would like to have an advance view of the budget, but it would be quite improper in my view to draw it out bit by bit in the way suggested by the hon. member for Essex East. Of course if the hon. member disagrees with the view I take I will be glad to hear him.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank you, Mr. Speaker. However, we differ so rarely that I would not press the matter. Of course I was not asking the Minister of Finance to tell us what is going to be in his budget. I was simply giving him notice. The minister is preoccupied these days and may not have seen what Premier Frost said. I asked the minister whether in the preparation of his speech, which must be engaging his attention very much at this time, he was going to take into account the very deep desire that the premier of Ontario has that justice be recognized by the federal government. I suggest that is not asking for budget details. I am sure my dear friend would welcome—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I cannot agree that the further refinement to the question which the hon. member has made, alters it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On reflection, Mr. Speaker, I agree with you.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

VANCOUVER—STATEMENT ON DEATH OF INDIAN WOMAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, last week the hon. member for Vancouver Centre asked me to comment on the reported death of Mrs. Eva Ada Harry while being transported from the Vancouver General hospital to my department's Indian hospital at Sardis, British Columbia. In reply to the question, and to one asked by the hon. member for Gatineau yesterday, I would report as follows.

Mrs. Harry was received in the out-patient department of the Vancouver General hospital on March 9. After it had been diagnosed that she was suffering from tuberculosis, my department's local Indian and northern health services office was asked to arrange treatment, and in the meantime she was taken care of in the infectious diseases section of the hospital.

A vehicle from the Indian hospital at Sardis called for Mrs. Harry at 3.20 p.m. on March 11, removing her on a stretcher. It then called at Shaughnessy hospital for another patient, at which time the driver noticed that Mrs. Harry seemed to have taken a turn for the worse. He returned quickly by way of the Indian and northern health services clinic to the Vancouver General hospital, where death was confirmed a little more than an hour after he had originally called for her.

[Mr. Speaker.]

A coroner's inquest held last week found death to be due to a natural cause. The jury recommended that an ambulance similar to those used in Vancouver should be used in such cases, and that an attendant with first aid qualifications should be with the patient.

It must be remembered that my department requires a type of vehicle which can travel through difficult road conditions, and the vehicle used in this case is particularly well suited for such purposes. It could best be described as a station wagon body on a light truck frame, and is widely used by other agencies facing similar transportation problems where ambulance service has to be provided. For example, I believe the Department of Veterans Affairs and the provincial division of tuberculosis control use similar types, and that the specifications invariably include ambulance-quality springs.

I regret that such an incident should have taken place, and particularly that no qualified attendant was present on this trip. It is the custom of Indian and northern health services to have a first aid man or even a qualified professional officer accompany a patient on a transfer when it has been indicated that the patient's condition warrants such a precaution. In this case as, in all others, however, transfer was made on the basis of a diagnosis by the hospital staff, and there was no indication that the patient's condition would deteriorate so rapidly.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

NATIONAL GALLERY—REQUEST FOR FRENCH COPIES OF EXHIBITION FOLDER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. This morning I received from the national art gallery of Canada a folder prepared in connection with the inaugural exhibition which closes on April 5. This has been printed in English only. Can the minister tell us if copies are available in French?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I really do not know. I will inquire.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT—ALBERTA RED LABEL BEEF FOR DINNER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. W. Brunsden (Medicine Hat): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. The minister is aware that at long last there is in Ottawa today some choice beef, red label beef from Alberta. My question is this. In addition to those we have invited, will the minister impress upon hon. members from British Columbia, and particularly on the hon. member for Kootenay West, that they attend in the dining room at seven o'clock this evening?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

HONEST JOHN MISSILE—INQUIRY AS TO ATOMIC WARHEAD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I wish to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Can the minister advise the house whether the Honest John missiles to be obtained for the Canadian army are to be equipped with atomic warheads?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): I believe the answer to the hon. member's question was given yesterday by the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Hellyer: With deference, I do not think the question was answered yesterday, and I wonder if the associate minister will be good enough to answer it.

[Later:]

Mr. Hellyer: I have now had a chance to check yesterday's Hansard, and since no reference was made to the question previously raised—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising to ask a question?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, Mr. Speaker. In view of the lack of indication yesterday—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should be given an opportunity to ask his question.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the Associate Minister of National Defence now advise the house whether or not the Honest John missiles will be equipped with atomic warheads?

Mr. Sevigny: The same answer, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Is the minister not aware that this question was not asked yesterday, so how could it have been answered?

An hon. Member: It was dealt with.

Mr. Hellyer: Perhaps the associate minister would take the question as notice and advise the house tomorrow.

Mr. Sevigny: There was a comment made yesterday by the Minister of National Defence concerning this missile. If the hon. member for Trinity wishes to have more information, I will take the question as notice and advise him.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

AVAILABILITY OF CAPITAL BUDGET TO MEMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue when the capital budget of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation tabled yesterday will become generally available to members.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): It will be distributed in accordance with the usual practice.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): A supplementary question. Can the minister now throw any light on the intentions of the C.B.C. with respect to the Flin Flon area?

Mr. Nowlan: Not at this time, other than to say that the matter is under review and consideration, and that action will be taken at the proper time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is there any such provision in the capital budget?

Mr. Nowlan: The capital budget has now been tabled.

SPORTS

REQUEST FOR TELEVISION COVERAGE OF U.S. BASEBALL GAMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): While we are on the subject of the C.B.C. I have a question for the minister who reports to parliament for that organization. Has the hon. gentleman received from any person, persons or organizations in my constituency a telegram or other communication requesting that consideration should be given to the televising of American baseball games? If so, would he care to comment?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I have received many communications from various organizations, labour unions and so on with respect to this matter. I also have one which I can exhibit to the hon. member at this moment. I think most of his constituents, or at least a substantial number, have joined in sending this telegram.

This matter is receiving the attention of the C.B.C., as are all problems which are presented to the corporation, and in due time the most intelligent decision possible will be made.

Some hon. Members: Read it.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table this document?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the minister would have it made an appendix to Hansard?

Mr. Nowlan: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister tell the house whether or not the national energy board has now made its report to the cabinet with its recommendations concerning the export of natural gas.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have nothing further to add to the answers I have been giving to similar questions.

Mr. Argue: Is the minister still of the opinion that the decision of the government on this important question will be announced by the end of this month?

Mr. Churchill: I have not said that at any time. I said the report would be received and a decision reached before the end of this month.

Mr. Argue: When a decision is reached, will it be made public?

Mr. Churchill: The government will announce all matters of policy in due course.

NATIONAL REVENUE

NEWFOUNDLAND—REPORTED LOSS OF INCOME TAX REFUND APPLICATIONS

On the orders of day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is the minister aware of the loss of a mail bag containing several hundred applications for refunds on 1958 income tax returns between St. John's, Newfoundland and Ottawa? If so, will he see to it in consultation with the Postmaster General that there is no undue delay about making the proper reimbursement for the people of Newfoundland?

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I have not seen the report to which the hon. member refers. I will check on the matter. As I recall it, the hon. member said these were returns for 1958 rather than for 1959—

Some hon. Members: For refunds.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

EAST SAINT JOHN THERMAL PLANT, N.B.—ATLANTIC PROVINCES—NATURAL RESOURCE PROCESSING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Secretary of State. Can the minister inform the house why there is such a delay in tabling the documents and exchange of correspondence on the East Saint John thermal plant, as covered by motion No. 9 passed by this house on February 3, some 56 days ago?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am sure there is a very good reason for this delay. This will be tabled as soon as possible.

Mr. Robichaud: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister not know that permission was obtained from the government of New Brunswick over a month ago?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, while these questions are being asked could I ask the Acting Secretary of State what progress he is making with respect to a return passed by this house pursuant to a question I asked on July 1, 1959, and with respect to which I have already asked him questions more than once in the house?

Mr. Balcer: I am looking it over, Mr. Speaker.

(Translation):

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF QUEEN'S PRINTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Secretary of State a question?

Could he tell us if we can look forward to the appointment of a queen's printer in the near future?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, that is a matter of government general policy, and when an appointment is made, the house will be informed.

(Text):

APPROPRIATION ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-55, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending March 31, 1960.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, is the minister not going to make a speech?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Speaker, I shall follow the time-honoured practice of the house and refrain from making a speech on the second reading of an appropriation bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY ACT

AMENDMENTS TO EXTEND PERIOD OF PAYMENTS AND INCREASE MAXIMUM EXPENDITURES

The house resumed, from Tuesday, March 29, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Walker—Mr. Rea in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act to extend until March 31, 1964, the period during which contributions or payments may be made to the provinces under the act and to prolong until December 31, 1963, the period in respect to which construction costs may be incurred under this act; and to provide also that the aggregate of all expenditures under the act may be increased to a maximum of four hundred million dollars.

Mr. Granger: Mr. Chairman, yesterday afternoon, at five o'clock, I had reached the point in my remarks where I was talking about the trans-Canada highway in my district. Within the district of Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador there are 151½ miles of trans-island road. Of this, 18.8 miles are paved; 36.4 miles are graded to trans-Canada standards, and 96.3 miles are ordinary gravel road. The necessity of paving is very apparent. Gravel road will not stand up to heavy traffic and the cost of maintenance is growing with every mile of new road built.

I mention these figures in my district to show, at least in one part of Newfoundland, how small a proportion of the road has either been brought up to trans-Canada highway standards or is finally paved. Since Newfoundland entered confederation I believe about 300 new communities have been linked up by a road system. Those communities, formerly isolated, now have the advantage of having road connections; but there are many other communities yet to be linked and, at the same time, the trans-Canada highway must be completed. The cost of building is very high. But, as I said before, the cost, is even more burdensome when the cost of maintaining new roads is added to the province's outlay on roads.

Trans-Canada highway is a heavy load for the province to finance. The province of Newfoundland is sparsely populated; the distance between settlements is often very great and the average income is low. Thus far trans-Canada highway has cost the province of Newfoundland approximately $11,500,000. Taking everything into consideration, the number of miles built, the number of miles paved and the number of miles still to be brought up to trans-Canada highway standards, I cannot see how the road can be finished for some years yet. Under the 50-50 formula, my personal opinion is it would take from 10 to 15 years to complete the trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland.

Many tourists are finding new interests in the great new native attractions of Newfoundland, but the need for the completion of the trans-Canada highway stands between the tourists who want to come to Newfoundland and the prosperity of the tourist industry in our province. New adventures in the native attractions of Newfoundland await those who want to see the oldest part of the new world and the newest part of Canada. Money is needed to finish the trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland quickly. In order for the trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland to be finished quickly the old formula must be abandoned and a new, more equitable formula substituted.

It is in the interests of Canada to have the trans-Canada highway finished as quickly as possible. I do hope that the government of today will emulate the government of the past which made transportation the nation's business, and give the completion of the trans-Canada highway the same kind of thinking which created the transcontinental railways.

In conclusion, I should like to quote the following:

We should, and this government does, consider this newest of our provinces—

The speaker was referring to Newfoundland.

—as not a new province in the circle but as something special, something extra, because it can boast of being the oldest and most esteemed colony in the British Empire.

These words, Mr. Speaker, were spoken in this house last year by the present Minister of Public Works. I and all other Newfoundlanders appreciate his sympathy and his interest and we bespeak his making the completion of the trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland his personal responsibility.

Mr. McFarlane: Mr. Chairman, in connection with this resolution before us today, I should like to bring up a few points that should be considered at this time by the Minister of Public Works.

During the past several years we have spent millions on our present trans-Canada highway. Also, we have been building it for over 15 years and it is still far from completion. This has been a major project for a period of over 20 years. Since we can see the completion of the highway in the foreseeable future, we should now have a second trans-Canada highway projected, at least on paper, which would service the populated areas of southern British Columbia.

Several years ago the people of the southern sections of Alberta and of British Columbia formed the southern Alberta trans-Canada highway association and presented their views to the government of Canada. They expressed the urgent need of a through highway across those sections of the provinces. It would serve not only as a tourist attraction but, in an emergency, we would have a through highway not obstructed by ferries and toll bridges on the way.

I should like to impress upon the minister the necessity of supporting financially the early completion of this second highway. A good roads program is now being completed across the centre of the province of British Columbia, and also across the centre of the province of Alberta. It will be an asset to the northern sections of the provinces. It will also be a wonderful assistance in the development of British Columbia; but we must also promote immediately a second road and, of necessity, it will have to be located through my district, and preparations made for feeder lines connecting up with the trans-Canada highway. This southern route should be constructed to meet future demands. The tremendous increase in tourist traffic is demanding more adequate roads. Our travel bureaus, both provincial and federal, are doing a wonderful job but we must support them with good roads.

The provision of better road conditions for the country is supported by boards of trade, chambers of commerce, cities and towns all across the southern section of the western provinces of Alberta and British Columbia. At the present time we are losing millions of dollars every year because of an inadequate highway program, especially across the mountainous sections of our area.

Present development in our area will be greatly enhanced by the initiative of the present government in promoting a second trans-Canada highway across the southern sections of the provinces. It does seem to me that if the federal government could see its way clear to participate in the construction of the southern trans-Canada highway it would be an impetus to the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta and it would hasten the completion of this route. I have been advised that federal funds are being made available to improve the roads in the north, and we are also in a similar position. This matter has been placed by the provincial minister of highways before the federal department but I am advised the discussions have been in general terms. Therefore I should like to specify an early allocation of funds for the southern provincial highways, this, of course, being in addition to the provincial arrangements for a roads to resources program.

At the present time traffic is being diverted from various sections of the roads coming into Canada from the United States and tourists are being requested to use United States highways in preference to roads through Canada. Traffic is taking routes at the present time through the province of British Columbia for part of the way, then going south into the United States at Kingsgate and returning to Canada at Osoyoos and thence to Penticton and onward to our coastal points. If the new route is completed at an early date from Crowsnest through Cranbrook and Creston—I might also mention that at Kimberley, only 20 miles north of Cranbrook, we have the largest lead and zinc mine now operating and in addition a steel mill is being constructed this year—it will be a tremendous tourist attraction and will also give us an all-Canadian route. The major factor is that this is a route that can very easily be kept open all year round. Driving time will be cut in half for through traffic from the eastern and prairie provinces to the coast and for people who come from the eastern and southern states to see our glorious country.

With the advent of trucking operations by our major transportation systems, the Canadian Pacific railway and Canadian National Railways, we have a dire need for a four-lane southern trans-provincial highway to handle the tremendously increased traffic, a highway which will serve not only the people of British Columbia but of all of Canada both industrially and domestically.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words on this resolution which has to do with an extension of time and certain payments as far as construction of the trans-Canada highway is concerned. I am, of course, in complete agreement with any extension of time that is required and any additional expenditure of money that is necessary. But I should like to ask the minister in charge and the government to reconsider the routing of the trans-Canada highway and the question of federal financial responsibility as far as my own city of Vancouver is concerned.

I do not believe the exact situation in Vancouver, the first city of British Columbia and the third by population in Canada, is generally understood. If you look at a map you will see that Vancouver is almost an island. The only way out is through the city of Mission. As far as access to the trans-Canada highway is concerned, Vancouver is almost in the position of being an island.

Until a few years ago when the government came into the picture with respect to the planning and construction of the trans-Canada highway, unless the people of Vancouver went about 60 miles out of their way they had to pay a toll to get out of the city of Vancouver. When the federal government first took part in the planning and financing of the trans-Canada highway the major ingress to and egress from Vancouver was over the Pattullo bridge which was built by the province of British Columbia. The federal government made an arrangement with the provincial government whereby, on the payment of a certain amount of money to the province, the bridge became toll free.

In the great city of Vancouver we are now in this position. We have the Pattullo bridge which by agreement between the federal and provinical authorities is now toll free. However, the Pattullo bridge can no longer handle the traffic originating in the major city of Vancouver and in Burnaby and New Westminster. Therefore the province of British Columbia and the city of Vancouver had to get together on the construction of the Oak street bridge and the Ladner tunnel which are primarily routes leading to the United States although they also lead to the trans-Canada highway.

The federal government has refused to pay any part of the cost of what I maintain are not only international connections between British Columbia and the United States but also routes leading to the trans-Canada highway. People using the Oak street bridge and the Ladner tunnel have to pay tolls, but even with these routes and the toll-free Pattullo bridge traffic from the third largest city of Canada to the trans-Canada highway is so great that the province of British Columbia and the municipalities concerned have had to undertake to construct what is going to be known as the Mann bridge together with all the connecting links. The Mann bridge with all its connecting links from Vancouver, Burnaby, New Westminster, Coquitlam and Burquitlam will be a link connecting directly with the trans-Canada highway. It is my understanding that although it is a direct link between Vancouver and the lower mainland and the trans-Canada highway across the Fraser river, no contribution is being made by the federal government.

On behalf of Vancouver, Burnaby, New Westminster, Coquitlam and Burquitlam, which together make one of the largest communities in Canada, and because of the peculiar circumstance of Vancouver being almost an island, I should like to ask on what basis the federal government will not consider these most necessary highways leading from Vancouver, Burnaby, New Westminster, Burquitlam and Coquitlam over the Fraser river to the trans-Canada highway as being part of the trans-Canada highway. I do not believe there is any other city in the whole of Canada which is in the peculiar situation of Vancouver and its environs in linking up with the trans-Canada highway. It is not that the province, the city and the municipalities involved have only spent a few dollars. In the last few years and taking into consideration the construction commitments made of necessity by the provincial government in order to cross the Fraser river to the trans-Canada highway, millions upon millions of dollars have been spent. If you add the cost of the Oak street bridge, the Ladner tunnel, the new Mann bridge and the necessary approaches, I think I am safe in saying that the total expenditure will not be less than approximately $50 million; I think I am pretty close on that, not less than around $50 million for the approaches, bridges and tunnels. They are all in the city of Vancouver but lead to the international border or tie in with trans-Canada highway.

I understand that the only bridge toward which the federal government has made any contribution was the Pattullo bridge and its approaches. I would, therefore, under this motion, ask the minister if, because of the peculiar situation in the city of Vancouver, it is not possible to apply the same understanding that was reached in connection with one bridge to these new roads and bridges within the city. As a matter of fact, part of my property is being expropriated in order to put a road through, but that does not mean anything. I would ask the minister if, on the basis of Hastings street, Grandview highway, Kingsway, Marine drive, the ingress and egress to trans-Canada highway, there is not some responsibility on the federal government to make a contribution toward the millions of dollars that have been spent and the more millions to which my province is now committed.

I sincerely hope the minister can advise us as to whether or not an agreement has been reached as to sharing the cost of the Mann bridge over the Fraser river to tie in with the trans-Canada highway, even though it is now completed, and also the cost of the Ladner tunnel.

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Chairman, in speaking to the resolution which is presently before the committee I should like to commence by saying that I am extremely pleased to learn of the extension of the period during which contributions or payments may be made to the provinces in connection with this trans-Canada highway. I am equally pleased to learn that the fund in relation to this project will be increased. At this time, I should like to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Dauphin in which he suggested that funds should be made available for the construction of a second trans-Canada highway route. Other hon. members including the hon. member for Kootenay East have spoken about this second route, and I feel it is a very important question at this time.

I say it is very important in so far as the people in all parts of Canada are concerned. I am certain that plans of this nature would be heartily welcomed by all the citizens of Manitoba. As the members of the committee probably know, the Manitoba government has embarked on a fairly extensive program of highway construction and the improvement of provincial roads in general. Extensive plans have also been made, in conjunction with the federal government, under the roads to resources program. Many of these roads to resources in Manitoba are currently under construction, and others are planned.

Apart from the important effect of providing better road facilities for the people living in some of the northern parts of our province, a second trans-Canada highway would have a number of other important benefits. It would be a great boon, of course, as other members have mentioned, to the tourist trade. It is my opinion that we must have better roads, such as the trans-Canada routes, in order to attract tourists into the general area of the northern part of our province in which these tourist attractions are found. Many of these areas are today only accessible by chartered aircraft, although some scheduled flights are available to certain areas. I think it is very important to have these road links constructed under joint federal-provincial financial arrangements. These roads would bring the tourists into the general area where they could then avail themselves of the roads to resources which are being constructed.

I might mention some of these roads which would lead to tourist attractions, and I am speaking now particularly of the northern part of the province of Manitoba. There are roads leading off No. 10 highway going north to Flin Flon. Some of these roads will open up territory which up until now has only been accessible to people who could fly into the area. We have a road under construction off No. 10 highway in northern Manitoba from Simonhouse to Wekusko. Then, there will be a roadway into the Snow lake mining area. Also planned as an extension of this Wekusko road is a road into the nickel mining area of Thompson, Manitoba. Once this road is constructed as far as Thompson it is not going to be too great a job to continue the road on up to the port of Churchill. Many people believe that a road to Churchill is just a little bit out of the question, but after being up there on many occasions, I can visualize that the seaport of Churchill could easily become one of the major tourist attractions of Canada.

I believe if we can extend plans in the near future for a second trans-Canada highway, regardless of which route of the many which have been suggested is followed, it will bring these tourists into the area on good roads. Then they can, in time, make use of the roads to resources which will be quite accessible. However, for some length of time they will not be as good as the roads that are classified as highways.

There are one or two other things, however, which are just as important in regard to these roads through the northern areas. Just as important as the tourist trade is the fact that once we get these roads into these areas, many of them probably running closely adjacent to railway lines, we believe it will solve another of our great problems, namely the problem of the indiscriminate freight rates which all people in the northern parts of the provinces have to face. I have seen on many occasions through personal experience that the moment a road goes into an area and there is trucking competition down come the freight rates. So that we hope these roads will be planned as quickly as possible to help solve this very great problem.

Apart from the question of freight rates, a lot of the people living in the more populated areas probably do not realize that where there is no competition from other modes of transport there are many other little services which we are not entitled to have. Many of the areas of northern Manitoba are at the present time continually battling to have such things as free pick-up and delivery service of express and l.c.l. freight, and this all ties in with our railway problems. Although the authorities who have charge of these affairs will not admit it, it is quite evident that once there is this competition from trucking these services are provided, and, as I said before, the freight rates come down.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest briefly to the Minister of Public Works that, despite the fact that there are going to be many briefs presented with regard to just where this second trans-Canada highway should be routed, in Manitoba the route which seems the most feasible is one going northward on No. 10 highway up through the Dauphin area as far north as Flin Flon. I know there are many chambers of commerce, boards of trade and communities in general who are interested in suggesting that consideration should be given to taking a cut-off from No. 10 highway at or near Mafeking, probably going west through the towns of Westgate, Baden, Powell and through to Hudson bay, and then west from there to the Saskatchewan road link.

However, I would like to get back to this previous suggestion that a very good look be taken with regard to the possibility of continuing on No. 10 highway directly to Flin Flon, and then going southwest from there and linking up with the Saskatchewan road system. At the present time the Saskatchewan government are constructing a road going southwest out of Flin Flon under another roads to resources program from Creighton, Saskatchewan, which is adjacent to Flin Flon, going southwest and linking up with the Saskatchewan road system at a point near Smeaton, very close to the city of Prince Albert. I realize there will be many such routes suggested, but I would like to go on record at this time as heartily supporting the proposal that full consideration should be given to a route going north on No. 10 highway directly to Flin Flon, and then using the route which we hope will soon be available going southwest from Flin Flon into Saskatchewan.

I have very few further remarks to make on this resolution. However I would like to say, as has been said before, that we in northern Manitoba have found in talking to tourists that at the present time, with only one road going north, tourists stay for just a week or two and then have to return home along the same route over which they entered the country. I think it would be of tremendous help to them and certainly more attractive if they had the opportunity of coming in along one route and returning home along one or two alternative routes. Favourable consideration to putting through the second trans-Canada highway as I have suggested would aid considerably in those problems before us. The tourist trade is one of our greatest revenues and we should do all we can to encourage it to the fullest extent.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, may I intervene not to speak in the debate but to move an amendment? I notice that as this item No. 16 appears on page 10 of today's order paper, the word "March" is inserted instead of "May". It is just a printing error, but so that the resolution be correct, it should read "May 31, 1964" instead of "March 31, 1964".

Therefore it would read:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act to extend until May 31, 1964, the period during which contributions or payments may be made to the provinces under the act—

And so on. Accordingly I move that the resolution be amended by deleting the word "March" in the second line thereof and by substituting therefor the word "May".

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee agreeable to this change?

Mr. Pickersgill: Could I ask the minister if that is the way it was in the message from the crown?

Mr. Walker: I have not seen the message from the crown, but it has always been, as I understand it, an extension of three years to the day in each instance, and it was that way in the old bill.

Amendment agreed to.

(Translation):

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, this resolution would extend until December 31, 1963, the period in respect to which construction costs may be incurred under the Trans-Canada Highway Act and would increase to a maximum of $400 million the aggregate of all expenditures under the act.

I do not propose to speak at length on the resolution this afternoon, since I already had occasion to do so last year, when a similar resolution was considered. Besides, on second reading of the bill, we shall have a chance of asking questions about this highway and I hope the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) will not consider them out of order.

However, I want to take this opportunity to tell the minister that, once more, like many others, I was unpleasantly surprised to find that the members of this government had forgotten the promises they made when they were in the opposition and, had failed to carry out the suggestions they put forward when they were sitting on this side of the house. It seems to me that, after the many criticisms they expressed at the time, we might have expected that the federal government's contribution would be increased in proportion to the building cost of the highway.

I have no intention of mentioning the promises made by the key men of this government, nor all the commitments they made when they were sitting on our side of the house, because my leader, when dealing with the resolution yesterday afternoon, reminded the house of those promises made by the members of the Conservative party.

Mr. Chairman, I also thought that the minister would take this opportunity to tell us that the government intends to call a federal-provincial conference, as the previous government had done in 1955, as a result of which the federal government increased its contribution, with consequent greater activity in the construction of that highway.

The minister has no doubt been informed of the statement made by the president of the Canadian Construction Association who, speaking before members of that association at Calgary, in early January, suggested that a federal-provincial conference should be held this year to consider the national highways problem. He also added that, in his opinion, members present at this important meeting must work in close co-operation with Ottawa and the provinces.

On the other hand, according to the answer given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), some time ago, no official talks, so far, have been opened with the provinces in connection with that project. In my view, it is high time such a meeting were called, because two or three western provinces have already completed their highway, and it is desirable that plans be made for the construction of highways that would be in the national interest.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that in replying to the various questions that were put to him the minister will be able to give us more detailed information in this regard.

Mr. Chairman, the trans-Canada highway project, which is of major interest to all provinces of Canada, was launched 11 years ago. All provinces, except Quebec, shared in that project, through which millions of dollars were made available to them by the government of this country.

Now, despite the many representations made by both the former federal government and the present one, the province of Quebec, under the specious pretext of autonomy, invariably refuses to participate, thus causing Quebec people to lose millions of dollars that the province could have spent on the construction of this highway.

Mr. Chairman, I am not a lawyer and furthermore, I do not pretend to be an expert on constitutional law. However, I have consulted a few of my colleagues who are lawyers and they told me that section 92 of the British North America Act, which sets outs the powers of the provinces in different fields—

Mr. Asselin: It is section 10—

Mr. Bourget: Well, in subsection 10 of section 92 of the act, we find this:

> Local works and undertakings other than such as are of the following classes:

Paragraph (a) reads as follows:

> Lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs and other works and undertakings connecting the province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the province.

And now, I read paragraph (c):

> Such works as, although wholly situate within the province, are before or after their execution declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

Now, not being a lawyer, I can hardly interpret the law, but I do not know of a single member who objected to that section. Moreover, I stated reasons why that section did not prejudice the right of our country's government to build a national highway through the provinces. Besides, my hon. friends from the province of Quebec know that on various occasions the most autonomist papers in the province have blamed the Quebec government for its failure to participate in the trans-Canada highway project, one which, they pointed out, in no way affects our rights.

I now ask my friends from the province of Quebec, and more particularly those who are cabinet members this question: "If the Trans-Canada Highway Act is in conflict with the provincial autonomy, why do they not protest to the cabinet, and why do they not tell their fellow members that this legislation is a violation of Quebec's rights as a province?" I ask them to rise today and tell this house, instead of just accusing us on behalf of the province, of violating the rights of Quebec.

You have been elected in Quebec because you said that you would salvage all the rights that those wicked Liberals had taken away. If that is the case, prove it now. Do not hide behind the curtains. Take your responsibilities.

Mr. Pigeon: We are not afraid, not at all afraid. We have not sat pat for 22 years as you did.

Mr. Denis: You sat down between two stools.

Mr. Bourget: We have seen great repudiations, starting with the great repudiation by their provincial leader in the province of Quebec; but we shall have other occasions to refer to that.

I said that the most nationalist and autonomist newspapers rightfully blamed the government of the province of Quebec—

Mr. Pigeon: The reform.

Mr. Bourget: Many a time, we have heard the late premier, Hon. Maurice Duplessis, and after him, the present premier of our province, as well as the present minister of highways, emphatically state that this project was altogether unacceptable, and incompatible with Quebec autonomy.

Yet it will be remembered that not so long ago the Hon. Paul Sauve stated that autonomy should be forgotten for the time being. He said that an important matter of dollars and cents was involved in that project. I am not the one who said this. It was said by your former leader who for four months recently, was prime minister of the province. And he added, after pointing out that the province of Quebec had built a good portion of the road entirely on its own:

Why should we not get some financial compensation?

And then, quite rightly, he said:

Why should we be dupes?

That is clear, quite clear. I hope my fellow members from the other provinces realize the problem and understand what we mean.

To Mr. Sauve it was not a question of autonomy but of the benefits we might derive therefrom. It was a business matter. That is how he saw the interest of his province.

Mr. Denis: Contracts without tenders.

Mr. Pigeon: With a sob in his voice.

Mr. Bourget: With a sob in his voice Mr. Chairman, if you had heard those people since 1944 when they were talking about autonomy; if you had heard them say on the platform that French Canadians were going to lose their institutions, their language, if we lost autonomy.

I personally heard myself the ex-premier of the province—

Mr. Ricard: Tell us about conscription.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think the hon. member must realize he is straying away from the subject of the resolution before us.

Mr. Bourget: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I did realize I was straying away but I was invited to do so and sought to comply with the request of my hon. friend.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: You are talking like Jean Lesage. Jean Lesage has no seat.

Mr. Bourget: He shall have one.

Mr. Pigeon: No, he is licked before he starts.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The rules permit only one hon. member at a time to have the floor.

(Translation):

Mr. Bourget: Unfortunately, this is not the policy of Mr. Sauve's successor because since March—and I am talking about the new premier of the province of Quebec, he—

Mr. Denis: That is not so sure.

Mr. Bourget: He stated in the legislature:

If our government did not share in this project—

(Text):

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I have sat here for 15 minutes because of the respect I hold for the hon. member for Levis but the resolution provides for an extension of the time to complete the three years and makes provision for another $50 million and in no way concerns the province of Quebec which is not participating in the Trans-Canada Highway Act and I therefore respectfully suggest that the hon. member's speech which has been devoted entirely to a discussion of the policies in the province of Quebec is out of order at this time.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member realizes that we must confine ourselves to this resolution. As an hon. member of long standing in this chamber I am sure he will appreciate the situation and co-operate with the Chair.

Mr. Bourget: Speaking to the point of order raised by the Minister of Public Works, may I suggest that we are considering a resolution which could mean millions of dollars for the province of Quebec. As hon. members of this committee and representatives of our own province are we not entitled to get a share of the money that is spent?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before you make a ruling could I say a word on this point. After all, the trans-Canada highway is offered by the federal government to all ten provinces and not just nine of them. What my hon. friend is seeking to do is to show that it would be in the interests of the people he represents in the county of Levis and the people in the province of Quebec generally to participate with the rest of Canadians in this national program. It seems to me when he is arguing about that matter he is arguing about the very essence of the question.

Mr. Denis: Since the inception of the expenditure of this money for the highway not one foot of road has been built in the province of Quebec, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Winch: Because of the choice of the Quebec government.

Mr. Denis: Yes, but there are about 50 Conservative members from Quebec and we would like to know if they intend to take advantage of this.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Chair does not intend to restrict any hon. member in speaking on anything relevant to this resolution and I think the committee understands that but I hope hon. members will refrain from indulging in what is perhaps best termed a political speech and will stick to the terms of the resolution.

Mr. Denis: This is not a political speech. We are giving facts.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I recognize the hon. member for Levis.

Mr. Bourget: I hope hon. members will allow me to complete my speech which I shall do in four or five minutes. This afternoon we listened to speeches made by hon. members for Manitoba and British Columbia who I believe mentioned the requests of their provinces and no one rose in his place to stop them from speaking so why should not I be entitled to speak about my own province when this resolution could mean millions of dollars to my province. We are allowed some leeway on a resolution and I think we should be entitled to represent not only the views of Liberal members of parliament but the general views of the population of Quebec.

Mr. Ricard: The Conservative government will settle that.

(Translation):

Mr. Bourget: Sit down.

An hon. Member: The gag, the gag.

Mr. Pigeon: The Bourget gag.

Mr. Bourget: Unfortunately, Mr. Chairman, this is not the policy of the one who has succeeded to the Hon. Mr. Sauve in the legislature, because early in March he stated that if our government had not shared in the project, it was first and foremost because it involved the principle of provincial autonomy. Well, section 92 of the British North America Act, which I quoted earlier, clearly shows that such is not the case—unless I am mistaken in the interpretation of the text. In any case, I have heard no one contradict that fact in the house. If, on the other hand, the province of Quebec did have technical objections to raise, it should have raised them. Now, that project has been going on for 11 years, and the government of the Union Nationale has never, in any way, introduced any proposals or counter-proposals that might have settled that matter definitely.

During this session, about two or three weeks ago, I asked the Minister of Public Works whether the province of Quebec had made any proposals or counter-proposals concerning the trans-Canada highway, and the answer was no.

I have here the record of the debates that took place on that matter in the Quebec legislature early in March.

(Text):

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Bourget: Certainly.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is the hon. gentleman criticizing the government of the province of Quebec or the government of Canada?

Mr. Bourget: I am criticizing the government of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is that in order here?

Mr. Bourget: Why not?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I can answer that, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member wishes.

Mr. Bourget: Is Quebec in Canada? As representatives of Quebec are we not entitled to speak on behalf of those people? What are hon. members trying to do here, suppress the views of our population?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Levis has the floor.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, speaking to the point of order, the hon. gentleman is straying from the resolution under discussion. If the hon. gentleman reads it he will find he is out of order.

Mr. Bourget: Why am I straying? Quebec is part of Canada, is it not? After all, it means millions of dollars for us.

Mr. Spencer: Read the resolution.

Mr. Bourget: I have read the resolution.

Mr. Spencer: The hon. gentleman read the wrong form.

Mr. Bourget: No. That money is voted by the federal government. Quebec is as much entitled as any other province to benefit from the money spent all across the country.

Mr. Spencer: That is for Quebec to decide.

(Translation):

Mr. Bourget: I have here a record of the proceedings when this matter was dealt with in the Quebec legislature early in March, and I find that the provincial minister of highways attempted, probably to confuse things, to give a few reasons to justify the refusal of the province of Quebec to share in the construction of the highway. And among the reasons mentioned by the minister, there is not a single one has to do with provincial autonomy. They deal solely with matters of procedure and details.

May I add, Mr. Chairman, that in the 11 years that this project has been going forward, I have never heard a member of this house, from any party or from any province, complain about the way the federal government had handled the provinces with regard to this scheme. I ask the Minister of Public Works whether, since his appointment as minister, he has received any complaints from the provinces with respect to the treatment they have received from the federal government.

Personally, I had the opportunity, when I was parliamentary assistant to the minister of public works, to travel to western Canada, where I had the pleasure to meet the four provincial ministers of highways, and they all told me that they were fully satisfied with the good relations existing between their respective governments and the federal government with regard to this plan. From what I was told, there appeared to be the highest degree of co-operation in the matter. This shows that similar relations might have existed with the province of Quebec if it had really wanted to share in the plan.

It is quite difficult to figure out exactly how many millions of dollars the people of the province of Quebec are losing because of the stubbornness of their provincial leaders, but on the basis of the total length of the trans-Canada highway, 4,500 miles, excluding the province of Quebec sector—I find that the length of the highway within our province represents about one eleventh of its total length. Well, one eleventh of the $400 million spent on this project by the federal government is $36 million. That is the amount the province of Quebec is now losing in this case.

And that is not all; we hear now of the construction of a highway that would cross Montreal from east to west. There again the province and the city of Montreal stand to lose many million dollars because this highway could certainly be part of the trans-Canada highway.

I realize that under the present legislation, it might be impossible for the province of Quebec to recover the millions it could have obtained, either as payment for sections of the highway previously built between 1928 and 1949, or for other sections of the highway built since 1949 to date. But I believe it would be easy to amend the act, and I am convinced that not one member in this house would object to an amendment that would allow our province to recover its part of the amount spent on the construction of this highway.

This is perhaps the last opportunity the province has to share in this program, and I hope it will not let it go by.

I hope the ministers who represent the province of Quebec in the cabinet, and the other members on the government side will finally realize, as their former leader, the Hon. Mr. Sauve, did so well realize, that we must stop being dupes in our own country.

(Text):

Mr. Winch: I should like to ask the hon. member a question.

Is it not correct that the only reason why Quebec has not received any money under the trans-Canada highway 50 per cent formula is that the government of Quebec would not, up until recently, make an agreement with the federal government to accept any contribution?

Mr. Bourget: That is absolutely right.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, a few weeks after I was first elected to the House of Commons I was asked to represent the then minister of public works, now the Secretary of State for External Affairs, at the official opening of the Saskatchewan section of the trans-Canada highway, the first section opened in the country. I was very glad to have that honour and privilege, and I am glad to say that since that time I have received many representations advocating the establishment of a second trans-Canada highway from Winnipeg through Saskatoon, Lloydminster, Edmonton and on to the Yellowhead pass. I think it would be of much benefit to the northern areas of our western provinces, and particularly of benefit to the area around Saskatoon.

For many years, of course, there have been persons who have been advocating this project. They have been diligent and untiring in their efforts to achieve acceptance of the proposal for a second trans-Canada highway. Since 1957 I think it is fair to say that activity in this field has increased. Members of parliament all along the route have drawn it to the attention of the government individually and in this house. Saskatoon itself has always been vitally interested in this project.

Shortly after my election I received the first of many representations on this matter sent by the trans-Canada highway system association, Yellowhead group, dated September, 1957. That was followed by representations from the Saskatchewan highway No. 14 association, the Evergreen-Yellowhead route group. Then the board of trade of the city of Saskatoon wrote again in February of this year, both to myself and to the Minister of Public Works, advocating this project. I have also received correspondence from the city of Saskatoon itself as late as February 5 of this year advocating the establishment of this route. The most recent representation came from the trans-Canada highway system association dated March 25. In this representation the president drew attention to a recent announcement made by the Prime Minister regarding the commencement of preliminary discussions to consider the establishment of this second route.

The particular interest of Saskatoon in this problem derives not only from the common interest held by all major centres along this route, but we in Saskatoon believe that the present transportation system serving our city often places us in a very unfavourable position in regard to certain other centres in obtaining competitive rates on the railways.

I spoke on this matter on June 25 last year, as recorded on page 5186 of Hansard. If I may refer to what I said then, perhaps it will summarize the situation as far as our city is concerned. At that time I said:

> Agreed charges and competitive rates are growing at a fast rate in western Canada as a whole but they are naturally being applied to those movements where alternative forms of transport offer serious competition to the railways. Saskatoon is too far from the west coast to share the advantages of sea transport via Vancouver, which has brought about some relief in freight rates in British Columbia and Alberta. Rail competition through the United States has led to some agreed charges for centres near the international border but Saskatoon is too far north to benefit from these.
> The only effective competition with the railways as far as Saskatoon is concerned is highway transportation and load limits on the highways in the province of Saskatchewan are so low as to prevent this being an effective force. Cities on the trans-Canada highway to the south and others in Alberta and Manitoba where weight limits are higher have benefited considerably from agreed charges resulting from highway competition. Thus, while agreed charges are rapidly bringing lower transport costs to western Canada as a whole, Saskatoon is not sharing these benefits because it is poorly placed for service from competing forms of transport.

Many other hon. members from the western provinces have spoken on this subject and I do not wish to labour it at this time, but I wanted to make clear the particular position of Saskatoon and its interest in the establishment of a second trans-Canada highway. I might say that we from that area were greatly heartened by the announcement made by the Prime Minister, referred to by him again on March 8 of this year as found at page 1839 of Hansard, to the effect that preliminary discussions are taking place concerning a northern route in the western provinces. We urge the present Minister of Public Works and the cabinet generally to activate their studies of this problem in order that a resolution may be brought forward at an early date.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, the construction of the trans-Canada highway can be compared with great Canadian projects of a magnitude such as that of the transcontinental railway of the nineteenth century, the St. Lawrence seaway, the trans-Canada pipe line and the proposed Saskatchewan dam, projects which required not only faith in the future of Canada and vast sums of money but also an almost visionary concept of what this country is going to be for future generations to benefit from and to enjoy. I appreciate the privilege of participating in the discussion of this resolution to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act in order to extend until May 31, 1964 the period during which contributions by way of payments may be made to the provinces under the act and also to increase the amount that may be expended to $400 million. I congratulate the Minister of Public Works for sponsoring the resolution because it will enable those provinces which have not availed themselves of federal government participation in the past to make it possible that the national highway will be completed from Newfoundland to British Columbia.

The Canadian Automobile Association made a submission to the federal government advocating the urgent need of a national highway policy for Canada in order to develop the nation's highways efficiently. In its brief it recommends the convening of a conference with the provincial governments and representatives of the municipalities for the purpose of planning and building a national system of roads.

Automobile transportation, because of its convenience, has brought about much of what we like to call our Canadian independent way of life. It has become so popular that automobile manufacturers, through constant research into which untold millions of dollars have been poured, have far outdistanced the efforts of governments to build adequate roads for these vehicles. In 1890 there was not a single mile of pavement in Canada. In 1958 there were 252,000 miles of roads and highways, 41,000 of which were paved.

As everyone knows or should know, the automobile industry and the many economic enterprises that spring from it have actually become a decisive factor in the production of national wealth. The industry has completely transformed rural as well as urban living. May I point out that one out of every seven persons employed in Canada is now directly or indirectly dependent for his livelihood upon the economic activities related to the automotive industry and highway transportation.

In a survey conducted by the Canadian automobile chamber of commerce it is reported that six of every ten automobile owners use their cars to travel to work or use them in the conduct of their business. The same survey found that nearly seven out of every ten cars were operated by families whose chief wage earner earned less than $3,000 a year. A nation of not quite 18 million people uses for transportation five million vehicles. It can be predicted with reasonable assurance of accuracy that by 1970 ten million vehicles will travel on the roads and highways of Canada, without taking into consideration the millions of tourists who will visit Canada every year. Therefore, at the present rate of highway construction by all three levels of government, construction will fall far behind the requirements for reasonable and adequate provision to accommodate the ever-increasing number of vehicles competing for space on our highways.

It is true that the responsibility for road building and maintenance is established by the British North America Act, but that was done at a time when there were no automobiles. Those days produced no prophets who foretold the advent of the automobile and the evolution of transportation. Therefore there is a substantially good and sufficient reason why the government should consider an amendment to the act to enable the establishment of a highway program based on national need, which program should be second only to defence.

The present Trans-Canada Highway Act was passed in 1949 and established the framework within which the trans-Canada highway is being constructed. Under the act the federal government has made provision for substantial assistance, and the resolution we are discussing now again provides a sum of money and an extension of the time limit. At the same time, certain inequalities are present. This is what I particularly wish to point out to the minister.

Those provincial governments with few construction problems have completed their construction projects under the earlier agreement. Those provincial governments with longer stretches of highway and more difficult construction problems have not completed their projects. Others have not elected to participate in the federal assistance plan. The result has been that those governments which have completed their portions of the highway according to their agreements with the federal government are now deprived of financial aid. In other words the responsibilities for highways in Canada are not sufficiently co-ordinated nor clearly enough understood to justify the hope that a national system of highways, with a uniform construction will materialize.

As pointed out by the Canadian Automobile Association, the federal government should recognize the necessity of a co-ordinated plan. Canada is one of the few major nations of the world that does not have an integrated transportation policy and a national system of highways. The trans-Canada highway could be the starting point for a national system of highways. The Canadian Automobile Association suggests in their brief that the assistance for access roads which this government implemented last year is a good move but is only a partial answer to the problem.

I should like now to quote what the Canadian tax foundation has to say on its study of taxes and traffic, and which is very pertinent to the subject under discussion:

> Undoubtedly highways have some "national" implications in Canada, just as they have provincial and municipal implications, and these are probably broader than the federal government has been willing to recognize in the past. The Trans-Canada Highway Act and some of the earlier legislation has been in the right direction and more of this type of program should be planned for the future. The "national" implications of highways in Canada are far more intangible than in most other countries—particularly in the United States—and the danger is that they will be valued too low rather than the reverse. We will not truly be a national community until it is possible for the masses of our citizens who own cars to travel the country from coast to coast in comfort and safety during at least the milder times of the year.
> Just where the line falls between national effort that will achieve this end and federal assistance to the provinces and municipalities in meeting their normal responsibilities for highways, roads and streets cannot be said categorically, but undoubtedly experience and experiment would produce some workable rules. Wherever the line is drawn it should be consistent with the concept of highway financing set out previously.

The trans-Canada highway does go through the Canadian lakehead but unfortunately the condition of the highway west of Fort William practically to the Manitoba boundary, with the exception of a few stretches, can be described as poor for ordinary traffic and absolutely inadequate for the heavy traffic now resulting from the completion of the St. Lawrence seaway. When a similar resolution was introduced by the former minister of public works I expressed the fear that unless the highway from the lakehead to Winnipeg was considerably improved we were going to lose some of the benefits of the seaway to the cities of Duluth and Superior in the United States. The highway between Duluth and Winnipeg is preferable to our own and they are planning a four-lane highway all the way to the Manitoba boundary.

I advocated that we should not be caught sleeping at the switch, and that we should also plan a four-lane highway to Winnipeg if we are serious about the potential freight movement which the seaway is bound to create. I regret to say that little or nothing has yet been done on this portion of the highway and, consequently, hundreds of tons of freight unloaded from ships at the lakehead have found their way to western Canada via Duluth, Minnesota. A share of the blame for this "do nothing" policy on our trans-Canada highway link between the lakehead and Manitoba properly rests on the Ontario government. However, since the federal government pays a substantial, indeed the major, share of the cost it should also have some say in where the moneys are going to be spent.

Some of the hon. members here know that the provincial government is spending proportionately far more in the eastern parts of the province than in northwestern Ontario. This is a policy which has irritated the people of northwestern Ontario to the point of sparking talk of secession and the formation of a new province. I am not advocating such a move at the present time, but if this neglect continues the people of the northwest corner of the province will undoubtedly ask for a separation in the years ahead when a separate province may be economically feasible.

The lakehead is the natural gateway to the prairie provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. We share their common interests. We are the key to their communication system in which is wrapped up the movement of goods from eastern Canada and overseas, a large portion of which is being carried by motor transport. I believe that a considerable movement of grain may, in the future, be made by motor transport until a pipe line is constructed which will transport wheat from the west in a manner similar to that in which oil is transported by pipe line.

A good trans-Canada highway will also benefit the tourist business, and this means additional millions of dollars coming into this country to help balance the present adverse trade with the United States. Large sums of money have been spent to develop recreational facilities, to develop motels, and for advertising, especially in the United States. But much of these expenditures would be positively wasted if good all-weather highways were not provided. Good roads are an integral part of the tourist industry, just as the development of parks, resort facilities and advertisements in newspapers and magazines.

Motor car travel has a high priority for the Canadian people once provision has been made for the necessities. It is a pattern of life which is characteristic of North America which enjoys the highest standard of living in the world. Canadians are spending an increasingly larger amount of money on touring their own country, especially in places where they know they can rely on good roads. The growing number of car owners in Canada is one of the most spectacular developments of our Canadian way of life since the war. Approximately five million motor vehicles were registered in Canada in 1959, and every car owner becomes a tourist at some period during the calendar year. The federal government collected from the sale of these vehicles an estimated $500 million, $134 million of which represented the sales and excise taxes. The provinces collected more than $500 million in licence fees and gasoline tax.

I realize also, of course, that the construction of highways is costly, but I venture to say that it does not come anywhere near the amount of revenue received by the federal and provincial governments from various sources directly connected with the automobile industry which provides the source for the tourist dollar. It is a generally accepted fact that the tourist business is the third largest industry in Canada today. It is, therefore, an important factor in the national prosperity as well as the welfare of the community. Someone has said that the tourist trade is Canada's greatest invisible export.

Only wheat and newsprint bring in more money from outside Canada than visitors do. Only newsprint brings in more money from the United States than visitors do. We must give constant consideration to the need for providing good and safe highways in which our trans-Canada highway plays a major role. What needs to be done is to make the trans-Canada highway safer for motor travelling in order to attract United States tourists, such as levelling off the hilly portion of a road where the summit is approached from both sides, straightening dangerous curves and the laying of a good pavement.

It is expected that by next October the new highway around lake Superior will be completed. Nothing would please the people of northwestern Ontario more than to have the Minister of Public Works officiate at the official opening upon the completion of this important link of the trans-Canada highway along the shore of lake Superior from the lakehead to the Soo. This road, which is part of the trans-Canada highway, would open 450 miles of scenic splendour, the unsurpassed beauty of which will defy description unless one is possessed with the endowment of a Dickens or a Longfellow. Unfortunately the road will not be up to standard but it is to be hoped that it will not be as long before it is paved as those other sections of the trans-Canada highway which, though open for several years, are still in very poor condition.

This lakeshore drive is expected to bring in an additional three million tourists annually to northwestern Ontario. This trend was started two years ago by the opening of the Mackinac bridge, the largest suspension bridge in the world. The building of the lake Superior highway, which is designated as part of the trans-Canada highway, has added an attraction to millions of tourists living in the central and west central sections of the United States. This would also place the cities of Fort William and Port Arthur at the head of a transportation system which stretches from Mexico along the Mississippi waterway, into Ontario, the lakehead and Kenora. It opens up countless lakes and rivers for the sportsman who likes to fish pickerel, northern pike and speckled trout, to say nothing of good moose hunting.

A vacation paradise awaits the action of this government and co-operation with the government of the province of Ontario would make it a reality.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the special pleas put forth on behalf of the Atlantic region, first by the Leader of the Opposition and then by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador. While they did present what to my mind are very telling factors in arguing the case of the Atlantic region, I think they also showed themselves to be cursed with remarkably short memories.

What are the sound arguments they did advance before I turn to their short memories? First, the sparse population compared with areas elsewhere, which is particularly true of the province of Newfoundland and Labrador. Second, the lack of tax raising resources in these provinces, which is a fact that has haunted us before and since confederation. But their memories have proved to be remarkably short on the problem of the trans-Canada highway, for I suggest that since the government changed in 1957 we have gone a long way toward meeting the objections that our predecessors raised when the Conservative party was in opposition.

There are two very important measures which have been adopted which go toward meeting these reasonable objections of the hon. members of the opposition. For one thing the Conservative government has taken account of the problems of the Atlantic area in raising taxes for highway building and other public services. I refer to the special grants to the Atlantic provinces of $7.5 million to the three largest provinces and $2.5 million to the province of Prince Edward Island.

Some of this money has undoubtedly been spent on roads, and that fact alone would overcome some of the objections and arguments raised by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member from northern Newfoundland. In fact, in the province of Nova Scotia, my own province, we have had the most active road building in history since the people there in provincial voting followed the proper course which the people in the rest of Canada took in 1957.

But this alone is not the whole story. Very recently agreements were signed to provide $7.5 million to each of those provinces for roads to resources, and this again is of very special benefit to areas where the tax raising potential is not high, and in particular the area of the Atlantic provinces. So that in effect we have met, and I think met very effectively, the objections made by hon. members when they were in opposition which were quoted and read into the record by the Leader of the Opposition when he took part in this debate a day or so ago.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member for Halifax permit a question? Is the hon. member for Halifax, as a representative of the Atlantic provinces, satisfied with the contribution the federal government is now making toward the trans-Canada highway?

An hon. Member: That is not a fair question.

Mr. McCleave: I think it is considering the source.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): He was satisfied prior to 1957.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was not.

Mr. McCleave: I suggest that the arguments of the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member from Newfoundland who preceded me in this debate—doubtless other hon. members from Newfoundland can be expected to follow me—simply show that remorse and repentance can work wonders, particularly when you are in opposition.

I think these points should be made clear, otherwise the people could get the impression that the Atlantic provinces have special needs and special arguments which are not being met. I say that we do have these special needs; we do have these special arguments which were fairly pointed out by the Leader of the Opposition. But I would definitely quarrel with him in the proposal he has made, and I say that the government is not only recognizing those needs but has gone a long, long way toward meeting them. That is something which the hon. members in opposition can well ponder upon before they make this kind of suggestion.

I return briefly to another matter, namely consideration of the trans-Canada highway system. I hope that when the final link is completed from coast to coast some thought will be given to providing additions to it. My own city of Halifax, for example, does not enjoy a position on the trans-Canada highway, but 60 miles of pavement would overcome that difficulty. I think we people in the Atlantic provinces would be better advised to save our arguments on the completion of the first trans-Canada highway to ensure that we are not put in a bad bargaining position should a second trans-Canada highway system be considered or, as I say, additions are made to the first one.

Mr. Howard: On rising to participate in this discussion during the resolution stage, may I say at the outset that I was extremely interested in the proposal made by the Leader of the Opposition and other members of the Liberal party. I would imagine that if the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, is still a member of the Liberal party, he could properly classify himself as a Liberal in a hurry. These new views which the Liberal party has adopted indicate how stimulating is defeat in the promotion of the imagination; except, I may say, that the official opposition is four or five years too late in reaching these conclusions about the deficiency of their proposals concerning the trans-Canada highway when they were in office. However, I will say, also, that the government should now cease the practice of taking something which the Liberal party did when they were in office and extending it a few years. It seems that the Conservative party is not using the grey matter between its ears and is merely content to stumble along continuing what the Liberal party did during its years of office.

In any event, the request indicated in the resolution is acceptable as far as I am concerned. I have some complaints to make about the financial conditions attached to the building of the trans-Canada highway and with regard to certain other matters with which I will deal in a moment. If I may, I will first make reference to the report of the proceedings under the Trans-Canada Highway Act for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1959, which was submitted by the Minister of Public Works to the Governor General, and read a few lines from it. At the top of page 2 it says:

> The progress of construction during the 1958 season was generally satisfactory with most provinces proceeding with the work at an accelerated pace in order to ensure that travel will be possible on a paved road over the entire highway mileage by December, 1960. This may be so in all provinces except Newfoundland—

I ask the minister to consider seriously whether in future reports of this nature he should not be more truthful with regard to the impression he leaves with the general public and with the house. I am quite sure that when this was reported and when it was compiled the minister knew full well that the trans-Canada highway would not be completed by 1960.

Mr. Walker: On a question of privilege, is the hon. member referring to the fiscal year ending March 31, 1959? Is that the report from which he is reading?

Mr. Howard: That is what I said when I started.

Mr. Walker: That is the answer, then, is it not?

Mr. Howard: It indicates, too, that when this report was made the minister knew full well that the program would not be finished by 1960.

Mr. Walker: A year ago?

Mr. Howard: If the minister does not know that far in advance what he is doing, he should not be in office.

Mr. Walker: The hon. member has a great capacity for insolence, but he will be good enough to understand that I became minister in August 1959, and this report is dated March 31, 1959, not March 31, 1960, and only expresses the provinces' intentions a year ago.

Mr. Howard: It says: "Respectfully submitted, David J. Walker, Minister of Public Works." I assume the hon. member is the person who signed his name to this report. Even if what the minister says is true, and he did not know what he was submitting to the Governor General, that is a sad commentary on the situation, and he is merely putting the blame on one of his colleagues, the former minister, now Secretary of State for External Affairs. One of the two gentlemen is wrong and should be more truthful in the future when these reports are made. Does the hon. gentleman wish to ask a question?

I should like to deal now with this formula of 50 per cent of the cost paid by the federal government plus an additional 40 per cent of 10 per cent of the mileage, and to suggest it should be altered and adjusted in the same way as the initial 50-50 proportion was adjusted when the Liberals were in office. I suggest that such a revision is even more important now than it was in the past, in the light of the fact that some provinces have not completed work on their portions of the highway, and in the light of some of the comments made by the Prime Minister a few days ago about the acceptance of the principle of financial participation in this work.

I suggest that some of the things which should be taken into account in developing a formula more generous than the one we have at the moment are such factors as road building costs, which vary considerably from province to province, the weather, geographical and topographical considerations, labour costs, mileage, the state of the economy of the particular provinces and so on. All of these factors should be taken into account and some increase should be made in the amount of money which the federal government contributes.

As I have mentioned, the difference in mileage between the various provinces is considerable. Prince Edward Island, for example, has only some 71 miles as compared with 1,436 miles in Ontario. Differences of this kind emphasize the necessity of revising the formula upward, taking into account these disparities. Road building costs, too, vary widely from province to province.

Let us consider, for example, the two westernmost provinces, British Columbia, from which I come, and Alberta. In economic terms they are relatively equal. There is not much difference in their ability to pay. However, we know that in British Columbia road building costs, on account of geographical and topographical features, are much higher than they are in Alberta. In British Columbia we have a number of what are called million dollar miles; stretches of highway where, in other words, it costs a million dollars to build one mile of road. That is a cost which has to be reckoned with, and it is met not only in connection with the trans-Canada highway but in the construction of other highways in British Columbia. In Alberta road construction does not cost anywhere near this amount; if costs do run as high as that, it is only for, possibly, a few miles within the Rocky Mountains.

These are factors which should be taken into consideration. I mention the examples of British Columbia and Alberta only because of the comparable economy of the two provinces. But the increased construction difficulties which I have mentioned should be taken into account when determining this particular formula and how it should be developed, in addition to such factors as the economic ability of a province to pay, the per capita income of its population, and so on.

Wage levels in each province should also be taken into consideration. Compare, for instance, the province of Newfoundland with the province of British Columbia. Each province has roughly the same amount of mileage to build, Newfoundland having some 554 miles and British Columbia 568. When we compare the economic factors in the two provinces we immediately realize that economically British Columbia is better able to build highways than is Newfoundland. This is the most important factor to take into account in adjusting upwards the formula for payment by the federal government to the provinces in finishing the present trans-Canada highway and also when the government gets around to participating in the cost of other highways.

I do not state a flat figure as did my hon. friends in the Liberal party as applying equally to all the maritime provinces and leave that to the statistical people to work out. I say there should be an upward adjustment in the formula and that these are some factors to be taken into consideration in developing a formula. It was wrong to take the position in 1949 that the provinces were equally able to afford to build highways. In its distribution of funds across the nation the government considers the financial situation of the provinces and this same principle should apply in highway building programs.

One province has completed its section of the highway and others are nearing completion. An examination of the table for 1959, for which the present minister apparently is not responsible, indicates that Prince Edward Island has one mile to complete; New Brunswick has 72; Manitoba has 16; Alberta has 6; and Saskatchewan has none. I think we can logically assume that Prince Edward Island, Manitoba and Alberta will soon complete their sections barring unforeseen difficulties. This will mean four provinces will have their share completed, three of them being in western Canada. The hon. member for Saskatoon said there is great interest in western Canada in having a start on a second and northern trans-Canada highway following the completion of federal-provincial arrangements. The longer this is delayed the more will the federal government penalize those provinces which will have completed their share of the present highway.

The Minister of Public Works being new to the cabinet has not had time to visit the places he would like to visit but I extend an invitation to him to make an extensive tour of northern British Columbia and in order that he may fully appreciate the need of a highway system there I suggest he make his visit in the spring and discuss the question with individuals and groups such as city councils. His predecessor did visit northern British Columbia during the election campaign but I am sure the hon. gentleman's mind was preoccupied with matters other than highways on that occasion.

We are given to understand that the Prime Minister is interested in a second trans-Canada highway and indeed made a speech on the subject on a "Nation's Business" telecast on March 3, 1960. I have in my hand the text of this speech where on page 3 we find the words I wish to draw to the attention of the committee. I did not see the telecast but can well imagine the artful emotionalism the Prime Minister would employ on an occasion of this nature when he seeks to convince the people that he believes in something about which he intends to take no action.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, the hon. gentleman's remarks are in my submission a direct reflection upon the Prime Minister and should be withdrawn.

Mr. Howard: I believe what I said represented a direct interpretation of the Prime Minister's action as I shall show in a moment. The Prime Minister is capable of manufacturing a tremendous pseudo sincerity to make people believe he wants something in which he is not really too much interested.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, is that part of the text? Will my hon. friend be good enough at all times to indicate when he is quoting from the Prime Minister's text and when he is inserting his own inimitable nonsense and then we will be clear on the matter. Just say "quote", will you?

Mr. Howard: When my hon. friend says "nonsense" I do not know if he refers to what the Prime Minister said or to what I said. One of the things the Minister of Public Works should learn is humility and he should cultivate the ability to listen.

Mr. Walker: I could learn that from the hon. gentleman who has the floor, could I not?

Mr. Howard: I doubt very much if you could learn anything from anyone. I suggest you should develop the ability to listen and then you would appreciate what I am quoting. If you will pay attention now I will read what the Prime Minister said and I quote—

Mr. Walker: Is this a quote?

Mr. Howard: No, the "quote" is not a part of the quotation but I put it in for your benefit. I am reading from the bottom of page 3. These are the Prime Minister's words:

> We said we would push the trans-Canada highway to completion and then consider a second possible trans-Canada route across the prairies and the Rockies. The main line of the trans-Canada is now being carried to completion in co-operation with the provinces and, indeed, the time is not far off when the achievement of spanning the land mass of the continent by rail 75 years ago will be matched by a first-class automobile road from coast to coast . . .preliminary discussions are taking place concerning the northern route in the western part.

Unless the Prime Minister talks in his sleep we cannot imagine with whom these discussions took place. The hon. gentleman was asked about it on March 8, 1960 by the hon. member for Assiniboia, as reported at page 1839 of Hansard. After making reference to the telecast in question the following exchange occurred between the hon. member for Assiniboia and the Prime Minister:

> Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Can the Prime Minister say what is the nature of the preliminary discussions, and what progress is being made?
> Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the discussions are preliminary; that is their nature, and when we are in the position to go farther than that the house will be made aware of the plans we have in mind.
> Mr. Argue: Can the Prime Minister say with what province or provinces he has had those preliminary discussions?
> Mr. Diefenbaker: The question of another trans-Canada highway has not been discussed with the provinces particularly.

To whom was the Prime Minister speaking? Did someone write him a letter saying, "Dear John, I think it is about time to make a start on this", or what? Who or what is the other factor that is going to participate, if not the provinces? The four western provinces are affected and have, through the trans-Canada highway association, drawn up a route for the second highway.

The provinces will be the ones who will be determining the route and financing part of it. The Prime Minister says that it has not been discussed with the provinces particularly. I submit this is just wishful comment on the part of the Prime Minister; it is a distortion of something which may be a fact. He may have had discussions with the Minister of Public Works. Before the Minister of Public Works insists upon passage of this resolution—if those discussions have been held—he owes it to the committee to rise in his place and tell us with whom there have been discussions. If he has had discussions with the Prime Minister, he is in duty bound to discharge his ministerial responsibility by telling us about those discussions, and what plans, if any, are being made for the building of a second trans-Canada highway.

If those discussions have not been held—and according to the Prime Minister's comment they have not been held with the provinces—then the Prime Minister should be ashamed of himself because he has misled a great number of people into believing that amendments were to be made during this session to permit the provinces to participate in the building of another trans-Canada highway.

I have letters on file from municipal bodies in the riding of Skeena in northern British Columbia, and I assume the Minister of Public Works has, too, in which they say, following the Prime Minister's telecast, "We understand a second route is going to be proceeded with; can you tell us what it is all about?" There is not any indication in the resolution that there is any second trans-Canada highway route being developed, although it may well be that this is in the minister's mind. I should like to hear from him. Perhaps this may be a good opportunity for the minister to take advantage of the committee stage and tell us what he has in mind.

I think the Prime Minister is only laying the ground work for the next election. He is raising hope now; he will develop it next year and whenever the election is called he will say that discussions have gone on for a number of years and he is almost ready for it.

I submit that so far as western Canada is concerned, a start on a second trans-Canada highway is a must, and a must right now, not two or three years from now, but an indication should be given to the provinces. It should have been given to them already. Perhaps an indication will be given at the conference which will be held later on; but an indication should be given to the provinces that the federal government is willing to participate with them in the building of a second or northerly route.

In northern British Columbia we have quite an interest in a second route and quite an interest in highways of any sort because there are so few of them and what there are, are in bad shape. Of course, this is not the responsibility of the Minister of Public Works. Highways at the moment are a provincial matter. I only wish to relate the need for a second trans-Canada highway and to suggest in general terms the route which that second trans-Canada highway should follow through northern British Columbia.

I think the principle that is established now with the present trans-Canada highway, namely that part of Vancouver island is included in the route, should be applied to the north and to Queen Charlotte islands. The Queen Charlotte islands should be included in the route. The route should run from Prince Rupert and take in Prince George and thence to Jasper.

The Chairman: I have been following the hon. member. I do not wish to be too strict in my ruling but I do not think this resolution has to do with the construction of a second trans-Canada highway. This resolution, which precedes an amendment to the Trans-Canada Highway Act, has to do only with construction of the present highway. To try to relate it to the construction of another highway would be stretching the point. I think I have given the hon. member some leeway up to now; I would ask his co-operation.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased at any time to co-operate, and to abide by the rules. I do not know whether you were in the chair when the hon. member for Saskatoon spoke, but his entire speech dealt with a second trans-Canada highway. While the hon. member for Halifax did not deal with a second trans-Canada highway, he did advocate the extension of the present highway into the city of Halifax. I do not want to run foul of the rules but I think, especially since the Prime Minister said on television that we are going to go ahead with it and that this sort of thing was being discussed, I should be permitted to touch on it.

May I submit this for your consideration, sir? At the resolution stage, preceding a money bill, it is my understanding that a member can state his opinions and desires and express the hope that they may later be reflected in the bill. This is what I am attempting to do, express those ideas and opinions and the need for a second trans-Canada highway. I know full well how generous and how receptive the Minister of Public Works is to fresh ideas; perhaps he will incorporate the idea of a second trans-Canada highway into the bill itself.

I am sure, Mr. Chairman, you would not want to be too restrictive and prevent the Minister of Public Works from having the benefit of the suggestions that I put forward; otherwise, he might come in with a bill that covers only half the problem. In any event, I do not intend to go very much farther into the second trans-Canada highway route, except to say there is a tremendous amount of pressure from organizations and people in the central interior section of British Columbia, notably around Kamloops, who are interested and are insisting on this second trans-Canada highway route, once it is developed, proceeding from the prairies out to Jasper, which is on the Alberta-British Columbia border, and then turning from there northward toward Kamloops and connecting with the present trans-Canada highway.

The minister should not listen to those representations because the need for a second trans-Canada highway through British Columbia would be far better served and it would be of far more value to the economy and it would be truly an addition to the present trans-Canada highway if it were to run in an easterly-westerly direction from Jasper, through to Prince Rupert on the coast. I know the Minister of Justice comes from Kamloops and the minister of highways of British Columbia, Mr. Gaglardi, comes from Kamloops. I know there will be tremendous pressure on these two gentlemen to bend, or hook the highway and bring it down into Kamloops. I appeal to the Minister of Public Works to resist this pressure, and to ask his colleague to resist the pressure also, and not to sacrifice the needs of northern British Columbia to the desire that the route go down through Kamloops as a part of the second trans-Canada highway.

If we are going to build a second trans-Canada highway, let us do it now. I suggest also that it should go direct. Generally, this route should run from east to west to Jasper and thence to Prince George and from Prince George to Prince Rupert, and thence on to the Queen Charlotte islands. If the minister agrees with this suggestion, then I should like to say this to him. He is welcome at all times, I am sure, to come to British Columbia and to visit Skeena, but he will be far more than welcome if he announces now that he is going to start to build a second trans-Canada highway and that it will run through Jasper to Prince Rupert. I say to the minister, if he makes the announcement before coming out to visit us he will have a better chance to get back.

Mr. Walker: I appreciate the kind invitation of the hon. member for Skeena. His personality, his good will and his amiability are such that it is difficult for me to refuse the invitation to accept the hospitality which I know would be present if I made a visit to his constituency. Because I appreciate his good humour so much and the natural kindness and charity with which he deals with all subjects, and the lovely, kindly outlook that he has on all problems, may I answer him, just as he asked me to do in order to accommodate him, before making that trip. Of course, he has asked for the pronouncement that we will follow the Prime Minister's telecast and his statement. I say to the hon. member and give him our complete assurance that we will follow the Prime Minister's statement on that telecast. It is the object of the government to do that; it is the plan of the government. The Prime Minister said in that telecast:

> We said that we would push the trans-Canada highway to completion, and then consider a second trans-Canada highway.

That is exactly what we are going to do. We will complete the first trans-Canada highway and then we will consider a second trans-Canada highway. Perhaps my hon. and good-natured friend will just keep his seat until I get through with the explanation. What more could the hon. member expect? If British Columbia is going to be behind in its work and take much longer than was expected—I am not criticizing British Columbia on that account—and if it is going to be some considerable time before the first trans-Canada highway is completed, and this may apply to other provinces, does my hon. friend expect me to misinterpret the plain language of the Prime Minister's statement to a nation-wide audience that when the trans-Canada highway is completed we will consider a second trans-Canada highway?

A number of hon. members have made magnificent speeches advocating a second trans-Canada highway. The hon. member for Saskatoon, the hon. member for Churchill, the hon. member for Dauphin, the hon. member for Kootenay East and the hon. member for Levis have all suggested a second trans-Canada highway. But let me say this. With all the work still to be done on the first trans-Canada highway, let us put our house in order and complete it first. May I also say that our consideration then will not necessarily cover, as my friend suggests, only a second trans-Canada highway. We will consider a national highway policy when the time comes, something that will encompass more than just another highway, but that date is in the future. I know that the provinces are trying to do their best but if they will even accelerate their best a little more and complete the trans-Canada highway sooner we will then be in a position to go further in our consideration, which is as much as the Prime Minister has said we will do.

Mr. Bourget: I am sorry to interrupt the minister—

Mr. Walker: If the hon. member for Levis will wait, I will only be a moment. When the Prime Minister says that there have been preliminary discussions, may I say that we have literally spent hours with our chief engineers in charge of the trans-Canada highway and with other members of the cabinet in carrying on at great length what could be termed preliminary discussions. However, I want to assure all hon. members who are so enthusiastic that this is not the time to make any pronouncement or even to go further than we have. My hon. friend will appreciate this. May I also say that I appreciate the contributions of hon. members. It shows that they are quite satisfied with the present first trans-Canada highway because there has been little or no criticism of it and most of the speeches have been confined to advocating a second trans-Canada highway. For that, of course, I want to thank hon. members.

Mr. Howard: May I pose a question to the minister? To my knowledge this is the first time that anyone on the government side has said that the government is not going to give any consideration to a second trans-Canada highway until the first one is completed. That is substantially what the minister has said. I am quite sure that those who are interested in the building of a second trans-Canada highway, especially those from the northern parts of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, will be most disappointed that the representations they have made up to now have been given no consideration.

Mr. Walker: Apparently my friend cannot understand English because I said, as the Prime Minister himself has said, that we have already had preliminary discussions on the subject.

Mr. Howard: With whom?

Mr. Walker: I have already given that answer.

Mr. Howard: You have had no preliminary discussions with anybody unless you have been talking in your sleep because, as the Prime Minister said, the only people you can have discussions with about the building of such a highway are the provinces and the Prime Minister said that you have not had any discussions.

Mr. Walker: I always consider the source when the hon. member for Skeena sometimes asks questions or makes statements that do not even beget a polite answer. In this instance he does not want to know the truth. He wants to distort anything he hears. Therefore I refuse to waste the time of the house by engaging in a veritable competition with the hon. member.

Mr. Howard: Let me say to my kindly friend that he may refuse to do a lot of things. However, he must appreciate that when he becomes a cabinet minister he is not an entity unto himself and a dictator but rather he is in the hands of the house.

Mr. Walker: Do you still want me to come to Skeena?

Mr. Howard: The minister can come to Skeena anytime. Certainly if he comes at the time of the year when the fishing is good I will make sure that he has the opportunity to go to some of the finest fishing spots in Canada and he will not go home empty-handed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He had better come to Essex county.

An hon. Member: Why don't you go fishing right now?

Mr. Howard: I am trying to do a little fishing and find out what the intention of the government is with respect to a second trans-Canada highway but I am getting nowhere. The Prime Minister said in the house, as found on page 1839 of Hansard:

> The question of another trans-Canada highway has not been discussed with the provinces particularly.

I do not know whether he means that it has not been discussed with the provinces at all or whether particular provinces have not been included in the discussions. We all know that many of the comments made by the Prime Minister can be taken a number of ways. We are very disappointed and I am sure the people who have made representations are disappointed that nothing is going to happen with respect to a second trans-Canada highway until the first one is completed. I assume that means nothing will happen until the last mile in the last province is completed, whether that be some three years from now as is expected or whether it be five or ten years from now which will mean that the government will have to come back in a few years and ask for another extension.

I suggest to the minister and the government that this is most unfair because the financial formula was not equitable in the first place. The financial formula needs to be revised in order that provinces like Newfoundland will have a better opportunity to participate and finance the building of the road. If the government is going to continue to maintain the same financial formula it is simply penalizing those provinces which because of their geography or their economy have been less able to finance the building of the first trans-Canada highway than other provinces.

I think it is most unwise to ask other provinces to wait until the last mile of the first trans-Canada highway in the last province has been built. It is most unwise not to make other arrangements for financial participation in order to enable these poorer provinces to finish their section of the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Winch: I should like to ask the minister to comment on the situation I raised with regard to the peculiar situation at Vancouver with respect to access roads and any offers of federal assistance that may have been turned down because of toll highways or toll bridges.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the minister replies I should also like to put a question to him. I have in my hand an advertisement which appeared in the Telegram of St. John's, Newfoundland, on Friday, August 14, 1959. It is headed, "Charter for a New Deal for Newfoundland". In one corner it contains a picture of Mr. Malcolm Hollett, at that time leader of the Progressive Conservative party in Newfoundland, and it also contains the program of the provincial party that was put before the electors in the last provincial election. Point No. 10 is as follows:

> Complete the trans-Canada highway on terms consistent with Newfoundland's needs and capacity to pay.

Then it goes on to say:

> If a proper agreement, one that took due account of Newfoundland's needs and its low capacity to pay, had been entered into by the provincial Liberal government when they came to power 10 years ago the highway across Newfoundland could have been built and fully paved by now. Progressive Conservative leader Malcolm Hollett has talked with the Prime Minister, Mr. Diefenbaker, and with other ministers of the Diefenbaker cabinet, about the impossible position Newfoundland is in under the present trans-Canada highway contract. Mr. Hollett believes that "the Diefenbaker government is prepared to re-negotiate that useless agreement; . . . that the Diefenbaker government is prepared to give sympathetic consideration to the submission that the highway be completed entirely by the federal government."

This was the pledge on which the leader of the Progressive Conservative party in Newfoundland went to the country in August of last year. I realize I would be out of order to recall the circumstances, but hon. members will remember that Mr. Hollett was the express champion of the Prime Minister in connection with an attitude taken by the Prime Minister in this house which was not so popular in Newfoundland. Mr. Hollett is no longer a member of the legislature, although I believe he is still the leader of the Progressive Conservative party in Newfoundland. Mr. Hollett says in this statement:

> Progressive Conservative Leader Malcolm Hollett has talked with the Prime Minister, Mr. Diefenbaker, and with other ministers of the Diefenbaker cabinet, about the impossible position Newfoundland is in under the present trans-Canada highway contract. Mr. Hollett believes "that the Diefenbaker government is prepared to re-negotiate that useless agreement . . . that the Diefenbaker government is prepared to give sympathetic consideration to the submission that the highway be completed entirely by the federal government."

This advertisement appeared on August 14. I do not expect the Minister of Public Works who, at the time this was written, I do not believe was a member of the cabinet, to tell me what actually did take place in these conversations between Mr. Hollett and the Prime Minister. However, I wanted to put this on the record today so the minister would have it before him and have an opportunity to ascertain what did take place in connection with the conversations and to ascertain whether or not Mr. Hollett was right in his contention that the Diefenbaker government was prepared to re-negotiate this "useless agreement" as Mr. Hollett calls it and, if so, if the Diefenbaker government was prepared to carry out that undertaking given to Mr. Hollett. I put that on the record so that the minister will have an opportunity, when the committee next considers this matter, to give an answer, unless the minister is prepared to give an answer right away.

Mr. Winch: I want on the record an answer to my question.

The Chairman: For the sake of orderly debate, I was going to recognize the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. Winch: The minister was just getting up before the previous hon. member spoke to answer my question about the position of Vancouver.

Mr. Walker: There are only five minutes to go before adjournment, and I could not possibly state the position with respect to Vancouver; I will take half an hour to answer the hon. member.

Mr. Aiken: There are only five minutes before adjournment, but I will try to complete what I want to say in that time. There has been criticism during this debate about the slowness of the province of Ontario in completing its section of the trans-Canada highway. I think it is well recognized that the longest portion of the highway is in the province of Ontario through some of the most rugged country.

I should like to take, for example, the stretch of highway through the eastern Georgian bay area in the neighbourhood of the town of Parry Sound. During the last two years I have watched the progress of this section of the trans-Canada highway, as bridges have been built, sections of the road have been prepared and contracts have been let. The road is making good progress. It has not been easy work, but it has been progressing as rapidly as one could expect in view of the type of territory through which construction is proceeding and the bridges and other works which must be completed. I should like to say, in support of the resolution, that the building of this highway through the eastern Georgian bay area has opened up a tremendous section of the country to development.

A number of hon. members have mentioned the tourist trade that has developed as a result of the building of the trans-Canada highway. This particular section is no exception. As a result of the impetus provided by the building of this highway, the same Minister of Public Works has recently undertaken a dredging job in Key river area which will open up the area for boats and for pleasure craft, to which access is provided by the trans-Canada highway. A few years ago this highway did not go any further north than the village of Britt. Since then, it has been completed, in a partial state, through to Sudbury. This particular section of the highway is of great value in the development of this excellent recreational area. It is not yet completed and further time will be required. It is for this reason that the resolution is greatly appreciated because it does extend the time for completion of this section, in common with all the others that are being completed across the country.

May I call it six o'clock?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the leader of the house could possibly indicate the course of business right up to the Easter adjournment?

Mr. Churchill: Yes. We will continue with the business as I outlined last night, that is, we will start with Bill No. S-26, an act to amend the National Energy Board Act. If that is completed we will continue with the resolution that was under discussion today concerning the Trans-Canada Highway Act and the other items of business that I outlined last night.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister mind repeating them, so they would be in the record?

Mr. Churchill: The third item would be the resolution in the name of the minister of northern affairs, which is No. 11 on today's order paper, dealing with the Yukon Act; then after that, a resolution also in his name dealing with the Northwest Territories Act. This will occupy all the time tomorrow. Thursday night is the budget speech. Friday, we start with the resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance dealing with the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act. If that is completed on Friday we will continue with these items I have been talking about now.

Monday, April 4, would normally be a private members' day. I have already had consultations with hon. gentlemen on the other side and I suggested it might be advisable, in order to have a continuous budget debate and complete the budget debate by April 13, to transfer the private members' Monday from April 4 to April 25 so that there will be no loss of time whatsoever. If there is agreement to this course being followed, perhaps an order of the house could issue to that effect. It would permit us to commence the budget debate on Monday, April 4 and carry it right through for the eight appointed days, ending on April 13 when the house would then rise for the Easter recess.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I might say that as far as we are concerned we would be quite agreeable to that arrangement on the understanding that the budget debate would be continuous.

Mr. Herridge: I understand the leader of this party has indicated our agreement to the same arrangement.

Mr. Speaker: Then perhaps this would be the appropriate time for the house to give unanimous consent and order that next Monday, private members' day, be deferred in favour of the budget debate, presumably until the Monday after Easter.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, Monday, April 25.

Mr. Speaker: Yes. Does the house agree to that course?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

It being three minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

JEAN PELLETIER

Question No. 273—Mr. Boivin:

1. On March 1, 1960, was Jean Pelletier in the employ of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?
2. If so, (a) where; (b) in what capacity; (c) at what salary; (d) during what period?

Answer by: Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue):

I am advised by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that they have no one in their employ known specifically as Jean Pelletier. They have on regular staff and among those who are engaged occasionally in programs some persons with the surname of Pelletier, who use a second Christian name coupled with the name of Jean. To properly reply to the question a more specific identification of the individual concerned is required.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, March 31, 1960

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT OF ADDRESS IN REPLY

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a message from His Excellency the Governor General, signed by his own hand, reading as follows:

Government House, Ottawa
30th March, 1960

Members of the House of Commons:

I have received with great pleasure the address that you have voted in reply to my speech at the opening of parliament. I thank you sincerely for this address.

Georges Vanier

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, March 30, 1960

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Patrick Kerwin, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber on Thursday, the 31st March, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
E. Joly de Lotbiniere
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

SOUTH AFRICA—REQUEST FOR EXPRESSION OF ALARM AND DISTRESS

On the orders of day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, having regard to the grave deterioration of the situation in South Africa, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. Will he instruct the Canadian representative there to inform the South African government of the alarm and distress of this parliament at political developments which have led to such violence and may lead to anarchy?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am acutely conscious of the deeply held feelings of the house and, indeed, of Canadians generally, over this question and, I need not add, of their abhorrence and mine of discrimination.

The house will be aware, from the statements I have made in this house since the recent disturbances began, of how profoundly the government regrets and deplores the tragic situation which prevails in that country. I should add, too, that the views that have been expressed in this chamber in recent days have been made known to the representative of South Africa in Ottawa, and I do not consider at the moment that any beneficial purpose would be served by doing as suggested by the Leader of the Opposition; for, whatever one's feelings may be, a sense of responsibility demands that we should not act in such a way as to exacerbate the prevailing situation.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF VOTING MACHINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, as one member who is very concerned with some of the aspects of the development of automation in modern society, I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister.

In view of the invitation extended to members of the House of Commons by a very prominent British Columbia member of the Progressive Conservative party to attend a demonstration of an electronic roll call machine, given this morning by a representative of the International Roll Call Corporation of Richmond, Virginia, United States of America, will the Prime Minister inform the house whether the government is considering voting arrangements for the House of Commons which will make it unnecessary for members to stand up and be counted?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I may point out that the invitation extended to the hon. gentleman and his acceptance was by a private member, and in no way suggested that the government is considering such voting arrangements. However, this is one subject that might be appropriately discussed by the rules committee when it is set up, for the purpose of ascertaining whether its adoption would accelerate or expedite the proceedings of the house.

I might say to the hon. gentleman, in respect of the last statement, that while it may seem somewhat paradoxical, in the event that this is adopted members while still in a recumbent position will be able to stand up and be counted.

WATER RESOURCES

CHICAGO DIVERSION—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister seen a report in this morning's press concerning the Chicago water diversion and the present position before the foreign affairs committee of the Senate of the United States? Can he tell the house what the position is since the comprehensive statement made by the Prime Minister earlier in this session? Could he tell us what representations, if any, have been made since then, and what is the present position of the matter in so far as Canada is concerned?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in December of last year Senator Fulbright, chairman of the foreign relations committee of the United States Senate, requested the state department to hold consultations with Canada about this question. These consultations were duly held here about the 12th of January and the whole question was thoroughly canvassed at that time. Later the United States state department evidently made a report to the foreign relations committee of the Senate, and that committee has been sitting in secret, I believe, dealing with the proposed bill.

As I understand it, the report this morning referred to a vote in the Senate committee dealing with the possibility of having witnesses called before that committee. The Canadian position was made very clear during the consultations in January of this year, and there has been no deviation from the strong stand which the government has taken against the proposed diversion.

PENSIONS

RIGHTS OF CANADIANS EMPLOYED ON U.S. BASES IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, notice of which has been given. Does the minister have a statement to make with regard to the pension rights of Canadian nationals employed on United States defence bases in Canada, more particularly with reference to Canadian nationals employed at Pepperrell air force base, St. John's, Newfoundland?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members know the hon. member for St. John's East has been very much concerned about this matter. I believe that Pepperrell air base is in his constituency.

The house will recognize that this is a matter between the United States government on the one hand and the individual Canadian employees on the other. Nevertheless, in accordance with the undertaking given by the Prime Minister on April 15, 1959, officials of my department have been discussing this matter informally with the United States embassy. I am pleased to inform the house that yesterday afternoon I received a letter from the United States ambassador which reads as follows:

> Recently there have been informal conversations between members of the embassy and officials of the Department of External Affairs regarding the pension rights of Canadians employed at United States military bases in Canada.
> In this regard, I am pleased to inform you that it has been determined that those Canadians who are permanently employed, as defined by United States civil service regulations, by United States forces in Canada are entitled to the benefits of the United States civil service retirement act. A survey to determine the exact number of Canadians so entitled is now being made, and the payroll deductions and employer contributions required by the act will be initiated.
> As you know, the number of employees at Pepperrell air force base will be reduced this summer, and I am particularly gratified that the permanent employees there who qualify for retirement because of age and length of service will be afforded certain benefits even though they made no contribution to a retirement fund in the past.
> Those employees whose positions are defined as "indefinite" are not entitled to benefits under the United States civil service act, but our department of defence is seeking to find suitable means to provide a retirement system for them. To this end, it is contemplated that the appropriate Canadian authorities will be approached in the near future so that certain technical questions involved may be examined.

INCOME TAX

DEDUCTIBILITY OF CONTRIBUTIONS TO MORAL REARMAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue a question. Is the minister aware that a pamphlet entitled "Ideology and Coexistence" was recently distributed by mail throughout Canada and that it has printed in it a statement to the effect that cheques payable to Moral Rearmament are deductible for income tax purposes? On what grounds is this deduction allowed?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of this matter until the hon. member sent me notice of his question across the floor of the house a few moments ago. As he undoubtedly knows, there are scores and scores of organizations which have been classified as charitable under the Income Tax Act which comply with the principles of the common law as they have been enunciated in the leading cases before the privy council over two centuries ago. I presume this is a case which follows those principles, but I will check into the matter.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR ACKNOWLEDGEMENT OF RIGHTS UNDER UNION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, on this the 11th anniversary of the union of Newfoundland with Canada, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the government would not mark the anniversary by acknowledging the constitutional rights of Newfoundland under the terms of union, which the government repudiated a year ago.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether that was a patriotic speech or a partisan speech, but in any event it does not seem to be a question asking for information.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am asking the Prime Minister to reverse a position taken in this house, sir, and it is a question seeking information.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BOMARC MISSILE—REPORTED REDUCTION IN PROGRAM AND SUSPENSION OF TESTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Can the minister now confirm a Washington report that the Bomarc program has been reduced to ten bases, eight in the United States and two in Canada?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, this question was clearly explained in the house by the Minister of National Defence. There is nothing I can add to what the minister said in this house on Monday and Tuesday.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, two or three days ago the minister was merely asked to comment on a report and he said he did not know whether or not it was official. My question is—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. What the hon. member for Trinity is doing is complaining, shall I say, about the answer he has just had. It is contrary to the practice of the house to permit complaints about the character of an answer that is received. It is within the discretion of the ministry to give such answers as they see fit, so if the hon. member has any question to ask—

Mr. Hellyer: Perhaps the minister would answer a supplementary question for me. Could he tell me how many of the ten bases will be equipped with Bomarc A missile and how many will be equipped with the Bomarc B?

Mr. Sevigny: There again, this information was given to this house by the Minister of National Defence on Tuesday.

Mr. Rodolphe Leduc (Gatineau): I should like to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Is there any truth in this morning's newspaper statement from Cape Canaveral to the effect that tests on the Bomarc B have been suspended indefinitely?

Mr. Speaker: I do not like to be too meticulous, but the hon. member is simply asking whether a newspaper report is true. If answers are to be given to questions of that kind, there is no limit to the newspaper reports that could be brought in and the time of the house taken in attempting to verify their truth or otherwise. It has long been established that that type of question is not permissible. If the hon. member wants to know some fact about Bomarc tests he should ask about that fact, and if it is something within the administrative responsibility of the minister then the question can be asked.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I should like to put a supplementary question on the same point, based on the report from Cape Canaveral contained in Le Devoir this morning. My question is, in the United States-Canada joint program on the Bomarc missile, has the development test work been discontinued?

Mr. Sevigny: May I ask the hon. member to repeat his question? I am sorry; I could not hear.

Mr. McIlraith: My question was whether or not development test work on the Bomarc B missile had been discontinued.

Mr. Sevigny: The hon. member for Ottawa West is quoting from a press report which is purely speculative.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He is not quoting.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HONEST JOHN MISSILE—STATEMENT ON INQUIRY AS TO ATOMIC WARHEAD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I wonder if the minister is in a position to answer today the question of which he took notice yesterday.

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): I can tell the hon. member in reply to the question he asked yesterday that the Honest John rocket is capable of being equipped with either an atomic or a conventional warhead.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question. Can the minister tell us whether it is the intention of the Canadian government to equip it with the atomic warhead?

Mr. Sevigny: I have nothing to report on that matter.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR CALLING OF MEETING OF STANDING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the hon. member for Danforth, the chairman of the committee on industrial relations.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order. You cannot ask the chairman of a committee.

Mr. Benidickson: I wonder whether the hon. member would have an early meeting of the industrial relations committee called to consider my motion, which was reserved, in connection with the possibility of meeting to improve the statistical methods of measuring unemployment.

Mr. Speaker: Order. While it is appropriate to raise matters relating to the business of the house I question whether the house decides the time and place of committee meetings. Once a matter has been referred to a committee, it then lies with the committee itself or its chairman to determine when it will meet. I may be wrong in that understanding. If any hon. member can give me any assistance on the point I shall be glad to have it. However, that is my recollection of the situation that is involved in the hon. member's question.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I speak to the point about which Your Honour has asked for some expression of opinion. I refer Your Honour to standing order 39(1) which states as follows:

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Questions may be placed on the order paper seeking information from ministers of the crown relating to public affairs—

We recognize of course that the hon. member to whom this question is directed has not yet been invited to join the government. The citation continues:

—and from other members, relating to any bill, motion, or other public matter connected with the business of the house, in which such members may be concerned—

I may say to Your Honour that I solicited the view of officers of this house, in whom Your Honour would have great confidence, as to the procedure in this matter. If Your Honour definitely takes the view that he is not of our opinion, perhaps Your Honour would withhold final judgment pending consultation with your trusted officers. But I assure you that was done and that the course the hon. member has taken is the only one available. Weeks have elapsed since this committee has met. There is no way outside this chamber by which members of the committee can themselves take steps to have the committee convoked; the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, I submit to you with confidence, under standing order 39(1) has taken the only course that is open to him under our procedures.

Mr. Speaker: I have doubt about whether this is business of the house. That is the point I raised. It is business that the house has referred to a committee. But without determining the point of order which I myself raised, I shall allow the question to be asked at this time, and I shall give consideration to the question for a future occasion.

Mr. Benidickson: Shall I repeat the question, Mr. Speaker? I sent the hon. member notice of this. I think the hon. member for Danforth is familiar with the question.

Mr. R. H. Small (Danforth): Ordinarily, Mr. Speaker, I would take the question as notice and answer it on the terms of reference on which the committee has been set up. All that can be handled by that committee must be directed from the house. To date we have had no direction.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Speaking on the point of order, may I say that what the hon. member has just said—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no point of order now.

Mr. Speaker: There is no point of order unless the hon. member is raising one.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am raising one. The answer the hon.

member has given is not an answer to the question. He is now making the very ruling which Your Honour alone has the right to make. I submit that the hon. member has not the right to do that.

Mr. Speaker: I permitted the question. I have nothing to do with the terms of the reply. The hon. member must take the answer that is given.

Mr. Benidickson: May I say a word on a matter of privilege?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Benidickson: The motion upon which I had assurance from the committee was a motion within the rules, and many precedents are provided for it. It was a motion that the committee seek authority from the House of Commons to have this item of business referred to it, because the committee had nothing else to do.

Mr. Speaker: I think that is scarcely a matter of privilege.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INQUIRY AS TO IDENTITY OF PRISONER IN MONTREAL JAIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. J. Martel (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Could the minister tell us if her department has launched an inquiry, or is considering such action in order to establish whether one Anna Chisholm, who is now being held in a Montreal jail, is the Russian princess Anastasia Romanova, as she claims to be, according to a report in La Presse of March 29?

(Text):

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Since the person to whom the hon. member has referred has been in Canada, I understand, for many, many years, the question of her identity is scarcely one which would fall within the jurisdiction of my department.

IMMIGRATION

QUEBEC—REPORTED DELAY IN CLEARANCE OF MONTREAL-BOUND PASSENGERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and ask her whether a firm decision has been taken by the department in connection with the inconvenience and delay which is alleged in a report in the Montreal press, due to customs clearance at Quebec of passengers bound for Montreal.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I think the hon. member made a slip of the tongue. I am sure he did not mean to say "customs clearance".

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry; I meant in connection with immigration.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am afraid I cannot give a satisfactory answer to that question at the moment. The co-operation of the companies concerned has been sought, but I have no information other than what I read in the morning papers.

Mr. Chevrier: Has the department taken a decision as to whether it will be necessary to delay passengers bound for Montreal for a period of eight to ten hours at Quebec?

Mrs. Fairclough: There is no indication that there will be any such delay.

[Later:]

Mr. Chevrier: I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Will there be undue delay at the immigration offices in Quebec to passengers bound for Montreal, following the opening of navigation?

Mrs. Fairclough: That is a difficult question to answer. It depends on what is meant by delay, taking into consideration the length of time it has taken under another system and what it would now take to examine these passengers elsewhere, and so on. I do not think I can give a specific answer.

Mr. Chevrier: I think that is a reasonable reply, but could I ask the minister to make a statement on this matter when she has further information in connection with it?

Mrs. Fairclough: I shall be very glad to do that.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

REPORTED INTENTION TO REDUCE OVERSEAS DIVISION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I wish to address a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Can the minister inform the house whether the government plans to disband one third of the R.C.A.F. division overseas when the supersonic F-104 goes into service?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): First of all may I be permitted to make a correction in the answer I gave to the second question asked by the hon. member for Trinity today. The Minister of National Defence made comments on the hon. member's question on Monday and not on Tuesday, as I inadvertently stated.

In answer to the question which has just been asked by the hon. member for Trinity, may I tell him that the report which appeared in the press this morning is purely speculative, and that there is nothing to report on this matter at the present time.

AIR TRANSPORT

REPORTED CHARGE BY MINISTER OF ASSOCIATION MONOPOLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, based on the announcement by the president of the Canadian air industries transport association that an emergency meeting of the association is to be called in April in order to consider the minister's charge that this association or its members are interested in maintaining a monopoly. Is the minister giving any consideration to elaborating his anti-monopolist views at this particular meeting when it is held?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING GAS TOLLS AND EXPIRY DATES OF LICENCES

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-26, to amend the National Energy Board Act.

He said: In directing the attention of the house to this important bill amending the National Energy Board Act, I think it is only appropriate that I should make some explanation as to why this measure comes before us at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the minister allow me to intervene for a moment for the purpose of securing attention? I know that some hon. members leave the house at this time when orders of the day are reached, but would they kindly do so as rapidly as possible; otherwise it delays our getting on with the proceedings.

Mr. Churchill: I was saying that it would be appropriate to make an explanation as to why this bill is brought forward at this time rather than earlier, and I should like to do so at this stage in order that there may be no misunderstanding. I do not want anyone to think there is any hidden motive behind our action in bringing forward at this particular time a bill which is of some urgency in relation to the conduct of the affairs of the national energy board, and which affects a number of business enterprises in Canada. I know that no one in the House of Commons will make any reference to alleged default on the part of officials. The responsibility for delay in connection with this bill is mine and mine alone, and I have no intention of shifting it on to the shoulders of anyone else.

The national energy board drew my attention quite some time ago to the fact that in view of the number of applications for the export of gas which were coming to their attention it would be almost impossible to deal with the export licences in respect of electricity. There are 20 companies which have annual licences to export electricity from Canada. I recognized the fact that the energy board would be unusually busy in January, February and March, and consequently accepted their suggestion and had an amendment drawn to the National Energy Board Act which would permit these annual licences to be carried forward for a further period during which the board would be able to perform its proper function of having public hearings and considering each application on its merits, and either extending the licences again for one year, as has been done in the past, or for some further period.

That amendment was ready and I had intended to bring it to the house in the first week of February. In the interval the board, having been organized and having had an opportunity to study the act with greater care, suggested that there were other amendments which perhaps might be brought forward at this session of parliament. Consideration was given to these suggestions, and then it appeared that some of the proposed amendments would involve considerable discussion; and when it was obvious that the energy board was fully occupied with its gas export hearings I decided about the middle of February that we would be in a position to accept only one amendment in addition to the one I have already mentioned, and that is a small amendment to section 61 of the act which strikes out certain words.

Everything went all right up to that point, and there was still plenty of time to redraft the bill and bring it before the House of Commons; but somewhere at that stage there was a lapse of some sort. I have not bothered to fully investigate exactly what happened, but obviously I had not given clear instructions or the matter would have been dealt with. When I found out by the first of March that the bill was not available to the house I took immediate steps to rectify the error.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the sum and substance of the explanation for the delay in bringing this measure before the house. I repeat that I accept full responsibility for it, and I regret that the house is being asked to consider rather hurriedly a measure of this sort. On the other hand, the two amendments which are brought to the attention of the house are not such as to cause any great disturbance to people who are familiar, as hon. members of this house are, with the National Energy Board Act, which occupied the attention of this house for nine days last session.

There is no general principle in this bill, and in the second reading debate I find I am in the position of having to continue the discussion as though we were in committee, but I see no way around it because I want now to explain the two amendments for the benefit of hon. members.

The first amendment is to section 61 of the act. This section occasioned considerable difficulty to our drafting committee last year and to the House of Commons in consideration of it, and when the energy board examined it very carefully they found that the words which I am now suggesting be struck out of the section rather limited their powers. Section 61 as it stands in the act reads as follows:

> 61. Where the gas transmitted by a company through its pipe line from any place within a province to any place outside the province is the property of the company, such proportion as the board may fix of the differential between the amount paid by the company for the gas and the amount for which the gas is sold by the company shall for the purposes of this part be deemed to be a toll charged by the company to the purchaser for the transmission thereof.

It is suggested that the phrase "from any place within a province to any place outside the province" should be struck out. We are dealing here, of course, with pipe line companies which cross interprovincial boundaries and therefore come within the jurisdiction of parliament and under the National Energy Board Act, and may be dealt with by the energy board.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the minister permit a question here? Does the statement he has made indicate that a pipe line which operates exclusively within a province is outside the scope of the bill?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, a pipe line operating exclusively within a province, picking up gas within that province and selling it within that province, does not come within the jurisdiction of the national energy board; but a pipe line which transports that gas outside the province, that crosses a provincial boundary, does come within the jurisdiction of the board.

This section which gives the board power to determine tolls is a section which the board will now be considering during the next few months when the companies operating have placed before them their rate structures and the board faces the very difficult chore of determining how to apply this section and determine the tolls. However, last year we discussed this in the House of Commons, and the whole problem of the toll-setting capacity of the board is not under question at this moment. This amendment simply clarifies the issue and in the opinion of the board will make it easier for them to perform their task. Striking out these words does not give the board any powers it does not already have. The deletion of this phrase makes for clarification of the section.

The second amendment comes about because, as I mentioned earlier, licences to export electricity have been annual licences. Those licenses were issued under the Exportation of Power and Fluids and Importation of Gas Act, which was discontinued when the National Energy Board Act came into effect, and the former act has lapsed. The energy board has to exercise the same care with regard to the export of electricity as it does with regard to oil and gas. It must review these licences to export and determine whether or not the licences shall be continued and for what length of time.

These licences have been renewed annually virtually automatically. This has put the companies in the position of having to come to the department year after year to have their licences renewed. Although I have not examined the record that carefully, I do not know of any instance in which one of these licences was discontinued.

When we reach the committee stage I am prepared to give the committee a list of the 20 companies that are affected and the amount of electricity which is exported. I would just say at this stage that these annual licences to export electricity have been in effect since 1907 with regard to some companies and since 1924 with regard to those companies that are exporting the largest amounts of electricity. What we are asking for in this amendment, then, is permission to extend these licences until December 31, 1961, unless they are dealt with at an earlier period.

That date was selected merely as a matter of convenience. The energy board might deal with these electricity problems within the next twelve months, but as a precautionary measure we thought an extra few months might be allowed. Because public hearings have to be conducted, and because the energy board is new and has many serious problems before it and may have other difficult matters to deal with in connection with oil and gas, we thought an extension of time beyond twelve months would be acceptable.

That constitutes the basis of this bill. They are two small amendments in size but important in character which do not materially alter the power of the national energy board. They are introduced simply to make the task of the energy board somewhat easier and to protect the interests of those 20 companies which have the privilege of exporting electricity.

When we reach the committee stage I shall be prepared to make an explanation of the third clause if anyone so desires. At this stage I would simply say that this clause does not alter the practice which has prevailed in the past with regard to setting in a date when there is uncertainty as to when a bill will receive royal assent. If anyone desires further information, that may be given when we reach the committee stage.

I simply conclude by asking the house to use its good judgment in this matter, as it will. I have endeavoured to give an explanation of the delay imposed, and I express my regrets that this house is asked to consider this particular bill with a rather urgent deadline facing it. I am quite prepared to accept from hon. gentlemen opposite any suggestions for the future. Hon. gentlemen opposite who have had experience—and some of them have had great experience—in the preparation of legislation for the House of Commons will appreciate some of the difficulties that face those who have that task. They fully understand that unexpected delays may occur when legislation is being processed through the various important stages that must be followed before it is brought to the House of Commons in its finished and printed form. I commend to the house the amendments proposed.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in moving second reading of this bill the minister has characterized it as an important one, though he added that he did not think there was any question of general principle involved in these amendments. We agree with him in the first statement; it is an important bill. We do not agree with him in the second, because we think there is an important question of principle involved in the first of the amendments.

In being asked to consider this bill on second reading this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, we are faced with an extraordinary situation which the minister himself has admitted. It is not necessary to look for any hidden motive to explain our bewilderment at the procedure which has been followed by the government in this matter. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, we are now in one of those confused and unsatisfactory parliamentary situations into which this government has a genius for getting.

The minister said that some of us on this side of the house have had a good deal of experience with the preparation of parliamentary legislation. That is true, Mr. Speaker; but none of us has ever had any experience of the situation in regard to parliamentary legislation which faces us this afternoon. The procedure being followed is not only confused, it is a striking example of the violation of the rights of this house. It is also an ignoring of the interests of the provinces of this country in a matter which has real interest and perhaps great importance for them, as indeed was recognized in the other place. This afternoon we are witnessing a quite extraordinary procedure. It is an example, I think, of a violation of the rights and the dignity of this house and of the interests of the provinces.

The government knew at the beginning of this session that 20 licences for the export of power would expire on March 31 of this year, that is today, unless legislation were passed by this parliament to extend those permits. As a matter of fact, such legislation was announced in the speech from the throne in the middle of January in the following terms:

> An amendment will also be proposed to the National Energy Board Act authorizing the temporary extension of the licences for the export of electricity until the board can conclude its urgent business on export of gas.

Notwithstanding this announcement in the speech from the throne, nothing has been done since that time so far as this house is concerned, and this House of Commons is now asked to approve this important bill today, before six o'clock—no, Mr. Speaker, before 5.45 p.m., as we learned a few moments ago—to approve this bill, if it sees fit, in all its stages or else compel 20 Canadian companies to break the law of this land. This is a strange way to carry on the business of government, Mr. Speaker. The minister who is responsible for this measure must take, as indeed he has taken, full responsibility for it. It is an appalling example of muddle, confusion and inefficiency.

In case the house does not approve this bill in all its stages today the government has, of course, included a clause which the minister mentioned, namely clause 3. Though he said it was an ordinary clause in legislation of this kind it is in our opinion really fantastic. Let me read this clause:

> Sections 1 and 2 shall come into force on the day this act is assented to, except that if that day is after the 30th day of March, 1960—

And we are in the 31st day now.

—section 2 shall be deemed to have come into force on the 30th day of March, 1960.

This, Mr. Speaker, is a provision for indemnification by law for breaking the law before the crime has been committed. The minister has indicated that when we get into the committee stage on this bill he will give us further detailed information on matters of this kind. I shall be very interested to receive information about any legislation where a clause of this kind has been introduced for indemnification, not after the crime has been committed but before the crime has been committed. If this bill is approved parliament says to these 20 Canadian companies, "You may break the law of Canada if you like and we will fix you up after the crime has been committed", because that is the purpose of clause 3. Perhaps I can put it in another and somewhat more theological way. In essence it is this: "We will give you prior absolution for the sins we are forcing you to commit". Surely, Mr. Speaker, that is carrying the bill of rights a little too far. So we on this side feel that this particular clause or any such provision is most undesirable and to be strongly condemned in legislation of this kind.

So far as clause 2 is concerned, the minister has put us in the position where we must approve it this afternoon before 5.45 or put the companies concerned in a position where they would suffer most grievous prejudice through no fault of their own but solely because of the carelessness and inefficiency of the minister and the government.

I was glad to hear the minister say there is no shelter to be found behind any official for negligence in this matter. An explanation has already been given elsewhere that this is the reason for the delay. That was not accepted elsewhere, and of course it would not be accepted here. A minister, as the minister has already stated, must take the responsibility for every act of every official in his department. Any other course would be not only unconstitutional but cowardly.

Mr. Churchill: Will the Leader of the Opposition permit a question? Will he make it quite clear that I was not the one who gave the other explanation in the other place?

Mr. Pearson: I will be glad to make it quite clear. The minister was not mentioned at all in the other place in connection with this matter, and there was no suggestion in the evidence I read concerning what happened in the other place that the minister had anything whatever to do with this explanation.

What are the consequences if these licences are not renewed today, in other words if the bill is not passed before 5.45 p.m. today? Well, either an international incident would arise with the country receiving the power, which in every case would be the United States of America, or these companies will have to go on exporting power and in doing so would be breaking the law at least temporarily until their action was legalized by a later passage of this bill. If either of these two results should occur the minister and the government alone would be responsible for that situation.

We have no desire, Mr. Speaker, to be accessories to this kind of crime. We do not want to cause, even indirectly, an international incident of the kind I have suggested, or force any Canadian company into illegality. That is why we are quite prepared to take the minister off the hook and, if necessary, suspend the rules of the house in order to repair a serious mistake which has certainly been made.

But we are prepared to do this, Mr. Speaker, only on one specific condition. We ask the minister to undertake that when the bill reaches the committee stage he will drop clause 1 of the bill for later and more careful and exhaustive consideration. Clause 1 is the clause which deals with tolls for the transmission of gas. The minister has indicated the purport and importance of that clause which in our view does embody a very important question of principle affecting not only this parliament but the provinces. Clause 1, as the minister pointed out, would enable the energy board to fix tolls for transmission of gas within a province.

Mr. Churchill: Only in respect of a line that carries on beyond the province.

Mr. Pearson: I appreciate what the minister has said; only in respect of companies as described in the bill, companies engaged in interprovincial or international traffic. But notwithstanding that, in our view this clause does raise important constitutional and policy questions, and we are certainly not prepared to approve it without the most careful, complete and adequate consideration. It is intolerable and an affront to parliament that we should be asked to do so.

Notwithstanding what the minister has said, we on this side are not sure if it is within the jurisdiction of parliament to enact such a provision, if it is within the powers of parliament. I know the argument the minister has mentioned, and I know there have been constitutional cases dealing with this matter, the most important of which is the Winner case in New Brunswick. However, according to my understanding of that case it does not in every respect embody exactly the same principles as this bill. It was a case that went to the privy council in London and on which judgment was given by Lord Porter, but irrespective of that particular judgment and the validity that it may have for all time in cases of that kind or, indeed, the effect it might have on analogous cases, the fact is that what we are doing here is enshrining in legislation a decision of that kind. We have great doubts, Mr. Speaker, whether such an important step is advisable and sound as a matter of policy, and certainly we do not accept for a minute that it should be done in this hasty and ill-considered way.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, we feel that the failure of the minister and the government to consult with the provinces on the matter is open to strong condemnation. It is my information that the bill first came before the other place only a week ago today, and that it was considered again on Tuesday evening of this week. Today is Thursday, and I understand that only on Tuesday evening was the bill sent to the provinces for their examination. The provinces were informed by air mail special delivery, not even by telegram, through letters sent to them not by anybody representing the government but by the clerk of a committee of the other place. That is a very strange procedure indeed to follow on a matter of such concern to the provinces.

If clause 1 were to be approved the national energy board might be involved in the fixation of tolls at the local level. Surely, therefore, before we are asked to approve it the provinces not only should be properly informed about the bill but, if they so desire, they should be given the opportunity to present their views concerning it to parliament.

The provinces were treated in matters of this kind with more courtesy and consideration under the former government. In a similar case, when the bill on international rivers improvements was considered by parliament in 1955, the bill was sent well in advance to the provincial governments, which were given the opportunity to present any views they might have concerning the matter before the standing committee on external affairs.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, the same procedure should be followed in connection with this bill today. If this particular clause were sent to a committee, it would not only give the provinces an opportunity to be heard but it would enable members of this house to hear the officers of the Department of Justice concerning the constitutional basis for this provision, and also to hear members of the national energy board on the need and advisability of such a provision being enacted at this particular moment.

I ask the minister, what is the particular hurry to amend this clause at this time? What argument can be brought forward against our proposal that this particular clause should be dropped when we get to the committee stage? Then it should be possible to pass the only clause which is of an emergency nature. We would thereby avoid either having to make a snap decision on a constitutional principle of political and economic importance or force companies in this country into breaking the law.

I do not propose at this stage to say anything more about the substance of this amendment. May I sum it up by saying that if the government, at the appropriate time, is prepared to drop clause 1 of the bill, which would make clause 3 unnecessary, we are quite ready to do what we can to ensure that clause 2 of the bill, which is the one that must be passed today, should be passed today.

We believe that clause 1 should be referred to a standing committee. If the government is not willing to accept this course of action, which we think is most reasonable and is put forward as a way out of this difficulty, then I tell the minister that if his bill cannot be approved today by the house because there has been insufficient time for consideration of it, and because there has been no time for provincial views to be heard on it, the government will have to take full responsibility for that unfortunate result and for forcing these Canadian companies into illegality.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said that by inadvertence or oversight on his part he has placed the House of Commons in a very difficult situation at this time. One can appreciate that it is possible for anyone to make a mistake, and this is what the minister confesses to us he has done. Nevertheless, since the minister is a member of the government, and since the government is responsible to parliament, whether it has been a mistake of inadvertence or oversight it has a very serious result in that the government, by this means is holding a gun to the head of the House of Commons and is saying to members of the opposition, in effect, "If you exercise your prerogative, your right and your duty of discussing the bill before the house and looking into its effects as it is constituted, thereby carrying the discussion beyond six o'clock, then the responsibility for the dire results that will flow therefrom is yours".

This is a situation, Mr. Speaker, that has been brought about by a government which in the past, when its members were in opposition, has been very vocal about the rights of parliament. This bill comes from the other place of this house. It was discussed in the other place. As I am sure you would expect, sir, and as the minister would expect, hon. members interested in the bill have read the debates in the other place. Members in the other place have shown great impatience and have been sharp in their criticism of the delay in bringing this bill forward. We might have had an opportunity of dealing with the bill in this house at a somewhat earlier stage if the members of the other place were not on such short time. Some of these members might be compared to our T-to-T members in this house, about whom we have heard a great deal, and these extended week ends have not been conducive to an early consideration of this bill there and a resultant earlier consideration in this house.

I believe the points that have been raised by the Leader of the Opposition have been very well put and deserve the consideration of the government. I should like at this time to associate myself and the members of the C.C.F. group with the request that the first clause of the bill be withdrawn, and that we proceed to the discussion and consideration of clause 2 as expeditiously as possible. This would allow the government to withdraw clause 3, and we would have a very simple bill before the house which would make it possible for members of parliament, while protesting, to correct the error that the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself has admitted to the house.

I want to make it quite clear, however, that we are very much in support of the national energy board having adequate power so far as tolls are concerned on gas going through interprovincial pipe lines. We are not certain, however, that this amendment is necessary to achieve that purpose. We have not had it explained to us in a fashion that convinces us that this is correct. We certainly do not condone, and we would oppose, any undertaking by the government which would mean the exercise of prerogatives we feel properly belong to provincial governments or provincial companies operating within a province, whether they be private companies or publicly owned companies.

I should like some further explanation as to whether this clause, in its present form, would put power in the hands of the national energy board to, in fact, control the business operations of a company like the Saskatchewan Power Corporation, which obtains all its gas supplies in the province of Alberta and therefore must bring the gas through pipe lines which go across interprovincial boundaries. This gas is sold exclusively within the borders of Saskatchewan. I do not believe the minister would wish the national energy board to be setting the policy of the Saskatchewan Power Corporation as that policy affects business which is strictly a provincial concern and is not the concern of the national energy board.

Clause 3, apparently, is considered necessary by the minister because of the possibility that this legislation may not become law prior to the expiry of the licences that are involved. I think this is a very bad clause. I believe the practice of making any law retroactive is something that should be followed only in extreme circumstances. I can remember how members of the present government, when in opposition, complained so loudly about taxation by radio when a former minister of finance announced a certain policy over the radio and said he was going to have parliament brought into session in order to make this policy effective at midnight of the night he was making this announcement.

I think this is an even more repugnant proceeding in that parliament is in session. In spite of parliament being in session we are asked, as the Leader of the Opposition has stated, to take steps which would allow companies to break the law and would give them absolution by means of clause 3 coming into effect at a later date.

I think the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition is a good one. I hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce will accept it. Otherwise he himself must take the responsibility for the delay that will be required for a thorough and adequate discussion of clause 1 of this bill. I can see nothing that would be lost by removing clause 1 and considering that clause in a separate bill at a later stage during this session.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister if—

Mr. McIlraith: On a point of order.

Mr. Chevrier: I rise on a point of order at this stage in the debate, Mr. Speaker, to inquire of the minister whether at this time he will not give consideration to the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition. If he does so I think it would perhaps hasten the consideration of second reading and also shorten the discussion on the bill and allow us to get on with it more quickly. As has been stated by the opposition and also by the C.C.F. party, the suggestion appears to be reasonable on its face. I am not going to insist on that point, but I wonder whether the minister would not indicate to the house at this stage whether he is in a position to consider it favourably.

Mr. Speaker: By leave of the house, may the minister answer without closing the debate?

Mr. Pickersgill: By leave.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is just a point of order.

Mr. Churchill: In answer to the hon. member's question may I say that this is an alternative that certainly did not escape my notice when I was considering the bill. I think what we should reasonably do is go into committee and decide the issue there. It is there that it will have to be decided. There are quite a number of things upon which I should like to comment before we reach that stage, but the situation in so far as this bill is concerned is, as the hon. member for Assiniboia has indicated, that the amendment requested in clause 61 could be brought forward on some subsequent occasion; that in fact at the next session of parliament there might be other amendments to this very important act if experience should indicate that clarification is required.

I am quite prepared to take into consideration the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition. I am not too pleased with the way in which it was indicated, namely by a sort of threat that something would be done unless it was followed. This is a co-operative venture. Last year when we were considering this bill for nine days in this house a fine spirit of co-operation was shown. I accepted amendments put forward by hon. members opposite without much debate on some of the issues. We also put forward amendments which were acceptable to the house.

This is an act which is breaking new ground in Canada. This particular amendment comes before the house only because the chairman of the energy board suggests that for the proper application of section 61 it is required. In the other place this subject matter was considered. The law officers of the crown appeared, and members of the energy board, and satisfied hon. members of that house that this would be a satisfactory method of procedure.

However, on the other hand, I do not want to do anything that would appear to infringe upon the rights of the provinces. If someone considers that there is a constitutional issue here involved, that puts a different light on the matter. Why this issue was not raised a year ago when we discussed section 61, I do not know.

Mr. McIlraith: There was no amendment then.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Pearson: We did not need this.

Mr. Churchill: It could have come up at that stage. However, although there is urgency with regard to the electricity matter; although this proposed amendment would assist the board in the performance of its duties, and although it may be interpreted from rejection of this amendment by hon. members opposite that they are not in favour of having tolls determined by the board, which was the clear intent and purpose of parliament last year, nevertheless, because of the delay which occurred in bringing this bill forward, and because of the quite proper consideration of giving every province its opportunity to be heard if there is any suggestion that constitutional issues are involved, I am not averse in the committee stage to withdrawing this particular amendment.

Mr. Aiken: On the question of order raised by the hon. member for Laurier, may I point out that this is a Senate bill. I wonder whether we would be any further ahead. It would be necessary for it to go back there.

Mr. Speaker: I do not recognize any point of order. A question has been raised with the minister as to whether the government would accept the suggestion of the opposition, and it has been answered. Now we proceed with the debate. I recognize the hon. member for Laurier.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should now like to deal with the bill which is before us and to address myself to three points before coming to the answer given by the minister to the question I raised either directly or by way of a point of order.

The first one, of course, is that of the delay which for some reason or other has been responsible for the government bringing the bill before the house at this late date. In conformity with what has been said by the Leader of the Opposition I think I should state that the minister, although accepting responsibility for it, I am afraid has not given a sufficient reason or a good reason for the delay in bringing this bill forward. It is one thing to say in the speech from the throne that legislation of this nature is going to be brought forward, and it is another thing to bring it forward on the very day or the day before the licences for the export of fluid and electricity expire.

That is why, without pressing the point unduly, I think the minister must give careful and serious consideration to the other point, namely the one I raised in posing the question to him and also the one which the Leader of the Opposition raised. The minister himself has stated that this is an act which is breaking new ground. That is the expression he himself used. If it is an act which is breaking new ground, then a fortiori great care must be taken to see that the rights of the provinces are not infringed.

Neither I nor the Leader of the Opposition has stated that the rights of the provinces are being infringed. However, there is a grave doubt about the matter of their being infringed. Some mention was made of the Winner case. I have before me the decision in the Winner case. I had some knowledge of the Winner case, because following that decision it was decided by the government of that day to amend, as the minister knows, one of the statutes of parliament in order to give parliament jurisdiction over interprovincial and international highways. Up until that time there were grave doubts in the minds of the officers of the Department of Justice as to whether the federal parliament had jurisdiction over what was termed international and interprovincial transportation.

The decision lays down some very important principles. The decision states in so far as international and interprovincial transportation is concerned, that the federal parliament would have jurisdiction. But it then went on to make a number of very careful distinctions between intraprovincial movements and interprovincial movements, and because of that fact—because doubt has been raised by that decision—I think it is extremely important that we go very slowly and carefully with regard to clause 1.

I should like to bring this to the attention of the minister: before this legislation was introduced, the government of the day called a conference of the provinces here in Ottawa, and it took many days—I cannot remember how many, but perhaps the greater part of a week—before it was possible to get the provinces to agree, not without some difficulty, on the kind of legislation which should be introduced in parliament. Since that act was passed I do not know whether there has been any conference with the provinces or any representations from them in the field of highway transport. I mention highway transport because the question of pipe lines is akin thereto, and because the Winner case would not only have a bearing—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It involved transport.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend says it involved transport. It would not only have a bearing, but it would also be a precedent in so far as the pipe line is concerned.

The point I am trying to make now, is that if there is any doubt in our minds as to whether there may be an impingement on the rights of the provinces, we should hesitate to do anything with regard to clause 1. The minister has I think given agreement to the suggestion, because I think he said something like this in reply to the question: If someone considers that this infringed provincial jurisdiction, I am prepared to consider the proposal made by the Leader of the Opposition.

We on this side of the house feel that it does, and we think it would be in the general interest of the house and the country if we were to give immediate consent, if the minister wishes, to the passing of clause 2, upon the distinct understanding that clause 1 would be brought in at a later date; it could even be introduced tomorrow, if the minister desired, and put on the order paper so that we could give consideration to it during the Easter recess and discuss it later.

If the minister would do this—and I feel, from what he has said, that he is so disposed—I think we might get on fairly quickly with this piece of legislation. There is, of course, clause 3 which has already been mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition. All I want to do is to state that if perchance this bill did not pass today and we went on discussing it, not tomorrow, because we have other business announced, but at a later date, every act of export of fluid gas or electricity by these 20 companies would be illegal, and the fact that clause 3 is enacted does not for the time being at least legalize that illegality. So it would strike me that this is a departure from what was done in earlier cases.

I do not know that I want to add any more to what I have said. As far as we on this side are concerned I think I can say again on behalf of the opposition, that we are willing to consent to the passage of clause 2 of the bill, which is really what the minister wants, so that we may give consideration at a later date to clause 1. I think I am not unduly pressing the issue when I say that I believe the minister has agreed, in effect, to withdraw clause 1. If he will do that, I can assure him we shall not hold up the second reading of the bill.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I want to say a few words on this bill and I will be brief. The members of this group have given this measure some attention, and we were very concerned about the lateness of the date on which it was introduced. However, I must say we were very pleased to hear the minister accept full responsibility for the delay in introducing the measure and make no attempt to put the responsibility on someone else's shoulders. I think the hon. gentleman made a frank and manly statement, and that goes a long way with me.

This is a very serious matter, because even if the bill is passed as quickly as possible it is likely that these companies with export permits will operate illegally for a short period of time.

I should like to support the suggestion made by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Pearson) that clause 2 be held over for further consideration. We did consider this clause and discuss it with persons having legal experience, and we were definitely of the opinion that the wording is ambiguous, to say the least. It is not at all clear. In the years I have been in this house ministers have assured us from time to time that the language used in various clauses was satisfactory, that it had a particular meaning. Nevertheless, some hon. members were not clear as to what it actually did mean, and we have often been informed that the interpretation of a clause by a minister does not necessarily correct any errors in the wording which may exist, or remove shortcomings from the legislation in the form it is eventually passed. When the bill is passed the courts have to determine its interpretation, and we are very anxious that this particular clause which has been mentioned should be carefully drafted in order that the rights of the provinces should be protected beyond a doubt.

In addition, as the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) mentioned, there is no question but that some doubt could arise in the minds of the governments of the provinces on reading this clause of the bill, and for this reason we wish to support wholeheartedly the suggestion that clause 1 be withdrawn. I listened to the minister carefully and I am not sure whether he definitely undertook to do so or not. It is my view that further considerations should be given to this question so that there might be no doubt about the situation.

While I am on my feet, I wish to direct some questions to the minister which could be answered during the committee stage. The board is of growing importance and I find an increasing interest in its activities and a growing desire to obtain information about the applications and decisions of the board. Are the meetings open to the public? Can any person interested in the board's work obtain transcripts of the evidence of various companies making application providing he pays for the cost of the transcript and can one also obtain copies of the board's decisions in the same way? I have had some inquiries of that nature and request an answer to my questions when we reach committee stage.

(Translation):

Mr. Noel Dorion (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for rising at the very end of this discussion, but there are just a few remarks I feel bound to make.

I have been going over clause 1 of the bill carefully, and I must say that it gives me some concern. Aware as I am of the minister's good nature, I am sure he will not take amiss the few remarks I am about to make.

The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) referred a moment ago to an unhappy experience when the supreme court, after ruling in the Winner case that part of an interprovincial licence was the responsibility of the provincial authorities and the other part, with respect to interprovincial operations, came under federal jurisdiction. That case, involving the attorney general of Ontario versus Winner, was appealed before the privy council. I think it was in 1954. Unfortunately, as I had not expected to take part in this debate, I cannot recall the exact date. Still, as far as I can remember, the privy council formally ruled that interprovincial businesses were exclusively under federal jurisdiction, even as regards the use of their license within the province.

Following that ruling, if I remember correctly, the government put a bill through whereby it yielded to the provinces the responsibilities arising out of the privy council's interpretation of section 92, paragraph 10, of the British North America Act. Unfortunately, and I say this quite sincerely, with no thought of attaching any blame to my friends in the opposition—there remained an escape clause—I think it is in section 5—whereby the governor in council reserved the right to exempt any business or part thereof from such terms in the act as gave back to the provincial authorities, or which in fact entrusted to the provincial authorities full powers with regard to such interprovincial businesses.

Unfortunately, in section 1 of this bill, I see a very striking analogy, and it is obvious that in the light of the ruling in the Winner case, it would be extremely difficult for the provinces to exercise their powers, in view, as I say, of the purport of that section.

On account of the confidence I have in the minister, I hope—indeed I am convinced that he will take my remarks in good part and will kindly take them into consideration. Therefore, I think that section should be deleted from the bill, because of the situation in which it would put the provinces and especially on account of the extremely broad interpretation in favour of federal authorities that was given by the privy council in the Winner case.

For those reasons, I would feel obliged to vote against the adoption of that section, as now drafted. But I do not believe I shall have to do so, since the minister has indicated that he would see that this section is struck out. I repeat, it seems to me an extremely dangerous one for the powers already exercised by the provinces, or at least by some of the provinces.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to say anything on this bill and I am only going to utter two sentences now. We in the Liberal party are very pleased that the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion) has joined with us in the defence of provincial rights.

An hon. Member: That is the first time in your life you ever did so.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must advise the house that when the minister speaks he will close the debate.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I had intented to comment on the various speeches that have been made but in view of the fact that I have already agreed to drop the offending clause there seems to be no purpose in further discussion of it. I will say no more than that I think there has been an overemphasis placed on this bill with regard to the alleged violations of the rights and dignity of this house, the phrase used by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), and in the use of the word "crime" in connection with the export of electricity beyond a certain date, and things of that nature. However, in the course of debate phrases like that sometimes come quickly to hon. members' lips and are uttered.

We seem to have reached an agreement that to prevent any possible criticism on the part of the provinces or any possible doubt that provincial rights might be infringed by the suggested change that it would be wise to postpone consideration of this to some later occasion and I am quite prepared to do that.

Time is passing very rapidly again and we do not want to get into the position where the other house cannot assist us in this matter. There are certain steps that have to be taken, namely the passing of this bill through the other stages, transmitting a message to the other house which has already been alerted and then having the concurrence of the other house with regard to what we do here with respect to this bill, all of this to be done before royal assent may be granted at a quarter to six.

If I can get an assurance from the other house that their action will be immediate then there is no need for the third clause which occasioned some comments from the other side. If that assurance is not forthcoming then the third clause has to be inserted in order to safeguard the situation, but I think the common sense of both houses will prevail under the circumstances and that we may within just a few minutes deal with the one remaining clause in this bill which refers to the export of electrical energy on the basis of these annual licences.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Tolls for transmission of gas.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, will the minister make a statement on this clause?

Mr. Churchill: This is the one we propose dropping. It is just a question now of wording the necessary motion to that effect.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Can the minister tell us whether any examination was made by the board itself to determine the legal aspects of clause 1 before it was placed in the bill? On the legal arguments that have been offered, I cannot concur in the suggestions that this should not be included. I have no personal objection, of course, to the minister saying that it should be dropped, but it does occur to me that when the energy board has a former official of a provincial government as its president, the board certainly would not introduce something that was going to offend a provincial statute or a provincial law.

Mr. Churchill: The answer is yes; the energy board did get competent advice with regard to this particular matter and it was on that basis that this drafting was done and the amendment put forward. However, in order to move on with this, I will ask my colleague to move:

That clause 1 be deleted; that clause 2 be renumbered 1 and that clause 3 be deleted.

Mr. Brooks: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

On clause 2—Expiry date.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2, now clause 1, carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to say a word or two before it carries. The minister can relax because I am not going to prevent progress. I was very much struck by one observation the minister made. I think we all felt a certain sympathy—I know I personally did—for the minister when he said that he had overlooked this matter until March 1. But what really did astonish me was when the minister discovered on March 1 that no progress was being made with this bill—and I listened very carefully and I am sure that is what the minister said; if I am wrong he will correct me right away—why he did not do something. That was 30 days ago, sir. I do not know what has happened in those 30 days. I do remember those days in the middle of June, 1940, of course, and I am sure the Minister of Veterans Affairs will remember them, too, when one of the most important pieces of legislation that was ever passed by this parliament was drafted in a single night, introduced the next day, and passed through all stages in this house in two days and through the Senate on the third day and received royal assent. Here we have a little minor bill, when we consider all that is left of it now. Why, on March 1, when the minister found this had happened, he did not get a special meeting of the legislation committee—and I assume this government has one, as we had, under the Minister of Justice—why he did not get it approved at the council and get it before that day ended, or if it was late, at least by March 2, on the order paper of this house or the other place, it is hard for me to understand.

Then the minister mentioned the matter here, if I remember correctly, on March 18, in response to a question from my hon. friend about the business of the house. If my arithmetic is right, it was March 24 when this bill was first introduced in the other place, which promptly took its usual long weekend and consideration was not completed there until yesterday. It does seem to me that we can forgive anything that happened before March 1, and feel a certain sympathy for the minister's difficulties before that time but really, I am flabbergasted. I have had a long experience, as hon. members know, not in parliament—I have not been here nearly as long as the hon. gentleman—but on the periphery of parliament, and have had a lot to do with legislation that was subsequently introduced in this parliament and this case does seem to me to be unique. It seemed to me, just so that there would be a kind of recollection of it so that it would not happen again, perhaps this deserved to be mentioned.

Mr. Churchill: I want to thank the hon. member for forgiving all my sins in January and February but not absolving me from my sins in March. I would say this to him. Perhaps I will put down some notes with regard to what happened in March and if the executors of my estate determine something should be written about my life and appoint the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate to do the writing, he will have all the information available to him and know exactly what happened during the month of March.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This matter is one of importance, not only because of the permission that will be extended by parliament to some 20 companies in respect of licences which they have enjoyed in the matter of the export of power, but important for the reason which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has emphasized, and which, I think, bears some repetition, even though I may not do it on exactly the same basis as the hon. member.

Those of us who have been in this house for some time will recall the very strong positions taken by hon. gentlemen opposite when they were sitting on the benches on this side about any alleged effort on the part of the administration in any way to pressure the House of Commons into the consideration of matters which time did not afford. We would have been challenged by hon. gentlemen opposite, and particularly by the Prime Minister, if we had taken the course which the minister for one reason or another has been forced to take in this matter. We would have been told first of all that this was a bill that should have been introduced in this chamber first. That was not the course adopted by the present government. Of course, the reason why the upper chamber dealt with this matter first was that time was running out and it was necessary to run to the other place first.

But that does not in any way absolve hon. gentlemen from themselves now being implicated in the very charges which they on other occasions, in the light of their previous conduct, would have made. It is a violation of the spirit of parliament for any government to present legislation of this importance in the way in which this legislation now comes to us in this house. We are dealing with it for the first time this afternoon and because of the exigencies we are going to extend passage of the bill before five o'clock in order to guarantee to some 20 corporations in this country a right previously extended to them by parliament.

No member of parliament is open to censure for criticizing vigorously the position in which the government has placed us at this time. I join with the hon. member for Kootenay West in saying that the minister was tactful and wise today in accepting readily a responsibility which he says was his. He thereby, of course, contradicts a distinguished public servant who said that the responsibility was his. We also commend that individual. We have before us two willing culprits with respect to the delay for which parliament is now suffering.

An hon. Member: Shocking.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is certainly a shocking matter. It is certainly a violation of the rights of parliament. The minister by his very own words has indicated that the delay did not occur because the government suddenly realized its responsibilities. It realized its responsibilities early in February. The minister began his remarks today by saying there was some discussion early in February as to whether there should be one or more amendments to the legislation. He said that he had discussions with the energy board about some amendments, all of which he decided not to incorporate in the measure which came to us from the other place only this afternoon.

But the minister went on to say that he had intended bringing in these amendments early in February, and by that very statement I am sure he will recognize, good sport that he has proven himself to be this afternoon, how valid is the criticism that we level against the government for placing parliament in the position in which it has been placed today as a result of the dilatory actions of the government and of the minister. It is a most unusual situation. The minister certainly will not find in the history of parliament in the last 25 years any situation which could be regarded as a precedent for the inefficient manner in which the government has conducted this phase of the public business.

It should have been within the initiative of the minister to take the course suggested by the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Bellechasse, who like this party is concerned with provincial rights. This position should have been taken by the minister at the outset today instead of putting the Leader of the Opposition in the position where he had to offer as a condition precedent to acceptance by the house of the new clause 1, the former clause 2 of the bill. The fact that the minister must have been aware that a request had been made by the other place to inform the provinces of the implications of the former clause 1 should itself have served as notice that that clause ought to have been deleted at once or that the matter should have been referred to the courts for a determination as to its constitutionality.

The minister says that the law officers of the crown are of one mind in the matter. The evidence does not support that. There is grave doubt whether the bill as first introduced was not one that involved powers that come under section 92 and the property and civil rights section of the British North America Act. So not only are we faced today with the inefficient way in which public business has been handled, not only are we asked to pass legislation involving doubtful constitutional measures, but we are also asked in the former clause 3 to pass a bill which in effect would have been official notice given by parliament to some 20 companies now operating legally of a declaration that "you may break the law of Canada if you like to do so and we will fix you up after the crime has been committed". That is the clear implication of the former clause 3 of the bill.

I am sure that the minister will not readily and easily forget this day. I am sure that those who love this parliament and the protection that it gives to our ancient usages and liberties will not soon forget this day.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. gentlemen laugh but I hope that they will remember this on the day that the present Prime Minister introduces his bill of rights, a bill of rights intended not only to preserve the liberties of the subject but intended to preserve the liberties of parliament. Today the liberties of parliament were protected by a small group of individuals sitting on the opposition benches and by one of their own members.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Someone says "order". If I were a young and promising member of this house I would join in the denunciation of a government which by its conduct today has given strong evidence that it has really little regard for the functioning of parliament as we have known it traditionally in this country.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that there has been some overemphasis on the part of the hon. member for Essex East. No one is more adept at shadowboxing than the hon. member.

Mr. McIlraith: I cannot agree that there has been any over-emphasis whatever on the part of my colleague, the hon. member for Essex East. However, I recognize the extreme urgency of getting the bill, now before us in committee, to the other place, and I should like to add only one or two comments. The minister pleaded lack of experience. I could not help thinking that the minister was given a great deal of experience during the nine days that the energy bill was before the house last session. I am afraid he did not profit from that experience to the extent that he might and should have. In any event, I should like to ask him now to indicate the names of the companies and the value or quantity of electricity involved. In his remarks on second reading of the bill I think he said he was willing to do that.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, Mr. Chairman. There are 20 companies involved here. I will give the date of the original licence to export on an annual basis. The first is the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario. The date was the 31st day of the third month, 1924 and the licence involved a firm contract of 395,280,000 kilowatts. The second one was Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, and the date is 15-5-24, with respect to an interruptible amount—

Mr. McIlraith: If this is in tabular form, Mr. Chairman, I would have no objection to the minister putting it on Hansard.

Mr. Churchill: Well, if that is agreeable—

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee to give permission to have this table printed at this point?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The table referred to is on page 2659]

Mr. Van Horne: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to see this section being removed. It indicates the measure of reasonableness of this government when it recognizes the merit of suggestions from hon. members all over the house.

In New Brunswick, we are not too happy with the energy board. I shall come back to that later. As a matter of fact, some of our people are calling it the lack of energy board. I can assure you that there are other provisions in this act that meet with our approval but, up to now, there has been very little indication on the part of the energy board of a serious attitude toward problems connected with the transportation of gas and other fluids in New Brunswick or the other maritime provinces. In saying this, I realize that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will probably repeat the accusation he made the other day in Toronto that I am trying to promote some private interest. He may have said this to some reporter in Toronto, but nothing could be farther from the truth.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. I think the hon. gentleman said I had once said of him that he was trying to promote some private interest. I have no recollection of ever having made any such statement. I certainly never had any such idea. If I was reported as having done so and did the hon. gentleman any injury, I apologize at once.

Mr. Van Horne: I merely read a report that the hon. member had said that. I can assure the hon. member that is not the case. We in the maritime provinces are interested in this matter of getting the energy board to take a more serious attitude toward our problems. I wish to take this opportunity of going on record to request the government to direct the energy board to give more serious consideration to these problems that come under this act, as they relate to the maritime provinces.

Mr. Churchill: My attention has been drawn to the fact that when we put forward the amendment we left in the printed section the word "said" in the first line, referring back to the National Energy Board Act. Consequently, we will have to have a further amendment now striking out the word "said".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In what paragraph?

Mr. Churchill: This is in line 1 now of the clause which has remained. We have to strike out the word "said" and put in the "national energy board" and then the line will read as follows:

Section 99 of the National Energy Board Act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

Mr. Brooks: I move that clause 1 be amended by deleting the word "said" in the first line and substituting therefor "the National Energy Board Act".

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time, now?

Mr. Chevrier: By leave.

Mr. Churchill moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Trans-Canada Highway Act

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY ACT

AMENDMENTS TO EXTEND PERIOD OF PAYMENTS AND INCREASE MAXIMUM EXPENDITURES

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 30, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Walker—Mr. Flynn in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act to extend until March 31, 1964, the period during which contributions or payments may be made to the provinces under the act and to prolong until December 31, 1963, the period in respect to which construction costs may be incurred under this act; and to provide also that the aggregate of all expenditures under the act may be increased to a maximum of four hundred million dollars.

Mr. Batten: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks at this time concerning the trans-Canada highway. There is certainly no need to go into the history of the act itself as the committee is well acquainted with the history of the act from December 10, 1949. I should, however, like to point out that early in 1955 it became evident it would be impossible to complete this highway within the time limit which was then December 9, 1956.

On November 14 and 15, 1955, at a federal-provincial conference, this matter was thoroughly discussed and, as a result, the 1956 amendment to this act came about. During the debate of 1956, the then members of the opposition, now the government, had some very caustic comments to make. I am not going to quote those comments now, but I should like to make some general reference to them. At that time many members of the opposition referred to the need for more generous treatment of the trans-Canada highway program, particularly with reference to the amount of money being spent by agreement with the provinces. There was a good deal of discussion also concerning the maintenance of the trans-Canada highway after its completion.

Certainly we have now a fairly large number of miles of the trans-Canada highway completed and it will not be too long before the bills for maintenance will begin to come in to the provinces. As indicated in the debate of 1956, many Conservative members felt that as the cost of building the trans-Canada highway was too large for any province to carry, hence the cost of the maintenance of the trans-Canada highway would also be too large for many of the provinces to carry. There were those who then proposed that a greater share of the cost of building the trans-Canada highway should be borne by the federal government. Even though at that time the amendment to the act included a clause whereby 90 per cent of 10 per cent of the mileage in any province would be paid for by the federal government, there were those who felt that this amendment to the act was not sufficiently generous.

Last year the act was further amended as to the amount of money to be included in the federal share and we have a similar action this time. Dealing with the government's second amendment to the Trans-Canada Highway Act, may I say I would have hoped that some consideration would be given to those provinces that are feeling the burden of carrying their share of the cost of the trans-Canada highway. I would also have hoped that some consideration would be given to the possibility of maintaining this road in a condition suitable for a trans-Canada highway in the future.

I think all of us will agree that there are some measures which, when offering a 50-50 deal to the provinces, are fair. But it is my view, as it always has been, that the 50-50 deal as far as the trans-Canada highway is concerned is not fair to all the provinces. If I may digress here for a moment, I might say that my own personal opinion was that there should have been built across Canada a trans-Canada highway completely paid for and completely maintained by the federal government. That is my personal opinion. I took that position when I was on the other side of the house. I took that position in the debate on the amendment last year and I still think that was the thing to have done. However, it was not done and we have arrived at this 50-50 deal which is in existence.

This 50-50 deal makes no allowance for the differences in mileages to be borne by the different provinces. It makes no allowance for difficulty in construction. It makes no allowance for the cost of materials which must be transported over long distances and sometimes imported into the province as in the case of Newfoundland. It makes no provision for the existence of alternative routes or for the per capita income of the provinces through which the road is to be built.

I think one thing about which we must be extremely careful is the fact that it makes no provision at all for the demand for other basic services which may exist in the provinces. In my own province of Newfoundland we have a tremendous demand for health and educational services. With these demands being as great as they are there is only a limited amount which the provincial government is able to spend on the trans-Canada highway, although it might be very much inclined to accept the agreement in order to get what they can out of this type of arrangement.

Many hon. members on the other side of the house have recognized these difficulties in connection with building the trans-Canada highway under the present agreement. We have a considerable discrepancy in the number of miles to be built by the various provinces. For example, the population of Newfoundland is 32 per cent of the population of the other three Atlantic provinces but Newfoundland is obliged to build 72 per cent of the total mileage in the other three provinces. If we consider the four Atlantic provinces combined, Newfoundland has 24 per cent of the total population of the Atlantic provinces but is obliged to build 42 per cent of the total mileage. We might also compare the number of miles per 10,000 of population. Last year when this act was amended I put on Hansard a table showing the number of miles per 10,000 of population in each of the provinces. I have now revised this table and I am going to read it rather than to have it put on Hansard as it is. I have taken my population figures from the dominion bureau of statistics figures of February 10, 1960 and the mileages from table 1 of the trans-Canada report for the year ended March 31, 1959. It shows that in the province of Alberta the number of miles per 10,000 of population is 2.2—maybe I should point out first that the national average is 2.9 per 10,000 population —Ontario, 2.4. It will be noted that both these provinces are below the national average. The number of miles per 10,000 of population are as follows:

Trans-Canada highway

Province	No. of miles per 10,000 of population
Alberta	2.2
Ontario	2.4
Manitoba	3.5
British Columbia	3.6
Nova Scotia	4.3
Saskatchewan	4.5
New Brunswick	6.5
Prince Edward Island	6.9
Newfoundland	12.2

Newfoundland has 12.2 miles per 10,000 of population, a figure which is not quite but almost twice as great as that of any of the other nine provinces of Canada.

It is also interesting to compare the percentage of miles in a province with the total mileage, and the percentage of the population of a province with the total population. For example, British Columbia has approximately 13 per cent of the total population of the nine provinces included in this agreement and has roughly 13 per cent of the mileage to construct; Alberta has about 10 per cent of the total population and only 6 per cent of the mileage; Saskatchewan has 7 per cent of the population and 9 per cent of the mileage; Manitoba has 7 per cent of the population and 7 per cent of the mileage; Ontario, a province which is probably able to pay better than any other province in Canada has 48 per cent of the population but builds only 33 per cent of the mileage of the trans-Canada highway; New Brunswick with less than 5 per cent of the total population builds 9 per cent of the highway; Nova Scotia has 6 per cent of the population and builds 7 per cent of the mileage; Prince Edward Island has 0.82 per cent of the total population and builds 1.64 per cent of the mileage; Newfoundland has 3.6 per cent of total population but must build 12.8 per cent of the mileage. These figures show—

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member mind repeating the comparison between Newfoundland and British Columbia?

Mr. Batten: British Columbia has about 13 per cent of the population and about 13 per cent of the mileage—the actual figures are 12.72 per cent and 13.13 per cent—Newfoundland has 3.6 per cent of the population and 12.8 per cent of the mileage. It is interesting to note that the percentage of the mileage in Newfoundland is almost equal to that of British Columbia, yet the population of Newfoundland is a little more than a third of the population of British Columbia.

Mr. Walker: Have the percentages changed much since the Liberals passed the bill in its present form?

Mr. Batten: Of course not. The hon. gentleman knows very well that these percentages are arrived at on the basis of the population and mileage in each province. There has been a slight change in the population over the last few years—it has increased in most provinces—but the mileage has remained fairly constant. The only change would be a slight reduction in the number of miles per ten thousand of the population, but no significant change.

Various schemes have, of course, been discussed with the object of providing a better deal for some of the provinces. One suggestion which has been made is that the federal government should have built and maintained the whole of the highway. Another suggestion, made by my own leader, is that in the maritimes the federal government should pay 90 per cent of the cost. A further suggestion from another hon. member of this house is that the federal government should pay 75 per cent of the cost.

Of the various schemes which might be put forward, one, for example, could be based on mileage per ten thousand of the population. The average mileage per ten thousand of the population in Canada is 2.9, and it might be possible to base an agreement on this figure. Fifty per cent of the total cost, plus 90 per cent of 10 per cent, could be paid, as under the present agreement, to all provinces which have to build the national average or less. Suppose, however, the mileage to be built in a province was above the national average. An arrangement could then be worked out under which the federal government would pay a greater proportion of the cost. I might say that at the existing rate, under the existing plan, 40 per cent of the total mileage in the country would be covered, a mileage of 1,718. Where the mileage to be built in a province amounted to four miles per 10,000 of the population the federal government would pay 60 per cent of the cost, and if the mileage rose to six, the federal government would pay 65 per cent of the cost. For percentages in excess of six miles per ten thousand, the federal government would pay 70 per cent of the cost.

I have made some rough calculations as to what this would cost the federal government, and from these calculations, based on estimates of the cost of completion of the trans-Canada highway given by the minister last year, I find that both Alberta and Ontario would complete their mileage under the existing agreement. Manitoba would receive an increased grant of $2 million; British Columbia would get an increase of $9 million; Nova Scotia an increase of $3.5 million; Saskatchewan, $2.5 million; New Brunswick, $10 million; Prince Edward Island, $1.5 million; and Newfoundland an increased grant of $5 million; making a total cost to the federal treasury of $33.5 million.

I recognize, of course, that this scheme which I have broadly outlined does not take into account the various other factors which make the building of the trans-Canada highway so difficult for provinces such as the maritime provinces and British Columbia.

The motor business in Canada is becoming very big business indeed. In 1920 there were 400,000 cars and trucks in Canada; in 1930, there were 1,250,000; in 1940, 1,500,000; in 1950, 2,500,000; and in 1960 there will be more than 5,000,000, an increase of 100 per cent in the last ten years. It is estimated that during the present year Canadians will travel 40,000 million miles over Canadian roads. The amount received in registration fees and gasoline taxes in 1958 was just less than $500 million, or almost 25 per cent of the total net general revenue of all 10 provinces. Certainly these figures go to show that motor traffic in Canada has grown very fast indeed during the last 20 years.

In my own province the growth has been slower. Nevertheless, in the last five years there has been a speeding up of the development of the motor industry in the island province. In 1940, for example, there were 4,378 cars and 1,306 trucks, making a total of 5,834 vehicles; in 1949, just before confederation, the total was 11,500; and in 1950 it had increased to 16,375. In the last ten or eleven years since confederation, however, the total number of cars and trucks on the island increased to 52,578, a threefold increase in nine years. I draw these figures to the attention of the committee in order to illustrate the demand in the province for increased highway construction. As everybody knows, highway construction begets more construction; the more roads you build, the greater the demand will be.

As was pointed out two days ago by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador, who took the opportunity to recount some of the history of transportation in Newfoundland, there are large distances around the coast where the provincial government must construct its own roads. The demand for this type of road is so great that there is not enough money left over for any rapid progress to be made in connection with the trans-Canada highway.

Certainly there has been great progress made in connection with highway construction in Canada, though nothing compared with the progress which has been made in the United States. I recognize that the conditions are different. However, in the United States and also in Canada, we have devoted great research into the building of automobiles and trucks but we have not done the same amount of research work, or the same type of research, with regard to the roads over which vehicles have to travel. I do not think road construction in Canada has kept pace with the advance in the construction of motor vehicles. We have almost half a million miles of roads in Canada. Of this total, one mile in ten is paved, 4.5 miles in ten are gravel surfaced and 4.5 miles in ten have an earth surface. Road mileage in Newfoundland at the end of operations in 1959 resulted in the following picture:

Paved highways	234 miles
Gravel highways	2,930 miles
Motorable secondary roads	454 miles
Non-motorable secondary roads	785 miles
Local roads	3,000 miles

In the last ten years 1,600 miles of road have been constructed in the province of Newfoundland. In 1959 there were 138 road projects undertaken. Expenditures for this construction and for the maintenance of roads that had been built before that amounted to an all-time high of $18 million. The sum of $18 million may not be a lot of money to a province like British Columbia or Ontario but I can assure the committee that with the demand for other services in Newfoundland $18 million for road construction is a great deal of money especially when considered on a per capita basis.

In 1958, for example, the per capita expenditure on roads in Canada was $45. The per capita expenditure in Newfoundland in 1958 was $51. Certainly the roads in Newfoundland are just as important to that province as are the roads in any other province of Canada.

In this great country of ours we have many attractions for people who want to come as tourists from other countries and particularly from south of the border. They are attracted here by the scenery, the wide open spaces and the things that go to make up our tourist industry. I believe that if you are going to develop industry in an part of Canada the type of industry must be based upon the resources of that area.

In the maritimes there is certainly a tourist resource that can be developed but it will never be developed without the type of road over which tourists like to drive. I do not think for a moment that Florida became the great tourist resort it is because of its geographical position. I believe Florida is the great tourist resort it is today because the people who wanted to go to Florida, and particularly the people of the United States, were able to get there over the type of road which they demand.

We have, for example, the situation in the state of Maine. Maine in many respects is similar to the Canadian maritimes. Both the maritimes and Maine in the early part of the century had a fairly substantial shipbuilding industry and a large trade with the West Indies but the turn of the century saw both those industries decrease. Both areas have also witnessed the migration of a large percentage of their population west. There are indeed many similarities between Maine and the maritime provinces of Canada and yet the state of Maine has become the Florida of northern United States. This has come about largely because of the building of the Portland turnpike. The tourist traffic brought into the state of Maine because of the Portland turnpike last year was far greater than any of the sponsors of that highway had hoped.

I believe that such a highway going down through the maritimes and a similar type of highway across Newfoundland would bring into the Atlantic provinces a number of people that would raise the tourist industry there to the same level to which it has been raised nationally.

I say again that if you are going to develop industry in any part of Canada it should be based on the resources that happen to belong to that particular area. We should do what can be done to encourage the growth of the tourist industry in the maritimes. We in Newfoundland have not been able to avail ourselves of a large percentage of the tourist dollar but we believe that with an improved highway system and improved facilities for caring for tourists during their stay in the province and with the many attractions Newfoundland can offer we too could find a good deal of revenue in the tourist industry.

Another reason why further consideration should be given to the construction of the trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland is that this province has never received from the federal government the same railway services that have been received by the other nine provinces. When Newfoundland entered confederation in 1949 it brought with it its own railway which had been built and paid for. It is true that since 1949 the Canadian National Railways have spent a great deal of money improving the Newfoundland railway service and have done a pretty fair job, all that could be done with a narrow gauge railway. But we have never had any railway expansion or money spent on canals. The people of Newfoundland have not had the opportunity of deciding how to transport their produce, whether by rail or road. There was only one way in which it could be done. My own riding is an area of particular importance to Newfoundland with respect to agricultural products. These products have to be transported by C.N.R. at rates that are high and sometimes at rates that seem unfair. When the trans-Canada highway is completed these products can be taken from the farming areas to places where there is a higher density of population and where a good market could be found for the things which can be grown in this area.

I know that all I have said today has been said before. I know, too, that the minister is well aware of the situation that exists in Newfoundland. The hon. gentleman last year was kind enough to come to my province. I know that time did not permit him to visit my part of the country but when he makes his next trip I hope he will be able to come to the west coast of Newfoundland which is able to provide some of the finest scenery anywhere in Canada. I can assure him that if he comes he will receive a welcome that will be typical of Newfoundland hospitality, a sample of which he has already experienced, and we will show him a fine part of Newfoundland, one that I believe will impress on him the need for further consideration of this trans-Canada highway program.

Mr. Cadieu: Mr. Chairman, I too should like to express my approval of this resolution providing for the completion of the present trans-Canada highway. I am also of the opinion that it does not provide sufficient money. In view of the fact that the present trans-Canada highway is already completed in the province of Saskatchewan and has been for almost three years, and in view of the fact that Manitoba and Alberta have almost completed their share, I would recommend highly that a second trans-Canada highway get under way. I was very pleased to hear the contribution to this debate made by the hon. member for Dauphin and was very interested in his remarks.

When one looks at the great potentialities this northern route would open up in the way of natural resources and connecting with roads to resources and connecting many federal and provincial parks in this vast area and some of the best farm land in Canada he immediately sees the value of a second trans-Canada highway, coming into Saskatchewan on No. 3 highway on the east, thence to Prince Albert, connecting roads to resources at that point and making use of the much-needed and new four-lane traffic bridge now nearing completion at that point, then continuing west to Lloydminster and west through the province of Alberta and British Columbia. One really has to see this great country to realize the need for this second trans-Canada highway. I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, it will be second to none. I think, without any doubt, construction of this highway under a join federal-provincial program would give access to one of the most scenic and resourceful routes in Canada.

In this area we have an organization known as the northern trans-Canada route association which has been doing much research work on this proposed route. In their pamphlet I notice they indicate that the extension of such a highway construction program should be considered by the government of Canada at the 1960 session of parliament so that the provincial governments can make their plans and include this item in their 1961 budgets. They go on further to point out the points brought out by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who stated in the House of Commons on Friday, June 5, 1959, as reported at page 4385 of Hansard:

> Possibly some policy may have to be adopted which will allow one type of aid in one province and another type of aid in another province in order to serve the national interest.
> [Mr. Batten.]

This is very important, because there is such a difference in the vast terrain and we can build so many more miles cheaper, comparatively speaking, than can be built through parts of Ontario, British Columbia and the maritimes.

Consideration should be given to the starting of a second trans-Canada route in this area. I was also very interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Churchill who pointed out some of the great resources that such a route would open up. I notice that my colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon, proposed a route through Saskatoon on the basis of freight rates. If Saskatoon had the freight rate problem of the north that city would warrant a lot more consideration. Also, if we in the north had a highway built to the standard of No. 5 highway which runs through Saskatoon we would refer to it as our second trans-Canada highway. The importance of the starting of a second trans-Canada highway cannot be over-emphasized, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, one of the things that you can always note about highway construction within a provincial framework is that choosing the setting is the most efficacious way of pleasing voters. I think the example of Mr. Gaglardi and Premier Bennett in British Columbia is a very good indication. If you want to make an impression on the voters you build highways. I think Premier Frost in Ontario is about the smoothest politician that Canada has known. He has also followed this practice to quite an extent. I notice that in the eastern Ontario constituencies in particular, where we have a malapportionment in so far as votes are concerned in relation to suburban constituencies, the road program is excellent. I also notice in our part of Ontario where cities are few and far between and the mileage is great, the road construction progress is rather slow. I want to bring to the minister's attention, before he listens seriously to his people in the house who are advocating a second trans-Canada highway—and I include the members in my own party—this fact. I wish he would take a look at what has gone on up in our part of the country and give us an explanation as to what is happening to the first trans-Canada highway.

I would like to point out to the minister—I know there is no collusion between him and the politicians of the same stripe as he in the provincial setup—that the whole assumption is that the highway construction that goes on is from the magnificent boundary of the province of Ontario. We tend to get pretty critical about this boundary, knowing that most of the highway construction up there that is taking place along the trans-Canada route is being paid for by the federal government, anyway. This is the image that comes forward, which is abetted by the provincial politicians in our area. The member for Port Arthur in the provincial house, who has recently been in a bit of hot water for an optimistic statement in connection with a judicial matter, is also very free with his announcements in so far as culverts, bridges, and everything else are concerned.

There are usually about three stages in trans-Canada highway contracts. He announces all three stages. As a matter of fact, he makes so many announcements about trans-Canada highway contracts that I think everyone is confused. But anyone who drives over the trans-Canada highway between the Manitoba border and White River is more than confused. He is pretty well shaken up. It has got to the stage where you cannot politic in any decency. I know we had a riding association meeting last week in Nipigon, some 70 miles out of Port Arthur, and about 104 people managed to make it from various spots on the trans-Canada highway. But the main point that was made to me was, let us not have any more of those meetings if we are going to have our life and limb and property threatened by going over that highway. It is a terrible situation all the way from Port Arthur to Nipigon and from Nipigon all the way to White River and west of Port Arthur it is just tragic. As the hon. member for Fort William pointed out the other day, this was going to be the big link to enable trucks to fit in with the seaway development, tie in with Manitoba and give us cheaper transportation costs and help us to build.

I would like the minister to explain just what is the relationship of his department with the provincial department of highways. I would like him to explain why he cannot get them to move any faster, and why we have not a higher standard on the trans-Canada highway in our part of Canada.

Before he encourages the Prime Minister to go on television and talk about the possibility of further development of the trans-Canada, would he have the Prime Minister just take a drive from Winnipeg over to White River and examine the existing trans-Canada highway. I can tell you it is no prize. I know he would not want to blame his predecessors in that case, that terrible Liberal administration, because after three years in office the government ought to be able to get the provincial governments bugged up. The only thing we know about the trans-Canada highway is that we have had a beautiful scandal down there. I am not going to raise scandals again; but three or four years ago, as the minister may remember, we had all sorts of charges and counter-charges. We even had a couple of contractors pay very large fines. That is about the main contribution the trans-Canada highway has made in our area. It has the worst record of detours, bumps, springs torn out that I have ever heard of.

One man in our constituency, a union organizer, who has to travel far and wide, told me that he is always getting representations from the international office because his car bills are so high. There is one highway that he hardly ever goes down that he does not lose at least a muffler or an oil tank, and this is the trans-Canada highway that the minister is so proud of.

I know there is a tendency, whenever money is being voted on projects in the area, for politicians to become sweet and fatuous, but I do not see how the minister can be either sweet or fatuous if he has ever had to drive over the trans-Canada highway in northwestern Ontario. It is no prize. I know he will restrain the enthusiasm for a second trans-Canada highway until he gets something going along this route. All sorts of construction work are being done, but at the rate it is going by the time those new projects are finished the ones that were at one time up to standard will be all shot. In the light of this, I think we should snuff out all the guff that we have heard about a second trans-Canada highway and concentrate upon that mileage that has not been completed. I am not speaking of the gap from White River east to Wawa or that particular area. We will assume that will be done this year. This provincial politician I have been talking about has been predicting its finish for the last four years. We have even had people in the Conservative party betting in all directions in the last few years as to how soon it is going to be finished. I am talking about the part that is theoretically finished now but is not up to trans-Canada highway standards.

Of all the misbegotten highways that anyone has ever driven, I think the stretch between the Manitoba boundary and White River is about it and yet it is one of the longest stretches in the trans-Canada highway. I notice that the railways, using freight rate terms, always refer to this part of the country as the bridgehead area, the big link they have to move goods through to get them from east to west. You really think you are in a real war bridgehead when you go over some of that road.

I have requested both privately and publicly that the minister visit the lakehead. Conservative fortunes are not very high there and he could do something about raising them. It seems to be an area that does not take to Conservatives to any marked or consistent degree. The people there do not even take to the vision. I am always willing to give Conservative politicians every opportunity to come there and rectify the situation, so my invitation to the minister is sincere. Come up there and take a look at this trans-Canada highway. Take a look at the botch you have managed to make of the lakehead terminal so far. Bring the Prime Minister along and take him for a drive. I have noticed that he likes driving through Quebec. He took a big tour through Quebec last year because he thought the situation was shaky but I can assure him that he will be shaking when he is through driving over the trans-Canada highway in that part of Ontario. I would very much like to see such a visit. When the Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works travel that part of the trans-Canada highway they will be very warm when they are through. In other words, I am suggesting that we have a built-in warm reception in the form of the trans-Canada highway.

I do not want to overdo this point but I should like to reiterate: Let us not have any talk about a second trans-Canada highway as an if or a promise or a vision until we have the substance in northwestern Ontario of the first trans-Canada highway. I suggest that the minister has got to do more than talking to the provincial authorities to get them on the move. I know that the provincial authorities have been threatening to come here and do some tough talking about more money. In this particular case the money is there, according to the minister and previous ministers, but they have not been taking it. I think that some time during this debate or the later discussion we should have from the minister a really candid explanation of why the Ontario government has been puttering around for so long with respect to the trans-Canada highway in our part of the country.

(Translation):

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Chairman, I read with interest the speech made yesterday in this house by the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget), with regard to the resolution sponsored by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker).

The tone and the character of his remarks show that the hon. member is obsessed by the imminence of provincial elections in Quebec. His federal mandate is apparently not enough for him and so he did not fail to sermonize people who, after all have been given a mandate different from his own and which entrusts them, and them alone, with the responsibility for managing the affairs of the province. Does it mean that his provincial leader is so weak that he needs an alter ego in Ottawa to help him strengthen his positions?

Be that as it may, I do not intend to follow suit. In spite of my regard for the Quebec government, I have always endeavoured to rely on my own convictions in setting the course I should follow in this house. This I have chosen and still choose to do, out of regard for the mandate entrusted to me by the people of Bellechasse, a mandate which prompts me to adopt a federal and constitutional approach in dealing with the problems we have to consider.

That might well come as a surprise to my good friend of Levis. Indeed, according to the remarks he made yesterday, he seems to think that a man cannot reason on his own, assume his own responsibilities, but has to borrow ideas elsewhere and take his orders from outside.

If that is the hon. member's conception of a political party, and because of the regard I have for him, I refuse to believe that it is—

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I have been listening to the hon. member and I should like to remind him that we are discussing a resolution to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act. I was hoping that he was perhaps making a point leading up to that, and I am sure he will now come back to the resolution before the committee.

(Translation):

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Chairman, I was merely referring to certain remarks made yesterday, but at your kind direction, I will at once revert to the matter under review.

The views I shall express today on the problem we are considering—and this is the first opportunity I have of doing so—are quite personal views that in no way engage the responsiblity of either my colleagues or of the government which has been entrusted with administering Quebec's affairs and whose views, attitudes and inspirations I respect.

The sole object of the legislation before us is, after all, to increase to $400 million the contributions required to complete the trans-Canada highway and to extend to December 31, 1963, the period required for its completion. The resolution says no more and no less. It does not at all raise the matter of principle; it merely ensures that the project undertaken under a 1949 act, will not come to a halt and that the federal government that took it over will carry out the agreements made with nine of Canada's ten provinces.

How could we shirk the responsibilities undertaken by parliament, and attempt to terminate, by unilateral action, the agreements that were signed with the provinces? That alone would be reason enough to justify our support of the resolution.

I might perhaps let it go at that. However, having long since learned to face my responsibilities, I shall go even further and say that, in view of the wording of the 1949 act, I doubt that its provisions are contrary to section 92 of the 1867 constitutional act. Though the act does not expressly refer to the exceptions provided in paragraph 10 of section 92, it is fully in accord with the spirit of that paragraph.

Indeed, the primary purpose of the trans-Canada highway is to link the various provinces together by means of a motor highway, so that any Canadian may drive over it from coast to coast right in Canada, without occasional detours over United States highways. Now this primary object, and I think this is the main point—is in my view fully within the spirit of the exceptions provided in paragraph 10 of the said section 92.

It is quite normal that this legislation should have caused misgivings to the government of the province of Quebec, especially when we consider the centralization context existing at the time this act was adopted. It must be admitted that in the meantime the atmosphere has definitely cleared up.

Indeed, last year, when some hon. members of this house who had met with success in the province of Quebec by arousing dissentions and bickering—that is how they understood national unity—were doing all they could to blast the position of the government of the province of Quebec, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Green), then minister of public works, gave them this answer, and I quote:

> I merely say that in the province of Quebec, there is a first-class highway. The Canadian public is not inconvenienced in any way because Quebec has not seen fit to participate in any way in this program. That province has its rights under the British North America Act, and if the men who happen to form the government of the province see fit to follow a policy, then I doubt very much the wisdom of attempts being made in the house to blow up a storm in the province of Quebec either on this measure or on any other.

In other words, the hon. minister recognized that each government had to take its own responsibilities, and that he would surely not intervene in charting the course of the policy taken by Quebec or any other province.

Besides, when this legislation was adopted, it seemed that the concern felt by the government of the province of Quebec was being shared, to some extent, by the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget). According to the speech he made in this house on November 28, 1949, he would not have agreed to the federal government paying the full cost of the highway, as this might have given the federal government property rights and control over the highway. Here is, in fact, what he said on November 22, 1949:

> Well, under the circumstances, it would be easy to infer that in letting the federal government pay 100 per cent of construction costs, and later pay for maintenance, it would be a recognition of the federal government's jurisdiction over this highway. Although I am neither a lawyer nor an expert on constitutional issues, I think we all agree that the question of provincial roads, legally speaking, belongs exclusively to the provinces, even if parts of those provincial roads have to be used for the trans-Canada highway.

When the member for Levis was expressing such fears, why should not our rulers in the province of Quebec, who were more directly concerned with the administration of the province, entertain similar fears?

In a country with a British constitution, it is so dangerous to set a precedent and therefore a rule which, despite the terms of the constitution, eventually takes on a permanent character.

Then too, it does seem that, because of his long tenure in parliament, the hon. member for Levis is indulging a tendency to appeal to precedents in urging the federal government to venture farther and farther afield into ways and by-ways fraught with perils for the rights and freedoms of the provinces.

In fact, here is a suggestion he made yesterday, which make us believe that the hon. member has already cast aside the caution he expressed in 1949. I quote from yesterday's Hansard:

> The minister has no doubt been informed of the statement made by the president of the Canadian Construction Association who, speaking before members of that association at Calgary, in early January, suggested that a federal-provincial conference should be held this year to consider the national highways problem. He also added that, in his opinion, members present at this important meeting must work in close co-operation with Ottawa and the provinces.

On the other hand, according to the answer given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), some time ago, no official talks, so far, have been opened with the provinces in connection with that project. In my view, it is high time such a meeting were called, because two or three western provinces have already completed their highway, and it would be desirable that plans be made for the construction of highways, that would be of national interest.

Of course, I should be ill-advised if I stated an opinion on a project about whose nature or general character we know nothing; however, in my opinion, it is a project about which we should be cautious. As remarked by Mr. Pierre Vigeant in Le Devoir for July 23, 1959, certain federal undertakings should not be regarded as precedents justifying the government in taking up highway construction, which except in extraordinary circumstances, is under provincial jurisdiction.

Of course, the exceptions provided under paragraph 10 of section 92 are most insidious, and of such a nature as to give rise to all sorts of misunderstandings and interpretations. Already, on March 18, 1912, a senator whose opinion our hon. friends of the opposition would no doubt hesitate to disclaim, Sir Richard Cartwright, expressed himself very clearly on that point, in a debate of this nature, and I quote from the Hansard of the Senate for March 18, 1912, page 517:

What are those exceptions?

He is referring of course to the exceptions provided under section 92, paragraph 10, of the British North America Act of 1867:

What are those exceptions? Lines of steam and other ships, lines of steamships between the provinces, and lastly, such works situated within the province which are declared to be for the general advantage of Canada. I know how easily legal gentlemen of experience can drive a coach and four through any act of parliament that was ever drafted, and I suppose that it would be technically possible for the hon. gentleman to declare all these small roads, wherever they may be, to be works for the general advantage of Canada. Very possibly the courts might sustain that view, but I submit that no greater abuse of the provision could possibly be imagined than declaring local works of that kind to be for the general advantage of Canada.

The cautionary measures just quoted remain amazingly timely, and I believe that all members of this house should ponder and heed them. Was it not because of the exceptions under section 92, that, in 1954, in the case of the attorney general Ontario v. Winner—a case that was referred to this afternoon—was it not because of those exceptions that the privy council decided that interprovincial road transport is not under provincial jurisdiction and is entirely under federal authority?

They are exceptions that the federal legislator should resort to only with extreme caution and circumspection if he genuinely wants to safeguard the federative character of our constitution and, above all, if he really wants to preserve and to foster peace and harmony between the Ottawa government and the provincial governments, and between the various schools of thought which characterize the people of Canada.

Mr. Habel: Mr. Chairman, may I say that I have been most interested in the remarks of the hon. member who has just spoken. It was certainly a masterly speech from a constitutional point of view. As an expert on the Canadian constitution, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion) has said all that needs be said to explain and justify the vote of the Conservative members from Quebec on this resolution.

Coming back now to the resolution itself, I must say I am a bit disappointed that, on the occasion of this amendment to the Trans-Canada Highway Act, the minister failed to give greater consideration—notwithstanding the views of my friend the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher)—to the construction of a second trans-Canada highway.

I think the house will be interested to know that there is now, in Canada, an essentially trans-Canadian highway. I refer to the road linking Manitoba with Port Arthur and Fort William, and then running through to Longlac, Hearst, Cochrane, North Bay, and from there to either Toronto or Montreal.

Progress reported.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate Chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

An act for the relief of Janet McMillan Sim Sinclair Kerr.

An act for the relief of Jacqueline Joly Mazurette.

An act for the relief of Shirley Evelyn Ellis Bertram.

An act for the relief of Sally Emden Rohr.

An act for the relief of Barbara Steinberg Shapiro.

An act for the relief of Olga May Hospadaruk Edwards.

An act for the relief of Georgette Rosenberg Korman.

An act for the relief of Donald Snowdon.

An act for the relief of Mary Nisbet Clements.

An act respecting the Canadian Public Health Association.

An act respecting The Algoma Central and Hudson Bay Railway Company.

An act to amend the National Housing Act, 1954.

An act to amend the Indian Act.

An act to amend the Canada Elections Act.

An act to amend the National Energy Board Act.

An act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1961.

An act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1960.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is there any change in the course of business today?

Mr. Churchill: There are four items available for discussion tomorrow—the resolution concerning the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act and the resolution concerning the Trans-Canada Highway Act among them. If these should be completed, there are the two resolutions in the name of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources dealing respectively with the Yukon Act and the Northwest Territories Act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No change in the rest of the business for today?

Mr. Churchill: No. Tonight we continue with the budget debate.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

He said:

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, for a third time it is my honour and privilege to present to the house the annual budget.

In presenting my first budget on June 17, 1958, I drew attention to the fact that never since confederation had any portion of the budget speech been delivered in this house in the French tongue. I expressed surprise that in a parliament with two official languages enjoying complete equality every portion of the budget speech had always been delivered in English. Within my acknowledged limitations I departed from that practice in 1958 and again in introducing my second budget a year ago.

Tonight I am going to take a step further and open my remarks in the French language which has so gracefully adorned the proceedings of this house and holds a secure constitutional position in the Canadian parliament.

As on the two previous occasions, I shall begin with a review of economic conditions over the past year and an indication of what I regard as the likely trends to be expected during the new fiscal year. I shall report to the house on the government accounts, on dominion-provincial relations and on our debt management measures, then proceed to review our financial plans for the new fiscal year and the tax policy on which they are based. Finally I shall outline the tax proposals which are embodied in the resolutions which I am introducing this evening.

(Text):

ECONOMIC REVUE

Twelve months ago when I introduced the last budget we were emerging from a recession. Our fiscal and other related policies at that time were based upon an expectation of continued and accelerating recovery. In these circumstances we believed we should move in the direction of a balanced budget at a pace which would resist inflation and at the same time encourage a healthy rate of balanced growth. Looking back over the fiscal year which ends tonight, I think we can take satisfaction in the results. In spite of a period of credit strains and in spite of some unfortunately prolonged industrial stoppages both at home and abroad Canada has had a good year. A gratifying degree of price stability has been achieved, and employment, production, incomes and trade have all shown healthy increases. We can look forward optimistically to another year of solid expansion and balanced growth.

I shall not attempt a detailed review of economic developments of the past year; the budget white paper tabled yesterday covers these fully. Rather, I shall touch on some of the highlights and examine the prospects for 1960.

Last year we emerged from a recession which had been caused by a number of factors; capital expenditures by business, especially in industries producing raw materials for export, had declined; business investment in inventory holdings had fallen sharply from levels which had been high in relation to business sales; and export incomes, previously increasing, had levelled off for two years because of a reduction in demand in other parts of the world. The government had fought this recession by measures to sustain consumer demand, by stimulating housing, by increasing government investment, by augmenting transfer payments to other levels of government and by many other means.

The decline was reversed late in 1958 and gave way to expansion last year. Capital expenditure by business, especially on machinery and equipment, increased throughout 1959 and in the last half of the year was running at a rate well above that of the low point of the recession. The survey of business intentions released by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce a few weeks ago indicates that this upward trend will continue throughout 1960.

As business conditions improved, first in the United States and later on in western Europe, our exports began to increase and toward the end of the year accelerated sharply. In 1959 we exported more than $5 billion worth of goods for the first time in our history. Exports to the United States showed the greatest absolute gains, but in the latter half of the year the most rapid rates of increase took place in exports to overseas countries. In the fourth quarter the rate of our total exports of goods, seasonally adjusted, was 12 per cent above the rate in the first quarter of 1959.

With rising exports and greater business investment, Canadian incomes increased. Consumer expenditures continued to grow and outlays on housing were very close to the record rate of the previous year. Expenditures by provincial and municipal governments on goods and services increased. The federal government slightly reduced its own outlays on goods and services, but increased its transfer payments to the other levels of government.

With the general improvement in business, there was no longer any liquidation of inventories, such as had taken place in 1958; instead businessmen added to their stocks to keep pace with rising sales. In 1958 the liquidation of business inventories had amounted to $323 million, while last year there was a net accumulation of $355 million, a reversal which increased demand by a total of $678 million.

Reflecting all these and other influences, the gross national product in 1959, according to our present preliminary estimates, rose to $34.6 billion compared with the estimate of $34½ billion upon which I based last year's budget. Accompanying this rise in production was an increase in employment of 2.7 per cent over 1958. Hon. members have seen the recently published February employment figures. The number of persons with jobs was 116,000, or 2 per cent, higher than at the same date a year ago, but as the result of an unusual increase in the number of persons estimated to be in the labour force, the estimate of the numbers without jobs and seeking work was 18,000 higher than a year ago. I am confident, however, that employment will rise as the coming of spring opens up new job opportunities and as the economy continues its upward trend.

The past year was notable for a welcome absence of speculative excesses in production, demand and inventories. I stress this because often in the past such excesses have provided a major cause of recession. Our economic growth has been orderly and balanced. New investment in plant and equipment has been broadly based. Increases in consumer expenditure have moved in line with personal disposable incomes and personal saving was maintained at the 1958 level.

Average per capita wages and salaries of workers in trade and industry reached a new record of $3,773, an increase of 4 per cent over 1958 and of 10 per cent over 1956. Since the consumer price index was only 1 per cent higher than in 1958, there was a very satisfactory gain of 3 per cent in real income.

The balanced nature of our economic growth has contributed to price stability, and price stability in turn, to balanced growth. Like the consumer price index the wholesale price index for 1959 was about 1 per cent higher than in 1958.

In the financial sector 1959 was marked by some disturbances which had subsided by the end of the year. During the first eight months of the year there was an extraordinary increase in the demand for bank loans. In order to meet their customers' demands the banks were heavy sellers of government bonds. At the same time all levels of government continued to be net borrowers although demands for funds, especially by the federal government, were substantially lower. As a result of all these forces, combined with the effect on Canada of rising interest rates abroad, especially in the United States, bond prices declined and interest rates rose from January to August. Since then short term rates have declined substantially and longer term rates remained steady until recently when they showed a downward trend.

The general public, attracted by higher interest rates and increasingly confident in the determination and ability of the government to combat inflation, provided the savings necessary to meet a large part of these and other demands for capital. Private savings, both personal and corporate, totalled some $6.6 billion, $260 million higher than in 1958 and more than $500 million higher than in 1957.

The high level of Canadian savings has, however, been more than matched by the level of capital investment. During 1959 the equivalent of one quarter of our gross national production went into investment. This proportion is one of the highest among all western countries.

Our capital requirements in 1959, and over the past several years, have necessitated a substantial inflow of foreign capital to supplement our domestic savings. The initiative for this inflow has come in part from our own people who have borrowed abroad, and in part from foreign investors attracted by the nature and the diversity of our resources. This direct investment by foreign entrepreneurs, not only from the United States but also from the United Kingdom and from Europe, is a reflection of strong confidence in our economic prospects and brings into Canada not only capital funds, but also technical know-how, and often also brings with it an assurance of export markets. All told the net inflow amounted to $1,460 million in 1959, about $400 million higher than in 1958, and only slightly above the previous peak of 1957.

This increase in the inflow of capital was, of course, interrelated with the increase in our balance of payments deficit on current account. I wish to comment on this subject. Our current account can be divided into two parts; goods and services, and the movements of these two parts are quite different. In the goods sector our deficit amounted to about half the size of the record deficit of 1956. This improvement reflects the fact that imports were more affected by the intervening recession than were exports, while the recovery of 1959 saw sizeable increases in both. In contradistinction, our deficit on account of services has steadily increased, reflecting higher dividend payments on successful investments by non-residents in Canada, higher interest payments, business fees of one kind and another, and increased travel and expenditure by Canadians abroad. In 1959 this deficit exceeded one billion dollars.

Putting goods and services together, they add up to the total of $1,460 million. This deficit is reflected by, and is a reflection of substantial continuing imports of capital. I do not mean to say that we use all of the money we borrow abroad to import machinery and other forms of capital equipment. We produce domestically many of the goods and materials used in our investment program, and the composition of our imports reveals only a partial picture of that program. What is significant is the use we make of all our resources, including the product of our own labour and equipment, and what we obtain as a result of our foreign transactions. What is important is that a substantial portion of these resources should be put into new capital investment, rather than into consumption, and that this new investment should be of a character that will promote the efficiency and productivity of our country. Broadly speaking, I believe that these objectives are being attained.

However, as my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said, we must not be complacent. Basically our attention must be directed to our spending and investing habits. Our standard of living has increased to a level undreamed of a generation ago. Our people have demanded social security, services and facilities from all levels of government on an expanding scale. Along with our investment program, this scale of expenditures has required a heavy outlay of resources, both physical and financial. In spite of a rate of saving which is higher than that of almost any other country in the western world, we have not been able to supply all these resources ourselves. The inflow of capital and the accompanying balance of payments deficit reflect this underlying situation.

Any inflow of capital raises questions as to ownership and control of Canadian industry and resources, and also the question of the servicing of debt. As to ownership and control, this government's position is clear. We welcome capital into Canada if, when here, it is willing to act as if it were Canadian and not as if it were foreign. During the past two years there has been increasing evidence, in many quarters, that foreign capital in this country is becoming increasingly conscious of its Canadian responsibilities. This is a subject that has been vigorously brought to the attention of foreign investors by the Prime Minister and others. It would be better if the desired result were achieved by such persuasion than by legislation.

As to the servicing of external debt, I have already explained that a very large proportion of our national output consists of additions to our national stock of capital equipment which increases our total productivity. The inflow of capital has contributed to the growth of our gross national product. Over the years of our history economic growth has taken place at a faster rate than the additional net financial indebtedness to the outside world which has been incurred in the course of achieving it, and our ability to service this foreign debt has correspondingly improved.

From the mid-1920's to the outbreak of war in 1939 our net foreign indebtedness was equal to or exceed our gross national product. During the war years and in the immediate post-war years we made very large loans, amounting in total to more than $2.5 billion, to our friends and allies overseas and to new international financial institutions. In the same years we had to defer much of the maintenance and most of the expansion of our social capital, while at the same time all levels of government in Canada were progressively paying off or buying back large amounts of foreign-held debt. As a result by 1950 our net foreign indebtedness was equal to less than one quarter of our gross national product.

Since 1950 we have been expanding very rapidly in resource development, in secondary industries, and in augmenting and modernizing our social capital, at rates considerably in excess of our domestic rate of saving. In this period the rate of increase in our net foreign indebtedness has exceeded the growth in national output, and the ratio of net foreign debt to gross national product is currently about 45 per cent. Thus in relation to our national product our net foreign indebtedness is today less than half what it was before the war and our ability to service it is correspondingly greater. The net cost of servicing our external debt in 1926-1930 represented more than 4 per cent of our gross national product; in 1950 it was just over 2 per cent, and in 1959 it was just under 1½ per cent. I do not anticipate that, if we manage our affairs prudently and properly, Canada will indefinitely continue to rely on capital from abroad as heavily as in the last few years. I expect that our need for capital from abroad, while fluctuating from year to year, will continue to decline in relation to our economic development and growth.

Admittedly, if a situation were to arise in which the economic environment or the financial climate deteriorated rapidly and radically, there would indeed be problems associated with past capital inflows, but happily that is not the situation in Canada, today.

We have been following constructive and realistic policies in matters of trade and finance, policies appropriate to present and foreseeable circumstances. What are the alternatives to such policies? A program of government controls? The imposition and enforcement of import restrictions and quotas? Individual restraints upon Canadians desiring to travel abroad and on the amount of money they could take with them? The creation of a centralized capital issues committee which would dictate to provinces, municipalities and to private business as to where, when, on what terms and how much they could borrow? I have only to list a few of these questions to indicate the obvious reply. They may be justifiable in the midst of a national crisis. In peace and prosperity, in a free society, they are not warranted. Indeed, some of them would be unconstitutional. Moreover, I believe that some of these so-called remedies would actually cause the disease that they are supposed to prevent or cure. Government controls, by interfering with freedom, cause confidence to falter, initiative to freeze, and capital to take flight.

Canadians can increase their own domestic capital and make this country financially more self-reliant if they are prepared to practise increased efficiency, productivity and thrift. This responsibility falls on all levels of government, private business and individuals.

We must place emphasis on greater productivity and efficiency rather than on sheer size, on cost control rather than on price increases, on greater saving rather than on excessive consumption. I have every hope that in the mood of renewed confidence in the soundness of our currency, and in the absence of shortages of goods, both business and the public at large will be disposed to review more carefully their spending programs.

In saying this I am fully aware of the role of leadership that falls to the federal government. It is the responsibility of the government to try to establish the conditions of financial balance within which the endeavours of others can be carried out successfully. Let me assure hon. members that the government is discharging this responsibility.

In the post-war years, in this country as in others, there has been a serious threat of inflation. Some people were actually led to suppose that chronic price increases were inevitable; others even suggested that they were desirable, or at least less undesirable than some imaginary alternatives. Let us give no quarter to such defeatist doctrines. Inflation acts like a drug on the economic system. Even small doses breed a craving for more.

One of the most serious effects of inflation is that, like other drugs, it erodes stamina and will power. The will to save, to build carefully and prudently for the future, lies at the heart of sound financial policy, whether it be the financial policy of the individual, the corporation or the government. Saving —voluntary, purposeful, constructive saving —is essential in an economic system dedicated to freedom and progress. Yet it is this sort of saving that inflation most insidiously undermines. As prices rise and stability disappears, the prizes of inflation go not to the worker but to the speculator, not to the saver but to the spendthrift.

To contain inflationary pressures the government has reduced its borrowing and has held a firm check on the expansion of government expenditure. The treasury board has painstakingly reviewed and revised spending programs. As a result of careful scrutiny we are reducing substantially the demands of the federal government on the financial markets and, through them, on the savings of the Canadian public.

If all of us, working and saving together, will increase the total amount of capital available for sound investment in Canada, we can reduce our reliance on foreign resources. In short, we have at our disposal the means to achieve in a positive way, the objectives which negative courses of action cannot hope to accomplish.

There is a related question upon which I should like to dwell for a moment. This is the question of our exchange rate. The external price of our Canadian dollar has been high for eight years now and is currently running about five per cent above the United States dollar. This situation has been brought about mainly as a result of an inflow of foreign capital and reflects the confidence of outsiders in the soundness of the management of our financial affairs. Admittedly it lowers the prices received in Canadian dollars by those exporters who have to sell in world markets at world prices. It also means a lower price in Canadian dollars for many classes of Canadian imports. On the other hand, it lowers the cost of imported raw materials and semi-finished goods used by our manufacturers, and it has helped to keep down our cost of living and cost of producing.

I have said on many occasions and I repeat now that I would welcome the development of circumstances that would reduce the external price of our dollar provided this was brought about by means other than an arbitrary and artificial attempt by the government to work against basic economic forces.

I have seen some references to a demand that the government should deliberately "devalue the dollar". This kind of talk might have been appropriate when Canada was on the gold standard, or even when it maintained a fixed exchange rate. We have not been on the gold standard for half a century and we have not had a fixed exchange rate for a decade.

An attempt by the government artificially to lower the external price of the Canadian dollar would involve borrowing or raising by taxes very large sums of money with which to buy up foreign exchange. It might well be that the government could not reduce the inflow of funds sufficiently without imposing direct controls on capital movements and then on the movement of goods. Apart from the economic objections to such policies it would be a very difficult matter to work out effective technical means of control. Even then the controls would not be effective unless the objective were one which commanded the broad public support which is necessary for general compliance. In other words we would be embarking upon a gigantic financial speculation with no assurance of success.

The exchange value of the Canadian dollar is determined by the free play of the forces of supply and demand. These forces have pushed the rate up, and at some time in the future market forces could drive the rate down. Many people would be happy about such a development, at least if it came about in an orderly manner. However, those who undertake commitments in terms of United States dollars or other external currencies expose themselves to the risk of having to repay at a time when the exchange rate for the Canadian dollar may be quite different from what it is today. This is a risk which the borrower, whether personal, corporate, provincial or municipal must bear himself and is a danger which I clearly wish to stress.

I have referred to the improvement in our exports; we must look further ahead, however, and make every effort to preserve and improve our access to world markets so that Canada's exports, which will remain one of the foundations of our prosperity, can continue to expand.

In recent years the western European economy has been enjoying particularly rapid and substantial growth. More than one quarter of our exports go to western Europe including the United Kingdom. A prosperous, politically stable and expanding European economy will provide increasing opportunities for profitable Canadian trade. We have been concerned, however, with the possible political implications of economic disagreements within western Europe. We need also to take all practicable steps to ensure that our trading position is not adversely affected.

We have therefore been giving very close attention to the problems that are arising from the emergence of the two regional trading groups in Europe: the European economic community of six countries and the European free trade association of seven countries. We have been anxious that these arrangements should not lead to inward looking and discriminatory practices and should not weaken the world wide trading system which has been built up so patiently and so successfully in recent years. We are therefore seizing every opportunity to put forward the Canadian point of view at meetings with representatives of these groups and with our other trading partners. Moreover, we are participants with the European countries and the United States in discussions relating to, and have declared ourselves ready to become members of, a reconstituted organization for economic co-operation and consultation, O.E.C.C.; and further we will press that such organization shall subscribe not only to the principles of the international institutions governing trade and payments but also that members shall honour their obligations in these institutions. In particular, we are continuing to urge European countries to resist the growth of European tariff discrimination by extending their tariff reductions to other countries on a most favoured nation basis. We have found that our views are shared by many countries in other parts of the world, and particularly by those in the commonwealth. The general tariff conference of the contracting parties to the GATT which is to be convened next September will provide an opportunity for a further reduction in world trade barriers and new opportunities for Canadian exporters.

I have dealt at some length on our external position because of the bearing which it has on our domestic situation. So long as our access to foreign markets is unimpaired and we are able to keep the costs and the quality of our products and services thoroughly competitive, we need have no fears for the future. The economic expansion which Canada is now experiencing is soundly based; incomes are rising and we have demonstrated a willingness to save; relative price stability seems reasonably assured; business confidence is high, and capital investment is expanding; our export prospects are bright. I expect that the forces of expansion will continue during 1960, and that the rates of increase we have experienced in 1959 should be maintained throughout the year. Within this framework I am basing my forecast of 1960-61 revenues on an increase in the gross national product in 1960 of about 6 per cent, or to a record level between $36½ and $37 billion dollars.

GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS 1959-60

The government's accounts for the fiscal year that ends today are set out in detail in the white paper tabled yesterday afternoon and I propose to refer to them only very briefly now. I should, however, remind hon. members that the figures I use tonight as well as those in the white paper are preliminary and subject to change. The final figures will not be available until next July or August after the accounts for the year have been closed and audited.

The house will recall that in my budget speech last April I budgeted for revenues of $5,267 million, expenditures of $5,660 million and a deficit of $393 million. On the basis of figures in the white paper it is now estimated that our revenues for the fiscal year were $5,301 million, our expenditures $5,707 million and the deficit was $406 million.

Revenues, expenditures and the total deficit all were very close to forecast. Revenues were $34 million or two thirds of one per cent higher than last April's budget estimate; expenditures were up $47 million or three fourths of one per cent more than forecast; and the deficit which was forecast at 7.5 per cent of revenues has turned out to be 7.7 per cent of revenues. Defence expenditures were $175 million less than forecast but this was more than offset by increases of $87 million for higher charges for interest on the public debt, $50 million for larger subsidy and tax-sharing payments to provinces, and approximately $55 million for various payments in connection with our agricultural and farm assistance program.

Over and above these expenditures that are charged to the budgetary accounts we have under authority of parliament disbursed considerable sums for loans, advances and a number of other essential purposes. These included loans of $325 million to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, $233 million to the C.N.R.—which, however, repaid $489 million on account of these and earlier loans from the proceeds of public issues of government guaranteed C.N.R. bonds—$30 million to the farm credit corporation, $23 million to the St. Lawrence seaway authority and $21 million to the Northern Canada power commission. During the fiscal year these disbursements amounted in all to $945 million. To meet these outlays $942 million was available from the repayment of loans, net annuity insurance and pension receipts and other sources. Thus a net amount of $3 million was required for all these non-budgetary transactions. This compares with a net cash requirement of $664 million to finance our non-budgetary transactions in the previous fiscal year.

The budgetary deficit of $406 million and the net amount of $3 million required for non-budgetary transactions have been financed by an increase of $333 million in the government's outstanding unmatured debt and by a decrease of $76 million in our cash balances. Combining the net new issues of C.N.R. guaranteed bonds, the net new issues of direct government of Canada bonds and the reduction in our year-end cash balances, our total net cash requirements for the year have turned out to be $900 million.

OLD AGE SECURITY

At this point I should like to report briefly on the old age security fund. As hon. members know, the Old Age Security Act provides a pension of $55 a month to every eligible person 70 years of age or over. Prior to last year these payments were financed by contributions of 2 per cent on corporate and personal incomes, with a maximum contribution of $60 on personal incomes, and a 2 per cent sales tax. Under last year's budget, these contributions were raised from 2 to 3 per cent to take effect January 1, 1959, for corporate incomes; July 1, 1959, for personal incomes, with a maximum contribution of $90, and April 10, 1959, for the tax on sales.

During 1959-60, pension payments from the fund totalled $574 million and revenues credited to the fund amounted to $550 million. The deficit of $24 million for the fiscal year was covered by a temporary loan.

May I insert in Hansard at this point, Mr. Speaker, table 1—showing the contributions and pension payments under the Old Age Security Act for the last four years.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to have this table inserted at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DOMINION—PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

(Translation):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): During the past year there have been important developments in our financial relations with the provinces. On July 6 and 7, 1959, the newly created dominion-provincial committee of ministers of finance and provincial treasurers met in Ottawa to discuss a wide range of subjects connected with these financial arrangements and to make provision for their systematic study. This committee met again in Ottawa on October 15 and 16 for further discussions. At the October meeting I informed the provincial treasurers and ministers of finance that it was the intention of the government to ask parliament at this session to approve legislation continuing for a further two years the increase from 10 per cent to 13 per cent in the provincial share of the yield from the personal income tax.

As hon. members are aware, this legislation is at present before the house. This measure also contains important provisions relating to university education and federal-provincial co-operation. A solution has been offered which takes into account the long-standing objection of the province of Quebec to payment of federal grants to the universities of that province. The alternative provided in the measure will enable any province to replace the present federal grants to universities by additional provincial grants without placing greater burdens on its taxpayers and without increasing the cost to the federal treasury.

At the October meeting of the committee of ministers of finance and provincial treasurers, I also stated that it would be the intention of this government to arrange for a dominion-provincial conference of prime ministers and premiers in mid-1960 to discuss federal-provincial financial relations for the period after the expiry of the present agreements March 31, 1962. As hon. members are aware, the Prime Minister on March 24, wrote to all the provincial premiers inviting them to a plenary conference in Ottawa, July 25-27 of this year. We hope that this meeting will make a further major contribution to the achievement of harmonious fiscal relations between the dominion and the provinces.

(Text):

From a budgetary standpoint our fiscal relations with the provinces are extremely important since the amounts paid to or for the provinces absorb nearly one quarter of our total federal revenues. I should like to place on record table 2 showing the cost to the federal treasury in recent years of our fiscal arrangements with the provinces. This table includes unconditional payments and tax abatements as well as conditional grants and certain closely related payments, the grants to universities and the grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes. It will be seen that the total amounts paid or abated to the provinces have approximately doubled over the past four years.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to have this table inserted in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The preliminary figure for the cost to the federal treasury of unconditional payments and tax abatements to the provinces in 1959-60 is $822 million, an increase of $80 million over the previous year and $163 million higher than in 1957-58. It is estimated that there will be a further increase in cost for 1960-61 of $48 million. Of the estimated increase of over $200 million in unconditional payments and abatements between 1957-58 and the fiscal year 1960-61, more than one half is the result of new payments or changes in the basis of payment or abatement. The increase in the provincial share of the yield from the personal income tax from 10 per cent to 13 per cent, which has benefited the provinces by $120 million in the past two years and it is estimated will mean a further $68 million to them in 1960-61, by itself accounts for approximately one third of the total increase.

Conditional payments to the provinces were also substantially higher in 1959-60, increasing by $135 million to a total of $383 million. Seventy per cent of this large increase was the result of increased contributions under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act as more provinces participated in the scheme. There were, however, also large increases in grants for welfare and resource development. It is estimated that there will be a further increase of $6 million in conditional payments in 1960-61.

DEBT MANAGEMENT

In reporting to the house a year ago on the management of our public debt I pointed out that the large conversion operations undertaken during the summer of 1958 had removed a source of heavy pressure on the bond market and that by substantially lengthening out the average term of our debt a sound debt management policy could be developed and carried forward.

Public debt transactions during 1959-60 included the issue, refinancing and redemption of a large volume of government securities. However, as a result of the successful conversion loan operations undertaken during 1958 the volume of debt transactions in 1959-60 was considerably less than in the previous year.

During the year now ending we have sold $1,048 million of new marketable bonds and we increased the outstanding issues of treasury bills by $530 million. In the same period we paid off $1,550 million of market issues so that the total volume of direct government of Canada marketable issues outstanding at the end of the year is only $28 million higher than at the beginning. In addition we sold $1,445 million of new Canada savings bonds and paid off or redeemed $1,170 million of earlier Canada savings bonds.

After taking into account the net decrease of $20 million in bonds held in our securities investment and sinking fund accounts, the unmatured direct debt held outside these government accounts was $333 million higher at the end of the fiscal year than it was at the beginning. This compares with an increase of $1,439 million during the previous year and is an indication of the progress we have made.

With the consent of the house, Mr. Speaker, may I insert here three tables showing the size, distribution, average term and total interest cost of our public debt over the past 10 years?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the house would give consent at this time to the insertion of such tables as the hon. minister proposes to use

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

* Excluding Canada Savings Bonds and Perpetuals.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): These tables show that at the end of the current fiscal year our net debt is $12.1 billion, which is about $400 million higher than it was at the beginning of the year. In per capita terms it was $849 ten years ago, $717 five years ago, and has now dropped to $681. As a percentage of gross national product our net debt at 34.9 per cent now stands at a lower figure than for any previous year except 1958.

Last year I mentioned the decline in the holdings of Canada bonds by the general public that had been going on more or less steadily since the end of the war, but noted that since September 1958 there had been a sharp reversal of this trend. I am very pleased to report tonight that during the past year the general public's holdings of Canada bonds have continued to increase and that they are now $1.5 billion more than at March 31, 1959, and $3 billion more than on September 30, 1958. The latest figures show that the holdings of the general public are now 63.5 per cent of the total outstanding funded debt compared with 62.6 per cent at December 31, 1959, and 57.8 per cent at June 30, 1957.

Net interest payments over the whole year amounted to 4.13 per cent of our net debt at the end of the year, as compared with 3.30 per cent in the preceding year. This rather sharp increase is largely due to the fact that the net debt mounted rapidly during the latter part of 1958-59, and interest on the increased debt was paid for only part of that year. In 1959-60 interest on this increased debt was paid for a full year. The average interest rate on our total unmatured debt stands today at 3.96 per cent compared with 3.54 per cent a year ago.

GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS 1960-61

I turn now to the budget prospects for 1960-61. The main estimates for the fiscal year totalling $5,740 million were tabled early in February. In addition there are bound as usual to be some supplementary estimates. Provision will have to be made for the C.N.R. deficit for 1960, although I expect this will be somewhat less than the 1959 deficit, and I must assume that there will be some payments under the agriculture stabilization act and also some additional statutory expenditures.

Offsetting these there will be some lapsings in appropriations although these are likely to be less than in previous years because of the very careful and exacting scrutiny of departmental estimates made by the treasury board this year. As I said on tabling the main estimates, although we have provided for sustaining and in some cases increasing the expenditures relating directly to national development in such fields as atomic energy, exploration, scientific research, transportation and communication, controllable costs have been carefully scrutinized and sharply restrained.

There is, however, one substantial additional item of expenditure in prospect which I should report to the house and which relates to the review of salaries in the public service.

When I announced on October 13, 1959 that the government was unable to assume, during the 1959-60 fiscal year, the cost of carrying into effect the recommendations of the civil service commission for increases in the salaries of many classes of civil servants, I stated that:

> The decision taken by the government, in the light of its financial position, will not preclude consideration being given to the special position of certain categories of civil servants as the government's financial circumstances permit.

In conformity with this undertaking, revisions of the salaries of the nursing classes where special conditions obtained were approved by the treasury board on October 15, 1959 and January 28, 1960.

It is now nearly three years since there has been a general increase in civil service salaries. The last general increase was authorized by the present government in July, 1957 and made retroactive to May 1, 1957. In July, 1958 the civil service commission reported that a general increase in salaries at that time was not warranted. A year later, in June 1959, the commission made recommendations to the government covering the great majority of classes in the civil service. This report recommended widely varying increases for several hundred classes of employees. For reasons which I made public last October the government decided that it could not implement those recommendations.

Our public service contains the widest range of jobs and positions, from unskilled labourers to research scientists. The relative pattern of wages and salaries for such diversified groups in a dynamic society changes with the passage of time and with shifts in the economic and social structure. It has seemed to me that instead of embarking upon periodic general wage and salary increases across the board, it would be a more sensible approach to develop a continuous cycle of reviews and recommendations. In this way the salaries of different groups or clusters of related classes of employees can be reviewed in successive months or quarters in the light of rates of pay prevailing in private employment and in the light of our demonstrated capacity to recruit and retain the right number and quality of public servants.

I have discussed this approach with the chairman of the civil service commission and I am given to understand that the commission agrees that there is merit in this suggestion.

We have an excellent public service in Canada. In terms of ability and integrity it compares very favourably with those of any other country. Now that up to date information on the current levels of salaries paid by private employers is becoming available in the form of preliminary reports by the pay research bureau, and as the budgetary situation now makes action possible, the government will accelerate its program of implementing recommendations from the civil service commission affecting a number of classes in the public service where the comparison with outside rates and the recruitment situation justify action.

I am happy to report that the treasury board, taking into consideration the degrees of disparity between civil service salary rates and those of private employers and the problems of recruitment and retention of qualified employees, has now approved recommendations from the civil service commission involving some 50,000 employees of the public service, principally in the clerical and stenographic classes, but also including some of the professional classes, such as meteorologists and veterinarians, where recruitment and retention of the essential number of qualified officers have become increasingly difficult. These revisions in salary ranges will be effective from tomorrow, April 1, 1960 and will involve an increase in expenditure during the fiscal year of about $15 million. Details of these revisions will be made public as rapidly as possible over the period of the next ten days or two weeks.

With the same principles as criteria, a review of all other classes in the public service will be carried out by the civil service commission forthwith and is expected to be completed before the end of the summer. As recommendations are received from the civil service commission, they will be promptly cosidered by the treasury board on a class by class basis.

After considering all the available data and taking into account our unremitting efforts to effect further economies and efficiency in all government activities, I have concluded that our budgetary expenditures for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1961 will be approximately $5,880 million.

This is $173 million higher than our budgetary expenditures for the year now ending. Approximately one third of this increase is in defence expenditures. The other two thirds part is in our non-defence expenditures and is due to higher public debt charges, higher civil service salaries, higher social security and welfare payments reflecting the increase in our population, and increased outlays under the government's programs designed to promote national development.

Revenue forecasting, as I have observed on previous occasions, always presents formidable difficulties. However, on the basis of a projected gross national product of between $36½ and $37 billion for 1960 and in the light of our present information, I have concluded that our present tax structure, with no change in rates will yield $5,892 million in 1960-61. This is $591 million more than our revenues in the past year.

For the convenience of hon. members, may I insert in Hansard at this point a table showing my estimate of the past year's revenues and what we may expect to receive in the ensuing year from the present tax structure.

[Editor's note: The table referred to follows:]

TABLE 6

REVENUE FORECAST BEFORE TAX CHANGES
(In millions of dollars)

—	Preliminary 1959-60	Forecast 1960-61
Personal income tax	1,555	1,750
Corporation income tax	1,140	1,340
Non-resident tax	75	80
Estates tax	88	85
Customs duties	529	580
Sales tax	737	795
Other duties and taxes	626	670
Total taxes	4,750	5,300
Non-tax revenue	551	592
Total revenue	5,301	5,892

With revenues estimated at $5,892 million and expenditures at $5,880 million and assuming no change in our existing tax laws, I should expect a surplus of $12 million for the coming year.

During the coming year I expect the old age security fund to show a small surplus of revenue over expenditure for the first time since the fund was inaugurated on January 1, 1951. Between January 1, 1951 and March 31, 1960, the old age security fund has experienced deficits totalling $630 million. Of this amount over $500 million has been paid off out of general tax revenues and about $100 million was charged in 1954 to our balance sheet reserve against active assets. There remains outstanding now a deficit incurred during the past 12 months of $24 million. Revenues to the fund from the current 3-3-3 formula in 1960-61 will be about $630 million; pension payments after making provision for certain amendments forecast in the speech from the throne will exceed $590 million. If these expectations are realized the prospective surplus will be sufficient to extinguish the presently remaining deficit in the fund.

Before proceeding to discuss the tax policy appropriate to our present and prospective circumstances, I should like to refer briefly to our non-budgetary transactions and our cash requirements for 1960-61. In addition to the expenditures for administrative and other governmental services that are included in our budgetary accounts, we pay out each year substantial amounts of cash as loans to or investments in a wide variety of essential public undertakings. These outlays are not considered as budgetary expenditures as the principal is usually repaid, and, in almost every case, they earn interest or produce revenue for the government.

Against this, we receive each year large amounts of cash that are not recorded as budgetary revenue. For the most part, these consist of repayments of loans made in previous years and moneys received by the government as net premiums, contributions and earnings in connection with annuities, insurance or pension funds.

During 1960-61 we shall probably require about $290 million for housing loans, including new and existing commitments, about $150 million for C.N.R. and T.C.A. capital investment and refunding, and perhaps as much as $100 million for other non-budgetary purposes such as the St. Lawrence seaway authority, the national harbours board, the farm credit corporation and other crown companies. Against this we shall probably have somewhat more than $300 million available from the repayment of loans and from the transactions in our various annuity, insurance and superannuation accounts. Thus the net cash required for all these non-budgetary transactions, excluding the exchange fund requirements, which cannot be forecast, will be of the order of $225 million. With a prospective budget surplus of $12 million, our net cash requirements, including those of the C.N.R. will be about $210 million as compared with $900 million during the year just ended and $1,273 million in 1958-59.

TAX POLICY

As I said a year ago, and as I have repeated in this house and elsewhere on a number of subsequent occasions, sound budget policies must be flexible and adapted to changing economic conditions. The onset of the 1957 recession called for lower taxes, higher expenditures and heavier capital commitments in order to offset the downward trends in the private sector of the economy and the decline in the external demand for some of our basic products; and I put such proposals before the house in December, 1957 and again in June, 1958.

The fiscal policies we followed during our first year in office had a major influence in reducing both the depth and the duration of the recession, and by the third quarter of 1958 the low point of the recession had been passed and the forces of expansion began to gather momentum. By the spring of 1959 recovery was well on the way, and in my budget speech a year ago I recommended to this house policies which were designed to bring us back to a position of budgetary balance as soon as the economy had recovered the losses of the recession and was moving firmly forward and upward to new record achievements in production, employment and investment.

The position we have now reached, with its sound prospect of a fully balanced budget, represents the fruits of carefully designed policies carried forward over the past 18 months. This is not something that has just happened. It is the result of considered aims and efforts. It began with the great conversion loan of the summer of 1958 which made possible a policy of sound debt management which in turn restored public confidence in government credit and in our determination to control the powerful forces of inflation. It was continued in the expenditure controls and the tax changes of 1959, and is reinforced in this year's program of reduced controllable expenditures balanced by the continued promotion of constructive national development.

I am happy to say that we have reached this goal of a balanced budget without the necessity of recommending any further increases in taxation, indeed at a level of taxation which in relation to gross national product will be lower than in any year between 1950 and 1958.

Another fruit of our policies over the past year and a half is that during the coming year we shall be making very modest claims upon the capital market. Our net new borrowings, as I have already indicated, will be about $210 million. This will greatly ease the problems of provincial and municipal governments and also of private industry in meeting their essential financial requirements in the domestic market. If other levels of government follow similar policies of prudent financial management they too should experience less difficulty than in any recent years in meeting their basic financial needs.

As I said in my opening review of economic conditions, we are anticipating a year of solid expansion and balanced growth. The main forces of inflation are quiescent. We still have, however, some slack in certain sectors of our productive capacity, though I expect to see these diminish as the year progresses. While I look forward to the day when we can undertake a measure of orderly reduction in our public debt, present circumstances do not, in my judgment, warrant an increase in tax rates in order to expedite the retirement of debt.

In the light of all these facts and prospects I am proposing no major tax changes in any fields this year. I shall, however, be recommending to the house a number of technical amendments to our taxing statutes, all of them designed either to remedy certain anomalies that have developed or to close certain loopholes for tax avoidance that have been discovered, or to meet certain other special circumstances.

INCOME TAX

In the income tax field there will be quite a number of technical amendments but I shall refer now only to those of general interest.

I am proposing an increase in the maximum amount of medical expenses that can be deducted in calculating taxable income. The existing limits have remained unchanged for some years, at the levels of $1,500 for a taxpayer of single status, $2,000 for a taxpayer of married status, and $500 for each dependant but not exceeding $2,000 in respect of these dependants. Over a period of years increases have taken place in the costs of medical care and in the accepted standards of medical care. The maximum limits that were once considered appropriate are increasingly found to impose hardships upon people of moderate means. The new limits I am recommending are $2,500 for a taxpayer who is single, $3,000 for a taxpayer of married status, and $750 for each dependant but not exceeding $3,000 in respect of dependants.

I shall also bring forward an amendment to provide a deduction from certain items of income, such as superannuation, pension or death benefits, on account of the estate tax that has been paid on the asset corresponding to that income. This measure is being introduced to alleviate a problem that sometimes affects the financial resources of the widow and the children of a deceased taxpayer. The purpose is to provide relief in certain cases from the so-called double impact of estate tax and income tax, which may deplete unduly the resources of the surviving family.

I am proposing to provide for the appointment of an additional member of the tax appeal board. Concern exists about delays encountered in connection with appeals. The enlargement of the board will implement a proposal set forth in the report of May 8, 1959 by the standing committee on estimates.

I am also bringing forward an amendment to deal with the problems of associated corporations to which I drew attention last year. At that time I said that perhaps it was becoming too easy to divide a corporation into a number of smaller components, each of which may qualify for the low rate of tax on its first $25,000 of income. I indicated that consideration was being given to the possible necessity of introducing some appropriate measure to deal with this method of tax avoidance. In the meantime further study has indicated an amendment of this kind to be necessary.

There are two other highly complex issues relating to the income tax law to which much study has been devoted but in respect of which I am not yet ready to make specific recommendations. I am, however, proposing two separate courses of action.

The first is the question of the application of the income tax law to employees' profit sharing plans. In various parts of the country increasing use is being made of plans by which employers share a portion of the annual profits with employees, thus providing a source of funds to assist the individual to plan for his eventual retirement. Special tax rules for profit sharing plans have been in existence for some time. These rules, however, do not permit employees to defer taxes on amounts contributed to these plans on their behalf. Largely for this reason they have been criticized as being insufficient to allow the fulfilment of the potential social usefulness of profit sharing plans.

My intention in this matter is to follow the precedent established some years ago in connection with the Income Tax Act and more recently with the Estate Tax Act. I propose to introduce toward the end of this session a separate bill which will incorporate a new approach to the taxation of the several components of employees' profit sharing plans. I shall invite the house to give this bill first reading but to proceed no further at this session. This will provide full opportunity for all interested citizens and organizations to study the bill and make their views known to the government. Consideration will then be given to the incorporation of this new approach into the Income Tax Act next year.

The improved facilities to be made available for employees' profit sharing plans will constitute an important piece of social legislation within the framework of the Income Tax Act. In its distinctive way, this will supplement the growing body of social security measures that have been sponsored by the government. It may be that the medium of profit sharing will provide fresh opportunities for capital, labour and management to work out new forms of co-operation amongst themselves in various instances. Neither expense nor obligation will be imposed, however, upon groups and organizations that do not choose to assume them.

The second complex question that requires fresh study and consideration pertains to the designation of surplus under section 28(2) of the act. The central issue is the taxation, as personal income or otherwise, of earnings that are distributed or are available for distribution in various forms by corporations. We shall be undertaking a comprehensive study of these matters during the coming year. I shall welcome considered expressions of view from all interested persons and organizations.

ESTATE TAX

The new Estate Tax Act has been in force since January 1, 1959. It has received general public approval. At the same time experience has indicated a number of points at which it can be improved, and I shall place before the house a number of amendments for this purpose. Most of these will be of a technical nature and on balance they will benefit the taxpayer.

An amendment of general interest will provide for the reopening of the assessment of an estate within a fixed period of years and the refunding of estate tax when, for example, a life annuity is terminated prematurely. It sometimes happens that an important asset in an estate is an annuity to the surviving widow. This annuity may come to an end if she dies or if she marries again. It is nevertheless valued for purposes of estate tax on the basis of the prescribed mortality tables. The proposed amendment will provide that where certain classes of income rights are terminated or altered within four years of the death of the testator, the assessment may be reopened on request and appropriate adjustment made.

SALES AND EXCISE TAXES

I am placing before the house a small number of amendments which will affect the application of the Excise Tax Act.

I am proposing that electric heating equipment designed to be permanently installed as part of a building heating system should be exempt from sales tax. The effect will be to permit this method of household heating to compete for the market on the same terms as other methods of heating.

I am proposing that manufacturers of doors, windows and window frames should be required to pay sales tax on the hardware attached to or sold with doors, windows and window frames unless such hardware is specifically exempt under schedule III of the act. The standard items of hardware that are used with doors and windows are, in fact, listed in schedule III. The purpose of the amendment is to remove some uncertainty that has existed with respect to some special items of hardware. The result will be that the whole group of manufacturers concerned will be more fairly and equitably treated as amongst themselves.

In order to avoid the possibility of misunderstanding I shall mention a comparatively minor amendment intended to prevent private individuals who purchase yachts from avoiding the imposition of sales tax in respect of the materials that are included. This will not affect the commercial shipyards, which will continue as before to purchase materials for the construction of ships free of sales tax under licence.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

I turn now to matters relating to our Customs Tariff. I have six resolutions to place before the house and I shall also be mentioning some new references to the tariff board.

Four resolutions relate to textiles and contain the results of tariff negotiations with other countries designed to give effect to reports received from the tariff board. The reports in question are those relating specifically to cotton and cotton products, to silk, man-made fibres and their products, to textile wastes, slivers, rovings and yarns, and also to wool fabrics other than those covered by tariff items 554b on which action has already been taken.

I should perhaps add that, as the house knows, I received from the tariff board a few weeks ago one further report on textiles relating to hosiery and knitted goods, and within the textile field the tariff board has still to report on a miscellaneous group of products including woollen clothing, hats and caps, coated fabrics, laces and embroideries. Negotiations on these products will be undertaken in due course. Negotiations will also be undertaken in relation to the tariff on record changers on which I have also received a report from the board recently.

The negotiations related to the textile tariff changes proposed tonight were undertaken with seven of the other contracting parties to the general agreement on tariffs and trade, specifically the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Italy, Benelux, Japan and Peru. In addition, consultations with other countries were required under GATT procedures. I am happy to be able to announce that all the necessary negotiations and consultations with all of these countries have been successfully completed.

As the house is already aware, tariff board recommendations often, perhaps usually, include proposals for both increases and decreases in rates of duty. Sometimes it is found in the subsequent negotiations that the other countries concerned are ready to accept the proposed decreases as full compensation for the proposed increases in our tariffs against them. However, in the case of the particular group of textile tariff items negotiated on this occasion, it was found that the increases, of which the most important relates to coloured cotton fabrics, somewhat overbalanced the decreases. Hence, in order to conclude negotiations, we found it necessary to reduce about a score of Canadian tariff rates on items outside the textile field. The implication of this is that the Canadian textile industry is receiving some additional protection, as proposed by the tariff board, but that this is being matched by some reductions of tariffs in other fields. Some of these reductions were requested by Canadian industry while others involve quite small reductions from relatively high rates of duty which should not damage the industries affected.

I mentioned earlier that there were four resolutions relating to textiles and textile negotiations. Much the most important of these covers the substance of our textile negotiations including the additional items outside the textile field to which I have just referred. A second contains changes that are merely matters of form. A third provides for a much-needed definition of "man-made fibres"; this is a technical proposal put forward by the tariff board. A fourth resolution amends an existing drawback item relating to textiles. I should also add that, again in conformity with the board's recommendations, some temporary items established in past years by order in council are being revoked forthwith, while others will be permitted to expire on June 30 of this year.

Two further resolutions cover miscellaneous tariff changes, of which there are 15. This is an unusually small number and I should explain that this year, in considering requests for tariff alterations, we had very much in mind the fact that in the autumn an important round of tariff negotiations under GATT will be initiated. In a good many cases we decided that it would be imprudent to take action on the Canadian tariff in advance of these negotiations. Many of the proposals that have been put to us during the past year for changes in tariff rates may find some place in the forthcoming negotiations.

In these two resolutions covering miscellaneous changes, the only alterations to which I might call attention are those relating to instant potatoes and seismograph bits. Production in Canada of both these items has only recently commenced, and it is proposed to provide for modest rates of duty.

The six resolutions together propose changes in 123 tariff items. Of these changes 20 are purely formal; they simply involve the renumbering of existing items as a matter of convenience. A further 49 involve changes in nomenclature without alteration in the rates of duty. Sixteen involve increases in the rates of duty that will be payable, while 38 involve decreases. As on earlier occasions, I should warn that these bare statistics are not very revealing or conclusive, but they do serve to indicate the general balance and moderation with which this government is approaching tariff matters.

As I said earlier, I am planning some new references to the tariff board. In doing so it is of course necessary to take into account the work which is already before the board. This includes, in addition to a substantial number of appeals, the remaining parts of the textile reference, a reference respecting electronic items and, most important, the very substantial reference embracing virtually the whole field of chemicals. Obviously, with such an agenda already before it, we cannot ask the board to take on much more. However, there is one section of the tariff which, on the basis of representations that have been made to me, I am convinced requires the attention of the board at a fairly early date. This is a series made up of so-called end use items which provide special rates of duty for machinery and equipment in certain specified uses such as the mining industry and the oil and gas industries. We have here, mainly in items numbered from 410a to 410z, a mixed bag of rates which were intended, when they were introduced, to give concessions to the industries named but some of which, due to the change of other tariff rates, now act in fact as obstacles. Accordingly I shall be asking the tariff board to review this particular group of tariff items.

In addition I shall also be assigning three tasks of much smaller dimensions, but of some urgency and difficulty, to the board. One relates to a small group of rates of special concern to the few firms in Canada which undertake the decoration of chinaware and glassware. The Department of Finance has had substantial correspondence on this subject over several years and, since we have not been able to work out a solution that is acceptable to all parties, a reference will be directed to the board.

Second, I am asking the board to review the tariff items under which plans, drawings and blueprints come into this country, some duty-free and others dutiable. The standing committee on estimates last year drew attention to the problems involved and I now propose to refer the matter to the tariff board.

Finally, certain producers have drawn attention to the substantial and rapidly rising imports of nails and to certain anomalies in the duties applicable to these imports. Accordingly, I shall be asking the board to review and report on the tariff items relating to this product.

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSION

The net effect of all the amendments I am proposing to our taxing statutes will be to make no measurable change in the estimate of total revenues for 1960-61, which I presented to the house earlier this evening. The amount of tax relief accorded by some amendments will be approximately balanced by the increased revenues from others. The total loss of revenue from the relieving amendments could add up to as much as $2 million, and the increased revenues from blocked loopholes and clarified definitions are likely to be of about the same amount. While these changes on balance do not affect total revenues they nevertheless represent significant improvements in the fairness of our tax structure.

The past year has witnessed an extraordinary resurgence in the economic strength of the western world. Canada has shared generously in this remarkable progress. Today she is stronger, more developed and more united than ever before.

The abiding goal of our fiscal policy is the maintenance of a sustainable rate growth in terms of employment, development of resources, and a sound dollar. This year's budget, devised to meet the conditions and needs of 1960, will I believe, effectively serve this goal. It is my hope that this balanced budget will strengthen the economic and financial structure of Canada, impart renewed confidence to Canadians in their future, and give fresh impetus to the enterprise and initiative of our people. With courage, self-discipline and self-reliance Canadians will meet the challenges of the new decade.

RESOLUTIONS

INCOME TAX ACT

Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act to make provision in respect of a new class of profit sharing plans under which

(a) amounts allocated by the trustee shall not be included in the income of an individual who is a beneficiary under the plan until the year in which they are received,

(b) no tax shall be payable by the trustee under the plan on the taxable income of the trust,

(c) an employer may deduct in computing income for the year an amount which when added to his contribution, if any, under a registered pension fund or plan does not exceed $1,500 per employee.

INCOME TAX ACT

Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide among other things:

(1) That the increase from 10 per cent to 13 per cent in the deduction from tax granted to taxpayers in a province which imposes an income tax on individuals be continued for the 1960 and 1961 taxation years.

(2) That for the 1960 and 1961 taxation years the deduction from tax allowed to corporations in respect of income earned in a province which imposes an income tax on corporations and in which arrangements exist for the replacement of federal grants to universities by additional provincial grants in accordance with the proposed amendments to the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act be increased from 9 per cent to 10 per cent in respect of income earned after December 31, 1959.

(3) That for the 1960 and subsequent taxation years the maximum amount deductible from income on account of medical expenses be increased to $3,000 for taxpayers who are entitled to claim the deduction for married status and $2,500 for other taxpayers (not exceeding $3,000 for husband and wife together) plus $750 in respect of each dependant of the taxpayer up to a maximum of $3,000 in respect of dependants.

(4) That for the 1960 and subsequent taxation years, where a person who formerly carried on a business in Canada the income from which was computed by the cash method has ceased to be a resident of Canada, there shall be included in computing his income from the business for the last year in which he resided in Canada the value of the accounts receivable and inventory at the time he ceased to reside in Canada.

(5) That with respect to any amalgamation after March 31, 1960 any share other than a common share of a new corporation resulting from an amalgamation shall be deemed to be a liability of the new corporation for purposes of section 105C of the act.

(6) That for the 1960 and subsequent taxation years no deduction shall be made as an allowance in respect of an oil or gas well or a mine in computing the income of a non-resident-owned investment corporation.

(7) That for the 1960 and subsequent taxation years, for purposes of calculating the amount of the credit a taxpayer may claim in respect of taxes paid to a foreign country, the limitation at present computed by reference to the tax paid to the foreign country on that part of his income from sources in the foreign country that is also subject to tax in Canada be amended so as to be computed by reference to the income tax (other than income tax on dividends which are deductible by the taxpayer) paid to the foreign country.

(8) That for the 1960 and subsequent taxation years the rules for determining income from a source be amended to specify the deductions that shall be made in computing the income of a non-resident person from a business or employment in Canada and in computing income from sources outside Canada for the purpose of calculating the foreign tax credit allowed to a person resident in Canada.

(9) That for the 1961 and subsequent taxation years for purposes of the provision that only one of a group of associated corporations shall receive the benefit of the lower rate of tax on the first $25,000 of taxable income the present rule for determining whether one corporation is associated with another, which is based on ownership of shares, be replaced by a rule related to control of the corporations.

(10) That the four-year period, after which the minister may not make a re-assessment of the tax payable for a taxation year unless there has been fraud or misrepresentation by the taxpayer or the person filing the return, shall commence with the date of mailing by the minister to the taxpayer of the original assessment or of a notification that no tax was payable for the year.

(11) That the four year time limit, after which the minister may not make a re-assessment unless there has been fraud or misrepresentation by the taxpayer or person filing the return, may be waived by the taxpayer by notice to the minister.

(12) That for the 1960 and subsequent taxation years the present rule in section 36 of the act for determining the tax on certain lump sum payments which the taxpayer may elect not to include with other income be changed to provide that in determining the tax the following rates shall apply:

(a) 10 per cent of the amount taxable if the amount taxable does not exceed $1,000,

(b) $100 plus 20 per cent of the amount by which the amount taxable exceeds $1,000 if the amount taxable exceeds $1,000 and does not exceed $5,000.

(c) $900 plus 30 per cent of the amount by which the amount taxable exceeds $5,000 if the amount taxable exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $10,000.

(d) $2,400 plus 40 per cent of the amount by which the amount taxable exceeds $10,000.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

(13) That for the 1960 and subsequent taxation years a corporation whose principal business is production or marketing of sodium chloride or whose business includes extraction of sodium chloride from halite deposits may deduct in computing its income drilling and exploration expenses incurred by it in the year in exploring or drilling for halite.

(14) That for the 1960 and subsequent taxation years an individual who receives a superannuation, pension or death benefit or a benefit under a registered retirement savings plan in respect of which any tax under the Estate Tax Act or succession duty imposed by a province was payable in respect of a death occurring after December 31, 1958 may deduct in computing his income for the year a portion of the benefit received by him determined by reference to the tax or duty applicable to the benefit.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act to provide:

1. That the sales tax on electric heating equipment, designed for use on a system using 230 volts or greater, for permanent installation as part of an electric heating system for buildings, be repealed, but not including electric wiring or other materials leading to or connecting such equipment to the electric power supply.

2. That ducts for warm air systems for heating buildings, but not including materials used in their manufacture, be exempt from sales tax.

3. That the sales tax on laryngeal speaking aids and parts therefor, including batteries specifically designed for use therewith, be repealed.

4. That the sales tax on prepared surgical sutures be repealed.

5. That the sales tax on goods enumerated in Customs Tariff Item 692a, that is, "articles presented from abroad in recognition of the saving of human life", be repealed.

6. That the sales tax on perlite be repealed.

7. That portrait photographs of individuals be exempt from sales tax.

8. That the exemption from sales tax for, "perforated bituminized fibre pipe for drainage purposes not exceeding four inches in inside diameter" be changed to read "perforated pipe for drainage purposes not exceeding four inches in inside diameter".

9. That the exemption from sales tax for feeds and feed supplements be extended to include feed supplements for addition to feeds for fur-bearing animals, and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture thereof.

10. That hardware for doors and sash not specifically mentioned in schedule III be excluded from the sales tax exemption for articles and materials to be used in the manufacture of building materials.

11. That the exemption from sales tax for "septic tanks" be changed to read, "septic tanks and grease traps therefor".

12. That the exemption from sales tax for, "Usual coverings to be used exclusively for covering goods not subject to the consumption or sales tax and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture of such coverings" be changed to read, "Usual coverings or containers to be used exclusively for covering or containing goods not subject to the consumption or sales tax and to be delivered and sold with the goods, and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture of such coverings or containers".

13. That the exemption from sales tax for, "Materials for use only in the construction, equipment and repair of ships over ten tons net registered tonnage" be changed to read, "Materials for use only in the equipment and repair of ships over ten tons net register tonnage".

14. That the security required under the Excise Tax Act include bonds or other securities of or guaranteed by the government of Canada.

15. That any enactment founded upon this resolution be deemed to have come into force on the 1st day of April 1960.

ESTATE TAX ACT

Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Estate Tax Act and to provide among other things:

(1) That the deduction from aggregate net value allowed for the value of any gift made to a charitable organization in Canada be extended to the value of a gift made to a charitable foundation in Canada.

(2) That the Canada Council be deemed to be a charitable organization for purposes of the act.

(3) That there be included in computing the aggregate net value of the property passing on death any amount payable under a policy of insurance effected on the life of the deceased for the benefit of the family of the deceased, where such policy, immediately prior to the death, was owned by the employer of the deceased.

(4) That where the property passing on the death of a person includes property the value of which was determined as of the date of death of that person according to prescribed tables of present values of annuities, and within four years of the date of death there occurs an event, such as a death or change in marital status of a beneficiary, that allows the value of the property to be determined having regard to the occurrence of that event, the property shall, on application made in accordance with prescribed conditions, be revalued and the difference in tax refunded.

(5) That the four-year limit, after which the minister may not make a re-assessment unless there has been fraud, misrepresentation or failure to disclose by the person filing the return, may be waived by the executor by notice to the minister.

(6) That any enactment founded on paragraphs (1) (2) and (4) shall apply in respect of deaths occurring after December 31, 1958, and any enactment founded on paragraph (3) shall apply in respect of deaths occurring after March 31, 1960.

THE CUSTOMS TARIFF

1. Resolved, that subsection (1) of section 2 of the Customs Tariff be amended by adding thereto the following definitions:

"man-made fibre" means a staple fibre or filament produced by manufacturing processes, wholly or in part of organic polymers, but does not include rubber; and

"sliver" means fibres in a continuous strand, combed or not, not twisted and not exceeding twelve inches in length, and includes tops.

2. Resolved, that Schedule A to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking out tariff items 160(a), 236, 343, 414*a*, 414*e*, 463*a*, 520(1), 520(2), 520*a*, 520*b*, 520*c*, 521, 522, 522*a*, 522*b*, 522*c*(1), 522*c*(3), 522*d*, 522*e*, 522*f*, 522*g*(1), 522*g*(2), 523, 523*a*, 523*b*(1), 523*b*(2), 523*b*(3), 523*b*(4), 523*c*, 523*d*, 523*e*, 523*f*, 523*g*, 523*h*, 523*i*, 523*j*, 523*k*, 523*l*, 523*n*(1), 523*n*(2), 524, 524*a*, 532, 532*a*, 532*b*, 532*c*, 532*e*, 535*b*, 535*c*, 535*d*, 535*f*, 549, 549*a*, 549*b*(1), 549*b*(2), 549*b*(3), 550, 550*a*, 550*b*, 550*c*, 550*d*, 551, 551*a*, 551*b*, 551*c*, 551*d*, 551*f*, 553(1), 554, 554*a*, 554*c*, 554*g*, 557, 557*a*, 557*b*, 557*c*, 558, 558*a*, 558*b*(a), 558*b*(b), 558*c*(i), 558*c*(ii), 558*d*(a), 558*d*(b), 558*e*, 558*f*, 559, 560, 560*a*, 560*b*, 560*c*, 561, 561*d*, 563, 564, 564*a*, 567, 567*a*, 567*b*(1), 567*b*(2), 573, 586, 663*f*, 802(b) and 818; and the enumerations of goods and the rates of duty set opposite each of these items, and by inserting therein the following items, enumerations of goods and rates of duty:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, it is something of a novelty to find the Conservatives applauding a surplus, even a small surplus. First of all, I think they have only had this opportunity four times since confederation to applaud a surplus from a Conservative government and, in my time, I do not recall that they were very enthusiastic applauders of the many surpluses of the previous administration.

I was thinking particularly on this particular anniversary that swift indeed has been the descent from Olympus when we think of an event two years ago. This is the second anniversary of that event and already we see across the country lapels bearing buttons saying, "Do not blame me; I voted Liberal." Two years is a fairly short span in history, but it has been a rather long period for Canada in so far as its terms of record deficits are concerned, record expenditures, record taxation and record unemployment. I suggest that is the significant feature of this anniversary for most Canadians.

Now with the applause for this very dismal surplus, as surpluses have been experienced in this country, we must also recognize that the government supporters had to take with it tonight a report from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) that this was the second largest deficit in Canada's peacetime history and the previous record was, of course, the record of the same Minister of Finance in the previous year. I think most of us were expecting to hear tonight from the minister what his estimate would be of the gross national product for the coming year. I was surprised by some of the omissions of qualifications in his description of the prospects for the gross national product next year, just as I am sure the house was surprised to get his white paper and find that his estimates for last year, having regard to these usual qualifications, prove exceedingly disappointing.

Last year the minister indicated that subject to normal crops, stable prices and no untoward external events, he expected a gross national product increase of 7 per cent. If we read his white paper we find, first of all, that 6 per cent is the attained figure and then from that 6 per cent, according to his own report, you have to take off 2 per cent for increases in prices. But that is not the only point. Since the white paper was sent to the printers I find that we have the typical confusion exhibited between the Department of Finance and the Department of Trade and Commerce, because on Tuesday the Department of Trade and Commerce published its D.B.S. accounts of income and expenditures for the fourth quarter of 1959. You will find there a record of volume of production in relation to gross national expenditures, and you will find that the increase was only 3.5 per cent. In other words, the estimate of the Minister of Finance a year ago was just 50 per cent wrong.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Benidickson: In so far as gross increase was concerned, we find it was 6 per cent instead of a 7 per cent increase subject, as the report of this dominion bureau of statistics indicates, to a reduction of 2.3 per cent in so far as prices are concerned.

Tonight, as I took down the words of the minister, I found he predicted an increase in the gross national product for the coming year of 6 per cent but, for the first time in many years I found absent from that statement those qualifying words that have been typical in the past from my hon. friend and his predecessors, "subject to normal crops, stable prices and no untoward external events." Are we to assume, as a result of this absence that stable prices are now an unrealistic assumption on the part of the minister? Did he get discouraged from the poor estimating that was done last year? Is inflation to be accepted?

I do not know when in the history of any administration the country has lost as much ground in as short a period of time and I want to give some indication of that situation. As to lost ground in so far as the shareholders of Canada are concerned, here are some of the indications. The net debt during this administration has gone up $1,084 million. The unemployment insurance fund has been depleted by $504 million. We no longer have the defence equipment account; $165 million is gone there. The minister has even changed the method of reporting to this house this year. For the first time in many years the deficit on the old age security account is not taken into this year's expenditures. That fact accounts for another $24 million which would increase the deficit from $406 million, as reported, to $430 million for 1959-60.

In any event those items total $1,777 million in three years. A rough estimate of the population would be perhaps 17,700,000. I suggest that makes mathematical calculation very easy. One will recognize the fact that the net worth of the shareholders in Canada in this short time has gone down $100 per person. To use the old phrase which the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) used to use, namely "an average family of five", this means $500 a family. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that that is an indication of the lost ground under this administration of which I have spoken.

In addition to that consideration, this administration is now collecting more taxes from more people than any other government in history. The minister has indicated tonight that next year, as compared to this year, he proposes to take out, of the Canadian populace an additional $591 million in taxes and that figure does not include the additional amount he will take, as compared to this year, on the old age security account. A little bit of calculation there again I think will indicate that this works out to about $30 per capita. If you multiply that figure by five, it is an increase of $150 a year for an average family of five persons. Indeed, the long arm of the Minister of Finance is certainly going very deep when we have such an astronomical increase in the proposed take from taxes such as he has indicated to us tonight.

The minister has an extremely slender budget surplus forecast; I think it was $12 million. Based on revenues in excess of $6 billion, one can understand how unreliable an estimate of that kind can be. In addition to that, it seemingly would indicate that to attain that budget surplus on the estimated expenditures he will come to this parliament in the coming twelve months with supplementary estimates totalling only $140 million. We all know that in recent years, even under this Minister of Finance, after the opening of the fiscal year we have been getting later supplementary estimates that at times have totalled between $400 million and $500 million additional to those contained in the blue book of estimates.

In addition to that, quite apart from the budget, this administration in three years has reported to this house cash deficits that totalled $2,338 million. Is it any wonder that the position for financing of our junior governments and of the business of this country has been greatly embarrassed by this type of activity? Certainly it is true that this government and the minister have been hogging this market and others have had very little chance indeed.

Tonight, if I took down the minister's words correctly, he said this with respect to debt management:

> In reporting to the house a year ago on the management of our public debt I pointed out that the large conversion loan operations undertaken during the summer of 1958 had removed a source of heavy pressure on the bond market and that by substantially lengthening out the average term of our debt a sound debt management policy could be developed and carried forward.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

The minister pounds away on this theme. He referred again to the "great conversion loan" of 1958. In the press release with respect to it in 1958 these were his words:

> This great conversion will lay the foundations for a new healthy and confident tone to our whole bond market, and the beneficial results of this will extend well beyond the market for Canada bonds and into the market for provincial, municipal and corporate bonds.

I wonder what our provincial treasurers think now of that statement. I wonder what our school boards and the municipalities, in their desperate financial state today, think about it. I find that on page 88 of the minister's white paper tabled the other day he has given an average interest rate of 3.96 per cent with respect to our public debt on March 31, 1960. I think it is not just a coincidence, that this is the highest rate on our public debt since the last Conservative administration, that of R. B. Bennett, in 1935.

In addition to that, there is more of our direct and guaranteed securities maturing within two years from February 29 of this year than there was prior to the launching of this great conversion loan, all borrowed by the present administration and coming due under the policies of the government. In addition to that, when we were told about the conversion loan a reference was made to the balance that was piling up and coming due within eight years. I think $6,400 million was mentioned. The situation today is that almost the same amount is falling due within eight years as there was prior to the launching of this "great conversion loan".

There has not been a great deal of applause, outside of this house for the performance of the administration financially during the past year unless it comes from the moneylenders. There certainly has not been any applause from the taxpayers. I have indicated that they were obliged to pay $676 million last year more than they paid into the treasury of the minister in the previous year. There certainly is not any applause from the unemployed. There should not be any applause from the consumer. I have stated that the bureau of statistics reports indicate there has been a 2.3 per cent price increase related to gross national expenditures. There is certainly no cheering from the provinces, the municipalities, the school boards or business, large or small. I greatly doubt whether civil servants are going to cheer very much about the statement of the minister tonight. There certainly should be very little cheering from the young people of this land who have facing them the prospect of home building. That, of course, is a very formidable undertaking indeed with the high interest rates prevailing.

I do not propose to be a Cassandra but I think the minister has been unduly optimistic.

I think it is only right that someone should draw the attention of the house and of the country to some factors that certainly are not in this atmosphere tonight as a result of this glowing report we have heard from the Minister of Finance.

Unemployment has been increasing every month. Bank loans this year have declined by comparison with last year. We read the other day about heavy lay-offs in the automobile and other industries. Freight carloadings, always an impressive statistic in the estimation of the Prime Minister, are not above those of 1959; bankruptcies have increased by comparison with 1959. With regard to the unemployment insurance fund in one year the minister has to report to us in the white paper that the fund is down a further $126 million.

The trade deficit was a real shock to this country. We have heard tonight, with respect to it, again, just preachings, not remedies. Opportunities for employment have certainly not been opening up as rapidly as the labour force has been increasing, and we do not seem to have any remedies presented to us by the minister. Soft commodity prices are certainly not encouraging the building up of inventories. Everybody recognizes that in recent months the optimism of the business community has moderated. We have had very little in the way of guidance and leadership in the fiscal proposals of the minister tonight. This, indeed, is a very tepid budget. I think that if we were to call it anything at all it could be described as a "do-nothing" budget. That is what we have in front of us in the minister's presentation.

We were not looking forward to very much from the minister tonight, because we feel that in the monthly preachings he has been making in Toronto and elsewhere—he eliminated one month's speech in order that we should get something from him tonight—he has fairly well dealt with this theme of "work and save". The hon. gentleman said recently in Saskatoon that we were now in a period of unprecedented boom and market expansion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Benidickson: Then, in the conclusion of this speech he urged everyone to take self denying measures, use self-discipline, and—at least I can understand why the minister should have emphasized this—exercise forbearance. He then urged self-denial. There certainly is not very much except an appeal for self-denial as far as this budget is concerned.

I suggest this is pretty cold porridge for the unemployed and for many other people who are certainly not sharing in what the minister refers to as unprecedented boom.

May I adjourn the debate?

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

BUDGET PAPERS

presented by the Honourable Donald M. Fleming, M.P.,

for the information of Parliament in connection with the Budget of 1960-61

79951-0—172

FOREWORD

The purpose of these Papers is twofold:

1. to present a general economic review of 1959, bringing together in one place and in convenient form some of the more comprehensive indicators of economic conditions prepared by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, the Bank of Canada and other Government Agencies, together with brief comments;

2. to present a preliminary review of the Government Accounts for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1960.

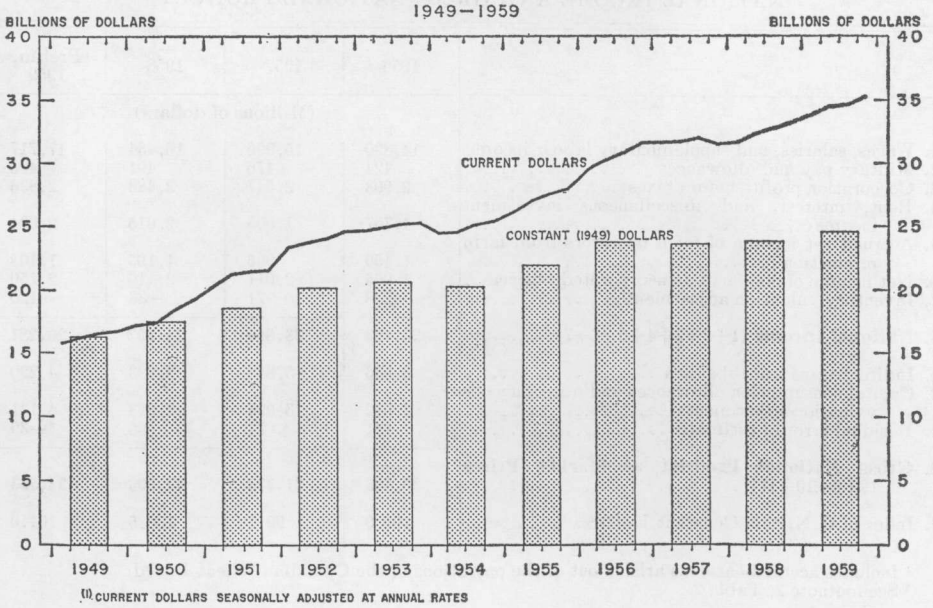
3. Employment and Earnings 2734

4. Financial Developments 2736

5. Price Trends 2740

The tables in this Budget Paper are based upon estimates provided by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, the Bank of Canada and other Government Agencies. Some of the figures appear for the first time; others have been published elsewhere. All 1959 estimates are preliminary and subject to revision.

THE NATIONAL ACCOUNTS



National Income and Product

Gross National Product in 1959, according to preliminary estimates, amounted to $34.6 billion, more than 6 per cent above that of 1958. Most of the increase represented gains in the volume of production; the rise in prices was about 2 per cent.

The increase in the volume of production in 1959 was the first significant gain in real output since 1956 and compares with a postwar average of about 4 per cent. The rise in output had been underway since mid-1958, but 1959 was the first full year to feel the impact of the current expansion. The expansion proceeded until the third quarter of 1959 when there was a temporary pause, caused in part by the effects of some major labour disputes. By the fourth quarter of the year, however, the upswing had been resumed, and the final quarter annual rate of Gross National Product of $35.3 billion was 2 per cent above the average of 1959 as a whole.

It is also possible to measure changes in real output on an industrial basis. While official statistics do not completely cover all sectors of production, there are indications that the rise in total real output, as measured this way, may have been more than 4½ per cent. The gain in output was widespread among industrial groups, with both goods-producing and service industries higher by that amount. The largest gains were registered in mining and forestry (which reflected the pickup in demand from abroad for Canadian wood and metal products) and in public utilities and durable and non-durable goods manufacturing. By year end the pace of the upswing had brought total industrial output to a level 8 per cent above the previous peak at the beginning of 1957. Output in durable manufacturing, which had generally declined from the beginning of 1957 to the autumn of 1958, rose substantially throughout 1959 and by October had almost reached the previous peak. There was little change in the level of agricultural production. Output in construction and in fishing and trapping was somewhat below the level of 1958. The decline in construction activity was the result of a slightly smaller level of housebuilding and a moderately lower level of private non-residential building for the year as a whole. In the last half of 1959, however, private business construction was increasing.

There was a substantial increase in employment during the year as the increase in production opened up new job opportunities. Total employment rose by 156,000 persons from 1958 to 1959. At the same time the growth in the labour force was 101,000 persons so that the number without jobs and seeking work fell from an average of 405,000 in 1958 to 350,000 for the year 1959. This represented 5.6 per cent of the labour force in 1959 compared with 6.6 per cent in 1958.

Increased production and employment provided the basis for a rise in income in 1959; national income was up 6.4 per cent. Most major income groups showed gains over the preceding year. As is typical of periods of economic expansion, corporation profits rose more than other elements of the national income, increasing by 14 per cent over 1958 and almost reaching the 1956 peak. Labour income rose throughout the year reaching a record level of $17.7 billion, almost 8 per cent above the previous year. The number of paid workers increased by 3.7 per cent; average hours worked in manufacturing were up from 40.2 hours to 40.7 hours per week, and average hourly earnings increased by 4 per cent. Consumer prices rose only about 1 per cent in 1959 so that there was a substantial increase in total real income. After allowing for the increase in population, there was a considerable gain in real income per capita.

Corporations increased their profits almost to the level of the previous record of 1956 as output was higher and costs remained relatively stable. Corporation profits amounted to $2,836 million in 1959, up from $2,483 million in 1958. Profits had risen sharply in the final quarter of 1958 and remained at this higher level throughout 1959, increasing only moderately throughout the year.

Rent, interest and miscellaneous investment income increased by almost 4 per cent.

Farm output remained high and cash income was at about the 1958 level of $2.8 billion, 3 per cent below the 1952 record. The farm labour force declined a further 3 per cent during the year to a level almost one-quarter below that of 1952, and per capita farm cash income continued to increase. Accrued net farm income amounted to $1,108 million in 1959, 7 per cent below that of the previous year. The 1959 grain crop was larger than that of 1958 and marketings were about the same. In both years marketings exceeded production and stocks were drawn down. Income from the sale of livestock was almost unchanged in the year; a decline in marketings of cattle and calves, associated with lower exports to the United States, was mostly offset by higher income from hogs.

Net income of unincorporated business amounted to $2,150 million in 1959, 1.5 per cent above the level of the preceding year. The major gains in this sector were accounted for by service industries and transportation. Net income in forestry also rose, in line with higher levels of operations in the woods industries.

National Expenditure

The strength of domestic demand which had sustained the Canadian economy in 1958 provided impetus to the expansion of production in 1959. Consumer expenditure, supported by higher levels of income, provided the main stimulus to demand in dollar terms. The increase in government expenditure on goods and services was also a significant element in the expansion of domestic demand. Private investment was almost unchanged from the 1958 level. Expenditures on new housing declined very slightly from the record of the previous year, while non-residential construction was 8 per cent below 1958. On the other hand, business investment in machinery and equipment was 9 per cent above 1958, and was decidedly stronger in the second half of the year. Exports responded to the rising tempo of economic activity abroad and reached a record level. The rising level of total demand prompted a buildup in inventories, in contrast to 1958 when there had been a liquidation of inventories. About three-quarters of the increased demand was met by means of higher domestic production, and the remaining one-quarter by higher imports. It should be noted that the movement of imports has been considerably more volatile than that of total Canadian demand; in periods of slackening demand, imports tend to decline more rapidly than other components of Gross National Expenditure so that the decline in domestic production is mitigated. Conversely, in periods of expanding demand, imports tend to increase more rapidly than other components.

The average consumer increased his volume of real spending on consumer goods and services by more than 2 per cent in 1959. The value of consumer expenditure on goods and services rose by 6 per cent and amounted to $22.3 billion. Expenditures rose steadily throughout the year and by the fourth quarter of the year had reached a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $22.8 billion. Almost all of the rise in value represented a gain in volume. Average prices of consumer goods and services in 1959 were only one per cent above the average of 1958, while average prices in 1958 had been 2½ per cent above those of 1957. The gain of almost 5 per cent in the volume of consumer expenditure contrasts with a population increase of about 2½ per cent.

In 1959 expenditure by all levels of government on goods and services amounted to $6,437 million, 4½ per cent above 1958. This is in contrast to increases of 7 per cent in both 1957 and 1958. All of the gain in 1959 was at the provincial and municipal levels; total federal expenditure on goods and services declined slightly, with an increase in federal non-defence spending not quite offsetting a decline of about 6 per cent in defence expenditure. About three-quarters of the net increase in total government spending was accounted for by capital expenditures which rose by 15 per cent to a level of $1,600 million. Other government non-defence expenditure on goods and services in 1959 was about 5 per cent above the level of 1958.

Private capital expenditures, including housing, moved upward strongly during 1959 and the fourth-quarter rate was 5 per cent above that for the beginning of the year. For the year as a whole, private capital expenditure amounted to $6,961 million, about equal to 1958 and 5 per cent below the 1957 record of $7,335 million. Since prices of capital goods increased somewhat during 1959, the volume of capital expenditures declined about 3 per cent from that of the previous year.

The pattern of investment expenditure in 1959 was somewhat different from that of 1958. In the latter year there had been declines in spending on business plant and machinery, offset to some extent by a sharp increase in housing expenditure. In 1959 housebuilding activity was at almost the record level set in 1958 and, while business expenditure on plant was lower, there was a significant recovery in investment in machinery and equipment.

[2] The book value of inventories is deflated to remove the effect of price changes and the derived "physical" change is then valued at average prices of the current period to obtain the value of physical change. The difference between this value of physical change and the change in book value is called the inventory valuation adjustment (see line 7, Table 1).

[3] Minor adjustments have been made to the figures of current receipts and payments shown in Table 10 and in "The Canadian Balance of International Payments, 1956 to 1959", Dominion Bureau of Statistics, to achieve consistency with the other component series.

Housebuilding in 1959 was at a level of $1,743 million compared with the $1,763 million spent in 1958. After allowing for a rise in building costs, the volume of housebuilding activity was about 5 per cent below that of 1958. In terms of physical activity 145,671 housing units were completed in 1959, almost equal to the 1958 record of 146,688 units; at the same time 141,345 starts were recorded, as against 164,632 in the preceding year. At year end, there were 81,905 units still under construction; at the same period a year previously 88,162 units were under construction. As in 1958, government action played an important role in the financing of housebuilding; there were about 34,000 mortgages financed directly by government funds.

Outlays in private non-residential construction were $2,592 million in 1959, 8 per cent below the 1958 level and 16 per cent below the record year 1957. The declines reflect the completion of large projects begun in 1956 and 1957, years of an extraordinary capital goods boom. By 1958 the major work had been completed on large projects such as the St. Lawrence Seaway, and work done in 1959 represented a greater emphasis on a large number of smaller projects throughout all sectors of the economy. There was a decided strengthening of private non-residential construction throughout 1959 and the fourth-quarter rate was 2 per cent above the year as a whole. Prices were about 2½ per cent higher than in 1958.

Investment in machinery and equipment, which includes outlays both for the equipment of new plant and the modernization of existing plant, rose more than 9 per cent in 1959 to a level of $2,626 million. Prices of machinery and equipment were about 2½ per cent above those of 1958 so that there was a significant gain in the volume of investment for the year. The peak in expenditures on machinery and equipment was reached at the beginning of 1957 and there had been a decline until the middle of 1958 when the current upswing began. Outlays in 1959 were the third highest on record, being exceeded only by the extraordinary years of 1956 and 1957. In the last half of 1959, expenditures on machinery and equipment were at a rate 17 per cent above the low point in 1958.

The accumulation of inventories was a major source of expansion for the economy in 1959 and bore a more reasonable relationship to current sales than the excessive accumulation of some earlier periods. The buildup of inventories amounted to $300 million, in contrast to a decline of $435 million in 1958. This reversal increased demand for investment in inventories by $735 million or more than one-quarter of the increase in total demand.

Farm inventories and grain in commercial channels decreased by $55 million in 1959; there had been a larger liquidation amounting to $112 million in 1958. In the latter year, the grain crop was below average and sales were met out of inventories; there had also been an unusually high level of exports of cattle to the United States. In 1959 total marketings were about the same as in the previous year, while the grain crop was larger and there was no repetition of the unusually high cattle sales abroad.

All of the inventory accumulation occurred in the non-farm sectors. The liquidation in 1958 had come to a halt by the fourth quarter of 1958 when a slight accumulation took place. This was followed by a strong accumulation throughout the entire year 1959. For the year as a whole, the business inventory accumulation amounted to $355 million; stocks increased in the manufacturing, retail and wholesale sectors. In total, the percentage rise in inventory holdings was in line with the rate of increase in shipments and sales.

Exports of goods and services set a record in 1959 and totalled $6.7 billion, 5 per cent above 1958 and 4.6 per cent above the 1956 level. This increase reflected a strong pickup in foreign demand. While exports rose generally throughout the year, the fourth-quarter movement showed particular strength. Imports of goods and services rose in 1959 to $8.1 billion, 9½ per cent above 1958 and 4.5 per cent above the 1956 level. The upswing in imports began in the fourth quarter of 1958 and there was a gradual increase throughout 1959. The 1959 total of imports was 4½ per cent above the rate of the fourth quarter of 1958.

Personal Income and Its Disposition

Personal income in 1959 increased by 6.1 per cent over the preceding year and totalled $25,940 million*. Almost all components showed an increase. The gain over 1958 was fractionally less than that of national income, in contrast to the experience of the preceding two years. There were two main reasons for this difference in movement. Corporation profits rose more rapidly than did the other items in national income, as is typical of a period of upswing and, as noted, corporation profits are excluded from personal income. Transfer payments from government rose only 5 per cent in 1959 in contrast to sharp increases in the two previous years. In part, this movement reflected the decline in unemployment insurance payments in 1959 as the level of unemployment declined considerably. The decline in unemployment insurance payments was more than offset by the increase in payments under the hospital insurance scheme; the scheme came into effect on July 1, 1958 and 1959 was the first full year of operation.

Personal direct tax payments increased by 16 per cent in 1959 reflecting a higher level of wages and salaries, slightly higher rates of taxation in the upper income brackets and a sharp rise in miscellaneous taxes, representing mainly the premiums paid under the hospital insurance scheme. Income tax collections amounted to $1,747 million in 1959, 12 per cent above the previous year. Succession duties were up slightly at $130 million while payments of miscellaneous direct taxes almost doubled to $211 million.

After deducting direct taxes from personal income, the residual, or personal disposable income, totalled $23,852 million, 5.3 per cent more than in 1958.

* Personal income differs from national income in a number of ways although the components of these two totals are for the most part similar or identical. While national income is the total of the annual earnings of Canadian residents from the production of goods and services, personal income is the sum of the current receipts of income of persons, whether from production or from transfers. For example, personal income includes all wages and salaries, but only that part of corporation profits which is actually received by Canadian persons as dividends. Personal income also includes transfer payments such as family allowances, old age pensions, veterans' benefits and charitable contributions of corporations, although these are not payments for services and do not, therefore, form part of national income.

DISPOSITION OF PERSONAL INCOME[1]

Personal saving rose to $1,591 million and was 6.7 per cent of disposable income in 1959 compared with the 7.1 per cent achieved in 1958. This contrasts to an average savings ratio of 6.5 per cent over the ten-year period 1949–1958. Personal saving is represented by changes in the assets and liabilities of persons and would include, for example, changes in holdings of liquid assets, life insurance, outstanding consumer debt and mortgage debt and the value of changes in inventories of unincorporated business and farmers.

At the same time that consumers maintained their savings they also spent more on durable goods, non-durable goods and services. Outlays on consumer durable goods rose by more than 6 per cent. The largest increase, both in percentage and in dollar terms, was in the purchase of new cars, which rose by almost 10 per cent. Purchases of household appliances and home furnishings also increased significantly during the year. Prices of durable goods rose by 1½ per cent in 1959 so that the gain in volume was of the order of 5 per cent. Purchases of non-durable goods, including clothing, food, tobacco and gasoline were up by 5 per cent. All of this increase in value represented a real gain since prices of non-durable goods were unchanged in 1959 over the preceding year. Outlays on services rose by about 7 per cent, continuing the long-run increase in this sector. Prices of services were 3 per cent higher than in 1958.

Source and Disposition of Saving

In 1959 there was a sharp increase in total saving over the preceding year. Saving totalled $5,895 million, 9 per cent above the level of 1958. Personal saving was maintained. Business saving increased while there was a smaller deficit (i.e., negative saving) for all levels of government so that governments as a whole drew less upon the saving of persons and businesses. In 1959 the deficit* of all governments combined was sharply down to $617 million from a level of $1,037 million in the preceding year. The decline in the total deficit was mostly accounted for by the federal government; the deficit of provincial and municipal governments was slightly lower than in 1958.

Business saving increased substantially in 1959 to $5,080 million and provided the major part of total Canadian saving. Depreciation allowances, the largest item in the total, rose by $208 million to $4,131 million. Undistributed corporation profits increased from $852 million to $957 million as the sharp rise in corporation profits was only partly offset by higher dividend payments.

* Government saving would be represented by the excess of revenue over expenditure for all three levels of government combined. Revenues are computed on an accrual basis, in accordance with national accounts convention and differ from revenues on a cash basis.

In 1959 the deficit on international current account, on the national accounts basis, amounted to $1,405 million, up from the 1958 level and about the same as in 1957. The deficit on current account was matched by an inflow of foreign capital; the main items in this inflow were direct investment from abroad and new security transactions. The capital inflow served to supplement the flow of Canadian saving.

Investment and Capital Expenditure

The value of capital investment increased slightly in 1959 after having declined the previous year from the extraordinary levels achieved in 1957. Private and public spending on capital goods totalled $8,411 million or 24.3 per cent of Gross National Expenditure. This ratio is lower than those achieved from 1956 to 1958, but higher than all other postwar years.

Trends in capital expenditure in the past three years have reflected in large part the completion of major large-scale resource projects and a greater emphasis on a wide variety of investment, including social capital. The enormous amounts of capital invested during the resource boom of 1955-1957 provided for an expansion of basic facilities in mining and basic manufacturing for some time in advance—the "lumpy" nature of such investment implied a cessation of investment, once the facilities were in place, until the expansion of export and domestic markets was sufficient to induce additional investment. The completion of the Seaway, some major pipelines and power projects in 1958 explains the lower level of investment in the utilities and transportation sectors in 1959. This reduction was more than offset by the expansion in investment in primary industries, service industries, and social capital both public and private. Investment in manufacturing, mining and housing was relatively unchanged from the year before.

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE CAPITAL EXPENDITURE

In 1959 there was a considerable expansion in investment in farms and forests. The rise in farm investment was associated particularly with the acquisition of machinery which increases farm productivity and which has permitted farm production to remain at the high levels previously reached in the face of the continuing decline in the number of persons engaged in agriculture. The increase in forestry investment was related to the expansion in demand for wood products. In the past few years emphasis had been given to investment in the wood-using industries rather than woods operations.

Capital expenditures in mining were almost unchanged from the level of the previous year and totalled $344 million. Outlays in manufacturing amounting to $1,074 million compared well with expenditures of $1,095 million in 1958. Both mining and manufacturing had declined sharply in 1958 from the boom levels of 1956 and 1957.

Outlays in electric power, gas and water and in the transportation, storage and communications groups continued to decline from the 1957 peak. Expenditures for these groups were 14 per cent below the levels of 1958 and 20 per cent below 1957, a measure of the extent to which basic undertakings had been completed.

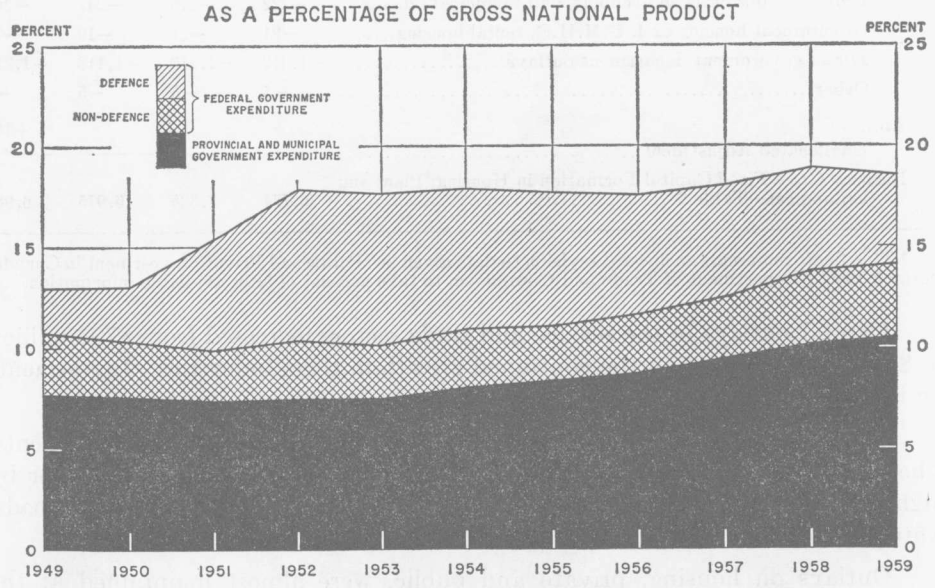
[2] This figure represents an upward revision to data given in "Public and Private Investment in Canada, Outlook 1960", Department of Trade and Commerce, to take account of later available information.

Capital outlays in the service and trade sectors increased from $705 million to $759 million reflecting the continued growth in these industries. Investments by institutions also increased by $17 million.

The largest increase in capital spending was by government departments. There was a gain of $194 million over 1958. The gain was accounted for by higher provincial and municipal spending on capital facilities including roads, water services and sewers.

Outlays on housing, private and public, were almost maintained at the record 1958 levels and amounted to $1,759 million. Housing, government departments and institutional capital expenditures in 1959 were 43 per cent of total private and public investment compared with 41 per cent in 1958 and 34 per cent in 1957.



Revenue and Expenditure of all Governments

The deficit on an accrual basis for all levels of government in 1958 was $1,037 million and in 1959, $617 million.* The smaller deficit in 1959 reflects a growth in government revenues which more than offset the increases in expenditures over those in 1958.

Almost all of the reduction in the deficit in 1959 arose from the federal accounts; the deficits of provincial and municipal governments combined were only slightly reduced. Federal expenditures in 1959 increased by $258 million or 4 per cent. However, federal revenues registered an increase of $662 million, or 12½ per cent, more than double the growth in expenditures. As a result, the deficit of the federal government declined from $803 million in 1958 to $399 million in 1959. In the case of provincial and municipal governments, the growth in expenditures amounted to $568 million, an increase of 13 per cent. Provincial and municipal revenues exceeded this increase slightly, rising by $584 million or 14 per cent. Thus, the deficit for these levels of government was $218 million in 1959 in contrast to $234 million in 1958.

The 1959 expenditure on goods and services by all three levels of government was greater by $276 million than in 1958. The overall increase was composed of divergent movements at the various levels of government. While provincial and municipal expenditures in this category increased in 1959, federal outlays showed a decline due to the fall in defence expenditures. In 1959, defence expenditures declined by $101 million, or 6 per cent, following the decrease of $104 million in 1958. As a result, defence outlays comprised 24 per cent of combined government expenditures on goods and services as compared with a proportion of 27 per cent in 1958. The decrease in defence spending was partially offset by an increase in federal civilian outlays of $70 million or 6 per cent. The expansion here was considerably less than in 1958, when these expenditures increased by $226 million. At the 1959 level of $1,258 million, federal expenditures on goods and services for civilian purposes were approximately one-fifth of combined government expenditures in this category, about the same proportion as in 1958. For provincial and municipal governments, expenditures in 1959 on goods and services rose by $307 million, or 9 per cent, to a level where their combined outlays comprised 56 per cent of the total at all levels of government for this purpose. While growth in the cost to governments of wages and salaries accounted for some of the increases for goods and services, a higher level of investment expenditures also contributed to the increase.

* The following section discusses only those government transactions relevant to the National Accounts. As a result, the figures used may not agree with those shown in other Public Accounts. Table 9 indicates the reconciliation between federal deficit or surplus for purposes of the National Accounts and the comparable figures appearing in the Public Accounts. In particular, federal corporate taxes have been adjusted to an accrual basis to make this item consistent with other components of the National Accounts. In 1958 this adjustment decreased revenues by $53 million, and in 1959 increased revenues by $69 million.

While government expenditure on goods and services is the only government outlay included in the gross national expenditure account, it is necessary to discuss other government expenditures in order to arrive at the figure for government surplus or deficit appearing in the saving and investment account. Total expenditures at all levels of government combined were $11,230 million in 1959, an increase of $826 million, or 8 per cent, over 1958. The expenditure on goods and services made up 57 per cent of the 1959 total, a proportion slightly below that of 1958. Transfer payments to persons, interest on the public debt, subsidies and transfers to other levels of government accounted for the remainder of total government outlays. Expenditure on transfer payments to persons was much the largest of these four items, comprising in 1959, 25 per cent of all government expenditures, roughly the same proportion as in 1958.

There was a continuation during 1959 of the postwar trend towards increased expenditures on government transfer payments to persons. Taking all levels of government combined, the increase in 1959 was considerably less than in 1958 when these payments rose rapidly. In the federal sector in 1959 there was a decline of $109 million, or 6 per cent, from the level of 1958. There were diverging trends within this total movement. Family allowance and old age pension payments increased moderately due to a larger number of eligible recipients. These increases were offset by a substantial decline in outlays from the unemployment insurance fund as unemployment levels dropped in 1959. In addition, miscellaneous transfer payments declined by comparison with 1958 when a special acreage payment was made to western grain farmers. There was an increase in payments on the public debt. At the provincial and municipal levels the growth in transfer payments was substantial. Payments at these levels rose by $237 million, or 32 per cent, largely due to increased payments under provincial hospital insurance plans. The calendar year 1959 was the first full year of operation of the federal-provincial hospital insurance arrangements and the first year when the majority of provinces participated.

Federal subsidies rose by $49 million in 1959, due almost entirely to the increased cost of the agricultural stabilization program. In the case of federal transfers to other levels of government, 1959 saw a further substantial increase in these payments. In 1958, transfers to provincial and municipal governments had increased by $146 million or 28 per cent. The 1959 increase exceeded this, the transfers in 1959 being greater by $215 million, or 32 per cent, than in 1958. While increased tax rental payments to the provinces accounted for some of this growth, the major portion was due to the effect of the first full year's operation of the federal-provincial agreements on hospital insurance.

Total revenues of all levels of government showed increases in 1959 as compared with 1958. Approximately two-thirds of the increase in the yield from direct personal taxes was accounted for by the rise of $183 million, or 12 per cent, in the revenues from federal personal income taxes. This growth was due to increased personal income and the slightly higher federal tax rates introduced for the last half of 1959 on upper income brackets. At the provincial and municipal level, the most significant increase was in the revenue from miscellaneous taxes where yields rose by $98 million. The growth in revenues from the direct taxes used by the provinces to cover their share of hospital insurance costs contributed almost all of this increase.

Federal revenues from corporate income taxes (on the National Accounts accrual basis) increased sharply in 1959, reversing the sharp drop in revenues from this source in 1958. Rising corporate income, as well as increased tax rates, resulted in an increase of $201 million, or 19 per cent, in 1959 in corporate tax revenues. For the governments of Ontario and Quebec, the receipts from the corporate taxes levied in these provinces continued to grow in 1959 showing an increase of $25 million. This expansion was not as great as during 1958 when application of the Ontario tax for the first full year was the main factor contributing to increased revenues.

For all levels of government combined, receipts from indirect taxes rose by $388 million or nearly 10 per cent. The federal share of this increase was $219 million. While growing economic activity contributed to this increase, the higher sales tax rate in 1959 was also a factor. In addition, increased receipts from customs duties resulted from the greater volume of imports during 1959. Provincial and municipal revenues from indirect taxes showed a growth of $169 million or 8 per cent. As in 1958, the component mainly responsible for this increase was the revenue from municipal taxes on real and personal property. Provincial collections from the gasoline tax and retail sales taxes rose by moderate amounts in 1959.

Investment income for all levels of government includes three main components; interest on government-held public funds, interest on loans and advances and the net profits of government business enterprises. At the combined provincial and municipal levels, this income increased by $42 million, or 7 per cent, in 1959 as compared with a rise of $35 million, or 6 per cent, in 1958. In the federal sector investment income in total was relatively stable, showing an increase of $7 million, or 2 per cent, in 1959. The moderate increase in 1959 resulted from a rise in receipts from federal government loans and investments offset partially by a small decrease in the combined trading profits of government business enterprises.

BALANCE OF INTERNATIONAL PAYMENTS

Canada's international transactions for the year 1959 reflected the expansion in economic activity at home and abroad which began late in 1958. Merchandise exports rose by more than 5 per cent after relative stability for the years 1957 and 1958. For the year 1959, merchandise imports increased by 9 per cent over the preceding year; following a two-year decline this increase did not quite bring imports to the 1956 level. The merchandise trade deficit increased to $386 million, more than double the deficit incurred in 1958 but well below the deficits of 1956 and 1957. At the same time, the deficit on non-merchandise transactions rose from $915 million in 1958 to $1,074 million in 1959. As a result, the total current account deficit amounted to $1,460 million in 1959 compared with $1,085 million in 1958, $375 million higher than 1958 and slightly above the 1957 figure.

The average level of prices for commodity exports was moderately higher while that of commodity imports was slightly lower. Consequently, the terms of trade, that is the ratio of export prices to import prices, moved in Canada's favour in 1959.

The trade results for the year as a whole obscure an interesting development which occurred in the latter part of the year. On a seasonally adjusted basis, merchandise imports began to rise strongly in the fourth quarter of 1958. The upward trend continued until the third quarter of 1959 and was replaced by a decline in the fourth quarter. By contrast, merchandise exports, seasonally adjusted, showed minor irregular gains until the fourth quarter of 1959 when they increased sharply and were running 12 per cent above the first-quarter rate and 7 per cent higher than the average for the year as a whole. There was a sharp increase in exports to overseas countries as well as a substantial rise in sales to the United States. As a result of the fourth-quarter trend, the trade deficit narrowed in the final months of 1959 and the overall current account deficit, seasonally adjusted at annual rates, declined to about $1.3 billion.

The value of merchandise exports in 1959 amounted to $5,152 million compared with $4,890 million in the previous year. The increase in exports was widespread and the most significant gains occurred in exports of iron-ore, primary and semi-finished steel, uranium, forest products, copper, asbestos and farm implements and machinery. The largest declines took place in exports of aircraft, beef cattle and meat; in 1958 these items had shown large increases because of special circumstances.

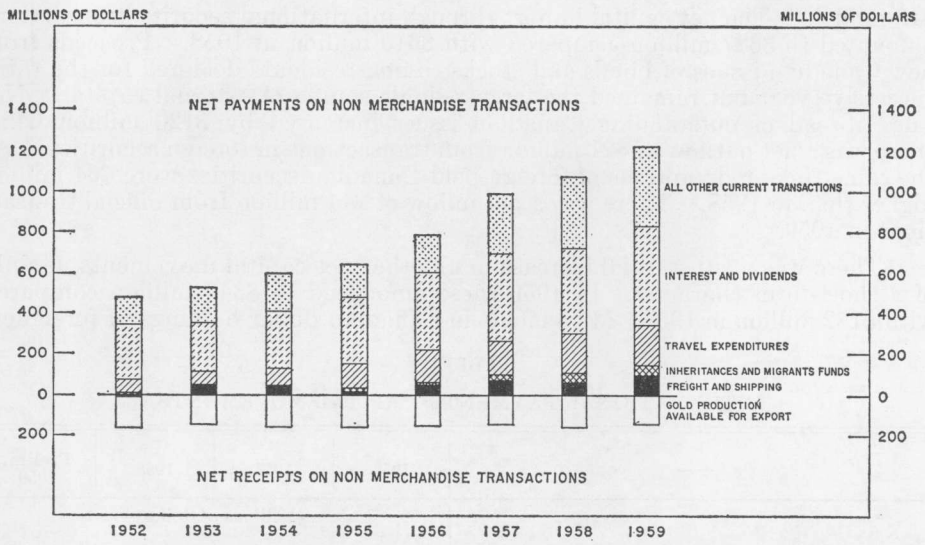
IMPORTS AND EXPORTS OF MERCHANDISE

The value of merchandise imports rose from $5,060 million in 1958 to $5,538 million in 1959. The increase in imports was also widespread. There was a large increase in importations of automobiles, trucks and parts and substantial increases in purchases of farm and other machinery, electrical equipment and iron and steel products. Declines, where they occurred, were moderate.



There were some important changes in Canada's pattern of trade in 1959. Exports to the United States increased by 10 per cent while imports from that country rose by 8 per cent. Sales to the United Kingdom rose by about 2 per cent and exports to other Commonwealth countries fell by 3 per cent. On the other hand, purchases from the Commonwealth, including the United Kingdom, increased by 12 per cent. The value of merchandise exports to continental OEEC countries and their dependencies declined by over 13 per cent while imports of goods from this source rose by 22 per cent. The decline in exports to this group was largely due to large non-recurring sales of military aircraft to European NATO countries in 1958. Sales to all other countries increased by 9 per cent while imports rose by 7 per cent.

The result of these developments was a slight decline in 1959 in our trade deficit with the United States while our trade surplus with all other countries was reduced by more than 60 per cent. The proportion of imports originating in the United States fell from 67.9 per cent in 1958 to 67.0 per cent in 1959. The proportion of purchases made in the Commonwealth rose slightly while those from OEEC countries increased to 7.6 per cent compared with 6.8 per cent in the previous year. While the proportion of total exports to the United States increased for 1959 as a whole to 62.0 per cent from 59.5 per cent in 1958, this movement was reversed during the latter part of the year when the sharp increase in exports to overseas countries took place.

The reduction in the trade surplus with overseas countries was the major factor in the emergence in 1959 of a current account deficit with those countries. Within the total, a small current account surplus with the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth countries was more than offset by a greatly enlarged deficit with all other countries.

Canada's surplus with overseas countries began to decline in 1953. This was the result of a decline in the trade surplus on the one hand and a growth in the deficit on non-merchandise transactions on the other. To a large extent, this trend was a reflection of the recovery and subsequent expansion in production in western Europe and the greater participation of other overseas countries in world multilateral trade. At the same time, currency and trade restrictions which, until recently, were widespread had a limiting effect on purchases of Canadian goods. The increase in the deficit on non-merchandise account reflected growing expenditures on travel, freight and shipping and the servicing of foreign investment.

BALANCE ON NON MERCHANDISE TRANSACTIONS

The increase of $159 million in Canada's deficit on non-merchandise transactions in 1959 was the result of a 9 per cent increase in Canadian payments and a 5 per cent increase in receipts. Payments for interest and dividends, freight and shipping, and for miscellaneous items were the largest elements in the increase in the deficit. A lower level of gold sales was an additional factor. The balance on travel and the inheritances and immigrants-emigrants funds component showed little change since the increase in receipts matched the increase in payments.

Canada's balance on merchandise trade has usually fluctuated sharply in response to changes in demand at home and abroad. By contrast, the traditional deficit on non-merchandise transactions has grown continuously since 1953. With the exception of gold sales, every component of the non-merchandise account has contributed to the growing deficit, since in every case the increase in payments exceeded the increase in receipts. To a large extent the increase in the deficit is a reflection of the rapid economic growth in western industrialized countries. The strong world market for raw materials fostered rapid Canadian resource development and substantial imports of investment goods and capital.

The import of capital led to a rising volume of interest payments to non-residents and, where past investment has proven profitable in terms of increased production and exports, to an increasing level of dividend payments. Accompanying the inflow of capital has been an inflow of technical "know-how" and this has resulted in a variety of payments abroad for business services, including patents, royalties and similar items. The growth in imports carried with it a higher level of freight and shipping and other business charges. In addition, a rising standard of living greatly increased spending by Canadians on travel abroad. Further, Canada's contributions to underdeveloped countries have increased.

The net inflow of long-term capital into Canada in 1959 was slightly larger than in 1958. These net long-term inflows of capital in the form of direct investment, security transactions and official transactions, were equivalent to about 70 per cent of the 1959 deficit on current account compared with more than 90 per cent of the smaller 1958 deficit.

Net direct investment in Canada, after declining in 1957 and 1958, rose in 1959. Compared with 1958 direct investment in Canada was higher by $80 million while Canadians increased the level of their direct investments abroad by $12 million. The net capital import through international security transactions amounted to $627 million compared with $610 million in 1958. Proceeds from new Canadian issues of bonds and stocks to non-residents declined for the third successive year but remained the largest single source of external capital. Net sales abroad of outstanding Canadian issues increased by $120 million while there was a net outflow of $21 million from transactions in foreign securities. At the same time, redemptions of foreign-held Canadian securities were $64 million higher than in 1958. There was a net inflow of $44 million from official transactions in 1959.

There was a substantial increase in all other net capital movements, mainly of a short-term character. In 1959 these amounted to $349 million compared with $182 million in 1958. Movements in Canadian dollar holdings of foreigners added $13 million to the capital inflow for the year as a whole but there were significant variations in this category during the year. In the period January to August, non-residents added nearly $90 million to their holdings of Canadian treasury bills because Canadian yields were sufficiently higher than those in the United States to allow for the cost of exchange protection through forward transactions. The differential narrowed somewhat in the latter part of August and the employment of United States funds in Canadian treasury bills became less attractive. By the end of December, non-resident holdings of Canadian treasury issues were only slightly above the value held a year earlier.

The balance in the miscellaneous group showed a net inflow of $336 million in 1959 compared with $76 million in 1958. This group includes, among other things, short-term commercial payables and receivables, miscellaneous borrowings by Canadians and private Canadian holdings of foreign exchange.

At December 31, 1959, Canada's official exchange reserves, expressed in United States dollars, amounted to $1,869 million compared with $1,939 million at the end of 1958. The decrease largely reflects Canada's increased subscription to the International Monetary Fund which, though it can be regarded as a secondary reserve, reduced our official reserves by $62.5 million.

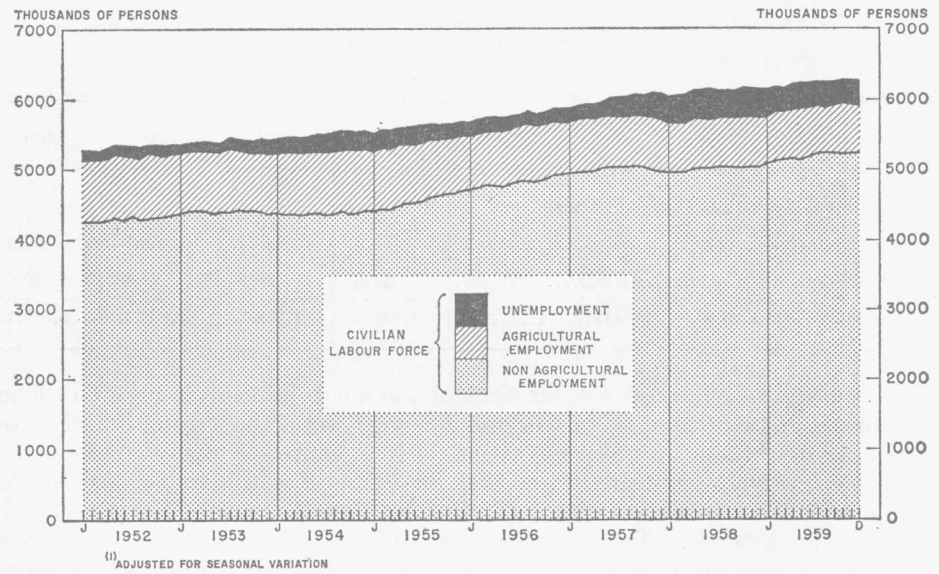
Geographically, about 80 per cent of the net total capital inflow in long-term forms in 1959 came, as in the previous year, from the United States. Net long-term investment funds originating in the United Kingdom represented 10 per cent, about one-third lower than in 1958. A considerable part of this change reflected unusually large outflows from Canada for direct investment in the United Kingdom. The completion in 1958 of repayments by the United Kingdom on the 1942 loan was also an important factor. Net inflows originating in all other countries rose sharply. Direct and portfolio investments from this source increased and in 1959 there were no substantial outflows in the form of intergovernmental loans matching those made by Canada in 1958.

The exchange value of the Canadian dollar which had been rising, almost without interruption, since September, 1958, showed some decline in the final months of 1959. The average rate of exchange for the United States dollar, in terms of the Canadian dollar, reached a low for the year of 94.77 in October, 1959. This was followed by a slight decline in the value of the Canadian dollar and for December, 1959, the rate for the United States dollar was 95.12 compared with 96.46 for December, 1958. For 1959 as a whole, the average noon rate was 95.90 compared with 97.06 in 1958.



EMPLOYMENT AND EARNINGS

There was a significant improvement in the demand for labour in 1959. There were more persons employed in each month of 1959 than in the corresponding period in 1958. In 1959, for the first time since 1956, the increase in employment exceeded the growth of the labour force, and unemployment declined.

For 1959 as a whole, the average number of persons with jobs rose by 156,000 or 2.7 per cent. This is in contrast to the fractional decline which occurred in 1958. At the same time it is estimated that on balance 101,000 persons entered the labour market in 1959, an increase of 1.6 per cent compared with the expansions of 2.1 per cent in 1958 and more than 3 per cent in both 1956 and 1957. The moderate size of the increase in the labour force was a reflection of the lower level of immigration in 1959 as well as relative stability in labour force participation rates.

The shift from rural to urban occupations which has been evident throughout the postwar period continued in 1959, though at a somewhat lower rate than in previous years. It is estimated that some 22,000 persons left the agricultural labour force in 1959 compared with 26,000 in 1958, 30,000 in 1957 and 44,000 in 1956.

THE LABOUR FORCE[1]

Since 1946, the agricultural labour force as well as agricultural employment has declined about 40 per cent. Within this total, employers and "own account" workers declined by one-third while the number of unpaid family workers was nearly two-thirds lower. The number of paid farm workers has shown a decrease of one-quarter since 1946, although in 1959 their numbers increased by 12,000 over 1958.

The number of persons with jobs in non-agricultural occupations rose in 1959 by 176,000 persons. The growth of 3½ per cent in non-agricultural employment in 1959 compares with a rise of 8,000 persons, a fractional increase, in the previous year. On a seasonally adjusted basis, non-agricultural employment reached a peak in September, 1957, and subsequently declined by 1.4 per cent to a low in February, 1958. This was followed by irregular gains and by August, 1959, non-agricultural employment had exceeded the previous peak by nearly 4 per cent. In the fourth quarter of 1959 non-agricultural employment levelled out. This stability was, in part, a reflection of the indirect effects of the strike of forestry workers in British Columbia in the third quarter of the year and the lengthy strike of the steel workers in the United States.

On a year-over-year comparison, increases in employment opportunities were general in all regions and most industrial divisions in 1959. In the previous year, the commodity-producing industries had registered substantial declines and increases were limited to the service sector. Despite the improvement in output in the goods-producing industries, the greatest gains in employment in 1959 were again concentrated in the service industries. Community services, notably education, health and government, and trade accounted for nearly three-quarters of the increase in non-farm employment. Manufacturing provided about one-fifth of the new job opportunities in 1959.

The average number of persons without jobs and seeking work in 1959 amounted to 350,000 or 55,000 fewer persons than in the previous year. As a proportion of the labour force this was 5.6 per cent compared with a postwar high of 6.6 per cent in 1958.

Total labour income increased in 1959 by 7.8 per cent compared with 2.7 per cent in 1958. Higher rates of pay and increases in the numbers of hours worked per week as well as increased job opportunities contributed to the rise in salaries and wages. In 1958, the number of paid workers did not show much change from the level of the previous year and the moderate increase in total labour income resulted in a gain of $79 in average annual earnings per paid worker. In 1959, the number of paid workers grew by 168,000. Nevertheless, the very much greater increase in labour income led to a $143 gain in per capita income, an increase of 4 per cent. In manufacturing, average hourly earnings rose by 3.6 per cent compared with 3.1 per cent in 1958 while average hours worked per week rose by about one per cent compared with a small decline in the previous year. In the light of the minimal rise in the cost of living in 1959, most of the increase in per capita earnings represented real income gains whereas in 1958 the moderate increase in per capita earnings was more than offset by higher prices.

In 1959 all the major industrial groups shared in the increase in total salary and wage payments. In the service sector, in line with employment opportunities, the growth in labour income was more pronounced than in the goods-producing industries as a whole. Wages and salaries paid out in trade, public utilities, transportation, storage and communication, governments, finance and related groups rose by 9 per cent in 1959 compared with a gain of 6 per cent in 1958. Earnings in agriculture increased by nearly 10 per cent while those for construction rose by 9 per cent. Total wages and salaries in manufacturing and forestry increased by 6 per cent while those for mining rose by 5 per cent.

FINANCIAL DEVELOPMENTS

Financial conditions in Canada in 1959 reflected the growing demand for funds which naturally accompanies economic expansion and recovery. They also reflected a number of other influences of a more deep-seated nature which were at work both at home and abroad. Interest rates and bond yields were higher in 1959 than in 1958 and there were important movements during the course of the year.

There were marked changes in the pattern and distribution of borrowings: total bond offerings were less than in 1958; the federal government deficit was reduced substantially and there was greater government reliance on short-term borrowing; corporation borrowing on the long-term market was relatively steady as a result of a lower level of fixed investment and a higher level of retained earnings. At the same time there was a sharp rise in borrowings from the banks. The increasing tempo in general economic activity and a substantial rise in inventory holdings led to greater demands by business for chartered bank funds. Bank lending to individuals also increased rapidly. With total bank assets almost unchanged during the year, the banks sold off a considerable amount of their security holdings to meet the rising demand for loans. Finally, the instalment finance companies issued short-term paper to help finance the expansion in consumer credit.

The net effect of these movements was an increase in interest rates, with short-term rates rising more than medium- or long-term. The general public became heavy buyers of bonds, and governments and banks were sellers. Corporations sold long-term bonds but, with their high degree of liquidity, also became buyers of short-term government and finance company paper.

Interest rates, which had begun to rise in mid-1958, continued to increase until the late summer months of 1959 when a moderate decline took place, lasting for the remainder of the year. At year end, however, the level of interest rates was above that at the beginning of 1959.

The yield on three-month treasury bills showed the sharpest changes throughout the year, rising from 3.49 per cent at the end of 1958 to 6.16 per cent in August and then declining to 5.12 per cent at year end. The decline has continued into 1960, and on March 24 the rate was 3.41 per cent. Medium-term yields followed a different pattern, rising until September, then remaining more or less stable until year end. The yield on the $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent June, 1967–1968 Government of Canada Bonds, for example, rose from 4.48 in January to 5.30 in September, and ended the year at 5.37 per cent. Long-term Government of Canada's followed the same pattern as those of the medium-term issues; the yields on $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent, October, 1979 bonds were similar to those of the June 1967–1968 issue. The Bank of Canada discount rate, which is set at one-quarter per cent above the average tender rate for three-month treasury bills, stood at 5.37 per cent at the end of 1959, and at 3.66 per cent on March 24, 1960.

Interest rates on provincial, municipal and industrial bonds also rose during the year, in line with the general increase in interest rates. The prime rate on chartered bank lending which had been $5\frac{1}{4}$ per cent at the beginning of 1959 was $5\frac{3}{4}$ per cent at year end.

In the United States interest rates generally moved upward during the year, responding to much the same influences which were operative in Canada. However, there were differences in the spread between United States and Canadian rates throughout the year. The spread of Canadian rates over those of the United States increased until late summer and then narrowed in the latter part of the year. At year end the spread was greater for long-term bonds than at the end of 1958 while for treasury bills and medium-term bonds the spread was smaller.

[1] To make the statistics for the different periods in this table comparable certain approximate adjustments have been made in calculating changes in loans and investments. The 1956 figures have been adjusted for the reclassification of foreign currency loans from Canadian loans to net foreign assets which was made in the returns of the banks to the Department of Finance, and the 1957 figures for the change in the allocation of inner reserves consequent upon the change in the method of valuing Government and provincial securities required in the returns of the banks to the Department of Finance.

[2] Total foreign currency assets less total foreign currency liabilities. Excludes foreign currency securities issued by Canadian borrowers.

Net new issues of bonds including treasury bills showed a considerable drop in 1959 from the previous year, with $1,768 million being raised, compared with $2,875 million in 1958. All classes of borrowings showed declines; provincial and municipal borrowings were about 10 per cent below 1958, while there were much sharper declines in borrowings by the federal government and by corporations. Net new issues of bonds and treasury bills by the Government of Canada decreased from $1,252 million to $723 million while the net issues of corporate bonds were only $171 million compared with $665 million in 1958. Offsetting to some extent the decline in corporate bond borrowings was an increase in corporate stock issues from $300 million in 1958 to $409 million in 1959; most of the stock issues took place in the first half of the year. The decline in corporate borrowing was a reflection of relatively steady outlays for capital goods at the same time that retained earnings of corporations were rising in line with higher profits.

Net new issues of bonds and stocks payable in foreign currencies amounted to $224 million in 1959, or about one-half of the 1958 level. There was an increase in provincial government bonds payable in foreign currencies, little change in the level of municipal borrowings and a sharp drop in corporate bonds and stocks payable in foreign currencies. There was a net redemption of Government of Canada bonds payable abroad. This included an issue of $150 million 3 per cent bonds maturing in 1963 and called for prior payment on February 1, 1959. In earlier years the Government had purchased $129.5 million of the original issue and held it in a special sinking fund.

There was almost no change in the level of Canadian chartered bank assets in 1959. The increase in the demand for loans led to bank sales of securities which amounted to $812 million for the year. The banks increased their holdings of insured residential mortgages by $178 million in 1959.

Bank loans, excluding day-to-day loans and call loans, increased sharply by $707 million. The peak in bank lending came in August, and from then until the end of 1959 there was a more than seasonal decline in loans outstanding. Almost every borrowing group increased its loans in 1959, with the exception of provincial governments and some of the major resource industries. Loans to industry, merchandisers, construction contractors and public utilities accounted for almost one-half of the increase in loans. Personal loans rose by $163 million, or 18 per cent, to account for another major share of the increase. Loans to farmers, municipal governments and religious and social institutions rose moderately as did loans to stockbrokers and investment dealers. There was an increase of $82 million in loans to grain dealers and exporters while instalment finance companies increased their borrowings by $57 million. It should be noted that this latter group also issued $135 million of short-term paper in 1959.

[1] Includes all holdings other than those of the banking system and the federal government and government accounts.

[2] The deposit balances of religious, educational and welfare institutions and personal accounts used mainly for business purposes were reclassified from "personal savings deposits" to "other notice deposits" as at September 30, 1957 in the returns of the banks to the Department of Finance. The figures prior to September 30, 1957 are thus not comparable with those since that date. The amount of deposits reclassified was approximately $140 million.

A higher level of bond yields, along with growing public confidence, led to greatly increased holdings of federal government bonds by the general public outside the banking system. This increase in holdings by the general public was one of the outstanding financial events of the year. Holdings of government securities by the public outside of the banking system rose by $1,757 million or 20 per cent in the year. Holdings of Canada Savings Bonds increased by $317 million, those of treasury bills by $340 million while the remaining increase of $1,100 million represented other government securities. There were small increases in the public's holdings of currency and in savings deposits, while other deposits declined.

The total amount of federal government direct and guaranteed securities increased by $719 million in 1959 compared with an increase of $1,252 million in 1958. As mentioned above, the general public more than accounted for this increase. In the course of 1959 the banking system sold $702 million of Government of Canada securities while Government of Canada accounts, including the Unemployment Insurance Fund, were reduced by $336 million.

PRICE TRENDS

The upward movement in the consumer price index which began in mid-1956 was far less marked during 1959 than in preceding years. For the year 1959 as a whole, the average level of consumer prices increased by 1.1 per cent. This compares with increases of 2.6 per cent in 1958 and 3.2 per cent in 1957. The general index of wholesale prices was 229.8 for December, 1959, only fractionally higher than 229.3 a year earlier.

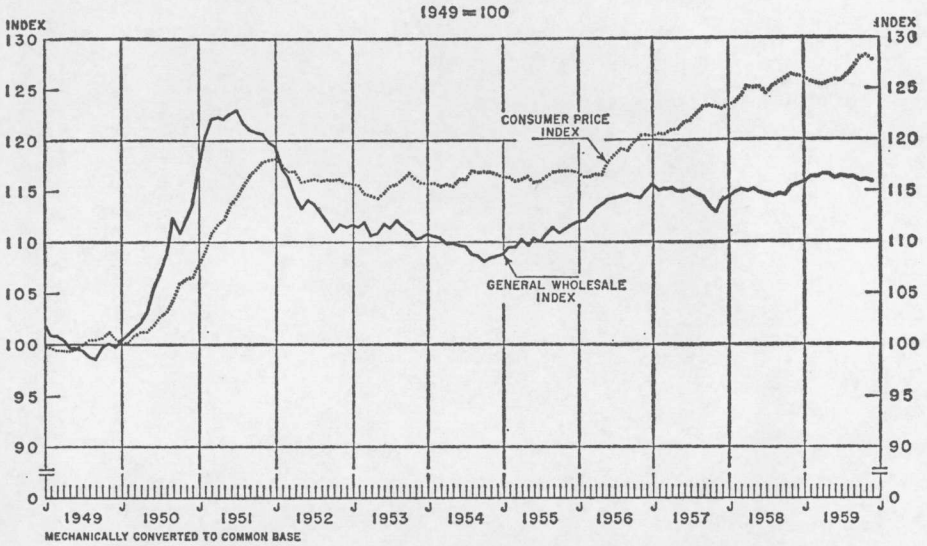

TABLE 17

CONSUMER AND WHOLESALE PRICES

—	Consumer Price Index (1940=100)	General Index of Wholesale Prices (1935-39=100)
AVERAGE FOR YEAR:
1956	118.1	225.6
1957	121.9	227.4
1958	125.1	227.8
1959	126.5	230.6

September	127.1	230.9
October	128.0	230.1
November	128.3	230.3
December	127.9	229.8

The consumer price index declined during the first four months of 1959 from 126.2 in December, 1958 to 125.4 in April, 1959. The decline was reversed in May and consumer prices reached a high of 128.3 in November. Slight declines occurred in the next three months and in February, 1960 the consumer price index stood at 127.2. As in the case of the total index, all major groups, with the exception of the food component, averaged slightly higher in 1959 than in 1958. The increases in 1959, however, were in most cases smaller than in the previous year. Clothing prices were fractionally higher while the costs for shelter and household operations rose by 2.2 per cent and 1.4 per cent, respectively. The largest increase in 1959, as in earlier years, occurred in the cost for services and all other commodities where prices rose by 3.1 per cent. This compares with increases of 3.8 per cent in 1958 and 4.3 per cent in 1957. The most significant change occurred in food prices which were fractionally lower on average in 1959. This is in marked contrast to increases of 3 per cent in 1958 and 4.6 per cent in 1957. From 1953 to 1956 the downward movement of food prices had offset increases in other components and imparted an element of stability to the total.

CANADIAN WHOLESALE AND CONSUMER PRICE INDEXES

The performance of wholesale prices in 1959 was in slight contrast to that of 1958. In 1958 the general index in December was more than one per cent higher than at the beginning of the year whereas in a year-over-year comparison with 1957 the index showed little change. In 1959, on the other hand, average wholesale prices were more than one per cent higher than in the previous year but the gap narrowed at the end of the year. The contrast came about mainly because of a weakening in wholesale prices after mid-1959 which followed an upward trend that began in the final quarter of 1958. In a year-over-year comparison, prices for industrial materials showed a marked increase in 1959 compared with substantial declines in the previous two years. Similarly, construction materials which had declined fractionally in 1958 were moderately higher in 1959 though some weakening appeared at the end of the year. Prices for raw materials and manufactured goods were also slightly higher in 1959 following relative stability in 1958.

REVIEW OF GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS 1959–60

1. INTRODUCTION

The fiscal year of the Government ends on March 31 but the books must remain open for some time after this date to record various adjusting entries and to take into account all payments up to and including April 30 made on account of expenditures originating in and properly chargeable to the fiscal year 1959–60. Consequently the figures presented in this Part for the fiscal year are preliminary and subject to revision. The final figures when they become available next July or August may vary to some extent from those given in the following pages.

2. HIGHLIGHTS OF GOVERNMENTAL FINANCIAL OPERATIONS DURING 1959–60

The following table summarizes the financial operations of the government for the fiscal year and indicates how the budgetary and non-budgetary transactions, together with changes in the unmatured debt, affected the government's cash balances. In the sections entitled "The Budgetary Accounts" and "The Cash Position" a more detailed explanation of these transactions is given.

Budgetary transactions

The revenues, expenditures and deficit as forecast in the budget speech of April 9, 1959 and the actual figures as now estimated are shown in the following table:

TABLE 2

(in millions of dollars)

—	Budget Forecast April 9, 1959	Actual (estimated)	Increase
			Amount	Per cent
Revenues	5,267	5,301	34	0.6
Expenditures	−5,660	−5,707	47	0.8
Deficit	−393	−406	13	3.3

Revenues of the government for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1960 amounted to $5,301 million. This is $34 million or less than two-thirds of one per cent above the total of $5,267 million forecast in the budget speech of April 9, 1959 and $546 million or 12 per cent more than the total of $4,755 million collected in 1958–59.

Expenditures amounted to $5,707 million and were $47 million or approximately three-quarters of one per cent more than last year's budget forecast of $5,660 million and $343 million or 6 per cent more than the 1958–59 expenditures which totalled $5,364 million.

On the basis of these figures the deficit for the fiscal year is $406 million compared with the deficit of $393 million as forecast in the budget speech of April 9, 1959 and a deficit of $609 million in 1958–59.

Revenue collections have shown an increase over the previous year. This is due partly to the fact that the general level of activity and production in the economy was higher than in 1958–59 and partly to tax increases announced in last year's budget speech. Tax revenue increased by $502 million and non-tax revenue by $44 million.

Electronic data processing of the returns of Ontario taxpayers by the Taxation Division of the Department of National Revenue has resulted in earlier payments of refunds. As a consequence net revenues for 1959-60 are approximately $10 million less than they would otherwise have been and revenues in the first three months of 1960-61 will be correspondingly higher. Had the procedures of previous years been followed 1959-60 revenues would have been $10 million more and the deficit $10 million less.

On the expenditure side defence again constituted the largest item. Budgetary outlays on defence amounted to $1,528 million or 27 per cent of the total expenditures. In 1958–59 defence costs charged to the budget were $1,442 million but in that year equipment purchases amounting to $212 million were charged to the non-budgetary defence equipment account. Thus while budgetary defence expenditures in 1959–60 appear $86 million higher than in 1958-59 the cash outlays were in fact $106 million lower.

Civil or non-defence expenditures amounted to $4,179 million, an increase of $257 million over the corresponding total for the previous year. Of this increase $95 million is due to government contributions under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, $138 million to public debt charges and $55 million to provincial subsidy and tax-sharing payments. In addition there were increases of $22 million in the expenditures of the Department of External Affairs, $20 million in the expenditures of the Department of Agriculture and $16 million in the expenditures of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. There was no charge in 1959–60 to reduce the temporary loans to the old age security fund, which in 1958–59 amounted to $184 million.

More detailed explanations of budgetary revenues by source and budgetary expenditures by classification and department are given in later sections of this Part.

Non-budgetary transactions

Although the budgetary deficit for 1959–60 is expected to be $406 million, the government's bank balances at the end of the fiscal year are estimated to be only $76 million less than a year ago. This decrease in cash balances is the net result of budgetary requirements of $406 million, requirements of $770 million for loans, investments and working capital advances and of $175 million for other non-budgetary disbursements offset by non-budgetary receipts and credits of $942 million from repayments of loans and investments, annuity, insurance and pension accounts receipts and other non-budgetary sources and an increase of $333 million in outstanding unmatured debt.

Old age security fund

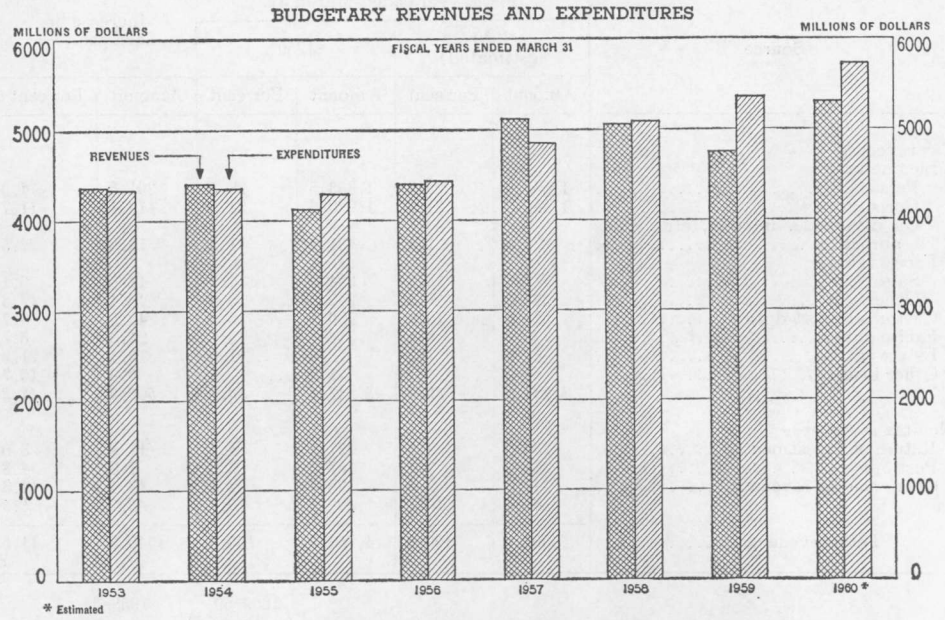
Pension payments from the old age security fund amounted to $574 million and tax receipts credited to the fund totalled $550 million, and the deficit of $24 million for the fiscal year was covered by temporary loans by the Minister of Finance. During 1958–59 pension payments amounted to $559 million and tax receipts credited to the fund to $375 million resulting in an excess of pension payments over tax receipts of $184 million which was charged to expenditures in 1958–59 under the authority of a vote of parliament.

Debt transactions

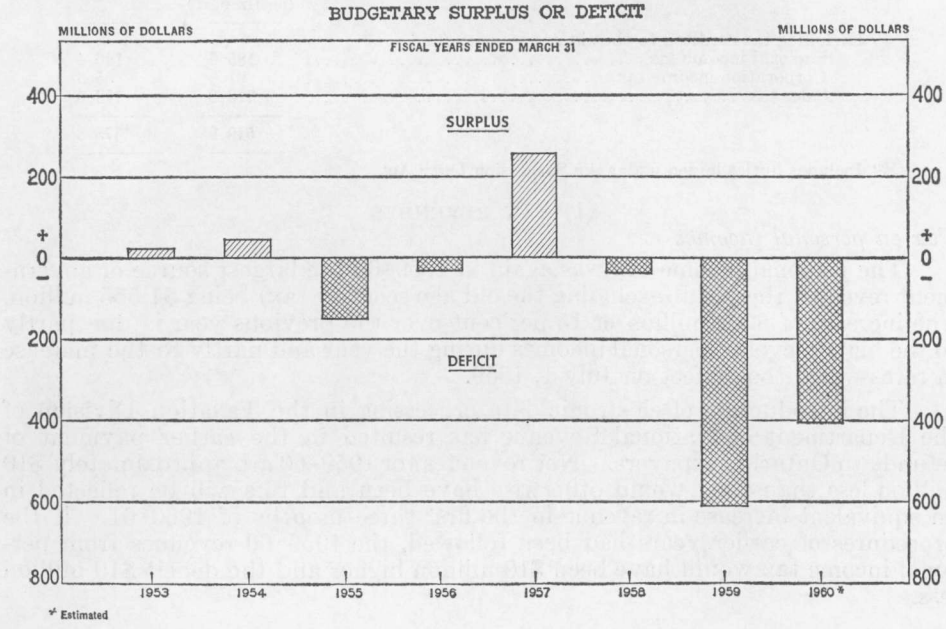
During 1959–60 the government issued securities amounting to $3,033 million (excluding the refunding of treasury bills which mature periodically) and redeemed or converted issues in the amount of $2,720 million, resulting in an increase of $313 million in unmatured debt. As other liabilities increased by $434 million the government's gross public debt increased by $747 million to $20,997 million at March 31, 1960. During the fiscal year the government's net assets increased by $343 million to $8,915 million. As a result, the government's net debt at March 31, 1960 is estimated to be $12,082 million compared with $11,678 million at March 31, 1959, the increase of $404 million reflecting the budgetary deficit of $406 million less an adjustment of $2 million in respect of prior years' transactions.

Cash position

Receiver General bank balances decreased by an estimated $76 million during the fiscal year as net budgetary and non-budgetary requirements totalled $409 million and outstanding unmatured debt (after taking into account transactions in the securities investment and sinking fund accounts) increased by $333 million.



3. THE BUDGETARY ACCOUNTS



Total revenues, amounting to $5,301 million for 1959–60, are $546 million more than the total for the previous year. Total expenditures are $5,707 million, an increase of $343 million over the total for 1958–59. The deficit for the fiscal year is $406 million compared with $609 million for the previous year.

A. Revenues

Budgetary revenues were $5,301 million in the fiscal year 1959–60. This is $546 million or 12 per cent more than in the previous year. Of the total revenues for the year, $4,750 million, or 90 per cent was derived from taxes and $551 million or 10 per cent from non-tax revenues.

(1) tax revenues

Tax on personal incomes

The personal income tax was again in 1959–60 the largest source of government revenue, the yield (excluding the old age security tax) being $1,555 million. The increase of $202 million or 15 per cent over the previous year is due partly to the higher level of personal incomes during the year and partly to the increase in rates which took effect on July 1, 1959.

The introduction of electronic data processing in the Taxation Division of the Department of National Revenue has resulted in the earlier payment of refunds to Ontario taxpayers. Net revenues for 1959–60 are approximately $10 million less than they would otherwise have been and this will be reflected in an equivalent increase in revenue in the first three months of 1960–61. If the procedures of earlier years had been followed, the 1959–60 revenues from personal income tax would have been $10 million higher and the deficit $10 million less.

In addition the tax on personal incomes levied under the Old Age Security Act yielded $186 million. This tax which previously was 2 per cent with a maximum of $60 was increased effective July 1, 1959 to 3 per cent with a maximum of $90. This revenue is credited to the old age security fund.

Corporation income tax

The corporation income tax (excluding the old age security tax) yielded $1,140 million in 1959–60 and was the second largest revenue producer. The increase of $119 million or 12 per cent over the previous year is due partly to higher corporate profits in 1959 and partly to the increase in rates which was effective January 1, 1959.

In addition the tax on incomes of corporations levied under the Old Age Security Act yielded $91 million which is credited to the old age security fund. This tax was increased from 2 per cent to 3 per cent effective January 1, 1959.

Taxes on interest, dividends, rents and royalties going abroad

Revenue under this heading is derived from taxes withheld on payments of interest, dividends, rents, royalties, alimony and income from estates and trusts made to non-residents. The increase of $14 million over the previous year reflects higher corporate profits in 1959.

Excise taxes

Included under this heading are the revenues from the general sales tax and the special excise taxes levied on a number of manufactured products.

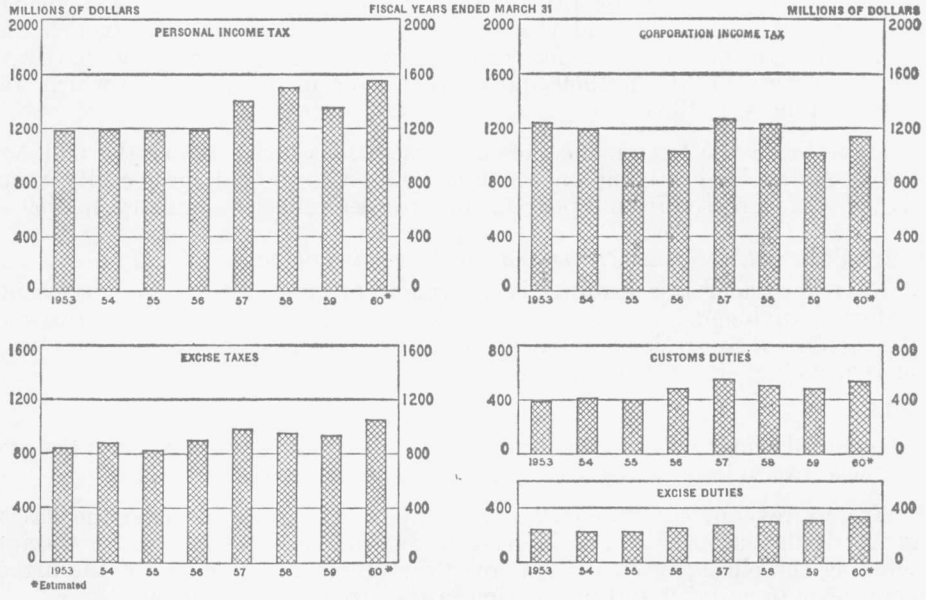
From a revenue standpoint the most important tax levied under the Excise Tax Act is the sales tax. The increase of $43 million or 6 per cent in receipts (excluding the old age security tax) over the previous year reflected the higher general level of activity and production in the economy in 1959–60.

The tax on sales levied under the Old Age Security Act and credited to the old age security fund yielded $273 million compared with $174 million in the previous year. This tax was increased from 2 per cent to 3 per cent effective April 10, 1959.

Excise taxes other than the general sales tax were $46 million or 19 per cent more than in the previous year. Receipts from the tax on tobacco products were $36 million higher than in the previous year, due mainly to the increase in the tax rate of two cents per package of twenty cigarettes which was effective April 10, 1959. In addition receipts from the tax on automobiles were $7 million higher.

Customs import duties

The increase of $43 million or 9 per cent in customs import duties reflected the increase in the volume and value of imports during the year



Excise duties

Excise duties are levied only on alcoholic beverages and tobacco products. (Additional taxes on tobacco products are levied under the Excise Tax Act referred to above.) The collections from the taxes on alcoholic beverages, before deducting refunds, were $195 million, an increase of $15 million over the previous year, due mainly to the increase in rates by one dollar per proof gallon effective April 10, 1959. The gross receipts from the taxes on tobacco products amounted to $147 million, an increase of $6 million.

Estate tax

The revenue from this source for the year amounted to $88 million, an increase of $15 million over the 1958–59 total. Although the Estate Tax Act replaced the Succession Duty Act with respect to death on and after January 1, 1959 a large part of the revenue received in 1959–60 was derived from duties levied under the Succession Duty Act.

PRINCIPAL SOURCES OF TAX REVENUES

Other taxes

Most of the revenue under this heading was received from the special taxes on the export of electrical energy from Canada, but a small amount was also received from the tax on the export of furs from the Northwest Territories.

(2) NON-TAX REVENUES

Non-tax revenues for 1959–60 were $551 million, $44 million or 9 per cent more than the 1958–59 total of $507 million.

TABLE 5

Return on investments

Receipts in this category amounted to $239 million compared with $221 million in 1958–59.

Payments from Crown corporations were $154 million, $7 million over the 1958–59 amount. Increases of $17 million in receipts from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, $3 million from the Canadian National Railways and other smaller increases amounting to $2 million were offset partly by a decrease of $15 million from the Bank of Canada.

Other loans and investments yielded $85 million, an increase of $10 million over the previous year. Increases of $7 million in profits of the exchange fund, $3 million in interest on deposits with the chartered banks and other smaller increases amounting to $4 million were offset partly by a decrease of $4 million in earnings from the sinking fund and other investments.

Post office

Gross post office receipts totalled $191 million but authorized disbursements from revenues for salaries and rent allowances at semi-staff and revenue offices, commissions at sub offices, transit charges on Canadian mail forwarded through or delivered in foreign countries, etc., amounting to $26 million, brought the net revenue to $165 million. Last year gross receipts amounted to $183 million and authorized disbursements totalled $26 million.

As costs of operating the post office during 1959–60 (excluding the $26 million charged to revenue) were $168 million, net expenditure exceeded net revenue by $3 million. However, in making this comparison, it is to be noted that the total shown for post office revenue does not reflect any payment for the franking privilege covering parliamentary and departmental mail or for certain miscellaneous services provided for other government departments and agencies, nor does the total shown for operating expenses reflect any charges for premises occupied by the Post Office Department or for certain accounting and miscellaneous services provided by other departments.

Refunds of previous years' expenditures

Refunds in the current fiscal year of expenditures made in prior years totalled $46 million, $8 million more than in 1958–59. These refunds included $15 million received by the Department of National Defence, of which $5 million was on contracts with the United States Government for the supply of engines, aircraft and other defence equipment under an arrangement that when Canada places contracts with the Government of the United States, payments of the estimated costs are made to the United States Treasury and if these estimated costs are revised, or if there are reductions in the contracts, the United States Government refunds the overpayments. The Department of Finance received $13 million (of which $12 million was a repayment by the Province of Ontario in connection with succession duty payments under the tax-rental agreements), the Departments of Transport and Veterans Affairs received $2 million each and other departments received $11 million. In addition, the unexpended balance, amounting to $3 million, of the 1958–59 parliamentary grant for the capital expenditures of the radio and television services was refunded by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Services and service fees

Sums totalling $31 million were collected during 1959–60 by various government departments for services and service fees, $3 million more than the total collected in the previous year.

Revenue from this source included $10 million received by the Royal Canadian Mounted police, mainly for police services to provinces and municipalities; $6 million by the Department of Trade and Commerce, mainly for services in connection with the inspection, weighing, storage and elevation of grain and for electricity, gas and weights and measures inspection services; and $5 million received by the Department of Transport, mainly for wharfage and other canal and marine service fees, steamship inspection, air-ground radio at airports, and government telegraph and telephone services.

Proceeds from sales

Receipts from proceeds from sales were $25 million for 1959–60, $1 million more than the total received in 1958-59.

Receipts under this category included $6 million from Crown Assets Disposal Corporation representing amounts realized from the disposal of surplus Crown assets (after deducting certain agency fees and transfers), $4 million under agreements of sale and $5 million from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation representing the proceeds from the sale of wartime housing properties and including amounts available as the result of the reversal of the provision for depreciation set aside by the corporation in previous years on properties that have now been sold.

Privileges, licences and permits

Revenues of $32 million were received during the fiscal year on account of privileges, licences and permits compared with $28 million received last year.

Included in these revenues is an amount of $11 million collected by the Department of Transport, mainly on account of aircraft landing fees, rentals of hangar accommodation, and other miscellaneous rental charges, and $3 million by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources for oil leases in the Northwest Territories.

Bullion and coinage

Revenue of $6 million under this heading arose out of the operations of the Royal Canadian Mint and included a net gain on coinage of $5 million, and gold refining, storage and handling charges and gain in gold refining of $1 million (of which more than half was in respect of handling charges).

Premium, discount and exchange

Under this heading is recorded the premiums and discounts incurred in the purchase of foreign currencies. Transactions in the current fiscal year resulted in a net credit of $1 million to revenues, the same as in the previous year.

Other non-tax revenues

Revenues under this category amounted to $7 million, the same as in 1958–59.

(3) COMPARISON OF ACTUAL REVENUES WITH FORECAST

The Budget Speech of April 9, 1959 forecast that budgetary revenues for the fiscal year 1959–60 would be $5,267 million.

It is now estimated that actual budgetary revenues for the fiscal year will be $5,301 million or $34 million more than forecast.

The following table shows the extent to which actual revenues for 1959–60, as now estimated, differ from the budget forecast:

TABLE 7

COMPARISON OF FORECAST WITH ACTUAL REVENUES FOR FISCAL YEAR ENDED MARCH 31, 1960
(in millions of dollars)

SOURCE OF REVENUES	Budget forecast of revenues	Revenues (estimated)	Increase or decrease (−) compared with budget forecast
			Amount	Per cent
Personal income tax	1,578	1,555	−23	−1.5

Total tax revenues	4,757	4,750	− 7	−0.1
Non-tax revenues	510	551	41	8.0
Total budgetary revenues	5,267	5,301	34	0.6

As the above table shows, the actual revenue from a number of sources is expected to be very close to the amount forecast. The revenue sources which showed a significant difference, on a percentage basis, from the amount forecast are the corporation income tax, estate tax and non-tax revenues.

The revenue from corporation income tax exceeded the forecast by a small amount, reflecting higher than expected corporate profits.

The revenue from the estate tax has been substantially influenced in the last four years by duties payable on two exceptionally large estates and actual revenues in each year have varied from forecasts because of the difficulty of foreseeing exactly when the duties on these estates would be paid.

Non-tax revenues were $41 million above the forecast, due to larger than expected returns on investments.

B. EXPENDITURES

Budgetary expenditures for 1959–60 amounted to $5,707 million, an increase of $343 million over the 1958–59 total of $5,364 million.

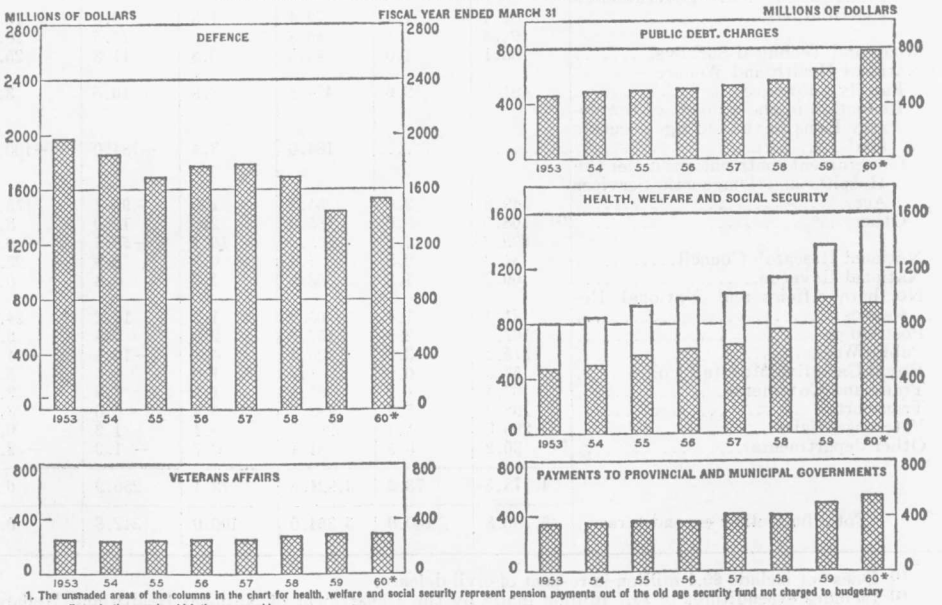
The Budget—Appendix

Defence expenditures



Defence expenditures which consist of expenditures of the Departments of National Defence and Defence Production and outlays for the civil defence programme are again the largest category of government budgetary expenditures. The total of $1,528 million for 1959–60 was approximately 27 per cent of the aggregate budgetary expenditures of the government and was $86 million, or about 6 per cent, more than the total of $1,442 million for 1958–59 when defence expenditures were also 27 per cent of aggregate budgetary expenditures.

Expenditures of the Department of National Defence were $1,506 million, those of the Department of Defence Production were $17 million and outlays for the civil defence programme were $5 million. In 1958–59 expenditures were $1,424 million, $14 million and $4 million respectively.

Expenditures for army, naval and air services totalled $1,378 million, $169 million more than the 1958–59 total. The outlay for army services increased by $30 million, for naval services by $48 million and for air services by $91 million over the previous year's totals. However, when comparing defence costs charged to budgetary expenditures for the past two years it must be noted that in 1958–59 purchases in the amount of $212 million were charged to the national defence equipment account rather than to budgetary expenditures. This was in accordance with the policy announced by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech of June 17, 1958, that the balance in the national defence equipment account would be liquidated during the fiscal year 1958-59.

Expenditures on mutual aid to NATO countries in 1959–60 show a decline of $56 million from those of the preceding year. However, this apparent decline was due to a change in the method of accounting for this programme in the current year rather than to any major reduction in the programme itself.

PRINCIPAL CLASSES OF BUDGETARY EXPENDITURE

1. The unshaded areas of the columns in the chart for health, welfare and social security represent pension payments out of the old age security fund not charged to budgetary expenditure in the year in which they were paid.
2. Does not include those payments made to provincial and municipal governments for specific purposes.

(1) Does not include $0.4 million in respect of civil defence.

(2) Includes expenditures of $3.7 million made by the Department of National Health and Welfare, $1.2 million by Privy Council and $0.4 million by the Department of National Defence.

Direct charges to mutual aid in 1958–59 amounted to $13 million consisting of procurement of equipment for mutual aid and Canada's share of NATO military budgets and infrastructure costs. Expenditures on these items in 1959–60 amounted to $15 million. However, in 1958–59 the mutual aid appropriation was charged also with the value of equipment transferred from service stocks amounting to $51 million plus a further $7 million in respect of NATO aircrew training carried out by the RCAF. In the fiscal year under review the costs of these items are being borne by the services without recovery from the mutual aid appropriation which provides for direct charges only. The value of these items in the mutual aid programme in 1959–60 was $54 million for transfers of equipment and $5 million for NATO aircrew training.

Outlays for defence research and development were $40 million compared with $74 million in 1958–59.

The government's contribution to the permanent services pension account of an amount equal to $1\frac{2}{3}$ times the contributions by permanent services personnel was $52 million, an increase of $2 million over the total for the previous year.

Administration and general costs were $21 million in 1959–60, approximately the same as for 1958–59.

The total expenditure of $17 million for the Department of Defence Production was $3 million more than in 1958–59. This increase resulted from the $1 million outlay in connection with the government programme instituted in 1959–60 of supporting selected defence development programmes in order to sustain technological capability in Canadian industry, the increase of $1 million in administration and general costs and the $1 million increase in respect of the programme under which capital assistance is given to private contractors, Crown plants operated on a management-fee basis and Crown corporations undertaking contracts essential to the defence programme.

Civil defence expenditures of $5 million were $1 million higher than comparable costs in 1958–59.

In addition to these budgetary expenditures for defence, there were certain other cash outlays which must be considered in assessing the full effect of the defence programme on the economy of Canada.

Under section 11 of the National Defence Act, materiel, not immediately required for the use of the Canadian defence forces or the Defence Research Board, may be sold to such countries and upon such terms as the Governor in Council may determine. The proceeds of such sales in 1959–60 amounting to $4 million were credited to a special account to be used for the procurement of materiel. Net cash outlays from this account during 1959–60 were $10 million leaving a balance of $4 million at March 31, 1960.

The Department of Defence Production also makes cash disbursements for the procurement of materials for use in the manufacture of defence equipment which are not recorded as budgetary expenditures. For purposes of accounting and control, these amounts are charged to the defence production revolving fund and are treated as assets on the books of the government until they are billed to the Department of National Defence or sold to defence contractors for use in the manufacture of defence equipment. As a result of the transactions during 1959–60 proceeds from sales exceeded purchases by $10 million and the assets of the fund were reduced by an equivalent amount leaving a balance of $20 million in the account at March 31, 1960.

For several years cash outlays were made for the purchase of equipment and supplies for the army, naval or air services which were charged to the national defence equipment account and not included in budgetary expenditures. In 1958–59 this account was liquidated in accordance with the policy outlined in the budget speech of June 17, 1958. Consequently there was no non-budgetary charge in 1959–60 comparable to the charge of $212 million made in 1958–59.

The following table summarizes the cash outlays for defence for the past two fiscal years:

Agriculture

Expenditures of the Department of Agriculture totalled $185 million for 1959–60 compared with $166 million in 1958–59.

Increases of $43 million in the net operating loss of the agricultural stabilization board, $6 million in contributions to the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba in respect of unharvested crops, $8 million in expenditures of the production and marketing branch, $5 million in outlays for rehabilitation and reclamation projects and $2 million in research branch expenditures were offset partially by decreases of $41 million in payments to western grain producers and $4 million in the deficit of the prairie farm emergency fund.

The 1959–60 net operating loss of the agricultural stabilization board was $58 million compared with $15 million in 1958–59.

Under the authority of Vote 613 of Appropriation Act No. 1, 1960 contributions totalling $6 million were made to the Provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba during 1959–60, in accordance with terms and conditions prescribed by the Governor in Council, of one-half the amounts paid by the Governments of those Provinces to farmers in respect of unharvested crops to a maximum of $300 in respect of any one farm; and contributions to the Governments of those Provinces (or their municipalities) in respect of the administrative costs incurred by them in making such payments.

In 1958–59 payments of $41 million were made under authority of Vote 663 of Appropriation Act No. 5, 1958 and Vote 698 of Appropriation Act No. 1, 1959 in accordance with Western Grain Producers Acreage Payments Regulations. There was no expenditure for this purpose in 1959–60.

Advances of $13 million made by the Minister of Finance to the prairie farm emergency fund to cover the year's deficit were charged to budgetary expenditures. The comparable amount in 1958–59 was $17 million.

Atomic Energy

Expenditures of the Atomic Energy Control Board and payments to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited totalled $31 million compared with $26 million in 1958–59, an increase of $5 million.

Administration expenses of the Atomic Energy Control Board and grants for research and investigations with respect to atomic energy were $1 million, slightly higher than in 1958–59.

During the fiscal year $30 million was paid to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited for its research programme, $4 million more than in the previous year. Of the total, $19 million was for current operations and maintenance and $11 million for the construction and acquisition of buildings, land, works and equipment.

In addition, working capital advances of $2 million were made to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited during the year. This brought the total of advances covered, or to be covered, by obligations or shares of the company to $61 million at March 31, 1960.

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation

Expenditures of $62 million were made by the government on account of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation during 1959–60, approximately the same as in 1958–59.

Grants for radio broadcasting and television services increased by $2 million over the corresponding amount for 1958–59, while expenditures for the international shortwave broadcasting service remained at approximately $2 million.

There were no payments made during 1959–60 of amounts equal to the 15 per cent special tax collected under the Excise Tax Act in respect of radio and television sets and equipment. These payments were discontinued under the provisions of the Broadcasting Act which came into force on November 10, 1958.

During the fiscal year 1959–60 grants totalling $7 million were made to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the capital requirements, including the replacement of existing capital assets, of the radio and television services.

Citizenship and Immigration

Expenditures of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration were $56 million in 1959–60, an increase of $3 million over the total for 1958–59.

Outlays for the Indian affairs branch increased by $5 million during 1959–60, due principally to increases of $3 million in expenditures for Indian education and $2 million for Indian welfare, while costs of the operation of the immigration branch decreased by $2 million due to lower expenditures in connection with assisted passage and other assistance given to immigrants.

External Affairs

Expenditures of the Department of External Affairs totalled $98 million in 1959–60, an increase of $22 million over the previous year.

The principal changes in expenditure were increases of $15 million in the grant to the Colombo plan fund, $6 million in contributions to international organizations, $2 million in assistance to other countries and $1 million in the costs of representation abroad.

Finance

Expenditures of the Department of Finance amounted to $1,425 million in 1959–60, an increase of $197 million over the corresponding total of $1,228 million in 1958–59.

Increases of $138 million in public debt charges, $55 million in provincial subsidies and tax-sharing payments and $2 million in government contributions with respect to the superannuation fund were the main factors in the overall increase.

Public debt charges

In 1959–60 public debt charges are again the second largest item of budgetary expenditure. These charges, which consist of interest on public debt, the annual amortization of bond discounts and commissions, the cost of issuing new loans and other costs incurred in servicing the public debt, amounted to $786 million in 1959–60 or 14 per cent of all budgetary expenditure compared with $648 million or 12 per cent in 1958–59.

	47.9	41.4	6.5
	786.1	648.0	138.1

Interest on public debt was $738 million in 1959–60, an increase of $131 million over the 1958–59 total of $607 million. Interest of $603 million on unmatured debt was $117 million higher due to an increase in unmatured debt and the general rise in interest rates; interest of $135 million on other liabilities was $14 million higher due mainly to increases of $8 million in respect of the permanent services pension account, $3 million in respect of the superannuation account and $2 million in respect of the government annuities account. Approximately one-half of the increase in respect of the permanent services pension account was due to the fact that the 1958–59 totals did not include interest for the first quarter of the year on the increase in the balance effective April 1, 1958 due to an actuarial adjustment of $326 million.

Other public debt charges amounted to $48 million compared with $41 million in 1958–59. The annual amortization charges of bond discounts and commissions were $9 million higher and the cost of issuing new loans was $2 million less than comparable 1958–59 amounts.

When considering the magnitude of these public debt charges and the burden they place upon the public treasury, it must be borne in mind that a substantial portion of the debt is attributable to, or is invested in, productive or earning assets. Therefore, in calculating the net burden of the government's annual interest charges, the income derived from loans, investments and other productive assets must be taken into account. For 1959–60 this income was $239 million as shown in the non-tax revenue section under the heading "Return on investments". This amount deducted from the gross total of $738 million for interest as shown in the above table leaves a net amount of $499 million compared with a net of $386 million in 1958–59.

Subsidies and tax-sharing payments to provinces

Payments to the provinces during 1959–60 for statutory subsidies, rentals under the Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act, the transitional and additional grants to Newfoundland, and the transfer of a portion of income tax receipts from certain public utility companies are expected to amount to $522 million compared with $467 million in 1958–59.

Charges to budgetary expenditures in 1959-60 under the Federal-Provincial tax-sharing arrangements, including adjustments made on account of previous years, were $61 million more than in 1958–59. The increase was occasioned by higher individual income tax collections and corporation taxable income for the 1959 taxation year.

(in millions of dollars)

Subsidies and Tax-Sharing Payments to Provinces	Fiscal year ended March 31		Increase or decrease (−)

	522.0	467.0	55.0

Payments to the provinces under the Federal-Provincial tax-sharing arrangements in 1959–60 were adjusted by deducting a total of $1 million from the tax-sharing entitlement of the provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Manitoba and Saskatchewan. These deductions represented recovery of one-fifth of overpayments made to those provinces under the 1952 tax-rental agreements on account of an over-estimation of their population as revealed by the 1956 census. By memoranda of agreement with the provinces concerned, the 1952 tax-rental agreements were amended to authorize the recovery of the overpayment in equal monthly deductions from the tax-sharing payments of those provinces over the five-year life of the new agreements.

Under the Newfoundland Additional Grants Act, pursuant to the report of the Royal Commission on Newfoundland Finances appointed under clause 29 of the Terms of Union, Newfoundland is to receive additional grants for the fiscal years 1957–58 to 1961–62 inclusive. The additional grant for 1959–60 was $7.3 million. The additional grant of $13.6 million paid in 1958–59 was for two fiscal years.

Statutory subsidies at $21 million in 1959–60 were virtually unchanged from the previous year.

A summary of payments, by provinces, during 1959–60 is given in the following table:

(in millions of dollars)

The amount of public utility tax receipts to be transferred to the provinces in 1959–60 is estimated to amount to $9 million, virtually unchanged from the previous year. Section 6 of the Tax-Rental Agreements Act, 1952, authorized the payment to the provinces, whether participating in an agreement or not, of a portion of the income tax collected from corporations whose main business was the distribution to, or the generation for distribution to, the public of electrical energy, gas or steam. The 1958–59 payment represented the transferrable portion of the income tax from the above corporations for the taxation year 1956. That payment was the last transfer authorized under the 1952 Tax-Rental Agreements Act; the payment for 1959–60 was authorized by Vote 114 of Appropriation Act No. 5, 1959.

Fisheries

Expenditures of the Department of Fisheries amounted to $20 million in 1959–60, $3 million more than was spent in 1958–59. Increases of $2 million in outlays by the field services division and $1 million in administration and general costs accounted for the change.

Labour

Expenditures of the Department of Labour amounted to $104 million during 1959–60, an increase of $17 million over the 1958–59 total of $87 million. Increases of $8 million in the government contribution to the Unemployment Insurance Fund, $8 million in payments to provinces for assistance to municipalities for winter works projects and $1 million in payments to provinces under the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act were the main factors contributing to this increase.

Authorized payments to a province by the Government of Canada during 1959–60 of amounts not exceeding one-half of the cost of labour incurred on winter works projects are expected to total $8 million compared with $250 thousand in 1958–59.

Unemployment Insurance Act administration and government's contribution

Expenditures in 1959–60 relating to the Act (excluding the government's payment as an employer) amounted to $81 million compared with $72 million in 1958–59.

Unemployment insurance benefit payments are not charged directly to budgetary expenditures but are paid from the unemployment insurance fund which is financed by equal contributions from employees and employers, by interest earned on investments, and by the government's contribution of an amount equal to one-fifth of the combined employee-employer contributions.

The government's contribution to the fund for 1959–60 was $45 million and administrative costs were $36 million; the corresponding amounts for 1958–59 were $37 million and $35 million respectively.

Mines and Technical Surveys

Expenditures of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys totalled $55 million for 1959–60, an increase of $11 million over the total for 1958–59.

The Budget—Appendix

The increase of $11 million was due mainly to increases of $6 million in the expenditures of the Dominion Coal Board for payments in connection with the movements of coal and $3 million in emergency gold mining assistance.

National Health and Welfare

Expenditures for the Department of National Health and Welfare (excluding outlays of $4 million for civil defence) during 1959–60 amounted to $810 million, a decrease of $59 million from the 1958–59 total of $869 million.

Outlays for the national health branch totalled $226 million in 1959–60, reflecting an increase of $95 million over the previous year's total, almost entirely due to the increase of $95 million in government contributions under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act.

During 1959–60 expenditures of the welfare branch decreased by $154 million from the 1958–59 total. Estimated increases of $17 million in payments for family allowances, $12 million for unemployment assistance and $1 million for disabled persons allowances, were more than offset by the fact that there was no comparable charge in 1959–60 to the 1958–59 expenditure of $184 million for the reduction in the amount of temporary loans to the old age security fund.

General health grants to the provinces for assistance in hospital construction, general health services and the control of diseases are estimated to be $46 million in 1959–60, approximately the same as in 1958–59.

Hospital insurance and diagnostic services

The Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, Statutes of 1957, authorized contributions by Canada in respect of programmes administered by the provinces, providing hospital insurance and laboratory and other services in aid of diagnosis. Payments for 1959–60 are estimated at $150 million compared with $55 million in 1958–59. The increase of $95 million was due mainly to the fact that during the previous fiscal year no province had participated in the plan for a full year whereas in 1959–60 seven provinces had participated for a full year and two provinces for a partial year. The effective date of each agreement is as follows:—July 1, 1958 for Newfoundland, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia; January 1, 1959 for Nova Scotia and Ontario; July 1, 1959 for New Brunswick; and October 1, 1959 for Prince Edward Island.

Family allowances

Family allowances are payable in respect of all children under sixteen resident in Canada, with minor exceptions such as in the case of children of immigrants who must reside in Canada a year before an allowance is payable.

The monthly allowance is $6 if the child is under 10 years and $8 in the age group 10 to 15. Children of immigrants receive family assistance of $5 per month during their first year of residence in Canada from the Department of Citizenship and Immigration if during that period they are under sixteen years of age.

Family allowance payments in 1959–60 amounted to $491 million and represented 9 per cent of total expenditures. The increase of $17 million over the previous year reflected the increase in the number of children in the eligible age groups.

Temporary loans to the old age security fund

In 1959–60 payments of $574 million out of the fund exceeded receipts of $550 million resulting in a deficit of $24 million which was covered by temporary loans by the Minister of Finance. In the budget speech of April 9, 1959 the Minister stated that since provision was being made for the necessary revenues (by increases in the old age security tax rates) to bring the fund into balance over the next two or three years he did not propose to treat the 1959–60 deficit as a budgetary charge in that year but to carry it forward into 1960–61.

Old age assistance, disabled persons allowances, blind persons allowances and unemployment assistance

Under the Old Age Assistance Act, the federal government reimburses the provinces by paying 50 per cent of the lesser of $55 monthly or the amount of assistance given by the provinces in the form of monthly pensions to eligible persons in need who are in the age group 65 to 69. (Under the Old Age Security Act, all persons 70 years and over who satisfy the residence requirements of the Act may receive a pension of $55 per month from the federal government out of the old age security fund.) Similarly, the federal government reimburses the provinces under the Blind Persons Act for allowances of not more than $55 per month to blind persons in need 18 years of age or over by paying 75 per cent of the total payments, and under the Disabled Persons Act by paying 50 per cent of not more than $55 per month for allowances to disabled persons in need 18 years of age or over. In 1959–60 payments of $30 million for old age assistance and $4 million for blind persons allowances were approximately the same as in 1958–59 while payments of $16 million in respect of disabled persons allowances were $1 million higher than in 1958–59.

Under the Unemployment Assistance Act the federal government contributes up to 50 per cent of the cost of unemployment assistance paid by the provinces, subject to certain deductions as set out in the Act. All provinces have now signed agreements with the federal government. There was an increase of $12 million in these contributions over those for the previous year.

National Research Council

Expenditures of the National Research Council amounted to $31 million in 1959–60, $6 million higher than for 1958–59. Increases of $2 million in scholarships and grants in aid of research, $2 million in construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, and $1 million in salaries and operating expenses were the main factors in this increase.

In addition, under the Queen Elizabeth II Canadian Research Fund Act, 1959, an amount of $1 million was paid to The Queen Elizabeth II Canadian Fund to aid in Research on the Diseases of Children.

National Revenue

Expenditures of the Department of National Revenue were $69 million in 1959-60, approximately the same as in 1958–59.

Northern Affairs and National Resources

Expenditures of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources in the fiscal year 1959–60 were $81 million, an increase of $16 million over the total for 1958–59.

The Budget—Appendix

The main increases in expenditures of this department were in the northern administration and lands branch and in the national parks branch. The increase of $12 million in the northern administration and lands branch was due mainly to increases of $7 million in contributions to the provinces to assist in the development of roads leading to resources, $3 million in operation and maintenance in the Northwest Territories and $2 million for construction in the Yukon Territory. Outlays for the national parks branch increased by $3 million due to higher expenditures for the national parks and historic sites services.

Post Office

Gross expenditures of the Post Office Department for 1959–60 were $194 million, an increase of $10 million over the 1958–59 outlay of $184 million.

Remuneration of postmasters and staffs at revenue and semi-staff offices, commissions at sub-offices and certain other authorized disbursements are paid from revenue. These payments, included in the total of $194 million, amounted to $26 million in 1959–60, approximately the same as for 1958–59.

Public Works

Expenditures of the Department of Public Works for 1959–60 amounted to $215 million, compared with $226 million for 1958–59, a decrease of $11 million.

Increases of $4 million in development engineering services and $1 million in outlays for the National Capital Commission were more than offset by decreases of $15 million in public buildings—construction and services and $3 million in payments to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in respect of defence housing administration, housing research and slum clearance, and reimbursement of losses sustained as a result of the operation of Federal-Provincial housing projects.

Outlays for the National Capital Commission were shown in previous years with Privy Council expenditures. For purposes of comparison the 1958–59 costs have been included with Public Works expenditures in the following table.

[1] Formerly reported under Privy Council expenditures.

Expenditures for "Public buildings—construction and services" declined by $15 million during 1959–60 due mainly to reductions in outlays for the acquisition, construction and improvement of public buildings of $6 million in Ottawa and $10 million in other centres in Canada partly offset by $1 million in maintenance and operation costs.

The increase of $4 million in the expenditures of the development engineering services was due mainly to increases of $1 million in contributions to the provinces under the terms of the Trans-Canada Highway Act, $2 million in increased expenditures in connection with the Trans-Canada Highway through national parks and $1 million in general services.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police

Expenditures for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police amounted to $53 million for 1959–60, $2 million more than the total spent in 1958–59.

Payments as shown in the table represent gross expenditures; payments received from the provinces and municipalities for police services amounting to $10 million were credited to revenue.

Increased expenditures of $5 million for the land, air and training divisions were offset partially by decreases of $3 million in headquarters administration and national police services and smaller decreases in marine services and the government contribution to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police pension account.

Trade and Commerce

Expenditures of the Department of Trade and Commerce totalled $67 million for 1959–60, an increase of $2 million over the previous year.

The main item responsible for this increase was the $4 million increase in payments of carrying costs of temporary wheat reserves, partially offset by the fact that there was no comparable charge in 1959–60 to the $2 million expenditure in 1958–59 to the Canadian Wheat Board on account of the loss on oats for the crop year 1956–57.

Outlays for air services increased by $6 million during 1959–60 attributable primarily to expanded services for aviation and include increases of $4 million in expenditures of the telecommunications branch and $2 million in increased costs of the meteorological branch.

Canal services expenditures decreased by $3 million during the year due mainly to the transfer of the Welland Canal to The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, and to elimination in full or in part of canals due to the opening of the Seaway. Outlays for marine services increased by $3 million due to expanded northern supply operations.

Expenditures of railway and steamship services increased by $12 million due mainly to payments of $9 million under the Freight Rate Reduction Act for which there was no comparable charge in 1958–59 and increases of $2 million in expenditure towards construction and acquisition of auto-ferries and $1 million in payments under the Maritime Freight Rates Act.

The payment in respect of the Canadian National Railways deficit for 1959 was $8 million less than the comparable figure for 1958, and the non-active advances to the National Harbours Board were $2 million less than in the previous fiscal year.

Veterans Affairs

Expenditures of the Department of Veterans Affairs amounted to $290 million in 1959–60, an increase of $1 million over the 1958–59 total of $289 million.

An increase of $3 million in war veterans allowances and other benefits was offset partially by decreases of $1 million in pensions for disability or death and $1 million in expenditures in respect of the Soldier Settlement and Veterans Land Acts.

All other departments

Expenditures of the departments not dealt with in preceding sections amounted to $30 million, a decrease of $1 million from the 1958-59 total.

The most significant change in the expenditures of these departments was the reduction of nearly $3 million in the expenses of the Office of the Chief Electoral Officer due to the 1958–59 figure having included part of the costs of the last federal election. However, this decrease was offset partly by increases in expenditures of other departments.

A. CHANGES IN PRINCIPAL LIABILITY CLASSIFICATIONS DURING 1959-60

The gross liabilities of the government increased by $747 million during the fiscal year. The main changes were increases of $313 million in unmatured debt, $267 million in annuity, insurance and pension accounts and $187 million in current and demand liabilities.

Current and demand liabilities

This category consists of obligations of the government payable currently or on demand. The principal changes were increases of $176 million in non-interest bearing notes, $11 million in accounts payable, $14 million in interest due and outstanding and $16 million in interest accrued and decreases of $7 million in matured debt and $2 million in outstanding money orders.

The increase of $176 million in non-interest bearing notes was due to the increase in Canada's quota to the international monetary fund in October 1959. A more detailed explanation will be found under the asset category "Other loans and investments".

Accounts payable are those payments made in April in accordance with section 35 of the Financial Administration Act but which are applicable to the previous fiscal year.

During 1959–60 a change was made in the system of recording Post Office accounts. In prior years these accounts were recorded in one account named "Post Office—net liability for money orders, etc." which was maintained under the current and demand liability category. In 1959–60 this account was distributed to the following accounts:—"Outstanding money orders" under the current and demand liability category, "Philatelic trust account" under the deposit and trust category and "Cash on hand and in transit" and "Departmental working capital" under the current asset category. For purposes of comparison the corresponding balances for the previous year are shown in the appropriate tables.

Deposit and trust accounts

In these accounts are recorded sundry funds deposited with the Receiver General of Canada or held in trust for various purposes. The net decrease of $24 million was due mainly to a decrease of $18 million in the account "United States—S.A.C. bases", which records funds received from the United States Government for the purpose of facilitating the placing of contracts by the R.C.A.F. on behalf of the U.S.A.F.

Annuity, insurance and pension accounts

This category records the amounts to the credit of the various annuity, insurance and pension accounts.

There was a net decrease in the unemployment insurance fund during the year of $126 million. The balance at March 31, 1960 was $384 million compared with $510 million at March 31, 1959. Benefit payments were $409 million and receipts were $283 million consisting of contributions by employers and employees of $227 million, government contributions of $46 million and income from investments of $10 million. Benefit payments were $70 million lower than the $479 million paid out in 1958–59.

The government annuities account increased by $52 million reflecting the amount by which premium receipts of $57 million, interest credited to the account by the government of $43 million and a small amount required to maintain the reserve exceeded payments of $48 million to annuitants and beneficiaries.

The increase of $94 million in the superannuation account was due mainly to the government's contribution of $40 million equal to the estimated current and prior service payments of individuals in 1958–59 and $47 million interest credited to the account. The remainder of the increase was due to the excess of employees' current and prior service contributions of $40 million and miscellaneous receipts of $1 million over benefit payments of $34 million.

The permanent services pension account increased by $114 million. The increase reflected the government's contribution of $52 million which is made at the rate of one and two-thirds times the current and prior service contributions, interest on the account of $40 million, and contributions of $32 million by permanent services personnel for current and prior years service less payments of $10 million from the account.

Old age security fund

Under the Old Age Security Act pensions of $55 per month are paid, without a means test, from the old age security fund to all eligible persons seventy years of age and over. Payments from the fund during the fiscal year were $574 million while credits to the fund from the tax on personal incomes (maximum tax $90), the tax on corporation profits and the sales tax totalled $550 million. Temporary loans amounting to $24 million were required to cover the deficit resulting from these transactions during 1959–60.

In 1958–59 payments were $559 million, receipts were $375 million and the deficit in the fund covered by temporary loans of $184 million was charged to 1958–59 budgetary expenditure by authority of parliament.

The increase of $175 million in 1959–60 in receipts from the old age security taxes was due to the increases in the rates announced in last year's budget speech. These were: an increase from 2 per cent to 3 per cent in the tax on personal incomes with a maximum contribution of $90 (previously $60) effective July 1, 1959; an increase from 2 per cent to 3 per cent in the tax on corporate incomes effective January 1, 1959; and an increase from 2 per cent to 3 per cent in the tax on sales effective April 10, 1959.

Undisbursed balances of appropriations to special accounts

This category records the undisbursed balances of appropriations to special accounts for which moneys have been appropriated by parliament and from which disbursements may be made for authorized purposes in periods subsequent to that in which the appropriation was made.

The increase of $5 million in the railway grade crossing fund represented the amount by which the $15 million credited to the fund and charged to budgetary expenditure exceeded disbursements from the fund.

In 1959–60 an amount of $50 million was credited to the Colombo plan fund and charged to budgetary expenditure but as disbursements were approximately the same there was no significant change in the balance at March 31, 1960 from the balance at March 31, 1959.

The balance in the national capital fund was $2 million at March 31, 1960 compared with $1 million at March 31, 1959. The increase represented the amount by which the $4 million credited to the fund and charged to budgetary expenditure exceeded disbursements of $3 million.

Deferred credits

This category records the amounts of deferred interest on loans and advances to certain Crown corporations and national governments and other deferred payments due the government. These are contra accounts to corresponding items under "Cash—in blocked currencies", "Loans to, and investments in, Crown corporations ", "Loans to national governments" and "Other loans and investments". Further explanations are given under these categories.

Balances receivable under agreements of sale of Crown assets are set up as contra accounts to corresponding items under "Other loans and investments". The net decrease of $3 million during the year was due to the receipt of payments on outstanding agreements having exceeded the total amount of new agreements set up in the account.

The increase of $12 million in deferred interest in respect of The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority represented interest due to the government during 1959–60 on outstanding loans to the corporation.

Suspense accounts

These accounts consist of balances where some uncertainty as to disposition exists.

The "Paylist deductions" account consists of deductions for Canada savings bonds, income tax, etc., which are credited to this account pending transmittal to the Department of Finance or to the department concerned.

The "Replacement of materiel" account established by section 11 of the National Defence Act is credited with amounts realized from the sale of materiel that has not been declared surplus to requirements but has been authorized by the Governor in Council to be sold to other countries. The account is debited with disbursements representing amounts paid for the procurement of replacement materiel. During 1959–60 disbursements exceeded credits to the account by $10 million.

Unmatured debt

The unmatured debt of Canada at the close of 1959–60 amounted to $15,887 million compared with $15,574 million at the close of the previous fiscal year. Debt payable in Canada increased by $313 million. There was no change in debt payable in London and New York.

In the year under review, unmatured debt obligations payable in foreign currencies have been stated in Canadian dollars converted at the rate of $2.80 for the pound sterling and par for the U.S. dollar.

B. Changes In Principal Asset Classifications During 1959–60

The total of assets increased during 1959–60 by $343 million. The principal changes were increases of $201 million in loans to Crown corporations and $256 million in other loans and investments and decreases of $56 million in current assets, $35 million in loans to national governments and $31 million in advances to the exchange fund.

Current assets

There was a decrease of $56 million in this category during the fiscal year, due to decreases of $76 million in cash and $22 million in the securities investment account which were partly offset by increases of $39 million in departmental working capital advances and revolving funds and $3 million in moneys received after March 31.

Cash in current and special deposits decreased by $76 million and moneys received after March 31, 1960 is estimated to increase by $3 million.

"Post Office—cash on hand and in transit" is a new account set up in 1959–60. For purposes of comparison the 1958–59 balance has been recorded in the above table. The balance was previously included in the current and demand liability account "Post Office—net liability for money orders, etc.".

The increase of $39 million in working capital advances and revolving funds was due to an increase of $49 million in the agricultural commodities stabilization account partly offset by a decrease of $10 million in the defence production revolving fund.

Advances to the exchange fund

Advances during the year to the exchange fund account to finance the purchase of gold and foreign exchange amounted to $119 million and repayments were $150 million, reducing outstanding advances to $1,964 million at March 31, 1960.

Sinking fund and other investments held for retirement of unmatured debt

There was an increase of $1 million in this category during the fiscal year bringing the balance to $84 million at March 31, 1960.

Loans to, and investments in, Crown corporations

These loans and investments increased by $201 million during 1959–60 bringing the balance in this category to $3,472 million at March 31, 1960.

[1] Formerly the Canadian Farm Loan Board.

Advances to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, to be covered by obligations or shares of the company, amounted to $2 million during the year.

Loans to the Farm Credit Corporation (formerly the Canadian Farm Loan Board) amounted to $31 million during the year while repayments by the board were $1 million bringing the total advances to $117 million at March 31, 1960.

Loans to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation during the year amounted to $360 million, of which $351 million was for direct loans by the corporation and $9 million for federal-provincial housing projects. Repayments totalled $35 million of which $32 million was in respect of direct loans, $2 million in respect of loans for federal-provincial housing projects and $1 million in respect of loans for house construction. The net increase for the year of $325 million brought the total loans to the corporation to $1,329 million at March 31, 1960.

Loans to the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation in connection with the construction of the Northern Ontario section of the all-Canadian natural gas pipe line totalled $8 million in 1959–60.

Advances to The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority amounted to $23 million bringing the total loans to $293 million. In addition deferred interest on these loans was increased by $12 million being the amount of interest due on December 31, 1959. A contra item for this amount is included in the liability category "Deferred credits".

In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1960, the government advanced to the Canadian National Railway Company the sum of $167 million for capital purposes and retirement of debt in the hands of the public. Of this amount $6 million was advanced for the Company's Purchase Fund which is operated under the terms of Canadian National Railway Company bonds, guaranteed by the Government of Canada, issued on May 15, 1959, December 15, 1959 and January 1, 1960. During the year ended March 31, 1960, repayment of current and prior years' advances totalled $446 million (of which $441 million was made available through the sale of $450 million of the above-mentioned bonds).

In addition, to assist the Company to finance further capital expenditure during the fiscal year, the government purchased $22 million of four per cent preferred stock of the Canadian National Railway Company. This stock is issued under the authority of the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act, 1952, in an amount equal to three per cent of the gross revenue of the Company.

Further, in the year which ends March 31, 1960, the government provided the Company with temporary loans of $30 million to cover in part the 1959 income deficit. This amount plus temporary loans totalling $14 million made on the same account in the year ended March 31, 1959, brought the total of the loans on account of the 1959 deficit to $44 million which was charged to budgetary expenditure in 1959–60.

In addition, temporary loans of $14 million were made in February 1960 to the Company in respect of its 1960 income deficit.

In summary, the total amount made available to the Company during the year was $233 million and repayments amounted to $489 million. The amount of advances to the Company outstanding at the end of the fiscal year was thus reduced by $256 million.

At March 31, 1959, temporary loans of $2 million were outstanding to the Trans-Canada Air Lines in respect of its 1959 income deficit. During 1959–60 a further advance of $1 million was made. The total amount of $3 million was repaid during the year. In addition $1 million was advanced in respect of its 1960 income deficit.

Other changes included increases of $16 million in loans to the National Harbours Board, $21 million in advances to the Northern Canada Power Commission, $9 million in advances to the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, $11 million in loans to the National Capital Commission, $2 million in advances to the Canadian Commercial Corporation and a decrease of $1 million in loans to the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited.

The Budget—Appendix

Loans to national governments

These loans totalled $1,414 million at March 31, 1960, a decrease of $35 million during the fiscal year.

During the fiscal year the United Kingdom government repaid $16 million on the $1,185 million loan made under the $1,250 million credit authorized by the United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act, 1946, reducing the principal outstanding at March 31, 1960 to $1,064 million.

Repayments of advances under Part II of the Export Credits Insurance Act to certain foreign countries to assist them in purchasing goods and services in Canada amounted to $18 million during the year reducing the balance at March 31, 1960 to $268 million.

Miscellaneous loans and advances to foreign governments in the amount of $38 million at March 31, 1960 were approximately the same as at March 31, 1959.

Other loans and investments

There was an increase of $256 million in this category during the year bringing the balance to $939 million at March 31, 1960.

In October 1959, action was taken to implement an agreement whereby Canada's quota to the international monetary fund was increased from $300 million U.S. to $550 million U.S. The increase was equivalent to $240 million Canadian, of which $177 million was covered by non-interest bearing notes payable on demand, $3 million by a cash payment and the remainder by a transfer of gold to the fund. A contra entry for $177 million was made to the current liability account "Non-interest bearing notes payable on demand".

The accounts of the fund are maintained in terms of United States dollars, therefore, in order to keep Canada's subscription at the required amount, that portion represented by Canadian dollar balances is revalued quarterly and any settlement required is made annually as at April 30, the end of the fund's fiscal year. Revaluation adjustments resulted in a credit of $4 million to Canada.

The net increase of $236 million in the account during the year was due to the increase of $240 million in respect of Canada's quota, partly offset by the revaluation adjustments of $4 million.

Loans to provincial governments were reduced by $6 million and overpayments to certain provinces arising out of the 1952 tax-rental agreements by $1 million during the year.

Advances under the Veterans Land Act decreased by $5 million. The reserve for conditional benefits under the Act decreased by $4 million and consequently the net decrease was $1 million.

Miscellaneous loans and investments increased by $28 million during the year. Included in this increase are temporary loans of $24 million made to the old age security fund by the Minister of Finance during 1959–60 to cover the 1959–60 deficit in the fund. In 1958–59 temporary loans to the fund were charged to budgetary expenditure in accordance with Vote 764 of Appropriation Act No. 3, 1959. However in the budget speech of April 9, 1959 the Minister stated, that, since provision was being made for the necessary revenues (by increases in the old age security tax rates) to bring the fund into balance over the next two or three years, he did not propose to treat the 1959–60 deficit as a budgetary charge in that year but to carry it forward into 1960–61.

Securities held in trust

This category records the security holdings of various liability accounts. There was a decrease in this account of $1 million, the balance at March 31, 1960, being $19 million.

Deferred charges

This category consists of the residual balance of discounts and commissions, redemption bonuses and conversion premiums on loan flotations that have not been amortized or written off to expenditures.

The balance in the account at March 31, 1960 of $153 million was $6 million more than the balance at March 31, 1959. Costs of new loans issued in 1959–60 and charged to the account were $59 million, of which $16 million was in respect of treasury bill discounts which will be charged to interest on public debt in 1960–61. Credited to the account was $53 million of which $46 million was charged to annual amortization costs and $7 million representing discount on treasury bills sold in 1958–59 was charged to interest on public debt in the 1959–60 budgetary expenditure accounts.

Unamortized portion of actuarial deficiencies

There was no change in the unamortized portion of the actuarial deficiencies in the superannuation and permanent services pension accounts. The balance remained at $465 million.

Suspense accounts

There was an increase of $2 million in this category during the fiscal year, due mainly to revaluation adjustments of Canadian dollar balances in the international monetary fund. A further explanation of these revaluation adjustments is given in the comments on the account "International monetary fund" maintained under the asset category "Other loans and investments".

Capital assets

Capital assets, which consist of assets of the government such as land, buildings, works and equipment, etc., that are charged to budgetary expenditures at the time of acquisition or construction, are shown on the statement of assets and liabilities at a nominal value of $1.

Inactive loans and advances

This category records loans and advances which are not currently revenue-producing or realizable. Included are the loan of $49 million to China under the Export Credits Insurance Act, loans of $24 million and $7 million made to Roumania and Greece in 1919–20 and 1920–21 and advances of $13 million in respect of the implementation of guarantees (Ming Sung Industrial Company Limited).

Reserve for losses on realization of assets

There was no change in this reserve during the year. The balance at March 31, 1960 remained at $546 million.

C. Increase in Net Debt

The budgetary deficit of $406 million for the fiscal year 1959–60 less an adjustment of $2 million in respect of prior years' transactions increased the net debt of Canada from $11,678 million at March 31, 1959 to $12,082 million at March 31, 1960.

5. THE CASH POSITION

The government's cash position is affected not only by the budgetary transactions explained in some detail in preceding sections but also by non-budgetary transactions and changes in the government's outstanding unmatured debt. Although there was a budgetary deficit estimated at $406 million in 1959–60, the government's bank balances decreased by only $76 million during the same period. This decrease was the net result of the budgetary deficit of $406 million, net disbursements of $3 million from non-budgetary transactions and an increase of $333 million in outstanding unmatured debt (after taking into account transactions in the securities investment and sinking fund accounts).

Non-budgetary receipts and disbursements relate to transactions which result in increases or decreases in the government's assets and liabilities and do not appear in what might be called the government's income account for the fiscal year nor do they enter into the calculation of the annual budgetary surplus or deficit. However, in considering the full scope of the government's financial operations and in measuring their effect on the government's cash position and their impact on the economy, non-budgetary as well as budgetary transactions must be taken into account.

The increases or decreases in the government's assets and liabilities have been described in detail in the section entitled "Statement of Assets and Liabilities of Canada". On the assets side the non-budgetary transactions consist, for the most part, of loans and advances to, and repayments by, Crown corporations and other government agencies and funds (including the old age security fund), national, provincial and municipal governments, international organizations, veterans and other borrowers. On the liabilities side they relate mainly to receipts and payments in connection with the many deposit and trust accounts, and annuity, insurance and pension funds held or administered by the government.

The following statement summarizes both the budgetary and non-budgetary transactions for 1959–60 and indicates how they, together with the changes in unmatured debt, affected the government's cash position. For purposes of comparison the corresponding figures for 1958–59 are also shown.

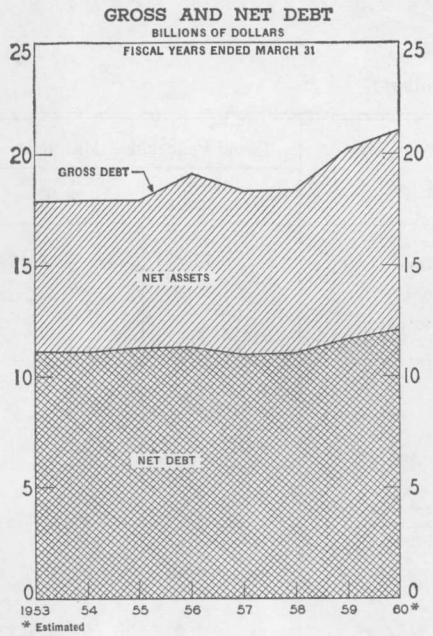
As the table shows, non-budgetary receipts and credits for 1959–60 (excluding unmatured debt transactions) totalled $942 million while non-budgetary disbursements and charges (also excluding unmatured debt transactions) amounted to $945 million, resulting in a net disbursement of $3 million from non-budgetary transactions. As there was a budgetary deficit of $406 million, $409 million required financing by an increase in unmatured debt or a decrease in cash balances. In 1958–59 there was a requirement of $664 million for non-budgetary transactions and this, together with the budgetary deficit of $609 million resulted in $1,273 million having to be financed by an increase in unmatured debt or a decrease in cash balances.

Non-budgetary receipts and credits, as already indicated, totalled $942 million in 1959–60. Repayments of loans, investments and working capital advances were $348 million and included $256 million from the Canadian National Railways, $10 million from the defence production revolving fund, $31 million from the exchange fund, $16 million from the United Kingdom Government on account of the Financial Agreement Act, 1946 and $18 million from other national governments on loans made under Part II of the Export Credits Insurance Act. Net government annuities account receipts were $52 million and net insurance and pension accounts receipts were $216 million. The net proceeds from the sale of investments of the unemployment insurance fund to finance payments out of the fund amounted to $125 million, and net receipts and credits in various other accounts amounted to $201 million.



Non-budgetary disbursements and charges amounted to $945 million. Loans, investments and working capital advances were $770 million and included net advances of $49 million to the agricultural commodities stabilization account in connection with the purchase and sale of commodities, after allowing for a charge of $58 million to budgetary expenditures in respect of the operating loss for 1959–60, $9 million to the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation for additions and betterments to facilities, $325 million to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the purpose of making housing loans, $30 million to the Farm Credit Corporation for the purpose of making loans to farmers, $11 million to the National Capital Commission for the purpose of acquiring land in the National Capital area not required for immediate use, $16 million to the National Harbours Board for reconstruction and capital expenditures, $21 million to Northern Canada Power Commission for power plant construction in Northern Canada and assistance under the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act, $8 million to the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation for financing the Northern Ontario section of the natural gas pipe line, $24 million by way of temporary loans to the old age security fund, $23 million to The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority for dredging and construction of the seaway and $236 million in respect of a subscription to the capital of the international monetary fund. Net payments from the unemployment insurance fund were $126 million. Other non-budgetary disbursements and charges amounted to $49 million.

In summary, as budgetary and non-budgetary transactions during 1959–60 required financing in an amount estimated at $409 million, and unmatured debt outstanding in the hands of the public (after taking into account transactions in the securities investment and sinking fund accounts) increased by $333 million, cash balances on deposit with the banks decreased by $76 million.

6. THE PUBLIC DEBT

Gross and net debt

During the fiscal year ended March 31, 1960, the gross public debt increased by $747 million to $20,997 million. This increase was made up of increases of $313 million in unmatured debt and $434 million in other liabilities. During the year the government's recorded net assets increased by $343 million. The net debt increased by $404 million to $12,082 million, reflecting the budgetary deficit of $406 million less an adjustment of $2 million in respect of prior years' transactions.

Unmatured debt

The total unmatured debt of Canada at March 31, 1960 was $15,887 million. This was $313 million more than the total at the end of the previous fiscal year. During the fiscal year the government's holdings of its own securities in the sinking fund and in the securities investment account showed a net decrease of $20 million. The net increase in the amount of outstanding unmatured debt in the hands of the public was $333 million.

The Budget—Appendix

Summary of security issues and redemptions during the year

During the year ended March 31, 1960, the government issued securities payable in Canadian dollars in the principal amount of $3,033 million (excluding the refunding of treasury bills which mature periodically but including the increase in the issue of treasury bills in the amount of $530 million) and redeemed or converted issues in the amount of $2,720 million. The total amount redeemed or converted was payable in Canadian dollars.

The following is a summarized table of changes in unmatured debt for the last two years:

At March 31, 1960, the outstanding unmatured debt payable in U.S. dollars was $150 million, unchanged from March 31, 1959. The amount payable in sterling was $52 million, also unchanged from the previous year.

Net sales of Canada savings bonds, 1959 series, as at March 31, 1960 amounted to $1,425 million and additional sales of Canada savings bonds, 1958 series, during the year were $30 million and redemptions of Canada savings bonds series 4 to 13 (of which series 4 matured on November 1, 1959) were $1,170 million. The net increase during the year for all series was $285 million and the amount outstanding at March 31, 1960 was $3,133 million.

The issue of treasury bills was increased by $530 million during the fiscal year and the amount outstanding at March 31, 1960 was $2,125 million, consisting of $1,375 million in three-month bills, $510 million in six-month bills, $200 million in special one-year bills (due June 10, 1960) and $40 million in special 253 day bills (due June 10, 1960). The March 31, 1959 balance of $1,595 million consisted entirely of three-month bills.

Interest rates

The average interest rate on the government's unmatured debt at March 31, 1960 was 3.96 per cent compared with 3.54 per cent at the end of the previous fiscal year.

Treasury bill yields reflected a trend similar to that of general interest rates. The yield on three-month bills at tender on April 2, 1959 was 4.33 per cent. On August 13, 1959, the yield had risen to a high for the year of 6.16 per cent and was 4.02 per cent at tender on March 17, 1960.

The yield on six-month bills was 5.27 per cent at tender on May 7, 1959 (the first issue during the year). On August 13, 1959 the yield had risen to 6.87 per cent and was 4.26 per cent at tender on March 17, 1960. The yield on the one-year bills issued June 10, 1959 was 5.49 per cent and the yield on the 253 day bills issued October 1, 1959 was 6.80 per cent.

The Budget—Appendix

The following table shows the high and low yields together with the yield on the last issue of three-month bills for the fiscal years ended March 31, 1956 to 1960 inclusive, and for six-month bills for the fiscal year 1959–60:

Indirect debt or contingent liabilities

In addition to the direct debt set out in the statement of assets and liabilities the government has assumed certain indirect or contingent obligations. These consist of securities of the Canadian National Railways, guaranteed as to principal and interest, or as to interest only, and a number of miscellaneous guarantees, the chief of which are the guarantee of insured loans made by chartered banks and other approved lending institutions under the National Housing Act, 1954, deposits maintained by the chartered banks in the Bank of Canada, bank advances to the Canadian Wheat Board, advances under the Export Credits Insurance Act and bank loans under the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

The government's liability under its guarantee of insured loans under the National Housing Act, 1954 was $2,678 million at December 31, 1959, compared with $2,059 million at December 31, 1958.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, April 1, 1960

The house met at 11 a.m.

RAILWAYS, AIR LINES AND SHIPPING

Second report of sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping—Mr. Rowe.

GRAIN

OATS AND BARLEY—CLOSING OF POOLS AND DISTRIBUTION OF SURPLUSES

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make an announcement with regard to the oats and barley pools for the crop year 1958-59. These pools were closed out on March 4. The surplus for distribution on the oats pool is $3,153,318.57. The surplus for distribution on the barley pool is $5,335,502.66. The cheques for the final payments of the two pools will be issued commencing April 4.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

MALAYA—TRIBUTES ON PASSING OF HIS MAJESTY TUANKU ABDUL RAHMAN

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, members of the house will have read with regret the announcement that His Majesty Tuanku Abdul Rahman, the paramount ruler of Malaya, died this morning in Kuala Lumpur. His Majesty had been Malaya's distinguished head of state since that country became independent in 1957. He had played a significant part in fostering Malaya's links with the commonwealth, and in his capacity as head of state in a parliamentary democracy he had been closely associated with Malaya's admirable record of economic and political progress.

I shall always remember the generous hospitality extended to me on the occasion of my visit there, at which time he spoke in most glowing terms of Canada and its relationship with his country. I am sure I speak for all members of the house and for Canadians generally when I express sincere condolences to the Malayan government on the death of His Majesty.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the opposition is sorry to learn of the untimely death of the ruler of Malaya, and joins with the government in extending to the government of that country our deep and heartfelt condolences.

79951-0—178½

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we in the C.C.F. have learned with regret of the death of the ruler of Malaya. We join with the other political parties in this house in making unanimous the fact that the Canadian parliament is sorry to hear of His Majesty's death. We extend our sympathy to the government and the people of Malaya.

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR SETTLEMENT OF RIVER PILOTS' GRIEVANCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport of which I have given him notice. Perhaps he will reply on Monday.

Has the minister received a telegram from the Quebec river pilots setting out their grievances and requesting a settlement thereof prior to the opening of navigation? Can the minister tell the house whether those grievances have been studied by the department and what decision has been reached?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will bring this question to the attention of the Minister of Transport.

AGRICULTURE

PORK—REPORTED FAILURE TO OBTAIN DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean-Paul Racine (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I inquired about a petition reported to have been sent to the minister by more than 300 farmers, complaining that some business concerns are using the registration and numbers given to farmers to obtain deficiency payments on hogs. Would the minister indicate whether he has received that petition and whether he intends to do something about it?

(Text):

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I found what was really a long letter signed by a considerable number of farmers in the province of Quebec, and together with certain requests for information and so on there was a statement to the effect that there were rumours current that there was some trafficking going on with respect to farmers' registration numbers for the delivery of hogs. I have replied to that letter and have requested them, if they know of any definite instances, to inform us so that we may take appropriate action to put an end to the practice.

(Translation):

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (Megantic): I have a supplementary question. Would the minister indicate whether other similar cases were brought to his attention and, if so, what action he has taken?

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: As I indicated on Wednesday, I believe, this was the first intimation we had that any practices along this line were going on. We had anticipated, as I indicated on Wednesday, that there might be some attempts to beat the system, shall we say. We will prosecute any cases that we can discover and, as I indicated, the system is also set up in such a way that it is going to be pretty difficult for people to carry on practices of this kind to any extent without being detected. Of course punitive measures will then be taken against them.

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is this not a matter that should be referred to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for investigation?

Mr. Harkness: I do not think so, unless we receive some definite information in connection with particular infractions or suspected infractions of the rules and regulations. If the hon. member or any other hon. members opposite know of any definite cases I wish they would bring them to my attention so we can take appropriate measures.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

DANGER TO CHILDREN FROM HOUSEHOLD PRODUCTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister aware of a report to the effect that the food and drug administration of the United States has warned that ordinary products for household use cause 500 children's deaths each year and poison 600,000 more in the United States, and that a bill is now before congress calling for labelling as dangerous any detergents, waxes, furniture polish, bleaches, paints and other home cleaning aids that are poisonous, corrosive or inflamable? If so, is the Canadian government considering the introduction of similar measures in Canada?

[Mr. Harkness.]

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my department is fully aware of the hazards accompanying the use of several household products. The situation with respect to these dangers has been under close study and scrutiny in Canada for the past number of years. Present legislation within my department covers the drug aspect. The more general question has been taken up with the industry, and discussions are still going on.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASED INDEMNITIES FOR MEMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether his attention has been drawn to an article in this morning's Globe and Mail to the effect that indemnities of members of the Ontario legislature are to be increased, and whether similar action is planned with respect to this house.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): To the first question, yes; to the second question, no.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, in view of the great interest in the country as a whole, and particularly in the province of Alberta, I wonder whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce can confirm speculation that the government has received the national energy board report. If so, when does the government intend to take action on the report?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the report has been received.

Mr. McIlraith: It depends on who asks the question.

Mr. Churchill: I hope before the house rises today to inform the house as to that matter and when the decision of the government will be announced.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask a supplementary question. Can the minister say whether the government's policy in this regard has now been decided?

Mr. Churchill: All of this will be indicated in due course.

Mr. Argue: As a further supplementary question, does this answer mean the minister's statement that policy will be arrived at before the end of March has now been set aside?

Mr. Churchill: There has been no setting aside of anything, and no change in the announcement I have made earlier.

Mr. Argue: Has the policy been decided?

FLOODS

MANITOBA—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN RED RIVER CONTROL PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the minister of northern affairs whether an agreement has yet been reached with the government of Manitoba with regard to the sharing of the cost of flood control on the Red river.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister say whether negotiations are actively being carried on at the present time, particularly in the light of the statement he made last summer that the two governments had practically reached agreement?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): These matters take a little time, Mr. Speaker. There is give and take on both sides, and when some decision is arrived at the house will be made aware of it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister say whether negotiations are going on at the present time?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TAX-SHARING ARRANGEMENTS ACT

ALTERNATIVE ARRANGEMENTS FOR UNIVERSITY GRANTS—EXTENSION OF INDIVIDUAL INCOME TAX RATE

The house resumed from Friday, March 18, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Fleming (Eglinton)—Mr. Flynn in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act to provide certain alternative arrangements for payment, either by Canada through the Canadian Universities Foundation or directly by a province, of the grants to institutions of higher learning presently paid under the authority of the Appropriation Act: and also to extend for a further period of two years the rate of 13 per cent for standard individual income tax for the purpose of calculating the tax equalization payments to the provinces and the amounts payable to the provinces under the tax rental agreements.

(Translation):

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Chairman, when the debate was adjourned the other day, I was recalling certain remarks made last year by the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge) in justification of his stand on federal grants to universities. In his view, the exclusive rights of the provinces in the field of education, under section 93 of the act of 1867, did not apply to institutions of higher learning, and his suggestion, one of great import, was summed up as follows:

Therefore, I repeat that, in my opinion, the fathers of confederation, acting in good faith, have given no consideration whatever to universities, when the provision on education was inserted in section 93.

Without going that far, the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) said on July 18 last something that amounted to about the same thing, as reported on page 6374 of Hansard of that date. I quote:

Since they were established in 1951 we have always said that such grants—

The federal grants to universities.

—were constitutional.

And as if to convince himself further, the hon. member went on to say:

This system of grants was established as a direct compensation to Canadian universities for the national and international role that they are called upon to play and which greatly benefits the nation as a whole and the federal government itself.

Three days later, that statement of the hon. member for Laurier prompted Mr. Gerard Filion, manager of Le Devoir, to make the following comments:

Need we again point out that the Liberal theory put forward by Mr. Chevrier is basically unacceptable. According to the hon. member for Laurier, university grants are justified by the national and international character of those institutions of higher learning. It will be noted that the former minister fails to base his arguments on legal grounds—

This is still Mr. Filion speaking.

—because the texts are perfectly clear. Only the provinces have the right to legislate in educational matters, which implies that they have an exclusive right to collect funds for the maintenance of schools.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, the hon. members for Laurier and Megantic would have had quite a bit of trouble finding some legal basis for their statements. To suggest, as did the hon. member for Megantic, that the fathers of confederation never had universities or higher education in mind, when they conferred upon the provinces exclusive powers in the educational field, is to have a very poor opinion of the knowledge and foresight of the Macdonalds, Cartiers and others. What is more, this is an historical error which should be refuted if to prevent the serious consequences to which it might again expose us.

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, contrary to what the hon. member for Megantic seems to think, Laval was not the only Quebec university in 1867. There were also Bishop and McGill colleges. Furthermore, there were already some classical colleges where, in half the courses, university training in the Anglo-Saxon sense of the word, was being provided.

In fact, if we refer to the French edition of the Journal of Public Education, for that date, we see that, as early as March 1857, there were in United Canada five universities, two of them in Upper Canada and thirty three colleges, twenty five of them in Lower Canada.

If, at the time of confederation, Laval University was not yet getting any help from the government, the situation was different with regard to McGill and Bishop colleges, and I would refer the hon. member to the Journal of Education, English version, of 1864, volume 80, pages 157 and 158. Moreover, he will find there a list of eleven colleges that were already receiving grants. I fail to see how the politicians of 1867 were unaware of those facts.

Besides, the grants were being drawn out of specific funds and distributed under existing laws. In fact, if we refer to the revised statutes of Lower Canada, 1860, chapter 15, Part 3, we find there an "act concerning a provincial allowance in favour of higher education—and normal and common schools". It establishes an investment fund made up mostly of assets confiscated from the Jesuits. The superintendent of education for Lower Canada, in conjunction with the governor in council, is entrusted with the distribution of the returns. I quote section 6:

—for and between such universities, colleges, seminaries, academies, lycées or high schools, model schools and educational institutions, other than ordinary elementary schools.

On the other hand, in chapter XVII of the same statutes, there is the act concerning the Royal Institute for the Advancement of Science. According to that act, which incidentally, is but the outcome of several laws enacted over nearly a quarter of a century, the trustees are incorporated and their corporation holds in trust all lands and property donated by the founder of McGill college and by other benefactors, to help that institution carry on its mission.

How can we imagine that our legislators, in 1867, were unaware of those laws? Quite the contrary, they knew them so well that, in Appendix 4 of the act of 1867, they had considered as an "asset becoming the common property of Ontario and Quebec", among other things:

—the capital assets of universities—

And also:

—the Royal Institute.

Is that not clear and precise enough?

And there is more. When the federal statutes were revised in 1887, the commissioners who were setting out the matters over which the respective powers had jurisdiction pointed out very clearly that both the above-mentioned laws should be embodied in the revised statutes of Lower Canada.

In the light of those facts and laws, I am surely justified in coming to the conclusion that not only did our public men, in 1867, have both universities and classical colleges in mind when they sought and obtained from the imperial parliament that the provinces have exclusive jurisdiction over education, but in transferring to them the public funds, which, at the time, served to provide in part for those schools of higher learning, they clearly indicated their wish to let the provinces subsidize those schools. And this will, far from being merely a whim, fulfilled the essential conditions laid down by Lower Canada for joining the confederation. I turn to the testimony of George Brown himself who stated:

(Text):

Education, the rights of property and the civil law, we were compelled to leave to the local governments, in order to afford that protection which the lower Canadians claim for their language and their laws and their peculiar institutions.

(Translation):

Reference: Edward Whelan, The Union of the British provinces, 1865, page 187.

If we assume that federal participation in the financing of universities had really been in accord with the constitution, how can we imagine that none of our government leaders for more than 80 years, had not an inkling of it being so. Have they been remiss in their obligations towards institutions of higher learning, or were they simply poor ignoramuses? Because, let us not forget it, it is only through the Massey commission report, published on June 1, 1951, that the great discovery was made on the basis of which it was recommended:

—that the federal government make annual contributions to support the work of the universities on the basis of the population of each of the provinces of Canada.

And it was in that same month, June of that year, that was passed as the first contribution of the kind since confederation.

Once the precedent had been set—and Heaven knows the power of precedent under British law—it seemed only natural to repeat it in 1952, especially as the Massey report recommendation explicitly mentioned the word "annual". However, in that particular instance, important amendments were made to the terms of item No. 699, which then remained unchanged until 1956.

First, under the 1952 legislation, institutions qualifying for grants had to be recognized both by the federal government and by the provincial government in the province where they were operating. Moreover—and this is even more serious—the federal Minister of Finance was given the responsibility of defining the expressions "university level" and "university degree". And to give practical application to this utterly fantastic power, the government, on January 9, 1952, passed order in council P.C. 123, which gave a federal definition of those terms, and also of the terms "student" and "university". Just as a sample, let me quote the definition given of the phrase "university level":

> With regard to a province, a more advanced curriculum than is generally accepted in the provinces as a prerequisite to university enrolment.

That, you must admit, was a dangerous definition, the terms being so vague and indefinite.

Far from improving the situation, those conditions and terms only made it worse. In the province of Quebec, in particular, where universities and affiliated classical colleges control their own curricula and enjoy the greatest degree of freedom, a freedom that enables them to maintain the peculiar character of our educational system which is so well adapted to the cultural traditions of our people, how could such an intrusion be accepted in a field which the province regards with such pride and jealousy? That time, no further compromise was possible, and federal grants were spectacularly rejected.

There was another and quite serious danger. In a country like ours, where two living cultures are found beside each other, where programs and methods of education are based on either of them according to the ethnical element for which they are meant, where the structures of our institutions of higher learning differ among themselves as much as Quebec differs from the other provinces, it was extremely dangerous to give to each of the four designations "student", "university", "university level" and "university degree" a single definition applying to the whole country. Thus, according to a remark made by the Rev. Father Vanier, who was rector of Jean-de-Brebeuf college, "the heart and soul of the Anglo-Saxon type of universities is the "college", especially the faculty of arts and sciences where the student registers after the four or five years high school course, whereas, generally speaking, in Quebec, the B.A. degree which opens the door to the great faculties, is awarded only to students who have followed courses in letters, philosophy and applied sciences during four additional years at college.

Both those methods give excellent results; but I point out those facts only to show one of the basic differences between them, differences that the legislator had to take into consideration.

Is it surprising, after that—and it is the same educator who recalled it in December 1956—that newspapers from Halifax to Vancouver charged those who were responsible for this policy of federal grants to universities with the secret desire of achieving cultural unification and with endeavouring to put an end to the particularism of the province of Quebec.

The Minister of Finance will have had the merit of recognizing the full implications of the extremely serious objections we had made to the policy adopted by the federal government in 1951. Rejecting certain suggestions made by the hon. member for Laurier, he expressed his views on July 19 of last year, in these words:

> The province of Quebec has a point of view in regard to education which I think all hon. members of this committee have a duty to recognize. It is patent that a different view altogether is taken of this subject in the province of Quebec from the view that is taken in the other provinces of Canada.

I am still quoting from the minister's statement:

> Those who know the history of the province of Quebec understand the point of view of that province today and will know that Quebec regards this exclusive jurisdiction over education as something fundamental to the ethnic survival of that province and its people. This has been the view of the people of Quebec down through the years, that its jurisdiction over education is the sheet anchor of the survival of the culture, the language and the institutions of the province.

The minister added:

> I also say to the members of this committee that at this time no modification can be introduced into this item since the item has been known to universities which are free to accept their share and they are counting on it.

And the Minister of Finance went on to say:

> But, Mr. Chairman, having regard to the fact that nearly all of the universities of one province of this country are not receiving their share of these grants, before such an item or any item on this subject is presented to the house in another year a most intensive effort must be made to grapple with this very great difficulty. For my part, I give the committee my personal assurance that anything I can do to help to resolve this difficulty will certainly be done if effort and understanding can do it.

Those comments and this solemn pledge fully answered the wish that some of us Conservative members of the province of Quebec, had felt bound to express clearly and frankly. For my part, dealing with this problem in the house on April 22, 1959, I pointed out among other things—I apologize for quoting from my own speech—the following:

Whatever may be the value and strength of the precedent, in a federated country such as ours, the rights and powers conferred by the constitution are not subject to prescription. They never lapse. And this tenet is all the more to the point since the province of Quebec has never failed to abide by section 93 in its entirety. Therefore its position is absolutely unassailable and every effort of this government, in co-operation with the government of Quebec, should aim at finding as soon as possible a way to settle this thorny problem and to make it easier for the province to exercise its powers most freely in this field.

Then, after putting forward a few suggestions, I concluded with the following words:

I repeat, Mr. Speaker—and I close my remarks with that statement—that, faced with the importance of that problem of federal grants to university teaching; faced with the conflicts of opinions which they arouse in the province of Quebec; faced with the resistance shown by the Quebec government, in order to fully retain the exercise of a right all its own; faced with the deep-seated reasons motivating its attachment to that right, its will to defend and maintain it, I do hope the problem will be on the agenda of the next federal-provincial conference; that it will be approached and discussed with frankness and in a spirit of co-operation and, above all, I do hope it will be solved through some agreement. That will take into account the very basis of federalism, which may be summed up in two words: unity in diversity.

Since then, there have been talks between the Right Hon. Prime Minister of Canada and the hon. Minister of Finance, and the three premiers who, over a very short period of time, have successively headed the province of Quebec. This resolution is, in a way, the outcome of the courageous efforts made on both sides. Although, in principle, it remains based on the precedent of 1951 which, since then, has recurred each year, it might open the way to provinces that will see fit to use the taxation rights to which they are entitled and which they need to subsidize higher learning. It indicates, in the minds of our leaders, a tendency that Mr. Andre Laurendeau in Le Devoir of December 30, 1959—

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Bourget: Carry on.

[Mr. Dorion.]

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Let him continue.

The Chairman: Is the committee agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(Translation):

Mr. Dorion: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, thank you my dear colleagues.

It indicates, in the minds of our leaders, a tendency that Mr. Andre Laurendeau, in Le Devoir of December 30, 1959, described as definite, sound and shrewd. It takes into account political realities, by giving the provinces, in a matter over which they have exclusive jurisdiction, a chance to assume, if they so wish, obligations which the constitution clearly ascribes to them. It will allow the province of Quebec, in particular, to carry out the comprehensive plans it has in mind to substantially increase its contribution to our higher learning institutions, whose lofty mission consists in training the leaders of our ethnic communities. Let us hope that many of them will follow suit and eventually recognize that the best and surest basis for the solution of our national problems still lies in absolute and integral respect for the Canadian constitution.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Dorion: Of course, you may.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall ask it in English and the hon. member may reply in French.

(Text):

I understood the hon. gentleman to quote with approval a citation to the effect that the provincial government of Quebec had been giving assistance to institutions of higher learning outside the province of Quebec. Am I correct in thinking that the hon. gentleman did quote such a citation with approval? I refer to the University of Ottawa, for example. Do I understand that the hon. gentleman approves of that conduct?

Mr. Dorion: I should like to reply in English but I may not be able to do it too distinctly, and I shall therefore reply in French.

(Translation):

Well, Mr. Chairman, it is true that the province of Quebec has on occasion contributed funds to the University of Ottawa, and also, I think, to certain universities in Nova Scotia. I must say however that they were donations voted by the provincial legislature, and whether it was on an annual basis, I cannot say. They are donations voted by the Quebec legislature to help other French groups, or rather universities attended by French-speaking students.

As far as I know it is on that basis that such donations are sometimes voted for the benefit of those educational institutions of French culture.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. gentleman permit a second question? Will the hon. gentleman explain to me what is the difference in principle between the government of Quebec voting money to institutions outside that province, which are under the jurisdiction of another province, and the parliament of Canada voting money to free institutions in this free country of Canada, say for example those of the English language in the province of Quebec, with no strings attached; voted annually, as they were in this parliament? Can the hon. gentleman explain to me any difference in principle there?

Mr. Dorion: Yes. The difference is in the constitution: the difference is in section 93. By section 93 this power is given to the provinces; it is not given to the federal government.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. gentleman think the government of Quebec has any right to be giving money to a university in Ontario, and thereby, according to him, to interfere with the educational autonomy of the province of Ontario?

Mr. Dorion: It is quite different. First of all, the right is inscribed in section 93 without any reservation at all. Second, the province of Quebec has a role to play in Canada because there is a French ethnic group in the country, and the province of Quebec has cultural obligations not only in the province but in all Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Dorion: In all Canada; and that is why the province of Quebec by his government voted certain grants to universities outside of Quebec, at the request of those universities and with the implied consent of the governments of those provinces.

(Translation):

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Chairman, in rising to take part in the debate on this resolution, I realize I am treading on very dangerous ground and I know that in this house, as well as in the province of Quebec people are divided on this issue.

Before going into my remarks, let me first read the resolution:

> Resolved, That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act to provide certain alternative arrangements for payment, either by Canada through the Canadian Universities Foundation or directly by a province, of the grants to institutions of higher learning presently paid under the authority of the Appropriation Act: and also to extend for a further period of two years the rate of 13 per cent for standard individual income tax for the purpose of calculating the tax equalization payments to the provinces and the amounts payable to the provinces under the tax rental agreements.

There are therefore two parts to this resolution. The first deals with arrangements between the federal government and the provinces with regard to grants to universities.

All hon. members know that in the province of Quebec the universities since 1951-52 have been forced by the government, and particularly by the former premier of Quebec, the Hon. Maurice Duplessis, to refuse the grants offered to them by the federal government.

As I say, universities had been forced by the former premier of the province of Quebec, because he told them openly: Leaders of universities and classical colleges must choose between grants from Ottawa and grants from Quebec.

Mr. Johnson: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Chairman, as soon as I am through with my remarks, I shall be pleased to answer the hon. member's questions.

As I was saying in 1952 the federal government offered grants to the universities on a 50 cent per capita basis in each province. In the meantime, the basis has been raised. It was raised to $1 per capita in 1956, and in 1957-58 the present government raised it to $1.50 per capita. As I was saying, at that time the universities had to choose between federal grants and provincial grants.

After receiving an amount of $2,225,800 for the year 1951-52, the universities accepted federal grants that year only and then were deprived of them because of the stand taken by the former Quebec premier, Hon. Mr. Duplessis.

The universities will now be getting federal grants, especially those that have been paid since 1956, because the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, was wise enough to amend the legislation in 1955, and to create a fund for the benefit of the universities that were not free at that time to accept federal grants. Those grants were then placed in a fund that would be at the disposal of the universities when they would be free to collect them. But from 1952 to 1956, our universities did not get anything from the federal government during those four years, Quebec universities and classical colleges have lost more than $8 million, an amount that they will never be able to collect.

Mr. Martel: This is not true, they got more money in another way. It is absolutely untrue.

Mr. Johnson: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Leduc: Wait until I have finished my speech to put your questions.

Mr. Johnson: You should have Mr. Lamontagne correct your figures.

Mr. Leduc: Besides, you will have a chance to make your own speech and to try to prove I am not telling the truth.

Mr. Chairman, some members have claimed that it was the present government and the Hon. Paul Sauve, the former Quebec premier, who had made possible the settlement of the thorny question of grants to universities.

Mr. Ricard: You have admitted it yourselves.

Mr. Leduc: I admit—

Mr. Ricard: The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) admitted it.

Mr. Leduc: I give credit to the Hon. Paul Sauve for changing the Quebec government policy, and I also give credit to the present federal government for making a suggestion to the Quebec government in order to settle this problem.

It was easy for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) to make a suggestion to the Quebec government. All he had to do was to refer to page 771 of Hansard of January 29, 1957, where he could read part of the speech made by the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) who, in 1957, had found the formula and explained it in this house. Why has the problem not been settled since 1957? The reason is very simple—

Mr. Johnson: The Liberals would not agree.

[Mr. Leduc.]

Mr. Leduc: That was because Mr. Duplessis did not want to settle the matter. He did not want to settle with Mr. St. Laurent and the Liberal party nor did he want to settle it with the Conservative party. Do you know what brought about that settlement? It is very simple—

Mr. Ricard: Not you or your friends, anyhow.

Mr. Leduc: Providence settled the issue—

Mr. Ricard: I thought the Grits had done it.

Mr. Balcer: Providence sides with the government.

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Chairman, Providence settled the problem by calling back Mr. Duplessis. After Mr. Duplessis had gone, the solution was ready-made, as the hon. Solicitor General had given a formula in this respect to Mr. Duplessis and his government.

I have great respect and admiration for Mr. Paul Sauve because in the few months during which he was at the head of the province of Quebec, he did a tremendous job, and changed the whole policy. I would even say that he changed Mr. Duplessis' nefarious policy of provincial autonomy. His first move was to come to Ottawa for talks with the federal authorities to determine whether there would not be ways and means to find a common basis of understanding, so that universities and classical colleges in Quebec, which need financial assistance—as do all other institutions of higher learning of this kind in Canada—could collect and receive the $26,238,678 set aside for them.

They were not long talks. Matters were discussed in a few meetings, and Mr. Sauve and the federal government agreed upon a formula. In the Quebec legislature a bill was introduced and passed, and we are now asked to vote on an introductory resolution to a bill to amend the present federal act so that, in future, universities and classical colleges in Quebec may benefit from federal grants like any other institution in this country, with no strings attached.

When the bill is introduced, we shall see whether it goes against the constitution or the autonomy of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, I have always been baffled by the attitude of some Conservative members in this house, and by the attitude of the government of the province of Quebec, and more particularly that of Mr. Duplessis who suggested that his position was logical, because the federal government wanted to interfere in the field of education in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Martel: It is true, and he was right in making that statement.

Mr. Leduc: It is certainly not true, and I shall prove to you that Mr. Duplessis' argument was faulty. He made provincial autonomy and provincial education his battle cry during election campaigns. They stood him in good stead for a time, but they were being ridden to death, and that is why the present provincial government is discarding Mr. Duplessis' favourite topic.

Mr. Ricard: He stifled the Liberal party and routed the Grits.

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Duplessis—

Mr. Johnson: He is now annihilating Mr. Lesage.

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Chairman, between 1945 and 1956, the provincial government of Quebec accepted federal government grants amounting to $6,014,475 for technical and professional training purposes. I have before me the list of grants awarded to technical schools, including those of Cap de la Madeleine, Chicoutimi, Hull, Joliette, St. Hyacinthe, etc.

Am I expected to believe that the province of Quebec has no jurisdiction over those schools in matters of education? Is there a single member in this house who could prove that the province of Quebec is not entirely responsible for education in all those vocational and technical schools?

The hon. Mr. Duplessis has accepted the federal grants in this field; he also has accepted, between 1945 and 1956, another amount of $11,458,716.58 for technical education in the province of Quebec.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is easy to show that Mr. Duplessis was not being consistent, because while he was blaming or trying to blame the federal government for intervening in education in the province of Quebec, he and his government had granted $50,000 to the University of Ottawa in 1948 and in 1949. It was a grant made to an Ontario university.

Mr. Paul: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Johnson: Are you going to hold that against him?

Mr. Leduc: I have never held it against him.

Mr. Paul: Could the hon. member explain to me the difference between a grant and a gift?

Mr. Leduc: Grants paid by the federal government come under this bill. We are making a certain amount of money available to the provinces. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion), an expert on constitutional law, told us a moment ago that the province of Quebec put through a bill voting $50 million to the University of Ottawa—

Mr. Paul: $50,000.

Mr. Leduc: $50,000.

Mr. Paul: Was it a grant or a gift?

Mr. Leduc: In my view there is no difference at all. Whether it is called a grant or a gift, it is an amount of money which is being donated; a sum which has been voted. You cannot get out of it.

Mr. Deschatelets: They have always been inconsistent.

Mr. Lessard: It is hurting them.

Mr. Ricard: It is hurting you even more.

Mr. Leduc: I was asked just now if I held it against Mr. Duplessis for giving money to the University of Ottawa. Far from it; on the contrary, I congratulate him.

The only thing I hold against Mr. Duplessis and the Union Nationale government is their failure to accept federal grants for those institutions in the province of Quebec, and not only for institutions of higher learning, but in various other fields, where the province of Quebec lost much. Mr. Duplessis' stubbornness has cost the province more than half a billion. Today the province cannot get from the government the amounts it had refused. Nobody among the Conservative members who support the Union Nationale can contend that Quebec can recover from the Ottawa government the $50 million or so a year which it would have received under the hospital insurance and diagnostic services plan like all the other provinces if the province of Quebec had not refused to share in this plan.

The federal government has made payments to all the other Canadian provinces so that Quebec has to pay part of the federal share for hospital schemes in other provinces, and Quebec itself is getting nothing. However, the province has to pay for its own hospital care, and has to share in hospital costs for people in other provinces.

That is one of the reasons we are so heavily taxed in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Martel: Prove it.

Mr. Leduc: You will get the proof.

An hon. Member: Yes, go ahead and prove it.

Mr. Leduc: Do you know of any other province in Canada with a personal income tax—

Some hon. Members: Order. Order.

Mr. Leduc: The Quebec tax is—

Mr. Martel: Deductible from the federal tax.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Morissette: The hon. member is getting mixed up.

The Chairman: I would ask the hon. member for Gatineau to stick more closely to the subject matter of the debate, because otherwise we are going to cover too wide a field of discussion.

Mr. Ricard: Grasp all, lose all.

Mr. Leduc: I have tried to inform my hon. friends—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Leduc: But I am surprised that the province of Quebec—

Mr. Bourget: You are always there with your interjections; stand on your feet and stop interrupting as you are doing now.

Mr. Leduc: However, Mr. Chairman, allow me to say that I am fully in favour of grants to all universities and classical colleges of Canada.

It is very easy to understand the reasons why the federal government has instituted those grants. It has instituted them at the request of the majority of the provinces. As all hon. members know, in some provinces universities give technical and professional training to their citizens, and when the latter graduate instead of remaining in their own province to give it the benefit of their knowledge they have to go, in many cases, into another province to find work, so that it is the other provinces which benefit from the amounts paid by the citizens of one province to train part of the population. It is only fair that, in return, the federal government should redistribute certain grants to the universities and classical colleges of Canada.

[Mr. Leduc.]

As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, the province of Quebec lost considerable amounts for educational purposes, and I feel sure that in accepting the new formula, Quebec universities and classical colleges will be getting something to which they are entitled, because from the letter or letters, or the exchange of letters, between the former premier of the province of Quebec, the hon. Mr. Paul Sauve, and the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Diefenbaker), it is my understanding that only the tax collector is changed, and nothing else.

At the present time, Ottawa collects the taxes and redistributes them to universities on the basis of $1.50 per capita in each province. Under the new formula, no longer will Ottawa be collecting those funds and distributing them to the various universities. That will be done by the province or provinces. So far, however, only the province of Quebec has expressed the desire to collect this 1 per cent tax on corporations. An interesting point is that, according to the correspondence, the province of Quebec will not be allowed to keep this 1 per cent; it will only be allowed to keep the equivalent of $1.50 multiplied by its population. The balance will be handed over to Ottawa, which will keep it.

The position has changed. Now the province of Quebec will collect the tax instead of Ottawa.

I have nothing more to add to my remarks. I shall wait to study the bill, and I shall probably have further comments to make at that time.

Mr. English: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member allow me a question? When the hon. member mentioned that our universities refused the federal grants because of threats made by the former premier of Quebec, did he mean that our universities and teachers were motivated not by principle but by fear?

Mr. Leduc: From what I have read, our universities—

An hon. Member: Where did you read it?

Mr. Leduc: —from statements made by certain newspapers, have been forced to refuse the grants.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Chairman, I am still waiting for an opportunity to direct a question to the hon. member for Gatineau. If I understood him correctly, the hon. member for Gatineau said—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Johnson: —that Mr. Duplessis had openly told the universities in the province of Quebec that they were to refuse the federal grants, or else they would get no grants from the province. Could the hon. member for Gatineau quote a citation, a sentence, a statement, from a university rector or from anyone authorized by any university, establishing that the hon. premier of Quebec at the time had made such a statement or such a threat to the universities in the province?

An hon. Member: Cyril James.

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Give us the quotation.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): It appeared in the Montreal Gazette.

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Chairman, I am most surprised to find a member of the Union nationale—

Mr. Johnson: I do not ask you to make a speech, but merely to answer the question.

Mr. Leduc: —a supporter of the Union Nationale knowing so little about happenings with regard to university grants in his province. Everybody in Quebec, except you, knows what Mr. Duplessis did. The whole people of Quebec know that Mr. Duplessis told the universities: You may choose between the Ottawa grant and the Quebec grant.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Leduc: It was a question of choosing between the Ottawa grant and a Quebec subsidy. Everybody knows that.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. I am asking the hon. member a specific question, but instead of answering he resorts to cheap humourous remarks. I asked him to quote a text and not to make any gratuitous statements or repeat what his fellow members around him tell him to say. But I have another question to ask the hon. member. Can he maintain—

The Chairman: I think that this exchange of questions and answers has lasted long enough. I give the floor to the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon).

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Chairman, when I wanted to ask the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Leduc) that question, he refused to answer it at the time and told me that I would have the opportunity to ask it when he finished his speech.

I therefore ask him to be loyal and allow me to put another question.

Mr. Leduc: I shall answer it.

The Chairman: This is not a matter of the hon. member for Gatineau refusing to answer questions, it is that the Chair believes that in order to ensure an orderly debate, this exchange of questions and answers should be interrupted. I therefore give the floor to the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm. May I add that the time of the hon. member for Gatineau had expired.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, referring to the discussions in the House of Commons on Saturday, July 18, 1959—

(Text):

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Port Arthur. I recognize the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

Mr. Fisher: I do not hesitate to put forward the traditional argument, since we seem to be among traditionalists. Usually, in the discussion of a resolution, our party has the opportunity of having the third speaker. I have been here and have been ready to get into the debate. This practice has worked consistently. I do not want to make a big issue of it, but I think I was on my feet as soon as the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, and I would appreciate recognition.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I wonder whether the hon. member has overlooked the fact that this is the second day of debate. There was an earlier day of debate on this resolution.

The Chairman: When the debate started, following the speech of the minister the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the hon. member for Kootenay West were recognized. After the three first speakers have been heard I think the rule has been to alternate between the two sides of the chamber. That is why I recognized the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, if we refer to Hansard of Saturday, July 18, 1959, when university grants were being discussed, we note that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) replied as follows to the hon. member for Laurier:

> Every university that I know of in Canada is subject to provincial jurisdiction. There is no such thing as a university created by federal authority, and the same applies to municipalities.
> Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it is made quite clear that these were referred to as provincial institutions, and I think hon. members will conclude that the hon. member for Laurier was drawing a very long bow when he suggested that this reference to universities as provincial institutions connoted some thought of making federal contributions to the cost of primary and secondary education. Nothing could be further from the truth. Nothing could be further from the intention of the government.

This quotation from the Minister of Finance may be found on page 6391 of Hansard for July 18, 1959.

The hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Leduc) was rather critical a moment ago, and he made a comparison which, in my opinion, was not proper when he referred to gifts made by the Quebec government to certain educational institutions in other provinces. I would point out to him that education is under provincial jurisdiction and that even if the province of Quebec made a gift to the Ottawa university I do not believe that in so doing it interfered with the rights of the Ontario government in that field.

Besides, a grant always has certain conditions attached to it. A grant has always strings attached to it, whereas a gift is unconditional. A gift may be refused or accepted. A grant has always conditions attached to it.

I should like to congratulate the Minister of Finance who, in co-operation with the Quebec premier, has worked out an agreement on this problem.

We cannot forget the sincere attitude adopted by Quebec premiers who have taken part in those negotiations for many years. Mr. Duplessis has stoutly defended the rights of an autonomist province within a great confederation. Mr. Duplessis, in my opinion, was actually voicing the opinion of his province, the province of Quebec, in basing himself on the constitution. Everybody knows, besides, that the Tremblay report agrees with the attitude taken by the premier of Quebec at the time. The educational institutions, the elite, in a word the whole province of Quebec, have supported the late Hon. Maurice Duplessis who, for a while, was the only one in the country to defend the autonomy of the province of Quebec, and thus of all the other provinces. In fact, several premiers said later that Maurice Duplessis was right, that the federal government was going too far in too many fields which do not concern it.

Need I call to witness a Liberal from Newfoundland who thoroughly agrees with the stand the late Hon. Mr. Duplessis had taken. In fact Le Devoir of July 20, 1959 said:

Liberal senator Wishart Robertson, just before the adoption by the Senate Saturday of the act concerning the grants to Newfoundland, said that the federal-provincial tax-sharing agreements were ridiculous and nonsensical. "We have given rise," he said, "to an absurd situation where a government collects money to give it to other governments—This system has made suppliants of at least eight of the ten provincial governments—It results in unending controversies which, in my opinion, will only become worse in the immediate future. The attitude of Premier Duplessis towards this ridiculous problem is more logical than that of the other federal and provincial negotiators", the senator added. He simplifies the problem in these words: "Give up a field to us and we will collect our own taxes and we will pay our own expenditures."

Mr. Chairman, Hon. Maurice Duplessis not only expressed the point of view, as I said earlier, of the province of Quebec, but also that of all the provinces, because he wanted to safeguard the confederation pact. Besides, he had the support of the people of Quebec.

His successor endeavoured to find a middle term to bring about an agreement. Unfortunately, death came to him suddenly. Thus, it became the responsibility of the present premier of Quebec, whom I have the honour to have among my loyal constituents, to bring a true solution to this crucial problem.

Mr. Chairman, the agreement between the federal government and the province of Quebec will be an example. This gesture will not only consolidate national unity, but will contribute to the formation of a truly Canadian mentality.

The problem of the relations between the federal parliament and the provincial legislatures is as old as confederation itself. We can even say that the problem existed before, since as early as the Charlottetown meeting in 1864, it became quite clear that the apportionment of powers within the framework of a federal state would not be achieved without certain clashes and incidents.

It is not our purpose to attempt today to solve that problem or even to find a cure-all formula for all the evils resulting from the co-existence of a federal state and ten provincial governments.

The British North America Act is a document bearing the stamp of wisdom resulting from the long experience which initiators acquired through their contacts with the Canadian people in the administration of public affairs. The fathers of confederation devoted many years to draft a final text which was to combine with its nature of a pact between the contracting parties the legislative character resulting from its promulgation as an imperial statute. The fathers of confederation did not delude themselves as to the difficulty of the problems which were arising and which would arise between the federal authority and the provincial entities.

Therefore it was clearly stated in section 93 of the British North America Act what would be the respective powers of the central government and of the provinces. However, nothing is final in this world, not even a British law, and that is why since 1867 many commissions have been established to study certain aspects of the relations between the federal authority and the provinces. Those of us who have had the opportunity and the patience to read the voluminous report of the Rowell-Sirois commission which report, incidentally, was centralistic, or the reports of the various federal-provincial conferences were amazed, not to say dumbfounded, at the complexity of the problems and especially of the differences of opinions put forward by the various parties concerned. It is no use deluding ourselves; there is something wrong between the federal government and the provinces. Speeches and briefs dealing with that problem clearly indicate two different stands, perhaps not irreconcilable, but certainly diametrically opposed. The federal government and the provinces do not speak the same language and that is the cause of the increasing difficulties.

Under the terms of the constitution itself, Ottawa has certain clearly defined powers while the provinces have others also well spelled out. But besides that the federal government has what we call the residual powers, which means that all that is not specifically provincial is automatically federal, and even as members of this house, we are not at all convinced that this solution is a very appropriate one. The federal government is jealous of its prerogatives and rightly so. We would be the first to rise as one to defend the rights of federal government against any threat from within or from without. We do not want foreign countries to tell us how to administer our country, just as we have no intention to be dictated to by the provinces.

On the other hand, if we have those rights, the provinces also have theirs, and it would be ungracious not to recognize it. No province is thinking of encroaching on the federal field, and we fail to see why the Ottawa government would be presumptuous to the point of wanting to substitute itself to the provincial authorities in the fields vested in them.

I would point out, as an example, that under the constitution of Canada, indirect taxation and certain rights in the field of direct taxation come within the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal government. The same constitution imposes specific and important obligations on the provinces, wherefrom it ensues that the same provinces have a right to collect a revenue from direct taxes. This is true to such a degree that for more that half a century there was no question about the collection of direct taxes. And even when federal income tax was established, the federal minister of finance stated that it was only a temporary measure to be considered as a wartime measure. It was in this same House of Commons that Sir Thomas White stated in 1917:

> Income tax comes especially within provincial jurisdiction; this tax particularly meets the purposes of the province and of municipalities.

The same applies to estates, because until 1942 the federal government had stayed away from that taxation field, since it is closely related to civil rights and property. Those two infringements of the rights vested in the provinces are both equally unbearable. There is no need to be a learned economist to understand that what is provincial belongs to the provinces and what is federal comes under the central or centralizing government. We are always under the impression that only the province of Quebec asks for the restitution of the funds stolen from the provinces by the federal government. There is also an attempt to suggest that the formula of the return to the provinces of their own rights and funds was conceived by the former Quebec premier, the late Hon. Mr. Duplessis. Yet, who stated this in 1867:

> Lower Canada is rightly proud of its ancestral customs and traditions; it is bound by its particular institutions and it will only enter into confederation with the assurance of retaining them.

It was Lord Carnarvon.

To quote another testimony, which is not precisely from a member of the present Quebec cabinet, may I repeat that:

> The existence of the provinces preceded that of the Dominion of Canada, and it is from them that it got its powers. The provinces are sovereign within the limits of their attributes and any attack against that sovereignty is a violation of the federal pact.

And who, Mr. Chairman, made such a judicious comment? None other than a great premier of Canada's oldest province, the Hon. Honore Mercier, in 1884. I think no one could accuse him of being a bad Canadian or a poor Liberal.

That is the position. From a constitutional point of view, the rights are clearly defined. The federal government has its own, and provincial legislatures also have theirs. There can be no question, for emergency or other reasons, to change this arrangement without first obtaining the consent of all parties to confederation. That is the law of the land. If it is bad, then it can always be changed, but in the meantime, it should be enforced, without any haggling or discrimination.

Once it is admitted that the claims of the provinces are justified—and I say provinces purposely, because it is not only Quebec—there remains the problem of finding a solution to this anomaly. From a practical point of view, such a situation cannot last indefinitely. It has lasted for too many years already. Let us face the facts as shown to us by history. It is a government which, for national emergency reasons, decided to invade the field of provincial revenues, at the time the great war was in its most sinister period. We do not want to criticize our predecessors for it, because they did what the circumstances forced them to do at the time. But it belongs to another great government, that of the Right Hon. Mr. Diefenbaker, to correct that anomaly. Thus, the names of Borden and Diefenbaker once again will be united in history, because the former saved Canada from the German threat, and the latter will have saved national unity. It is not a matter of a favour asked by the province of Quebec; it is a matter of justice for all provinces; we are not asking for charity, but for equity.

It must, in fact, be recognized that citizens, and this is the price which we must pay for belonging to a federal state, have a dual responsibility as citizens, not to say a dual citizenship, or a dual allegiance. Indeed they are, for certain things, under the federal government and for others under a provincial administration. But such dual citizenship also implies a dual responsibility. In order to satisfy it, it is essential that Canadians have access to the legal financial means put at their disposal by the constitution.

The fathers of confederation wanted to endow every Canadian with the means of discharging his responsibility as a good citizen and also with the facilities needed for this purpose. It is therefore not up to us to revise that position today, and even if an injustice has been done in the past, we must strive to repair the wrong that has been done.

It is utterly futile, not to say immoral, to maintain that one authority will levy taxes and hand them over in some form or other to the other power which forms the confederative association. Those who hold the purse strings can spend and control. Indeed, from 1887 on, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who was born at St. Lin, in the Laurentians, in the riding of l'Assomption which I have the honour to represent in this house, said:

> The principle whereby a government levies revenues for another to spend is basically wrong.

Is there any need to repeat, in this respect, the views of a Canadian whom our opponents hardly would call anti-Liberal. Indeed, it was the Right. Hon. Mackenzie King, who said:

> I believe that whoever has made any study of public finances will consider that a system providing that one organization levies taxes and another spend the money thus obtained is entirely wrong. In other words, paying subsidies to the provinces without their having to collect taxes on their own will not lead to the careful control over expenditures which would be exercised if the provinces had, in the first place, to find the money themselves. It is a bad system, one that is altogether wrong.

Those two testimonies should be enough to convince the most timid minds. They only add to the general complaints made by most provincial prime ministers, who, during federal-provincial conferences, ceased to demand, for their legislatures, the fiscal rights of which they were deprived in 1917 and 1942 by the federal government.

Mr. Chairman, it was easier for the former government to destroy the constitutional pact. It is also, at this time, much more difficult to reconstitute the confederative pact, but I have great hopes that the Minister of Finance will make some contribution to this end. As a matter of fact, following negotiations between the premier of Quebec and himself, he also proved and recognized that the situation had to be settled before proceeding with the redistribution of provincial or federal rights.

I should like to pay tribute to the Minister of Finance who, in co-operation with the present Quebec premier, has settled that problem.

Mr. Chairman, the provinces have long been demanding restitution of the rights from which they have been dispossessed.

And they will go on demanding restoration of those rights until justice has been done. No province would ever think of preventing the federal government from fulfilling its tasks but, on the other hand, all of them wish to fulfil theirs, without any external interference.

To deprive a man from his fortune and then to offer him charity is not honest, and we will not accept such a deal. According to us, it is time the federal authorities—and once again I should like to congratulate the Minister of Finance for having initiated such an approach—should become fully aware that the federal government does not have all powers, nor a monopoly on the exercise of those powers. The rights of all concerned have been clearly defined, so let each party conform, and have regard for their respective rights and powers.

Some governments may have been inclined to consider right what was wrong, and honest what was not, but we cannot, in good conscience, allow such a situation to go on. Once again, we must fully understand that we are not speaking only as citizens of the province of Quebec, and I know that the other provinces are of the same opinion, especially those that were deprived of their rights and whose wealth has been taken away from them.

Mr. Chairman, I therefore believe that it is up to our government to assume its responsibilities and to give unto Caesar what is Caesar's and unto the provinces what rightfully belongs to them.

Much was said about the equalization system and the mitigated reimbursement formula, in the form of grants for educational purposes. Again I repeat to the hon. member for Gatineau that the word "grant" means strings attached; there is a big difference between "grant" and "gift".

We are quite prepared to admit that the federal government has a role to play in the intellectual and scientific education of the people, but as the responsibility for education belongs, first of all, to the family and not to the state, so are educational responsibilities primarily of a provincial rather than of a federal character. To make a gift is one way to silence whiners, but it is not the way to correct an injustice. Let us not forget the saying: "Let us beware of the Greeks even when they are bearing gifts."

Even if we set aside all economic considerations about tax sharing arrangements, we must remember that it is one aspect only of the relations between the federal government and the provinces that we must consider, and once again, to repeat words which our opponents could not question since they are those of Hon. Ernest Lapointe:

> The federal power is the offspring, not the father, of the provinces.

It must be fully realized that relations between the provinces and the federal government cannot indefinitely stand such wrangling. Federal-provincial conferences have accomplished little progress, and it is with some misgivings that we look to the day when one or several provinces, dissatisfied at being treated as poor relatives by their big brother in Ottawa, will decide to go their own way.

However, nothing is eternal in this world, and I would not like to contribute to a split within the confederative family. Yet, I must recognize that the provinces have some very definite rights for which the federal government has not always shown proper respect in the past. But I know the present government is deeply respectful of provincial rights and will always strive—as it has been doing since it took office—to settle the many problems which were created in large part by the former administration. It must not be forgotten, Mr. Chairman, that it would be much easier for Quebec and Ontario to do without confederation than for confederation to do without them.

We must at all costs avoid letting the matter of fiscal relations become a cause of serious misunderstanding, and to that end, we must re-establish proper balance and reinstate justice.

Mr. Chairman, allow me, in closing my remarks, to publicly commend, on behalf of the constituency of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, the present Minister of Finance who, more than anyone else in the past, has been striving to work out a solution to this problem. The present Minister of Finance has not assumed a take it or leave it attitude. He has had frank discussions with the authorities of the Quebec government. I want to commend him publicly for it, and say to him that in co-operation with the Prime Minister of Canada, his actions have served to strengthen national unity, rather than to weaken it, as was the case under the former administration.

I was very sorry to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Gatineau. He has attacked a fondly regretted man, the Hon.

Maurice Duplessis. Duplessis was a man of great stature, a great leader, the leader of his province. As I said at the outset of my remarks, he was one of the first to denounce the centralizing attitude of the former government. Gradually, the governments of every province gave their support to the stand taken by the Hon. Maurice Duplessis. The Hon. Maurice Duplessis has now entered history, and on behalf of the constituents of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, I lay a wreath of gratitude on his grave.

The late lamented Hon. Paul Sauve wanted to take over where the Hon. Maurice Duplessis had left off, but unfortunately death came to him too early. Mr. Chairman, we have as leader of the province of Quebec an authentic worker who still holds his union membership card. It is fitting that an authentic labour man like Mr. Barrette should solve this problem in co-operation with the Minister of Finance. I can assure the minister that the province of Quebec is happy about the decision concerning this agreement, and the province of Quebec breathes freely again.

Under the former government, the province of Quebec was held in a yoke; it was a matter of "take it or leave it". It was not democratic; there was no discussion with the province of Quebec. It was true dictature. I believe the Minister of Finance, by discussing frankly this problem, has served the cause of democracy and restored the people of Quebec and the people of Canada's confidence in our democratic principles.

Mr. Habel: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Johnson: Answer him in the same way as did the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Leduc).

Mr. Habel: Will the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Pigeon: Yes.

Mr. Habel: The hon. member says that the Hon. Mr. Duplessis was a great man, and I have no doubt about that, Mr. Chairman, as far as the Union Nationale is concerned and—

An hon. Member: Read the Tremblay commission report.

Mr. Habel: Now here is my question: Is it not true that the present premier, the Hon. Mr. Barrette, is making an outright change of policy and even says that what happened in the past will not be repeated in the future?

[Mr. Pigeon.]

Mr. Pigeon: May I say to the whip of the opposition that the Hon. Maurice Duplessis has established certain principles; he is dead now and it is the responsibility of his successors to do the best they can, but by different methods, to safeguard the principles established by their precedessor. In other words, the former premier of Quebec (Mr. Duplessis) has led the way and the present premier, in co-operation with the Minister of Finance, has followed the way which led to this settlement.

(Text):

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, the C.C.F., of course, is going to support this resolution with a great deal of pleasure, especially the first part having to do with a way of extending grants to educational institutions.

When I was at university, Mr. Chairman, taking history there was a very strong emphasis on Canadian history; and one of the O.K. phrases that was always being thrown at us and that we were supposed to pay a great deal of attention to was what you might call bonne ententeism; or, if you want the O.K. phrase in the political vernacular, which has been fashionable for so long in the country, national unity. When I listen to a speech such as I have just heard—I must confess through the translation system—and hear someone talking about "our" constitution, I wonder whether bonne ententeism has not gone a little too far; because there are conceptions of the constitution other than what I think was the rather selfish and narrow interpretation which has just been put on it by the last speaker.

I would like to say there is always a possibility of misunderstanding. I would also like to say there are other views of Canadianism, there are other people who are proud of Canada, and there are other people who have interpretations of the constitution and beliefs in the constitution that may differ markedly.

If I may, Mr. Chairman, I would like to start with something that has been called by the newspapers the "Churchill thesis". The Churchill thesis does not refer to the great Winston Churchill but to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The Churchill thesis in a nutshell, as I understand it from press reports of a few years ago, was that it was possible to form a federal government in this country without worrying too much about the Quebec vote. It seems to me that this government, led by the Prime Minister, achieved that result in a sweeping victory in 1958. It had 200-plus seats. It really did not need its Quebec supporters, and those of us who noted the Churchill thesis have been watching ever since to see the moves that were made that would indicate the relationship and the attitude of this particular government toward Quebec. Many of us have lamented, and perhaps have pin-pointed, the fact that so far there has not seemed to emerge any striking attitude toward Quebec other than indifference. There is weak Quebec cabinet representation. There do not seem to be too many concessions.

It seems to me that this move by the Minister of Finance—and I think he deserves much congratulation—indicates that this government is pushing on with the Churchill thesis. I know he can probably argue—I believe he did—from a number of quotations that this new arrangement that is being entered into with Quebec is nothing startling; that it is consistent with the government's position that this government will not encroach upon any provincial autonomy or provincial jurisdiction in the field of education. Whether it is a legal marriage or a common law relationship, it seems to me that we now have a situation where in the field of university education the last of the 10 blocks has been moved. When you interweave the tax structure and the financial structure we have in Canada as between the provinces and the dominion government, all the complications of formula that the minister has produced cannot conceal that as far as my interpretation goes—the minister may not agree with this—this is a break-through.

We have had a number of break-throughs and a very inconsistent pattern, but for many years the Quebec government has tacitly accepted a variety of invasions of its so-called jurisdiction in education. We all know of examples in the vocational field and so far as technical training is concerned. This goes way back to the royal commission established before the first war. I remember that a writer for the Montreal Star, Tim Creery, had three articles on this matter a year ago this month, and he had a long list of examples where Quebec had accepted assistance. Even Mr. Duplessis, with all his pride in autonomy, never returned to the federal government the money he took in the first year the university grants were in operation, which is the kind of compromise of consistency that I think indicates a trend as to where we are going.

As I say, I feel that this is a great break-through, and I think the minister deserves congratulations because one of the things that bother a great many people in Canada who do not live adjacent to or among or with French Canadians is a feeling that somehow they insist in taking a different view of Canadianism and of what Canadians want and need from that of people within the rest of the country. This is a most delicate and touchy subject for a politician to confront, but I think it needs some confronting. Like many other members who have come here in the last few years, while I had read a great deal in Canadian history about the French-Canadian problem, it was not until I began to follow the French-Canadian newspapers with more intensity that I realized the markedly different conception of Canadianism that the French Canadians have. This, it seems to me, is something that we very much need to resolve even in the name of that magical phrase, national unity.

One feeling I have taken from reading the French-Canadian press is that they have what is almost a conceit in their Canadianism. They push upon other Canadians an interpretation that I cannot accept and which I think many members of the house cannot accept. It seems that the contradistinction between their kind of Canadianism and ours is that theirs is French Canadian based upon language and Roman Catholic based upon religion and so on the other hand we have to be Protestant and English speaking. I do not think this necessarily holds true.

I know that in my constituency we have very few French Canadians. We have a good many Catholics who in the main are English speaking. Many of them in descent are Italians, Poles, and so on. I do not think their conception of Canadianism has to take a back seat at any time to what I might call the superiority complex of Canadianism that exists in French Canada—

Mr. Grafftey: That is not so.

Mr. Fisher: —especially as you find it in the newspapers.

Mr. Grafftey: That is not so.

Mr. Fisher: Some hon. member has said "That is not so". I am sure he will have the opportunity to get up and rebut what I say. I am giving my own interpretation.

The last speaker mentioned the compact theory of government or constitution that is set out in the Tremblay report. I do not know how many English speaking members of the house have read the Tremblay report, but it is a rather scary document in terms of the kind of Canadianism that I think I share with quite a number of Canadians. The main basis of the report is that the constitution is a solemn compact or treaty and, even more, it is argued by some that the government at Ottawa is the creature of the provinces which brought about confederation. An element of this thinking creeps into the Tremblay report. I should like to refer to the main premises of the report as summarized in a book entitled "Evolving Canadian Federalism" by A. R. M. Lower and Frank Scott. They are as follows:

1. The primary purpose of Canadian federalism is to allow the two great cultural communities which make up our population (a) to live and develop themselves according to their respective particularisms and, (b) to co-operate in the building and progress of a common fatherland.

2. With regard to French-Canadian culture, the province of Quebec assumes alone the responsibilities which the other provinces jointly assume with regard to Anglo-Canadian culture.

For the benefit of the member who interrupted, the basis for my remarks is found in the words I have just read, to wit:

With regard to French-Canadian culture, the province of Quebec assumes alone the responsibilities which the other provinces jointly assume with regard to Anglo-Canadian culture.

Mr. Grafftey: The hon. member is long on theory but short on facts.

Mr. Fisher: I continue.

3. The Canadian reality, both economic and sociological, has undergone a profound transformation since 1867, but its cultural elements have not changed, so that the basic problem still remains the same.

The authors continue:

Thus posed, the postulates, formulated without any consultation with representatives from outside Quebec, lead on to a critical analysis of present trends toward centralization and call for a "readaptation of the public administration according to the spirit of federalism".

Obviously this is a type of federalism that most of us in the rest of the country do not appreciate. It seems to me that one place where politicians fail lamentably is in being candid and honest in this particular field. Everybody wants to wrap cotton wool around this very difficult problem, and it seems to me that in this particular case where we have a concession, where we have a move forward, we should put it bluntly that we think this is an excellent move, a move away from the Tremblay report position which the previous speaker extolled as being the epitome of Duplessisism, toward the kind of Canadianism in which I think the rest of the country believes. If you push the Tremblay report position too far it seems to me you have a situation not unlike that of the security council of the United Nations, in that Quebec always has the right of veto just as Russia always seems to have the right of veto in the security council. The same thing seems to apply with respect to the constitutional interpretation of many people in Quebec. They believe in a separatism, with Quebec always having the right of veto over proposals from other provinces or the federal government.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, before the luncheon hour I was trying to deal with a delicate subject, and one in which I never claimed to be an authority. There are many other hon. members in this house who can speak with more authority than I can on French-Canadian relations with the rest of the country. I detest the use of the expression English-Canadians but I am going to refer to French-Canadian relations with Canadians. However, this compromise that has been worked out by the Minister of Finance is an important break-through in these relations and is one that I think we should assess in some detail.

One of the things that has intrigued me has been the tremendous amount of involvement and the federal build-up in recent years in the field of education. Last year the newspaperman to whom I referred, Tim Creery, worked through the estimates and in a series of articles that appeared on March 2, 3 and 4, 1959, in the Montreal Star, he traced the scope of federal aid in the matter of education. His estimate, and this was confirmed in his talks with statisticians in the dominion bureau of statistics, was that approximately $100 million would be spent on education by the federal government, making it a very large contributor and financially comparable directly with all but three of the provinces in this responsibility.

In his article of March 3 he listed the estimated departmental spending on education for the year April 1, 1959 to March 31, 1960. The first was the Department of Finance, through the university grants, totalling $26,221,000; second, the Canada Council scholarships and grants, roughly $1.5 million and then, for capital construction under the Canada Council, $6 million; citizenship and immigration, Indian affairs branch, for operation and maintenance, approximately $13,734,000 and for plant, well over $7 million. The same department spends approximately $400,000 for its 50 per cent share of citizenship and language instruction. The department of northern affairs spends a total of approximately $9 million on education in the territories, that is for both direct education and maintenance and also for employment.

The Department of Labour makes payments to the provinces under the apprenticeship training and vocational and technical schools assistance of approximately $9.5 million; national defence, through the three service colleges, the naval venture plan, and regular officers training plan, spends approximately $6 million. The Department of Trade and Commerce, through national research council scholarships and grants in aid of research spends about $8 million. The atomic energy control board spends about $650,000 in scholarships. The Department of Transport, through its schools of navigation and seamanship, steamship inspection service, radio operators training, aviation instruction, and so on, spends approximately $600,000. The Department of National Health and Welfare, through its national health grants, education proportion must spend approximately $1 million. The Department of Veterans Affairs is in the field of education through correspondence courses, $29,000; vocational and technical training, $55,000; university training $49,000; and children of the war dead, $481,000. The Department of Agriculture spends, on grants in aid of agricultural research, $187,000; mines and technical surveys, through its grants in aid of geological research in Canadian universities, spends $50,000; University of British Columbia, for research in foreign geography, $3,500. The last two departments contributing to education are fisheries, contributions to research, $25,000 and scholarships, $25,000, and external affairs, NATO fellowships and studies, $42,000.

All this totals roughly just under $100 million which was spent last year in what almost everyone will agree was a proper federal activity in the field of education. However, if Quebec thesis or the Tremblay report thesis or the Pigeon thesis is correct in so far as this situation is concerned, such expenditures were wrong and unconstitutional. If their interpretation is correct, then Quebec should be fighting this much more wholeheartedly than has been the case. I think, if I remember correctly, Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent engineered two of the largest contributions in this federal program, that is the university grants and the Canada Council scholarships and capital construction grants. This is an indication to me that the Tremblay report, and the understanding that it represents is anachronistic, it is out of time, that Quebec is past the Tremblay stage.

There is a much more definite move in Quebec toward a realization that education is a field in which the federal government is properly working. I do not feel we will ever get an improved educational system in Canada unless and until this whole matter of provincial jurisdiction becomes less a matter of controversy and much more a matter of co-operation and co-ordination for the greater good of all. I have said before in this house, and I am sure many hon. members agree, that you are not a Quebecer, or an Ontarian, a Manitoban or a British Columbian, but you are a Canadian.

Mr. Grafftey: You are a Canadian first.

Mr. Fisher: Nowhere does this apply more than in the field of education. I notice I am getting interruptions again from the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi.

Mr. Grafftey: You are very long on theory but rather short on practice.

Mr. Fisher: I know the hon. member is very practical. I understand he changed overnight from being a Liberal to a Conservative.

Mr. Grafftey: I am proud of it.

Mr. Fisher: May I suggest that the thoughts of one of the leading spokesmen for that kind of trend in Quebec and French Canada and of other Canadians who are interested in the problem were expressed by Maurice Lamontagne who, as I think all hon. members know, has an association, if indirectly, with this House of Commons. He argued in this way or at least this is the interpretation put upon it by Frank R. Scott interpreting Mr. Lamontagne's book "The Canadian Federalism" published in 1954. According to Frank Scott, Mr. Lamontagne states:

> For him the only solution for Quebec is "a lucid integration into the new Canadian federalism."

Mr. Scott goes on to say this:

> This solution, as has been shown, is repudiated expressly and at length in the Tremblay report. But the commissioners themselves admit that the far-reaching decentralization they advocate cannot be brought about immediately, because "de facto situations and habits of thought have been created which must be corrected," and they therefore offer a "temporary solution" which confines itself to a mere reallocation of taxes within the present constitutional scheme. That some such financial adjustments will be made in the future is probable; no part of the Canadian constitution has been more flexible, more responsive to changing political and economic pressures, than the subsidies provisions and tax arrangements. But the profound reshaping of the constitution itself, called for in the main recommendations of this report, is another matter. It cannot be as divorced, as it is here, from the hard facts of Canada's increasing industrial growth in an increasingly dangerous world. The preservation of human and cultural values in this day and age, which this report professes to seek, is an aim all Canadians would support; what would be questioned, in Quebec as outside, is the possibility of reverting to smaller governmental units, however distinct they may be in race or religion, for the almost exclusive protection of those values. The present distribution of powers in Canada has not satisfied everyone, but it has unquestionably permitted a wide freedom for the steady development of the two cultural groups along their own distinctives lines.

Complementary to those remarks or that interpretation, I go along with and interpret the move the minister has succeeded in making in this regard as another step along this particular path.

Before lunch we heard from the hon. member for Bellechasse and, as a result of a question put to him by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, he argued that Quebec has an obligation to French Canadians in the rest of Canada. This is an argument that seems to me to be most controversial. If Quebec has an obligation to French Canadians in the rest of Canada, as a government, surely it has an obligation to that diaspora of French Canadians in the New England states. I am sure these lost ones should arouse the same reaction among French Canadians in Quebec. If Quebec has an obligation for French Canadians in the rest of Canada, what about English Canadians in the rest of Canada and their obligations to English Canadians in Quebec? I have yet to encounter a provincial authority anywhere outside of Quebec that would follow along with this argument.

It seems to me that this assumption by the hon. member for Bellechasse expressed in governmental terms on the part of the province would look forward to a continuation of strife throughout the rest of Canadian history. Then a provincial government, according to this argument, has the obligation to go into the rest of Canada to further the particular ethnic and cultural problems of French Canadians or English Canadians in the rest of Canada. It certainly seems to me to be a most controversial argument.

In so far as the second part of the resolu- is concerned, it merely continues the 13 per cent rate the minister introduced several years ago. Some of the provinces have been asking for an increase. The minister has brought down a budget that envisages a sound, constructive balance and obviously this resolution is merely geared to it. Today in almost every municipality it is fashionable to look toward the provincial authority and cry for more; and we know it is fashionable for provincial authorities to look toward the federal government and to cry for more. The way out of the jack-pot undoubtedly will be found on a very empirical basis or through a shading of development rather than in a clear, new rewriting of tax agreements or tax proposals.

To refer to the problem that develops from the first part of this resolution, namely the field of education, one can certainly see where there needs to be a wide new understanding of the entire problem. One of the disappointing things about the federal House of Commons to anyone who has been involved in education and who finds as he goes around the country that education is a live issue, is that here it is not a live issue. I think two hon. members from Toronto who are members of the government are the only ones of whom I know who have ever, in the two years I have been here in parliament, devoted major efforts to this particular field. One would almost assume that this particular parliament is not interested in education. Yet out in the municipalities and in the communities from which we come, this matter in financial terms is the most live topic of all.

I think most hon. members from Ontario will recognize the storm that has arisen just in the last few weeks over the new tax grant brought down by the province of Ontario. Of course it seems to me that the argument of the premier of Ontario is that no real changes or advances will be possible in the immediate future unless there is some support from the federal government first. What the way out of this difficulty is, I do not know. I think this is the toughest problem faced by the minister as Minister of Finance.

However, I am certainly convinced, as is our party, that this is one field in which federal support must be ready and be more available than it has been in the past in the way of more funds in order that the provincial governments can accept their educational load. Of course this raises the question whether there should be any consignment or direction of funds from the federal government to the provinces, that is as to how they are spent. I do not think any of us have reached the stage where we are prepared to argue favourably that question but I think we shall eventually be obliged to arrive at it if we want to get in Canada the standard of education or health we need.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I should like to reiterate our group's support of this resolution and to congratulate the Minister of Finance for moving or shaping Quebec a little bit along the path towards greater co-operation with the rest of Canada. I know he may disclaim credit for such a move or at least our interpretation of that move; but I think he deserves it. I must give credit not only to him but to those hon. members from Quebec who obviously have changed their position to quite an extent. If they are able to vote in support of this particular resolution, it seems to me that I and even those who have looked at the Tremblay report can forget all about that now that they are moving along the path toward a different kind of Canadianism from that which seems to have been popular in Quebec in recent years.

(Translation):

Mr. Allard: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add a few remarks to the speeches made by previous speakers on this resolution.

On April 13, 1959, I had the opportunity of voicing in this house my personal opinions on the matter of education and university grants. In fact, as recorded on page 9, English version, of Hansard for April 13 last, I closed my speech with the following words:

> That is why, if the Quebec government cares to offer a suggestion, to make an official proposal, an appropriate and constructive one, I am positive that this government will consider it with great care and that, eventually, a proper solution will be found in this field.

Mr. Chairman, I was very pleased, as were many Canadians, when the late Quebec premier, Mr. Sauve, came here to Ottawa, in October, 1959, to discuss the financial problem. In coming here, he did exactly the right thing, that is, he set forth the particular views of the province of Quebec and, at long last, suggested an answer, a formula, likely to settle the problem. The present government had not created that problem but had inherited it and, with its typical conscientiousness, it was anxious to do justice to all Canadians and to all provinces. This is why we find today the present formula in this resolution.

This matter of the exclusive rights of the provinces in the field of education—I wish to come back very briefly on this today so that there be no misunderstanding in other provinces across Canada or in any quarter whatsoever—is not a mere whim on the part of the province of Quebec; that stand which was relentlessly upheld by the province of Quebec was and will always be a question of justice, a question of constitutional right, because we all know that under section 93 of the British North America Act, education is an exclusively provincial responsibility. However, the policy applied until June 10, 1957 seemed to indicate that it was not so, although education is an exclusive right which strictly belongs to us and cannot be taken away from us without mutual consent. An exclusive right is more than a priority right, it is an absolute right. That is why, when the former Liberal government had passed that legislation on educational grants in an attempt to do indirectly what it was forbidden to do directly by the constitution in spite of various judgments rendered by the privy council, more particularly in the case of Edwards, of the Aeronautique and the Great West Saddlery, the people of Quebec refused to go along.

Those are the principles of the Canadian constitution which were submitted to the court of the time, i.e. the privy council in London. It had obviously been sanctioned in principle that the central government could not do indirectly what the constitution forbade to be done directly. But what the Liberal government tried to do by introducing financial aid to universities and establishing the Canada Council, was to accomplish indirectly what it was constitutionally barred from achieving directly.

Such was the position when this Conservative government came into power. We are quite pleased with this resolution, and I wish, in just a few words, to express my personal satisfaction and the satisfaction of the people of Sherbrooke and the eastern townships, and also of a good many people in the province of Quebec. This solution is a step in the right direction. This resolution will enable the government of a province to meet the needs of its universities, high schools, etc., by distributing them its own grants.

If the province of Quebec can look at this development with satisfaction, it is due in large part to Mr. Sauve, who proposed this formula, and to the co-operation and great understanding of the present government. We thank them heartily for it.

It can now be said that as a result of that formula which forms the basis of this resolution, the year 1960 is, in a sense, the year of education, because it is sufficient for instance, to examine legislation introduced by the Quebec government to realize—following the introduction of this resolution and the publicity given to that problem—that this Quebec legislation deals largely with education since, at last, the Quebec government, with the co-operation of the present federal government, will be able to give direct grants to its universities.

Let us examine briefly this legislation of the Quebec government which has increased the assistance to its universities by $8,750,000 million during the present fiscal year, thus providing a total and complete assistance of $20 million each year.

This legislation of the province of Quebec has made possible the establishment of a special sinking fund for building projects of our Quebec universities. We are informed that at present a special $75 million fund covers those Quebec universities building projects.

Thanks to the wonderful spirit that has developed since June 10, 1957, the Quebec government is able to allow statutory grants to teachers and institutions, namely classical colleges and high schools.

Mr. Chairman, that is a good result of this legislation, that is a practical result, and that is why we, members from Quebec, we who are in the federal field, are happy to commend the government and urge it to continue in the right direction, that of respecting—as it has done and with what solicitude, since it came to power—the rights of all the ethnic groups in Canada and in all the provinces

It is said, and I repeat it without blushing, that the province of Quebec is not a province like the others. It is true. We are not different in that we want to break away from the rest of the country. We are, like all the others, Canadians who are mindful of the higher development of their country and who want to safeguard its basic interests. We are sincere, we love our country and we are anxious to see it go forward.

But where we differ, it is in matters of culture, in our traditions which we want to keep and it is this difference which allows us to bring to the Canadian nation the marvellous contribution that adds so much to it.

It is for this reason that we of Quebec are today happy to see that the government of this province will be able to supply the necessary funds to its universities and institutions of higher learning.

Having a right is not enough, we must have the financial means to exercise it.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of taking part in this debate and I do not intend to dwell on the matter. But, having heard some of my Quebec friends, with a Union Nationale slant, I would have been angry at myself had I not risen here this afternoon to straighten certain things out and put them back where they should be in public opinion.

I have just heard my friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) who is a living example of "duplessism" in this house. He said that Quebec was not a province like other provinces.

Well, Mr. Chairman, this statement is not new. I have heard it mouthed every day by the Hon. Maurice Duplessis during the four years that I sat in the Quebec legislature.

Well, in that field of federal aid to universities, we realize today that the province of Quebec is beginning to be like the others, and we realize more and more that it has always been so; it is the government which preceded the Barrette and the Sauve government which was not like the others.

Mr. Chairman, I was a member of the Quebec legislature for four years, and we often discussed federal-provincial relations. We also discussed federal help to universities, but never did any jurist, any expert in constitutional law succeeed in proving that the federal government violated the Canadian constitution.

Mr. Chevrier: Hear. hear.

Mr. Dupuis: I have witnessed many discussions, and I do not intend to pose as an expert in law or as a professor of Canadian constitutional law. But there is one thing that strikes me. Our Conservative friends here are now unanimous in recognizing the benefits of federal aid to universities. Nobody sees any encroachments to provincial autonomy, except perhaps a few friends of the Union Nationale in Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, I have here a list which I compiled a moment ago, just before coming into the house, and it makes me wonder.

Who are the ones who used to say that the federal legislation on grants to universities, which had been enacted by the Liberals, was a violation of provincial autonomy. Here is the list:

The Hon. Maurice LeNoblet Duplessis, Montreal Matin, Leopold Richer—paid on a commission basis by the newspaper, Notre Temps. The Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer), member for Three Rivers, a close friend of premier Duplessis, the former secretary of state, who when he saw so many changes—

An hon. Member: The Hon. Nicol.

Mr. Dupuis: You will have an opportunity to make a speech later.

An hon. Member: Don't forget him.

Mr. Dupuis: The Quebec school board, headed by a "duplessist," Mr. Cossette, Mr.

François Albert Angers, who goes even farther and thinks the province of Quebec should become a separate country, Mr. Esdras Mainville, who no later than last week, again put his foot in his mouth and ascribed to Duplessis some of Mr. Godbout's accomplishments, Mr. Louis-Philippe Roy, of l'Action Catholique, who is embarrassingly friendly to the Union Nationale, the very Louis-Philippe Roy who at one point had this to say to Stalin:

Let Stalin mind what I have just said.

Mr. Charles Pelletier, paid on a commission basis by the newspaper Notre Temps, Mr. Marcel Adam, paid on a commission basis by the newspaper Notre Temps, and finally, those who owe their election to the Union Nationale. I need not mention names.

Mr. Chairman, who are the ones who saw no encroachment on provincial autonomy? Here is the list, and you will see there is quite a contrast. The names I shall now quote are all completely free from financial bonds of any kind, and free from the Union Nationale.

Here is a list I made up just as I was about to enter the house. A few names may be missing, but here it is:

Quebec Association of Professional Teachers: in favour of the federal act designed to aid our universities, as submitted by the then Liberal government; Monsignor Irenee Lussier, rector of Montreal University, Mr. Marcel Lambert, Ph. D., Mr. Jean Falardeau, Mr. Cyril James, of McGill University, The Quebec Federation of Teachers' Associations, The Canadian Federation of Catholic Workers, the then president of CCCL, Mr. Gerard Picard, who once was a victim of discrimination; the teachers' associations of the four universities of Quebec.

All these people who are free from all ties and sound of mind, we like to think, have stated that the legislation concerning federal grants to universities which the federal government had adopted was not an encroachment of autonomy.

There is another list, that of wage earners, that of "rebaters" and "rebates," of those who had direct or indirect dealings with the Union Nationale but who were too heartless to speak their minds.

Autonomy.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot help saying now: Autonomy. Autonomy. What crimes have been committed in thy name.

Autonomy. Autonomy. If thou had not existed, some people would have had to invent thee to serve their own purposes.

Mr. Chairman, looking today at my friends opposite, I remember the speeches they made during the election campaigns when they came over into our ridings to tell us that the federal government had no right to help universities. I remember also that last year in this very house, the hon. members opposite did vote for the same legislation the Liberal government had passed and against which they were protesting at the time with quavering voices.

Well, we are now giving serious thought to sound legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I listened to the speech made by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion). He is an expert in constitutional law. He is, in fact, such an expert that he cannot venture to make a single speech without reading from his text, lest he should forget a comma.

The hon. member for Bellechasse is no doubt an expert constitutional lawyer, but because of that and because he could make a mistake and prove we are right, he writes his texts in advance. He takes care not to get away from it, in order not to risk proving we are right.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard similar speeches in many quarters, but it is none the less true that all right thinking persons in the province of Quebec realize today that what was in former days an interference with provincial autonomy, a crime against the province, has now become a help, a blessing, something that is very good.

The procedure has changed. The form has changed perhaps, but the substance remains the same. Of course, with some of our friends, the great lack is substance, but in this legislation substance is what it lacks least, because it was introduced by the Liberal government, which had no intention of violating autonomy, but which, realizing like several other persons, that our Canadian universities were in need of financial help and that the leaders of those universities had not the required facilities to help our country produce as many prominent men as we would have liked, considered the problem of universities, not of its own initiative—because it did not improvise such action—but following recommendations from serious people and as a result of the Massey commission report which stated that, if universities were not helped, they would bog down, because they were in need of several million dollars to meet their needs in the immediate future.

Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago, I heard the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) refer to section 93 of the British North America Act. I think I have often heard it referred to somewhere or other.

The hon. member for Sherbrooke was heard to say that the field of education was under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, as stipulated in section 93. Nobody denies that. Mr. St. Laurent never denied it; but what did Mr. Duplessis say when discussions started with regard to university grants? He did not refer to section 93. He spoke of sections 91 and 92. When dealing with section 91, he went on quickly, so as to get to section 92, and then said:

> Section 92, is perfectly clear to our minds. It is only the Liberals who cannot see clearly. But, as far as we are concerned, we do see clearly.
> Section 92 confers an exclusive right to the provinces in the direct taxation field.

He kept repeating it for years, or rather from 1945 to 1956. At one time—

Mr. Parizeau: Until 1959.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I think that if I were the member for Lake St. John (Mr. Parizeau) and knew no more than he does, I would keep quiet and not say a word.

Moreover, if I rise at this time, it is to inform those hon. members whose outlook is one-sided, because, like horses that wear blinkers, they only can see in one direction. I just want to give them information.

In 1956, Mr. Duplessis introduced in the Quebec legislature—and I was there at the time—

An hon. Member: You did not stay long.

Mr. Dupuis: I stayed long enough to smell out a member of the Union Nationale from a distance, and I can do so in the House of Commons.

Mr. Chairman, I will bring out certain statements made by Mr. Duplessis and you will see that they are tremendous. Of course, they may be somewhat rambling, because I was not prepared, and I did not expect the "duplessists" to take part in this debate today.

Mr. Chairman, I beg you to have a little patience—

[Mr. Dupuis.]

Mr. Parizeau: Mr. Lamontagne wrote your speech and you are reading it.

Mr. Rouleau: You should go back to your personality courses.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I believe it would do good to some Conservative members to follow Mr. Lamontagne's courses.

Mr. Chairman, when I look at my hon. friends of Quebec, opposite, I cannot hold a grudge against them—one cannot hold a grudge against children for the way they have been raised—but now that they are in Ottawa with us, we will try to impart some of our knowledge to them. They could use it to avoid perhaps making rash promises.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to quote a statement of the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer). Listen to this, Mr. Chairman: "The legislation on federal grants to universities is unsatisfactory and centralizing", he said. The same legislation they said was unsatisfactory and centralizing under a Liberal government has become an official blessing under the Conservative administration.

I now come to a statement of the former secretary of state (Mr. Courtemanche), the man who preferred the Senate to—

Mr. Denis: He is ill; he is the ailing senator, that one—

Mr. Dupuis: The former secretary of state said that it was an invasion of the field of direct taxation and that the federal government should return to the provinces their exclusive right to direct taxation.

That was Mr. Duplessis' school. Once, Mr. Duplessis introduced in the legislature a bill whose preamble read as follows:

> Whereas under section 92 of our Canadian constitution, the province of Quebec has an exclusive right in the field of direct taxation—

Immediately, the answer was: "No, we do not have an exclusive right. Such was the contention since 1945, since the beginning, that the province of Quebec did not have an exclusive right in the field of direct taxation. It had a right of direct taxation under the terms of section 92, but according to section 91, the federal government could resort to every method of taxation." It is clear. It is easy to see. Just read the constitution and you will see. Well, Mr. Chairman, in order to bring the federal government to agree to that income tax deduction, Mr. Duplessis within half an hour had to retract all that he had preached during 10, 15 and 20 years, and he erased in front of us—it is not for nothing that pencils are fitted with erasers—the word "exclusive". It is clear.

So, Mr. Chairman, everything that was claimed as being exclusive for the last 20 years has now become common, as common as was at times the language of the one who held it to be exclusive. I shall not dwell any longer on the sections which confirm our rights since they are quite clear. The Liberal government was the first to think of helping the universities. At the time that hurt Union Nationale members who were against it. But today, the Conservative government is supposed to have changed everything, but it comes back with the same law, with the same situation, and last year we saw our friends opposite cast a reluctant vote in voting illogically for what they had been condemning previously.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, when Mr. Duplessis was there, this aid to universities was impossible. In Ottawa, Mr. Duplessis never had anything constructive to suggest, no positive proposal. All he ever did was to utter the word autonomy and then take leave. "Autonomy" was the only word he could ever find. Then he would return to Quebec, and was welcomed with beating drums at the Palais station.

Well, Mr. Chairman, we realize that Mr. Duplessis could have made concrete suggestions, had he wanted to, and that if the hon. Mr. Sauve's suggestion were deemed acceptable, those of Mr. Duplessis would have been acceptable and accepted in fact. But, as his attitude was a negative, as he was imbued with partisanship and separatism, it was therefore impossible to discuss with a person like Maurice LeNoblet Du Pont Duplessis, of Three Rivers.

I say that today I will vote for this motion, but I feel I must rise after the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) to point out that we have here the full result of a great and useful step taken by Mr. Louis St. Laurent to help the universities all over the country.

I cannot help thinking of all the money lost in small time politicking. I cannot help remembering all the years we lost, when our young people might have enjoyed a university education which was refused then, under the pretext of protecting a sham autonomy. I simply cannot think of all the Union Nationale lost for us Quebeckers in a period of 20 years.

Mr. Chairman, if the Hon. Paul Sauve suddenly got up and found a way to accept federal grants, why could his chief not find a solution and make concrete suggestions to the federal authorities? Now, the premier of Quebec, the hon. Mr. Barrette, suddenly found the legislation beneficial; though he had sat long enough in the Quebec legislature to realize that Mr. Duplessis was holding the province back and depriving our universities of the answer to a great need. It is not up to me, as I say, to interpret sections 93, 92 and 91, and I leave that to our learned lawyers. However, I know that section 91 gives the federal government the right to levy all kinds of taxes, including direct taxation, whereas section 92 confers the right of direct taxation upon the provinces. I also know that under section 91, the province of Quebec never found the federal government in its way, neither at the time of Mr. Louis St. Laurent nor in the days of Mr. Mackenzie King. As a matter of fact, the federal government never encroached upon provincial autonomy in the educational field.

To my mind, I admit—

An hon. Member: All that is written.

Mr. Dupuis: It is all in black and white. Obviously, for those who never say anything but interjections; nothing interesting is ever written. But I am saying that because I know it has been put in writing.

I recognize, and this my creed—for I have one—I recognize that the national Canadian government has a right to look after the advancement of arts, sciences and letters in this country. I cannot admit it should have the right to interfere in the type of education, programs and training that will be given our citizens because, under section 93, that is left to the provinces. But, as Canadians, we are not entitled to think for a moment that the government which is looking after the destinies of our country should not take a logical and commendable action in showing interest in the advancement of arts, science and letters in Canada.

Can we, for a moment, believe that General de Gaulle, president of France, should not take an interest in the progress of education, in the various French departments? And President Eisenhower, must he not take an interest also in the progress of arts, science and letters throughout the United States?

We live today in a world where competition is world wide, and not only local. If Canada does not have a great number of prominent people in the field of arts, science and letters, the whole country suffers from such a situation.

Mr. Chairman, there was a Canadian prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, who realized that, nowadays, the era of petty village quarrels is over. The time when people indulged in petty politics twenty four hours a day for 365 days a year is over. Yes, Mr. Chairman, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent realized that Canadian universities had to be known across the world. To achieve that purpose, he gave grants to universities without interfering at all in the type of programs, training or education within the universities themselves.

This is a Liberal piece of legislation; it is an advantageous and sound Liberal legislation. It is a tribute to Louis St. Laurent. It is a tribute that the present federal government is paying to Mr. St. Laurent in placing before us that piece of legislation concerning grants to Canadian universities.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, I also would like to make a few brief remarks, not as unpleasant as those the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) would like to make them, but some remarks about this resolution.

This matter of tax sharing to provide alternative arrangement for the payment of grants to our institutions of higher learning has been much discussed and has raised much controversy. It is a matter which has been much discussed by the population of the province of Quebec and about which the province had given its full support to the premier of that time, the hon. Mr. Duplessis, who will be well remembered by the whole country as one of the greatest premiers of French Canada.

We are about to settle this matter which had no other fate than being put off from time to time by the former Liberal federal government. And it is significant that this question should be settled by the ministers and the members who form the present Conservative government.

Mr. Chairman, if you analyse the factors involved in the agreement about to be concluded between the government of Quebec on the one hand and the central government on the other, it is obvious that one of the main causes of this success is the totally different attitude of the present government as compared to that of the previous government. The arrogant, intractable take it or leave it attitude has been replaced by a friendly, understanding attitude and by a desire to settle a problem which concerns one of Canada's most beautiful provinces: the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, the man who occupied the chair a moment ago knows better than anyone, because of his background, that the city of St. Hyacinthe is famous for its contribution to education throughout the country. He knows that our educational institutions are a credit not only to St. Hyacinthe, but to the whole country. Each year, in St. Hyacinthe, students from everywhere in Canada, and even from the United States and other countries, come to acquire the knowledge that will make of them qualified men in their respective fields.

I seize this opportunity, Mr. Chairman, to say a well deserved tribute to our educational institutions and, in particular, to their teaching staff. By their conduct and their knowledge, the teachers helped make prominent citizens of our people, and this even well beyond our frontiers.

I am sure of expressing the feeling of our people, Mr. Chairman, when paying tribute to two great Quebec figures, men who have done so much for the progress of education in our province. I am referring to Hon. Maurice Duplessis and Hon. Paul Sauve, former premiers of Quebec. As you know, both have greatly contributed to the agreement which we are about to adopt. It was the realistic and logical position of these two premiers, who had the entire and immediate support of the Quebec population which paved the way for the agreement now before us. To the first, we owe our gratitude for his tenacity and his steadfast stand against those who wanted him to accept proposals which went against the best interests of the province of Quebec. Deeply convinced that Quebec, on account of its faith, tongue and traditions, is not a province like the others, he has always insisted upon such an approach to the problems. That is what the present Minister of Finance understood, after the present Prime Minister, Right Hon. John Diefenbaker. The record has amply justified premier Duplessis' attitude, since he was, at the start, the only one to rise against the Liberal government of the time and now practically all the premiers of the other provinces have accepted his opinions and taken the same attitude as he did. To my knowledge—

Mr. Pickersgill: You have forgotten Drew.

Mr. Ricard: To my knowledge, Mr. Chairman, premier Duplessis is the man who launched the agreement that we are definitely reaching. The second one, Hon. Paul Sauve, whom the Liberals recognize today as a great Canadian from Quebec, most probably because he is now dead—for when he was in power, they had started a petty campaign of slander against him, as they had always done with regard to his predecessor. Hon. Paul Sauve is certainly to be considered the architect of the present agreement. His wish to serve his people, his way of looking at things objectively and realistically and his broadmindedness were at the basis of the present agreement. He too deserves our never-ending gratitude, as well as that of the other citizens of this country.

Another great promoter of the present understanding is the present premier of Quebec, Hon. Antonio Barrette. A gentleman of politics, as he is called—

Mr. Rouleau: Not by us.

Mr. Ricard: —because of his tact, his patriotism, his politeness—which is totally lacking in the hon. member for Dollard—and his realism, brought together all people of good will who wished a practical solution for all concerned. We owe him also our most sincere gratitude.

As a Conservative member, Mr. Chairman—

An hon. Member: You mean as a Union Nationale member.

Mr. Ricard: Yes, as a supporter of the Union Nationale, and I am proud to proclaim it, because it is a government which has done much for the province of Quebec; it is a government which has had also the support of the people of the province of Quebec, in spite of all the slanderous and stifling influences of the Liberal party against everything it was doing.

I feel a very legitimate pride, as a Conservative member, in having taken part in this understanding, and of having done something to bring it to the point—

Mr. Rouleau: Of being completed.

Mr. Ricard: —of being completed since this will be a monument to the glory of the Conservative party and will make desperation of the Grits, those wet blankets. I am certainly glad for having done something about it for it is an important and definite step that will certainly, as I just said, be a monument to the glory of the Conservative party. The Minister of Finance who never ceased working for ensuring justice to all concerned also deserves all our gratitude. The difficulties he faced at various times did not break the indomitable courage which is so characteristic of him. He has also continued to work towards a final agreement. The people of Quebec see in him, and they have seen it for quite a while, one of their closest friends.

We must also recognize that our Prime Minister, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker has done a lot to bring about that agreement. He is the worthy successor of the right hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, since he is following in his footsteps in order to assure everywhere an integral Canadianism from sea to sea.

Mr. Chairman, certain statements made in this house or elsewhere lead to believe that in the province of Quebec nothing, or almost nothing, was done for the furtherance of schooling and education. I should like at this point, Mr. Chairman, to give some figures which can certainly clear up, in the minds of right-minded people—but not of some of those to my left—

Mr. Denis: Name them.

Mr. Ricard: —because they have never been able to understand anything, they are simply imbued with—

An hon. Member: He does not know his left.

Mr. Ricard: They have a bitter taste in their mouth that comes from losing the power. It is only with spite, remorse and resentment that they speak and reveal what is on their minds.

Mr. Rouleau: Rumilly will be shocked.

Mr. Ricard: This house is surely interested in knowing that early in 1959, the province of Quebec had the largest number of university students. Out of a total population of 4,884,000, there were in that province 29,320 students entitled to federal assistance. That is 5,324 more students than in Ontario for the same year.

Mr. Chairman, if we consider that from 1945 to 1959 inclusive, the Quebec government has appropriated the fabulous sum of $768,706,931.34 for public education, it is impossible not to rejoice at the results the measure before us will bring about. With more money, the Quebec government will, under the able leadership of its present premier, the Hon. Antonio Barrette—who will also be premier after the next election —do a still better job in the province in the field of education and teaching.

In June 1959, during the annual convention of learned societies of this country which was held in Saskatoon, Miss Rosemary Bushell, of the research bureau of the conference of Canadian universities and colleges, stated that among Canadian governments, the Quebec government was giving the greatest help to universities and their students. In the academic year 1956-1957, the Quebec government contributed in a proportion of 54 per cent to student aid throughout Canada, in the form of fellowships and scholarships.

If, Mr. Chairman, we make the comparison between the years 1943-1944, under a Liberal government, and 1957-1958, it will be found that amounts earmarked for university teaching in the province of Quebec, rose from $2,356,000 to $14,570,460, that is, an increase of 600 per cent.

(Text):

Mr. Parizeau: Shame on the Grits.

(Translation):

Mr. Ricard: Such are, Mr. Chairman, the figures I challenge hon. members on the Liberal benches to question. I have quoted them in this house to make the Liberals still more sorry, as you cannot fail to realize, Mr. Chairman, that since the legislation is before us, deep gloom has gripped the ranks of the Liberal party.

Finally, there is a point which we have not been able to solve, Mr. Chairman. During the 20 years they were in power, the question remained pending, and it shall be settled by the Conservative party, to the benefit of those among our people who really want educational advancement.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the way the Conservative government wants to administer things. Indeed, we are always feeling the pulse of the working population and keeping close to it, because the workers are keeping close to us. They have put their trust in us and will never stop trusting us.

Mr. Rouleau: The hon. member spoke differently when the Hon. Duplessis was still living.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, I should like to express a few thoughts that came to my mind about the two or three speeches I have heard today. First of all, I was hurt,—and I say so dispassionately,— to hear the hon. member for Port Arthur, (Mr. Fisher) whom I hold in high esteem, speaking as he did of the province of Quebec and its people.

Sure enough, there are fanatics and bigots in the province of Quebec, as in the nine other provinces, but they are not very many.

The province of Quebec is conscious, at least all right-minded people are, that we form part of the Canadian confederation. We understand that Canadian citizens, whether they live in Prince Edward Island, in Newfoundland, in Manitoba or in Ontario, are Canadian just as much as we are, and that we are Canadian just as much as they are.

I really regret that the hon. member for Port Arthur should have spoken the way he did today in this house.

Mr. Bourbonnais: He used to be a Liberal.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): He certainly did not do so with a view to promoting good understanding in this country. If he took the trouble of visiting our province, not only for two days, but for a whole week end in Quebec city or in Montreal, and of associating with us, exchanging ideas with us, he would no doubt change his mind about the citizens of the province of Quebec.

There is another argument I should like to adduce in support of what I have just said, and it is that all citizens of the province of Quebec should not be judged by the views of some people who, from time to time, may have expressed very personal ideas which do not represent the general thinking of the population of Quebec.

I should be interested to know what Mr. Claude Jodin will say and what Mr. Michel Chartrand will think of the ideas expressed this morning by the hon. member for Port Arthur.

In any event, I should like to assure him of the friendship of the citizens of Quebec, and I invite him to come to our province and to associate with us. He would soon realize that we are as good Canadians as he is and as are all other Canadians of the other provinces.

Mr. Bourbonnais: It must not be forgotten that he is an advanced Liberal.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Chairman, I also listened carefully to what was said by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard); in his speech, he made an admission of which I should like to remind him.

He told us that the former premier, the Hon. Paul Sauve—for whom I have never hidden my esteem,—was the originator of this agreement, because he had shown objectivity and realism.

Would that mean, by any chance, that his predecessor had shown no objectivity nor realism in the discussion of those matters?

We have been told that the Liberal administration had neither the courage nor the brains to settle the university question. However, the door was always left open in Ottawa for discussing this problem.

An hon. Member: There was a screen.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): We always got the same answers, it was always the same negative attitude. I repeat to my hon. friends —and I say with no ill feelings whatsoever— because if I recall these facts to the weak memory of our hon. friends from Quebec, it is because, as the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) pointed out, I think today's legislation is a clear testimony to the memory and glory of Mr. St. Laurent. I join in with all my colleagues to pay him tribute. However, I do not want it to be only in my own words, but I would like to quote in support an excerpt from the Globe and Mail, a newspaper which is not particularly close to the Liberal party. Part of an editorial from this newspaper was quoted in l'Action Catholique for Friday, September 24, 1954, and I quote:

Such is also the opinion of the Toronto Globe and Mail—

The article had just quoted another newspaper:

Such is also the opinion of the Toronto Globe and Mail, which believes that Mr. St. Laurent's speech will go down in Canada's history. The article then goes on to take a pot shot at the premier of Quebec.

And here is the quotation from the Globe and Mail:

We are quite sure that Mr. Duplessis never intended to start something so constructive. He was merely indulging in politics. But he pushed it to the point where Mr. St. Laurent was forced to answer back, and in his reply, he reached one of the highest levels of statesmanship.

This morning, the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Johnson) challenged the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Leduc) to prove that university rectors had spoken up when it was very slyly suggested to them that they were not to accept the grants to universities. I have here a clipping from La Presse for November 14, 1956, which bears the title:

Mr. St. Laurent's offer to the universities is unanimously carried.

Let me quote the first paragraph of this article:

The national conference of Canadian universities has unanimously accepted the offer it has received from the Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent, Prime Minister of Canada, to administer and distribute the funds placed at its disposal to help Canadian universities.

Mr. Chairman, I draw attention to the next sentence:

The representative of the province of Quebec was one of the members of both the finance committee and the executive committee of the conference who took a stand on this matter.

And further on, in an item entitled: "Mgr. Lussier takes a definite stand", I read:

I obey to what seems to me to be a conscience duty and I state strongly our respect for the federal and provincial authority. I think I can state, said the rector, that under the circumstances described, the money that is offered could be accepted for capital expenditures.

The rector of the University of Montreal, Mgr. Irenee Lussier, adopted a truly vigorous stand when he gave his opinion on the acceptance of federal assistance to higher education, without the approbation of his council of governors. As we all know, the council of governors of the University of Montreal includes persons who are in one way or another answerable to the government of the province of Quebec, which places the rector in a delicate situation when it comes to state a truly academic policy.

A little further on, and this is the last sentence I want to quote dealing with the financial situation of the university, Mgr. Lussier added:

That is why we suffer at this time from being in a situation which seems to force us to make an apparently political choice.

Mr. Chairman, I believe this is clear enough, and I am not making up anything. This was published in La Presse of November 14, 1956, and those are the very words of the rector of the University of Montreal, Mgr. Irenee Lussier.

Mr. Chairman, it is obvious that we will support wholeheartedly this resolution. As did some Conservative members from Quebec, I want to pay a tribute to Mr. Sauve for having had the intelligence to make constructive and concrete proposals to the federal government.

The only reproach we can make to the former premier of Quebec is that in the field of grants to universities, he always said no, closed the door and walked away. I believe Mr. Sauve acted like a great Canadian in coming here to explain to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) the proposal of the province of Quebec, and in believing that we had no right to deprive of high school and university education, as the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville said, a whole generation of young people.

Mr. Chairman, I said I would not speak for a long time. I close my remarks in saying that we are going to vote with much enthusiasm in favour of the bill which will be introduced after this resolution. We only regret that, in Quebec, it took so long to understand that the duty of a public man is to see, first of all, to the general welfare of the community, before thinking about the re-election of his party and his followers.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry? The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Bourbonnais: What does he know about Quebec?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I understood one of the hon. members to ask as I rose in my seat, what did I know about Quebec? I know quite a little bit about Quebec, and I have known quite a little bit about Quebec for a very long time.

I was rather astonished at some of the things said by the hon. member for Port Arthur this afternoon, who admitted that only since 1957 when he was elected to this house had he begun to make any serious study of French Canada and on the basis of the three years' elementary course that he had taken, of the affairs of one third of this country, he proceeded to pontificate this afternoon.

I do think that there are some of us who have had a longer time to observe our fellow citizens in Quebec and in other parts of Canada where they speak the French language than apparently has been the case with the hon. member for Port Arthur. I think if the hon. member for Port Arthur, who is a very intelligent member and I think a man of good will—I would not contest that for one minute—and who is also constantly talking about the history of this country, had just reflected on the history of this country in this twentieth century and had been asked, "If you had to pick three men out of all the Canadians who have taken a part in public affairs in this twentieth century, three men who had contributed as much as any other three men to a recognition that this is a country with two equal cultures and a country where citizens, whatever their origin, are equal, who would you pick?", those three men would have been Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Ernest Lapointe and Louis St. Laurent.

I do not say that you could not pick three other names equally worthy, and there is certainly one which I would say was in every respect equally worthy, Mr. Mackenzie King. But I would draw attention to the fact—

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): What about Premier Smallwood? Where would you put him?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Saint John-Albert, who is seizing one of those rather rare occasions when I speak to make a speech himself, asks me where I would put the premier of Newfoundland. I will tell him where I would put the premier of Newfoundland: the premier of Newfoundland thought so much of this country when Louis St. Laurent was prime minister that he brought Newfoundland into Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I would hope that the hon. member would get back to education and this resolution at some time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would draw your attention, sir, to the fact that I have not mentioned anything which has not been mentioned by previous speakers in this debate who have not been called to order, and I hope Your Honour will give me the same latitude as has been given to other hon. members because I have no intention to do anything in this intervention other than discuss speeches which have already been made in this debate.

I was discussing the speech made by the hon. member for Port Arthur, who spent a great deal of his time suggesting that because a few people in the province of Quebec took a rather narrow view of Canadianism, just as there are a few people in the city of Toronto and in some other parts of this country who think that they, too, have a monopoly on Canadianism, they are not very representative of French Canada, or indeed of any other part of Canada. I was pointing out that it was perhaps no accident that when one picks four names, as I did, all those four happened to be members of the Liberal party of Canada. Incidentally, the only name which was suggested from the other side was another member of the Liberal party of Canada, a man who helped to complete that dream of confederation which Sir John Macdonald joined with George Brown and a great many other Liberals in bringing about nearly a century ago.

I was also rather astonished to hear several hon. members sitting over on this side of the house but not in this party suggesting that there was something rigid and intransigent about the attitude of the government which was in office when Mr. St. Laurent was prime minister. But I was very pleased to observe that that attitude was not taken by the hon. member for Bellechasse, who speaks after thinking instead of before thinking as seems to be the case with some hon. members supporting the government sitting to my immediate left. The hon. member for Bellechasse, in speaking in this debate the other day on the subject which is now before us, had this to say, as reported on page 2241 of Hansard for March 18 last:

(Translation):

Last year, I had the opportunity—as I also did during my election campaign—to say how much I had admired the gesture of the Hon. Louis St. Laurent who, after having found opposition in Quebec, and being aware that this opposition was due to a firm wish to observe the constitution, agreed, after a meeting with the Hon. Maurice Duplessis, to increase from 5 to 10 per cent the individual income tax deduction, so that provinces wishing to do so, and more particularly the province of Quebec, might exercise their own jurisdiction in the taxation field.

(Text):

That is the rigidity which was shown by the previous government. The fact of the matter is that ever since 1957 this country has been living in the kind of world which was described by Lewis Carroll in "Through the Looking Glass and what Alice found there". Everything is reversed. Not only is the former government—this is normal in parliamentary institutions to which I take no objection—now in opposition and the former opposition now in government, but history has to be changed too. All the past has to be changed by hon. gentlemen opposite. They are not satisfied with their own achievements; they must change everything that happened before. But I am glad to say that the hon. member for Bellechasse, who seems to have somewhat more regard for the facts than some hon. members on the other side of the house, has really rather exploded that whole silly notion.

The fact of the matter is that the problem we are now considering is this. I am not now talking particularly about university grants but rather about the main problems of the division of the direct tax field between the federal parliament and provincial legislatures. This is the problem which was elucidated so well a few moments ago by the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville when he cited from memory—and incidentally his memory is a lot better than that of some hon. gentlemen—the provisions of the British North America Act both in sections 91 and 92 with respect to taxation. He pointed out that far from the federal parliament ever having tried to invade the provincial field, a former provincial premier put as a preamble in his legislation a statement that was not true and not in accord with the constitution, and that the premier of Quebec regularly claimed that he had a power which under the constitution the legislature of Quebec did not have at all and that is the exclusive right to impose direct taxes.

If the former premier of Quebec had believed that—no, probably I should not say that—but if the premier of Quebec had really felt he could sustain that position in the courts, why did he not challenge the income tax? Why did he not challenge all this legislation in the courts?

If the Solicitor General really believed the things he said in this chamber when he sat on this side why did he not refuse to join the government that continues to impose an income tax? One hon. gentleman said earlier today in this debate that when Sir Thomas White proposed an income tax in 1917 it was a temporary measure for wartime. That is what Sir Thomas White said, as one hon. gentleman reminded us earlier. That is true enough but like many other temporary measures including some of the so-called temporary buildings they last quite a long time. I do not believe the Minister of Finance is going to get up and tell us that his follower is now his leader and that he is going to scrap the income tax and change his budget. In fact, far from that, he gave us a whopping addition to it only last year.

The plain fact is that there has been a marked change since 1957 in the attitude of the government of Canada toward the governments of the provinces in this field but that change is quite the opposite of what hon. gentlemen opposite said it would be when they sat over here. In 1957 the old tax rental system was coming up for revision. The agreements would have expired and did in fact expire on March 31, 1957. More than two years before that Mr. St. Laurent as prime minister of this country called the first conference to discuss this matter. Again I remind hon. gentlemen this was done two years before the impending expiry. Counting all the various meetings that were held, five meetings were held with provincial representatives before the final proposition was brought into this house by Mr. Harris in 1956. In the course of those discussions many modifications were made at the suggestion of the provincial governments.

After that long process some finality, of course, had to be reached and the legislation was brought in which was described by the present Minister of Finance as incomprehensible. I think that is the word he used. I have Hansard here if I am challenged, but I do not think I will be. And while it is true that in the end the Tory opposition did vote for that bill, or at least did not vote against it—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In 1956?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh yes, we did.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did you vote against it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, we said it was quite inadequate.

Mr. Pickersgill: I asked the minister if the opposition of that day voted against it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Was there a division?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: I had forgotten that but I accept the minister's correction gladly because it strengthens my argument. My argument is that this so-called inadequate and incomprehensible legislation is still the law of Canada and no improvement has been made except that a small dividend has been added. I suggested the other day when I spoke before, and I will not elaborate that point because I have already made it, that a small dividend was added for one reason and for one reason only and that was that the government did not get a majority in 1957 and they were going to the country again in 1958 and that they felt that this addition of 3 per cent reduction allowed in the personal income tax would be of some electoral advantage to them. I suggest that if the Conservatives had got a clear majority in the election of 1957 there would have been no change whatever in the tax-sharing arrangements act until the time of its expiry in 1962. It is very obvious that from March 31, 1958 we have had no suggestion that there would be any improvement. But, we have had some very extraordinary things said.

The Minister of Justice has turned out to be one of the greatest financial experts in this country. He went down to Newfoundland a year ago to make peace in Newfoundland and to tell the Newfoundlanders how much better off they were than they used to be and he did so in a toplofty patronizing way that was not much appreciated in Newfoundland. The hon. gentleman also went to Quebec to tell the people of that province how much better off they are now under a Conservative government than they were under the government of Louis St. Laurent. He went to speak to the women's Conservative club in Quebec and I notice that the Ottawa Journal quoted what the minister had to say. In order to verify this I got a copy from the minister's office of the translation of his speech but this quotation from the Journal seems to be very adequate for the purpose. Here is what the hon. gentleman said:

> We (the Conservative government) constantly show ourselves ready to study each problem on its merits, and there can be no doubt that to date the relations between the provincial and federal authorities are less strained than ever before.

This speech was made on November 25, 1959 and the report appeared in the Ottawa Journal of December 1. I draw attention to the fact that it was the Minister of Justice who said this. Let us just consider the evidence. This statement was made in 1959. That was the year this government repudiated the constitution of Canada and the obligations of Canada under the terms of union with Newfoundland thereby vastly improving our relations with Newfoundland, and the only two members of the Newfoundland legislature who supported this government were both defeated at the polls in the provincial election.

An hon. Member: What has this to do with education?

Mr. Pickersgill: An hon. gentleman asks me what this has to do with education. What we are discussing are the federal-provincial financial arrangements and a minor improvement this government—which claims it has created greater harmony and reduced strains with the provinces—claims to have made in that way.

What is the evidence? I refer to Newfoundland as an example but some people will say that is an extreme illustration. I will bring evidence from some of the other provinces. I have here a news item from the Cape Breton Post of October 16, certainly a newspaper that has never been accused of supporting the Liberal party and one which I think most people would regard as a very strong Tory paper. This is a Canadian Press story and no doubt it appeared in many other newspapers. I just happened to pick up this one. This was the day after the Minister of Finance had that meeting last October with the provincial ministers of finance and provincial treasurers. Here are what some of them said about this new state of harmony:

> British Columbia's premier Bennett said "it's just what we expected" but he criticized "inane policies" of the federal government which had produced a big deficit—

Then, the provincial treasurer of Saskatchewan said:

We are, of course, very unhappy about the decision. All the provinces are unhappy.

He called it a breach of faith. One could go on and quote a good many others, some of them not exactly opponents normally of the present government. I shall now quote Premier Stanfield. This is from the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of the same date. Premier Stanfield, speaking of the conference, said he was not surprised that Ottawa was unable, because of the deficit financial position, to grant further moneys. He went on to say:

It does not follow logically that nothing could be done on an interim basis before the tax sharing arrangements expire in 1962.

I do not suppose from one end of the country to the other there is the head of any government that supports the government at Ottawa more than Premier Stanfield does, unless it is possibly Premier Flemming of New Brunswick. Premier Stanfield said that what the minister is proposing now is not logical. He said he hoped next year Ottawa's financial position would be sufficiently improved to permit something more to be done for the provinces during the current agreement. We are now being told nothing more is going to be done.

I might add that as you go further west you find that the complaints get a little stronger. For instance, in the Toronto Telegram we have this item:

Ottawa deaf to provinces' plea.

The provincial treasurer of Ontario, Mr. Allan, said that a tax adjustment was not only desirable but absolutely necessary. Mr. Roblin said the position of the federal government——indicated that if there is a federal surplus next year Ottawa will have to change its stand toward the provinces.

In the Winnipeg Tribune of October 17 we find an editorial entitled "Closed Door". Indeed, that is all the Minister of Finance has ever done. He and the Prime Minister gave a solemn promise, a solemn undertaking, in November, 1957 that they would have another federal-provincial conference in January of 1958. They broke that promise. They made a unilateral decision by telegram, and that is all that has ever happened since, except this meeting where, as the Winnipeg Tribune, one of the normally strong supporters of this government, said they closed the door.

Of course, you can hardly pick up a newspaper without reading a heading like this one. This is from the Ottawa Journal of October 20:

Frost Attacks Ottawa

It has to do with this matter. Then, on January 5, 1960, we find this in the Toronto Star:

Frost Won't Pay Tax "Due" Ottawa

Then, on February 5, 1960, the Ottawa Journal carried this headline:

Frost Seeks Extra $100,000,000 From Federal Treasury

I could read these but everybody has read them. I am just putting these things on the record to show this wonderful harmony that has been created by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, and that latter day John the Baptist, the Minister of Justice, who goes talking about this harmony all over the country with a singular regard for the facts and the figures.

Then we find in the Toronto Telegram—and, if ever there was a newspaper that ought to be grateful to the government, it is that one, as the Minister of National Revenue I am sure will readily admit—

Mr. Nowlan: I do not know what the hon. member is talking about.

Mr. Pickersgill: In the Toronto Telegram of February 25, 1960, we find the following:

Queen's Park Blasts Ottawa
Proposes Tit-For-Tat Taxes

Then, the Ottawa Journal of February 26 carries this heading:

Frost Stresses Need for Expansion Money

Again, Mr. Frost wants his $100 million. In the Hamilton Spectator of March 29 we find the following:

Frost Hints Tax-Sharing Demands May Broaden

In other words, he may not even be satisfied with $100 million. He says:

Ottawa's position had been unrealistic and unjust.

This is the harmony; this is what they have achieved.

Then, of course, when you go a little further west into Manitoba you find the present premier of that province who said he was modelling himself on the present Prime Minister of Canada; he was a real follower of John; where John went he was going to go. This was before he became the premier. He is also the provincial treasurer who had to encounter the Minister of Finance of this country. Here is his budget speech. I hold in my hand the Manitoba Hansard. I think hon. members ought to see what this harmony is we now have; I think hon. members ought to see what this Tory premier, who has just won a very considerable victory in that province, has to say about the measure that is now before us and about the attitude of this government. I quote from page 20 of the budget speech, which is to be found in the Manitoba Hansard for March 17, 1960:

The problems of intergovernmental relations in the past year have bulked large on the governmental scene. There has been some progress. Hon. members will recall that, following the plenary dominion-provincial fiscal conference of November, 1957, it was expected the conference would be reconvened early in 1958 to examine fully the requirements for improvement in the financial status of the provinces.

Hon. members will see what Mr. Roblin said:

It was expected the conference would be reconvened early in 1958 to examine fully the requirements for improvement in the financial status of the provinces. This meeting did not materialize.

I suppose that is as far as a Tory can go. He means they did not carry out their promise. I continue:

It was not until midsummer of 1959 that a committee of ministers of finance and provincial treasurers met in Ottawa.

This committee, by its very nature as it became clear, could not resolve the issues at stake.

I cannot take the time of the committee to read all of this but I will read the choicest extracts. I go to page 21, and here is what he said: Here is the provincial treasurer and premier of Manitoba talking about the Minister of Finance:

Our claim for increased revenues from this source received short shrift at the hands of the Minister of Finance.

That is the way those who were going to have a new regime of harmony, who were going to do away with attitudes of the past, acted. This is what one of their best friends, a great follower of John, had to say:

Our claim for increased revenues from this source received short shrift at the hands of the Minister of Finance. He maintained that his own budgetary situation would not permit any further "concessions" to the provinces. This was a position we could not in all logic accept.

Maybe they could not accept it in logic, but they could not pry anything out of the Minister of Finance either. I continue:

This stand suggests that a province's entitlement—

I hope some of those hon. members who are such great exponents of provincial autonomy are listening to this.

This stand suggests that a province's entitlement to a share of taxation revenue is based on whether or not Canada feels she can afford it.

That is what Mr. Roblin is saying about a Tory government. I continue:

But the provinces are not mere residual partners in the Canadian confederation.

This is a Tory premier talking about a Tory Minister of Finance in Ottawa. I continue:

We cannot accept the implication that we must wait for some unstated level of dominion revenue before we receive recognition of our just rights.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Two years, only two years, and this is what we get.

To do so would be contrary to the whole principle and spirit of confederation.

This is the Tory premier saying that what the Minister of Finance is doing is contrary to the whole spirit and principle of confederation.

I venture to suggest it would be contrary to the interests of Canada itself.

Then he went on:

We were unable to persuade the Minister of Finance to recommend to his colleagues any further changes in the level of tax-sharing. We have not given up hope—

Mr. Roblin can go on hoping but I do not think his hopes are worth much.

—for an improvement in 1961-62, but it likely will be 1962-63 before we can expect to secure a more realistic share of the taxation pool.

That is as good a friend as the government has left today after two years.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We have still got you.

Mr. Nowlan: We have got so many you cannot even recognize one from the other.

Mr. Pickersgill: They do not do much talking any more. They are not quoted much in the newspapers any more, while their erstwhile friend talks—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): When the hon. gentleman talks he is the best friend of the government.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, that has come nearer to making me sit down than anything I have ever heard. If I did not recognize that the hon. member for Carleton would not have said that without an ulterior motive it might have brought my speech to an end.

Mr. Nowlan: You are doing very well, keep it up.

Mr. Pickersgill: Here is another very interesting thing said by Mr. Roblin which shows that when you get a little distance away from Ottawa you sometimes recognize some of the facts of life. He said:

One of the advances made in the 1955 and 1956 negotiations was the recognition of the principles of equalization and stabilization.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt but I have to advise the hon. member that his time has expired. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Chevrier: Before the resolution carries, will the Minister of Finance answer the questions I put to him at an earlier stage of the debate on March 18, I believe.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the minister answers, I have a few other observations I should like to make. When the hon. member for Laurier was good enough to interrupt me and put me in order without having to ask the indulgence of the committee, which I would have been reluctant to do—

Mr. Nowlan: Purely a coincidence.

Mr. Pickersgill: —I was just about to refer to one or two other observations made by Mr. Roblin in his budget speech. In case this has not been drawn to the attention of the Minister of Finance, I feel that it should be drawn to his attention. Mr. Roblin said:

One of the advances made in the 1955 and 1956 negotiations—

That was when what we were doing was incomprehensible and inadequate, as the Minister of Finance said, but the premier of Manitoba does not seem to think so.

—was the recognition of the principles of equalization and stabilization.

This is very important, because for at least six of the provinces this is the differerence between life and death. The principles of equalization and stabilization are the difference between having autonomy and not having autonomy. Mr. Roblin went on to say:

It is true that there was a substantial element of fiscal need contained within the rental payments of the 1947 and 1952 tax agreements—

This is a great tribute from a Tory premier to the Liberal government and to what Mr. Harris and Mr. St. Laurent did in 1956.

—but it was not until the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act of 1956 that these two principles received open statutory acceptance.

Here is the premier of Manitoba saying that the system we have now is the system that Manitoba needs. It is the system, of course, that every one of the six provinces that could not possibly finance within their own limits has to have if they are to have any real autonomy, and I can tell you that the $60 million Quebec is getting by way of an equalization payment is pretty necessary to Quebec too. The provincial treasurer then went on to commend the government, as I have commended it every time I have mentioned the subject, for establishing the Atlantic provinces grants. I say that that is the one and only useful thing the government has done since it has been in office. Here is what Mr. Roblin said about it:

Unfortunately, Canada was not prepared to accept the logic of its own conclusions.

By "Canada" he means the Tory government.

The payments were limited to the four eastern provinces and were not extended to any other that might, under like conditions, be able to qualify under the formula. We may, however, reasonably hope that the principle, having once been accepted, will in the next fiscal arrangement be carried to its logical and equitable conclusion.

So say I, and so says the leader of the opposition in Nova Scotia, Mr. Hicks, who promptly made this suggestion at the very time these Atlantic grants were started, and in equity it is the only fair way to do it. Mr. Roblin goes on:

The continued acceptance and extension of the joint principles of equalization and stabilization are basic principles on which any Manitoba case must be founded.

I repeat, "The continued acceptance and extension of the joint principles of equalization and stabilization". I remind you, sir, that these principles of equalization and stabilization were fought by the Tory party when it was in opposition. They were going to substitute a new system of allocation of tax fields. Any system of allocation of tax fields would be absolutely ruinous to six provinces in this country, and Mr. Roblin has made it very clear that he recognizes that fact. He says:

The continued acceptance and extension of the joint principles of equalization and stabilization are basic principles on which any Manitoba case must be founded. These are not concessons to this province, either on the part of Canada or any other province. They are essential factors in maintaining the rightful status of the provinces in the Canadian economy. These principles remain paramount. It will be our objective to see that they are applied in a formula more effective than that existing at the present time.

If a more effective formula can be found no one on this side of the house will oppose it, but until it is found we certainly stand by the formula that Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Harris introduced, that the hon. member for Bellechasse gave a blessing to, and that the Tory premier of Manitoba has said is essential to the preservation of provincial autonomy and equality among the provinces.

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, I want to make a few brief remarks. First I wish to thank the Minister of Finance for settling a problem that has been existing for too long, that of giving all provinces a share in the aid to universities. I should also like to thank the hon. member for Bellechasse for the remarks he made about the help that the province of Quebec gives to French colleges outside of that province. It is probably doubtful whether such help is within the constitution. Hon. members all know that the provisions contained in section 93 and 133 of the British North America Act, which relate to separate schools and the French language, are equivalent to sections 22 and 23 of the Manitoba Act which was passed in 1870 and which granted the same privileges with respect to schools and language as have been granted to the minority in the province of Quebec.

I am happy to say that the province of Quebec has treated the English Protestant minority very well and I hope that the province of Quebec will always do so. But although in Manitoba we have the same constitutional rights as the province of Quebec, as all hon. members know, we have lost all our rights. We have left no vestige of the rights that were granted by our own provincial constitution.

Recently a royal commission was formed to study educational problems in Manitoba. The five members brought in a unanimous report advising the provincial government to grant 80 per cent of the amount paid to public schools for the support of separate and private schools. However, since that time the Winnipeg Free Press, that great Liberal paper which supports freedom for the South Africans and freedom all over the world, is exhibiting intolerance at home by advocating that the people who support separate schools pay double taxes. I have faith in the tolerance of my fellow English and Protestant citizens in the province of Manitoba. There are always bigots like the Winnipeg Free Press fanning the flames of intolerance.

I should like also to challenge a few of the remarks made by the hon. member for Port Arthur when he attacked the hon. member for Bellechasse for advocating the right of the province of Quebec to help maintain French culture outside of the province of Quebec. The hon. member for Port Arthur said, are you in favour of a continuation of strife? I do not believe that merely because the French speaking Canadians outside Quebec fight for the maintenance of their culture they are continuing strife. It is just a struggle to keep their own culture.

If one reads the speeches of D'Arcy McGee, Brown, Macdonald, Cartier or even Mr. Rose, who represented Montreal Centre you will find that confederation was a partnership between the French and English races in Canada. Unless both cultures are treated equally, we will never have perfect unity in Canada. I do not believe we should try to argue on the basis of the British North America Act or even to stand on the Manitoba act of 1870, but we should lay more stress on the good will of Canadians generally. Unless we treat one another as equals, there will never be harmony, and it is only through harmony that Canadian unity can exist.

Mr. Habel: Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of taking part in this debate but, after listening to the hon. member for Port Arthur, I have to say a few words on this resolution.

I contend, as did the hon. member for Lapointe, that the hon. member for Port Arthur should have tried to understand the position of the French Canadians in Quebec before putting forward his point of view. I regret the stand he has taken and no doubt, on some future occasion the hon. member will find an opportunity of explaining that this was not exactly what he meant.

As a Canadian of French descent, born in the province of Quebec and partly educated in that province, I had occasion some years ago in the Ontario legislature to speak on a motion relating to the tax-sharing agreements. I feel it would be in order for me to quote certain passages from the speech that I made in order to show that in circumstances like these the fullest co-operation should be given by those in authority.

At this point I want to say that I think the hon. member for Gatineau as well as the hon. members for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville and Lapointe have made it quite clear that if the premier of Quebec had wanted to come to an understanding it would have been as easy to do so under the Liberal administration as it seems to have been under the Conservatives. On that occasion when I was speaking in the Ontario legislature, I made the following remarks:

> It is not my intention to weary the house with a long discussion of this motion, but I want to put myself on record as being one who believes that a strong federal government system is what we need in this country. However, I also want to put myself on record as being one who believes in it at all times, not as the prime ministers of Ontario and the premier of Quebec, only when it serves their poltical ambitions and purposes.

Later on I said:

> This motion, worded as it is, is nothing less than a smokescreen for the prime minister of this province and his government, who are trying to be forgiven for his stubbornness in regard to dominion-provincial relations.

I went on to say, Mr. Chairman, and I hope the hon. member for Port Arthur will note this:

> I do repeat, Mr. Speaker, that Ontario and Quebec are part of this dominion and when we ourselves, boast of being the two provinces paying most of the income tax and profit tax, why not be sincere, yes, honest, about it, and admit that we are also the two leading provinces of Canada in industries and farming? Where would we be if we did not have the other seven provinces—

Now, it would be eight provinces.

> —as buyers of the very things we are producing in these two provinces?

Later on I mentioned the fact that the people of this country are getting more and more conscious of our nationhood, and they have a right, especially in a world seeking real peace, to expect that men clothed with the responsibility of co-operating in solving such an important question will bury their political differences and their political war hatchets, and work harmoniously for the general welfare of the people when so much is at stake.

I could go on with other quotations as well, but I did think it was worth while to put on the record these examples in order that they may be before hon. members from Quebec, for whom I have great respect. The other day one of them said I had made a statement in this house for which I would be sorry. In fact, he told me personally that I had said, while a heated discussion was taking place in the house, that we were not in Quebec. What I said was that it looked very much like the debate in the legislature of Quebec. At that time I was just repeating the very words used by the Speaker of the house in Quebec just a few days previously in the legislative assembly.

For their edification I want to say that the whole question of tax arrangement is also tied up with the question of social security as well as that of university grants. I said before that in order to try at least to partly indicate the situation to the younger members from Quebec I would read for them what Mr. Bennett said in 1935. I said in the legislature as follows:

> Now I will quote from a speech by the Hon. R. B. Bennett in 1935, which should enlighten the Conservatives of today and show them how to act. The Hon. R. B. Bennett spoke at the Royal York hotel on February 24, 1935, and here is what he said:
>
> "The election will be amongst you like a thief in the night ...
>
> I realize that under our modern society we must do something to reform present conditions. If we had attempted to do this in 1930 we could not have survived ...
>
> As time went on we were convinced that the capitalistic system could be saved if it was freed from all its present abuses. When you engage in an enterprise you expect to profit by it. But we see what has happened. The poor have become poorer, and the rich have become richer ..."
> At another point he said:
>
> "Do you want socialism or communism? If not you must reform the capitalistic system..."
>
> And at yet another point:
> "Over my shoulder every day go the ghostlike features of the past. I see them every minute of each night and day. These reforms will and must come or the capitalistic system will fail, and I know not what will come in its place except anarchy."

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, may I say this? The tax-sharing arrangement is one which enabled the federal government to carry on with social security measures and also later on in granting certain aids to the universities. I cannot understand why the province of Quebec—except perhaps for purely political motives—could not have found it possible to come to an understanding previously as they are doing today. We heard a great deal of commendation stating that this change in the act was to serve national unity. I sometimes wonder whether my friends from Quebec are serious about the whole matter. I hold in my hand here an advertisement paid for by the Conservative candidate in the riding next to mine in 1958. He put the proposition to his voters as follows:

> You shouldn't have to support municipalities in other provinces,—

If we want to be Canadians I think we must look at the whole matter as Canadians, from whatever province we come. If we are fortunate enough to be in the province of Ontario or in the province of Quebec—the two leading provinces in this country—and if we want to act as Canadians, we must take every opportunity to help the other provinces which may not have as much as have the two provinces which are benefiting from the industry within their borders. As I said at the beginning of my speech, Ontario and Quebec are prosperous because we have eight other provinces as customers. We should look at them not only as customers but as Canadians.

Mr. Chevrier: May I get a reply from the minister?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member for Laurier put several questions when this resolution was under debate two weeks ago. I think I can tell him that the answers to his questions are plainly contained in the bill which I hope to have an opportunity of introducing in the house this afternoon. It is quite clear that in the case of the province of Quebec the 1 per cent corporation tax will exceed, and by a substantial sum, the equivalent of $1.50 per capita; and the adjustment at the end of the year will be made by way of a deduction from the equalization payment that accrues to the province under the provisions of the act.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill C-56, to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY ACT

AMENDMENTS TO EXTEND PERIOD OF PAYMENTS AND INCREASE MAXIMUM EXPENDITURES

The house resumed from Thursday, March 31, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Walker—Mr. Rea in the chair:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act to extend until March 31, 1964, the period during which contributions or payments may be made to the provinces under the act and to prolong until December 31, 1963, the period in respect to which construction costs may be incurred under this act; and to provide also that the aggregate of all expenditures under the act may be increased to a maximum of four hundred million dollars.

(Translation):

Mr. Habel: Yesterday, Mr. Chairman, I began some remarks, a few minutes before the house was called to the hon. Senate. I shall try to complete what I wanted to say before the time set aside for the discussion of private bills.

I mentioned yesterday that we have now a trans-Canada highway which allows all Canadian citizens and indeed many transportation companies to travel entirely on Canadian soil.

I realize, following the speech made yesterday by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) that conditions west of Port Arthur, towards Winnipeg, do not seem too favourable. It nevertheless remains that there is now a trans-Canada highway. And, as I said yesterday, I was surprised to find that the hon. minister did not, even this year, choose to consider the inclusion in his resolution of a second trans-Canada highway, which could easily exist; not that I am opposed to the present route which goes through the south eastern and northern parts of Ontario, but I believe it would interest the minister to know conditions as they are now.

Indeed, we should admit that from a national defence point of view, we should have the necessary roads, in case of an attack.

Perhaps we do not realize that it might be easy to supply with an alternate route the people of northern Ontario and those of the northwest section of the province of Quebec. I said yesterday that there is now a practicable road, and paved for the most part between Longlac and North Bay, through Hearst, Kapuskasing and Cochrane. Now we would have to open a new road linking the northeastern part of the province of Ontario to the northwestern portion of the province of Quebec. That will leave only a 52-mile stretch of road to build, which after all does not mean an extraordinary expenditure, since the road from Cochrane to Hearst, which I mentioned a moment ago, is almost paved.

It seems to me that such a road would be advantageous because it would give us direct access to the west or allow us to reach cities like Montreal and Quebec, so that we could travel on the road going through the Laurentian park. I say that that road would be necessary even for national defence purposes, especially if the government relies so much on the famous Bomarc installations—I do not intend to wander away from the resolution—because it just so happens that our region is, neither more nor less, under the umbrella where the famous Bomarc can cause the greatest damage. And there may be a time when the people of Kapuskasing, Hearst, Smooth Rock Falls, Cochrane and even of the Quebec part of the Abitibi may have to exacuate those twons as a result of what damage the famous Bomarc may cause there.

Therefore, I feel that the government should study that situation seriously. I remember that during the second world war, the Ontario provincial government, in order to contribute to the protection of the country as far as national defence was concerned, undertook to build a 163 mile stretch of road between Hearst and Longlac, which resulted in our having the existing trans-Canada highway.

It seems to me that the minister might have included in his resolution the building of a second direct road between the northern part of Ontario and the northwestern part of Abitibi.

In addition to being useful for national defence purposes, the building of such a road would supply jobs for the people of Abitibi and for the population of northeastern Ontario, because many lumber camps are operating in that area. At present, as we know, even the wood-workers return home by car every night so as not to remain overnight in the lumber camps.

This could also be a very interesting project for the tourist industry. I would therefore ask the minister to consider this matter because it is only a question of 52 miles. I must also point out, Mr. Chairman, that a survey was made in 1937-38 and that, but for the war of 1939, I am convinced this road would have been built by now.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Just before the resolution carries, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the Minister of Public Works could answer the question which I put to him the last time we were in committee.

Mr. Walker: In due course I hope to be able to answer many questions, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think probably the resolution would carry before five o'clock if the minister could give his answer.

Mr. Walker: That is very good news and under those circumstances I would be delighted.

I read with pleasure the statement of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate reported in Hansard of the next day, but really he raised a point which in reality does not require any answer, All he was bringing to the attention of the house was not something which had been said by the right hon. Prime Minister, and not something which had even been suggested by the right hon. Prime Minister. All he brought to the attention of the house was an advertisement in a provincial election, and all it recounted was the belief of a certain man from Newfoundland.

If I had to comment on what some other person believed, Mr. Chairman, I would be inundated with questions from now to eternity and never get through trying to answer them. I refuse to make any comment about what this man believes, any more than I would make any comment on the Maple Leafs believe they are going to win the championship. Because they believe that, it does not mean it is the fact that they will.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I just want to make one observation. I was not asking the minister to comment on a belief. The leader of the minister's party in the province of Newfoundland, who championed their party when they could hardly find any other champion, made the statement that he had telephoned the Prime Minister about this, and I asked the minister whether he did telephone the Prime Minister and, if so, if he would find out from the Prime Minister what the Prime Minister actually said to Mr. Hollett. If he does not choose to answer that question then I will not hold up the business of the house.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Walker thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-57, to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

HELEN FRANCES ESTELLE KEARNEY FREEMAN

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-34, for the relief of Helen Frances Estelle Kearney Freeman—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, there are four children in this case, ages 15, 12, 9 and 6 respectively. As I have said before, we should consider the welfare of the children in these cases especially if the divorce is granted. The marriage took place in 1943 and there is a long history of marital discord resulting in desertion.

At page 12 of the evidence the divorce committee of the Senate thoroughly examined into the matter. I propose to refer to this evidence to illustrate the amount of weight given to the background of the marriage as compared to that given to the circumstances relating to adultery.

Mr. M. Joyal of Ottawa appeared as counsel for the petitioner. He examined into the background of the marriage and at page 12 the following evidence is recorded:

Q. You are not living with your husband at the moment?
A. No.

I point out that Mr. Joyal asked a leading question almost suggesting the answer. I continue:

Q. When did you separate from him? Or did you separate more than once from him?
A. Yes, about three or four times.

Obviously Mr. Joyal knew the answer before it was given. I continue:

Q. What were the grounds or reasons?
A. Promiscuity and alcoholism.
Q. Was this promiscuity and alcoholism the subject of some conversation between you and your husband?
A. Yes, it was.
Q. On one occasion, or on many occasions?
A. On many occasions.
Q. Did you ever resume cohabitation with him after he might have made certain promises?
A. Yes, I did.
Q. Were those promises kept?
A. No.
Q. Did he resume, so to speak, his habits of alcoholism and promiscuity?
A. Yes, he did.
Q. Forgetting about the alcoholism, which is a problem in itself, what about his promiscuous habits? Was it with one person?
A. Just about everybody.
Q. With any one person, was it over a short period of time or a more extended period of time?
A. Once, for a year and a half, and the last time about a year and a half.
By the Chairman (Senator Taylor, Westmorland):
Q. What do you mean by a year and a half?
A. Well—
Q. Was he keeping company with another woman for a year and a half?
A. Yes.

Q. Do you know that to be a fact personally?
A. Yes. He took her out in public I know that, indeed. I know where she lived—the last one he lived with.
By Senator Barbour:
Q. Did they live together for a year and a half?
A. Oh yes.
By the Chairman (Senator Taylor, Westmorland):
Q. He left you entirely and went to live with this woman?
A. Yes.
Q. And he came back again to you?
A. No, he did not come back after that.

The evidence indicates a series of desertions and reconciliations resulting in a final desertion. Mr. Joyal and the hon. senators were concerned about the question of desertion and what may be characterized as cruelty, involving alcoholism, extended promiscuity, the failure to keep promises and ultimate desertion. I shall return later to the subject of cruelty.

Some evidence was given concerning arrangements for the maintenance of the children. Mr. Joyal questioned the petitioner about this and the following exchange is recorded at page 13 of the evidence:

By Senator Barbour:
Q. Did he support you?
A. Sometimes.
By Mr. Joyal:
Q. You did something about this. You took action in the superior court?
A. Yes.
Q. In what year?
A. It was two years ago, and Mr. Hetu was the lawyer.
Q. About 1957 or 1958?
A. Yes.
Q. Since that action was instituted have you resumed cohabitation with him?
A. No.
Q. Was that action on your part successful?
A. Yes.
Q. What was that action? Was it an action for separation from bed and board?
A. Yes, it was.
Q. And was judgment granted in your favour?
A. Yes.
Q. What did you allege in the action—adultery and alcoholism on the part of your husband?
A. Yes, and beating.
Q. Was there cruelty also?
A. Yes.
Q. In any event, judgment was granted in your favour?
A. Yes.
Q. Were you given custody of the children?
A. Yes.
Q. Were you given an order for an allowance for maintenance of the children?
A. Yes.
Q. Have you been in receipt of that allowance, more or less?
A. Yes, I have been.
By the Chairman (Senator Taylor, Westmorland):
Q. What was the amount?
A. $50 a week.
Q. For both yourself and the children?
A. Yes.
By Senator Barbour:
Q. That would be for the children, would it?
A. Well, yes.
By Mr. Joyal:
Q. Was that $50 a week for yourself and the children or for the children alone?
A. Well, when we had the separation it was for myself and the children.

I take it from the evidence, therefore, that $50 a week is provided for the wife and children. I think it is an excellent thing to conduct an examination into the question of maintenance in cases where there are children. It is apparent that the Senate pays not much attention. In fact, they feel they should not do this sort of thing, and ask questions about maintenance of children. I am quite sure, in their moral concept of these things they know full well we are liable to a degree if we are to be asked to pass a divorce bill. We are liable to the extent anyway of wondering about and concerning ourselves with the welfare, maintenance and upkeep of the children following the granting of the divorce

Even though some days ago the hon. member for Halifax raised, and quite properly so, the matter of jurisdiction because of the division of jurisdiction, and the question of this committee having the function of concerning itself with the maintenance of the children, and even though the chairman, at that time ruled that, because maintenance was not a matter upon which we could pass judgment, we should not concern ourselves with it, I do hope that the chairman of the committee at this time will be more lenient in this regard, certainly to the extent at least that the committee of the other place has been lenient in this regard in wanting to concern itself about the welfare of the children.

It is a commendable attitude for the members of the other place to take, and we would be well advised to follow their example. I do not say we should disregard the rules; I do not want to do that, but we should give expression to our moral thinking when it comes to the maintenance of the children.

When it comes to the actual grounds which are considered in granting a divorce we find that this case is similar to another one to which I had the opportunity to make reference the other day. One of the private eyes in this case again is Mr. Charles Charron, age 53, Montreal, Quebec who, I believe I indicated, has also been an investigator, whatever that is, in these cases. He has appeared as a witness in some 36 cases before the committee in the other place this year. If I am wrong in that figure I stand to be corrected. In his activities in those cases and in other years he is well aware of divorce proceedings; he is well aware of the points he is required to make to ensure that the proper—I put it that way generously —evidence is given to the committee of the other place and to this house and also to ensure that the relative questions and tests that by practice must be made—normally they are circumstantial—which would lead one to believe that adultery had taken place are made. I would submit it is done in a very sloppy fashion. To all intents and purposes from an outline of the times, the address, the names of the individuals and the fact that in another case the respondent was a woman and in this case it is a man, we might just as well, in so far as Mr. Charron is concerned, be reading the evidence from another case because it is almost identical. He is sworn and testifies.

Mr. Woolliams: The evidence in divorce cases is always the same.

Mr. Howard: I heard some comment from the side. I did not hear what it was, Mr. Chairman. I do not know whether someone wanted to pose a question. At any rate, I will quote from Mr. Charron's evidence at page 15.

By Mr. Joyal:
Q. This is exhibit 2, filed by the petitioner. Can you identify that photograph?
A. That is Mr.—That photograph I had at the time of the investigation.
Q. Do you remember seeing this Mr.—?
A. I saw him several times at—
Q. Is that his home?
A. That is where he was staying. I used to see him come in for dinner every day.
Q. Did you see him on the 5th day of April, 1959?
A. Yes. On the 4th of April he came at seven o'clock. About eight o'clock a couple came out of there and they came in at a quarter after eleven, the couple that had gone out. Then, at 11.30 I called Mr. Lacombe to come and meet me right away—

Mr. Lacombe is another witness; he is listed as an investigator. Incidentally, he is only 22 years old. He must be an apprentice at this sort of thing, taking his instructions from a person with much more experience. I continue:

—and he came on the 5th of April at 12.35 in the morning.

It was after midnight. They went to the door upstairs. I continue:

We went to the door upstairs—it is a duplex. We knocked on the door several times before Mr.—came and opened the door. When he opened the door all he had on was a pair of grey pants with the upper part of his b.v.d.'s.

An hon. Member: Perhaps he had a tie on.

Mr. Howard: It would be much more amusing if one could hear these interjections. I do not know whether he had a tie on or not; it is not given in evidence. From what we know of divorce evidence it could well be that he had a shirt and a tie underneath the top of his pyjamas to make it look well. The people who arrange divorce evidence are not beyond that sort of thing. Let me return to the evidence given by Mr. Charron:

I asked, "Are you Mr.—?" He said yes. I showed him this photograph and he admitted that it was one taken of him.

This is 12.35 in the morning. The couple came in at a quarter after eleven, and 15 minutes later the gentleman is wearing the upper part of his b.v.d.'s. He is a complete stranger, but this investigator goes to the door, asks him his name, shows him a photograph and he says, "Yes, that is I". Is it reasonable to assume that one would expect this to take place? However, let me carry on with the evidence:

I went to the bedroom and asked the woman, who was in bed, her name.

Two strangers knock on the door at 12.35 in the morning; the gentleman wearing the upper part of his b.v.d.'s—with or without tie, it is not clear—and a pair of trousers, opens the door to two complete strangers and says, "Yes, this is my name." These two complete strangers walk into the house, duplex or apartment go into the bedroom and ask the woman there who was in bed, what her name was. No permission was asked. There was no difficulty; it was just like walking into Eaton's store to buy some clothing. They had complete freedom of the house. It was almost as if each of the parties involved in this, the two strangers, the investigators, the respondent and the corespondent knew precisely what was about to happen. It looks as if they were developing a stage presentation and had rehearsed this on a number of occasions. Let me return to the questions and answers:

And she said, "This is Mrs.—

She gave her surname, the name of the respondent. I continue:

Then I said, "What is your maiden name?" And she said—

She gave her maiden name. I continue:

The man asked what it was for—.

After these two strangers had knocked on the door at 12.35, after they had asked him his name and after they had shown the photograph he identified it as one of himself. After that they casually strolled into the living room or wherever it was, nonchalantly appeared in the bedroom, asked the woman in bed what her name was and then the respondent who was in his b.v.d.'s finally got the opportunity to ask what it was all about. Then he is told that divorce proceedings are involved and, to quote the evidence, "he started to get mad at us, so I told him to see a lawyer and we went out".

What Mr. Charron probably does is to mimeograph thousands of copies of his evidence. When he has to appear before a committee he just fills in the blanks on the mimeographed form with the names of the people involved and the times. As far as the evidence is concerned, it is almost identical, and it is stretching the imagination quite a bit to ask us to think that no arrangement existed between these people, that Mr. Charron did not know what he was going to find and that the couple in the apartment did not know that he was going to be there at a particular time.

We could assume that it might have happened if this were an isolated case and if the evidence in this case were unique but, as I say, it is not unique. It is stereotyped in form as if the investigator had memorized it and uses it each time he appears as a witness before the divorce committee. From that I think one must come to the conclusion that arrangements were made to obtain this evidence and that the evidence of Mr. Charron was given in such a way as only to satisfy the tests that might reasonably lead one to believe that adultery had taken place or might take place. That is the extent of the evidence here. The evidence with respect to adultery can be stretched, and if one looked at the evidence given here with both eyes closed and read it he could come to the conclusion—

Mr. McCleave: That is a logical remark from a logical corner of the house.

Mr. Howard: It is a good Irish type of remark that the hon. member for Halifax will appreciate very much because so far as the evidence in this case is concerned, and I emphasize this, you do not need to read it to know that it is falsified.

Mr. McCleave: Do you never believe anyone who speaks under oath in a court or do you believe just what you want to believe?

Mr. Howard: Perhaps the hon. member for Halifax would like to participate in the debate.

Mr. McCleave: I will.

Mr. Howard: If he wants to ask questions I suggest that he do so in the normal manner by rising in his place instead of sitting in his seat and yapping about C.C.F. hypocrisy, knowing full well that at the time he did it he was not going to be called to order for making such slanderous charges.

Mr. McCleave: I rise on a point of order. Surely it is not in order in this debate to refer to remarks made in previous debates. I realize that the hon. member is straying far and wide, but surely that is out of order.

[Mr. Howard.]

The Deputy Chairman: It is also a rule in this committee for one person to have the floor at a time. The hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Howard: I am pleased that the hon. member for Halifax did get around to participating in the correct manner and I hope he will continue to do so as we deal with other cases. As I have said, I think the evidence with respect to adultery in respect to this particular case was arranged beforehand and was designed to meet the minimum tests established with respect to adultery. Because of the extensive questioning by members of the other place and also by Mr. Joyal, counsel for the petitioner, with respect to desertion, alcoholism, cruelty and extended promiscuity, I believe that is the basis upon which this divorce was granted by the Senate and that the adultery was only an incidental factor. I submit this was the decent and correct thing to do. I am told by people who have had far more experience than I have with regard to the granting of divorces by parliament that it is only by practice that the test of adultery has been established and that parliament can grant a divorce upon any ground or no ground at all. Whether or not that is correct I do not know. As I say, my information comes from a source that I consider to be quite reliable and I take their word for it.

Mr. Peters: One was granted the other day for desertion.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member for Timiskaming comments that the Senate granted a divorce the other day on the basis of desertion.

Mr. McCleave: Untrue.

Mr. Howard: I assume they have done the same thing in this case. I assume that the greatest amount of weight has been given to the questions of desertion and cruelty and that the reference to adultery is only there to leave the impression that the unofficial rules followed in these cases have been met. I certainly think that the divorce should be granted.

I could make some reference to the manner in which Mr. Joyal asked questions, which was more a case of insisting upon a certain type of answer than asking questions. It might be well to read some of them. As found on page 14, Mr. Joyal is examining the petitioner. There have been some questions by members of the Senate about other matters and Mr. Joyal comes to the question of arrangements between the petitioner and the respondent. He does not say, as one would normally expect, "Have you made any arrangements," He says:

Q. You made no arrangements with your husband whereby he could provide this evidence so that this action could be taken?

He practically puts the answer in the woman's mouth. She said, "Oh, no". Again, there is this direct statement:

Q. There has been no connivance? You have not got together and put through a little deal with Miss ... so that your husband would be caught with her?

A. I would not speak to her.

You will notice that she did not answer the question directly. However, we can assume from that that the answer is no because the lawyer said it was no. Again, we have this extensive question and a very short answer:

Q. I take it, because of these repeated separations and reconciliations, you feel that the marriage is on the rocks now, and you have not forgiven your husband in the sense of being prepared to resume cohabitation with him?

If anyone could answer "yes" to that type of question it would be a strange thing indeed. However, the answer was "Oh, no". Then there is this question:

Q. Whatever difficulties you have, do you think they will be increased should this divorce be granted to you?

The answer is obvious. You do not have to read it. The answer is "No". Then she goes further and says:

I could not have any increase in my difficulties.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, on the basis of cruelty, promiscuity on a number of occasions—

The Deputy Chairman: I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, we have had a particularly mischievous type of intervention in the debate on this particular case and I intend to deal with several points made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. Ordinarily, I would content myself, but I am afraid I have reached a point where I cannot sit here in the House of Commons among certain other gentlemen and hear hon. members from one particular corner assassinate the characters of people who are not here and able to defend themselves. The first point,—

Mr. Howard: Let them get their divorces somewhere else.

Mr. McCleave: —and one that has gained some currency throughout this country because of remarks made on previous occasions and repeated this afternoon is that divorces are being granted on grounds other than adultery. This is just not so. If that impression got abroad it would lead people who went to provincial courts for justice into thinking that some special favours were being dispensed in parliament that were not given elsewhere. I think that is mischievous and I so brand it.

The hon. member has also made it appear, by reading carefully selected portions of the evidence, as if the alleged adultery between the respondent husband and his lady friend were staged. If the hon. member had wanted to fairly present all the evidence on that matter he would have found in the evidence of the wife, at the top of page 14, that actually the husband and this woman had been living together for quite a period of time. It is this sort of remark, this loose allegation, that I am afraid I can no longer take. If my hon. friend is going through this stack of cases one by one and making such remarks, then somebody is going to defend the people who cannot defend themselves here and I am afraid it is going to be a long, hard session.

Mr. Howard: I am afraid I cannot very well allow these comments to go by without straightening out the record and, at the same time, straightening out the hon. member for Halifax. If he had been listening carefully, as I assume he did, he would have heard what I said about the evidence I read and he would have had no occasion to make the rather unfair and unkind remarks he made a moment ago. If he was not listening when I made my initial remarks, then I forgive him and I shall attempt to repeat what I said with respect to this particular case.

The hon. member said that I carefully selected sections from the evidence, and carefully left out others, in order to leave the impression that this evidence was staged. He said that if I had read a certain piece of evidence it would have shown that this couple had been living together for some time. I have my notes here and I will read again what I read before. It is at the bottom of page 12. There is another place in the evidence in which these facts are more clearly stated, but Mr. Joyal is questioning the witness about the husband living with other people. I start reading in the middle of one question:

Was it with one person?

A. Just about everybody.

Q. With any one person, was it over a short period of time or a more extended period of time?

A. Once, for a year and a half, and the last time about a year and a half.

Q. What do you mean by a year and a half?

A. Well—

Q. Was he keeping company with another woman for a year and a half?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you know that to be a fact personally?

A. Yes. He took her out in public. I know that, indeed. I knew where she lived—the last one he lived with.

Q. Did they live together for a year and a half?

A. Oh, yes.

Q. He left you entirely and went to live with this woman?
A. Yes.
Q. And he came back again to you?
A. No, he did not come back after that.

It is true that later on, on page 14, this point is more clearly drawn to the attention of the committee. This is probably the quotation to which the hon. member for Halifax was referring. I read:

Q. Was this the same woman he lived with for a year and a half?
A. Yes, but he only lived with her after I had met her.

The evidence which I read initially did bring out the fact that there was a person with whom he lived for a year and a half. I believe that evidence of that nature itself, when it is not contested or denied, is just as valid evidence to show that adultery took place as the evidence is of going through all these formalities of people knocking on doors after 12.30, walking into the bedroom, asking for names, showing photographs, and so on; all for the purpose of meeting certain tests that have been established. I submit that this evidence given on page 13 to the effect that he was going with some woman for a year and a half, and that he lived with her, is a greater indication that adultery could have taken place than the circumstances related on page 15 by Mr. Charron in which he happens to walk casually into this place and find someone in his b.v.d.'s and a pair of grey pants in the bedroom. There is far more chance that adultery took place during the course of this friendship over a year and a half than there would be that it took place at the moment Mr. Charron entered this place.

The hon. member for Halifax made mention of the fact that these two people lived together for a year and a half. I think there is a greater likelihood that adultery might have taken place in that year and a half rather than in the few short minutes Mr. Charron was wandering around in that particular apartment. The hon. member for Halifax also made some comments to the effect that some of us, I presume in the C.C.F., were engaged in a game of character assassination with respect to people who were not here to defend themselves. I know the hon. member wants to be fair in this matter, and in all other matters, and I admit that in dealing with the earlier cases and reading from the evidence, if the name of the respondent was given I read the name of the respondent; if the name of the corespondent was given I read that name and I also read the address because those names and addresses appeared in the evidence. It was only when the hon. member for Halifax rose to ask me a question during a previous case and, instead of reading the name of the individual left it blank, that I realized I had been in error in the other cases when I made reference to the names of the individuals. I spoke to the hon. member for Halifax about this afterwards and thanked him for drawing this to my attention in an indirect way. Since that time, I have made no references to the names of the petitioners, the respondents, the corespondents or their addresses. The only names I have mentioned have been those of the lawyers and investigators.

Mr. Taylor: Would the hon. member permit a question. He has referred to a local lawyer in connection with this case. Is he suggesting the lawyer acted improperly in this particular case?

Mr. Howard: I do not know how the hon. member could come to that strange conclusion.

Mr. Taylor: The hon. member referred to the evidence during the early part of the discussion and made some remarks about the lawyer's questioning of the witness. There was a suggestion that they had come to some agreement prior to giving testimony.

Mr. Howard: My friend who is asking this question is a lawyer. I imagine that when he represents someone he goes over the evidence with him, goes over the story, and attempts to get it straight in his mind; that is one thing. The second thing is that it is my understanding a lawyer is in a profession, and one of his functions is to represent people. He is certainly not involved. He is not a respondent or a corespondent. If, for argument's sake, Joyal was mentioned as respondent or corespondent or petioner in any one of these cases, I would not mention his name as that. But I do not see that there is much wrong in making reference to the name of the particular lawyer who is involved in the case because this is his function as a public servant, as I understand it, or as a servant of his client and the same thing applies as well in the case of the private investigators. They have a particular duty to perform. The position is just the same as when reference is made to the name of Senator Taylor who is chairman of the committee. This implies nothing whatsoever with regard to Senator Taylor. He is a member of the Senate. He is chairman of the committee and he asks certain questions. I do not see that there is anything wrong in that procedure.

Mr. Taylor: I conclude that the hon. member is not suggesting that there was any improper conduct on the part of the lawyer.

Mr. Howard: I do not know whether there was or not.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Howard: I made no such suggestion. I do not know how my friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard could have come to that conclusion.

Mr. McCleave: It is very hard to follow the hon. member.

Mr. Howard: I did say—and I will say it again—that Mr. Joyal is quite adept at asking questions in such a way that he gets a particular answer. I assume that this is one of the things a lawyer is trained to do. I am not a lawyer, and I do not know what the situation is but I assume that one of the functions of a lawyer, if he is retained by a client, is to protect and to advance the interest of that client in court or in some other place if that is where he is acting on the client's behalf.

If by his line of questioning he desires to get certain information out, then this is his function, is it not? I suggest that he is quite good at that sort of thing. Perhaps he should have a "Q.C." after his name—as have so many other lawyers in Ontario—for his skill and ability in making sure that the interests of his client,—in this case the petitioner, are presented to the fullest extent, that her case is advanced and that the evidence given is in her favour. If evidence is given which is not in her favour, he will on cross-examination, if it is a contested case, do his best so to confound other persons giving evidence that it will be to the advantage of his particular client. I do not see anything wrong in that procedure. Maybe I have a misunderstanding of one of the functions of members of the legal profession. However, I would assume that this is one of them, namely that of advancing the interests of their clients.

I say only that Mr. Joyal is very skilful and adept at this procedure and when he wants the answer no, he phrases the question in such a way that he gets the answer no. Whether he sat down with the petitioner in this case beforehand, went over the evidence and discussed the questions which might be asked of her by him or by the senators, I do not know. Quite frankly, I may say that I do not know whether or not this is a common practice followed by lawyers with clients. Perhaps my friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard could take the opportunity of advising us on the matter out of his wealth of legal knowledge and ability, and the cases with which he has dealt.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think we have strayed away long enough on the conduct of lawyers in general and that we had better come back to Bill No. SD-34.

Mr. Churchill: I wonder whether at this stage I might interrupt the hon. member? I suggested to the leaders of the parties opposite that we might have the committee rise and report progress at this time so that I could make an important announcement of interest to all members of the house prior to six o'clock. If that course is agreeable, could we now rise and report progress?

Mr. Pickersgill: That procedure is agreeable as far as we are concerned.

Progress reported.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD—TABLING OF REPORT ON APPLICATIONS FOR GAS EXPORTS

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like the permission of the house to revert to motions.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Churchill: I have an important announcement relating to the applications for the export of gas and for the construction of gas pipe lines which have been considered by the national energy board.

Recognizing the economic importance of energy to the future growth and development of our country and realizing that a national energy policy is fundamental to our national development program, one of the first decisions of this government was to establish a national energy board.

The board has been set up to assure the people of Canada that the best possible use is made of the energy resources of this country. It is charged, among other things, with the responsibility, subject to the jurisdiction of parliament, of regulating the construction and operation of oil and gas pipe lines, the tolls charged for transmission by such pipe lines, and the export and import of gas in such a manner that the public interest is protected. The board is also charged with the responsibility of safeguarding Canada's interest in regard to the methods of financing and the participation of Canadians in the pipe lines that transmit energy under the jurisdiction of parliament.

I now wish to table two copies of the important report of the national energy board on application for licences to export natural gas and build certain pipe lines for the purpose, and to announce the decisions of the government in regard to the approvals required under the law.

After a detailed review of the applications and the circumstances affecting each of them, based upon the lengthy public hearings it held, the board states that it is prepared to issue, subject to approval of the government as required by law, and upon certain defined conditions, the following export licences:

(a) a licence to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited to export a maximum of 204 million cubic feet of gas per day near Emerson, Manitoba;

(b) a further licence to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited to export a maximum of 204 million cubic feet of gas per day, on an interruptible basis, near Niagara Falls, Ontario;

(c) a licence to Alberta and Southern Gas Company Limited to export a maximum of 458,750,000 cubic feet of gas per day near Kingsgate, British Columbia;

(d) a licence to Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company to export a maximum of 36 million cubic feet of gas per day at a point on the boundary near Cardston, Alberta; and

(e) a licence to Westcoast Transmission Company Limited to export a maximum of 152 million cubic feet of gas per day near Kingsgate, British Columbia.

The board has also stated that is it prepared to issue, subject to approval of the government and upon certain defined conditions, certificates of public convenience and necessity authorizing the construction of pipe lines as follows:

(a) To Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited for the construction of a 30-inch pipe line from Ile des Chenes in Manitoba to the international boundary near Emerson, Manitoba, a distance of approximately 51 miles;

(b) To Alberta Natural Gas Company for the construction of a 36-inch pipe line from a point in southwestern Alberta to the international boundary near Kingsgate, British Columbia, a total distance of approximately 108 miles;

(c) To Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company for the construction of a 16-inch pipe line, approximately three miles in length, in southern Alberta near the international boundary near Cardston, Alberta.

The board estimates that the annual revenue of the exports of gas covered by these licences would amount in all by 1963 to about $75 million. In addition, the development of the fields and the construction of the pipe lines, gathering lines and processing facilities would involve investments over the next few years amounting to several hundred millions of dollars.

The board considered, but did not approve, an application from Niagara Gas Transmission Limited for a licence to export gas near Cornwall, Ontario, and authority to build a short pipe line for the purpose. The board was not satisfied that the price to be charged by the applicant for the gas proposed to be exported was just and reasonable in relation to the public interest.

In its report upon these applications for licences the board states its finding that, having regard to established reserves and to the trends in the discovery of gas, there is now sufficient gas to meet the reasonably foreseeable requirements for use in Canada and to permit exports on the scale proposed. The board also found that the terms on which the exports will be made under the licences proposed are fair and reasonable.

The government has fully considered this major report of the board and has concluded that the findings and decisions of the board assure the protection of the public interest of Canada and Canadians.

The government has given special attention to the export licence proposed for the Westcoast Transmission company, having in mind the observations made in the first report of the royal commission on energy in 1958, on the existing Westcoast contract for exports at Sumas.

The government has considered the views of the board concerning the increased utilization of the present pipe line operated by Westcoast and the desirability of developing more reserves of gas in northern British Columbia.

When applications are made for the issue of future licences for the export of gas to Pacific coast areas of the United States, a primary consideration the government will have in mind is whether the action proposed will have the effect of increasing the use of the existing Westcoast pipe line and further promoting the development and use of exportable gas reserves in British Columbia. In carrying out such a policy it is expected that as the demand for gas increases in the Pacific areas of the United States, the prices to be obtained from export sales of British Columbia gas will in due course increase substantially, thereby effectively offsetting the unduly low price in the existing export contract entered into in December 1954.

Accordingly the government has decided that it will authorize the issue of such licences and certificates as have been approved by the board and on the terms set forth in its report. Formal action by the board and the governor in council will be taken as soon as the necessary legal details have been worked out.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house and the country at large will welcome this announcement. There has been a long delay in dealing with these matters because of the time which elapsed before the energy board was set up and the policy in that regard announced. That factor, together with the delay after the energy board was authorized in appointing the board itself, and also the time consumed by the necessary hearings, does make up quite a lapse of time, and I am very sure that now the announcement has been made it will be most welcome to the country at large.

The rather interesting thing here is that the government fortunately has announced the granting of the necessary licences to the company which in earlier days it so vehemently opposed and attacked in this house, and I think it has very effectively vindicated the stand taken by the former government in this regard. I think this is a very good thing for the country at large, as well as for the industry.

The payments which will arise out of this export are also welcome at this time because of the effect they will have on our balance of payments with the United States. That is a very good and important feature, and the licences will provide as well a lift to the internal economy of Canada arising directly out of the necessary development work.

I take it from the minister's announcement that the government has in fact, either wholly or very substantially accepted the findings of the national energy board. It is a happy circumstance to see that that has happened because there was an interesting point which arose so far as the export licences themselves were concerned in that the energy board act gives to the national energy board under section 82 a right to issue the licences. In section 85 it gives the governor in council certain very limited rights to make regulations. Under those limited rights to make regulations the governor in council has seen fit to claim the right to approve the granting of export licences by the board. I doubt very much if the governor in council has that right to take something that parliament did not give it. But in this particular case, as I understand the announcement, the question does not arise because the government is in fact approving the granting of the licences by the board as the board has recommended. If I am right on that point, the question does not arise and I think that is a fortunate circumstance. The point can perhaps be more appropriately and aptly developed on some other occasion.

I think the minister is quite correct in speaking about the lift, if I may use that term, that these licences will give to the economy of Canada at this time when it is needed. It will be a very good thing for the country and the announcement is timely for the reason that the economy, in my view at least, needs this added lift at this time. The minister also gave some indication as to the commodity value of the export in 1963, and that is particularly welcome because it will go a considerable way to help to replace the loss of the uranium export in that year.

It is very difficult to appreciate fully every implication of the remarks contained in the minister's statement, and perhaps there are other parts of his statement on which it would be better to reserve comment. But I think it is appropriate that I should indicate that, as far as we are concerned, we welcome the making of this announcement today.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, speaking for this group in general terms in view of the lack of time to consider the announcement carefully and fully I must say I am sure all hon. members are pleased the minister made the announcement because of the importance of this matter to the Canadian economy.

Without doubt this decision is the result of study of the first major problem that is being given consideration by the energy board. I think it is quite proper to say that all hon. members have confidence in the personnel of the board.

It is obvious from the statement as I heard it that in this instance the government takes final responsibility for the decision. I listened as carefully as possible to mention of the export gas from certain points in Canada with many of which I am not familiar although I am acquainted with Crowsnest and Kingsgate. In view of the representations made by citizens, municipalities and various organizations in places from which gas is to be exported I take it that the interests of potential Canadian consumers with respect to service and price are well protected by this decision and that there is protection with respect to reserves.

We are all human and I suppose it is fair to say that only time and experience will prove the wisdom of this decision. In the meantime, on behalf of this group I want to say we trust the announcement will mean the decision will result in a major contribution to the economy and consequently to the benefit of the Canadian people.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, may I make this further announcement. Copies of the report were delivered to the post office at six o'clock and are now available for hon. members. Additional copies are available on order from the queen's printer at a cost of $2 per copy. The queen's printer store will be open on Saturday and is located on MacKenzie avenue across from the Chateau Laurier.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, before you see the clock, perhaps just for the record the house leader would tell us what the government proposes that the house should do between now and the Easter adjournment?

Mr. Churchill: Unless some unforeseen emergency arises, Mr. Speaker, it is our intention to carry on for the next eight days with the debate on the budget which, I presume, will be rather spirited.

It being five minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CIVIL SERVICE COMPETITIONS 1955-59

Question No. 277—Mr. Boivin:

How many competitions for positions were held by the civil service commission in each of the years 1955, 1956, 1957, 1958 and 1959?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Secretary of State):

Year	Number of Competitions
1955	10,814
1956	9,767
1957	9,726
1958	9,301
1959	10,902

CANNED PORK—CHARITABLE DONATIONS

Question No. 319—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Under what conditions are surplus stocks of canned pork made available (a) to international organizations; (b) to governmental and charitable organizations in Canada?

2. Who bears the cost of shipping?

3. Has an application been received from the Goodfellows club of Windsor, a charitable organization, for an allotment of canned pork for distribution to needy families?

4. If so, has the request been granted?

Answer by: Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture):

1. (a) Ex-warehouse, in carload lots, to approved international welfare organizations for distribution abroad, having regard to the commercial availability of canned pork in the areas approved for its distribution.

(b) Ex-warehouse, in carload lots, to charitable institutions eligible for sales tax rebates, national welfare organizations, and to provincial governments for distribution to local welfare organizations.

2. Recipient.

3. Yes.

4. No, this organization was advised that they should apply to the provincial authorities to whom canned pork luncheon meat has been made available for distribution to local welfare organizations.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PATENT ACT

TABLING OF REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am tabling herewith in English and in French the report on patents of invention of the royal commission on patents, copyright and industrial designs.

The royal commission was appointed pursuant to order in council P.C. 1954-852 of June 10, 1954, to inquire into and make recommendations upon the legislation of Canada relating to patents of invention, copyright, trade marks and industrial designs. The commission's report on copyright was tabled in the house in June, 1958, and its report on industrial designs in August, 1958.

Since the present Trade Marks Act, which resulted from approximately five years' study and discussion by a committee of experts in the light of representations from interested organizations and individuals, is relatively new; since the statute appears to have been well received in Canada and abroad; since the commission, in its report on industrial designs, recommended one amendment to the Trade Marks Act on the basis of its recommendations with respect to industrial designs; and since, finally, the commissions's membership and staff have become depleted and it would be impossible for it to undertake an inquiry into trade marks, it was decided that the commission's terms of reference be amended by the deletion of the reference to trade marks. By order in council P.C. 1959-1340, dated October 16, 1959, the commission's terms of reference were so amended. There will, therefore, be no report on trade marks, and with this report on patents of invention the commission has now completed its assignment. This report on patents is being made available to the press and for sale to the public today.

Since this report contains matters of a highly technical nature, the government does not intend to introduce the necessary legislation to bring a new act into force at the present session. We intend to give to all those who are interested time to study this report and submit their suggestions before introducing appropriate legislation at the next session of this parliament.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

D.B.S. QUESTIONNAIRES ON LABOUR FORCE SAMPLING

Question No. 82—Mr. Pickersgill (for Mr. Hellyer):

For a copy of each regular or special questionnaire used by the bureau of statistics during the months of January and February 1960, in respect to its sampling of the Canadian labour force, including its without jobs component.

Motion agreed to.

WHARF RECONSTRUCTION, MALARTIC RIVER, QUE.

Motion No. 83—Mr. Dumas:

For a copy of all payrolls showing the names of those employed, the period of employment and the amount paid to each person, in connection with the reconstruction, during 1959, of a wharf located on the west bank of the Malartic river, range 4, in the township of Malartic, Quebec.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are conducting an investigation at the present time, and I would appreciate it very much if the motion could stand until their report is received.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member is agreeable, the motion stands.

Motion stands.

SOUTH STUKELY, QUE., UNDERPASS

Motion No. 84—Mr. Leduc (for Mr. Boivin):

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the board of transport commissioners for Canada and the government of the province of Quebec, from 1948 to date, regarding the underpass at South Stukely, Quebec.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to passing this motion with the usual reservation regarding the requirement to obtain the permission of the province.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the limitation expressed by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

LAND ASSEMBLY PROJECT, ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.

Motion No. 85—Mr. Carter:

For a copy of any agreement or arrangement entered into since July 1, 1959, between the Minister of Public Works or Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation on the one hand, and the Royal Bank of Canada on the other, to guarantee payment of the provincial or municipal share of a proposed land assembly and slum clearance project on the eastern outskirts of St. John's, Newfoundland.

Motion agreed to.

LAND ASSEMBLY PROJECT, ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.

Motion No. 86—Mr. Carter:

For a copy of all correspondence since July 1, 1959, between the mayor or any other official of the city of St. John's, Newfoundland, and the Minister of Public Works or any official of his department or of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation regarding a proposed land assembly and slum clearance project on the eastern outskirts of the city of St. John's, Newfoundland together with a copy of any agreement or agreements or arrangement or arrangements with the city respecting such project.

Motion agreed to.

FREIGHT RATES

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER DELAY IN APPLICATION OF INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister, apropos of the decision of the government made last year not to allow a general freight rate increase for a period of one year pending an inquiry into the railway rate structure and other matters affecting railway transportation. Has the government decided to continue this policy for a further period?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): As the hon. gentleman will recognize, this question deals with a matter of government policy which will be announced in due course. I should further point out that the order of the board of railway commissioners in connection with this matter does not lapse until July 31.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question and state that my recollection is that the policy announced by the Prime Minister was for a period of one year. My purpose in asking the question was that the year expires on April 10, which is Sunday next, and I wondered whether the Prime Minister would not give consideration to making a statement prior to that time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I know the interest of the hon. gentleman in this matter, and I will certainly give consideration to his suggestion, but I will not undertake to say anything prior to that date.

RULING OF TRANSPORT COMMISSION RESPECTING EQUALIZATION ORDERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport and ask whether he has seen a report of a ruling on Saturday by the board of transport commissioners to the effect that it will issue no further equalization orders while the federal government is paying the subsidy to reduce the impact of the 17 per cent general freight rate increase authorized in 1958? I just sent the minister notice of this question prior to my coming into the house. I do not expect he will be able to give an answer today, but perhaps he will take it as notice.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have seen the report.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister comment on the report made by the board in connection with this ruling?

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chevrier: Then may I ask the minister whether it is his intention, or that of his government, to renew the application of the Freight Rates Reduction Act, referred to in the ruling?

Mr. Hees: The Prime Minister has already answered that question very adequately.

Mr. Chevrier: No, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has not dealt with that question at all.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Chevrier: I am rising on a point of order to say that the question I put to the Minister of Transport and the question I addressed to the Prime Minister are two entirely different questions. One deals with the royal commission on freight rates and the other deals with the Freight Rates Reduction Act passed in 1959. These are different matters entirely.

Mr. Speaker: That is a matter of argument rather than a point of order. The hon. member has had his reply from the minister.

Mr. Chevrier: Then in view of his reply I should like to address a supplementary question to the Prime Minister, to ask him whether it is the intention of the government to renew the application of the Freight Rates Reduction Act in the year 1960?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): May I give the answer which I gave to the hon. gentleman earlier, which is that this being a matter of government policy, an announcement will be made in due course.

TRANSPORTATION

ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO TARGET DATE FOR REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Since the board of transport commissioners has postponed the equalization of freight rates until the royal commission report is made, can the Prime Minister give the house some idea as to when the royal commission report may be completed, what the target date is at the present time?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): On one previous occasion I did set a target date, and because it turned out to be an incorrect prognostication I heard about it on a number of occasions. I do not intend to make that mistake again.

Mr. Argue: I am pleased that the Prime Minister is learning, but is it not correct that the objective was to have this matter looked into and a report completed this year?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has had his answer. It seems to me the supplementary is merely for the purpose of explaining something that was said. The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre.

Mr. Argue: But my question is this. Is it not correct—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have recognized the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre.

Mr. Argue: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Assiniboia may raise his point of order, but I have just now recognized the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre and he has not had a chance to say a word.

[Later:]

Mr. Argue: I had risen on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My understanding of the rules of the house is that a point of order should be taken up immediately it is raised. I was claiming the floor because I wished to raise a point of order. My point of order is that I do not feel that my second supplementary question went beyond the rules of the house, and that while the Prime Minister is not required to, in fact he did not, answer the question I had asked.

On this point of order I was about to say that my understanding was that there was a time limit with regard to the report of the royal commission on freight rates. I was merely going to ask the Prime Minister, as a further supplementary question, whether there was not a time limit or a target limit, shall we say, for the royal commission on freight rates, in that its inquiry was hoped and expected to be made before the subsidy went out of existence?

Mr. Speaker: Dealing with the point of order, I had just recognized the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, although he had not yet had a chance to say anything. In those circumstances I think any hon. member who wishes to rise on a point of order should at least wait until the hon. member who has been recognized has taken the floor.

The point of order the hon. member raises with regard to the supplementary question, which he has now repeated, seems to me to leave the question as one asking for information which is readily available to anyone. The Prime Minister had twice answered to the effect that he did not wish to venture an opinion as to when the report would be given. The second question, the supplementary, it seemed to me was not really a supplementary question but was asking for information which could be ascertained by anyone who looked up the facts.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's answer, as I recall it, was not on this point at all but was on the subject of another royal commission, which had absolutely nothing to do with my question.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member objects to my decision with regard to his question asking for information which is open to anyone, I would be glad to hear him further; but it seems to me that is the type of question it is.

AGRICULTURE

EGGS—INQUIRY AS TO DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Now that the first quarter of the year has been completed in the government's program for support prices for eggs, can the minister inform the house whether deficiency payments are necessary to bring the national average of producer prices up to the level of the support price? If so, when will these deficiency payments be made?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): On January 11 I announced that the agricultural stabilization board would make an interim payment to producers for eggs marketed during the period January 1 to March 31. I also pointed out that at that time egg marketings were at a relatively high level, and that this interim payment was being made to provide assistance to producers during the period of adjustment.

Inquiries of the Ministry

The national weighted average price for grade A large eggs during the period January 1 to March 31 was 25.4 cents per dozen, or 7.6 cents below the prescribed national weighted average support price of 33 cents per dozen.

In establishing the exact amount of the deficiency payment, the agricultural stabilization board took into account the fact that the national weighted average price of grade A large eggs during the last quarter of 1959 was slightly below the prescribed price, and will accordingly pay an interim deficiency payment of 8 cents per dozen. This payment will be made for all grade A large and extra large eggs up to a total of 1,000 dozen, marketed in the period January 1 to March 31, 1960, by producers registered with the agricultural stabilization board. Cheques will be mailed to producers as soon as marketing records for this quarter are completed, which is expected to be within the next few days.

During the period January 1 to March 26, 1960, egg marketings were 7 per cent below marketings for the same period in 1959, and for the week ending March 26 marketings were 12 per cent below the same week a year ago.

The reduction in egg marketings is now reflected in improving price levels. Egg marketings are now in a more realistic balance with domestic requirements, and except for seasonal variations prices may be expected to remain at or above the support level. During the week of March 26 the national weighted average price for all grades of eggs in Canada was 34.9 cents per dozen, or 1.9 cents above the support price, as compared to the national weighted average price for the same week a year ago of 31.9 cents when the board was purchasing eggs to support the price.

The deficiency payments of 8 cents per dozen on grade A large eggs, which will be paid to all producers regardless of location, is 0.4 cents per dozen higher than producers in Alberta and Saskatchewan would have received under a regional average basis, and 0.4 cents less than the producers in Manitoba would have received.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I did not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman because he was making a statement of considerable importance. However, I suggest to you that the minister was not in order in giving this reply; that it should have been made on motions, when a spokesman for the opposition would have had the first opportunity of commenting on this important statement of government policy. Instead, the minister has circumvented the rights of the house by the device of giving a member of the government party an opportunity of asking a question and thereby seemingly getting credit for something which obviously neither he nor the government deserve.

Mr. Harkness: On this so-called point of order raised by the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that hon. members opposite are constantly asking me and other members of the government to make statements of this sort in reply to their questions.

Mr. Speaker: The answer the minister gave was in length beyond that which it is customary to expect or to receive at this stage of oral questions before the orders of the day are called, and could certainly have been made appropriately as a statement, by reason of its length and its being in the nature of an announcement. Where one draws the line between one answer and another is up to the good sense of the house. I recognize the objection taken by the hon. member.

NOVA SCOTIA—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE ON DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of Agriculture yet been able to obtain the consent of the province of Nova Scotia with regard to the tabling in this house, as requested, of correspondence between the premier of that province and the government of Canada in the matter of deficiency payments?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I believe the material was tabled either Friday afternoon or today.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the minister.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—REPORTED EXCLUSION OF CANADA FROM CERTAIN CONSULTATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question based on a Canadian Press report in today's Montreal Gazette in which the following appears:

> Mr. Green was critical of the bigger powers of NATO for excluding middle power Canada and smaller nations from certain consultations.

This was part of a speech made by the minister in Hamilton on Saturday night. Will the minister tell the house what were these certain consultations from which Canada was excluded by certain of the great powers in NATO?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I do not think that is a proper question on orders of the day, Mr. Speaker. However, there is a very good illustration in this very report which the hon. member for Essex East has; if he reads the next paragraph or two, he will find an answer to his question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, of course I will not comment on the minister's reply. This is an important question, and I am sorry the minister feels he cannot give the details to parliament which he obviously gave outside this house. May I ask—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Essex East is doing nothing more than commenting upon the answer. If he rises it should be on a supplementary or a new question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the kind of consultation he had in mind was the failure of the government of the United States to consult Canada with regard to the substantial modification it made and is making in the production of Bomarc missiles.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Essex East could not have heard the same speech I heard, because I got the impression that there was adequate consultation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could I ask a supplementary question. In the extract just read by the hon. gentleman, was the minister referring to supermen?

IMMIGRATION

IRENE REBRIN—RESOLUTION FROM UNIVERSITY OF BRITISH COLUMBIA FACULTY ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. My question is based on a letter addressed to the Prime Minister by Mr. Douglas T. Kenny, secretary of the University of British Columbia faculty association, in which he informed the Prime Minister of the contribution being made to the educational work of the university by Miss Irene Rebrin and the need for keeping such persons in Canada.

My question is, in view of the resolution adopted by the University of British Columbia faculty association on Thursday, March 31, and in view of their representation to you, Mr. Prime Minister, earnestly requesting that a faculty member, Miss Irene Rebrin, be permitted to remain in Canada, would the Prime Minister inform the house whether, in the light of this representation from the University of British Columbia faculty association, the government is giving further consideration to this case.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have received the representations made by the faculty group of the University of British Columbia and intend to discuss the matter with the appropriate ministers, including the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, at the earliest opportunity.

PUBLIC SERVICE

OTTAWA—REPORTED RESTRICTION IN ADVERTISEMENT FOR ELECTRICAL MAINTENANCE MAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Transport. The civil service commission has requested applications for the post of electrical maintenance man at the air service branch, Department of Transport, Ottawa. However, the announcement is written this way: "Open to qualified residents of the Toronto air service region". This region consists of the province of Ontario as far west as the 88th meridian.

Can the minister tell us how it is that residents in Hull and the whole of the Quebec region are not permitted to compete in this competition?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Details of these competitions are matters which I do not carry around in my head. I shall be glad to consult my officials and give the hon. member an answer later.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—EXTENSION OF SALARY INCREASES TO MEMBERS' SECRETARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance, and ask him whether the salary increases for government employees to which he referred in his budget address on Thursday will be extended to that overworked group, the secretaries of members of parliament?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): The increase recommended will be extended to the secretaries attached to the House of Commons, but of course it will require action on the part of the house to make them applicable.

May I add, Mr. Speaker, that I do not think the hon. gentleman ought to overwork his secretary.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BRIDGES

JACQUES CARTIER BRIDGE, MONTREAL—REPORTED ARRESTS BY R.C.M.P.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Justice. Have arrests been made today by the R.C.M.P. consequent on the investigation into the Jacques Cartier bridge situation. If so, can the minister give us some indication of the scope and nature of the charges?

Mr. Speaker: I do not know whether the Minister of Justice considers that to be a matter under his jurisdiction. If he does, he will answer; but it seems to me that this is a question of the enforcement of criminal law, which is the responsibility of the attorneys general of the provinces.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Perhaps because of the interest in this matter, and the fact that there is an inquiry before one of the committees of this house, Your Honour would permit me to answer in so far as it is proper for me to do so. I am not able to say at the moment whether any arrests have actually been made. I have only a report that the inquiry is proceeding satisfactorily. Only if and when arrests are made would it be proper for me to comment, or to report to the house as to exactly what has happened. At the moment, in the absence of specific information I do not think I should answer any further.

SHIPPING

QUEBEC—STATEMENT ON SETTLEMENT OF RIVER PILOTS' GRIEVANCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport whether he has had an opportunity to consider the question I asked on Friday, which reads:

> Has the minister received a telegram from the Quebec river pilots setting out their grievances and requesting a settlement thereof prior to the opening of navigation. Can the minister tell the house whether those grievances have been studied by the department and what decision has been reached?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I was just on the point of rising to give an answer to the hon. member's question.

The points at issue relate to the special pilot system, the relocation of the pilotage station, and a number of lesser issues. These have been under study by my department during the winter and have been discussed with the pilots on more than one occasion.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Communications setting forth our views were sent forward a few days ago, and I am in fact receiving a delegation of the Quebec pilots this afternoon to discuss the matter further.

CANCER

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO RESEARCH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Would the minister care to comment on the report that the United States department of health, education and welfare has awarded a research grant of close to $300,000 to a group in Toronto working under the auspices of the Ontario cancer treatment and research foundation? In view of this recognition, is the federal government giving consideration to an increase in our own assistance to cancer research in Canada?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for having intimated that he was going to ask this question. I have seen reports of this grant, and I feel it indicates the high standard of cancer research in Canada. The foundation in question is the official agent of the province of Ontario in this field, and as such is free to encourage and receive support from any source.

Under the cancer control grant, any province may submit research projects for consideration of federal assistance, and I am always pleased to receive these. Last year my department made available to the province of Ontario, on behalf of the foundation's program, a total of almost $1,225,000.

TRADE

RUSSIA—REPORTED VISIT OF CANADIAN OFFICIAL RESPECTING IMPORTATION OF AUTOMOBILES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is it a fact that an official of the government of Canada has been sent to the Soviet union for the purpose of examining certain aspects of the importation of Russian automobiles into Canada?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No sir, that is not the subject of the inquiry whatsoever.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Do I understand the minister to say that no official from the public service has gone for that purpose?

Mr. Churchill: I said that was not the subject of the inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the minister explain? What is the subject of the inquiry that has prompted the sending of an official of the government of Canada to the Soviet union to examine some aspects of Russian-made automobiles and their importation into Canada?

Mr. Churchill: Two answers to that question should be sufficient, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BANCROFT, ONT.—REPORTED DIFFICULTY OF MINERS IN OBTAINING EMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, notice of which I have sent to him. In view of the report that unemployed uranium miners at Bancroft are having an extremely difficult time obtaining employment because employers believe they are a health risk and could become a burden on pension benefits, would the minister care to comment on this report and would he use his good offices to the end that these unemployed miners will be given every opportunity to obtain employment.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member gave me notice of this question. I immediately got in touch with the officials of the national employment service, who informed me they had not encountered this problem in securing alternative employment for miners of Bancroft or Elliott Lake. I have also asked them to look further into this matter, thoroughly, and they have promised to do that and will see that no discrimination takes place.

Mr. Argue: I thank the minister for his reply. I wonder whether he will report to me privately or to the house at a later date as to whether there is any foundation for the report.

Mr. Starr: If there is any foundation for this report I shall be glad to report to the hon. member.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Thursday, March 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I would be the first one to admit that the Minister of Finance is not easy to follow in debate. I was interested to read of a delegation that visited the Prime Minister during the middle of last month, inviting him to a summit meeting of the chiefs of the Six Nations Indian reserves, an invitation which was, by the way, declined. None the less the delegation afterwards reported:

> We have had a lot of promises in the past that have never been kept.

But the spokesman said, after an hour with the Prime Minister:

> He is a great talker. He can almost make you forget what you came here for.

I think that was about the position of those in the gallery the other night because, next to the Prime Minister, I would certainly give full marks to the Minister of Finance for being this house's greatest illusionist.

We have some sympathy for the Minister of Finance. Admittedly he has had difficult circumstances to contend with, but we would have more sympathy were it not for our feeling that many of the difficult circumstances have been of his own making. I said the other night—and I think a number of other commentators are confirming the view—that the presentation was really a do nothing budget. Someone amended that by saying, "Well, if it was not a do-nothing budget it was then perhaps doing just the same as was done last year." I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that is not good enough.

One has to do quite a bit of searching through ore to try to find a bit of sparkle in this budget. I have been prepared to do that, and I have, of course, every desire to approve of some of the good new items, however slender, that appear there. I think most hon. members will approve of the minister's announcement that the double impact of income and estate taxes on pension and annuity rights inherited by widows and others will be avoided.

I remind the minister, of course, that when the new estate tax was being examined in the committee on banking and commerce, sitting when the house was sitting, I stood alone and indicated that the women's organizations of Canada, including the university women and the national council of women, even trust companies and others who were familiar with these matters, urged that this particular amendment be taken care of at that time. I was voted down, of course, by the overwhelming majority of government supporters in that committee. I think too there will be universal approval of the minister's proposal to increase the exemption with respect to medical expenses, for the benefit of those who are faced with abnormally high expenses these days when such expenses admittedly are rising very noticeably.

It was the Winnipeg Free Press, as the minister might imagine, that made the statement last year that it is not realistic to expect an opposition to penetrate all the deceptions of an often deceptive government. I, of course, would not hope to be able to do that today. However, in reading the resolutions over the week end I did notice some items that have not had adequate attention perhaps to date by the taxpayers. I think, for instance, of resolution No. 7 with respect to the sales tax. This is the way that resolution reads:

That portrait photographs of individuals be exempt from sales tax.

I suppose the uninformed may have taken a little glow from the thought that in getting portraits next Christmas they may be able to benefit from what looks like a reduction in tax. Without any explanation, as is usual in these matters, it would appear that this is not a reduction in taxation. Portraits have been exempt from the sales tax. On the contrary, this vehicle is being used to impose new taxation that has not been imposed hitherto. I think this is a very regrettable, back door and sly method of introducing a new tax. I suppose the minister is following the slogan of the popular song; he is simply "emphasizing the positive". But what is actually happening here is that for the first time it seems it is the intention of the minister to impose a tax on developing the films used in our amateur photography, which you and I take to have developed in the ordinary photographer's shop. So I came to the realization that quite contrary—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. gentleman is quite wrong.

Mr. Benidickson: Will the minister deny that portraits have always been exempt from tax?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will deny that there is any suggestion of putting a tax on films that are being developed for people, as the hon. member has indicated.

Mr. Benidickson: I am glad, we shall watch for developments.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Darkroom tactics.

Mr. Benidickson: I do know that the minister's colleague the Minister of National Revenue advised photo developers that it was the intention to impose this tax for the first time, effective in January of this year, without any change by means of a budget resolution but simply relying on what the department thought was permissive power in the present law. They took the matter to the Department of Justice. It is my submission that we have here a clear exemption of one type of portrait photography with the intention of going ahead with the proposal to impose a sales tax for the first time on the ordinary development of films. If I am wrong I will be very pleased to hear so from the minister.

Before we proceed too far with the budget debate, and in view of the fact that in the city of Ottawa the civil service pension plan covers more people than any other such plan elsewhere, I suggest that the effects of income tax resolution No. 12 be considered by taxpayers very carefully. As most of us know, under certain circumstances a person can withdraw from the civil service pension plan and receive a lump sum payment. This provision is utilized particularly by single female employees upon marriage. The intent of the resolution may be simplification for the tax collector, but we must examine very carefully the effect upon the taxpayer himself.

Apart from some of these items, I do not see that it is useful at this stage, or until we come to debate the resolutions, to refer very much to some of the other items because not very many people are interested in cuttlefish, fish bait, pretzels, instant potatoes and the like, which are prominent in the resolutions this year. At another stage I do, of course, propose to examine very carefully the changes in the tariff. For three budgets we have seen the Minister of Finance come before us as he does, warming his coat tails before the glow of his professed virtue in tariff matters, but with each budget that has been presented we know we have had certain complaints from our best customers. I refer to Britain, Italy, Japan and so on. I suggest that again this year these items will require very careful consideration when we have the bill before us amending the Customs Tariff.

When I spoke briefly the other night, Mr. Speaker, there were a lot of oh's and ah's when I made the statement that the Minister of Finance had been 50 per cent wrong in his forecast of the gross national product, because he had made his forecast on the assumption that no increases in prices would be involved. Over the week end I think most of us have seen that this view has been shared by those with prominent positions in financial journalism. I find that in the April 2 issue the Financial Post had this to say:

> Business planners got an unwanted and unexpected surprise this week: 1959's gross national product made only a bare 3.5 per cent gain in volume. At budget time last year, finance minister Fleming had assumed that prices would be stable and a "real" 7 per cent advance would be achieved in the production of goods and services...
> These G.N.P. trends add to the evidence pointing to slower paced growth in 1960.

I hope the Minister of Finance will comment on this as we proceed. I hope the Financial Post is equally right when it goes on to say:

> But it's probably all to the good, say most business analysts. The fewer the excesses this year, the milder any subsequent recession.

However, that was not the minister's forecast last year and, as I indicated, it was just 50 per cent out with respect to volume and an assumption of no increases in prices. When we examined the minister's comments the other night we were greatly disappointed with regard to some of the important matters other than finance lightly dealt with that have a great effect upon our economy and our financial future. There was certainly cavalier treatment with respect to the problem of unemployment. It was certainly brushed under the rug. In the budget of the Minister of Finance we seemed to have quite a departure from the philosophy of the Prime Minister that "no man is going to suffer". There is nothing new for the unemployed. In fact one could hardly find anything more fatuous than this brief reference to unemployment in the minister's statement, as found at page 2670 of Hansard:

> I am confident... that employment will rise as the coming of spring opens up new job opportunities and as the economy continues its upward trend.

Mr. Deschatelets: What a shame.

Mr. Benidickson: If that is all that can be expected, if that is all the minister was prepared to tell us in his budget speech about the pressing problem of unemployment, I say it is cavalier treatment indeed. About agriculture there was nothing at all said. The silence was deafening with respect to our agricultural industry. Notwithstanding the fact that the net income of Canadian farmers as reported, last month, has declined 7 per cent in 1959, did the minister make any comment about that very vital industry in his report to the nation the other night? He did not.

Well, Mr. Speaker, at this stage in our proceedings it is always monotonous—it is monotonous to us as it must be to those on the other side—and indeed depressing to recite even a partial list of the broken promises of this administration. I believe those promises were made not with the feeling that they would ever have to be redeemed, but were made in an election campaign simply from the point of view of embarrassment.

I shall refer to some very briefly. There was the promise to reduce expenditures, and then what happened? They were increased. There was the promise to lower taxes, but they were raised; the denunciation of high interest rates, and they were pushed higher; the promise to provincial governments of benefits which the government find afterwards they seemingly cannot concede; the promise to divert trade from the United States and then they concentrate trade more in the single basket; the promise to cure unemployment, and in the year which our financial treasurer says is a prosperous year we find unemployment worse than last year and rising. There was the promise to reorganize and rationalize national defence. Now, there is almost universal agreement across the country that national defence is in an incomprehensible mess.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that in this picture two things have come into focus. It has become abundantly clear that the Prime Minister is, after all, mortal; and second, that the taxpayers' purse is limited. The taxpayers had begun to wonder if the vision was something they could actually afford or was merely an illusion. What are some of the results? We find that the Minister of Finance today is the one being cheered, mostly, as the strong man of the day. The "no person will suffer" philosophy, as I have said, seems to have been jettisoned as being incompatible with the green light that, at some stage, apparently was given to the Minister of Finance to make our finances more sound. Even the government itself now appears to be reaping the whirlwind of the iniquitous promise seed which it sowed in two elections.

At some point last fall—I think this is very interesting—even the Prime Minister seems to have got green around the gills in connection with our financial distress and must have decided on something new because, after all, a change did take place. The Minister of Finance has given us a review of the past year, but it seems to me that the white paper and his report to the house last Thursday night have left out a great portion of the real bases for some of the changes that have taken place.

I want to ask the house to reflect upon the climate, financial and political, across this country last year, particularly in the fall. I have a little review to show just what the thinking was of people not only in this country, of those likely to be biased in favour of the government, but of onlookers outside of the country. What were they saying six months ago? The Economist of London, an outstanding United Kingdom journal, described Canada as in a financial mess.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will the hon. gentleman read some of the articles from those English papers that came out about six weeks or two months later, and which corrected those erroneous statements?

Mr. Benidickson: That was doubtless after the visit by the minister of the United Kingdom, when he said that Canada's finances were as sound as a bell. But it was also after the time that radical changes were made in the direction of our finances in this country.

The Globe and Mail of Toronto has never been particularly unfriendly to this government. Its financial editor, after hearing the speech of the Prime Minister on our financial policy which was delivered to the Lethbridge chamber of commerce, said this:

> As to the cause of tight money, this may clearly be attributed to official policy.

The Montreal Star commented as follows:

> We wish that someone he would listen to, would tell the Prime Minister that no one cares whether tight money is due to the Liberals, the Conservatives or hurricane Gracie. Very tight money is here.
> Tight money is due to a combination of factors for some of which the government has responsibility. Why not tell what government policy is? Mr. Diefenbaker could. Instead we have to go on guessing.

This was the climate of last fall. The money market certainly told the government that something was wrong and not sound as a bell. I think you and I as individuals, if we had found it so difficult to borrow money, certainly would have thought something was wrong with our operations and would be rather concerned. At the beginning of October the president of the investment dealers of Canada had this to say:

> The underlying issue is the absence of leadership by the government in monetary matters.

The financial editor of the Montreal Gazette, commenting on that statement by the representative of the investment dealers, said this—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Will the hon. gentleman give the date of the quotations?

Mr. Benidickson: October 1, 1959 was the date of the first one. Commenting on that statement the following day the financial editor of the Montreal Gazette, not unfriendly to this government either, said if that statement of the I.D.B. is to be criticized, the criticism is that the statement has not gone far enough.

Within about a week, in this kind of climate —and I am giving only a few illustrations of what was being said about the financial policy of the government—it is true that the Minister of Finance broke a long silence, something which is unusual for him, and made a statement to the Empire club of Toronto. This followed within a few days that famous television broadcast of the Prime Minister when he delved into financial policy and pouted that the banks were to blame for our situation and said that nobody was going to stampede him.

Within a week we certainly did get from the Minister of Finance something quite different and more positive in connection with financial policy. It appeared that at long last the Minister of Finance had been given by his Prime Minister something in the way of a brighter light with respect to financial leadership in the country. We certainly had been in quite a bit of uncertainty previously. I should like to give an illustration of what the House of Commons was told in the previous session by the Minister of Finance as to financial policy, and the kind of muddled explanation that we obtained. As reported at page 3746 of Hansard of May 18, a question was put to the Minister of Finance and these were his words in reply:

> If the banks find they have not an ample amount of money to meet the extraordinary demands for credit that are made upon them today as a result of the upsurge in the Canadian economy, then certainly it is not the intention of the Canadian government to inflict on the people of Canada a repetition of the tight money policy of our Liberal predecessors.

Then the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked this question: "What are you going to do to stop it?" To that question there was no answer. There was no answer after the adjournment of the house until the minister started in October to make statements as he has been doing, as I said the other night, every month since. What is the policy? Is the policy that the budget is to be balanced at any cost, or is it the policy enunciated previously by the Prime Minister, namely that no person will suffer—presumably economically—in this country?

The Minister of Finance the other night had quite a bit to say about debt management. There was a striking absence of comment on unemployment and agriculture. However, he had a great deal to say about debt management. I think some of the statements made the other night are certainly worthy of a review. As reported at page 2677 of Hansard the minister said this:

> —the total volume of direct government of Canada marketable issues outstanding at the end of the year is only $28 million higher than at the beginning.

What is the unsophisticated person going to think about that statement? I suggest to the Minister of Finance that no matter how he may twist or squirm, all he requires to do is look at the statistics in the weekly report of the Bank of Canada—and I refer to the latest one, dated March 31 of this year—and he will find that the total of government of Canada direct and guaranteed securities outstanding is up $756 million from a year ago. This is the sum that was taken by the government from the market, and taking this sum diminished accordingly the amounts which investors would otherwise have had available for other undertakings, for other governments, for the commerce of the country and so on. I say, Mr. Speaker, what lubricity there is in this kind of statement.

The finance minister's remarks on the debt management activities of the government in the past 12 months just glossed over the tremendous damage that his borrowings have caused to junior governments and to individual commercial borrowers. The course of the treasury bill rates during the year 1959 reflects these repeated demands made by the government on the money market. The Minister of Finance suggests that these rates really, in their rise, reflected particularly the heavy demands that were made by ordinary commerce through the banks. It was the earlier demands of this government for money, made through and after the conversion loan, that demoralized the interest rates of this country and made it no longer possible for the Minister of Finance to say, "look what we as a government have done to bring down interest rates". Once they started to rise, of course, it was somebody else's fault. First of all it was said it was that of the Bank of Canada; then it was said it was the fault of the chartered banks of the land. But the course of the rise is evident. It stemmed and originated from that unfortunate conversion loan.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Give the most recent Bank of Canada rate.

Mr. Benidickson: I am going to refer to that matter. I suggest that the hon. member, like the Minister of Finance, may claim credit that it is going down. You are taking great credit for it going down, but refused to accept any responsibility for financial policy when it was going up to heights never experienced in a generation. I want to say something about what this has resulted in. Let us look at what the cost of interest has meant to this government—and we are examining the accounts of our government for the past year—quite irrespective of the calamity that its policies have caused in pushing out other governments and pushing out the legitimate commerce of the land.

The main estimates for 1960-61 provide for interest in a staggering sum, but this is not all the story. The amount of interest actually provided in the book of estimates for the forthcoming year is less than was spent by the government last year. The amount is $594 million. The actual interest charges last year amounted to $632 million. I pointed out the other night that there is an allowance of only $140 million for extra charges for the remainder of this new year if he is actually to produce a balanced budget. The other night he provided $15 million for the civil servants. But here is a difference of $39 million between what was actually spent last year on interest and what is provided for in the estimates for interest for the coming year.

The question that naturally arises is this. Can the minister, with an item of this kind and many others that I could mention, hold the line to this margin of $140 million in the large budget that is involved for this country? We know this government has indicated that as far as freight rates are concerned, an increase cannot be allowed. They have said that the line must be held. Indeed, the president of the Canadian National Railways said to our committee the other day that if freight rates went up he thought there would perhaps be a diminishing return to the railroads. In competition with other carriers the freight carried would become less. We have at the present time a board of conciliation with respect to the wage demands of 100,000 of our railway employees. If freight rates are to be held as they are and subsidies are to be continued in order to provide wage increases commensurate with increases in wages to workers in other segments of the economy, what is that going to do to the budget of the Minister of Finance?

The minister always has a desire to relate the national debt to per capita debt. We are sorry that we have not in the house these days the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan). We hope, however, that he will be back with us after an operation after the Easter recess, at which time he will doubtless be participating in later stages of this debate. But I am surprised the Minister of Finance would repeat this old tale after the excellent way in which it was presented to the house last year, when the hon. member for Welland pointed out that what the minister was really saying was that every baby born and every immigrant arriving into the country is simply being handed and assuming a share of the debt. The member for Welland also pointed out that this does not in any way reduce the debt by one dollar. It is simply a matter of transferring to a new baby a share of the public debt.

The net debt as it stands today is $12.1 billion. The Liberals, so much attacked by the Minister of Finance in the past when he sat in opposition for reaching large surpluses, as a result reduced the net debt over a period of 11 years from $13.4 billion to just over $11 billion. In two years this new administration has managed to wipe out half the savings achieved by their predecessors over a period of 11 years.

The cost of servicing the public debt, as a result of the high interest rates and unprecedented deficits in peacetime, now stands at $786 million. This is the second largest item in our budget, being second only to that for national defence. Let us look at the cost of servicing this debt today per wage earner. If we take the figure for the total labour force as approximately 6,200,000, I calculate that the cost would be $126 per year or about $10.50 per month for each wage earner in this country to service the debt. This, of course, is a tremendous obligation, and it has been rising to great proportions.

Mr. Speaker, in connection with debt management, I want to look at another angle. In examining the Bank of Canada report I have found there set out the details of the various forms of loans obtained last year by this administration. We have features that have never been prominent in requests for money over many years of this country's history. Loan after loan seems to have coupled with it a new gimmick and I suggest something which one would almost regard as a new give-away, so far as the taxpayers are concerned, in order to get money.

I refer to such things as the non-callable feature. We have had non-callable features in our public debt in the past, it is true; but I pointed out in the budget debate last year, when referring to the conversion loan which was made, that it would be a financial tragedy of great magnitude when the youth of this land, when they became taxpayers, found there were no callable features as far as the government was concerned respecting that massive conversion involving $6.4 billion.

This has continued. In the past there were occasionally times under the previous administration when the callable feature was omitted, but I suggest there is a very big difference between the elimination of a callable feature when interest rates are 3 per cent and 3½ per cent and when they are 6½ per cent or 5½ per cent, at all time high levels.

This is what the Minister of Finance is denying to his successors in the way of financial adjustment in the future if interest rates go down.

I refer to the debate of last year of March 18, when I said there was another very dangerous gimmick which the minister was apparently introducing. That was the gimmick of a very substantial discount offered with respect to a very short term loan. I do not know whether the minister was as naive as he suggested, whether he actually did not realize the implication of this, or whether he was endeavouring to mislead me or put me and the hon. member for Welland off. Also the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. gentleman wishes to leave that imputation on the record. It is not worthy of him to suggest that an hon. member of this house was endeavouring to mislead him.

Mr. Benidickson: I was suggesting an alternative, Mr. Speaker, which I thought the minister perhaps would less like to have, and that was that he did not realize the implication to the crown—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I must take objection to the imputation in the words used by the hon. gentleman. He has his opportunity to withdraw that expression, when he suggests I was misleading him.

Mr. Benidickson: I withdraw willingly, the words "misleading me," Mr. Speaker, and in doing so I will indicate that if one reads the remarks of the Minister of Finance as they appear in Hansard of March 18 of last year, it will be found that he said in reply to remarks made by the hon. member for Welland, "What difference does the length of the term make?" We had described the value to shrewd, sophisticated investors of getting a substantial discount on the purchase of a government bond and utilizing that, if they were not dealers, as a tax free capital gain. Indeed, one wonders why, if it were not deliberate tailoring, we had what would normally be called a treasury bill which would not be subject to a capital gain advantage, but by tailoring the loan for merely a period of one more month, 13 months, it was called a bond.

I pointed out last year that as a bond this was indeed a very expensive form of floating loans on the part of the Minister of Finance. He did not seem to realize that the discount portion of the loan extending over 12 of the 13 months was worth more to a person or a corporation paying income tax of 50 per cent than was the nominal rate advertised with respect to it across the country, the low and unrealistic rate advertised at that time being 2¾ per cent. I said at that time that for a taxpayer who was paying an effective income tax rate of 50 per cent, and who was entitled to a capital gain, it was equivalent to a rate of 6.6 per cent for a bond sold at 100 cents for the dollar. I said in addition that I thought the Minister of Finance was suggesting in this form of procedure, providing short term bonds, a form of finance to the junior governments, and that as the collector of most of the income tax in this country he would regret it very keenly as time went on.

Some of the governments, following the example of course of the Minister of Finance, have been entering into this type of financing to a much bigger extent than ever before, and the sufferer is the treasury of Canada which does not get, on the difference between par and the discounted price, any income tax if the purchaser of the bonds is not a dealer and is thus entitled to have the discount regarded as a capital gain. I think this reached proportions of a dangerous nature. The Minister of Finance did not take that advice, and during the year we had subsequent floatings of loans with this important discount feature over a short term. I say this is going to prove very expensive indeed to the other side of the government, the tax collecting department, when they are seeking to collect income tax.

Then toward the fall we got into something which I think is particularly frightening to the young people of the land, if they just care to look at the type of financing which the minister has embarked upon. I have already said that most of his loan flotations do not give him the right, if interest rates go down substantially in the future, to call the debt, as used to be the practice when interest rates were nothing like as high as these. But here, time after time from September on we have had loan issues which have no call right and another feature called the right to convert. In other words, the sophisticated borrower sees that he has all the benefits of the present high rates of interest for bonds maturing over a short period of time, in 1962, 1963 and 1964, and then if rates of interest prevailing in this country in those years are substantially less he has the right to extend the term of those loans, in some cases up to an additional 13 years.

One can readily recognize this form of finance is certainly going to prove very costly indeed to the taxpayers of tomorrow, who are the youth of today; and this in spite of the fact we have indicated these dangers to the Minister of Finance in the past.

Then we come to Canada savings bonds. Even the Auditor General suggested that there seemed to be a lot of unnecessary and expensive run-around with respect to this form of finance. Canada savings bonds, when they were introduced by the previous administration, may have had some social benefit. They were tailored to encourage savings on the part of the small individual of the land. The maximum amount under the previous administration available to any individual was set at $5,000. Under the new administration there has developed another sales gimmick. The bonds formerly never available to other than the small man, are now available to estates and trusts. They are available to an amount of $20,000 in the name of any one individual, instead of being available to a total of $5,000. I do not think this can be called a small man's form of lending his savings to the government.

The minister's report shows that in the fiscal year just past he did, it is true, sell $1,455 million worth of Canada savings bonds at extraordinary high rates of interest. But the report also shows, at page 267 of Hansard —and this is also contained in the white paper—that the minister in the same year redeemed $1,170 million of Canada savings bonds. In other words he has just been rolling this debt over, and the net increase in borrowings of this nature was only $285 million during the year as shown by this report.

This has even provoked complaints from provincial treasurers. When it had some social merit, providing a vehicle for lending money in small amounts, as under the previous administration, up to a limit of $5,000, these complaints did not arise; but the minister will have noticed that the treasurer of his own province of Ontario has long since cried "ouch" and "foul" against this practice, and only last week these were the words used in the legislature by the premier of Ontario with respect to this type of federal financing:

> I do not agree with what they are doing. I feel it is totally unfair. It is "hot" money, and the turnover is tremendous.

I have indicated that the minister cannot have this both ways. I suggest to him that he is always criticizing the opposition and saying we are the prophets of doom and gloom. I say to him that the biggest prophet of doom today is the Minister of Finance if he thinks we shall have this tight money situation with us so long that in 1962, 1963 and 1964 he must be prepared to give lenders an option to renew their loans at 1959 and 1960 rates of interest for high interest rates such as are indicated in the Bank of Canada report; for another 13 years, seven years and so on. I say he is the pessimist if he thinks that interest rates at levels such as we are experiencing at the present time are to continue for 13 years or more.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made some comment on the fact that in the last month the rate being paid for treasury bills has fallen very substantially. I suggest to the Minister of Finance that this being so he might get in touch with the commercial arm of the Bank of Canada and see if something could not be done to reduce the rate of interest being charged by the industrial development bank to commercial borrowers.

This would have a very healthy effect upon business in this country, and would provide a healthy stimulus. In March 1959 this government bank raised its charge to borrowers from 6 per cent to 6½ per cent. Last October 1 it increased the rate again from 6½ per cent to 7 per cent. I suggest that in view of this drop in the treasury bill rate from about 6 per cent last September to 3.26 per cent on March 30 last, the minister might consider carefully whether business would not be stimulated if borrowers who cannot go into the securities market or whose applications are turned down by the chartered banks were able to obtain a decent rate of interest from the government bank itself.

Now with respect to revenue and taxes, I have indicated what were some of the promises made by the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister when they sought a mandate from the people of this country. What do the white paper and the speech of the minister the other night indicate? The minister, of course, compared taxes with the gross national product. Well, we all take pride in the growth of Canada, but most of us think that if a man is progressing in his business and taking in more money he should be expected to get out of debt rather than be complacent about staying in debt.

Apart from that, let us look at the following table. I think, as I have said, that the gross national debt is not being reduced but only being spread more widely; that it is being shared by a greater number of newborn babies. I submit that a more realistic table with respect to tax revenues would certainly have reference to the amount of taxes per capita which are being paid.

I should like to submit a table which I have prepared. It shows a comparative statement of revenues. The figures in each case are taken from the budget papers, and the table compares the revenues taken by this administration in respect of ordinary budgetary expenditures and the old age security fund in 1958-59 with the estimate given the other night for 1960-61. This indicates that the tax revenues per capita in 1958-59 are $269.48 and in 1960-61, $326.72. That is a very substantial increase indeed, and this from an administration led by a gentleman who went up and down Canada saying taxation would be reduced.

I have here a headline taken from the Toronto Globe and Mail shortly after the present Prime Minister was elected to the leadership of his party. It reads, "Diefenbaker charges Liberals are Pickpockets". Now, when the tax take is considered, comparing revenues two years ago with the expectations for the coming year, I wonder what the people of this country will think of that kind of political propaganda. This was a speech made on a program of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation during a free-time period.

Indeed, it was in the same speech that the Prime Minister indicated that the Conservative party would have a commission set up to report on government economies which might be put into effect. It is almost three years since hon. gentlemen opposite took charge of the government, and this commission has yet to be established. We know that any inquiry as extensive as the one proposed would take several years to complete, and I say this is just a further indication of somersaulting with regard to promises made to the Canadian people in 1957 and 1958 elections.

When we come to consider expenditures we find something which is just as revealing. If we look at the budget papers we find the expenditure reported there for the last full year of the Liberal administration, 1956-57. The total, including old age security payments, amounted to $5,228 million. In the year just ended—and I am not taking the figures for the year ahead; that would show an even bigger disparity—in the year which was reported upon the other night by the Minister of Finance, we find that there is a billion dollar difference since this administration has been in office.

One thing which the Minister of Finance reported in his budget this year—and he did it in his budget speech last year—is the well worn claim, as it appears in Hansard on page 2679, to the effect that because of the very careful and exacting scrutiny of departmental estimates it is likely that there will not be the usual amount of government lapses, unspent moneys that are put into the budget.

The minister said exactly the same thing last year, as recorded at page 2413 of Hansard. These are, of course, good illustrations of the minister's usual modesty.

But bearing these remarks in mind and bearing in mind his suggestion that extraordinary scrutiny has been provided while he has been in charge of the Department of Finance, something presumably never equalled by his predecessors, let us examine the public accounts for 1958-59. We find there that the main estimates for 1958-59 indicated statutory expenditures of $1,788 million. But the accounts show that total budgetary expenditures under statutory authorization amounted to $1,970 million. In other words, the reality was worse than the prospect.

But these are statutory items. What unusual, extraordinary control has been proposed with respect to the items the minister sometimes describes as controllable? In other words, they are voted by parliament. In the main and various supplementary estimates submitted to parliament by the minister authority was given to him to spend $3,818 million in 1958-59. The actual expenditures for those same items amounted to only a difference of $424 million. Does anybody think that careful control, as indicated by the minister, was applied if we have lapsings of $424 million and if as he says, under his supervision presiding over treasury board these estimates of expenditures had received care and attention beyond that of any other of his well-known predecessors. I am afraid the minister is going to sprain his shoulder one of these days patting himself on the back. The trouble is, when one examines these lapsings one finds that it is so unnecessary.

At this stage it is very difficult for anybody examining the budget papers which were presented to us the other day to make a complete and accurate calculation to see how well the minister has carried out his boast in the next year 1959-60 with respect to the close control of the estimates so that lapsings would be minimal. However, by the use of the budget papers it is possible to make a calculation in this respect. Out of budgetary expenditures under statutory appropriations of $2,253 million I do admit that it is not readily possible to follow $21.3 million of expenditures, but with respect to the remainder of this large sum of $2,253 million it is possible to relate the expenditures reported in the 1960 white paper back to the book of estimates for 1959-60 which was prepared by the minister. When one does that he finds that it was proposed in the blue book that $2,056 million be spent on statutory items as appropriations for 1959-60. As I say, in both cases, I have deleted miscellaneous items of approximately $21 million. When this is examined we will find—and I think this is of interest when we consider the narrow margin upon which the minister is basing his surplus for next year—that there was an increase of $196 million. I have indicated on how narrow a base the margin is for the minister's next year's surplus.

With respect to non-statutory authorizations voted in supply I find that there were lapsings of $288.6 million. When one examines the records of previous years, he finds this does not indicate to him that the minister has been better able to reduce lapsings under non-statutory appropriations and at times overexpenditures under statutory items than his predecessors.

It was rather amusing the other night to find that this was brought forward again by the minister despite this discrepancy, when one looks to the past two years' record. It is reported that the other night the Minister of Finance went up to the press gallery after delivering his budget address. One of the journalists asked him a question. It is reported in this way:

> He fenced nimbly with a reporter who asked him if the modest $12 million surplus was over-taxation, a sin for which the one-time opposition critic used to castigate the Liberal government.
> "That was different," said Mr. Fleming. "The Liberals were guilty of inaccurate budgeting."

I have indicated the kind of lapsings and discrepancies between the estimates of the Minister of Finance in each of two years.

I indicated some kinds of promises that remain unfulfilled. In fact, what we are getting now demonstrates leadership diametrically opposite to what was indicated to the electorate would be their policy in the matter of finance.

However, the Minister of Finance last year spoke for the second time in the budget debate, as reported at page 2892 of Hansard of April 21, 1959. This shows the extreme length to which the minister can go in debate in the house. He was dealing with the opposition amendment at that time a year ago, and he said:

> I have dealt with the terms of this extraordinary amendment, an amendment which has the temerity to accuse this government of having made promises which it did not make; of having been elected on the basis of promises which it did not give during the election campaign, and of having broken promises which it did not make.

I leave it to the country to decide whether any of the promises I have referred to today are not promises that were made well known across Canada as promises made by hon. members of the administration who now sit on the treasury benches. If that is not enough, let us look at some other promises, promises that related to likely changes in fiscal policy.

There are, of course we have been told, two kinds of promises. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) has indicated that promises made outside the house are not entitled to the same respect and obligation as promises made in the house, and I must confess that some of these promises were made outside the house but by very prominent members of the Conservative party.

Mr. Pickersgill: Just promises to the people.

Mr. Benidickson: Just promises to the people. We remember that at the national convention at which the present Prime Minister was elected leader of his party they had a resolutions committee. It is true that they did draw up a number of items for the platform for the election that was expected to take place in six months or so afterwards. But after the election of the present Prime Minister as party leader it seems that these platform items were stifled. However, those of use who were here at that time know that no one had a better entree to the goings-on at that convention and to the activities of the Conservative party than that good friend of all of us, Mr. Blakely, representing the Montreal Gazette.

Before these plans in the platform were thrown out we had a report from Mr. Blakely as to the goings-on in the resolutions committee of the Conservative party. In the Montreal Gazette of December 12, 1956 he reported that the party had agreed, through its resolutions committee, on an extension of the housing act to cover existing homes in good condition. We have heard no more about that. It was agreed that they would encourage processing in Canada. What is there in this budget along these lines of fiscal policy. It was indicated that they would encourage national research by a more favourable tax climate. I see the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy): I have no doubt he is still trying to persuade the government to carry out this part of the platform. He probably had a great deal to with getting it in there in the first place. We find that they proposed the development of a deep sea fleet at an estimated cost for 35 ships of some $35 million. That has gone down the drain. Even what we had under the previous administration was sold by this administration.

Mr. Pickersgill: Sold to Batista.

Mr. Benidickson: They promised that they would eliminate the sales tax on purchases by school boards. This is the third budget presented by the minister and we have had nothing with respect to that yet. Then there is another matter which is of great concern to me because I have a bill on the order paper to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act with the same objective that the Conservative party had in 1956, that of providing aid to non-industrial small business through the industrial development bank. When that bill comes up for consideration I hope that my friends, who in such large numbers form the governing party, will make sure of the passage of the bill.

Here is an amazing one. They proposed that they would withdraw from the taxation field with respect to alcoholic beverages and would leave that field entirely to the provinces. Some credit was given to individual sponsors of resolutions at that convention. The present member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith)—he was not a member then—said that he won his case before the 162 member policy and resolutions committee when he called for an amendment to provide for tax concessions for Canadian oil and gas operators equal to those obtained by United States operators from the United States government. We just heard the other day that the government, after almost three years of responsibility, were finally removing the road block that they themselves created instead of providing a green light for this very important industry in western Canada.

Here is another interesting one. The former member for Gloucester got his way too when he insisted that the word "distinctive" be used to describe the Canadian national flag to be adopted immediately.

We know that these planks in the platform were pigeonholed, but let us look at the matter from another angle.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about the excise tax on automobiles?

Mr. Benidickson: The excise tax on automobiles was another example. In the election campaign the Conservative party made no reference to the promises made at the national convention and in substitution therefor said that they would go by the commitments made to the Canadian people by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), then the party leader. It just happens that many matters having direct reference to fiscal policy were indeed referred to publicly and often by the Prime Minister. In his speech to the Montreal chamber of commerce shortly after his election as leader of the party he said that there would be tax changes if his party was elected to power to put Canadian companies on a basis of equality with foreign corporations or their subsidiaries operating in Canada. After three budgets what have we in the minister's financial proposals with respect to that matter?

Again, in his opening campaign speech in Toroto on April 25, 1957 the present Prime Minister said that there would be less discriminatory methods of taxing Canadian oil companies. This was the plank that the hon. member for Calgary South was instrumental in selling to the 162-member convention resolutions committee. Again, as reported in the Vancouver Sun of March 10, 1958, the Prime Minister said that there would be drastic changes in the taxation treatment of all companies. He said that under the Income Tax Act further incentives would be provided for Canadians to invest in Canadian equity stocks. That was also in his opening campaign speech at Massey hall, Toronto, on April 25, 1957.

Then we come back to the project of the hon. member for Lambton West. Tax reductions to encourage Canadian research in every field, which was also referred to by the Prime Minister at Massey hall on the same date. At a Conservative rally at Campbellton, New Brunswick, on May 4, 1957 the Prime Minister promised tax inducements to persuade business firms to process raw materials in Canada.

As I say, these were promises made to the people of Canada outside the house and I think that most of us are disappointed to find little implementation of these well-known commitments made throughout the country in three budgets presented by the Minister of Finance.

I am not going to deal with this matter at any length. Not only in these monthly speeches of the Minister of Finance to chambers of commerce, empire clubs and others prior to presenting the budget but also in what he said to the House of Commons the other night, in which there was very little change from what he had been saying elsewhere, the minister closed his remarks by urging people, with that ring in his voice, to work and save. Of course, the poor unemployed would like to be able to work so that they could save. In past budget debates time after time the minister has used the Biblical reference about the mote and the beam and the eye. If the minister is trying to tell workers and people generally throughout the country that they should follow a policy of self-reliance and that there should be some forbearance and self-denial, I suggest that the minister simply look at the government telephone book of April, 1957 and the new directory and compare the number of staff for each of the ministers then with the number of personal, political staff now. I think the government is certainly not leading the way in forbearance, self-denial or, indeed, self-reliance.

Mr. Pickersgill: A 50 per cent increase.

Mr. Benidickson: In department after department we find no indication of ministers seeking assistance from the permanent professional staffs of the department but rather the addition of publicists, associate private secretaries, executive assistants, and so on. As somebody has said, the number is almost double what it was in 1957.

So I say that if the administration really desires to follow a policy of economy the ministry would be better advised, if they are not practicing self-reliance, to look to the permanent civil service for advice and counsel and not to political advisers to the extent that a comparison of the two telephone books indicates has taken place, contrary to their professions about economy. I move, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud):

> That all the words after the word "that" be deleted and the following be substituted therefor: "this house regrets that the financial policies of the government will produce a fourth consecutive over-all deficit in a year of "so-called prosperity", while at the same time offering no solution to the problem of rising prices, rising trade deficits, a continued high premium on the Canadian dollar, increased pressure on provinces and municipalities to borrow outside Canada, declining farm income, and high and rising unemployment."

Mr. Speaker: May I put the amendment with this reservation, that I am not certain that some of the details in the second part have not already been the subject of a decision of the house. Subject to inquiry into that matter, I will put the motion with that reservation.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to raise a point of order. I think that the Minister of Finance will recall that I referred to tabling two documents which I prepared myself and for which I take responsibility. One is a memorandum as to statutory authorizations and parliamentary votes for 1959-60 and the other is a memorandum as to the principal budgetary expenditures under statutory appropriations for 1959-60. The first table is a comparison of the estimates in the blue book, as I have indicated, with the white paper of the budget for 1960 showing expenditures for 1959-60. I wonder if these could be appended to Hansard.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member says he has prepared these tables and taken his information from government records I would urge on the house that it give permission to having the tables made part of the record of the hon. member's speech in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree that the tables just submitted by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) be made part of the record of his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The tables referred to are as follows:]

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, we are today giving consideration to a rather important document. The house is considering the budget address that the minister gave last week. I believe that the contents of the budget will find a place in Canadian parliamentary and political history because this budget was submitted at a crucial time in the life of the present government. I think historians are going to have to note that the budget is significant in that it shows the failure of the government to supply leadership and a sense of direction to the economic welfare of the Canadian people. I believe there is revealed in the budget a lack of responsibility on the part of the government in terms of recognizing the problems facing most of the Canadian people.

I note that the government has announced its expectation of having a balanced budget. As long as inflation hangs over our heads our group has to endorse the desirability of a balanced budget. However, we feel that the methods the government has employed in arriving at a balanced budget are wrong, if not indeed harmful, to the interests of Canadians at large. We note that the minister has arrived at what he forecasts will be a balanced budget by the simple Tory expediency of reducing or holding the line on government expenditures. In the light of the serious problems we have to face this in our opinion is a wrong approach. We feel the government should rather obtain a balanced budget by looking for ways and means of raising its revenues instead of harshly curtailing expenditures, many of which are important to the welfare of the people.

We submit that the budget does nothing. It does not even make an effort to meet the problems of the people. In the method by which it has been balanced it is a negative budget instead of a positive one that could be historic in that it would indicate an awareness on the part of the government of the needs of the people. It is a do-nothing budget. It is intended for "Fleming's few". It may well satisfy the cynical among us. There may be many Canadians who will say, "Well, what else can you expect?" However, I believe many people who were so starry-eyed back on March 31, 1958 will suffer a rude awakening as a result of this budget. In my opinion only the moneylenders, the large corporations and the foreign exploiters will be able to appreciate the friendliness of this budget.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) recognized the serious problems of the Canadian people in 1958. Why, then, does not the government recognize them in either the speech from the throne or the budget presented last week? The budget this year was a test of the sincerity of the government. Next year I expect we will see the goodies spread around.

I repeat that our Prime Minister at one time recognized as possibly no other Canadian politician recognized before the needs of the Canadian people. They expressed their confidence in him and in appreciation of his recognizing their needs brought his party into office. This year the people are carefully watching the actions of the government. At least those Canadians who do any deep and serious thinking are watching and I believe they will recognize this budget as a complete denial of the knowledge the Prime Minister claimed to have with respect to our needs back in 1958.

I wish to ask the government a question at this point. Is it the contention of the government that these problems no longer exist? If they are admitted as existing what are the intentions of the government in regard to action? The Canadian people are demanding answers before the end of the debate and if none are forthcoming I have every confidence that thinking Canadians will take note of this betrayal of the confidence they placed in the Conservative party a few short years ago.

Before proceeding to the subject of the budget as a whole I should like to refer to a detail of the budget, namely civil service pay increases. Now that the minister has revealed the government's intention in respect to the civil service may the House of Commons have made available to it the report of the civil service commission to the minister in regard to a recommended increase in civil service pay? What is the government hiding by continuing to deny to parliament and civil servants the contents of this report? Now that the government has made up its mind as to what it intends to do I feel this is the time when at long last we should be supplied with information as to what those recommendations were.

The whole economy of Canada is going to suffer as a result of the denial on the part of the government of adequate increases in the incomes of civil servants. The public servants who have waited so long have now been told that only a limited number of them are going to receive pay increases. Those who will receive increases—roughly 50,000 out of some 180,000—will have increases retroactive only to April 1. It is our contention that the government ought to at least follow the example pursued by most employers in Canada. If and when a pay dispute is finally resolved the award that is made is made retroactive up to the beginning of the dispute at least and in the case of many employers it may be retroactive even much further back than that. I believe that any increase ought to be made retroactive to the time of the beginning of the dispute.

I believe the government should also give careful consideration to granting the rights of citizenship to our civil servants in that they give them the right to collective bargaining. I hope the government is yet going to reconsider the decision announced by the minister whereby 50,000 will now be given a pay increase and the government is going to weigh the needs of the remaining 130,000.

I ask in all sincerity these questions of the government: is it worried that the civil servants have been acting as one unit in Canada? Is the minister concerned lest there develop some unanimity in the ranks of the civil service and lest they present the government with a unified approach? Is the move of the government now what in union terms we call union busting in that the minister now wants 130,000 civil servants organized into many associations to come and bargain individually with the government? Is the government really guilty of union busting or will it release the report of the civil service commission which I believe we shall find contained a recommendation for an over-all wage increase for Canadian civil servants. If the minister wishes to deny that the report contains that recommendation, I shall be happy to hear him say so. At long last we might be able to get a little bit out of him as to what that report really did contain. I feel that not only will the whole economy of Canada suffer loss when we deny all these workers and their families adequate purchasing power but that it is a reflection upon our society when we have people working in our society as civil servants—people who have denied themselves the right or the hope of any personal gain in their lifetime—if we pay them less than the average wage rates in the country.

We have heard the arguments of the government and the minister. I am not sure whether he made reference again last week to the cost. Yes, he mentioned how much the expected increase would cost. However, last October he argued that the cost of the pay increase asked for was beyond the level of revenue and expenditure that the government was able to afford. The minister now announces that $15 million will be available. He was unable to afford several hundred millions which last fall he claimed it would take. Now he announces that $15 million will be made available. It is my opinion that no such kind of concern for the taxpayers was evident in the part of the minister when he obviously readily acquiesced in the demand for higher interest rates on the part of the moneylenders of Canada. Even in one year he is making over $100 million more available to the moneylenders at the expense of the taxpayers than was the case the previous year. If the same concern had been shown for the civil servants as was shown for the moneylenders, they would have received an adequate increase a long time ago.

The minister asserts that he has presented us with a balanced budget. Whether or not that is so will only be known a year hence. We admit the need to curtail inflation. Reading over what the minister had to say on Thursday night, I would say it almost appears as if the government is operating on the theory that inflation is no longer a danger. I should like to point out that the problem of inflation has not yet been licked in Canada. I feel it is high time that the government really made a study of this problem and, as a result of intelligent and informed opinion, undertook long term action to cure our society once and for all of this cancerous disease of inflation.

I am at a loss to realize exactly how much inflation we have had in the past year. Reading over the reports and the statistics emanating from government ranks we find various figures. On one occasion there is reference to a 1 per cent increase in prices; in other cases reference is made to a 2 per cent; and in other cases government spokesmen admit to a 2½ per cent increase in prices. Even cabinet ministers issued conflicting reports on what actually has taken place.

However, the federal government is only one influence in this problem of inflation. There are other forces existing within our economy, and they are powerful ones. If the government wants to solve inflation as a national problem, I feel they will have to make much greater use of the Bank of Canada than they have made in the past.

I was rather disappointed that the budget did not contain many more adjustments to the Income Tax Act. I feel that a useful move that might be made is that the industrial development of the poorer regions of Canada could be enhanced by amendments to the Income Tax Act involving, if necessary, some concessions. I notice that this is a device that has been used by the government of the United Kingdom. There we have a government that realizes the need for all regions of the country to enjoy the blessings of industrial advancement and of employment as a result thereof, and they have used their taxation measures as one means by which to encourage industry to locate in regions of the country where it is desirable that more industrial development take place and yet where, if the ordinary laws of economics were allowed to work, these industrial developments are not going to take place.

I had hoped that the minister would have undertaken some moves to plug the many loopholes existing in our income tax laws at the present time. I had hoped there would be a review of the extremely generous depletion and depreciation allowances that exist. We all hoped there would be an increase allowed in the exemptions for the average wage earner in Canada and that the exemption for single people would have been raised at least to $1,500 and for married people to at least $3,000, with a much greater allowance for dependants than exists at the present time.

I had hoped that the government would have given some consideration to the institution of a graduated corporation tax in Canada. I cannot see the logic of applying a graduated income tax to individuals in Canada and yet having a flat percentage rate of corporation income tax. I feel that a graduated corporation tax would serve many useful purposes. It would make it a little bit easier for the small businessman to survive as a small independent businessman. It would be a weapon that would help to discourage the development of monopolies and cartels. It would reduce foreign investments to more reasonable levels. It would encourage the sale of offerings of federal, provincial and municipal governments on the money markets.

We had hoped that the government would at long last have instituted a capital gains tax which would also bring in its wake many helpful solutions to the problems of the Canadian economy. We talked about the difficulties—the premium on the Canadian dollar and investment by people in the United States in Canadian industrial enterprise—and the institution of a capital gains tax would be another method whereby in an orderly and planned manner we could bring about desirable results to the benefit of the future welfare of Canadians.

The minister hardly mentioned the field of agriculture. I suppose in the opinion of the Conservatives agriculture is no longer very important; at least, their action henceforth have not shown that they pay much attention to the needs of agriculture. I would like to ask what has happened to the demand for parity prices, and what has happened to the demand for deficiency payments when goods are exported? There is no planning in this budget to grant either parity prices on home consumed goods or deficiency payments on exported goods.

Neither is there anything contained in the budget which will bring any measure of hope to what the minister admits is an average figure of 350,000 unemployed persons. May I point out to the minister and the government, in seeking ways and means of adding to its revenues, that if we had 350,000 as an average level of unemployment we thereby lost over $1 billion worth of wealth which would have gone into the Canadian economy. The attitude of the government of the day toward the unemployed of Canada seems callous indeed.

This Conservative government has now introduced the means test in the application of the Unemployment Insurance Act, a most regrettable move. The Unemployment Insurance Act was passed on insurance principles, and the introduction of the means test and the denying to these people of the benefits of their severance and holiday pay is completely opposed to the original intent of the act.

The independent businessman of Canada will receive small comfort from the budget. Ever since the Conservatives took office we have only had one lousy, measly $30,000 vote in all the estimates specifically designed to help the small businessman. How they were going to help the small businessman of Canada before the government was elected. Interest rates are now so high that they are beyond the ability of Canadian enterprise to afford. They are also beyond the reach of those responsible for supplying us with our social needs. Our municipalities, hospital boards and school boards simply are not doing the necessary borrowing because they feel that our home owners, in turn, can no longer pay these high interest rates on such borrowings. Our businessmen, especially our independent businessmen, have ended their major borrowings for the very same reason. They can no longer operate when they have to pay these excessive rates.

The government is deliberately responsible for raising the interest rate, and when one looks back now to the speeches made both by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and by the Prime Minister at the time of the bond conversion deal, he will realize that practically every one of the predictions and forecasts as to the blessings of this deal has since been denied by the facts.

We were assured that this move had to be made in order to rid the market of an excessive supply of short term securities. Yet after the bond conversion deal was completed the government itself simply flooded the market with its short term securities, and the provinces and municipalities were not helped to market their own securities. There were many other forecasts and predictions made as to the wonderful blessings of this move, and I cannot think of a single prediction made by the minister at that time which he would now be willing to repeat in this house.

The government is responsible for making tight money tighter still. Tight money became tighter because of the desperate moves of the minister in the money market, and the banks of Canada had to bail out the government in order to make the bond conversion deal a success. The weekly statistics released by the Bank of Canada show that the minister's bond conversion deal would have been a flop if the banks had not come to his aid on an emergency basis. Of course, that made tight money tighter still, and the ordinary man just was not able to borrow.

Then the bottom fell out of the bond market, and in the words of one of the heads of the Canadian banks, the banks had to put a sounder foundation under the bond market and around about August of last year again had to come to the aid of the government and increase their holdings of bonds. Because of the interest rates being pushed up, large corporations left the market and went to the chartered banks in order to meet their capital needs. As a result, the small man in Canada has certainly had to take a beating.

The budget indicates no action will be taken to reduce the premium on the Canadian dollar which harms Canadian exporters so much and also works such a hardship on Canadian manufacturers. No action is indicated to increase our exports so that they may be more even with our imports. There is no action taken on behalf of the veterans of Canada so that their relative purchasing power in relation to the average wage earner of Canada can be restored to what it was shortly after the first world war. There is nothing in the budget to give any hope to those of us who look forward to more federal aid for education. Our municipalities certainly have nothing at all to their benefit from this budget.

We see nothing in it which will enhance economic aid or reduce defence spending. We see nothing in the budget which will encourage greater Canadian ownership of Canadian resources. There is nothing in the budget to deal with the serious transportation mess we are getting ourselves into and which will take hundreds of millions of dollars of public money to get us out of so as adequately to serve the needs of the nation. There is nothing in the budget to indicate any awareness of the serious economic difficulties in the Atlantic areas of Canada. There is nothing in the budget for the masses of the Canadian people.

Our many problems were realized by the Conservative party and the Canadian people at the time of the last election. After three years what do we get? We get a speech from the throne that ignores these matters, and we get a budget which again refuses to recognize our difficulties. The budget contained a little bit for some civil servants. It was a balanced budget and a glowing report. Resolving our problems will take a lot of money. However, the wrong steps have already been taken by this government—inflation and getting more deeply into debt. The Tories have done both these things. The new budget of the Tories is a negative one. The only efforts they have undertaken have resulted in higher taxes, higher tariffs and higher interest rates.

The budget should be balanced by raising the productivity of the Canadian economic scene. We need vastly expanded production and all our people at work. We need more intensified production. Our whole economy is becoming more and more vulnerable to what happens in the United States of America. The glowing reports, when analysed, reveal that our prosperity is very narrowly based indeed and that an ever smaller number of Canadians are being allowed to share in the growing production and prosperity that we are said to have.

Moneylenders and foreign investors are having a field day in Canada. The government is applying the brakes to the development of the Canadian economy, and it is applying the brakes to a rising standard of living for most Canadian people. I appeal to the government to recognize that in this day and age its first responsibility is to the broad mass of the Canadian people. The people expect that their difficulties will be recognized and that action will replace pious appeals, and because we feel that the government, in the budget, is not recognizing its responsibilities to the Canadian people, I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West:

That the amendment be amended by striking out the period after the word "unemployment" and adding thereto the following words:

"and in the opinion of this house the solution of these problems requires amongst other things that the government give consideration to the following measures:

1. The planned elimination of wasteful defence expenditures
2. The provision of a self-liquidating public investment program
3. The provision of an appropriate capital gains tax."

[Mr. Regier.]

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in what terms might I most appropriately describe the sallies and the sneers which have been launched against the budget this afternoon by opposition spokesmen? Having heard them, I thought that perhaps I should follow the example of the late Humphrey Mitchell, and speak in a kindly way. Is not what we have witnessed this afternoon a parade of the picayune, the piecemeal, the puerile and the perverse?

Have there been any objective, discriminating critiques of the budget, of fiscal or tax policy, or have we heard political harangues and abusive declamations? Have we heard constructive criticism, or churlish captiousness? The house and the country have a right to expect from the opposition's financial critics constructive, realistic, forthright and substantial criticisms. What they have received was a peddling of gloom, of pessimism, of despondency, of dejection. These qualities, however they may be a reflection of the political futures of the parties to which hon. gentlemen opposite belong, do not capture the mood of the Canadian people today and do not represent the reality of Canada's future, of her unprecedented and unparalleled development.

In what he had to say this afternoon about existing fiscal and taxation policies, did the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) propose any alternatives whatever? Did he give the house and the country any concept of the policies he would pursue in the unlikely and unhappy event of his becoming minister of finance? Carefully I listened to him, hoping for some clue. None did I gain, and none was there. With respect, may I say that his speech was in my opinion the most negative I have ever heard from a financial critic.

I am not one who believes that an opposition is under a duty to parade detailed policies on every issue. But I do affirm it has an obligation to assert its principles, to demonstrate on important fiscal matters where its principles and theories differ from those of the government. A hodge-podge of strictures is no alternative to statements of principle.

Presumably, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and others of the front bench of the group opposite—I adopt the word "group" to which they have been demoted by the hon. gentleman who represents Essex East (Mr. Martin)—will be speaking in this debate. Specifically and directly I invite them to state their fiscal principles, their economic tenets. Let them tell us what in this year 1960 would be their tax policy. Do they believe in a balanced budget at this phase of our economy? What would they do about our deficit on international payments, except to talk about it? Would they stop the inflow of capital abruptly or gradually, completely or partially? Would they join their great expert Walter Gordon, who may become the minister of finance instead of the hon. gentleman from Kenora-Rainy River, and devalue the dollar, whatever that expression means? If it means something which technically it does not—merely reducing the value—how is that to be accomplished? Would foreign exchange control be reinstated? Would hon. gentlemen opposite peg a fixed rate of exchange and, if so, by what technique? Or would they go into the market and engage in a gigantic financial speculation in the purchase of foreign currencies? Have they, in fact, any cure which is not worse than the disease?

These are fair questions which I put to hon. members in the Liberal group. If we are to have an eight-day debate let it be a debate. Let us know where each party stands; let us get to grips with reality; let us thresh out the issues and the principles which are before us.

This amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River gives us no clues concerning Liberal policies. All it does is condemn; it does not assert. It is a warmed over version of the various amendments already proposed by the Liberal party to the address and on supply motions. I say to the hon. gentleman that the repetition of inaccurate assumptions—and that is all this amendment achieves—does not make them any more accurate or more palatable. I think I should add at once that the sophistical and unrealistic subamendment assuredly does not improve the amendment. In fact, I was thinking as I read through the text that both the amendment and the subamendment had obviously been drafted by experts, and I use the term "expert" in the sense in which Nicholas Murray Butler defined it, as one who knows more and more about less and less.

I do not propose at this time to spend any time replying to the speech of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier). That speech reminded me simply of one which Disraeli characterized as "the hare-brained chatter of irresponsible frivolity". The hon. gentleman succeeded only in demonstrating one thing, the validity of the epigram of Viscount Hailsham: "The Left can never be Right". If the hon. gentleman is the spokesman of the so-called new and unnamed party of the left, its future might well be that described by a United States congressman who, speaking of another party, said it was "like a mule, without pride of ancestry or hope of posterity".

Mr. Argue: How old is that one? Why not say what you think instead of quoting the views of other people?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. member will hear plenty—

Mr. Argue: Not from you.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): May I say to the hon. member that nothing becomes him so much as silence, and I hope he will observe it for a little while.

Let me deal with some of the matters which have been raised by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. In his anxiety to score debating points he fell into many grave errors this afternoon. Last Thursday night, and indeed again this afternoon he alleged that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) had forecast for the last fiscal year an increase in the gross national product of 7 per cent, and in an imaginary horror he exclaimed that it was only 6 per cent. Let us test the validity of all his strictures by this one. What he forgot to tell the house was that the dominion bureau of statistics, after the last budget, revised upward the 1958 preliminary figure of gross national product, thereby involving a shift in the percentage by which 1959 could exceed it. What the Minister of Finance said in his budget speech of April 9, 1959—and I quote from Hansard at page 2409—was this:

> I shall be basing my budgetary policy and my revenue forecasts on a gross national product of about $34½ billion which is about 7 per cent above the average level achieved in 1958.

In other words the forecast was a dollar amount of $34½ billion. What is the actual figure for 1959? It is $34,593 million, or $93 million more than the forecast figure. I ask this. Has the house ever seen closer estimating in respect of figures so astronomical? The margin of error is fantastically small.

Why, then, this talk of 6 per cent as opposed to 7 per cent? When the Minister of Finance brought down his budget on April 9, 1959 the preliminary estimate of the 1958 gross national product was $32,184 million. On this figure the forecast 1959 gross national product of $34½ billion represented an increase of approximately 7 per cent. Later in 1959, the dominion bureau of statistics, on the basis of later information, adjusted the 1958 figure upwards from $32,184 million to $32,606 million, on which of course the percentage relationship was slightly less.

What my hon. friend failed to do was to compare the comparable. If you compare the preliminary 1958 figure of $32,184 million with the preliminary 1959 figure of $34,593 million you will find a 7.48 per cent increase.

This increase compares with the post-war average increase of about 4 per cent. In other words, our rate of growth in 1959 was almost double the average of other years since 1945, and this despite the fact that our rate of expansion was subject to a temporary but very significant pause in the third quarter of 1959, due to the effects of some major labour disputes. These are the real facts. But, in one of his scattered jibes on this subject, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River claimed that the Minister of Finance was 50 per cent wrong and he repeated that this afternoon.

Mr. Benidickson: In volume.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): My hon. friend was not 50 per cent wrong. He was 100 per cent wrong in this as in so many other subjects that he discussed.

For his forecast of the gross national product, his forecast of the budget deficit and other estimates, when compared with the actual, the Minister of Finance certainly need offer no apology. On the contrary, I believe he can proudly assert the smallest margins of error that there have been in history. Let hon. gentlemen opposite produce examples of any budget of recent Liberal ministers of finance where the forecast was so closely vindicated by actual performance, where the margin of error was less. All of us remember when time after time that very distinguished minister of finance, now Mr. Justice Abbott, would be $300 million and $400 million out in his forecast of budgetary balances. That was budgeting in those days by accident.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River attempted to find something sinister in the technique of dealing with the old age security fund. The Minister of Finance has loaned that fund $24 million, which amount will be repaid out of an anticipated $30 million surplus this year. Oh, said my hon. and genial friend from Kenora-Rainy River, if you had not done this your deficit would be $24 million greater. He cannot have it both ways although he tried to do just that very often this afternoon; he tried to have things both ways many times. Suppose he was right in the assertion which he makes; then, the inevitable concomitant would be that next year's surplus would be $30 million larger than that which has been forecast.

On many occasions this afternoon my hon. friend seemed to take great pleasure in playing with bookkeeping items. With great respect I would suggest to him that this hair-splitting brand of dialectics profits us not at all, and that he really should leave these tactics to his colleague on the front bench who is an expert therein, namely the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith).

We heard some things this afternoon about unemployment. Not for a moment do I discount the individual problems which are involved. I could not do so, since it perhaps falls to my unfortunate lot to interview more persons seeking employment than perhaps any other hon. member of this house. But in their preachments of gloom, in their wallowings in pessimism these Jeremiahs opposite fail to tell us the whole story. It can be found in the white paper. There are more persons employed at better wages than at any time in our history. Total employment rose by 156,000 persons between 1958 and 1959. Labour income reached a record level of $17.7 billion, almost 8 per cent above 1958. Since consumer prices roses only about 1 per cent, there was a substantial gain in real income.

A few weeks ago the Leader of the Opposition made a very realistic and I thought a surprisingly objective appraisal of some of the causes of unemployment and I think his example might be followed by some of his colleagues on the front bench opposite, particularly the hon. member for Essex East.

In all his declamatory rhetoric this afternoon, in his jibes the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River totally ignored the very substantial fiscal accomplishments of this government, the very genuine advances in fiscal and tax policy. I want to take a few moments to discuss ten of those highlights, adding the caution that this review and listing are not, of course, intended to be exhaustive or exclusive.

First, and at the top of my list, I put the successful financing of the greatest increases in social justice payments ever made in any period. What are the facts? Direct payments to individual Canadians by the federal government for social justice account have increased more than 50 per cent over the last year of Liberal government and that tremendous dollar increase has had to be financed from revenue.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is all nonsense.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): My hon. friend could find out if this is so by examining the record.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will you allow me to deal with that now?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that is so. If he would only allow his statistical genius to have full sway he would discover the exact figures.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would my hon. friend permit me to point out that whatever benefits there are—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They do not like the truth.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): My time is limited. My hon. friend's skill in building up men of straw is exceeded only by his volubility and ability to create diversionary tactics. I do not intend to be diverted in this way.

In the last year of Liberal administration old age security payments were $379 million; last year they were $574 million, an increase of about 52 per cent, and this is the story generally across the board.

Second, the fiscal policy of the government provided the incentive for recovery from the recession. In June of 1957 Canada was tottering on the verge of a depression. Had we not reversed some of the policies of our predecessors, recession would have become all-out depression. The reductions in taxes in 1957 and 1958, together with the introduction of many hundreds of million of dollars into housing, transportation and resources development, were designed to augment investment, to stimulate recovery and to provide employment. These policies succeeded.

Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have forgotten that housing in Canada was coming to a virtual standstill when this government took office. It was the tremendous stimulus given the industry under the imaginative direction of the then minister of public works, now the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green), that saved the day. The flexible and adjustable fiscal policies adopted by this government enabled the country to emerge from recession into recovery and renewed growth, and in the last fiscal period to experience an expansion of major magnitude as well as soundness.

Third, and in due course, has been the achievement of a balanced budget in the forthcoming fiscal year. For sound reasons the Minister of Finance deliberately budgeted for a substantial deficit in 1958 and for a reduced deficit in 1959. Two years ago we were meeting the problems, as I have said, of a recession and were seeking to use fiscal measures to offset the decline in business activity and to stimulate recovery. In 1960 our position is different. Deliberately, in this period of expansion, the government has brought the budget into a surplus position, a position where the federal government ceases to be a net borrower, thus leaving the capital market free to the extent of some $700 million to the provinces and the municipalities and to business and industry. Let no one think that this has been easily attained. Without the determination, the persistence and the tenacity of the Minister of Finance it could not have been accomplished. This balanced 1960 budget is a personal tribute to the hon. member for Eglinton.

The fourth major accomplishment of the government has been the achievement of relative price stability. No one can ever assert in a dynamic society the conquest of inflation. But we have accomplished an avoidance of disturbing fluctuations upwards or downwards in the general level of prices. In the last fiscal year of Liberal government the consumer price index rose 4.1 per cent. The first broken year of Liberal and Conservative government shows an increase of slightly less. Since that time, in two years the price index has risen 2.9 per cent or an average increase of less than 1.5 per cent a year. I say that ceaseless, unremitting vigilance to control inflationary pressures is essential to our progress, as the Minister of Finance so eloquently mentioned in his budget speech the other night.

Then I come to the fifth matter, the effective management of our public debt. On this matter an uncommon lot of nonsense has been talked, none more so than about the conversion loan, and we heard some of it this afternoon. This was the greatest financial operation in Canada's economic history. It was a major anti-inflationary step, it removed a heavy pressure on the bond market and it nearly doubled the average length of our debt.

Suppose there had been no conversion loan. What would have been the pressures upon the capital market with this heavy debt maturing? If such pressures had been added to the pressures which actually did develop in 1959, the result might well have been chaos. History, I believe, will prove that the conversion loan of 1958 has been one of the most farsighted acts of financial statesmanship ever undertaken.

Last Thursday evening and again this afternoon the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River engaged in some agile dialectics about the net debt. How it has risen, he exclaims. But he really did not tell the whole story in connection with it. It is true, of course, that our total net debt has risen but so has our ability to pay. The fact is that our per capita debt today is $681 as opposed to $849 in 1950 or $701 in 1956, the last full year of Liberal administration. Was the hon. gentleman heard in protest in those earlier years about the size of our per capita debt?

Equally, what is not clear from what he said this afternoon is that our net debt as a percentage of the gross national product has declined. Back in 1950, in the heyday of Doug. Abbott, our net debt was 71 per cent of our gross national product. When the Liberals went out of power it was 36 per cent. Today it is 34.9 per cent, a lower figure than in any previous year except 1958. The best evidence of effective debt management is, first, that public holdings of dominion of Canada bonds are at the highest level in the last 10 years and, second, that public subscriptions for the last Canada savings bonds were the highest ever. The public of Canada, with their dollars, have voted for the debt management policy of the government.

Mr. Pickersgill: And the high interest rates.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): My sixth point is the question of dominion-provincial relations. There have been many things said by way of criticism but overlooked were the most significant and revealing facts. The first is that in the last full year of Liberal government total payments of all kinds to the provinces were $689.4 million. In this fiscal year they will be $1,300.9 million. That is an increase of $611.5 million or about 88 per cent.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): My time is very limited, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then the hon. gentleman will not.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Actually unconditional payments have increased by 57 per cent and conditional payments by about 250 per cent.

Mr. Pickersgill: Most of it Liberal legislation.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pickersgill: That was the question I was going to ask the hon. gentleman. Tell the truth.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): When the hon. gentleman interrupts like that it reminds me of what Bacon once said, that universities incline wits to sophistry and affectation, and if there ever could be proof of that it is found in the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is in the hon. member's speech.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the Atlantic adjustment grants have been a major contribution of the government. The settlement of the university grants issue with the province of Quebec on a mutually satisfactory basis is a magnificent contribution to national unity. It is one for which credit must go to our Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), to the Minister of Finance, to the late premier and the present premier of the province of Quebec. What an act of constructive statesmanship. Let us give credit where it is due. And have hon. gentlemen opposite forgotten the 50 per cent increase in the amount of the grants? Let them give credit for that.

Mr. Pickersgill: Who started them?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The seventh major contribution of the government is its effective tariff policy. Attempts of a rather childish nature are made to claim that this government is a high protectionist government and has departed from the principles of multilateral trading. Since the government came to power there has been a firm adherence to the principles of the GATT. Indeed, what we have tried to do is to give leadership in GATT, not just pay lip service to it as our predecessors did. We have tried, with success, to use GATT as an instrument in the removal of restrictive trade practices, and this we must continue.

Let those who criticize our tariff policy assess the success of the negotiations regarding fruits and vegetables and textiles. Let our Liberal friends tell us during this debate if they would have ignored the tariff board report on fruits and vegetables. If not, will they not admit our genuine success in concluding these delicate negotiations with the United States? No constituency will profit more by that than the constituency of the hon. member for Essex East.

Before this debate is finished we shall probably hear much on textiles. That the Liberal party will seek to face both ways, I have no doubt. But this house knows and the country knows that the Liberal party wholly ignored the plight of the textile industry. It sold the industry down the river and it has not relented—

Mr. Chevrier: What are you doing now?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): —in its callous disregard of a great national industry, one of the largest employers of labour. When the Leader of the Opposition speaks in this debate let him tell us whether he would have accepted or rejected the tariff board reports on textiles. That is a specific and direct question that I put to him, and it should have a direct answer.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When do you want the answer?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): When the hon. gentleman speaks. He will have plenty of time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend does not want an answer.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I had not discovered that the hon. gentleman had taken over the role of the Leader of the Opposition. I know he has been most un-co-operative with the Leader of the Opposition and has been trying to take it over but I had not realized that he had succeeded.

Mr. Benidickson: That is not true.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The amendments to the Customs Act which were so bitterly fought by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) and others have been a significant contribution to orderly trade. When he speaks perhaps the Leader of the Opposition would tell us directly whether the Liberal party would repeal them, amend them or retain them.

Coupled with this is my eighth point, namely effective leadership in commonwealth trade policy.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my time is limited and I do not feel that I can accept questions.

Mr. Chevrier: Before the hon. gentleman leaves his point about textiles would he permit me to ask a question?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Normally I am most happy to answer questions, but my time is exceedingly limited and I am endeavouring to cover a very broad field.

In this area there is a significant difference between hon. gentlemen opposite and this government. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not really believe in commonwealth trade though they give lip service to it. We do believe in it and we do not apologize for this belief. As a direct result of the commonwealth trade conference, sterling and other European currencies have become convertible, a major advance, and the great majority of discriminatory restrictions against dollar imports have been eliminated.

What are the other results? Our contribution to the Colombo plan in southeast Asia was raised 50 per cent. For the first time we sponsored aid programs for the British West Indies and for Africa. This technical and other assistance was and is an act of enlightened leadership. I will admit that these are not the last word in aid to underdeveloped countries. Indeed we are probably but on the threshold. So long as people anywhere in the world are hungry this wealthy nation cannot be complacent. Well may it be that in this field will lie our greatest contribution to peace and the democratic way of life.

From the conference, as well, flowed the establishment of the commonwealth scholarship plan, a plan which in my view may prove ultimately to be a major beacon light of the 1950's.

I come to my ninth point, the major tax revisions. The replacement of the old dominion succession duty by the new Estate Tax Act was a major advance in tax legislation. But there have been other detailed and significant revisions of our tax structure. Take for example the new provision for a tax free gift of $10,000 between spouses respecting a jointly owned home, or in the case of a farm, between parent and child; the reduced sales tax on a wide range of municipal purchases; the inclusion of drugs, eyeglasses and many other categories in medical exemptions, as well as the raising of the exemption limits in this budget; the reduction in automobile excise tax; the very many tax reforms introduced, including in this budget two very significant proposals, first the relief from the impact of double taxation on pension benefits and, secondly, a new technique of tax deferment on profit sharing plans. Let it not be forgotten that for the lower and middle income groups income tax rates are lower than when this government was elected. The tax position of small corporations has also been greatly improved.

As my tenth point I wish to say a word about civil service matters. Controversy has obscured some of the major facts. Let me set the record straight. It was this government which put into effect the last civil service increase and which had to raise the funds for it. It was this government which proved itself the true friend of all civil servants by managing a change of government with the least upset of any change in Canadian history. There were literally no dismissals. Contrast that with the parade of firings which occurred when the Liberals came into power in 1935. What a scandalous and unconscionable display of political patronage occurred at that time including what Pierre Casgrain did in this very House of Commons, which was the worst of all.

It was this government which in its first year of office provided increases for superannuated civil servants, something which the former government for 10 years refused to do. It is this government which last session fully revised and improved the Defence Service Pension Act, the R.C.M.P. pension provisions and which at this session of parliament proposes a revision of the Public Service Superannuation Act. It is this government which after Easter will introduce a complete revision and modernization of the Civil Service Act itself, to bring it up to date and to improve and assure for all time the true practice of the merit system.

It is this government which established the pay research bureau which the previous government had declined to do. It was established so that the pay data could be assembled on a scientific basis. This is the atmosphere in which the government at the first feasible opportunity had decided upon a class to class system of pay increases with increases for 50,000 civil servants effective at once and the balance before the end of summer. Oh, yes, I have neglected to mention the medical-surgical plan, one of the major advances in civil service matters.

Representing as I do more civil servants than perhaps any other hon. member of this house I am not unaware of the disappointment which existed at the decision not to approve a general pay increase last autumn. But I am satisfied that a class by class approach will enure in the very near future much more to the benefit of the average civil servant than a horizontal increase. We have seen how horizontal increases in freight rates have merely accentuated the existing discriminations. Continuous horizontal increases in salary perpetuate and intensify discriminations as between classes and help the high ranking civil servants to the detriment of the lower paid. That is why I believe this continuous class by class approach will prove much more effective and much more beneficial to those I represent than would a single horizontal increase. Under this approach, with the pay research bureau in action, review of salaries will be more regular, less discriminatory and more in the interests of the average civil servant. To my civil service friends in Carleton who have maintained a responsible and dignified attitude throughout this salary controversy I say—"give this new approach a real trial these next few months. I do not believe you will be disappointed."

I have taken the time to mention but 10 of the major accomplishments of a fiscal nature of this government but there are many others. If time permitted me to do so I would go on to enumerate them. I say, however, that this is a proud record of fiscal accomplishment. The Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) may justifiably take genuine satisfaction in the economic leadership they have given this country. The promotion of confidence in Canada's economic future, the encouragement and continuation of our unprecedented economic expansion, a continued assault upon inflation, the maintenance of a sound dollar, the relief of the capital market thereby easing credit; these have been major objectives of this budget. These objectives have been achieved in the budget for 1960, I believe. In my opinion, in their accomplishment the Minister of Finance has earned the gratitude of the house and the country.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. gentleman resumes his seat would he permit me a question.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I already have, but if I can improve the hon. gentleman's knowledge I will endeavour to answer his question.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the hon. member if he is aware that in his speech he made the same misleading statement about payments to the provinces that the Prime Minister made on television and that has been corrected more than once in this house?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that statement which I made is entirely accurate. It was accurate when previously made and it is accurate now and can be proved by an examination of the white paper.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support the amendment introduced earlier this afternoon by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) I wish to say at the outset that I will deal with the main points referred to in the amendment together with the position of the government in relation to the civil servants of this country. I will leave to others the task of replying to the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) who just made another of those "What would you do?" speeches which we hear so frequently from hon. members opposite. It is a clear indication that the government still seeks advice from the opposition.

The hon. gentleman reminded me of an auctioneer in the approach he adopted. He could easily have said, "$12 million once, $12 million twice, $12 million three times, gone". That is just about what will happen to the meagre surplus which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) introduced in his budget, a surplus of which the hon. member for Carleton and other hon. members opposite are so proud, one which may be attained at the expense of the civil servants of this country including those residing in the constituency of the hon. member for Carleton. It was on March 27, 1956 that an hon. member of this house is reported, as can be found at page 2647 of Hansard of that day, to have said as follows:

Well, sir, it is in no personal sense that I must say to the Minister of Finance, in referring to the budget effort on this occasion, that it was unquestionably the worst failure in Canadian history within living memory. In kitchen terms this budget is as dull as dishwater, and it fell as flat as a pancake.

Further on he said this:

Indeed, sir, if this represents the government's idea of a budget it might just as well have been dispensed with entirely.

Those were the words of the hon. member for Eglinton when sitting on the opposition side of the house. I could not resist repeating those same words today because at no time in Canadian history has a budget been introduced which did so little, offered so little and meant so little to the people of this country. It was indeed a "doing nothing" or a "doing just the same as last year" budget.

This is a case in which someone should have called out "dispense" because by avoiding the reading of this budget the Minister of Finance would have been saved from exposing once again the lack of leadership, the lack of policy and, indeed, the evidence of contradiction which has been so outstanding a feature with the government since it took office in June of 1957.

I know that for over one and a half hours on Thursday evening last the government members, the colleagues of the minister, 44 times burst into desk-thumping applause, notwithstanding the stand-pat aspect of the presentation. It would have been advisable for those hon. members to have reserved their enthusiasm, at least when the minister announced the meagre $15 million increase for one-third of the civil service force of this country.

In his hold the line policy announcement when he flatly refused to grant any general salary increase early last fall the Minister of Finance, in an inept and arrogant way, stated that such an increase would seriously upset the budget. In other words, the civil servants of this country were nothing else but the victims of the unrestrained extravagances of the present government. How could they upset a budget which was already badly disrupted? Now, six months later, the same minister comes back with what is being called too little and too late. The applause from government members—which provoked an ear to ear grin on the normally solemn face of the Minister of Finance—could well have been avoided when the minister referred to the degrees of disparity between civil service salary rates and those of private employers and ended up by selecting one third only of the civil service force for nonretroactive increases in salary.

What about the remaining two thirds of the civil service force? What about the armed forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police? In his budget speech the minister took great care to say that a review of all other classes in the public service will be carried out by the civil service commission forthwith and that it is expected to be completed before the end of the summer. What he did not say is that he already has in hand a complete report, an exhaustive study, prepared by the civil service commission and presented to him early in 1959. Not only did he refuse to act on the recommendations of the commission but he even refused to make this report public as requested by opposition members in this house.

In a post-budget press interview, the minister allowed himself to be understood to mean that there was a clear obligation in the budget speech to cover the salary levels of the rest of the civil service by the end of the summer. What is the Minister of Finance waiting for? As I have just said, he has on hand a recent civil service commission report on salaries and he is now attempting to cover up once more by delaying tactics which are uncalled for and unacceptable as the procedure is considered to be far too slow to keep up with changing conditions since the last increase was granted in 1957.

I want to make it clear that once again the civil servants are being victimized by the delaying tactics of the Minister of Finance and that the two thirds of the force not included in the present increase are being used to cover up so that it might be possible for the minister to be in a position to announce a balanced budget.

What a contradiction we find there. The minister could just as well have said: taking into consideration the degrees of disparity between civil service salary rates and those of private employers, the treasury board has now approved recommendations from the civil service commission involving the employees of the public service. In saying this, however, the minister would have had to say further: this will involve an increase in expenditure of about $45 million or maybe $50 million during the present fiscal year. But no, the minister could not do this, because he would have missed his meagre surplus of $12 million. He would have missed the desk-thumping applause of his supporters in the house. He would have ended up with a deficit of $25 million or $30 million.

How inconsistent can the minister be when within minutes of the presentation of his budget in a post-budget press conference he makes it rather clear that there was almost no possibility of stopping before the full civil service force was considered by the treasury board on a class by class basis. If this is so, why does the minister refuse to admit now that the 1960-61 fiscal year, as we all well know, will show the fourth consecutive deficit of the present Conservative administration?

In dealing with the civil service increase the minister has been very open to say that there was no leak. In a post-budget press conference he is reported in the Ottawa Journal of April 1 as follows:

"I'll say quite flatly there was no leak" in the federal budget, Finance Minister Fleming told reporters at a post-budget conference last night.

I have here in front of me the Ottawa Journal for March 3. Under the heading "Fleming Replies to C.S." we find the following:

Civil service leaders were pondering the phrase "subject under continuing study"; was it just polite and non-committal acknowledgement of their renewed salaries plea or was it an indication that the government was actually considering a salary adjustment?

Later on the article states:

Replying today, Mr. Fleming wrote that the case the committee had made in its new submission was "largely a reiteration of previous arguments".

And further:

As to any commitments out of a budget priority for salaries, Mr. Fleming reminded the committee that comment on this subject "at this time"—

"At this time" were the minister's own words.

—with the budget under preparation—would be "improper".

Then he concluded his letter with the assurance the salaries question was "a subject under continuing study".

A few weeks later, on March 25, this same newspaper, namely the Ottawa Journal, in an article under the heading "New C.S. Pay Approach to Fleming", reported as follows:

In its announcement of plans for the new approach to the finance minister, the committee dropped a few hints of the points it would try to make with Mr. Fleming.

They included:

1. The finance minister's own "quite emphatic" statement on the last committee interview in October that his hold the line policy on government salaries "was intended for the 1959-60 fiscal year only;—

If this is not enough to let anyone believe that an increase was coming in the present budget, I do not know how it could be otherwise interpreted. It may be well and good for the minister to huddle together a series of wild guesses and figures which, for the time being at least, may temper down the disappointments and frustrations of his fellow members.

Let us look at the facts. Does the present budget come to grips with the economic problems facing the country today? This is a government which is well known for its promises. It has been a government which has committed itself to defeating the problem of unemployment. "We are defeating the problem", said the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) at Prince Albert on February 14, 1958. At Cornwall ten days later on February 24, the Prime Minister said, "We have acted; we are meeting unemployment. We have given our young Canadians hope. We have given them the vision".

Our young Canadians, as I said before in this house, cannot live on hope and vision alone; they want work and employment. Our unemployed as they stand today deserve better consideration from the government than they are receiving from the present budget.

What were the words of the Minister of Finance in the presentation of his budget when he referred to unemployment? As reported on page 2670 of Hansard, he said:

I am confident, however, that employment will rise as the coming of spring opens up new job opportunities and as the economy continues its upward trend.

Here again is the minister hoping to be saved once more by luck, if ever luck comes his way.

Can we imagine the argument used by the minister when he said that as a result of an unusual increase in the number of persons estimated to be in the labour force, the estimate of the number without jobs and seeking work was 18,000 higher than a year ago? What would this increase in unemployment be today if the immigration influx into this country would have followed its normal course? The coming of spring, not government policy, will open new job opportunities, says the minister. This, at last, is a frank admission by the Minister of Finance himself of the lack of policy, lack of leadership, lack of planning by the present government. As our leader stated the other day in a "Nation's Business" broadcast, this government hopes that unemployment will go with the snow. It had better start moving fast, because the snow is pretty well gone, especially in the vicinity of Ottawa, but the number of unemployed is still rising. In fact, there were 814,241 live claims for unemployment insurance benefits as of February 29, and 827,512 unplaced applicants as of March 10 of this year. And while the economy continues its upward trend, according to the minister, the number of unemployed is increasing day by day and the government is hoping for spring to rush its course and come to its rescue. More sun, more rain, more mild weather, less snow, more jobs, hopes the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance has refused to recognize the urgent need to give direction to the economy of this country. His attitude is typical of the present government's complacency; it is based on hope, on the hope that everything will come out right in the end. The gross national product, says the minister, will again increase by 6 per cent and on this assumption he believes that the unemployment problem will adjust itself accordingly. He seems to forget, however, that notwithstanding a 6 per cent increase in 1959 the number of unemployed at mid-February of this year had reached 8.9 per cent of the labour force against 8.8 per cent at the same date last year. It has adjusted itself, but in reverse. The snow is going down but unemployment is still going up.

This government refuses to meet the challenge of unemployment and chooses to stand pat on the tired assumption that everything will come right some day. It is a government without leadership, without definite policy. It is a government which in less than three years of office has already lost the overwhelming confidence with which it had been entrusted by the electors of this country. Here again let us listen to the minister. As reported on page 2670 of Hansard, he said:

> The past year was notable for a welcome absence of speculative excesses in production, demand and inventories. I stress this because often in the past such excesses have provided a major cause of recession.

In other words, is the minister taking satisfaction in the fact that the 1958 and 1959 crop years were so much below the previous recent years that excesses or surpluses of inventories in wheat and other grains have been cut down? Is he taking satisfaction from the fact that the 1959 net income of farm operators is estimated at 7 per cent below the previous year's level? Is he welcoming the fact that as at December 31, 1959 storage holdings of fish products were over 63 million pounds as compared with holdings of 56 million pounds on December 31, 1958 and 52 million pounds on December 31, 1957? I sincerely hope that the minister is not welcoming the excess in the inventory of unemployed, which under the present administration has reached records unequalled in this country since the hungry thirties.

At the present rate of unemployment the Minister of Finance will soon be called upon to supply additional funds to the Department of Labour to secure or replenish the unemployment insurance fund, which since this government took office has been depleted by over $504 million. At the present rate of decline the entire fund will be practically exhausted, wiped out, by March 31, 1962.

The sum of $383 million standing to the credit of the unemployment insurance fund as at March 31 is a figure to be concerned about. We are asking now, what does the government expect to do about this? Does it expect to save the situation by this discriminating position it has adopted toward the family employment or toward its unjust and unwarranted treatment in its determination of the insurability of relatives? Does it expect to save this fund by attempting to destroy this family relationship and family unity which is traditional among our French Canadian and French Acadian large families? Some of the recent decisions of the unemployment insurance commission in this regard are nothing else but unfortunate attempts to undermine this family unity and good understanding.

Very little was said in the present budget having to do with the records of the present administration. The records I have in mind are not the kind of records which one should be too proud of and which could draw the applause of hon. members opposite. A record debt increase of over $1 billion in two years is nothing to boast about on the part of a government who has committed itself to cut all unnecessary expenses and extravagances.

A record balance of payment trade deficit of $1,460 million in one year is other evidence of the failure to keep up with the Prime Minister's statement made at Brantford on February 17, 1958 when he said that the Conservative government's success in its trade promotion cannot be challenged. The 1959 record of the government shows success in reverse.

What about this other record where the government refuses to take any responsibility? Where is the mention in this budget about this crippling tight money and high interest rates? It is true that the minister has stated, as reported on page 2670, that in the financial sector 1959 was marked by some disturbances which, he says, subsided by the end of the year. What about interest rates on mortgage loans, which again have reached an all time high and have been crippling home construction in the last few months? It is true that the rate of interest of the Bank of Canada has declined somewhat. Does the government intend to take credit for that? If it does, are hon. gentlemen opposite going to take credit for the interest charged to municipalities or for interest rates charged on mortgages? When things are good, the government is responsible, but when things are going wrong, the government has nothing to do with it.

I would ask the minister: what is there for municipalities in this budget? The minister has ignored the plight of the municipalities in this country. I ask him, how can he justify the statement he made at St. Hyacinthe on February 23, 1958, when he said:

> We have eased the burdens of the municipal governments by bringing about easier credit and lower interest rates?

How can the minister justify the statement he made at Montmagny on September 28, 1958 when he said that the provinces and municipalities in their financial operations will derive much benefits from the conversion operation? The facts are here to show how far from the truth the minister could be in his assertions. Was it not the Prime Minister who said in Saskatoon, on May 27, 1957:

> The Conservative government, if elected, would remove the crushing burden of municipal taxes.

Was it not the Prime Minister who said on May 20, 1957:

> The tight money policy has struck a death blow to small business. They are going into bankruptcy at the fastest rate since depression; and municipalities have their back to the wall, forced to borrow money in the United States at high interest rates.

I would ask the Prime Minister these questions: when have bankruptcy rates been higher than in the last two years? When have municipal interest rates been higher than in the last two years? When have municipal taxes been higher than in the last two years? When have interest rates on borrowings for home building been higher than at the present time? When, finally, has a federal government done so little and accomplished so little in facing a problem which, according to the Prime Minister's own admission, was stultifying every part, every section of Canada.

Moreover, what is there in this budget to provide for the $100 million additional requested by Premier Frost of Ontario, a sum which we know the Minister of Finance will be asked to produce at the July federal-provincial conference on fiscal matters? What is there in this budget to provide for additional assistance which will be requested by Premier Roblin of Manitoba, when he will insist that Ottawa change its stand toward the provinces.

What is there in this stand-pat budget for the Atlantic provinces? What is there to indicate any measure of relief for the people of the maritimes who need, not restrictions but more credit and monetary expansion? What is there in the present budget which could even lead to an incentive to accelerate business in that particular area and bring about speedier maximum use of its natural wealth, thereby raising the standard of prosperity in that part of Canada?

Have the Atlantic provinces been forgotten because someone has dared call this budget a "no-tax budget"? What a fallacy. How can one be so blind as not to realize that the Minister of Finance expects the present tax structure to yield $5,892 million, an increase of $591 million over and above the year before, and more than $1,120 million over and above the fiscal year 1958-59? In other words, the taxpayers of this country will be contributing to the federal treasury over $1 billion more than they were two years ago; over $3 million a day more than they were two years ago. Yet the present government, with all this extra cash at its disposal, cannot find one simple measure which could contribute to narrowing the gap which exists in the income of the people of the Atlantic provinces compared with those of other Canadians.

This, stand-pat, do-nothing budget offers absolutely nothing which could influence the establishment of secondary industries in the Atlantic provinces. The disability of the Atlantic provinces with regard to transportation remains as the main problem, the major obstruction which must be removed if our area is to share equally in the progress and prosperity which in the last decade or so have been so prevalent in other parts of the country. We have a right to know what this government intends to do about the various suggestions which we from time to time have offered in order to stimulate industry in the Atlantic provinces. What does the government intend to do about the idea of a capital grants program and the fiscal incentives which have been suggested both inside and outside this house for some time? Urgent consideration should be given to these proposals. Meanwhile, a solution to our transportation problems, or even the improvement of our transportation system could contribute to stimulating the growth of our secondary industry.

Might I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask when you would find it convenient, Mr. Speaker, to hear a submission with respect to the amendment? I think I am bound to take the view that it is not in order.

Mr. Speaker: I think that might be done at the conclusion of the speech of the hon. member who now has the floor. That would be shortly after eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Robichaud: When the house took recess at six o'clock I was referring to the numerous suggestions which had been made from this side of the house to stimulate industry in the Atlantic provinces. I was saying that urgent consideration should be given to our proposals affecting the Atlantic provinces which, if implemented, would contribute to stimulating the growth of our secondary industry.

I deplore the fact that the present budget fails to recognize the plea of the Atlantic provinces. I deplore the fact also that when suggestions are made which could contribute toward raising the level of our economic activity, someone should come right out in the open and launch a controversy which has the effect of spilling cold water on the projects involved. Such controversial statements as have originated recently from Halifax, Charlottetown and Fredericton, involving the Chignecto canal and the Prince Edward Island causeway are most unwarranted and unworthy of anyone having at heart the task—and it should be a national task—of applying national policies for the common good and welfare of all Canadians.

Instead of amending the Excise Tax Act to remove sales tax on electric heating equipment to make it more competitive with maritime coal; instead of including the sales tax on materials used in the construction of ships over ten tons net registered tonnage, the minister could well have listened more favourably to the representations of the fisheries council of Canada on behalf of the fishing industry. The minor exemptions asked for by the fisheries council would have had very little effect on the over-all position of the present budget, but would have been of some assistance to the industry and to a large number of individual fishermen.

Not one single new measure has been introduced by the present government to help the fishing industry which is so vital to the economy of the maritimes. Canada cannot afford to allow the Atlantic fisheries to glide along as if it was to be abandoned to its own fate. There is an urgent need for a definite national plan and policy for the development of our Atlantic fisheries, and wide-scale government attention should be directed to the field of production. The present system of subsidies on the construction of vessels of the dragger and long-liner type is antiquated, outmoded and does not serve any more the purpose for which it was introduced.

Competition in the marketing of our fisheries products is getting keener and stiffer from year to year and this competition originates in countries which are exploiting our own fishing areas along our Atlantic coast. Our fishermen need protection to safeguard their rights and to maintain their source of production. Our fishing industry needs protection to compete favourably with European countries in the traditional markets, and more so when we know that these European nations are subsidizing their own fishing industry. I intend to say more on this aspect of the fishing industry when the estimates of the Department of Fisheries are before this house for discussion.

Notwithstanding the admission by the present government that this country is now out of the recession and experiencing a period of boom, no one can deny that the serious unemployment situation, which is more evident since this government took office than at any time in Canadian history, is causing grave concern and disquietude among the labour class of our country.

The 820,000 unemployed want an explanation from the Prime Minister. They want to hear more about his promise to take the necessary steps to ease unemployment in addition to his billion dollar public works plan. They want to remind the Prime Minister today of his pledge to every man and woman in this nation who is unemployed, "So long as I am Prime Minister no one will be allowed to suffer in this nation." Was he then the leader of the Conservative party attempting to stultify the people of Canada in making such statements, just as he is trying to fool them today in his "Nation's Business" television appearances?

The Minister of Finance should tell us why in this period of high unemployment approved and urgent public works projects have been shelved and put aside for future consideration. Is this policy in line with the Prime Minister's promise that:

> As long as I am Prime Minister, no man or woman is going to suffer from unemployment so long as public works will provide them the assistance they require.

Why delay—as is being done in my own constituency of Gloucester—the construction of public wharves which will provide facilities for fishermen, increase their production and supply additional shore help? Why cut down this year's public works projects by the amount of $31 million? In the harbour and engineering branch alone Nova Scotia is cut down by $2.5 million and New Brunswick by almost $3 million. The construction of a number of projects is economically justified. It would raise the economic level of many fishing communities and, as I have just said, it would increase production and provide additional shore help, thus cutting down on unemployment.

The population of Gloucester county learned with interest a few weeks ago that Brunswick Mining and Smelting Corporation and Sogemines Limited have reached agreement in principle for bringing into production Brunswick's lead-zinc property in the Bathurst area. An initial operation of 2,000 tons of ore a day is good and welcome news for the people of New Brunswick and particularly for the population of Gloucester county. The unfortunate part of it is that those concentrates will be sold to a group of Belgian base metal smelters and again a primary product, a raw material, will be exported to be processed outside of this country. This is not what the people of New Brunswick expected when the mining discoveries of the Bathurst area made history in the mining world in 1952 and 1953. This is not what the Prime Minister promised at Campbellton, New Brunswick, as was referred to this afternoon by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River.

The least that could now be expected from the present government is the provision of adequate port facilities to allow shipments of the concentrates from the port of Bathurst at a distance of fewer than 20 miles from Brunswick's deposits. Such facilities would involve the construction of a spur line from the mine to Bathurst harbour, together with adequate loading accommodation and proper deep water channels to allow easy access for ocean-going ships. Such facilities must not be delayed indefinitely, and if Brunswick's mine is going to operate, as we are assured it is, the government should take the necessary steps now to provide proper planning in order to avoid any possible delay which could in any way jeopardize operation.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the minister that the people of Canada are not being fooled by the additional medical expense deduction which he has offered. We all know that last year—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I tender you at this time my submission that the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) is not in order. An examination of the amendment itself will serve to emphasize the omnibus nature thereof. While it may be very inviting at times to tender omnibus amendments there are certain risks that are then taken, and in this particular case I think the hon. gentleman has taken risks that have the effect of making his amendment out of order.

May I draw your attention to the breadth of the subjects mentioned in the amendment.

> This house regrets that the financial policies of the government will produce a fourth consecutive over-all deficit in a year of "so-called prosperity", while at the same time offering no solution to the problem—

Here we have this succession of matters cited.

> —of rising prices, rising trade deficits, a continued high premium on the Canadian dollar, increased pressure on provinces and municipalities to borrow outside Canada, declining farm income, and high and rising unemployment.

There we have seven items mentioned. The rule, which I think is quite clear in this respect, is set forth in Beauchesne, fourth edition, page 126, citation 148. The first section reads as follows:

> It is a wholesome restraint upon members that they cannot revive a debate already concluded; and it would be little use in preventing the same question from being offered twice in the same session if, without being offered, its merits might be discussed again and again.

The second and third clauses of the citation serve to emphasize the strength of the rule, Mr. Speaker. I think it is the course of decision in the house that two principles have been firmly established in the interpretation of this rule. The first is that it is the substance and not the mere form of the motion, amendment or resolution to which the Speaker has regard in applying this rule. In the second place, if the motion, amendment or resolution offends this rule in part, then the entire motion, amendment or resolution is out of order.

In my submission, Mr. Speaker, while some of the matters enumerated in the omnibus amendment have not been decided by the house at the present session, there are at least several which have, and even one of these would be quite enough to make the amendment out of order having regard to this rule, for if it were possible to support an amendment because part of it had not previously been the subject of a decision of the house in the same session then it would be a simple matter to defeat the rule by simply adding matters which had not yet been the subject of decision.

May I recall to your mind the several decisions the house has made earlier in the present session in relation to some of the matters mentioned in the omnibus amendment. On January 18 the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) introduced the following amendment on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It is to be found on page 24 of Votes and Proceedings:

> This house is of the opinion that the failure of the government to develop and enunciate clear and consistent policies or to provide full and accurate information, is a major cause of the confusion and uncertainty that prevails about national defence, public finance, agriculture, markets, employment and in other important areas of governmental responsibility.

You will see, Mr. Speaker, that several of the matters mentioned in the omnibus amendment had already been introduced by way of an amendment that sought to condemn the government in the same sense as the present amendment seeks to condemn the government. The amendment to the amendment introduced on January 20 simply added certain words to that amendment. They are to be found at page 34 of the Votes and Proceedings of the session.

Then on February 22 an amendment was introduced on a motion to resolve the house into committee of supply. On this occasion the amendment was introduced by the same hon. gentleman, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. It is to be found at page 182 of Votes and Proceedings. It sought to strike out certain words and to substitute the following:

This house is of the opinion that the government should give immediate consideration to the implementation of agricultural policies designed for the purpose of stabilizing the prices of agricultural commodities in order to assist the industry of agriculture to realize fair returns for its labour and investment, and to maintain a fair relationship between prices received by farmers and the costs of the goods and services that they buy, thus to provide farmers with a fair share of the national income.

The amendment to the amendment moved the same day by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) purported to add certain words to that. In all of these cases the house resolved the question in the negative.

Again on March 21, on a motion to resolve the house into committee of supply, the Leader of the Opposition introduced an amendment that was intended to strike out certain words and substitute the following:

This house expresses its grave concern at the deterioration in Canada's trading position as emphasized by an unfavourable balance of nearly $1.5 billion in Canada's total trade in 1959, and urges the government to deal with this serious problem by taking effective action, including the working out of proposals for the establishment on a gradual and progressive basis of an Atlantic free trade area.

On the same day an amendment to the amendment was introduced by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) by which he sought to add certain words to the amendment in relation to trade contracts, export credit insurance, planned reduction of foreign investments in Canada so as to reduce the premium on our currency presently handicapping our export industry, greater economic aid to underdeveloped countries, and an expanded and intensified effort by the Department of Trade and Commerce to encourage orders for our goods in world markets.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask where that last one is found?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This last one is also to be found on page 296 of the Votes and Proceedings of the present session. It was an amendment to the amendment introduced on March 21.

I think it is quite clear, Mr. Speaker, from a reference to these amendments, all of which were negatived in the house and therefore are the subject of firm decision by the house at the present session, that a number of the matters included in the omnibus condemnation of the government in the present amendment have already been the subject of decisions by the house at the present session.

I mentioned the matter of the recent trade deficit. That clearly was the subject of the amendment on March 21. The premium on the Canadian dollar was the subject matter in part of the subamendment of March 21. Declining farm income was exhaustively dealt with by the amendment of February 22. High and rising unemployment was the subject matter in part of the amendment of January 18. Therefore I think it is quite clear that the amendment does offend the rule.

I emphasize again that it is the substance of the matter that counts and not mere form. I presume that hon. gentlemen opposite will say that you do not find the matter spelled out in exactly the same words in these earlier amendments which were the subjects of decisions of the house at the session. That is not necessary. That is not the rule. The rule is not so confined. It is the substance of the matter that counts and the fact is that the house has dealt in substance on these various occasions with four of the matters that are included in this omnibus amendment that has been submitted to the house this afternoon.

If it were open to hon. members to introduce amendments of this kind there would be no finality whatever to any decision of the house in a session. It would be relatively simple for any hon. member by exercising just a little bit of ingenuity and merely by changing a phrase or two to invite the house to debate the same matter over and over again.

I think with great respect that this is a situation that has been brought about by the hon. member including too many subjects in the scope of the amendment by which he seeks to condemn government policy.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member speaks may I indicate to him that I see a problem with respect to a couple of the items, as I perhaps indicated when the amendment was first presented. Since then I happened to have been looking at the previous motions which have been decided by the house and I find that there is substance to what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) says. I am particularly concerned about two of the items enumerated in the second part of the amendment, that is rising trade deficits which were the subject of supply motion No. 3 and declining farm income which was the subject of supply motion No. 1. Of course, if these items have been dealt with the whole amendment would fall apart unless the hon. member were prepared to withdraw the defective items.

I just mention that before the hon. member replies to the minister so that he will have that possibility in mind. Those two were the items which appeared to me to perhaps have been dealt with, although there is something to be said too about the question of the premium on the Canadian dollar having been discussed but I think that subject has not been dealt with so fully as the other two.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, following your remarks, I think perhaps at this stage it is possible to confine one's attention to the two subjects where you yourself said you have some thought that there may be a duplication of debate that is contrary to our rules.

I too, of course, have reviewed each of the motions to which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) has referred. I would suggest to Your Honour that the minister is perfectly correct when he says it is not mere form but substance that we have here. I suggest to Your Honour that the substance of this amendment to the budget is contained in the opening phrase:

> This house regrets that the financial policies—

Those are the financial policies, of course, as presented to us by the minister in the resolution which he asked this house to adopt in adopting his budget and it is with respect to the financial policies as outlined in the budget that I suggest to Your Honour we should consider the matter of rising trade deficits. With respect to agriculture the phrase, as Your Honour has indicated, is "declining farm income".

May I first of all say just a word with respect to declining farm income. Irrespective of my point that each of these topics relates to the absence of an adequate policy in the budget I wish to suggest to Your Honour that with respect to declining farm income in particular I can see very little similarity between the phrasing we have before us in this amendment and the discussion on the supply motion of February 22. I think perhaps Your Honour will surely agree that both the amendment and the subamendment were designed so specifically that we were considering there the cost-price squeeze. We were, in the subamendment, dealing very specifically with what was particularly concerning the agricultural community at that time, namely the situation confronting the producers of hogs and eggs. I would say that the amendment which regrets that the financial policies as presented in this budget fail to deal with the question of declining farm income can scarcely be related to the supply motion of February 22.

With respect to the matter of rising trade deficits, the supply motion of March 21 did, of course, refer to a deterioration in balance of payments but surely the substance of this motion is that we have not in the budget proposals and policies that deal with these matters.

Your Honour has doubtless also reviewed the decision of Mr. Speaker Beaudoin on May 3, 1955 as recorded at page 3425 of Hansard. The then private hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), as has been done today, moved an amendment to the budget. On May 3 after, indeed, we were ready to take a vote Mr. Speaker Beaudoin had this to say:

> Considering the fact that on the budget wide latitude is always given, and that the main reason the amendment could have been declared out of order was the fact that the amendments to the address in reply had covered a variety of subjects, I decided not to intervene.

I suggest that that is still valid. Our discussions of the items in this amendment relate to the absence of policies in the financial presentation of the budget itself and having reference to the substance of the amendment and not to some mere technicality of form they do not offend against the rule to which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has referred.

Citation 330 to which the Minister of Finance has referred in Beauchesne's third edition at page 134—and this is on the other point—reads as follows:

> When a member hands a motion to the Speaker after having spoken in support of it, the Speaker may, before putting the question to the house, make such corrections as are necessary or advisable in order that it should conform with the usages of the house.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the point of order raised by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and to your remarks. Members of this group are convinced that on two or three points there is some lapse on the part of the mover of the amendment for the official opposition under the rules of the house. This is a surprising matter in view of their having had the opportunity of securing constitutional, legal and procedural advice and in view of the great experience of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill).

Speaking on behalf of the hon. members behind me may I say this. Should you find the amendment out of order, in view of this rather incredible error on the part of the official opposition I think that the knowledge of the rules displayed by the C.C.F. should be rewarded by your giving consideration to our subamendment then becoming the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate what has been said to assist in dealing with this matter in order to assure that we observe the rules and practices of the house. In addition to the references given to me on both sides, I refer to Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 234 which reads in part as follows:

234. The ancient doctrine that the redress of grievances should be considered before the grant of supplies is maintained in the House of Commons of Canada

(1) Whenever an order of the day has been read for the house to resolve itself into the committee of supply or the committee of ways and means—

That is what we are doing now.

—the motion "That the Speaker do now leave the Chair" must be proposed, except on Wednesdays, Thursdays and Fridays as provided by standing orders 56 and 58. When such motion is proposed, it shall be permissible to discuss any public matter within the powers of the federal parliament or to ask for the redress of any grievance; provided that the discussion shall not relate to any decision of the house during the current session, nor to any item of the estimates, nor to any resolution to be proposed to the committee of ways and means, nor to any matter placed on or whereof notice has been given in the order paper.

These four categories which are mentioned are excluded in order to avoid duplication of debate and waste of the time of the house in repeating a debate. It is true that we have dealt specifically, in the first and third supply amendments, with two of these matters. To say that they may now be discussed again in their aspects as subjects of financial policy, which is only one aspect of any problem, would be to permit the house to revive debates of which it has already disposed.

I had practically come to the conclusion before returning the house—and I am reinforced in it by the argument made by the minister and by what has been said elsewhere—that at least two of these items should be removed. In accordance with the authority of the Chair, as mentioned by the hon member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson), I think I might direct that two of the specified items be deleted from the resolution, namely rising trade deficits and declining farm income. Those are two specific items among the seven. I am in some doubt about another one, namely the high premium on the Canadian dollar. However, in view of the broad range of this debate, in any event, and the fact that the former motion on that item was somewhat limited, I think justice would be done and that the time of the house would be saved by avoiding unnecessary debate or duplication of debate if those two items were removed. Perhaps the hon. member who moved the motion would concur in the deletion of those two items.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I be heard on that point, Mr. Speaker? With great respect may I say this. I do not think the rule read by the hon. member concerning the correction of mistakes applies to a matter which vitiates an entire amendment of this kind. With great respect, I submit that power applies only to the correction of mistakes in minor matters such as clerical errors and that sort of thing. With great respect I submit that it does not apply in order to cure in an amendment a clear defect that makes it out of order. If this amendment is out of order in part under the provisions of the rule which I read then it is clearly out of order in its entirety. I therefore submit with great respect, Mr. Speaker, that the power to correct mistakes has no application here. I submit that the proper course is that the amendment be ruled out of order and that it be left to whoever chooses to do so to bring in an amendment that is in keeping with the rules of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I could say a word on the point which has just been raised by the Minister of Finance. I am sure Your Honour will recall previous occasions when, with the leave of the house and in circumstances of this kind, precisely the course that Your Honour has now suggested was taken by the house. My friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has indicated to me that he would be quite agreeable to the course that has been suggested.

However, if I might be permitted just to make this observation with the greatest possible respect, we feel that it would surely never be intended that in a budget debate, notwithstanding the fact that there had been a motion on a related topic, it would not be competent for either side of the house to discuss trade deficits and that it would not be competent for the house to discuss the declining farm income, both of which were discussed by the Minister of Finance himself in his budget speech. It seemed to us that anything that was debatable on the budget, so long as our motion dealt entirely and exclusively with the minister's statement—as we believe this one does; it refers to financial policy—it would be in order. Perhaps we should have said "as set out in the budget speech", but it says that the statement the minister made the other day offers no solution to these problems. Since that statement was made only subsequent to the decision of the house on these other matters, it seemed to us that there was in fact no duplication.

Mr. Argue: The Minister of Finance has taken objection to Your Honour's following the procedure of directing that the defects in the amendment be corrected. He has done so on the ground that the citation to which reference has been made had to do only with minor defects such as typographical errors et cetera. I think what we need at this time is a little bit of common sense applied to our proceedings. If the Minister of Finance objects and if Your Honour agrees with the minister's objections, I believe the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River would be quite willing to agree to the motion being amended in the way it has been suggested. On many occasions in the past, over a period of many years, when an amendment has been brought in which in general was in order but some parts of which, in the opinion of the Speaker of the day, were in error, those errors have been corrected at the time on the suggestion of the Speaker.

I should also like to make a further point which is a practical one. Since the official opposition has the right to bring in an amendment, a want of confidence motion and since we in this group have the same right or, if it is our only opportunity or alternative, to bring in a subamendment, I think we might just as well have the amendment settled now as wait until some other hon. member of the official opposition speaks and brings it in at that time.

Mr. Robichaud: As seconder of the motion, Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to make a few observations?

Mr. Speaker: I can assure the hon. member that it is unnecessary for him to do so in view of the course which I propose to take. This matter, of course, is a point of order which arose when the motion was made. If I had dealt with it then and if I had disposed of it at that time, it would have been open to the hon. member who had the floor to concur in the suggestion for an alteration, which I have now made at this rather later date instead of then in view of my having made the reservation at the time the motion was just presented. Particularly as the hon. member who moved the motion and the seconder of it concur in the deletion of two of the seven items, which items I think might be taken as illustrative of the criticism of the financial policies but which nevertheless open the door for debates we have had, I feel that the proper course now is to direct that they be deleted from the amendment and that it stand with that change. It does not affect, then, the subamendment. I am not sure whether the Minister of Finance has any comment to make on the amendment to the amendment which was also reserved, if I am not mistaken, at the time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, do I take it from your ruling that you claim the power to do that, in the absence of consent in this matter? I wish to make it quite clear that there is no consent, and I submit with great respect that in a situation of this kind the Chair has no power to make an amendment or to direct an amendment even if there is consent on the part of the mover and seconder. We have here an amendment which is out of order in part, and under the rules, therefore, it is quite clear it is out of order in its entirety.

With very great respect there cannot be on the part of the Chair any curing of the error in the amendment, the vice which makes it out of order. With great respect, the only course open to the Chair is to rule the amendment out of order. As I said before, the power to cure mistakes is not a power that authorizes the Chair to cure defects, defects which of themselves are so serious as to make an amendment out of order. This is not a matter at all of correcting a word here or a word there which is obviously a mistake. This is something which goes to the very root and substance of this amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the force of what the minister says and undoubtedly it is true that, without the consent of the house, a motion which has been put and which is in possession of the house cannot very well be changed. But I take the view that this matter is not in the possession of the house because I reserved it when it was moved, and I now direct before it is put that it be amended and that those deletions be made in the motion.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, on that point, the amendment surely is in the possession of the house. Once an amendment is introduced and read and then handed to the Chair, surely at that point, it being in possession of the house, it is not possible to deal with it in an ex parte manner. It is an amendment which belongs to the house, and being out of order there is no power to cure a defect in it which is as basic as the defect in this amendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, if I might be permitted, I might say that you have made a ruling and we respect it.

Mr. Speaker: It is true I have expressed my view, but I do not want to force my views upon the house unless they commend themselves fully to the house. With respect to the last statement of the minister, I may be mistaken about my authority in this matter, but as I see it this motion was not in the possession of the house because when I read it I said I had doubts about some of these items on the very ground which the minister has taken and that I would reserve them and deal with them before the motion was formally put. The motion being in that state, I think it can be distinguished from one where the unanimous consent of the house would be necessary. Furthermore, the proposed course commends itself to me as one which will further the general interests of the debate. Accordingly I make that amendment with the concurrence of the mover and seconder, and I now put the motion before the house in its amended form.

Before proceeding, the amendment to the amendment was also dealt with in the same way by the Chair at the time, and if any hon. member wishes to say anything about the subamendment this would be the appropriate time. Otherwise I will consider it as having been disposed of at this time as well.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, will you clarify one point of the ruling you have made. When does an amendment come into the possession of the house? You say that you reserved judgment on the amendment, so when does it come into the possession of the house? Is it just before a division or when is it?

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I might be permitted a word on that point. I listened very carefully to what Your Honour said when my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River made his motion, and I understood Your Honour to say that you were reserving the motion and not putting it. If you had not taken that position and had questioned anything in it I or one of my colleagues would have risen at once and asked for permission to argue the question right there and then. It seems to me that that makes it perfectly clear that we accepted in good faith what Your Honour obviously did in good faith; that is to say, reserved the motion.

Mr. Nowlan: One other question of the hon. member, if I may. On what have hon. members been speaking since we reserved this matter? On the main motion or the amendment?

Some hon. Members: On the main motion.

(Translation):

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, it has been said of the budget speech made Thursday night by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) that it was a do-nothing, stand-pat budget. It was a neat way of saying that, on Thursday, March 31, 1960, Canada was in the position of a hard-pressed debtor offering its creditors a legal settlement and a moratorium.

During the last three years, the national debt has increased by more than a billion dollars. The unemployment insurance fund has decreased by more that $500 million. To finance its deficits, the government has drawn upon the savings of the people and in order to make its loans more attractive, it has raised the interest to such a point that the savings in our banks, which were used for the development of industry, of business and by the general public, are exhausted through the government's deficits. In this budget, there is no decrease in expenditures and the taxes which had been increased last year remain at the same level, while the rickety surplus expected for 1960-61 is based not only on a hope, but also on the theory that the national product will increase by 6 per cent in the next 12 months.

This budget was evidently devised by a government which as a result of its shortcomings and of its monetary and fiscal errors, has been placed at the mercy of financiers. This budget speech which the Minister of Finance read Thursday night for the public at large is as cold as a tombstone. It lacks humanity and, for the hundreds of thousands of Canadian families affected by unemployment, it is cruel and inhuman.

In fact there is not even the slightest reference in it to the most important domestic problem in Canada today, unemployment, as if the problem did not exist. To the provinces, which bear a substantial part of the consequences of the government's monetary and fiscal failure, the budget offers nothing that they did not have last year. They will have to fend for themselves. The municipalities which were recently claimed to be heavily in debt, whose taxes on real estate are at their highest level, will have to solve their problems alone; and next winter, I am sure, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) will again ask them to bear the same costs of the winter works program. The government trusts to Providence to take care of the 827,000 unemployed.

If I refer to page 2670 of Hansard of March 31, I find that the only consolation offered to the unemployed are these few lines, dedicated to them, in the tone of a prayer at the end of a sermon.

I am confident—

—said the Minister of Finance—

—however, that employment will rise as the coming of spring opens up new job opportunities and as the economy continues its upward trend.

That sentence, coming at a time when there are more than 827,000 unemployed in Canada, confirms what we already knew, that this government, in its stubbornness, continues to consider unemployment as seasonal and does not care a rap about it. From that angle, the budget of last Thursday evening is an insult to the unemployed of this country.

In the course of my remarks, I intend to make a brief outline of the unemployment problem and of the hypocritical attitude of the Conservative government towards it. But, before going any further, let us glance at the statistics of previous years, under the Liberal regime.

As recorded on page 1654 of Hansard, the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) gave a complete statistical table of unemployment in Canada from 1946 to 1959. His conclusions were as follows:

If that table is carefully examined, it will be seen that from the period 1946 to 1956—10 years—the average annual percentage of the labour force without jobs in Canada was 2.8 per cent.

As everyone knows—

The experts in the field say that 3 per cent of the labour force without jobs is the equivalent of full employment.

Well, that magnificent result is not accidental. The Liberals did not trust to spring, as did the Minister of Finance, to provide jobs for our labour force.

[Mr. Deschatelets.]

In 1945, to ease the change from a wartime to a peacetime economy, the Right Hon. C. D. Howe, then minister of reconstruction and supply, tabled in the house what we call a white paper, outlining an eight point concrete program concerning income and employment in Canada for a given period.

If such a program was necessary, at the time, how much more would it be today, when unemployment has reached its highest level since the Conservative depression of 1930-1935?

On March 10, 1960, in fact, the latest figures we had at our disposal showed, according to the national employment service, that 827,512 persons looking for jobs were registered in our offices, and according to the dominion bureau of statistics, there were 555,000 unemployed.

According to the information I gathered, 620,000 persons would now be getting unemployment insurance benefits, after having registered at the end of January 1960.

After personal investigation and research, I am able to say that at present about a third of the above-mentioned unemployed are not registered in our unemployment insurance offices, which would add 200,000 more unemployed to the first group.

If we consider that most unemployed have dependents, it is safe to say that at this very moment, over a million Canadian citizens are suffering from unemployment in Canada. Over a million Canadians are undernourished, over a million Canadians cannot get the drugs they need to restore their health, and thousands of young people, boys and girls, are unable to go on to college because their father, the head of the family, cannot afford to pay for their tuition.

Generally speaking, these people do not share in Canada's high standard of living, which we all like to boast about. Every day, as hon. members may read in their papers, youths of 17, 18 and 20 tell magistrates that they have robbed because they were unemployed and could not find a job.

In other words, unemployment is not only an economic matter, it is also a social problem. Through the fault of the government, we condone the fact that, in our midst, an imposing group of fellow-citizens are undernourished, that women and children are forgotten, neglected, rejected and deceived by the Conservative party, whose members were mainly elected because of a formal and solemn promise of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), to the effect that, as long as he would be Prime Minister, nobody in Canada would suffer unemployment, whether there be a deficit or not.

Now, on the evening of March 31, it was time to carry out that promise, but the unemployed were in fact forgotten, and this government, and more particularly the Minister of Finance, preferred financiers to the unemployed.

Now, let us look at the Conservative record with regard to the unemployment question. First of all, there is the Prime Minister's responsibility. After promising so much, he became silent and as the unemployment figures rose from month to month, he became more and more silent.

In the speech from the throne, the Prime Minister and his cabinet undertook on January 15 to give a seasonal character to unemployment, whereas there were at the time at least 700,000 people without jobs.

In early March 1960, we discussed the unemployment question, for eight days, on an item providing for winter works. If I am not mistaken, the Prime Minister did not in that instance come down from his ivory tower. He remained silent.

In the face of growing unemployment, we submitted on March 1, 1960, as shown on page 1578 of Hansard, an amendment recommending "That the problem of unemployment be recommitted to the standing committee on industrial relations".

As soon as the amendment was moved, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) jumped to his feet with the fourth edition of Beauchesne in his hands, trying to discover fine points of procedure by which the amendment could be rejected.

Following rejection of the amendment, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) rose to direct a very plain question to the Prime Minister. May I quote from page 1582 of Hansard the conclusion of the question put by the Leader of the Opposition:

—I ask the Prime Minister whether he will not forget technicalities and ask the house to give unanimous consent in order that this matter may be debated as a question of urgency by this particular committee.

And here is what the Prime Minister replied, as recorded on page 1582 of Hansard:

I do not really know what the hon. gentlemen means when he says this matter should be debated as a matter of urgency.

Mr. Speaker, this was on March 1, 1960, and the Prime Minister ended his reply as follows:

—if in that time they have not been able to produce anything, I see no benefit in the suggestion which is now put forward.

And now, perhaps we could put a few questions to the Prime Minister. What is he doing and what has he done about his election promise? Why has he refused to take part even once in the only debate we have had on unemployment in the course of this session? Why did he, on March 31 last, sell Canada's unemployed down the river. And why has he made no provisions for them in the budget, as he had promised to do?

Why did the Prime Minister refuse, on March 1 last, to refer the matter of unemployment to the industrial relations committee?

On February 15, 1954, the Prime Minister, who was then the private member for Prince Albert, made this statement, as recorded on page 2102 of Hansard:

A committee set up to study and report on unemployment would hear evidence of those who are warning this government and the country of the need for action now.

At that time, in 1954, we had only half as many unemployed as we have today.

Mr. Speaker, I leave it to Canada's people to draw the obvious conclusions. I do suggest, however, that after that solemn pledge made in March 1958, the arrogant and unyielding attitude of the government towards the unemployed is one of the most revolting about-faces ever recorded in Canada's political history.

Let us now turn to the responsibility of the Minister of Labour. I should like to recall two statements he made on unemployment, the first one on March 3, 1955, when he was sitting in the opposition. I quote from page 1693 of Hansard:

I think we are wasting time by quoting figures. What is needed is some drastic action on the part of the government rather than the quoting of any figures.

During the period of time that this unemployment situation has gradually increased, no visible effort has been made by the government to alleviate the condition or to provide safeguards against its increase. Consequently we find ourselves with unemployment on a scale of national emergency—

Mr. Speaker, I would remind hon. members who are now listening to me that the unemployment statistics were much less serious in 1955 than they are now. Now, if in 1955 the present Minister of Labour believed that it was a case of national emergency, why, today, does he remain in agreement with a government that refers to seasonal unemployment, when the present unemployment problem is not only more serious than in 1955, but the most serious we ever had since the years 1930-35.

On March 3, 1955, as recorded on page 1694 of Hansard of that date, the present Minister of Labour also made this other suggestion:

It is obvious therefore that a conference on this particular subject should be called in order to arrive at some conclusive plan to deal with this serious problem.

Mr. Speaker, I now ask this question to the Minister of Labour. If he thought that a federal-provincial conference was needed in 1955 to deal with unemployment, does he not think that such a conference should have been called at the very beginning of last winter?

According to Hansard for February 15, 1957, the Conservative party, which used to sit in the opposition, moved that the whole question of unemployment be referred to the industrial relations committee, and the present Minister of Labour then favoured that suggestion. How can he explain now that, on Thursday February 25, 1960, the members of the Conservative party on the industrial relations committee rejected a motion from the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) for a full study of the unemployment situation? Those are facts no one can deny—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me the hon. member is reflecting on a decision of a committee of the house. He is not within his rights in taking a course of that kind. He must assume that the house acted properly and if it made a decision it is not open to him now to criticize it.

Mr. Deschatelets: I was of course referring to what had taken place in the committee. At any rate, Mr. Speaker, I think your point is well taken and I might now pursue my remarks from another line.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, those are facts that cannot be denied, which clearly point to the inconsistency, confusion and irresponsibility of our Conservative friends.

The only remedial measure introduced by the Minister of Labour was the resolution concerning the winter works program which, at the time, we rightfully called a peanuts program. The latest statistics issued in March concerning unemployment are the most significant proof that those incidental works were unsatisfactory and ridiculous, both in planning and scope.

We now come to the responsibility of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) in that question of unemployment, but before proceeding any further, I should like to quote from only two editorials, the first of which was published in La Presse of Friday, April 1, 1960, which reads as follows:

Out of that no-change budget, a few outstanding facts emerge: Mr. Fleming is apparently unaware that there is unemployment in Canada—

Now, Mr. Speaker, turning to the Montreal Gazette for April 4, 1960, I should like to quote from an article under the heading—

(Text):

Budget's Challenge Not Recognized.

The budget would have given finance minister Fleming the opportunity to give direction to the economy had he recognized there was a need for direction. In standing pat on tax levels, he also stood pat on the tired assumptions that everything will come out right in the end. That posture is not one which can much longer be afforded.

Mr. Fleming's attitude toward unemployment is an instance.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, during his budget speech on Thursday last, as reported on page 2671 of Hansard, the Minister of Finance mentioned that the number of people holding a job was on the increase. I ask him now why he did not then mention the number of unemployed, according to the statistics provided by our two official sources.

He stated that more men are now at work in Canada than at the same time last year. I might ask him to except the province of Quebec where there are now less men working than last year.

The Minister of Finance devoted 16 lines of his extensive speech to unemployment and employment, he made no mention at all of the present unemployment situation, nor did he suggest any remedy, any plan, any measure likely to check it.

This year's budget does not grant one cent to the unemployed. The Minister of Finance stands out as a dealer in false hopes. He thinks that Canada's No. 1 problem has been solved when he says: "I am confident that spring will bring new opportunities." What a cruel disappointment this is for all the unemployed in this country and their families.

The deception is all the more cruel for the population of Quebec, considering that, on February 18, 1960, there were 259,885 people looking for jobs in that province, or 19,500 more than the previous month. At the present time 100,000 unemployed are receiving unemployment insurance benefits in that province. Almost one third of the total number of unemployed in this country are in Quebec.

And the Prime Minister is still silent, the Minister of Labour has adopted a do-nothing attitude, while the Minister of Finance is hoping that spring will bring a solution to the problem.

When we think of this budget speech which ignores the problem of unemployment across the country and, consequently, in the province of Quebec; when we think that that budget speech was received with loud applause by all the Conservative members, including those from the province of Quebec, I say, Mr. Speaker, that I would hate to be in the boots of my hon. friends when the time comes for them to go to the people of the province of Quebec who will call upon them to account for their actions and their solemn promises.

An hon. Member: Not in your boots either.

Mr. Deschatelets: Did anybody want to ask a question?

Mr. Speaker, while our hon. friends opposite are sleeping, we have tried, week after week, perhaps day after day in this session, to wake them up. We have told them that this problem was becoming more and more important, and nothing was done. And now, we have an unemployment figure which really reaches the proportions of a national emergency. I say to my hon. friends that if nothing is done right away to find some solution, we shall sacrifice a whole generation of our young people. All the vital forces in this nation should be mustered in an attempt to solve this problem.

Everybody knows, that, if today we were faced not even with war but the threat of war, if we had to face some fearsome situation, if within a year, or a few months, there arose the danger of a conflict, we would immediately find enough money to start our plants and mobilize all our resources. Well, if we do nothing, we shall face a serious situation which the Canadian people will find difficult to understand.

Mr. Speaker, I have proved that the Conservative party failed to consider our unemployed and deceived them by not fulfilling their promises. I proved that the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, and the Minister of Labour did not submit anything constructive to deal with unemployment. I proved that the hon. member for Essex East on behalf of the Liberal party advanced ten suggestions, which the Minister of Labour put aside without even considering them. I also proved that the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) put on the record 25 suggestions on ways to remedy those conditions.

We moved an amendment asking for a complete study of unemployment by the industrial relations committee, where we might have heard economists and experts, and received some advice. But the Prime Minister refused, and yet, some valuable suggestions would have been submitted to the government.

The Prime Minister, the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Finance, the whole cabinet and all the private members, in a word, all of them, have been hiding their heads in the sand like so many ostriches to avoid facing the problem.

In the speech from the throne, unemployment was described as being of a seasonal nature; in his budget speech, the Minister of Finance also referred to it as being of a seasonal nature.

Well, we have done all we could to try to awaken our hon. friends. Apparently, we have not been successful.

In closing, may I repeat the words spoken by the hon. member for Laurier, at the end of one of his speeches on the unemployment situation, and say to the Conservative government: "Face your responsibilities, honour your election promises, or resign."

(Text):

Mr. J. A. McBain (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, may my first words be to compliment the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) upon the outstanding budget he produced last Thursday evening. To me it was very reassuring, as I know it must have been to many Canadians, to know that the minister was able to bring down a balanced budget optimistic enough for a small surplus without creating any major tax changes. I should like to commend the minister for making a considerable number of tariff changes, especially those pertaining to cottons as our cotton industry has long been suffering from importations from low wage countries.

This is a budget that seems to be accepted by the opposition parties very reluctantly, for so far they have found very little in it to criticize. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) the other evening and again this afternoon in his feeble attempt to criticize the budget mentioned that the government had a record expenditure, record taxation and record unemployment. I am sure he must have been ashamed of his colleagues when they apparently gloated and applauded as loudly as they did the other evening when he mentioned the high unemployment in this country.

After listening to the last two speakers I wonder whether we are now debating the budget or are we back on the unemployment debate that we had some weeks ago? Commenting on this budget there was an editorial which appeared in the St. Thomas Times-Journal on Saturday last, April 2, which expresses the thoughts and feelings of a very large number of people across the length and breadth of Canada. The editorial is entitled "A Balanced Budget" and I now wish to quote from it. It begins with these words:

> Blessed are they that expect not for they shall not be disappointed.
> That probably represents the feelings of the people of Canada in regard to the budget brought down in the House of Commons Thursday night. Reports emanating from Ottawa throughout the past financial year have indicated that although the national economy was improving, no tax concessions could be expected. If hopes are to be entertained for next year much may depend on what happens at Geneva or some other city in regard to disarmament, nuclear agreements and the pacifist attitude in general, for the military part of the budget takes up one third of the expenditure.
> However, the country is in a prosperous condition. The general output of production increased and continues to increase, but our prosperity is not sufficient to justify a tax reduction that would really be felt. There are hopes for next March.
>
> The most interesting part of the budget is that the textile industry is to receive increased tariff protection against imported fabrics, and that the tariff board will examine the tariff structure on engineering and architects' plans, nails, china and glass imported for decoration, and mining and petroleum machinery.
> The textile industry has been crying out for a long time; way back into the St. Laurent administrations, but then they mostly cried in vain. Factories have been shut or put on short time and textiles have probably contributed more to unemployment than any other business.
>
> On the whole, not a bad budget under the circumstances.

I think that editorial speaks for most of the people in Canada.

I wish now to discuss some problems that are relevant to southern and southwestern Ontario and portions of Quebec. I wish to refer to the tobacco industry from the production standpoint to the manufacturing process. My remarks will have reference mainly to flue-cured tobacco.

The production of flue-cured tobacco and its processing into a consumer product is an industry on which a great majority of the people in the tobacco growing districts depend for their livelihood. It is also the main support of numerous local industries and services which manufacture, sell or service materials and machines for the tobacco industry. Merchants, garages, service stations, banks, legal firms, insurance and real estate companies and other businesses have gained much from the tobacco industry. It is also the largest customer of the companion branches of agriculture in these same districts. The tobacco industry may also be found to be the largest single source of tax revenue, if not in the country at least in many municipalities.

Tobacco is the hub of a great wheel of local industry which finds its earnings rising and falling according to the state of the tobacco industry. The general overhead for an Ontario flue-cured tobacco farm exceeds that of almost any other agricultural commodity. At the present time the province of Ontario has approximately 4,500 qualified farms growing flue-cured tobacco in 16 counties. The estimated capital invested in these farms approaches $300 million or an average of between $65,000 and $70,000 per farm. The farm buildings and equipment required to cultivate and cure tobacco cost upward of $40,000 depending on the size of the unit.

The outstanding cost in producing tobacco is the annual labour account. To harvest and prepare this annual crop for market requires up to 60,000 persons and their earnings paid by farmers amount to approximately $45 million. Much of this money is borrowed from the banks at fairly high interest rates. When you take into account the interest on the capital invested, the maintenance and depreciation on farm buildings and equipment together with the high labour costs and the money which farmers borrow annually from the banks, this makes tobacco one of the most costly agricultural crops to produce. An average production cost per acre under present conditions would be $650. This cost is dependent upon the producer being permitted to market his full basic acreage production. Practically all the tobacco farms are equipped to operate to full capacity and when they have to drop back to anything less their production costs per acre increase.

The amount of tobacco marketed each year in Ontario is set by the Ontario flue-cured tobacco growers marketing board before the beginning of the planting season and many factors have to be considered before acreage quotas are determined. The chief factor is not to set quotas at a level that would produce a serious surplus thus depressing prices to a point where producers could not repay their loans made from the banks to grow their crops. At the same time the board must take into consideration the dangers of producing too small a crop resulting in a great demand and a high price and loss of export trade.

The Ontario flue-cured tobacco marketing board is one agricultural marketing association that deserves a great deal of credit because besides negotiating with the buyers to establish a price they also maintain strict controls over their acreage production. In the year 1958 production was very high with a yield of 173,213,818 pounds of tobacco returning an average price of 47.57 cents per pound which brought to the producers $82,394,702.

To market this large 1958 crop the marketing board experienced serious difficulties so that the base acreage for 1959 was reduced by 25 per cent. This the board estimated would yield from 145 million to 150 million pounds. When the sale of the 1959 crop wound up on March 11, 145,220,668 pounds were sold bringing to the producers a gross return of $81,525,841 at an average price of 56.25 cents per pound. This indicates how closely the output was estimated. Despite this extra large return the gross return was some $750,000 less than for the large 1958 crop.

Although this agricultural product is restricted to areas where it can be grown the federal treasury collects more tax in proportion from tobacco than from any other product manufactured. At present a package of 20 cigarettes has a tax of 20 cents or one cent per cigarette; in other words, 209 per cent of the manufacturer's selling price. In Canada the average per capita cigarette consumption per annum is 1,949. For taxation purposes this means a revenue of $19.49 per person. For a family using two packages a day under our present tax they would pay $146 per year. Breaking this taxation down further, I might say that the treasury collects an estimated $3,200 from every acre of tobacco grown. Since the 1940 budget the excise tariff on cigarettes has been computed by the weight of two and a half pounds of tobacco per thousand cigarettes. This weight includes paper, paste and filter tip if it is a filter tip cigarette that is under consideration. As producers wish to see the demand for tobacco increase they have therefore requested the government to revert to the pre-war position, when three pounds of tobacco was the amount allowed per thousand cigarettes. I hope this request will be granted by the Minister of Finance.

I wonder whether I could have the consent of the house to place in Hansard as part of the text of my speech a table showing the total federal excise taxes paid by the consumers of manufactured tobacco products compared with other representative commodities.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member state the source of his table?

Mr. McBain: It is from the brief presented by the flue-cured tobacco growers.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to insert this table at this point in his address?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: What did the hon. gentleman say the table was about?

Mr. McBain: This table shows federal excise taxes paid by the consumers of manufactured tobacco products compared with other representative commodities.

[Editor's note: The table referred to is as follows:]

I have not placed these figures on the record to be critical of the Minister of Finance for not reducing the tax on tobacco in his present budget. But now that he has been able to balance the budget with a surplus I am sure we shall be expecting him to be in a position to reduce the tax in his next budget. I therefore expect him to give consideration to a considerable reduction of the tax on tobacco in his budget next year.

In 1957 when this government came into office, the sugar beet industry and growers were gradually being forced out of business and production. The Liberal government would always say no to a support price on sugar beets, and without a support price and import controls sugar beet acreage in Ontario had dropped from a high of 40,000 acres to 14,000 acres and one sugar beet processing plant was forced to close.

After the change of government in 1957, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and his cabinet listened with an open ear to the producers' problems and eventually established a floor price under sugar beets. Since this floor price was implemented the acreage has increased from the low of 14,000 acres, in a two-year period, to 35,000 acres in 1959.

As Canada produces less than 25 per cent of her sugar requirements it appears to me to be a great opportunity to have this agricultural production of beets expanded not only in Ontario but in western Canada as well. I would suggest the government should consider the implementation of a long range sugar policy for Canada. At the present time I am informed that the price of Cuban refined sugar in Cuba is from $2.80 to $2.85 per hundred pounds. As the government of Cuba has a monopoly on sugar and as a result of its present instability I can foresee Cuba endeavouring to dump into Canada refined sugar at a price below the cost of production. If this should happen it would spell ruin for the sugar refinery in Toronto and the beet plants at Chatham and Wallaceburg.

If a long range policy could be brought into effect so that the producers would know where they are going I am sure it would be possible to increase acreage up to a possible 50,000 or 60,000 acres. It would take out of production acres that are now producing crops that at times create a surplus. It would also keep in circulation the $20 million that is now spent for growing, harvesting and processing the sugar beets. It would also create a need for a new sugar beet factory to be built and therefore would give employment to a large work force in construction operations and maintenance.

The present two plants at Wallaceburg and Chatham when operating at full capacity employ 1,500 people. The riding of Elgin which I represent produces a fairly substantial acreage of beets at the present time. If the producers could be assured of a long range return plus import quotas I am sure this acreage would definitely be increased.

In the riding of Elgin we have an excellent location for a new sugar beet factory at Port Stanley. As a sugar beet processing plant requires a large amount of water for washing and processing the beets, a new plant situated at Port Stanley on lake Erie would have available all the water necessary. Furthermore, the farmers in this area are the producers of a large quantity of the flue-cured tobacco grown in Ontario. When this crop is harvested, usually about September 15, the surplus labour could be diverted to the harvesting and processing of sugar beets.

I wish to commend the government for the steps they have taken in the past to restore the sugar beet industry in Canada. I hope they will continue their interest and will continue to assist the sugar beet producers in 1960.

I think it is gratifying to see the optimism shown in this chamber by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill). It is unfortunate that the opposition parties can see no optimism and no future for Canada in this present year. These forecasters of gloom and depression remind me of the story of an Italian immigrant who came to Canada and established by the side of the highway a hot dog stand. In this venture he was extremely successful for he would stand out by the side of his stand and, although unable to read or write, he would spiel out the words "Come and buy a hot dog". It had its effect on the travelling public for Tony's Place became very favourably known far and wide. Tony was successful enough to put aside enough money to send his son to college.

After a year in college his son came home and said, "Dad, how is business?" His father replied, "Business is booming better than ever". "That is strange," said the son; "did you not know there is a depression on in Canada?" His father said, "No; I was not aware of it. I have no television, no radio and, as you know, I cannot read the papers; so as far as I am concerned business is as good as ever". But before the son left to go back to college he had convinced his father that things were not as good in the country as they had been.

Thereafter the father did not go out to the side of the road to ask people to stop and buy his hot dogs, and he took down some of the advertising around his booth. The next time the son came home his father said to him, "Son, I know you are right. I am just beginning to realize that a depression is at hand".

My friends on the opposite side, in continuing to take this gloomy outlook are not only not doing themselves any good but are making other people in Canada gloomy as well.

It seems to me that each one of us has a particular job to do to sell Canada to our friends in other countries. We can do this only by pointing out that Canada maintains one of the highest standards of living in the world, with our manufactured products and agricultural products being the best produced anywhere.

Very recently we had in Canada for some four weeks an agricultural delegation from Roumania and this only happened because one of our boosters of Canada in the person of Mr. E. M. Warwick of Blenheim, Ontario, had paid a visit to Roumania late in 1957 for the purpose of seeing that country and introducing to Roumania new varieties of seed corn. He was so impressed with the country and its needs that he impressed upon the Roumanian department of agriculture that they should appoint a group to visit Canada and make purchases of our Canadian agricultural products. This came about early in 1958 and that year Roumania purchased its first Canadian cattle.

From this initial shipment the country was so impressed with the qualities of the cattle and other purchases, and by a further visit to Roumania by Mr. Warwick with the co-operation of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Agriculture, that they have negotiated what is to be hoped will be a continued trade with Canada. On their most recent visit they negotiated for the purchase of 1,100 head of cattle, some of these coming from western Canada; 400 hogs; seed corn to plant a million acres; 200 tons of soybean seed. In the previous shipment of cattle Mr. Warwick supplied them with two Holstein cows which have proved to be the best two cows in that country. Their present purchases have included some of the top producing Holsteins in Ontario. In all their total purchases will be over $1 million in agricultural products.

Of course, we cannot expect these purchases to be one sided. Eventually Canada will be expected to negotiate for some of the products that Roumania wishes to export. To follow this up, I would suggest that it would be advisable for a small delegation from Canada to be sponsored by the government to visit Roumania to secure their continued good will, and I am sure it would promote the sale of more of our agricultural products. At the same time this small group would be in a position to evaluate the products they would wish to sell to Canada.

I was interested to find on picking up the Montreal Gazette for April 1 that one of the first boats to sail from the port of Montreal will be a vessel by the name of Cora which will take aboard 400 head of cattle bound for Roumania. The Gazette mentions that Canada today exports few cattle to Europe and that this will be the first time any have gone to that country. Actually it will be the second time.

If one man can go there and promote the sale of our products in a European country, I am sure a delegation from Canada could do the same thing in many other countries in Europe.

(Translation):

Mr. Rodrigue Bourdages (Laval): Mr Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to congratulate our Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). He has given Canada a magnificent budget for the current fiscal year.

I very well understand, Mr. Speaker, that the previous fiscal year should have ended with a deficit, and I also understand very well that we have a great Minister of Finance who needed only two years to repair the damage done by the previous government during its twenty two years of administration.

I will frankly admit, Mr. Speaker, that having heard such a fine budget speech, if I were in the opposition, I would be so discouraged and dejected that I sincerely think I would resign.

The Minister of Finance has given us a balanced budget. He even managed to offer us a $12 million surplus. And yet, he did not increase taxation. Furthermore, he has managed to grant a salary increase to 50,000 civil service employees, who certainly deserved it.

If you will allow me to get at the heart of my subject matter, I will say that, contrary to the statements made by my hon. colleague for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets), and to the opposition generally, Canada is advancing economically.

According to a Montreal Star report of March 26, 1960, Mr. J. H. Goldsmith, a reputed financial editor, stated and I quote:

(Text):

Bonds continued to advance and stocks also rose.

(Translation):

The stock market is therefore experiencing a revival. The stock market is more or less the economic pulse of a nation. If it is vigorous, everything else is.

The paper industry stocks are showing a remarkable vigour.

Here is what Mr. Goldsmith said about that, on the same date:

(Text):

If the current trends continue, the industry as a whole should be able to make a very good showing in earnings for 1960.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, even the banks are optimistic. They are happy about the economic recovery in Canada. This means that the whole Canadian industry feels the effects of this economic recovery.

In the same newspaper, in its March 26, 1960 edition, we read the following by the same writer:

(Text):

The demand for bank stocks may be an indication of renewed confidence in the outlook for general business. It is axiomatic that banks, being closely linked to the country's business activities, are among those institutions which share directly when the economy is prosperous.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, it must be admitted that there has been progress in Canada. It must be recognized that there has been progress abroad. Our exports are better than ever. In fact, our export trade has made significant progress since last year. Still a little farther down, Mr. Goldsmith had this to say:

(Text):

Foreign trade figures for the first two months of 1960 are highly encouraging. Exports for the two-month period were up more than 27 per cent over the like period of last year.

(Translation):

On that same topic of exports the dominion bureau of statistics, whose figures the members of the opposition are so prone to quote, issues encouraging data. I should like to quote in that connection from a Star report of March 26, 1960 beginning with the following words:

(Text):

Exports up sharply over '59.

Ottawa, March 26—Recent strong gains in Canada's export business continued in February, keeping the 1960 trade ledger in the black.

Exports in February were 33.5 per cent above a year earlier, following a 21 per cent gain in January, a bureau of statistics preliminary report yesterday showed.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, opposition members want figures. If my hon. friends in the opposition want figures, I shall quote figures. In the Montreal Star for March 26, 1960, there is a report from the dominion bureau of statistics which says that exports rose from $322,200,000 in February 1959 to $430,100,000 in February 1960, for a total of $852,000,000 for January and February 1960, as against $670,200,000 for the same months in 1959.

On the other hand, imports rose to $454,-300,000 in February 1960, as against $381,-600,000 in February 1959, for a total of $850,800,000 for January and February 1960, as against $784,900,000 for the same months of the previous year. There is therefore a net gain of 19 per cent of exports over imports in January and February as against last year's figures.

In La Presse for March 29, there was a feature by Roger Fontaine under the heading "Financial Talk", and I quote:

Referring to operations in Canada, the annual report of the S.S. Kresge company mentions that sales for 1959 have been higher than in any previous year.

Mr. Speaker, there has been some criticism levelled at the government's export policy in relation to non-commonwealth countries. Let me say to opposition members, on the basis of D.B.S. figures, that our trade relations with foreign countries have been promoted as never before. That takes care of some irresponsible remarks.

Here is something which appeared in the Montreal Star for March 26, 1960, and I quote:

(Text):

Almost as notable was the turn-around in trade with non-commonwealth countries overseas, with a two-month surplus of $41,100,000 emerging after the $13,700,000 deficit in January-February, 1959.

(Translation):

As you can see, this government has improved the economic situation of the country. In the field of industry, again there is progress. For the automobile industry, for instance, we have some revealing figures.

The Canadian automobile chamber of commerce says, in fact, that:

The Canadian automobile industry produced this week 10,450 vehicles as against 10,319 last week.

These figures come from the Canadian automobile chamber of commerce.

This year, production is estimated at 116,896 vehicles, compared to 109,063 at the corresponding date of 1959; it is distributed as follows: 95,571 automobiles as against 92,086 last year and 21,325 trucks, as compared to 17,007 a year earlier.

We have there more evidence of optimism based on facts.

So, Mr. Speaker, the automobile production is 7,000 units higher this year than last.

Now, I want to deal briefly with mines. In the province of Quebec, we are but one and a half million dollars away from the record reached in 1956.

Here is what La Presse said on this matter on March 26, 1960:

$1.5 million away from the 1956 record.

Mineral production in Quebec reached $461,979,700 in 1959. Mineral production increased by more than $72,000,000 in the province in 1959 to reach $461,979,700 as compared to $389,442,985 in 1958.

A word now to the pessimists—that is to the members of the opposition—about the textile industry.

Mr. J. D. Ritchie, president of the Canadian federation of textile, stated recently as reported in La Presse of March 26, 1960:

Canadian textiles gain prestige.

Mr. I. D. Ritchie, president of the Canadian federation of textiles, said yesterday that the Canadian industry has devoted a great deal of time and effort to promote its products and that the work done in the last few years is slowly debunking the overdone reputation of imported goods.

What has the government done for its part? Members of the opposition you are now singing small. We have the most sensational budget that we could hope for, as far as textiles are concerned.

This last budget has caused enthusiasm in cities where the textile industry will now become prosperous.

Members of the opposition have mentioned imbalance or something of the sort in the 1959 budget.

Well, the Canadian tax foundation said this on March 26:

The Canadian tax foundation forecasts a tax revenue surplus of $120 million over expenses for the year 1960-61.

Mr. Speaker, I think these people did not make a mistake, and that they were right on March 26.

Everybody knows that, from an international point of view, Canada occupies a choice position. This country is respected and I would be remiss if I failed to give credit to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green), who is doing a magnificent job of which all Canadians can rightly be proud.

Canada meets its obligations. And the optimistic note we get in the speeches of the Secretary of State for External Affairs is based on facts.

When we go abroad to take part in some international conference, we realize how much our country is held in high esteem.

This is what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) said here on this matter, as reported in the Montreal Star of May 26 last:

(Text):

Liberal party leader Pearson told the commons it was "a very unhappy record from which no one can get any satisfaction" that some 40 nations were not meeting their financial obligations.

(Translation):

The statement of the Leader of the Opposition is quite right. Thus, he pays a tribute to the foresight and to the unequalled accounting sense of the Conservative party under the leadership of great men, one of whom is the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Diefenbaker). Canada meets its obligations at the international level. In short, this government is not trying to find excuses. It faces up to reality and meets its requirements.

The Conservative government meets its obligations. I would call it a creative government. We find in the Larousse dictionary that the word "create" means "to make something out of nothing".

Well, that is what the Conservative government has done: out of nothing—it succeeded to the Liberal government, of which everybody had had enough—the last election proved it,—this government presents a budget that is not only balanced but advantageous. To prove it, may I say that the Canadian stock market reacted favourably the day following the budget of the Minister of Finance.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the minister whether there is any change in the plans?

At ten o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, AIRPORT AND TERMINAL FACILITIES

Question No. 211—Mr. Fisher:

1. Does the government have a record of capital expenditures made in providing airport and terminal facilities at those airports used by commercial air lines?
2. If so, what is the total capital expenditures made by the government in providing (a) runways; (b) radio and directional equipment; (c) meteorological services at the airports; (d) terminal facilities at such airports?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

1. Yes.

2. (a) Runways—$145,645,836.

(b) Radio and directional equipment—$15,646,416.

(c) Meteorological services at the airports—The meteorological services have stations at several airports which supply weather information to the air lines, and these facilities are also used for public forecasting. It is not possible to segregate these costs, as the accounting records are not maintained in this manner.

(d) Terminal facilities—$37,339,496.

The above figures are cumulative to March 31, 1959.

CANSO CAUSEWAY CONSTRUCTION

Question No. 315—Mr. Regier:

1. What were the total contributions of the federal government to the building of the Canso causeway?
2. Are any federal contributions still to be made? If so, what is the expected amount?
3. What is the total estimated cost of this causeway?
4. Does the federal government receive any returns on this investment out of the tolls being collected?
5. From whom was the rock needed for this causeway purchased?
6. Has the rock been paid for? If so, how much was paid for the rock? If not, what is the cause of the delay in payment being made?
7. If this rock was purchased from a company or a corporation, who are the officers of same?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

1. Expenditure by the federal government on the construction of the Canso causeway to March 1, 1960 amounted to $20,157,201. The above covers the total expenditure on the construction of the causeway to March 1, 1960, and under the agreement between the federal government and the government of the province of Nova Scotia the province will contribute $5,500,000 toward the capital cost subject to the provision that if the total capital cost is less than $22,760,000 the contribution of the province will be reduced proportionately.

2. Yes. The amount cannot be determined until the full cost of the land from which the rock was obtained is available.

3. Answered by Nos. 1 and 2.

4. No.

5. Rock obtained from land expropriated by the federal government. Owner of the land Hon. Alistair Fraser.

6. A payment of $15,000 on account was made to the owner of the expropriated land pending a decision of the exchequer court of Canada as to the value of the parcel of land expropriated. The decision of the court was rendered under date of March 18, 1960 which is subject to appeal within 60 days from date of judgment.

7. Answered by No. 5.

EAST-WEST EXPRESSWAY, MONTREAL—HOUSING CONSTRUCTION, ST. HENRI COUNTY

Question No. 324—Mr. Lessard:

1. Have there been any negotiations between officers of the Department of Public Works and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and representatives of the city of Montreal, regarding the east-west elevated expressway and its effect on the construction of low cost rental units in the county of St. Henri?
2. If so, what stage have such negotiations reached?
3. Have any officers of the department or Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation examined this problem, and what are their findings?

Answer by: Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works):

1. No.

2. Answered by 1.

3. No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 5, 1960

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. PICKERSGILL—ALLEGED INCOMPLETE RETURN RESPECTING PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege. Yesterday a return was made to an order of the house respecting a question of mine which was passed on March 9, having reference to federal payments to provincial governments and the increase therein. The answer to the first part of this return shows the total amount as $208.8 million. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) when speaking in the house yesterday said that the same payments for the current year were $689 million. It is perfectly obvious that there has been a misinterpretation of or a misunderstanding about this return. What I think has happened is that only so-called conditional and not unconditional payments were included. I just wish to draw that to the attention of the house and ask that the return be made complete.

AGRICULTURE

NOVA SCOTIA—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE ON DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Yesterday the Minister of Agriculture said that he had tabled correspondence between the premier of Nova Scotia and the government of Canada relating to deficiency payments. I looked for that correspondence yesterday, and I could not find it.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I said yesterday that I believed it had been sent in either Friday afternoon or yesterday morning. In checking up on it I found it was sent in yesterday. Maybe it was delayed in the mail, or something; I do not know, but it was mailed from my office in the Confederation building yesterday.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. Noel Dorion (Bellechasse) presented the first report of the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Indian affairs, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BRIDGES

JACQUES CARTIER BRIDGE, MONTREAL—ANNOUNCEMENT OF ARRESTS BY R.C.M.P.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in view of the question asked yesterday, to which I was not in a position to reply fully, perhaps I may inform the house at this time that three former toll collectors on the Jacques Cartier bridge were arrested yesterday, arraigned this morning and released on bail of $200 each. Three other former toll collectors were arrested this morning and it is expected they will be arraigned this afternoon.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

SOUTH AFRICA—REPORTED SHORTAGE OF MEDICAL SUPPLIES AT NEGRO HOSPITAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of the news and television reports that there is a shortage of medical supplies at the Nyanga negro hospital in South Africa. Is the Canadian government prepared to make an offer of needed medical supplies in order to assist in the treatment of the wounded at this hospital?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): No report has been received by myself or by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I have been informed by the minister, with regard to this matter. When it is received, in the ordinary course of events, it will receive consideration. As we all know, assistance in situations such as this is given through the Red Cross and otherwise.

SOUTH AFRICA—SUGGESTED GRANTING OF ASYLUM TO REFUGEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I have a supplementary question to direct either to the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the government prepared to consider doing as the United Kingdom government is reported as now doing, granting asylum in Canada to negro refugees or fugitives from South Africa?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): There is no suggestion of that, either, but we would give consideration to any request that might be made.

Mr. Argue: I have a supplementary question. Will the government give consideration to this question since it has now been raised?

Mr. Green: The hon. member knows that government policy on questions of this kind would have to be announced in due course.

TRADE

RUSSIA—REPORTED VISIT OF CANADIAN OFFICIAL RESPECTING IMPORTATION OF AUTOMOBILES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of National Revenue this question. Can he say whether it is a fact that an official from his department has gone to the Soviet union? If that is the case, will the minister say whether or not his visit has to do in any way with Soviet union made automobiles?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I shall have to take that question as notice, Mr. Speaker. It certainly has nothing to do with the proposed discussion about Russia-made automobiles.

RUSSIA—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT RESPECTING EXTENSION OF AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether the trade treaty with the Soviet union, which was on the verge of signature some time ago, is likely soon to be signed?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): That continues to be our hope, Mr. Speaker. There is presently in Moscow a delegation of officials headed by Mr. J. H. Warren, the assistant deputy minister of trade and commerce, and that delegation is there for the purpose of continuing the negotiations with the appropriate persons representing the government of that country.

HOUSING

C.M.H.C. LOANS—INQUIRY AS TO AMORTIZATION PERIOD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Will the minister advise the house whether or not loans to be granted to owner-applicants by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation can be amortized over a period of 30 years?

[Mr. Argue.]

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

IMMIGRATION

IRENE REBRIN—REPORTED RECALL OF PASSPORT BY DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. I apologize for not sending him notice, but it was impossible to do so. My question is based on a very recent inquiry from Vancouver with respect to Miss Irene Rebrin's case. There has been a great deal of interest in this case in Vancouver.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the Prime Minister this question. In view of the fact that this young lady's passport has been taken up by the immigration department, was it taken at his request? Second, has the Prime Minister been informed that Dag Hammarskjold, secretary general of the United Nations, has expressed interest in this case?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday a question was asked similar to the one asked a moment ago by the hon. gentleman. At that time I said the question would be discussed by me with the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough) and other appropriate ministers. That discussion has commenced, and the minister should be in a position very shortly to say something definite in this regard.

As to the second portion of the question, may I say that I have no information in that regard.

INCOME TAX

DEDUCTIBILITY OF CONTRIBUTIONS TO MORAL RE-ARMAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask the Minister of National Revenue whether he has now had time to look into the matter of the deduction for income tax of donations to Moral Re-Armament? He indicated last week that he would look into the matter.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I have not as yet received a report on that matter. As I said, I believe, it has to do with a ruling on whether it is a charitable organization.

PUBLIC SERVICE

OTTAWA—STATEMENT ON REPORTED RESTRICTION IN ADVERTISEMENT FOR ELECTRICAL MAINTENANCE MAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yesterday the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) inquired regarding an application for the position of electrical maintenance man at the Ottawa airport, which had been advertised by the civil service commission as open to residents of the Toronto air services region.

For purposes of efficient administration the air services branch of the Department of Transport operates through a series of regional headquarters which have extensive operational authority delegated to them. It is the custom of the civil service commission to advertise public competitions on an area basis related to these regional areas of administration.

The Ottawa river forms the boundary line between the Ontario and Quebec regions, so that the competition advertised for Ottawa airport through the Toronto headquarters would include the Ottawa area but not Hull. On the other hand, residents of Hull would be eligible for regional competitions in the Quebec area, which has its headquarters at Montreal.

This regional organization of our air services branch, including the present boundaries, and the civil service commission practice of advertising competitions on this regional basis, were established over 10 years ago under the previous administration. I am a little surprised, therefore, if the hon. member takes exception to the practice we are following, that he did not take the matter up with my predecessors under the previous government when they were in office.

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Seeing that the airport of Ottawa is much nearer than the airport at Dorval and that the minister promised to change everything which was not going well in Canada, does he not think it is time to make a change?

Mr. Hees: I might say I am surprised that the hon. member had not shown such zeal during the past 10 years in his dealings with the hon. member for Laurier and Mr. Marler along these same identical lines.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ELLIOT LAKE—ANNOUNCEMENT OF VISIT BY MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition asked me a question some days ago regarding Elliot Lake and I told him I would give an answer as soon as I could.

I am now in a position to advise that on Saturday the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Labour will visit Elliot Lake to discuss the whole situation with representatives in that area. This is in sequence to the fact finding committee which recently visited the same area, that committee being headed by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Labour.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister whether in view of the proposed visit, which I am sure will be welcomed by the inhabitants of Elliot Lake, it is not now intended to make available to the house the report of the fact finding committee until after the ministers' return?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think it would be better to discuss that matter after the return of the ministers, if the hon. gentleman would agree.

(Translation):

VALCARTIER QUEBEC—REPORTED DISMISSAL OF EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Lafreniere (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Defence Production. Is the minister aware of a report published in La Presse of April 4, 1960, to the effect that 450 employees of the Canadian Arsenals in Valcartier will be discharged on April 17, 1960?

Has the minister any comments to make on this matter?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): I read this report in La Presse. It was a statement by Mr. Marchand, secretary general of the Catholic labour unions of the province of Quebec, saying that 450 employees of Canadian Arsenals would be discharged on April 17. Mr. Marchand's statement is altogether untrue. Forty one employees were actually discharged at the end of March, because they were over 65, and for other reasons. Moreover, the contract for cartridge cases has been completed in Valcartier. We are not expecting any change or any layoffs of Quebec arsenals employees in the coming months.

(Text):

TELEVISION

CANCELLATION OF INTERVIEW WITH LEADER OF OPPOSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the minister who reports for the C.B.C. Would the minister give the house an explanation as to why a sponsored interview scheduled during the Saturday night telecast of the Toronto-Detroit hockey game with a well known Canadian athlete, the Leader of the Opposition, was cancelled?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the question should be directed to the Leader of the Opposition, because apparently he knows more about this than I do. I read the interesting story on the front page of the Globe and Mail this morning, and I suspected that somebody might be asking me about it. I will obtain a report on the matter and answer in due course.

Mr. Argue: I wonder, when the minister has obtained a report, whether he would make a further inquiry as to the explanation given by the public relations officers that if the Leader of the Opposition had appeared it would have been a political appearance, but that it was a public service when the Minister of Transport spoke on national health week.

Mr. Nowlan: I refuse to commit myself, Mr. Speaker, in discussing the activities of public relations officers of any corporation anywhere, at any time.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): When the minister is making an investigation into this interesting matter, I wonder if he would get the text of the statement made by the Minister of Transport on a similar occasion advocating national health?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Perhaps I might answer that, Mr. Speaker. That is impossible because I spoke from the heart, not from a text.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister whether it is not correct that the Minister of Transport always speaks from the heart rather than the head?

[Mr. O'Hurley.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—STATEMENT ON PARIS MEETING OF DEFENCE MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister any statement to make to this house following his meeting in Paris with the other defence ministers?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): I could make a brief statement if required, Mr. Speaker, as I expected there might be such a question raised.

I think the best way of describing this meeting would be to say it was a "technical session" during which were discussed various matters of interest to defence which will be further considered by the military committee in order that they may be brought forward to the NATO council in permanent session.

The question of the logistic support of the alliance was discussed with special reference to the problems of the Federal Republic of Germany. These are to be examined by the NATO military authorities in full co-operation with West Germany and the other nations directly concerned, which means that General Norstad will consider what contributions the various NATO countries can make to the solution of Germany's problems. It was urged that these be found within the NATO area.

Ministers also discussed ways in which the efforts of the alliance could be better co-ordinated in the fields of research, development and production in order to take advantage of the skills and capabilities available in NATO countries. This matter was referred to the NATO armaments committee. A list of various projects planned or under development in the several NATO countries will be submitted for study. In this way it is hoped to make progress toward preventing duplication. This item is of special interest to Canada. I expect that several of our country's projects will be reported upon and, of course, Canada would benefit if it were found that any were generally acceptable for use within the alliance.

Questions of defence planning were raised, increased emphasis being placed on immediate readiness and the first phase of a war. The military committee is to examine the suggestions made during the discussion and report by July 1 upon the consequences, particularly with respect to the logistics. As to sharing the burden, numerous suggestions were advanced so as to enable all member nations to train and maintain their forces at the level agreed upon by the north Atlantic council.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I read a newspaper report the other day to the effect that some equipment was to be made by several of the NATO countries in concert, and wondered if this same committee has recommended any other equipment which could be manufactured partially at least in Canada, or if results have yet been achieved in this field.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, the suggestion was made that the countries should submit a list of the projects they were carrying out, and that the armaments committee would prepare a list of about 20 promising projects for further examination.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question arising out of his statement—if I understood it correctly—that if bases were not available in NATO countries or West Germany they might be found outside those countries. Was any restriction in that regard suggested to West Germany, in regard to territory suitable for such bases?

Mr. Pearkes: The question of bases was discussed, and it was referred to General Norstad to examine the need of bases, training facilities and supply bases in peace and in the various phases of war. He was urged to find these bases within the NATO area.

Mr. Hellyer: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell us whether there was any discussion about the continued use by Canada of French bases for the R.C.A.F. after we have re-equipped with planes carrying atomic weapons?

Mr. Pearkes: No, Mr. Speaker, that subject was not raised.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSED PROVISION OF ACREAGE PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question based on an interview given to the Regina Leader-Post on March 5 by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, in which he suggested that farm leaders should sit down with the government and discuss alternatives to grain deficiency payments such as acreage payments. Is it the intention of the government to provide acreage payments this year to farmers in western Canada?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman with his wide experience on the treasury benches will realize that the only appropriate answer is that this is a matter of government policy to be announced in due course.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Monday, April 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Benidickson, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Regier.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday night I listened very attentively to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). First he gave us a résumé of the economy, in which he could see nothing but roses.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest that the hon. member wait for one minute, as there is considerable movement in the house at the moment which will soon settle down.

Mr. Badanai: I was just saying, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Finance last Thursday night gave us a résumé of the economy in which he could see nothing but roses. Then he proceeded to enumerate small changes described in various terms such as "minor" and "technical". For all practical purposes the budget did not create the spontaneous, resounding applause that those on the government side of the house had hoped for, because the position is practically the same as it was before March 31. No one anticipated a general slashing of taxes, but there was plenty of justification for anticipating the removal or at least a reduction of some taxes, such as the excise tax on passenger motor cars, which has been suffocating an industry that has contributed more to the coffers of the receiver general, to employment and to the all-round standard of living of Canadians than any other industry.

The automotive industry in Canada today can be regarded, directly and indirectly, as one of the major employers of labour. This industry provides more jobs than any other industry. The total value of its products in 1959 was $1 billion. There are approximately five million motor cars and trucks using the highways of this nation, and where great distances might seem an obstacle to national advancement the motor vehicle has supplemented the railways and the waterways in opening new territories for development.

I shall proceed to outline briefly the impact of the automotive industry on our national life. The reason I am bringing this industry to the attention of the Minister of Finance is that, nothwithstanding its many contributions, the minister has again ignored the need for the elimination of the discriminatory excise tax on automobiles which now, more than ever, is an obnoxious tax on Canadian made cars and is only creating a favourable climate for the sale of foreign importations.

There is no Canadian employment in the manufacture of imported passenger cars and substantially less tax revenue for the government from their sale, but the most important factor is the reduction in employment in the Canadian manufacturing plants. To illustrate this point, among the principal Canadian automobile factories the monthly average of employment was 40,243 in 1956, whereas in 1959 the monthly average of persons employed in these plants was only 33,160. Yet more passenger cars were sold in Canada last year than in 1956.

The hon. member for Laval, speaking on this subject last night, had this to say as found in the translation of his speech:

> As you can see, this government has improved the economic situation of the country. In the field of industry, again there is progress. For the automobile industry, for instance, we have some revealing figures.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the revealing figures are the figures of new car registrations in Canada from 1955 to 1959 inclusive. These figures are as follows:

1955
Made in Canada	332,929
Made in United Kingdom	13,864
Other European cars	7,943
Made in United States	27,046

These figures are revealing indeed. They reveal the fact that if all these imported cars had been manufactured in Canada it would have resulted in the additional employment of roughly 16,400 persons. I am not suggesting that the elimination of the excise tax would automatically stop the importation of automobiles, but I am sure it would result in a reduction in importations, and a beneficial effect on sales of Canadian made cars would undoubtedly be the outcome.

It is a matter of more than passing concern that the excise tax affects the share of the market obtained by Canadian companies. Even the most cursory examination of the share of the market obtained by the less expensive foreign cars leads to the conclusion that consumers are sensitive to variations in the price spread between imported and domestic models. The price spread resulting from the application of the excise tax on a Canadian produced car which is sold to the public for $3,000 and a European automobile which is sold for say $2,000 amounts to about $90. The removal of the excise tax and thus the removal of the price spread it creates of about $90 could have an important effect on the share of the market to be obtained by Canadian produced cars.

Relief from the excise tax on passenger cars is needed to help the Canadian motor car manufacturing industry combat the increasing sales of European cars, and would permit the continued growth of the Canadian passenger car manufacturing plants. But, Mr. Speaker, over and above all I have said with regard to the facts and figures, the excise tax is discriminatory because the automobile is the only major consumer article still subject to special taxation, and I submit to the minister that a re-examination of this provision should be made without undue delay looking to the elimination of this unwarranted tax.

Mr. Spencer: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Badanai: Yes.

Mr. Spencer: I hope he will correct me if I am wrong, but I understood him to say that if the excise tax on automobiles were removed it would enable the Canadian industry to supply the cars which are now being imported from abroad. That was substantially his point. Is the hon. member aware that the excise tax is applied also to imported cars, and in the light of that fact will he kindly explain how the removal of the excise tax is going to have any bearing on the importation of cars from abroad?

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Speaker, the question is really not particularly relevant to the subject, nor to the figures which I quoted. There is a difference between an imported vehicle being sold for $2,000 and one made in Canada and sold for $3,000. There is an excise figure of approximately $90. I can substantiate that, and I shall do so if my hon. friend wants an example.

I suggest that the government should give serious consideration to the production of the Bobcat, which is an amphibious vehicle developed by the Department of National Defence and engineers of the Canada Car Company, whose plant in Fort William would be in the immediate position to proceed with its production. The reason I am advocating that this vehicle be used for the opening up of the far north is that until recently it was the objective of the government, and now it seems to be totally ignored.

Those of us who were hoping to see a budget designed to create jobs for the unemployed certainly could not cheer. Only the day before the budget Chrysler Corporation of Canada announced that some 3,500 workers were being laid off in a shut-down of all passenger car production. Some of these will return to work, while others will be laid off indefinitely. I hold in my hand a clipping from the Fort William Times-Journal of April 2, which indicates a serious and alarming unemployment situation. I am going to quote only a paragraph:

> An all-time record high of 10,527 people are seeking employment according to figures which reached the lakehead employment advisory committee during their March meeting.

The move to amalgamate the telegraph services at Fort William, which cannot be assessed but as a step toward a program to merge all telegraph services across the country, is just a beginning of a nation-wide scheme to bring about the physical amalgamation of the two railways, a proposal which was originated by the Conservative government of R. B. Bennett in the 1930's. Only last week at a meeting of the committee on railways, air lines and shipping, attended by the president of the Canadian National Railways, Mr. Donald Gordon, and some of his officials, it was brought out that extensive reductions in service on sections of the line to Sioux Lookout and between Atikokan and Rainy River were effected, as well as at Reddit, Armstrong, Nakina and Longlac, and Belleville in the eastern part of the province of Ontario. As a result Sioux Lookout, a railway town dependent for its existence upon the Canadian National Railways, will be on the verge of becoming a ghost town. I am told that the morale among the men in those sections of the Canadian National railway system has never been as low as it is at the present time.

It is all very well to be pleased with a budget which forecasts a surplus, but with nearly 800,000 unemployed the satisfaction is but of short duration. I have had occasion to say, and I say it again, that I would rather see deficit financing, with full employment of the available manpower of the country than a financial statement in the black with massive unemployment. Our human resources are paramount, and their welfare should be the first consideration of any government. I do not mean to imply that those who are occupying the treasury benches are less concerned with the welfare of the people. I suggest that the Minister of Finance and his colleagues have been listening to the wrong prophets and, for whatever reason, have not been able to come up with the right answer to cure unemployment, and that these trends toward amalgamations or mergers of services will not produce results acceptable to the Canadian people.

On February 18 I asked the Minister of Finance whether he would consider the removal of the burden of double taxation on those people who have received or will receive payments under the Ontario health plan and who cannot deduct those medical expenses from their taxable income even though they have paid taxes on their contributions to the plan. The minister informed the house that it was not appropriate to discuss fiscal policy during the question period. Now I expect it to be quite in order for me or for any other member to ask the minister, since the federal government contributes only a portion of the cost of this plan, whether some adjustment could not be made so the provincial and personal share of these payments might be deducted from taxable income.

To illustrate my point, prior to January, 1959 a person who was covered for hospitalization and medical care under Blue Cross paid $5.40 per annum more than he is paying for his present coverage under the Ontario hospital plan and Blue Cross for semiprivate and P.S.I. medical. In 1958 he was allowed to deduct all hospital expenses from his taxable income. In 1959 this person was hospitalized twice, but he can deduct only his semiprivate room charge of $3 per day instead of the full charge of $23.25 per day. This means that instead of having a tax refund of $45.70 for 1959 he is allowed a refund of only $5.70. In other words the government charged the extra $40 against its contribution of only one third of the cost of hospitalization.

I express the sincere hope that in what the minister did not spell out in his statement last Thursday, when he said that minor adjustments will be made, he had this particular feature in mind.

On Friday, March 18 I asked the Minister of National Revenue whether the government had made any attempt to evaluate the impact that the selling of duty and tax free goods by International Resort Facilities Limited to United States tourists at border points is going to have on small retail merchants who derive their livelihood from the tourist trade. A few days later the minister replied to the effect that it was impossible to determine the impact of that business because operations had not yet started.

This is a question which has engaged the attention of the tourist industry as well as the retail merchants association. It has been reported that this scheme may well cost Canada a lot of money as a result of the dislocation of small businesses and the diversion of customs duties and sales tax revenue from the federal treasury.

The Minister of National Revenue also indicated in his reply that the company involved, namely International Resort Facilities Limited, was incorporated in the regular way under the Canadian Companies Act. This is, of course, not a question of legality but of whether or not this type of free shops merchandising is in the national interest. These shops will be stocked with samples of imported goods, cameras, perfumes, watches and clothing. While Canadian goods will probably be on display, the visitor will be tempted to buy goods imported from abroad and brought into this country in bond so they can be sold without customs and excise taxes.

Theoretically any merchant could set up a bonded warehouse, but in practice small retailers could not afford such an overhead, with the result that they will be the losers in competition for the tourist dollars. Those feeling the effects of these free shops will be not only merchants operating at border cities anywhere in Canada, but the chief losers will be a large section of our national retailers. I suggest that a close study be made of this new type of merchandising which might cause more trouble than the extra dollars are worth to the country even if, indeed, it should mean extra revenues, something which I doubt.

About a year ago, on the occasion of a debate on a supply motion, the Leader of the Opposition introduced the subject of Canadian-United States relations and during the course of that debate I mentioned the move by the city of Chicago to have an increase in the diversion of water from lake Michigan from 1,500 to 2,500 cubic feet per second, the effect of which would have been a threat to the water levels of the great lakes. You will recall that the bill passed the United States Senate, but fortunately it was vetoed by the President. Now they are at it again, and I do not know whether this government can stem the tide. I therefore wonder whether a proposal formulated in the mind of one of our brilliant young engineers, namely Mr. Thomas Kierans, who hails from the city of Sudbury, has sufficient merit for this government to give it serious consideration.

Briefly, the plan would be to take fresh water from rivers flowing into James bay and divert it by way of the Harricanaw river into the Ottawa and Mattawa rivers, lake Nipissing and the French river into Georgian bay; in stages, up to 25,000 cubic feet of water per second would be diverted. The beginning stage calls for the diversion of about 4,000 cubic feet of water per second from the Bell river to the Harricanaw river near the height of land south of James bay. This initial diversion, according to Mr. Kierans' estimate, could be completed within three to four years.

What Mr. Kierans suggests, however, is a study which would determine the feasibility of the plan. Mr. Kierans submitted his original idea to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Unfortunately the minister's reaction was negative. On the other hand the reaction of Robert Macaulay, minister of energy and resources in the Ontario provincial government, was receptive, so much so that Mr. Macaulay has initiated a study of the plan with his energy committee and with Ontario hydro.

Inasmuch as the United States government is plagued by the continuing problem of water diversion from the great lakes by the city of Chicago and the state of Illinois, the plan was taken to Washington by Mr. Robert Evans of Sudbury. There Mr. Evans was received by Senator Fulbright, chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee; by Senator Paul Douglas of Illinois and Senator Alexander Wiley of Wisconsin. Senator Douglas is working hard to secure more water for his state. Senator Wiley is emphatically opposed to further diversion.

There is pending now before the Senate foreign relations committee a bill called H.R. 1, which calls for a study of the Chicago water diversion problem, while at the same time it would permit Chicago to divert 1,000 cubic feet per second more of water from the great lakes. That city is at present taking 1,500 cubic feet per second for sanitary and shipping purposes, and an additional 1,800 cubic feet per second for domestic clear water purposes.

The bill already has passed the house and should be reported out from the Senate foreign relations committee to the Senate floor within the next few days. In the meantime Senator Wiley sees the Kierans plan as a possible solution to the long time problem. He told Mr. Evans he would recommend that the United States initiate funds to study its feasibility, with the permission and co-operation of Canada. I understand that the Prime Minister has been informed of the plan. I would therefore suggest to the Minister of Finance that he make money available, if necessary, for initiating a study of this plan with the co-operation of the United States.

Mr. Kierans prepared a substantial brief, a copy of which I believe is in the hands of the Prime Minister. I am just quoting from one page of it. It contains that proposal and suggests that the advantages that project could offer to Canada include the following:

(a) Profit from the sale of water to certain water deficient areas in North America.

(b) Hydroelectric energy from the fall of the new water on the southern side of the height of land.

(c) A barge navigation channel from James bay to the great lakes and the lower Ottawa, thus providing a low cost transportation system for the large iron ore reserves of the James bay area.

(d) An opportunity to open for economic development a very large area of Canada now only very sparsely settled.

In his budget speech the Minister of Finance acknowledged the demand made upon the government for devaluation of the Canadian dollar to the level of the United States dollar. As reported at page 2673 of Hansard he had this to say:

There is a related question upon which I should like to dwell for a moment. This is the question of our exchange rate. The external price of our Canadian dollar has been high for eight years now and is currently running about 5 per cent above the United States dollar. The situation has been brought about mainly as a result of an inflow of foreign capital and reflects the confidence of outsiders in the soundness of the management of our financial affairs. Admittedly it lowers the prices received in Canadian dollars by those exporters who have to sell in world markets at world prices.

Further on the same page he continued:

It might well be that the government could not reduce the inflow of funds sufficiently without imposing direct controls on capital movements and then on the movement of goods. Apart from the economic objections to such policies it would be a very difficult matter to work out effective technical means of control. Even then the controls would not be effective unless the objective were one which commanded the broad public support which is necessary for general compliance. In other words we would be embarking upon a gigantic financial speculation with no assurance of success.

With that statement the minister is attempting to give this question an air of finality which should not be raised now or ever, at least until the government will decide when it will be appropriate for further review. The minister contended that the inflow of foreign capital was responsible for the premium on the Canadian dollar, but said nothing about the borrowing in the United States by provincial governments and municipalities and private corporations, a procedure which many would agree to have been chiefly the result of poor financial management. It is a statement which does not take into consideration the artificial value of the dollar which in reality, having regard to its true value in relation to our trade deficit, should be worth only 95 cents instead of $1.05 in United States dollars. I think the truth of the matter can be found in the suggestion that the Canadian dollar is presently being manipulated by a few international financiers.

The artificial value of our dollar is damaging our tourist industry to the tune of millions of dollars. It has severely handicapped northwestern Ontario major industries, pulp and paper and forest products, and the iron ore from Steep Rock iron mines. I submit to the minister that he would render Canada an excellent service if he would reconsider the question in the light of what parity of our dollar with that of the United States would mean to our export trade and to the development of Canada.

In the matter of civil service salaries, the minister made an astonishing statement to the effect that the last general increase in civil service salaries was authorized by the present government in July, 1957. He very conveniently omitted to say that the general increase had been proposed and approved by the government of the previous prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, as of May of that year, several days before the then prime minister decided to resign. The increase at that time ranged from 3½ to 12 per cent, or an average of 6 per cent. On the same date increases to the armed forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were also granted. After the brush-off which the civil service received from the present government last year we at least anticipated that in this year's budget a general increase would be forthcoming for all civil service employees, not only for a fraction of the number who will benefit by the minister's announcement. Perhaps among those hardest hit by this omission are the postal employees who are actually in receipt of a lower net income than they enjoyed three years ago.

There is another important omission about which the minister failed even to whisper; that is, giving civil servants who do not occupy executive positions the right to bargain, in the same way as members of police forces and firemen, and the protection that none should suffer the penalty of dismissal for attending a political meeting. The granting of these rights would remove the stigma of being considered second class citizens subject to penalties and loss of employment. As far as the civil service is concerned, this budget can be labelled the half a loaf budget of 1960 to be divided among a fraction of the civil service body.

On January 20, on orders of the day, I asked the Minister of Finance if he would inform the house whether a borrower from the industrial development bank could prepay a loan without having to pay a penalty, and if not why not. The minister's answer was to the effect that the industrial development bank is a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada and that he, as Minister of Finance, had no control over it.

The reason which prompted me to ask the question was that a firm in my constituency, on whose lands and buildings the industrial development bank loaned $60,000 on a mortgage, recently had sold a part of their assets consisting of small boats which they manufactured, some machinery and stock. Consequently they wished to prepay the sum of $25,000 on the mortgage; and all things considered, when money is still in a strait-jacket this prepayment or any prepayment of loans should be welcomed by the government-owned bank. But because the mortgage contained a clause under which the bank reserved the right to charge a premium on prepayments which amounted to one tenth of one per cent, multiplied by the number of months in advancement of the date the instalments fell due, the premium asked was excessive. The manager of the company wrote a letter asking me to bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of Finance in the hope that he would see the merit of the request, which resulted in the question and answer as reported in Hansard of January 20 last, pages 135 and 136.

I did, however, receive a detailed explanation from the secretary of the industrial development bank, which contained the following paragraph:

> Many mortgage lenders do not permit prepayment of mortgages at all and where prepayment is permitted, it is the usual practice to charge a prepayment fee whenever any amount is prepaid.

This would mean, then, that the government-owned industrial development bank has adopted the practice and regulations of ordinary moneylenders. It is a matter of regret that the minister overlooked the importance of suggesting an amendment of this practice to the industrial development bank. The statement of profit and loss for the year ending September, 1959 reported a rather healthy profit of $1,533,363, and an amendment which would remove the objectionable feature of premiums on prepayments of loans would in no way prejudice the profit position and purpose of the bank.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this budget, and I am very pleased and proud to do so. We have a courageous budget introduced by a courageous and capable minister. This budget, as has been well said, stands to hold the line. At a time like this holding the line is a necessary thing. We have to learn to live within our means. We have been living beyond our means, but now we are going to stand and move forward from here. I compliment our minister and the government for taking this stand, which every thinking man in Canada knows has to be taken.

I am pleased, however, to see that even in this year of holding the line we have not forgotten the great body of civil servants who run our country so efficiently. As usual the members of "the group" have criticised the stated contribution to this effort. They say "too late and too little". The sum of $15 million, I might point out, is only the minimum set aside for this purpose and, as has been promised by the government, a full review of the civil service is being made and many groups will benefit in the near future.

Amongst these no doubt will be the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. This body of men have been notoriously underpaid ever since 1873. I would say that the basic pay is now more realistic, but there are still certain groups within that body, notably the sergeants and the superintendents, who are underpaid. Bearing in mind the responsibilities they hold and the service they are giving to this country I would recommend to the government that when they are making this review they give special consideration to these particular groups. I served for some 23 years with the mounted police; therefore I speak with firsthand information.

Although I have no doubt that we are moving forward and will continue to move forward, there is still one part of the population which has not come fully into its own, and that is the agriculture industry. In particular I refer to the small family farm. The bureau of statistics assures us that the family farm is now getting a fair share of the national income. I do not think this is quite accurate. I think agriculture has gone forward, and that total income has increased. However, we have an inequity in the agricultural picture. I see a tendency to return to the feudal system in agriculture, not on account of claims of birth or blood but on account of the claims of finance. Today our farms are highly mechanized. Today a farmer needs a lot of capital, and it is not easy in a free economy to make capital available down to the level of the family farm.

I have consulted with farm groups who have come from all across Canada, and have tried to get them to define the family farm. They refuse to do so, and I think this failure is due to the fact that the better-off farmers are able to use their influence within their own groups to press for those things in agriculture which help the men with the most money. This tends to concentrate agricultural income into fewer and fewer hands, regardless of the increased income available to agriculture generally.

At this point I would ask permission to have the following tables printed in Hansard. The source is the dominion bureau of statistics census of Canada, and the tables purport to give the over-all figures of the number of farms in Canada in 1941, 1951 and 1956, and the number of farm holdings by size of farms in 1951 and 1956. These tables are too long to read at this time, and I think it would be for the convenience of the house if they were inserted in the record.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): These figures are from the bureau of statistics?

Mr. Bigg: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to have the tables referred to printed in today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: The tables referred to follow:]

Mr. Bigg: These tables show that there has been a great decline in the number of farms in Canada. Total acreage has not declined, but the number of farms has notably decreased with one exception, namely that in British Columbia the number of small holdings has increased.

This tendency to increase the size of our farms has a great many backers. The economists agree almost unanimously that the larger farms are more efficient. This means, of course, that you can produce more hogs in a large pen, more chickens in a large chicken house, and more cattle on a large ranch, with a corresponding reduction in the cost per head. It is also true that you can reduce the cost of grain per bushel as acreage increases.

I spent a good many years on a farm. I love the land, and so do most Canadians. It is not sentiment alone that gives us an attachment to the soil; it is a natural way of life. The small farmer on his own land is the happiest man in the world. He is healthy. He works hard. He produces natural wealth. He sleeps well, and he raises his family in the finest of surroundings. I can speak for the people in my district, some 65,000 strong, and say that our whole economy is based on the family farm.

I wish to bring to the attention of every person in Canada the fact that today the number of farmers is shrinking; the number of farm homes is declining; the number of children reared in rural surroundings is becoming fewer and fewer. Dollar efficiency is not the only question involved. We still want to draw on the farms for young men and young women who are healthy, strong and independent. I think this is an environment which must be retained. A few dollars today, properly invested in agriculture at the proper level, would help to do this.

This government is not approaching this question blindly. We have thought long and hard about this subject. A large number of hon. members who sit in this house today have a rural background, and we are trying hard to find a correct compromise between so-called efficiency and this rural way of life. I would have expected greater support from hon. members who have socialist views. They must see this trend, and at times they should be able to see that money wisely spent will help to accomplish what they claim they hope to accomplish, an even distribution of wealth. The program of this government is based on the retention of the family farm. Canada is still an agricultural country, and it is an agricultural exporting country.

Here again we have a double problem. If we decide to support the family farm this will mean it is likely to cost more to produce our goods, which will then be more difficult to sell in a fiercely competitive world market. However, I think we can achieve a happy medium. If we retain the family farm and still make sure that we produce beyond our needs and turn these products loose on the markets of the world, we can stabilize our economy at home and still be a blessing to the world at large. In order to accomplish this we have to make sure that the family farm is secure, and that is why we have gone in for support prices. We would have no need for support prices were our markets capable of absorbing the whole of our production. But it is hard to get the money down to the family farms when it is being picked up by the corporations who are competing.

We instituted a system of price support for hogs. What happened? Money poured out of the cities, and the farmers were offered an illusory security. They were told that if they worked hard for the corporations they would make more money and be more secure than they would be on their own. Then when the hog market collapsed in the circumstances—because this system always results in overproduction—the corporations withdrew their money from the market. The farmer was unemployed. He rushed to the city, and we find him on the unemployment rolls. If he had stayed on his farm and we had been able to assist him to remain independent, this would not have occurred. It seems to me that our Department of Agriculture has done well to realize that the only way to stop this process is to set a quota on hogs and reduce government support to 100 units. This is not foolproof but it does tend to cut down the extent of vertical integration in the hog industry.

There are one or two other matters I should like to deal with concerning what may be done beyond the home front. Trade is our life blood, and anything we can do to balance our trade will attack this problem from another direction. If we can retain and increase our world markets there will be a greater call for all our agricultural products, and then perhaps there will be a future even for corporation farming. In order to do this we must take steps to reduce the cost of marketing our grain, of transporting it to the lakehead and across the ocean. This must be done more cheaply and efficiently. Anything we can do to diversify our agriculture should be done. We should encourage the growth of things like rapeseed for use in the production of edible and lubricating oil. If we can get our rapeseed put on Crowsnest pass freight rates it will not only increase the return to the farmer but will make rapeseed oil competitive in the world markets.

Rapeseed is important at the present time in terms of our trade with Japan. Japan has been taking all the rapeseed we can produce. The production of rapeseed in western Canada is leaping ahead. If we can encourage farmers to put rapeseed into production in place of wheat in relation to certain acreages it will help us balance our trade, because rapeseed sells in the world market.

Transportation is very important in getting our goods to market. In my district of Athabasca I cannot exaggerate the necessity of improved transportation facilities. In an area of 60,000 square miles, three quarters of my district is absolutely without road communication of any kind. We do not even have air communication in a great many districts. At Fort Chipewyan, a community of 1,200 people, there is no road, no railway and no airstrip. It is true that in the summer one can land on the lake and in the winter when the lake freezes over it is possible to land on the icy surface, but for a period ranging from eight to ten weeks during the year this community of 1,200 people is completely cut off. We are going ahead with organizing the district so the community can take on the responsibility of a municipal airport.

The description I have given clearly indicates that Canada is still a pioneer country. These people are not whining for government help, but they do have to have it. The government must assist them in building the necessary facilities, just as we built the railroads for their fathers and grandfathers.

Roads still remain the most important link. As all hon. members know, roads are principally the responsibility of a province, but the government of the great province of Alberta has consistently refused to assist in the outlying districts, particularly in the northeast corner of the province.

If roads are to be built the federal government will have to assist in their construction. I think it has a perfectly good reason for doing so, because in the northeastern part of Alberta we have some of the finest tourist country in the whole of Canada. We have Wood Buffalo park with 15,000 buffalo. We have some of the finest fishing lakes in the world and some of the best hunting in the country. This is virgin territory with no roads, railways or other transportation. If the federal government were to assist in putting roads in there tourists, and particularly tourists from the United States, would flock in.

Some hon. members might wonder why I mention this in relation to trade, but tourist dollars are solid dollars. This is the most important kind of trade we can get at present to balance our trade with the United States. We want tourists, and in large numbers. We are not selling tourism in Canada as we should. We do not advertise the attractions of our country, and we do not even stay home and enjoy our own country. We spend far too much abroad which could be spent at home. All hon. members from eastern constituencies have a standing invitation to visit us in Alberta in September. We want you to come, and when you return we want you to tell everyone what you saw. When hon. members have done so people will come out west in large numbers.

It is useless to talk about agriculture, trade and the need for improved transportation if we do not have peace, and so I come down to the last and I think possibly the most important subject facing us today, the peace of the world and the defence of our nation. I suggest that this subject can be handled under two headings. We must be strong at home and we must be generous abroad. I am greatly assured, after hearing the speech of the Minister of National Defence, that we have a realistic approach to the defence of North America. If we keep North America strong and free it will serve as a launching pad for the peace of the world. Nothing less than a realistic approach to the defence of this continent is of any value. This is the time not for pacifism but for realism. It is a time to get ourselves in shape, physically, mentally and spiritually to accept this challenge. I repeat, we must be strong at home and generous abroad.

To be strong at home we need a strong air force. To understand what I mean you have only to visit Cold Lake airport, one of the finest airports in the world. You should see the morale of the men there in the Royal Canadian Air Force, the finest air force in the world. These boys are worried about the future of aviation and of the air force. I have told them and the Minister of National Defence has also told them that we are going to keep them flying. We are going to supply them with the finest up to date aircraft we can, bearing in mind our ability to produce and pay for such planes. I believe we will always need them. These boys are willing to fly the planes and, as I have said, I have assured them we will do everything in our power to see that they keep their wings. So much for the need of our being strong at home.

As my second point I mentioned that we must be generous abroad. We in Canada have learned complete tolerance. We are going to love our neighbour in a completely practical way. We intend to do our best to feed him. We have a future here in Canada to produce all the food we can as cheaply as we can and give it to the people of the world as quickly and as inexpensively as we can; but in order to do this we must bear in mind that charity begins at home. We want to take a long look at the family farm and make sure our agricultural policies are long term policies that will keep the farm family on the farm.

I think the most forward step we have taken in that direction to date has been through the provision of acreage payments. We have given the small family farmer a little shot in the arm, a bit of assistance, but it is not enough. The farmers are in need, and perhaps particularly those in my district where they have sustained three crop failures in a row and are hard pressed. I would strongly urge upon the government that again in this year of holding the line wo do not hold it too rigidly. I urge the government to see that the family farmer receives temporary support when he needs it. In my opinion he still requires this assistance to help him get back on his feet and keep him in the running.

If we take action in this regard then our policies of price supports, farm credit, emergency assistance for crops under the snow, crop insurance, land protection and rehabilitation, irrigration and all the measures we have undertaken will work out to the advantage of all Canadians. If we have a strong and healthy farm community at home we will be in a position to assist those in underdeveloped countries who require our aid.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, the budget speech affords the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) an opportunity to review the national accounts of the year which has passed, to describe the financial health of the nation, and in general to give an accounting of the government's stewardship in handling the nation's business. In an economy such as ours which is based mainly on free enterprise the main duty of the government is to create as far as possible a favourable economic climate wherein free men by exercising their free decisions can operate the various kinds of business with a minimum of interference and a maximum of success.

The budget speech should therefore provide clear and accurate information in a simple form so as to be readily accessible to the public. It should also contain an accurate account of all the financial activities of the government, a forecast of the economic weather that is likely to be encountered during the coming year, and it should indicate what adjustments the government is making to meet the situation and what part the public will have to play in this regard as well.

Since no government plans or action can be successful without the wholehearted cooperation of the people it is important that the people not only know and understand what defects exist in our economy but also how they came about, what forces caused them and how these forces can be neutralized or reversed.

If we appraise the budget by these standards I think it is fair to say that while it does contain a few items that will be welcomed by the Canadian people it also has some glaring deficiencies which will cause a great deal of disappointment to thinking people who are looking for clear, positive leadership at this very crucial period in our history. I would not wish for one minute to detract any credit or commendation from the minister for his efforts to achieve a balanced budget or for his easing of the double impact of the estate and income tax on the widows and children of deceased taxpayers.

I welcome also the increased payments to the lower paid civil servants. True, it is only an item of $15 million and only about 50,000 or one third of the total civil service force will benefit from it. Still it is better than nothing and I commend the minister for doing even that. But I must tell him at the same time that it destroys the argument that he used on a former occasion when he turned down a request of the civil service because of the high cost to the government as he stated at that time. Fifteen million dollars is not a very huge expenditure and if we can afford it this year I think we could very well have afforded it last year and perhaps have alleviated a great deal of the hardship which some of these poorly paid civil servants have had to undergo in the meantime.

The minister's efforts to enable us to live better electrically will no doubt be welcomed by people setting up new homes. It will help in some measure to reduce the cost of furnishing homes and in that way offset the rising costs due to the high interest rates that have to be paid on mortgages. But while giving the minister full marks for all these points, we cannot assess them at their true value unless we know their true cost and also know the motive that lies behind them.

It is interesting to note that a surplus, which was denounced as something very wicked by the minister and his party prior to the 1957 election, has now seemed to acquire at least a small measure of virtue. I do not know whether the virtue is to be measured by the size of the surplus. If so, we hope it will grow. But the difference between a $12 million deficit and a $12 million surplus will have a rather negligible effect on the economy and if that surplus is being acquired at the expense of hardship to certain individual Canadians or at the expense of the development of certain underdeveloped parts of our country, then I think we may very likely be paying too high a price for it. Also, if it is being acquired at the expense of an increase in veterans war pensions, which is more urgently needed at this time than in any past year, then again I doubt whether it is worth the cost. If in addition to this cost the motive behind it is purely political so that a balanced budget can be achieved before the next election, then, of course, that destroys its worth completely.

As the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) pointed out yesterday, there is a great deal of disappointment that the budget indicates that nothing is to be done to ease the cost of production in the fishing industry. The suggestions made by the fisheries council of Canada in this regard have not received favourable consideration. They were very modest requests and not only very practical but vital to the welfare of the fishing industry. The removal of the tax on diesel fuel would not mean a very large cost to the federal treasury but it would wipe out a great deal of discrimination between different types of fishing vessels and at the same time would enable the fish to be produced more cheaply. Not even the insignificant request that the tax be removed on diesel oil used in generating electricity within the fishing industry has received favourable consideration even though this privilege is and has been enjoyed by the mining industry for some years. The cost of drying fish is one of the main factors which will decide whether or not we can compete in foreign markets. The removal of the sales tax on imported driers and imported parts for maintenance would again be a great help to the fishing industry, but no special consideration has been given to any of these requests.

Also, there is nothing in the budget to indicate any encouragement of the development of our resources in the Atlantic provinces. There are no special tax incentives to induce enterprises to establish themselves in the maritimes and no word as to whether there is to be a modification of the industrial development bank or whether a development corporation is to be set up to introduce a measure of flexibility into our economy. Therefore we must conclude from the budget that the maritimes, or the Atlantic provinces, must still bear the full brunt of the bad effect of tight money and, at the same time, there will be no easing of the dollar premium which is a great handicap to our fish exporters who sell to the United States markets.

It seems to me that the main criticism of the budget is that it does not show any positive leadership. There is no recognition of the problems, no reappraisal, agonizing or otherwise, of the government's policies and no redirection of our economy.

The problems of the uneven development of our resources, to which I have just referred, which is a direct result of tight money and high interest rates; the growing hard core of the unemployed during relative prosperity; the pattern of unemployment which involves a much higher percentage of the work force in the Atlantic provinces than in other parts of Canada; the dangerous balance of our trade payments, especially in so far as invisible exports are concerned; our mounting debt, public and private; the high interest rates which have been frozen for some years to come by the uncallable bonds that the minister has put on the market; the effects that we must expect through automation; all of these problems have been entirely ignored. Apparently the government is operating on the principle that if we ignore them and leave them alone long enough they will go away of their own accord.

On this score the government has no reason to be proud of its stewardship. We know from the budget that the government's estimated expenditures for the coming year amount to $5,880 million. If we look at the estimates for 1957-58, which were the last estimates introduced by the former administration, we find that the estimated expenditures were $4,827 million, exactly $1 billion less. If we study the budget papers, at page 19 we find that the total federal expenditure for 1959 amounted to $6,359 million, and that the figure for 1957 was $5,337 million, again an increase of $1 billion in expenditures since this government took office.

If we look at page 18 of the budget papers and study the effect on the taxpayer and if we exclude the investment income we find that the total amount of money taken from the taxpayers in 1957 was roughly $5,300 million, but last year the government took $334 million more than this. If the minister's estimates are right for the coming year and are as accurate as he has boasted about last year's estimates, then he will take an extra $592 million from the Canadian taxpayers. I emphasize these figures, Mr. Speaker, because they come ill from a government which made so much fuss about waste and extravagance prior to the 1957 election, and which was elected on a firm pledge to cut expenditures by $500 million; a government which had also pledged not only to cut expenditures but to cut taxes as well. Therefore, these figures are interesting in that they highlight the wide discrepancy between the promises of this government before election and their performance since election.

If we look at the public debt—again on the same page of the budget papers—we find the same picture. In 1957 the interest on the public debt was $519 million; in 1959 it was $678 million, or $150 million more. If we look at the estimates for 1960-61 we find that the interest on the public debt is estimated at $774 million, which means an extra $250 million, which is going to be, as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) pointed out yesterday, a millstone which will hang around the necks of Canadians for many years to come.

It is unfortunate that we have so little information concerning private debt. I placed a question on the order paper some time ago and the answer, as recorded at page 2383 of Hansard, showed that in 1949 the total consumer debt of Canadians amounted to $582 million, but in 1959 the consumer debt of Canadians had increased to $2,076 million. These figures are not exactly comparable because they are different kinds of dollars. But if we reduce the $2,076 million of 1959 into 1949 dollars we get $1,490 million, which means an increase of $900 million in consumer debt during the last 10 years. Not only has consumer debt and public debt both increased, but interest rates have increased as well.

At page 2672 of Hansard the minister made reference to productivity. He said the following:

> We must place emphasis on greater productivity and efficiency rather than on sheer size, on cost control rather than on price increases, on greater saving rather than on excessive consumption.

I have been interested in this question of productivity for some time. I spent a whole week end in the library trying to discover information on this subject. Unfortunately, however, there does not seem to be any information available. We do not know what our man-hour productivity is here in Canada either in general terms or in specific industries. We do not even know what man-hours are worked each year. However, we know that the gross national product has increased by 3½ per cent. If we take into consideration the number of people who have had jobs during the year, it would appear that there is a slight increase in our productivity. But when we take into account the extra productivity in the agriculture industry, it is doubtful whether there has been any actual increase in productivity in the other sectors of our economy.

This question of productivity is of immense importance because unless we have some information about it we shall not be able to measure the effects of automation on productivity when its impact is fully felt. At present automation has not had a great effect on Canadian industry. For most Canadian small businesses automation machines are too expensive to be employed by them. However, the time is coming when these machines will be much cheaper and will be available to small industries. That day may not be far distant. A radio report this morning indicated that it might come within the next 10 years. When it comes it is going to bring with it a whole new set of social and economic problems. What are we doing to prepare for it? Certainly one of the first steps toward the preparation must be to make a study so that we shall have at our disposal accurate information on man-hour productivity in Canadian industry.

The inadequacy of our present economic system is increased by this lack of information. It is further complicated because we do not have an absolute unit with which to measure our wealth. How would we manage if we were obliged to use a yard or a pound that was different every year? No scientific progress was possible until absolute physical standards were evolved for length, weight and volume. Yet we measure our wealth in terms of a dollar that changes, not only from year to year but during the year as well. In fact, it changes practically every day in the year.

We are living in times when it is imperative that business firms and industry should be able to make rapid and accurate comparisons of cost control, price increases, efficiency and productivity at very short notice. But how can this be done with a unit that is constantly changing? Then again the dollar is not only a unit for measuring wealth, it is in addition a medium of exchange and on some occasions a commodity bought and sold on the world market. This situation raises a question as to whether these functions are compatible with each other. Should we not therefore have a royal commission to look into this subject and bring forward recommendations that can be used at least to introduce a measure of simplicity into our system?

In conclusion I should like to commend the minister for the little bit of indirect advice he gave to the people of Canada as reported at page 2672 of Hansard. This is what he said:

> Canadians can increase their own domestic capital and make this country financially more self-reliant if they are prepared to practise increased efficiency, productivity and thrift.

Then he goes on to say this, and this is the punch line:

> This responsibility falls on all levels of government, private business and individuals.

And, I presume, on the minister himself. It is true that we can do this as Canadians and we should do it. However, I think the burning question is this: Will we do it? When we are obliged to choose between the national interest and our own narrow self-interest do we as Canadians have sufficient self-discipline to put the national interest first?

I raised this question in the committee on railways, air lines and shipping a week or so ago. Mr. Donald Gordon complimented me on my altruism but he went on to say that in the hard bargaining that goes on between labour and management in working out their agreements he felt it is a little overoptimistic to expect that the national interest should be the overriding factor. However, unless the national interest becomes the overriding factor, these suggestions which the minister made will not produce any tangible effect.

Some time ago the Duke of Edinburgh called attention to our lack of physical fitness and most people in Canada agreed with him. Many editorials were written in praise and support of what the duke said. However, I think we need to ask ourselves whether this physical softness—if this physical softness is a fact—is not a reflection of our inner softness, our moral softness, our mental softness, our reluctance to do any hard thinking. If this is a fact, is it not true that most of our economic problems can be traced directly to this source?

We Canadians need to ask ourselves whether we are not a self-indulgent, pleasure-seeking, security-minded people, whether we are able to distinguish between our wants and our needs and whether we have the necessary self-discipline to make the right decision with the right motive.

As I was coming to work this morning I met a friend who told me a story about a farmer, and he used this story to illustrate the people's attitude toward government. This story came to my mind as I listened to the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Bigg) who preceded me in this debate. Illustrating the people's attitude toward government generally, he pointed to a litter of pigs in his pen and said, "That is just like it: those that are not sucking are squealing". And there may be a lot of truth in that statement.

In any case, if the minister's suggestions are going to bear any fruit, what Canada must have is a new concept of living, a new sense of purpose, and above all a new unifying idea which will enable us all to rise and work concertedly together, not only in the national interest but in the interests of the world as a whole.

Two weeks ago there was distributed to every home in Canada a little pamphlet called "Ideology and Co-Existence". I hope every Canadian will read this pamphlet not once but many times, because it not only describes the problems of mental softness and moral softness and the dangers inherent in them, but it also provides the answers to those problems as well.

Mr. J. C. MacRae (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my first words in contribution to this debate must be to compliment the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) upon his budget and his presentation of it. There is no question that in the next few weeks, perhaps the next few months, there will be many things said about this budget, many things complimentary and many things which are not complimentary. But over the week end I read these words in one of Canada's greatest newspapers in describing the budget which had been brought down. This newspaper said, "It was sound, it was solid, it was business-like and it was competent". I think those words are most applicable not only to the budget, to the minister and to his handling of his department, but also to the government of this country as it is constituted today.

In discussing the points which are brought out in the budget there are only two that I would like to discuss at this time. The first is the raise given to the civil servants. I think a very fine thing was done by this government in giving a raise to 50,000 clerks and those who are lower paid. I think they will welcome it; I am sure they will. I know that the representations which I have had from my own constituency in which there is a fairly high percentage of civil servants have been most reasonable at all times, and I know they will welcome this particular move on the part of the government. I think, too, that the review of civil service salaries in cycles and by groups is the correct and proper way to approach this particular problem.

I am distressed, as I am sure most thinking Canadians are, by the attitude which has been taken by certain of the leaders of the civil service association and the civil service federation. The language they have used as reported in the press over the last months is something you would expect to see perhaps in the Canadian Sailor, or something of that category. Of course, I am sure these gentlemen are honourable people, but they are trying to justify their own salaries as all union leaders try to justify their salaries. I think they have said many things which should never have been said. They should realize that this government will not be bludgeoned and bullied into doing anything. I think all Canadians are learning that the government will treat everyone fairly at all times.

There was another point brought out in the budget, and that was the relief given to the textile industry, especially to cotton milling firms. That was especially interesting to me because in my constituency we have a small cotton milling town which has been having a rather difficult time. We used to say years ago that you should never reinforce failure. Well, you should not, but I do not think the textile industry in this country should yet be considered a failure. I think it can be saved even in the face of competition from Japan, United States and other countries. This measure was most welcome to me and I am sure to the people of my constituency also.

For the few minutes I have today I should like to discuss a subject which is very dear to my heart, and that is the economy of Atlantic Canada, our maritime economy. I suppose that Upper Canadians, or sometimes we just call them Canadians, are tired of listening to this but it is something about which we feel very strongly. All of those who live in Atlantic Canada are interested in that part of the country and wish to stay there. Their roots are there and they would like to have their families remain there. We know that at confederation the maritime provinces were the most wealthy part of this country and the most heavily settled. We know, too, that in 1864 they were planning a maritime union. The father of our country, Sir John A. Macdonald, heard of this and hurried down to persuade them that rather than unite they should come into Canada as they were. Then in 1867 New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, along with Upper and Lower Canada, that is, Ontario and Quebec, united to form this great dominion. But this was not accepted by our people entirely. Of course, now they have forgotten, although peoples' memories are long and these things are handed down, but they hung black crepe on the doors in Halifax and Saint John on the first day of July, 1867.

From 1867 up until perhaps 1950 our economy has never been able to keep pace with the rest of Canada. We have dropped steadily back from an economic point of view. We know, of course, what our contribution has been to this country in war time. Those who met the men who served who came from the maritimes in the two great wars, great numbers of them, know the contribution they made. We all know what their contribution has been in peace. Great political figures have come from the maritimes to lead this country. Nova Scotia provided three prime ministers of Canada including the great Sir Robert Laird Borden. New Brunswick provided Richard Bedford Bennett and a prime minister of Great Britain, Bonar Law. We have provided industrialists, leaders of the church, of professions and education, such as the late Hon. Sidney Smith, so recently deceased, and other men of that calibre.

But this is changing. During the last decade in the maritime provinces there has been progress, and there has been progress for two reasons. I think the first one is that the people of Atlantic Canada are trying to raise themselves economically by their bootstraps. In fact they sometimes refer to it down there as "Operation Bootstrap".

One of the steps taken, and there are two I would like to discuss, has been the meetings of the Atlantic premiers which were instituted some seven or eight years ago, when the premiers of the four Atlantic provinces, regardless of their party affiliation began meeting to try to work out and do something about their mutual problems. Our own able and distinguished premier of New Brunswick, Hon. Hugh John Flemming, has always taken an active and leading part in these conferences.

Then there is another body which I have mentioned before but would like to mention again, the Atlantic provinces economic council, which was founded in 1954. Many things have been said about it, but here is a quotation from one of the Ottawa papers:

> The letters "APEC"—

They stand of course for Atlantic provinces economic council.

> —spell out a symbol of a new and united determination of the Atlantic provinces to force consideration . . . and correction . . . of economic problems of that area upon the rest of Canada. This is a citizen body now busily working to inform and consolidate public opinion behind the proposals of the four provincial governments for the development of these provinces.

From their statement of policy I should like to put a few words on record in this house as follows:

> What APEC is.
> The Atlantic provinces economic council is a voluntary association of industry, business organization and of individuals. Its objective is the raising of the economic status of the Atlantic provinces region.

APEC is non-political and non-profit making. Its basic idea lies in the man with an idea, an organization with a plan, a government with a policy, and is designed to produce economic betterment within the region and the Canadian nation as a whole. Just as in any organization where there are only men, it is always strengthened and made better because women take some part. The women of the Atlantic provinces now have their own women's Atlantic council.

Last September the annual meeting of the Atlantic provinces economic council was held in my home city of Fredericton and I had the opportunity to attend. I was amazed at the amount of work which these businessmen, leaders of the professions and others were doing. It is hoped that at the annual meeting in Halifax this fall there will be in attendance all the maritime senators and members of parliament.

Another excellent step which was taken because of APEC was the formation in London, England of the Atlantic provinces office under a very able businessman, Watson Jamer, who has already been successful in bringing some industry to Atlantic Canada. I was interested in a report in the press with regard to the possibility of further development of mineral sites in northern New Brunswick. Some of us believe there is a reserve of minerals in this area second to none in the world. The mines there which have been quiescent for the last year or two because of economic conditions affecting minerals will be going back into production, and that is most encouraging news to us.

Yes, we are showing initiative now in Atlantic Canada, and we are taking action with regard to our economic problems. We have one of the greatest basic assets—a stable, eager work force. We have electric power, and all we need is industry.

I should like to say that this government has done much for us since 1957. The equalization grants have been of great help in providing the money to do things which otherwise we could not have done; the aid given to our province in respect of electrical development—the building of thermal plants and transmission lines—has also been extremely valuable. I should like to quote a few figures which I have assembled in preparation for my contribution to this debate showing the expenditures in New Brunswick in two contrasting years. I will use the two years 1955, under the previous administration, and 1959. The comparison is interesting.

Department	1955	1959
Agriculture
Acquisition of buildings	$ 42,000	$ 346,000
Finance
Compensation in lieu of taxes	17,000,000	30,000,000
Payments to municipalities	218,000	925,000
Fisheries
Fish culture and development	155,000	204,000
Research	449,000	803,000
National Health and Welfare
Hospital and health grants	1,400,000	1,700,000
Northern Affairs
Construction of buildings	113,000	597,000
Forestry operations contributions	19,000	61,000
Spruce budworm program	314,000	452,000
Public Works
Construction and improvements	1,790,000	5,000,000
Trans-Canada highway contributions	510,000	11,000,000
R.C.M.P.
Acquisition of buildings	142,000	400,000
Transport
Acquisition of buildings and vessels	289,000	2,410,000

I have used round figures because I just wanted to point out the things which this government is doing for the Atlantic provinces.

I have, too, a clipping from a recent newspaper containing an article from the Canadian Press which reads as follows:

> Private and public investment in the Atlantic provinces is expected to reach a record $563 million in 1960, the Atlantic provinces economic council said today.

I should like to say a word about York-Sunbury, my own constituency. This has been the most successful year, I believe, in the history of that part of New Brunswick. I mentioned earlier how happy the people of Marysville would be over the tariff protection which is now to be accorded to their products. The Minto coal field in central New Brunswick has produced more coal this past year than ever before in its history. The new town of Oromocto beside Camp Gagetown continues to grow. We hope the new Department of Agriculture research station, costing nearly $2 million, will be ready this fall. We are experiencing a building boom second to none in our history.

Unemployment has been mentioned in this house on many occasions. It is true there are men and women who are unemployed in Fredericton as elsewhere, but I should like to tell the house about something that happened a few weeks ago. The daily Gleaner, the Fredericton newspaper, offered as a public service to those who were unemployed, the opportunity to advertise in its classified columns without cost if they wanted work. There were some 2,400 men and women drawing unemployment insurance benefits. After a few days had passed, and it had become known in the area that men and women could advertise without cost to themselves in the local paper, I decided to see how many people were actually advertising. The results were interesting. The first day I checked there were 17. The next day there were nine, and of these nine, most were repeats from the day before. One was the advertisement of a lady attempting to get pupils for piano lessons, and another was that of a high school girl who wanted to do baby sitting. I think there is a lesson here which we should take into account when we think of our unemployment figures today.

Another point which I think should be mentioned is this. I do not think unemployment should be used as a political football. I can remember the time after the election of 1957 when perhaps on occasion discussion in this house became acrimonious. In particular, I remember well one night when the opposition asked for unemployment figures. They were given, and they were considerably higher than they had been. As a matter of fact, they were higher than many of us would have liked to see. I recall that there were members of the Liberal opposition at that time who, like Horatius on the bridge, could scarce forbear to cheer. I remember only too well two of them in particular who did cheer at that point, the former hon. member for Portneuf and the former hon. member for Charlotte. Neither of them were here after March 31, 1958.

As I have said, we are raising ourselves by our bootstraps in the maritimes. However, there are one or two matters which I should like to bring to the attention of the government, things which I feel might be done to help us down there. I may say that none of us want any part of Canada to be a second class area. There must be no second class Canadians and no second class areas of Canada. First, I should like to suggest to the government that more defence orders and public service contracts should be allocated to maritime firms. I suggest this might be done along the same lines as it is done in the United States. In each defence department procurement agency there is a small industries division which can set aside all or part of a government order for military supplies for tendering only by small firms if it is felt these companies can do the job. Most of these small industries are to be found in the retarded areas of the country.

In addition, the 6 per cent preference given under the buy American act to United States firms over foreign companies in bidding for government orders is extended to 12 per cent in the case of labour surplus areas. Before awarding any contract for government supplies to a firm in an areas that has no unemployment problems, any bidder from a labour surplus area whose tender has been within 20 per cent of the successful firm is given a second opportunity to match the latter's price and get the order. The federal government's recently instituted policy of calling for tenders from maritime shipyards only for the building of certain vessels for service on the east coast is a step in the right direction.

Second, we hear much about freight rates. It is our firm belief in Atlantic Canada that there must be a revision of the freight rate structure. As there is a royal commission studying this particular matter perhaps it would not be apt at this point to discuss it further but we certainly hope that the commission will see fit to recommend that provision be made for doing something about our freight rates and the difficulties they impose.

With respect to a capital projects program, we have three pet projects in the maritimes at this moment. First there is the Chignecto canal which we sincerely hope engineering and economic studies will prove should be built. I think all hon. members from the Atlantic provinces regardless of party affiliations stand firmly behind it. There may be one or two exceptions but I know that all those who come from New Brunswick stand behind it completely.

The second project is the causeway which, if it were built, would join Canada to Prince Edward Island. There is a difference there, you will see, between joining Prince Edward Island to Canada and joining Canada to Prince Edward Island.

Finally, there is the corridor road project. This is a plan to build a road across central or northern Maine which would link the maritimes with Montreal and central Canada.

I wish to advance the suggestion that provision should be made for low rate capital loans for new industries and the provision of income tax concessions to industries that might locate in the maritime provinces. We have an economic problem there and there is no question about it. I suppose the government of a country can grow too large but I should like to suggest to the distinguished leader of our government that perhaps the time has arrived when there should be appointed a minister of Atlantic affairs just as we have a minister of northern affairs. We have the problems and we have the men there to solve them under proper direction. If that suggestion were not practical I would suggest as an alternative that a department of government be set up to deal with Atlantic affairs possibly under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton). I think that suggestion commends itself and I would ask the government and the distinguished leader of our country to take my suggestions into consideration.

In conclusion, may I say that the decade that has recently concluded has been one of awakening and of renewed hope in Atlantic Canada. Under the able leadership of our Conservative government we are now confident that many of our hopes and aspirations will be achieved in the decade we are now entering.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting everyone in this chamber. There is a horrible draft at this moment in the chamber.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the remarks of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) relate in any way to the fact that I am rising in my place or to the fact that the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. MacRae) has just resumed his seat.

In the few brief minutes at my disposal before we reach the private members' hour perhaps I may make a few general comments about the reference in the budget to increasing the salaries of some civil servants. I refer to the $15 million interim payment to some 50,000 civil servants and following that, as I understood it, a class by class review with respect to other civil servants. This sounds like a job evaluation study or a co-operative wage study as referred to in private industry in which each job—for instance, that of a stenographer—is assessed and assigned a certain position in the wage structure. A job evaluation program is complex and requires great study and negotiation between union and management and does not occur overnight.

I understood that this was to be one of the functions of the pay research bureau. I understood it was to assess jobs in the public service and relate them to like jobs in private industry evaluating the differences and making recommendations for adjustments in the wage scale applicable to each job category.

The bureau some time ago completed a full year's study in this field and made recommendations through the unemployment insurance commission to the Minister of Finance who promptly shelved it and said he would have nothing to do with the recommendation. Now the bureau is again carrying on the same function for next year. It makes one wonder if the $15 million arose out of the recommendations of the bureau or if it is just a figure the present minister took out of a hat for a particular purpose and not to equate wages in the civil service and industry.

If the $15 million arose from the recommendations of the bureau surely the minister is duty bound to make the report public. If he insists on keeping it as a secret document we are entitled to draw other conclusions.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

PRIVATE BILLS

JOSEPH ALPHONSE YVES JEAN GABRIEL LALONDE

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-35, for the relief of Joseph Alphonse Yves Jean Gabriel Lalonde—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, the last three or four bills we have considered have involved the same individuals as investigator and as counsel for the petitioner and certain patterns have developed as a result of the functions of these two gentlemen. This case is again one of those in which children are involved. There are two teen age children. There is reference in the evidence to where they have been living, with whom they have been living and so on. I do not wish to suggest that there is anything whatsoever wrong with the existing arrangement. In 1955 the petitioner received a legal separation from the superior court of Quebec and was also awarded custody of the two children at the same time. This couple have been separated since 1949.

From reading the evidence it would appear on the surface at least that the attitude and activities of the respondent or mother were not in the least in keeping with what one would expect of a wife and mother. Apparently she absented herself from the home at times and went with people other than her husband. This behaviour continued for quite some time. She would go away for a few days at a time. They have been separated for some 11 years and the father has had the custody of the children. I do not wish to draw any conclusions with regard to this arrangement but certainly after a separation or divorce, regardless of which parent has legal custody of the children, I think the other parent should have the opportunity to spend time with the children because after all the children are theirs.

But with this background and having in mind the fact that in 1955 the father obtained a legal separation and custody of the children, none the less the evidence given to the Senate committee by the petitioner or father indicates, as shown on page 15, that one of the children, the daughter, has lived with her mother at times in New York, Montreal and Ste. Adele. Apparently the daughter moves back and forth from the father to the mother. Regardless of the legal position with respect to custody of the children, it would seem that this situation has existed for some time.

In this case there was also some discussion between the husband and the wife about a divorce. I intend to read the evidence to indicate precisely what the discussion was. I do not want to run afoul of the hon. member for Halifax and have him accuse me of selecting phrases and words out of the evidence in order to paint a particular picture. I suggest to him that in all fairness I have not attempted to do that on any occasion, and if the hon. member for Halifax is going to rise and suggest that is what I am doing in this case then my only alternative is to read all the evidence into the record, which will take considerably more time. There are two references with respect to the discussion about divorce. As found on page 14, Mr. Joyal, counsel for the petitioner, asked the petitioner questions about arrangements. He said:

Q. Did you make any arrangements with your wife so that she might give you evidence for the purpose of obtaining a divorce before this committee?

A. No. In 1956 she came back to Montreal, about four or five months after I found she was in Garden City. She came back and phoned me and wanted to meet me. She said that if I had no objections she was going to take divorce proceedings and I said, no, and she wanted to see a lawyer and apparently she did not go through with it.

Apparently the wife wanted to make some arrangements for a divorce but the husband said no, he did not want to have anything to do with it. Certain other evidence found on page 13 is probably connected with the desire on the part of the wife to obtain a divorce. About a third of the way down the page Senator Isnor asked this question:

Q. Who was the man? Were you given the name?

This was after the petitioner had indicated that he had found out that his wife was living with someone else. The petitioner replied:

A. His name was . . . She was living with him at—

Then he gave the address in Garden City, Long Island.

About a year afterwards she was in the Laurentians and she came to my office and introduced this Mr. . . . to me. I thought that was a little odd.

He may have thought it a little odd but I think we are entitled to wonder whether or not this was also an indication on the part of the wife that she was desirous of getting a divorce, that she wanted to show him the particular person she was living with and perhaps indicate that everything would be all right one way or another if they could get a divorce.

Then there is the evidence of the investigators and again we have Mr. Charron who has acted in a number of these cases. His evidence is again stereotyped and it makes one wonder whether or not what he says happened is in fact all that occurred. Again I must say that I did not hear the remarks that the hon. member for Halifax made from his seat on the last occasion when these bills were being dealt with but in looking at Hansard I find that he inquired whether I never believed anyone who testified under oath. That is not the case at all, neither in this nor in any other instance. This is the evidence given by Mr. Charles Charron and he is bound by it. When one questions that evidence one is not saying that the evidence is incorrect or that Mr. Charron has perjured himself, but it may well be that the full story has not been told. There is often quite a difference between being told the complete story and only part of the story. Where the evidence is not clear, where there are incongruities or strange things seem to exist, we are entitled to wonder about these things and relate them to the other activities in the case. I do not know whether Mr. Joyal or the members of the Senate committee did not want to deal with these things. I think it is necessary to refer to the full examination by Mr. Joyal of Charles Charron, the investigator, and I read from the evidence:

Q. I show you exhibit 2 in this case, which is a photograph?

A. That is Mrs. . . . That is the photograph I had at the time of the investigation.

Q. What investigation did you make with respect to her?

A. I got all the information from Mr. Hetu—

I am jumping to a conclusion here but I believe he was the lawyer who arranged the legal separation in 1955.

—that she was living in New York at . . . Garden City, Long Island, so I went there.

Q. What date?

A. On the 18th of February, 1959.

Q. What happened?

A. We went to . . . about 8 o'clock in the morning—

When he says "we" he is talking about himself and his partner Mr. Morin. I continue:

A. We went to—about eight o'clock in the morning and at nine o'clock we saw a man come out and he went away. We stayed there and at 10.30 we saw a woman come out, Mrs.—the lady on that picture, and she went to a shopping centre not far from there. She had her dinner at the shopping centre, in the restaurant, and came back home with some parcels at 2.30 in the afternoon, and at six at night we saw the same man who went out in the morning come in and at ten o'clock we saw the light go out and at 11.30 we went to the door and there was a big mailbox marked, "—" on the mailbox.

He refers to the name of the corespondent. I continue:

We rang the doorbell several times before the same man we saw going up there at six o'clock came and opened the door. We went in.

All the way in; there was no argument at this stage about asking who he was, or what his name was; he just went in. He went not only in through the door, but into the bedroom. He said:

We went to the bedroom on the left hand side and Mrs.—was lying in the bed, a full size bed. I went near the bed and said, "You are Mrs.—?". She said yes. I showed her the photograph and she admitted that it was a photograph taken of her. So I says to the man, "You are Mr.—?" And he admitted it and he says, "What's this for?" And I told him it was divorce proceedings that Mr.—was taking against his wife, so the man started to get mad and pushed us out and we went out.

Finally, after all of this the man started to get mad. This is very stereotyped sort of evidence that Mr. Charron is quite adept at giving. He seems to glory in it, after having discovered probably that this is the type of evidence that is necessary to meet the tests established by the other place with respect to divorce.

I point out again, if I may, Mr. Chairman, that here are two strangers, unknown to the respondent and the corespondent. Not only that, they are not in the same city and often not in the same country. They are in New York, in Garden City on Long Island, and at 11.30 in the evening after the lights have been out for an hour and a half—and I assume that if this couple were living together as man and wife, as the evidence would indicate they might well have been asleep by that time—this man rang the doorbell several times and a gentleman came to the door and opened it and the two strangers walked in. They walked into the bedroom and asked questions. They asked the lady in bed what was her name and to identify the picture. They got an admission from her as to who she was. Then the man started to get mad, after all this had taken place.

As I indicated before in another case, this might well happen in one instance, but I submit it is stretching coincidence a bit to assume that in every case that Mr. Charron gets involved in the self-same things occur. He goes to a door; he knocks on the door; someone opens it. He walks in to the apartment, the house, or whatever it is. He walks into the bedroom without being asked one question by anybody. He inquires of whoever is in bed what is his or her name. He shows a photograph, and then suddenly the individual who opens the door starts to get a little mad. Perhaps I should express these doubts. I doubt very much whether Mr. Charron was telling the exact truth when he made that statement. The man might have got mad in one particular case, but I do not think you could stretch it to the point of saying that it was absolutely true in each case that Mr. Charron happens to be involved in. I doubt whether this is what occurs.

I submit also that the evidence given by the petitioner is not quite accurate. The wife came back to Montreal in 1956, and about four or five months after her husband discovered that she was in Garden City. She came back and said she wanted a divorce; she was going to take divorce proceedings if he had no objection. On another occasion she brought the gentleman with whom she was living, the corespondent in this case, to the petitioner and introduced him. I submit that in this case there was agreement. There is no argument. There is no contest, and she undoubtedly was not the least bit surprised, neither was the corespondent, when at 11.30 at night a couple of strangers came knocking on their door, walked into the bedroom and asked them what their names were, showed them photographs and then left. I submit there is quite a bit of understanding with respect to this particular case in so far as getting the evidence before the committee is concerned.

There is one other incident which makes one wonder, not about this particular subject matter of divorce but about another matter submitted in evidence. I do not want to put a construction upon someone's words to express what was not there or a thought that was not there, but a particular word or phrase is used which in some circles is taken to mean, not something dishonest particularly but the putting on of a show in order to obtain a certain thing. In some circles it is called a front. When someone puts on a bit of a front it leaves the impression that he is a pretty decent chap, and so on, or that he is using it to gain some other end. This is commonly referred to as a front. This gentleman used this, and I wonder whether it might not be the subject matter of some investigation. At page 13, Senator Isnor asked this question:

Q. Do you still support her?

A. No, I am not supporting her because in 1955, having to make a request to the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for a radio station, I wanted to put up a front in the Laurentian where I intended to establish a radio station, and I ordered a house built for her in Ste. Adele.

I do not know that there is anything wrong with that. The use of that word would indicate that he wanted to leave an impression with the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that he was established in this particular area so that he might get a radio station. This might well require some investigation by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in order to find just how people happen to get radio stations, and whether it is necessary to put on a front to get them.

This is quite apart from adultery in the case itself. Because of the activities of this particular woman during the period of their marriage when they were living together; the husband coming home and finding someone else in his place; the wife being away for a few days and living with another gentleman, and so on, this might put a different complexion on the case. Apart from this, though, apart from the fact that it looks as if there were some arrangement, there was no surprise to the respondent and the co-respondent to find someone knocking on their door at 11.30, and so on, and walking in and asking certain questions about divorce, I submit there is a great deal more to talk about than the conduct of the wife herself.

Mr. Peters: I should like to say a few words on this case because it is unique in that this is the first time there has been an international incident in relation to one of these cases that has come before us. I am greatly surprised that in the state of New York there does not seem to be more objection taken to the method of operation, as outlined by the hon. member for Skeena, of detectives in relationship to the rights of privacy and private property. Something that surprises me in this case is in connection with Mr. Joyal. First I should like to inquire whether Mr. Joyal is the lawyer in these particular cases or whether he is only retained as counsel who handles them in Ottawa and the legal case is handled by somebody else, and that all he does is to present the case. Maybe the sponsor of the bill would like to answer that question.

Mr. McCleave: Yes, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Joyal is an Ottawa lawyer. It sometimes happens in these cases that a Montreal notary—as I think the description is—will start the case and will here counsel here in Ottawa.
